ought so to indulge your anger that you regard your safety and advantage as more important than anger. For you hate these senators, as I think, but you do not wish to have no Senate at all. Assuredly either a king--which must be abominated--or a Senate, which is the sole counsel of a free city, must be possessed. Therefore two things must be done by you at once: you must both remove the old Senate and elect a new one. I shall order the senators to be summoned individually, and I shall consult you concerning the life of each; what you determine concerning each will be done. But before punishment is exacted from the guilty man, you will elect into his place a brave and active man as a new senator.'

"Then he sat down and, when the names had been covered in an urn, ordered the man whose name first fell out by lot to be summoned and brought out from the senate-house. When the name was heard, each man cried that he was evil and wicked and worthy of punishment. Then Pacuvius said: 'I see what sentence has been given concerning this man. He is cast out as evil and wicked; choose a good and just senator.' At first there was silence, from want of a better man to be proposed. Then, when someone, laying aside shame, named somebody, at once a much greater clamor arose: some said they did not know him; others objected now his disgraceful acts, now his lowliness and sordid poverty, or his shameful craft or manner of gain. This happened much more with the second and third senator, so that it appeared that the men repented of the senator himself, but lacked anyone to substitute in his place. For there was no purpose in naming the same men, who had been named for nothing other than to hear reproaches; and all the others were much more lowly and obscure than those who first occurred to their memory."

And indeed, among so many seditions and disturbances of all nations, this must especially be noted: the constitution of the state has very rarely been made better. For if those who rise against the magistrates and citizens are conquered, the ancient form of the state remains; if they conquer, since they are worse than the conquered, they administer it worse. This is the ordinary disaster of the seditious; and I appeal most freely to all history. Whoever considers the outcomes will pronounce it an oracle.

CHAPTER XVI

Various Methods of Restraining Seditions Employed by Different Men

It has seemed good to join together the various methods by which princes have met seditions, and to stuff them, as it were, into a medley--not because they are all to be approved and employed, for some confound everything by malicious deceit, perjury, and cruelty, but because it is nevertheless permissible to fashion similar measures by imitation according to that manner, without crime, for the public safety.

Pompey, as Frontinus relates in Book II, chapter 11, when he regarded the people of Catina as suspect and feared that they would not receive a garrison, asked them to allow the sick among his men meanwhile to recover with them; thereafter, having sent the bravest men in the appearance of invalids, he occupied and held the city. It was indeed moderate in that he did not kill anyone; it was dissembling and fraudulent in that he sent strong men in place of sick men.

Dissembling and fraudulent also was Caesar, who discharged the seditious from service, and then, after the instigators had been killed, received those discharged men again. Hanno acted thoroughly wickedly and with Punic faith. Four thousand men had begun to riot because their pay had not been rendered; first he deceived them by promises, and then betrayed them to the Romans. For, having promised that he would compensate for the injury of the delay by liberality, he brought them back to quiet and obedience. Having done this, he sent them out for plunder and at the same time, through an agent under the guise of a deserter, informed Otacilius that the Gauls would go out to plunder. When ambushes had been placed by him, they were all slaughtered, and Hanno was freed both from the danger of sedition and from payment of their wages, but was bound by the greater crime of perfidy.

With equal perfidy Cassander entrapped Nicanor, who was estranged from him, when he was prefect of Munychia. Lysimachus was much more cruel, because he raged against innocent and pitiable men. Six hundred Autariatae had been stripped of their baggage. He suspected that, as men who had been exasperated, they would stir up a sedition; and so, after they had been led out by fraud, he slaughtered them all. Those of Enna who were killed by Pinarius can be judged to have been killed justly, since they were already contriving a revolt. For when they demanded the keys back, he ordered them to assemble in the theater and deliberate; when they persisted in their opinion there, he ordered them to be killed. Nor can the Spartans be accused of cruelty when, without fraud and falsehood, they sent a plotter into an ambush.

Cinadon had laid plots against the ephors. They sent him into a certain district of Laconia, ostensibly for the sake of a secret affair; there, after being tortured by cavalrymen sent ahead for this purpose, he disclosed his accomplices, whom the ephors immediately killed. Polyaenus, Book II. When three thousand men had revolted from Antigonus, he sent Leonidas to them under the pretense of desertion; Leonidas first persuaded them not to join one another, and thereafter betrayed them themselves.

When the Macedonians frequently rioted against Alexander but the Persians loved him, he elevated the latter, gave them Persian commanders and Persian reinforcements. Diodorus Siculus, Book XVII. By that transfer to the Persians he restrained open violence, but not the monstrous hatreds by which he was afterwards overwhelmed and drank poison.

Julius Caesar broke up a sedition by fortunate rashness, something which can be done only if the man against whom they rage possesses great authority. Pompey, Caesar's son-in-law, did the same. He was a man of great spirit. When the soldiers threatened that they would seize the money which was to be carried in the triumph, and when his friends advised him that he should instead divide it among them himself, he answered that he would die rather than succumb to military license. After chastising the soldiers in a stern address, he threw the laurelled fasces before them so that they might begin their plundering with these. These men acted thus for their own safety, but Antigonus for another's. For he skillfully quieted a sedition of the soldiers against Antipater. They were demanding their pay from a man who was destitute, and very little prevented them from stoning him. Antigonus advanced over a bridge like a man about to address an assembly; they yielded from his path and followed to hear what he wished to say. Meanwhile, while he defended Antipater in a long speech, the latter escaped. Polyaenus, Book IV.

Hamilcar's stratagem against deserters and those contriving sedition was remarkable, especially because it was free of Punic malice. When Gauls in great numbers were deserting from him to the Romans, he ordered his most trustworthy men to feign desertion and to kill the Romans who came to receive them. Thus neither did others flee, nor did the Romans receive fugitives.

Eumenes also acted in a civic manner, for by borrowing money from his rivals he defended his own safety; for lest they lose their money, they protected him with great fidelity. In that way certain cities in Germany were drawn into an alliance in war, lest they lose what they had already expended. Leucon preserved himself in the same manner, but added a falsehood. For, being assailed by plots, he received money on loan from merchants, alleging that his enemies had been surrendered to him through a betrayal. After receiving the money, he acknowledged the plots and took the merchants as bodyguards; he defeated the plotters.

It seems more proper to impostors than to princes to meet seditions, both civil and military, by forged letters as though written by a counterfeiter's hand; yet many have also employed this. For commanders themselves are accustomed to invent false plans, ambushes, betrayals, flights for refuge, and panic terrors, so that the soldier may be prepared for everything and may become thoroughly acquainted with the thoughts of all. When letters concerning Eumenes' life had been scattered in his camp, he gave thanks because no one had sought the price of the crime, and added that he himself had scattered the letters for the sake of making a test. Besides, he said that Antigonus did not wish to conquer in such a way as to establish in his own person a most wicked example.

I marvel that Alexander the Great, who professed such strength of mind, cast himself down to such base things as to pry into the secrets of all his men who had written letters to Macedonia. For when, while stationed in Hyrcania, he had advised them to write letters to their people with the envoys whom he was sending into Macedonia, he arranged for the letters to be recalled from the journey and read them; and against those whom he found to have written anything against him he conducted himself as an enemy. It was an altogether dangerous business, and one which compelled the king to be cruel. Polyaenus, Book IV; Curtius and others.

Ingeniously, Iphicrates equipped a fleet in hostile attire and, when he was received with unrestrained eagerness by those whom he suspected, plundered the city. By an alien dress Datanes deceived both his own men and his enemies; for, when he knew that plots were being laid against him, he fought in another's dress in battle, and thus was able both to remain concealed and to mark the plotters.

The things tyrants have done in this kind are abominable. Augustus was defiled by adulteries with matrons; yet his friends excused him more disgracefully by saying that, because he was assailed by many plots, he sought out the secrets of husbands by means of those shameful acts. Dionysius was more cruel in this kind. For he enlisted female musicians and prostitutes, and, after they had been tortured, inquired what their lovers had said concerning the tyranny; he afterwards killed those who had spoken dangerously.

He also sometimes pretended that he was dead or ill, so that he might explore men's inclinations. Dionysius certainly spread a report among the soldiers that he had been killed; he then slaughtered those who had shown joy at the event. He also did the same when he had published abroad that he was in extreme danger; for, when many men rejoiced, he came forth with his bodyguard and ordered them to be slaughtered. By a theatrical device as well, after hearing an itinerant performer, he avoided real dangers and terrified those who were contriving sedition. A certain man at Syracuse professed that he knew an art by which plotters could be recognized and guarded against. Having been admitted to Dionysius, he said, “If you say that you know plotters beforehand.” Dionysius, after giving great rewards to the teacher, boasted that he had learned a wonderful art of escaping plots, and was safer because of it. But this was the imposture of a madman; for that same man who taught Dionysius such a secret disclosed it to others also. Nor is it likely that it was betrayed by Dionysius, since by it he could be safer only so long as it was kept silent.

To impede a sedition it has often been profitable to conceal it or to show oneself trustful toward the very men involved. Frederick, having understood that the men of San Miniato were looking toward rebellion, indicated that he wished to place treasures and captives among them. In place of treasure he sent concealed weapons, and for captives, brave soldiers in bonds, who occupied the town and brought it back under Frederick's dominion. Thus Eumenes, when he was being neglected by Antigenes and Teutamus, commanders of the Argyraspids--for they did not come to his tent--lest this evil spread to others, said that he had been warned by a twofold dream to erect a tent for Alexander and to conduct all business in it. Thus he obtained the result that even his rivals were compelled to come. Polyaenus, Book IV.

Among men who have been stirred up and are powerful, too, it is advantageous to conceal what one knows. Antipater acted cautiously with the earlier army of the Naxians, who, when Alexander's death was heard, had assembled to assail his dominion. Pretending that he did not know with what intention they had come, he thanked them because they had assembled to bring aid to Alexander against the Lacedaemonians, and added that he would write this to the king. But because their service was not necessary to him at present, he urged them to depart for their homes; and by this assertion he dispelled the danger that threatened from the revolution. Frontinus, Book II, chapter 11. This has place especially when others are in danger of rioting after the example of those who desert. Agesilaus arranged for the shields of fugitives to be removed by night, lest it become known to the soldiers that there was so much perfidy and so great a multitude of deserters.

Although there is much importance in the discord of enemies, nevertheless they are not easily to be provoked, for they readily unite against a common danger. Therefore one must rather act so that they are separated, as Dionysius did when he wished to deprive the veterans of their pay. A sedition was stirred up, but he professed that he would employ the older men in guarding fortifications and composed the tumult for the present. Afterwards, when he had divided them among the garrisons, he took their pay away from them while they were separated.

It is also a wicked method of preventing seditions to break peoples by luxury, something which many kings have done. When Xerxes ordered the Babylonians to devote themselves to pleasures and lay down their arms, Croesus the Lydians, and Phalaris the Leontines, thought that they should be restrained by the same bond of pleasures. But it is not safe; for when morals have been corrupted by that manner of life, many squander their own property and are therefore compelled to undertake revolutions. In addition, they become unwarlike and poor, so that they are able to assist the prince neither by labor nor money.

A sedition has often been composed by the intervention of holy and religious men. When the inhabitants of Walcheren had obtained, with the aid of Saint Willibrord, a noble and miraculous victory against Robert the Younger, son of Baldwin, Count of Flanders, and then afterwards, in a civil and intestine war--the cause is not stated--had been divided into the parties of factions, they raged mutually against one another, so that they killed the more noble chief men of the island. No one had free opportunity of entering or leaving; no one had the ability to approach sacred buildings or sacrifices, even on the very day of Parasceve, without an array of arms, an assembly of fellow tribesmen, and a band of attendants. Nor was there an end or measure to such fury and discord until, after many funerals of their own people, by common counsel and embassy, the abbot Thiofrid, the lover of Christ--these are Victor's words--was summoned from Echternach and composed the minds of the citizens by miracles, prayers, and authority, and with great labor restored peace.

Thus writes the Reverend Lord Abbot of Echternach, whose Flowers of the Epitaph of the Saints our Father John Roberti, after almost 550 years, first published at Luxembourg in the year 1619 and illustrated with his most learned notes; and they append the aforesaid history, described most copiously, to the life of Thiofrid. It is worthy to be read by the heretical and Catholic inhabitants of Walcheren, for the confusion of perfidy or the confirmation of faith. What religion could do among Christians, superstition could sometimes do among the gentiles. When the Egyptians had revolted through hatred of Persian cruelty, Darius came at the time when they were mourning the dead Apis and proclaimed that he would give one hundred talents of gold to the man who found a new Apis. Marveling at the king's piety, they returned to obedience. Polyaenus, Book VII.

Betrayals must be met by enticing suspected men with a price and a greater hope. Thus Marcellus drew over to himself Bantius of Nola, who inclined toward the Carthaginians and was agitating the minds of his fellow citizens. It is a matter of the greatest skill to turn betrayal to one's own advantage. Thus Arsames, himself a seditious man, met both betrayal and sedition. A prefect of cavalry had promised that in the engagement he would go over to the other side. Arsames, after holding an inquiry about him by night, discovered the crime; and so he clothed another man in the prefect's garments and equipped his most faithful soldiers with cavalry arms. When the signal was given by the enemy, he ordered them to cross over and cut down their rear; by this stratagem he obtained a distinguished victory. Polyaenus, Book VII.

It is especially important to impress hatred of a betrayer upon men's minds. Antigonus and Caesar loved betrayal but hated betrayers. Philip loved men who were going to betray, but when they had already betrayed, he hated them exceedingly. Indeed, he also hated those who were going to betray, but pretended to love them. Lysimachus rewarded Andragathus, the betrayer of Amphipolis, magnificently, but afterwards killed him by torture. For these words especially agree with such men:

> May no land, no seas be able
> To receive them.
>
> Men for whom there is nowhere a place among the Danaans, and the
>
> Dardanians themselves, moreover, are hostile and demand punishments with blood.

CHAPTER XVII

Public Peace Has Been Disturbed Not by Catholics, but by the Seditions of Sectarians

Both my purpose and the bitterness of the times compel me to treat many matters concerning the composing of the seditions of our country. That there is so great a disturbance in the Empire, so great a distrust among the princes, and so great a mutual hostility toward the Imperial Majesty as there was not even in the most exasperated times is taught by the diets and public assemblies. The beginnings of almost all of them contain complaints about discord, contention, lawsuits, and distrust, while the negotiators have thus far sought remedies. Yet it appears marvelous to foreign nations, and posterity will scarcely believe it, that now for ninety years peace has been negotiated among princely colleagues and relatives, in the sight of emperors who are most desirous of peace, while alienation of minds and petty wars nevertheless endure--especially since war would be equally ruinous and mournful to either party, and since no one comes to those diets who does not profess that he is most desirous of peace.

I inquire into the cause of so great an evil; for just as in medicine it is necessary for the remedies to know the cause of the disease, so a certain harmful humor enclosed in this vast body of the most august Empire must be recognized. In various places and with diverse effect it disturbs the duly tempered harmony and concord of the limbs and members; some it inflames contrary to nature, some it wastes away, and some it tears apart by gnawing; and while it assails the individual parts, it infests all alike. I shall disclose in what part this evil is situated and reigns.

Accordingly, I determine as follows. The causes of all discords, hatreds, civil wars, and rebellion in the Roman Empire are the Lutheran and Calvinist preachers, by whatever name they are called and in whatever sect they live. Nor are the Anabaptists innocent; but because their audacity has once been broken, their malice now lacks force and arms. Therefore they now cover themselves with a fox's skin until they acquire a lion's and grow strong enough to carry the matter through. I ask the reader so to regard and weigh the reasons that he does not pronounce sentence from a preoccupied judgment.

The first reason. For conserving the Empire and preserving peace, the authority of the ruler is necessary; it is stronger against rebellions and contempt than all citadels and even arms. Majesty is the safeguard of empire. The preaching innovators, so far as lay in them, dissolved all its force, and attempted to bring the matter to such a point that there would be neither admiration nor fear of the highest power, the two things by which authority, which is the prop of governments, is sustained. They therefore undertook to cut the sinews of the Empire; thence audacity broke the peace in the hope of impunity, and that enticement gradually drew many men so that they now drew authority to themselves.

> οὐ γὰρ πεφύκασιν αἰδοῖ πειθαρχεῖν, ἀλλὰ φόβῳ· οὐδ᾽ ἀπέχεσθαι τῶν φαύλων διὰ τὸ αἰσχρόν, ἀλλὰ διὰ τὰς τιμωρίας.

For they have not been born in such a way that they obey shame, but so that they obey fear; nor that they abstain from wicked things because of their disgracefulness, but because of punishments and penalty.

But how shall I show that the innovators blunted the edge of august authority, detracted from majesty, and befouled it with the contempt of every most worthless man? This indeed will hardly be laborious. In the volumes of Luther there are entire invectives against princes, collected even by Catholics. It is not my intention to report all of them--indeed, scarcely any--because Luther's authority has not yet been abolished from the minds of all, and esteem for legitimate power is languishing more than it ought. It is sufficient to have taught the matter by one or two examples.

In his little book On the War against the Turks, he denies that the emperor is the head of the Christian state and defender of the Gospel or of the faith. The Church, he says, assuredly ought to have another defender than the emperor and kings, for they are the worst enemies of Christianity and the faith. In the little book On Secular Power, he says that princes are for the most part either the foremost fools or the most abominable scoundrels.

But lest we attribute these things to Luther's fervor alone, behold that most timorous man Philip. In an epistle to Lord Burchard Mithobius: “Although I have often learned with great sorrow that the minds τῶν ἀρχόντων [of rulers] are exceedingly inconstant”--he speaks of his own rulers, whose diligence in plundering monasteries he also censures. “Most princes even before this time have been much more diligent in plundering monasteries than in establishing παροικίας [parishes] and schools. But let us await the coming year, which perhaps will shake from our heroes their lethargy, games, pleasures, loves, and quarrels. Thus far some have raged against churches, others have invented corruptions of doctrine, contended with obscene pamphlets, invented tasteless dialogues, delighted themselves with venereal pleasures, neglected churches and schools, and contended in ambition; now Nemesis draws near an enemy who is not to be despised.”

And in an epistle to Milichius, he says that cities have been deserted and betrayed by cowardly princes. What the Calvinists think about the princes of the Empire and the emperor himself I have already shown often enough: namely, that the Empire is the apocalyptic beast, the slayer of the saints; that to admire the Empire excessively and to call it August is to adore the Devil or Dragon.

But this doctrine was invented for overthrowing the Empire. Therefore the preachers endeavor to overthrow the Empire. But because that world cannot be inverted without a crash, and so great a body cannot be transferred without dissolution, so great a ruin must necessarily be preceded by many and most violent convulsions.

The second reason. Those by whose arts the power of the Empire is attacked and weakened furnish the cause of tumults and seditions. For what is anger without strength? What is the shadow of a great name? That Empire which rests upon the mere opinion of the multitude and esteem for antiquity cannot stand; power, wealth, arms, counsels, and alliances must be present, or else the first man who has dared to push the column dislocated from its base will overthrow it. But by the insidious and also open machinations, preparations, and battles of the innovators, the power of the Empire has been afflicted; and the fact that it has not yet fallen it owes to its emperors, to the Catholic princes, to certain Protestant princes as well as certain free states. It credits its preservation to no preacher.

What? Would those pitiable men disturb the Empire? As though there were no danger even to the strongest from the weak. For great frauds there is no need of a great spirit, but of an evil one. When affairs have been disturbed, Sinon as victor mingles fires. What lions and bears can do, vipers and blister beetles can do also. The acrimony of the poison compensates for weakness of strength. I prove that the preachers are implicated in this fault.

For first they attempted to divert, wear away, and ruin wealth--the sinews of war, the ornaments of peace, and arms.

For they converted the estates, possessions, and ornaments of very many churches to other uses and, as Melanchthon bears witness, were diligent in plundering monasteries. But that wealth was taken from the Empire, because old tenants who were faithful subjects of the Empire were ordered to migrate, without right and without legitimate process. Monasteries, canonries, prelatures, and bishoprics were the plunder of secular princes; names, places, and the valuation will tell to whose courts annual accounts are rendered concerning the spoil of the Lord. A double loss arose from this for the Empire. For neither were monetary subsidies sent by those despoiled, and the others, who were terrified by the example of those who had been plundered, while their fortunes hung in uncertainty and depended upon the disposition of their neighbors, were weaker for defending the state in which they saw themselves oppressed, having been deserted by the fellowship of their colleagues.

Much of its former power therefore departed in this way by the counsel of the preachers. Yet their own greed deceived them; for when they saw that they were heard with inclined ears by princes and cultivated by the people, they did not doubt that they would be received into the dignities of the deposed prelates and would become prosperous after being begging and itinerant versifiers. But they were mistaken. When the matter came to the point, the treasury prevailed; they themselves were sprinkled with a slender little portion, lest they bark, not so that they might be satisfied.

By this convulsion, therefore, the tributes and revenues of the Empire were diminished, that is, the ornaments of peace and the supports of war. For neither can the repose of the Empire be possessed without arms, nor arms without pay, nor pay without tributes. But what system of tributes will there be if those who transferred the possessions of others to themselves have no will to contribute, while the despoiled are protected by πενίᾳ [poverty] and ἀπορίᾳ [want], divinities of ill omen?

Secondly, in so many diets and assemblies, which have now been multiplied for ninety years, so much expense has been expended upon lawsuits and contentions and upon mutual skirmishes as would have sufficed for a Turkish war. I appeal to the princes' very accounts and to the expenses made upon journeys, envoys, and diets.

Thirdly, with Luther as its author and Müntzer as its agent, the Peasants' War was kindled, in which fortresses, monasteries, and churches were overthrown, and at last the obstinate peasants were destroyed by slaughter. Whoever has not learned to reckon this among the losses does not know that fields and farmers are the foundation of the treasury.

Fourthly, Luther and his followers stirred up intestine wars; upon these was incurred expense and poured out blood with which Hungary and Thrace, even Constantinople itself, could have been acquired. To wit, after various disasters, almost all non-Catholic Germany conspired against the emperor. They record that there were eighty thousand infantry and ten thousand cavalry in the camp of the rebels, besides garrisons of towns and the remaining equipment. Why should I then relate other lesser things, such as the devastation of Brandenburg, the wars of Cologne and Alsace, and the rest? The beginnings of all those things were stirred up by the innovators while they attempted to wrest ancient possessions from the orthodox.

Nor yet does restless novelty, impatient of peace, stop here. How often has Belgium been aided with money and men? How often have the Huguenots in France been strengthened against their own kings? The fields of France and Belgium are still growing fat with the corpses of Germans. Who can wonder that the power and strength of the Empire, fighting against itself and letting blood so often, are drained away? Who can wonder that it has neither spirit nor resources against the Turks, when everything is expended at home?

Consider even the present condition: Germany must be drained by daily expenses. For behold the standards, equal eagles, and javelins threatening javelins. Adversaries intent upon an occasion have sometimes terrified Catholics by sudden expeditions; at last they conspired among themselves and entered into alliances with foreigners. And so, with the emperor approving, they impelled the Catholics mutually to bind themselves by a holy confederation necessary for protecting their affairs that remained. Movements therefore arise from both sides: war is prepared there, defense here; money is contributed even in peace; commanders for war are chosen; pay for future wars is given to centurions; provisions and equipment are procured. German felicity would have deserved congratulation if it armed itself in this manner against the enemy. Now, through fear of neighbors who, at the trumpet call of their preachers, clamor for wars and arms and promise priestly robes to the soldier, those expenses must be incurred.

The Empire therefore collapses beneath its own mass and is arrayed against itself; hence it is weak against foreigners and, its strength poured out in domestic conflicts, will be conquered by an unwarlike enemy unless caution is taken. But what is the origin of so great an evil? Whence comes so enduring a mutual hostility, sometimes making war, always threatening, never thinking rightly? From those who lie upon the goods of Catholics, for whom it is too much that bishops live, who, having been baited by the plundering of the Church, regard whatever is denied

The Empire of Germany was formerly strong not only by its own majesty and might, but also by the love and alliances of its neighbors. The innovators undertook to cut off these aids and altogether strip us of the assistance of allies. Faithful Italy and Spain have always furnished the strongest assistance against the Ottomans, kingdoms which scorn truces and peace with the Turks; we read that a ready force, and one especially feared by the Turks, came from Belgium; nor must there be doubt about a French force, since the kings have confirmed friendship by affinity.

What do the innovators do here? The pontiff is the beast; the Florentine, the Mantuan, and the Spaniard fornicate with the Babylonian harlot. You, Briton, burn Italy, kill, devour flesh. But what? While the pontiff, the princes of Italy, and the Spaniards in part oppose their own bodies for the Empire, in part support soldiers at their own expense, contribute money, and make vows, do you lay plots? The Lutherans accuse the Calvinists of inclination toward the Turk; they warn their princes to adhere to the Catholics rather than to the Zwinglians, because the pope wages wars for the Empire, while the Calvinists deny subsidies to Caesar and carry the Eastern Antichrist under their breast, as I proved in the book On Syncretism, or False Peace.

Who, therefore, disturbs the peace? Is it the man who says that the most faithful allies must be retained in friendship? Or the man who neither thinks of contributing to the war himself and seeks an enemy throughout the whole world for the defenders of the Empire?

The third reason. Those are guilty of violating peace who have taught men to occupy the possessions of others by injury; or, if they allege some element of right and equity in that usurpation, who have entered upon possession by no judgment and no order, who flee the sentence of courts, and persuade men to possess and persevere by force or deceit. These have been the pursuits of the preachers, these their endeavors from their very cradle.

And concerning the Zwinglians, indeed, the matter is public: in the Diet of Augsburg itself they boasted of armies, alliances of foreign nations, and divisions of bishoprics, as is found in Melanchthon's epistle to Philip, Prince of Hesse. But what need is there of my proof? Let the acts of the Imperial Chamber at Speyer be inspected: supplications, formal declarations of right, appeals, pending suits, and inveterate suits. Catholics complain that possessions have been snatched from them wrongfully, by force and deceit, through the ministers; they wish to try the remedies of law; they are and have been the plaintiffs; they arraign their adversaries for extortion; Caesar assigns judges of recovery. There is therefore no doubt that those men gave the beginning to the suit who drove from ancestral estates a possessor in good faith, the peaceful possessor of an undoubted inheritance.

“But the Catholics were unjust possessors; therefore the lordships had to be vindicated and transferred to us.” I shall consider the question of right later. If they appeal to law, let them come under law to a formal joining of hands; let the matter be decided by law, and let them not proceed by force alone. But why were those possessors unjust who were possessors by the gift, foundation, and laws of Charlemagne, Henry, and other pious emperors and princes? There was a common interpretation of imperial laws, a common understanding of municipal laws, a common use and practice of law, and the decisions of tribunals. According to this law they were legitimate possessors, quietly and without challenge occupying dominion over their own property.

By the counsel of the innovators, right or the interpretation of right was changed, and the minds of princes were changed; with the new religion, the old form of the state ceased. By confiscation, fine, exile, and plunder, by a new and most unjust law, proceedings were taken against those whom the customary and long-enduring protections of the laws defended. The private treasury seized so many bishoprics, abbeys, colleges, monasteries, hospitals, and schools; for to the very ministers of the robberies, as to hunting dogs for sharpening their keenness, small particles from the plunder were divided.

Who moved the war? Was it the man who invoked the laws and the magistrate while he was being expelled? Or truly the man who drove an old tenant out without law? You snatch everything from its ancient owners because they did not embrace a new opinion which fought against ancient laws and customs, and do you accuse them of violating peace? “Let them become Evangelicals,” you will say, “and they may keep their own property for themselves.” I do not know whether they could protect their possessions by changing their faith. This I know: it was provided by no ancient law that possessions were safe and preserved intact only for those who call themselves Evangelicals. This new law, therefore, which is opposed to all ancient rights, customs, and privileges, was the cause of the discords.

The fourth reason. Those men gave the cause of seditions and tumults whom the legitimate magistrate condemned for violating peace, for whose restraint assemblies were proclaimed, laws enacted, and judgments instituted--not those in response to whose tears and prayers these things were granted, for the relieving of whose calamities and the mitigating of whose exiles these protections were prepared.

You expelled me from my possession by your law, stripped me of my goods and annual revenues, and punished even my reputation. I lie at Caesar's feet; I implore the noble office of the judge and the assistance of the laws. What remains except that at your command Caesar should order me to be led away as a violator of public peace? I possessed by ancient law and faith; I was expelled by no law. I complain of this to Caesar, and behold, I hear that I am seditious.

What, therefore, of Caesar and the Roman Empire itself? The Pandects, the Code, and the Novels protect me; the Golden Bull of Charles IV, issued in the year 1356, protects me; the Reformation of Frederick III in the year 1442 protects me; the declaration made by Maximilian I in the year 1500 defends me.

But Charles V identifies you as the author of the discords at Worms in the year 1521, at Augsburg in the years 1521 and 1530, at Speyer in the years 1526 and 1529, and in the years 1542 and 1544, and in innumerable other places; he confirms the judgment of the Chamber and forbids plunderings and spoliations. A General Council is sought and awaited by all; meanwhile I was expelled before the Council and am not restored after the Council. Despoiled before I was accused, amid punishment and exile I await the sentence of the Council to which you too appealed. Let me be permitted to grieve over these things with myself. Why do you insult me as I lie fallen and attempt to transfer to me the fault for violated peace? You were unwilling to approach the Council, deservedly so, because you possessed without right. Invited to the Colloquy of Worms in the year 1557, you departed, overcome by the discord and mutual hatred of your own men; meanwhile each party lives upon my plunder, although opposed to the other. Am I the cause of the discord because I did not immediately die out?

The fifth reason. Let us look at the acts themselves. After they had occupied many goods of Catholics, in the year 1541, lest war arise, the Catholics were compelled to suspend the actions which they possessed against the invaders, as was established in the Decree of Regensburg--but under this law, that the hands of the Evangelicals should now stop and that they should not carry out new spoliations. But who could stop men hurrying toward other things, always with a new thirst? For what did princes not learn from those Harpies? Scenting gain from every occasion, the preachers advised that our wings be cut in such a way that they could not grow again; every fold and every designation for plundering was invented.

For in the meantime the bishoprics of Magdeburg, Bremen, Halberstadt, Verden, Osnabrück, Minden, Lübeck, Utrecht, Cammin, Schwerin, Gdańsk, Brandenburg, Ratzeburg, Schleswig, Hamelburg, and Lebus were snatched away, and likewise both celebrated and small monasteries. Nothing else remained except that they carry everything away together with the dust. Priests were expelled and temples laid waste, contrary to the agreements and covenants and to Caesar's mandates issued at Speyer in the year 1544. Caesar therefore decreed that he would appoint commissioners because of the ecclesiastical jurisdictions and goods that had been invaded. Certainly they had not been invaded by us, but by the violators of peace.

The disaster of Germany then followed, when they openly rebelled against Caesar. We assuredly did not arm Saxony and Hesse. We neither impede reviews of the Chamber nor call Caesar's power into doubt, something repeatedly done at the last diets by the envoys of the Correspondents. Concerning this matter, let the acts published by them be seen, and the author who wrote On the Disturbed Condition of the Empire.

The sixth reason. Those by whose counsel war, plots, and betrayals were made against Caesar violated the peace; but the years 1544, 1545, 1546, and those following teach that the innovators did this.

Deservedly, therefore, Catholics also wage war on their own behalf. For if the Landgrave rightly told Caesar at Frankfurt in the year 1546 that nothing else had been transacted among the Protestants except how they might both remain in their own religion and repel unjust force, who can doubt that Caesar necessarily had to wage war in order to repel unjust force from so many subjects? Who can deny that a just cause of war was given to the Catholics, when they experienced that they were stripped of goods contrary to Caesar's edicts and laws and deprived of the exercise of the ancient religion?

Did not certain princes deny Caesar the appellation of August Majesty? Otherwise, they thought it was not permissible to wage war against him. Sleidan, Book XVII. As though, truly, once you have taken away the name of authority, it is then permissible to fight against the magistrate. At the same time they stirred up both the king of France and the Swiss against Caesar, but they were mocked by the Frenchman and rejected by the Swiss.

But there is no need for me to transfer the fault for the wars to my adversaries, nor is it fitting for the innovators themselves to deny it, since the case of men who have confessed need not be pleaded. Ulrich of Württemberg implores Caesar's mercy and asks that for Christ's sake he pardon him. He does not place his protection in his own innocence, but in the fact that he has found Caesar's clemency to be certain, a clemency which Caesar is accustomed to employ toward suppliants; there was, he says, more than one proof of this fact, and indeed one produced a few years before in the case of certain men from the order of princes who perhaps had furnished Caesar with no little greater cause of offense than he himself had. And his envoys said that he openly confessed his fault and grieved vehemently over the crime committed. Sleidan, Book XVIII.

Frederick the Palatine also came to Halle to seek pardon. A little later the envoys of Ulm came to Caesar and, when as suppliants they acknowledged their fault and begged forgiveness, they were reconciled. But the envoys of Memmingen, Biberach, Ravensburg, Kempten, and Isny say that it happened partly by their own error and partly by the fault of others that they transgressed against Caesar. Indeed, the people of Strasbourg and others also seek pardon. Caesar's envoys at Ulm in the year 1547 accuse them of not only having rebelled themselves, but also of having impelled others to do the same and of having disturbed everything throughout Germany in violation of laws and right. Nor does the Landgrave, as Caesar's suppliant, deny it.

We therefore have the authors of the tumults now accused by their own judgment. But the cause of all the evils is the dissension of religion, concerning which the emperor rightly said in the year 1547: “Unless it is composed, peace cannot be established at all.” Thence it followed that right was not administered. The emperor deservedly judges that the fact that for some time no justice was administered pertains to the infamy and injury of Germany. But who is the author of the injustice except the man who distrusted his cause, except the man who, when the trumpet sounded, compelled the laws to be silent?

The seventh reason. A man is guilty of violating peace if he prevents justice from being administered and prevents justice from being able to have an avenger or executor. But how greatly the sectarian ministers labored to remove from their midst all tribunals except those they themselves erected! At the beginning, in the year 1521, Luther burned the canon law, as though he were free from every fear of judgments if he burned the parchments. Then they most earnestly demanded that the Imperial Chamber not pronounce against them; they impeded reviews, by which art they evaded very many sentences.

When appeal was made to Caesar's court, they denied its jurisdiction; they wished the causes of principalities and counties to be committed to the estates of the Empire. When the matter came to the diets, they were unwilling that the greater number of votes should prevail, but rather those to which they attributed greater soundness. Which were those? The votes of the few who call themselves the Correspondents.

What, then, must pitiable Catholics do if someone from among the Calvinists invades them? Let a Catholic flee to the Chamber? A review will be sought and will not be granted. To Caesar's tribunal? They will deny that Caesar can decree without the consent of the estates. They will rescind the sentence, as the most unconquered Emperor Matthias declares was done in the affair of Aachen. Do you appeal at a diet of the Empire to the venerable Senate of the most illustrious princes? One will have to abide not by the greater part of the votes, but by the lesser or the least.

What if that least part, which wishes itself to be sounder, judges everything in the Calvinist manner: that Catholics are Antichristians, to be burned and devoured, and delivers us to Du Plessis, who would die from joy at our punishments? What if the greater part cries that this is contrary to the law of nations, while the lesser part thinks itself sounder? It is marvelous that they could propose these things without blushing.

Will you believe this, posterity--that there were men in the Roman Empire, founded upon so many laws and ordered by so many dignities, who wished to be exempted from all laws and judgments and, by an unheard-of oligarchy, to draw to themselves the jurisdiction of all the princes and indeed of the August Emperor himself? No one has anything to hope for in such a condition if he is not among the Correspondents; no one has anything to fear if he is going to have men of his own faction as judges. But if these things continue to hasten onward in their course, what at last will this sacrosanct Empire be except a great brigandage? For where the laws have been trampled down, judgments removed, and the authority of magistrates vanquished, what will be right and lawful hereafter except every act of the superior, every title of the stronger? For what the man who conquers has himself done will be judged lawful.

CHAPTER XVIII

Civil Peace Can Scarcely Be Obtained in the Roman Empire So Long as the Preachers Disturb Ecclesiastical Peace

My discourse concerns true peace. I judge that this can scarcely be safe and enduring in Germany, my dearest country, among the diverse members of one Empire, without suspicions and offenses and without anxious expectation of war, unless the importunate and furious madness of the ministers, especially the Calvinists, is restrained and reduced to measure in its calumniating and disturbing of everything. For they disturb ecclesiastical peace in such a way that they remove civil peace from the midst. There are many and most weighty reasons for proving this matter.

The first reason. True religion and piety possess sharp goads and, when aided and ruled by divine grace, are victorious even over tortures and death. Superstition too is a vehement thing and, through its own timidity, headlong; when it grows strong, it engenders heresy and magic, always restless and, if opposed, savage. “All men,” says Cicero in the sixth action against Verres, “are moved by religion, and they judge that the ancestral gods whom they received from their forefathers must be diligently worshiped and retained by them.” All men without exception: not only those whom true piety joins to the true and only God who is to be worshiped, but also those whom error holds in bondage and charms with the images of false divinities, whom love of their own opinions blinds so that they do not behold the truth.

The cause is that all judge temporal or eternal salvation, and most judge both, to be at stake in a religious controversy. Therefore we see that, when religion is introduced, the populace is stirred up by the slightest impulse, and that seditions already stirred are composed by the same means. Peoples roar when they see a new religion imposed upon them, as recently at Berlin. Whenever they see religion changed, they believe that Christ is snatched from them, that they are delivered into the power of the demon, and that they are consigned to eternal fires--except where they have already become accustomed to changes and huckstering and hold faith among the adiaphora, dependent upon the will of their princes.

The preachers abuse this inclination of peoples and their zealous conviction, and they labor to bring everyone over to their own opinion: first by blandishments, then by general edicts and a change in the exercise and rites of the Church. How greatly did the Lutherans labor in the Palatinate to expel the Catholics? By what a fine stratagem did the Calvinists cast out the Lutherans? With what great anger did the Lutherans, returning from exile, proscribe the Calvinists? How skillfully did the proscribed Calvinists at last avenge themselves upon those who had proscribed them? And these things were transacted not by disputation alone, but by the authority and power of most illustrious princes.

In these disturbances, what confidence and charity could there be either among the Lutherans toward Frederick and Casimir or among the Calvinists toward Louis? Do they not judge those princes to be the enemies of their souls through whom they are most firmly persuaded that they are despoiled of true teachers and assigned to false teachers and seducers? Let the supplications of the citizens of Heidelberg to Casimir the Administrator be seen. Can it be that the Calvinists whom Louis the Elector expelled could have loved him and wished him to be powerful and secure? They cried that by his command and forces they themselves and the truth were oppressed, and they were persuaded that by his death salvation would return to them.

The ministers on either side, both Lutherans and Calvinists, each impelled the subjects toward his own opinion; they vociferated that a contest had been instituted concerning supreme salvation, concerning eternal life and death. They openly hated the opposing counselors and preachers, at whose instigation the princes changed religion. Would they love the prince without whom those men could do nothing? Would they love the prince who would give away the salvation of his subjects, and indeed their eternal salvation, to the desires of others? Since, therefore, from year to year and day to day the meddlesomeness and vanity of the preachers seeks a change of religion, there cannot fail to be as many causes of alienation, discord, and distrust as there are attempted changes. Luther changed religion; Melanchthon, Flacius Illyricus, Osiander, Major, and the Ubiquitarians altered it yet again after it was changed--all with disturbances and a convulsion of the parts of the Empire.

The second reason. From that restless and perverse zeal of the ministers of the new Gospel arise a grave struggle and perpetual contentions. For what praiseworthy charity effects among the orthodox, that all should desire to come to knowledge of the truth, corrupted depravity attempts among tribunician agitators, so that they may infect everyone with their own contagion. Since they cannot do this by another way, despising mild remedies, they meditate exiles, confiscations, proscriptions, and tortures. The nine children of Arminius complain in a preface to the Estates of Holland that this occurs.

Let that sect which with more than human artifice feigns gentleness and innocence be our example. With what unbridled lust, with what barbarous cruelty did it exercise tyranny? How clearly did it demonstrate what madness lay hidden beneath the fleece of a gentle animal! What comparable deed did the infamous cruelty of the Arians or Circumcellions perpetrate? And yet that heresy, relying upon a single town, not only dared to hope for dominion over the world--which is excessively to the disgrace of the German nation--but, after sending envoys in every direction, attempted it.

To me, assuredly, that Anabaptist portent appeared not so marvelous when it decreed those crimes--for it had heretics and tyrants whom it might imitate--as when it applied itself with such ardor to the propagation of its sect. Every error possesses this quality, that it is fertile; every heretic is an importunate propagator of his opinion, and they do not easily cease unless they conquer. They all strive to dominate the body from which they have been cut off. They advance their hatreds with curses and, when they can, with the sword.

Behold within the Empire the soft Calvinists, the rigid Calvinists, the Socinians, Anabaptists of diverse superstitions, pure Lutherans, altered Lutherans, Ubiquitarians, Majorists, Osiandrians, and Flacians--all zealots of their own sect. There is no one among them who does not exceedingly desire the entire Empire to pass under the laws of his heresy, who does not attempt to accomplish this as far as he can. What peace, therefore, can there be when so many sects struggle with one another daily over life, fortunes, and the soul itself? Moderation must therefore be prescribed to the preachers, and precaution must be taken lest they bear and bring up some new monster.

Yet what would you prescribe to them? What laws would you establish? In the year 1530 the Augsburg Confession was presented to the Emperor Charles V, and many copies of it were then published. But how often was that confession changed? Indeed, how often did the assembled princes and cities act so that it would not be changed? Yet nothing was accomplished: one Melanchthon was more powerful than the whole body of Protestants. And so now no one maintains it intact.

The third reason. Foreign kingdoms will perhaps be able for some time to sustain a diversity of religions without disturbances. But while this insolence of the ministers, especially the Calvinists, remains, the connection of the estates with one another and civil association in the Roman Empire cannot endure without fear of danger and without suspicion. For the preachers attempt altogether to remove the Empire from the midst under the pretext of religion.

The Roman Empire is no less within the Church than the Church is within the Empire; and if we wish to confess the truth, the Empire in Germany exists through the Church. The principal members of the Empire possess their dignity because they are ecclesiastics. Three chancellorships of the Empire, and electorates, belong to churches. Therefore the peace of the Church is the peace of the Empire. The preachers who attempt to remove the ecclesiastical estate from the Empire therefore overthrow the Empire. But the Calvinist Puritans deny that bishops can be princes, and they proceed not only to snatch the government of their provinces from our bishops, but are also indignant with the English bishops because they obtain political dignities at the royal court.

They therefore remove the peace of the Empire, because from among so many archbishops, bishops, and abbots who are princes of the Empire by most ancient right, they acknowledge no one as a prince. They exhort their people to invade the sees of their colleagues as though they were vacant; they assert that this is not the least important head of their religion. This assuredly not only disturbs civil peace, but removes it altogether from the midst. Hence, when they wish, they will assail the emperor himself by the same art; for if those who elect him and proclaim the diets are not electors, then the election is not legitimate. Since these things are so, there is no doubt that the doctrine which labors, under the occasion of piety, to commit all the members of the Empire to a war of mutual destruction must be banished altogether from the territories of the Empire.

You will perhaps say that princes of a religion different from ours think otherwise. Deservedly so, indeed; they do not believe their own men, having often experienced them to be liars. But I do not consider what the generous spirit and prudence of the princes accomplish, but what whisperers--or, as the Lutherans call them in the history of the changed religion in the Palatinate, serpents--hiss into their ears. For what if at some time they obtain a prince upon whose youth they impose? Peace is not firm where the disposition and goodness of the prince, upon which alone it rests, are assailed by so many engines.

The fourth reason. A state cannot be undisturbed where it is administered by contrary wills and laws; but the intemperance of the preachers makes the Empire such a state. There will be perpetual spiritual war; how, therefore, can there be temporal peace if spiritual war also afflicts it? To wit, will the laws of the Church call men to the sermon, to the celebration of the mysteries, to a procession, to prayers and fasts? What will a prince do here if he hears the preacher as a πάρεργον [secondary matter]? To wit, he will compel men to attend the court and the hunt, to repair roads, to cut wood, and to do other things by which they are altogether called away from the church.

Here, which lord will the conscience of the oppressed obey? For if a subject neglects the prince's authority, political peace will now perish; if he postpones the law of the Church to the prince's edict, conscience will totter. Let us make the matter clear by an example. Let the prince be a Calvinist, the superintendent a Lutheran. Let the latter threaten anathemas; the former, exiles, prisons, and the sword. Let each draw a portion of the people; when the pursuits of the populace have been split in opposite directions, civil peace must perish utterly.

The prince will pronounce Lutheran doctrine impious, a diabolical heresy, and the superintendent a turbulent enemy of the truth, to be pursued, exterminated, and cut down with all one's strength. The superintendent will pronounce the prince's commands tyrannical and his deeds cruel; he will earnestly await the aid of foreign Lutheran princes. Court and Church will collide; the ὑπερεπίσκοπος [super-bishop] will impel men toward the Lutherans, while the magistrate's edict will compel them toward the Calvinists. The prince will not endure contempt of himself, nor indeed will the magistrate, who will be the more savage than so great a prince in proportion as his anger is more ignoble.

What remains here except that they bring forth arms, these men on behalf of the court and those on behalf of the church? If they obey the prince because religion has been commanded, it is worship not of God but of the purple, extorted from the unwilling. But what peace is there if you perceive that you are compelled to stake your life and salvation upon the prince's opinion? Therefore that is not concord of minds, but the groaning of the oppressed, execration and hatred of the victor, and a hidden contrivance of minds intent upon vengeance.

The fifth reason. We see daily examples of the Preachers' War. For such is the constitution of the Roman Empire, such the intermixture of rights and jurisdictions, that it requires the highest concord between the ecclesiastical and political estates and can easily be torn apart by the machinations of turbulent men. Rights have been divided among different and often rival men, so that even when religion is one, peace can scarcely remain undisturbed. But now, when common rights and privileges are scattered among different religions, what convulsions of tribunals, what plagues of justice invade provinces with deadly contagion? How often are we compelled to see those disgraces of Germany?

This man possesses civil jurisdiction, that man ecclesiastical jurisdiction; another claims both. A Lutheran intrudes a Lutheran, a Calvinist a minister of his own communion; sometimes they do this by alternate turns. Hence come forcible installations, threatening convulsions, and, when the greater prelatures are at issue, bloody wars. Here there can be no concord of minds, no confederation, when with a savage and stern brow the preachers judge that every peace--indeed, any concession and inclination toward milder counsels--must be broken off as though contrary to conscience. Amid these things the most pitiable peoples, uncertain of everything, through the contest of those who rule bear an uncertain faith and a salvation held in suspense.

The sixth reason. The Calvinist ministers bind civil and ecclesiastical peace by so inseparable a bond and association that, if the matter is conducted according to their judgment, they can by no means be separated. For they adorn their kings and princes with pontifical authority and power, so that spiritual power may serve political power and political power may support spiritual power. For they endow the principate with the faculty of judging and conducting spiritual affairs and arm ecclesiastical jurisdiction with the laws and army of the age, so that they come formidable with a twofold force.

Pareus, in his preface to Hosea, after he had conferred all the offices and power of bishops upon the most illustrious Prince of Hesse, animates and incites him with these words: “Well done, DIVINE Hero; boldly perform the work of the Lord which you are performing.” That is: expel the Lutherans; substitute Calvinists. For the prince was then doing this, and indeed in earnest. The Calvinists judge that their princes must act by this power, by this doubled force of both temple and court and, if there is resistance, of the camp.

Therefore those who impel civil power toward the alteration of affairs and drive it to strip its principal subjects of offices and revenues, cast them from possession, and order them to go into exile cannot preserve civil peace. For what peace can exist between the violence of those driving men out and the groaning and complaints of those who migrate? “But the people of Marburg did not move a war.” Prudently, assuredly: they were not ignorant that they were weaker. The Berliners, however, did move one, whether through sudden fury or because they hoped for victory. And at some time the people of Marburg will move one too, if what the Saxon counselors report is true: that all Lutherans who live under Calvinists earnestly expect to be liberated by the estates of the Augsburg Confession. Motive 12. These are their words:

“The Protestants would enter upon slight favor--indeed, rather they would stir up execrations and groans against themselves among those who dwell among Calvinists and confidently and earnestly expect that they are shortly to be liberated by the estates of the Augsburg Confession and that Calvinism is to be abolished--if these men should perceive by hearing that the Protestants now play the same pipe with the Calvinists and concede that, as the saying goes, five is even. Once this was done, an occasion and cause would assuredly be furnished for no small disturbances and movements in the Church of God among Christians.”

The Lutherans who live among Calvinists therefore earnestly await liberation, and indeed liberation by the estates of the Augsburg Confession--a liberation which cannot occur without a violation of peace. They earnestly await the abolition of Calvinism; whether that abolition can occur without war, I leave to be discussed by the counselors of the princes. Conversely, the estates of the Augsburg Confession would groan and execrate them if they entered into peace with the Calvinists; therefore they now execrate the Calvinists and groan against them. That on account of which each thing is such is itself more such. The Lutherans living among Calvinists execrate the Lutheran estates on account of the Calvinists; therefore they execrate the Calvinists even more.

Finally, peace between Lutherans and Calvinists would furnish an occasion and cause for no small disturbances and movements. But why? Because by that peace the Lutherans would fall from their own hope and expectation and would therefore seek counsel and assistance from themselves. The matter has been brought to this point: if the preachers are left to themselves, not even mention of peace can be made without danger of war. Moreover, what should we think those men who execrate their princes and expect to be liberated from them will do if they obtain an opportunity?

Nor would I believe that the Saxon counselors say these things rashly and by conjecture concerning Lutherans living among Calvinists, but that they have discovered the matter from secret alliances and, as they now love to speak, correspondences. These are the Lutherans. Moreover, when these things are known, what should we suspect the Calvinists are contriving? Calvinist ministers so vigilant, so keen avengers of injuries, so cautious in anticipating dangers, so swift to forestall crimes, so practiced in deceiving Lutherans? This, assuredly: that they may abolish those who wait and every expectation, and that as quickly as possible, lest they delay their own security and lest there be time for aid to be brought to the confederates. Indeed, for this reason they will execute everything more savagely, lest they seem to be slow amid the dangers of their princes.

The seventh reason. The ministers who today besiege the states which they call Evangelical, especially the Zwinglian states, endeavor by design to excite hatred and contempt of the Empire. These two causes are so effective for overthrowing the state that, unless God, the founder and guardian of order and magistrates, repressed their wicked and abominable endeavors, we would long ago have had no form of the Empire in Germany. Concerning the Anabaptists this shines forth more clearly than to require demonstration, for they attempt to wrest from all magistrates the sword which those magistrates do not carry in vain.

I demonstrate the matter concerning the Calvinists. Those men attempt to attach hatred and contempt to the Empire, and altogether to overthrow it, who teach the following consequences in words, writings, and, when they can, DEEDS:

1. The Dragon, or Demon, gave the Empire his own strength and great power.

2. The Church is necessarily afflicted by the Empire.

3. The fullness of diabolism dwells in the Empire.

4. The Empire which now exists is the seven-headed beast, Apocalypse 13:3.

5. To marvel at the beast is to marvel at the success and felicity of the Empire while proclaiming it august, holy, sacrosanct, and immortal.

6. The Dragon affixes his own ornaments to the Empire.

7. To marvel excessively at the majesty and felicity of the Roman Empire is to adore the demon.

8. While the pontiff defends the Empire, he retains men in the worship of the former apocalyptic beast.

9. To adore the beast is nothing other than to wish the Empire to be sacrosanct, august, and venerable, as it formerly was under the gentiles.

But the Calvinists teach these things: Graserus in The Royal Plague, Benedictus Aretius on Apocalypse 13, and others.

By design, therefore, they attempt to overthrow the Roman Empire.

Therefore, unless those agitators and Gracchi are restrained, peace cannot be stable in the Roman Empire. The minor proposition is evident from their writings; I cited the places in the little book On the Increase of Heresies, to which I refer the reader. If anyone denies the major proposition, I do not doubt that all will judge him either insane or supremely shameless. Yet there is no need to prove it in any other way than by experience.

For if that doctrine is not insulting toward the August Caesars, if it is not seditious and exceedingly hostile to peace and concord, come then, let someone relate those things about other states after changing the name. Let him say that the Dragon or Demon gave his great power to the people of Zurich, the people of Bern, the Briton, the man of Bouillon, and the Dutch; that the Church is necessarily afflicted by them; that the fullness of diabolism dwells in them; that to marvel at the beast is to marvel at their success and felicity. Let him preach these and the other things at Zurich, Bern, London, Sedan, and The Hague, and publish them in print. Would not instruments of torture, stirred from the entire world, rush upon him? Would they not attempt to pour the Ocean itself through broken dikes upon that man as upon a pestilential torch of the state?

I scarcely seem safe to myself, who employ these examples for the sake of teaching--although what fault of mine is here? The Calvinists say these things against the Empire; I say that the statements are seditious, because if they were uttered against the Swiss, Dutch, and British, they would be judged seditious. Therefore they are also seditious when they are uttered against the emperors, electors, and princes of the Empire. That doctrine must therefore be removed if civil and ecclesiastical peace is sought. Those who show by these statements that their affairs cannot be safe except by the ruin of the Empire must not be tolerated.

The eighth reason. What emperor, at last, or what prince at all could beasts of this kind endure? Of what profession or faith could he be? But I finish and conclude. The peace of the German state, the civil peace of the ruling nation, cannot stand unless a bridle is placed upon those disturbing ministers; or, if any peace is established, it will be brief, unsafe, untrustworthy, full of suspicions, hatreds, and enmities, and will not be far removed from war, since there is a certain perpetual expectation and preparation for war. This is for the sole reason that the Calvinist ministers, not content with present things and not tolerating the laws and common right, watch attentively for every occasion to increase their own affairs, entrap the Lutherans, and burn and devour the Catholics.

CHAPTER XIX

Experience Teaches That Religious Dissensions Disturb the Peace of the State

With a design not merely insignificant but also foolish, and with a most sorrowful outcome, the kings of the Egyptians had introduced various monsters of gods and opinions so that, contending with one another in perpetual dissension and battles, their subjects could never conspire together. Diodorus Siculus, Book XI. It was altogether depraved and tyrannical to wish to stabilize the scepter by the blood of subjects and, as it were, gladiatorial spectacles, and for the sake of royal majesty--which was instituted for the safety and preservation of all--to overthrow the life and safety of the people. Truly they were ἀνδροφάγοι [man-eaters], kings who devoured their people, whose diadem could not stand without the blood of their own subjects. Indeed, pitiable were the nations which were compelled to fight so that they would not conspire. So many corpses were being snatched away lest the fatal band should fall.

That the design was also foolish and proceeded from the dizzying spirit which the Lord mingled with Egypt is evident both from the nature of the matter and from the outcome. They indeed endeavored by cruel cunning to render both factions subject to the kings, but they made the kings hateful to both; and while the factions disagreed with one another in perpetual conflicts, through that training they learned to conspire against the hated kings. For since a king cannot comply with the will of all, he must offend one party. But if he favors now this one and now that, depresses the victorious and raises the defeated so that strength and spirit are always available to the combatants, who can doubt that each will judge itself injured and will judge that the king weighs the fates of his subjects not by justice but by caprice?

Accordingly, in no kingdom were massacres of kings more frequent or more foul, until Egypt itself was divided into two hostile kingdoms and was always subdued with the greatest ease, although it surpassed all kingdoms in the nature of its location, the multitude of its warriors, and the abundance of provisions. Tyre alone resisted more than all Egypt; for in Ezekiel 26:18 Egypt is given as a reward to the army of Nebuchadnezzar for the labor which it endured at Tyre. Thereafter they were easily subdued and exhausted by the Persians, Greeks, and Romans; for to have entered Egypt was to have conquered it. This is the endeavor of the Stentors of this age: always to contrive something, always to harm the other party.

Xenophon judged much more wisely in his Cyrus, whom he described as an exemplar of a good prince, Cyropaedia, Book VIII:

> ἐλογίζετο ὡς εἰ πάντες οἱ κοινωνοὶ θεοσεβεῖς εἶεν, ἧττον ἂν αὐτοὺς ἐθέλειν περὶ τε ἀλλήλους ἀνόσιά τε ποιεῖν, ἢ περὶ αὐτόν.

Cyrus thought that, if all his associates were pious, they would be less willing to commit anything impious either against one another or against himself. Wisely indeed, and politically--indeed, even holily, if it had been granted to him to speak of the true God. For if a man judges and fears God to be the avenger of right and wrong, will he not readily restrain his hands from injury? But how will they spare their fellow citizens or kings if they judge them impious and patrons of the impious, against whom they regard wars as not only just and lawful, but commanded and holy?

And, lest I pursue every individual matter, religion first separated East and West, and then wars arising from disputes did so; and the Empire which we possess in Germany we received, upon the defection of the Greeks, by the prerogative of faith. From the time of Charlemagne there has scarcely been any stronger heresy which did not excite wars. What disasters did the Simoniacal heresy produce in the times of the Henrys? Thereafter the Albigensians and the rest, and within the memory of our great-grandfathers the Hussites--did they not afflict the Church even more?

It is better to be silent about our own evils than to renew the pain in words. The fury of the peasants was kindled and extinguished in their own blood; the war of the princes against Caesar, and their punishment; the desertion and betrayal of the free cities by their princes, as Melanchthon says; the devastation of Brandenburg; the wars of Strasbourg, Cologne, Belgium, and France; the cruelties of the Huguenots; the English and Scottish massacres; the Swedish rebellion; the devastations of Transylvania; the disasters of Hungary; and what ought to have been named first, the Zwinglian battle lines among the Swiss. We can expect nothing else, especially since Pareus, on chapter 13 of the Epistle to the Romans, and Braumbomus, in Book X of the Flores Flaminiorum, deny that there can be an alliance with the pope and papists: an eternal war commanded by God.

CHAPTER XX

Concord of Religions Commended to the Prince

On this matter I treated partly in Book II, and partly it must be treated here. There I urged concord; here I treat the true and solid quieting of seditions born from discord, matters which I also urged concerning the peace of Germany. Hatred and aversion from one's neighbor are contrary to charity; from them arise other plagues and shameful acts, namely discord, contention, war, quarrel, sedition, and schism, which altogether remove peace from the midst and, when they have invaded a city, demonstrate by their own malice the goodness of peace. What is most excellent in our doctrine? Peace; I shall add, also what is most useful. Conversely, what is most disgraceful and destructive? The separation of wills. Gregory Nazianzen, on the moderation to be observed in disputations.

All those things come from the same source, namely hatred: discord is a conflict of wills, contention a conflict of words, and the rest are conflicts of things.

Discord is an altogether grave vice, for it is the disagreement of one's will from the will of one's neighbor concerning a divine good or the neighbor's good which we are bound to will and desire for him. It is an act of hatred, and indeed the primary act, when someone maliciously opposes, so far as lies in him--by his will, if he cannot by deed--that which his neighbor embraces with the best will and which he is bound to will, or even to bestow and procure, for him. Therefore the Apostle, Galatians 5:20, enumerates dissensions among the manifest works of the flesh which exclude men from the kingdom of heaven.

For whoever is found in discord is disowned by the Father, disinherited by the Son, and likewise made alien from the Holy Spirit. For he who has despised the good of the law that was given rejects the gift offered; he who has refused to observe the testament will not be able to attain the Lord's inheritance; and he who has wished to be discordant with a Christian cannot possess concord with Christ. For it is the crime of contumacy to despise what is commanded, to refuse what is prescribed, and to turn away from what has been enjoined. What do you have in common with discord, Christian? Why do you love mutual hostilities, something which could not please the author of peace? Why do you practice enmities which even the man who first invented them could not escape?

But if reason should be silent, nature itself commends concord to us most greatly and accuses dissensions. For nothing is so discordant by vice as this race--the human race--or so social by nature. Nor could human nature speak more fittingly for guarding against the vice of discord, lest it arise, or for healing it when it had arisen, than by recalling that parent whom God willed to create as one man from whom a multitude would be propagated, so that by this admonition a concordant unity might be preserved even among many.

From a mind steeped and seething in hatreds, contention is a certain foam of boiling discord and a pestilential breath, when the man who is discordant disputes with his neighbor in order to assail the truth. Against the truth, I say; for a contest undertaken on behalf of the truth, if accompanied by modesty and a zeal for instruction, is not only praiseworthy but very often necessary, either lest justice be oppressed or lest religion be abandoned without defense.

No vice is more common today, none held in greater praise and value among our adversaries. For what are the innumerable defamatory pamphlets? What the pictures? What the other things, except contention and an assault upon truth? What else do they do than lose even the name of Christianity by disputing about religion? For who among them speaks peaceably with the divine Scriptures without contention, not striving to conquer another with empty and childish animosity? In whose heart does peace conquer? But enough has been said concerning the contentions of heretics in the book On the Union of the Evangelicals and the other, On Syncretism.

When discord and contention grow strong, they produce wars, quarrels, seditions, and schisms. When the conflict is between princes and states, it is war; when between private persons, a quarrel; between citizens, sedition; in the Church, a schism, which almost always ends in heresy. Would that all these things needed to be explained in discourse. Would that there were such felicity in our times that we learned from books that they were evils rather than felt them in the deed itself.

The first care of a prince, or nearly so, is to protect sacred things and augment religion--not, however, so that he is the judge of controversies, but the patron of acknowledged and approved truth. For he ought not to possess the same power in the temple as in the praetorium, nor to dominate the faith of his subjects, but to persecute perfidy. Those who so form their prince that he is neither himself devoted to a definite religion nor undertakes the care of those of others place some Epicurean or Diagorean over the state. In the first place, they will never obtain what they propose to themselves, namely, that the people will love or accept an atheistic man. Thereafter this license which the prince permits will altogether disturb the peace of which we treat. For the prince's Politicism will render uncertain everything--sacred ceremonies and whatever ought to have been most certain.

Indeed, we deservedly judge pitiable those peoples whom the commands of their lords have drawn three or four times into various sects within the lifetime of one man, while the populace embraces the prince's errors partly voluntarily and partly through inducement and threats. For those whom the authority of princes alone moves or their power impels are necessarily without religion. Yet much worse is the condition of those whom a tyrant who despises the gods oppresses by the precepts of Machiavelli. A heretical prince harasses his subjects because of his error; a Machiavellian because of calculations of gain or loss. Avarice and ambition govern these; superstition governs those. No one can be secure in his religion when it depends upon so many chances; yet there is more mutability in a Machiavellian principate.

For men are generally more tenacious of superstition and heresies; but when they relate the religion of their people to their own advantages and dignity, then, if the condition or calculation of utility changes, a change of religion must follow also. For if a politician commands a Lutheran populace and himself agrees with his subjects not by faith but for the sake of his advantage, because it is expedient that a prince of Lutherans appear to be a Lutheran, everyone understands that, when the calculation of utility changes, he will change not his faith, which he does not possess, but his simulation of faith, which is moved by utility alone. Bring to such a man the hope of greater dignity and power: suddenly he will become not only a Calvinist and an atheist, but even a Turk.

Under such a prince there can be peace neither of the state nor of the Church, for no one can trust a man who refers everything to his own utility. When it is expedient for him, he will put on every form of religion; indeed, he will rage even against the associates of his own religion. Nor are peoples subject only to the danger of variety and inconstancy when true utility has twisted the prince in another direction, but also when a false appearance of it has been presented. Irreligious princes have therefore always held a kingdom to the greatest public evil and have overthrown themselves, God making foolish the wisdom of this world. Deservedly so: their subjects' souls are a source of gain to them, and God an object of mockery.

Such men are perfidious and abominable even in human society, for:

> ἀκύρων γινομένων τῶν συνθηκῶν ἀναιρεῖται ἡ πρὸς ἀλλήλους χρεία τῶν ἀνθρώπων.

When covenants are rendered void, mutual intercourse among men is removed. Aristotle, Rhetoric, Book I, chapter 15. But those men remove all these things when they deny that there is a divine power, namely:

> Οἷσιν οὔτε βωμὸς οὔτε πίστις, οὐδ᾽ ὅρκος μένει·

For whom neither altar, faith, nor oath remains firm. Aristophanes, Acharnians. They neglect everything right and honorable provided that they obtain power. They will never lack a cause for abjuring an old simulation and feigning a new one; it will not be difficult to seek hiding places in perjury once they have learned to impose the appearance of justice and honesty upon their own desires and frauds.

A prince must therefore be religious, hold a true understanding concerning God, offer true worship to God, and instruct and confirm the people entrusted to him not only by protecting them with arms, ordering them by justice, and cherishing them by clemency, but also by religion, which is the supreme good of the human breast.

For why should princes not worship God when they know that a kingdom was given to them by God and can be taken away by him when he wills? For by God:

> Things founded proceed,
>
> Each in its own order; and by the Prince of things the courses
> Remain fixed.

The same God is arbiter of great empires and huts; with as easy a nod he overturns marble palaces as humble cottages. Strong and weak things hang from the same thread, destined to fall if he who weighs mountains in a balance relaxes his hand. Hence kingdoms generally fall by an unexpected and unforeseen outcome, because they spurn the providence of the divine power. The creator of things willed that great things depend upon the smallest, lest anyone, elated by his own greatness, neglect small things--much less him from whom both great and small things come. Princes must therefore worship him through whom they reign and live.

Your dominion, therefore, O princes, rests upon the counsel of God alone, not upon human arts; neither caution nor anxious fear accomplishes the matter.

> Many came to their fate
>
> While they feared the fates.
>
> The very fear of coming evil
> Sent many into the greatest dangers.

God himself warns princes: “But now the Lord says: Far be this from me; but whoever glorifies me, I shall glorify him; but those who despise me will be ignoble.” 1 Kings 2:30. How noble was David by worshiping God; how ignoble Jeroboam? We therefore see that all things turn out prosperously for those who worship God and adversely for those who spurn him; for even calamities themselves are converted to good for the pious, while their prosperity is for the impious a cause of miseries.

> For they are raised on high
> So that they may fall with a heavier fall.

It is not only necessary for a prince to be religious and to induce his citizens by example and edicts to worship the divine power, but also fitting to government and altogether royal.

> Δεῖ γὰρ τὸ ἄριστον ὑπὸ τῷ ἀρίστῳ τιμᾶσθαι, κὴ τὸ ἀγεμονεῦον ὑπὸ τῷ ἀγεμονεομένῳ.

The best--that is, the divine power--must be honored by what is best and most excellent among created things, while he who governs must be honored by those who are governed. But kings and princes are the best part of the world, through whom, even if they are evil, very many evils are nevertheless impeded, and who protect the society and safety of the human race. They are nearest to God; for this reason they are also called gods, and deservedly gods if through them the divine Majesty is vindicated.

But if the safety of the citizens and the tranquility of the state are also truly a care to him, as they ought to be and ought especially to be, a Christian prince cannot fail to apply himself to it. Yet without religion that tranquility not only cannot exist at all, but cannot even be desired. To such an extent is this so that even impious deniers judged that fierce and rude peoples must be restrained by fear of religion; for without religion and fear of the gods they did not think that their own rights would be safe. Reason will therefore teach what a pious king and nursing father of the Church must do.

In addition, if religion is absent, the life of men is filled with foolishness, crime, and savagery; the truth of promises, the sanctity of oaths, and all fidelity in compacts and commerce are removed from the world. Lactantius, On Anger, chapter 8. This impiety and audacity at last rises against the very Mezentiuses and despisers of the divine power. For religion and fear of God alone guard the society of men with one another. Lactantius, On Anger, chapter 12.

The maxim of Maecenas to Augustus is golden, if it is transferred from superstition to true religion:

> Τὸ μὲν θεῖον πάντῃ πάντως αὐτός τε σέβου κατὰ τὰ πάτρια, καὶ τοὺς ἄλλους τιμᾶν ἀνάγκαζε· τοὺς δὲ δὴ ξενίζοντάς τι περὶ αὐτὸ καὶ μίσει καὶ κόλαζε, μὴ μόνον τῶν θεῶν ἕνεκα, ὧν ὁ καταφρονήσας οὐδ᾽ ἄλλου ἄν τινος προτιμήσειεν, ἀλλ᾽ ὅτι καὶ καινά τινα δαιμόνια οἱ τοιοῦτοι ἀντεισφέροντες πολλοὺς ἀναπείθουσιν ἀλλοτριονομεῖν· κἀκ τούτου καὶ συνωμοσίαι καὶ συστάσεις, ἑταιρεῖαί τε γίγνονται, ἅπερ ἥκιστα μοναρχίᾳ συμφέρει.

Worship the divine power in every way and at every time according to the ancestral rites, and compel others to its worship; but hate and restrain those who introduce any innovation concerning it, not only for the sake of the gods--since he who despises them will hold nothing else in high regard--but because those who introduce certain new divinities impel many toward revolution. From this arise conspiracies, seditions, and secret assemblies, things assuredly least conducive to monarchy.

If a pleasure-loving and impious man pronounced these things about the true worship of the true God, he would give counsel both prudent and holy. For nothing in human affairs is more excellent than true religion; therefore it must be defended with the greatest care.

How greatly atheists are hated, and always have been, not only by foreigners and neighbors but even by subjects and intimates who are participants in their tyranny, many ancient and recent events teach us. The entire family of Jeroboam was destroyed by King Baasha; all the lineage of Baasha by Zimri; the latter, despairing of kingdom and life, burned himself with his palace when the victor Omri approached, and Omri's family was wholly cut off. Jehu too, although his posterity reigned to the fourth generation, was at last punished in Zechariah; Shallum was killed by Menahem, Pekahiah son of Menahem by Pekah, and the latter was killed by Hoshea, who was the last of the kings of Israel.

Behold all the kings not of the Persians or Scythians but of Israel divided from Judah: every one impious, every one either killed or punished by the destruction of his posterity. They possessed faithless prefects and subjects because they had all violated faith with God. These things are sufficient for a prince; if anyone wants more, let him consult those whose commentaries on this matter survive.

These matters deservedly ought to move a prince greatly, especially because heresy is a restless thing and its assistants, the preachers, are turbulent enemies of truth. Their superstition perpetually increases until it issues into every foul thing, so that it cannot bear even itself. Hence came those monsters of errors in former times, hence the Circumcellions savage against their own blood, hence the Libertines and Anabaptists of our time. But I have treated these sufficiently in the little book On the Increase of Heresies.

Nor do occupations poured out upon governing the state and administering justice excuse princes, since the head of legitimate government is the piety and morals of the citizens. If they apply their mind to these as though they were secondary matters, and importunately favor or conceal those teachers who prefer to please by some novelty rather than to edify by truth, as though these were not great injuries to the state, they entangle themselves in great calamities. Thus Constantine, a good prince, incautiously harmed the Empire and posterity; thus many in our time nourish serpents by which entire provinces, lethally poisoned, will soon fall. Did not Peucer alone, with two confessors of the Elector of Saxony, fill almost all Saxony with Calvinism without the prince's knowledge? Did not Crellius alone recently drench almost that same Saxony with the blood of citizens and nobles?

CHAPTER XXI

The Sectarians Themselves Feel the Disadvantages of Their Discords

Concerning them, the man who endeavored even by a shameful act to urge concord sings thus:

Not if I had a hundred tongues and a hundred mouths

Could I recount the unspeakable sorrows of schism.

Deservedly, therefore, he concludes:

There is no safety in war; we all demand peace.

Indeed, while every anger conceived from inward hatred and from the heart, and every war born and waged from it, is foul and harmful, a dissension concerning religion is accustomed to be the most obstinate and furious of all. We have long perceived that it renders men utterly savage, especially in audacity, crime, and inhumanity; for they assign every crime to religion, and what the gentiles once judged barbarous in wars to the death, heretics consider holy in their disputes. Whoever does not rage is regarded as a deserter; if anyone dares to urge moderation and peace, he is accounted a fugitive. Hence:

Calvinists always practice eternal hatreds,

Nor does the fury once begun ever depart from their minds.

The fortunate keeps his arms; the unfortunate prepares them.

Wars leave nothing: now the field lies foul

With vast untilled lands; a lofty ash buries nations,

Entombed beneath the torch applied to their roofs.

But let us hear the Syncretist recount the disadvantages of the Evangelical war.

The first disadvantage. Papists are deterred by the deadly dissensions of the Evangelicals from Evangelical doctrine as heretical, satanic, and seditious. This is perhaps a strong and opportune bridle upon heresy ranging through everything, and a great advantage for the Catholic Church. Although it is illumined by the revelation of eternal truth and does not judge the errors of those who perish to be the supports of its faith, nevertheless, in its estimation of the discord of others, it congratulates itself upon its own concord; and, having learned the wars of those who go astray, it embraces its own peace more eagerly, guards it more closely, and exacts it more severely. The goodness of our cause does not rest upon your evils, but is nevertheless made clearer and confirmed by them. We cannot approve the cause of the Evangelicals, which some part of the Evangelicals--often the principal and more numerous part--always execrates.

We acknowledge, O God, great judge and arbiter of furious contests, your benevolence toward us: you founded the Church with such solidity of faith that not only can the powers of hell not prevail against it, but you have permitted those gates to collide mutually against themselves and break their hardness, so that they may strike the walls of the Church with a lesser onset and gentler concussion. So it is, O uncreated, creative Wisdom: you blunt wave with opposing wave, so that, their fury mastered, they strike the sides of Peter's ship in such a way that they at the same time raise it. Nor is all heresy conspired into one Syncretism to be feared, because a heavenly oracle has promised victory to his Church.

Do you grieve that we regard your doctrine as satanic? Whence, then, such great angers, calumnies, execrations, killings, and massacres, if not from hell? But what will you do with Luther, who says that you are incarnate devils? What with Alberus, who says you are possessed by a demon? What with your doctors, who prosecute one another as guilty of atheism, Turkism, Manichaeism, and Borborism? Return to favor and recover your esteem in our minds. You carried the reproaches out of your own house; what we say abroad you always hear at home.

The Lutherans long ago rendered you suspected of sedition, for they accused your princes, as you yourself bear witness, of openly colluding with the Turk against the Empire. Dedicatory epistle to the Eucharistic Controversy. But it is not mine to treat the disturbed condition of the Empire, especially when you threaten the Lutherans with the sword. I prefer, therefore, to offer Luther--whom you call the defender of the Gospel and servant of God--as a witness against you. You must receive his testimony, since you yourself have praised the witness. Now an old man, namely at the age of sixty-one, he testified thus: “I, who already have one foot in the grave, shall carry this testimony and this boast to the tribunal of my Lord and liberator Jesus Christ: that with my whole heart I condemned and avoided the fanatics and enemies of the Sacrament--Carlstadt, Zwingli, Oecolampadius, Schwenckfeld, and their disciples at Zurich or wherever in the world they may be.”

The second disadvantage. What except the dissension itself placed a stumbling block before the Jews?

Long ago the refuse of various heresies brought a destructive offense to the unhappy Jews and gentiles. Their foulness rendered the entire Christian name hateful to the world from the cradle of religion. The disgraceful acts, paradoxes, sorceries, parricides, and enthusiasms of the Nicolaitans, Menandrians, Carpocratians, Marcionites, Montanists, and Manichaeans were imputed to all; and those who had proved their innocence to God burned among men under hatred for another's crime. Those stumbling blocks remain and revive among the new sectarians, and one always sins by example as by deed.

The Jews are hardened not more by your dissension than by the absurdity of your dogmas. They somehow acknowledge that God is one and continually repeat to that God, “Because he is good, because his mercy endures forever.” But when they hear from you that he is the decreer, procurer, mover, impeller, and compeller toward crimes, they immediately believe the Lutherans who say that this God is the bloodthirsty Moloch, the Devil himself. Again, when they hear that amid every crime you are just, holy, and dear to God, they suspect that you are beasts. They believe Arminius, Bertius, and the rest of your doctors, who say that rigid Calvinism is infamous among all nations because of its paradoxes.

The stumbling blocks therefore come from you--not so much from dissension in error as from the error itself. For they are not offended because you do not agree in so disgraceful an opinion; rather, they are altogether indignant that a man can be found either so mad as to believe those things or so audacious as not to fear uttering them. You ought not to have erred at the beginning; complaint is late amid ruin:

What has been done cannot be corrected. They recognize that, having followed such diverse sects, you cannot wander together into one error. You run about groping in the darkness; how can you strike against one rock? You therefore place a stumbling block before the Jews not only by the diversity of sin, but by the very absurdity, gravity, and savagery of the crimes.

The third disadvantage. What sharpened the scimitars of the Turks and Tartars against the Christian world and drew them as far as the thresholds of Germany and Italy, except, on the one side, the horrible idol-mania of the Papists and, on the other, the sins of the Evangelicals and the fatal quarrels and conflicts allied to them? By these, fraternal charity was trampled, domestic peace disturbed, the raging Fury attracted, the minds of all estates divided and exasperated, salutary counsels dispersed, and at last the most afflicted Church betrayed to its enemies at home and abroad.

He adduces a twofold cause for Turkish strength and the victories obtained against the Empire: the "idol-mania," as he calls it, of the Papists, and the crimes and furies of the Evangelicals. We deny the first: we are conscious of no idol-mania. We not only detest idols, but with great dangers and continual labor endeavor to exterminate them from both Indies, Africa, China, and Japan. Since you yourselves confess the other, it is not ours to deny it; for why should I make a speech for defendants who have confessed and have been convicted by their own judgment? They have an internal witness continually lashing them within their fortification: conscience. It is neither part of my purpose to speak against it, nor can they suppress it or impose silence upon it. And if that domestic torturer sometimes ceases, nevertheless the Lutherans do not allow them to rest.

Among the Lutherans--as Pareus himself complains in the preface to the Eucharistic Controversy--a certain courtly Stentor recently did not blush to advise in a public writing that at the diets they should join themselves with the Papists rather than with the orthodox Calvinists. He adduced two reasons. One was theological: that the Lutherans agree with the Papists in more things than with the Calvinists, whom he calls Turks. The other was civil: that the pope contributes forces for protecting the Roman Empire, while Calvinist princes openly collude with the Turk against the Empire. The latter reason deserves to be refuted in a manner very different from my pen.

What reasons the Lutherans adduce to prove so grave and dangerous a matter need not concern me. I nevertheless remember reading the answer of the German princes to the embassy of Ségur: "The audacity of your men has now become known not only to Christians but even to the emperor of the Turks. Although he desires them to rage against the Spaniard for the destruction of all Christians, nevertheless, with the truth of the matter crying aloud, he cannot approve them." Answer of the Protestants to the Embassy of Ségur.

And a little later the same princes say: "And have you ever seen one of the Calvinists who drew the sword for the Christian state, either in that naval fleet which the Roman pontiff, the Spaniard, and the Venetians prepared against the Turk, or when Malta was attacked by Dragut? Indeed, rather, they hastened to stir up the Moors so that they might cross into Spain, and to impel the Turks lest the Christian state find rest, and finally to slaughter kings by various arts." And a little later: "Whence shall we obtain protection against the Turk if the pontifical party, which has always assisted us in this matter, is absent?" And so forth. But what is to be expected from the Calvinists both N. has said and all readily understand: either that they provoke the Turks against the Christians, and so forth.

It is not mine to inquire upon what foundation these judgments of the princes rest; I know that conspicuous places must be avoided.

> A savage thunderbolt comes from a conspicuous citadel.

Meanwhile, it ought also to be permissible for me to bring into the midst, without deceit and harm, what the Calvinist ministers think. Frederick Braunbomus, in the prolegomena to the Flores Flaminiorum, after saying on page 15, "Even the sultan's arms are now about to depart from the Church," immediately adds: "Let us prepare ourselves for war--not so much the Turkish war; the sultan will never possess Hungary, because it was never among the Roman provinces under the dominion of Constantinople, Babylon, or Arabia--as for the approaching Roman war and the most bitter expedition of all."

Selim would wish this, and the Ottomans would purchase it at a great price. O safety of Germany, how you stand upon a slippery place, by what grave hatred you are assailed! What monsters do you embrace in your bosom? What vipers do you bring up? The Turk holds Greece, has enervated Transylvania, oppressed a great part of Hungary, strikes Austria and Styria, and threatens the Margraviate of Brandenburg; and the prophet of Phaehoff forbids us to arm against an enemy so savage, so restless, so cunning in disposition, so desirous of another's property, so hostile to the Christian name, so intent upon every opportunity to harm, playing with treaties as with knucklebones, and regarding nothing as disgraceful which is profitable. Against this enemy, I say, he forbids us to arm, while he incites subjects against the pontiff, bishops, Catholic princes and kings, and the emperor himself. Who does not know

> What he constructs by these beginnings?

If fortune follows him, the Germans will expend their strength, arms, and blood mutually upon themselves, so that, when they are worn down, scattered, discordant, and half-wounded, the victor, exulting, may impose the Turkish yoke and carry away their wealth, wives, children, and even the faith which remains, without battle and labor. I grieve that these things had to be said; yet they could not be left unspoken, so that it might become manifest to the orthodox what the Lutherans think about the Calvinists.

The fourth disadvantage. Offenses to the weak. But I also add the gravest falls and horrible deaths of the strongest, whom either Zwinglian cruelty dragged into the battle line to die or Lutheran license broke down into pleasures. Hence stumbling blocks and depraved morals, luxury, avarice, fornication, contention, drunkenness, and vices of that kind range everywhere with the greatest disgrace to the Christian name, as the adversary himself complains in the preface to First Corinthians. Hence, as the same man acknowledges in the same place, come the ambition of teachers, the levity of hearers, a most profane life, security, contempt of God, contempt of every order, and Epicurean profanity.

The fifth disadvantage. The condemnations, exiles, prisons, persecutions, and killings of so many provinces and faithful doctors and confessors, and finally the devastation of graves.

Nemesis at last pursues and apprehends the proud. Heresy is assailed by its own examples. The Lutherans were cruel against us, the Calvinists more savage; for the former tempered their savagery with drinking cups, while the latter sharpened their angers with drunkenness and lust. But now they rush mutually against themselves and say and do to one another things which shame and Christian charity forbid us to say and do. At the beginning and thereafter, every most faithful man deserted Luther: Carlstadt, Oecolampadius, Cruciger, Melanchthon, and others. Zwingli fell in the civil war which he had urged. A host of diseases produced by an intemperate life overwhelmed Calvin in despair.

Thereafter, as discord increased, the Lutherans were oppressed. They were expelled from the Palatinate, Zweibrücken, Hesse, Ascania, Switzerland, Rhaetia, Holland, Zeeland, Friesland, and many counties of Germany. Now even the Brandenburgers have bitten the bridle and will gradually understand that they have no preacher except one of the Calvinist stamp. Nor are the Calvinists content with a Lutheran enemy. So long as they lived they waged civil wars most hostilely and perfidiously. Do we not still behold the battle lines of that nation fighting?

Hear those who even now serve in those camps, the nine orphaned children of Arminius, who was commander of one party, in their preface to the curators of the Academy of Leiden: “Good God,” they say, “to what lengths do we not break forth? We who within the same Christian religion follow opinions different from one another decide among ourselves more harmfully with pens than with iron. Nor are our disputes confined within dissensions, hatreds, and eternal enmities. Some of us exclude others from the practice of our religion; some adjudge salvation away from others; indeed, we advance our hatreds as far as ropes and from time to time even the most exquisite punishments, while magistrates of evil zeal assent to us. The memory of this matter is still far too recent for there to be any need to reopen it. To wit, in zeal for CHRIST, how often have we shed the blood of those who wholly devoted themselves to Christ himself, applied themselves to piety and salvation, always lived most innocently, and harmed no one--although Christ poured out his own blood for them so that the blood of others would not be shed.”

These are the contests of the Calvinists among themselves. All Britain swells with the same, and they would undertake some greater abomination unless they were restrained by royal power. In Holland they are carried on with so great an onset that they can scarcely be restrained by the edicts of the most illustrious Lords the Estates, as Peter Bertius, leader of the principal faction, bears witness in the Hyperaspistes. This man stands for Arminius, that man for Gomarus; to this man Calvin is holy, to that one a Borborite and Manichaean. All labor for their own opinion, no one for the whole truth; for even those who defend true things mingle in many false things, lest this be for them an unmixed good. These things the Calvinists do among themselves; what will happen to the Lutherans?

The sixth disadvantage. The bloodthirsty theologians--the Lutherans--in tragic pamphlets written not with ink but with blood represented those who were killed by Catholics in France as martyrs of the Devil, to be refuted not by the pen of theologians but by the sword of butchers, and thus inflamed the Catholics against them. That disadvantage is of such a kind that, to one who weighs the matter, it brings many advantages with it.

For first, the Catholics possess the Lutherans as approvers of their opinion. When the magistrate commanded proceedings according to law against the Huguenots, who were guilty of many killings and sacrileges, incendiaries and cruel torturers of the orthodox, men hardened in crimes and shameful acts immediately adorned with the praise of martyrs those whose crimes were capital, lest fear of punishments deter the rest from evildoing, whose audacity appeared likely to be of use to their desires. And when they attempted to stir and entice Lutheran arms into France as if to defend the cause of martyrs and confessors, the Lutherans in public writings and sermons did not indeed merely deny that they were martyrs, but declared that they were martyrs of the Devil. By this judgment they absolved the Catholics and condemned the Calvinists.

For this reason, when certain Lutherans through flattery called the Calvinists pious and holy martyrs of Christ, they were rejected by them with abuse. In an epistle to the Gallican Churches Danaeus complains about Osiander in this way, page 12: “For those whom this man, in his zeal to flatter you, calls pious and holy and martyrs of Christ, both he himself and certain of his associates most insultingly call martyrs of the Devil from the public pulpit.” And a little later: “Indeed, brothers, this is now the cruel charity of those men toward us and their compassion for your punishments: when recently they had most savagely anathematized all of us and our churches in a certain new formula of new discord, and were therefore warned by several most illustrious princes of Germany and by very many good German men”--that is, Calvinizing men--“to abolish it, because by this means they sharpened the swords of the pontifical party against our churches, they themselves answered and joked ridiculously, indeed cruelly, that they were only accidentally the causes of our punishments.” Finally he adds that this is Osiander's disposition, charity, and sincere love: that he does not fear to stir up against you the fires of most savage persecutions and flames. This, therefore, is the opinion of the Lutherans concerning the French martyrs.

Furthermore, because the cause, not the punishment, makes a martyr, it is worthwhile to inquire into the causes of the punishments, so that the name may be established. For if I state the cause for which each was killed, I shall submit the judgment concerning the designation to the reader so that he himself may determine whether they must be judged martyrs of the Devil or of Christ.

When the Swiss inflicted cruel war upon their blood relatives, they fell in battle with Zwingli their very gladiator, not as martyrs but as invaders of another's right. In the year 1562 they undertook by common counsel the crimes which they had already conceived and published at Geneva and elsewhere: to despoil the churches throughout the whole kingdom and everywhere perpetrate those deeds of which they left examples in several places. The beginning of their savagery was in Aquitaine; the fury wandered widely. At Paris, wicked men flew about with swords, rashly injuring everyone they met. Priests were slaughtered everywhere at the very altars; churches flowed with blood. Statues of the saints were shattered not from hatred of idolatry, which did not exist, but from avarice, which was immense. The bones of Francis II, king of France, were burned, so that no one could doubt with what disposition they would have treated him alive when they so raged against him dead.

But what would those men not dare, whom Poitiers saw burn the bones of Saint Hilary after they had been dug from their ancient tomb, and from whom neither the relics of Irenaeus nor those of the most celebrated bishop Martin escaped? The people of Lyon and Tours beheld with immense grief impious flames consuming sacred pledges. Why should I relate what cruelty Orléans endured from them? Neither age nor sex was spared, and this throughout the entire kingdom upon which they bore down like a storm: old men killed amid mockery and tortures; tender youth burned with the towers in which they sought protection; men driven by torture to disclose the bones of martyrs; bells changed into cannon; baptisteries turned into sewers; wells filled with Catholics; bellies and genitals cut out. While they did these things, and attempted many more things worthy of a theater of Calvinist cruelty, they themselves were repressed and killed, and mark the Calvinist martyrologies and exceedingly inauspicious calendars. These are Calvinist martyrdoms.

But the Calvinists have no cause to be angry with the Lutherans over the designation of their martyrs; Bertius the Calvinist himself does not acknowledge those martyrs. His words in the Hyperaspistes, pages 172--173, are: “Nor indeed did that confession”--the Augsburg Confession--“cost your Germany less than this one, which, although it is said to have been confirmed by much Belgian blood, has nevertheless thus far been introduced into neither the state nor the churches by any authority of our nobles.” First, he says it is said to have been confirmed, not that it has been confirmed, and opposes to it the Augsburg Confession. But on the following pages he relates the articles of the Belgic Confession to the Manichaeans, who formerly experienced that severity.

CHAPTER XXII

That Religious Peace Can Be Established in Germany

I do not mean that peace which, full of syncretisms, contention, distrust, and plots, awaits an opportunity for war, but a true and genuine peace which holds the same opinion concerning God and his worship. I confess that it is a great and arduous good, indeed a rare one, but nevertheless a good which we can attain.

It is a difficult good amid so great an obstinacy among dissenters and so great an audacity among those desiring contrary things; but because it is a gift of the divine power, it is permissible to hope that at some time, even among the unworthy, that immense mercy will command peace, agitated in so many ways, to stand firm. For since our nature was made for mutual friendship and peace, and since peace is sought even by war, human society would be frustrated of its proper end if there were no way to attain peace.

Indeed, the Scriptures would exhort us to concord and peace in vain if either by nature or by our fault we were enslaved to disputes. Since the Lord declares that he leaves peace to us and gives us his peace, John 14:27, and that he acted so that in him we might have peace, John 16:33; since the Apostle so often promises and desires for us the peace of GOD--Romans 1:7 and 2:10; 1 Corinthians 1:3; 2 Corinthians 1:2; Galatians 1:3; Ephesians 1:2; Philippians 1:2; 2 Thessalonians 1:2--since, I say, peace is promised so often, who can believe that Germany alone, deprived of peace for nearly a hundred years, possesses no return to its former peace?

The disposition and nature of the German nation also avail greatly for conciliating concord. For the Germans, both by their own nature and by training and custom, are courteous and kindly, abhorrent from disputes and wars, and quiet like a tranquil sea unless stirred by the blasts of winds. Thus they have frequently lulled even the greatest discords without blood and for the most part lay down their hatreds together with their arms.

Although heresies, when they have grown strong and armed themselves with secular powers, generally rage atrociously--as did the Arian and Monothelite--Germany has nevertheless been milder toward its own entrails.

Let us consider only France or Britain, indeed Belgium: in one year it gave more Catholic blood, more martyrs to heaven, than Germany did in almost an entire century. Germany was indeed cruel in the rebellion against Emperor Charles and in the fury of the peasants, but religion alone was not alleged for those causes. The hatreds were civil, stirred up indeed by heretical agitators who preached, but not practiced by everyone for the propagation of heresy. Why, then, should we despair of our country, which is especially a pupil of peace?

Recent examples of provinces converted in Germany also raise us to great hope. For when we see Bavaria, Franconia, Styria, great tracts around the Rhine, and the best part of Belgium rescued from the darkness of errors into the liberty of the children of God; when throughout France we see many thousands restored and established each year in possession of the ancient religion, why should we not think that the rest will agree in the same unity? We perceive peace growing daily, and shall we cast away hope for its complete increase? Dawn already glows red, the herald of full light; why should we put aside confidence in a bright day?

Almost the same conviction belongs to those who err and follow heretics through ignorance, hope, fear, or some other affection--not because they judge that truth stands among them, but because they judge it levity and inconstancy to release what they have once seized. They think that by right of return they will go back to the ancient and apostolic faith of our forefathers, and that there will be no end of wandering until they return to the path by which the primitive Church ascended to heaven.

Thus we are taught by experience that now even threats, exiles, and confiscation of goods can scarcely impel the very few Catholics to desert their ancient piety, whereas at the beginning of the tumult a single Epicurean or tribunician sermon hurled whole flocks of peoples into Lutheranism or Calvinism. The heresies ranged abroad until they became recognized; now they have lost their strength, their onset has grown languid, they have completed their circuit, and now slide backward. Consider Lutheranism.

First, who is now a Lutheran in the opinion in which the Augsburg Confession stood? The Calvinists swear that all have departed from it. But let us omit these matters. Who is a Lutheran at all? Are the Ubiquitarians? The Synergists? The Osiandrians? The Flacians? Yet I do not inquire into these distinctions. I ask about the Lutherans' strength. No one approaches them; many depart from them. They possess only one electorate, and that one strongly altered by Calvinism--so greatly, indeed, that Zwinglian operations insinuated themselves not only into the academies and the prince's council but into the very secrets of conscience; for the elector's confessors, by his own testimony, were Calvinists. Acts of Peucer.

They have lost the Rhenish and Bavarian Palatinates, Zweibrücken, Hesse, the congregations of Switzerland, Rhaetia, Holland, Zeeland, Friesland, and the churches of England. Their numbers are diminished in Poland, Lithuania, Sweden, most of Hungary, and Bohemia. They have lost the Catholic portion of Belgium, Bavaria, Styria, Troppau, and Franconia; in the Catholic electorates they have been compelled to abandon splendid conditions. They labor over Brandenburg and Prussia. Certain Lutheran cities, such as Hamburg and others, have now admitted Calvinist religious exercise; others gradually slide toward it. They are therefore driven into a narrow place and will shortly pass into all other things.

But since no one among them embraces Calvinism unless compelled, or assuredly very few do, it must be hoped that by far the greatest part can be brought to knowledge of the truth. So too it was formerly: heresies held their course, then fell and expired. The Simonians, Nicolaitans, Cerinthians, Ebionites, Menandrians, Basilidians, Carpocratians, Cainites, Marcionites, Valentinians, Archontics, and others almost perished within the first two centuries. The Montanists, Manichaeans, Novatians, and Donatists raged longer; most gravely of all the Arians, and the Iconoclasts who even now have revived. But the times in which they flourished must be distinguished from those in which they secretly increased or lay hidden while decreasing. The fury and tempest of them all quickly spent itself; the remnants lived longer.

The cause must be taken from the very disposition and nature of heresy. For at the beginning, adorned with borrowed ornaments of the Scriptures and whitened with a certain antimony of truth, when it prostitutes itself to a world greedy for novelty and disdainful of ancient things, it easily entices minds ignorant of virtue by the image of good; for allurements draw more men than truth. But when, the flowing color and ornaments removed, it appears in its own skin like an aged and diseased prostitute, it makes its lovers flee far away and repels them.

How numerous were the lovers who knocked at the doors of the eastern Thais! But now how many desert the decrepit woman and transfer their loves elsewhere? With what great zeal and what exquisite blandishments does she retain a few? That heresy therefore tends toward destruction and would have perished long ago had it not from time to time struck curious minds with some novelty. Hence Osiander, Major, Flacius, and the Concordists added certain new pigments to the old and wrinkled woman; they even changed names so that they might hold by some novelty those whom they could not convince by truth.

Since, therefore, a certain old age of all the heresies appears, we are not far from peace. As for the fact that some think Calvinism is growing because by the cunning counsels of courtiers they place certain heralds of that sect in Lutheran chairs and mock the goodness of certain princes, they stray greatly from the truth. For by their importunity they stir hatreds and execrations and raise sluggish peoples to hope and desire for liberty. Thus the Saxon counselors affirm that the Lutherans who live under Calvinist lords earnestly hope and expect to be liberated by the Lutheran estates; indeed, all Lutherans who live among Calvinists confidently expect Calvinism to be abolished, as the same counselors say in Motive 12. Therefore not merely inexperienced men but practiced and prudent counselors think the end of Calvinism is at hand.

Since it is manifest that Spain, Italy, France, and Germany were once cleansed of Arians, Pelagians, Priscillianists, Albigensians, and the other heresies which widely reigned, and that the peoples returned to unity, we deservedly ought now also, after an interval of almost one hundred years, after horrible blasphemies and bloody wars, to hope for this from divine goodness.

Nor do I think that our adversaries will deny it. Certainly, if they act consistently with their faith, they will also have to believe it. For Lutherans confidently and earnestly expect that they will soon be liberated by the estates of the Augsburg Confession and that Calvinism will be abolished, as the Saxon counselors say in Motive 12. The same men judge that the pontiff will perish; with their enemies removed, therefore, they fashion their own peace for themselves and have already devoured it in hope. The Calvinists think the same things and judge that they can impose their peace upon both Lutherans and Catholics. Indeed, some do not despair that union and a synod can occur among so many heresies. Why, then, should the pious and faithful not at last expect true peace?

Peace is rightly hoped for even by the enemies of peace; nevertheless, there cannot be peace in evil or concord in error. Although some sometimes conspire in it, that peace cannot be lasting, nor the peace of all, indeed not even of many. For no falsehood lies so hidden that it is not sometime revealed; no lie is concealed either forever or from everyone; nothing is colored so plausibly that it deceives all. Deception is at last detected when it is secure.

CHAPTER XXIII

That Peace Cannot Exist in a Mixture of Religion and a Certain Political Moderation

Zeal for peace and concord sometimes leads prudent men who love the state to prefer even a disgraceful and dangerous peace to discord, and to judge that what they see done advantageously in political matters must also be adapted to religion. While arms have been laid aside and embassies concerning peace are conducted under a truce, at the first meeting each party generally seeks what it thinks it demands by the highest right; they often even demand unjust things so that they may obtain what is equitable. Yet by negotiating, yielding, conceding, and entreating they come to the point of making peace, when each party judges what was agreed to be just or tolerable, or at least such as must be preferred to war. The same method is observed in arbitral judgments and private agreements, and I do not know whether any pacification has been established without such moderation. They demand religious concord and unity in this manner: let this be conceded to the Lutherans, that to the Calvinists, another thing to the Anabaptists; and let them in turn concede many things both to Catholics and to others; let a rigorous examination of the questions be discontinued; let there be peace in our days.

They say that in this way the world can be reduced to concord; that by a remission of their qualities contrary elements are thus tempered into firm and solid bodies; that from dissimilar sounds a most delightful harmony is thus made; and that nothing becomes food for animals unless it has departed from its native rigidity and been tempered to an alien nature. If you strike hard things against hard things on both sides, they say, all are broken; gentleness and indulgence accomplish more among the obstinate. They will concede more if the beginning is made by you. The highest right is the highest injury; all extremes, even in good things, are dangerous.

These and other things are said either by malicious plotters, by simple men, or by men slightly instructed in piety and swollen with an opinion of their civil prudence. If theologians follow them, after the example of Marcion of Pontus they will abolish the whole of Christianity in a short time. Marcion selected from every heresy all that was foul, cruel, mad, and impious and forged one monster from so many evils. If we now mingle all things into one, it will be more detestable and destructive than the Marcionite monster in proportion as the heresies from which this poison will be compounded are fouler and more pestilential. Whatever is most capital and virulent in each heresy will pour all its corruption into this σορὸν φάρμακον [compound drug], and this will be the supreme evil of evils, sublimated from the marrow of all evils.

Let us see the matter itself. It must be conceded to the Calvinists that God destines, incites, impels, and compels us to sins; ubiquity must be conceded to the Lutherans; to the Osiandrians, that we are just by the essential justice of God; to the Memnonist Anabaptists, Anabaptism, and to the same men fornications and adulteries in nocturnal assemblies; to the Libertines, shameful acts, and it must be said, “Not I, but God did it.” I have named a few things; they themselves confess that they are infinite. What moderation, what religion will be made from these?

Musonius rightly says in Strabo, Discourse VII, that wicked men cannot nourish concord. Crooked wood does not fit straight wood, nor another crooked piece of wood; light does not agree with darkness, but as much light as approaches, so much darkness withdraws. That peace therefore cannot exist, nor that moderation which leads us away from the moderator of all things. We possess the true religion and cannot without crime pollute it with the errors of others. Shall I lie so that some Calvinist or Osiandrian may learn from my lie to speak truth? Shall I adore God as author of sin, confess an ubiquitous Christ, abjure with the Socinians the price of his blood, and deny ten articles lest they continue in their manner to trifle about purgatory, indulgences, and holy water? Shall I deny the whole Christ with Vorstius and Osiander so that by their kindness I may possess half a Christ--the whole of whom I possessed and betrayed to them?

Nor must the method observed in making treaties of kings be followed here. There, to remit one's own right, yield an estate, and relinquish things acquired by war belongs to humanity, and excessive firmness in retaining one's right is imputed to obstinacy. But when religion is disputed, it does not lie in the power of the litigants to bargain about victory; for the cause of truth is pleaded, and of that truth concerning which we possess the eternal decree of the highest and uncreated Truth. Whatever you alter from that truth is sacrilege; whatever you add is abomination. “For I testify to everyone hearing the words of the prophecy of this book: If anyone shall add to these things, God shall add upon him the plagues written in this book. And if anyone shall diminish the words of the prophecy of this book, God shall take away his part from the book of life and from the holy city and from the things written in this book.” These words must be received concerning the whole economy of Christian doctrine and rule of belief as well as concerning the Apocalypse of John, since they were dictated by the same authority. Whoever changes these things corrects the Holy Spirit; whoever moderates the sentence of the supreme judge by human ingenuity denies divine wisdom.

Therefore every true Christian who seeks the account of sacred dogmas from God and does not manufacture it from himself understands sufficiently that the least voluntary departure from heavenly truth is a fall into death, since he accuses God of error when he presumes to moderate by his own teaching the doctrine delivered by God.

Nor is the peace of those who err thus served if you indulge those who err; rather, spirit is added so that they undertake greater things and, having pursued the bird, hasten more confidently toward destruction. Truth is the one goal; one does not reach it by wandering. Eternal salvation is the one end of believers; one does not attain it by denying God and agreeing with errors. You will fall into the abyss

if you allow yourself to be moved from the summit of right doctrine; you will not be able to stand upon the slope if you did not stand at the top. You believe God in nothing if you judge him false in one thing. No reason for believing remains to you if you have either repudiated the authority of the revealer or surrendered it to the deadly peace of heretics. That is not peace but a compact with perfidy, sacrilege, impiety, and hell itself. Simulated religion is a double impiety, for a man both is impious and simulates piety.

He who covers impiety with paint therefore labors under a double evil and is consequently incurable. But experience has also taught here how useless that counsel of mixing religion is. The contests of the preachers in the federated Netherlands are known. Grotius, a learned man, politician, and jurist, interposed himself as mediator and pacificator among them; but what did Bogermannus the preacher do? He attacked Grotius the pacificator. Caspar Barlaeus attacked Bogermannus in his τὴν Βογερημαννομαχίαν [Bogermannomachy]. The whole question turns upon the fact that Sibrandus and Bogermannus accuse the Estates of Holland, who commanded mutual toleration among dissenters, of INJURED PIETY.

Sibrandus explains in what matter they injured piety. He writes that the Estates of Holland wished to be deceived by an ignorant and stupid man; that they allowed the churches to be torn apart and disturbed; that after the bishops were expelled they all transferred political power to themselves; that they patronized evasive men; maintained a heresiarch at public expense; wished to introduce the heresies of Socinus into the churches; and many similar things, which he poured out audaciously and fearlessly. These are Sibrandus's words. But Bogermannus is so far from disapproving them that he instead defines them as an Apostolic Paroxysm.

It is therefore impossible for the Rigid to agree to any moderation or mixture; and assuredly it cannot be done. Why, then, do political men judge that the eternal law must be moderated by their prudence? Because they think themselves to be without law and therefore prefer their decrees to the declarations of the creator; because they lack the faith by which alone the Majesty of him who is offended is esteemed.

The Apostle Peter calls them sects of perdition, 2 Peter 2. Who, then, is so mad as to communicate with those sects and expect salvation from a source from which only destruction can be drawn? Heretics--I speak of true heretics, not of those who err and incautious followers of heretics--are false prophets, ravenous wolves, false Christs, thieves, and robbers, Matthew 7 and 24, John 10. They are false apostles, deceitful workers, men who love themselves, greedy, proud, blasphemous, wicked, without affection, 2 Corinthians 11, 1 Timothy 1 and 3. They are false prophets, lying teachers, slaves of corruption, unlearned and unstable, 2 Peter 2; antichrists and seducers, 1 John 2. Such they remain even if they cast away one or another error while remaining obstinate in the rest. Catholics cannot enter into association with them unless they embrace fellowship in such great crimes. I mean that association sought in the moderation of religion, by which truth is commanded to be tempered to falsehood.

Therefore we shall rather hear Saint Cyprian, Epistle 55 to Cornelius: “Let our most beloved brothers resolutely shun and avoid the words and conversations of those whose speech creeps like a cancer.” Not merely conversations on any occasion for approving their error, but also the other means by which men are customarily drawn into communion with heresy. “Let no intercourse, no banquets, no conversations be mingled with such men, and let us be as separate from them as they are fugitives from the Church.” Let them avoid these things when there is danger of contagion; let them seek them when there is hope of converting others.

The great Antony, as the great Athanasius testifies in his life, never granted friendly words to Manichaeans or other heretics, declaring that their friendship and discourses were the destruction of the soul. But he detested the Arians, so that he said to all: “One must not even approach near them.” And Antony himself, now about to die, said: “Avoid the poisons of heretics and schismatics, and follow my hatred toward them. You yourselves know that I never had peaceful discourse with them.” If we cannot, and sometimes ought not, avoid these things, let us act earnestly lest our conversation confirm them in their errors while they think themselves either approved by us or judged tolerable.

CHAPTER XXIV

That Seditions Arising from Religions Cannot Be Removed by Syncretism Is Taught from Its Nature and End

After ninety years of dissensions, hatreds embittered by many injuries, a war made deadly by the bitterness of words and deeds--an Evangelical war--the Calvinists seek peace from a General Synod. But because faithful peace, the nursling of truth, the enemy of simulation, ignorant of frauds, execrates and flees heresies, disguise, and deceit, the same men, cast down from hope of sincere concord, pursue its handmaids, truces; construct images of false peace; and contrive syncretisms. Therefore, since I treated the Union and Synod of the Evangelicals in a separate book, I have determined now to treat Syncretism.

Syncretism is a false, simulated, insidious peace; a cunning concealment of hatreds; malice intent upon an opportunity for vengeance; fire placed beneath deceptive ash; a danger ingeniously covered; enmity flattering by a show of duty; a shadow of alliances, disciple of Machiavelli, daughter of Epicurus, plague of human society, and death of piety. Pareus has again brought forth this monster in an unhappy birth, with Heidelberg Wisdom acting as midwife, although it was pierced and cut apart by so many books and colloquies of the Lutherans and commands of princes. My intention is to propose a discussion rather than my judgment concerning it. I therefore examine the case; the states and princes to whom it pertains will pronounce sentence.

But if anyone who will read my discussion should by chance wonder why I--a member of the Society of JESUS and a pupil of sacred studies, whose whole course and every part of duty demands peace, flourishes by peace, and is weakened and broken by war--should seem less favorable to peace of any kind, I, always an adviser and author of peace, ask and entreat him to hear the reason for my purpose without offense and, having heard it, to weigh it. In this judgment I neither implore the benevolence of a friend nor refuse to undergo the judgment of an enemy; this cause stands sufficiently by its own equity.

All will understand that I oppose not peace but the most foul war which lurks beneath the name of peace; not truces, but syncretisms, the seedbeds of plots and wars. I venerate peace. Truces, as certain forerunners of peace which carry the olive branch, the insignia of their mistress Peace, I receive and embrace with my whole mind. But if those same truces, clothed in the spoils of true peace, conceal war; if beneath a peace-bearing bough they hurl a hidden death-bearing spear, I abominate them as insidious simulation, poison of concord, plague of sincerity, and the disgrace and stain of Germany--that is, of the ruling nation.

Peace is an uncertain good even when it is earnestly sought and sincerely given, when the minds of those making the compact are allied by mutual love, not merely their fidelity bound by letters and oath, because we do not know the hearts of those with whom we wish to maintain it. If, therefore, no one is secure in true friendship, with what great care must we flee Syncretism, which includes fraud in both fact and name, and which by the very fact that it is Syncretism possesses an express profession of simulated love for a time and future hatred? For when Syncretism most cunningly feigns peace, it acts so that it may overthrow by hidden plots the enemy whom it cannot lay low openly.

The most holy and learned Augustine rightly judged concerning these things in City of God, Book XIX, chapter 5: “There are no more hidden plots than those which lie concealed in the simulation of duty or under some name of intimacy. For by taking precautions you can easily avoid the man who is openly an adversary. But this hidden, intestine, and domestic evil not only arises, but even overwhelms a man before he can foresee and discover it. Therefore that divine utterance, ‘And a man's enemies are those of his household,’ is heard with great pain of heart; for although someone may be so strong that he bears with an even mind, or so vigilant that he guards by provident counsel against, the things which simulated friendship contrives against him, nevertheless, when he experiences those perfidious men to be the worst, if he himself is good he must be gravely tormented by their evil, whether they were always evil and pretended to be good or were changed from goodness into that malice. If, then, the house, the common refuge amid these evils of the human race, is not safe, what of the city? The greater it is, the fuller is its forum of civil and criminal suits, even if not only turbulent but often bloody seditions and civil wars are at rest. Cities are sometimes free from their outcomes, never from their dangers."

I therefore consult the safety of all when I disclose the frauds of a few. I do not sound the trumpet, but dissuade from Syncretism; I remove suspicions and simulations as impediments to true peace, because a union and concord of minds cannot otherwise be entered. A subscription can indeed be persuaded from the credulous, commanded from the weaker, extorted from those who fear, and an agreement signed with the unwilling; peace cannot exist without the benevolence and mutual concord of minds. But if my discussion is suspect to Lutherans of the Augsburg Confession, let them inspect and consult their own consciences, to which I appeal. Does Pareus propose, obtrude, and urge Syncretism for the honor and increase of the Augsburg Confession and Lutheran religion, or for the propagation of Calvinism and destruction of Lutheranism?

Who does not know how greatly it concerns the Empire and the state that the arts of the most fraudulent men be banished and crushed? Who is so ignorant--not merely of German generosity and sincerity but of human affairs universally--as not to marvel that a man existed who arrived at such shamelessness that he did not hesitate to offer a most disgraceful, insidious, and dangerous thing to most serene and illustrious kings and princes and most ample states, and to publish a very large book as prophet of such levity, perfidy, and fraudulence? Do new Machiavellis everywhere contrive too few imitations of alliances and friendships? Has so manifold a faith produced too little perfidy, and does it produce too little every hour? Old and cunning theologian, do you think the world so destitute of its own vices that you, a teacher of deception and artisan of syncretizing, judge that examples of fraud from an infamous nation must be brought into the morals of our age? Why do you obtrude ancient and foreign crimes upon a world as though it could not perish by recent ones?

But let us grant that you obtained the Syncretism you urged. Is there doubt how much disgrace will cling to the princes of Germany if they allow themselves to be bound by your faithless and foxlike pacification? You order them συγκρητίζεσθαι [to syncretize]. If they hear you, therefore, they will be:

> Κρῆτες ἀεὶ ψεῦσται, κακὰ θηρία, γαστέρες ἀργοί.
> Cretans always liars, evil beasts, idle bellies.

If anyone sees them, he will employ the old expression, ὁ κρὴς πρὸς τὸν κρῆτα [the Cretan against the Cretan], or κρὴς κρῆτα κρητίζονται [a Cretan and a Cretan play the Cretan], or assuredly ὁ κρὴς πρὸς αἰγινίτην [the Cretan against the Aeginetan], or more clearly, Ἀλώπεκι ἴσον πρὸς ἑτέραν ἀλώπεκα [a fox matched against another fox]. Do you prepare to transfer the ancient reproaches of a most foul and deceitful nation, now almost dead, to the Teutonic nobles? Are those men, in whom are German constancy and gravity, Roman majesty, and the right of the August Empire, so worthless to you that you do not fear to liken them to Cretans? You desire them to be συγκεκρητικευμένους [syncretized], that is, joined together by a fraudulent peace full of hatreds, so that when they assemble at the diets that maxim from the formula of trust may perish: "Among good men, affairs are conducted well." Let the supreme law of those syncretizing then be: "With a fox, act the fox." Let foreign nations laugh at us and say, "Behold a Cretan with a Cretan, a Cretan with an Aeginetan."

But let us despise the sayings of foreigners. What shame can survive in so disgraceful a matter? Can peace exist even thus? What will enticements of words and lies of countenances profit those who profess Syncretism? They confess that they simulate friendship in appearance so that they may await an opportunity to harm those joined with them without danger to themselves. I would wish to see the princes themselves, or at least the faces of envoys composed for favor, and to hear the soft words of those whose aim is to display peace in their countenance and store hatreds in their minds. For the man who syncretizes is a friend only in words; with his mouth he regulates arts of flattery, κακὰ βυσσοδομεύει [he plots evils in the depths], and in his inmost mind constructs evil.

Yet let Pareus conquer even here. Let Calvinism fill every vein of German sincerity with Cretan blood and alter nature with a Circean drug, so that they are now not Germans--faithful and generous--but rather Cretans, always liars, evil beasts, idle bellies. What alliances and commerce with foreign kings and peoples will they be able to hope for? Who will endure conversing with them? Who will either send or receive envoys whose fraudulence the titles of Syncretism show upon an open forehead? Who is so foolish as to believe men who by professed fraud contrive plots against their countrymen?

Flee these things, O kings, O princes, O states which rejoice to be named from the Gospel. It does not belong to your blood, dignity, or utility to imbue our country with the frauds of Cretans and Oxydracae. Unless you take timely precautions, there is danger that not only your faith but also your fidelity will be called into doubt, and that your colleagues and foreign princes will spurn all your promises, writings, and oaths as arts of fraudulent simulation rather than signs of a true and constant mind. Indeed, I have long heard the whispers of many who more often consider what you may at some time determine and do by the counsel of Cretan ministers than what belongs to your duty. They fear lest you someday approve those whom you hear praying so often about Syncretism and frauds. Although they judge this foreign to your disposition, they nevertheless consider it unnecessary to experience it at their own peril. But we shall treat these things individually hereafter.

I have thus far explained the notion and nature of Syncretism; nevertheless, for the sake of those who desire a fuller explanation, I shall make the whole matter clear by an example. Holland gave us one complete in every feature of Syncretism, and all the clearer and more perfect because that Syncretism was not between Calvinists and Lutherans, who fight diametrically, but coalesced within the Calvinist nation between the Rigid and the Soft.

The matter occurred in this way. At the beginning of the introduction of Calvinism into Belgium there was a fierce dissension among the Reformers. The more Rigid then conquered, but the Soft regained strength in Arminius and his associates and in 1606, at the Synod of Gorinchem, obtained a censure of the Palatine Catechism and Belgic Confession. By such labor and the favor of the Estates they brought matters to the point that they almost depressed the others. After many colloquies and writings, both were ordered to present their opinion about entering concord and to offer counsel publicly.

The counsel of the Soft, who from the title of their published little book call themselves Remonstrants, was this:

1. Mutual charity and benevolence must be cultivated. 2. Abuse and condemnations must be suspended. 3. A synod must decide the controversies. 4. They must be permitted to defend their opinion and ordain ministers who agreed with them. They were prepared for these things.

But the Rigid, who from another writing call themselves Counter-Remonstrants, judged thus:

1. Exacerbations and dissensions could be met only by a national synod. 2. Through the postponement of a synod until the twentieth year, so many stumbling blocks had arisen. 3. All who wished to be and be called ministers of the Reformed Churches ought to submit themselves to a synod as litigants on either side. 4. If a synod could not be held, the judgment of foreign academies must be obeyed. 5. In good conscience they could choose no other path of peace; if they themselves attempted another, the other pastors would not agree and even their hearers would depart from them. 6. Neither party should be forbidden to teach or dispute concerning the matter, for by this prohibition truth would be oppressed. 7. Nevertheless, neither party should be permitted freely to propose its doctrine; for this would occur with immense scandal and offense if in one city it were taught in this manner, in another otherwise, indeed in one and the same church and chair thus before noon and the contrary after noon. From this would follow harmful confusions, scandals, and schisms, to the devastation of the churches. 8. The adversaries, the Remonstrants or Soft, must therefore be commanded to keep their opinion on the five disputed articles within themselves and not propose or urge it in a sermon or otherwise in writing, publicly or privately; nor should they attack or refute the opinion of the Rigid or Counter-Remonstrants which opposed these articles. 9. Nevertheless, the Counter-Remonstrants must be commanded to dispute moderately against the Soft or Remonstrants and assail them. 10. Meanwhile no one who agrees with the Remonstrants must be ordained.

At last, for the peace of their churches, the Estates made a decree in January 1614. By it they ordered men to remain quiet until the future synod, to be wise unto sobriety, to tolerate and bear others--in one word, to observe a truce; all were to possess the same right, and the Remonstrants were to suffer no trouble because of their religion. They also forbade the horrible decrees of the Rigid to be taught, such as: that some men were created by God for damnation; that a necessity of sinning was imposed upon someone; that some are invited by God to salvation although he has altogether not decreed to give them salvation; and so forth.

Behold, reader, after so many years of most bitter disputations, writings, anathemas, thunderings, and combats, Syncretism commanded by the magistrate between two battle lines of one Calvinism. Let us now see what followed, yet in such a way that we also weigh the laws of Syncretism enacted by the Rigid.

First, they especially urge a synod because they hoped to surpass by numbers those whom the Remonstrants surpassed in eloquence, industry, and the magistrate's favor.

Second, a most unjust law is proposed by the Rigid: the Soft are permitted neither publicly nor privately to propose their doctrine, defend their opinion in books or sermons, assail others, or ordain anyone from their own flock. The Rigid deny that the Soft should be tolerated any longer; they say they have been tolerated more than enough. They assert it to be unjust that they implore the protection of the nobles--the Estates--against every ecclesiastical censure.

Third, that is the true face of Syncretism: they impose silence upon the Soft, judge accusation equitable, and wish the respondent's voice cut off. They reason not foolishly: victory is easy if you contend with a mute, if the accused is denied the defense always conceded among all nations by divine right. For how will truth, weakened by so many calumnies and agitated by so many hatreds, be restored by the equity of judges and stand if it is condemned unheard and undefended? It is an altogether barbarous crime, known neither to the altars of Lyon nor of Scythia, that a man should perish like a guilty person when the protection of innocence was denied him.

Fourth, the ordination of the Soft is forbidden. By a most cunning design they procure two advantages for their sect in a few words: the pursuits of the Soft are diminished when hope of honor and gain has been removed, and, succession denied, they must be reduced to fewness. But the decree of the Estates concerning mutual toleration and moderation made the cause of the Remonstrants or Soft better, as I said. Could the hardness of the Rigid be bent by the decree? Nicholas Grevinchovius, one of the six chosen disputants, writes thus in the dedicatory epistle of his disputation on two questions:

“But just as the same purple delights men and offends bulls, so the decree turned the minds of some toward counsels of peace, but provoked and sharpened others still more for battle. I know that this decree was suspect, and indeed hateful, to some for this reason alone: that it was promulgated by the illustrious Estates, not by a synod. Others, contrary to what the king of Great Britain had advised, judged that those disputes should be quieted neither by public authority nor any moderation, but terminated in favor of one party by theological decisions and synodal anathemas. Thus from that time no less rioting occurred than before, nor did those brothers rush more sluggishly against their fellow ministers and the more moderate churches than the most hostile and sworn enemies. This very church”--Rotterdam--“in which I serve the Lord is a witness, and you, most ample lords, are eyewitnesses with how great an effort and what a mass of invented suspicions, putrid calumnies, and most false accusations they labored at this one thing: that, the minds of the hearers being alienated, they might render our sermons less frequented and our churches deserted."

He then continues to explain their arts: disturbing the people by tribunician declamations; driving ignorant rural presbyters mad; preoccupying judges by the atrocity of suspicions; and leading square and simple rural presbyters by the ears. He treats these things at greater length. At last matters reached the point that the Rigid flew about freely in contempt of every decree of the Estates.

The history which Grevinchovius relates there is worthy of remembrance; I shall report it in his words: "I remember that, after hearing a most virulent sermon in a neighboring church, I sought from the presbytery a friendly conference about it with S. Gruterus, the minister of that church. But after many most bitter insults, what at last? A peremptory response: if I were a Turk or Jew, I could and ought to be admitted to a colloquy; but as a heretic more wicked than those, I was not to be heard but avoided by Paul's command." These things after the pleasant colloquy, these things after Syncretism had been decreed. But is this the end? Is immense anger and savage madness content with a moderate disaster?

Behold another stratagem proper and natural to Syncretism. While in the sight of the Estates they debate peaceably, cover hatreds with their countenance and frauds with bland speech, call one another brothers in almost every period, syncretize most splendidly, and most cunningly feign friendship, the same men most hostilely and bitterly assail their associates and brothers. For because they saw that the Estates were more favorable toward the Remonstrants or Soft than to appear likely to obey the desire and anger of the Rigid and condemn those men undefended, that hard nation of the Rigid, ignorant of yielding and tenacious in urging its purpose, contrives their utter destruction from elsewhere. It prepares a most powerful and fervent foreign enemy against the Remonstrants, who by speech may inflame the Estates of Holland toward the destruction of their brothers, move them by authority, and almost compel them by power.

I report the history from the Remonstrants' supplicatory book: "Moreover," they say, "since no one is ignorant what was recently written under the title of the king of Great Britain to the most powerful States General concerning the late pious and faithful servant of Jesus Christ, Lord JACOB ARMINIUS--who in those letters is disgraced with the appellation 'enemy of God,' and his disciples with the titles 'sectarians, plagues, heretics, indeed atheistic sectarians whose heresy it is expedient to suppress and root out promptly and in the very blade'--the Remonstrants judge that they too are touched and injured by these words. Yet they are no more Arminians than Calvinists or Lutherans; for they profess themselves Christians, ministers of the Reformed Church, by no means infected with heresy or a sect, much less--which is horrible to say--an atheistic sect, but agreeing in the foundation of doctrine and faith with the churches of Great Britain, faithful citizens of their country, humble subjects, the most humble servants of your illustrious lordships and of his Sacred Royal Majesty, for whose safety, long life, preservation, and happy government they ardently pray to the Lord God, King of kings.

"It seemed good to the Remonstrants, with the greatest submission, to ask and entreat your illustrious lordships to grant them, with your good leave--as their innocence in this matter is best known to you--permission to enter upon some safe and honorable way of defending themselves and most humbly and submissively admonishing the said Royal Majesty concerning both Lord Arminius of pious memory, whom they confidently believe to have been and to be not an enemy but a friend of God, and themselves, as men who wish to be cleared and freed before the whole world from the gravest accusations, intolerable to any Christian person."

A spectacle harsh even to waves and shores, but unexpected and mournful to the Remonstrants: in their own country, before their own magistrate, chosen theologians and presidents of churches dispute about faith, religion, charity, holiness, and mutual toleration; instruct one another with fraternal words; write counsels of peace to their magistrate; offer themselves to a synod and pledge to stand by its judgment. While they display these splendid things in Holland to the gaping people, they most cruelly prosecute the same men in Britain as guilty, affirming them to be sectarians, plagues, heretics, atheistic sectarians, liable to the gravest accusations intolerable to any Christian, and judging that they must promptly be suppressed and rooted out in the very blade. They acted with such art that the king believed, with such passion that he quickly dictated a sentence and by letter urged a foreign magistrate to suppress and root them out. The outcome of the judgment, the severity of the royal sentence, and the transmarine embassy show what were the cunning and atrocity of the accusers.

Perhaps the Counter-Remonstrants were not the authors of so atrocious and perfidious an accusation carried to a transmarine tribunal, nor did the Rigid summon the deadly sentence from the island when domestic equity obstructed them. I would therefore wish them to clear themselves, or the most serene king, who alone can do so, to absolve them from suspicion. For by naming definite accusers he will show the rest to be immune, if not from communion in an approved crime, at least from the perpetration of the deed.

But it is admitted that they accused them. Those who wished their brothers to perish undefended, imposed silence, and judged them intolerable and more wicked than Turks and Jews--and this contrary to the magistrate's public decree--why is it marvelous if they reported the matter more harshly to the defender of the faith because the Estates seemed too gentle? Moreover, no one except a rigid Calvinist condemns those articles of the Remonstrants about which the controversy exists. Therefore those alone accused who alone possessed a cause for accusation. Thirdly, we ought neither to suspect, nor will his panegyrists concede, that the most prudent king judged most severely in a most grave cause upon the information of an uncertain or unknown accuser. Who, then, accused? Were they not the leaders of the Rigid, who knew the Soft most intimately and could report certain, attested, and seen things? Those men, I say, who foresaw the ruin of the colloquy and perceived themselves conquered by reason and the judgment of the Estates.

I have produced an example of Syncretism which may instruct even the rudest man. What more Cretan could be devised even in Crete itself than the Rigid displayed for us in Holland? At home they dispute fraternally, utter holy words drawn from the sanctuary of Scripture as signs of false benevolence in simulated love, compose laws of peace, and undertake a truce at the command of the Estates. Meanwhile they abuse the authority and power of a foreign king for the destruction of their associates and brothers. They hoped that those whom they could not conquer would be given over as guilty to royal favor, and that the Estates would not dare deny what they so ardently demanded: that they stake the reputation and life of a few to earn the friendship of an allied king.

They were not ignorant that the Briton held the key of the federated provinces; that without his aid navigation was unsafe; that Zeeland and Holland were bound to him by heavy pledges; that cities were occupied by an English garrison; that many Englishmen were in Belgium; and that not a few Belgians preferred royal Majesty to the modest rank of their own Estates. The Rigid judged that all these protections of favor, power, authority, proximity, appearance, and fear must be employed against the safety of their brothers with whom they had been syncretized.

Do not expect another condition of Syncretism or hope for other alliances, Lutherans--or, if other, ones much worse in many ways. For the articles about which they dispute belong as much to you as to the Soft. They teach: first, that reprobation was not made without regard to sin; second, that Christ died for all and each; third, that grace is so given that many can nevertheless resist the Holy Spirit; fourth, they demand that whether faith and justice can be lost be demonstrated from Scripture, for they candidly profess that they doubt. They utterly deny that they have any other dispute with their brothers.

On account of the same articles you will have to sustain the same judgments against you. They will proclaim silence to you, deny that you should be tolerated, and declaim that you are more wicked than Turks and Jews. However the theologians flatter and lie with their countenance about charity, simulate fraternity in words and embrace, nevertheless a tempest stirred by the flatterers will come and, armed with royal forces, a storm will strike you. You will be sectarians, plagues, heretics, atheistic sectarians, liable to the gravest accusations intolerable to any Christian person as soon as they become stronger; hence you must promptly, indeed in the very blade, be suppressed and rooted out lest you be able to grow into shrubs.

They will rise against you the more cruelly in proportion as they possess more causes for conquering you, and the more eagerly as the prize of victory is greater and succession to more splendid wealth is hoped for. For in you they will not allege those errors which they pursue by so distant a judgment and avenge so cruelly among the Remonstrants--errors which British courtiers scarcely understand, much less rural ignoramuses, or “square men,” as Grevinchovius calls them. They judge that they possess greater reason for raging against you: namely, monstrous ubiquity, the conqueror of all articles of faith; impanation; ἀρτολατρείαν [bread-worship]; Osiandrism; Flacianism; and the other horrible and abominable portents of heresies summoned from hell.

Fraternal names will then be far away, when you are called worse than those now judged more wicked than Turks and Jews. Nor will you be able to complain; for he who admits Syncretism brings frauds into the compact. He who introduced a condition of deceiving into the counsel ought not to grieve at the outcome. Who will pity an enchanter struck by a serpent? To whom is death unexpected if he wanders carelessly around a lion's mouth? Flee the very long whales which display the faces of Sirens in the Netherlands but possess the tail of scorpions in Britain. If the deceitful fiction of one or another entices you, let the examples of the most bitter persecutions which those who took too little caution for themselves were compelled to undergo deter you. And let this be the example of Calvinist Syncretism.

CHAPTER XXV

That the Primary Aim of Syncretism Is That, Once the Peace of Religion Has Been Violated, Catholics Should Be Slaughtered

The name of Syncretism is infamous, the thing far more foul, its danger directed against all. Its end is most cruel and most unworthy. For through this counsel of an impious conspiracy destruction is prepared for the Roman Pontiff, the August Emperor, kings, princes, Catholic states, and the whole orthodox name. By examples of ancient crimes, by the notorious deceits of truces, a most accursed thirst for Catholic blood and Catholic money, most thirsty for our blood, advances against us. It has placed before its bloody conspiracy the peace and union of the Evangelicals and a general synod, so that it might impart an appearance of honor to its brigandage; it summons all Evangelicals so that they may profess themselves helpers in obtaining the plunder. It makes a splendid entrance hall so that secretly and safely, through a laboriously painted substructure, it may carry them off to prisons, quarries, undertakers, and pyres. A bland speech? The Union and Synod of the Evangelicals. A popular devotion to peace, and a book dedicated to the desires of peacemakers; but through these fair appearances, through this chrysocolla, the way leads to wounds and blood, to civil wars, to the theaters of savage superstition, to the amphitheaters of Calvinistic cruelty. For Calvinism at last, sooner or later, passes over into its own nature, and by the horror of its punishments betrays and disgraces the lies of its affected gentleness. What, then, does the adversary attempt by Syncretism and pacifications? What is the end of so great a disgrace? Let us hear the man himself.

In Chapter 12 he commands that endeavors and counsels be joined in pious Syncretism against the common enemy Antichrist. In Chapter 11 he conducts this more ardently, and prefixes this title to it: “That, while a synod and full concord are being procured, the Evangelicals meanwhile ought to unite in pious Syncretism and mutual toleration, and to stand together against the Papacy.”

Therefore that Silesian Hannibal, now about to die, seeks throughout the whole world an enemy for the Romans--an enemy for the Romans, that is, for the Pontiff, his defenders, friends, and clients. He looks about on every side for auxiliaries, even faithless and doubtful ones, and by the same labor warns us to be cautious, lest we fail to know that war has been declared, which so well-known a fetial priest has proclaimed. I propose three things in this war for princes and their counselors to consider.

The first is that by the name Antichrist and Papacy not only the Pontiff, but all clerics and laymen of the Catholic and ancient religion, are designated by that gladiatorial trainer. The second is that he treats not only of his own defense but of an attack upon Catholics and of arms to be carried against them unprovoked. The third is that the war he recommends will be the most cruel of all those that have ever shaken the human race.

The first is admitted. All define the Papacy as the pontifical kingdom. Graserus, in The Royal Plague, folio 54, attempts to show that the clergy are the flesh of Antichrist, and secular kings and princes his bones. Povellus says almost the same in his theses On Antichrist; Benedictus Aretius says it most pestilentially of all on Apocalypse 13:15. The name of the Beast is to be a son of the Roman Church, or a Catholic, or a member of the Roman Church. But two beasts are described by the Apostle John, of which they interpret the greatest and most monstrous as the Emperor or Empire, and the secondary, the servant of the first, as the Pontiff.

Therefore this war will rage most widely against kings and the firstborn of kings who sit upon their thrones, down to the firstborn of maidservants grinding at the mill; for when the Calvinist peacemaker begins to be provoked, all are Antichristian to him. Against all, I say, barbarous savagery will advance, but first against those whom it will be most profitable to have conquered: the Emperor, the Most Christian and Catholic kings, who are the firstborn sons of the Church and the most noble members in so divine a body. Nor do I say these things to arouse odium; no speech can be found equal to such atrocity, nor do those who teach thus care about reproach, since they account ingenious cruelty a praise to themselves. It seemed too little to them to demand in general that all be delivered to tortures and death, lest anyone trust that account would be taken of his dignity or lineage; Aretius the Calvinist expressly destines Caesar and the princes of the Empire for slaughter in his commentary on Apocalypse 13:7: "After the doctrine of Christ had been received, impious hypocrites presently snatched the title of the Church to themselves and persecuted the true commandments of Christ, which cause the successors of the imperial seat still strenuously defend." And: "For as widely as the Roman name extends, so widely do the pious"--that is, Calvinists--"suffer persecutions." When he wrote this, Calvinism had not yet invaded the Empire with so great a force. And on verse 1: "To marvel at the Beast is to marvel at the success and felicity of the Empire, proclaiming that august, holy, sacrosanct, and immortal thing." And: "For the dragon is the Devil, who attaches his own ornaments to the Empire."

But Graserus speaks far more abusively in The Royal Plague: he calls the Empire "the fullness of diabolism." The same man, after calling all Catholics "bestiality" at folio 55, and then saying at folio 207 that all Catholics fornicate with the great whore and that kings are fornicators, adds: "In this order of FORNICATING KINGS, THE SPANIARD AND SPAIN hold first place."

Nor does Pareus conceal these things, nor can he; for he orders all sects to stand against the Papacy and those whom, for the sake of insult, he calls Papists. Nor is he so stupid as not to know that the basilica of Peter is supported by the protection of many kings and peoples. He knows that their life and power prevent him from turning the rich plunder of Roman benefices into his own rewards; he knows that the common father in Christ of all orthodox kings cannot be attacked except through the sides of faithful kings. He knows that the praetorian ship of Saint Peter is surrounded by the victorious fleet of the whole Christian world, and cannot be taken and torn apart unless that fleet is scattered.

But he would especially wish given over to destruction those whom in Chapter 29 he falsely says are forcing their provinces back under the yoke of Antichrist by deceit and arms. Who are they? "Documents of this matter," he says, "are Eastern Francia, Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Hungary, Troppau, and Donauwörth." In its place I shall bring forward a most just expostulation concerning this injury; now it is sufficient to show against whom Pareus declares war: namely, against the Emperor, the Austrian house, the Bavarian princes, and the duke of Eastern Francia. "These things," he says, "must be opposed more strongly and more promptly by united vows, counsels, and ACTS." These matters indeed especially concern kings, princes, and other secular men; since I have proved the case concerning them, it is not necessary to speak of ecclesiastics, whom they hate more bitterly. Concerning these I shall be content to produce the most calumnious opinion of Calvin, Letter 2, On the Duty of a Christian Man concerning Benefices, etc.: "Among upright"--Calvinist--"and incorrupt judges, it would surely not be so difficult to make manifest that that whole mass of Roman wealth, from the supreme see itself down to the least chaplaincy, as they call it, was compounded from impostures, thefts, robberies, sacrileges, and the worst arts; and that you cannot touch any particle of it without binding yourself by consciousness of many crimes."

Laws and legal principles teach how impostors, thieves, robbers, sacrilegious men, usurpers of evil arts, bound by consciousness of many crimes, are to be treated; and when these men have conquered, they will turn all those laws--established to restrain the audacity of the wicked--toward attacking the innocence of the orthodox. For what will victors not attempt, when, although they do not yet possess much and do not yet securely possess what they have scraped together, they nevertheless wish war to be decreed against distant kingdoms, against princes under another's jurisdiction, and against Caesar himself? When they grow hot with wine and anger beside the Neckar, they bear it ill if, in Eastern Francia, Austria, Styria, Hungary, Troppau, and the city of Donauwörth, the ancient truth into which those regions were first baptized is taught contrary to their will and dominion. I have said and proved that the calamity and ruin of that war are proclaimed against all; I shall now show the second point: he does not aim to preserve and defend things acquired in whatever manner, but to enlarge his dominion, carry hostile arms against others, kill, and strip away spoils.

First, the Genevan, Helvetian, French, Belgian, British, and the now-emerging Brandenburg practice demonstrate this. Next, he thinks that war must be undertaken to propagate his perfidy, break images, and abolish Catholic ceremonies; but for one who attempts such things, defense alone is not sufficient: war must be carried forward by him, not merely sustained. But it is better to hear in his own words the Tartarean mob of civil war thundering. On Romans 13, Doubt, Proposition 7: “Christian kings and princes ought to resist pontifical tyranny, even with the sword, by obstructing and breaking it by force, removing idols, and restoring the Church to its liberty.” Everyone understands that offensive war is commanded here; or, if anyone doubts, surely the three reasons that he appends ought deservedly to remove every scruple.

The first reason: “Princes ought to be a terror to evil works and avengers unto wrath against those who do evil. But the works of Antichrist are the worst, and therefore his wickedness must be restrained with the sword.” Who would say that mere defense against crimes is commanded to a prince? Who denies that it is the magistrate's duty diligently to search for and track down brigands, thieves, and malefactors, to drag them from hiding places, and to proceed by law against those convicted and judged? But who does not see that by this reasoning not only a right and a sword are given to Calvinists against the Pontiff, Caesar, and every Catholic Estate, but vengeance is also commanded? Truly an accursed heresy, which not only permits the license of wars and robberies against fellow princes who have persisted in the ancient religion of the fathers, but also commands cruelty.

The second reason is even more cruel: “Because this is commanded to them, Apocalypse 18:6: Render to her as she herself rendered to you, and double to her the double according to her works; in the cup in which she mixed, mix double for her. Therefore they ought to destroy the kingdom of the Pope.” A just command indeed, but against Antichrist and his helpers, against whom it is directed by God; impious and cruel when punishments of malefactors are transferred to priests and Christian kings because of their perseverance in ancient piety.

In the third reason he explains more fully what he wishes to be done: “Because,” he says, “it is foretold that Christian kings and princes will hate the whore, render her desolate and naked, eat her flesh, and burn her with fire; but the prediction possesses the force of a precept, so that they should do this.” I have elsewhere exposed the injuries, calumnies, and sacrileges of the adversaries in corrupting these words of Scripture; now I wish to establish only this: according to their judgment, the war they contrive is not defensive but offensive.

Hence Fredericus Braubomus the Calvinist, in Book 10, Chapter 5 of The Flowers of the Flamens, attempts throughout to prove that all Christian kings--indeed, all Calvinists--possess a divine command to overthrow the Pontiff. “Such a command,” he says, “as the private man Ehud possessed, we possess publicly.” Hence the warlike speech of Graserus in The Royal Plague. Hence Plessis's trumpet call to the king of Britain, in which with great shouting he demands that the king seek Italy, pierce the Pontiff with an avenging sword, furnish the world a spectacle of the hunt, trample him upon the Milvian Bridge, ruin him, drive him out, and submerge him in Avernus like a millstone. With great passion the most gentle man seeks this, and desires himself to be present, to fight, and to lick swords warm with noble blood. “I,” he says in the preface to his Mystery of Iniquity, “shall mingle among the first battles; amid the triumphs, when the angel gives the signal, I shall repeat, FALLEN; I shall immerse myself wholly in this holy joy; caught up close to eternity, I shall die in it.”

I pass over the cruelty of this veteran soldier fattened on Catholic blood. I do not accuse the savage joy of a mind submerged in the gore of the slain, or a joy so exultant from butchery that it severs the life of the rejoicing man, because it belongs to Calvinist piety not to glory in the hope of the sons of God, not to rejoice in heavenly consolation, not to immerse oneself in the holy joy of divine love, but to set the highest pinnacle of gladness upon the gore of the slain, to be submerged in Catholic blood, and to melt with such great pleasure at another's wounds and tortures that one dies in one's own cruelty. This is the vow of the soldier; this is the vow of all the Calvinist ministers who have nourished that chick of Mars with blood.

I have now sufficiently explained two things: namely, that war has been decreed against all; next, that it is a war in which force is to be carried against others unprovoked, not one in which force offered is merely repelled. The third remains: namely, that if war is waged under the auspices of Pareus, it will be the most monstrous and foul of all that the world has thus far undergone, and that this savagery is the proper end of Syncretism.

Plessis's joy and pleasure can demonstrate the cruelty more clearly than my words. We have heard that there were many savage tyrants who took pleasure from the blood and pains of others and eagerly watched punishments. We recall none of so beastly and ferocious a disposition that the torments of the wretched furnished him so great a force of joy as to compel him to die; no executioner who derived from tortures applied to another's body so much gladness that the pleasure of tormenting could effect in the one what pains and the laceration of the body effected in the other, so that the immensity of savage joy would take the tormentor's life just as the magnitude of torture took the tortured man's. Plessis alone professes that he will be wholly submerged in, and will die in, that joy of executioners. Let us imagine an army of Plessises, with Pareuses as its commanders. The mind shudders to speak of the rest; I do not intend to range over what no ingenuity of executioners has hitherto discovered.

Perhaps you will ask what cause of savagery the Calvinists put forward. Most allege anger and hatred, all a false opinion, and some the pleasure that they perceive from another's torture, which is proper to cruelty. They think Catholics, whom they call Papists, are Antichristians. Some persuade themselves of this so certainly that they assert it even with perjury, as Povellus does in his theses On Antichrist; others doubt, as does the Most Serene King of England. Yet because they think this, they therefore judge Catholics the most filthy, foul, and savage of all men, drunk with the blood of the saints, idolaters, Baalites, and "bestiality," as they proclaim. "Under those elaborate masks"--of Catholics--says Graserus in The Royal Plague, "nothing other than cruel murderers, criminals, poisoners, impure fornicators, thieves, and brigands are concealed and hidden." A grave accusation: that nothing else lies hidden there, nothing of humanity, nothing of truth.

Therefore, since they have long since judged us to be such criminal masks, from that prejudgment they determine that we must be vexed by every punishment and torn by every insult. Sacred Scripture teaches us that Antichrist will try every kind of savagery against the pious. "For then there will be tribulation such as has not been since the beginning, when nations began to exist." They judge the Pontiff to be Antichrist and Catholics to be Antichristian attendants and servants; for this reason they impute to us all the cruelty that Scripture attributes to Antichrist, and one greater than was ever exercised by any tyrant. But what is said in Apocalypse 18, "Render to her double," they interpret so as to say that they have been commanded by GOD to apply to us torments twice as harsh as those by which Antichrist tortured the saints.

Although Pareus's words are more monstrous than Plessis's pleasure, let us hear them: "Nor is injustice commanded when it is commanded that double be rendered to her; rather, it is signified that no kind of vengeance against the Pope is unjust or excessive. 'Double' is understood not in relation to the punishment that he deserved, but to the evils which he formerly inflicted upon the pious and with which he afflicted the Church." How emphatically: no kind of vengeance! Nor are punishments decreed against the person of the Pontiff alone. If Plessis conquers, the lot of kings and princes will be the same, for many of them have harmed Calvinists far more than the Pontiff has--especially those by whose pious care, life, and admonition certain provinces have been led back to knowledge of the ancient faith and the true worship of God.

These things are to be expected by us if Syncretism prevails and God ceases to govern the human race. Pareus, a minister of hell, will preside over the slaughterhouse; a harsh arbiter of punishments, he will multiply the tortures to double measure. Attentive and skilled in torture, he will take care that they do not pay less than double; for if the executioners please to exceed it, Pareus will permit it, "because no kind of vengeance is excessive or unjust." Plessis will be present, wholly submerged in holy joy. Pareus will invent what Phalaris will marvel at, what Busiris will be astonished at, what Calvinism has not yet dared or has not yet been able to do. He will dictate punishments to be applied not merely to plebeian bodies but to the majesty of kings and princes and the sanctity of bishops; and, having vigorously employed so great a mastery of slaughter, he will extinguish Catholics by tortures and the army of Plessis by the joy conceived from the tortures of Catholics.

More savage are you than grim Busiris, more savage than he

Who roasted the false bull in a slow fire,

And he who is said to have given the bull to the Sicilian tyrant

And to have allied his arts with his words.

That Tuscan tyrant, about whom boys are accustomed to sing, was nothing beside the desire for Christian peace and the contrivances of Syncretism:

Indeed, he even joined dead bodies to living,

Matching hands to hands and faces to faces,

And thus killed them by a long death in a wretched embrace.

The Calvinist will double these things against us. What appearance will the world then have? What place will receive the fearful? How many punishments must the brave overcome? What groans? What sounds of blows? What fumes of fires hissing in wounds?

Who could disclose in relation so many Deaths? Who could lament the abominable slaughters?

What such deeds are the monstrous ever said to have committed--

Either Scinis with the Isthmian pine, or Sciron from the deep cliff,

Or Phalaris with the bull, or Sulla with the prison,

Or the Dutch with swords, or the Huguenots with dormice?

O gentle horses of Diomedes! Altars of Busiris,

You are now merciful; Cinna is now pious, and Spartacus gentle,

When compared with Pareus.

How great will be the suffering that can produce mortal joy in a Calvinist? Although perhaps his hands have not yet been wet with Catholic blood, he has certainly dyed the pen with which he writes in our blood and bloodied his jaws with our death. These are the counsels of the tribunes of our age; these the decrees of the theologians: We cannot conquer by our cause; let us kill. “We possess publicly the divine command which Ehud the judge possessed privately against the king of the Moabites.” What sort of command is this? Kill. Who will ask whether courage or deceit is used against an enemy?

Can there therefore be peace for you, O Pareus, with those whom God commands you to kill? If a law has been commanded by the supreme Lord by which our slaughter is entrusted to you, and you judge that this is so, you break off every compact and every hope of concord forever.

You will say: “I shall make peace with you, but I cannot act against the law of God; he has commanded me to kill you. I possess a public command to kill you; the supreme Emperor's authority renders private pacifications, treaties, and oaths void.” Our princes now understand you sufficiently. Divine goodness has therefore bound their power and courage by the closest alliance for their own defense, lest each one perish separately through the snares of these agitators. But to expect religious peace from those for whom it is the summit of all sanctity to kill their adversaries at the first opportunity is foolish--from those, I say, who introduce into the world not only treaties customary among nations but even shameful frauds of Syncretisms; namely:

> So great a task it was to destroy the Roman nation.

CHAPTER XXVI

That the Secondary Aim of Syncretism Is Twofold: the Overthrow of the Lutherans and the Servitude of Calvinist Princes

Once the Pontiff has been killed together with his defenders, after they have devoured his flesh, burned many of them, blocked the bed of the Tiber with corpses, and brought back the times of Sulla, in which the foremost fell into the river and the highest upon their bodies, they will then turn the sword against their Lutheran fellow soldiers and, with a Cadmean battle, offer funeral rites to Roman shades. For if the simple Pope and simple Papists had to be finished off so atrociously, what will they say that double popes and double Papists deserve? For Calvinist ministers are accustomed to call the Lutherans thus, as I proved in the book concerning their union.

Next, they will possess against the Lutherans themselves the same causes for waging war which impelled them to Syncretism and conflict against Catholics. They will say that their princes ought to resist Lutheran tyranny, obstructing it even with the sword and by force and breaking idols; for Pareus thinks that the Lutherans too patronize idols, on Romans 1, Doubt 18. Thirdly, the Lutherans judge that Calvinists must be prosecuted by war; but who would believe that Calvinists will deliberate more benignly concerning their enemies, whom they have experienced to have thought about them only with the greatest cruelty? Joachim Westphal cries out that whoever is found to favor Calvinists must be exterminated from the whole world. He glories that he wrote: “Calvinists are to be refuted by the magistrate with the sword rather than with the pen.” He is the author of the advice “that magistrates interdict from water and fire not merely professors of Zwinglian doctrine but also those who approve it”--so Calvin reports in his Final Admonition to Westphal.

For the sake of order I now touch this part lightly; in their proper place I shall produce the Lutherans themselves pleading their cause, for among all causes this is the principal one. Therefore nineteen reasons from the judgment of the Lutherans will explain the cause. Yet lest the Calvinist agitators think they can so cover and suppress the purpose of their mind that it does not issue forth among the people and become known, I shall deal briefly with them, and so gently that they cannot take offense, so truly that they cannot answer.

Come then: let there be peace; let Syncretism coalesce. You wish to provide for the Lutherans; you account it an abomination that fraternity be rent. Once we have been killed, you promise to live peacefully with them forever. If you do not knowingly and willingly deceive them, come then: as spokesman for all Lutherans, I pray and entreat this one thing. Allow them to retain their place in the Electoral March for even one month. I do not pray that they remain forever; this is too much. I demand some interval for flight and a small loan of time. Let them possess that pledge of your humanity and Syncretism; do not expel those whom you greatly desire to be so closely joined with you. If I obtain this, I shall become a herald of your moderation; if it is denied, I do not see what the Lutherans can hope for. Will you yield lands and inheritances to those whom you have begun to expel so precipitately and eagerly that by your importunity you have driven the wretched men into madness--men to whom you have not granted even a precarious possession for a time? If you proceed to oppress them by secular power, what may they expect when conquered, when even now, while fortune stands, they suffer such dire things; when even now, while the flatteries of Syncretism solicit them, they experience exiles, proscriptions, and prisons?

But what if I make plain from Pareus that not only can the Lutherans not be safe while Calvinists live, but even Calvinist kings and princes themselves cannot evade the deceits and violence of their ministers unless they serve a servitude? So great is the perversity of the Zwinglian possession that it turns the sword against its own entrails when the material for cruelty directed against foreigners is withdrawn. Pareus teaches thus on Romans 13, Proposition 2:

"Subjects--not private persons, but those established in an inferior magistracy--can by right defend themselves, the state, and the Church, or true religion, even by arms against a superior magistrate," upon these conditions:

I. When the superior magistrate degenerates into a tyrant.

II. Or when he wishes by force to compel them or other subjects to manifest idolatry and blasphemies.

III. When an atrocious injury is inflicted upon them.

IV. If they cannot otherwise be secure in fortune, life, and conscience.

V. That under the pretext of religion or justice they do not seek their own interest.

VI. With ἐπιείκεια [equity] always preserved, and with the restraint of blameless protection according to the laws.

From these conditions Lutheran and Calvinist princes can fashion their arguments.

First. If a Calvinist consistory judges me a tyrant, it will think it lawful, whenever it pleases, to arm a praetor against me. But it will call me a tyrant if I tolerate and foster rigid Ubiquitarians and savage enemies of the truth--if I exterminate Calvinists.

Second. With how great a license will it establish that decree of its own: that a satrap may defend his own church against a superior magistrate? If Calvinists assemble a little church at Wittenberg or Leipzig, will a consul or satrap be able by good right to defend it by arms against the Elector? No one is ignorant how widely that statement extends--"I defend the Church; I protect the true religion"--unless he is so much a stranger in Europe that he does not know by how many religions the true faith is claimed. If a sword has been given to an inferior magistrate against a superior in that cause, they must concede that the prince of Saxony could once have been killed by Crellius.

Third. "If he wishes to compel them to manifest blasphemy." Namely, if anyone teaches impanation and ubiquity in Lutheran fashion, and commands men to subscribe to those articles or to cease from condemning them, according to Pareus's judgment that prince can be killed by his own praetor.

Fourth. "If an atrocious injury is inflicted." Surely it is an atrocious injury to give subjects in church, in place of heavenly bread and the saving Eucharist, excrement of which the Devil himself ought to be ashamed in hell. Beza says the Lutherans do this; see the Defense of the Men of Pforzheim, page 205. Therefore he judges that princes who exclude Zwinglian loaves and morsels from their dominions and protect the Lutheran Supper by their authority and arms inflict an atrocious injury.

Fifth. "If they cannot otherwise be secure in conscience." But when will men say that they are secure in their most holy conscience? When in fortune and life? If in the best faith the Lutherans yield their ministries to them; if they abandon everything; if they are not burdensome to the occupiers of their property; if it is granted them freely to teach, rebuke adversaries, convene councils, and arm consistories. I have never doubted that Pareus himself never approved for himself what he demands that we believe: that a praetor driven mad by Zwinglianism, if he thinks that while his own prince lives he cannot be secure in conscience, has obtained the right and power of life and death over his lord.

For what if his conscience is as cauterized as Calvin's back? What if it is fanatical? What if impious? What if Calvinist? Will the life of a Lutheran prince depend to such a degree upon the conscience of a Calvinist subject? What if the latter professes that his conscience is injured because the sacraments are not given according to the Genevan rite; because he does not hear pleasant sermons which ascribe crimes to GOD; because he is forbidden to educate and initiate his children in Genevan rites? Will he procure the security of his conscience by the danger of the prince, sanctity by the blood of the magistrate, and safety by the death of those who rule him? I leave these things for magistrates to consider; I proceed to other matters. He produces five reasons to prove his proposition, by which he overturns the exception concerning the ἐπιείκεια [equity] of blameless defense.

Reason I. “Because the superior magistrate is subject to divine laws and those of his state. For it would be manifest impiety and wickedness for a magistrate, however exalted, to wish to exempt himself from the laws. This is evident because the king is commanded to read Deuteronomy, or the divine law, Deuteronomy 17; Joshua 1:8. Therefore God wishes the king to be subject to divine laws. But the law of GOD not only prohibits tyranny but also commands it to be lawfully restrained: ‘Whoever sheds man's blood,’ etc. Likewise, the Emperor testifies in the Code that he does not wish his decrees to possess a place in judgments contrary to law, but that they ought to be void if perhaps they are recognized to depart from justice. And in Book 4 of the Code, On the Laws of Princes: ‘So worthy of the majesty of a ruler is the declaration that the prince professes himself bound by the laws.’ Therefore even the tyrannies and brigandage of a superior magistrate ought to be restrained by the ordinary power, which in any polity is either the inferior magistrate or the consent of the people.”

II. “Because it is no less the duty of an inferior than of a superior magistrate to defend the life and safety of subjects against atrocious injuries and the unjust force of brigands and tyrants, whether foreign or domestic.” This is proved: “Because of them too it is said: ‘He is the minister of God to you for good; he is not a terror to good works, but to evil. He does not bear the sword in vain; he is an avenger unto the wrath of God against him who does evil.’ Therefore when a superior magistrate does evil, and acts with atrocious injuries against subjects or blasphemies against God, the inferior ought to be an avenger unto wrath,” etc. Likewise, “because inferior magistrates are therefore joined to superiors, both so that they may be associates in government and so that they may moderate the latter's excessive license. Therefore, when they restrain it, they employ the authority and sword divinely entrusted to them through a legitimate calling.”

III. “Those whose office it is to establish magistrates also have the office of restraining or removing those who advance outrageously, unless they desist from advancing against God and the state. But magistrates are established either by the consent of the people, by the senate, by electors, or by other magistrates. Therefore these act rightly when they restrain or remove those who advance outrageously.”

IV. “From a similar case: a mad magistrate is rightly removed by public authority, as Nebuchadnezzar, turned into a mad beast, was cast out from human fellowship, Daniel 4:31. But an atrocious assailant and tyrant is like a madman.”

V. “Approved examples, both sacred and profane, confirm the same. In the history of the Judges, the Israelites are often read to have risen through their judges, with God's approval, against neighboring tyrants by whom they were cruelly treated. Hezekiah, a pious king, revolted from the Assyrian tyrant, and when attacked by him in war, defended himself against him by arms, 2 Kings 18. It does not matter that these were foreign tyrants, for domestic tyrants differ in nothing from foreign ones; indeed, they are to be restrained more because they are perjured and more harmful. Thus the people resisted the foolish King Saul when he wished to slaughter his son Jonathan, 1 Samuel 14:15. Ahikam defended the prophet Jeremiah against King Jehoiakim when he wished to kill him, Jeremiah 26:24. The centurions and princes removed the tyrant Athaliah, 2 Kings 11. The Maccabees defended themselves and the state by arms against the Macedonian tyrants. Thrasybulus drove the Thirty Tyrants from Athens. By public consent the Romans expelled kings who ruled shamefully; they often compelled consuls to abdicate the magistracy; they judged the tyrants Nero and Maximinus public enemies and removed them. The Electors deposed the idle and luxurious Wenceslaus from the Empire, putting in his place Rupert, Elector Palatine, founder of the cathedral church of this town, in the year 1400.”

Finally, Trajan is praised in Dio because, when handing the sword to the praetorian prefect, he said: “Use this for me if I command just things; against me if unjust things.”

Since the matter itself teaches how such splendid arguments open a door to the crime and audacity of the wicked for destroying the safety of princes, I ought to say no more. What then? A prince is subject to the laws of his state? Let it be so; I do not now dispute this. Is he also subject to the law in such a way that he ought to pay penalties to the state, and that legal proceedings ought to be taken against him as soon as he transgresses? You indeed think so: “Because,” he says, “the law of God commands tyranny lawfully to be restrained: whoever sheds man's blood,” etc.; “therefore a superior magistrate ought to be restrained by an inferior.” If, therefore, a Lutheran prince is liable for some offense sanctioned by capital punishment, Pareus judges by force of divine law that he must be killed. For this is the tendency of the statement: “Whoever sheds man's blood, his blood too must be shed, for homicide cannot otherwise be expiated except by the blood of him who shed another's blood.”

And just as it is the prince's office to suppress brigandage, blasphemies, adulteries, and much more heresies and idolatry by force and even, if necessary, by the sword, so by Pareus's counsel Calvinist nobles will proceed with the sword against Lutheran princes if they protect and defend ubiquity; if they establish idols or images in a church; if they practice Cyclopean dismemberment; if they believe what the Soft in Belgium believe, and thus seem to be sectarians, heretics, atheistic sectarians, to be promptly suppressed in the very blade. Those who think thus will never lack a legal action against their own princes, and never a design for accomplishing such great audacity.

But what does the second argument permit a Lutheran prince against Calvinism? Indeed, what does it not permit Calvinism against a prince? “When the superior magistrate does what is evil,” he says, “the inferior ought to be an avenger unto wrath.” But if a Lutheran or Calvinist prince is arraigned before the consistorial tribunal of the Zwinglian ministry, it will be difficult to prevail in the cause under an unjust judge. “You do evil,” they will say to the Lutheran. “You proscribe Calvinist ministers and advance Ubiquitarians, turbulent enemies of truth; you summon ancient heresies from hell; you worship a bread-made God; you hold a Cyclopean feast and tear your God with your teeth.

“Go, lictor: veil his head, scourge him within or outside the pomerium, hang him upon the unlucky tree. Beware of suspecting that any punishment is excessive or unjust, for they are double Papists.”

He does not fear to add that inferior magistrates were joined to superiors in order to moderate the latter's excessive license; therefore, when they restrain it, they employ the authority and sword entrusted to them through a legitimate calling. If these things are true, those men are not merely helpers of princes but princes of princes--indeed, executioners of princes. For on departing from Pareus's Museum, what will a satrap swear to his prince? Namely, that he is an associate in government, a moderator of the prince's license, and that he will use his sword against him if he transgresses.

But what does it concede to the prince against these petty tyrants? Are they inviolable and sacred like tribunes of the plebs? Can they not command the prince, drag men to prison, and kill? Therefore those who hold in their hand not only the authority but also the life of the prince are exempt from his dominion. But you will say: “This is so if the prince has bound himself by crime--if he has done what is evil.” Nor are they so mad as to profess that punishments must be established for good deeds and virtue; nor is it necessary for me, although they have often done this, to accuse so great an insolence on their part. I assert and confirm this: under that royal power of praetors, consuls, and satraps, the life of a Lutheran prince is not to be valued at one as. For they long ago decreed that he does evil; they judged him an enemy when they said he was a defender and patron of horrible heresies and a persecutor of truth.

They will arrogate the same right to themselves from the third argument; for whenever it pleases them to kill, they will allege that the Lutherans advance outrageously against God and the state. Nor will the censure of a consistory expose only Lutherans to the swords of petty rulers; it will not spare the Calvinists themselves.

William Ames, a champion of the more rigid Puritanism, furnished an example. I have not seen his book against the bishops of England; I shall transcribe what Nicholas Grevinchovius cites from it in his preface:

“But the rest”--those, namely, who are not Rigid Puritans but Anglo-Papists, as are the bishops of Britain--“are notable gamblers, strenuous drinkers, men who treat the duties of religion as of no importance, practiced peddlers corrupted by the perverse ambitions of the Papists, impious swearers, and, finally, vain, unjust, shameful men and all sons of Belial.

And these men not only act as commanders of the army but almost alone fill the camp; for they often make Marian mules of the simpler men whom they possess among the freeborn, while they abuse their labor to supply wood to the soldiers after the manner of camp servants. But the breasts and heads of those Euclios who still obstinately struggle against Puritanism must be purged with hellebore. Moreover, those laws through whose favor and force some ministers were driven from their goods and seats, etc., whatever they may be, incur the same reproach as the decrees of the Athenians, concerning which Xenophon complained: ἔλοντο τοῖς πονηροῖς ἀμείνον πράττειν, ἢ τοῖς χρηστοῖς [they chose that the wicked should fare better than the good]. Nor, that you may know it, are those ancient decrees or counsels of the forefathers," etc.

"Certain canons were fashioned with evil deceit in fraud of the laws, condemned by the parliamentary senate, truly criminal, which at last their authors enforce against the ministers unwillingly, not without shame, and by transferring the blame to others--if you except certain fierce and savage men who appear altogether to have cast off shame. Furthermore, most of those constitutions were deliberately enacted to disturb and ensnare the quiet of the land. This is evident even from the fact that they not only retained certain putrid relics of the Papists, but delivered them fortified by every means and surrounded by dense anathemas taking effect from the very deed, striving especially to establish those corruptions which they knew almost all good men abhorred. Thus they have now made it manifest that they do not fail to know their own vices but love them: prison-guards gaping after plunder, armed with omnipotent Vulcan, devouring rich pasture, trampling under their feet what remains of the pasture, attacking with their horns the sheep affected by disease, until they have scattered them and driven them outside; ascending the criminal ladder of Antichrist through the unequal grades of churches and ecclesiastics in jurisdiction, impelled by the Antichristian spirit while they arrogate this to themselves, that they should be accounted pastors of pastors--men whom you could rightly call Catos or dragons, in doubt which. And thus either this pretended order of bishops must be removed from the midst, or the Pope must be summoned again from hell."

These things he casts, as if from a wagon, against that order which Royal Majesty itself venerates as holy and which the nobles of the kingdom esteem.

You have heard Ames, who laid the first rudiments of his abusive speech in assailing the king himself through the bishops.

Does he doubt here that those bishops are atheists and the most criminal of men? Is it not doing evil to do those things Ames writes? Is not the innocent king not merely their defender but their restorer, patron, author, and adorner? Can or dare they do those things without the king? What, then, do we think this man would do if he employed the right of the inferior magistrate? The reasoning is complete. Those bishops do what is evil; the king established, venerates, protects, and assists them. Therefore the sword divinely entrusted to me must be directed against the king. For who, when the criminal ladder of Antichrist lay prostrate in Scotland and tottered in England, raised it and supported it by the opposition of royal power and authority, unless it was the Most Serene King James? "He does what is evil," says Ames. "Therefore it belongs to his satrap to be an avenger unto wrath," Pareus adds.

He commands madmen to be driven out. But the Calvinists think the Lutherans mad.

"Nor will Westphal effect anything by his mad tumult," etc., says Calvin in the Final Admonition in the same place: "to rise with a frenzied impulse"; "the man's intemperance is obstinate." The Heidelberg Consolators expressly endeavor to demonstrate that Jakob Andreae and Osiander are mad. In the program of his apology, Grynaeus thinks that the magistrate is affected by the most atrocious insult through the sides of those who teach piously. Therefore they will refer to the magistrate everything that the preachers rave and will cry that the magistrate of the Lutherans is assailed by the disease which is accustomed to be spat forth. For nothing is holy, nothing immune, which audacity driven by the evils of superstition does not break through.

Thus far we have heard the arguments; let us see the examples. “In the history of the Judges the Israelites are often read to have risen through their judges, with God's approval, against neighboring tyrants by whom they were cruelly treated.” Therefore an inferior magistrate can kill a superior, because domestic tyrants are to be restrained more, since they are perjured and more harmful. I seem to hear the declaration of the briganding consistory: One judge killed a king who cruelly treated the Israelites; let one satrap kill a Lutheran prince who exterminates Calvinist ceremonies.

Hezekiah rebelled against the Assyrian king. Therefore an inferior magistrate can fight against a superior if the latter sustains the criminal ladder of Antichrist and, impelled by the Antichristian spirit, arrogates this to himself: that he should be accounted pastor of pastors, that is, head of the Church.

The centurions killed Athaliah; therefore a praetor can rightfully kill a prince. Thrasybulus drove out the Thirty Tyrants; the Romans expelled their kings and compelled their consuls to abdicate; they removed Nero and Maximinus. Why, therefore, should Calvinists not cut Lutheran princes in two--Ubiquitarians liable to the gravest crimes, intolerable to any Christian man--and introduce into their patrimonies and dominion pious men who are masters of their own mind?

Wenceslaus was stripped of the Empire because of idleness. Therefore an inferior magistrate will be able to deprive a superior of his dominion. What, then, if a Calvinist prince does not attack Lutheranism sharply enough? If he publishes more merciful edicts for Lutherans? If he seems more inclined toward the cause of the sectarians--that is, the Soft--as the Estates are? If the royal admonition has not aroused his sluggishness? Evidently a danger equal to the Pope's threatens him: the same that threatens the Lutheran, the double Papist, and the bishops of England who ascend the criminal ladder of Antichrist so that they may be pastors of pastors.

But what need is there of more? I produce Pareus's testimony against the author himself. He denies that Lutherans should be tolerated. “A Christian magistrate,” he says on Romans 13, “ought not to permit confusion in religion, but to protect and defend the true religion alone.” But in Pareus's mind Rigid Calvinism alone is the true religion; therefore he ought to protect and defend it alone. And Proposition 4: “Christian princes ought by edicts and punishments to obstruct blasphemies, heresies, idols, sacrileges,” etc. “Because they obstruct the good and safety of subjects, they therefore rightly exterminate the Papacy. Because they are evil works, princes ought therefore to be a terror to them.” Let not the Lutheran prince lose confidence here unless Pareus says that the Lutherans possess blasphemies, heresies, idols, and sacrileges. For in Chapter 28 he says that paradoxes and dogmas far more horrible and false than those which they reproach to the Calvinists can be collected from the Lutherans' own books. He says the Lutherans are called by his party Marcionites, Manichaeans, Nestorians, Eutychians, Capernaïtes, flesh-eaters, Ubiquitarians, and Flacians. Are not the Marcionites blasphemous? The Manichaeans more than heretics? The Capernaïtes and flesh-eaters idolaters, or, as the Zwinglians are accustomed to call them, ἀρτολάτραι [bread-worshippers]? Are not the Flacians sacrilegious? And the Nestorians and Eutychians most especially so? Indeed, are not all those men all these things? Therefore a prince ought to restrain them by punishments. Consequently they will effect this as soon as they have the power. For whoever opposes the consistory will fall by the sword.

These things are so clear that Pareus cannot deny them, so turbulent and seditious that he has not attempted to defend them. Yet a man was found German in tongue, Cretan in mind, who not only defends those dangerous things but, as is the custom of desperate wickedness, attacks me without provocation. He suppressed his name and betrayed his character; and although he aims at others, he nevertheless pursues me. The judgment is yours, reader.

First, Pareus speaks thus on page 316 of the Irenicum: “But this is the thing concerning which not only we labor, but undoubtedly all pious and prudent men understand that the greatest labor must be expended in this business: that, when at last a pious and true union of all the Evangelical Estates and theologians, however many there are within or outside the Roman Empire, has been effected, the horrible schism and deadly discord may be removed; the course of the Gospel may no longer be obstructed by the fault of the Evangelicals but everywhere be advanced so much more expeditiously; the calumnies of the Papists concerning the WAR of the fifth GOSPEL--with which they fill their notorious pages and whole books--may be beaten back by the truth itself; finally, that the tyranny of the Roman Antichrist, whose power has thus far grown and grows daily in the Roman Empire through nothing more than our discord--where we see now this city, now that territory or province, forced again under its yoke by deceit and arms, without any distinction whether Lutherans or Calvinists were there (of which Eastern Francia, Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Hungary, Troppau, Donauwörth, etc., can serve as evidence for all)--may be opposed so much more strongly and promptly by united vows, counsels, and acts."

Here I complained, first, that Pareus accounted the Lutherans mushrooms, since, by naming a few regions that had returned to the ancient faith, he did not think it could come into their minds how many principalities had defected from Lutheranism to Calvinism.

Second, I said that his statement that they were forced by deceits and arms under the tyranny of Antichrist was an accusation; I proved this, and before me our Scherer proved it against Utzinger. Here the Anonymous answers: "Whether that change was made without deceits and arms must be gathered from history." But history has now taught that neither Julius in Eastern Francia nor the other princes employed deceits or arms. A notable defense! Pareus says that provinces were forced under the yoke by deceits and arms; Pareus's defender says that histories must be consulted to discover whether Pareus lies. If I wished to speak openly, I would say that he lies. But I prefer to spare ill-omened words.

Third, I said that these were tribunician and seditious harangues. He answers--as one for whom saying anything is answering--that the purpose of the Irenicum is not to describe the machinations of Catholics, but to warn that this is the reason for union: lest Catholics cast against them the war of the fifth Gospel, not so that harm may be done to any Estate.

So tortuously speaking a cunning must be dragged into the open. The words of Pareus both complain about the war of the fifth Gospel and then threaten war against Catholics. "Finally," he says, "that the tyranny of the Roman Antichrist," etc., "may be opposed so much more strongly and promptly by united vows, counsels, and acts."

To oppose tyranny thus is not merely to resist speeches about the war of the fifth Gospel, but to do certain other things. Eastern Francia was reformed; Pareus establishes this as an example of pontifical tyranny, complains that it was forced under the yoke, and teaches that this tyranny, exercised by the excellent Bishop Julius, must be opposed. Was he, then, to be obstructed and the religious peace violated? Why do you advise this to the Lutherans? The kingdom of Sweden, the Palatinate, margraviates, electorates, landgraviates, and other dominions defected from Lutheranism; and will the Lutherans not oppose it? Will they receive Calvinism, seven times worse than Papism?

Fourth, I said that "by united vows, counsels, and acts" was seditious and, if princes followed Pareus's counsel, would shortly inundate Germany with blood.

The defender answers: "By united vows, counsels, and ecclesiastical acts of sermons, disputations, and theological writings." He adds: "It is therefore manifest that the word 'acts' is twisted by both calumniators, as also by Contzen the Jesuit of Mainz, altogether contrary to Christian sincerity, into political and rebellious acts," etc. It is not twisted in that direction, but carried along a straight path. For, first, "by vows, counsels, and acts," or mit Rat und Tat, possesses this meaning: that vows and counsels precede and deeds follow. Next, sermons and writings are counsels rather than acts; therefore other acts must be sought. Third, he requires the union not merely of theologians but of all. But the acts of the Evangelical Estates are not sermons, disputations, and writings; they are also wars and threats of wars.

Fourth, Pareus treats here not of the concord of the Evangelicals but of Syncretism, as he began to do in Chapter 12 of the treatise. For he says: "That, while a synod and full concord are being procured, the Evangelicals meanwhile ought to unite in pious Syncretism and mutual toleration, and stand together against the Papacy." But Syncretism has need not of sermons, disputations, and writings but of dissimulation and silence; for by those acts Syncretism is obstructed, not procured.

Fifth, he says tyranny must be opposed by counsels. But by whose counsels? Not merely those of theologians but also of Estates. Yet the counsels of the Evangelical Estates do not appear to concern only the contentions of theologians, but alliances, expenditure, war to be undertaken, etc. Within a few years there have been several assemblies of allied princes, and various counsels were discussed so that the pontifical party might be opposed. I now ask whether the objects of those counsels were acts, or means sought for the end. If Pareus answers that they were acts, I shall ask what sort of acts: whether there was disputation or decision there merely concerning sermons, writings, and disputations of theologians, or also concerning other matters; and whether Pareus included these matters also when he said "counsels and acts."

Even if Pareus can be so shameless as to say that they treated only of ecclesiastical acts among themselves, his kindred nevertheless will not permit it, lest by lying against the conscience of all the Estates he become incapable of giving testimony. But Pareus approved non-ecclesiastical acts of the Evangelical Estates and understood them in this place, since he commends the alliance of the princes as holy.

Next, in the fourth motive the Saxons deny that union with the Calvinists is to be made so that the Papists can be resisted more strongly. They prove it from 2 Chronicles 19:2. Pareus asks in his response to Motive 16 whether the Lutherans not only dissuade their princes from fellowship with Calvinists but also openly counsel them in published writings that in diets and public negotiations they must seek the intimacy of the Papists but avoid association with orthodox--Calvinist--princes. He attacks these men and wishes the Lutherans in diets and public negotiations to adhere to the Calvinists, undoubtedly to agree in decrees and execute what has been resolved. Therefore he extends "acts" to all those things. And if princes follow his counsel, Europe will soon swim in blood. For that dispute will not remain within words or pamphlets.

The second passage is in the commentary on Hosea, where he addresses the Most Illustrious Landgrave of Hesse, who was expelling Lutherans, in this way: "Well done, divine hero; perform the work of the Lord which you confidently perform." Here I said nothing either against the Most Illustrious Landgrave or in favor of the Lutherans. I merely warned that the exhortation of that aged flatterer was not consonant with the Irenicum. For why do you recommend peace, Syncretism, and toleration? You flatter the Lutherans and canonize the prince who strips them of every office, so that, when the Lutherans have been expelled, he may be both a hero and a divine hero and perform the work of the Lord? They were dexterously expelled, but in such a way that no tumult arose.

They answer: in that reformation there were only three points. Three are named, but in those three and through those three Calvinism was introduced and Lutheranism expelled.

Next, they say that three or four theologians were dismissed with favor. I hear: three or four. Where, then, are the hundreds of ministers who were formerly Lutherans? In what corner was a Lutheran preacher permitted to hide unless he accepted Calvinism? Where is the Lutheran exercise of religion? What need is there of words? The thing itself--that is, the churches and cities--cries out.

The third passage is in the Commentary on Romans 13:1, where he teaches that subjects who are not private persons may defend themselves by arms against the magistrate. Here, first, the defender hidden in darkness answers that, even if this were an error, it ought not to be imputed to the whole body of Calvinism. This is true, unless it is defended by the whole body. Second, he says that these things were dictated in the schools in 1604, when those commotions did not yet exist in the Empire. Let it be so. They did not exist, but they arose from those things. Even in peace, words of sedition are dangerous. Third, he says that this defense is permitted only against the tyranny of the Pope and must not be extended to the Estates of the Empire.

But this is contrary to Pareus; for he falsely accuses provinces in Francia, Bavaria, and Austria of having been forced by deceit and arms, and says that pontifical tyranny must be opposed. Yet if that had been tyranny, it would have been exercised by princes of the Empire; therefore they would have had to be resisted. Consequently he incites the satraps of Catholics against their own princes. Therefore, although the Roman Antichrist alone is named, all the friends and clients of the Pontiff are nevertheless understood--those whom they are accustomed calumniously and seditiously to call the attendants of Antichrist. Fourth, he affirms that princes of the Reformed religion do not wish the Papistic religion to be driven from others' dominions, since responsibility for them does not rest upon those princes. I answer: Let them observe this, and the cause of dissensions will have been removed.

The fourth passage is: “Christian kings and princes ought to resist pontifical tyranny even with the sword, obstructing and breaking it by force, removing idols, and restoring the Church to its liberty.”

I most truly affirmed that here a trumpet call is sounded clearly and with full trumpets. It is the same when he said: “Princes ought to be a terror to evil works.”

Pareus's defender restricts this combat to the lands under a ruler, for a Spaniard is not a terror to evil works in Poland, nor a Frenchman in Germany; otherwise horrible confusions would arise.

An excellent and most wholesome interpretation, but contrary to Pareus. For he admonishes them to oppose the tyranny of Antichrist by united vows, counsels, and acts--a tyranny which forces Francia, Bavaria, and Styria under the yoke by deceits and arms. Therefore he teaches that the sword is to be drawn against foreign princes. Next, in the third argument he says: “Because it is foretold that Christian kings and princes will hate the whore, render her desolate and naked, eat her flesh, and burn her with fire. But the prediction possesses the force of a precept, so that they should do this.”

Therefore he judges that all kings have been commanded to slaughter and devour the Pope; thus he thinks that a right against the Pope has been given to all, and exposes the Pope as though proscribed to the swords of all. Therefore Plessis too exhorts the Most Serene King of England to the Italian journey. That defense is therefore false and imposturous, and Pareus will never admit it. He himself will rather try the sword with trembling hand and cast an unwarlike weapon without inflicting a great wound. He says that, just as Ehud possessed a command against his own king, so all princes possess one against the Pope. If against the Pope, then against his flesh--that is, ecclesiastics--and his bones--that is, secular Papist princes, dukes, kings, and Caesars. For if full right of raging has been given against the Pope, if it is a just war, if the battle is commanded from heaven, then it is also against all who undertake the Pope's defense and obstruct those hastening to that dismemberment. For if slaughter against the king is commanded to you by God, war against his soldier is also commanded. So widely does that confusion of affairs extend that none of the preachers doubts that anyone whatever is a lawful executioner of the Pope and his defenders.

Yet so great is the madness of the defender that he thinks Pareus is excused by the very thing of which he is especially accused. “Let no mention be made in any word of our”--Evangelical--“princes, but in the thesis of Christian kings, princes, and magistrates, among whom surely are Caesar, the Spaniard, and all Papist imperial cities, all of whom would be no less prepared than others to resist the Pope in their own dominions if they knew him to be Antichrist.” Thus he thinks it just that all should resist the Pope, whom they think advances outrageously in the dominions of all. And not only in their own dominions; for Ehud killed King Eglon in the royal upper chamber, and Pareus says that all princes possess such a command. Therefore, with Plessis, they ought even to seek Italy and stab the Pontiff in the Lateran itself. If Caesar, the Spaniard, the archdukes, the Bavarian, or the Lorrainer obstructs them, he must be killed through his own sides. Indeed, many of these men are no less diligent than the Pontiffs themselves in advancing true religion and rooting out errors.

The fifth passage: “Nor is injustice commanded when it is commanded that double be rendered to her; rather, it is signified that no kind of vengeance against the Pope can be unjust or excessive. And ‘double’ is understood not in relation to the punishment that he deserved, but to the evils which he formerly inflicted upon the pious and with which he afflicted the Church.”

I said that this cruelty pertains to all Catholics who defend the Pope. The defender denies it, saying that it pertains only to Babylon--that is, the Roman Church--and the Pope, the head of that Church. First, it is indeed excessive that so much is lawful against the Roman Church--that is, the members of the Roman Church. If by the name Roman Church he understands only the episcopate of that city, his cruelty extends less widely than if he understands the entire Roman Church--that is, all Catholics. But it must be shown that the savagery of the bloodthirsty old man pertains to every church subject to the Roman Church.

“Here,” he says in the commentary on the Apocalypse, “vengeance is commanded not privately to private persons, but publicly to pious kings and princes, into whose hearts the Lord God will put this, and whose military forces he will wish to employ to overthrow Babylon. Therefore this part of the exhortation especially pertains to them and their military forces, and the manner in which God put it into their hearts is explained: namely, because by an express command he commanded this vengeance to them.”

Therefore Evangelical kings and princes expressly received a command concerning the taking of vengeance. It is not merely against Rome; for many are more closely joined to the Pope, and many have inflicted more losses upon the innovators than the Romans have. Surely the condition of our society, of all religious houses, and especially of collegiate churches will be worse than that of Roman citizens. Therefore the precept is general--that is, a precept of Calvinism--and directed against all Catholics. But “Babylon” for Calvinists, although they disagree among themselves and with themselves, is not the single church which is at Rome and in the suburbicarian region, but the entire Papacy spread throughout the whole world.

Thus Pareus in his commentary on Apocalypse 17:4, when he interprets the words “Come out of her, my people.” For all sectarians urge that men depart not merely from the city but also from the Papacy, and Pareus especially. He says that all the faithful are admonished, not only those within the city's walls but those within the pomeria of Roman jurisdiction. And then: “Whenever, therefore, the Papists ask where the Church was before Luther, if the Papacy was not the Church, let us ask in turn where the Church of God was at the time of the Babylonian captivity, if Babylon was not the Church. It was, I say, in Babylon, but oppressed by captivity; thus this Church was captive and oppressed in the Papacy.”

“Come out of her.” The ancient people was commanded to depart from Babylon, first in heart, by fleeing its idols and abominations; after seventy years also in body, by returning to Judaea under Cyrus. Both departures from the new Babylon are commanded to us also: that we flee and detest its idols and abominations in heart, and also depart from Rome in our bodies as far as it is granted, shaking off the yoke of Babylonian tyranny by force of the command: “Come out of her.”

Therefore in Pareus's judgment Babylon is the Papacy. Consequently, when they are commanded to render double to Babylon, burn her, and eat her flesh, they understand the entire Papacy. They do not mean the Papacy in the abstract, and therefore they mean Papists in the concrete--that Papacy which can be scorched by fires, roasted as food for the victor, divided by the sword, and water the dry throats of executioners with its own blood. It is therefore false that Pareus is not to be understood concerning Papists, bishops, princes, and Caesar. He wishes all to possess one throat, so that they may fall quickly and without danger to the striker, although perhaps he desires them to be tenacious of life so that he may enjoy cruel pleasure by prolonging their death through savagery. For he judges that all are members of the whore, since he invents that the whore is the Papacy.

But Graser comes to Pareus's aid--whom, O brow! O hard face! Pareus's defender attempts to excuse. He denies that Caesar and secular Catholic princes are called the bones of Antichrist by Graser and the clergy his flesh, and says that those who impose this upon Graser are calumniators. Indeed, he says that Graser teaches the contrary: namely, that the strong are to be destroyed by Antichrist, from Daniel 8:24: “And he will destroy the strong and the people of the saints.” Here I must prove from Graser's judgment that the bones are secular men and the flesh the clergy.

First, folio 54: “I therefore still think that he”--Daniel--“throughout this whole passage, Chapter 8:24, had regard rather to that twofold family of Antichrist whose history we shall explain.”

Second, he explains it in these words: “Hear, therefore. The root עצם, ghazam, from which this word descends, signifies ‘he was endowed with strength.’ Concerning strength of this kind you must understand that it possesses the force of its solidity in itself and subsists without the support of another. Hence the noun עצם, ghezem, ‘the bone of a bone,’ is so called by the Hebrews because it alone in the body subsists by its own solidity and sustains the other parts. The Latins appear to have derived from this their ancient ossum. The rabbis also call the category of substance עצם, ghezem, so that from this signification someone could interpret the word עצומים, ghezūmim, as ‘substantial,’ ‘essential,’ or at least ‘osseous.’ Thus, therefore, he reasoned that by these עצומים secular men were indicated, insofar as they are of the planting of iron in the feet of the fourth Beast and subsist under the kingdom of Antichrist by their own strength, yet so that they accommodate this osseous strength to the uses of the Beast to such an extent that they sustain at the same time the spiritual Estate as though it were the succulent flesh of the Papacy.”

Third, he thinks that all the forces of Antichrist are in these bones. “Surely,” he says, “in the same verse he speaks thus concerning the kingdom of this king growing together marvelously: בכחו ולא כחו ועצם--‘His power will indeed become strong, but not by his own strength.’ You will find this phrase used nowhere else in the Canon. But our prophet in this passage designates by it another mystery of Antichrist no less than the former: that it is so proper and peculiar to his kingdom that outside it the phrase cannot properly be applied either to Antiochus--whatever meanwhile may be made of the type--or to any other worldly kingdom. For tell me of what kingdom, king, or empire it could truly be said that its power consisted not of its own but of another's and, as it were, borrowed forces.”

Fourth, he says that secular men possess one counsel and deliver their strength and power to the Beast.

Fifth, he says that the Pope obtained this by evil arts. These are his words: “Daniel explains this in the words cited, saying: ‘By marvelously corrupting, he will destroy, and he will possess prosperous successes in it’; for this is the proper force of the verb hatzliach, which our author interprets thus here. ‘For God put it into their hearts to execute his judgment, to consent, and finally to give their kingdom to the Beast,’ Apocalypse 17:17. This, namely, will be the cause of such great successes. Otherwise the sense of the prophet's words here is: He will understand so hidden, subtle, and efficacious an art of corrupting that by marvelous deceptions he will, as it were, cast down from their station even the strong, whom he could have overcome by no force. And besides, he will deceive the very people of the saints, who ought to observe his fraud, make it known to others, and thus protect the liberty of God's people.”

Sixth, he says that “the strong” are opposed to fleshly softness, folio 55: “If he had wished to commend these strong men for military fortitude, insofar as that is reckoned under virtue, he would have had to use the word geburim, whose proper signification this is. But if he had wished to censure the excess of this quality in the same nation--namely, tyrannical ferocity--he would have used the word gharitzim, whose meaning is very evident. But now, omitting those terms, for which no sufficiently cogent cause for consideration remained, he employs a word of this sort, by which simply that brute strength is indicated, in respect of which this race of his peers”--the locusts--“is opposed to their fleshly softness. And since Daniel in the same verse verbally employs this root for the sinews of external power, why do we hesitate, or what obscurity do we imagine for ourselves?”

Finally, he calls these strong men the limbs and members of Babylon, folio 56: “There is indeed another point, and one by no means to be despised, of which I had nevertheless almost forgotten: namely, that our prophet in Chapter 19:18, in the history of Babylon's ruin, finds among its ruins these strong men, these horses too and their riders, as the limbs and members of the truncated Beast, speaking thus: ‘Come, birds of heaven, and assemble for the great supper of God, so that you may eat the flesh of kings, the flesh of tribunes, the flesh of the strong, the flesh of horses, and of those who sit upon them.’ These are the principal members of which the Beast's kingdom consisted and into which it is finally resolved. Among these, that mention of the strong possesses so much more cause for wonder because throughout the entire context of the prophecy he has nowhere previously mentioned them under this nomenclature. In Chapter 6:15, indeed, mention is made of powerful men, but there he calls them δυνάτας, whereas here he employs the word ἰσχυρούς, by which the Septuagint render the Hebrew in Daniel.”

Now I ask you by justice itself, reader, to deign to judge. Is he a calumniator who, according to Graser's judgment, has said that secular princes are called the bones, limbs, and members of Babylon--the principal members of the Beast, of which its kingdom consists and into which it is also resolved? What Pareus thereby threatens against Caesar, the kings of the Spains and Gauls, and the other Catholics everyone understands, unless he is ignorant that Babylon cannot be burned and devoured unless her bones, limbs, and members are cut off, roasted, and eaten with a Cyclopean mouth. Behold for yourself the contest between two associates, of whom one most insultingly and savagely reviles Catholic princes, while the other most shamelessly denies that he said things which it is evident to everyone's eyes were said.

Hence it is evident that according to Graser and Pareus Babylon is also in Germany, because its principal members are imagined to be in Germany, and that the Anonymous calumniator turns the words of Pareus and Graser elsewhere in vain. The seventh passage: the ten kings fight with the Lamb, yet they will burn the whore. Therefore the Calvinists cannot say this concerning their own princes unless they confess that those princes delivered their power to the Beast. For whether they acted rightly is doubtful among Calvinists, as is evident from Pareus's final question on Apocalypse 17. Aretius indeed reports that they punished the woman after being bent by God to his service. Thus Attila said that he was the scourge of God; thus Alexander was divinely summoned into Asia, etc. Do they therefore wish their own princes to be like one of these? In his Method on the Apocalypse, Nicolas Colladon thinks that those kings were by no means converted and did not act with an upright mind. Next, he himself understands the entire Papacy.

But what need is there of our labor against the adversaries? Christoph Jungnitz, a professor of Heidelberg, sufficiently refutes all those things. Although he has not yet reached the truth, he nevertheless disproves the falsehood. Who will not concede that Christian emperors and kings fight with the Lamb and are beasts? From these things I conclude that, since the Calvinists themselves teach that those kings are impious, I am not to be accused if I say the same thing which John clearly asserts and they themselves confess.

All the things which that mask defending the darkness proposes in obscure night can be tolerated; but the things it offers in excuse of Aretius could not please Aretius himself. For, residing at Bern as an enemy of orthodoxy and a traitor to the Empire, he said and wrote things which the Swiss allied with the Empire condemned.

First, on Apocalypse 13:1: “It is rightly called a beast on account of the Devil, who surpasses every beast in savagery and whose character is still excellently expressed in the Roman Empire, so that the Romans themselves rightly confess that they arose and were nourished by a she-wolf. Therefore the Roman Empire is a beast, just as the Babylonian, Persian, and Macedonian empires are in Daniel. But it ascends from the sea, that is, from the confusion of all nations; for the Roman Empire was born from other empires having been struck down. For just as the sea is the common receptacle of all waters and a kind of sewer of filth, so the vices of all nations were heaped together in the Roman Empire, so that, having obtained dominion of the sea, the Romans easily conquered other nations.” You will note: “The character of the Devil is still excellently expressed in the Empire.”

Second: “It has seven heads,” that is, it excels singularly in counsel and prudence; for the head is the dwelling of reason, and the number seven is the number of perfection and completeness.

Third: “Now he expresses the spirit acting in this beast, the same ornaments being set forth with which he adorned this beast. The dragon is undoubtedly the Devil. He therefore gives certain ornaments of his own to the Beast--that is, the Roman Empire. And it must carefully be observed that the dragon does not establish the Beast, but merely adorns it after it has arisen with his gifts; he does this lest we think that the Devil is the author of empires. Rather, let us know that he is their corrupter: for the magistracy is from God, but the vices of magistrates proceed from that dragon.”

Fourth: “He describes the foolishness of mortals who, marveling at the fortune of the Empire, extol and adore it more than is proper: ‘the whole earth marveled after the Beast,’ that is, the whole earth, as great as it is, was carried away into admiration of the Beast. The cause of the admiration depends upon the preceding fortune: that so deadly a wound was marvelously healed.”

Fifth: “That is to marvel at the success and felicity of the Empire, proclaiming that august, holy, sacrosanct, and immortal thing.”

Sixth: “They adored the dragon who gave power to the Beast,” that is, in its person they worship and adore the Devil. “For the dragon is the Devil, who attaches his own ornaments to the Empire.” See what it is to worship the Devil: namely, to marvel excessively at the majesty and felicity of the Roman Empire.

Seventh: “But after the doctrine of Christ had been received, impious hypocrites presently snatched the title of the Church to themselves and persecuted the true commandments of Christ, which cause the possessors of the imperial seat still strenuously defend today.”

Eighth: “Power to wage war upon and conquer the saints is given to the Beast; that is, that the condition of hypocrites should always be in a better position than that of the pious. The histories of all ages testify to this, so that today it is discovered to be clearer than daylight. For as widely as the Roman name extends, so widely do the pious suffer persecutions, in all tribes, tongues, and nations.”

Ninth, verse 8: “And they adored it.”

“He describes the character of the reformed Empire; for the Beast will then wish to be adored, as though he said that this blasphemy will not cease until the end of the world. Just as the Beast was adored when its wound was healed, so it will be adored when power to conquer God's saints has been given to it. Therefore the same impiety remains because of the success of these things; for men marvel at the success of princes and hence pass over to their party.”

Tenth: “‘This is the victory that conquers the world: our faith.’ Therefore let us console ourselves amid these punishments of the world, lest we imagine a peculiar fortune for ourselves. This is our calling: to enter the kingdom of God through tribulations and afflictions, especially under this old age of the Roman Empire. Furthermore, the governors of the Empire require another faith from their people and commend it in assemblies of magistrates, a faith which pertains in no way to the saints of God of whom John here speaks.”

Eleventh: “Next, he”--the Pontiff--“also compels men to adore the former Beast; that is, he wishes the title and name of the Roman Empire to be accounted no less sacrosanct than the name ‘Augustus’ and the venerable name of the Empire were formerly under the emperors. Under the Popes, the Roman Church remained both Catholic and adorable, and if anyone denies this, he must be a heretic.”

Twelfth: “The Pontiff retains the shadowy name of the Empire.”

So also those who invented the featherless eagle and other abominable things.

Thirteenth, on Chapter 17:13: “He says that the dragon has seven heads because to himself he seems fully prudent, cunning, and crafty; for the head is the seat of prudence and reason. Below, seven hills are attributed to him, whence it is not inaptly an image of the Pope, because at other times he held seven heads, that is, kingdoms; and he subjected the seven-man body of the Roman Empire to his judgment." By these words he shows, not obscurely, that by the dragon's seven heads are designated the seven electors as heads, as it were, of the other Beast--that is, of the Pope.

He took that abusive speech against the princes from Matthias Flacius Illyricus. On Chapter 12, verse 3, Flacius comments thus: "Some apply this rather to Rome and its empire, because it was constructed upon seven hills. It also held under itself the seven principal kingdoms of the world: African, Egyptian, Asian, Greek, German, Spanish, and Italian. Likewise, in more recent times and even now it had, and still has in some fashion, the same number of kingdoms under itself. It also has seven principal princes. Altogether the Spirit of the Lord appears here to have had regard to the prophecy of Daniel 7, where also the fourth Beast--namely, the Roman Empire--is depicted with ten horns, that is, kingdoms or powers; so that there can be no doubt that here, under the name of the dragon, the power of the world itself, raging against Christ and his Church, is also depicted."

These things they set forth with round and blasphemous mouth against the Empire.

Another proposition of Pareus is that Christian princes ought by public commands and punishments to obstruct blasphemies, heresies, etc. Likewise, no mixture or confusion in religion is to be permitted, but the true religion alone is to be protected. I say that this is the sword by which both Catholics and Lutherans are slaughtered, because Calvinists abuse it for this purpose. For they call piety blasphemy and think the ancient faith a heresy. If you doubt it, read the defender of Pareus: he calls the sacrifice of the Mass and similar things idolatry.

Enter a Calvinist consistory, reader: you will not plead the cause of any one of the ancient saints so accurately that he will not depart condemned by the black pebble. Whom, then, do you think safe? Ignatius the Martyr? He acknowledged the sacrifice of the Mass in the Letter to the Smyrnaeans, as Theodoret reports in Dialogue 3, and in the Letter to the Romans. Martialis, Cyprian, and Augustine are involved in the same fault; Augustine also caused a Mass to be celebrated for his deceased mother. Justin and Irenaeus? They taught the truth of Christ's body in the Eucharist. Chrysostom? He asserted free will. Jerome? He preferred virginity to marriage. Basil the Great? But he is the patriarch of monks. The thirty-three Roman pontiffs who were martyrs? But they judged concerning other bishops. Athanasius or Hilary? They invoked the saints. Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory Nazianzen, or Gregory the Great? But they venerated relics. Ephraem, Cyril, or Ambrose? They denied that faith alone justifies.

And what need is there of more? All these saints, and others, did all those things which the Calvinist ministers call evil works; therefore punishment is prepared for all of them, and sentence has now been pronounced. For they rage against us for no cause which we do not possess in common with the saints.

The eighth passage: "When the superior magistrate degenerates into a tyrant," he grants the inferior power of restraint. But the Calvinists interpret tyranny according to their own affections, in the same way as when he said: "If they do evil." Those who obeyed Pareus now gather the fruit of this matter. Indeed, he adduces so many causes against princes that a cause for deposing them can never be wanting. If a prince obstructs their desires, he will immediately hear: "In a tyrant the relation of magistracy ceases." But if a Catholic prince reforms his dominions, he is immediately called a tyrant. Let Utzinger's most seditious pamphlet against Julius, Prince of Würzburg, be read. Therefore, according to Pareus's judgment, Julius lost his name and power when he led his subjects to the true religion; consequently he could be killed by his own satraps and his ministers hurled down.

The other examples which Pareus adduces serve this end: that no Catholic prince may be secure, as I taught in the book on peace, because all Catholic princes are fornicators with the great whore, are members and limbs of that harlot, are persecutors, and are such men as Aretius depicted.

Since, therefore, Pareus, Aretius, Graser, and others teach:

1. That the Empire is adorned by the Devil.

2. That to marvel at and adore the Beast is to adore the Devil, and consists in marveling excessively at the Empire and calling it august, etc.

3. That persecutions exist as widely as the Empire extends.

4. That the character of the Devil is excellently expressed today in the Empire.

5. That a singular hypocrisy still reigns in the Empire.

6. That the dragon is the spirit acting in the Beast.

7. That the dragon inspires a malignant disposition in the Empire.

8. That the malignant spirit is σύνεργον [a co-worker] and reigns efficaciously in the Empire.

9. That those who marvel at the Empire's success are fools.

10. That there is a threefold impiety in the Roman Empire, the thing itself speaking.

11. That the possessors of the Empire strenuously defend the cause of hypocrites.

12. That even now the Beast of the reformed Empire wishes to be adored.

13. That impiety remains because of the success of princes, and men therefore pass over to their party.

14. That the worshipers of this Beast--that is, the Empire--are vessels of wrath from eternity.

15. When they incite the Lutherans against Catholic reforming princes.

16. When they falsely say that those converted to the ancient faith of the martyrs were forced under the yoke by the tyranny of Antichrist.

17. When they say that this was done by the deceits and arms of Catholic princes.

18. When they exhort their own princes to oppose those reformations by vows, counsels, and acts.

19. When those acts are not merely sermons and writings of preachers, but deliberations and negotiations of assemblies and diets, and executions of decrees.

20. When the head of the acts and counsels of Pareus is Syncretism against the Papacy.

21. When in those counsels there is scarcely any thought of sermons.

22. When Pareus grieves that the Lutherans adhere to Catholics.

23. When they call the expulsion of Lutherans the work of the Lord.

24. When he gives arms to subject magistrates so that they may be a terror to their superior lord.

25. When he says that all princes possess a command to burn Babylon--that is, the Papacy--and eat her flesh.

26. When he affirms that by this command jurisdiction against the Pope and the Pope's followers, as members of Antichrist or Babylon, has been given.

27. When he judges all Catholics blasphemers and idolaters and affirms that his magistrates possess a public command to resist their evil works. When, I say, they teach these things:

28. It follows from them that Catholics, whether ecclesiastics or secular princes, cannot be secure for even one hour if the counsel of Pareus pleases Evangelical princes. Indeed, neither can the Lutherans, if those who call themselves Reformed put on the zeal of Pareus; nor the Reformed, if they erect the criminal ladder of Antichrist, as the Puritans cry that the king of England does; nor the Arminians, if the Gomarists thrust advocates and syndics into custody. This is the sum: not only confidence but even the mention of peace has perished if the furies of briganding theologians occupy the minds of princes.

CHAPTER XXVII

That Syncretism Is Not Proved by the Examples of the Fathers, Catholics, and Lutherans

Indeed, this cause for conspiring against us is also handed down: that it appears possible from the example of many who were afterward reconciled. Why, therefore, could not the controversies of those called Evangelicals be syncretized or removed? Saint Cyprian and Stephen; Saint Basil the Great and Eusebius of Caesarea; Saint Jerome and Augustine; Saint Jerome and Rufinus; Saint Jerome and John, bishop of Jerusalem; Saint Epiphanius and Chrysostom; the orthodox and the Novatians; Catholics among themselves; the other Lutherans and the Concordists disagreed, and yet they did not break peace but admitted reconciliation. Why, then, should not we Evangelicals do so? This is the sum of Chapter 15.

This argument drawn from examples is indeed not unusual in rhetorical amplifications, but in disputations it is weak and, unless all things are equal and similar, faulty and captious.

But in this passage, since all things--both matters and persons--are plainly contrary, it is foolish and ridiculous. I confess that the Church was never so fortunate that all agreed entirely in all things; nor do we dare to hope that this will ever occur except when God will be all in all and, error having been removed, we shall behold uncreated truth in heavenly light. Nevertheless, judgment must be formed concerning the kind of dissension, the mind of those teaching contrary things, the gravity of the question, and the obscurity of the matter; likewise, whether anything was defined in councils and whether anything was always believed in the Church. For not every dissension makes a heresy, nor are the dissensions and hatreds of heretics to be estimated from the discord of the orthodox.

Let us reconsider the examples one by one.

Cyprian and Stephen, the Roman Pontiff, disagreed concerning the baptism of heretics. Cyprian rejected it; Stephen approved it. Cyprian possessed the error, Stephen the truth. Cyprian added a small agitation to his error, for he wrote somewhat angrily about Stephen to Pompeius, bishop of Sabrata. Augustine grieves over that letter and says he cannot excuse Cyprian, in the Letter to Pompeianus and Book 5, Chapter 25, Against the Donatists, On Baptism. But he erred in a question that had not yet been examined with the most clarified insight; see Augustine, Book 3, Chapter 3, Against the Donatists. Therefore Cyprian erred, and the council moved by his authority nevertheless did not condemn those who thought differently. “It remains,” he says, “that concerning this very matter we each set forth what we think, judging no one and removing no one from the right of communion if he thinks differently.” Meanwhile Stephen threatened the Africans with excommunication unless they corrected the error.

But those who erred obeyed those who thought rightly, as is evident from Augustine, Book 3, Chapter 1, Against Cresconius; for Cyprian both died in the Catholic faith and the bishops rescinded their former opinion by a contrary decree, as Jerome testifies against the Luciferians; see also Augustine, Letter 48. Indeed, most of the Asians returned to concord. Baronius, volume 2, may be consulted.

To what purpose, therefore, is this adduced? Let the Zwinglians change their errors and sing a recantation; the Lutherans will not be difficult in receiving them, provided they think them to act sincerely. If they persevere in error, they will be judged no less heretics than those rebaptizers. But what proportion does one error have to innumerable heresies? Yet why is nothing written concerning Cyprian's changed opinion? Because Valerian immediately intensified the persecution in the year 259, while the controversy had fallen in the year 258; therefore the tyrant's violence suppressed ecclesiastical proceedings.

“A grave dissension arose,” he says, “between Basil and Eusebius of Caesarea, and hostilities burned to such a degree that Basil departed into Pontus, abandoning the Church.” Pareus recalls the deeds of the saints in bad faith and with a calumnious exaggeration. The matter stands thus. After Hermogenes died, Eusebius, still a catechumen, was elected bishop by the Caesareans; for Basil had withdrawn himself so that he would not be elected. The electors presently repented of their vote, but Eusebius prevented them from creating another bishop and by his constancy easily dispelled the danger which Julian threatened.

Meanwhile the monks who lived under Basil's care condemned the election of Eusebius. For this reason Eusebius held Basil suspect and oppressed him beyond his deserts. But Basil, so that the monks might be quiet and the Church not be rent on his account, withdrew into solitude--not while burning with hatred and hostilities, but from love of peace and quiet. We gather these things from Gregory Nazianzen's letter to Eusebius. These things occurred in the year 362. But in the year 366 they contended in acts of duty: Eusebius of his own accord sent Basil letters of entreaty and recall, and Basil, having remitted the injury, returned to Caesarea. Therefore in this passage no conflict of dogmas is observed, but virtue, modesty, and prudence in Basil; suspicion and hostility, and finally serious repentance and humility, in Eusebius. What do these things have to do with thunderbolts of condemnations, with the exiles and tortures by which the Evangelicals rage against one another, or with most bitter contests concerning heads of faith and salvation?

Saint Jerome and Augustine also disputed concerning the passage of Saint Paul, Galatians 2:11, and not without sharpness of words; but what will he establish from this? That a Syncretism of all heresies must therefore be made?

The controversy between Jerome and John was lighter than John's imprudence or malice afterward made it. For John was thought to favor Pelagius, as Augustine has it in Letter 252. He also came under suspicion as though he had been the author of the pillage committed in Bethlehem, as is clear from Innocent's letter written to him. But since the cause is doubtful, neither Jerome nor Innocent condemned him absolutely, and death forestalled full knowledge of the matter, he is not to be summoned back to a tribunal and pleading of the cause after so long a time; much less is confusion of all religions to be introduced from the deed of one bishop who offended many orthodox men and rendered himself suspect.

As for Jerome and Rufinus, I confess that the matter is very similar to those things now disputed among the Evangelicals. Jerome's innocence is sufficiently attested, and in his second Apology there survives an oath denying calumny: “I call Jesus the Mediator to witness that unwilling and resisting I descended to these words, and that unless you had provoked me I would always have remained silent. Finally, cease accusing, and I shall cease defending. For what edification is there for the hearers when two old men fight one another on account of heretics, especially when both wish to appear Catholic? Let us abandon the patronage of heretics, and there will be no contention between us.”

But Rufinus, after the manner of heretics, not only resisted wholesome admonitions but grew hardened. He refused the judgment of Pope Anastasius. It is evident from Augustine, Book 2, Chapter 2, Against Pelagius, that he was the forerunner of Pelagius. Concerning him Caelestius professes thus in the Council of Carthage: “The holy presbyter at Rome, who remained with Saint Pammachius, said this. I heard him saying that there is no propagation of sin.” Thus Caelestius cites not Pelagius but Rufinus as the author of so abominable a heresy. Yet all these things became manifest after his death, although while alive he was both condemned by Anastasius and thereafter absolved by no one. If this example effects anything, it serves to signify that in a cause of religion there can be no peace between heretics and Catholics--not that contrary heresies can be fused into one.

The dissension of the bishops Chrysostom and Epiphanius concerned fact and forum, not religion and dogmas. The condemnation of the Origenists was in question. Epiphanius judged that they should be condemned at once, as though sufficiently heard and known; Chrysostom judged that they should be heard again. Therefore Epiphanius refused to reside in the patriarchal palace and communicate with Chrysostom, with whom heretics were staying. Chrysostom thought communion lawful for himself with those whom he judged not yet heard and condemned. Hence arose the dissension, since in one hatred of heresy prevailed, in the other care for judicial process and order.

Baronius thinks the mutual prophecies a fiction: namely, that Epiphanius said to Chrysostom, "You will not die a bishop," and Chrysostom to Epiphanius, "You will not die in your homeland." For Epiphanius died the following year at his own home, although Chrysostom, after experiencing various exiles, was extinguished by the importunity of soldiers. I repeat again what indeed could seem tiresome but is nevertheless necessary to the cause: this little dissension contributes nothing to making a Syncretism of all who call themselves Evangelicals.

Concerning the orthodox and the Novatians, their statement is a manifest falsehood to those practiced in history.

It is evident that the Novatians were not restrained with the severity with which they ought to have been, because they thought rightly concerning Christ against the Arians. This was the reason that in the year 326 Constantine issued a rescript on their behalf: "We have not found the Novatians to have been condemned beforehand, so that we would believe that those things which pertained to them ought by no means to be granted." But afterward the great Emperor discovered the matter, as Eusebius reports in Life of Constantine, Book 3, Chapters 61 and 62. For first he reckons them among heretics; they were condemned in the Council of Constantinople; Chrysostom attacked them vehemently; Innocent expelled them from Rome; and in the year 413 Theodosius proscribed them by edicts and condemned them to deportation, as the words of the law declare. Do you now wish Lutherans to be tolerated for a little while, so that afterward you may do what was done to the Novatians?

Finally, concerning the dissensions of Catholics this must be established universally: one who pertinaciously protects an error contrary to the Catholic faith is not a Catholic. If the error belongs to the class of those in which neither party has been condemned, dissension does not remove fraternity or rend unity. But I shall speak of these things in their place.

I conclude the argument by a reversed syllogism. No heresies have ever been able to oppress the Catholic faith by conspiracy and attempted Syncretism; therefore neither will the Evangelical heresies be able to do so. No syncretization has been able to endure; therefore neither will the syncretization of the Evangelicals.

CHAPTER XXVIII

That the Lutherans Condemn Syncretism and That Catholics Ought to Be Prepared to Endure Evils

There are many writings and decrees of the Lutherans against Syncretism with the Zwinglians. Among them the adversary especially undertook to attack one, which belongs to the Saxon preachers and counselors, whom he insultingly calls court Stentors. They advise their princes not to conspire with Calvinists against the Pontiff, Emperor, kings, and Catholic princes, but rather to join themselves to the Emperor and Catholics; and for this matter they briefly and wisely included nineteen reasons, which they call motives. Pareus snarls against their counsel in these words in Chapter 19:

"But indeed it has been discovered that another hindrance, equally insidious and pestilential, creeps through the courts of certain princes. For certain MOTIVES circulate under this title: Motiven und Ursachen, warumb man mit den Calvinisten in Religions Sachen nichts kan oder soll wider die Papisten für einen Mann stehen; that is, reasons why Lutheran princes can and ought neither to stand together with Calvinists in the business of religion against the Papists. This pestilential hindrance, I say, undoubtedly distracts the minds of most praiseworthy princes and cities in various ways and disturbs counsels of peace. Therefore the matter demands that we briefly examine whether those motives or reasons are true and so solid that they ought to stir up troubles among the Evangelical churches and overturn peace. There are nineteen reasons, which, retaining the term 'motives,' I shall report in order, and I shall openly and calmly, without any irritation, append what the orthodox answer to each."

He also shows in the dedicatory letter to the Eucharistic Controversies the reasons which especially moved those counselors. In it, an old man among Polish youths, he accuses the Lutherans in this manner: "But whatever is said here about the Lutherans is said concerning our adversaries in Germany--the rigid Ubiquitarians, savage and turbulent enemies of truth, who admit no conditions of peace unless their Ubiquity and Majesty are preserved; who represent and condemn the orthodox as heretics worse than the Turks themselves; and who openly profess that one ought rather to pass over to the Papists than cultivate fraternity with the orthodox, whom they call Calvinists. From among them a certain court Stentor recently was not ashamed in a public writing to counsel his prince that in the diets he should join himself to the Papists rather than the orthodox Calvinists, adducing two reasons. One was theological: that the Lutherans agree with the Papists in more matters than with the Calvinists, whom he names. The other was civil: that the Pope contributes his strength to protect the Roman Empire, while the Calvinist princes openly act in collusion with the Turk against the Empire. The latter reason deserves to be refuted in a very different way than by my pen. If the former is true, truth itself has become a lie--unless perhaps, just as he numbers genuflection at the name of Jesus among the heads of agreement, which the orthodox account indifferent, so he numbers among them statues in churches, organs, Phrygian chasubles and stoles, flowing gowns, curled hair, dances, church dedications, and many things of that kind, which these and those possess in common. If the counsel is upright, why did Luther write that the Papacy is from the Devil--Dass das Papsttum vom Teufel gestiftet sei? Why does the Apostle cry: 'Come out of her, my people'?"

They later divided the two reasons I reported into nineteen when it seemed good to explain everything individually. For neither are princes so frivolous or so neglectful of public safety and honor, nor do they employ counselors so inexperienced or so corrupted into perfidy by Calvinist money and promises, that they would bring their resources, liberty, life, and the safety of their subjects into danger for the domination of the Calvinists. Much less are they so foolish as to permit themselves to be ruled by Calvinist ministers.

Since princes profess these things without fear and dissimulation, there is no danger that at the will of a bloodthirsty Calvinist they would wish to be cruel toward their colleagues. For what prince of German blood and spirit would endure being hired for the slaughter of Catholics by a most shameful Syncretism? Who would lease his prison service to this gladiatorial trainer? What more monstrous thing could they do to incur hatred for their wickedness, or what more unworthy insult to their ancestors, than to hasten to slaughter and devour neighboring, quiet, friendly, and related princes because they practice that religion in which all those from whom they themselves received nobility, riches, and dominion were born and died?

Is anyone so savage that he would wish to contaminate himself by killing the living, whose only crime is that they follow his ancestors--from whose nobility he is highborn and from whose inheritance he is powerful? Would he employ against them the same cruelty by which, in the torments of others, he shows what he judges his own fathers to have deserved? Will you kill me, most illustrious prince? Will you devour me after I have been killed? Will you die from joy in my torments because I did not depart from the religion of your grandfathers and great-grandfathers; because I serve at the altar which your ancestors founded; because I believe what they gave me cause to believe; because I do not condemn that to which they wished their teachers and academies to swear? Behold, my blood flows to your odium and the disgrace of your family. Therefore it is necessary that either you assume a more benign disposition toward me or consign almost your whole family and antiquity to the flames.

Concerning the free cities of the Empire, without whose strength the madness of the preachers cannot set war in motion, I judge there to be still less reason for fear. They abhor contention and blood, flourish through commerce and the exercise of arts, and cannot grow by war; for they experience that through it the fortunes of private persons are diminished and commerce halted, nor is there hope that a state enclosed among the empires and dominions of more powerful men can extend its boundaries.

Who, therefore, will sound the trumpet at the voice of tribunician madness? Who will bring it about that Europe, dashed against itself in civil war, turns the remnants of its fortunes and its mangled members into plunder for the Mohammedans? This is Pareus's undertaking. He counsels so atrociously concerning us that he judges the delay by which our slaughter is deferred to be AN EQUALLY INSIDIOUS AND PESTILENTIAL HINDRANCE. It is too much for him that the Pontiff, Caesar, kings, and Catholic princes are alive. Surely to one for whom delay is insidious and pestilential, the acceleration of death must be safe, salutary, and religious.

They recognize the gentleness of Calvin and Beza; nor do I marvel at the savagery of the court preacher about whom the History of the Religion Changed in the Palatinate relates that, speaking in the women's quarters concerning the fifth change, he said that if he were Caesar he would cut off the head of every Lutheran preacher.

Yet if the worse party should someday prevail; if Evangelical ministers, burning from the cautery of their patriarch, should fly about amid a column of armed men; if they should smear the books they wrote in blood with the gore of martyrs; if Calvinist-Lutheran camps should stand against us, our helper is in heaven. Our heart will not fear. We shall spend upon religion the death which we owe to nature; we shall return to Christ the life which we cannot retain. It is not wretched, not even bitter, to die for Christ. More wretched are those whose cruelty we shall undergo.

We shall possess as witness of our innocence the same man who invades our fortunes and takes away our life: the Lutheran soldier, who, although he performs an infamous service for the Calvinists, nevertheless will not be able to deny that he fights for the scales of the Devil. Nor can he be ignorant that it is a great good which embodied devils--as Luther in his Table Talk calls the Zwinglians--hate so bitterly and persecute so atrociously. Therefore let us all be prepared for combat and martyrdom, destined to fall happily if, by permission of eternal providence, success answers the hostile attempt. Happily destined to fall, I say, beneath whom almighty God will place his hand, so that death itself may implant us into the life for which God exalted his only-begotten Son and gave him the name which is above every name.

If we bring this pious meditation on death and blessedness to every vicissitude of the times, we shall neither fear the adversaries' threats nor tremble at the daily reports of wars and the semiannual histories which their forgers most mendaciously compose. Nor shall we be excessively raised up by the consolation which honorable men, experienced in the state, bring. For there are men neither of the lowest rank nor little practiced in the affairs of the Empire who deny that that conspiracy should be feared even if it is most successfully accomplished. They say that God will not fail the most just cause of the Catholics; that he is the avenger of justice; that efficacious means for justice against wickedness and audacity are not lacking to the lawful magistrate; that they know where the shoe pinches the adversaries; that the mortality by which they can fall is common to them and us; that iron battle lines stand on feet of clay; that immense structures turn upon a slender hinge; and that blood will follow from our wound too.

I have thus far been accustomed to approve their counsels in order to indicate that human aids and industry, since they are divine gifts, are not to be despised. Yet I gladly demonstrate a more excellent way of Christian perfection, constancy, and glory, and exhort men to seek triumphs in the heavenly Capitol more willingly by suffering than by acting bravely, by meeting death than by killing the enemy.

If we await war with this disposition, we shall obtain one of two things: either, by dying in the faith and communion of the ancient martyrs, we shall obtain the same laurel in which they rejoice, crowned eternally; or, if God grants victory to the just cause, if that great weigher of counsels and great arbiter of wars obstructs the conspiracy, we shall live in our ancestral religion without the tumult of innovators and persecution by enemies. O happy lot of the Christian soul, for which a longer life is a road to felicity and death a shortcut, and which cannot perish except by its own will!

CHAPTER XXIX

That the Civil Alliance of Certain Princes Is Not to Be Adduced in Favor of Syncretism in Religion

They also derive Syncretism from the civil alliance of princes. If peace exists among them, why should there not also be Syncretism in religion? Why do theologians prosecute one another? Most praiseworthy cities, renowned barons, illustrious counts, and most illustrious and serene princes have entered into counsels of alliance and holy peace. Why, therefore, do we preachers fight?

In the first place, no one except an atheist and Epicurean would say that the care of piety and ceremonies must be accommodated to the laws and treaties of human compacts, and that concord and dissension in religion, sacred rites, and faith depend upon the peace or hostilities of kingdoms. What then? Will you regulate the worship of the immeasurable deity by the laws of treaties--whether forced or shameful, and certainly always unstable? If your prince joins himself to the Ottoman, will you also judge that the worship of Mohammed must be tolerated? You will certainly do so, for you tolerate those whom, when you speak from the heart, you judge worse than Jews and Turks. What will you advise the Belgians if perhaps the States General enter into a treaty with the idolatrous Indians and Chinese? Will you judge it equitable for a Calvinist table to be established at Calicut, and will you permit it to be erected? Or an altar to the Calicutan god at Amsterdam?

“They do not agree with us in the foundation,” you will say. But I taught above that you too do not agree. Yet let it stand that you think civil pacifications ought to be arbiters of religions and faith, and that the manner of belief is to be learned not from the Church but from palaces and camps. What do you think will occur if hostility dissolves the friendship of princes or injuries break it? Will you then also judge that the peace of religion, the attendant of civil compacts, has been violated by the destruction of those compacts? Will the trumpet's sound simultaneously rouse the thunderbolts of churches and the condemnations of chairs, and summon men to arms? If a battering ram strikes a wall, will the man who was formerly a brother presently be a heretic? These are impious, Epicurean, Machiavellian, and Satanic decrees.

But what, then, is that union, league, or correspondence of princes?

Do they agree upon this: that they may assert the safety of their fatherland and dignity of the Empire, protect the authority of the supreme magistrate, contribute the necessary expenditure and arms for the needs of the Turkish war, ensure that judgments are held, and prevent the execution of adjudicated matters from being obstructed by the audacity and frauds of wicked men? If these things are their objects, there was no need of a new peace, since absolutely all princes of the Empire are bound both by the right of fidelity to Caesar to perform these things and by the promise made to their colleagues upon first entering their dominions. But that they looked toward something else everyone sees. How necessary was the alliance and confederation of the orthodox among themselves and with Catholic kingdoms and dynasties for their own blameless protection!

But who are those princes? How many Lutherans are among them? And how can Lutherans be at religious peace with those by whom they experience Lutherans being expelled daily? Indeed, defection from Lutheranism began with that alliance. Diplomas were conceived concerning the non-offense of Calvinism, and cautious proscriptions of Lutherans were instituted under the name of dismissal precisely when those treaties were being made. Thus no one can doubt by confidence in whom princes hitherto Lutheran introduce Calvinism into their dominions. Therefore that civil peace, or correspondence, produced war and destruction for Lutheranism.

Peace and defense against the Papacy are displayed to the wretched peoples; the wealth and dignities of noble churches are displayed; rewards from another's property are displayed, so that while Lutheran preachers gape eagerly after our possessions, they may unexpectedly be shaken from their own little nests. How great was the expectation among the Evangelicals when that alliance first began to grow! What pages, what pictures were thrust upon us for the terror of Catholics! They denied that the Catholic cause could stand for one or two years; they asserted that bishoprics had been distributed, prelatures given away, and monasteries described; the preachers were already inventing new titles for themselves, when behold, almost half of Lutheranism suddenly fell, and from two electorates it lost one. Can you not yet conjecture, can you not yet see and feel, O remnants of the Lutherans, that your safety is being attacked by these agreements and your quiet disturbed by Calvinist arts? Rome is put forward as the object of the treaty, and Berlin is captured. You thought that you were contributing resources and strength against the Roman Papacy, and with your own defenses you besiege and attack the Saxon Papacy, as the Calvinists call it.

He praises the cities, barons, counts, and dukes who are partners in the treaty and holy alliance; but a Calvinist praises them when he sees his own dominion enlarged and hopes by the same art to draw all men into the Genevan marshes.

These things pertain to all Lutherans, yet free cities must fear them more. But I prefer to set forth the judgment written by a senator of a noble state to the syndic of another city rather than my own.

LETTER OF SENATOR N. OF STATE N. TO N., SYNDIC OF CITY N.

Most distinguished and prudent lord, most beloved cofather, you ask me to be an adviser to my citizens that they unite themselves with the corresponding princes against the Papists. Here I hesitate greatly and greatly marvel that you advised this to your people. For I see many grave things that greatly deter me. We shall either be conquered or conquer; or certainly, worn down on both sides by equal combat, we shall make peace. If we are conquered, who does not see what “woe to the conquered” is proposed? If peace must be made after disaster, why do we not rather retain it now? But I think that we cannot be victors without disaster--indeed, that we shall perish by victory itself. Hear my consideration of the individual outcomes.

First, war must be prepared if we enter the treaty. In that whole business direction belongs to the princes, counts, and nobles. They will conduct the levies; we shall contribute the money, either for our own share or as a loan for others. The soldier must be sustained in our territory, stipends given from our treasury, supplies from our granary; for you know whence these things are usually sought.

Second, journeys will be unsafe, commerce interrupted, and fields deserted. For if Prince N. sends even a thousand horsemen into our territory for forage, he will make us poor in one week. Hence scarcity at home, fear abroad, contempt for the mechanical arts; there is danger that the citizens' hunger may stir up a tumult.

Third, if the Imperial Majesty should also command arms to be laid down and proscribe the contumacious, the goods of our citizens would be yielded to the fisc not merely throughout all Germany but throughout Gaul, Italy, and Belgium; persons would be seized, and extreme destruction and even internal seditions would have to be feared.

Fourth, when war is waged, since we are not nobles, barons, or counts, not only will the whole administration belong to others and we shall be accounted as peasants, but our cities will also be in their power. Everything must be given to men holding arms, and with the army they have collected by our money they will be able, if they wish, to compel us to concede whatever they desire. You will answer that those who love treaties and equity will not do this. Perhaps they will not; nevertheless, I fear that they may. Next, it is not for us to bring matters to the point that we hold a precarious liberty by another's kindness and mercy rather than defend it by our prudence and counsels and by the ancient law of imperial favors. It is not the act of a senator faithfully counseling his fatherland to bring it about that, whenever a neighboring prince wishes, he can subject the city--to suspend liberty from another's judgment and nod rather than fortify it by domestic counsels and defenses. I do not judge even that city free whose fortune a more powerful neighbor carries from his belt. Certainly, while the war that will be waged at our expense endures, one noble centurion will possess more power than our senate and people.

Fifth, if the war is prolonged, how shall we sustain the expense for five or six years, with the fields devastated, the citizens vexed, the treasury exhausted, and commerce removed, when now we cannot bear even one winter? Do not our citizens' spirits fall if they hear that the Frankfurt fairs were less profitable? What do you think will occur if all of them are abolished?

Sixth, if we are conquered--which a wise man ought to fear as much as he hopes for victory--the condition of all conquered by adverse fortune will indeed be wretched, but that of cities most wretched. For princes have relatives, kinsmen by marriage, friends, intercessors on the adverse side; they will arrange marriages with the victors; they will cast the cause of the war upon their counselors; this one's youth, that one's old age, another's merits, and some men's ancestors will receive pardon. But the cities which are free by the favor of Caesar alone--who will protect them? Liberty will be diminished by a single word, expenses demanded back, new magistrates established, and much exacted. The reconciled princes themselves will be appointed executors; we, I say, will be demanded by the victor as plunder.

Seventh, you will say that we shall conquer. If this were an oracle, not a man's conjecture, it could perhaps move a soldier to battle; nevertheless, it ought not to induce a senator of the city of N. to undertake war. For I think victory must be feared: first because it will bring no advantage, next because it will bring extreme dangers. Furthermore, what benefit will our city derive if Prince N. conquers Prince N., expels him, and occupies his dominion? You know that I speak of those upon whose border we dwell. Will some prefecture sprinkle us, so that some remnants appear to have flowed down to us from his great fortune? First, even if he did this, its annual revenue would nevertheless not compensate for the expense we incurred. Next, he will scarcely do it; so many centurions, nobles, barons, counts, and princes through whom he conquered will surround him that we peasants--or, if you prefer, city nobles--will not even possess access. Shall we buy uncertain hope at a certain cost?

Who does not know how great a danger we too, even as victors, will undergo? For I call it a danger because, though free now before the war, as victors we shall be in the power of a stronger man. You know that we are sustained by commerce not merely from the regions of two princes but from their fields, pastures, and forests; we cannot place a foot outside without being in the territory of one or the other. Yet our liberty is safe because that ecclesiastical prince is peaceful and will not permit the other to become more powerful by the accession of our city. Thus their hostility is our safety. If by our labor the secular prince expels the ecclesiastic, he will also place us under the yoke whenever he wishes. And, believe me, a time will come when he wishes it.

Melanchthon once complained in a letter to Milichius that the cities had been both deserted and betrayed by idle princes; and he hoped that they would therefore be more moderate and seek more upright counsels for making peace. The wretched princes could betray and desert the cities; will prosperous princes not wish to rule them when they possess the power?

Eighth, examples terrify me. For since we and most cities profess Luther's doctrine, while the princes profess the Calvinist, there is no doubt that they will wish to have conquered for themselves and to introduce the Genevan exercise of religion. Thus, scattered among powerful Calvinists, we shall be a few Lutheran cities. First, therefore, little by little our citizens and youths will imbibe love of Calvinism through proximity and commerce; syndics, secretaries, and some senators will favor Zwinglianism--for even now there are men who sell themselves to the Calvinists and sell their opinions. Then they will also seek the exercise of their religion and will extort it through great intercessors. We have recently seen it effected in a famous emporium that the city should lie open even to foreigners and foreign Calvinists.

Next, disputes are accustomed to arise among neighbors. Who will administer justice to the weaker or execute by deed a just sentence? Third, at this very time, when they need our aid, solicit our money, and greatly fear their adversaries, do they grant us anything? Consider not Cologne, which because it is Catholic they judged must be afflicted, but the cities of our--that is, Lutheran--faith. Have they not begun, by introducing foreigners from Gaul and Belgium, to oppress and constrain those cities by others? See the new towns established upon the Main and Rhine for draining the most ancient cities, so that they may transfer the commerce, wealth, and life of the ancient cities into their own lands. Do you doubt that they will do this when they see themselves able, when you see them attempt it while they cannot? I believe they will not desire to possess wealthy cities which they now labor at such expense and odium to transfer! “They will not do it,” you say. I prefer to take care that they cannot rather than await their mercy when they can.

You possess the protocols of proceedings; you are not a stranger in your state. Weigh what they have done; from the rules of prudence you will more easily judge what they will do.

This is the sum: we shall have to sustain the weight of war; its outcome is uncertain, its calamity most certain. If we are conquered, we shall be the victor's plunder; we shall be betrayed, as Philip says was formerly done, by idle princes. If we conquer, we shall become an accession to the plunder for men more powerful than ourselves. Therefore, since in this confederation either destruction or servitude is proposed to us--both a great evil, but more pitiable because it is proposed that it be purchased with our own money--we shall pass over ancient things and protect our liberty by fidelity toward Caesar, quiet toward our equals, and humanity toward our neighbors. Farewell, and impart counsels thus to your citizens, lest your fidelity toward the state appear to have wavered in doubtful times. I have said what belongs to my judgment.

Thus he writes; and I suspect that these are the reasons why most cities have withdrawn from that imaginary treaty or await an opportunity for honorable withdrawal. But I willingly pass over such matters, although not altogether foreign to my undertaking, since they were nevertheless not proposed for my consideration.

CHAPTER XXX

That for Peace It Is Necessary to Restrain the Insolence of Intellects

What wind is to the ocean, the inconstancy of frivolous intellects is to the Church: the source of heresies. Gusts stir a tranquil sea and make it infamous for shipwrecks; the blast of winds increases a kindled fire without limit and renders useless the labors of those extinguishing it. Heresies are so called by a Greek word, from the meaning of choice, which a man employs either in establishing or in embracing them. Tertullian, Book Against Heretics, chapter 5: “Therefore, because they introduce a thing by their own judgment, they choose it.” Hence they insert Aristotle, who instituted dialectic for them--an artificer dexterous in building up and destroying, constrained in opinions, harsh in conjectures, a producer of contentions in arguments, troublesome even to itself, retracting everything lest it should have treated anything at all. Hence those fables and interminable genealogies, unfruitful questions, and discourses creeping like a cancer, from which the Apostle, restraining us, expressly testifies that philosophy must be guarded against. Colossians 2. Hence the rejection of that simplicity by which the Lord is sought. Hence the novel assertors of fate and those who introduce a Stoic, Platonic, and Epicurean Christianity.

It belongs to princes to avert so great an evil. If this is removed, heresies will now cease to exist. For we have no need of curiosity after Christ Jesus, nor of inquiry after the Gospel; when we believe it, we desire to believe nothing beyond it. For this we believe first: that there is nothing which we ought to believe beyond it. Tertullian, Against Heresies. And so Tertullian already long ago complained that philosophers were the patriarchs of heretics, that a novel apparatus was prepared from the seed of philosophers, and that heresies were animated from their intellects. This entire evil arises from curiosity and the display of knowledge, while men prefer to be masters of their own inventions rather than disciples of truth; they move everything and hold nothing, full of new questions and empty of faith. Hence the succession of contentions, the rise of novelties, the enormity of shameful opinions, and the cruelty of civil wars. For since nothing is so firmly constructed by any intellect that an equally keen intellect cannot be found on the opposite side, a perpetual contest concerning the glory of memory, dexterity, and acuteness necessarily arises, so that religion has now become a battle of intellects, not a sincere devotion to the worship of the deity.

The exercise could be tolerated if it spent its labor upon childish rudiments, was tormented among the thorn-brakes of dialectic, played in physics, or constructed admiration of itself from mathematics. But now to seek the glory of intellect at the peril of souls, to draw the state into partnership in contention, and to mingle scholastic dust with citizens' blood--as it is impious and cruel, so it is most customary in our age.

“But he possesses a great and perspicacious intellect, worthy for many to follow.” Would that he possessed a good disposition rather than a great intellect, if he does not possess both, so that there may be both a good will and a perspicacious understanding. If the intellect is quick, take care that it is not changeable, cunning, and inconstant. If it is swift, let it be directed toward virtue: he who runs swiftly easily rushes headlong. If it is acute, it is therefore fragile: sharp things are easily broken. And there is a certain deceptive acuteness--odious, sophistical, hostile to wisdom, and dangerous to religion. Certain most acute and excellent intellects, says Augustine, Letter 1 to Macedonius, err all the more greatly in proportion as they run forward more confidently, as though by their own powers, and have not simply and truthfully sought God to show them the way. If those great intellects indulge themselves, they presently swell and cease to be sound; and what they have once rashly said, they always defend, until at last they consume themselves by their own labor.

But they think it right and lawful that liberty of prophesying be conceded to them. Vorstius alleges this, Socinus this, and the other plagues this. And they allege it not so that they may instruct men in religion, but so that they may disturb them. In Clement, Stromata 1, they are ζηλωταὶ τεχνυδρίων, ἐριδαντέες καὶ ἱμαντελικτέες: "zealots of petty arts, contentious men, and stitchers of tortuous lawsuits." That liberty always desires more than is lawful; therefore its untamed license must be restrained, otherwise nothing of the faith except its name will be retained.

It is of no consequence to relate examples: our age, the mother of monstrous heresies, is itself an example. Luther, employing undue liberty at the beginning, innovated the explanation of Scripture--that is, the instruments of faith. Not a thousand Cyprians, not a thousand Augustines, not a thousand others, whether by the authority of their sanctity or the splendor of their learning, recalled the man, obstinate in his own imagination, from innovation: to interpolate the Scriptures, to receive them with a new understanding, to thrust monstrous dogmas upon the world. Why should the same thing not be lawful for Zwingli which was assigned to Luther as praise? Once the die has been cast, once they have crossed the Rubicon, bringing an abominable war upon Mother Church, each rests upon his own authority in explanations of Scripture and is wise by his own intellect. He is not held by the judgment of the whole Church, which he comes to attack; he does not revere antiquity, which he ascribes to Antichrist. Therefore he is free and of his own right; he trusts himself alone; he alone is himself the author of his own religion. And we see it occur that new masters arise in individual years because individuals teach according to their own judgment. Nor can those who have departed from the first heretics be reproved by those whom they deserted, for the latter left the matrix and original Church of the faith. If deserters from the camp placed the military oath beneath their fear, what wonder is it if they are not faithful even to the enemies from whom they remember that they received rewards for perfidy? And so daily desertions occur to new heresies, or to old ones interpolated and brought upon the stage in a new form, because the vanity of the world loves to become renowned through new inventions. Nor is there any end of innovating, renewing, and disguising, because the license of fabricating possesses not only impunity but even glory, and, if it draws tumults after it, enormous profit.

I produce witnesses--not indeed weighty ones, but, since no one lies to his own disgrace, trustworthy at least in this cause. They are the preachers from the Eisleben conventicle, who complain in the preface to the Mansfeld Confession that many and various corruptions of Christian doctrine and sects of heretics everywhere enter their churches unexpectedly--partly creeping in insidiously, partly breaking in boldly and violently; that the devil stirs up on every side the intellects of proud and fanatical men, who infect the flock of God with most pestilential errors and false dogmas, by which both our bodies and souls are driven headlong into eternal destruction. And they prophesy not vainly: if this business of Satan succeeds, the condition of the Church will be much worse than it ever was before, as Christ teaches us beautifully and clearly in the parable in Luke 11. But they deny that it is so very astonishing that the opinions and sects of fanatical men are accumulated daily, and they adduce eight causes, among which this one is placed second:

"Secondly," they say, "sects must increase because almost all princes and magistrates neglect their office in this matter, but confirm the insolence of intellects by permitting anyone, according to his own judgment, the license to fabricate any false opinion whatever." Hence, they say, it has come about that the matter has now reached such a point that many at this time consider it a disgrace and ignominy to oppose false brethren and authors of sects by voice or writings. Indeed, even if some sincere doctors still remain, not yet infected by the poison of fanatical opinions, nevertheless they are feeble, fearful, and of a spirit somewhat too abject to be willing to incur danger for the cause of truth.

Thus they speak--with a true complaint, but an empty and indeed a foolish one. A true one, certainly: for those against whom they assembled their synod have invaded--the Anabaptists, Servetians, Stancarians, Antinomians, Schwenckfeldians, Sacramentarians, Osiandrians, defenders of free will, assertors of works toward salvation, and Adiaphorists. Among them they also placed the Jesuits, by a novel injury, since the Jesuits' religion is that of the ancient Fathers, not the new opinion of fanatics. They could have named many more of their own, such as the Flacians, Ubiquitarians, and other monsters; still others were afterward added from the Concordian Pandora. Therefore they are divided and vary because individuals depend upon themselves; each man, for himself alone, is authentic concerning his own inspiration of the Spirit.

The complaint is empty because princes and magistrates of non-Catholic men, by either punishing the insolence of fanatical intellects or prohibiting it so that there be no need of punishment, would themselves destroy their own profession. The patriarchs of the Lutherans permitted themselves every license of interpreting the Scriptures; now the princes cry out against their rivals and accuse the magistrates because they do not restrain the fanatics, although the magistrate doubts which men are to be judged fanatics. The accusation is reciprocal: the Sacramentarians and Osiandrians call the Mansfelders not only fanatics, but madmen and lunatics. Yet grant that the Anabaptists, Servetians, Antinomians, and the rest are fanatics, as they truly are: what will the magistrate teach, or what will he forbid? Namely, that no one according to his own judgment should possess the license to fabricate any false opinion whatever. A just command, a most equitable law. But by what standard will the magistrate examine those opinions? For they concern the interpretation of Scripture; it is not for the magistrate to judge what agrees with the mind of Scripture and what is alien to it. Or, if causes of religion also pertain to his tribunal, who will provide magistrates who all agree upon one interpretation? Will the Heidelberg and Tübingen praetors ratify the same opinion? Whatever unsound intellects rave, they boast with great vehemence that it was drawn from the most limpid fountains of Scripture. What will the prince's office do here? Command another interpretation? But which one? That which is in Luther's tomes, or in Calvin's papers? What does a fanatical intellect do here?

> I care neither for Calvin nor for great Luther;
> Each pleases when true; each lies fallen when false.

And why should I care for him, when he did not care for his predecessors? Let the man impose laws upon me who taught me by his own example that the free power of prophesying--that is, of interpreting the Scriptures--is constrained by no law. Let him restrain me within his own orbit who

> Traverses pathless regions of perfidy,
> Trodden before by the sole of none.

Therefore this complaint is empty, for those who fabricate novelties do what they learned from their predecessors. Unless they did it, they would not be heretics. And so this complaint is also foolish. For those counselors bore through the ship in which they sail and begin to sink themselves, lest the συμπλέοντες, those who are in the same ship, escape. They too are innovators, and indeed ought especially to be restrained. For what portents will arise, and to what outcome, unless the magistrate opposes them with armed force brought to bear?

They teach in the chapter on good works, from Luther, page 194: “The statement is slippery and vain when one thus declares: Faith indeed ought not to rest upon works and merits, but nevertheless it is necessary to possess good works, as things necessary for salvation. This entire statement is nothing. For if they are necessary for salvation, salvation cannot come without them, and therefore we are not saved by faith alone. But this is false and dissents from all Scripture.” They then proceed to devote labor to monsters: that it is not good when it is said, “Good works are necessary for salvation.” Indeed, they are neither a preserving cause nor a condition without which salvation cannot occur. But if good works are not even a condition without which salvation cannot occur, who doubts that a man may promise salvation to himself and his followers even if they have never conceived any good work? Who does not see that princes, if they love the distinction between good and honorable things in their provinces, must drive away those monsters--not now of intellects but of deliriums?

But I omit these things. Cato was accustomed earnestly to admonish the magistrate to punish offenders severely in the state, perceiving that nothing was more ruinous in the state than license. He thought it so intolerable in a polity that he judged a magistrate who could restrain it but did not do so ought to be stoned. If this maxim ought to possess force anywhere, it seems to possess a place especially in the license of teaching, writing, and painting, since evil things are sometimes taught with greater destruction than they are done. What license effects is shown by so many thousands of errors--and errors most pestilential in the state.

I shall seek an example from a neighboring place. There is a law which prohibits defamatory pamphlets under the penalty of death. So little regard is paid to that law at the Frankfurt fairs that everywhere through the crossroads and ships wicked men fly about as vendors of such pamphlets. And, to pass over the rest in silence, fifteen defamatory pictures were brought to me at the most recent fair--and yet those were not the only ones--in which the reputation of Catholic princes and estates, and indeed of the most august Emperor himself, is traduced. For in them the Pontiff is depicted with a demon, the cardinals with a fool; all the bishops' ornaments are boiled in a kettle; the Emperor, kings, and princes, prostrate on the ground, adore the Babylonian harlot; the Prince of Parma is brought onto the stage after death; the Belgian Truce is mocked together with the image of the Catholic King; a griffin subdues Aachen, Düren, and Wesel and overturns Mülheim; the Truce dies before its day; the Spaniards and the Archduke are mocked; Spinola rides upon the seven-headed Apocalyptic beast and hangs terrible over the Jülich provinces; a Babylonian tower is built at Cologne; the most serene Duke of Neuburg, prostrate, adores the devil in the Pontiff. Everything capable of producing hatred, envy, and contempt of Catholics is brought forward on various sheets; the name of none but the Hollanders and confederates remains untouched. Condemned sheets publish judgment concerning the Roman Empire and the whole world. No one is immune from abusive sheets because there is now a reward for audacity, abusive speech, and wickedness; license entices, slanderers are purchased for a price, and those men rejoice who prefer to have injured lions with humble poison and to fasten hidden bites upon them, because, if they professed their hatreds and were enemies openly, when defeated by greater power they would lose both vengeance and credibility. Therefore this combative audacity, innovating curiosity, and defaming shamelessness must be bridled if we wish to introduce some semblance of peace--indeed, if we wish to approach a negotiation concerning peace.

CHAPTER XXXI

That Arbiters Free from Passions Must Be Chosen in a Negotiation for Peace

We approach nearer to peace--which would that we might attain. We must treat of peacemakers, for we see that in civil contentions, or in regard to foreign wars, authors of peace who are devoted to neither party are interposed. And certainly a negotiation for peace is better completed through outsiders. For, since they are free from the passions of anger and hatred, which losses and injuries have exasperated among those who have waged mutual wars, they estimate the matter by reason and equity alone and are inclined toward concord because they hold the causes of discord far away. Indeed, the outcome has taught all too often that peaceful conversations and conferences instituted for the sake of contracting treaties have made the beginnings of a more atrocious war, and that disappointed hope of peace has sharpened hatreds. This is especially accustomed to occur when those who still bear hostile dispositions come to mutual conferences to make peace. For there everything is suspect: a slight word, an easy gesture, the order of sitting disturbs peace. Man, a suspicious animal, snatches everything toward the worse when he presumes that the disposition is hostile; the very sight and conversation of an enemy strike the distressed spirit and rouse fires not yet lulled. Therefore political writers instruct men to negotiate peace through intermediaries, or to commit the business to arbiters with full power. But in a cause of religion Catholics have perpetually appealed to arbiters against heretics. Unless this is done, I see no end of controversies. Those who refuse either arbiters or judgment distrust their own cause. He who admits no judge is indeed victor when he himself is judge; but to conquer thus and to be judge in one's own cause is, in the judgment of all men, to lose the cause.

But what arbiters, what judges do you name? Those whom you will not be able to reject without shame. If you reject them, your conscience will accuse you of being conquered: judges who are ἀδεκάστους [incorruptible], who neither possess nor hope for favors from either party; judges whom God has placed above fear and human passions; judges acquainted with the cause and most tenacious of equity,

> Brave men and tenacious of purpose,
>
> Whom neither the ardor of citizens commanding wicked things,
>
> Nor the countenance of a threatening tyrant
> Shakes from their firm mind.

Such men, I say, eager to die for justice and for religion, against whom, if you make an exception, you will have betrayed your cause.

Who, therefore, are arbiters or judges so great and of such a kind?

They are the assemblies of the holy Fathers, the councils of confessors, and the councils of the ancient martyrs. I bring forward men who deserved excellently of religion, who died in their piety, who either suffered the supreme punishments for truth or were prepared to suffer them. Their sincerity in teaching was so divine that they were unwilling either to conceal truth for the price of the whole world or to dissemble their faith; their constancy was free from fear to such a degree that no threats, no loss of possessions, and no proposed atrocity of torments could induce them to cease from assailing and expelling falsehood. Whoever refuses witnesses so holy and judges so incorruptible now professes himself condemned by his own judgment. This, therefore, I establish: that those judges ought to be refused neither by plaintiff nor defendant.

The adversaries themselves will also grant me the second point: that they cannot name anyone by whose judgment they are willing to stand. Or certainly, if they so will, come now--let that which they assert themselves to will be done. Let them name the man by whose judgment they dare to stand; let them name one, but someone other than each man himself.

In Holy Scripture we read: “Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him unto righteousness,” Genesis 15:6, Romans 4:3, Galatians 3:6. The interpretation of this is various. A certain man interprets it thus: the work, or τὸ believing, was imputed to him unto righteousness, because God accepted it as though he had fulfilled the whole law. Thus Bertius and others. Certain men say: Christ's merit was imputed to him unto righteousness; others: God's essential righteousness was imputed to him unto righteousness; others: the habit of faith was imputed to him unto righteousness; others: faith alone was imputed to him unto righteousness, so that no merits of works came into justification; others: faith was imputed to him unto righteousness, so that not even works were a condition without which it could not occur. And these interpreters so dissent among themselves that they attack one another as heretics, atheists, Socinians, and Antichristians.

They all assert that Scripture, the sense and words of Scripture, and the analogy of faith stand on their own side, and that the others either do not understand the meaning of the Holy Spirit or corrupt it. No beginning has yet been given to peace. No one admits a judge except a man whom he knows to be bound to his own sect and hired for his own errors. Therefore, unless they wish to consume their lifetime in quarrels, let them seek arbiters who will judge sincerely without passions.

Let the Bishop of Hippo come forward and expound Paul and reconcile the dissenters: “What faith, unless that which the Apostle defined most fully in another place, saying: Neither circumcision avails anything, nor uncircumcision, but faith which works through love?” Let him come and teach that faith alone is not righteousness but the foundation and beginning of justification. “Man begins from faith,” he says, “but because the demons too believe, it is necessary to add hope and charity,” Sermon 16 on the Words of the Apostle; and Sermon 22 on the Words of the Apostle: “The house of God is founded by believing, raised up by hoping, and perfected by loving.” Let Ambrose, Augustine's teacher, come, Sermon 29 on Psalm 118: “Faith is the beginning of the Christian; the fullness is righteousness.” Let Cyril come from Egypt, Book 4 on John, chapter 9: “Faith will be the gate and the way into life.”

The Calvinists teach that faith cannot perish and that righteousness is not destroyed by any crimes; the Lutherans deny it. Why do they fight hand to hand concerning Scriptures which the former deny, the latter overthrow, and neither believe? Let them hear the ancients; let them hear the judgment from the holy martyrs; let them learn truth from the ancient Church. Let the Calvinists see that they err and depart far from the sense of the word; let them read against themselves The Orthodox Consensus of the Church in This Doctrine, produced by Peter Bertius, the most eloquent of the Calvinists, Book On the Perseverance of the Saints, etc., page 89. There let them read Ignatius, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Tertullian, Theodoret, Cyprian, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, Prosper of Aquitaine, Gregory, Bernard, and the Acts of the School of Paris in the year 1354. He adds to these even heretical witnesses. Bertius, a milder Calvinist, wrote these things against his own rigid Hollanders and Bremeners. If he examines the other heads of doctrine by the same reasoning, and tests novel interpretations by the judgments of the ancients, he will proceed by a straight road to the orthodox faith.

If they consider these things, they will easily rescind what was wrongly judged and hold their own interpretations suspect. For if they understand that this was the perpetual doctrine of the Church of Christ, and that it was never dealt with so unhappily that these doctrines did not always possess a place in it--the words are Bertius's--what arrogance could be so obstinate as to judge that the whole Church until now read Scripture without a true understanding, while they alone were endowed with that knowledge which until now had been unknown to the world?

Therefore we direct this prescription: if Jesus Christ sent the Apostles to preach, no other preachers ought to be received than those whom Christ appointed, because no other knows the Father except the Son and he to whom the Son has revealed Him; nor does He seem to have revealed to others the interpretation of Scripture which He revealed to the Apostles whom He sent to preach. But what they preached--that is, what Christ revealed to them--I will here also prescribe ought to be proved in no other way than through those same churches which the Apostles themselves founded by themselves preaching to them, both, as men say, by living voice and afterward through epistles. If these things are so, it follows that every doctrine which conspires with those apostolic churches, the matrices and originals of the faith, must be accounted truth, as without doubt holding that which the churches received from the Apostles, the Apostles from Christ, and Christ from God; but that every remaining doctrine which savors against the truth of the churches, the Apostles, Christ, and God must be prejudged as falsehood. These are the words of Tertullian, On the Prescription Against Heretics, chapter 21. Therefore, he who superinduces another meaning of the Lord's words and of apostolic preaching, contrary to the interpretation of the matrix and original churches, introduces a doctrine prejudged as falsehood. He who refuses those churches as arbiters of his interpretation rejects the truth of the Apostles, Christ, and God.

“But we appeal to God's judgment,” they say. “We do not regard human arbitrations. The truth contained in the canonical Scriptures is unmoved; we embrace it. The judgments of men are often those of persons who favor unjustly, often of those who envy maliciously, often of those who are deceived; they are always mutable, never infallible. We appeal to God's tribunal; we follow God's word. It is wicked, after the deity's judgment has been abandoned as though doubtful, to seek truth from a creature; after the declaration of God, who is infallibly true and immutably good, to transfer the arbitration to a human tribunal is sacrilege. For there either passion or ignorance frequently oppresses truth, and imperious wickedness condemns innocence when it has been deprived of assistance. To summon God into court is more than sacrilege. Therefore the Church ought not to judge concerning our interpretations.”

These things are said with the best right; but a great injury is done when they are twisted back against us, as though anyone were of so barbarous an insanity as not to know that God is immutably good and true, while the judgments of men are either fallacious through ignorance or injurious through wickedness. And even if this matter could have been doubtful, their most atrocious calumny would have removed the doubt.

For who has appealed from the heavenly tribunal to the censures of men? Who has examined God's pronouncements upon the balance of a created understanding? The matter at issue is not the truth of the divine law, concerning which he who doubts is unbelieving and he who examines is sacrilegious. It is holy to us without controversy and approved without examination. We bring men's thoughts into judgment; we inquire what they teach concerning the divine law: judges not of the law, but of deeds and sayings.

The adversaries' accusation is grave, but it possesses much insult and no reason. It is judged unbecoming even in their own conventicles, and it has been so refuted and convicted by the orthodox that it is an indication of a ruined cause to flee to the ruins of old defenses and chant worn-out trifles again. The state of our cause is this:

The question is not whether Scripture is true, but whether Scripture too has said what the innovators say. Whether Scripture says that which no one believed it to have said a hundred years ago. Whether the Holy Spirit formerly regarded no Church, so as to lead it into the truth which the innovators boast. Whether meanwhile, until Luther and Calvin apostatized, Christ willed all the churches to understand the Scriptures in one way and believe in another; whether He willed the faithful sometimes to die for one faith other than that which He Himself had preached and written through Himself and the Apostles. Whether, in the interpretation of Scripture, so many and such great churches, various in such diverse places and languages, so near to the age of the Apostles, and testifying to truth by the blood of so many martyrs, not only erred but even erred into one faith and into the same understanding of Scripture. Whether the error truly reigned for so long. Whether among the innovators an interpretation of Scripture so varying, a reading so manifold, and versions of so many chapters at variance conspire into one truth--and from what corner, amid such vast darkness, the light of truth shines forth.

Who is so ignorant of law and custom that he does not know that, when a dispute is instituted before a judge, the equity of the laws is not examined, nor is the purpose to overthrow the laws, but to decide controversies according to the prescription of the laws?

Germany labors and is worn down by many lawsuits of many years; and in the numerous mass of laws, a pretext for overthrowing justice is never lacking to inequity, while a swift outcome and an undamaged victory are rare even for a just cause. Yet amid so great difficulty, delay, and variety of judgments, who is there who accuses the laws, advises that customary law be abolished, or overturns the law itself? All defend themselves by law and contend that the whole apparatus of law supports their own case--not only private persons and those who are dragged into the city by law, but much more also the lords of affairs, who are besieged by troops of jurisconsults and counselors. They are entangled in more lawsuits the better they are furnished against lawsuits. These are prosecuted with so much anger, so much violence of contests, and so much cunning of intellects that legal disputes frequently issue into wars and civil slaughter.

At the present day an enormous lawsuit concerning the right to the dominions of Jülich is pending; books have been published on both sides. Three most noble princes each claim the entire inheritance for himself and exclude the others from the whole. No prudent man doubts what must be done in this place: war must be avoided. For the lawsuit will not be settled by it, since whoever succumbs in battle will say that he was overcome not by right but by force or stratagem. There can be no end of lawsuits unless it is determined by the authority of a lawful judge what the laws command. By explaining the mind of so many laws and constitutions, he will display his judgment and by his own decision disentangle the controversy which the multitude of laws entangled. Those who refuse his arbitration distrust their own cause, and on both sides the boast of laws is vain if the soul of the law--that is, the judge's sentence--is fled.

The condition of our dispute is the same, but on a more complete right. We place in the midst the immutable law of God, the word of eternal truth, and the Lord's judgment nowhere at war with itself.

We each say that it pronounces in our favor; we assert that our adversaries are condemned by it; we have persisted in the same clamor for nearly a hundred years. In individual years new competitors arise and arrogate to themselves the understanding of Scripture and the defense of truth, so that we must vindicate our possession of the faith as many times as, by a new assault and by fanatical intellects sent in, the robber of Tartarus either disturbs or invades it. Hence it is not difficult to know on whose side the true understanding of Scripture stands: on the side, certainly, of him who not only contends with an empty voice that he possesses the mind of Scripture, but also comes to join issue according to law. He not only says, “The truth is mine,” but even submits the matter to a judge. Indeed, he demonstrates that it was adjudicated long ago.

If you should claim a farm from your neighbor and say:

> By law the farm which you possess is mine, but he should answer: “Not at all; for the law which you produce does not award the farm to you, but confirms it to me--or certainly, if it seems so to you, let us be brought before a court. Come into court.” But you should proceed: “I alone understand the law; by law the farm is mine; I reject a judge; surrender the farm.” Who would endure you, so importunately injurious concerning farms, small fields, and rainwater-drips? Yet in the business of salvation, in the highest matter of all, you desire this to possess force: that you assume judgment over all interpreters for yourself, that your interpretation be ἀνυπεύθυνος [not answerable], and exempt from every censure. Moreover, you even slander the innocent, whom, when you see them appeal from your deliriums to the ancient Fathers and judges of the Church, you feign by an unspeakable lie to subject divine truth to human arbitrations and to summon God into court. But I conclude thus:

When the interpretation of divine Scripture is disputed, it belongs to a good conscience to appeal to the ancient Fathers and councils, but to avowed wickedness to rest upon oneself alone. Since the Lutherans admit neither Calvinists as judges, and the Calvinists judge Lutherans unworthy of judgment, this cause cannot be referred except to the ancient Fathers, known from the monuments of ancient writers, and decided from the prejudgments of the Church's councils.

For who will judge? John Francis Astaspis, against Pouchain for John Palmer, page 263, judges the Lutherans unworthy: “For even if Melanchthon was fainthearted and fearful, even if he changed his opinion, even if certain of his colleagues and disciples resisted those Ubiquitarians in the school at Wittenberg for some time, lest they make the Saxon churches infamous by this new dogma, it does not therefore follow that there are no contests and quarrels among those men. They are rendered unworthy to deliberate alone concerning the establishment of peace among the German churches, or alone to arrogate to themselves judgment and condemnation concerning the dissensions of others. For how will those who cannot repress their own contentions heal the dissensions of others? How will those who clash among themselves with such animosity and harshness of insults be fit to lead others dissenting concerning graver matters to concord, much less to condemn them? To each of them, not without cause--indeed, most opportunely--that familiar proverb can be objected: ‘Physician, heal yourself’; and, ‘Hypocrite, first take the beam out of your own eye before you attempt to pluck the mote from another's eye.’”

But if Palmer deservedly and rightly judges the Lutherans unworthy, because of the shameful marks of ingratitude, to sit alone as a tribunal for judging all men--as Palmer himself says and Astaspis proves--for, he says, “Those who have shown themselves so ungrateful toward their parents that they have either brought an atrocious and indecent insult upon them, or arisen as slanderers against them, or finally defamed them by public judgment, are rightly pronounced infamous and unworthy of their paternal inheritance,” thus Justinian, Novels 111, § Justas; but the Lutherans, he says on page 270, “deserve to be numbered among the ungrateful and infamous who inflict those indignities upon their teachers”--Melanchthon and others. And not only the word of God, but even the philosophy of the pagans, teaches that teachers and doctors--especially theologians, who spiritually beget us in Christ--must be honored in the place of parents. If, because of contempt for Melanchthon, the Lutherans are infamous in the judgment of the Calvinists and ought not to be admitted to judgment, what will be done in general with all the innovators, who sinned not by contempt for one fainthearted and changeable little man, but who defame all antiquity, the teachers of the churches, the bishops of the world, armies of martyrs, and the teachers of all men by voice, writings, conventicles, and judgments?

But I omit these things, to which their importunity drew me away. I return and admonish again: it is a most pestilential imposture, a diabolical calumny, by which they hold the souls of the unskilled in their net, when they accuse us--because we appeal to the ancient teachers of the Church concerning the interpretation of Scripture--of fleeing from the word of God to the judgments of men and subjecting the Scriptures to be judged by human arbitration. For if anyone changes or mutilates one iota or one apex from the Lord's words, or adds to them, we say anathema to him. We inquire only concerning the understanding. The Lord said: “This is my body.” We understand and believe what He Himself said: namely, that this is Christ's body. The Calvinists deny that this which the Lord said was His body is the body of Christ; they assert that it is a figure or symbol of the body. We say that it is the body delivered for us and the blood poured out for us. We know that figures and symbols are not the price of our redemption. They proceed and persist in fastening figures upon the Lord's testament.

What end is there of contending? Let us hear uncorrupted judges, pronouncing sincerely concerning a known cause and defendants not known to them: judges, I say, who do not seek to inquire and pronounce whether the Lord truly said, “This is my body,” for in this they declare that they agree with us; but let them define that which is disputed--whether we or they rightly understand the Lord's most true words. But if they refuse to stand by the judgment of others, let them do so openly and abstain from calumny. For we do not judge the word of God, but summon their versions, interpretations, corruptions, and deliriums before the tribunals of the ancient Church. Here we plant our foot; here we conquer, because they abandon their recognizance, because through calumny they flee the encounter and reject the examination of their errors, convicted by the testimony of their own conscience.

CHAPTER XXXII

That Meanwhile, While Peace Is Being Negotiated, the Lies and Calumnies of Preachers Must Be Restrained

The restraint of slanderers is a thing altogether necessary and worthy of the cares of princes. For those poisons of tongues not only oppose the restoration of peace, but even break off a negotiation for peace after it has begun, and not rarely ruin peace itself after it has been well composed and confirmed. Deservedly, therefore, in the year 1613, at the Diet of Regensburg, the orthodox princes and estates proposed to the Imperial Majesty, among their other grievances, the insane license of reviling and slandering by which the race of preachers protects its desperate cause. For after they had demonstrated that the Augsburg Confession was gradually being annihilated and would at last be entirely destroyed amid so great a diversity of religions, and that all men appeared to have conspired for the destruction of the Catholic religion, they finally add:

"The very license of slandering and accusing has now prevailed to such a degree in the pulpits of the other party that they do not hesitate to rend with insults even the Roman Pontiff, who deserved far better of them and of the whole Empire, particularly at the time of the recent Hungarian war. What is done concerning Catholic princes, and how not only they themselves but also other estates professing the Augsburg Confession who desire to live peacefully with Catholics are everywhere traduced and dishonored by defamatory pamphlets, it is not worth the labor to demonstrate at length. Nevertheless they hope that Caesar will at length consider lawful means both of restraining this license and of preserving concord in the Empire," etc.

These are the words of our princes. Nor are the artificers of calumnies themselves ignorant of them, since they dare to insert them into their histories in the same words. Would that princes of the other religion possessed power great enough to confine and tame θηριώδη [beastlike] and savage breasts by fear of the laws. But those men break all the rights and bonds of the laws; inflamed with envy, hatred, and anger, they fly about and nevertheless accomplish nothing else than to reveal to the world the malevolence planted in their spirits and to become the destruction of their own state. For Holy Scripture teaches us that license to slander is the sign of a city about to perish:

Jeremiah 6:6: "This is the city of visitation; calumny is in its midst." Ezekiel 18:22: "He who has slandered and done violence to his brother--behold, he is dead in his iniquity." But Amos 3: "Make it heard in the houses of Ashdod and in the houses of the land of Egypt, and say: Assemble upon the mountains of Samaria, and see the many insanities in its midst and those suffering calumny in its inner rooms. And they did not know to do what is right, says the Lord, storing up iniquity and plunder in their houses. Therefore thus says the Lord God: The land will be afflicted and surrounded, and your strength will be drawn away from it, and your houses will be plundered." For the safety of that state is laid aside and lamented not only when vices reign freely, but when they also vex innocence with impunity and oppress virtue, in which men have degenerated so far from what is right that evil is called good and good evil.

But this is the single pursuit of the new-evangelical ministry: since they cannot prevail by truth, they hold the unskilled by slandering the adverse party. They know that the bite of calumny is incurable and, though it does not deserve belief, nevertheless generates an opinion by which the greatest part of mankind is led. Although that which is boasted in an old saying is false:

> Νικᾷ γὰρ αἰεὶ διαβολὴ τὰ κρείττονα.
> Calumny always conquers the better things.

For truth often conquers. Yet the other saying is true:

> Οὐδὲν διαβολῆς ἐστὶν ἐπιπονώτερον.
> Nothing is more intolerable than calumny.

The sword indeed cuts, according to Democritus, but calumny separates friends. Yet I appeal to those men in vain: like an asp, they possess poison in their tongue, and their single hope of victory; and, if they can hear the truth, they owe every success of novelty and every increase of heresy to their lies. Therefore they will not permit these arms to be wrested from their hands unless their princes and magistrates, lovers of true and sincere peace, reduce them to the orbit of modesty by force and fear. Unless they attend especially to this, not only will pear tree grow old upon pear tree and fig tree upon fig tree in their dominions, but they will also lose every assurance and hope of peace. For he who slanders renders the man whose reputation he detracts hateful, and himself too hateful to all. What a basilisk touches, it kills and poisons; the man whom a slanderer destroys he renders execrable even to others.

We seek peace, a synod, treaties, and friendship; but amid so great a license and impunity of fabrication, amid so great an atrocity of calumnies, we cannot negotiate with the preachers. Nothing of fidelity, nothing of humanity, much less of religion, can exist in professed informers and sycophants. For behold, we have disputed together for so many years, and in each year they fabricate new, horrible, and unheard-of crimes concerning us; with these they fill sheets, pictures, books, and the ears of the peoples. What kind of conscience so laboriously traduces another's innocence? What kind of religion is it which needs to be supported by such unspeakable lies? Catholics deservedly detest them when they observe that they slander not only beyond belief but also beyond measure.

I shall make the matter clear by examples. In Poland they fabricated unspeakable and foul things concerning certain priests of our Society and published in writing that, examined before the eyes of the city of Kraków, they had been subjected to the supreme punishment. They lied that the same crimes had been expiated publicly at Antwerp by others. The most serene King of Poland, the bishop and governor of Kraków, and the senate and bishop of Antwerp refuted the manifest lies by their testimony. They lie about other things at Vienna, Styria, and Bavaria; princes and states defend innocence among foreigners by public attestations. For in those places where the crimes are said to have been committed and punished by the gallows, wheel, and fires in the sight of all, there is no need of a defense, since so many thousands of men recognize the heretical lust for lying and detest it equally with heresy. I pass over lesser and daily things; from these greater ones I draw my argument.

Nothing can be negotiated with men who do not fear to scatter so many and such false things, either in the polity or in religion, since all familiarity and every conversation possess no less danger than if you were associating with a scorpion, viper, or basilisk. I am not ignorant of their excuse: that they fabricate those things for the sake of defending religion and conquering their adversaries. But if religion is true, it ought to rest upon its own integrity, not upon detraction from another's piety. I know that otherwise they cannot maintain their cause; but it is better to lose it than conquer through so many crimes.

In the year 1613 a disputation was instituted at Durlach between Catholics and adversaries. The ministers, with the μεγαληγορία [boastful grandiloquence] customary to them and confident speech, boasted that they would prove certain pronouncements of their opinion from the sole, clear Scripture. When they came to the matter, they brought glosses and petty arguments in place of the sole, clear Scripture. The history was published in Latin and French. But what did the evangelical historian do? Contrary to the conscience and testimonies of two most illustrious men, contrary to the preachers' own programs and theses, he lies about the event in these words, Mercurius Gallobelgicus, volume 9, book 4:

“At the beginning of July, a colloquy between the Protestants and Pontificians was instituted at Durlach, to which the brother of the Duke of Lorraine also had gone with two Jesuits so that he might attend the colloquy. But since the Jesuits, obtaining the ancient position, chanted their old song again and contended that the Pope must be chosen as judge and that the dispute must be conducted from the Fathers and indeed in the French language; whereas the Protestants, appealing to Holy Scripture, said that the disputation must be conducted from it alone and indeed in the Latin language, in the customary manner; the Jesuits, unwilling to accept that condition, returned by the road on which they had arrived and departed to their own party with the matter unaccomplished."

These are the words of Gothard Artus, a man of such prostituted shamelessness that, after princes testified and the preachers themselves moreover disclosed in writings that the matter stood otherwise--not only the Jesuits but even the most serene Vaudémont himself demanded the proof of dogmas from Scripture alone, as had been promised, and the preachers confessed that they could not do this--he nevertheless has not yet deleted the lies detected by the writings of so many Lutherans and Calvinists and even by Pareus's oration. There can be no negotiation for peace with such men, who, as soon as they have been conquered, possess at hand some scoundrel sold to lies, by whose pen they overthrow the truth of history, who dares to swear that it is not light at midday.

But I now cease to marvel at these things, since I have read the foulest calumnies since the birth of mankind against the most reverend and illustrious Cardinal Bellarmine. Impiety never formerly dared anything similar; innocence suffered nothing of this kind. The arch-sycophants of the Evangelicals have reached the summit; they have conquered all the ancient informers, slanderers, revilers, abusive speakers, and detractors; now in the Bellarminian calumny they have conquered themselves. Therefore, unless such men are excluded from conferences or constrained by the laws and punishments of princes, peace cannot exist. For let us suppose a colloquy appointed in some city on the Rhine: what disposition can Catholics possess when they know that the Gdańsk slanderer is prepared to attack any celebrated truth by a public lie? When they must fear lest, meanwhile, while they themselves devote themselves to prayer, reading, doctrine, and disputation, sheets fly throughout all Germany in which they are said to have died, to be carried through the air encircled by flames by the devil, to fill cities with enormous wailing, and to render their hearers lifeless? For since they have fabricated these things against Bellarmine, without precedent, from the fullness of diabolism, they will not easily be milder toward us: that example has made them more instructed, impunity more audacious, and practice more prompt.

But lest we be moved excessively by reputation--although whoever neglects it is cruel--what of the fact that we cannot even live among them without the greatest peril? Certainly with no less peril than men formerly lived among informers at Rome in the time of Tiberius, Claudius, and Domitian. For at the slanderous lie of one or two men, if strength should belong to the adverse party, we must perish without a defense. The history which the same purveyor of lies relates teaches this, volume 10, book 3:

"Meanwhile, when a report had become widespread that the Jesuits at Münster had performed a comedy concerning the ruined Maurice--namely, representing his person on the stage as suddenly vanishing, as it were, while fighting with Spinola, while he concealed himself under a table and thus escaped the impending danger, his soldiers being altogether routed and at last put to flight by Spinola's soldiers--the Nassauers, moved by this occasion, converted the comedy into a tragedy a little afterward. For immediately seven troops of the confederates' cavalry, together with no small body of infantry, flying into the neighborhood to seek him, crawled through various places; and when they did not find Maurice, after all chests and boxes had been shaken out, they carried away with them whatever goods they could seize, while the peasants lamented their lost possessions in vain."

These are the words of that same Artus. That comedy was never written, never performed, never seen; nor did any scoundrel so shameless arise who dared to say that he had seen it. But a report became widespread: that report was false. But report is a swift evil and one which acquires strength by going. The report arose from the preachers or their satellites, certainly from those who both hate Catholics and loved the resources of Catholics excessively; they will also render account to God for the plundering of the wretched. But this is not the time to complain of these things; it was done recently at the Diet of Regensburg by the Catholic estates.

Now I assert this: that with the unpunished license of the ministers, we cannot hope for peace. An inequitable condition of peace indeed! If you delay an irritable and bilious minister for a little while, he will immediately lie that you made a comedy about Maurice; he himself, the artificer, in order to convert it into a tragedy, will bring seven troops of cavalry with infantry, plunder the neighboring regions and harmless inhabitants. Behold how much evil comes to you from one tongue! What viper, what basilisk, by prolonged ravaging, brought so much devastation as one tongue of a slanderer, by a few and false words and while absent? It was rightly said long ago:

> Οὐδὲν θηρίον κακουργότερον τῆς διαβολῆς.
> No beast is more harmful than calumny.

Good God, what will happen to the entire Catholic name if armed princes believe their ministers when they lie for our blood? If those princes are able to do what the ministers wish? If the fortunes and life of the orthodox depend upon the worst of all things--the tongue of a preacher?

Calumnies do not touch private persons alone; they rise with the same audacity against kings and princes, and not only Catholics but even those who desire to live peacefully with Catholics. Above I cited calumnies, insults, and defamatory pamphlets. In them an eagle is fabricated without feathers and Caesar sleeping; the Pontiff is Antichrist, and all ecclesiastical and Catholic princes are Antichristian; the King of Spain is compared to a griffin; Spinola rides upon the seven-headed beast of the Apocalypse; no Catholic and none of the friends of Catholics is immune. I am not ignorant that the States of Holland prohibited these things, but the rage of the ministers strives toward what is forbidden. They have spurned God's command prohibiting calumny; it is not astonishing if they contemn the magistrate. For what authority would not be cheap to those who mock eternal Majesty as though it did not impute crimes?

Therefore, every law being set aside, not only do they defile the fairs with abusive speech, defamatory pamphlets, and pictures, but they twist the news which they print each week to the insult of Catholic princes, as in issue 52 of the journal of the year 1615, where the King of Spain and his ambassador are rendered suspect as though they were privy to the Somerset conspiracy; and in the journal of the year 1616, on the twenty-second day, it is reported that a persecution of religion has begun in Austria, whereby Caesar is traduced as a persecutor. In the other reports such is the course and malignity of the narration that the cause of Catholics is burdened with suspicions and contempt. Therefore, if they seek peace, let them remove from the midst the perpetual material of wars and nursery of discords--namely, the abusive speech of the preachers--or at least so bridle it that it does not ravage with the liberty which it has possessed until now.

CHAPTER XXXIII

That Colloquies Rightly Instituted Conduce to Peace

“Peace has not been established by so many conversations,” you will say. “Why, therefore, do you summon us to disputations? What else will follow from them than exacerbations and the proclamation of itself as victor by each party?” I am not ignorant that many disputations have been causes of greater discords, that fire has been stirred with a sword, and that hornets have been exasperated by mutual agitation. Indeed, in the book On the Synod and Union of the Evangelicals I demonstrated by evident arguments that they cannot return to concord through mutual colloquies. Now I shall show only this: that colloquies instituted between the orthodox and those who err make some progress toward peace. For I do not affirm that they suffice; rather, I seek all supports for peace, not only those by which we may possess it but also those by which I trust that we may approach peace.

First, in Acts 6:9 the Libertines, Cyrenians, Alexandrians, Cilicians, and Asians disputed with Stephen and could not resist the wisdom and spirit which spoke. There were, therefore, continual disputations with unbelievers by which the Church grew and error diminished.

Next, in chapter 9:22, Paul grew much stronger and confounded the Jews who dwelt at Damascus, affirming that this is the Christ. We are taught in Acts 17:2 and 17:18 that this was the custom. For at Thessalonica and Athens, and indeed in the very assembly of the Areopagus, Paul disputes. Likewise at Corinth, after entering the synagogue, he spoke with confidence for three months, disputing and persuading concerning the kingdom of God.

Acts 19:8--9: he disputes daily in the school of a certain Tyrannus, not only with the disciples but with those who came to be taught. Indeed, Paul as a prisoner disputes before Felix and Drusilla concerning justice, chastity, and the future judgment, so that he beholds Felix, his judge, trembling. At Rome too, in his own hired lodging, he disputes for the whole two years and, though himself a prisoner, sets the multitudes free into the liberty of faith; for the word of God is not bound.

Nor did the Church abandon its custom afterward. To omit ancient matters, how many colloquies were held in Africa in Augustine's time? Augustine himself disputed against heretics not only in writings but in collated discourses. “At the same time,” he says in Retractions, book 1, “during my presbyterate I disputed against a certain Fortunatus, a presbyter of the Manichaeans, who had lived at Hippo for a very long time and had seduced so many that on their account he was pleased to dwell there. This disputation, while we argued, was taken down by notaries as though acts were being drawn up, for it possesses both a day and a consul.” The outcome was that which Augustine himself relates: “On the following day Fortunatus finally conceded that he found nothing to say against us. He certainly did not become a Catholic, but nevertheless departed from Hippo.”

He also conferred with the Donatists for three days; he reduced their long disputation into narrow compass and called it the Breviculus of the Conference. He not only advised a conference with Fortunius, bishop of the Donatists, but even prescribed its manner and method in Letter 163 to Eleutherius and Glorius.

He also consented to institute a colloquy with Pascentius, a count of the Arian heresy, but on the condition that the words of the disputants be taken down by notaries. After the count rejected the condition, Augustine deservedly refused the colloquy at first: for the count wished his words to be spoken, but did not wish them to be held against him. Nevertheless, overcome by charity, Augustine undertook it.

Concerning the most renowned disputation, Possidius writes thus in chapter 13 of the Life of Augustine: “And concerning all these things done for the peace of the Church, the Lord both gave Augustine the palm here and reserved with Himself the crown of righteousness; and, with Christ aiding, from day to day the unity of peace and the brotherhood of the Church of God were more and more increased and multiplied. This was accomplished especially through the conference which was afterward held at Carthage by all the Catholic bishops with those same bishops of the Donatists, with the most glorious and religious Emperor Honorius assisting. To accomplish it, he had also sent from his own side to Africa the tribune and notary Marcellinus as judge. In that controversy they were refuted in every way and convicted of error by the Catholics; they were marked by the sentence of the cognitor and, after their appeal, were justly condemned among heretics by the response of the most pious king. For this reason more than the customary number of their bishops, together with their clerics and peoples, entered into communion; and, holding Catholic peace, they endured many persecutions from them, even to the amputation of limbs and death.”

Then, after that most celebrated conference, some did not cease to say that those bishops had not been permitted to say before the authority which heard the cause everything on behalf of their own parties. Augustine afterward imposed silence upon Emeritus, the principal defender of the sect, at Caesarea, a city of Mauretania. He also confuted Maximinus when he came into Africa with the Goths, and he disputed with the Pelagians very frequently, so that a conjecture concerning the other ages may be formed even from that one age. Nor does it belong to my undertaking to demonstrate by examples a practice now employed for so many ages in the Church, but to show how greatly those men err who condemn conferences of this kind universally because the inquiry into truth is often impeded more by clamors and quarrels than it is advanced. This generally happens when victory is sought by shameless ambition, not an understanding of things--when the interlocutors wish to seem learned, not to learn.

The reason why exact disputations, perfected according to the dialectical norm, are necessary is that many stubbornly resist acknowledged truth and yield only when manifestly convicted. Rightly did the most holy prelate Augustine, most practiced in eristic writings and conferences, say in The City of God, book 2, chapter 1: “If the weak perception of human custom did not dare to resist the reasoning of perspicuous truth, but subjected its infirmity to salutary doctrine as to medicine until it was healed by divine aid when the faith of piety obtained it, there would be no need of lengthy discourse for convicting anyone's error of empty opinion by those who think rightly and explain what they think in sufficient words. But now, since that disease of foolish spirits is greater and fouler, by which they defend their irrational movements as though they were reason and truth--even after all the reason which is owed by man to man has been fully rendered, whether through excessive blindness, by which even manifest things are not discerned, or through most obstinate perversity, by which even those things which are discerned are not endured--it generally becomes necessary to speak more copiously. We must offer clear things to be seen, as though to those not looking at them; but, in a certain manner, to be touched by those groping and to be encountered by those struggling.”

For this reason the adversaries must be convicted seriously and ἀναντιρρήτως, irrefragably, so that they themselves may be compelled to behold their own effrontery and shamelessness.

Next, although sectaries who hunt for glory from colloquies are rarely converted, nevertheless they defend less spiritedly those things concerning which they begin to doubt. Third, by the agitation itself the innermost elements of their errors, the discords and conflicts of the sects, and especially the calumnies which they customarily fabricate against absent Catholics, are thoroughly known. Fourth, their contumacy is uncovered. For who among them, from the first disputant down to Plessis in the royal court and Heilbronner at Neuburg, so yielded his hands to truth and glory to God that he was not ashamed to be convicted while disputing, but rather rejoiced to have been better instructed by truth? Did not an unformed clamor of perversity explode a matter well introduced for discussion? Or, if the prerogative against truth was denied to clamor, did not the pretense of illness abandon the disputation? A plainly childish thing: to feign so sudden and so savage an illness that you cannot point out ten or twenty passages in another's book which you had previously copied out and weighed! Yet in this manner they concluded two of the most noble colloquies of our time: Plessis in Gaul, leader of the cuirassiers, and Jacob Heilbronner in Germany, pope of the Lutherans. For each preferred to cut short public disgrace by feigning illness rather than hear his own faults and learn truth.

CHAPTER XXXIV

That Writings Undertaken Concerning Controversies, Although Eristic, Are Nevertheless Useful for Peace

The multitude of writers and contenders causes many of the more prudent to call into controversy whether it is expedient at all to write books concerning matters of faith. But those who doubt concerning this matter are not to be heard, much less those who judge that writings must be abolished universally. Indeed, to such a degree that to prohibit Catholics' writings on behalf of the faith is the same as to betray the faith. Certainly the Apostle Paul composed most of his epistles against sectaries: to the Romans and Galatians concerning justification, law, and predestination; to the Corinthians concerning various errors of the pseudo-apostles. He also admonishes the Philippians to beware of dogs and evil workers; the Colossians, lest anyone deceive them through sublimity of speech or empty philosophy. He instructs the Thessalonians against those who said that the final day was at hand. The whole Epistle to the Hebrews consists in an attack upon Judaizers. John, James, and Peter also treat controversies in their Catholic Epistles, so that those who dare to blame the accepted custom of writing concerning controversies assume judgment for themselves concerning the Apostles and the Holy Spirit.

Let the books of the ancients--few of many which have come into our hands--be inspected: they are for the greatest part eristic and pursue heresies. There is no need to teach this; the pages themselves cry out. If it is burdensome for anyone to approach the authors, let him consult the indexes of Tertullian, Cyprian, Athanasius, Hilary, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and others. This, therefore, has always been done in the Church: that heresies creeping secretly or raging bitterly should be removed with every care. Because this can be done most easily by writings, writings must be employed, since they most easily come to the knowledge of others, are composed with deliberation, and can be retained for a very long time--especially since the colloquies themselves are customarily written down by notaries, so that not only those present may be instructed, but those far distant may attend the disputation most tranquilly and judge the matter.

Why should Catholics not labor diligently at this, lest truth lack its defense, when the sectaries' bloody presses and rage in writing have caused so great a slaughter of unskilled men? The adversaries confuse everything with insults, epigrams, and defamatory pamphlets; atrocious and infamous things are scattered concerning the Pontiff, Caesar, and all Catholic princes. Is it fitting for us to be silent toward all these things? Shall we not beware of betraying a good cause by our silence, rendering the adversaries' calumnies secure, and adding a spur to those running through hope of impunity? I indeed judge that not all must be answered. Augustine speaks truly in The City of God, book 2, chapter 1: “And yet what end will there be of disputing and measure of speaking, if we always think that those who answer must be answered?

“For either they cannot understand what is said, or they are so hard through perversity of mind that even if they understand, they do not obey. They answer, as it is written, and speak iniquity; and they are indefatigably vain. If we wished to refute their contrary sayings as many times as, with an obstinate face, they have resolved not to care what they say provided that in some manner they contradict our disputations, you see how infinite, laborious, and unfruitful it would be.” Therefore it is not necessary to answer all, but some must always be met, lest victorious ignorance triumph over truth.

How greatly the writings of Catholics obstruct their malice, the adversaries' hatreds and laws sufficiently show. For what things do they not fabricate against Bellarmine and the whole Society? All these things tend toward this: that when they have made those who announce the Gospel hated, they may also render truth itself contemptible. But now they rage even more furiously, since they perceive themselves to be known and refuted more clearly day by day. For they thrust forward so many defamatory pamphlets and pictures at each fair that recently the nobles of Holland had to restrain the wicked men by public edict. For there, in particular, is the workshop of enormous insults and maleficent sheets, either because more men there delight in such things, or because the license for crimes is greater in that place than in other provinces, or finally because they think that such things do not displease many leading men; and artisans prepared for everything through greed for profit do not refuse their labor.

Others indeed judge writings necessary, but moderate and familiar ones. Thus they do not even suffer those against whom anathema was pronounced long ago to be called heretics, nor do they admit a harsher word.

I judge that moderation and humanity contribute greatly to the matter, both in other things and especially in sacred disputations, and that they must be applied everywhere; yet in such a way that matters are weighed according to their own moment and gravity, that heresies are not tolerated, and that they are not estimated as light matters or philosophical controversies. For if that opinion prevails, a commingling of all religions will soon follow. Therefore errors must not only be convicted but also distinguished. Nor do I approve a shepherd who, when he has seen a wolf killing, does not dare to call it by its own name. But if a wolf covered with soft wool enters the folds, he is a traitor to the sheep who does not warn that destruction lies hidden beneath a lamb's skin. The soldier who fears to call an enemy by name, from whom he sees that his throat is sought, is cowardly. Therefore, according to the example of the holy Apostles--and among them John, who drank charity most fully from the Lord's breast--heretics must be uncovered, named, fled, and detested; nor must “hail” be said to them. I speak of heretics, not of those who through ignorance or infirmity are followers of another's error and do not cast off that in which they were entangled by the first fraud because they have not yet received another and better thing to hold. To these not only humanity and courtesy but also mercy must be expended, because truth is found with the greatest difficulty by those seeking it, and there are innumerable causes why it is not sought.

“But Tertullian disapproves colloquies and writings with heretics, and many others have called colloquies pernicious and writings useless.” I answer that colloquies are useful if they are free, moderate, conducted in syllogistic form without evasion, and if a judgment is also added which the arbiters present pronounce. Writings too must be tested by the same rule, and sectaries must be pressed to dispute at close quarters concerning the opinion of Catholics, not to attack their own dreams and adversaries whom they themselves fabricate. Thus those Belgian writings also contribute to peace, and many thousands who lacked an opportunity for conversation have now returned to the Catholic Church through the circulation of writings.

CHAPTER XXXV

That a General Council Is the Most Certain and Compendious Way to Peace Is Shown from the Scriptures

Thus far I have produced the aids of peace and those things without which peace cannot be composed, referring all of them to honorable, firm, and salutary concord. Now I come to that which alone suffices for peace, which has frequently brought peace to a world in tumult, and which has left none in quarrels and destruction except the ignorant and extremely unskilled, or the inflexibly contumacious who obstinately reject it: namely, a General Council of the whole Christian world. Thus Holy Scripture teaches us when it signifies that such a council cannot err and that the voice of the council is the voice of the Holy Spirit. For in Acts 15 the Fathers of the first council say, “It has seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us.” Nor was the Holy Spirit so present to their constitutions that He deserted the churches of later men; nor did subsequent times require the aid of the Holy Spirit less than the earliest. Therefore, if infallible truth is in councils legitimately congregated, provided that they are general, just as it is in the Scriptures, certainly it is necessary that he who believes the Scriptures also place faith in the canons of a council, since the Scriptures commend in councils the authority of truth and the truth of authority.

They are accustomed to object that this was a synod of the Apostles and therefore was directed, under the leadership of the Holy Spirit, according to the norm of truth and without suspicion of error, but that in their successors certainty and constancy in governing the Church were weakened. Men of this kind are malicious appraisers of divine goodness, which remains with its Church even to the consummation of the age and which would in vain command that doctors and pastors be heard if they can all err simultaneously at some time. When they extend the grace of God to forty or fifty years, they confine it within a very short space. They dream that the Church ceased long ago. For if the firmness of those who teach is removed, if it can define nothing, there is therefore no authority which can either condemn heresy or confirm the orthodox. Wickedness seeks an exception against every judgment so that, when it has rendered every sentence of the judge uncertain, it may fly about without fear of condemnation and ravage with impunity.

Next, “He Himself gave some indeed as Apostles, some as prophets, others as evangelists, and others as pastors and doctors, for the consummation of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edification of the body of Christ,” etc., “so that we may no longer be children, wavering and carried about by every wind of doctrine, in the wickedness of men, in cunning for the circumvention of error. But doing the truth in charity, let us grow in all things in Him who is the head, Christ, from whom the whole body, compacted and joined together through every joint of supply according to operation in the measure of each member, makes increase of the body unto its own edification in charity.” Ephesians 4:11 ff.

Those words of the Holy Spirit assert the Church's authority in deciding controversies so clearly and forcefully that, to one considering them, it appears more manifest than the noonday light that they were spoken against heresies.

For He describes God's charity, rich toward all, and His most persuasive providence in the government and defense of the Church. He gave Apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and doctors, not for the use of a few years, so as to withdraw them from the other ages, but for the stability of perpetual time; for the consummation of the saints--not only those who served the Lord in apostolic times, but also those whom the temptations and dangers of the final ages were to await. And He expressly adds the time: “for the work of the ministry,” which certainly will not cease while the world stands. “For the edification of the body of Christ”: the body of Christ is the Church; it is built in all ages. God will place the finishing hand upon it when the burning heavens are dissolved and the earth and the works that are in it are burned. Therefore power and authority must persevere until that day because the work of the ministry is performed without cessation; without authority it would come to rest. Edification still continues. Therefore the knowledge and industry of an architect are required. Thus the labor and power of the builders did not cease in the Apostles, since the building in their successors is tested by the same rule.

But they build toward this end: "that we may all meet in the unity of faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ." That, namely, we may καταντήσωμεν, arrive, at the unity of faith--which cannot occur if there is now no authority to protect unity; if those ancients possessed certain authors of their religion, while our faith rests upon uncertain conjectures. How shall we meet "unto a perfect man"--that is, grow in the knowledge of God and charity so that we attain the perfect and stable age of faith and are constant and immutable in the manner of men--if there is no certainty in the Church's judgment upon which our confidence may rest? How shall we come "unto the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ" if Christ's fullness is taken away from us? For the Apostle speaks of Christ as He grows to maturity in us and attains fullness in the Church. Therefore the measure of Christ's age or stature (ἡλικίας) is twofold: the first is that by which He Himself as an adult attained the fullness of a body assuming its increases in the human manner; the other is the measure of fullness by which the Church grows until that mystical body is full and perfect. We must grow unto that measure, and, as we grow, the body of Christ must be increased until it puts on πλήρωμα, fullness, consummation, and perfection complete in every respect.

For this reason doctors and bishops of our souls have been given to us. If certain truth is not in their universal body, the body of Christ has perished and the Lord could not maintain His purpose, for the body has been cut away from its head so that it could not attain its fullness. Individual members on this side and that die and are torn from the body; but the life of the universal body is perpetual from God's promise and guardianship of the faith. Therefore the universal Church will never be separated from Christ nor fall into lethal errors; consequently, infallible authority exists in it. Those who concede this will also grant that it exists in a General Council. For where will that constant truth be found except in a legitimately congregated council, since they do not admit it in the Pontiff?

But what will occur when we have grown unto a perfect man? "That we may no longer be children, wavering and carried about by every wind of doctrine, in the wickedness of men, in cunning for the circumvention of error." But if there is now no authority of judging in the Church which God willed to be certain, all must necessarily waver and be carried about in many matters. For even if all General Councils, together with the Roman Pontiffs, define that this or that Scripture must be understood now in this or that way, since they could err no less than individual men, their definition will bring nothing certain, but the Church will waver in perpetual ἐποχῇ [suspension of judgment].

How explicitly does the Spirit of God hand down to us that perpetual life of truth in the Church, growth of faith, increase of charity, and inseparable conjunction with Christ? "But doing the truth in charity, let us grow in all things in Him who is the head, Christ, from whom the whole body, compacted and joined together through every joint of supply, according to operation in the measure of each member, makes increase of the body unto its own edification in charity." How do we grow in Him in all things if at some time the whole Church falls from Him, a teacher of errors and alien to truth? How shall we grow in all things if there is no certain food in any supply of the Church? If every nourishment whatsoever, even though judged salutary by the Christian universality, can be poisonous and lethal?

Finally, if the Church is a body compacted, συναρμολογούμενον ἢ συμβιβαζόμενον, fitly and articulately joined together through every joint, or διὰ πάσης ἁφῆς, through every contact--not only so that the spouse, the Church, is closely joined to the Lord its head, but expressly διὰ πάσης ἁφῆς τῆς ἐπιχορηγίας, through every joint of supply; for Christ, as though the soul, diffuses strength and grace into all the limbs and members by vital operation. For this is κατ᾽ ἐνέργειαν, from the power by which Christ operates within. If by its nature each member grows and the whole body increases from that supply of nourishment and powers; if it effects its own edification in charity, which it cannot effect unless it coheres with the rest of the body; and if the rest of the body cannot possess the contact of supply unless compacted and joined together from its own head: it is certainly concluded that the Church perpetually coheres with Christ in this manner and therefore can never depart from the faith, and consequently possesses infallible truth in decrees of faith.

Nor does a General Council now possess less authority than that council in which Peter, the pastor of the Church, presided with the Apostles. For authority is found nowhere else. But if that Church possessed certain doctrine and ours doubtful doctrine, our Church is not one body and one spirit with it. It does not live from Christ but is the Church's corpse. For every Church whose authority is uncertain is not engrafted into Christ.

I hear the heretic speaking against me, though with a lighter murmur than was his custom.

First, that he acknowledges infallible authority in the Church, but one which belongs to the Scripture which the Church employs, not to the Church. Next, that the Church of which the Apostle speaks is a certain hidden Church.

These things are not now uttered by most men with their former grandiloquence, nor do they produce them ληρωδῶς [foolishly] in their customary manner, since recently even the Calvinists of Dordrecht denied against Tectander that Scripture was sufficient, and the initiates of Durlach spontaneously confessed that they could not show their faith from Scripture. Especially because certain men, whom I have treated elsewhere, concede that the sacred writers sometimes knowingly and willingly departed from truth. If these things are true, it is necessary that nothing be clear, but that it be preferable ἐπέχειν, to withhold assent in the Academic manner, rather than rashly give assent to things unknown and uncertain.

But I omit these matters, although they suffice for refuting errors. I ask this: who can pronounce judgment with infallible authority in the explanation of the Scriptures? If there is no one, then this body is not compacted and joined together from its head, nor does Christ impart to the Church, κατ᾽ ἐνέργειαν [according to operation], as the Apostle speaks, the vegetative power of spiritual grace. Nor will anything certain be possessed in many articles of faith.

Among the primary and capital decrees of the Calvinist faith is this: that faith and righteousness remain amid all crimes. The Lutherans deny this; the mild Calvinists, Bertius, and the more learned Hollanders doubt it--indeed, they speak while doubting in such a way as to show that they think the contrary. Scripture does not decide the matter by its judgment because each side is accustomed to cite it for its own cause. Nor is Scripture an evident expositor of its own opinion; for why does the evidence of Scripture concerning this matter which I have cited not shine upon the Lutherans and mild Calvinists? Next, they say that they concede the interpretation of Scripture. Who among us ever removed the interpretation of Scripture? Certainly no one. “For we all freely confess that the Scriptures need interpretation,” thus Whitaker; indeed, he expressly adds: “Those who understand the grammatical sense of Scripture nevertheless ought to hear an explanation of Scripture so that they may understand better.”

When a dispute arises in controversial articles, by what authority will this interpretation be settled? By none except that of the Church, which taught us that the Scriptures were given to us. But the Church is accustomed to disclose their mind to us through Christ's vicar and a General Council, which represents that sacred state. Without its testimony, although the truth of Scripture is most certain, it is nevertheless unknown to us. For whence do you know that this Scripture is divine--a fact of which the Chinese and cannibals are ignorant--unless because the Church taught you so? Even if they read the Bible in their own language, they would nevertheless not know certainly that it is the divine voice. Therefore let the hypocrisy depart by which men withdraw from the word of God while praising the word of God, and a hiding place is prepared for all heresies.

For what if the first-rank Calvinists deny that the Apocalypse is Scripture, and the Lutherans with them, while later Calvinists concede it? What Scripture says, “The Apocalypse is a divine book”? Yet this must be believed; therefore it must be proposed by a firm authority incapable of being deceived and deceiving. For that which is believed from authority becomes credible only from the truthfulness of the reporter; but whatever proceeds from an author of uncertain fidelity can deservedly seem suspect to the hearer. Therefore, if the Church, the user and commender of the Scriptures, errs in proposing them, to whom can it be certain that the documents which it exhibits are of good faith? Therefore, if the Church is deceived, the Scripture which bestows upon it the praise of perpetual infallibility is false; nor am I bound to believe a Scripture whose authority I knew only through the Church as witness.

The other laborious and dark refuge, in which they labor in vain to hide themselves in opaque night: they say that the invisible Church does not err. But the Apostle instituted his discourse concerning that Church in which Apostles, evangelists, pastors, and doctors are heard, and to which there is access, so that by adhering to it we may not waver or be carried about. Therefore this answer falls back into a refuted fallacy. For if the Church is not visible, it cannot pronounce judgment, nor can its decree be heard when it is unknown whether it exists at all.

Next, how ridiculous it is--if laughter can possess a place in so grave a matter--that the Church which hands down the sacred Bible to us, in which we possess faith and which we do not suspect of deceit, should be invisible! Whence do you recognize the donor if it was invisible when it gave? The Apostle speaks of the Church which obtained the minds of the gentiles, whose nursing fathers are kings, which, placed upon a mountain, cannot lie hidden, and which the nations admire even when they do not follow it.

“This was accomplished,” says Augustine in the book On the Usefulness of Believing, “by divine providence, through the predictions of the prophets, through the humanity and doctrine of Christ, through the journeys of the Apostles, through the insults, crosses, blood, and deaths of the martyrs, through the praiseworthy life of the saints, and, amid all these things, through miracles worthy of such great matters and virtues according to the opportunity of the times. Therefore, when we behold so great aid of God and so great progress and fruit, shall we doubt to place ourselves in the bosom of that Church which, from the Apostolic See through the successions of bishops--even while heretics bark around it in vain, condemned partly by the judgment of the people itself, partly by the gravity of councils, and partly even by the majesty of miracles--has obtained the summit of authority even to the confession of the human race? To be unwilling to grant it primacy is surely either the act of supreme impiety or of headlong arrogance. For if there is no certain way to wisdom and salvation for souls unless faith prepares them beforehand for reason, what else is it to be ungrateful to divine assistance and aid than to wish to resist authority prepared by so great a labor? And if every discipline, although cheap and easy, requires a doctor or master so that it can be perceived, what is fuller of rash pride than to be unwilling both to know the books of the divine mysteries from their interpreters and to condemn them unknown?”

Deservedly will men be unwilling to know them if all the interpreters can err simultaneously; nor is the foundation certain if the whole building can be constructed in sand outside it.

CHAPTER XXXVI

That It Is the Custom of the Church to Assemble Councils against Heresies, and That the Holy Fathers Think Thus

I have shown that some authority must necessarily exist in the Church, living and judging clearly and distinctly between the parties. Catholics acknowledge the Pontiff as that judge, whether he judges in a General Council or even without a council--which I do not now dispute. For since heretics hate the Pontiff and are exasperated against him in many ways, I do not wish to name him as judge in vain, for they will immediately demand the Apostles. Therefore I propose a General Council. If its authority is not infallible, there is absolutely no authority which can render the interpretations of Scripture certain for us. From this, I have shown, it follows that darkness and doubts are thoroughly introduced into the Christian religion, the possession of faith is tossed in astonishing ways, and a far greater confusion arises than in the ἀταξίᾳ [disorder] of empires, when the equity of laws is agitated by the cunning of crafty men and the integrity and fear of judgments have been removed.

Moreover, the authority even of provincial councils is enormous in the Church, and the practice has always prevailed that assemblies of bishops be gathered to form morals rightly and to break heresies. They seek their beginning from the deed of Christ the Lord, who, after summoning the Apostles, questioned them concerning the sum of the faith: “Whom do men say the Son of Man to be?” And, “Whom do you say that I am?” The Apostles too, in Acts 1, 6, and 15, governed the Church and rooted out errors after a council was assembled.

For the end of councils is the preservation of faith and morals. The Catholic Church of Christ itself, the diligent and cautious guardian of the dogmas committed to it, never changes anything in them, diminishes nothing, adds nothing; it does not amputate necessary things, append superfluous ones, lose its own, or usurp things belonging to another. But with every industry it attends to this one thing: that by treating ancient things faithfully and wisely, if any were formed and begun in antiquity, it may refine and polish them; if any have already been expressed and unfolded, it may consolidate and strengthen them; if any have already been confirmed and defined, it may guard them. Finally, what other cause has there ever been for the decrees of councils than that what was formerly believed simply should afterward be believed more diligently; that what was formerly preached more gently should afterward be preached more urgently; and that what was formerly cultivated more securely should afterward be cultivated more solicitously? This, I say, and nothing besides, has the Catholic Church--stirred by the novelties of heretics--always accomplished by the decrees of its councils: that what it had first received from its forefathers by customary tradition, it should thereafter consign to posterity by the chirograph of Scripture, comprehending a great sum of matters in a few letters and, generally for the light of understanding, designating not a new sense of faith by the propriety of a new appellation.

Such, therefore, was the solicitude of the bishops after the Apostles that, because they were impeded by the bitterness of persecution and it was not lawful to hold a General Council, they nevertheless met together frequently. Thus Pope Victor, in the year 198 under the emperor Severus, proclaimed a council, and at nearly the same time the Pontic, Gallic, Osroene, and Asian councils were celebrated. In 217, the African council was proclaimed by Agrippinus of Carthage. In 242, the Labesitan council under the pontificate of Fabian; likewise, in 149, the Arabian. In 253, the Roman council while the see was vacant, and the first Carthaginian under Cornelius in 254. Then, under the same pontiff, the first and second Roman councils, likewise an Italian and another Carthaginian. While Pope Stephen governed the Church, the council called the First African was held, likewise the Iconian, the Synadan, and three Carthaginian councils. Under Pope Dionysius, one at Rome and two at Antioch; under Marcellinus, the Cirtense and Sinuessan; under Marcellus, the Eliberitan and two assemblies of the Donatists held at Carthage; under Miltiades, the Roman; under Sylvester, the First Council of Arles, the Ancyran, the Neocaesarean, the Roman, two Alexandrian, the Laodicean, another Roman, and finally the General Council of Nicaea.

Who would not marvel that at that time, when pagan fury raged openly and manifestly and heresies sprouted everywhere, there was so great a spirit in those brave heroes of the Church that, as though in the highest peace, they gathered assemblies of bishops, expounded the norm of faith, and cut off heretics? I am not ignorant that there were more synods within that period; I speak of those of which either all or some acts survive. Nor did I wish to pass over even condemned conventicles and those of heretics, for by their own preposterous emulation they demonstrate to us the custom of the Church. There is no need to mention subsequent times. They possessed seventeen General Councils and hundreds of provincial ones, so that the Church should deservedly embrace the aid which it has always employed, and with such felicity that condemned heresies perished so completely that almost no memory of them now survives except in the books of Catholics by which they are refuted.

Here it is pleasing to attend to what the most learned Pammelius comments upon chapter 13 of Tertullian against the Psychics.

These are the words of Tertullian: “Throughout those regions of Greece, councils from all the churches are held in fixed places, through which all the higher matters are treated in common and the very representation of the whole Christian name is celebrated with great veneration.” These are the words from Pammelius's commentary: “And thus this passage contributes greatly to the authority of councils. We are accustomed to confirm it especially by the same Scriptures by which we confirm the authority of the Church: Matthew 28 and Luke 21; likewise that passage in Matthew 18: ‘Where two or three have been gathered in my name, there am I in their midst.’ Next, this too contributes to the same point: that in the Apostles' Council at Jerusalem, Acts 15, James expressly wrote back in these words: ‘It has seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us.’ Blessed Irenaeus in book 3, chapter

12, makes so much of this that from the words of that synod he proves the one God against Marcion.

“But if anyone desires to know the first synods after Christ down to the times of Tertullian, he will find first the synods of the Apostles celebrated at Jerusalem: Acts 1, in the election of Matthias; Acts 2, at Pentecost; Acts 6, in the election of the seven deacons; Acts 15, the council already cited; and finally that concerning which Galatians 2 speaks, when Peter was ordained to the apostolate of the circumcision, but Paul among the gentiles. To these add the council in which the Canons of the Apostles and the Apostolic Constitutions, afterward collected by Blessed Clement of Rome, were published. Likewise that in which James, the brother of the Lord, was elected bishop of Jerusalem, according to what Clement of Alexandria writes in book 6 of the Hypotyposes, cited by Eusebius in book 2, chapter 1.

“Next you have the Antiochene council of Acts 13, where Blessed Paul and Barnabas were separated from one another, and the Ephesian, to which Paul summoned all the presbyters and bishops of the Ephesians and, as far as appears, of all Asia, Acts 20. To these the Corinthian council seems to be added, in which--according to what Blessed Augustine asserts in the letter to Casulanus--according to his promise which he had spoken in 1 Corinthians 11, ‘I shall arrange the remaining things when I come,’ Paul established many things concerning the rite of the Eucharist.

“Moreover, since Apostolic Canon 37 establishes that assemblies of bishops concerning dogmas of religion and ecclesiastical controversies be held twice in each year, there is no doubt that frequent synods were already celebrated in the individual provinces. That their statutes were sent to Rome long ago through Pope Damasus to Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, is established from his letter which Blessed Isidore of Seville prefixed to his canons of councils. He says that none of his predecessors from Blessed Peter onward omitted to send something of their statutes. Although it seems to us that he alludes to the decretal letters of the Roman Pontiffs, which were generally written in Roman councils, we nevertheless leave the judgment free to the reader, referring him to the books which Francis Torres composed on their authority.

“Yet the Roman councils under Clement cannot be passed over--which Anacletus mentions in Letter 1--nor those under Alexander I, Sixtus I, and Telesphorus, since they mention them in their decretals. Certainly, under Victor, Eusebius enumerates almost innumerable councils concerning the day of Passover in History, book 5, chapter 20 or 22, and after him Nicephorus in book 4, chapter 30; and expressly the Roman council with Victor presiding and that of the Gauls under Blessed Irenaeus in the West; likewise one at Caesarea in Palestine, one in Pontus through Osroene, and the Corinthian or Achaean council. To these it is permissible to add the Alexandrian, which Victor himself mentions in Decretal 1, and that of Asia, in which Nicephorus, book 4, final chapter, writes that even the Asians--who had defined the contrary in their own synods--yielded to Pope Victor and published the same decree. And these seem to me the councils which the author here commemorates as held throughout the regions of Greece. Moreover, Eusebius in chapter 23 of the same book, and Nicephorus after him, from Apollinaris's first book against Montanus, mention many assemblies of Asia in which Montanus with his followers was expelled from communion.”

Although they ought deservedly to hear the Pontiff--since he who deserts his chair is not in the Church; since the Roman faith is apostolic; since it is the matrix and principal Church and the chair of Peter; since priestly unity arose from it; since perfidy cannot possess access to it; since he who communicates with him communicates with the Catholic Church, and he who does not communicate with him cannot communicate with it--contempt for him is itself also the beginning of schisms and heresies. For these reasons, I say, which I report from Cyprian, although those who err ought deservedly to hear their pastor, I nevertheless prefer to propose a council to them, if perhaps, when it has been read or heard, hatred of the name may obstruct the learning of the faith less.

Moreover, all the holy Fathers and the councils themselves are witnesses of this matter. For all General Councils attributed infallible judgment to themselves, even the Nicene and others which are received by the innovators. If their authority was uncertain, it was also a fault and a pernicious error. But Bellarmine gives the authorities of the holy Fathers in book 2, chapter 3, where he can be consulted concerning this matter.

CHAPTER XXXVII

That the Sectaries Themselves Think a Council the Most Advantageous Way to Peace

I willingly employ this kind of argument, both because it possesses some force for confirming Catholics and because it possesses very great force for convicting adversaries. Certainly that cause is good which an adversary is compelled to advance to his own detriment; victory is ready when it is voluntarily offered from the enemy's camp. Their own supreme commander concedes what we have already proved, although with one hand he recalls what he gave with the first.

“We certainly concede freely,” he says in Institutes, book 4, chapter 9, §13, “that if a dispute concerning some dogma arises, there is no better or more certain remedy than for a synod of true bishops to assemble, where the disputed dogma may be examined. For a definition of this kind, upon which the pastors of the churches have agreed communally after invoking the Spirit of Christ, will possess far more weight than if each separately handed down to the people at home what he had conceived, or a few men privately composed it. Next, when the bishops have been collected into one place, they deliberate in common more advantageously what and in what form they must teach, lest diversity produce a stumbling block. Third, Paul prescribes this method in judging doctrines. For when he attributes judgment to individual churches, he shows what the order of proceeding should be in graver causes: namely, that the churches should undertake a common examination among themselves.

“And thus the very sense of piety instructs us that if anyone disturbs the Church with an unusual dogma, and the matter reaches the point that there is danger of a graver dissension, the churches should first assemble, examine the proposed question, and finally, after a just discussion has been held, bring forward a definition taken from Scripture, which may both remove doubt among the people and stop the mouth of wicked and covetous men, lest they dare to proceed further. Thus, when Arius arose, the Nicene Synod was assembled, which by its authority both broke the criminal efforts of the impious man, restored peace to the churches which he had vexed, and asserted the eternal divinity of Christ against his sacrilegious mouth. Then, when Eunomius and Macedonius stirred up new tumults, their insanity was met with a similar remedy through the Constantinopolitan Synod. Nestorius's impiety was routed by the Council of Ephesus. Finally, from the beginning this was the ordinary method in the Church for preserving unity whenever Satan began to contrive anything.” Thus far Calvin.

He then adds: “But let us remember that not all ages or places possess Athanasiuses, Basils, Cyrils, and similar defenders of true doctrine, whom the Lord then raised up. Indeed, let us consider what happened at the second Synod of Ephesus, where the Eutychian heresy prevailed: Flavian, a man of holy memory, was cast into exile with certain pious men,” etc. Yet the Church was not there: I confess it. But I deny that this is perpetual--that an interpretation of Scripture which has been received by the votes of a council is true

Completely beyond reason, he both establishes a council and concedes that it is a remedy for error: let them bring forward a definition from Scripture, remove doubt among the people, and stop the mouth of the wicked, but nevertheless let them possess no certain interpretation of Scripture. And let it be lawful for Arius and all the rest to resist most freely, since there is no certainty in those asserting and all can err no less than individuals. But let us accept what he grants: there is no more certain or better remedy than a council. Let us defer to another place how greatly he errs when he renders uncertain that remedy which he acknowledges to be unsurpassed in goodness and certainty.

Next, Pareus, the man with whom I am dealing, is a substantial witness for me. He praises the purpose of the Lutheran princes whom he hates when they seek a General Council, and he wrote a pacific book On the Synod and Union of the Evangelicals. For he thinks the controversies between the Lutherans and Calvinists, which are many and great, can be removed by a synod; and he loves a synod so ruinously that, while it is being convened, he embraces Syncretism, the mask of a synod, with both arms. Therefore we possess the matter accomplished. But because the Hollanders are accustomed to mingle in the business of all kingdoms, I would do them injury unless I also summoned them here. Thus the counsel of the Remonstrants which they were ordered to explain is comprehended in these words:

"According to this apostolic counsel of mutual toleration, noble and powerful lords, we show in the state of the controversy which we exhibit here under the individual disputed heads by what method--in our judgment, at least--peace could be cultivated in the Church of God through mutual concord. For this purpose we humbly ask you to direct your minds promptly, since we cannot devise a more advantageous remedy than that some tolerate others, at least at this time and until the spirits now disturbed beyond measure and perhaps too alienated from one another, gradually calmed and mutually joined to one another, may weigh and examine the whole business more exactly through a verbal colloquy in a free synodal ecclesiastical assembly, empty of prejudgments, to be celebrated at the proper time by the authority, protection, judgment, and governance of your noble powers; and until we may all be led to one opinion, or, if necessary, it may be judged which opinion is nearer to the truth of Holy Scripture and to the edification which is according to piety, so that an order may afterward be instituted," etc.

But the Contra-Remonstrants urge a council far more strongly.

These are their words: "After long and mature deliberations, with all possible and customary methods weighed, we could not discern in the fear of the Lord that any more advantageous way could be chosen or undertaken by which these difficulties might be thoroughly composed with dexterity than that, at the first possible time, by the authority of all the most illustrious and powerful Lords States General, a National Synod be convoked and celebrated in which the controversies may be fully disclosed, examined, and judged from the word of God; and in which thereafter an order of mutual toleration and association may be sanctioned by common opinion, so that through it at last some general method of peace and concord may be established, and timely opposition may be made to dissensions, exacerbations, stumbling blocks, schisms, and similar difficulties that may thereafter arise.

"This is the method always employed from the very times of the Apostles, and exhibited and indicated to us by the Holy Spirit Himself as the most advantageous and especially accommodated to this purpose, as appears from Acts of the Apostles 15. Even after the times of the Apostles the Christian churches were preserved in this manner during many and most grave persecutions. All pious magistrates and Christian churches afterward followed their examples in similar difficulties, with great edification and benefit to the churches, and found this method most useful, as can be proved from the thread and sequence of ecclesiastical history.

"On the contrary, whenever other ways were brought forward--whether of ambiguous and two-edged toleration, of silence proclaimed on each side, or of lulling controversies which had arisen in doctrine--it was always learned by experience that difficulties could not be removed in this manner, but after incrustation of this kind quarrels always afterward erupted again with greater disquiet and harm to the churches. If the churches of these regions had been left free and permitted to hold a national assembly of this kind at the proper times, difficulties of this kind could not so easily have arisen in the churches, nor have spread thus far or taken increase, but could without any labor have been either guarded against and forestalled in this manner or, if they had arisen, immediately lulled and removed from the midst. Instances of ἀταξίας [disorder], dissolution, and difficulty would not be found everywhere in the churches and their government, as though daily. The Reformed religion would not have made so little progress in these regions nor suffer so much harm daily, as all the pious are compelled to see with the highest grief and sorrow of spirit.

"Therefore the Reformed churches in these regions suffer so great a loss from no other thing as from the delay of the National Synod, which has now been deferred beyond even the twentieth year, with the greatest loss--incapable of being expressed by any words--to the Reformed religion and the churches in these regions, and with no slight weakening of the condition of this state. It greatly concerns its preservation that in the doctrine of the Reformed religion and the government of the churches in these regions some certain and general tenor be established and preserved, which certainly cannot occur without the aid of National Synods of this kind.

“It is added that such is now the constitution of the churches in these regions that difficulties have arisen not only from those five articles exhibited by the Remonstrants, but that various, diverse, and new dogmas concerning the principal heads of our Christian religion are moreover defended and proposed by various pastors of the churches, both openly from the pulpit and in books published into the light. Such are the dogmas concerning the full satisfaction of Jesus Christ for our sins; concerning the justification of man before God; concerning saving faith; concerning original sin; concerning certainty of salvation; concerning the perfection of man in this life; and finally concerning many other matters which we judge to fight diametrically against the word of God and the catholic doctrine of all the Reformed churches, as this may be seen, among other things, from the declaration published in print by Adolphus Venator, residing at Alkmaar. Thus those five articles do not contain either all or the principal heads concerning which dispute is conducted today among the ministers of the churches in these regions. Therefore it is especially necessary that controversies of this kind be removed in good time by the aid of a National Synod, and that similar others be forestalled, lest on their account the common churches of these regions be torn apart and rent by schism.”

That the Sectaries of Our Time Cannot Possess a General Council

In the book On the Union and Synod of the Evangelicals, chapter 8 and those following, I demonstrated by most certain arguments that a synod cannot be instituted between Calvinists and Lutherans. I possess as consenting witnesses not only all the Lutherans but also a good part of the Calvinists, and even Pareus himself παλινῳδοῦντα, recanting and refuting himself. He confessed that hope of a synod was far away and referred peace and the synod to the deceits of the Cretans and Aeginetans. In the Postcolloquy I also taught that a synod would possess no utility, whether it were instituted among Calvinists alone or Lutherans alone, because the authority of that synod is merely human. Those whom its decrees displease will always be able to deny that they are true; they will be permitted to cry out: "The oracles of God must not be subjected to the censure of men." Those who have now learned from Calvin to contemn and condemn so many hundreds of ancient synods will place their own interpretation and private inspiration before all Calvinist councils.

Why, therefore, do I produce the opinions of the Calvinists now in favor of a synod and now against a synod? Why do they themselves speak now in favor of a synod and now against one? You ought to have sought the reason for their disagreement with themselves, and then to have asked me why I objected to them this domestic conflict.

Now I shall state both reasons. They reject a synod, for they do not wish to be pressed by the authority of the ancient synods. They understand that they must abandon their opinions, despair of the profits of contentious sermons, and undergo shipwreck of reputation unless they attack the ancient councils. If they defended the ancient synods, they would neither overturn the Scriptures by their own intellect nor adulterate them by perfidy. For they would receive the reading and understanding of Scripture from the most weighty judgment--from the senate of the Church assembled in the Holy Spirit; they would not cancel and explain it according to their own most frivolous opinions. They see that Scripture is fertile according to the faculty of each nature and has been so disposed by God's will as to supply material even to heretics. They prefer to employ that fertility to their own destruction rather than be led to salvation by another's teaching. That is not the fault of Scripture; for although those same Scriptures seem to have supplied materials to heresies, when rightly understood they nevertheless refute those same heresies born from their corruption.

Therefore, since in a dispute concerning the Scriptures they rest upon their own intellect and judgment alone, and borrow an interpretation agreeable to their morals either from ancient and most condemned heresies or deform it by a new contrivance from their own inspiration, they must necessarily dissent from all the ancient churches and therefore hate the authority by which they are refuted.

Let the Calvinists, rigid and mild, who recently fought in the arena in Holland, well matched, be an example to us. And when you hear that the mild have been matched with the rigid, do not fear that they will presently succumb voluntarily without combat. That softness is tough and tenacious; it does not easily lie open to a wound; it receives the violence of rigidity dexterously and permits what is inclined to ruin to be broken by its own assault.

This horrendous proposition belongs to the rigid--in the formulated state of the controversy which they offered to the Estates: "That he who once truly believes, even if with deliberate mind he lapses into great and atrocious sins, is nevertheless so preserved by Jesus Christ, and will be preserved hereafter, by the force of the eternal decree of election and from that ἀνεμποδίστου [unhindered] and irresistible power of God, that he can never lose it totally and finally; and consequently is then outside every danger and fear of condemnation; and that this is indeed the sole foundation of the consolation of the children of God."

These things, so filthy and impious that even the Gnostics and Carpocrates ought to be ashamed of them, would not be said unless the Scriptures were wrongly understood, unless not only the creeds and the doctrine handed down through the Apostles, Christ's companions, were utterly overturned, but the decrees of all councils were rejected. Therefore all ancient things must altogether be overthrown if these new things are to be established.

Thus they must flee and reject the ancient synods in order to maintain novel heresies; but in turn, when pressed from another side, they are compelled to betake themselves to the aids they spurned. Thus Calvin in Institutes, book 4, chapter 9, §1, professes that he venerates the ancient councils "from his heart"--and would that he said that "from his heart" from his heart. For they embrace the first four General Councils--the Nicene, First Constantinopolitan, Ephesian, and Chalcedonian--not from their heart but from necessity, on account of Servetus and the Antitrinitarians. They were compelled to receive the fifth and sixth synods on account of the Lutherans, the Ubiquitarians, strenuous enemies who produce a confusion of the natures in Christ.

But perhaps they will hear their own councils. They will not. An example from the same Belgium: they objected to the Remonstrants the judgment of the professors of Leiden against the Remonstrants. The authority of the Academy of Leiden is weighty in Batavia. But what did the Remonstrants say? "Why should Gomarus's judgment against us possess more force than Arminius's for us? Or what does it accomplish to produce such a judgment in this place, which can neither demonstrate truth firmly nor introduce unity of consensus with the Reformed churches?" Will they not oppose this wall against all the conventicles of their own men by which those things are not approved? "What does it accomplish to produce their judgments? For they are human and can neither display truth firmly nor produce unity of consensus." And next: "Are the brethren perhaps intent upon showing that certain articles have been defined otherwise in the Academy of Leiden than we now profess? But what does this have to do with the matter?" And a little afterward: "It would not be right for either a man or any assembly to prejudge for us in this cause."

Thus, if you regard the matter, they will hear no councils at all. To all they will answer: "What does it accomplish to produce these things? But what does this have to do with the matter, if it has been defined otherwise in the councils of our men? No man, no assembly, ought to prejudge for us. It suffices for us to have discharged our consciences for the defense of truth and liberty in the Church." Thus they think inconstantly and alternate their opinions. They flee the ancient councils because, if they acknowledge them, they perceive themselves condemned. They employ those same councils against new heresies. They desire new councils from their own men so that they may afflict brethren who think otherwise; they refuse new councils of their own men by which their own causes might be prejudged. In one word: when councils oppose them, they are defective; if they favor them, they are approved. They long ago made a Lesbian rule from Scripture, twisting it to their own opinions. They greatly desire to drag councils with the same impulse. Hence, therefore, the foulest tossing about of opinions; hence those many things which men who refuse to understand rightly must interpret badly.

But in adducing their opinions to prove truth against them, I possess the Apostle as my author.

He instructed the idolatrous Athenians toward faith from their own poets, Acts 17, and proved from them a truth which those authors of things rightly said either did not know or held down in unrighteousness. The ancient Fathers imitated the Apostle: Justin Martyr, Theophilus of Antioch, Tatian, Clement of Alexandria, Minucius Felix, Blessed Cyprian, Arnobius, Lactantius, Origen, Eusebius, and Augustine; especially Tertullian, who judges that heresies should be attacked by the same method. "In this place," he says, "it will be lawful for me to seek arguments even from the party of other heretics. That kind of proof is firm which is taken even from an adversary, so that truth may be proved by the very enemies of truth."

But these things too must be confirmed by a Belgian example. The Contra-Remonstrants, or the Rigid, seriously sought a synod from the Estates. The Remonstrants, or Mild, seem to have possessed the same desire, as they state in the writing concerning the method of conciliating peace exhibited to the Estates. But when they came to the matter, they declared that they wished for no synod and conceded all power to the Estates. Concerning this, Caspar Barlaeus writes thus in Bogermannus ἐλεγχομένῳ [Refuted]:

"Therefore Bogermannus cuts off every hope of toleration unless provision is made by a lawful judgment--that is, unless this entire controversy which has hitherto been agitated and is still agitated has been decided by a synod. But what kind of synod? I shall explain: one which the Estates of Holland permit to be convoked and celebrated; for which they make provision concerning place and time, as well as costs and the expense of meals; to which they delegate one or another spectator from their own number, who may be aware of the matters conducted there--lest they think the betrayal of the fatherland to the Spaniard is being discussed; finally, whose decrees they hold most ratified by their own seal and put into effect against the refractory as swiftly as they can and ἐμπρακτέως [in deed]. The remaining matters must belong to the synod and the theologians.

"Men delegated to it by the classes or ecclesiastical magistracy will assemble: men especially fit for disputing and for refuting μετὰ ἀντιλέγοντας [those who speak against them], possessing testimony that they are sound in doctrine, free from every stain of suspicion, and taught by experience in ecclesiastical affairs pertaining to these things, ἐσθλά τε καὶ τὰ σχέτλια [both good things and wretched things]. The Fathers will sit. Some president will lead the words; and in a long oration he will relate the labors and griefs of the Church struggling with so many monsters of errors, and will give thanks to God that the sun has now shone by which it is lawful to deliberate, in the customary manner, concerning a salutary remedy for these evils and to condemn the heretical opinions of the adversaries by common votes together and at once. He will likewise exhort the brethren to counsels of moderation, to serious examination of the articles, and to judge holily and without προσωπολῃψίας, partiality, and to the other things which contribute to formalities.

"The Remonstrants will be summoned according to custom; they will be accused of ἑτεροδοξίας [heterodoxy], because by private authority, without consulting a synod, they dared to depart from the received formulas of the catechism and Belgian confession and to contradict the summary of sound words. If they possess anything by which they can defend themselves, they will be ordered to propose it briefly and syllogistically, so that, if what they say is true, it may be approved by the judgment of the synod; if false, they may subject themselves to the spirits of the prophets and comply with their decree unless they wish to be held as heathens and publicans.

"It will be disputed sharply whether the articles contravene the Scriptures and truth as it is in the churches and as it is taught in the churches. These men will deny it; those will affirm it. Finally, after the Remonstrants have been ordered to leave and walk about outside, it will be deliberated what must be done. Since the opinions and judgments of the Fathers will differ, counters will be sent around; and, after the votes have been collected, a decree will be made approximately in this form:

"'The Synod has decreed and judged, and even now decrees and judges, that those five articles of the Remonstrants, both by reason of themselves and by reason of their consequences, are not orthodox but contradict the received doctrine of these churches, and therefore are by no means to be tolerated in doctors and pastors. But for all those among the Remonstrants who are willing to preserve a profound silence concerning them and promise solemnly that they will contradict the orthodox opinion in nothing, let there be mercy on account of their wives and children. But those who wish to defend the aforesaid articles tooth and nail and profess them by voice and writings shall be removed from the ministry, and let another receive their inheritance. But those who have attacked the Church in books hitherto published into the light and have blasphemed its doctrine, unless they are willing παλινῳδεῖν [to recant] and humbly beg pardon before the same synod for the fault of their deed, shall be struck by the thunderbolt of excommunication.'

"With this decree they will go to the Estates and request its ratification--not because doing so is necessary, but because it is conducive. If the Estates approve that moderate decree of the synod, they will hear themselves called fathers of the fatherland, nursing fathers of the Church, Constantines, Theodosiuses, and most Christian princes, because they have satisfied Bogermannus's wishes, Sibrandus's expectation, and the desires of so many pious men by which they are now tormented. But if they refuse and say that judgment of all those matters is owed to them, and rescind the decree of the synod itself after convicting it of multiple nullity, the Fathers will return to their old theme: peace is despaired of, there is no hope of toleration; nor will the Estates be held as they wish to be held--lovers of religion and haters of heresies--but, on the contrary, their favorers and promoters."

This is the very αὐτοσύνοδον [synod-itself], the most exact Idea of that synod by whose lawful judgment Bogermannus wishes these controversies to be completed. Plato would call it αὐτοσύνοδον; barbarous philosophers, "Synodeity." But those who constrain the Estates by this law of a synod and ecclesiastical judgment have not resolved to make an end of raising tumults before they have carried off a triumph concerning the Remonstrants' articles. Let them take care lest, while they seek to strike a fragile thing with a tooth, they break it against a solid one and, by inflating excessively, produce a rupture. It sometimes happens that he who, by refusing lawful conditions of peace, wishes the enemy utterly routed loses his cause, although by conceding something to the other he could himself have been preserved. But these things are θεῶν ἐν γούνασι κεῖται: placed in the knees of the gods.

CHAPTER XXXIX

It Is Shown Further That the Innovators Can Possess Neither a Synod nor Peace

At length they have attempted a synod; but in it nothing was conducted, not only according to the ancients, but not even according to those things which they themselves had said. I showed, however, that this assembly is not a council in chapter 56 of the Coronis.

It is certain that God constituted the ecclesiastical state with such providence and αὐταρχείᾳ [sovereignty] that in it he established an infallible norm for recognizing truth and detecting errors, and gave a judge for terminating suits and controversies. For that city is in no way worthy of the name of a state in which the inhabitants join issue concerning a right in such a manner that, after many expenses and long lawsuits, they remain uncertain concerning their cause; in which there is no one who pronounces judgment in such a manner that one party can know itself victorious and the other defeated. But all the assemblies of the Innovators are such states: without a norm, without a judge of the truth. Therefore they are not Churches of Christ.

They all vaunted Scripture, but they all employed it for themselves against the opposing party. And now the Gomarists, or the Rigid, in Holland confess that the matter cannot be composed from the Scriptures alone. For Scripture has not hitherto pronounced judgment among the litigants in such a manner that either party has confessed itself to have lost its cause.

It remains for them to sanction concord by a synod. But they themselves sufficiently confess that not even this way is suitable for removing controversies and hatreds. For although Dudley Carleton, ambassador of the King of Britain to the Estates, counsels a synod in the name of his king and shows that there is no judge except a synod, he nevertheless did not persuade the Arminians.

I indeed demonstrated in the thesis that a synod cannot exist, in the book On the Synod of the Evangelicals, Syncretism, and the Peace of Germany. Nevertheless, the Rigid pretend that they possess hope; for that reason they have summoned from Germany, Britain, and Switzerland demagogues of their own stamp, in order to overwhelm the Arminians.

But the Arminians object in reply that it cannot exist and is not useful. I shall readily show that their opinion is most true and demonstrate it by many arguments; and you, reader, will seek several more from our Father Maximilian Sandaeus.

The first argument is this. They have no one who may legitimately convoke a synod; therefore there can be no legitimate synod. For unless an assembly has been gathered by the authority and power of a magistrate, it is a crowd, in which there can be neither order, nor jurisdiction, nor any authority. The consequence, therefore, is clear. The Belgian Provinces themselves confess the antecedent; for neither any king nor the States General can proclaim a synod, while the provinces are unwilling. Therefore there will be no synod. No king can do so, because the Estates acknowledge none. The Estates themselves cannot do so; for the several provinces possess that liberty of religion by which the right of determining belongs to them, not to the States General. The man who wrote accurately on the same matter proves this and demonstrated the error of the British ambassador in §51:

“Because, according to the liberty and the privileges of the fatherland and of the Provinces, absolutely no province can by any power or right make laws for another, or all the provinces for one, in matters of religion, nor overwhelm one another by votes, even if a single province should dissent from all the others; rather, it is necessary that each individually consent freely to that which is being transacted. For no one--unless he is altogether a stranger to Belgian affairs--is ignorant that each one of the Provinces possesses absolute jurisdiction, and that one is no more subject to another than to the Emperor or to any foreign king, and this in all matters to which they are not bound by force of the pacification, or final union. By that pacification, indeed, they in no way renounced their dominion and absolute jurisdiction; rather, each retained its own, both in the government of the state and in the administration of justice, and especially in the care of religion. Indeed, it is so far from the case that by these compacts and agreements the Provinces renounced their Privileges and the absolute Dominion consequent upon them, or wished to prejudice or be an impediment to one another in their respective special and particular privileges, immunities, exemptions, rights, statutes, laudable and approved customs, and other rights, that, on the contrary, they united precisely for this reason: that they might mutually aid, strengthen, and defend one another in every way they could against all, whoever they might be, who should attempt in any manner to violate those aforementioned privileges and rights of theirs in fact. On what foundation, therefore, is the authority of some provinces now diminished under the pretext of religion--a thing which was itself formerly attempted by the Spaniards? Under what appearance of reason or equity, after the other provinces, is Holland--the most powerful of the provinces, which during the war sustained greater burdens than the rest and defended them by contributing great sums of money--subjected to the dominion, and as it were the guardianship, of others, and that by those who have received the greatest advantages from her? It was rightly said by Lipsius that factions generally sprout from ambition, when one man endeavors to dislodge another from his place and invade his seat. God knows, and I leave it to the conscience of each person, whether our calamity does not derive its origin from the same source."

The provinces themselves profess, moreover, that not all are willing; and they cannot be compelled, because their liberty has been guaranteed by oath.

The second argument. The other party, namely the Remonstrants, attribute too much to the magistrate. Carleton accuses them of assigning this authority to the secular power: "To confer this authority upon the secular power, by giving Caesar what is Caesar's, is to decline too much toward the other side and to take from God what is God's." For the Remonstrants, most harshly harassed by the Classes and by their Rigid brethren, fled to the aid of the Magistrate, which the ambassador reproaches them for doing. Therefore they wish the magistrate, not a synod, to be judge; and for that reason a synod, which would be without authority, cannot exist. It must therefore first be determined whether the faculty of deciding belongs to the Magistrate or to the synod. This controversy cannot be terminated among them, either by a synod or by the Magistrate, because the parties are not suitable judges. Therefore they cannot judge for themselves against their adversaries; for the Dutch ministers are not the entire Church, nor is the power of the Estates universal over all the ministers. Finally, therefore, the preachers will lose their cause, and the right will belong to those who possess greater power.

For the Most Serene King of Great Britain decided the matter against his own servant, as is evident from the Summary of the Conference held in the chamber of His Majesty in the year 1603 and published by William Barlow, Doctor of Theology and Dean of Chester, and afterward printed at Leiden in the Belgian language, pages 38 and 30. For when Reynolds happened to make mention of instituting a synod in which a bishop with his elders would determine disputed points which previously could not be decided, His Royal Majesty was moved, judging that they intended the Scottish eldership--if the word may be pardoned--or were attempting that which accords as well with monarchy, as the King himself says, as God with the devil.

"There," he says, "Peter and Paul, Thomas and Matthias, will assemble, and at their own discretion will subject me and my council, and all our proceedings, to their censure. There Peter will rise and say, 'Thus it shall be'; and Paul will answer, 'We do not wish it thus, but it shall be in this manner.' And therefore I repeat what I said before: Le Roy s'avisera [the King himself will deliberate]. Pray, wait another seven years before you seek such a thing from me; and if you then find me asthmatic and exceedingly fat and stopped up by windy pipes, perhaps I shall grant an audience. For I am certain that, if this manner of governing should prevail, my mouth will then be stopped up."

Hence it is also evident that His Royal Majesty had recourse not to a synod but to his Privy Chamber at Hampton Court.

Since this dispute, therefore, is litigated on both sides with great exertions, it will be ἀόριστος [without limit], and it will furnish laughter to the enemy and compassion to Catholics.

The third argument. To this pertains the difficulty of the Provincial Synods of Gelderland, Zutphen, Holland, Zeeland, Utrecht, Friesland, Overijssel, and Groningen--and perhaps specifically of Amsterdam. Their ministers were instigators and approvers of the public plundering of the Arminians that took place; that cruelty must be cloaked by an elaborate disputation, lest it be disapproved by the others. But the preparatory synods will impede the general synod of all the provinces: first, because they will think differently; next, because the synods themselves are divided among themselves. The provincial Synod of Holland will be able to define nothing, because the Arminians judge nothing right except what they themselves think, and the Gomarists will delegate no one except a Rigid. Thus one party will protest against the other, and finally no one will expose himself so foolishly to the hatreds of his adversaries as to surrender himself to danger, without hope, with a half-complete--that is, most contentious--commission.

The fourth argument. Contrary to the opinion of the Calvinists, that synodal session and disputation presupposes an enormous miracle, without which it cannot exist. But assemblies and disputations of the Church by no means rest upon miracles. For why do they not seek an angel from heaven instead of contriving a synod which cannot exist without a miracle? The miracle, however, consists in this: that they think men most hostile to one another, exasperated by long-lasting and pertinacious hatreds, full of anger, shame, rivalry, and lies, will by a sudden metamorphosis become gentle and placid; and, although the presence of hostile men inflames and arms them, they imagine that, as soon as these men have beheld one another, they will put off every vice. As if Atreus, when he stood stupefied at the sight of his brother, had laid aside his savagery; or as if Thyestes had not preferred flights through the forests to royal riches because his brother also had to be seen.

This, therefore, I assert: that without a manifest miracle there will be no disputation free from anger, quarrel, hatred, curses, contention, envy, and lies. For if hitherto, as they testify concerning one another, they have filled everything with lies, why should they now suddenly fear to deceive, which they have hitherto learned to do? They act, therefore, just as if someone were to send mountain brigands into some tender region and, when an opportunity had been given them, suppose that they would immediately become good colonists and men.

The fifth argument. There is no rule and norm to which they can direct their disputations and faith. Therefore they will sail rashly in the vast ocean of controversies, and they must be borne wherever the impulse of some opinion drives them. There is no Scripture, no tradition, no authority of Councils, of Fathers, or of the Church. The first of these must be proved, for they spontaneously confess the others.

That Scripture cannot be their norm and judge is so easily apparent that they themselves cannot deny it, as was shown above concerning those of Dordrecht. Next, each person interprets Scripture according to the analogy of his own opinion; from this it arises that, in reading it, each confirms his preconceived opinions.

The sixth argument. A twofold condition can be imagined for those who will be sent from the provinces to the synod: for either they will arrive with free mandates, so that they may determine in the synod what seems good to them; or they will arrive having been sworn to the opinion of their own provinces. If liberty is granted, the delegates themselves will nevertheless not easily change their opinion. Or if they do change it, by their own transgression they will not thereby draw their entire province with them. Indeed, greater discord will arise from this matter. For it can happen that delegates from Arminian cities will cross on foot into the opinion of the Gomarists, and deputies from Gomarist cities will embrace Arminian opinions. If this should happen, all dissensions would be doubled, and various disturbances of the states would arise.

The seventh argument. By what law will the ministers, magistrates, and people of the provinces live during the synod? Will they teach all their customary assertions with confidence? Or will everything depend upon the future decree of the judgment? If they continue to teach, the synodal definition will profit nothing on either side, since it belongs to a few, and to men whom it is very easy to err. If they are ordered to doubt, they will mingle heaven and earth, since hitherto they have defended their dogmas so confidently and so furiously. Thus, if those who were deputed should alter anything in the faith, their return to their own people will by no means be permitted.

The eighth argument. The regard for honor and reputation which exists in the state will greatly impede a recantation and retraction of opinions. For since they have represented one another not only as heretics but also as infamous men, liars, and calumniators, they cannot return to favor unless they acknowledge themselves to have been such. Friends and enemies, and children and children's children, will perpetually reproach them with this matter.

The ninth argument. There will be no order at all in the synod. For either magistrates or preachers will preside. Not the magistrates: formerly the preachers did not acknowledge the magistracy. “In the year 1586,” says Oldenbarnevelt in his Apology, “many preachers no longer acknowledged the Estates. Without the knowledge of the Estates, they sought from the Earl of Leicester the convocation of a synod which they called national.” Next, the ambassador Carleton denies that this ought to be done. Not the preachers: for the Estates formerly opposed their decrees, and yet were compelled to dissemble. Thus Oldenbarnevelt, page 7:

“The decrees of the pretended National Synod are published. The States General raised a difficulty in approving them without the consent of the Estates of the respective provinces, by whom they themselves had been delegated. By doing this, they contracted the utmost odium and gave very great offense. Action was taken against them by writings, endeavors, and public sermons in the churches. The Estates of Holland yielded somewhat to the time, judging it a good thing if they accepted the decrees for a time, provided that meanwhile the Estates, Nobles, and cities each retained its own right of appointing and removing ministers of the Church.”

But if they nevertheless assemble, will they give their votes with equal right and merit? Who will reconcile men equal in number and hatred?

The tenth argument. What number of synodal delegates will be established? Let there indeed be two hundred. If, matching equals in opposition, you place a hundred Arminians against as many Gomarists and next confer an equal right of voting upon both parties, you will experience a hundred opinions contrary to the other hundred. If you assign more to one sect, the others will complain of inequity; for those who are fewer in number will say that they are overwhelmed by the multitude. They will vaunt that their votes, although fewer, are nevertheless sounder.

The eleventh argument. Many of the deputies have explained their opinion in public writings and have condemned others. They will not refute their own decrees; for they would have to confess not merely that they had erred, which is human, but also that they had lied, which belongs to impostors.

The twelfth argument. Very many states and cities have harassed men of the opposing religion with prison, exile, and fines. The people of Amsterdam saw the Arminians publicly despoiled after a mob had gathered. For these things the acknowledgment of error is not sufficient; rather, compensation for losses and insults is necessary, which the preachers--by whose turbulent sermons the fatherland was shaken--will have to furnish and pay.

The thirteenth argument. Their Church is invisible, and all who constitute it are invisible; therefore their synod too must be invisible. As the Church is, so is the synod. For what if no one in that synod possesses the Spirit of God and faith? Therefore a synod cannot exist. For who will convoke a Church which he cannot see, hear, or recognize? A synod is a part of the Church, and indeed its most noble part--not a formal but an integral part. Thus a visible part will belong to a whole which is hidden and invisible. Therefore their synod cannot be called the Church.

The fourteenth argument. From this it follows that no one's conscience is bound by the decree of a council, for it is not known whether that council is a part of the invisible Church, and consequently whether the judgment they pronounce belongs to the Church or to unbelievers and heathens.

The fifteenth argument. A very great impediment will be placed before the synod by the multitude and variety of foreigners. For if Frenchmen, Germans, and Englishmen are to be endowed with the right of voting, in the judgment of the Arminians this cannot be done otherwise than by aiding the parties' opinions with an equal number on each side. This will not only fail to quiet the dispute but will also disperse it into foreign regions, although both France and England already possess enough controversies.

The sixteenth argument. The theologians of foreign nations are bound to the opinions of their own assemblies, princes, and kings, and will be able neither to think nor to speak otherwise than those by whom they are sent. Nor, if they act otherwise, will they ever be received again by their assemblies and princes. For if the Prince of Orange was already making ordinances concerning these matters long ago, what will kings do now? Concerning order, says Barnevelt on page 43:

“From the year 1574 onward, questions were raised in these provinces, my lord the Prince of Orange, of pious memory, and the Lords Estates asserting that it belonged to their office to establish ecclesiastical laws and ordinances, since lawful supremacy resided with them, in conformity with the practice received in all Kingdoms, Provinces, States, and Cities which undertook the Reformation against the idolatry, heresy, and tyranny of the Papacy.”

Therefore nothing can be expected from the other parties except rigid Zwinglianism, Socinianism, or Lutheranism. For why should the Arminians not summon Lutherans and Catholics to their aid if the Gomarists draw in Zwinglians?

The seventeenth argument. Those who seek a synod have not even established a place equitably.

They named Dordrecht. In this matter not a few disadvantages will occur. First, that city is remote from the Frisians and the people of Overijssel, so that they will come with greater difficulty and remain only with weariness. Second, it is an island, and therefore departure is less free and less subject to one's discretion. Third, Dordrecht exercises an ancient rivalry with Holland, which it has frequently opposed; thus those whom its inhabitants persecute not only from the common hatred of the nation but also on account of religion can expect nothing moderate in that city. Fourth, I do not think they will be safe. For although the people of Dordrecht have not yet stirred up a popular tumult against the Arminians, nor plundered those wretched men after the manner of the people of Amsterdam, there have nevertheless been ministers among them who wrote most bitterly against them in public and brought it about that the Arminians of Dordrecht preferred to hide rather than be despoiled. Fifth, perhaps the ancient calamities of floods will strike fear into some; for when it was torn away from the mainland, one hundred thousand perished. That was the crime of one man. Sixth, that city is more suited to testing wine than to judging dogmas; and therefore the ancestors established there τὸ δοκίμιον ἐν οἴνῳ, not τῶν πνευμάτων, although they did not hold even that privilege without a dispute, for they maintained that right through many contests against the people of Gelderland and Overijssel. Seventh, the proximity of Brabant and the Spaniards is also suspect; stirred by these disputes, it will sound the trumpet for a war of the Fifth and Sixth Gospel. Eighth, Dordrecht is full of Frenchmen and other foreigners, and therefore the city resounds with great noise; the Arminians will not be able to be safe. But if no snares are being prepared, why is Leiden, Haarlem, or indeed The Hague itself not conceded?

Is the purpose that captives may be handed over to the Spaniards?

The eighteenth argument. The excessive contention for proclaiming a synod is pressed with great prejudice to the provinces which think otherwise. For why do a part of the Hollanders and Zeelanders prescribe law? Why do magistrates reduce the Arminians to order? Why do they disarm the other provinces as though conquered and enslaved by secret contrivances and then oppress them with garrisons? The cause of all these things is religion, for whose liberty the Arminians think that they fought and now pay the gravest exactions--not so that they may consult their consciences, but so that they may subscribe to the most abominable insanities of the Borborites and Manichaeans. Thus, after so many insults, are they also to be condemned by a public decree of the synod, although they are the more learned and honorable part of Holland and Belgium? Who can doubt that patience so unworthily injured will pass into fury and that arms will then be ready at hand?

The nineteenth argument. Gomarism cannot be introduced without arms. The cities, therefore, must be strengthened by a garrison so that they may comply with the opinions of the Rigid; or, if they refuse to believe, they must be encircled by a siege. And in this manner, when swords have been turned against one another's entrails, they will hand over the half-dead fatherland to those from whose rule, by fleeing, they fell into the most wretched servitude under the appearance of liberty. For what appearance will that fatherland possess in which one sect rules and the rest are oppressed? Or how will those fight for altars and hearths, for religion, who are compelled to serve on account of religion? Who, for this cause alone--that they do not believe in Rigid Zwinglianism--are cast down from their dignity with the mark of infamy and plead their cause in chains among enemies?

Some hope now remains, and therefore extreme measures have not yet been attempted. But if synodal violence drives to despair those who refuse to be more insane than the Borborites and Manichaeans, they will not be able to restrain themselves from preferring anything whatever to acceding to those horrid opinions. But if at the same time the truce is dissolved, with what concord will they be able to resist?

The twentieth argument. The Arminians have already predicted beforehand what the decree of the synod will be, and the preparatory synods now show it: namely, that the Arminians are to be condemned and the Gomarists approved. Thus there is no need for so laborious and expensive a convocation when the execution of the synodal judgment is already in force before the synod. For to this end the Arminians have been accused in the fatherland and before the tribunal of Great Britain; garrisons have been imposed upon Arminian cities; Arminian magistrates reduced to order; preachers restrained and driven away; and churches restored to the Gomarists. Since these measures vehemently offend their spirits, if those same things are approved by the public judgment of a National Synod, all who lose their cause will learn by this matter that the people of Amsterdam and the other Rigid seek dominion.

The synod, therefore, will stir up disturbances and tumults. For it will render unequal those who are equal by right and who hitherto were equal in appearance, which has never been done among a free people without a great commotion and never will be.

The twenty-first argument. Vengeance will be sought by the Rigid; for those who judge themselves gravely injured and fear that they will be affected by greater disadvantages rage more savagely when they have obtained power and authority. But the Rigid complain in court concerning the greatest injuries of the Mild and compose entire books about them. Therefore no one can hope that, in an anger which they judge most just, they will be so slow as not to employ the aid of the synod, when before the synod they have done everything hostile. The Hague Letter, which sets forth the condition of Holland, was printed at Cologne. Its beginning is: “On the fourteenth day of June, Count William arrived here from Friesland on the second passage.”

Nor can it be hoped that the victorious Rigid will be gentler than the Mild were. For they are by nature fiercer, and by the decrees of their sect they are incited to cruelty, which they even attribute to God. Pain and anger are added, because they judge that they have suffered injury. Finally, those through whom they conquered--that is, the rigid ministers--will have to be obeyed.

The twenty-second argument. Not even consideration of expense permits a synod. First, there must be many participants, otherwise authority will be absent; for since all have hitherto been equal, the conventicle of a few will not be able to prejudge the rest. Next, the leaders of the preachers are summoned from France, England, and Germany, for without them they judge the decrees insufficiently firm; therefore the expenses must increase with the numerous army of guests. Third, the ministers will not assemble alone; they must draw along their households and wives. For since they lack the gift of chastity, why should they be driven to synodal celibacy? Thus in the first session they will enact a decree concerning bringing or retaining their households. Fourth, the synod will be long-lasting, for they enumerate more than fifty disputed articles; and since hitherto they have not defined even one in a decade, they will expend many years upon so many.

Let there therefore be five hundred Arminian ministers and as many Gomarists, and two hundred foreigners--in all, 1,200. Let there be eight hundred politicians and delegates of the Provinces, for they too will state their opinion, lest the ministers prevail. But I prefer to posit fewer; let there indeed be three hundred. Thus let the entire synodal number be 1,500. Add as many wives, servants and maidservants, sons and daughters, and you will easily find eight or nine thousand. Provision must be made for their lodging, food, and clothing. But let us contract the number so that the ministers with their households make only four thousand. Nevertheless, they will burden the fatherland with great expense, and it will be easier to feed ten thousand armed infantrymen than to furnish the delicacies of the ministers--especially the foreigners--and their wives. A soldier's food passes by an easy route of supply; those doctors clothed in silk and accustomed to delights demand other dishes. Nor is it fitting for the synodal delegates and leading spearmen of all the ministers to be chastened by excessive frugality.

No one who has considered their accounts more deeply will doubt that this expense is burdensome to the federated provinces, for all things have hitherto been disordered. Barnevelt's Apology teaches this. He reports that, when he himself was summoned to the office of advocate, the Colleges of the Great and Provincial Council, the prefects of accounts, and the magistrates of The Hague were so disposed toward the Estates that by voice and writings they called into doubt whether so much authority still remained to the Estates of Holland and West Friesland that they could execute the imposed taxes and contributions. He adds that for a loan it was necessary to pay twelve annually in place of interest and two for brokerage. The burdens were far greater than the revenues. How much greater they were he teaches on page 14:

“From the time when the King of France made peace with the British King and thereafter with the Spaniard and the Archdukes, during the last nine years of the war the burdens of debts and expenses had increased so that they exceeded the entire amount of taxes and contributions--even though these had been increased by no small amount--by twenty-six million florins. The last two years too had passed with very little glory and great loss, and indeed fear of greater danger remained--although two expeditions of the enemy had meanwhile been removed by vigilant zeal--because during the same time foreign subsidies were both less certain and joined with a greater burden to the fatherland than they had been before; and because, as such great burdens took increase, the condition of the whole fatherland appeared likely finally to be reduced to despair, just as the senators and prefects of accounts had warned three years earlier.”

Behold, so great were the burdens. Now in peace they have been increased by the cities sitting in deliberation concerning the convocation of a synod. While some threaten the liberty of others, others endeavor to protect and defend their own liberty and religion by civil arms. Meanwhile even those cities which now enroll soldiers lest they be compelled to consent to convoking a synod will be induced with much greater difficulty to furnish expenses. For they will permit the contentions of the preachers much more patiently than pay money. Lest a war of preachers be waged, war is waged in the state; and nevertheless there are those who think that the cities will not contribute money so that the preachers can contend, when they are endeavoring with all their resources to quiet their conflicts.

The twenty-third argument. There are certain wounds which do not bear wind and air; likewise these evils of the state, when exposed, reject medicine. That true synod will not only make them notorious but also known by supreme right and publicly. When this has been done, shame concerning wickedness is lost. The most cunning old man Oldenbarnevelt rightly recognized this, for he always endeavored to conceal those discords. He says on page 27 of his Apology:

"I grieved from my heart over the dissensions which arose between the Remonstrants and Contra-Remonstrants. I always labored in every way lest they spread abroad or break out in public. I first procured that, under the presidency of different ecclesiastical persons, the cause of Arminius be examined within private walls. To this end the business was conducted in the house of the late Lord of Noordwijk as senior curator of the University of Leiden; and afterward the business was instituted in the supreme Council between Gomarus and Arminius, with ministers of different churches from each party presiding. I accepted or rejected neither of the opinions, since I understood--in conformity with the exceedingly wise instruction and repeated writing of the King of England--that each opinion could be tolerated without prejudice to truth, in Christian charity and union. I shall also take care not to indicate who are the authors of these tragedies.

"But I judge that the evil broke forth especially from a certain synodal Decree by which the professors of Theology at Leiden and all the Preachers were instructed to attend in the fear of God to those things contained in the Belgic Confession and the Heidelberg Catechism, and, if they doubted anything anywhere, for each to send it, set down in writing, to their Classes. The cause of this decree was furnished by all the earlier ecclesiastical differences and controversies which had taken their origin from Caspar Coolhaes, H. Herberts, Taco Sybrandts, Cornelius Wiggers, and several others concerning the understanding, sense, and varying interpretation of certain points contained in the two aforementioned writings--especially Divine Predestination--and because for this reason in 1597 Your Most Illustrious and Powerful Lordships understood that the Confession was to be reviewed and corrected in a synodal congregation. For after your Commissioners had informed you of the aforementioned synodal Decree, you judged that it was not expedient for the doubts of the Professors and Preachers to be handed over to their respective Classes, fearing lest in this way an enormous flame of dissension be kindled among the theologizers."

From this it is most manifest that both the Estates and Barnevelt acted so as to cover those disgraceful matters. Therefore, for them now to be opened more deeply and displayed is contrary to the public advantage.

The twenty-fourth argument. Not only controversies and errors but the crimes of the ministers themselves will be bandied about through the mouths of men. Let Grevinckhoven and Adrian Smout be an example: either they are such as they describe one another--that is, the wickedest of all bipeds--or they are not such, and thus each must be the worst of all calumniators. But whom will we be able to summon to the synod about whom more atrocious things are not said? What else will that synod be than τῶν κεχηνότων ἀγορά, that is, an assembly of men of whom the province should deservedly be ashamed?

The twenty-fifth argument. The outcome of the synodal disputation is doubtful or certain. If what is to be defined has certainly been predefined, if the judgments of the judges have been anticipated, the Calvinist world is disturbed within itself in vain. If it is uncertain, why do they not fear that judgment may be pronounced against the Rigid, the people of Amsterdam, and the most excellent Prince of Orange? If that should occur, who does not perceive that his authority will be cast down and that the magnanimous man will by no means endure the insult?

The twenty-sixth argument. When the synod has been happily completed, judgments, writings, and defamatory pamphlets against both the matter and the persons will immediately be brought forward. Everyone will disapprove something in it, many many things, and some everything. The anger of the parties will thus be inflamed. If free voices are suppressed, they will bite more venomously from concealment. The examples are in Germany, which after all the colloquies of the Lutherans among themselves and of those same men with the Calvinists was assailed by a new paroxysm and renewed the war.

The twenty-seventh argument. According to their laws, the norm of disputing is the Bible, but none is authentic except the Hebrew in the Old Testament and the Greek in the New. The other versions possess human authority, as they think. Therefore only the Hebrew and Greek languages must be employed in that synod, and everything must be examined according to that norm. But whence among them are there so many Hebraists and Hellenists--so many, I say, most learned men to whom it is certainly established that they understand those languages so thoroughly that they know an error of interpretation to be absent from themselves?

The twenty-eighth argument. Nevertheless, let us establish that in the Belgian nation there are so many most learned in Hebrew and Greek. Yet who will persuade us and others that they are true interpreters of an unknown text? For whatever is transacted, their words will not be authentic for us.

The twenty-ninth argument. Indeed, some of them, such as Calvin and Vorstius, have discovered errors and lies in the Hebrew Bible itself, so that when this foundation is undermined, the whole mass will fall.

The thirtieth argument. Men will come from France, such as Sharp, who denies that the laws of magistrates pertain to consciences. Men will come from England who will restore bishops--that is, as the Puritans judge, build the criminal ladder of Antichrist. The Belgians will call these things monsters.

The thirty-first argument. If it pleases that synodal delegates be released from the oath by which they are bound to their opinions, the same right must be granted to all ministers; otherwise they will not be bound to obey the synod. It must be feared, however, that this matter may reach the soldiers and even the Magistrates.

The thirty-second argument. Although the States General and the princes labor to constitute the synod, nothing will ever be accomplished when the preachers are unwilling. Our countrymen rightly say that it is difficult to hunt with unwilling dogs. But the synod is instituted against the will of all the Arminians--that is, one half, and indeed the more learned half. They will come unwillingly and therefore, delaying, will contrive everything so that they may depart with the matter unfinished. And how easy this is! They will dispute concerning the conditions and laws, make exceptions, and protest. If an answer to questions is sought, they will ask for delays again and again. Some will allege their health, others their occupations; many will say that on account of weddings they cannot dispute, as Grevinckhoven reports to have happened. The sum is this: there cannot be a synod where one half does not wish there to be a synod. Violence will perhaps be applied, and they will be compelled to attend. They will not be able to repel force, but that presence will be useless; for they cannot be driven to dispute and answer unless willing and eager. Therefore there can be no synod and no concord from it.

CHAPTER XL

The Form of a Council Assembled to Make Peace Must Be Taken from the Ancient Custom of the Church

I have taught that a council is useful for beginning and establishing peace, nor do the adversaries oppose this. I have also demonstrated in another book that a council of heretics cannot be assembled and held with advantage; and, if they judge my arguments insufficiently firm, behold: let words and the discourses of writers cease; let them furnish the thing itself. Here is Rhodes; here let them jump. Let them assemble a Calvinist-Lutheran or Rigid-Mild synod and κατὰ βίον refute me by experience. But if they cannot assemble a general one, let them at least assemble a national one. Until they have done so, we shall deny that it can be done, and not without cause, because they say that they desire it and acknowledge this to be the most advantageous way, while they reject other ways, as I showed above from the writing of the Hollanders.

If, therefore, there is need of a council, and one cannot be assembled from novice doctors, why do we hesitate to adopt the ancient councils and their form and authority, lest we be deprived of so great an advantage--which we confess on both sides--and of peace itself? Has heresy been able to engender in anyone's mind so great a hatred of holy and orthodox antiquity that he will not consent to receive even remedies and benefits from it? Or do we not know that those sick persons are most desperate who are obstinate against remedies and judge the hands of those who sincerely heal them to be hostile? Far from a Christian breast be such hardness that it refuses peace; far from it be such blindness that it closes against itself beforehand the approach by which peace is to be entered.

What then? Will you persuade me to accept the Council of Trent through these circumlocutions? I indeed should wish to do so, but I fear that I shall not persuade you--not because the truth which that Council illustrated is destitute of its own testimony, but because, through hatred of the persons, you will not easily receive the truth from them; for the wounds which the sycophants, the calumniators of the Council, inflicted have not yet been healed. And so I indeed formerly granted you release from that Council; perhaps, if you come to know it thus of your own accord, you will embrace it.

It seems to me that in this conflict and vaunting of religions there occurs what occurs in medicine. For very many persons, out of disgust for old remedies and a vain hope of better ones, hear with the greatest eagerness mountebanks and wandering impostors, and sometimes, induced by promises, entrust life and health to them. And while they marvel at new things as true, they suffer loss of property and health. When, at their own peril and to the mockery of others, they perceive that they have given another's rashness the power to test its art upon their own body, they return to the old physicians, the Hippocratics and Galenists; for they prefer to use approved remedies without danger rather than again to make trial of new and uncertain ones.

For a long time now the peddlers of novelties have, by their outcries, called away a great part of mankind from the ancient healing of souls and from the customary nourishment. Luther calls in one direction, Calvin in another; and among the parties of Luther's sect there are manifold callers: Osiander, Major, Flacius, the Ubiquitarians, the rest, the Anomians, the Anabaptists--and these are not all of one stamp, although all call, and call to evil. On Calvin's side there are the Mild and the Rigid, the Libertines, the Anglo-Papists, and the Puritans. All promise salvation, life, health, and mountains of felicities--and that without labor--more shamelessly than all wandering impostors; but credulous and frivolous men discover too late that they are false. For most, nothing is lacking for a return except shame at recognizing and uncovering their wounds. They not only see but also touch with their hands that everything is changed day by day. Why, therefore, do they not consult the old remedies, or at least deign to look at them? Why do they follow novelties condemned by their own authors?

Let there therefore be a general council such as even the adversaries concede the first councils to have been and such as we teach the following ones to have been. Namely, in it let the orthodox sit as judges--those who already possess the faith and who have long prescription against those who introduce unaccustomed dogmas. For novelty must be proved; it must not judge antiquity. It is a matter of undoubted law that a possessor enjoys his privilege and is not driven to proof, although councils also perform this: they vindicate the possession of the ancient faith against profane novelties. For why should Arius sit as judge at Nicaea, or Eutyches, Nestorius, and others in the succeeding councils? Why at this time should Libertines, Arians, Socinians, and Anabaptists have the same right, number, and merit for pronouncing opinions? Will those men assemble in the Holy Spirit who attack the Holy Spirit with the whole panoply of hell?

Second. Let there be in the Council neither a part of the Church nor a body without a head, but let the whole Church be represented in its senate. Let neither a part conspire against the whole, nor a cause be judged without the bishop of the primary see--a thing Augustine formerly recognized as unlawful and wrote at length to the pontiff Melchiades.

Third. Let the Council define, not what must be believed anew, nor let it define new articles, but let it explain the old ones more clearly, hand down the sense of Scripture, and make certain that concerning which there is doubt. For this is its office: to meet novelties and confirm ancient things.

Fourth. In matters which pertain to faith, let the Council possess a vote which no one is permitted to resist, and let him who proudly refuses to obey the command of the priests be considered, for that very reason, outside the Church.

Fifth. Let councils be free, neither dishonored by the violence of princes nor enslaved and subject to magistrates, so that not only may opinions be free and the secular power not prescribe what must be said, but also no punishment for liberty may be feared, nor may such control reside with princes that the substance of the matter finally falls back upon their decision.

Sixth. Let the causes of the accused be examined prudently, gently, with charity and sincerity; nor in any way let one whose heresy is known sit as judge, for he must receive the sentence as one to be judged.

Seventh. Let it defend the decrees of all preceding general and approved councils.

Eighth. Let the holy customs of prayers, fasts, and penance be observed according to the received practice.

No other procedure for councils can be entered upon. For if, as Pareus does in his own council, we admit all heresies to judge, I do not see what appearance of a council we retain, since we place all the accused upon the tribunal and allow neither authority to the judgment nor truth to the sentences.

CHAPTER XLI

There Are Weighty Reasons Why Catholics, but Not the Adversaries, Approve a Council

We have frequently heard them appeal to a free, pious, general council. That in reality they do not desire a council is manifest from many things; for us, on the contrary, a council is desirable.

The Calvinists and the rest of the sectarians, most talkative in corners, will necessarily become mute in the public light and in a universal assembly; and, hating the light, they will hide themselves in their dens. For they will not be able to defend their teachings if they speak openly, nor in so great an assembly of learned men will there be opportunity to envelop their errors in their customary obscurities and ambiguous labyrinths of words. Hitherto they have vigorously done this in the Colloquy of Worms and elsewhere--so much so that even Calvin himself found intolerable the cunning of Bucer and Melanchthon in devising deceptive articles. But how remarkably the Calvinists deceived their disciples in France I showed in the book On the Synod and Union of the Evangelicals. For the principal man, Baron Clervant, thought that his own people and the Lutherans disagreed in only one article; and Pareus himself professes this--how glaring a lie it is I taught in the preceding book.

What hope, therefore, do those men have in a council who did not dare to disclose openly, even among their own initiates, all the mysteries of their idol? Those who fear to make the disciples acquainted with their doctrine must necessarily flee the judgment of all. Our doctrine not only shines in the clear light of the whole Christian world, but was known to the ancient Church. It spreads the rays of its light toward East and West, and, because it possesses nothing shameful, no part of it is concealed.

Those who never satisfied any particular council will not be able to hope for victory or to prove their doctrine to a general, pious, free council. The Rigid Calvinists do not persuade even their own colleagues, fellow initiates, and brethren of their horrid opinion; much less will they establish before a general, pious, and free synod that this opinion is the mind of the Holy Spirit, when they must plead their cause burdened by the adverse judgment of their brethren and be examined whether they are Manichaeans and Borborites. For the Mild judge that the madness of the Rigid not only equals but surpasses that of these men.

The same reasoning applies to the Lutheran parties and their subdivisions. The Ubiquitarians will come apart, the Flacians in another party, then the Majorists and Osiandrians; and, marked by the prior condemnation and disgrace pronounced by their own fellow citizens, they will understand themselves condemned at the mere sight of the assembly. For they will see no judge favoring them except, from their own small number, a Ubiquitarian, a Flacian, a Majorist, or an Osiandrian.

The Landgrave of Hesse did not dissemble the dissension of his own people coming from the whole world in the year 1546, at Speyer, in a conference with Emperor Charles. “For my part,” he says, “I place no great hope in a council. But I judge that an assembly of the province of Germany will not be useless. For the other peoples still dissent excessively from us in opinions and dogma. In Germany, however, matters have been so arranged and have come to such a point that they cannot be changed. Nothing, therefore, is more preferable or more excellent than that you permit free religion in it, yet so that all cultivate peace.” He afterwards repeats the same thing before Granvelle and confesses entirely candidly, as became a prince, that because Italians, Frenchmen, and Spaniards dissent so greatly from the dogma of the Germans, there would be no great use for a general council--or, as they call it, an ecumenical one.

What advantage, therefore, will there now be for the benefit of any particular sect, when not only the Catholic universality and agreement with constant truth stands opposed to every petty sect, but ten other sects, more powerful or not much inferior, assail it with the greatest hostility?

We desire a council because we judge that by its judgment not only must the integrity of the ancient religion be restored, but also, when the occasion furnished by religion has been removed, we hope that restitution will be made, at least in part. For the Catholics are the plaintiffs; they prosecute the adversaries for the recovery of property. If the cause is decided by a council, nothing will bring greater difficulty than restoring things obtained, possessed, and squandered without any right. It is therefore not difficult to estimate who fear judgment and who place protection in it. And if the acts are read, we shall discover whose calamities demanded execution and justice, and whose rapacity exacted adjournment, delay, and finally the abolition of the actions brought, by entreaties, arguments, threats, and arms.

Let us make it be as they themselves wish: let the council be general, pious, and free--but general with Genevan generality, pious with Zwinglian piety, free with Libertine liberty. Let it, I say, be a council composed of the prefects of the Calvinists, who have borne all the labors and reproaches of the Genevan mitre. Let whatever has hitherto been condemned in Calvin be holy. Not even this council is to be feared by us for any cause except love of the truth.

For if they conquer, if the truth stands with them, our condition will not be worse than theirs; indeed, if we regard the advantages of life, it will be much better than that which we now enjoy. For now we serve God with fear and trembling, uncertain of our perseverance, yet we place certain hope in the divine good pleasure. But if we are transferred to them, all anxiety, doubt, and sorrow, carried far away into the Cretan sea with swift south winds, will depart. A new confidence will render us most blessed, most secure, and most immune from all punishments after this life. We shall live for a time happy in our error, and neither fear of death, nor of divine judgment, nor of hell will touch us even lightly. How many whom fear now holds to their duty, after the barriers have been broken, will rush into every crime? And, to prove themselves true Calvinists, amid robberies, murders, and lusts they will exclaim: “I know that I am just, that I cannot lose justice, that I am free from damnation. No, no crimes prohibit me from heaven.”

Others will congratulate themselves that they are exempt from the trouble of confession, fasting, celibacy, almsgiving, and all works. For why should they do good works--that is, mortal sins? Then why should they fear sins, when both their guilt and their punishment are removed if before God they say in their heart: “I am just; I cannot lose justice”? Indeed, before they say these things they have been made just, because they once believed; as though they had fortified the soul with an impenetrable ἀλεξιφαρμάκῳ, so that they may drink down all the poisons of vices without harm.

This doctrine, so pleasing to the flesh, so flattering to atheists, so enticing to every vice, a council pious in the Calvinistic manner will propose. If we are Antichristians, if we are covered with every crime--as they accuse us before the inexperienced--it is fitting for us to embrace it with the greatest readiness. For why would we not hear doctors who so flatter our desires? If we seek delights, why do we not fly to heaven through pleasures themselves, and indeed without fear of wandering? What holds us back from passing over into this sect? This alone: because it is contrary to truth and ruinous to morals. Accordingly, for us a council is to be desired whichever way the judgment falls, and is to be feared for no cause. If we conquer, deservedly we shall render the greatest and most submissive thanks for the sincerity of the faith preserved in us by divine virtue amid these disputes. If we are conquered, there will be no “Woe to the conquered!” as that man cried. For what will the conquerors command the conquered? “Live securely; indulge wantonly upon the rose; believe that you cannot perish.” Would that there were not many who preferred thus to be conquered rather than to conquer, since even now many are conquered by enticements because they wish it.

There is therefore no cause why we should fear even a general council wholly and purely Calvinistic. Its synodal decree will not be of the kind which the austere fathers at Nicaea or Ephesus, bearing the marks of Christ upon their bodies, issued, but of the kind which some Aristippus from the gardens of Epicurus would dictate with his neck thrown back and a languid voice. Although I do not believe that those delicate and polished men--ὦ μακαρίους ἐπιβάτας [O blessed passengers!]--will expend so much labor as to write new canons; rather, they will approve those which have already been written. They possess a book of Ottmar Casmann with a most delightful title that flatters them, for it is inscribed THE CUSHION OF CHRISTIAN SECURITY. By the best right and deservedly so. For it commands for all Christians a supreme security of beatitude, which no good works assist and no crimes diminish. Supported by this cushion, they will dismiss all from the Council. Nor will they say the accustomed, "Go in peace," but, "Sleep securely upon this cushion."

Those who acknowledge no advantage in a council, or one so slight and diluted that it does not answer to the labor and expenses, cannot prudently desire a council. Matthias Hoe, the Electoral chief court-preacher, proposes this question and judges councils empty. For he judges both that prejudice is brought against Scripture and that the Calvinists are unwilling to submit themselves to the opinion of the synod or to be bound by its decrees, but desire to discharge their office with the same liberty of teaching as before. Hence he reasons rightly according to his own position: "If, therefore, they refuse to be instructed and taught, what need is there of a council?" Plainly, if a council can err no less than individuals, an exception will not be lacking. For all authority is evanescent if it is not accommodated to the Calvinistic analogy of faith. We, however, attribute infallible authority to general councils; they therefore profit us.

All general councils hitherto have gone well for us and according to our heart's desire. For our doctrine has been condemned by no council; in all controversies judgment has been pronounced for us. The adversaries have lost their cause by the prejudgment of all councils. Not without reason, therefore, having been struck so often in the ancient heresiarchs, do they labor to avoid that battle line of judgments and shudder at synods as at infamous reefs where they perceive the spoils from the shipwreck of their ancestors floating. Whatever, therefore, they allege about councils to be convoked is empty; for they seek nothing other than an escape and an opportunity for corrupting the minds of the peoples. If they demand a new council sincerely, why do they despise the old ones?

They are indeed accustomed boldly to object to us that we flee from a pious and free council lest our errors, abuses, and scandals be disclosed. In this manner, to be sure, these acute men judge that they will be free of blame if they anticipate the accusation and divert their own evils onto others. For as to what they calumniate concerning errors, we are conscious of no error; and we approach this part of the cause not only securely but even joyfully, destined to emerge victors without blood and dust. For the things which they impute to us as errors are the dogmas of the holy Martyrs, of the Bishops who once flourished in the Churches and presided over councils, and of the Apostles themselves. We shall therefore stand among these accused men and hear judgment concerning those most ancient masters of ours. Indeed, if the matter is conducted according to the opinion of the adversaries, the whole Christian world will stand accused before a few men.

"It offends very many," says Calvin in On Scandals, "that they see almost the whole world opposed to us. Nor indeed do the patrons of a bad cause lack the means to strike the unlearned and weak with a device of this kind: that it is exceedingly absurd for faith to be accorded to a few men while almost the whole Christian world is disregarded. But especially, in order to crush us, they arm themselves with the sacred title of the Church as though with a hammer."

He knows Catholics well. Thus plainly do we object, and we persevere in saying it. Nor are we moved by the example which he adduces against us, when he compares himself and his people to the household of Noah. "As far as we are concerned," he says, "if Noah alone by his faith condemned all the men of his age, there is no reason why the great multitude of unbelievers should move us from our position." But he has not yet proved himself Noah; he has not yet constructed an ark from which he may consign the whole Christian world, as a multitude of unbelievers, to the flood--although the present multitude of Christians, which does not now conduct its life according to Calvin's laws, seems to him entirely born for destruction. Does he also involve those who formerly completed their lives in the same deluge? The errors, therefore, which they calumniously and most malevolently impose upon us belong to the whole world insofar as it is Christian, as our New Noah himself has proclaimed.

I, however, judge even Calvin's errors and blasphemies intolerable: that the branded Calvin should sit upon the tribunal; that Beza, infamous for his deeds and verses, should sit beside him; that Cyprian, Augustine, Basil, Nazianzen, and the whole nation of the chief men of the ancient Church should stand befouled; and that they should tremble before the faces of Sodomitic judges, be compelled to a recantation, and be condemned for idolatry and grave errors. Yet if these things should occur with the condition of affairs inverted, it is far more excellent for us to lie in the rank of the most innocent accused than to be partners in such unjust judgments. Therefore that disclosure of our errors in a council is not to be feared.

The adversaries, however, have nowhere to turn except to this refuge of obstinacy: that, as Noah formerly did, they by their own faith condemn the flock of unbelieving Pontificians, Fathers, and Martyrs. For although they do not openly and expressly condemn the Martyrs, nevertheless, since they condemn their faith in us and persecute it by writings, sword, and fire, their judgment concerning the masters is no milder than concerning the disciples.

As for abuses and scandals, there is no reason for us to fear a council, since no one approves abuses and scandals, even those who are a scandal. Indeed, all the orthodox implore the severity of a council in removing scandals; and by the Council of Trent, wherever its observance is in force, almost all scandals have been removed. Scandals possess very great power, but among the unlearned and weak. The rest know that Christ foretold that there would be scandals in the Church; therefore they do not withdraw from the Church on account of scandals which they learned would exist in the Church. We therefore excuse no abuse, no scandal.

Yet if you desire to see enormous scandals that have sprung from the doctrine itself, approach the Calvinists. You will discover that the axioms of the Libertines are consequences of their doctrine; you will discover morals such as those of the Manichaeans and Borborites, and, by Calvin's own testimony, scarcely every tenth man sincere. Formerly false teachers turned very many away from the truth of the faith by declaiming tragically against the vices of the clergy, and the life of certain men gave them occasion. But suddenly that accusation slipped from their hands, when among the Calvinists more numerous, greater, and more atrocious crimes were admitted from the faith itself, without fear of losing justice or incurring damnation.

Calvin, therefore, considering these things, wrote a book On Scandals, in which he pleads the cause of the crimes and shows that they always adhere to the Gospel. But let us see what scandals he himself acknowledges among his own people. Let us place before those about to enter Calvinism the mass of scandals from its own author.

First, when the profession of the Gospel reigned far and wide in Germany, he says that he feared for this triumphant Gospel because it was exalting his people to insolence. He then continues: “Unless the Lord had seasonably met profane license, the disease would in the course of time have been almost incurable. Doctrine and pious admonitions would have possessed no authority. Those who had not yet endured the admission of moderate discipline would have broken every yoke with a violent charge, just like untamed beasts.” Calvin therefore thinks most contemptibly of the Gospel and the Evangelicals: namely, that unless they are constrained by fear and punishments, they will be untamed beasts.

Behold: what deeds of the Evangelicals do you suppose he had perceived, from which the man who begot them, who is merciful toward his own blood, conjectures so atrociously about their future? Of what kind were those crimes of men which, unless compelled by punishments they had abandoned them, would by now have passed into the manners and disposition of untamed beasts? And do you here press upon me the scandals of Catholics, you whom the fear of the sword alone separates from beasts, who owe it to the enemy and executioner that you have not yet put off human nature through crimes?

Second, he confesses that seditions were excited by the Gospel, although he makes a cause possessing the appearance of justice for the scandal: “As soon as the doctrine of the Gospel began to be published, as though from an opened spring, the impiety of many who formerly seemed religious burst forth.” He denies that the Gospel is the cause, and I believe him. But who would deny that the doctrine which I proposed above from him is the cause? What wonder is it that the life of those beneath whom the cushion of security is placed when they sin is most licentious?

Then, after he had said truly and severely, “But this is more than sacrilegious impiety, to abuse the Gospel as a pretext for crimes,” he adds: “I speak of the now-common artifice by which perfidious and worthless men insinuate themselves in order to deceive, defraud, and harm in every way.” He speaks, however, about his own ministers, who extol the dignity of the ministry with swollen cheeks, while he himself marvels at the patience of the common people because women and children do not cover them with mud and dung. Thus even then Calvin's haughtiness was compelled to bear such associates in preaching, men so incautiously disgraceful. He complains that some of them, through hatred of virtues, readily indulge equally their own vices and those of others.

And these scandals arise from the very fountains and chief standard-bearers of Calvinism. But what of the people? Are those people, contemptuous of their preachers, better? Speak, Calvin; speak, I pray you.

“The people, however, in order to return the favor, love, embrace, and cherish them alone; and, in order to possess patrons for their own offenses, protect them by their patronage.” Is there too little scandal where wicked teachers alone are loved by the people so that they may have patrons for their vices? Thus, surely, would the Sodomites and Gomorrheans, thus the Lemnians--who by the enormity of their crimes furnished material for a proverb--embrace teachers of wickedness, if they were living. Recognize, reader, why the Calvinistic people hate Catholic teachers: because they love only the patrons of crimes.

Perhaps you desire to know specifically the heroic deeds--or deeds more distinguished than heroic--which these preaching birds perform. I shall give them from Calvin:

“Some, after being kindly received into hospitality, depart secretly either burdened with stolen goods or defraud their hosts in other ways; or they solicit maidservants to fornication and sometimes even dare to attempt wives. Others, marvelous artificers at ensnaring, leave stripped bare those to whom they promised mountains of gold. Some deceive in a loan; others deny a deposit. Some are perfidious in partnership. Some consume in whoring, gaming, or other prodigal luxuries the money which they took from good and thrifty men in the name of alms. Others boldly gorge themselves in idleness upon what had been given as a loan to aid their industry. And some have their wives as associates in these crimes. Others do not hesitate to violate the sacrosanct bond of marriage, with their wives deceived and their children cast off. There are more examples of crimes of this kind than a brief catalogue would suffice to recount.”

I certainly believe that there are very many more in that catalogue which God, the most exact knower, has recorded. Yet above all is this: that such men alone are loved by the people, held in their embrace, cherished, and defended by their patronage, so that in turn they may be patrons of vices. But even this is surpassed by another crime: for when they have done all these things, they believe with the most certain, most infallible confidence that they are just and cannot fall away from this faith and certainty of justice--a thing which I believe neither the Sodomites nor the remaining Canaanites believed. Now go and collect scattered scandals of the ancient Church; meditate upon an accusation in the Council.

What account, finally, will they render to a council of the daily trafficking in the Gospel and of their inconstancy depicted as though upon a tablet? What recently was the word of the Holy Spirit in Germany is now the enchantment of Satan. Sacred things are changed from day to day in a day, and religion is momentary according to the will of princes. They say that they believe nothing except what is expressed in the Scriptures, and from day to day they believe now one way, now another. Individuals are authors of their own credulity and inventors of their own opinion, and are therefore unstable.

Concerning the Germans Calvin says in the book On Scandals: “All were magnificently vaunting the Gospel under cover”--in Germany before the war. “In many places criminal hypocrites held the first positions.” Does he mean the Saxon, the Hessian, the Württemberger? “But after the defeat received first at the Danube and then at the Elbe, certain princes of great name, nobles, and states, thunderstruck by some fear or other, immediately lost heart and voluntarily collapsed.”

That accusation is forged against the Landgrave, the Württemberger, the people of Ulm, Strasbourg, and Frankfurt, and other cities which Melanchthon affirms were betrayed by cowardly princes. “Here an effeminate softness more than effeminate--indeed, perfidious cowardice--plainly betrayed itself. Within two years we saw more impious and sacrilegious defections from Christ in one nation than the histories of all times and nations recount.” But those were praiseworthy returns and conversions of many to the Catholic faith; afterward followed more defections to Calvinism and other sects.

If I speak falsely, let them show not one state, I do not say, or one city, or one petty church, but one soul which agrees in all things with the original Augsburg Confession. They will produce none. For it belongs to heresies never to stand, always to rush headlong, and to be broken by their own impetus and divided into new sects, until not only all religion but even the name of religion vanishes.

I have brought forward some examples of controversies in the book On the Peace of Germany--a few concerning many. I also summoned witnesses of every kind: a few from the universality of Christianity, but men from whom orthodox agreement is established; indeed, so many that, if anyone demands more for a general council, holier men for a pious council, or more constant and learned men for a free council, he would seem to need a physician, not a teacher.

Yet I do not abandon a cause so good, so evidently victorious, so unconquered in the judgment of the adversaries; again and again I press it upon them. They are ashamed of their small number. For when I proceed against them, I proceed separately against a fragment of some sect. What, for example, can that Ubiquitarian, Majorist, Osiandrian, or Illyrican fragment accomplish against so many hundreds of legions, by whom truth fights, conquers, and triumphs? For what protection can exist in the camp of deserters against so many strong armies and defenders of a good cause? What will spurious novelty be able to plead against the antiquity of legitimate right and possession? I know the ancient response of your patriarchs, O Innovator: that you conquer by Scripture.

But that evasion accomplishes nothing and affords no escape. It would possess an appearance of truth if you could conspire for some period of time in one interpretation; now falsehood has lost not only the thing but even its shadow, after by unstable rotation it changed approved doctrines and founded new ones. Tell me, I pray you: by what faculty, amid so many opinions of those reading, translating, and interpreting, do you understand these things? From what petty sect do you plaster over your error?

You will answer as Honoratus did to Augustine: “When I read, I came to know it by myself.” I shall not answer you as Augustine answered Honoratus. But since you wish it thus, enjoy your judgment concerning yourself. Certainly you ought not to be angry with me if I do not believe you, if I do not prefer you to so many thousands. For what you cry from one corner alone, all the sects on the opposite side profess concerning themselves. They also did so formerly. Vincent of Lérins is witness in chapter 37 of the book On the Profane Novelties of Heretics:

“But if anyone were to ask one of the heretics who persuades himself of such things, ‘Whence do you prove, whence do you teach, that I ought to abandon the universal and ancient faith of the Catholic Church?’ he immediately answers: ‘For it is written.’ And at once he prepares a thousand testimonies, a thousand examples, a thousand authorities from the Law, from the Psalms, from the Apostles, from the Prophets, by which, interpreted in a new and evil manner, the unhappy soul may be cast headlong from the Catholic citadel into the abyss of heresy.”

Therefore with an easy effort I cast you down from this position upon which you stand securely.

For even if I should believe, or at least not refute, that you alone perceive the sense of Scripture rightly and that all others are deceived, what will you say about Scripture itself? Before you had yet read it by yourself, did you know that what you were about to read was sacred? Or, as you read the several things, was it revealed to you concerning each one--even those which are difficult--that the several things you read were divine? No authority moves you to interpret the Gospels; you rely upon your knowledge alone. Yet some authority must necessarily move you to believe that this book is the Gospel.

"I, however," says Augustine, "would not believe the Gospel unless the authority of the Catholic Church moved me. Why, therefore, should I not obey those whom I obeyed when they said, 'Believe the Gospel,' when they say, 'Do not believe Mani'?" To Calvin: "If you hold to the Gospel, let me hold to those at whose command I believed the Gospel."

And so at the beginning Scripture is believed solely by the title of tradition and then under the protection of custom, without any instrument of Scripture. Who, therefore, possesses such audacity that he announces anything beyond what has been announced in the Church? Or such levity that he receives anything beyond what he has received from the Church? What a profession: "I understood it by myself; my sense is true"! Is the whole agreement of universality and antiquity thus justly condemned?

For if novelties of dogmas, things, and opinions--novelties which are opposed to age and antiquity--are received from the words of the Apostle, it is necessary that the faith of the blessed Fathers be violated, either entirely or certainly in great part. It is necessary that the faithful of all ages, all the Saints, all the chaste, the continent, the Virgins, all the Clerics, Levites, and Priests, so many thousands of Confessors, such great armies of Martyrs, such great celebrity and multitude of cities and peoples, so many islands, provinces, Kings, Peoples, Kingdoms, nations--almost the whole world, now incorporated into Christ its head through the Catholic faith throughout so long a course of ages--be pronounced to have been ignorant, to have erred, to have blasphemed, and not to have known what it believed. Thus Vincent of Lérins, chapter 33 of On the Profane Novelties of Heresies.

These things he said in his own time. Since then, down to the new Gospel, so many armies of other Martyrs have been added, concerning whom those who condemn the Council of Trent--assembled in the Holy Spirit on account of the faith of those armies--pronounce the same judgment. Why do I say "condemn"? They persecute it with fires and disembowelment. That one Catholic remains is not due to their clemency, but because they lack strength.

But what will anyone who errs more moderately answer me? What cause is there why you do not believe the saints? If you are so proud that you suppose all of them to have erred and yourself alone to be wise, are you also so foolish that you hope I shall believe you? If the authority of others moves you, by this very fact you withdraw from your position, because you are led by authority. Yet if you are moved by it, why do new, suspect, and few men move you rather than ancient and many men, who approved their faith by torments and death and sealed their confession with blood?

See how great is the obstinacy of not believing these men, how great the savagery of desiring to devour their disciples and to call them Antichristians and bestialities. For the insults do not stop at us, but are hurled through sixteen ages and through many thousands of Martyrs and Bishops, and reach as far as the Apostolic Churches. Act moderately in a matter so arduous, because you are contending with so many thousands of saints; if you love peace, speak peaceably. If you seek a council, embrace the one which is given. If we are impostors because we believe these men, rescind the judgment of the divine majesty; cast down from heaven and condemn for imposture so many thousands of the Blessed, who were illustrious for sanctity, doctrine, ecclesiastical dignity, and miracles; consign them to Orcus, where Tartarus alone opens sheer below:

> So great is the prospect upward to the ethereal Olympus of heaven.

But you who are orthodox, flee novelties. "They announce to us a wisdom hidden since Christ--a thing worthy of tears. For if faith had its origin in these thirty (ninety) years, although almost four hundred (one thousand five hundred) years have passed from the time when Christ was openly beheld, the Gospel was empty for so long a time, our faith too was empty, and the Martyrs indeed underwent martyrdom in vain; in vain also did such and so great bishops preside over the people." Gregory Nazianzen, Letter 2 to Chelidonius.

CHAPTER XLII

The Council of Trent Must Be Received, So That Peace May Be Restored to Germany

It would not be difficult to persuade them of this, provided that the name of the Pontiff and hatred of Catholics were absent. Now, alas, envy, anger, and avarice dispute concerning religion with such injustice that they carry the teachers to heaven but persecute the disciples with condemnation, exile, prison, and sword. Let this cataract of alienated minds be removed, and Germany will receive the Council no more reluctantly than the other parts of Europe. For why should it not receive that which it has so often desired and which it holds through its better part? Certainly the princes, as they speak in the preface to the Augsburg Confession, request a general council. These are their words:

"Since Your Imperial Majesty has also, not once but often, graciously signified to the Electors, Princes, and remaining Estates of the Empire, and at the Diet of Speyer which was held in the year of the Lord 1526 caused it to be recited and publicly read according to the given and prescribed form of your imperial instruction and commission, that Your Majesty, for certain causes alleged in Your Majesty's name, did not wish to determine anything in this business of religion and could not conclude anything, but according to the office of Your Imperial Majesty would diligently endeavor with the Roman Pontiff concerning the convocation of a general council--just as the same thing was set forth more fully a year ago at the most recent public assembly convened at Speyer. There Your Imperial Majesty, through Lord Ferdinand, King of Bohemia and Hungary, our friend and gracious lord, and then through the imperial orator and commissioners, caused these things, among others, to be proposed: that Your Imperial Majesty had understood and considered the deliberation of Your Imperial Majesty's lieutenant in the Empire, and of the president and counselors in the government, and of the legates from the other Estates who had assembled at Regensburg, concerning the convocation of a council; and that Your Imperial Majesty judged it useful that a council be convoked; and because the causes which were then being treated between Your Imperial Majesty and the Roman Pontiff were near to concord and Christian reconciliation, Your Imperial Majesty did not doubt that the Roman Pontiff could be induced to hold a general council. Your Imperial Majesty therefore signified that you would endeavor that the aforesaid Supreme Pontiff, together with Your Imperial Majesty, should consent to assemble such a general council, to be announced at the earliest time by public letters.

"In the event, therefore, that in the cause of religion the dissensions between us and the parties have not been composed amicably and in charity, we now offer ourselves here before Your Imperial Majesty in all obedience, superabundantly prepared to appear and plead the cause in such a general and free council. Concerning its convocation, in all the Imperial Diets that have been held during the years of Your Imperial Majesty's reign, it has always been treated concordantly by the Electors, Princes, and remaining Estates of the Empire and concluded by agreeing votes.

"To the assembly of this General Council, and at the same time to Your Imperial Majesty, in this by far greatest and gravest cause, we have already appealed beforehand in the proper manner and form of law, and we now appeal. We still adhere to this appeal to Your Imperial Majesty and at the same time to the Council, nor do we intend or have power to abandon it through this or another negotiation--unless the cause between us and the parties, according to the tenor of the most recent imperial citation, has been composed amicably in charity, quieted, and reduced to Christian concord. Concerning this we here also protest solemnly and publicly."

It is true. For in the year 1524 a council was requested in earnest; business was conducted with the pontifical legates then present at Nuremberg so that, with the Emperor consenting, the Pontiff might proclaim a council. All things thereafter were directed to this end: at Speyer in 1526 and 1529; at Augsburg in 1530; at Regensburg in 1532 and 1541; at Speyer in 1542 and 1544; at Worms in 1545; at Augsburg in 1548, where the Emperor also proposed certain articles to endure until a General Synod; and again at Augsburg in 1551. These things were done, and either the judgment of the Council was awaited or the business was certainly conducted with little German candor.

The Emperor himself is witness in the recess of Regensburg in 1546. His words are: “His Imperial Majesty, in response to the humble prayers and petitions of the Estates, obtained and procured through various negotiations that at last a General Council should be established and begun at Trent, a city of the German nation.” Concerning the same Council the same Emperor Charles V says: “The General Council, to which all the Estates of the Holy Roman Empire have subjected themselves, will without doubt apply pious and zealous diligence so that, in this cause, provision may be made for the consciences of many men and for the peace of the Catholic Church, as necessity requires.”

Why, therefore, do men evilly curious, enemies of peace, now draw the princes and Estates away not only from the Council but also from the former opinion which they laid before the Council, and cast them into Calvinisms, Osiandrisms, and Socinianisms?

All assemblies of the Empire, all diets, all public meetings demand peace--peace, I say, especially the cities and princes who neither hope nor desire to grow through war. Even those who trust that they will be safe only when affairs are disturbed pretend peace. But they will be able to obtain neither political nor ecclesiastical peace except by approving and accepting the Council of Trent.

How often now, after the well-known variations of religions, and at how great an expense, do they seek civil peace and quiet? But they have not yet obtained it; rivalries and enmities grow stronger each year. For since the Council's decrees have been received by foreign nations with great applause and approval, and since the nobler part of Germany follows them, what peace will those men be able to possess whom a solitary and obstinate opinion divides from the rest of the Christian world and from their own colleagues--an opinion by which they judge that they alone think rightly, while the rest are impious, blasphemous idolaters? This is all the more so because no peace and agreement has hitherto been able to be established even among themselves.

In the year 1557 four ways to peace were proposed in the recess or decree of the Empire: a General Council, a National Council, a Colloquy, and an Assembly of the Empire. All the princes confess by their decree that a national council and an assembly of the Empire are useless for religious concord. They determine that a General Council is the most orderly and correct way to peace; that it has descended from antiquity through the Christian Church to the present time; and that it is without controversy the best, most useful, and most advantageous way--the way which the Church has employed in similar cases and dissensions and by which it has happily decided causes. Every care must therefore be devoted to making it possible for a General Council to be assembled.

Meanwhile they propose a colloquy because they had no hope of a Council. But experience has now taught that no colloquy is sufficient for peace, nor can one be. For they establish a colloquy as a consultation and deliberation in which every negotiation undertaken is conducted without obligation and without prejudice and contains no confession, decision, determination, or definition. Since, therefore, peace has not been made by a colloquy and, as affairs have now been settled, cannot be made by one, a Council is necessary--and indeed the one which the whole world has now embraced.

I have often taught that the adversaries cannot possess such a council. Matthias Hoe, supreme preacher at the Saxon court, proves this expressly: “Moreover, if we consider what a general council requires, all will confess and say that it is impossible for such a council to be instituted.” He adduces arguments: because it must be assembled by imperial authority, and the Emperor will not do this; second, because theologians cannot be compelled to attend the Council and expenses are lacking. They will therefore never obtain solid peace, but will pass from errors into other and still other errors unless they join themselves to the Universality. Domestic peace is weak if the whole city is afflicted by seditions.

The Roman Empire, as I taught above, cannot subsist without ecclesiastical peace. Its civil laws are not only now tempered by the canons of councils and pontiffs, but were so formerly, when the German nation did not yet rule: "The laws of the age do not disdain to follow the sacred canons," in the Authentic, That Clerics Be Judged before Their Own Bishops, penultimate section, Collection 6. Unless, therefore, the Council is received, the conflict between ecclesiastical laws and the new civil laws will be perpetual, as I showed elsewhere, and consequently there will be no peace.

Following the example of their head, it is fitting that all the Estates of the Empire, as members, should receive the Council's saving doctrine and reformation willingly and with a grateful mind. But Charles, Ferdinand, Maximilian, Rudolf, Matthias, and Ferdinand, who now holds the governance of the Most August Empire, constantly adhered to the ancient Roman Church and profess themselves its advocates and defenders. They requested the Council and obtained it; they urged the restoration and continuation of it when interrupted; they promoted it and, when it had been completed, commended it to their subjects.

It is indeed fitting that members be conformed to the head and subjects obey the Magistrate. But those men will say, "It is necessary to obey God rather than men." Yet they use so holy a maxim seditiously and impiously. For those Emperors were neither Jews nor Gentiles, nor do they rise against God so as to command what God forbids. But if they held them to be such, why by their own votes did they impose tyrants and persecutors upon the Christian people? Why did they themselves prefer to stand beneath the blow of an idolatrous prince rather than elect an Orthodox man from their own brotherhood? Why do they themselves condemn the Emperor whose religion all antiquity approved?

But I have already demonstrated these things above. I press this point, that I may make plain that stable peace cannot exist where there is so great an ἀνεμονία [wind-driven instability] and ἀκοινωνία [lack of communion] between the head and members. This formerly shook Germany with war, when the agitators of the pseudo-Gospel stirred up the princes against the supreme Magistrate. That war, notable as it was, was lamentable and destructive to the fatherland through the disasters of cities, the devastation of fields, and the chains of princes.

Even now there remain men who from Switzerland and neighboring places call the Emperor the Apocalyptic beast and the Empire the fullness of devilism. Indeed, at the most recent fair an image was publicly sold in which Ambrogio Spinola, an incomparable hero and commander of the imperial and royal army, rides upon the seven-headed beast. These things are certainly opposed to peace. But they gush from one fountain: that they hate the religion of the Emperor, to whose clemency, prudence, and justice they have entrusted themselves.

The battles of the Calvinists and Lutherans among themselves are now known. The Calvinists defend themselves because they have been condemned by no council. Sturm writes in the Antipappus, page 197, that "the Papistic doctrine ought not to be defamed and repudiated as erroneous, since no legitimate general council has defined this or rejected the Papists together with their doctrine." Thus also the Calvinists in the preface to the Orthodox Consensus, thus Hospinian, thus Pareus in his Irenicum.

Accordingly, the preacher Hoe says that in this part they agree entirely with the Papists and Jesuits, who can do nothing other than cry, "Council, Council, Council!" That courtly chief preacher then proceeds: "In what, therefore, does the necessity of a council consist? Does it not follow from this that more is placed in the council than in Scripture? That the authority of the council is greater and more conspicuous than that of Scripture? Is this not entirely to fall back into the Papacy up to the girdle?"

If a council is needed for the condemnation of false dogmas, behold: I have already furnished so many councils which condemned these teachings; why, therefore, do the Calvinists not reject them? For concerning Scripture without another authority, fanatical spirits will never agree. Our religion has been condemned by no council, theirs by many; therefore let them abandon the condemned religion and, together with the Emperor their head, follow the uncondemned one--indeed, the one approved by councils.

I should wish that the princes and states of Germany would learn what must next be done, not from turbulent enemies of truth, or impostors and apostates, but from the ancient Emperors, who led the way by deed and voice. It is fitting for the Germans, whom God has raised to the Empire in this last age of the world, to emulate them. Constantine undertook by imperial authority the execution of the Council of Nicaea. Theodosius the Younger defended the decrees of Ephesus; Valentinian and Marcian defended Chalcedon. Nor did any orthodox prince allow his labor to be lacking where it was required for those things which had been established by councils.

Golden indeed are the words in the decree of Emperor Marcian: “The profane contention has now departed. For truly impious and sacrilegious is he who, after the judgment of so many priests, leaves anything to be treated by his own opinion. It is indeed the height of madness to seek an imaginary light in the midst of clear day. For whoever investigates anything further after the truth has been discovered seeks a lie.” But the Council of Trent must be defended much more earnestly, because in it the ancient councils are found and the deeds of pious kings are commended for imitation.

In this Council that was done which all judged necessary for all councils: namely, that it be convoked by the vicar of Christ, that those who possess the right pronounce judgment, and that security and liberty be conceded to all. Accordingly, the legates of kings, princes, and states were present, and kings embraced the Council. Why will a few princes in Germany not do what they know that the others did with great praise for constancy, sincerity, and religion? Why do they not prefer foreign princes as friends and allies rather than as suspected persons?

We daily see divisions of minds, secret counsels, and confederations arising from deep envy and hatred toward Catholic princes. Hence come the estrangement of nations and hereditary dissensions. Italians, Spaniards, and Frenchmen are alienated from Lutheran Germans, while the Germans themselves are inflamed against Catholic nations by perpetual invectives, calumnies, and defamatory pamphlets. And yet, since human affairs are fragile and fleeting, it can happen that they need mutual aid and that they must become suppliants to those whom they presume to be enemies.

Why, therefore, do the German princes not embrace the true and ancient religion of their fathers, explained by the Council of Trent, so that they may enter into, renew, and confirm affection and treaties with foreign nations? Why do they permit their subjects to be aroused by factious and tribunician preachers to hatred of other kingdoms--kingdoms which deserve better of the German princes than the preachers themselves do?

Look at the matter. The Innovators contend that all the ancestors of the princes were what they fashion us to be: Antichristians, that is, the most criminal of all men; and by so atrocious a charge they defame all the families of Germany. The Council defends the faith, honor, right of succession, and reputation of illustrious families. Why do you attend to malevolent detractors, to the reproach of yourselves and your stock, and neglect the true defenders of your dignity and your ancestors?

Behold: kings no less powerful than your Emperor nevertheless defer to the Emperor and with an untroubled mind hold the second or third places, reverencing the Sacred and August Empire of which you are noble members. But your preachers, as I taught at the beginning of On Syncretism, do not fear to call and write that it is Antichristian, the Apocalyptic beast, and the fullness of devilism. Therefore at last recognize these men who, under the pretense of truth, mock your noble and inborn nobility; once recognized, abandon them.

Have you not yet recognized them? Do they not direct and toss you and your subjects at their decision, not without tumults? Now they drive you, after the manner of cattle, into Luther's pens, now into Calvin's; then again they send you out upon the sea of Ubiquity and expose you to Flacian winds. Now they remove bishops, now restore them; now compel you to grow mild with the Hollanders, now to grow rigid with the Genevans. They are constant only in their own mutability. Return, therefore, to the truth of the ancient age, for there is no end of innovating, since every novelty destitute of truth is swiftly removed by another novelty.

Ninth. I marvel if all are not able to touch their error with their own hands. For what, I ask, is more ill-advised than to write a few private laws of princes and towns concerning a common thing--that is, concerning the religion of all Christian kingdoms--and to establish an ecclesiastical order, and from the municipal laws of one party to overturn universal law?

Augustine rightly says on Psalm 75: “Truth is common; it is not mine, nor yours, nor his, nor that man's; it is common to all. And no one says, ‘It is mine,’ lest he wish to make his own portion of that which stands in the midst for all.”

What, I ask, did the few subscribers of the Confession say at Augsburg in the year 1530? “Truth is on our side; the rest of the world is insane; we alone are wise; the others ὡς σκιαὶ πέτονται [fly like shadows].” And not only those who now live, but all ages were ignorant of the truth. How do new and few men judge it worthy that all Christians should migrate into their laws, abandon approved things, and condemn salutary things? Why does the small number not rather yield to the universality, subjects to their Magistrates, sheep to shepherds?

A rival confession is opposed to the Council, Augsburg to Trent, Philip Melanchthon to the Pontiff. I exhort and beseech you to believe the Council and acknowledge the Pontiff, for as a leader in withdrawing from the Confession you possess Philip Melanchthon himself, the author of the Confession--and now almost all of you have withdrawn. The author himself condemned and hated his own work. The rule which he offered to the world he himself broke; what as a younger man he approved, when older he rescinded. See Roland Pontanus, book 3 On Memorable Affairs. See Melanchthon's letters to Frederick the Palatine; see his tears concerning ἀρτολατρίᾳ [bread-worship].

If the master and craftsman of a Confession of so great a name--so that he alone seemed to have imbibed Luther's spirit and mind--abandoned the Confession, enticed neither by a reward, nor by human fear, nor by hope, and condemned his own decrees before he had even heard the Council's decrees, the disciple is not above the master. Do not retain what its maker cast away.

“We shall therefore be Calvinists,” you will say, “for he passed over to Calvin.”

By no means. Follow him when he condemns evil things; flee him when he follows worse things. For to which Calvinists will you depart? He was one of the Mild, and therefore not even thus will you stand among the larger minority; you will dwell amid the offense of more men. Yet you will be nearer the Council than if you thus harden yourself in the αὐθαδείᾳ obstinacy of the Rigid. Both his letters and Joachim Mörlin's book, which Andreas Petri of Eisleben printed in the year 1565, teach that Melanchthon defected to the Calvinists.

But concerning Philip let it be as you wish. “We oppose the Confession to the Council.” Yet that Confession is neither certain nor pleasing to all your people; it has been changed ten times. Nor do I alone or the Calvinists alone say this, but your own countrymen themselves. Andreas Musculus, in his Pious and Necessary Admonition concerning Avoiding the Gross and More-than-Papistic Errors of Major, book 3, folio 194, says: “The authors of the Confession accommodated themselves to the time, or wrote without sufficient consideration.”

What then? Will you prefer to the Council of Trent--a council to which the councils and Fathers of all times bear testimony--a confession which in my judgment is novel and heretical, in the censure of the Calvinists a torch by which France is set aflame, and in the confession of the Lutherans a confession accommodated to the time and written without consideration? What then does Musculus conclude from this? “Therefore an argument taken from the authority of the Confession and the Apology is not valid.” Deservedly indeed; for a temporary and inconsiderate confession must be corrected according to the words of eternal truth, the most carefully considered councils, and the confessions and martyrdoms of fifteen centuries.

What does Abdias, the defender of the Confession, reply to these things? “I should have omitted our Confession if this must truly be alleged concerning it. On that reasoning, what else is it than a confession written without consideration and accommodated to the time? In this manner it will cease to be authentic; in this manner a most splendid occasion is given to our adversaries for condemning us ourselves together with our Confession. In this manner we ourselves cannot be certain concerning our religion, nor shall we leave anything certain to posterity. In this manner the distinguished testimonies of Luther and others concerning the Augsburg Confession will most unworthily fall away.”

Since they now see that these things have occurred, there is no reason why they should adhere to a slippery and ambiguous confession and spurn the orthodox agreement of all ages explained and handed down by the Council of Trent.

The Augsburg Confession cannot be salutary, since, like a tragic buskin, it fits either foot, and sits not upon two stools but upon twenty. For it has been changed, corrected, and mutilated in many editions, the beginning of the alteration having been made by its author himself, so that it is now asked of which edition each professor is.

Then, how many heresies lurk beneath that cloak? The Calvinists claim it for themselves, but rightly understood; the Ubiquitarians arrogate it to themselves alone, but explained in their own sense; all the others think so diversely and dissent so inimically. Pareus attempts to prove that it is defended by no one such as it was first proposed. If no one defends it in that form, why does he adhere to it once changed? Why does one who has cast away a part of falsehood not profess the truth in its integrity? Does he not show as vain and mendacious the vaunting of Melanchthon and his colleagues about Scripture alone, infallible truth, and new light, since he withdrew from the Confession at least in part? The Estates of the Augsburg Confession were deceived by the cunning of impious men in the very construction of the Confession, because the Confession was interpolated, changed, and abandoned by posterity.

Eternal salvation, therefore, is not in a temporary confession; stability of faith is not in daily ἐφημερινῷ vaunting. Rather, it is in that Rock upon which Christ built the Church, against which the Augsburg Confession, when it dashed, was broken and flew apart into little pieces. Those who are called the Estates of the Augsburg Confession vainly attempted to join and solder them together. Secular power cannot bind spiritual wickednesses, nor does God permit the concord of those in error to grow excessively, lest it give authority to error.

Finally, the salvation which they lose so inexcusably ought to move everyone to return to the place from which they rashly departed. “He who hears you hears me; he who despises you despises me,” was said. The men of Trent can say this: bishops joined to the Apostolic Church through perpetual succession, handing down through the succession of the Apostolic Churches the faith.

Cyprian, Letter 9, book 4: “You ought to know that the Bishop is in the Church and the Church in the Bishop; and that if any are not with the Bishop, they are not in the Church. And those who, not having peace with the priests, creep in, flatter themselves in vain, since the Church, which is one and Catholic, has not been rent or divided, but is certainly connected and joined by the glue of priests cohering mutually with one another.”

You await salvation in vain while of your own accord you separate yourselves from fellowship with the common and ancient Church, whence saving doctrine is derived to us.

For what excuse is there for abandoning and condemning the doctrine of so many saints and adhering to the opinions of those who themselves condemned them? The Apostles were the Fathers of the Church; in place of the fathers those sons were born and were appointed Bishops. The Church herself calls them fathers. She herself begot them and established them in the seats of the fathers. Therefore do not think her deserted because you do not see Peter, because you do not see Paul, because you do not see those through whom she was born. Fatherhood comes from the offspring of the Church: in place of her fathers sons have been born to her, appointed as princes over all the earth--princes for explaining the faith, princes for implanting piety, princes for abolishing error.

May he who inhabits inaccessible light illuminate the eyes of your mind and strengthen your spirits, so that you may dare to say to your Innovators what Augustine said to the disturbers of his own time in chapter 14 of On the Usefulness of Believing:

"I did not see Christ himself in the manner in which he willed to appear to men, who is proclaimed to have been seen even by these ordinary eyes. When I consider whom I believed concerning him, so that, now furnished beforehand with such faith, I might approach you, I see that I believed none except the confirmed opinion of peoples and nations and a most celebrated report; and that the mysteries of the Catholic Church have occupied these peoples everywhere. Why, therefore, should I not inquire most diligently among them above all what Christ commanded, since, moved by their authority, I have already believed that Christ commanded something useful? Will you explain to me better what he said--you at whose recommendation I would not think that he existed or exists, if this were commended to me as something to be believed? This, therefore, as I have said, I believed through report strengthened by rapid diffusion, agreement, and antiquity.

"But you are so few--and so few--and so turbulent, and so new, that no one doubts that you here bring forward nothing worthy of authority. What, therefore, is this so great madness? 'Believe those men that Christ is to be believed, and learn from us what he said.' Why, I ask you? For if they should fail and could teach me nothing, I should far more easily persuade myself that Christ is not to be believed than that anything concerning him must be learned from anyone except those through whom I had believed him.

"O enormous confidence--or rather folly! 'I teach you what CHRIST commanded, in whom you believe.' What if I did not believe in him? Would you be able to teach me anything concerning him? 'But,' he says, 'it is necessary that you believe.' Is it because you commend him to us?

"'No,' he says, 'for by reason we lead those who believe him.' Why, therefore, should I believe him? 'Because the report has been established.' Whether through you or through others? 'Through others,' he says. Shall I therefore believe them so that you may teach me? Perhaps I ought to, unless they chiefly warn me precisely of this: that I must not approach you at all. For they say that you possess pernicious doctrines. You will answer: 'They lie.' How, therefore, shall I believe them concerning Christ, whom they do not wish to see?

"He says, 'Believe the writings.' But if every writing is presented as new and undoubted, or is commended by a few, with no reason confirming it, belief is accorded not to it but to those who present it. Therefore, if you who are so few and unknown present those writings, I am not inclined to believe them. At the same time you also act contrary to your promise, by commanding faith rather than rendering a reason. Again you will recall me to the multitude and the report. Restrain at last your obstinacy and some indomitable lust for propagating your name. Rather, admonish me to seek the chief men of this multitude, and to seek most diligently, so that I may learn something concerning these writings from those men through whom, if they did not exist, I should be wholly unaware that it must be learned. But you, return to your hiding places, and do not plot anything under the name of the truth which you attempt to take away from those to whom you yourself concede authority."

CHAPTER XLIII

The Objections against the Authority of the Council Are Empty

Nevertheless, even in a clear matter and with the accused convicted, there is not lacking the greatest impediment to a better life: a refuge in excuse. They say that they possess reasons why they cannot return to the inherited religion. This is not the evil of heresy alone, but an evil common to human depravity: they sin willingly and conceal their sins by denying them.

“No one,” says Seneca, “understands himself to be avaricious; no one, covetous. Yet the blind seek a guide; we wander without a guide. We say: ‘I am therefore not ambitious, but no one at Rome can live otherwise. I am not extravagant, but the city itself demands great expenditure. It is not my fault that I am irascible; youth causes this.’ We indeed deceive ourselves. Our evil is not external; it is within us, it sits in our entrails. And for that reason we come to health with difficulty, because we do not know that we are sick.” Letter 60.

These are the vices of human affairs, but especially of those in error; for unless they loved their vices, they would not err. Indeed, they generally err in such a manner that they impute error to sanctity and truth.

The first objection against the Council is therefore customarily this: because it was assembled by the Pontiff, although it ought to have been done by the Emperor.

Yet that is not a legitimate objection. For why do the Germans and the English, with a few others, seek a knot in a bulrush when the rest of the world reverences the Council? The Emperor himself, the head of the Empire, brought it about that it was proclaimed and continued by the Pope. If they are moved by the honor of their prince, let them not spurn his solicitude in seeking the Council. Why did they offer the Saxon Confession to the Council in the year 1551? In it they say that they are not conscious that their preachers possess any error, either in doctrine or in the government of the Church; nevertheless, they do not doubt that those men are endowed with such modesty and piety that, if they are admonished by testimonies of heavenly doctrine and by the true agreement of the Catholic Church, they will by no means fail the edification and tranquility of the Church.

Let subjects not disappoint the hope of their princes, and let them revere the orthodox agreement of that Council which possesses the unity and agreement of the ancient Churches. But if they repudiate the Council because it was assembled by the Pope's authority, why do they receive Nicaea, which not only was assembled by Pope Sylvester but also determined by its own decree who could lawfully proclaim a council?

These are the words of Athanasius's Letter to Felix concerning the Persecutions of the Arians: “We know that in the great Synod of Nicaea it was unanimously confirmed by the three hundred and eighteen Bishops that councils ought not to be celebrated without the judgment of the Roman Pontiff.” Hence also Socrates, book 2 of the History: “Councils which are celebrated otherwise than the ecclesiastical rule commands possess no force; councils ought not to be celebrated apart from the judgment of the Roman Pontiff.”

So far, therefore, is the authority of the Pontiff interposed in the celebration of the Council from having to deter the Estates of the Augsburg Confession, that for this reason it is fitting for the Council to be received with the greatest readiness, since without such authority a council is invalid. For a council must be assembled by him who presides over the Church; but emperors are not presidents of the Church--indeed, they have often been

Next, I cannot sufficiently marvel at what reason those men allege who say that they approve the assembly of councils by the authority of the emperors Charles, Maximilian, Ferdinand, Rudolf, and Matthias. For their doctors calumniate in voice and writings that these Emperors are Antichristians. Aretius, on Apocalypse 13:2 and 15, contends that the Emperor or Empire is the ten-horned beast. The same man says: “The name of the beast is to be a son of the Roman Church, or a Catholic, or a member of the Roman Church.” The same: “The dragon is the Devil, who attaches his ornaments to the Empire.” The same: “To worship the beast is to cultivate the Emperor superstitiously; even those who call him the unconquered Emperor do this.” The same man complains at verse 8 that men marvel at the success of princes and therefore pass over to their parties.

How, therefore, will they approve as Catholic and legitimate a council assembled by imperial authority--that is, by beastly, draconic, Antichristian, persecuting, and idolatrous authority, as they themselves are accustomed to fashion it by blaspheming the Majesty in a horrid manner? To what end, therefore, do they object the Emperor to us? If they acknowledge his authority in the convocation of a synod, why do they not follow the modesty, prudence, faith, religion, and zeal with which, at the beginning and continuation of the Council, he moved, aided, and heard the Pontiff and embraced the Council's judgment? In a matter of the greatest moment he followed Constantine and other pious Emperors.

You seek a council assembled by imperial authority, which cannot be given; why do you not follow the one defended, approved, and honored by imperial authority? Finally, both Pareus and the Saxon chief preacher think that a Council can be commanded by princely authority, so that one is not free to refuse it in whatever manner one wishes, because they judged that coercive power too is necessary for a Synod.

But what Emperor will compel the Spaniards, Italians, Frenchmen, Englishmen, Swedes, Poles, and others--foreigners, namely, who are not subject to his scepter--to undergo the dangers of journeys and the losses of expenses? You judge him so weak that he cannot restrain a few merchants of Mülheim from an unjust attempt and from making an insane expenditure. In those halls that promote imperial vigor you depicted him sleeping; you contemptuously fashioned his eagle ἄπτερον [wingless] and featherless.

Those, therefore, who pretend to seek a council of this kind reject every council. Did not Luther himself expressly teach at the beginning, in On the Chief Articles of the Christian Faith, that the Pope is bound to institute a General Council? Who would believe him bound to do that which it is not lawful for him to do? If a council assembled by him is void through the invalid authority of its convoker, what law constrains him to labor in vain, to move the world by a ridiculous attempt, and, when he has convoked it, to accomplish nothing beyond expense? Indeed, must the whole affair therefore perish because the Pope is its author?

But if anyone is little concerned about Luther, let him consider the unanimous opinion of an entire imperial assembly. In the year 1524 it was decreed thus at Nuremberg:

“And lest good things be oppressed together with evil ones, and so that it may finally be defined what is to be done by each person in this cause, it has seemed to our Lieutenant, orator, and also to the Electors, princes, prelates, counts, and Estates of the Empire present here to be supremely necessary that a general, free, and universal Council of the whole of Christianity--which can most advantageously, if it is possible, be effected by His Pontifical Holiness with our consent--be proclaimed and convoked, as is fitting, at a suitable place in the German nation. Concerning this matter negotiations have been conducted here with the legation of His Pontifical Holiness, which has undertaken to refer it to His Pontifical Holiness and to promote it most faithfully.”

To what end is there need of these decrees of the Empire if the Pope ought not to assemble a Council, or if that which the Pope assembled according to the judgment and request of the whole Empire is therefore void because it possesses the Pope as its author? But if the judgment of the Empire is correct, we easily see how mad is the audacity of the preachers who by private detraction and malevolence rescind the opinion of the August Majesty and of all the Electors and Estates then present.

Besides the Catholics, there were also present at that assembly the legates of the Electors Ludwig of the Palatinate, Frederick of Saxony, and Joachim of Brandenburg, and of many other princes. The assembly approved their acts, and then there was the consent of those who had sent them. The objection against the Council's author therefore comes too late, if they themselves selected the author.

The second objection. The Council of Trent was not free, nor was it within the German nation; for Trent is in Italy, in a place insufficiently healthy, whose Bishop was a Cardinal.

The preachers could therefore easily have protected themselves from the heat, especially since the Emperor and Pope Julius, unless they had been prohibited by an impediment, were ready to betake themselves there. Since it was a suitable seat for so many wealthy men and princes, especially since it is warm as though with a temperate breeze between the Italian suns and Alpine cold--for the cold which Italian and Spanish cosmographers ascribe to Trent is less than the northern frost, even if it should nevertheless surpass a Saxon and Baltic winter--the Italians, Sicilians, Spaniards, and Frenchmen should have complained about the frost of Trent, since the dissensions of the Germans drew them from their native warmth into the Germans' freezing regions. Would they not have prayed for a milder and somewhat quieter climate?

What they complain concerning liberty denied is most unjust and most false, fashioned solely to arouse hostility toward Catholics by an invented fear. For Trent is a city of the German nation; it was then under Ferdinand's dominion and even now belongs to the house of Austria. How, therefore, did an imperial town diminish the liberty which the Emperors themselves kept safe and unimpaired? Nor did the Cardinal obstruct it--indeed, he could not--since not only he, but the universal Council together with the Pontiff and Emperor, proclaimed a safe-conduct for all Germans and the other nations, not once but again and again. Finally, the whole Christian Church granted it to the German nation, in Sessions 13, 14, and 18. And so that those who do not have the Council at hand may possess something by which to refute the lies of their preachers, I shall transcribe the safe-conduct which was given in Session 18.

SAFE-CONDUCT granted to the German nation, in the general congregation on 4 March 1562.

“The most holy Ecumenical and General Synod of Trent, legitimately assembled in the Holy Spirit, the same legates of the Apostolic See presiding in it, assures everyone that, to each and all priests, Electors, Princes, Dukes, Marquises, Counts, Barons, Nobles, Military Men, Commoners, and all other men whatsoever, of whatever estate, condition, or quality they may be, from the cities and other places of the German province and nation, and to all other ecclesiastical and secular persons, especially those of the Augsburg Confession, who together with them will come, will be sent, or are about to set out for this General Council of Trent, or have come hitherto--by whatever name they are designated or may now be called--it imparts and altogether concedes, by the tenor of the present instrument, the public faith and the fullest and truest security, which they call a safe-conduct:

“freely to come to this city of Trent; to remain, stand, and tarry here; to propose and speak; to treat, examine, and discuss any business whatsoever together with the Synod itself; to offer and disclose freely whatever things they please and any articles whatever, both in writing and by word; to explain, establish, and prove them by the Sacred Scriptures and the words, opinions, and arguments of the blessed Fathers; and, if necessary, also to answer the objections of the General Council and to dispute or confer charitably, without any impediment, with those who have been selected by the Council, with reproaches, revilings, and insults entirely removed;

“and specifically that the disputed causes be treated in the aforesaid Council of Trent according to Sacred Scripture, the traditions of the Apostles, approved Councils, and the authorities of the holy Fathers; with this also added, that they shall in no way be punished under the pretext of religion, or of offenses committed or to be committed concerning it. It concedes this also in such a manner that, because of their presence, divine offices shall not in any manner cease, either on the journey or in any of the places while they are going, remaining, or returning, nor in the city of Trent itself.

“And when these things have been completed or not completed, whenever they please, or when, at the command and with the assent of their superiors, they desire to return to their own places, or any one of them desires it, they may immediately, without any resistance, occasion, or delay, freely and securely return according to their good pleasure, their property and likewise their honor and persons being safe, and vice versa; yet with the knowledge of those to be deputed by the same Synod, so that provision may then be made opportunely for their security, without deceit and fraud.

“The holy Synod also wills that in this public faith and safe-conduct all clauses whatsoever be included and contained, and be held as included, which may be necessary and opportune for full, effectual, and sufficient security in going, remaining, and returning.

“For greater security and for the good of peace and reconciliation, it also expressly declares that if anyone or any of them, whether on the journey while coming to Trent, while remaining there, or while returning, should perpetrate or commit some enormous deed--which God forbid--by which the benefit of this public faith and assurance conceded to them could be annulled or made void, it wills and concedes that those discovered in a crime of this kind shall be punished immediately by their own people alone, and not by others, with a worthy penalty and sufficient amendment, which must deservedly be approved and commended by the party of the Synod, while the form, conditions, and terms of their assurance remain altogether inviolate.

“In like manner it also wills that, if anyone or any persons from the Synod itself, whether on the journey, while remaining, or while returning, should perpetrate or commit some enormous deed--which God forbid--by which the benefit of this public faith and assurance could be violated or in any way removed, those discovered in a crime of this kind shall be punished immediately by the Synod itself alone, and not by others, with a worthy penalty and sufficient amendment, which must deservedly be commended and approved by the party of the Lords of Germany of the Augsburg Confession then present here, while the present form, conditions, and terms of assurance remain altogether inviolate.

“The Synod itself further wills that it shall be lawful for each and all of the ambassadors, as often as it shall be opportune or necessary, to go out from the city of Trent to take the air and to return to it; and also freely to send or dispatch their messenger or messengers to any places whatsoever to arrange their necessary business, and to receive the persons sent or dispatched, or the one sent and dispatched, as often as it seems expedient to them, in such a manner that some person or persons among those deputed by the Council accompany them to provide for their security.

“This safe-conduct and security must stand and endure from the time and throughout the period when it happens that they are received under the care and protection of the Synod and its people, until they are brought to Trent; throughout the whole time of their residence there; and again, after they have had sufficient hearing, with a period of twenty days allowed beforehand, when they themselves request it, or when the Council, after a hearing of this kind, orders them to depart, it shall restore them, with God's favor, from Trent to whatever safe place each has selected for himself, all deceit and fraud being entirely excluded.

“It promises and pledges in good faith that all the aforesaid things are to be inviolably observed on behalf of each and all the faithful of Christ, on behalf of all Princes whatsoever, both ecclesiastical and secular, and on behalf of all other ecclesiastical and secular persons, of whatever estate and condition they may be or by whatever name they are designated.

“Moreover, all fraud and deceit being excluded, it promises in true and good faith that the Synod itself will seek no occasion, either manifestly or secretly, nor in any way employ--or permit anyone to employ--any authority, power, law, statute, privilege of laws or canons, or of any Councils whatsoever, especially those of Constance and Siena, expressed in any form of words, to the prejudice of this public faith and free hearing conceded to them by the Synod itself; and for this occasion it derogates from them in this matter.

“But if the holy Synod, or anyone from it or its people, of whatever condition, estate, or preeminence he may be, should violate in any point or clause the prescribed form and manner of assurance and safe-conduct--which nevertheless may the Almighty deign to avert--and sufficient amendment, deserving of their approval and commendation, should not immediately follow, they may hold the Synod itself, and will be able to hold it, to have fallen under all the penalties which violators of safe-conducts of this kind can incur by divine and human law or custom, without excuse or any contradiction in this matter.”

No one will easily say that greater liberty was ever granted either in a Council or in a state. Accordingly, while they allege fear, they sufficiently show that they distrust their cause, fear the light, and prefer to deceive the simple in Germany rather than come before the sight of the Church. For why do they decline the place and liberty when the whole Empire approved it? It is contained in the Imperial decree promulgated at Augsburg in the year 1548, to which I refer the reader.

Why does the whole Empire here complain about nothing concerning the place, the liberty, and the convoker of the Council, but submit itself to its judgment? But who bewitched many so that they would believe neither the ancient Church nor the recent Council, with which all antiquity agrees? Who so swiftly altered the constancy of the Germans that they neither came to the Council nor defended its decrees? Namely, those who severed them from the primitive Church are now bringing it about that they do not unite with the rest of Christianity; and, lest this ever occur, they divide the wretched men into very many petty sects and into names and dogmas equally monstrous.

The third objection. Bishops, Cardinals, and Monks alone pronounced judgment; laymen were excluded from the right of voting. It was therefore not a legitimate Council.

No one was excluded who possessed the right to come and pronounce judgment.

These are the words of the Pontiff proclaiming the Council: “All, from every place, both our Venerable brethren the Patriarchs and Archbishops and our beloved sons the Abbots, as well as all others whatsoever to whom by right or privileges the power of sitting in general councils and pronouncing judgments in them has been permitted,” and so forth.

One must proceed according to the ancient religion, and consequently councils must be proclaimed and celebrated according to ancient law. But since the power of coming and pronouncing judgment is given to all to whom it has been conceded by right or privilege, no one can complain that he was excluded, unless someone judges it just to come contrary to right.

But that judgment concerning controversies of faith was formerly entrusted to priests is clearer than to require teaching. For what is clearer than that the three hundred and eighteen Bishops subscribed to the Synod of Nicaea, but no layman? Therefore either let him produce a single council among all the councils in which laymen subscribed together with the Bishops and pronounced a definitive judgment, and we shall hear his complaints about Trent; or, if he cannot, let him cast away all ancient councils with a single nod and betake himself openly and without deceitful pretense to the enemies of all councils--that is, of the whole Church. We know that Emperors subscribed to certain councils, but they protested that by this act they bore witness to their pious assent and did not arrogate to themselves the role of judging.

The fourth objection. The Prelates who attended the Council were bound to the Pontiff by oath; therefore they did not pronounce free judgments.

Once this has been established--which all confess to be true--that the legitimate oath of Judges, Counselors, and Senators does not remove but confirms their liberty of pronouncing judgment, it must be investigated whether the oath of the Prelates at the Council of Trent obstructed the truth. Peter Fuentidueña teaches in his oration to the Germans that it was instead advantageous. For they were constrained by oath to teach and accept the truth insofar as they knew and were able. But if you have sworn that you will do so, this does not prevent you from inquiring freely into the truth. Otherwise princes would be judged to take liberty from the subjects whom they bind to themselves by oath.

But since an oath is not a bond of iniquity, all know very well that they are bound by no oath either to defend lies or to oppress the truth. What then? Because the Princes of the Empire are bound by oath to the Emperor, are they for that reason prohibited from confessing the truth? Which of the Protestant Theologians is not bound by many--indeed, unjust--oaths, both put under oath and administering an oath concerning the heresies of his Academy?

The fifth objection. The definitions and canons of the Council of Trent are not according to the word of God; therefore we deservedly refuse them. For why should we subject ourselves to human laws? Let CHRIST alone pronounce judgment; let his word alone be heard.

Uncertain error is not consistent with itself; it dashes against itself, and falsehood finally crushes itself while it flees from the manifestation of truth on every side. A little before they equated the votes of laymen with the decrees of priests; now they deign to hear Christ alone--that is, Scripture. And would that they heard him, for thus they would also hear the priests whom Scripture pronounces must be heard.

What had to be said concerning Scripture alone has been explained in various places. For if Scripture alone suffices, what need is there of a Council? For in it the true sense and interpretation of Scripture must be treated. The Princes of the Empire were certainly not ignorant that this cause was being treated when they requested the Council. It is established that they did not doubt the truth of the divine utterances, but sought with so much labor peace among interpretations.

The sixth objection. There are scandals in the Papacy and the life of the Popes has often been evil; therefore the Council is not legitimate.

I shall employ not merely the common response, but the true response which Christ too approved, Luke 18; nor in return shall I cast back at you that a beam adheres in you who labor to pluck a mote from the Papacy, because I ought not to compare the vices of those in error with the sins of the Orthodox. The comparison of a Catholic with a heretic is unequal, especially with one whose justice is imputed, from whom no crime strikes out justice.

Let us therefore leave these things aside, lest we be compelled to teach with Luther that Evangelicals are possessed in the Gospel by seven devils, who previously were troubled by only one; lest we be compelled to complain with Calvin that scarcely every tenth man among the Calvinists is sincere, and so forth.

I ask this one and only thing: let them not accuse the innocent and, from envy and hatred of the name, make the cause common to all; I shall not defend the guilty. In the Council there were many learned, holy, and upright in life--Cardinals, Bishops, Priests, and doctors, men whose faith and morals are to be judged from the truth, not from the abuse of detractors. Who among so great a number was ἀκατονόμαστος [unspeakable] and publicly infamous after the manner of Calvin and Beza? Behold, so great a Council is in sight. Review the sins and disgraces of the subscribers if you accuse them, or assert that you can prove them if you revile them.

“But they are covered by walls.” I ask how that which is covered by such solicitous caution is known to you. For if you accuse without an argument, you are a calumniator. Yet let there also be scandals among us, as there truly are--and would that they ended in the destruction and condemnation of their authors. Nevertheless, the Church does not cease to be the Church although it also contains its evil members within its enclosures; nor did Christ cease to be the head of the Church because Judas too was there. Wheat does not lose its nature although it is among tares.

A Bishop does not lose his dignity and the power of his office--indeed, not even the truth of the faith--even if his works are not complete before his God. Otherwise, why do princes of the age not fall from their thrones by sinning, if a Bishop is reduced to order when he has fallen? But if you read the decrees concerning reformation, you will easily perceive that the Council teaches, admonishes, exhorts, and reproves right things, whether they concern the Pontiffs and the Roman Curia or kings and magnates. No one approved either simony or other crimes, but by a true judgment all determined that they must be amputated, although laws are unequal to the evils of many men--a fact unknown only to those who are ignorant of the human race.

The seventh objection. The doctrine of the Council is false; therefore the Council itself must be repudiated.

I have already demonstrated above that the Council's decrees and dogmas have come down to us from the ancient Church in a perpetual and nowhere interrupted sequence.

It will indeed be worth the labor to learn who those men are who accuse the Council of Trent of falsehood and who, in the midst of the discords and contentions concerning religion by which Germany is shaken, judge the universal Church. Seeking a remedy for your dissensions from a Council, you selected arbiters; now, after you as defendants have lost your cause, it pleases you to calumniate the judge. The Germans, disturbed by their dissensions, implored the Christian world and requested a Council. The whole body was shaken by one sick member; one part wearies the universal Church and gratuitously despises its labor on its behalf and spurns its counsel, imitating the madness of the frenzied, whose fury is first embittered against the solicitude of those treating them.

Italy possessed religious peace; England lived according to the institutions of its ancestors; the Pontiff and Emperor strove for Hungary to be preserved. France was at rest, for no Calvinist existed. Portugal in the East and Spain in the West extended the boundaries of the Empire and the Gospel. The new faith of the Germans disturbed so many goods and cut off greater hopes. After it was divided and torn within itself and could no longer bear the evils which it had itself caused, it looked to the universal Church, so that by the judgment and agreement of the universality it might compose its domestic factions. Would that it had persevered in what had been rightly instituted.

But the same parish priests, the trumpets of civil war, obstructed the restoration of peace. Accordingly, after despising the Council, given over to a reprobate sense and turned against one another, they began to rage still further. For what is more audacious and foolish than that those whom all selected as judges should be condemned by the most desperate of defendants; that those whose cause, now crushed and defeated, was to be condemned by the final vote should preoccupy the judges' benches and turn against the judges the evils they feared for themselves?

“The doctrine of the Council,” they say, “is false.” Therefore that doctrine which the ancient Councils and Fathers handed down to the Council of Trent is false. If, therefore, truth does not exist in the whole world, in what faction of Germany, finally, does it possess its dwelling? This accusation cuts off every hope of peace. There is no Memnonist, no Schwenckfeldian, no Ubiquitarian, Socinian, Trinitarian, Sacramentarian, Flacian, Majorist, Anglo-Papist, or Puritan who cannot by this speech mock and elude every ancient or recent, greatest or least council, if he calls false whatever is opposed to his opinion, displeasing to his will, or contrary to his glory or advantages.

Hence comes that enormous and most notorious propagation of schisms and new sects in the new religions; hence the eternal wars into which the demon casts those who despise the remedies of peace. For what peace can exist in a kingdom, what concord of citizens, what union of a family and its many duties, unless either the Magistrate or the father of the household possesses the power of terminating disputes? Who will be able to endure those who flee altogether from every judge and judgment? For what judge, finally, will those who despise a Council admit?

Cyprian rightly says concerning them in book 1, Letter 3: “What kind of men do you suppose those to be who are enemies of the priests and rebels against the Catholic Church and who are terrified neither by the Lord's threatening nor by the vengeance of the future judgment? For heresies have arisen and schisms been born from no other source than that the priest of God is not obeyed, and that one priest for the time and one judge in place of CHRIST for the time is not contemplated in the Church. If the whole brotherhood obeyed him according to the divine teachings, no one would move anything against the college of priests." Flight from and detraction of the Council is therefore an evident sign of Schism.

The eighth objection. Councils have rarely had prosperous outcomes; therefore the Council of Trent must not be received.

Councils legitimately instituted, not by their own fault but sometimes through the malice and cunning of impious men, have produced wars and persecutions. Christ himself, by teaching, living rightly, and performing miracles, armed the envy of the Jews against himself. Just laws prudently enacted and to be observed by the state are the destruction of many; discipline, admonition, and correction itself are a detriment to proud and harsh dispositions. What disturbances did the Council of Nicaea produce, when the Arian heresy, armed first with pen and voice and then with arms, avenged itself upon the Orthodox?

No one turns this into an accusation against laws because the law proceeds against malefactors; no one accuses discipline because it often provokes savage spirits so that they rush more licentiously and desperately into the precipices of vice. These are not the faults of good things whose preservation is necessary for cities and kingdoms and has always been retained to break the attempts of the wicked, but of impious men who refuse to be contained and ruled by laws.

Thus neither was the Council of Trent--consecrated to peace and most zealous for peace--the cause of the disturbances which followed. A multitude of Bishops and doctors from the whole world assembled to procure the peace of one nation and join it to the rest of Christianity; rather, those men were the cause on account of whose turbulent attempts it was necessary for the Council to be assembled.

But I judge that more things must be said about the fruit of so great and holy a Council. First, the agreement of the Catholic world was manifest in it, not only among Theologians from different kingdoms, but also with the primitive Church.

Next, the morals of the clergy and people were reformed, a reformation which also illuminated Germany in great part.

Third, all the heresies, struck by the Council's anathema as though by a thunderbolt, were in a worse condition than before; little by little they began to tend toward decay and destruction. The Synod was confirmed in the year 1564, when the last session had been begun on 3 December 1563 and completed on the fourth day. After that time the heresies began much more to be divided and to perish by mutual anathemas--so much so that now scarcely any city can be found in Germany which defends all those heresies into which they had conspired when the Council was begun. No one now professes the Augsburg Confession in its integrity. Meanwhile half the Lutherans have defected to Calvinism or returned to Catholic unity. Calvinism has ceased to be propagated among Catholics with the power in which it formerly excelled; indeed, it too, now divided into equal factions, threatens its own ruin.

The ninth objection. Those who sat in the Council are enemies and opposing parties; therefore they must not be heard by us, nor is it equitable for us to stand before the judgment of enemies.

Would that you were either not enemies of the men of Trent or did not pretend that they were your enemies. For how are those men enemies who so often invited you to concord, who made expenditure for your sake and endured the troubles of travel? I do not doubt that they were adversaries of errors, since they themselves condemned them so that no one could doubt it. "But it was a hostile Council." Yet I ask you: what council do you call friendly? If you are a Calvinist, the Lutherans are in your judgment turbulent enemies of truth. If you are a Mild Calvinist, the Rigid judge you worse than any heretic, Turk, and Jew. If you are Rigid, the Mild assert that you are both a Manichaean and a Borborite. If you are a Majorist, Flacian, or Osiandrian, you will possess as enemies all who refuse to belong to your faction.

What kind of council, therefore, do you choose? One from that kind of men which is devoted to you, or to which you have bound yourself? You will conquer before such a council without contest and without danger, for you have selected your judges most prudently: you admit no one except the man who has already absolved you, except the man whose cause is the same as yours.

CHAPTER XLIV

The Method of Entering upon Peace

Good peace, O sincere peace, the end of my disputation and the happiness of the Church, where shall I seek you? Paul, the vessel of election, commands me at Romans 14:19 to pursue the things that are of peace. Peter, the rock of the Church, commands me at 1 Peter 3:11 to seek peace and pursue it. And God himself is not the author of dissension, but of peace. But whom shall I address concerning peace? Or rather, whom have all Catholics long been addressing together with me? Not the Theologians of the opposing party; for they, ἄσπονδοι, have declared eternal war against us without a treaty. What shall we do with them? What shall we expect from them? Recently one man from their company, Joseph Hall, began a polemical work and called its first part Rome Irreconcilable. There he says that it is necessary for them and Rome to disagree, §21, and in §22: "God will sooner create a new Rome than reform the old." Nevertheless, if we are rejected by the Theologians, we are not embittered against peace by their curses; we shall flee for refuge to the moderation of statesmen and the equity of princes. Perhaps those who now wage war after having been led into it by a cunning stratagem will grant peace more readily.

Now, therefore, I address you, O Kings and Princes, who foster any religion different from the Roman, Catholic, and ancient religion. As a suppliant I call upon you as arbiters, patrons, and advocates of peace. What I ask is great, I confess, and difficult, which I lament. But it is lawful for great things to be sought from magnates, and the power of the giver makes easy those things which by nature are difficult.

I have a reason to hope for peace, and you have a reason to grant it: the frailty of human judgment, which vehemently seeks certain things and swiftly abandons the same. What it held fixed and ratified when the day departed, it condemns and impales when the day returns. This indulgence, therefore, must be granted to infirmity; and where there was no perseverance in innocence, let there be repentance. Let it be permitted to return to the point at which what was rashly denied may be conceded and what was incautiously admitted may be renounced.

The examples are at hand and are in the acts of your archives: within a hundred years peace has been attempted a hundred times, both between us and your people and among the various divisions of your parties. For what region, what city, holds that faith which it first received after departing from our Church? Some began with Zwingli and went over to Luther; very many, after manifold changes within Lutheranism, departed to Calvin.

Behold, moreover, while I am writing these very things in the year 1618, on the Kalends of November, a new peace and a new Synod are under discussion between the Gomarists and the Arminians--that is, between the bitterest enemies whom Europe contains. The Arminians protest that the Gomarists are Manichaeans and Borborites, and that they worship the very Demon himself in place of God. The Gomarists, now stronger in military force, run forward on the same line against the Arminians. They say that the latter are worse than Turks, Jews, all heretics, and even the Jesuits themselves; and yet they do not despair of peace, although they will never attain it, however they may devise truces and syncretisms, because both parties lack the support of peace--that is, the foundation of truth. Nor does God ever permit an agreement of errors without allowing more dissensions to flow from the nature of that agreement.

If, therefore, peace is hoped for and attempted amid such hostile wrath, inveterate hatreds, and recent wounds, why not also between us and those who are vehement in their opinion but nevertheless unstable? The good and merciful God has compassion upon those who err; perhaps he will grant that those regions which have been changed three, four, five, and six times to another religion may at last be changed to the true one. Those whom the windings of the roads within the labyrinth have long wearied may sometime find the true exit.

Unhappy indeed is an error which is driven on by another error, as wave by wave, and is never dashed to pieces by the truth. The Augsburg Confession was changed twelve times, as is stated in the Colloquy of Herzberg, fols. 91--92. At the assembly of Naumburg an uncorrupted copy was sought in vain. At the assembly of Altenburg the Theologians of Jena called it a buskin. I omit the rest. If your Theologians have erred and have been divided into so many sects, they can err even now; they can take up again what they have condemned and return to the Catholic faith. This will easily occur if you, O Princes, are willing to tread in the footsteps of your fathers; for we see the opinions of peoples turned at the nod of princes, while all accommodate themselves to the ruling power--a word which the unhappiness of the times has now made proper to the business of religion.

The difficulties of the cause, however, are innumerable, and they render peace difficult, though not impossible. For, first, it is the character of error that it cannot stand for long, and yet those who err do not therefore return to the truth first, but are scattered. Thus the Arians and Macedonians departed into various sects, until Mohammedanism was compounded from them all; and it too has parties among so barbarous a people. We see it occur thus in Europe: all disagree, all wish to be Christians, but what fraction is sound? The cause is that those who have abandoned the truth are struck with blindness. If the blind begin to walk, the farther they proceed, the greater the divergences they make.

There is more than one cause why your teachers fall into new errors, but the chief cause is that they do not believe to be true the things which they hawk to you as oracles of the Holy Spirit. Mathesius, in Sermon 12 on the life of Luther, fol. 147, relates that Anthony Musa told him that, when he said that he had sorrowfully complained to Luther because he himself could not believe the things which he preached to others, Luther replied: “Blessed, then, be God, since the same thing happens to others as happens to me; for until now I believed that it happened to me alone.” Because, therefore, they do not believe what they wish others to believe, they presently choose something else which appears more probable; they reach the truth itself with difficulty. For they do not reject at once all the things which they wish to appear to have believed, lest they appear defeated; and they delight in the praise of novelty. Hence there are so many new sects in Belgium and in the North. Nevertheless, this is a good within the evil: being cut into small pieces, they look back upon themselves and embrace the truth more readily.

Next, I see those who contend far more bitterly with one another than with us contriving peace. What today is more common and better known than the syncretism of your preachers? Do you believe that they disagree among themselves? Hear the Dean and Theologians of Tübingen sounding a terrible trumpet in the year 1588. Second, they say that the errors of the Zwinglians and Calvinists, as they call them, are far more horrible than Papist idolatry. Third, they say that the Zwinglians and Calvinists, abusing the doctrine and profession of the Gospel, inflict more harm than the Papists. Therefore:

1. Following the example of Paul, one must fight against them; 2. following the example of Luther, who wished that Zwingli had remained a Papist; 3. after their defection from the Papists, they inflicted more harm than they could have inflicted if they had remained with them; 4. the Calvinists abuse the humanity of the Lutherans and vaunt brotherhood; 5. the Calvinists introduce new errors intolerable to the Church--and they enumerate them.

Thus they dispute at Heidelberg concerning syncretism. Although they say these things and said them in 1588, nevertheless in the meantime a great part of the Lutherans migrated to Calvinism, even your ministers themselves, for whom the will of princes was sufficient for abjuring their faith. Someone will say that these things are said by the Lutherans of Tübingen but denied by the Calvinists of Heidelberg. The Lutherans say them rightly; the Calvinists deny them wrongly. For although at the beginning they say that they disagree with the Lutherans only in one article, and not in that whole article, nevertheless at the end they retract this: “What things could we, in turn, cast against these men”--the Tübingen theologians--“in this place, and how MONSTROUS and UNWORTHY of Theologians?” Thus say the Heidelberg theologians.

Peace, therefore, can prudently be hoped for from the mercy of GOD; but the method and the beginning must be treated. The true and customary method is indeed that which I proposed in the book On the Peace of Germany: that we should stand by the judgment of the ancient Councils when they interpret the Scriptures. But since, amid so great a variety of dissenters, no council can be given which all embrace, many things must necessarily precede, and methods must be entered upon which all ought to approve by right judgment.

The first method of concord is that the state of the question and controversy be correctly formulated--a state which a great part of the disputants and your Stentors in the pulpits corrupt. For the question is not whether the pure and unadulterated word of God must be taught; whether definition must be made from it; whether the word of God must be rejected. Accordingly, Bucer, in his book On Concord, calumniously judges that this must be conceded among the first things: "that the true word of God be freely preached everywhere"; for we granted this long ago.

This, therefore, is the controversy: when the word of God, which we all call sacrosanct, has been placed in the midst, which party possesses its true and genuine understanding? Nor is this the question only between us and them, but among their petty sects: whether the Lutherans or the Calvinists truly interpret the word of God, and whether the Arminians or the Gomarists do so.

The first advantage of this consideration is that those who are to make peace agree at least in certain matters and possess common principles. Nor is it an obstacle that they acknowledge for the most part the written word alone, whereas we acknowledge the written and handed-down word, or ἄγραφον [unwritten]. For this very matter will be disputed from the written word: whether the existence of traditions is repugnant to it; whether it is a tradition that those books which the Church venerates as the word of God are canonical. For Luther himself confesses that infant baptism cannot be proved evidently from Scripture. Ochino argued thus: "Whatever is not evident in Scripture must not be believed; the condemnation of polygamy is not evident in Scripture; therefore:" And thus, from that principle concerning the written word alone, he introduced polygamy.

Nor do I demand anything inequitable when I pronounce and insist that this state of the question must be proposed. All the hundreds of those who err repeat with one voice: "Scripture, the word of God, the pure and unadulterated word of God." And yet they dispute about its meaning. I am not ignorant that very many disputations are useless, as Tertullian observed long ago; but I judge that all can be brought back to some equity and concord if we all dispute about the meaning of Scripture and that one aim alone is proposed.

You, O Prince, believe Scripture. I too believe it; indeed, I am prepared to die for one iota or stroke. There is agreement, therefore, in this matter. But from this beginning you subsequently believe one thing and I another, because Scripture says one thing according to my meaning, another according to yours, and perhaps another in the opinion of those whom you believe. Hence, therefore, arises another question: whether you and your people, or I, possess the true meaning. We must therefore join battle more closely.

The second method of concord is that we should all together beseech almighty God that, since the controversy concerns the meaning, God may deign to aid us with his own light, so that we may draw out the truth and be confirmed in the truth. Next, let us debate the true meaning from the idioms of Scripture, analogy, comparison with other passages, evident deduction, and the usage of the ancient Church, the Councils, and the Fathers.

That method of comparison possesses many advantages if it is conducted among humane men and with modesty. First, no one will make us hateful among those who do not know us, as though we were despisers of Scripture. Second, when the paint has been stripped away, the disease of those who oppose Scriptures to everything, both against us and mutually against themselves, will immediately appear. Third, there will be fewer contentions, since all will be occupied in investigating Scripture, not in mutual combat, in which they blaze up at a light touch--indeed, like sufferers from gout, they cry out at the suspicion of a touch. Fourth, since ministers are of two kinds--some clamorous and eristic, who refer everything to their preconceived opinion, and others more peaceable and more learned--the commentaries of the latter afford a great opportunity and means for blunting the insolence of the Stentors. Fifth, the ministers will not be compelled to act intemperately and angrily because they are interpreting Scripture; for in eristic disputation, unless they wash themselves in all their bile, their cause seems to have fallen, and a patient disputant is regarded as a betrayer. Sixth, although someone is not evidently defeated, he will nevertheless observe that Scripture does not support him; he will also fear the array of many great men on the other side. Nor will he be able to condemn me when he has not defeated me from his own principle.

I shall demonstrate an example. In Proverbs 16 it is said: “God made all things for his own sake, the impious man also for the evil day.” The Gomarists in Belgium, and the rigid men who follow them, interpret this passage so as to say that God creates the impious in order that his own justice may shine forth in their punishment. See Piscator's theses 6, 7, and 9, and his disputation against Vorstius. The theses read thus:

1. Sins occur with God procuring them, and they occur with the same God willing them--indeed, willing them altogether thus. §17; likewise §§6 and 64, and throughout. 2. God wills that iniquity be done, although he does not delight in it, just as a sick man wills to drink a bitter draught although he does not delight in it. And thus that saying of Psalm 5, “You are not a God who delights in iniquity,” and so forth, must be understood. §95. 3. God willed that Judas betray Christ and that the Jews kill him, although he had prohibited this to them. §§10, 16, and 24. 4. That which is unjust--that is, contrary to his precept--is in conformity with the will of God; for example, that homicide by the Jews and the betrayal by Judas, and so forth. In the same place, especially §§16 and 24. 5. All things occur from the decree of God, even sins themselves, and indeed from an absolute and special decree. §§56, 58, and 130. 6. Because God wills to make known his justice and mercy, for that reason he also wills that sins occur. §61. 7. Because God procures that manifestation of his justice and mercy, for that reason he also procures the sins themselves. §64. 8. God procured that Absalom should violate his father's wives and that Shimei should curse his king, and so forth. In the same place, as also §17. 9. God destined all men for sins, and did so for this reason: that he might save some by mercy, and punish and destroy others by justice. §89. 10. Because God decreed to permit sins, it is therefore necessary that they occur, because otherwise he would have decreed in vain to permit them. §131. 11. The unbelief of the Jews--and similarly of all unbelievers--depends upon God's predestination. And the Apostle expressly teaches this in Romans 9. §133.

These things are according to the mind of Zwingli, Calvin, Beza, Gomarus, and others. I interpret the passage otherwise, more truly and better. God created the impious, not by implanting impiety in them, but he created men whom he foresaw would be impious; and he will use their impiety--which he did not make, but foreknew--to manifest his justice. He created the man who was to go into the evil day; he did not ordain him to punishment except from foreseen impenitence.

I prove my interpretation thus. 1. The Hebrew words do not indicate that God ordained the impious man for the evil day, or that he made the man impious; and that text alone is authentic for you: גם רשע ליום רעה, “also evil for an evil day,” or, as others render it, “and the evil or impious man will fall or perish in the evil day.” For since the article הא is not joined to the word רשע, it can be expressed in the nominative case just as well as in the accusative. Next, the Seventy interpreters explain it thus: οἱ δὲ ἀσεβεῖς ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κακῇ ὀλοῦνται. “But the impious will perish in the evil day.” Those words, therefore, do not signify an absolute ordination by God and a decree of condemning without fault.

2. Unless we follow this interpretation, we shall make God unjust; for he cannot destine someone to punishment without foreseen fault, just as he cannot condemn without committed fault. This, therefore, is an exercise of cruelty, not of justice.

3. God is infinitely good; therefore he infinitely abhors the infliction of unjust punishment, and consequently also the destination to punishment.

4. It is much more cruel even to procure sins. For then God would be the Tiberian God which the Hollanders have described for us.

5. The Fathers interpreted the passage thus with me. Augustine, Letter 106 to Paulinus: “Although he did not make sins, nevertheless who but God created the natures themselves--which in themselves are undoubtedly good--in which, nevertheless, from the choice of the will the vices of sins were to exist, and in many such vices for which eternal punishment was to be rendered?”

And in book 2 Against the Calumnies of the Pelagians, chapter 3: “God is indeed the creator of all men, but no one was created by him in order that he might perish, because the cause of being born is one thing, the cause of perishing another. For that a man is born is the benefit of the Creator; but that he perishes is the desert of the transgressor.” The ancient Fathers agree in the same judgment, as does that whole Church which existed in the age of Augustine and thereafter.

6. Thus also interpret all the Arminians, those who think more mildly in Germany and France, and even those in Britain who interpret against Calvin and altogether condemn Calvin's error in this interpretation. The Lutherans do so much more severely: they judge that interpretation so impious and deadly that in whole volumes they prove that the GOD of the Calvinists is the very evil demon.

If in this manner we search the Scriptures from the beginning of Genesis to the end of the Apocalypse and dispute about their true meaning, it will appear most clearly that no iota and no stroke of the divine word is denied, mutilated, or perverted by us.

No one can deny us this opportunity, provided only that he is a lover of truth. From it, moreover, it will be brought about that what previously appeared to be contrary to the law is found to be according to the law and the mind of the legislator.

The third method of concord is that princes should hear our doctrine from us or from our books, not from their ministers, who are our enemies. For before God, the judge of all and avenger of calumnies, and before the whole world, we protest with our whole heart that very many and very grave dogmas are falsely imputed to us. Others have proved this, and most recently Maximilian Sandaeus in his Antithesis against Pareus, and Andreas Fornerus in his work Against the Jubilants. Why do they fasten upon us errors which we anathematize? Do they desire us to err, or to deceive their own people?

This method of concord is both necessary and efficacious. It is necessary because in councils, colloquies, and judgments concerning religion, one stands by the profession of the man with whom the controversy is conducted. Therefore what I believe must be attacked, not what an adversary imputes to me through ignorance or calumny. For example, they say that we deny that Jesus Christ is the sole Redeemer. With every asseveration, even by oath, we attest that Jesus Christ alone redeemed us. That calumny, therefore, must be put to rest so that the truth may be heard.

This method, moreover, is most efficacious because the greatest part of the controversies will fall away; indeed, the material of infamous sermons will vanish. For if they speak only truths about our doctrine, they will be unable to create hatred against us. We therefore stand before your tribunals, Most Illustrious Princes, and ask you to furnish patronage to the truth, as belongs to great fortune and to the office of a prince. What we request is not burdensome, but most equitable: namely, that in return for so many accusations and calumnies by which we have been and are daily brought into ill repute before your ears, you grant us one hearing--not vengeance, not retaliation. If you love peace, if you hold Christian charity, if you are guided by the laws of nature, hear what we believe and what we condemn. Hear it, however, from us, not from our enemies.

It is the office of a judge to investigate diligently: l. cum ii, § si praetor, de trans. in π. Next, he must not be moved rashly by rumors, nor judge undeserving men marked by hostile reputation, but inquire by a complete investigation. Why do they accuse us where our defense is not heard? Your ministers utter abuse; they do not accuse. For it is one thing to utter abuse, another to accuse. Cicero, For Marcus Caelius: “An accusation requires a crime: it must define the matter, designate the man, prove it by argument, and confirm it by a witness." If we are reviled, we shall bless in return; if we are accused, let our defense be heard. For we are oppressed by a most violent calumny: they maliciously and mendaciously defame us with errors which we are prepared to flee even by death.

The fourth method of concord is that there be a limit to calumnies concerning morals. It is an ancient artifice of Satan to defame the best men so that, since some men are openly evil and others feignedly good, if he also renders those who truly and sincerely cultivate virtue suspect of crimes, no one may be believed to be good, and therefore even to be capable of being good--although, otherwise, this is the greatest consolation of evil men: to carp at the good. Cato pleaded his cause forty-four times and was always acquitted. Pliny, book 7, chapter 28.

Never have so many and such foul kinds of calumnies been heard as in our age concerning Bellarmine, the Pontiff, and our Society. If they are true, grant a trial. With an escort we shall go to Heidelberg, The Hague, or London; let the accuser appear and prove the crime; we ourselves shall surrender ourselves to punishment. That method is necessary and efficacious for concord. For our enemies attempt to defame us so that we will not be heard; for if we are heard, we have conquered. Where is Christian gentleness? Where is justice? Shall I be brought into ill repute not only as an Antichristian on account of religion but also as an adulterer, thief, seditionist, and regicide, and yet, when I offer myself for judgment, not be heard? If you wish to kill me, condemn me after I have been heard, so that you may appear to have expended my blood for the state, not for calumny. You see what natural justice demands.

Your ministers defame not only the doctrine of Catholic doctors but also their life, and beyond the ordinary manner and conspicuously so in the case of the Society. There is no crime of which they do not make us guilty, no punishment which they judge excessive, no hatred of the whole world which is equal to our malice. Now I call God and men to witness: summon us into court, prove the crime; let us be permitted to die as men condemned, if not by law, at least by rite and process. Amid so many men who speak abuse and insults, we seek an accuser. We shall follow his forum; there will be none in which there is not some protection for innocence.

There are Kings and Princes acquainted with our affairs; there are prelates, magnates, nobles, Senators, citizens, craftsmen, servants, so many myriads of young students and men--among them Lutherans and Calvinists, and even Apostates from religion. If our crimes are unknown to them all, although our colleges are open to them, whence are they known to you? If they are known to them, behold: produce the witnesses, join issue, convict us.

It once came into my mind to persuade our Father General that, since so many calumnies against us arise daily, he should arrange for all the diplomas of Emperors, Kings, Princes, Prelates, states, cities, and courts which bear testimony to our innocence to be published--and he would certainly act prudently. For what brow will be so brazen, what face so hard, that if it should see a thousand testimonies of Monarchs, Princes, states, and other magnates on behalf of our innocence--and indeed of those who know us intimately and who have inquired into our affairs and life--it would still dare to calumniate? But let him to whom that duty belongs determine those matters.

Now I wish to be accused. I shall plead my cause from chains, provided that I am admitted to the chains from which I may plead my cause. Peace cannot be made otherwise, unless disgrace is removed from the innocent. For because they know that reputation is more excellent than life, and lest they be compelled to fight and debate, they wish us to be buried by infamy.

You, Most Illustrious Princes, will grant this the more readily because you are either Lutherans or follow the doctrine which they call Reformed--and, if the latter, either that first reformed doctrine or the one most recently adulterated. If you are Lutherans, you ought, if you believe your own people, to judge all Calvinist ministers the worst of calumniators. If you are Reformed, the same judgment must be made concerning the Lutherans. If, therefore, this is the complaint of all your people, admit mine also.

The sixth method of concord is that the impediments peculiar to you be removed. I call those impediments peculiar which inhere in your parties and yet can easily be removed.

The first impediment is the ἀντίληψις [preconception] and preoccupation of prejudgments, which shudders at everything alien. But this can be removed by the variety and altercations of the dissenters, and next by the changes of religions. Your ancestors were all most certain, but nevertheless they changed. After Zwingli was killed, your ministers themselves came into Germany; when the Protestants were defeated, the Lutherans fled into Switzerland and, having become Calvinists, declared that their own Lutherans had deservedly been defeated. Even now, as each prince goes over to a different religion, he draws and draws back a crowd of ministers; and do you believe them to be worshipers of God rather than flatterers of your power? What confidence, therefore, can there be in a cause abandoned so many times, a cause whose defenders stood on the other side?

The second impediment was removed long ago: namely, scandals given and received on both sides. For many years ago Bucer, in his book On Christian Concord, enumerated the impediments to his Gospel: the impious life of the Evangelicals. If, therefore, the impiety of the Evangelicals ought to deter us from their fellowship and association, there is no reason why our sins should greatly keep them from the ancient faith, especially since inventions of new heresies are added to malice of morals. “Added to all these things,” says Bucer, page 65, “is the not inconsiderable number of those who withdrew from Papist ceremonies and boast of the Evangelical reformation, and under that pretext and boast began--and today continue to begin--many evil and poisonous heresies and sects, seditions and tumults.”

The third impediment to our coming over to you is that we would become unlike the whole remaining Christian world, and, after abandoning the universal Church, would become like one hidden little part of a single corner. Augustine would then cast against us what he cast against the Donatists, who boasted that the Church had remained in their part alone. But you, O Princes, if you hear your own men, hold a solitary faith. For who holds a Lutheran faith in common with his neighbors? Who maintains the rigid faith together with a portion of the Genevans? All your people create little parts, because they do not hold peace with a part and because they wage wars against the whole. This, therefore, ought to be an incitement to you to join yourselves to the whole body from which you have been torn away.

The fourth impediment enumerated by Bucer is the fear of Catholic prelates lest they fall from their dignities. He judges this to be most grave. But he himself turns this back upon you, O Princes, for you possess more prelacies, and therefore you can fear as much as the Catholics. Yet this impediment too delays no one any longer. Our Prelates are prepared to bargain not only their dignities but even their blood for the faith.

Next, what great evil will befall those who defect from the faith of their fathers? If many and powerful men do it, they will not only retain their wealth but even make it hereditary, for a wife will be added. Nor is it secret what Luther advised Albert of Brandenburg, Archbishop-Elector of Mainz. You will leave their property also to our Canons and parish priests if they come over to you. This impediment, therefore, must be removed from your ministers; you would see hundreds of them migrate to the Catholics in a short time if we possessed the means from which to nourish them with their families.

The fifth impediment is lack of concern for salvation. It is a great impediment, and one by which occupied men excuse themselves. For because nothing better has yet appeared, they remain upon the course which they once undertook--not from knowledge of the good in which they are, but from ignorance of better things.

Nevertheless, there are many things which can move your ministers so that at last they too may undertake concern for their salvation and treat of it with us. First, they have perceived that they possess no foundation upon which to stand. For they cannot rest upon Scripture unless they are most learned in Hebrew, Chaldaic, and Greek; the rest lack an authentic Scripture, as I taught above when I treated of Scripture.

Second, they defend an antiquity which is doubtful. No one follows Luther, no one Calvin, no one anyone else in full; each man is a master to himself. On this account, since it is necessary that they struggle with doubt and suffer torments and lacerations of conscience, they are driven daily toward the truth by great torment. Every fluctuation warns voyagers of danger. And how are the ministers certain, when Luther himself doubted? In the Colloquy of Eisleben, fol. 96, §3: "I often think thus with myself: I almost do not know where I stand and whether I teach the truth or not."

Third, there are two things which especially afflict them and, as though with their necks twisted backward, drag them to the ancient religion; for, placed between the sacrificial knife and the stone, they cannot escape except by the most extraordinary aid. For at every hour they expect a command to change religion. If they vehemently inculcate as Orthodox what the prince now believes, it must soon afterward be changed with greater infamy. If they inculcate it languidly, they will be accused of betrayal. Hence confident speech, and thence despair of permanence--two utterly conflicting evils--devastate the soul, so that for this reason alone they ought to wish to return to the ancient religion, which has remained most constant for one thousand six hundred years.

Finally, unless a determination concerning the true religion is made by mature counsel, great zeal, and genuine sincerity, and a beginning of meeting and hearing is made, perfidy will gradually end in Turkism. The Arians, Samosatenians, and Ostorodians or Socinians are gaining strength; they deny the merit and divinity of Christ and teach other things which will reconcile them with the Mohammedans more easily than with us. This thought will easily shake out whatever lack of concern, sloth, and negligence inheres in doubtful minds.

Since, therefore, we cannot abandon the Church, go outside, and come over to you, we seek and beseech you with whatever exhortations we can that you instead return to Mother Church and to our brotherhood. But if we do not obtain this, grant at least that you hear our cause and either approve it or understand what ought to be approved.

We venerate Christ alone as true God and Son of God, and his Father and the Holy Spirit. We hold the αὐτοπιστίαν [self-authenticity] and authority of Scripture; concerning its meaning we dispute with your people. We teach nothing that is not orthodox. We cannot be condemned unheard. We implore the noble office of the judge; we are prepared to plead our cause under any condition. We both can and will render an account of all things, provided only that the tongue of your ministers--which is our daily furnace--does not occupy minds with prejudice which would otherwise judge justly. We call God and men to witness these things: prepared to prove our cause if we are heard; prepared to die undefended but innocent if we are neglected.

CHAPTER XLV

Severe Punishments Have Been Established for Seditious Persons and Rebellions

It makes a great difference how seditions have been instituted. Sometimes subjects disagree among themselves; sometimes they rise against the magistrate. At times factions remain within words, accusations, and insults; at times their spirits blaze up into fights and killings. It also makes a great difference whether a sedition arises among townsmen or countrymen, or among armed men. For tumults of armed men are not easily restrained without the sword.

Seditions were rare in Roman camps, for reverence for the oath was great. The soldiery stoned the consul Postumius when he denied them the spoils he had promised; under Appius Claudius they refused to conquer. In later ages, when the power of creating magistrates had been transferred to the camps, seditions too migrated there.

The ordinary punishment for seditions was capital, unless mercy dictated that the multitude be spared. Dio Cassius understands this of an atrocious sedition. If it remained within shouting or a light complaint about military service, the offender was cast down from his military rank. If a soldier had grasped the vine-staff, he changed his military service. And indeed the ultimate punishment was decreed for the man who stirred up sedition, even for those who appeal; for deference is not paid to an appeal, but the guilty man is punished at once with the penalty due.

For there are four kinds of crimes of maiestas. The first occurs when sovereign power is sought or the person of the prince is attacked; the second, when treason is undertaken; the third, when sedition is instituted; the fourth, when other lighter things are attempted against the prince. Evils permit no delays. Meanwhile all crimes of maiestas, either immediately or at least mediately, advance toward disturbing the state. Hence no one is exempted from torture in this cause.

Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian established in Code 9, title 8: “Let absolutely no one upon whom, without our consultation and knowledge, the torments of cords are inflicted be prohibited from employing a defense based on military service, birth, or dignity, with the sole exception of a cause of maiestas, in which alone there is an equal condition for all.” Given on the eighth day before the Ides of July, Valentinian the Younger and Victor being consuls. Thus Tiberius and Gaius Gracchus were killed by a concourse of men. In the same manner Carbo was killed as though by the state itself.

Houses also are customarily confiscated or demolished. Maelius's house was demolished, and the place is called the Aequimaelium. The house of Saturninus was also destroyed. Not only the houses of those who stirred up sedition, but also those in which forbidden assemblies were held, were destroyed. Sometimes monuments of crimes are set up, as we have seen done at Aachen and Frankfurt.

Canon Law excommunicates seditious persons if, after being admonished, they are unwilling to return to peace, distinction 90, final canon: “It has been reported to the Apostolic See that some of you wish to harm their brethren and contend so that they may fall; that they likewise disagree in the sacraments, and that on this account contentions and rivalries arise among you. We command you to turn away from these dissensions, to agree in all these matters, and mutually to bring aid. For if you quickly neglect to do this and do not strive to be mutually reconciled, do not doubt that you will be driven from the communion of the Apostolic See and of the whole Church.”

It forbids them to be initiated into sacred orders, distinction 46, canon 8: “We establish that seditious persons are never to be ordained clerics, just as neither usurers nor avengers of their own injuries are to be ordained.” Those already initiated are deprived of their honor, canon Conspirationum, cause 11, question 1.

The severity of the punishment is weighed according to the magnitude of the fault and the dignity of the persons. Under the ancient law, the authors of a sedition are either raised upon the fork, thrown to beasts, or deported to an island. In Germany they are cut into four parts and the heart is drawn out while it is still beating. These things must be understood of a sedition truly attempted and accompanied by some act or preparation for acting; for a slip of the tongue must not readily be drawn into punishment. Under Roman law, the man who attempted to stir up sedition was punished with a very heavy fine, not with death; by the first law On Seditious Persons, he was prohibited from spectacles. Demetrius the Cynic was relegated to an island by Vespasian because he debated too incautiously concerning the state. A certain Diogenes, who dared the same, was beaten with rods. Crates the Cynic was punished capitally. Dio, Vespasian.

But if they attempt it more often, they are struck with the sword. Callistratus, chapter 28, § solent, On Punishments, book 48, title 19, although at times they were punished with exile and at times by beating with cudgels. The law reads thus: “Certain men who commonly call themselves ‘young men’ are accustomed in certain cities to accommodate themselves to the turbulent acclamations of the populace. If they have admitted nothing further and have not previously been admonished by the governor, they are dismissed after being beaten with cudgels, or they are even prohibited from spectacles. But if, after being corrected in this manner, they are found in the same offenses, they must be punished with exile, and sometimes capitally--namely, when they have repeatedly conducted themselves seditiously and turbulently and, after being apprehended several times and treated more mildly, have persevered in the same settled rashness.”

No different practice was customary among Christians. In the year 788, as Sigebert is the authority, Hardrad and other nobles were put to death by Charlemagne because of sedition. Indeed, Pippin, the son of Charles, was thrust into a monastery, but those who were his instigators in conspiring against his father were subjected to punishments.

Where a multitude has sinned, some part is enveloped in the punishment, yet in such a way that fear reaches all. Julius Caesar composed the soldiery in such a manner that those who had dared were each selected by lot for death. Macrinus likewise decimated them. Thus the punishment reached a few, the fear all.

When Leontius the prefect was being attacked by sedition on account of a charioteer who had committed a crime, he ordered whomever they encountered to be seized and hanged. This is certainly greatly disapproved, since very incautious men, although perhaps not innocent, pay the greatest penalties. Decimation, vicesimation, and centesimation are therefore better and more customary, because with little blood they bring much fear.

When the sole survivor carrying news of the Aeginetan disaster related that all the Athenians had perished, he was pierced by the needles and brooches of the widows whose husbands had perished. The Areopagite Senate afterwards forbade the use of the kind of clothing which they were wearing at that time. They pursued a womanly but malevolent sedition with a civil punishment, and one grave nevertheless in proportion to the frailty of the sex.

The multitude must therefore be spared; the law also indicates this, book 48, title On Punishments, law 38: “Deserters to the enemy or revealers of our counsels are either burned alive or suspended upon the fork.” And: “The authors of seditions or tumults, when the people have been aroused, are, according to the quality of their dignity, either raised upon the fork, thrown to beasts, or deported to an island.”

The Code also looks back to this law, book 9, title 30: “If anyone should perhaps attempt, contrary to the most manifest command, to take up the cause of the plebs and defend it against public discipline, he will sustain a most severe fine.” And: “In no places or cities is anyone's insulting interruption to proceed with tumultuous cries, nor are wanton words to be hurled merely to bring anyone into ill repute. Those who utter such voices and stir up tumults are to know that they will by no means obtain the fruit of the things they demand, but will be subjected to those punishments which the most ancient decrees established for the authors of sedition and tumult.”

Therefore participants in a sedition must be punished more moderately, but its authors more gravely. When the authors are uncertain, the multitude is punished more lightly. Gaius Curius acted thus, Frontinus, book 4, chapter 1: “When the consul Curio, in the Dardanian War near Dyrrachium, had five legions and one of them, after making a sedition, had refused military service and denied that it would follow the rashness of its commander on a harsh and dangerous expedition, he led out the four armed legions and ordered all of them to stand with weapons drawn as though in battle. After this he ordered the seditious legion to come forward unarmed and, ungirded in the sight of the armed army, compelled it to cut straw. On the following day he likewise compelled the ungirded soldiers to make a ditch; and no entreaties of the legion could obtain from him that he should not lower its standards, abolish its name, and distribute its soldiers as replacements among the remaining legions.”

Those who speak evil of the prince are sometimes tolerated. Modestinus: “The person, namely, must be considered in this crime: whether he was capable of doing it, whether he contemplated it, and whether he was of sound mind; nor must a slip of the tongue readily be drawn into punishment. For although rash men are worthy of punishment, nevertheless they must be spared as though insane, if the offense is not of such a kind that it either descends from the letter of the law or must be judged as an example.”

The edict of Theodosius, Arcadius, and Honorius, Augustuses, Code 9, title 7, is most mild: “If anyone, ignorant of modesty and unacquainted with shame, should believe that our names must be assailed with a wicked and wanton curse, and, turbulent through drunkenness, should become a detractor from our times, we do not wish him to be subjected to punishment or to sustain anything hard or harsh; for if it proceeded from levity, it must be despised; if from madness, it is most worthy of pity; if from injury, it must be remitted. Hence, all things remaining unimpaired, let the matter be referred to our judgment, so that we may weigh men's words from their persons and determine whether they ought to be passed over or investigated.” But if insults of pernicious example, or indeed the beginnings of seditions, should be scattered, that madness must be restrained by grave punishment.

Some princes, however, exercised that inquiry severely. In the time of Tiberius, Paconianus was strangled in prison on account of poems repeatedly made against the prince. Caligula caused many men to be killed who, while flattering him, had called him “the young man of Augusta,” because he judged himself held in contempt. If anyone should seek a catalogue of these matters, the Lives of the Caesars will supply it; in them we read of very many punishments for words.

Deservedly and justly, those who speak evil of princes, their revilers, and their mockers are gravely punished. And although it is pious and consonant with divine laws to remit offenses and injuries, and not to punish words with exiles or tortures--and although princes bind themselves with grave crime when they rage rashly against bodies on account of uttered words--nevertheless, at times it is lawful, and indeed necessary, to punish. The following determinations must therefore be made concerning this matter.

FIRST. It is a grave crime to speak evil of the prince, detract from his reputation, disclose hidden sins, exaggerate true things, and fasten falsehoods upon him. Thus the divine oracles: “You shall not speak evil of the gods, and you shall not speak evil of the prince of your people.” Exodus 22:28. And Numbers 12: Miriam, the sister of Moses, is struck with leprosy. “He who was angry departed; the cloud also withdrew which was over the tabernacle; and behold, Miriam appeared white with leprosy like snow. And when Aaron looked upon her and saw her covered with leprosy, he said to Moses: ‘I beseech you, my lord, do not lay this sin upon us, because we have acted foolishly. Let her not become as one dead and as an aborted child which is cast from its mother's womb. Behold, half of her flesh has already been consumed by leprosy.’”

Consider the circumstance and gravity of the sin. Miriam, from rivalry and womanly contention, having drawn Aaron into the cause, spoke against Moses: “Has the Lord spoken only to Moses? Has he not also spoken to us?” Miriam spoke truths, for she was a prophetess and Aaron a prophet; but they owed honor to Moses as the greater. Miriam is punished so severely that leprosy consumes half her flesh. Aaron owed his escape from punishment to the priesthood, for God did not wish to afflict him with public disgrace as he did Miriam. Had Moses not poured out prayers for his sister, without doubt she would very swiftly have been consumed by leprosy and paid the penalty with death.

SECOND. It is lawful to punish with death those who speak evil of kings. Apostolic Canon 83 is cited: ὅστις ὑβρίσει βασιλέα, ἢ ἄρχοντα τιμωρίαν τινύτω, κἀ εἰ μὲν κληρικὸς καθαιρείσθω, εἰ δὲ λαϊκὸς ἀφοριζέσθω, "If anyone should insult a king or prince, let him pay the penalties; if indeed he is a cleric, let him be deposed; if a layman, let him be deprived of communion." This Canon, I say, does not decree death, but deposition and excommunication; therefore some do not correctly translate τιμωρίαν as "capital punishment."

The Greeks had a law that those who spoke evil should be led into chains. With that custom observed, the Triumvirs cast the poet Naevius into prison. Gellius, book 3, chapter 3. Dio relates that all injuries committed against the prince were judged to be impiety. Paconius was strangled in prison because of poems published against the prince. Therefore the offense is not simply remitted; rather, the evaluation belongs to the prince, so that he may weigh men's words from their persons and decide whether they ought to be passed over or investigated.

Certainly evil words against a magistrate have always been regarded among crimes of maiestas, and at times they are exceedingly injurious and seditious alike. When, therefore, the magistrate, who is the vicar of God, is affected with ignominy, he can avenge the public injury. When incitements to tumults arise from evil words, he cannot neglect his reputation, since the safety of his subjects rests upon it. The reason is that a man gravely harms the state when he detracts authority from its head and makes contemptible or hated the man whom all ought to reverence in the place of God. For all these things are incitements to seditions and secessions.

It is not lawful to rage against the friends and children of conspirators, for this is forbidden by divine law, Deuteronomy 24:16 and 4 Kings 14:6: "And when Amaziah had obtained the kingdom, he struck his servants who had killed the king his father; but he did not kill the sons of those who had killed him."

In Persia, therefore, the custom was cruel and unjust whereby the children and wives--and even the households--of those who had attempted something against the king were killed. Justin, book 10; Plutarch, Artaxerxes. The greater part of the kings of Israel did the same, destroying the entire household of their predecessors lest some avenger arise. The same law existed among the Macedonians, as Curtius relates in book 6. It was a wicked and dangerous law, for no equity permits an entire household to perish for the offense of one man. But who cannot infer how great a danger to kings was created from it, when for the sake of one assailant many brave men attempted everything, shaking off their danger by flight, killing, and treason? Hence the continual killings of kings, despite the severity of the law.

Archelaus killed Alcetas with his son Alexander; he himself was killed by a young man whom he had mocked. Orestes, Archelaus, and Pausanias followed; after they had been extinguished within a very short interval, the kingdom again devolved upon Amyntas. His son Alexander was killed by the man of Alorus, and the man of Alorus by Perdiccas. Finally, on the occasion of this law, the whole progeny of Alexander was killed. For Cassander killed Olympias, Alexander's mother; Roxana, Alexander's wife, with her son Alexander; and Barsine, his other wife, with her son Hercules. Demades the orator was also killed by Antipater after his son had first been slaughtered in his embrace. Yet nothing was effected by such cruelty. The son Antipater killed his mother; Alexander, the other son, killed his brother Antipater; Demetrius killed Alexander. At almost the same time the stock of Alexander was removed by Cassander and the stock of Cassander by his rivals, and on each side rage was directed against the women.

The clemency of King Mithridates was praised: after he had exacted punishment from Attilius the plotter and from the conspirators, he dismissed the servants because they had offended not voluntarily but under unhappy necessity.

On this matter there exist laws of Arcadius and Honorius which are mild and consonant with equity, Code 9, title 8, On the Julian Law of Maiestas: "Whoever shall enter into a criminal faction with soldiers, private persons, or barbarians, or shall accept or administer the oath of that faction, and shall even plot against illustrious men who take part in our councils and consistory, against senators also--for they too are a part of our body--or, finally, against any man who serves us: since the laws have willed that the intention of a crime be punished with the same severity as its accomplishment, he himself, as guilty of maiestas, shall be struck with the sword, all his goods being assigned to our treasury.

“But his sons, to whom by special imperial mildness we concede life--for they ought to perish by their father's punishment, since in them examples of the paternal, that is, hereditary, crime are feared--shall be excluded from the inheritance and succession of their mother or grandmother and of all their nearest kin; they shall take nothing under the wills of outsiders; they shall be perpetually needy and poor; their father's infamy shall always accompany them; they shall attain absolutely no honors and no oaths of service. Finally, they shall be such that, while they are defiled by perpetual want, death shall be a consolation to them and life a punishment. Finally, we command that those who ever attempt to intervene with us on behalf of such persons shall themselves be marked without pardon.

“But to their daughters, however many in number they may be, we will that only the Falcidian fourth from the goods of their mother--whether she dies testate or intestate--shall come, so that the daughters may possess moderate support rather than the whole advantage and name of an heir. For the sentence ought to be milder toward those whom, on account of the weakness of their sex, we trust will dare less. Emancipations, moreover, which shall have been conferred by the aforesaid persons--whether upon sons, but only after the law was promulgated, or upon daughters--shall not be valid. Dowries, gifts, and, finally, alienations of any property whatsoever which it is established were made by any fraud or law from the time when the aforementioned persons first contemplated entering into a faction and association, we establish to be of no force.

“The wives of the aforesaid persons, after recovering their dowry, if they shall have been in that condition in which they are obliged to preserve for their children the things which they received from their husbands under the title of gift, shall know that, at the time when the usufruct is extinguished, they will leave to our treasury all those things which according to law were owed to the children; and from these goods also the Falcidian fourth shall be deemed assigned to the daughters only, not to the sons. What we have provided concerning the aforesaid persons and their sons, we judge with similar severity concerning their attendants, accomplices, and ministers and their sons.

“But if any one of these men, at the beginning of the faction that has been entered into, inflamed by zeal for true praise, shall betray the faction that was entered into, he shall be gifted by us with both reward and honor. But the man who shall have made use of the faction, if--even late, yet while it is still unknown--he shall disclose the secrets of its counsels, shall be regarded as worthy only of absolution and pardon.” In these provisions many special measures are established for averting the crime.

If anyone violates the prince or a subordinate magistrate--whether a proconsul, the prince's vicar, or a son designated as successor--the same crime of maiestas is committed. For when it is said that this crime is committed if anyone violates a magistrate of the Roman people, this is not understood of the consuls or Augustus alone. Indeed, if anyone beats the attendants of a magistrate, he is customarily punished capitally; this, however, must be understood when they are exercising the function of their office.

Otherwise, those who opposed the attendants and prefects of Nero or Gaius when they prowled by night were certainly not guilty of maiestas, since not the citizens themselves but the intimates of the princes were stirring up seditions and disturbances. Nor do the sacred Canons punish as assailants of clerics those who restrain clerics while they run about by night in secular dress. It has expressly been said that, if an inferior magistrate is discharging his office, the man who opposes him is regarded as seditious or as a disturber, but not if he is doing other things. At Rome a prostitute was acquitted who shut out an Aedile while he was reveling and wounded him with the blow of a stone when he attempted to break in by force.

CHAPTER XLVI

A Good Citizen Should Sometimes Join One Party, and Sometimes Neither

The law of Solon has been discussed by many; Gellius relates it: “If, because of discord and dissension, a sedition and division of the people into two parties should occur, and if on that account, their spirits being inflamed, arms should be taken up on both sides and fighting should occur, then whoever at that time and in that case of civil discord has not joined himself to either party, but, solitary and separated, has withdrawn from the common evil of the city, let him be deprived of his home, his native country, and all his fortunes; let him be an exile and an outcast.” Others believe entirely the contrary: that in civil wars and sedition one should withdraw from disturbances.

In this difficult matter, which nevertheless often occurs in practice, it seems to me that a distinction must be employed: a distinction of persons and controversies, which must be discussed individually.

Sometimes seditions are stirred up in such a manner that it is doubtful which party fosters the legitimate cause. The people secede and free those bound for debt, but they have been stirred up by the patricians contrary to law and covenants. There was a long controversy concerning the war of Caesar and Pompey. “The victorious cause pleased the gods, but the defeated cause pleased Cato.” Accordingly, a man defends himself by a great judge, and even under the reign of the Caesars later generations were Pompeians:

> Still Magnus goes, an exile, with peoples accompanying him;
> let the world adore Pompey's adversity as much as his prosperity.

In this controversy, therefore, it was prudent to be absent from the disturbances. Pomponius Atticus acted thus, more illustrious for his friendship with Cicero than for any other thing. The reason is at hand. For when a war is of doubtful justice, it is not lawful for a free man to enroll in it unless he judges the cause of one party to be just. This is permitted much less in a sedition and civil war, for it is more atrocious to oppress citizens than foreigners. Atticus therefore acted rightly.

Justus Lipsius is almost of the same opinion, century 2, Letter 24. But he says that he does not involve himself, yet he does not define the matter. In book 6 of the Politics, chapter 7, he also employs a distinction. Therefore, although every war is sorrowful, and civil war especially, nevertheless at times it must be waged through necessity. Yet civil war must be avoided more than foreign war because it is more cruel.

I demonstrated this at the beginning. Now I am pleased to confirm it by Augustine's testimony, so that it may appear how rightly those men judge who flee civil war while they can. Augustine, book 3 of The City of God, chapter 23:

“But now let us recall briefly, so far as we can, those evils which, the more internal they were, the more wretched they proved to be: civil--or rather uncivil--discords; and no longer seditions, but even actual urban wars, where so much blood was poured out; where the zeal of parties raged against one another, no longer through the dissensions of contentions and diverse voices, but now plainly with iron and arms. How much Roman blood did the Social Wars, the Servile Wars, and the Civil Wars pour out? How great a devastation and desolation of Italy did they produce?

“For before allied Latium moved itself against Rome, all animals subject to human uses--dogs, horses, asses, oxen, and whatever other cattle were under human dominion--suddenly became wild and, forgetting their domestic gentleness, left their shelters and wandered free. They shunned every approach not only of other men but even of their masters, not without the death or danger of the man who dared, if anyone pressed them from close at hand. Of how great an evil was this a sign? And if this was a sign, how great an evil was that of which this was the sign? If this had occurred in our times, we would have suffered these men as more rabid than those men suffered their animals."

It is by no means the part of a good citizen to stir up or assist such great evils in a doubtful cause. So many fell in the war of Marius and Sulla, so many in peace, and yet it is still disputed whose cause was more just. The aristocrats defend Sulla, the plebs Marius; both parties detest the cruelty of each, and they mourn the deaths of their own people.

It is also the part of a good man to abstain from civil controversies, although he perceives the just cause of one party, if the other party maintains an unjust cause but itself probably judges that cause to be just, and if he sees that the victory will be very bloody and the disaster greater than the offense--a thing ordinary in civil wars. Therefore, although Sulla defended a just cause--let us grant that this was so--nevertheless good men who approved the victory shuddered at the cruelty. A man is not bound to fight in Sulla's camp, nor to promote a victory whose companion is such great cruelty and a greater evil than the war itself. For since the Marians judged that they were properly conducting the public cause, they must not be destroyed by such great slaughter that scarcely any remain over whom the Sullans may rule.

In this affair a man can indeed abstain, but he is not bound to abstain, because he can assist the legitimate cause. But if he is in a magistracy, if he will bring great weight to the victory, and if he observes that Marius will use victory cruelly, he ought not to withdraw assistance from the just cause. Therefore, if Atticus judged the Pompeian party to be the Roman and just party, he ought to have joined Pompey; if he doubted, neither party.

If one party openly maintains a wicked cause, either by protecting wicked men and robbers or by oppressing good men, so that they themselves confess that they do not act without crime, it is the part of a good man to join the upright party and the just cause; and, if called by his native country, to fight, although he sees that the outcomes of victory will be most sorrowful and cruel.

When the children of Israel had decreed war against the tribe of Benjamin, Judges 20, they ordered the men of Gibeah who had perpetrated that evil to be handed over to them. After they had conquered, they killed the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead because they had not been present at the war. For at Mizpah they had bound themselves by a great oath to kill those who were absent. The cause of the civil war was that the Benjaminites were unwilling to surrender the wicked men for punishment. All were compelled to the war under penalty of death. They killed all the citizens of Jabesh-Gilead, chapter 21:10: "They therefore sent ten thousand of their strongest men and commanded them: 'Go and strike the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead with the edge of the sword, both their wives and their little children.'"

Indeed, they killed all the Benjaminites, together with wives, little children, women, and beasts, chapter 20. Although, therefore, the victory was most sorrowful--and, unless God, who had determined to punish the crimes of the Benjaminites, had commanded it, most cruel--nevertheless no one could be absent from the civil war, because they punished the delayers and those who refused service in the same manner as the guilty. Moreover, those who willingly and knowingly maintain an impious cause through wickedness and injustice will deservedly impute to themselves all the cruelty of the victory.

When causes for sedition exist on both sides, as in the Roman state--for example, the importunity of moneylenders and the obstinacy of the plebs demanding new account-books--although it is established on which side justice stands, it is nevertheless the part of a good man, so far as can be done, to join neither party, but to attempt peace and, as long as it is hoped for, to bring all assistance to that end. For peace is better than any war and any victory, since in civil war the victory is more miserable than the war.

If peace is despaired of, one must go over to those who maintain the right. But when the causes of seditions are exceedingly slight--such as some which we enumerated above--it is not necessary for anyone to join himself to the just cause, provided that he does not maintain the unjust cause. For to stir up sedition and begin a civil war for a slight cause is unjust. Then, however, a powerful citizen is bound to compel the parties to concord and to effect peace, and to take up arms against those who refuse to accede to equity and concord. For if honorable men, exasperated by a slight cause, should attempt a duel and eagerly seek mutual wounds, a prince can compel them to peace, and so too can their native country, so that he who obstinately resists is judged to have lost his cause. For it is unjust to ruin one's native country on account of insignificant trifles.

If there is a rebellion of one party against the prince or magistrate, or if treason is under consideration, one ought to join oneself to the magistrate and, each according to his ability, defend him by every means possible--by counsel, aid, and hand. For the man who does not come to the prince's aid in necessity, but deserts him until he sees where the affair tends, is judged a traitor to the prince. Mettius Fufetius, prince of the Latins, did this when he deserted Tullus in the midst of the battle-line.

In this case Solon's judgment is most true. For who would not judge worthy of every punishment the man who would not assist David against his son Absalom or against Sheba? It is plainly necessary for the members to expend their labor in defense of the head, for all have sworn to the defense of the prince. But each does this according to his ability: by zeal, contribution, fighting, and other means by which the life of the Prince may be provided for.

But if subjects rise against the magistrate, many against a few, so that scarcely any hope exists that the better cause will be victorious--indeed, if the just party in the state fights against the unjust party in such a manner that it seems scarcely able to defend itself--a great difficulty arises. No one can join himself to the unjust party; adherence to the upright party carries a risk to life and fortunes. Therefore they ought not to assist the stronger, by whom they would be stained with the same crime, and they are unwilling to aid the weaker.

In this cause I judge thus. If there is someone who by his prudence, strength, and wealth can raise up the just party and obtain hope of victory, he ought to expend himself and his possessions upon liberating and establishing the state. Jehoiada acted thus: when he now hoped that he would be a match, he opposed Athaliah at immense peril and raised Joash to the kingdom. But as long as hope of victory does not yet appear, he will foster justice by counsel, admonitions, secret plans, and assistance, until there is hope that the just cause will triumph. Jehoiada did this same thing while he secretly reared the royal boy and prepared strength and men for him.

But if someone is a private man and cannot bring any weight to the relief of the state, he will not be bound to expose his fortunes and life to his enemies without any hope of public advantage. He will therefore remain quiet and foster the oppressed by prayers and secret assistance. For if he adds himself to the oppressed, he too will be oppressed; his wealth and capacity to assist will be taken away; and by this means the just party will be weaker and the unjust stronger.

This was done by many in the royal city of Aachen. Seditious men and rebels, through supreme wickedness, deprived the magistrate of authority; they were as contumacious against the Emperor's commands as they were injurious toward the magistrate. But in domestic and foreign strength they far surpassed those who followed the just cause, and the grave oppression of all good men endured for more than twenty years. If anyone sent forth a free voice, calumnies, insults, prisons, exiles, and proscription were immediately before his eyes. At last the state was recovered by patience and the secret assistance of certain men and by the brave constancy of others. This could not have occurred if the weaker and fewer men had at the beginning opposed the stronger and more numerous with armed force; for in the first conflict they would all have been slaughtered.

When matters stand thus in a state--that civil war is being waged and the justice of one party is established--it is almost always prudent to join that party. For the man who stands in the middle offends both parties. They judge themselves injured by him: they themselves defend the state at the peril of all their possessions, while those who maintain the middle neither undertake labors for the common good nor wish to make expenditures. Hence during the war they are prey to both parties, for each battle-line demands assistance from them as citizens for the defense of the city; after the victory they are victims of the victor.

Pomponius Atticus remained quiet while Caesar and Pompey fought; nevertheless, he felt the same losses of fortune as others. Had Pompey been victor, Atticus would not have been in a better condition than Cicero and the others who were in Pompey's camp. Cicero, book 11, Letter 6 to Atticus: “I have never regretted that I departed from arms. There was such great cruelty among them and such great alliance with barbarous nations that a proscription was framed not by name but generally; so that it had already been determined by the judgment of all that the goods of all of you would be the spoil of that victory. I say ‘of you’ without qualification, for they never thought of you yourself except most cruelly. Therefore I shall never regret my intention; I regret my counsel.”

When one party has been defeated in civil disaster, it is better for the remnants to defend themselves than to yield suddenly. Accordingly, Cato renewed the war in Africa--not indeed in hope of victory, but, as others judged, in hope of a settlement. Cicero, book 11, Letter 12 to Atticus: “But, as I see, we must labor much more concerning Africa, which you write is daily being strengthened more in hope of terms than of victory.” For in truth the new war in Africa and Spain mitigated Caesar's victory, lest he render himself more hated.

For what Caesar's disposition was, Caelius the Caesarian sufficiently indicates to Cicero, Letter 11, book 10 to Atticus: “If you judge that Caesar's method in dismissing adversaries and offering terms will be the same, you err. He thinks and even speaks of nothing except what is atrocious and savage. He departed angry with the Senate. He has clearly been provoked by these intercessions. By Hercules, there will be no place for entreaty. Therefore remain there if your only son, if your household, if your remaining hopes are dear to you; if we are of any value with you, if your son-in-law, that excellent man, is of any value. You ought not to wish to disturb their fortune so that we may be compelled either to hate or abandon that cause in whose victory our safety lies, or to entertain an impious desire against your safety.”

If he had not feared the Spanish and African war, he would have exhibited himself in victory as the man whom Caelius depicts. And certainly he soon exhibited himself as proud and insulting toward all; nothing was lacking beyond cruelty arising from pride and suspicion.

When civil wars have blazed up to such a point that barbarous nations are called to assistance with great danger, I judge that it is the part of a good man even to desert a just cause rather than assist those who summon barbarians. Cicero again did so, and gives his reason in Letter 7, book 11 to Atticus:

“But of all things nothing is nevertheless more regretted than that I did not go to Africa. I employed this judgment: that the state ought not to be defended by the barbarian auxiliaries of a most deceitful nation, especially against an army often victorious. Perhaps they do not approve. For I hear that many good men have come to Africa, and I know that they were there previously. I am greatly pressed at this point. Here too there is need of fortune, that there may be some among them--or, if possible, all--who prefer safety. For if they persevere and prevail, you see what will become of us.”

Therefore the Greek emperors who summoned the Turks to their aid against their rebels deservedly lost the empire. It is certainly better that some state should exist, even one belonging to adversaries, than that none should exist. At times fear, at times ambition, impels great men to those counsels: fear impelled Boniface; ambition impelled Rufinus, Stilicho, and others. Nor are examples among our own people lacking. Part of Hungary perished thus, and many have experienced this evil.

The Belgian rebels were indeed twice in the utmost danger of servitude: first when they summoned Alençon, then Leicester. The latter began to betray their liberty to the English, the former to the French. For this reason wiser statesmen soon turned themselves to every means of expelling both--Alençon by arms, Leicester by artifice; and if Leicester had not yielded, he would have felt their arms. But I do not speak of foreigners of every kind, but of barbarians, such as Turks, Tartars, and others, and of those equal to them in perfidy, impiety, and savagery. But now let us proceed to wars.

CHAPTER I

That It Is Proper for a Civilian and a Priest to Discuss War

§ 1. "The life of man upon earth is warfare"; wherefore the Apostle commands me to labor like a good soldier of Christ Jesus. But does he enjoin that warfare by which the invader is deprived of life when he commands one to answer at the roll-call and to stand ready for battle? He proclaims spiritual warfare against the powers of the air, the rulers of these darknesses: "Let us therefore cast off the works of darkness and put on the armor of light" (Romans 13:12), which at 2 Corinthians 6:7 he calls "the armor of justice on the right hand and on the left." For in truth, "though we walk according to the flesh, we do not wage war according to the flesh; for the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God for the destruction of fortifications" (2 Corinthians 10:4). What, then, has spiritual warfare to do with carnal weapons? What has it to do with those weapons by which an enemy is killed, if one must pray for enemies and do good to those who persecute us? Two objections, therefore, are made against one who treats of war. The first is that a man inexperienced in war cannot give precepts from the shade to those engaged in combat. The other is that this is least becoming to a priest and religious, whose office it is to protect books and temples:

> Let men conduct war and peace, whose part it is to conduct war.

§ 2. At the threshold of this book I have set myself to answer these objections, so as to satisfy both the reproach of detractors and the question of the well-disposed.

And indeed, if it is objected that for a civilian to write about war is foreign to his condition and absurd--if they say, "Will you dare these things, you man of the study, who have never seriously seen a camp and have never, in short, touched any part of any military duty?"--Justus Lipsius, greater than envy and above slanders, already answered long ago on my behalf, in Book V of the Politics, chapter 1:

> I indeed shall dare it, yet not through confidence in my own ability or powers, but in those from whom I have long borrowed and taken. For what is mine here? Some order and arrangement, perhaps. But those men go before me with their words and judgments, whom, I say confidently, any Hannibal, or Caesar himself, would not refuse to hear on this very matter. For what escaped those wise and illustrious men? Why should their judgment not be correct and pure here also? Some of them took part in wars, and indeed commanded them; others lived in that senate and among that people where these matters were the constant subject and activity. They therefore saw and heard and--what is chief--observed with judgment the very causes and origins of things, not only the προφάσεις [occasions] of events, but the αἴτια [causes] themselves. Alexander, truly Great in military affairs, did not hesitate to take and declare Homer his teacher in warfare: may I not therefore take these men with better right? For what did that poet sing of except one war, and that very war sprinkled with fables? He was certainly an extraordinary poet and more than a human poet, yet a poet nonetheless. Those men of mine--I plainly mean the historians--wrote of wars from almost every age, in a continuous series and with uncorrupted fidelity. Nor did they do only this; often, in the narration itself or outside it in speeches, as though intentionally, they mingled most salutary admonitions and counsels for every part of military affairs. What part or art of it do they not both set before us with examples and also touch upon in words: the army, camps, columns on the march, engagements, the assault of towns, provisions, the making and avoiding of ambushes, and the remaining matters proper to the administration of war? Since I have occupied myself in these matters for so many years, and with that inquisitive eye of the mind wander daily through those broad fields of the histories, why is it not lawful for me also to understand and judge something in them?
> "You did not see them," they say. Certainly; and therefore I claim for myself neither the practice nor the handling of weapons, but only an opinion and judgment, and even these bound to the opinion of another. Behold, in every gathering and even, if it please the gods, at banquets, there are men who command an army: they know where a camp must be placed, what places must be occupied by garrisons, when hands must be joined with the enemy, and > when one must remain quiet. No one censures this. Am I a puppy and shameless if I say a word about these matters from the mind of the ancients? Iphicrates was once asked: τίς ὢν μεγαφρονεῖς; πότερον ἱππεὺς, ἢ τοξότης, ἢ πελταστής, ἢ ὁπλίτης; Οὐδεὶς ἔφη, τούτων, ἀλλ' ὁ πᾶσι τούτοις ἐπιστάμενος ἐπιτάττειν. "Who are you, that you assume such lofty airs? Are you a cavalryman, an archer, a light-armed soldier, or a legionary?" "None of these," he said, "but one who knows how to command all of them." I shall emulate him in part and say: I am neither a commander nor a soldier, but one who may be able to give some counsel and advice to them at the proper time. I shall therefore proceed boldly and with no wavering step in my undertaking; and from the writings of the ancients, as though from gardens, I shall gather flowers of maxims and weave them into these garlands of chapters.

§ 3. Here, certainly, my case is the same, and so is my defense. For why should that be censured in insignificant me which is praised in that great man? And surely those who attribute everything to experience, but nothing to study, diligence, and ability, depart altogether too far from true wisdom and reason, since reason is the surest guide, whereas experience, although useful, is never so complete in every respect. Even if we listen to a long-lived and successful commander, that principle which soldiers themselves acknowledge nevertheless remains: sound reason is preferred to all examples. Yet I have determined to teach and confirm all my precepts by the examples of illustrious men, so that what is lacking in the author may be supplied by the completeness of the teaching. This ought to appear all the less novel because we read almost all books about war, as well as the histories, written by civilians, who also judge most prudently concerning commanders and the military counsels of kings although they themselves did not conduct wars.

Moreover, the choicest histories are explained to the young in academies for this purpose: not that they may understand the crimes of men and the slaughters stored in the annals, but that they may perceive what is to be followed and what avoided in every matter. No prudent person will judge it foreign to the historian's office to discuss the manner of conducting war when he has learned at first glance that wars comprise the principal parts of history. Without this treatment, therefore, history can in no way be understood, nor can the more learned youth be properly instructed. Why, then, should anyone blame me if I set before the young the best precepts of peace and war from trustworthy history, when my calling, the inclination of my mind, and the love of my studies have long consecrated and bound me to the advantage of youth? If these precepts are bad, I now order them to be without effect; if they are good, even my enemies will have to praise them. I shall therefore give a history of war arranged in order, composed according to the rule of reason with the supports of examples, and confirmed and brought to completion not by my own ability but by the institutions of kings and great commanders.

§ 4. The second part of the objection is even more readily dissolved, although at first sight it appears absurd for a priest to treat of arms. To me, on the contrary, it seems that, for a good end and for just causes, priests sometimes can and ought to be disputants concerning war. Moses was a priest and an excellent warrior; Joshua, the minister of Moses, although he was not a priest, nevertheless joined piety with every distinction of war. Phinehas, the son of Eleazar the high priest, was appointed commander of the war against the Midianites by Moses. The Maccabean high priests conducted great wars; and why should I not be permitted to speak about war? Waging war is indeed forbidden to clerics by the canons; nevertheless, Saint Bernard advises Eugenius that wars are to be conducted not by his hand, but by his authority.

Clerics can sometimes take part in wars. For they can and ought to instruct the soldier in faith and piety, oppose the soldiers' license, comfort the wounded, and administer the sacraments to the dying. No sound person doubts this matter.

They can also perform other duties: they may exhort the soldier to fight bravely, even carry the cross before him, and command him to be of great courage, as Maiolus says, Book V, chapter 49. God formerly willed that there be trumpets in the camps which the priests should sound and thereby procure victory for the warriors: "If you go forth to war from your land against the enemies who fight against you, you shall sound with howling trumpets, and there shall be a remembrance of you before the Lord our God, that you may be delivered from the hands of your enemies" (Numbers 10:9). For this reason Balaam also calls it the blast of the king's victory which was in the tents of Israel. If a priest of the new law, placed amid the danger of war, kills an invader in necessary defense, he does not become irregular; in this case his condition is better than the soldier's, for the soldier has voluntarily given his name in order to kill the enemy by public authority, whereas the cleric privately defends himself against an invader.

§ 5. Nor is war forbidden to clerics so severely that they cannot fight in a grave necessity or for some great advantage--if the fatherland is in danger, for example, or if the universal peace of the Church is hoped for. See Bañez, II--II, question 40, article 2; Henriquez, Book XIV, chapter 13. All also concede that clerics may fight by permission of the pontiff. A bishop certainly can declare war if this is necessary for recovering or defending his churches; accordingly, he will hold a levy, compel soldiers, and fortify himself with alliances and the assistance of princes. Thus Henriquez, Cajetan, Sylvester, and, before these, Saint Bernard and Pope Saint Leo.

Those judges, therefore, are exceedingly unjust toward us who, in order that they may easily wrench the chalice from us, attack us girded with swords and order us to be content with the breviary as our sole armor, as though it were not lawful for us to fight for our lawful possessions, altars, and temples, when there were two swords in the Lord's household.

§ 6. Saint Thomas rightly teaches, II--II, question 32, article 2, that clerics are not permitted to fight because wars are very repugnant to clerical duties. They are deprived of the exercise of their orders, in Clerici and Quicumque, cause 13, question 8, and are ordered to be confined in a monastery. Yet because that law is not natural or divine, but ecclesiastical only, it not only can be removed by the legislator, but sometimes its obligation is removed by the very fact when another and graver law binds. For if the state is in grave danger and can be saved if clerics are enrolled among the soldiers, it is a right of nature that they too should fight with their own hands; for the obligation of natural law requires each man to defend his own state. And if in an offensive war the state is in the gravest necessity, a cleric will be able to fight in that war too with his own hand. Concerning defensive war, the opinion is unanimous that this is lawful in the utmost necessity or for the greatest advantage. Concerning offensive war they deny it; but it can happen that an offensive war is equally necessary, for in war it is often necessary to seize the initiative and forestall the enemy.

§ 7. Whatever reasons I set forth at the beginning for having undertaken the treatment of politics have their place here also. For the commander, legates, tribunes, and centurions must rely upon every kind of political prudence in order to govern an army--fierce men bearing arms--and this amid great dangers, from which disturbances and dissensions easily arise, since the men attribute favorable events to themselves and adverse events to their commanders. It therefore belongs to the highest art to govern the soldier; if this is rightly done, it is easy to conquer the enemy. Accordingly, I shall treat these matters with this end and in this manner: that by reading histories and accounts of wars the young may obtain benefit and, when their age has matured, may be able to conduct even necessary wars. Even the ill-disposed man ought to favor the attempt; I myself cannot guarantee its success.

We all owe very much to Lipsius, who, for the understanding of histories, kindled what he calls the Historical Torch, a name given not out of arrogance but by design: "That I may bring forward," he says, "Roman customs, public and private--and elsewhere also Greek customs--and illuminate them in such a way that, at the same time, I may illuminate the passages of the ancient writers who allude to or touch upon them. Since this material is diffuse, and indeed confused--I cannot deny it--I resolved first to excerpt from the whole mass whatever bears upon warfare, to present it joined together and in some sequence and coherence of subjects. The reason for selecting what bears upon warfare is that it occurs in history not very frequently, but incessantly, and, so to speak, every page bears upon it. For as our life is public, so too is the writing of it: the former, from age to age, is disturbances and wars; therefore the annals that represent the age are so too. And I say knowingly and advisedly that nothing detains or delays the young more than ignorance of ancient warfare. Before all else we are going to remedy this evil and dispel this darkness with our torch, according to the measure of our ability."

My purpose likewise is to exercise the young not only in understanding the deeds of the ancients, but also in reproducing them by imitation. For counsels are given concerning things that must be done. This pertains to the public good, which soldiers serve above all.

§ 8. Finally, since the studies of all political writers, jurists, theologians, scholastics, and canonists concerning war are extant, and since many questions pertaining to courts and conscience must be explained, it is manifest that I ought not to neglect this part, whether you regard theological or political treatises. To add to these some strategic counsels of great commanders will not be laborious for me, but will be most pleasing and fruitful for the young.

Yet my judgment is not that men accustomed to debate and declaim about wars should therefore be employed to conduct war; perhaps in battle they themselves, forgetful of all their precepts, would turn their backs to the enemy. Rather, let the state employ an experienced soldier who knows how to execute, not judge, the orders of commanders; but let it employ commanders who have also read these things and who can either use them or frustrate an enemy who uses them. For in battles, marches, and sieges various things happen contrary to expectation which demand immediate prudence. Then a commander trained both by reading and by waging war will be ready for sudden counsels. All these things tend to this: that counsel may be present in danger, and that commanders may extricate themselves in unexpected cases or entangle their enemies. For it belongs to a great commander to conquer by prudence, not by bloodshed. Indeed, to have deceived an enemy by a good stratagem is above every triumph.

I shall also add this: I was provoked by the example of an adversary. Machiavelli wrote about war, but did not dare to serve as a soldier, although the Duke of Urbino had urged him to do so. Cardano, On the Usefulness to Be Drawn from Adversity, Book III.

CHAPTER II

The Definition and Detestation of War

§ 1. Whole states experience war more readily than a few men define it. War, as Lipsius defines it, is "force and arms directed against a foreign prince or people." Without doubt he understands force inflicted by a supreme prince or by a state; for if it is inflicted by a faction or by a few persons without public counsel, these are robberies rather than wars. The Hebrews call it מלחמה and מלחמת, from לחם, which means to eat, to devour. For it is ὁ πόλεμος ὁ δημοβόρος--war that devours the people. Hence the divine Spirit in Scripture gives a mouth to the sword, and men are said to perish in the mouth of the sword. Deuteronomy 32:42: "I shall make my arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh." War, therefore, is a horrible beast which with innumerable arrows sucks the blood of the dying, cuts their flesh with swords, and tries to fill its pierced belly with dismembered flesh, yet is never sated even when drunk.

§ 2. The evils of war are innumerable; none is graver than that such great distinctions and triumphs are sought from the slaughter of men. We behold beasts tearing one another and hunts, but cruelty ceases once it is fed; for a man to have killed a man is glorious. It seems sufficient cause for so sacred an animal to be killed if the killer acquires the name of victor. For how many nations have perished through no fault of their own, but through most cruel ambition? I do not deny that those who have been ministers of just wars and have received wounds for their fatherland are to be adorned with deserved rewards. Yet I deplore this calamity of the human race: that whole nations fall for leaves of laurel; that wars are sown by a desire to triumph; and that there should be greater glory in having killed many men than in having saved many.

We admire Alexander, Caesar, Muhammad, and Tamerlane, and it is held the summit of praise to have killed many guilty and many innocent men without distinction. By the same title you could praise the Nemean lion, the Lernaean hydra, and the Calydonian boar. Caesar's avowal is foul: that 1,192,000 men were killed by him--and he is not yet speaking of the civil war. Pompey inscribed in Minerva's shrine that 2,180,000 men had been routed, put to flight, killed, or received in surrender by him. What is this, O my God, that in human society, even among cultivated minds, to have killed many should hold the summit of praise? Such savagery cannot be veiled by the pretext of justice, for those who waged unjust wars also possessed that glory.

We complain of these things in vain. Wars existed when the world was born, and the day of decision will find men still at war. The world was too narrow for two brothers, since Cain thought Abel was going to be more blessed than he. The wars of the Giants followed, and the Flood enclosed the discordant in one abyss. After the Flood, Noah and his sons at first governed one family, until the earth was divided and Nimrod reigned in the plain of Shinar. Indeed, grave wars occurred while Noah, Shem, Japheth, and Ham were still alive; nor could great-grandfathers, grandfathers, and fathers reconcile their descendants to peace. Those wars are narrated in Genesis 14. They occurred 344 years after the Flood, at which time Noah, Shem, Arphaxad, Salah, Eber, Peleg, Reu, Serug, and Nahor were alive, so that it was astonishing that tyrannies had arisen so quickly. For the battle which Moses recounts was not the first. Those kings had already served Chedorlaomer, king of the Elamites, for twelve years; therefore they had been conquered in war twelve years before, and wars were already customary. An indication of this is that Chedorlaomer had kings allied with him and, although he reigned in Elymais, far distant from the Canaanites, nevertheless oppressed them with servitude.

Moreover, these wars were cruel. Genesis 14:5: "Therefore, in the fourteenth year Chedorlaomer came, and the kings who were with him; and they struck the Rephaim in Ashteroth-karnaim, and the Zuzim with them, and the Emim in Shaveh-kiriathaim, and the Horites in the mountains of Seir, as far as the plains of Paran, which is in the wilderness." Wars have continued in this discipline and sequence down to our own times.

§ 3. Even the most just wars have this common evil: that discipline lies prostrate in them and vices grow strong. For since in war there are the greatest labors and continual dangers, the minds of foolish soldiers are detained by the sweetness of pleasures and of every vice, lest they desert the camp. Hence nothing corrupts morals as much as military service, in which most things are committed with impunity. War therefore makes men savage and desirous of every evil. Deeds that are judged disgraceful in a state and well-ordered city are games in a camp. For what form of evil is usually absent in captured cities? Thus those who contaminate victory with enormous crimes are much more pitiable than those whom they butcher. For greater crimes are usually committed while a city is being captured than those for which it deserves to be captured.

A sure sign of such great impiety is that, amid present danger and the slaughter of the dying, they undertake no serious thought for salvation. They have death upon their lips and experience what that author says:

Κοινὸς Ἐνυάλιος, καὶ τὸν κτείνοντα κτείνει.

Death is common to all; it kills the killer.

This is what shows a mind hardened by evils and stubborn against divine grace: not to die steadfastly, but to die fixed in one's vices; to be moved by no danger to repentance, but to grow hardened in the very evils. The reason is that riches are the end of such great contests:

To such a degree the love of gold alone knows not how

To fear steel and death. Laws are lost without distinction;

And you, riches, vilest part of things,

Have stirred up the contest.

§ 4. Hence neither superstition deterred pagans from the shrines of their gods, nor religion Christians from violating sacred buildings.

The humanity of Fabius is praised because, when he had overthrown Tarentum, he did not rage against its gods but said that he was leaving the Tarentines their angry gods. Fabius is therefore praised because he preferred to abstain from plundering images rather than carry away many great things. The ancients, however, were more wicked even within the temples of their gods. Troy herself, as I said--Augustine says this in The City of God, Book I, chapter 4--"the mother of the Roman people, was unable in the consecrated places of her gods to defend her citizens from the fire and sword of the Greeks, who worshiped those same gods." Indeed, in Juno's asylum:

Phoenix and dire Ulysses, chosen guards,

Watched over the spoil; here from every side was heaped

The treasure of Troy, snatched from the burning sanctuaries,

Tables of the gods and bowls of solid gold,

And captive raiment. Boys and trembling mothers

Stand round in a long line.

Plainly, the place consecrated to so great a goddess was chosen not as one from which it was unlawful to lead captives away, but as one in which it pleased them to shut captives up.

To destroy those idols and brothels was not indeed a crime; but it is monstrous sacrilege when we see that Christians spare not even the churches and sacred things of Christians. Those Athenians, the inventors of all literature and humane culture, waged wars not for justice or piety, but for wealth, as those who sought their aid attest. For this reason the people of Egesta deceived the Athenians by a notable stratagem: intending to procure auxiliaries by means of money, they borrowed valuables from their neighbors, adorned their temples and houses, and, by producing a false belief in their riches, obtained assistance.

§ 5. A prince must always fear war, although his enemies are weak and by no means his equals. For the die of war is uncertain. Diogenes the Cynic reproached Philip, saying that he was a spectator of Philip's folly, since, while possessing so many things, he put them all in danger and did so under no necessity. For what more insane thing can be conceived than that the lord of so many kingdoms should be exposed, like a target, to an uncertain missile? All things in human life are uncertain, but nothing is more uncertain than war. A single hour overturns acquired and expected riches and distinctions. What is gravest, in war it is not permissible to err twice. Indeed, it is also customary that those princes to whom the labor belongs do not receive its fruit. Others triumph and say:

> Those who, with blood shed, won this fatherland.

But the gravest thing of all in war for a commander or a state is that they are frequently stripped of their goods by their own soldiers and tribunes and fall into great calamities. For very many of the soldiers find it profitable for war to be prolonged, something they easily accomplish through their idleness and negligence. The Carthaginians had ended their war against the Romans; peace and treaties had been made, when suddenly the army that was to be discharged made Matho and Spendius its commanders and brought upon the Carthaginians a war much more dangerous than the one that had been waged against the Romans. The same thing happened in Italy within the lifetime of our grandfathers, when affairs were peaceful: bands of soldiers occupied and plundered towns and citadels. Indeed, the illustrious warrior Francesco Sforza occupied Milan, for which he had fought. Most soldiers in Italy at that time were disposed in the same way, although they did not obtain a duchy. A prince must fear his own forces no less than those of another.

§ 6. Nor do victors obtain the praise they desired. Nothing is so receptive of malice and talk as war. Losses always occur, and princes are always blamed for losses. Seditions therefore readily arise from war, and the prince is unequal to them when enemies arise abroad and rioters at home: the latter withdraw the prince's strength, while the former break it. Marcian therefore used most prudently to say that an emperor should not take up arms as long as he was permitted to cultivate peace. For since, even in a moderate government, it is difficult to satisfy even the modest expectation of a few, how can one man possibly please everyone through the injustices of wars, when he is useful to few, harmful to many, and burdensome to all? These things arise from the nature of war. No one securely enjoys his fortunes; death threatens everyone at every hour, and an enemy brandishes the sword that is now on the point of sticking in his throat. I therefore require the prince to be a guardian of peace. "Peace," as Nazianzen says, "is a good praised by all, but preserved by few."

Experience teaches that those who have triumphed most splendidly have been crushed by victorious envy. When Camillus triumphed after the plunder of Veii with white horses, he appeared to rival the gods; but he experienced that whatever exceeds the common lot is exposed to the envy of others. For all men envy those above them unless they are very good. They even envy friends and those who benefit them. Saul rejoiced in the deliverance given by David's courage, yet envied his glory to such a degree that he appeared to prefer being conquered rather than conquering with praise for his own commander. Envy is blind and knows nothing except how to disparage virtues and corrupt honors and the rewards of labors. Why, then, should you look to praise when you sometimes see the senate and people disparaging a victor? Indeed, the greater the glory appears, the more maliciously they diminish it, speak against it, devise lawsuits, and decree exiles. I recommend these things, yet, as I suspect, I do not persuade. For the sweetness of glory is immense; it is more easily said to be despised than it is despised.

§ 7. War is easily begun and most difficult to settle. A spark struck from flint sets a forest alight; no force can extinguish that forest once the conquering flame exults through the dense trees. A dispute first arose between the Scots and Picts over a stolen dog; then killings arose, and at last they fought a regular battle under King Crachyntus. Hector Boece, History of Scotland, Book VI. On account of one fish which had been given to a certain Felestagoras, the Naxians were afflicted by many disasters; they raged with rapes and killings until, through excessive liberty, they fell into servitude. Athenaeus, Book VIII, chapter 7, and Aristotle, The Constitution of the Naxians. For that reason Archelaus, king of the Macedonians, acted neither politically nor civilly when he imposed upon the Thracian people a fine of one talent because they had sacrificed to the gods and eaten his dog, which had by chance strayed from the road. For from a trifling cause they had almost kindled a vast war. The Thracians behaved more moderately, for the present concealing the matter.

§ 8. Therefore, all who advise a prince to maintain peace--provided that a grievous war does not lie hidden under the name of peace--must be heard even amid the trumpets. Nor do I disapprove of Hanno, who, after the victory at Cannae, saw messengers measuring the number of slain cavalrymen by the rings they had brought and urged that ambassadors be sent concerning peace. If Carthage had listened to his counsel at that time, it perhaps would have survived Rome. Many certain evils therefore follow, but the good that is sought is uncertain. Orosius, Book I: "What else should wars be called but evils pressing upon either side? Evils of this sort, whether those which have been or those which now are, insofar as they exist, are either manifest sins or hidden punishments of sinners." Proclus, in his commentary on the Alcibiades:

> ὁ δ' Ἄρης τὴν ὀνομασίαν ἔσχεν, ἀπὸ δ' αἴρειν, ἢ ἀναιρεῖν, ἢ ἀπὸ τῆς ἀρᾶς, ἤτοι βλάβης, κατὰ ἐναντίωσιν, ὡσανεὶ ἐκμαλισσομένων αὐτῷ τῶν πραγματευόντων, ἀπὸ τὸ ἄρσαι, ὅ ἐστιν ἁρμόσαι, ἡ γὰρ δραστικὴ δύναμις προσαρμόζει τὰ πράγματα.

Ares--read Mars--is said from αἴρειν and ἀναιρεῖν, "taking away"; or from ἀρᾶς, "curse" and "harm"; or, by the contrary sense, as they speak more gently, from ἄρσαι, which is "to fit together," for an effective force fits things together and orders them. Am I mistaken in thinking that the Latin word arma also comes from this? The end of war therefore falls somewhere other than men supposed. Carthage refused peace: victorious in battles, but conquered in war, it paid for its pride with destruction. The ruin of victorious Rome was not dissimilar; other ages seized the fortunate and crushed them.

Many things foreign to men's purposes have happened. Augustus appointed the Danube and Euphrates as the boundaries of the empire, but in vain. From one side the Euphrates stirs up war; from the other Germany, and the conspiring Dacian descends from the Danube. The Euphrates indeed floods fertile and soft Asia; the Dacian and the trans-Danubian peoples invade Pannonia, Thrace, Greece, and Italy; those beyond the Rhine exchange Gaul, Italy, Spain, and Africa itself for their frigid Boötes. History has taught us the disasters of the ancients; we shall teach our descendants:

> Lately the Getic tyrant attempted to destroy
> Italy, coming sworn from his native Danube
> To level these citadels to the ground.

All the peoples, Capitolinus bears witness, had conspired from the Illyrian frontier as far as Gaul: the Marcomanni, Narisci, Hermunduri, Quadi, Suebi, Sarmatians, Laringes, and Buri, and others--the Victoriati, Sosibes, Sicobotes, Rhoxolani, Basternae, Alavi, Peucini, and Costoboci. At great labor to himself, therefore, he conquered the fiercest peoples, but without profit. The cause was the diversity of the enemy and of his own men. It matters greatly with what enemies an affair is conducted. When Eudamidas the Spartan was urged to remember the victories obtained against the Persians and to fight the Macedonians, he replied: "You do not understand that this is the same as if one who had conquered a thousand sheep were to fight fifty wolves." Plutarch, Apophthegms.

§ 9. War must also be avoided because its companion is the enormous poverty of all. The treasury is exhausted; subjects are despoiled; the soldiers' ill-gotten goods are ill dissipated; and the supports of life are consumed by devastation and fires. Rarely is the victor happier; the conquered is always poorer. That poverty, however, is an evil counselor and an incitement to crimes, since men strive by robbery to recover what was lost through the calamities of war. “The poor perish in war,” as a defender of wars rightly said to Antisthenes; but Antisthenes also rightly answered, “More men become poor.”

§ 10. Not only war itself, but also the fear of war sends poverty and hunger before it. No honor worthy of the plow remains; the farmers flee, the fields lie neglected, and cities are deserted. Let those about to wage war not imagine that they will inflict many losses but suffer few; for it usually happens that those who inflict many things upon others also suffer many themselves, since it is most difficult to defend oneself but very easy to do harm.

In addition to those losses, there is also added the labor by which citizens are worn away.

By an excellent device Phocion drew the Athenians away from zeal for war against the Thebans. For when his arguments had failed to dissuade them, but war had been decreed contrary to his speech and Phocion himself appointed commander, he said, “Come, follow me after taking five days’ provisions.” When the old men refused, their zeal for war abated.

§ 11. If anything should happen that makes war appear necessary, let the state ponder this with itself: after the war it will obtain nothing better than peace. But peace already exists and can be preserved by acting civilly and overlooking small losses. That maxim of Seneca is surely golden: “Peace never provoked is happier than peace restored by much blood.” Within a few years we have seen wars and peace in Europe; after all were wearied by disasters, they drew breath in peace. Saint Augustine’s judgment on this matter is excellent, The City of God, Book IV, chapter 15: “It is greater happiness to have a neighbor in concord than to subjugate one at war.” Rome waged war with its neighbors for four hundred years, inflicted and received disasters; meanwhile so many citizens were slain and wounded, lands were devastated two hundred times, and spoils were driven off. Who is so estranged from all reason that he would not judge that Rome would have been happier if it had not worn away its citizens in continual wars and had lived in concord with its neighbors?

The Athenians desired peace only when they wore mourning; even now princes turn their minds to peace when they see the treasury exhausted and men wounded from battle. Guevara speaks most prudently in Book III, chapter 15 of the Dial: “No one is so foolish and uncultivated that he would not pronounce happier the man who uses a handkerchief to wipe the sweat from his face than the man who tears that same cloth to dry the blood from his head.” Accordingly, one who wages an unnecessary war for the sake of peace acts just like a man who prefers a scar to unbroken skin, although a scar is never pleasing except when compared with a wound.

§ 12. But what if we consider nature itself? Nature implanted strength and rage in beasts in place of virtue, but gave justice to man; and even upon the hearts of robbers she engraved that great maxim: “What you do not wish to be done to you, do not do to another.” Why do we rush into mutual butcheries? No animal rages against its own kind. Juvenal, Satire XV:

> Yet serpents have greater concord: a beast of similar
>
> Markings spares its kindred. When did a stronger lion
>
> Ever tear the life from a lion? In what forest did a boar
>
> Ever expire beneath the tusks of a larger boar?
>
> The Indian tigress maintains perpetual peace with the raging tigress;
>
> Savage bears agree among themselves.
>
> But for man it was too little to have drawn forth lethal iron
>
> From the accursed anvil, although the first smiths, accustomed
>
> To forging so many rakes and hoes, and wearied by mattock and plowshare,

Did not know how to hammer out swords.

We behold peoples whose rage is not satisfied

With having killed someone, but who have believed breasts,

Arms, and faces to be a kind of food.

But what is accomplished by wars? Subjects are granted license for crimes, men are butchered, and the innocent are despoiled--and these things for the most part without justice. For what will the soldiers possess if each man possesses his own? Seneca, On Benefits, Book IV. Princes, therefore, if they wish to be good and to be accounted good, must act so that they do not draw enemies to themselves, but repel the wicked. Plato very properly preferred the Lydians to the Spartans: the former had hands hardened by agricultural labor, whereas the Spartans dragged along arms enervated by brandishing spears. Nature, therefore, which taught us society, also taught us peace and friendship with all with whom it can exist. For without a friend life is the mutual tearing of a lion and a wolf.

Antiquity itself teaches us this, suffusing the warrior with a certain horror as a man acting against nature. Tertullian, On the Pallium: "Why do you not look at those garments? Or also at those modes of dress which, through the novelty of their clothing, pretend to religion: when, because of their attire all in white, and because of the mark of their life and the privilege of their headdress, men are initiated into the rites of Ceres; and when, because of the different performance of dark clothing and a grim fleece over the head, they flee to the mountains of Bellona." And in Against the Nations: "Today in that place blood consecrated to Bellona, taken from a slashed thigh and caught in a small shield, is given to her initiates." What else do grim fleeces, flight to the mountains, and the drinking of blood signify but that those who rejoice especially in war have departed from human beings and been transformed into a bestial nature?

§ 13. Finally, this is most detestable in war: not only that, when war descends, innocent and guilty fall alike, but that the good suffer even more. For because the wicked value life little and conscience still less, they are prone to every kind of injury; but the good, because they desire neither to inflict injury nor to plunder, are compelled to mutter over and endure their losses. If the wicked clash with the wicked, the injury is usually thought small by some; but these men also err. For although the loss may not be deemed great in the slaughter of the wicked, it is nevertheless itself an injury for a wicked man to fall by another's fury, and for the man who rages to fall as well, when, had he been removed by a bloodless death, he might have been saved. The price of a Christian soul is great; when it casts away temporal life amid slaughter, it often gives up hope of eternal life. Hence it comes about that even the good do not kill an enemy except when necessary. I judge plainly golden that maxim of a pagan man, Tacitus, Histories, Book I: "Among good men it is equally wretched to kill and to perish."

§ 14. Advantages and spoils nevertheless arise from wars. So it is--rather, from victory, and indeed a bloodless and successful victory; otherwise spoil is bought dearly with much blood. But let us call a province reduced to servitude and the soldiers' riches from plunder "advantages." Yet they are not advantages unless compared with losses. You prefer to have slaves for neighbors rather than robbers and pirates, but it was better to have friends. Nor are you happier through another's unhappiness unless you made those men unhappy from necessity. Orosius speaks truly: "As happily as Rome conquers, so unhappily is everything outside Rome conquered." Guevara aptly compares this wheel to buckets of a water-raising machine: unless those that have ascended are emptied, the others cannot ascend full. So great, therefore, is another's unhappiness, from which such great profits arise that they are believed to be well purchased by dangers to life.

Yet the victor is not happy even so. Rome seized the riches of the world partly by war and partly through the avarice of governors, but, crushed beneath the spoils of the conquered world, it perished. Nature placed enmity between the dragon and the elephant. The dragon drinks the blood of the conquered elephant with such avidity that it either bursts or is crushed by the bulk of its falling enemy. This usually happens when soldiers' minds, thirsting for plunder, are suddenly filled by its abundance and are stuffed so full that they can in no way digest their fortune--indeed, can no longer act bravely or live.

§ 15. To this cruel vanity that drags men into wars there is added another arrangement, plainly unjust, which deservedly ought to deter everyone from war. Nearly all the distinctions belong to the commander alone; the name of the prince alone is inscribed upon trophies. Curtius says in Book VIII that the Greeks acted badly in inscribing only the names of kings upon trophies. Let that itch therefore trouble the prince. What do you, O soldier, hope for after victory? So many thousands of comrades lie dead, and they indeed with praise, but nevertheless as a nameless multitude. A much greater part wanders about, needy, mutilated in body, and surviving its own triumph with disgrace. The commander is carried through the city high upon a chariot, seeks applause, and desires to be seen. Yet even that wise Roman Cicero, who desired those things, judges them empty delights and almost the amusements of boys, in the speech Against Piso. But if they are judged the greatest things, they certainly do not belong to the soldiers.

Today soldiers are chosen for the most part from the lowest common people. They are fed like sacrificial victims, and certainly not liberally; they are ruled most harshly, yet still aspire to war. Formerly, in order to escape the military oath, men hid in workhouses, cut off their own thumbs, and sought other opportunities of escape. Now those whom desperation or a desire for license does not permit to remain at home run to it voluntarily. From this another and sorrowful evil arises: that they desire wars and repose is hateful to them. The song of Philemon the comic poet displays an ill-disposed suspicion, but in war it is true:

Οὔτε γὰρ ἰατρὸς, οὐδὲ εἷς, ἂν εὖ σκοπῇς,

Τοὺς αὑτοῦ αὐτῷ βούλεθ' ὑγιαίνειν φίλους·

Οὕτι στρατιώτης πόλιν ὁρᾷ ἄνευ κακοῦ.

For no physician, if you consider the matter well, greatly desires his friends to be healthy, nor does a soldier desire to see his own city without misfortune. The desire for war holds them because they have learned no other art of passing life honorably. Hence the Italian proverb is commonly repeated: “War sows thieves, whom peace reaps with the sword and the noose.” For in truth, wholly devoted to idleness, luxury, and cruelty, they turn to robbery and theft. The cause of these evils is the corruption of our military service. Formerly, such was military discipline that the soldier earnestly desired to lay down his arms, received discharge as a benefit of the highest order, and returned to the fields--even men who had been consuls and celebrated triumphs. Veterans thought themselves so well treated if, when released from service, lands were given to them for their campaigns. Now many place everything in the military art and therefore retain their arms, as though life itself must be broken off together with war.

Kings must guard against nothing more than employing these men as counselors concerning the undertaking of war. For they fill the kings' minds with disturbance and vain hope, with no other end than that, when necessity presses, they themselves may be applied to affairs. It certainly happens that where military service is prolonged, a few tribunes and common soldiers are more powerful than the greatest governments. How small a part of Rome--not to say of the whole empire, but of one city--were the Praetorian soldiers; yet how often did they make emperors and kill the emperors they had made? Therefore, when there is war, affairs at home are uncertain and those abroad are afflicted.

CHAPTER III

That War Is Lawful

§ 1. That old dispute concerns, not indeed whether it is lawful to wage war at all, but whether it is lawful for Christians. For thus Julian the Apostate reproached them in mockery: the other cheek must be given to the man who gives a blow; therefore vengeance must not be taken by war. The Manichaeans also prohibited war altogether; Saint Augustine refutes them in Book XXII, chapter 74, Against Faustus the Manichaean: "Nor should he wonder at or recoil from the wars waged through Moses, because in them also he followed divine commands, not raging but obeying; nor did God rage when he commanded those things, but rendered to the deserving what they deserved and crushed those who deserved it. For what is blamed in war? Is it that men who will someday die are sometimes killed, so that those who will live may be subdued in peace? To reprehend this belongs to the timid, not to the religious. The desire to harm, the cruelty of vengeance, an unappeased and implacable spirit, the savagery of rebellion, the lust for domination, and anything similar--these are the things that are rightly blamed in wars. Wars themselves are often undertaken by good men so that these things may also rightly be punished, against the violence of those who resist, when either God or some legitimate government commands them and when those good men are found in that order of human affairs in which the order itself justly constrains them either to command some such thing or to obey in such matters."

Otherwise John, when soldiers came to him to be baptized and said, "And what shall we do?" would have answered them: "Cast away your arms, abandon that military life, strike no one, wound no one, lay no one low." But because he knew that, when they did these things in military service, they were not murderers but ministers of the law, and not avengers of their own injuries but defenders of the public safety, he answered them: "Extort nothing from anyone; falsely accuse no one; let your pay suffice for you." But because the Manichaeans were accustomed openly to blaspheme John, let them hear the Lord Jesus Christ himself commanding that this pay be rendered to Caesar, which John says ought to suffice for the soldier: "Render," he says, "to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's." For taxes are paid for this purpose, that pay may be furnished to the soldier for necessary wars. Deservedly, too, he praised the faith of that centurion who said, "And I am a man placed under authority, having soldiers under me; and I say to this one, 'Go,' and he goes; and to another, 'Come,' and he comes; and to my servant, 'Do this,' and he does it"; he did not command him to desert that military service.

Wycliffe is accused of the same error by Thomas Waldensis. Cornelius Agrippa, the arch-magician, held the same opinion. So did Erasmus. Luther judged the matter according to his passion and uncontrollable anger: he forbade war to be waged against the Turks because the Turk himself was the scourge of God; against the Pope and the Catholics he commanded it and caused them to be attacked.

§ 2. The whole of the Old Scripture teaches that war is not unlawful by its nature, nor prohibited by God. Abraham in Genesis 14 conquered in war the kings who had conquered; Moses and Joshua occupied Canaan by the right of war. For although God had given them that land, he nevertheless willed it to be obtained by arms. Indeed, he also dictated the laws of war. Numbers 10:9: "If you go out from your land to war against enemies who fight against you, you shall sound with trumpets of alarm, and there shall be remembrance of you before the Lord your God, that you may be delivered from the hands of your enemies." And in chapter 21:14 the Book of the Wars of the Lord is cited; these were without doubt deeds performed with the Lord's approval. And Deuteronomy 20:1: "If you go out to war against your enemies and see cavalry and chariots, and a multitude of the enemy's army greater than you have, you shall not fear them, because the Lord your God is with you, who brought you out of the land of Egypt. And when the battle is now drawing near, the priest shall stand before the battle line and shall speak thus to the people: 'Hear, Israel: today you join battle against your enemies. Let not your heart be afraid; do not fear, do not yield, nor dread them, because the Lord your God is in your midst and will fight for you against your adversaries, to deliver you from danger.' The officers also shall proclaim before the army, throughout the several divisions: 'Who is the man who has built a new house?'" And a little afterward: "And when the officers of the army have fallen silent and made an end of speaking, each one shall prepare his own companies for battle. Whenever you approach to capture a city, you shall first offer it peace. If it receives the offer and opens its gates to you, all the people who are in it shall be saved and shall serve you under tribute. But if it is unwilling to enter a treaty and begins war against you, you shall besiege it. And when the Lord your God has delivered it into your hand, you shall strike everything of the male sex in it with the edge of the sword, except the women and children, the beasts of burden, and the other things that are in the city. You shall divide all the spoil for the army and shall eat from the spoils of your enemies which the Lord your God has given you," and so forth.

The books of Joshua, Judges, Kings, Chronicles, and Maccabees also are full of the history of wars. And in Hebrews 11 the Apostle says that the saints through faith conquered kingdoms and were valiant in war. John the Baptist did not forbid military service; neither Christ nor Peter released the centurions from their oath. For they acknowledged that the license to wage war was given by God. Indeed, the prayers and alms of the centurion ascended before God, and he also had soldiers who feared God. There were also Christian soldiers in wars of old. The Thundering Legion is very well known, which, having obtained rain by prayer, saved the army; so too the Theban Legion, which endured martyrdom through repeated decimations. Tertullian, Apology, chapter 42, records that Christians served as soldiers together with the gentiles. But what he himself thought is not entirely clear, for it is certain that he disapproved of the military service of his time under pagan emperors because it was bound up with idolatry.

In On the Soldier's Crown, chapter 11, he says: "For, that I may approach the crown itself of the military crown, I think it must first be investigated whether military service is altogether suitable for Christians. What sort of thing is it to reconsider incidental questions when the fault lies in the antecedents? Do we believe it lawful to superimpose a human oath upon the divine one, and to answer to another lord after Christ, and to abjure father and mother and every neighbor, whom even the Law commanded to be honored and loved after God, whom the Gospel also will thus honor, making Christ alone of greater account? Will it be lawful to be occupied with the sword, when the Lord declares that he who has used the sword shall perish by the sword? And will the son of peace engage in battle, for whom it will not be fitting even to litigate? And will he administer chains and prison and tortures and punishments, though he is not the avenger even of his own injuries? And now, will he either stand guard for others more than for Christ, or also on the Lord's Day, when he will not even do so for Christ? Will he keep watch for the temples which he has renounced, and dine there where the Apostle does not approve? Those whom by day he has put to flight by exorcisms, will he defend by night, leaning and resting upon the spear by which Christ's side was pierced? Will he also carry a standard, the rival of Christ, and ask a watchword from a prince, though he has already received one from God? When dead, will he also be disturbed by the trumpeter's trumpet, he who awaits resurrection by the trumpet of the angel? And will a Christian be burned according to military discipline, he for whom it was not lawful to burn, to whom Christ remitted the punishment of fire? How many other things can be observed among the offenses of military duties, to be interpreted as transgressions? The very transfer of one's name from the camp of light to the camp of darkness is a transgression.

"Plainly, if faith comes later and finds some men already engaged in military service, the condition is different--as with those whom John admitted to baptism, and as with the most faithful centurions, the one whom Christ approves and the one whom Peter catechizes--provided nevertheless that, once the faith has been received and sealed, either military service must immediately be abandoned, as has been done by many, or every precaution must be taken that nothing be committed against God, things that are not even permitted outside military service, or, finally, one must suffer for God what the pagan military oath equally prescribed. For military service will not promise impunity for offenses or immunity from martyrdom. Nowhere is a Christian anything else. There is one Gospel and the same Jesus: he will deny everyone who denies and confess everyone who confesses God; he will save the soul lost for his name, but, on the contrary, destroy the soul gained against his name. Before him the faithful civilian is as much a soldier as the faithless soldier is a civilian. The state of faith does not admit the plea of necessity. There is no necessity of sinning for those whose one necessity is not to sin. For someone is also pressed by the necessity of tortures or punishments to sacrifice and directly to deny; nevertheless, discipline does not connive at even that necessity, because the necessity of fearing denial and undergoing martyrdom is stronger than that of escaping suffering and performing one's duty.

"Moreover, an excuse of this kind overturns the whole substance of the oath, so that it loosens the fastening even for voluntary offenses. For even the will can be maintained to be necessity, since it has something by which it is compelled. Or rather, I will have laid down these principles and the other cases of official crowns, in which that plea of necessity is most familiar, since either offices are therefore to be avoided, lest we fall into offenses, or martyrdoms are also to be endured, that we may break away from offices. Concerning the first form of the question, the unlawfulness even of military service itself, I shall not say more, so that the second may be taken up. Unless I expel military service with every effort, I shall thereafter have challenged the military crown in vain. Suppose, finally, that military service is lawful up to the matter of the crown."

He has the same view in On Idolatry, chapter 19: "But now the question is whether a believer may turn to military service and whether military service may be admitted to the faith--even that of the common soldier or any inferior rank for whom there is no necessity of sacrifices or capital judgments. The divine and human oath do not agree, nor the sign of Christ and the sign of the Devil, the camp of light and the camp of darkness. One soul cannot be owed to two, to God and to Caesar. Moses carried a rod, and Aaron a clasp; John is girded with leather; Joshua leads an army; and the people made war--if it pleases one to make sport of the matter. But how will he make war--indeed, how will he serve even in peace--without the sword which the Lord took away? For although soldiers had come to John and received a form of conduct, and although the centurion also had believed, the Lord afterward disarmed every soldier by unbelting Peter. No uniform assigned to an unlawful act is lawful among us."

The very learned Pamelius thinks that Tertullian rejected military service not absolutely, but because it had not been free from idolatry; for he reproves not Christian fellow-soldiers but the placing of the crown upon the head. Yet let this also have been an error of Tertullian. For us it is established by certain reasoning that military service is in itself legitimate and honorable, though dangerous and, for the most part, corruptive of morals. Military service did no harm to the centurion whose faith had no equal faith in Israel. The Church numbers among the saints Alexander, Theodore, Mercurius, Florian, Quirinus, Victor, Ferreolus, Romanus, Julian, Modestinus, George, Exsuperius, Anastasius, Gallicanus, Marcellus, Charlemagne, Arsacius, King Louis, Vitalis, Ursus, Longinus, Marcellus, and Nicostratus. Then she numbers entire legions or cohorts, such as those of Achatius, Maurice, Gereon, Castulus, Cyrion, Gregory and Maurus, Theodosius, Callistratus, and others, who were soldiers in such a way that they nevertheless flourished with outstanding praise for piety and martyrdom.

§ 3. If anyone seriously and from his heart condemns every war, I judge him to be not only a heretic but also a traitor to the state; the former belongs to the theologians, the latter to the magistrate. For since all beasts know their own weakness and by what means they can go against an enemy; since we also arm ourselves against lions and tigers; and since nature also planted in us a certain impulse to defend life and repel enemies, without which life cannot be lived, it cannot be denied that there is a just defense against a robber, thief, or adulterer. Neither faith nor any divine law has abolished natural law. Rather, just as it permitted defense against a serpent, against a scorpion, and against other beasts, so it permitted defense against impious robbers. For those who are borne toward injury by malice and desire are worse than those who are borne toward it by nature.

If, therefore, it was lawful for David to rise against the bear and the lion and tear them apart, why should not his sling also pierce the forehead of Goliath when, like a dead dog, he curses the armies of the living God? Because the power to resist unjust violence is given to every private person, much more does it belong to that prince whose office is the protection of his subjects. What father does not crush a snake lying in wait for his son? What shepherd does not snatch a sheep from the mouth of a wolf? And shall a prince not defend a city over which a barbarous enemy is hanging, about to rage against fortunes and bodies with avarice, lust, and cruelty? Wars, therefore, must be undertaken so that we may live in peace without injury. It is not merely honorable but also necessary when violence offered by force is repelled by force. Nature has imposed this law upon beasts, custom upon nations, reason upon the prudent, and necessity upon all.

§ 4. Therefore, in the state there must be an established ordering both of war and of peace. "It is necessary," says Aristotle, Book VII, chapter 14, "to be able to conduct affairs and wars, but more to cultivate peace and to enjoy leisure; and to have the capacity to do necessary and useful things, but more to do honorable things." Other deficiencies may therefore be overlooked in a prince, but to be a commander is a sovereign virtue. No state can endure unless it cultivates the military art. For since men are carried with great desire to seize the possessions of others, where they see no obstacle, there they rush. Therefore, if the prince is not warlike, or if he has cowardly commanders, for that very reason let him expect war. For others will make an attack, as the Danites did upon Laish, and others upon others.

§ 5. Where, then, are the Savior's commands concerning the offering of the other cheek, Matthew 5? Where is the law of the Apostle, Romans 12, "Not defending yourselves, but give place to wrath"; and Matthew 26, "Put your sword back into its place"? Did not God himself say, "Vengeance is mine, and I will repay"? If, therefore, vengeance is prohibited and endurance of injuries is commanded, war cannot be waged by a Christian.

I answer that the gentiles once abused these passages in order to say that the Christian faith was destructive of the state. Thus the illustrious Volusianus speaks in his letter to Marcellinus, as it appears in Augustine's Epistle 4: "And then, further, that his preaching and doctrine are in no respect consistent with the customs of the state, inasmuch as, according to many, this is known to be his command: that we ought to render evil for evil to no one; that we should offer the other cheek to one who strikes us; that we should give our cloak to one persisting in taking away our tunic; and that we ought to go twice the distance with him who has wished to compel us to go. He asserts that all these things are contrary to the customs of the state. For who would permit anything to be taken from him by an enemy, or would not wish to repay by the law of war evil deeds to the plunderer of a Roman province? And the other things that can be said to the point, let your Reverence understand."

Saint Augustine answers in Epistle 5. First, clemency by which enemies are forgiven is useful to the state; for in this way Rome was made great and wealthy from being small and poor, because citizens preferred to forgive an injury they had received rather than pursue it. Cicero too, flattering Caesar, said that he was accustomed to forget nothing except injuries. Second, evil is to be overcome in good when the defeated man is led to repentance, not by the strength of one who rages but by the benevolence of one who endures. Accordingly, the thing must be done when it appears likely to profit the man for whose sake it is done, and it must be done with that intention even if another outcome follows. Third, care must be taken that patience, which is better than anything that an enemy can take away against one's will, is not carried away by a desire for vengeance. Fourth, those commands pertain more to the preparation of the heart, which is inward, than to the deed performed openly, so that patience with benevolence is maintained in the secret of the mind, but outwardly that is done which appears capable of profiting those whom we ought to wish well.

He adds that neither Christ offered the other cheek nor Paul, but that they further rebuked the unjust judge. Therefore, those commands of patience must always be retained in the preparation of the heart, and that very benevolence, lest evil be rendered for evil, must always be fulfilled in the will. Yet do not suppose that Augustine sophistically approves benevolence in the will but cruelty in the deed. He shows most clearly that, while patience remains, without desire for vengeance--indeed, with a preparation to suffer joined to benevolence--others can be corrected and wars waged. "Many things," he says, "must be done even to the unwilling, who are to be punished with a certain kindly severity, since regard is to be had for their advantage rather than their will--a thing which their writings have most splendidly praised in the ruler of a state. For in correcting a son, however severely, paternal love is surely never lost. Nevertheless, that which he does not wish and which pains him is done, though he seems to be healed by pain even against his will. And by this reasoning, if that earthly state keeps the Christian precepts, even its wars will not be waged without benevolence, so that the defeated may more readily be provided for within a peaceful fellowship of piety and justice. For he from whom license to commit injustice is taken is usefully conquered, since nothing is unhappier than the happiness of sinners, by which penal impunity is nourished and the evil will, like an enemy within, is strengthened."

They say, indeed, that a prince can wish every good thing for his enemies except a good mind; for all good things, if the mind is evil, become hostile. I would wish a good mind especially for enemies, for if they are furnished with it, they will be friends--unless they are enemies by right. Accordingly, those precepts of Christian gentleness neither bind the judge's hands so that he may not punish criminals nor the prince's so that he may not destroy an enemy. Rather, this is their admonition: that neither publicly nor privately should we rage with anger, hatred, or the delight of vengeance; that we should endure adversities; and that if our patience is useful to the aggressor, we should maintain it both in heart and in deed. If by our patience he is provoked to a greater injury, let us maintain benevolence in the heart and apply a harsher medicine in deed, just as a father retains love both when chastising and when indulging.

Each man's right remains to him. A Christian is accustomed to yield in his private affairs; in public affairs a prince is sometimes accustomed to yield, but sometimes to oppose all the strength of the kingdom when he judges that necessary. Nor is it strange that this gentleness of mind is required of us, since neither a city nor a camp can stand unless many men pardon many things in their fellow citizens and fellow soldiers. But even in the struggle and heat of battle, reason, not anger, ought to rule. So even the gentile governors of empires decreed.

Seneca, On Anger, Book I, chapter 11: "For what else is it that diminishes the barbarians, though so much stronger in body and so much more enduring of labors, except anger, which is most hostile to itself? The gladiatorial art, too, protects its practitioners; anger lays them bare. Then what need is there of anger when reason accomplishes the same thing? Or do you think that the hunter is angry with wild beasts, either when he pursues those that flee or receives those that tremble? Reason does all things without anger. What else destroyed so many thousands of Cimbri and Teutons poured over the Alps in such a way that not a messenger but rumor carried to their people the report of so great a slaughter, except that anger stood to them in place of courage? As it sometimes strikes down and lays low what is before it, so more often it is its own destruction. What is more spirited than the Germans? What is fiercer in assault? What is more desirous of arms, amid which they are born and nourished, and which alone they care for while neglecting other things? What is more hardened to every endurance, since for the most part they have provided neither coverings for their bodies nor shelters against the perpetual rigor of the climate? Nevertheless, Spaniards and Gauls and the men of Asia and Syria, though soft in war, cut them down before a legion is sighted, for no other reason than their irascibility."

For the same reason it is also dangerous to mix a drink for men about to fight by which they may in some fashion be deprived of their minds and not perceive their own dangers. The Turks use opium, which arouses a kind of fury in those accustomed to it. This is nevertheless ruinous, since those whom frenzy, not reason, leads are less fit both to administer and to receive command.

Therefore, a spirited prince will wage war, for a robber must be dealt with by arms, not decrees. Soldiers are the fortifications of cities and the sinews of kingdoms. Without the military art, whatever is acquired belongs to the enemy, because it cannot be defended. Cicero shows this sufficiently in For Murena: "Military virtue excels all others. It won a name for the Roman people and eternal glory for this city; it compelled the world to obey this empire. All civil affairs, all these splendid pursuits of ours, and this forensic praise and industry lie hidden beneath the guardianship and protection of military virtue. As soon as the suspicion of an uprising has sounded, our arts immediately fall silent. And if this is so, the forum, I think, will yield to the camp, leisure to military service, the pen to the sword, shade to the sun. Finally, let that thing be foremost in the state because of which the state itself is foremost among all."

David himself teaches how dear military affairs were to brave men and lovers of the state, for he had thirty mighty men besides his armies. It is a divine oracle that kingdoms will perish unless kings cultivate military service: "I shall take away the mighty man and the man of war, the judge, the prophet; and the effeminate shall rule over them, and the people shall fall." Accordingly, when several unwarlike princes succeed one another, or one effeminate prince has vigorous adversaries, the state cannot stand for long. It is also a sign that a state is most badly constituted if military practice is neglected in it; for where there are no good laws, there cannot be good arms. Care for military affairs is therefore necessary for the prince. Every region must be traversed; mountains, rivers, cities, and ports must be considered, for the unarmed cannot be safe among the armed. Everyone harasses the unarmed; they fear the armed. Finally, it must be held that not a diadem or scepter but iron is the protection of a kingdom. An unarmed scepter invites robbers. Plato, in Book VII of the Laws, commanded that so great care be given to war that he wished even women to handle arms.

CHAPTER IV

That War Must Be Just and Be Declared by One Who Has the Right to Wage War

§ 1. Saint Thomas, Summa Theologiae, II--II, question 40, article 1, requires three conditions for a war to be just. The first is that there be the legitimate authority of the prince; the second, that there be a just cause which impels him to war; the third, that there be a just intention. I shall discuss these questions in order.

§ 2. Since the power of princes varies--some have no superior, while others are sent by kings to govern provinces in such a way that they nevertheless do not touch military affairs--it is rightly asked in whose power it lies to decree war.

It is certain that the right of declaring war resides in the state itself which is complete and does not receive its right from another, superior magistrate. For a complete state is one that is sufficient for itself, or αὐτάρκης, so that it can protect itself without another's authority. For this it is necessary that it be able to carry arms against another when it cannot obtain its right in another way. For when the Romans are attacked by the Veientines, their constant and yearly enemies; when the Faliscans and Fidenates make an attack; when allies implore assistance against the Samnites; when the Tarentines insult foreigners and violate ambassadors; when it has been resolved to subdue the Picentes, allies of the enemy--there was need of someone to decree that war must be waged. For those injuries ought not to have been borne, lest the state be lost entirely.

That the right of war belongs to a complete state is taught from the fact that it can bring an action for the recovery of what has been taken and demand satisfaction. Private persons go before a judge; here there is no judge except the injured party, who is therefore superior, because those who inflicted the injury have by that very fact become answerable to the injured: by their crime they have brought it about that they must submit to judgment. For just as a private person who commits a crime in another's territory is subjected to the judge in whose province he sinned, so too, when loss is inflicted upon a state, the state itself can judge the wrongdoers; and therefore it decrees war against others and removes impediments to the common good. But since war is an act τῆς ἐκδικητικῆς, of vindicatory justice, and thus belongs to the magistrate, it is altogether certain that the judge of him who inflicted injury is he who suffered it. Otherwise he would have no judge and no protection of justice.

§ 3. Kings ordinarily have the right of waging war, as does the senate or supreme council. Sometimes, however, by the laws of a kingdom they lack that power, and perhaps this is expedient, lest the swift indignation of kings undertake wars afterward to be regretted and to be paid for by the people. The first kings at Rome undertook war by the authority of the senate; afterward the senate used the same power, until, worn out by continual labors, the business devolved upon the people. For unwillingly did the people decree that a war must be endured at its own peril.

The Spartans, who, according to Aristotle and Xenophon, instituted their state very badly because they attended to almost one thing alone--namely war--granted their kings the right of carrying war against anyone whatsoever, and no one possessed the right to interpose or prohibit. This brought them into great calamities, since wars were aroused by the judgment of one man alone. Romulus and the kings who followed did better: they sometimes referred the matter to the Fathers and the people. Tarquin the Proud recalled everything to himself, as did Julius and Augustus; and so that they might appear to do this by right, they obtained the law of which Strabo speaks in Book XV, called the royal law. Certainly, so that war may be decreed more slowly, it is better that the consent of many be required. Yet I judge that such laws should be tempered in this way: that this right be sometimes granted to a king and sometimes denied--granted in sudden emergencies and when there is danger in delay, denied when time for deliberation can be given without danger.

§ 4. Princes who acknowledge a superior, and likewise states dependent upon another, can wage a defensive war under their own auspices and without the permission of the supreme magistrate. For each has no less right to defend himself and his citizens than any private person has; but anyone can arm himself against an aggressor and repel force by force.

§ 5. A prince who is under another and greater prince, or a state which obeys another, ordinarily cannot be the first to declare an offensive war against another. This may happen in two ways, for he declares war either against another prince who is a member of the same state or against a foreigner. He cannot declare war against a prince who is a citizen of the same state, because each has a judge who may decide the matter. Therefore, just as citizens recover what belongs to them not by violence and armed force but at law, so nobles, counts, and dukes ought to hear the supreme judge concerning their controversies. Otherwise the whole state would be disturbed and the stronger would oppress the weaker. The jurist Marcian answered, concerning the Julian Law of Treason, that he who waged war without the prince's command, held a levy, or prepared an army is bound under the law of treason.

§ 6. Nor can a prince carry war against a foreign prince if the supreme magistrate does not consent, although this can be granted more readily. For if the foreigner is absolute and acknowledges no superior, he cannot summon him before his king's tribunal, which the foreigner does not acknowledge. If the foreign prince also has a lord, he can be accused before him and can be compelled by him to give satisfaction; but if that lord is unwilling, not even then can a prince established under another attack his adversary in war without his own king's consent.

The reason is to be sought from the very union and ordering of the members of the state among themselves, which forbids any member to be moved without the consent and will of the whole. For how great would be the losses, and how atrocious the wars, that would arise if some prince of France made war upon a prince of Spain? Would not whole kingdoms immediately be shaken? Charles the Bold declared war upon the Frenchman and moved the whole empire. A great part of wars has taken its origin from private disputes and injuries. Moreover, it is dangerous even to great kingdoms for one prince to pursue foreigners in war, to possess soldiers, and to exercise arms; he who has become accustomed to wars is easily armed against his neighbors.

§ 7. I have denied ordinary power; I grant extraordinary power. The extraordinary power is twofold. The first exists when the circumstances are such that unless war is anticipated, all will be in great danger. The second exists when the superior prince is far away, the cause and opportunity frequently coincide, and the king cannot be consulted; for then he is accustomed to commit to inferiors the right of declaring and waging war. This latter reason has no difficulty: the decision of war and peace belongs to the inferior by commission of the superior. In this way the governors of the Indies can wage war and defend allies, by the common law and power of the office they hold.

There is a difficulty concerning the former manner, for jurists and theologians deny the power of an offensive war. But I except one certain condition: when the state of affairs is such that the enemy must be forestalled. The Turkish enemies drive off booty and give cause for war. The duke to whom the frontier is committed demands the return of the property and is mocked. Meanwhile, a singular opportunity is offered to occupy a certain city which carries great weight for the war and which, if it remains in the enemy's power, can bring Christians into great danger because arms and resources are in it. I say that he will act rightly if he uses the opportunity, for this offensive action is necessary, or certainly most useful, for his defense. Even a private person, for a defense of blameless protection, when he falls among robbers and sees that otherwise he must perish, can forestall them if he sees an opportunity.

§ 8. Against internal enemies many princes and cities have been given power to wage war without the superior's command and knowledge. For they are subjects whom the magistrate can and ought to restrain: first by laws and the penalties of laws; but if they are more powerful than to be held by laws, they must be subdued by war. Further, there is more danger in these men unless they are quickly suppressed. Finally, no external enemy is provoked when a magistrate suppresses his own subjects; rather, he is more provoked if sedition gains strength. Particular magistrates, moreover, if they are compared with the supreme magistrate, are regarded as private persons; if compared with subjects, they are magistrates and bear the sword--not against all, but against those who are subject to them.

§ 9. If two princes contend with one another and the king, for example, neglects justice, does not aid the one who has suffered injury, but allows him to be oppressed, many think that not even then can war be undertaken by those oppressed, but that the injury must be endured. This is without doubt severe, since subjects' bodies and possessions are vexed and carried away, and a prince can thus be stripped of all goods and even of life.

I think otherwise. If a foreign prince inflicts an atrocious injury upon a prince who is under the emperor, and the emperor does not administer justice, nor does anyone else, an offensive war can be waged. The reason appears evident to me: it is lawful to wage an offensive war when, without it, the prince or the part of the state which wages the war cannot be defended. But without such a war the prince or part of the state cannot be defended. There is an example in Julius, Julian, and others, who indeed possessed the power of waging war; nevertheless, the situation itself gives it also to one who does not possess it but is in like fortune. Every year the Germans crossed the Rhine and kept the province under attack. Merely to defend their own territory was too little a protection, either for the dignity of the empire or for the security of the subjects, for before they withdrew they always left the province afflicted by great losses. Accordingly, the Romans crossed the Rhine in turn, burned their huts, and raged with slaughter and bonds. For enemies become very insolent when they see that they are merely repelled and are without danger at home. Therefore, just as a private person, when justice is denied, can repair his loss by another compensation, so too can a prince--and indeed by a stronger right, because the defense of the people rests upon him.

§ 10. Formerly, in the Roman Empire, so vast and powerful, it was not lawful for any subject prince or king to wage war against others, much less for prefects and proconsuls to wage it against their colleagues; and when this was done, it was regarded as a civil and impious war. Nor at the present time is it permitted in either the kingdom of France or Spain, and the Pizarros, who began tumults and civil wars in the West, were deservedly punished. But now in Germany princes frequently wage wars among themselves, and did so formerly, to such a degree that some maintain it is lawful for the princes of Germany to declare war upon their colleagues without the emperor's consent.

Concerning this matter I determine as follows. That power, if it has been given to princes, is destructive. For it is just as if, in slight ailments of the body, before fomentations and the easy services of physicians, iron and fire were applied. Moreover, that conceded right exhausts armies, princes, and cities while they fortify themselves against all their neighbors. It is indeed a sign that the emperor is not sufficiently powerful to decide and settle controversies. Experience teaches how great the losses arising from it have been, and Emperor Ferdinand explains them in the Diet of Worms in the year 1564.

But concerning the power of waging war against colleagues, which is thought to belong to princes, it is best to hear the constitutions of the Empire. The Golden Bull of Charles IV prohibits arsons, spoils, and robberies, which are customarily committed after a declaration of feud, unless that declaration was announced in the customary place three days beforehand. A declaration of feud is the renunciation of friendship and a withdrawal from it. Frederick III established in like manner, in the year 1442, that no one should inflict loss upon another unless he had first summoned him to equitable, just, and customary law; but Frederick complains that immense losses were brought upon the Empire by violation of this law. Clearer still is the constitution made in the year 1495 by Maximilian--or rather by the whole Empire, for very many princes were present in that place. I have thought fit to set those laws down here, that we may understand what has been conceded to the princes of the German Empire.

The first law reads thus:

MANDATE FOR PRESERVING THE PEACE

From the time of this proclamation, let no one, of whatever dignity, estate, or condition he may finally be, attempt to exercise hostilities against another, stir up wars, despoil, capture, attack, or besiege him. Let him do this neither by himself nor through another by furnishing assistance in his own name, nor by detaching any fortress, towns, castles, fortifications, villages, country houses, or territories, nor by taking them away by force without the other's consent, nor by causing harm through fires and similar means. Nor let anyone be present to these transgressors with counsels or auxiliaries, receive them into his house, sustain them with provisions, or tolerate them. But if anyone wishes to implead them, let this be done only in those places and courts where causes either were formerly, or now have been, decided under the ordinance of the Imperial Chamber, or where they are to be decided.

ABOLITION OF ALL HOSTILITY

Wherefore, by royal power and the force of this edict, we have abolished all public hostility throughout the whole Empire.

PENALTY FOR DISTURBERS OF THE PEACE

And if anyone, of whatever dignity or estate, acts contrary to one or more matters mentioned in the preceding article, or at least presumes to act, by the law itself, in addition to other penalties, he shall be subject to our imperial ban. By this very act we place him under our imperial proscription in such a manner that we make his life and fortunes common to all and every person, nor shall anyone who claims them for himself be deemed to attempt anything rash. Moreover, all his written instruments, obligations, and treaties, upon which he relied, shall lose all force and validity on his part. Fiefs also, however great they may be, shall revert to their proprietor; and for as long as the transgressor survives, the proprietor shall not be bound to confer either the whole or a part of them upon him or his heirs, nor to grant participation in their fruits.

IF THE TRANSGRESSORS ARE CONCEALED, AND SOMEONE IS SUSPECTED

But if the electors, princes, prelates, counts, barons, nobles, cities, or anyone else of whatever estate, dignity, or condition, whether ecclesiastical or secular, and their subjects and associates, have suffered any loss contrary to this peace; and if the transgressor is not manifest but someone is brought under suspicion, while the accusers also do not undertake to convict him, yet do not nourish suspicion from a frivolous report, let it be permitted to the injured parties to appoint a day for the suspect and to demand a clearing of himself confirmed by oath. But if the suspect refuses such a clearing in any way or does not appear on the appointed day, he shall be judged guilty of inflicting the loss and shall be visited with the aforesaid penalties of a disturber of the peace. Nevertheless, an elector, prince, prelate, count, baron, noble, or city must provide the other person, and those who will be in his company, with safe-conduct until he is placed in safety. And if perhaps the letters by which the day is assigned and appointed cannot be delivered to him, it will be necessary to affix and publish them in two or three places where he is thought likely to transact business. And if, indeed, contrary to this mandate of ours, anyone has been despoiled, injured, or affected by another loss, then those who are notified of the matter after the recent crime has been committed, or learn of it in another way, shall pursue the perpetrators with all force, zeal, and diligence, and shall seek them out as though the loss had been inflicted upon themselves.

DISTURBERS OF THE PEACE ARE NOT TO BE RECEIVED INTO ONE'S HOUSE

Nor shall anyone receive transgressors of this kind into his house, or furnish them food and assistance in those places which belong to his superior, or even in his own jurisdictions; rather, he shall detain them and shall seriously take cognizance of their causes even upon the accusation of any person. Nor is there any security, safe-conduct, or privilege which such men may allege, since they are in no way capable of any of these without the consent of the opposing party. For in all privileges and safe-conducts which we have granted, we will that this disturbance of the peace be excepted.

CONCERNING PROTECTION AGAINST DISTURBERS OF THE PEACE

If perhaps these transgressors and disturbers of the peace employ so great a defense, assistance, other aids, and favor that there would be need of a proper army and of leading it into the field; or if anyone comprehended in this general peace, of whatever estate, dignity, and condition he may be, whether ecclesiastical or secular--or anyone not comprehended in it--has been defamed, accused, or affected by some loss, or even fosters and assists these transgressors, let this be referred by the injured parties or by the judges of the Imperial Chamber to us, or to our legate, and to the annual assembly of the electors, princes, and estates of the Empire. There assistance shall be decreed for the injured party without any delay.

But if it should happen, on account of some invasion or incursion, that that annual assembly cannot be awaited, we give power both to the judge of our Imperial Chamber in our name and to the electors, princes, and estates of the Empire to select some convenient and suitable place to which both we and they, or our and their legates, may come even by force and determine the matter as has been said. Nevertheless, it shall always be lawful for the judgment of our Imperial Chamber, and incumbent upon it, to proceed by law against the guilty, either by virtue of its office or upon the complaints and petitions of the injured parties.

IF ECCLESIASTICAL PERSONS ATTEMPT ANYTHING AGAINST THIS PEACE

If ecclesiastical persons--which we shall never expect--attempt anything against this peace, the prelates who possess immediate judicial power over them shall, at the petition and requisition of the injured parties and without any evasion, exact restoration in full of the losses so far as it can be done, and the guilty themselves shall be heavily fined. And if the prelates are negligent and do not exact penalties from the guilty, we deprive these prelates, just as we do the guilty, of all our favor and that of the Empire, and of grace and protection, as violators of the peace; nor let them hope for any assistance from us in adversity. Nevertheless, a clearing of themselves, as has also been said concerning secular persons, shall not be denied them if there is merely suspicion.

Moreover, during the peace no one shall be bound by any written instruments and treaties against this peace; for by the force and virtue of our royal preeminence we make and declare them all null and void. This, however, insofar as it concerns the remaining provisions of such written instruments and treaties, shall affect nothing at all; nor shall this public and universal peace and quiet of the whole Empire alter anything in other honest and lawful obligations of debts.

THOSE WHO ARE PROSCRIBED FOR DISTURBING THE PEACE

But those who have been proscribed for these offenses shall by no means be absolved by us without the consent and will of the injured parties, unless the law has awarded the cause to them. Hence, by royal power, we also command all and every one of you mentioned above, in accordance with the oaths and obligations made to us particularly for the sake of the Empire, and also the obedience which you promised us as King of the Romans, to observe this prescribed peace and our mandate with all its points, articles, and clauses as steadfastly as possible, unless any of you wishes to incur the loss of all our grace, and of the privileges and rights which have come to you either from us and the Holy Empire or from others. Moreover, throughout your principalities, counties, and dominions, and whatever is finally subject to the jurisdiction of each, we command you to strive, together with all your officials and subjects, by whatever name they may be called, to preserve and advance this established peace, and not in any way to attempt anything against it, whereby you would deserve both the penalties established against transgressors and our displeasure.

ABOLITION OF ALL PRIVILEGES WHICH CAN BE AGAINST THIS UNIVERSAL PEACE

We also set aside and reject all privileges, safe-conducts, customs, and treaties granted by us or our predecessors which can in any way be opposed to this peace, by whatever words, clauses, or intentions they may have been granted. By royal authority and power we declare them all annulled and void, nor do we will that anyone, of whatever dignity, estate, or condition, allege any defense through these privileges, customs, and treaties in any way.

THIS PEACE SHALL PREJUDICE NO OTHER RIGHTS

Nor shall this peace and our edict result in any prejudice, but rather in an increase, to our universal law and that of the Holy Empire, and to other ordinances and mandates issued before this; and absolutely everyone shall be bound to preserve it from the first moment of its promulgation.

These matters were explained more clearly at Augsburg in the year 1500. In the year 1512, however, at Cologne, a league was entered into among the princes and a method established by which violators of the peace could be corrected and punished. The same things were repeated in the same order in the year 1521 by Charles V. These were confirmed in subsequent years: in the year 1522 at Nuremberg; in the year 1526 at Speyer; in the year 1530 at Augsburg; in the year 1542 at Speyer, and in the same year at Nuremberg; in the year 1544 at Speyer; in the year 1545 at Worms; in the years 1566 and 1567 at Regensburg; in the year 1548 at Augsburg, and there in 1551, 1555, and 1559; in the year 1564 at Worms; and in the year 1570 at Speyer. These things were also enacted in other assemblies, but were by no means observed, as the whole Empire complained to Emperor Ferdinand in the year 1564.

Accordingly, an offense against the laws is always committed when an offensive war is undertaken, if it can be avoided, when it is possible to obtain one's cause through the laws. Therefore there remains what was also formerly provided by laws: that to prepare arms, collect money, enroll an army, and invade others is the crime of treason. See Paul in the law amissione.

§ 11. When war is waged without the prince's authority, both those who inflicted the losses and their heirs must make the losses good. For although the cause was legitimate, they nevertheless had no right to affect others with such great injuries. Thus it is not lawful for a private person to punish a thief, although caught in the crime, but he must be delivered to the magistrate. Yet they can recover their own property without an obligation to restore it, although not without sin, unless, having pursued the enemies without interruption, they subdue them. Further, if the enemies inflicted harm, they ought not to repair their own losses from spoil taken without the prince's authority; nevertheless, if they have done so, they are not bound to restore it unless the enemies give satisfaction.

§ 12. Tribunes, centurions, and soldiers ought not to attack an enemy on their own authority, nor to rage with arsons and devastations, unless power has been granted by the prince, either specially or generally, to harm the enemy in every way they can. Therefore, they sin gravely when, against the commander's will, they set fire to hostile fields, villages, and towns. For they are not judges but executors of justice, and no more is lawful for them than has been permitted. Thus a soldier who kills an enemy to whom the commander granted life is a murderer, and one who burns a city against the prince's will is an incendiary and is obligated to make good the loss; for a minister of justice cannot rage beyond the measure prescribed by the magistrate.

Formerly commands were so regarded that a soldier could not move his arms without his commander's order. It is the law of Modestinus: "He who in war has done a thing prohibited by the commander, or has not observed his orders, is punished capitally, even if he has conducted the affair well." For this reason Manlius and Postumius were cruel to their own sons. And just as it is a capital crime not to hand over an army to one's successor, or to retain it by force and against the magistrate's will, so too it is a capital crime to fight against the magistrate's will. When challenged by a Gaul, Titus Manlius addresses the dictator nobly: "Commander, without your order I shall not fight outside the ranks, not even if I should perceive certain victory. If you permit it, I shall meet the challenge." The reason is that which has already been explained above, and great disadvantages would follow: for anyone could kill a private enemy as though he were a public enemy.

CHAPTER V

The Just Causes for Which War Can Be Undertaken

§ 1. No crime can be more serious than to declare unjust wars and to wage them once declared. For if one homicide, theft, arson, or adultery is condemned by divine law, of how great a crime shall we judge him guilty who slaughters so many myriads of men, burns and reaps kingdoms, and leaves nothing in whole cities untouched by lust?

There is no purpose in recounting ancient examples. In the year 1599 the very broad and populous kingdom of Pegu was reduced to deserts; yet its king possessed so great a treasure of gold and gems that the victorious king of Arakan loaded from it seven hundred elephants and the same number of horses, and neglected the rest. Bovesius writes of that kingdom, and the account is contained in volume III of the Thesaurus of Indian Affairs: “I cannot express the grief I felt when I beheld with my own eyes those banks of the rivers planted with fruitful trees, but deserted and uncultivated, and the elegant and gilded temples overthrown from their foundations. You would think the whole kingdom deserted and uncultivated and inhabited by absolutely no one. The streets, especially those which lead to the temples, lie foul, filled with skulls and corpses: of men killed sometimes by famine, sometimes by domestic steel as they rushed into mutual slaughter, and sometimes also by royal command and cast into the river--which could scarcely be navigated even by smaller boats because of the multitude of corpses. Here I pass over cities, towns, and villages destroyed with all their inhabitants, so that no one may believe a more savage tyrant ever existed.”

The same fortune befell the most flourishing kingdom of Martaban, which was also reduced to desolation by the Siamese, as the same Thesaurus testifies. The king retained thirty thousand men with himself; two hundred thousand, stunned by fear of death, wandered through mountains and forests; every field was uncultivated and rough in the year 1599. He who gave counsel for the unjust war furnished the cause of so many evils. Therefore all the souls which perished shall be required from his soul, and the crimes of the soldiers who destroyed them shall be imputed to him.

§ 2. The causes of wars must be weighed with great care, so that the first question may be: Is the war being prepared justly? The second: Can a greater advantage be obtained from a just war than from an unjust peace? The first can be decided by theologians and jurists; the second remains uncertain until the fruit of victory. The Athenians were accustomed to hear philosophers and orators concerning the justice of a war. But if a war is undertaken unjustly, although victory follows, the wicked victor cannot remain fortunate for long.

Οὐδεὶς στρατεύων ἀδίκως σῶς ἦλθεν πάλιν.

No one who wages war unjustly returns safe.

Injustice sometimes prevails for a time, but in the end it is punished more severely. Alexander undertook many wars unjustly and conducted them uncontrollably and proudly; but he himself, together with his mother, wives, children, and whole family, paid the penalties. This would not have happened if he had remained in his own Macedonia and had not raised soldiers and centurions to such great power.

The very magnitude of the matters declares that great diligence is necessary in deciding the case, so that the justice of the war may be established. For the judge sits in the gravest cause, one which involves the fortunes of an entire kingdom and the lives of many in a single crisis.

There is a rule of law, and it is legitimate: proofs in criminal matters ought to be clearer than the noonday light. For no equity allows a defendant to fall by certain death in a doubtful cause. How, then, are so many thousands cut down when it is not clear which party has taken up arms more justly? A judge ought to follow only things proved and to adjudicate only matters which are clear: law illicitas, section veritas, On the Office of a Provincial Governor. If this is observed for a private defendant where an inheritance and little fields--or indeed the worthless life of one man--are at issue, what shall we judge must be done in great matters and with entire peoples?

But if the reasons for the adversaries and against them have equal weight, the war must now be suspended, or the matter must be investigated more accurately and the rule observed which Tholosanus counsels in his Syntagma, Book XLVIII, chapter 9, section 14: "Wherefore, if the defendant and plaintiff prove equally, and the witnesses and other productions are equivalent, the matter returns to doubt and to its first condition, whence the defendant is absolved--unless the plaintiff supports the more favorable cause. For judgment must be given in doubtful matters in favor of things favorable: as for liberty, in an action concerning an undutiful will, for marriage, and for a dowry. Nevertheless, in criminal causes a concurrence of proofs rarely occurs, for in them the defendant is not admitted to prove a negative so long as the plaintiff or accuser can prove his case. For a canonical proof is not introduced against proofs. Yet this is observed: if, while the defendant is heard in a criminal cause, he alleges certain facts, as they call them, or circumstances that attenuate or restrict the quality of the offense, proof is taken concerning these when separately extracted. A new investigation is also made by virtue of the judge's office when the proof on either side is doubtful, so that certain knowledge of the truth may be had."

A much greater investigation is fitting for one about to wage war. A light and perfunctory consideration has no force in this matter, for only an error difficult to avoid excuses its author. He will examine the matter not only through his own counselors but through universities, other friends, and princes. And if the rights of the parties are obscure, judgment must be made for the defendant, not the plaintiff.

§ 3. If war is declared upon some prince or state, the cause must be weighed. If the adversary possesses a just cause, satisfaction must be given to him. If, after all diligence has been applied, the cause remains doubtful, the prince can offer himself for a more exact discussion; if he is attacked by war, he can defend himself, for he is not bound to abandon his right merely because his right is doubtful. Further, he who makes war on the basis of a doubtful right commits an injury; therefore, the man who previously defended a doubtful cause now wages a just war.

§ 4. Here too that principle remains: in doubt, the cause of the possessor is better. For this holds in every cause, but especially in a criminal cause, since sentence concerning life is not rendered from obscure matters; but he who declares war has already pronounced judgment concerning life. Nor do princes here have more right over princes than subjects have over subjects.

§ 5. Nevertheless, the man who does not possess can request a judge and demand by right that, since the cause of each is doubtful, it be judged in common and that a part be given to the one who does not possess, or, if the thing cannot be divided, compensation. This has place, however, if the cause of the nonpossessor is more probable; for they are no longer equal, and therefore the condition of the possessor is not better. Nor is the nonpossessor bound to abandon the more probable right. Otherwise, if the possessor had the slightest doubt and the other the most probable cause, the latter could do nothing, which is unjust. But if in such a cause the possessor is unwilling to give anything, he commits an injury and can therefore be attacked in war by his adversary.

§ 6. Nor do I exempt soldiers, especially tribunes and centurions, from some inquiry into right and equity. For if the war is manifestly just, all can serve in it; if the injustice is clear, no one can give his name for military service. If the cause is doubtful, soldiers who are subjects, bound to fixed pay, and vassals can follow a cause that is doubtful. Thus Saint Augustine, Against Faustus, Book XXII, chapter 75: "For if a just man happens to serve under a sacrilegious king, he can rightly fight at his command when it is certain that what is commanded is not against God's command, or when it is not certain whether it is so; in such a way that perhaps the king is made guilty by the injustice of commanding, while the order of servitude shows the soldier to be innocent."

For soldiers, when they execute the sentence of a judge, choose the safer part when they follow the sentence of their prince. Finally, soldiers are bound to follow the prince; for by refusing the oath they would add strength to the enemy and betray the state. Certainly, in doubt one ought to favor one's country rather than its enemies. Finally, it is not customary to summon an unorganized multitude to judge the cause. The reasoning is different for commanders who, when they are summoned as counselors, are compelled to judge the justice of the cause seriously. But if it is evident to soldiers and vassals that the prince doubts the justice of his cause, they ought not to enroll for military service, because they know that the war is unjust. For it is unjust to judge concerning another's life when the cause is doubtful.

§ 7. Soldiers who are not subjects cannot serve in a doubtful cause, because the war does not concern them and they cannot voluntarily involve themselves in a doubtful matter. Further, without any necessity they expose themselves to the danger of inflicting injury upon another prince, whereas by abstaining they avoid that danger.

Ordinarily, however, soldiers of good conscience do not sin here. For those who wage wars put forward the most specious causes, which appear plainly necessary. Further, when a king or prince is of good name, they rightly presume that he does not undertake unjust wars, that he has examined the cause accurately, and that it has been approved by prudent and upright men. Conrad Lancellotus says that laws existed before arms; but I believe that laws were made for laying down arms or not taking them up. After arms, laws were thus enacted.

CHAPTER VI

The Just Causes for Which Wars Can Be Set in Motion

§ 1. The first cause, and the most just of all, exists if an unjust war is brought upon one. But it is brought unjustly in two ways. First, when war is declared upon the innocent, as the Moabites declared unjust wars upon the Jews, and likewise Antiochus and others--with such men, alas, history is full. In the second way, when a war was just at its beginning but is rendered unjust by satisfaction not being accepted. For example, the Venetians seize an Ottoman ship contrary to a treaty; the Turk declares war; the Venetians restore the ship, merchandise, passengers, and all losses, and promise to make satisfaction for the injured honor and authority of the emperor, either according to his own judgment if he commands equitable terms, or according to that of arbitrators if he wishes to appoint them. But if he moves war absolutely and wishes a most noble state to surrender itself to him, they will rightly resist with all their strength, because the sin is not so great that they ought to deliver themselves to a most cruel enemy and, together with their liberty, ruin themselves also in religion.

This cause is not only just but also necessary. For the prince who does not defend the state sins against justice just as much as he who invades the possessions of another. Therefore, against one who inflicts harm, defense is not only just but necessary. Here I pronounce boldly: he who desires peace should prepare war. Here especially has place that saying of Isocrates:

> Οὐκ ἀθυμεῖν δεῖ τοὺς ὑπὲρ τῶν δικαίων κινδυνεύειν μέλλοντας, ἀλλὰ πολὺ μᾶλλον τοὺς ὑβρίζοντας.

Those who are about to incur danger for a just cause ought not to be downcast, but rather those who inflict injury. Chilon used to say that this was the difference between a good prince and a tyrant, and that they were recognized from the matter about which they contended: the tyrant broods over another’s possessions; the prince defends his own.

§ 2. The second cause is the detention of things taken away. For just as citizens, who have a judge, when something has been taken away, recover it at law and appoint a day for the adversary, so a state, when it has sent ambassadors to demand back its possessions in vain, prepares and declares war. Moreover, the cause of demanding back possessions is various and as diverse as it is within a city. For something may have been taken away by theft or robbery; what had been deposited may not have been returned; justice may have been denied to citizens; or an inheritance may have been withheld.

A war is just when an enemy carries off and drives away the possessions of neighboring lands by plundering. The Roman people waged such a war with the Illyrians and Gauls, and afterward with barbarian peoples. “For things which they cannot possess together, they fight in unhappy want; laborious wars seek this peace, and glorious victory obtains it.” For the great and wealthy are attacked for this reason: the wind overturns the oak because it is laden with acorns and foliage; willows are exempt. Thus the Britons were safer for a long time because they denied that there was an ounce of gold among them.

War is also waged when justice is denied to citizens or merchants are detained. Among the northern peoples there were many such cases in ancient times, and atrocious battles. When an inheritance is divided unjustly, there is the case against Jugurtha, who through adoption had received with Adherbal the right to divide the kingdom and had corrupted Roman ambassadors and commanders with money. War was waged for this reason, because he had joined parricide to it.

§ 3. In these causes, not only the magnitude of the loss must be considered, for sometimes it is not worthy of war, but also the design of enemies who are seeking wars. If their first injuries are not opposed, they will be bolder for second and third injuries; and then, after greater losses have been received and the spirits of your men weakened, it will be necessary to fight men who are more confident.

§ 4. War is also frequently undertaken for the sake of vengeance, when the enemy has injured one in any matter whatsoever. It is not waged so that things may be recovered, since they either have not been taken away or have been consumed, but so that the wicked may be punished and the state made safer by this means. No one ought indeed to furnish vengeance for himself; nevertheless, a state ought not to leave its own injuries unavenged without cause, whether they are inflicted by private persons or by another state. Because it possesses the sword for vengeance upon evildoers, it ought therefore to use it with reason.

§ 5. War can also be waged when religion is attacked and God is blasphemed. This happens in two ways. The first is when foreigners live wickedly and afflict God with insults but nevertheless do not harm others. The second is when they attempt by deceit, fraud, and violence to draw others into the same sins, and actually do so.

If they are wicked and blasphemous only toward themselves, it is not lawful to wage war against them for that cause alone, because one state is not the judge of another state, while it belongs to a judge to punish sins. Nevertheless, by the express admonition and command of God they can make war. Thus Joshua killed the Canaanites by God's command because their iniquities had now been completed. They did not touch the Moabites and Edomites, who were not much better, because they had no command to punish their crimes.

§ 6. But when by force or fraud they attempt to bring their vices into a state, they also give a just occasion for war. Thus the Maccabees waged most just wars against Antiochus and others who compelled men by force to idolatry.

§ 7. This is so not only when they solicit the minds of subjects to crimes by violence and armed force, but also when they do so by fraud and blandishments. When Moses had occupied Bashan and the neighboring regions, the Moabites and Midianites, seeing themselves unequal in war, received the Israelites hospitably as brothers, gave them gifts, and sent their daughters to take care of the guests, so that under the appearance of friendship and of marriages to be contracted they might entice them to fornication and adulteries, and then, once they had been weakened by lustful love, to idolatry. When this had been done, as Balaam had conjectured, God, being offended, would either destroy them utterly or at least, when they had been deprived of heavenly aid, offer them to their enemies to be conquered.

And the deceit succeeded, Numbers 25: "Now at that time Israel abode in Shittim, and the people committed fornication with the daughters of Moab, who called them to their sacrifices. But they ate and adored their gods. And Israel was initiated into Baal-peor; and the Lord was angry and said to Moses: 'Take all the princes of the people and hang them upon gibbets before the sun, that my wrath may be turned away from Israel.' And Moses said to the judges of Israel: 'Let each one kill his neighbors who were initiated into Baal-peor.'"

For this crime a severe vengeance is exacted in chapter 31: "And the Lord spoke to Moses, saying: 'First avenge the children of Israel upon the Midianites, and then you shall be gathered to your people.'" And immediately Moses said: "'Arm men from among you for battle, who can exact the vengeance of the Lord from the Midianites. Let a thousand men from each tribe be chosen from Israel to be sent to war.' And they gave a thousand from each tribe, that is, twelve thousand men equipped for battle. Moses sent them with Phinehas, son of Eleazar the priest, and delivered to him the holy vessels and the trumpets for sounding. And when they had fought against the Midianites and conquered them, they killed every male and their kings, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, the five princes of the nation. They also killed Balaam son of Beor with the sword. And they captured their women and little children, all their cattle, and all their furniture; whatever they could possess they plundered. They consumed with flame both cities and villages and castles. And they took the spoil and all that they had captured, both from men and beasts, and brought it to Moses and Eleazar the priest and to the whole multitude of the children of Israel; but the remaining utensils they carried to the camp in the plains of Moab, beside the Jordan opposite Jericho.

"And Moses and Eleazar the priest and all the princes of the assembly went out to meet them outside the camp. And Moses, being angry with the princes of the army, the tribunes and centurions who had returned from the war, said: 'Why did you spare the women? Are not these the women who deceived the children of Israel at Balaam's suggestion and caused you to transgress against the Lord in the sin of Peor, whence the people were struck? Therefore kill all who are of the male sex, even among the little children, and slaughter the women who have known men in intercourse.'"

God decreed this war beforehand, Numbers 25:17: "And the Lord spoke to Moses, saying: 'Let the Midianites feel you as enemies, and strike them, because they too acted as enemies against you and deceived you by snares through the idol of Peor and through Cozbi, daughter of the prince of Midian, their sister, who was struck on the day of the plague for the sacrilege of Peor.'"

§ 8. Not only must a war be just; for it to be waged rightly, a wise man ought to grieve that a just cause of wars is given. For those who eagerly seize even a just cause and rejoice that an occasion has been given seek anything rather than justice. Both Romans and Carthaginians were disposed in this way before the Second Punic War. For when the ambassador said that he carried peace and war, the Carthaginians ordered him to give whichever he preferred, and he poured war from the fold of his garment, not without terror. Augustus acted better, for, as Suetonius writes in chapter 20, he brought war upon no nation without just and necessary causes. For he watched over the empire not to enlarge but to protect it. Therefore, he was unwilling to bring war upon those at peace and grieved when it was brought upon him.

§ 9. A war is also just against those who have assisted an enemy in an unjust war. For that cause the Romans frequently subdued peoples, and particularly the Picentes and Sallentines, because they had borne arms for the Tarentines. They decreed war against Philip of Macedon because he had allied himself by treaty with Hannibal while the latter held power in Italy, although the prayers of the Athenians also impelled them to it. War was also brought upon the Aetolians because they had stood by Antiochus. For the same cause the Histrians were subjugated because they had assisted the Aetolians. The Gallograeci, who were said to have been in Antiochus's camp, were in the same position; but the senate did not approve the cause of the war, wherefore a triumph was denied even to the victorious Manlius. Thus many peoples followed the ruin of the Syrian War. The contagion of the Second Macedonian War drew in the Illyrians; and while the Roman pursued all who were privy to it, as though by a chain, he subjected the world to himself, with peoples either furnishing causes or the Roman seeking them out.

But for this war, in which an enemy's σύμμαχοι, or allies, are attacked, to be just, two things are required. First, they must truly have assisted, not merely favored, the enemy. For if the Spartans are enemies of the Athenians, the Thebans are not therefore also bound to withdraw from friendship with the Athenians. Since they are free, they can love those whom the Spartans hate. For this reason the Cretan War was unjust. "The Cretan War, if we wish to confess the truth," says Florus, Book III, chapter 7, "we made from the desire merely to conquer a noble island. It seemed to have favored Mithridates; it pleased us to avenge this by arms, and, because the act was unjust, savage counsel was taken against the captives, so that very many destroyed themselves with poison."

The second requirement is that they were not subjects of the enemies and that the cause of the war was not clear to them. For if the cause of war was doubtful, they were bound by treaty to furnish allies, arms, and provisions; since they must be judged innocent, they ought not to be harassed after the war is ended.

§ 10. It is not only a most just but also a most honorable cause of waging war when allies are defended. Thus the Roman people, moved by the prayers of Campania, attacked the Samnites, not on its own behalf but, what is more honorable, on behalf of its allies. In this matter it must also be observed that the cause of the allies be just.

Saint Chrysostom speaks beautifully on Psalm 134: "We have right hands from God so that we may bear aid both to ourselves and to others who have suffered injury, so that we may remove crimes from our midst, and so that we may be a harbor and refuge to those upon whom violence and injury are brought. How, then, shall pardon be given to those who use these arms not for salvation but for the destruction of others?" And this is what Cicero advises in Book IV of

The Republic: “No war is undertaken by the best state except for safety or good faith.” For good faith must be kept with allies, lest they be allowed to be oppressed.

In this matter one must take care not to defend the unjust causes of allies. Some soldiers, for example, are so wicked that they care nothing whether the cause being conducted is just or evil. Having bound themselves for money, they serve the very powers of hell. A prince will not lightly employ them, because if money is displayed on the other side, they will soon migrate as deserters into the enemy’s camp. For this is in their mind:

> Right is where the greatest reward is.

§ 11. Although soldiers and princes do not weigh matters in this way according to their proper importance, justice nevertheless requires that in an unjust war the commander and the soldiers make good the losses. In a doubtful case, ordinarily the prince must do so, because he ought to have investigated the matter more accurately, if he doubted through his own fault. Next, the counselors must do so, whose ignorance is inexcusable. Soldiers are bound to restore only that by which they have become richer. If the error of any soldiers was culpable, they are bound to return everything they took away. But through the calamities of war men are generally rendered worse. For they rage against the enemy, and once despoiled they turn to plunder; therefore the cause must be both just and weighty.

CHAPTER VII

Certain Causes of War More Particularly Explained

§ 1. All causes of war can be referred either to defense, to reparation of loss, or to vengeance for injury inflicted upon God and men, both on behalf of one's own state and on behalf of allies. Yet because among these there are various kinds and degrees of injuries, I shall speak of certain causes from which immense wars have arisen.

Injury to ambassadors has been the cause of serious wars, and a most just cause, because it is contrary to the law of nations. For if an ambassador is not safe, the hope of peace and reconciliation is cut off. The Tarentines foully violated the Roman embassy which carried a complaint concerning injured citizens, by an obscene insult shameful to relate. Florus, Book IV, chapter 8. But after being defeated in great battles, while Pyrrhus defended the impious cause in vain, they paid for the crime with slavery. The Picentes and Sallentines at the same time came under Roman dominion. Then the Illyrians cut down the ambassadors with an axe as though they were victims; but after victory, axes drawn over the necks of their princes made expiation to the hands of the ambassadors. Destruction was also brought upon Corinth because Roman ambassadors had been violated--whether by hand is uncertain, but certainly by speech.

King David waged a most serious and most destructive war, to the ruin of the nation, against the Ammonites. The cause was that Hanun had violated the ambassadors sent for friendship and consolation, 2 Samuel 10:4. "Therefore Hanun took David's servants, shaved half of their beards, cut their garments in the middle as far as their buttocks, and sent them away." What was more detestable, they hired Syrian auxiliaries against David and brought war upon him. For besides those who assisted the children of Ammon, who numbered 33,000, Hadadezer brought an immense multitude, of which David struck down 700 chariots and 40,000 horsemen. But after he had conquered Rabbah of the children of Ammon, he was very severe in victory, though by God's command, 2 Samuel 12:31: "And bringing forth its people, he sawed them; and drove iron carts over them; and divided them with knives; and made them pass through the brick-mold. Thus he did to all the cities of the children of Ammon. And David and the whole army returned to Jerusalem."

§ 2. There was no legitimate cause why Rome the daughter fought with Alba the mother; but each people, a kindred people, was afflicted until, weary of evils, they imposed the public decision upon the three Horatii and the three Curiatii. Five fell, and the sixth gave his innocent sister as a victim for himself. "Let the cause of the war be stated," says Saint Augustine in The City of God, Book III, chapter 14, "as adultery was stated to be the cause of Troy: no such cause, nor anything similar, is found. It was only that Tullus might stir sluggish men to arms and troops now unaccustomed to triumphs." Therefore, through that vice so great a crime of war between allies and kindred was perpetrated. It is surely shameful brigandage to make war merely for exercise.

§ 3. Some also are moved to arms by no other cause than the weakness and contemptibility of their enemies. They indeed have other causes for wishing it, but the enemies' fortune causes them to dare it. This happens if a prince is weak in age or ability, if the people is rather alienated from him, or if a city has suffered fire or war. Thus, after Camillus had compelled the Gauls, when they had been cut down and put to flight, either to depart from Italy or to die, those who owed the Romans the greatest thanks attacked the wretched city with hostile minds--especially the Latins, when they demanded a share in the right of command and in the magistracies. This is one reason why the Empire deservedly remained unimpaired for the Romans, since they found their neighbors so ungrateful.

§ 4. Ambassadors are indeed inviolable and altogether immune, yet on this condition: that they do nothing beyond the office of their embassy, attempt nothing against those to whom they are sent, and, when ordered to depart, obey immediately. Accordingly, the ambassadors of the Tarquins deserved death when, under the opportunity of carrying away the royal furniture, they were purchasing traitors to the city. Livy, Book II: "Meanwhile, when the opinion which judged that the goods ought to be returned had prevailed in the senate, and when for that very cause the ambassadors had a reason for delay in the city--because they had obtained from the consuls time to procure wagons in which to carry away the kings' possessions--they spent all that time consulting with the conspirators."

The Romans could have punished them, but, lest they further provoke the Tarquins whom they feared, they dismissed them. The matter was of so great concern even to barbarians that when the Gauls attacked Clusium in war and confessed that they possessed no right except in arms, they nevertheless demanded that the Roman ambassadors be delivered to them because these had been seen in the front line and one had pierced the enemy's commander. When they not only failed to obtain this but also learned that the violators of human law had been given the military tribunate, they immediately flew upon Rome. They valued the ambassadors' deed more highly than their own. The Gauls were wresting land from its possessors by force and injury; the ambassadors, on behalf of innocent allies, were three men who had fought in the battle line, with no fault except that they had not been commanded to do so. Yet Rome paid for this fault with fire and near destruction. Therefore an ambassador must take care not to devise hostilities or have clandestine conversations, lest he appear to act as a spy and scout.

§ 5. The abduction of women and the avenging of violations of chastity have frequently been causes of foreign wars, just as they have been of seditions. The children of Israel, especially Simeon and Levi, avenged the violation of their sister Dinah by the destruction of the Shechemites. For one family made war upon an entire city, impiously and with broken faith; they had made peace and abused the sacrament of circumcision for deceit. The cause of the war was indeed just, but after the treaty the war became most unjust.

The Trojan War also arose from adultery, and the Messenian War, which divided Greece into parties, from fornication. The carrying off of Lavinia also roused Turnus to arms. And the first Roman arms, on account of the virgins abducted at the equestrian games, were employed between sons-in-law and fathers-in-law. The Veientines, Caeninenses, and Sabines justly brought war, but because they waged it with remarkable arrogance, they yielded to Roman arms.

CHAPTER VIII

Unjust Causes of Wars

§ 1. For the most part, either unjust wars are waged or, if they are just, they are administered unjustly. When the fury of war blazes up between two peoples, justice stands on only one side. Whether someone attacks a just cause or defends an unjust one, victory never makes him innocent. No one deceives his own conscience so that the outcome may console it; an unjust cause holds him guilty.

§ 2. Among the unjust causes of war, I place first the corrupt judgment of certain prudent men, by which they think that their own state, because it has been prudently instituted and furnished with excellent morals, deservedly subjects barbarian peoples to itself in servitude.

They make a distinction among men, saying that some are slaves by nature, born, namely, to obey, but others born to command. Aristotle, Politics, Book I, chapter 5:

> Καὶ εὐθὺς ἐκ γενετῆς ἔνια διέστηκε, τὰ μὲν ἐπὶ τὸ ἄρχεσθαι, τὰ δὲ ἐπὶ τὸ ἄρχειν.

And immediately from birth there is this difference, that some things were born to command and some to obey. He proves this in animals and then proceeds in this way to men who are slaves by nature:

> Ἐπεὶ δὲ τὸ ἄρρεν πρὸς τὸ θῆλυ φύσει, τὸ μὲν κρεῖττον, τὸ δὲ χεῖρον· καὶ τὸ μὲν ἄρχον, τὸ δὲ ἀρχόμενον. Τὸν αὐτὸν δὴ τρόπον ἀναγκαῖον εἶναι καὶ ἐπὶ πάντων ἀνθρώπων. Ὅσοι μὲν οὖν τοσοῦτον διεστᾶσιν, ὅσον ψυχὴ σώματος, καὶ ἄνθρωπος θηρίου--διάκεινται δὲ τοῦτον τὸν τρόπον ὅσων ἐστὶν ἔργον ἡ τοῦ σώματος χρῆσις, καὶ τοῦτ' ἐστὶν ἀπ' αὐτῶν βέλτιστον--οὗτοι μέν εἰσι φύσει δοῦλοι, οἷς βέλτιόν ἐστιν ἄρχεσθαι ταύτην τὴν ἀρχήν, εἴπερ καὶ τοῖς εἰρημένοις. Ἔστι γὰρ φύσει δοῦλος ὁ δυνάμενος ἄλλου εἶναι, διὸ καὶ ἄλλου ἐστίν.

Furthermore, the male, compared with the female, is better, while the latter ought to submit to command. It is necessary that the matter be the same in all human beings. Therefore, all who are inferior and worse than other men by as much as the soul excels the body and man the beast--and such are those whose work is placed in the use of the body and from whom this alone is the best thing that can proceed--are slaves by nature, for whom it is better to submit to this rule, if indeed it is so also for the things stated above. For a slave by nature is one who is capable of belonging to another, and therefore does belong to another.

This opinion is both false and destructive of the human race. For from this the very arrogant wisdom of the Greeks thought it a right to subject barbarian nations to its command, and thought war just so that the worse might obey the better; but they judged themselves the better, although it is established that many barbarian nations lived more innocently and modestly than the Greeks. They thought that they had accomplished some great thing when they reduced the Lydians, Sarmatians, Scythians, and Indians under their power and, as wise men, made themselves masters of men whom they thought foolish.

First, indeed, it is excessively arrogant to raise themselves so high and press others so low. Second, one must first see whether he who undertakes war against barbarians born for servitude, so that he may govern them legitimately, also governs his own mind, house, and state according to virtue; otherwise he is more wicked than the barbarians. Third, the barbarians ought rather to be taught and admonished than subdued in war. For why should they serve you? Why should you possess the right of life and death over them because you are more cunning than they?

All nations have taught that this difference is not one of nature but of education. The Romans at first were barbarians, and afterward the Spaniards, Gauls, and Germans--πᾶν τὸ χείριστον, "the very worst of all"--but now they are regarded as the most cultivated of nations, while barbarism has migrated into Africa and Asia.

§ 3. Many unjust wars have also been waged on account of women, even though there was no abduction. Darius the Persian brought war upon Iantinus, king of the Scythians, because his daughter had been refused to him in marriage. This was tyrannical, since he could not compel even a subject to give him his daughter in marriage against his will. It was indeed customary in ancient barbarism to abduct wives or to bring war on account of them. More subtle was the art of the French nobles, who incited the king to war against Charles the Bold so that, compelled by necessity, he might give his daughter in marriage to someone together with the very ample dowry of the Burgundian dominions. Antony did not indeed wage war on account of Cleopatra, for he enjoyed her love, but was driven into war by the ambition of a woman.

§ 4. Immense wars have often arisen from superstition, just as was said above concerning sedition. The cities of Egypt were accustomed to provoke one another to war on account of their gods. Once, when the Alans and Armenians had assembled for games, a dispute arose concerning the gods: which people had the better gods? That frenzy remained in them as they departed. For since each nation's own divinities appeared sacred and its rites most honorable, after they had returned home, the more each man wished to appear pious, the more hostilely he pressed the war.

For this is the nature of superstition: to ridicule the things of another. "Everyone," says Philo in Book II of The Life of Moses, "abhors foreign rites and thinks that so much more honor accrues to his own as he tramples those of others more deeply." The source of this proceeds from innate malice and obstinacy. For men cannot honorably defend their own rites, since these contain many unspeakable and shameful things; but in ridiculing those of others, since they are equally absurd, they can be eloquent and witty. Now there is scarcely any war which is not said to be waged for the sake of religion.

§ 5. It is established that the greatest wars have had the most trifling causes:

> Ἡ φαύλη τις αἰτία πολλάκις παρεμπεσοῦσα πολλῶν πραγμάτων ὠδίνησε μεταβολάς, καὶ συμφορὰς ἀπέτεκεν ὑπερόγκους.

And frequently a cause of no importance, intervening, has given birth to changes in many affairs and brought forth immense calamities, as Nicetas admonishes in his account of Manuel Comnenus. The greatest wars have often had the slightest and most contemptible beginnings. Cicero, On Ends, Book II, says that Xerxes would have attempted so much in vain if he were said merely to have wished to carry away honey from Hymettus. Yet frequently there is no greater cause or fruit of the bloodiest wars.

§ 6. Most unjust wars arise from a profound desire for wealth and honor. Even if other causes are also just, these nevertheless join themselves as companions. Desire for wealth was indeed more concealed among the earliest Romans, more visible among other nations. When the Persians sent ambassadors throughout Greece to ask for earth and water as a sign of subjection, avarice made them restless and judged it equitable that every land be annexed to their own. When Xerxes had tasted Attic figs, he swore that he would occupy the land which bore that fruit--not from gluttony, for he could have bought them, but from avarice, because although he had as great wealth and power as no one before him had possessed, he nevertheless did not have a mind content with present things.

Avarice and luxury together incited the Gauls to invade Italy. For when those who had been there offered wine to their countrymen, by its sweetness they aroused them all to the expedition; but most poured out their blood upon the land unhappily sought. Those who desired the property of others too eagerly lost all their own possessions and their life.

Afterward the same Italy, by the same pleasantness and felicity, invited the Lombards. For while they were in Pannonia, having heard that Italy abounded in sweet fruits, succulent meat, and fragrant wine and enjoyed, under a temperate sky, a variety of all things, they hastened there in great columns. Spain, however, armed the avarice of two peoples against itself and mutually against those very peoples. For the Spaniards, then a simple nation, were ignorant of the resources and riches that lay well hidden in the depths. Afterward the Romans sought them; but, inflamed by this matter, the Carthaginians moved arms against the Romans, which came to rest with the destruction of Carthage.

Thus, while they gaped after Spanish gold and excavations, they demolished their own walls. For whatever cause they pretended, certainly:

> Gold and purple trouble the lives of men with cares
> And weary them with war.

Nowhere was this clearer than in the war which the Gauls waged against the Greeks. For Brennus exhorted his men to war by the hope of booty. When he had heard from captives that the Delphic offerings were not of solid gold but iron covered with gold, he ordered them to affirm that they were of solid gold, and thus used his men's avarice for the battle. This cause of fighting seemed so legitimate that in Pausanias they said the Persians were foolish because, though rich, they fought with the poor. For they thought the reward of victory to be not justice but the resources of those oppressed.

Accordingly, in this cause they did not deny themselves to be so unjust that King Antigonus was not ashamed to say to a certain sophist who offered him a book written on justice: "You are foolish: although you see me harassing the cities of others with arms, you nevertheless discourse on justice in my presence." Antigonus laughed at these things, professing injustice and great robberies. But more shamefully, the Roman people occupied Cyprus without any pretext, and lest anything be lacking to the unworthiness of so great a crime, Porcius Cato was the commander.

Florus, Book IX, narrates the matter thus: "The fate of the islands was at hand; therefore Cyprus too was taken without war. Ptolemy ruled the island, which abounded in ancient riches and was for that reason sacred to Venus. So great was the fame of its wealth, and not falsely, that the people which had conquered nations and was accustomed to give away kingdoms, under the leadership of Publius Clodius the tribune, commanded the confiscation of an allied and living king. He indeed anticipated his fate with poison at the report of the matter. But Porcius Cato carried the Cyprian wealth in Liburnian ships through the mouth of the Tiber, and this affair filled the treasury of the Roman people more broadly than any triumph."

With similar desire but greater madness Crassus moved against the Parthians. Florus, Book III, chapter 11: "While it was subduing the Gauls through Caesar in the north, meanwhile in the east the Roman people received a grievous wound from the Parthians. Nor can we complain of fortune. The disaster lacks consolation. With both gods and men opposed, the desire of the consul Crassus, while he gaped after Parthian gold, was punished by the slaughter of eleven legions and by his own head. Metellus, tribune of the plebs, had devoted the departing commander with hostile curses. When the army had crossed Zeugma, the Euphrates swallowed the standards torn away by sudden whirlwinds. And when he had placed camp near Nicephorium, ambassadors sent by King Orodes warned him to remember the treaties struck with Pompey and Sulla. Gaping after royal treasures, he answered that he would make his answer at Seleucia, without even an imaginary right."

§ 7. Avarice is frequently a cause of war, but ambition and the lust for domination joined to the praise of complete victory are more obstinate in it. For when enemies, having bargained for life, are ready to surrender everything, why are their prayers not accepted, but the exactor of vengeance presses on until despair of pardon drives the wretched to prefer destroying their possessions and themselves besides rather than being a cruel mockery to the enemy? Is it not because pride, desiring an absolute victory, outweighs avarice? This, therefore, is a cause of waging war, as all histories show. Lucan, Book I:

> You, Rome, made common to three masters, were the cause
> Of the evils, and never did the deadly compact of rule
>
> Among a multitude succeed. O men badly united
>
> And blinded by excessive desire, what pleasure is it
>
> To mingle your strength and hold the world

In common?

For although his own causes seize each man and drag him into criminal battles, nevertheless the lust for domination holds first place. Ninus is said to have been the first to do this. Augustine, The City of God, Book IV, chapter 6: "Justin, who, following Pompeius Trogus, wrote in Latin, as Trogus had, but also briefly, a Greek--or rather, a foreign--history, begins the work of his books thus: 'At the beginning of affairs, command over peoples and nations was in the hands of kings, whom not popular ambition but moderation approved among good men advanced to the summit of this majesty. The peoples were held by no laws; the judgments of princes stood for laws. It was customary to guard rather than extend the boundaries of command. Each man's kingdom ended within his own country. Ninus, king of the Assyrians, was the first of all to change the ancient custom, as though ancestral among the nations, by a new desire for empire. He was the first to bring wars upon his neighbors and subdued peoples still untrained in resistance as far as the boundaries of Libya.'"

And a little afterward, he says: "'Ninus confirmed the magnitude of the dominion he had acquired by continual possession. Therefore, after his neighbors had been subdued, when he passed with an accession of strength, now more powerful, against others, and each succeeding victory was an instrument of the next, he subjected the peoples of the whole East.' And in Book III, chapter 14, Sallust touched in passing upon that vice"--of fighting for the sake of exercise and from love of praise--"as a great one. For when in praise he had briefly recalled more ancient times, when the life of men was passed without desire and each man was sufficiently pleased with his own, he said: 'But afterward, when Cyrus in Asia, and the Lacedaemonians and Athenians in Greece, began to subdue cities and nations, to hold the lust for domination as a cause of war, and to think that the greatest glory lay in the greatest command,' and the other things he had undertaken to say."

Let it suffice me to have set down his words thus far. That lust for domination assails and wears down the human race with great evils. Conquered by this lust, Rome then triumphed that it had conquered Alba and called the praise of its own crime glory.

§ 8. Many wars arising from the sudden and unjust ferocity of kings have crushed the world. Seneca, On Anger, Book III, chapter 20: "For my purpose is not to write of the cruelty of Gaius but of the evil of anger, which does not rage merely against individual men but rends whole nations, cities, and rivers, and lashes things safe from every sensation of pain. Thus the king of the Persians cut off the noses of an entire people in Syria; hence the name Rhinocolura for the place. Do you judge that he spared them because he did not cut off their whole heads? He delighted in a new kind of punishment.

"The Ethiopians, who are called Macrobians because of the very long span of their life, would have suffered something of this kind. Cambyses raged against them because they had not received slavery with upturned hands and had given free answers through the ambassadors he sent--answers which kings call insulting. Without provisions having been prepared and without the routes having been explored, he dragged the whole multitude useful for war through pathless and arid places. During the first part of the journey it lacked necessities, nor did the barren and uncultivated region, unknown to human footsteps, furnish anything. At first they sustained hunger with the tenderest leaves and the tops of trees; then with hides softened by fire and whatever necessity had made food. After roots and grasses also had failed amid the sands and there appeared a solitude destitute even of animals, they chose every tenth man by lot and had food more savage than famine. Anger still drove the king headlong when he had lost a part of his army, until he feared that he himself might be called to the lot; then at last he gave the signal for retreat. Meanwhile, choice birds were being preserved for him, and the instruments of banquets were being carried on camels, while his soldiers drew lots as to who should perish badly and who live worse."

This man was angry at a nation unknown and undeserving, though one capable of feeling it; Cyrus was angry at a river. For when he hastened to the war in order to attack Babylon--a war whose greatest moments lie in opportunities--he attempted to cross by a ford the whole broadly spread Gyndes, something scarcely safe even when it has felt the summer and has been reduced to its lowest level. I spoke of this matter when I treated tyranny and cruelty.

§ 9. I judge it unjust to declare war on account of receiving those who have fled from enemies, unless they themselves are authors of the evils. For why, once their country has been destroyed, should its remnants be pursued? The Israelites indeed spared six hundred Benjaminites and even gave them wives, in the final chapter of Judges.

Florus, Book II, chapter 18, confesses the wicked hatred of his own people: “If it is permitted to confess it, there was scarcely ever a more unjust cause of war. The Segidenses had received allies and kinsmen who had escaped the hands of the Romans. An intercession made on their behalf had no force. Although they removed themselves from every contagion of wars, they were ordered to lay down their arms as the price of a lawful treaty. This was received by the barbarians as though their hands were being cut off. Therefore, immediately turning to arms under Megara, a most courageous man, they attacked Pompey in battle. Nevertheless, although they could have completed the war, they preferred a treaty. Then they attacked Hostilius Mancinus. They so subdued this man too by continual slaughter that no one could sustain even the eyes or voice of a Numantine man. Nevertheless, with this man too they preferred a treaty, content with the spoils of arms although they could have proceeded to annihilation.”

It is altogether permissible to confess that an injury was done to the Numantines, not only because the beginning of the war was without cause, but also because treaties were violated and cruelty was repaid for clemency. For they wished to surrender if conditions tolerable to men were commanded. But when Scipio desired a true and unconditional victory, they were reduced to such misery that, after battle, a sortie, and flight had been attempted, they finally killed themselves. I shall conclude with the remarkable answer of a barbarian nation. If war is not just, it is brigandage. The ambassador of the Scythians said this freely to Alexander: “You who boast that you come to pursue robbers are the robber of all the nations you have approached.”

CHAPTER IX

If the Enemy Offers Satisfaction, He Must Be Treated More Mildly

§ 1. The dispute in this place is twofold. For it is asked, if an enemy who offered an injury says that he disapproves of the deed and wishes to repair the loss according to an equitable judgment, whether the injured party is compelled to accept that satisfaction and abstain from war. Then, if the prince is free either to accept satisfaction or to pursue them in war, what ought to be advised to him, or what is expedient?

§ 2. The Doctors do not hold the same opinion in the former controversy. Some command men to abstain from war once satisfaction has been offered, when war has not yet been consecrated by bloodshed; but if the battle lines have now clashed and the battering ram has struck the wall, some think that satisfaction may be despised and war continued, while others think that men must abstain from war. It appears to me that a substantial distinction must be used and the matter explained by these propositions.

PROPOSITION I

An injury is inflicted either when possessions are taken away, when violence is brought upon bodies, or when reputation and honor are injured by slander; and sometimes all these are combined. Finally, it is inflicted when the divine majesty is injured by sacrileges or by the crime of unbelief or heresy. Each must be discussed individually. I understand these things, however, as done by a public judgment, that is, by the judgment of the whole state.

PROPOSITION II

Among these, the easiest compensation is for possessions taken away and for honor. For money and livestock can be restored or equal prices repaid. Honor also appears capable of being restored by retracting insults and acknowledging the slander. But two things make this matter more difficult.

The first is that not only must the things taken away be restored, but also the losses which followed must be compensated. For that which is decreed in a civil judgment--that expenses, losses, and loss of profit, absolutely everything, be repaid to equality--is also required in war. The second is that, after everything has been restored, a penalty must nevertheless be inflicted upon the wrongdoer, and indeed a twofold penalty. Namely, he must repay something to the man who suffered the injury for the insult he inflicted when he took things away by force, for the man’s fear, and for the anxiety and distress he endured while deprived of his property. For this reason, in Exodus 22:4, 7, and 9, the thief is compelled to render double to his neighbor.

When this has been done, the state also exacts another penalty in order to preserve the common good. Therefore, after stolen things have been returned and slander has been retracted, it punishes the theft by the gallows and the slander by exile, prison, or another means. Accordingly, the state which caused the injury ought to make satisfaction in that manner according to the laws. For it belongs to natural law that equality be established between those who have been made unequal by another’s injury. Nor is there one law for private persons and another for kingdoms among themselves. For just as, within the same kingdom or city, equality of justice must be preserved by the judge, so within the fellowship of the human race, of which kingdoms are members, equality must also be established among kingdoms, so that if one has taken anything from another by injury, it may restore it by justice. Yet this must be done with such moderation and mild judgment that satisfaction is received and the other state is not oppressed; for the laws which favor a person making restitution in private causes must be observed.

PROPOSITION III

In violated chastity and life taken away, restitution is most difficult. For since adulteries, abductions, acts of violence, and slaughters are punished by death, there appears to be no other manner of satisfaction than that the whole state which did these things offer itself to death and submit its necks to the axes. For all are murderers, all adulterers and abductors; and satisfaction appears to be nothing other than a full surrender to the victor's free judgment.

There is an example in Sacred Scripture. For when the men of Gibeah had killed the Levite's wife by their lust, the children of Israel from the assembly at Mizpah sent messengers throughout all Benjamin to say: "Why has so great a crime been found among you? Deliver the men of Gibeah who perpetrated this wickedness, that they may die and evil may be removed from Israel." Behold: they demand that the evildoers be surrendered. When this was not done, all the defenders--that is, the whole tribe of Benjamin--were destined for death. One state appears to have the same right against another as all the children of Israel had against one tribe. Hence those who by private authority have injured another state are customarily surrendered.

Although this satisfaction appears capable of being required, it nevertheless ought not to be exacted so that all are punished; nor, if one king has harmed another king, is it necessary that he approach him in order to die or hand over his kingdom.

PROPOSITION IV

Therefore, when dealings are between different states, the moderation of satisfaction, so that justice may be preserved, must be made not according to written laws but according to natural law and the law of nations. In this, first, restitution is rendered easier when reputation and fortune have been injured. For it is not necessary to deliver anyone either to scourges or to the gallows, since by natural law the penalty of death was not established for those offenses; indeed, not even by the laws of all nations will theft be a capital crime.

But when chastity has been violated, although abduction and adultery have received the sentence of death by divine law, it is nevertheless not necessary even then that a state deliver itself to the sword. For those laws are judicial and belong to the Hebrews, not to all nations. Although the injured party can exact the death penalty if it has the guilty person in its power, the guilty state is nevertheless not bound to offer itself to death. The case of the Benjaminites was different, for by divine law they were bound to surrender or kill the guilty. They could have given satisfaction to other nations in another way if so great an injury had been inflicted upon a Canaanite or Moabite woman. David indeed committed adultery and homicide, yet he was not commanded either to die or to withdraw from the kingdom. A father also forgave Absalom the slaughter of his brother.

Accordingly, although some king, by the authority of the senate, the command of the people, and the consent of all, has injured another king through the slaughter of some men or by other means, if he himself and the people and senators truly repent, and if they are prepared to make satisfaction in every way, it ought not to be exacted from them that they all surrender themselves to the judgment of the injured, to death or chains. Rather, because of the multitude and the very many innocent persons, he who was injured ought to be content with some milder penalty, and either judge it himself or refer the matter to arbitrators. Joab indeed thought that a multitude ought to be spared even in battle.

The reason for this matter is that war is then not necessary, but it must not be waged without necessity. For either he will then fight in order to compensate his losses or to avenge an injury. But losses of wealth and honor are restored, while those of chastity and death are irreparable; let compensation be made according to equity and goodness. When they acknowledge the injury and offer appropriate satisfaction, it must be accepted. But because the penalty of death and servitude is most grave and a lesser one can be exacted, the injured party will act unjustly if he wishes to reduce an entire state to such severe conditions.

Moreover, he is a judge in this cause because of the other party's offense; but when satisfaction is offered, he deals as though with a party. And although he still sustains the role of judge, he is nevertheless also bound to hear the party as a party, or as a judge hears a party. I am moved especially to think that the matter must be handled mildly because otherwise there would be absolutely no end of waging war, since no one readily entrusts himself to the judgment of an armed enemy. These observations concern the whole state.

§ 3. But if the injured king demands that all offer themselves to death, or surrender so that the free judgment of life and death may rest with him, or at least that, their lives having been granted, they all subject themselves to him and change the form of their state, I think that those who inflicted the injury must do this if they caused great losses, devastated fields, and plundered cities; for here there is equality of compensation. In lesser matters they will not do it--for example, if they mocked ambassadors, as the Ammonites did when they sent David's ambassadors away with disgrace. I think that so great a satisfaction ought not to be made in such a case and is unjustly exacted. David's victory was cruel because they additionally prepared war in order to overthrow him. For many innocent men and all their posterity would be compelled to pay for those deeds. Therefore, they will be able to close the gates and defend themselves as against a tyrant who inflicts punishments greater than the offenses.

The whole difficulty, however, lies in this: when a private person has committed something worthy of death, he cannot defend himself against the ministers of justice, but must submit to the judge's pronounced sentence. Here, however, the state is guilty and the injured prince is the judge. Sentence is rendered when war is decreed; death is announced to the defendant when war is declared. Therefore, the state which inflicted the injury is bound to die and serve, and because this sentence is just the king can execute it, whatever satisfaction may be offered.

But in this matter there are so many dissimilarities that the argument is rendered weak. For the sentence of a king declaring war upon enemies is, and ought to be, different from that of a judge condemning a defendant. The judge's intention is that the defendant die on account of his crime. But the king's intention is to compel the enemy by force to give satisfaction for the loss, not that the king upon whom he declares war, and that king's princes and guilty people, should die--much less that everyone, even the innocent, should serve in slavery--but that equitable satisfaction be made for the injury. Accordingly, although death is decreed for those upon whom war is declared, it is nevertheless not decreed absolutely for all, but under this condition: unless they give satisfaction.

Moreover, there is a great difference among defendants. A private person pays for his offense with his own head; his wife, children, and kinsmen are immune. But the death of guilty persons in a state is followed also by the destruction and enslavement of many innocent persons. Therefore, they can first beg pardon and offer wealth and other things which they can give while preserving their own life and liberty and that of their people. If these are despised, they can defend themselves by arms against an excessively harsh sentence.

For what shall we say to citizens who have offended in this manner? They will say: "We have sinned. Money was taken away; it shall be restored. Insults were cast; we grieve at the deed. A slaughter was committed; we are all guilty, some as its authors; we shall surrender them. We shall give satisfaction in another way. If he commands us all to die, to leave wives widowed, children orphaned, and our country bereft of men, this is more grievous than ought to be commanded by a moderate enemy. If he commands us to serve, this very thing is more grievous than death. We are suppliants, and we do not beg off punishment; rather, we ask for punishment, but one short of death and servitude. But if we do not obtain this, now that the cause of war has changed, it is lawful to hope for victory."

It is not lawful to wage war against such men; they can defend themselves. The foundation is that no one is bound by natural law to kill a thief or murderer, but can affect him with another penalty, as I said before. Indeed, laws can be passed in some state that a murderer not be punished by death, especially if he sinned only by consent and assistance. Therefore, he is not compelled to this penalty by the law of nature, nor by the laws of an enemy state to which he is not subject, nor by the law of nations, for this is milder: it is customary to spare very many men conquered even in a most cruel war.

PROPOSITION V

When war is already being waged, if, while the enemy's battle line is giving way, they ask pardon and offer satisfaction, it belongs to charity to spare them; nevertheless, the prince is not bound by justice to do so, for he has now caught the evildoer in the very act, and the latter puts forward prayers only for the sake of escape. If, after some battles have been fought on either side, he still promises to give satisfaction, the prince is bound to hear and accept him, provided this is not done deceitfully, to gain time until auxiliaries arrive. The reason is that he who truly grieves that he has offended and is prepared for satisfaction now begins to be innocent; and therefore, on account of the reasons I advanced before, satisfaction ought to be accepted on behalf of the state.

§ 4. I would give counsel to the injured prince that, as soon as the enemy has acknowledged that he erred and has offered a small satisfaction for a great offense, he should accept it. Indeed, let him act in such a way that by his own clemency he mitigates the penalty and imposes nothing harsh or insulting. So far as can be done, let him provide for the loss of those whose interest is involved; yet rather than pursue war, let him make satisfaction from his own property and teach his subjects that certain disadvantages must be endured for the common good.

For thus he will avoid the most dangerous war of all, namely that which is to be waged against desperate men. If they see the extremity before them, they will resist most fiercely, since they are to fight for life and liberty. Then all men who pity them will come to their aid as they can, and will execrate the man who drives them to such grave necessities. But if all else fails, they will deliver themselves into the dominion and jurisdiction of any more powerful man. When the Fidenates despaired of the victor's mercy, they burned themselves with fire; the Saguntines killed themselves, and more effort was required in one city--and not a populous one--than in subjugating the vast kingdoms of Asia.

Let him also consider this: that many are innocent, many have sinned from necessity, many from levity, and most from error. Let him make a great distinction among the causes. For those who were openly wicked and cruel contrary to the law of nations are punished more severely.

CHAPTER X

One Must Proceed to Wars with Mature and Deliberate Counsel

§ 1. When about to declare war, look around at everything belonging to your enemies and your neighbors; and if you perceive that everything favors you, dread the changes of the times. When about to wage war, first secure all that is your own in common, lest you be harmed; then see how you may conquer. When Hannibal was about to attack Gades, he sent thirteen thousand Spaniards and one thousand horsemen into Africa to protect it; from the cities of Africa he detached four thousand men to guard Carthage, having in them at once hostages and soldiers. When Lysander was about to besiege Athens, he drove everyone into it, so that he might oppress it by a failure of provisions. But this is hazardous: for that multitude could have been equipped and could have overwhelmed camp with camp.

§ 2. Mature counsel, therefore, must be employed, and war must not be undertaken except with the greatest care, so that both the justice of the cause and the forces may be weighed. Again and yet again, therefore, let recourse be had to counsel. For what does everything profit when the state is entangled in the difficulties of war? The savings of all are consumed in wars, and as much cannot be taken from those at peace as is spent upon wars. Anger must be conquered by counsel. There is a wise saying of Nazianzen:

> Θυμὸν χαλίνῳ μὴ φρενῶν ἔξω πέσῃς.

"Bridle your spirit," or "bridle your anger, lest you fall outside your mind." I should prefer to adapt it to this place:

> Θυμὸν χαλίνῳ μὴ θρόνου ἔξω πέσῃς.

"Bridle your anger, lest you fall from the throne." Let the king and the counselors, when deliberating about war beneath a gilded canopy amid tapestries, believe that they are engaged in the battle line, and let them possess the spirit of those around whose ears missiles discharged from cannon whistle. If the repose of those deliberating were sometimes terrified by the ball of a single musket, they would decide upon wars much more calmly.

The Utopian prince acted rightly when, as a great number of counselors were deliberating about war and the decree of the senate in favor of war was now to be signed, he secretly arranged for soldiers to fire from a tower opposite the council chamber through its glass windows into the room, without any danger to those who were present but with immense alarm. When they saw shards of window glass flying, they all fled in different directions and sought safe places. The prince admonished them to stand unafraid amid danger, but in vain: fear overcame shame, and the prince alone was abandoned in what they believed to be danger. Courteously pardoning their fear, he said: "Let no one advise war unless he is also able to endure its dangers. You have abandoned me amid danger--lions in word, hares in deed." We see these errors daily, and Thucydides teaches that they also existed of old:

> μετ' ἀσφαλείας μὲν δοξάζομεν, μετὰ δέους δ' ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ ἐλλείπομεν.

While they are safe, they pronounce bold opinions; while they are in fear, they fail in the midst of the deed. In this matter nothing is more dangerous than a prince who, since he is a man, bears losses and insults in a human manner--that is, with a troubled spirit--and, so that he may seem to possess a lofty mind, bears them wrathfully. A faithful counselor will state his opinion not according to the prince's passion but according to his safety. For a calm counselor is most necessary to an angry prince, since he will give the counsel which the prince himself, when calm, would approve. Many err in this matter when, in order to seize favor, they flatter the anger of the prince--an anger which the prince himself will soon put away. For the wills of princes are not always the same, as Pliny admonishes, but the wills of angry men vanish most swiftly. I remember having read in Euripides' Suppliants these golden words:

> Σφαλερὸν ἡγεμὼν θρασύς.

A bold, or boastful, prince is a precarious thing. If a deceitful flatterer is added to him--one who knows how to excite movement upon a slippery surface--he will cast everything headlong by his impetus; and when everything has failed, they will take refuge in the confidence of fools, which consists in promising fortune to themselves.

I therefore require counsel concerning wars to be slow and mature: one counsel surpasses many hands. Let them remember that none feel the evils of war sooner than those who set it in motion. Peter Gregory of Toulouse, the most prudent of jurists, advises and proves the point exceedingly well in book 11, chapter 2, section On the State: "In a few moments the counsel of a state produces results no less great than fortune does." Aimoin also writes that all the Burgundians protected their state more by counsels than by arms. At the least, arms must be governed by counsel. For some men are excessively precipitate: while they wish to bring dangers upon others, they do not guard against them, although the power of fortune and Mars, common and uncertain to both sides, must be weighed; certainties must not be exchanged for uncertainties; and, as Sallust says, every war is easily undertaken but is ended with the greatest difficulty, nor are its beginning and end in the power of the same man. Anyone, even a coward, is permitted to begin it, but it is not laid aside except when the victors will it.

In this consultation about entering upon war, the prince must also weigh the counselors themselves: who they are, who advise it, and who dissuade from it. At court there are Furies and firebrands of war: nobles for whom servitude is harsher in peace, when they are compelled to obey upright laws, and from which they free themselves amid the license of war; there are restless men who neither rest themselves nor permit others to rest; there are exiles who, from fear of punishment, drive the hesitant prince to arms against those by whom they were justly expelled. There are men who, under the pretext of the public cause, desire either to avenge themselves upon their enemies or to become rich from princes' pay and expenditures and from plunder taken from subjects. There are many who readily give counsel about conducting a war but afterward refuse to undergo the danger. There are those who look only to present things and desire to satisfy a blazing anger, but do not consider public and private evils. Yet a prudent prince, or governor of the state, will weigh all these things before he undertakes war. For once war has been instituted, as Thucydides says, princes are ill spoken of and blamed for the losses. I locate counsel concerning war in this: that, by as much as youth abounds in fierce martial spirit, by so much the senate should judge it to be its own duty to foresee and unfold every possible event.

§ 3. Let it consider these things. First: Who is the enemy? Is he a Carthaginian? An Asiatic? Is he strong only in impetus, or also in stratagems and prudence? He is foolish who prepares a war of a thousand rams against fifty wolves. These things deservedly come under consideration, lest anyone rashly turn his own fortune and that of others according to hope and fear. An enemy who was not feared has caused the Romans, although they waged war so providently, and others too, greater trouble. Andriscus, a man of the lowest condition and an imaginary king of Macedonia, slew the praetor Juventius. Numantia, a single city, resisted for fourteen years and, after Roman armies had been slaughtered, afflicted the Romans with shameful treaties. The Cretans defeated Marcus Antonius when, in his confidence of victory, he had more chains than weapons in his men's hands. In the Social War Rutilius and Caepio were slain and routed. Julius Caesar, after losing his army, was brought bloodied into the city, and all Italy was despoiled more grievously than by Hannibal. In the Servile War, under the leadership of Eunus, the camps of Manilius, Lentulus, Piso, and Hypsaeus were cut down; and in the other war, under King Athenion, the camps of Servilius and Lucullus were captured, because they went against a despised enemy with less deliberation. Spartacus also and his allies plundered the camps of Clodius and Glaber, and then other camps. In the Apennines Spartacus cut down the army of Lentulus and destroyed the camp of Gaius Cassius; elated by these victories, he deliberated about invading the city of Rome. At last the forces of the entire empire rose against the mirmillo. He had earlier been neglected, and the war had been waged rashly until danger aroused their counsels. I have narrated only a few things; but I do not know whether, during the entire time of the empire--if one excepts the Second Punic War--the Romans were conquered with so much disgrace as in these incidental affairs and by these despised enemies, against whom their commanders cast themselves without mature counsel. But they learned through disasters.

Βουλῆς γὰρ ὀρθῆς οὐδὲν ἀσφαλέστερον.

Ἱερὸν ἀληθῶς ἐστιν ἡ συμβουλία.

Nothing is safer than right counsel; counsel is in truth a sacred thing. When wars are undertaken without this sacred thing, men sing that refrain of fools: "I did not think"--a capital fault in war. Then this too must be weighed: no one is more easily oppressed than one who feels secure. Nothing ought to be despised in war. Nor should those who are cautious be called timid:

ἀμαθία μὲν θράσος, λογισμὸς δὲ ὄκνον φέρει.

Ignorance brings boldness; reasoning brings fear. Set before yourself everything that is to be feared before war. Second: for this reason the Spartans must be praised, who punished a commander with death if he had conquered rashly and without counsel. The Carthaginians acted more harshly: if he had erred, they drove him to the cross--although this punishment could be excused in rashness alone. For they judged that a commander's rashness had betrayed the fatherland, even if fortune had averted the mischance. Everything must be foreseen and nothing scorned, since the destinies of kingdoms are moved by small moments. Wars depend upon reputation, and by it they are often concluded.

Among the Romans an account of the deed performed was demanded; but if anyone had managed the matter badly through ignorance or accident, he was in no other danger. Few offended through malice. Sergius and Verginius, through mutual hatred, caused a great disaster at Veii: Sergius refused to ask assistance from Verginius, his rival and colleague; Verginius refused to bring it to Sergius without being asked. One must therefore deliberate slowly, since, although you foresee many things, you will be harmed by countless others from the quarter whence you did not expect it. Let counsels therefore go before. Once counsel has been taken, war must be undertaken zealously, for:

Ἐν γὰρ χερσὶ τέλος πολέμου, ἐπέων ἐνὶ βουλῇ.

The end of war lies in hands; the end of words, in counsel.

CHAPTER XI

War Must Also Be Waged Justly

§ 1. It is not enough that wars be just and necessary unless the laws of war are also observed; for arms too have their laws, although they are opposed to laws. First, indeed, a war is sometimes rendered unjust and execrable from being just when it is waged by soldiers whom it was not proper to summon as auxiliaries. Then it can happen from this that neighboring princes and states can and ought, by right and desert, to assist those who previously supported an unjust cause, and to judge that cause to have been made just by the fault of the other party.

For if a Christian prince wages war with another who is likewise Christian, but brings in Turks, Tartars, or other unbelievers and barbarians as soldiers, there is no doubt that he sins most gravely, although he has a just cause for waging war. The reason is firm: although the other party has sinned and is bound to make satisfaction, it will nevertheless not be bound to deliver itself into the power of barbarians, which certainly occurs to the greatest detriment not only of bodies but also of souls. Nor can any prince or state exact from any prince or state the penalty that it open a gate to the Turk and commit its subjects to the utmost danger. Christian princes can also resist and rise against the man who has summoned unbelievers, contemners of treaties, and public enemies of all Christians. For in this manner they will not champion an unjust cause, but will avert a common danger which is accustomed to turn to the destruction not only of those against whom the barbarians are summoned and of the neighboring princes, but also of the very men who summoned them.

It has been customary in seditions to summon barbarians, and by this road the Heruli, Alans, Goths, Vandals, and Lombards invaded the empire. Palaeologus summoned Amurath against Marcus Craconicus, prince of Bulgaria, relying upon whom his nobles had rebelled. Rejoicing in the opportunity, Amurath first conquered on behalf of Palaeologus, and then subjected a great part of Greece to himself. Palaeologus waged a just war; but after he had employed a barbarous and perjured soldiery, he lost himself and his kingdom, and let into Europe a powerful enemy who now beats upon the barriers of Italy, Germany, and Spain. For this reason one must take care that high-spirited and lofty princes are not reduced by the injuries of their neighbors to attaching themselves to the common enemy. Thus, while Bayezid drove the conquered Christian Palaeologus to utter desperation, the latter was delivered after summoning Tamerlane; and Bayezid paid the penalties of fratricide--for he had killed his younger brother--and cruelty, being enclosed in a cage and led about as a mockery.

But let us return to the arms of barbarians. In 2 Chronicles 16 Asa is commanded to dismiss the army hired from Syria; and indeed, in chapter 19 Jehoshaphat is told: “Do you give aid to the impious and join in friendship with those who hate the Lord?” Nevertheless, arguments arise here which defend those auxiliaries. For no reason occurs why we may not employ every kind of soldier, whether faithful or unbelieving. For why, when we employ horses, elephants, and dogs against enemies, should it not be lawful to employ an unbelieving soldier, since they are ministers of justice, and in them piety is not required, but obedience? The Maccabees entered into an alliance with the Romans, and Jonathan assisted Demetrius. Indeed, in 1 Samuel 18 and 29 David joined himself to Achish, king of the Philistines. Finally, in most soldiers who are called Christians there is no great care for religion and piety. If, therefore, we seek the pious, the camps must be abandoned.

The answer is at hand. Nature has arranged it so that men seek every kind of aid for their own defense and do not attend to the piety or sins of the man assisting them. Therefore, considered in itself and by nature, it is not a crime to employ an immoral or unbelieving soldier; but because so many evils arise from it, the war is rendered altogether unlawful. Accordingly, a Christian prince unjustly driven from his dominion ought rather to live an innocent life in exile than to flee to the Turk in order to be restored by his forces. For in making war he will cast his subjects into servitude and cause slaughters--which indeed is lawful, for by the very fact that they revolted they deserved it. But it is contrary not only to charity but also to justice and the laws to subject them to unbelievers, so that they may be sold, compelled to Mohammedanism, and so that, by removing one dominion from the Christian world, he may make it weaker and increase the forces of the Turks by the addition; nor is the good he expects from it worth so much. For he will hold a precarious command beneath the proud scepter of the barbarian for so long as it pleases him. But if it were certain that the barbarous unbelievers would act humanely, use the victory according to the prince's intention, not carry away the captured multitude, transport their army away, and claim no right for themselves, he could employ their labor. Yet this is the same as if you denied that barbarous unbelievers are barbarians. It has never yet happened; therefore it is not to be hoped that it will. Consequently, they are never prudently brought into the fatherland and are always lawfully repelled.

§ 2. In order that justice may be preserved in the war itself, it is lawful to inflict all those losses which pertain to punishing the guilty, making satisfaction, and establishing the safety of the state. When vengeance advances beyond those limits, the war is now unjust. The Lord God plainly abominates cruelty in battles. King Ahaz of Judah had offended the Lord and was delivered into the hands of the king of Israel, 2 Chronicles 28: "And Pekah son of Remaliah killed one hundred and twenty thousand men of Judah in one day, all of them men of war, because they had forsaken the Lord, the God of their fathers. And the children of Israel took from their brothers two hundred thousand women, boys, and girls, and immense spoil."

But what did the prophet Oded say amid so great a rejoicing? "At that time," says Scripture, "there was there a prophet of the Lord named Oded, who went out to meet the army coming to Samaria, and said to them: 'Behold, the Lord, the God of your fathers, being angry against Judah, has delivered them into your hands, and you have killed them atrociously, so that your cruelty has reached to heaven. Moreover, you wish to subject the children of Judah and Jerusalem to yourselves as male and female servants, which ought by no means to be done. For in this you have sinned against the Lord your God. But hear my counsel, and lead back the captives whom you have brought from your brothers, because the great fury of the Lord hangs over you.' Therefore men from among the princes of the children of Ephraim--Azariah son of Johanan, Berechiah son of Meshillemoth, Hezekiah son of Shallum, and Amasa son of Hadlai--stood against those who were coming from the battle and said to them: 'You shall not bring the captives in here, lest we sin against the Lord. Why do you wish to add to our sins and heap up our former offenses? For the sin is great, and the anger of the Lord's fury hangs over Israel.' And the men of war left the spoil and everything they had captured before the princes and the whole multitude. And the men whom we mentioned above stood up and, taking the captives, clothed from the spoil all who were naked; and when they had clothed them, shod them, refreshed them with food and drink, anointed them because of their toil, and given them care, they placed upon beasts of burden all who could not walk and were weak in body, and brought them to Jericho, the city of palms, to their brothers; and they themselves returned to Samaria."

Here the remedy exceeded its measure and vengeance the measure of the offense; therefore the immense fury of the Lord hung over them--not because it was unjust at the beginning, but because in a just war there was unjust atrocity. Thus, even when princes undertake just wars, they must beware the savagery of soldiers, lest a nation swift to monstrous deeds provoke God in the very victory.

§ 3. Compensation is not to be valued according to the enemies' losses, but according to the victor's advantage. For the enemies' losses are accustomed to be immense. Whatever a soldier seizes in battle he retains by the law of war, and it does not pertain to satisfaction. It is an altogether equitable law that things captured in battle are considered to belong by right to those who capture them. For the freedom of commanders is necessary for encouraging the soldier. In Deuteronomy 20 all the spoil is said to be divided among the army. This is indeed taken from the enemy, but it is the wages of the soldiers; for in a just war the party which defends the unjust cause is compelled to restore the soldiers' pay and whatever has been expended. It is lawful to kill armed men, to possess cities, and to do other things, because the enemies do and attempt all those things.

§ 4. A war in which innocent persons are killed is also waged unjustly, although it otherwise has a just cause. An innocent person, however, can be killed in two ways. First, one who is known to be innocent cannot be killed in himself and directly without sin. Exodus 23: "You shall not kill the guiltless and innocent"; and Deuteronomy 24: "Children shall not be killed for their parents." The reason is taken from nature, because he who is free from fault ought not to sustain punishment. Injury is the cause of war; he who is removed from injury ought to be exempt from war. Moreover, the reasoning is the same for a subject city and a foreign one. For if Thessalonica sinned, Theodosius nevertheless could not involve the just and the seditious in the same punishment; nor does he have more power against foreigners, whose judge he has become for no other reason than their guilt. Hence in Deuteronomy 20 God pronounces that little children and innocent persons are to be spared. Children, women, and clerics are presumed innocent unless they have fought or assisted those fighting. Sometimes entire portions of armies can also be innocent: for all who believe that their prince is defending a just cause, although they bear arms, are to be considered innocent if only their ignorance is inculpable. Therefore they cannot be killed in themselves and directly as though lawfully condemned.

§ 5. Innocent persons are nevertheless killed incidentally, as the philosophers say. This occurs, first, because they are presumed guilty, as when, after a victory, all who are of military age are killed, because they are judged to have assisted by arms, counsels, or auxiliaries, and a soldier cannot hear and adjudicate the causes of individuals. Hence God spares only little children and women; without doubt, if men were known to be equally harmless, they would not be in a worse condition.

Second, although it were established that many are innocent, because war cannot be waged without their slaughter, they can be killed. For when a city is battered by artillery, the guilty and innocent are alike in the same danger. Third, when a city is given over to plunder, those who meet the soldiers are struck down everywhere without distinction; yet a commander can grant the spoil of the whole city, although he foresees that many innocent persons will perish. Indeed, if they place innocent persons upon the walls, he can pursue his right.

This occurred in the siege of Nicaea, where cruelty, heroic courage, and skill contended. Andronicus was besieging the city. When he saw the battering rams and machines being broken down, burned, and scattered, he entered upon the cruel counsel of placing upon the ram the mother of Isaac Angelus, who was then at Nicaea, and in this way setting the besiegers free to act. Nicetas narrates the history in his account of Andronicus:

"Therefore Andronicus, when he saw that his counsels lacked success, contrived an inhuman deed practiced by few before him. Euphrosyne, the mother of Isaac Angelus, summoned from Byzantium, he now placed before the machines as a bulwark, now struck the walls with her placed upon the ram. Thus at the same time the novelty of the spectacle, the monstrous anger recoiling from no crime, and the endurance of the poor woman--not deprived of life by fear itself amid so great and dangerous an assault--provoked pity and wonder. Then for the first time mortals saw a tender woman placed before iron for the sake of defense and, by a wonderfully inverted order, the frail body of a human being joined to the strongest machines so that those who fought from them might remain unharmed. Missiles were hurled from the walls just as before, but with so much care that, while the noble woman remained unharmed--as though she turned the missiles away from herself with nods and hands and drove them into the hearts of the enemies--they both struck and terrified the enemy.

"That monstrous deed profited Andronicus so little that the Nicaeans, making a sortie by night, both burned the machines and drew the woman by a rope into the city, leaving him to lament like Phineus despoiled by the Harpies, since he had nothing with which to satisfy the hunger of his anger. Thus the Nicaeans, having obtained praise for courage from the enemies themselves, conceived greater spirits and fought more boldly--not only by strenuously defending the walls and assailing Andronicus with taunts, calling him a butcher, a bloodthirsty dog, a rotten corpse, an immortal evil, a Fury of mankind, a womanizer, a Priapus older than Tithonus and Saturn, and, finally, abstaining from no name for a most shameful thing, but also by leaving the defenses and bursting forth from the gates."

§ 6. Hence it comes about that sometimes each party wages a just war, when some part of a guilty state is innocent and defends itself justly as innocent, while the other attacks it as part of the guilty state. Hence there is something similar in a man who has been condemned in accordance with the allegations and proofs, but unjustly: he can both defend himself justly, and the judge condemns him justly, because he acts according to the laws; yet the condemnation is unjust because it is the condemnation of an innocent man.

§ 7. Innocent persons can nevertheless be despoiled, because the state has greater power over the property of an innocent person than over his life. For the common advantage, it can take away a private person's property; it cannot take away his life. Nevertheless, the laws which have been enacted must be observed, as in the year 1570, article 69: "Let no one despoil a plough, a mill, an oven, or anything adapted for use, whether it belongs to friends or enemies; without license, let him destroy or break none of these things; let them not wantonly pour out or spoil wine, grain, or flour. Let death be the penalty for a transgressor." By the same penalty it is forbidden for anyone to kill old men, priests, preachers, or unarmed women.

A penalty which consists in the loss of goods and liberty, however, can for weighty causes be inflicted upon innocent persons. This is accustomed to occur in all wars. For when God permits spoil to the soldiers, and when he commands a city to serve under tribute, that penalty is imposed upon all, even upon their posterity. Yet the cause of the loss inflicted is the prince who defends an unjust cause, and he is bound to restore their property to the innocent persons.

CHAPTER XII

The End of War Must Be Lawful and Honorable

§ 1. It is agreed that the end of a war can be good although the war itself is unjust and is waged wickedly; the end can also be evil in a just war. In either manner the war is evil. Generally, the end of war is peace, nor does anyone deny this; but they contend over it because each party endeavors to impose his own peace upon the other--one advantageous to himself and burdensome to his allies. Augustine, in book 19, chapter 12 of The City of God, observed this end in most wars:

"For whoever looks in any way upon human affairs and our common nature acknowledges with me what I say: just as there is no one who does not wish to rejoice, so there is no one who does not wish to have peace. For even those who desire wars desire nothing other than to conquer; therefore, by waging war they desire to arrive at a glorious peace. For what else is victory but the subjection of those who resist? When this has been done, there will be peace. Wars, therefore, are waged with the intention of peace, even by those who are eager to exercise martial valor through commanding and fighting. For even those who wish the peace in which they live to be disturbed do not hate peace, but desire it to be changed according to their own judgment. Therefore they do not will that peace should not exist, but that it should be the peace they will."

No one thinks otherwise: wise men wage war for the sake of peace and sustain labor by the hope of repose. Thus it was also rightly said:

> εἰρήνης ὁ πόλεμος πρύτανις.

War is the fosterer of peace. Cicero likewise commands that war be undertaken in such a way that nothing other than peace may appear to have been sought. For the courage to finish a war ought to serve peace.

§ 2. A war whose end is not right, if it is otherwise just--as when the Romans assist the Greeks in appearance but in intention destine the sovereignty of Macedonia for themselves--is indeed just if the cause of the Athenians is just; nevertheless, desire mingled with virtue makes the war evil and makes it be waged badly. For the advantage of the allies was not so much set before the greed of the Romans as was dominion. Princes, tribunes, and soldiers also sin by no means slightly in this place when, although they have a just cause for waging war, they nevertheless indulge their own hatred and neglect the public advantages.

First, indeed, they sin against charity when they exact deserved penalties from love of vengeance, not from zeal for justice. From this arise cruelty against bodies, burnings, and insults. Rude spirits do not weigh this, but wage war when embittered by mutual rivalry or by disasters.

Second, although they sin, they are nevertheless not bound to restore the losses, because they inflicted them deservedly, though not in a lawful manner.

Third, a man who, in an otherwise just war, inflicted evils upon the subjects of the prince who declared the just war will be bound to restitution.

CHAPTER XIII

War Must Be Waged with the Aid of God and the Greatest Piety

§ 1. It is an impious saying that a commander in war cannot be just because so many things occur which persuade or compel him to be unjust. For once war has been declared, vices are let loose among subjects and soldiers. If you are a diligent exactor of military discipline, if you prohibit plunder from peaceful territory and injury, the soldiers' pay must also be paid, and without delay. If you indulge them a little, if money is lacking, injuries will be inflicted upon the subjects--not slight ones, but as great as military license is accustomed to conceive. The innocence of the commander is therefore placed in this danger. Nevertheless, if he has undertaken a necessary war, since he cannot guarantee its outcome, all the losses rebound upon its author. If he cannot restrain the soldier or sufficiently protect the subjects, his conscience will console him if he has omitted nothing whereby all things might be rightly administered.

§ 2. I demand not only justice in war, but also, amid the greatest dangers, the piety of the soldiers and commander. For since great dangers of death hang over them, those who do not prepare themselves for them sin mortally. Thus a war of Christians ought to be such that the camps are not unlike churches; for camps are assemblies of men going to death. Hence both a prosperous end to the war and victory in individual engagements must be sought from God. Since in war very many things occur contrary to expectation, not only forces but also the will of the Deity must be considered. Nowhere less than in war does the outcome answer to expectation: iron and bodies are on both sides; unseen leaden balls fly, and a man is deservedly laughed at if he appears like one trying to dodge them. War is the contest of men in sound health. Therefore aid must be sought from God and God must be kept before one's eyes: for true courage rests upon God.

§ 3. Wars supported by prayers have ended most prosperously. In Exodus 17 Moses prays while the Israelites fight, and the Amalekites are conquered: "And Joshua did as Moses had spoken, and fought against Amalek; but Moses, Aaron, and Hur went up to the top of the hill. And when Moses raised his hands, Israel prevailed; but if he lowered them a little, Amalek prevailed. And the hands of Moses were heavy. Therefore, taking a stone, they placed it beneath him, and he sat upon it; but Aaron and Hur supported his hands on either side. And it came about that his hands did not grow weary until the setting of the sun. And Joshua put Amalek and his people to flight by the edge of the sword." And in Numbers 21:2: "But Israel, binding himself to the Lord by a vow, said: 'If you deliver this people into my hand, I will destroy its cities.' And the Lord heard the prayers of Israel and delivered up the Canaanite, whom he killed after overthrowing his cities; and he called the name of that place Hormah--that is, anathema."

The Lord also appeared to Joshua and strengthened him; even the sun obeyed him, so that it did not set until he had pursued the enemies of the Lord. God assisted David, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and the other pious kings, especially the Maccabees, who gained very many victories against forces of veterans. But it must be observed that they were readily heard when they began war after consulting God. For that each man should stir up wars according to his own desire and endeavor to draw God according to his own judgment has more impudence than piety. For if you did not deign to seek counsel from God, how do you seek aid? God is present as moderator at the beginnings, courses, and ends of wars. Among so many battles waged in such various places, wherever aid was piously and faithfully sought from God, you will scarcely find one in which military prayers were not heard.

We Christians have had few commanders in war equal to Narses. In many battles he defeated the most powerful enemies; he always emerged victor through the power of God, not through confidence in his army. Since he was generous to the poor and merciful to suppliants, he worshiped God with such piety that he spent entire nights in basilicas. Thus everyone believed what was also true: that he obtained victory more by prayers than by arms. Prayers are certainly stronger against enemies than iron; and although a Roman historian calls it folly to believe that war can be brought to an end by sitting or by vows, Narses nevertheless conquered Totila after he had passed a sleepless night in continuous prayer and had left pools that were almost witnesses to his tears.

Thus he defeated Totila, encountered Theudebert the Frank, and crushed his commanders Buccelin and Amingus. He hanged Suitald, king of the Bretons, from a high beam in peacetime as a traitor. He performed deeds as great as few of the ancients: for he experienced the presence of Christ in every danger and deservedly expected the protection of him whose religion he cultivated. God himself is accustomed to preside over the just cause. “Are you one of ours, or of our adversaries?” Joshua, commander of the Israelites, asked; and by his answer the angel showed to whom victory belonged: “By no means; but I am prince of the army of the Lord, and now I have come.” If this prince is present, for him there is no difference whether he gives aid through few or through many, as Asa, king of Judah, piously and faithfully says. God, moreover, even threatens Amaziah: “But if you think that wars consist in the strength of an army, God will cause you to be conquered by the enemies; for it belongs to God to assist and to turn to flight.”

Therefore battle is waged against enemies from heaven: the stars, remaining in their order and course, fight against Sisera when victory is sought from God with humility in a just cause--a victory which is more often obtained by the faith of commanders and holy men than by the strength of soldiers. Thus Theodosius defeated Maximus and Eugenius when the wind turned their missiles back upon the enemy. It is wonderful and beyond every custom of war that, during the reign of Honorius, one or two hundred thousand men fell with Radagaisus while not even one man in the camps of Honorius was wounded. Mascezel routed his brother Gildo with five thousand men after seventy or eighty thousand had been slain, for Gildo scarcely endured the clash. During the reign of the younger Theodosius, one hundred thousand Persians perished in the Euphrates through panic. Three thousand Burgundians, after being baptized and praying to God, struck down ten thousand Huns.

The Christians besieged at Antioch destroyed one hundred thousand Saracens. The Spaniards too, though few, conquered immense kingdoms in both Indies. The examples are ready to hand.

I make this admonition as well: even the Gentiles especially entreated their gods in battles. Hence the Romans did not march out except after taking the auspices and performing sacred rites. Constantine, founder of the Eastern Empire, and Charles, founder of the German Empire, conquered the enemy chiefly by prayers. Constantine passed nights in prayer; Charles ordered public supplications for three days.

CHAPTER XIV

War Must Be Prepared for Betimes, and in Peace

§ 1. Everything necessary for war must be procured betimes. War must be prepared for a long time so that you may conquer more swiftly, for a long preparation for war makes victory swift. Philopoemen of the Achaeans, praised by the ancients, must be praised and imitated by us: when he traveled in time of peace, he was fixed upon the thought of war--how, for example, the hill which they were passing might be overcome. How far he differed from Vitellius, who concealed his cares beneath luxury: he did not prepare arms, address and strengthen the soldier by exercise, or keep his name upon the lips of the people, but lay hidden in the shades of gardens like slothful animals which, if you furnish them food, lie down and grow torpid; he had dismissed past, present, and future things with equal oblivion.

§ 2. Therefore, the first and most praiseworthy preparation for war is to hold brave and warlike men at a great price and in honor, and to entrust civil dignities to them. Rome was a seedbed of the best commanders and warriors because civil honors were granted to martial valor. For it judged it just that those who had undergone the greatest dangers for their fatherland should possess the highest place within it, and that the city should rightly be entrusted to the government of those by whose blood it had been defended. The nobility of Europe also derives its origin from martial valor. Hence writers of the Middle Ages call them soldiers, and the Germans Knaben vom Schildt; hence too they all bear a shield and helmet adorned with hereditary insignia. They also obtain the chief dignities in courts. If the young see these men honored, they will be kindled with the same zeal and will prefer to spend life in camps rather than to be softly educated at home.

§ 3. For this one reason the Greeks gravely afflicted their state: they regarded men brave and ready in counsel like plane trees, which they neglected during peace but, when a storm arose, fled trembling beneath their shade. Thus they were readily conquered by King Philip, for he possessed companies of the best and most circumspect centurions. Therefore, in the midst of peace let counsel concerning war flourish and be heard in the state; let no one who is to be a suitable defender and leader of the fatherland lack his proper honor when danger appears to be absent.

Nicias used to say at Athens that in peace he set many men before himself, but in war he was the foremost. From this fact there arises another evil, and one the more dangerous the more hidden it is. For when men of lofty spirit, swollen by the deserved praise of victories, are treated contemptuously in peace, they either migrate elsewhere, or wish for war and, if they can, persuade men to it--just as physicians in need wish for fevers and wounds--or they turn to brigandage and plunder.

§ 4. When provision has been made for men, arms must also be prepared. For if a man provides many arms and great arsenals without men, he acts in the same way as one who procures the instruments of various arts but has no craftsmen who know how to use them. By the best reasoning the great kings of old founded arsenals, for they obtained two advantages from them: first, that they had arms prepared against enemies; second, that the common people were not armed everywhere and did not abuse arms against themselves or against the state. At Rome arms were kept in public places. For, in his speech for Gaius Rabirius against Saturninus, Cicero says that when Gaius Marius was consul, arms were distributed to the Roman people from public buildings and arsenals. Private persons, however, were forbidden to possess, buy, or sell arms.

Vegetius demonstrates the Romans' industry and expenditures in this kind of matter in book 2, chapter 11: "A legion has, moreover, carpenters, builders, wagon-makers, smiths, painters, and the other craftsmen prepared to construct the buildings of winter quarters, machines, wooden towers, and the other things by which the cities of adversaries are either stormed or their own defended; some made new arms, vehicles, and other kinds of artillery, while others repaired the damaged. They also had shield works, armor works, and bow works, in which arrows, missiles, helmets, and every kind of arms were formed. For this was the chief care: that whatever appeared necessary to the army should never be lacking in camp. This went so far that they even had miners, who, after the manner of the Bessi, drove a tunnel beneath the earth and dug through walls within their foundations, so that they might emerge unexpectedly to capture the cities of their enemies. Their proper judge was the prefect of the craftsmen."

They had arms factories not only in the legions but also in towns and provinces, as Gottschalk Stewech, the most learned interpreter of Vegetius, teaches: "Those factories existed not only in the legions for manufacturing arms, but also in towns. Appian, in his Mithridatic War, is certainly a witness that Mithridates established them town by town. Caesar, in book 1 of The Civil War, says: 'They had conveyed grain from the neighboring regions and from all the forts into the city, and had established workshops for arms in the city.' Under the emperors the Roman Empire had a great number of factories, and these by provinces, in which every kind of arms was manufactured for the use of the state by the arms-workers. From the Notitia Imperii I shall enumerate where the factories of the East were.

"Five were in the East: a shield and arms factory at Damascus; a shield and arms factory at Antioch; shields and arms at Edessa; a spear factory at Irenopolis in Cilicia. There were three Pontic factories: a mail-armor factory at Caesarea in Cappadocia, and a shield and arms factory at Nicomedia. There was one Asian factory, namely a shield and arms factory at Sardis in Lydia. There were two Thracian factories: a shield and arms factory at Hadrianopolis and a shield and arms factory at Marcianopolis in Haemimontus. There were four in Illyricum: those of Thessalonica, Naissus, and Ratiaria, and the shield factory of Horreum Margi.

"But in the same Notitia the factories of the West are of a somewhat greater number. First in Illyricum: at Sirmium a factory of shields, ballistae, and arms; a shield factory at Acincum; a shield factory at Carnuntum; a shield factory at Lauriacum; and an arms factory at Salona. At Mantua there was an armor factory, at Cremona a shield factory, at Ticinum a bow factory, and at Lucca a sword factory. In the Gauls there were a factory of every kind of arms at Strasbourg, an arrow factory at Mâcon, an armor factory at Autun, a shield, ballista, and mail-armor factory at Soissons, a sword factory at Reims, a shield factory at Trier, a ballista factory at Trier, and a sword and shield factory at Amiens.

"Whether the Roman Empire had to be extended or its ancient frontiers defended against invaders, it had its frontier garrison soldiers in various forts, and also Roman legions scattered among various seats, whose number appears to have grown gradually as the empire grew. But whence arms of every kind were supplied to so numerous and dispersed a soldiery you can now have learned from me: namely, from those factories established by provinces. Whenever new arms were required on expeditions, they were sought from those same factories and conveyed by compulsory transport to the camps or designated places. This the constitution of the emperors Leo and Anthemius, in the Code On Arms-Workers, taught me."

Now private persons could not manufacture or sell any other arms apart from short knives, which no one would assume for use in war. But bows, arrows, swords, half-swords, cuirasses, pikes, lances, shields, helmets, and the other warlike arms of that kind Emperor Justinian permitted to be made nowhere except in public factories and by public craftsmen--that is, men maintained by the public grain allowance; his Novel 85, On Arms, concerns this matter. In the later books of the Code there is exceedingly frequent mention of the body of arms-workers, their duty, privileges, and so forth; and there is also a title there On Arms-Workers.

That even public vehicles were appointed for carrying arms to the camp especially signifies a consummate industry which omitted nothing useful.

Nor were they content with this diligence: there were also custodians of arms, book 49, π, title 16, On Military Affairs: "If a soldier has alienated his arms, the fault is generally imputed to the custodian of the arms if he entrusted the arms to the soldier at an improper time." Hence it appears that there were custodians of arms in the camps. For if any men lost their arms, or if they were broken, new ones had to be provided, besides the fact that an immense supply of arrows and javelins had to be conveyed and was kept in camp. For each man preserved his own lances, spears, bucklers, shields, small shields, and cuirasses, and men did not seek them from a custodian when about to fight. Nor is there any doubt that there were custodians of arsenals in the cities. Certainly, in time of war and of peace, watches, laws, and arms are deservedly required: law Qui excubias and law Officium, On Military Affairs, π.

§ 5. It is evident from Sacred Scripture that pious kings had care of arsenals. Song of Songs 4:4: "Your neck is like the tower of David, which is built with bulwarks; a thousand shields hang from it, all the armor of the mighty." Hence in 1 Kings 14:28 there is an arsenal of shield-bearers. What it was like is shown in 2 Chronicles 9:19: "And also three hundred golden shields of three hundred pieces of gold, with which the individual shields were covered; and the king placed them in the arsenal which was planted with a grove." It was called the House of Lebanon; its furniture had been golden, and the arsenal was in that palace.

Rehoboam himself, when he had peace during the first three years, fortified cities and made arsenals. In 2 Chronicles 11:5 and 12 the words run thus: "And Rehoboam dwelt in Jerusalem and built walled cities in Judah. And he constructed Bethlehem, Etam, and Tekoa; also Beth-zur, Soco, and Adullam; and Gath, Mareshah, and Ziph; Adoraim, Lachish, and Azekah; also Zorah, Aijalon, and Hebron, which were strongly fortified cities in Judah and Benjamin. And when he had enclosed them with walls, he placed princes in them and storehouses of food--that is, oil and wine. But in each city he also made arsenals of shields and spears; and he strengthened them with the greatest diligence, and ruled over Judah and Benjamin."

The cause of this new diligence was that a new and indeed more powerful enemy had now arisen, and the cities which in Solomon's time had been in the heart of the kingdom had, through the secession of the ten tribes, become frontier cities. The remaining arsenals of the ten tribes had also fallen to Jeroboam. In Isaiah 22:8 there is also mention of the arsenal of the House of the Forest.

Exercise produces spirit and confidence. He who wishes his own men to be cowardly so that they may not rise against him is not safe from his neighbors. These things must be cared for in peace so that men may grow accustomed to obeying. The one virtue of a soldier is prompt obedience. Those who are prone to duels are not brave, but bestial.

CHAPTER XV

The Arms for Which Provision Must Be Made

§ 1. A prince who is about to wage war ought principally to prepare these things: alliances, provisions, arms, fortifications, money, and soldiers. The individual matters need not be discussed in this chapter. Alliances, provisions, fortifications, and money were discussed in book 8, for they are works of peace rather than of war.

§ 2. Most of those who have written about war have treated accurately of everything concerning arms and men who are to fight either on land or at sea. Yet they have done so in such a way that some have exhibited ancient things, others new things, but few the reasons and counsels of the ancients and moderns. It is my intention to set forth briefly what I have understood concerning both new and ancient things.

§ 3. Arms are whatever necessity advises: iron, oil, wood, and other things. Arms are, as it were, the limbs of a soldier. For nature gave natural arms to beasts because it denied them prudence, but gives man external things to use, with reason added:

> Φύσις κέρατα ταύροις,
>
> ὁπλὰς δ’ ἔδωκεν ἵπποις,
>
> λέοντι χάσμ’ ὀδόντων,
> τοῖς δ’ ἀνδράσιν σίδηρον.

Nature gave horns to bulls, hooves to horses, the gaping array of teeth to the lion, but iron to men, with which man conquers bulls, tames horses, hunts lions, and, finally--which is most difficult--conquers other iron. Therefore, a great supply of arms must be prepared in peace, because they are readily obtained. When necessity presses, even all things must be accepted: the bronze of bells can be melted down, so that it may be restored when the war has ended.

§ 4. I define arms as all the instruments of wars by which we are defended from the enemy or strike the enemy. They are therefore twofold. For either we protect ourselves with them, as with a shield, helmet, and greaves, or we harm the enemy with them, as with a sword, spear, and musket. They are also divided in another way: either they are placed around the body and handled by individual men’s hands, or they are operated by machines, act more violently, and require the forces of many men, as do the ram, the tortoise, and the greater artillery. Among these I place horses, elephants, camels, dogs, pigs, and serpents in an intermediate class. Some men have sometimes employed them like arms; but they are animate arms, or half arms and half soldiers.

§ 5. Defensive arms, or coverings, are prior to offensive arms. For it belongs to a praised commander first to place his own men in safety, then to harm the enemy. If they fall under mutual blows, there is no victory for either. Therefore, the better protected man is the stronger. He who has provided well for himself does not fear the sound of the hammer, like an anvil. While the helmsman holds the tiller, he despises storms. A well-covered soldier confidently attacks the enemy and fearlessly employs skill; and skill absorbs every difficulty in affairs, as men boast in a military proverb.

§ 6. The head covering of the ancients was the helmet. That of the light-armed soldier was made from a wolf skin or another hide. Polybius says:

> προσεπικοσμεῖται δὲ καὶ λιτῷ περικεφαλαίῳ· ποτὲ δὲ λυκείαν ἤ τι τῶν τοιούτων ἐπιτίθεται, σκέπης ἅμα καὶ σημείου χάριν, ἵνα τοῖς κατὰ μέρος ἡγεμόσι προκινδυνεύοντες ἐρρωμένως καὶ μὴ διάδηλοι γίνωνται.

"He is adorned in addition," as Lipsius translates, "with a simple covering of the head; and this occurs when a wolf skin or something of that kind is put on, both for protection and as a distinguishing mark, so that those who have fought vigorously or otherwise may become known to the commanders of the units."

Concerning the material of the helmet Lipsius says: "Not of bronze or iron, but of wool, felt, or leather; the cassis was of metal." Galea was named from γαλῆ, a cat or weasel. They took the hides from wild animals, whence ἰκτιδέη, κυνέη, ταυρείη, αἰγείη: weasel-skin, dog-skin, bull-skin, and goat-skin helmets. In Homer and Virgil there is also a lion-skin helmet. Aeneid 5: "Turning the enormous covering of a lion." Lipsius notes on Trajan's Column that everyone in this equipment has a lion skin which covers the head, shoulders, and back. In Propertius there is a wolf-skin helmet in an elegant poem:

> And a bristling helmet adorned with a wolf's mane.

In Statius there is a bear-skin helmet:

> He makes his head savage with the jaws of a Lycaonian bear.

Others preferred the fox-skin kind. The Thracians and Macedonians had similar helmets. But this is the point about which the reader of Lipsius remains in doubt: since they wore them for protection and as a sign, did they place them upon a bare head or upon another helmet? Lipsius thinks that the light-armed soldiers put them upon a bare head, for they were not so cautiously and securely armed. I remain even more doubtful. Although lion and bear skins afford protection, I do not see how little weasel, goat, or even fox skins delay arrows or swords. Our felt hats resist much more, especially those thick ones which they are accustomed to call Brunswick hats.

Therefore, that which Polybius calls λιτόν signifies a cheap helmet not made with elaborate workmanship. It does not signify that it was merely a small skin, but that it was supported with linen or wool to break blows; perhaps the hides were also doubled. Statius describes the arms of countrymen:

> Their weapons were rough trunks; their helmets, the empty mouths of lions.

Lipsius himself says that helmets were of leather or similar material, with some iron applied in lines or circles. The leather, therefore, was either doubled or supported by another material. Indeed, I approve more the view that skins were placed upon caps, or that the helmets were made from hides doubled or compressed more frequently. For Vegetius, in book 1, chapter 20, calls them caps: "Almost to the present age the custom remained that all soldiers used caps which they called Pannonian and which were made from hides. This was preserved so that a heavy helmet should not seem burdensome in battle to a man who always wore something upon his head." The caps were therefore heavy in some proportion to the metal helmet.

Furthermore, we learn from Virgil that terrifying shapes were placed upon helmets; Turnus is described in book 7:

> Turnus himself, preeminent in body, moves
>
> Among the foremost, holding arms, and towers by a whole head above them.
>
> His lofty helmet, crested with a triple mane, supports
> A Chimaera breathing Aetnean fires from its jaws.

The Cimbri were also equipped in this fashion. Plutarch, in his Marius, says that the helmets of the Cimbrian horsemen were distinguished by feathers and by the forms of bristling animals. Diodorus Siculus, in book 2, says that the kings of the Egyptians bore the heads of lions, bulls, and dragons upon their own heads as insignia of rule. This gradually ceased in Christian times, and to wish to employ such terrors against a known enemy is childish. These things, if I may say so, have passed into family insignia; hence comes the variety among nobles when they display shield and helmet.

§ 7. The cassis was of bronze or iron, sometimes of silver or mixed metals. Camillus manufactured very many helmets entirely of iron and smooth around the circumference, so that swords might either glide upon them or be broken.

At the sides were cheekpieces which covered the cheeks or sides of the face. Servius commands bronze helmets for the wealthy; this sufficiently shows that bronze defenses were used earlier than iron ones.

§ 8. Crests served for ornament and terror. Polybius says: "In addition to all these things they are adorned with a feathered crown and three upright feathers, either purple or black, a cubit in length. When these are added upon the crown of the head to the other arms, the man appears twice as large, the sight is beautiful, and it is terrifying to the enemy." Lipsius translates στεφάνῳ as "crest," for Polybius is not speaking of a crown, although it bears some resemblance to a crown.

That crest, or feathered crown, was fixed to the top of the helmet and was called by the Greeks both λόφος and φάλος. Indeed, there were also tubes into which the crests were inserted. Centurions had transverse and silvered crests so that they might be recognized more readily. Those of the others stood upright; when damaged in frequent battles they hung down and spread out.

Purple crests belonged to distinguished men. The crests of Turnus were red; Hannibal's were snow-white. Later they also employed the colored feathers of peacocks.

There were generally three crests, for "the lofty helmet was crested with a triple mane." In Virgil Mezentius is bristling with a horsehair crest. Hence in the helmets and insignia of nobles there are either crests or other signs, such as horns, beams, and fixed colors. That other objects were borne in place of feathers is established by the history of Pyrrhus, who was recognized τῷ τε λόφῳ διαφέροντι καὶ τοῖς τραγικοῖς κέρασιν--by his remarkable crest and goat's horns. But as regards all these things, and indeed arms generally, men changed them in various ways, and everything had to be changed on account of enemies, because by these and other arms they render ancient arms useless and compel the adoption of new ones.

§ 9. The cassis, therefore, was of bronze; Polybius calls it περικεφαλαίαν χαλκῆν:

Camillus made helmets of bronze and iron, smooth about their circumference, against the enormous swords of the Gauls. They were bound beneath the chin with a strap, and the face was bare. Now many cover the face so that they are exposed to a wound only where they see out through the eyes. Marcellinus observed such helmets among the Persians. In 1 Samuel 17:38 and 5, and 1 Maccabees 6:35, men use bronze helmets. Our men temper iron by a new method so that it repels balls.

§ 10. Another covering of the body was the parma. Polybius says, ἡ δὲ πάρμη, and continues:

> καὶ δύναμιν ἔχει τῇ κατασκευῇ καὶ μέγεθος ἀρκοῦν πρὸς ἀσφάλειαν.

"The parma possesses both strength from its construction and sufficient size for safety." This belonged to the light-armed soldiers.

The strength of the parma did not come from its material, for it was not made from metal, but from leather, or leather and wood; and the wood was either solid, woven wicker, or little boards joined and bound together.

The shape of the parma was round--περιφερής--according to Polybius and Nonius. On the testimony of Aemilius Probus, Iphicrates gave his men peltae in place of the parma, from which they were named peltasts.

Polybius writes that the size of the parma was τρίπεδον ἔχει τὴν διάμετρον. Thus, Lipsius says, it has nine feet in circumference; but then it is not that short little parma and small shield. He doubts whether by the word "diameter" the circumference itself, περιφέρεια, is meant. Then, indeed, it would be a very small parma, for the true diameter would be one foot. Marius removed the little parmae and substituted Brutiana--that is, shields with which the Bruttians were accustomed to fight. But it cannot be that they were one foot across: for what would this contribute to protection, or ἀσφάλειαν, as Lipsius rightly objects to himself? It appears foolish, since the parma occupied the left hand, to have made it so small that it did not defend the man fighting and yet impeded him. Pliny says that the parma is what the Greeks call the pelta, and that they also call it a cetra. But although each was a short shield, their shapes were different: the pelta had the appearance of a half-full moon. Virgil, book 1:

> She leads the battle lines of Amazons with their crescent-shaped peltae.

§ 11. The shield and buckler are related to the parma.

The shield was two and one-half feet in width and four feet in length. The larger kind had a palm more.

Polybius says that the material of the shield was ἐκ διπλοῦ σανιδώματος, "from a double planking." Thus it is agreed that two boards were compacted with linen by means of bull glue. But Lipsius adds that it was woven together from small planks; for Varro derives scutum from cutting, as if it were named from being cut because it was made from minute boards. Ammianus likewise says of Julian: "While Julian was still Caesar at Paris, he was exercising in the field and shaking a shield whose round surface was compacted from little boards; when these were shaken loose to no purpose, only the handle remained." Here, I confess, I hesitate and should wish an ancient shield to be shown to me. For that construction from little slats is laborious and not suited to strength. Accordingly, since the use of shields was so extensive, I do not doubt that they were more readily made.

First, it was much stronger and more resistant to blows if two boards were glued together crosswise than if there were only one. For one board is readily pierced along the dimension in which it is liable to split; but here the lines liable to split run in different directions. What is received into one board is held in the other and suffers delay. For one plank glued to another, with the lines running in a different direction, overcomes and contains it so that it cannot gape with cracks or be split.

Second, it is certain to me that some little planks had to equal the length and others the breadth. For the length could not be made from two or three pieces, because they cannot be glued on the part where the length of the wood is cut off. I do not sufficiently understand how it was made from little boards unless they were rather long, joined to one another and compacted with glue, with a little rod added as a kind of bond, as we learn from Ammianus. Pliny names in book 16, chapter 40 the woods most useful for this purpose: "The coldest are all aquatic woods; they are most pliant, and therefore most suitable for making shields, whose wound draws itself together immediately after a blow and closes; for that reason it transmits iron more stubbornly. In this class are the fig, willow, linden, birch, elder, and both kinds of poplar." Of these the fig and willow are lightest and therefore most useful. From this we also learn that those shields are now altogether useless.

The shape of the shield was twofold: one was nearly flat and the other curved like a roof tile, of the kind Lipsius exhibits for us.

§ 12. Sometimes nothing was added beyond the little boards. Tacitus says of the Germans in book 2 of the Annals: "Not even shields strengthened by iron or sinew, but structures of wicker, or thin boards stained with color." But the Romans strengthened and covered them with leather, both for firmness and so that the moisture by which willow boards would be loosened might be kept off by the leather; for glue cannot endure moisture.

They also frequently multiplied the hides, for they are light and pliant. Hence the ancients strengthened shields with a sevenfold fabric, even among the Trojans and Greeks. These were the arms used at that time because of the price of bronze and iron, which the common multitude of soldiers in those places could not afford. Certainly, in Sacred Scripture we read of bronze bucklers and shields among the most ancient peoples.

In addition to these there was an iron defense which Polybius calls σιάλωμα and which the Suda interprets σιδηρᾶν περιφέρειαν τῷ ῥωμαϊκῷ θυρεῷ: an iron rim or circumference of the Roman shield. Iron was added late, for Camillus was its originator; nevertheless, he added a bronze plate. Plutarch says in his Camillus:

> τοῖς θυρεοῖς κύκλῳ περιήρμοσε λεπίδα χαλκῆν, ξύλου καθ' αὑτὸ τὰς πληγὰς μὴ στέγοντος.

"He fitted a bronze plate in a circle to the shields, since the wood alone sustained blows insufficiently." Against the great swords of the Gauls, brandished with powerful strength, the resourceful commander devised this. That circumference was sometimes silver and sometimes gilded. Sidonius says that the light of the shields was snow-white on the rims and golden-yellow on the bosses. This occurred among the great and powerful.

The boss is the rounded iron projecting in the middle of the shield, called ἄμβων by the Greeks, a word which signifies the prominences of mountains and other things. Tertullian recognizes a boss even in clothing. The Greeks also sometimes call it ὀμφαλὸν ἀσπίδος. Polybius calls it σιδηρᾶ κόγχος and says that it turns aside ὁλοσχερεῖς πληγάς--the violent blows of stones, sarissas, and every violent kind of weapon.

They also drove enemies back with the boss: "Acilius drives those who meet him with the boss." Lipsius has excellently observed that the shoulder and the arm itself are sometimes called the boss. They wheeled and shook the shield in such a way as to oppose the boss to every blow.

§ 13. There was little weight in a light shield and more in the larger. Now all those things would be impediments in war rather than aids. But let us consider their use among the ancients.

First, the Romans despised the shields of the Gauls as not strengthened by iron or sinew, but made of woven wicker, or of boards that were thin or stained with color. Therefore, before iron was added by Camillus, Roman shields too were weak.

Second, the boss resisted heavier blows; therefore, the rest of the shield was unequal to those blows and failed under repeated strokes. Thus Ajax also says of his own shield: "A new successor must be obtained."

Third, it was sometimes so burdened with javelins and arrows that it was heavy for the bearer.

Fourth, its manipulation greatly fatigued the soldier, so that the left arm was wearied no less than the right.

Fifth, in battles themselves we frequently see shields pierced through, even together with the man himself, as many histories show.

If, therefore, we come to the wars of our own time, they would be impediments, not defenses. For, to say nothing of cannon, they would not sustain the blow of even any middling weapon. Since they were pierced by a cast javelin and by an arrow, they cannot resist even lesser forces of arms. Against shields our forefathers, before cannon were invented, employed chiefly three kinds of arms: the lances of horsemen, by which they carried away shield and man together; great swords, which they brandished with both hands, by which they split the shields set against them and struck them from the bearer's hands; and, finally, two-edged axes, whose extremely violent blows rendered every shield useless. This armament took its origin from the Germans, Goths, and Lombards, whose great strength readily dashed shields away.

Shields, therefore, are now useless. In ancient times they too were frequently changed. Before Romulus, men used Argive bucklers, according to Plutarch. Romulus instituted shields, I believe because bucklers could not readily be obtained among a pastoral people. Hence Servius later restored bucklers, but commanded them for men who possessed a greater census. At Veii bucklers were omitted and shields retained. I do not sufficiently conjecture the cause: perhaps, since the soldiers' pay was equal, they judged that the arms of the infantry ought also to be made equal. Lipsius thinks so.

The θυρεός was the shield of the Greeks. It was so called from its likeness to a θύρα, a door, because its length was greater than its width, Athenaeus 4 and 6.

§ 14. The Greeks had bucklers; they called them ἀσπίδας. Homer calls one εὐκύκλος because they were round.

§ 15. The ancients had various kinds of cuirasses, and it is wonderful that so great a care was devoted to them when there were no cannon. Titus is described in Hegesippus, book 3, chapter 14: "We advance into war protected on every side: a helmet covers the head, a cuirass the breast, and a buckler the whole body. The enemy cannot discover where he may strike a Roman soldier." Nor is this an amplification. Claudian, in book 2 Against Rufinus:

> Joined together by art,
>
> The flexible plate comes alive upon the limbs it covers,
>
> Terrible to behold: you would believe iron statues to move
> And men to breathe through their kindred metal.

Not only a poet but also the historian Ammianus speaks in the same manner: "You would believe them statues polished by the hand of Praxiteles, not men: slender circles of plates, fitted to the bending of their bodies, encircled them and were drawn over every limb, so that wherever necessity moved a joint, the clothing corresponded to it, its connection coherently fitted."

But let us speak about the kinds of cuirasses.

In an earlier age most Roman soldiers did not cover the whole body with a cuirass, but only the breast with a plate:

> οἱ μὲν οὖν πολλοὶ προσλαβόντες χάλκωμα σπιθαμιαῖον πάντῃ πάντως, ὃ προστίθενται μὲν πρὸ τῶν στέρνων, καλοῦσι δὲ καρδιοφύλακα, τελείαν ἔχουσι τὴν καθόπλισιν.

"Most take a bronze plate which measures a span, or twelve digits, on every side and place it upon the breast, and thereby possess complete armor." They call it καρδιοφύλακα, which Lascaris renders "heart-guard"; Lipsius calls it a breastplate. Polybius says it was a bronze plate; Varro and others say that the breastplate was made from raw leather. But I believe that leather cuirasses ceased to be used because they afforded too little protection and heated those fighting very greatly.

Those who were more honorable and stronger covered the breast, belly, and the parts below with a cuirass, as Pausanias testifies in book 1. They connected the two parts of the cuirass at the sides with clasps, and this was called the proper and full armor. Those men belonged to the first class and were assessed at more than ten thousand drachmas, as Polybius says.

Those cuirasses were threefold. They were either made from a whole plate, as most are today, or ringed and woven from little chains, which the Greeks call ἁλυσιδωτούς. Virgil calls it "a cuirass joined with hooks and triple-woven with gold." The third kind was of scale armor, λεπιδωτῶν θωράκων:

> Clad in a gleaming breastplate,
>
> He bristled with bronze scales.

The scales were sometimes joined by little chains, sometimes to linen, and sometimes spread over leather.

In the Suda the Parthian horsemen, whom the Latins later imitated and call clibanarii, are armed as follows: "The cuirass of a Parthian horseman is of this kind. Its front part covers the breast, thighs, extremities of the hands, and legs; the rear part covers the back, neck, and entire head. Clasps are at the sides, by which they join both parts and thus cause the entire horseman to appear iron. Yet the iron neither prohibits nor impedes the extensions or contractions of the limbs; it is so carefully made and divided according to the nature of the limbs. They also arm the horse similarly with iron, wholly and down to the hooves. They do this because their own armor profits them nothing if the horse is killed."

This was the strength of soldiery then, and it is so now. Ammianus calls them iron plates "in the manner of a slender feather"; and Virgil:

> He drove his foaming horse, which a covering joined
> With gold in bronze scales, feather-like, protected.

Ammianus describes the armor more clearly in book 16: "On either side advanced a double line of armed men, bearing shields and crests and radiating with glittering light, clothed in polished cuirasses. Scattered among them were armored horsemen--whom the Persians call clibanarii--protected by coverings of breastplates and encircled with iron bands, so that you would believe them statues polished by the hand of Praxiteles, not men. Slender circles of plates, fitted to the bending of their bodies, encircled them and were drawn over every limb, so that wherever necessity moved a joint, the clothing corresponded to it, its connection coherently fitted."

He teaches in book 25 how men resisted them: "Representations of human faces were so carefully fitted to their heads that missiles falling upon their bodies plated solidly with metal could lodge only where sight was afforded sparingly through minute cavities attached to the circles of the eyes, or where narrow breaths were emitted at the extremity of the nostrils."

Great men had scales, for they were easy to carry and resisted blows by the very fact that they yielded somewhat. More wonderful is the fact that they made scales from the hooves of horses and other animals. Pausanias describes them in book 1: "They make breastplates as follows. Each man keeps many horses. They use them not only in war, but also sacrifice them to their ancestral gods. Collecting their hooves, cleaning and cutting them, they make from them something like the scales of dragons; or, if someone has not seen a dragon but has seen the green fruit of a pine, he will not err if he likens the work to those segments or little swellings upon the cone. Therefore, piercing these little scales and sewing them together with horse or ox sinews, they have cuirasses for use, inferior to the Greek ones neither in beauty nor in strength. For when struck at close quarters or assailed by a cast weapon, they resist and withstand it."

Homer shows that linen breastplates were of the most ancient use, for in him Ajax is λινοθώραξ, "linen-cuirassed"; I should believe them to have been among the earliest arms.

They are sometimes used in this age, but they resist iron or balls only slightly. They were suitable for hunters, for they blunt or break teeth. Ringed cuirasses have almost ceased to be used, since when the rings are broken by a ball they cause several wounds; their fragments lodge in bodies and cannot readily be extracted.

They also had woolen breastplates pressed together, or made of felt; they added vinegar so that they would resist iron. A sponge too was a covering for the breast. But lest such things be made heavy by rain, they were covered with hides. Things of this kind are strongly approved even now; for if they are protected by a moderate cuirass, by which the force of a ball is broken, it is arrested by this felt.

Meanwhile, at almost the present time strong, heavy iron cuirasses are in use, like the one in Plutarch's Demetrius, which repelled a missile from a ballista and received only a light scratch, as if from an engraving tool. But such cuirasses were very rare. For even swords overcame the common armor. Diodorus says:

> οὔτε θυρεὸς οὔτε κράνος οὔτε ὀστοῦν ὑπομένει τὴν πληγήν.

"Neither shield, nor helmet, nor bone sustains the blow"--namely, that of the Spanish sword. Plutarch likewise relates in his Perseus that the swords of the Romans, by their weight and impact, passed through every kind of armor to the bodies. But now no one would deign to carry armor that did not resist even a sword.

§ 16. Vegetius assigns iron greaves to the legs--one upon the right leg, which comes forward in a stationary battle; but when men fought with missiles, the left leg came forward. The ancients, nevertheless, had both legs covered.

§ 17. Horsemen did not have cuirasses at first, as Polybius reports, for they made it their concern to mount a horse readily, since they did not have grooms, or ἀναβολεῖς, to help them mount. This was strictly exacted. Vegetius, book 1, chapter 18: "The exercise of mounting horses was always strictly exacted not only from recruits but also from soldiers receiving pay. It is evident that this custom has survived to our own age, although even with some concealment. Wooden horses were placed under cover in winter and in the field in summer. At first the younger men were compelled to mount these unarmed until they became proficient by habit, and finally while armed. So great was the care that they learned together not only to leap on and off from the right but also from the left side, even while holding drawn swords or pikes. For they did this by constant practice, namely so that amid the tumult of battle those who were so diligently exercised in peace might mount without delay."

The shields of the horsemen were made from pure leather, which, if it had not been sufficiently hardened, was rendered useless by rain. They called it the cetra, a leather shield without wood. I believe that it was also made from another material, and sometimes from hardened leather which water would not harm. Without doubt it would be ridiculous to advance into our warfare with that defense.

§ 18. As a conclusion I shall add what Vegetius has in book 1, chapter 20 concerning arms:

"The place requires that we attempt to relate with what kind of arms recruits ought either to be equipped or defended. But in this part the ancient custom has been utterly destroyed. For although, after the example of the Goths, Alans, and Huns, the arms of the horsemen have advanced, it is established that the infantrymen have been stripped bare. From the founding of the city down to the time of the deified Gratian, the infantry army was protected both with armored breastplates and helmets. But when field exercise ceased through the intervention of negligence and sloth, the arms which the soldiers wore only rarely began to seem heavy. Thus they ask the emperor first to lay aside the armored breastplates, and then the helmets. In this way, meeting the Goths with breasts and heads uncovered, our soldiers were often destroyed by the multitude of archers. Even after so many disasters, which reached the destruction of such great cities, no one took care to restore either armored breastplates or helmets to the infantry.

"Thus it happens that men who were exposed naked to wounds in the battle line think not about fighting but about flight. For what can an infantry archer do without armored breastplate and helmet, when he cannot hold a shield along with his bow? What will the draconarii themselves and the standard-bearers do in battle, who govern the spears with the left hand, when it is established that both their heads and breasts are bare? But a cuirass and perhaps a helmet appear heavy to an infantryman who seldom practices and seldom handles arms. Daily use, however, does not labor even if it carries burdensome things. But those who cannot bear the labor of carrying the ancient defenses of arms are compelled, with bodies uncovered, to sustain both wounds and death; and, what is more grievous and more shameful, either to be captured or certainly to betray the state by flight. Thus, while they avoid exercise and labor, they are slaughtered like cattle with the greatest disgrace.

"Why, then, was the infantry army called a wall among the ancients, unless because the legions armed with javelins shone not only with shields but also with armored breastplates and helmets? This went so far that the archers protected the left arm with sleeves, while the shield-bearing infantrymen were compelled, in addition to armored breastplates and helmets, to receive iron greaves on their right legs. Thus were those men protected who, fighting in the first line, were called principes, in the second hastati, and in the third triarii. But the triarii, their knees placed upon the ground, were accustomed to crouch behind their shields lest, while standing, they be wounded by incoming missiles; and when necessity required it, as men who had rested they attacked the enemies more violently. It is established that victory was often achieved by them when the hastati and those who had stood before them had perished.

"Among the ancient infantrymen there were also those who were called light-armed troops, slingers, and ferentarii. They were stationed principally upon the wings, and the beginning of the fighting was taken from them. The swiftest and most highly trained men were selected for these troops. They were not very numerous; if the necessity of battle compelled them to withdraw, they were accustomed to be received between the front ranks of the legions, so that the battle line stood unmoved.

"Almost to the present age the custom remained that all soldiers used caps made of hides, which they called Pannonian. This was preserved so that a heavy helmet would not seem burdensome in battle to a man who always wore something upon his head. The missiles which the infantry army employed were called javelins. They were tipped with slender, three-edged iron, nine inches or one foot long; when fixed in a shield, they could not be cut away, and when directed skillfully and forcefully, they readily break through a cuirass. Among us weapons of this kind are now rare. But barbarian shield-bearing infantrymen chiefly employ them. They call them bebras and carry two or even three apiece in battles.

"It must be known, moreover, that when missiles are being employed, soldiers ought to put their left feet forward; for in this way the blow is stronger when darts are brandished. But when they come to the javelins, as they call them, and fight hand to hand with swords, then soldiers ought to put their right feet forward, so that their flanks may be withdrawn from the enemies and cannot receive a wound, and so that the right hand which can inflict the blow may be nearer. It is therefore established that recruits must be instructed and protected by every art of fighting and with every kind of arms. For it is necessary that he who, with his head or breast protected, does not fear a wound should acquire boldness for fighting."

§ 19. At that time the Roman army was neglected. For Valens admitted the Goths and, trusting in their protection, despised his own soldiery--not altogether without reason, since they were accustomed to become more famous for the slaughter of their own emperors than for victory against an enemy. Gratian, through the same error, trusted the Alans and suffered the treachery of his own men. Vegetius calls a defense of the breast and a cuirass cataphractae: all the καταφράξεις, or defensive coverings, which enclose and protect the body. Stripped bare in this way, they were thrown into confusion by the attack of the Goths, as Paul the Deacon, book 12, and Orosius indicate: "At the first attack of the Goths the companies of Roman horsemen were thrown into confusion and abandoned the naked infantrymen, who were soon surrounded by the enemy cavalry and overwhelmed by clouds of arrows."

Afterward they protected themselves with the thoracomachus, concerning which Stewech writes from the Notitia Imperii: "Among all the things which provident antiquity devised against warfare for posterity, it also placed beneath the weight and harshness of the arms the thoracomachus, of wonderful usefulness for relieving the body. For anxious concern, with skill as its teacher, composed this kind of garment from soft wools compressed to the measure and protection of the human breast. Thus, after this was first put on, the cuirass, the clibanus, or things similar to these would not injure the frailty of the body by the harshness of their weight; and the limbs of the wearer, aided by such relief amid the danger of arms and winter, might suffice for the labor. But lest this same thoracomachus, beaten by rains, afflict the wearer with increasing weight, it will be suitable to draw over its surface well-prepared Libyan hides made in the likeness of the same thoracomachus. Therefore, as we have said, after the thoracomachus has been put on--a Greek appellation which took its name from the protection of the body--and after he has also put on low shoes, that is, footwear, and iron greaves, and a helmet has been placed above, with a shield and sword fitted to his side and lances seized in full array, the soldier about to enter an infantry battle will be armed."

But this too was changed and did not remain in use for long. Against the force of spears, especially those with a narrow point, the iron could accomplish nothing. Then great expense and labor had to be employed in preparing the hides. Most grievous of all, those wrapped in a woolen fabric flowed with sweat, and it weakened the wearer in the battle line.

Hence it appears that everything depends upon the coverings' being light and impenetrable. If any commander could join these two qualities, he would easily obtain the empire of the world.

Hence came so many changes of arms, continuing even to the present day: first coverings of iron or bronze, then of wood and leather, then once more of iron and bronze--sometimes light, sometimes heavy. Dio says that Macrinus removed the scaled breastplates and shields which were like channels, but curved in the manner of roof tiles, so that he might render the soldiers readier for battle. But as he made them more agile, so he also made them weaker and more exposed.

CHAPTER XVI

Arms with Which We Harm the Enemy at Close Quarters

§ 1. The arms with which we strike the enemy are manifold. For there is no thing which men cannot employ for the destruction of men and have not sometimes employed. We read that men have been killed not only with swords and missiles, but also suffocated with cushions and roses. We also fight with trumpet and drum and put the enemy to flight with sound. Indeed, a part of the enemy supplies arms from his own body. 2 Samuel 2:16: "Each man, taking hold of the head of his companion, drove his sword into the side of his opponent." Thus the hair, as well as the sword, served as a weapon--so much so that the institution of Theseus appears less ridiculous: he wished the hair to be shaved lest it offer a handle to enemies. Alexander the Great commanded his men to imitate this with respect to the beard. The women of the Thasians and Carthaginians gave their hair for binding machines and for the ropes of ships, Polyaenus, book 8. The women of Aquileia expended theirs upon bowstrings, Fulgosus, book 7, chapter 6.

The arms, therefore, with which we strike and crush an enemy are those by which we fight either at close quarters or at a distance. Those with which the matter is conducted at close quarters have not been so greatly changed; the others are very different.

§ 2. The arms by which an enemy is harmed at close quarters are manifold. Most nations had swords. First they carried a single one, then two: besides a long sword, a paramerium or parazonium--that is, a dagger--sometimes at the right side and sometimes at the left. Polybius mentions the right; Josephus the left, in book 3 of The Jewish War. After the Second Punic War, the Romans carried Spanish swords. They used them by thrusting rather than cutting. For the Romans mocked those who fought by cutting, since the wound is rarely mortal and it exposes the flank. Nevertheless, they sometimes cut as well. Seneca, in On Benefits, says that a helmet was divided by a Spanish saber. Livy, book 31: "After they saw bodies dismembered by the Spanish sword, with arms cut off or the whole neck severed, and the other hideousness of the wounds." Now there are different kinds of swords for each mode of fighting.

A long sword was given to the horseman. Josephus, book 3 of The Jewish War: "The horsemen have a long sword at the right and likewise a long pike in the hand; a shield lies transversely at the horse's flank; and in a quiver are carried three or more javelins with broad points and not inferior to spears in size. All have helmets and cuirasses, as do the infantrymen."

§ 3. One spear is large and used for fighting at close quarters, while another is for casting. Strabo, book 10:

> Διτταὶ γὰρ ἦσαν τῶν δοράτων χρεῖαι, ἡ μὲν ἐκ χειρός, ἡ δὲ ὡς παλτοῖς· καθάπερ καὶ ὁ κοντὸς ἀμφοτέρας τὰς χρείας ἀποδίδωσι· καὶ γὰρ συστάδην χρῶνται καὶ κοντοβολοῦντες· ὥστε πρὸς ἑκάτερον δύναται ἡ σύνταξις.

For there were two uses of spears: one from the hand and the other as cast weapons; just as the pike serves both uses, for it can be used at close quarters and can be cast, so that the formation is capable of either use.

Our men today employ only these at close quarters; cannon alone have taken away the other missiles.

There were longer axes, which have been succeeded by our two-edged axes or halberds. To this class men refer the saliba, the three-bladed ax, or the martiobarbulus, with which they broke shields. Vegetius, book 1, chapter 17: "In Illyricum there were formerly two legions which had six thousand soldiers apiece. Because they used these weapons skillfully and bravely, they were called Martiobarbuli. It is established that for a long time all wars were most vigorously concluded through them--so much so that Diocletian and Maximian, when they came to the empire, judged that on account of the merit of their valor these Martiobarbuli should be named Jovians and Herculians, and they are taught to have preferred them to all the legions. Our soldiers, however, were accustomed to carry five martiobarbuli inserted into their shields. If the soldiers cast these opportunely, shield-bearing men appear in a certain manner to assume the office of archers. For they wound the enemies and horses before they can come not only to hand-to-hand combat but even within range of other missiles."

In Leo, however, martiobarbuli are javelins. Turnebus thinks them named from little barbel fish.

§ 4. The aclides were smooth, and when they had been cast against the enemy they were drawn back by a cord. Men think this was also called the cateia or caia.

§ 5. Horsemen especially were also accustomed to carry hammers, in place of which they now carry broad swords. To this class belong ῥόπαλα, clubs, and gauntlets.

They also employed nooses, as the retiarii used a net or net-like snare. When the Macedonians moved towers forward for an assault upon Tyre, the Tyrians entangled the Macedonians in nets and cast them down, Diodorus, book 17. Olaus Magnus says the same concerning the Finns.

CHAPTER XVII

Arms with Which We Harm the Enemy at a Distance

§ 1. The pilum, the missile customary among the Romans, was four and one-half cubits long, or a little less than seven feet, as Lipsius teaches. The iron was equal in length to the wood, but half of it was inserted into or attached to the wood. The iron was sometimes square and sometimes three-edged, with the thickness of a finger. Vegetius says that it often pierced through shield-bearing infantrymen and cuirassed horsemen. Tibullus assigns so great a force to it that "with the pliant pilum he broke what stood in his way." Virgil assigns it a broad iron point: "Brandishing shafts with broad iron."

Florus compares enormous pila with swords. Around the point they were hooked so that they could not be extracted. Thus they lodged in shields and weighed them down. So that this impediment might be greater, Marius arranged for them to bend. Sometimes they pierced two shields and connected them.

The pila were different from the spears of the light-armed soldiers. The Greeks call the latter γρόσφους and the former ὑσσούς. They also called the light-armed soldiers γροσφομάχους. Polybius describes the weapon as follows: "The wood of the pilum has a length generally of two cubits and the thickness of a finger. Its point, one span--that is, a greater palm--in length, is thinned and sharpened to such an extent that immediately after the first cast it necessarily bends and becomes unsuitable for casting back; otherwise it would become a weapon common to both sides."

Seven javelins, each four feet long, were given to each man. The wood was three feet long; the iron was a great palm, or three-quarters of a foot, a little less than one foot. It was therefore easy to carry seven little spears in the hand.

Partly like the pilum and partly like the light-armed soldier's spear was the sibuna, or sybina, customary among Greeks and Illyrians. They employed it principally in hunting. Although the force of pila is sometimes exaggerated, it is nevertheless established that it was ordinarily weak. For most often, when cast from level or lower ground, they fell ineffectually.

Livy, book 7: "In addition to valor, the position too assisted them, so that all the pila and spears did not fall ineffectually, as if cast from level ground--as most often happens--but all, balanced by their weights, lodged fast." But our weapons are effective from any position.

§ 2. Polybius describes for us the old and new spears of horsemen: "Their spears were also useless to them in two ways. They made them slender and pliant, and therefore they could neither aim them correctly nor strike the target; and before they fixed the point into anything, most were broken by the shaking caused by the very motion of the horses. I add that, being made without a point at the lower end, they delivered only the wound and blow of the forward part; when this was broken, the remainder was useless and ineffective for them. But they had a shield of oxhide, very similar to the bossed cakes which they are accustomed to place in sacrifices. It was not convenient to employ these in battle because they had no firmness; and when the leather was loosened or spoiled by rain, they became altogether useless, both then and now. Therefore, since their use was defective, they immediately adopted the Greek preparation of arms. In it, the blow of the spear's forward point happens to be direct and powerful, since the shaft is stable and immovable; likewise, after the weapon is reversed, the use of the lower point is firm and violent. The same reasoning applies to the shields, for both in attack and resistance they remain stable and firmly stretched. When the Romans saw this, they immediately imitated it."

Lipsius observes excellently that, when Brutus and Tarquinius fell after being wounded through their parmae, the spears were not strong but the parmae weak. The armor of the ancients was therefore not of great worth, since even the princes themselves were not safe when protected by it.

§ 3. It is established that horsemen had a long spear with which they charged, as do our lancers. Our men now secure them against their sides so that the blow may be carried through with their whole weight and impetus. Since the ancients also had an iron point at the rear, which they called the σαυρωτήρ, Lipsius thinks that they lacked such a support; if they did, the blow inflicted was much weaker. But I believe that there was a nail, hook, or something similar by which the spear was secured to the seated man's body, while the οὐραχός, the butt end, remained free. For they could brace it upon their knees, as Silius says:

> The weight of the Sarmatian pike, supported upon the knee,
> Drove headlong across the field against the opposing enemy.

The other javelins, three or four of which they carried in a quiver, were weak and more suitable for one who cast them than for one fighting at close quarters.

Marcellinus also shows the use of cylinders and stones: "Some, while carrying ladders and preparing means of ascent on every side, were crushed beneath the very burdens, when stones, fragments of columns, and cylinders were driven down the slope."

§ 4. The Romans were accustomed to scatter caltrops against the enemy. Herodian, book 4: "Whenever the Romans joined battle on foot, they readily overcame their adversaries. But afterward, when they were pressed by cavalry and a multitude of camels, they pretended flight and cast down caltrops and other sharpened iron devices. Hidden beneath the sand and visible to no one, these brought destruction upon horsemen and the riders of camels. For when they trod upon them, the horses--and especially the camels, because this kind has the softest hooves--fell down or became lame, throwing their riders from their backs."

CHAPTER XVIII

Living Arms

§ 1. We employ horses for warriors, and other animals as animate instruments; thus they too can be called arms. Indeed, whether a farmer turns the earth with a mattock or with oxen, both the oxen and the iron are instruments.

§ 2. The most ancient arms of early peoples were chariot horses and chariots armed with iron and scythes. Scythed four-horse chariots were formerly an object of the greatest fear. They are frequently mentioned in Sacred Scripture. In Exodus 14 Pharaoh yokes six hundred chosen chariots; Deuteronomy 11:4 and 20:1; Joshua 11:4 and 17:16; iron chariots, Judges 1:19 and 4:13, where Sisera has nine hundred; and in 1 Samuel 13:5 the Philistines have thirty thousand chariots and six thousand horsemen. In 1 Kings 9:19 the cities of the chariots are fortified; likewise 2 Chronicles 8:6 and 9:25. Strength and confidence were placed in them: Judith 9:6; Isaiah 31:1, 36:9, 37:24, and 66:15, "his four-horse chariot is like a whirlwind." Antiochus and Mithridates also employed chariots. At last they disappeared and are now altogether useless for battle. Vegetius gives the reason in book 3, chapter 24: "As they at first brought great terror, so afterward they were an object of ridicule. For a scythed chariot finds an entirely level field with difficulty and is arrested by a slight obstacle; and when one horse is brought down or wounded, it is brought to a halt. But they perished especially through this device of the Roman soldiers. When battle was joined, the Romans suddenly cast caltrops over the whole field; when the charging four-horse chariots fell upon these, they were destroyed. A caltrop is a defense composed of four stakes which, however it is cast, stands upon three points and threatens with the fourth upright."

There were also other chariots, or scythed chariots, drawn by two horses or one, of the kind exhibited for us by the learned and diligent commentator on Vegetius, Gottschalk Stewech.

Caesar describes chariot-fighters for us as almost wonderfully bold and nimble, book 4: "This is their manner of fighting from chariots. First they ride about through every part and cast missiles; by the very terror of the horses and the clatter of the wheels they generally disorder the ranks. When they have insinuated themselves among the companies of horsemen, they leap from the chariots and fight on foot. Meanwhile the charioteers withdraw a little from the battle and so station themselves that, if those men are pressed by a multitude of enemies, they may have a ready return to their own men. Thus in battles they display the mobility of horsemen and the steadiness of infantrymen. At length, by daily practice and exercise, they become accustomed to stop their horses upon a sloping and precipitous place, to control and turn them in a short space, to run along the pole, to stand upon the yoke, and from there to betake themselves into the chariots with the greatest speed."

Curtius describes scythed chariots for us in book 4: "He had scythed chariots before him, all of which, when the signal was given, he poured upon the enemy. The charioteers rushed forward with loosened reins so that they might crush more men by an attack for which sufficient provision had not yet been made. Thus spears projecting far beyond the pole tore some men, while scythes let down from either side tore others." Again in the same book: "Two hundred scythed four-horse chariots, the only aid of those nations, followed. Spears tipped with iron projected from the highest part of the pole. On each side of the yoke they had directed three swords, and between the spokes of the wheels several darts projected forward. Then other scythes clung to the outer rims of the wheels, and still others, lowered toward the ground, were to cut off whatever met the horses at full speed." Alexander himself ordered that they be received after the ranks were opened; Sulla fixed stakes.

When the Helvetii had determined to occupy the Gauls, they increased to the greatest possible number of beasts of burden and wagons, made the greatest possible harvests for two years, and entered into an alliance with the neighboring states. Then, when they were about to depart, they ordered each man to have ground provisions for three months, Caesar, book 1 of The Gallic War.

Those chariots served as fortifications, as I shall say in the proper place, and at the same time for conveying necessities.

§ 3. The introduction of elephants into battle was formerly terrifying. Pyrrhus first brought them into Italy.

§ 4. The Romans also rendered elephants useless; now they are generally harmful because they are very readily turned against their own men. Formerly they placed armored men in chariots against the beasts, who directed sarissas--that is, long pikes. Others sent against them armored soldiers fortified on every side with projecting points, so that they could not be seized by the trunk; others sent slingers and archers. They granted them space to attack, then surrounded them and captured them together with their masters. They also assailed them with wheeled ballistae. Now every kind of artillery is effective against them, so that they are scarcely led into battle. Hannibal placed eighty elephants before the battle line; Scipio opposed Numidian horsemen to them. They are considered common enemies, or enemies to both sides, because they are readily turned against friends. Cassiodorus falsely reports in book 10, chapter 30 that they could be wounded by no force; otherwise they are repelled with the slightest trouble.

§ 5. Men were accustomed to oppose camels to horses and elephants. Croesus opposed camels to cavalry; the horses, terrified by their novelty, threw down their riders. Frontinus, book 2, chapter 4. Pliny also mentions camels in wars, book 7, chapter 18. Alyattes the Lydian, the Colophonians, and the Castabalians employed dogs in battle; this was also customary among the Magnesians. Polyaenus, book 7; Aelian, book 14.

Philip also captured the Arbelans when they fled into dense forests by means of hunting dogs, Polyaenus, book 4.

There is nothing wonderful about noble beasts. Men even led pigs into war--an animal born for banquets, whose life serves in place of salt. For the elephant abominates and shudders at the grunting of a pig and at that unclean animal itself. It was therefore sometimes employed against the tower-bearing beasts.

The Megarians turned aside the elephants of Antigonus by means of pigs which they had smeared with pitch. Others removed the terror by habituation, for everything familiar becomes contemptible. Perseus caused wooden elephants, from which a trumpet shrieked, to be made, so that the horses might grow accustomed to them and learn to despise them.

It is not wonderful that men employed beasts when they even brought statues to an assault. What is said about Sardis when it was captured by Cyrus appears excessively crude. On the side where the mountain was precipitous, he placed armed statues upon poles and applied them to it; then he began the assault from another side. But when the besieged saw the statues, they believed the ridge to have been occupied by armed men, and thus Cyrus entered the city. Therefore, everything that lies between serves as arms for a prudent commander.

With beasts too it belongs to skill to excite their natures in whatever manner is possible. For since they lack skill, they must be governed by another’s skill. When the weary horses of Brachius could not be driven by spurs, he sent mares ahead, which they followed, Fulgosus, book 7, chapter 4. Victory depended upon occupying the passes of the mountains first.

CHAPTER XIX

Consideration of Engines of War

§ 1. What stratagems are in battles and the actions of war, engines are in works; for in both the former and the latter there is need of ingenuity, prudence, and sagacity, not of strength or expenditure. An engine, therefore, is a work ingeniously devised and made for effects which would otherwise require greater expenditure and strength. They think it was so called, ὅτι δεῖ μηχανᾶσθαι, "because it is necessary to contrive," since it is made not by men who yawn idly but by men who direct their mind and art.

In Deuteronomy 20:20 God forbade engines to be constructed from fruit-bearing trees. He calls them מצור, because they fortify, or render strong, those who are besieging. In 2 Chronicles 26:15 Uzziah equips Jerusalem with engines: "And he made in Jerusalem engines of diverse kinds, which he placed in the towers and at the corners of the walls, that they might discharge arrows and great stones." The Septuagint calls them μηχανὰς μεμηχανευμένας λογισμοῖς, "engines contrived by the calculations of an artificer." The Hebrew, however, speaks more clearly: חושב מחשבת חשבנות, that is, "engines, the contrivance of one contriving." חשב is earnest care, and to think by art and turn all things over in the mind. Engines, therefore, were invented in the most ancient times, and new ones are invented daily; nevertheless, if we wish to confess the truth, the engines of engines are the instruments of war--the force of gunpowder in artillery, petards, and mines. Thus now the engines of the ancients have for the most part withdrawn as though thunderstruck.

§ 2. Philologists dispute concerning the antiquity of engines, but nevertheless judge them to come from Moses and those ancient men. Statius attributes them to the Pylians and Messenians in the Trojan War. The Romans used them in the time of the kings, as Lipsius teaches in book 1 of the Poliorcetica. Diodorus, book 12, attributes rams to Pericles.

That there were ancient engines Moses teaches in Deuteronomy 20:20, where they are made principally from wood and are called מצור, a word which signifies siege, fortification, and confinement. Accordingly, whatever belongs to besieging and harassing the besieged is so named. But since in the time of Moses, and in the time which preceded it, there were very strongly fortified cities, walled even up to heaven, as Scripture speaks in Deuteronomy 1:28, and since these same cities were taken, as is evident from the wars of the kings Sihon, Heshbon, Moab, and the Palestinians, it is evident that there were engines. For who would believe that walls were demolished merely with axes and mattocks, or that the cities were taken by hunger? They therefore used engines.

Then in Ezekiel 4:2, 21:22, and 26:8 he mentions engines as things commonly used in his own time. His words in 4:2 are these: "And you shall set a siege against it, and you shall build fortifications, and you shall heap up an embankment, and you shall set camps against it, and you shall place rams round about." And in 21:22: "At his right hand the divination was made concerning Jerusalem, that he should place rams, that he should open a mouth in slaughter, that he should raise his voice in a howl, that he should place rams against the gates, that he should heap up an embankment, that he should build fortifications." And in 26:8: "Your daughters who are in the field he shall slay with the sword; and he shall surround you with fortifications; and he shall heap up an embankment round about; and he shall raise a shield against you."

He calls rams כרים, and the Seventy call them βελοστάσεις, because missiles were discharged from them. But in chapter 26:8, what our version calls vineae and rams is λόγχας in the Seventy; in the Hebrew it is קבלו מחי, which the Seventy render καὶ λόγχας αὐτοῦ, "and his lances." A ram is also called מחי, Mechi, from destroying, because it casts everything down. קבלו the Seventy render ἐναντίον, "against"; our translator interpreted it as an engine because it is placed against the wall. In whatever way it is taken, it must be understood of engines of war. Kimchi interprets it "the stroke of his engine"; others, a ballista. The Targum has ומחת פגוזוהי, "And the stroke of his engines." The Chaldaean monarchy therefore had its own engines, and I believe the Assyrians did as well; indeed, I would believe them to have been used even before the Flood. This also has been observed: those nations which established their state by art and reason generally employ engines, while barbarians employ unconsidered force. When the Romans had formed a tortoise, the Parthians, thinking them exhausted, dismounted from their horses and were slain. Dio, in Augustus.

§ 3. Vegetius enumerates these engines: tortoises, rams, hooks, vineae, mantlets, mice, and towers. Vitruvius, book 10, chapters 20 and 23.

The tortoise is an engine of joined shields. The use of the tortoise was that men might approach the wall and undermine it. Certain young Romans, turning a spectacle of the Circus to the use of war, seized the lowest part of a wall, Livy, book 44. They also mounted upon it and made a double and triple tortoise. Ballistae and catapults did not harm it because of its proximity. The first men raised shields above their heads; those following lowered them; the last knelt upon their knees. In this way they repelled cavalry and archers. Dio describes it in this manner: "Further, the tortoise is of this sort and is formed in this manner. After the baggage, the light-armed troops, and all the cavalry have been received into the middle, the heavy-armed infantrymen--those who use oblong shields made in the shape of a tube cut in half--are placed on the outermost parts, like brickwork, as a wall, and, themselves looking outward, encompass all the rest. The others who carry broader shields are placed densely in the middle and raise their shields both over themselves and over the others, so that throughout the whole phalanx nothing but shields may be seen, and all may be safe from the cast of missiles because of the density of the formation. Indeed, they make it so firmly compact that several men can walk upon it; even horses and chariots can be driven upon it whenever they are crowded together in some hollow and narrow place." That it supported cavalry and chariots could scarcely have been accomplished unless perhaps they assisted it by fixing javelins in the ground. Now, because shields are lacking, a tortoise cannot be made, nor is it expedient that there be one, since men crowded together can be scattered by artillery. They support cavalry with spears, as I shall say in its place.

Vegetius describes the tortoise, the ram, and the hook in this manner in book 4, chapter 14: "A tortoise is woven together from timber and planks; lest it be burned by fire, it is covered with hides, haircloths, and patchwork coverings. It receives within it a beam which either is furnished at its end with hooked iron and is called a hook, because it is curved so that it may draw stones out of the wall; or else its very head is covered with iron and it is called a ram, either because it has a very hard forehead which may undermine walls, or because, after the fashion of rams, it draws back so that it may strike more violently with an impetus. The tortoise, however, has taken its name from its likeness to a true tortoise, because just as the latter at one time withdraws and at another extends its head, so the contrivance at one time withdraws the beam and at another extends it, so that it may fall more forcefully."

Tortoise, therefore, is a general name which includes the ram and the hook. Vitruvius, book 10, chapter 19, reports that it was an invention of the Carthaginians: "The Carthaginians," he says, "pitched camp to attack Cadiz; and when they had first taken a fort, they attempted to demolish it. After they had no tools for the demolition, they took a beam and, supporting it with their hands and continually striking the top of the wall with its end, cast down the highest courses of stones and thus gradually dispersed the whole fortification course by course. Afterward a certain Tyrian craftsman named Pephasmenos, induced by this method and invention, set up a mast and from it suspended another crosswise like the beam of a balance; and by drawing it back and thrusting it forward, he cast down the wall of the people of Cadiz with violent blows. But Cetras the Chalcedonian first made a base of timber with wheels placed beneath it, and above it framed upright posts, crossbeams, and struts; upon these he suspended the ram and covered it with ox hides, so that those stationed in that contrivance for striking the wall might be safer. Because the device had slow motions, he began to call it a ram-bearing tortoise." But it existed earlier in Palestine.

Lipsius teaches that the tortoise was threefold. The χελώνη χωστρίς was for filling ditches and leveling roads; the χελώνη ὄρυξ was prepared for digging; the ram-bearing tortoise was that to which a ram was bound. It is called a tortoise from the slow pace of its advance, for it was a great mass and secure against fires, catapults, and great stones.

On the ram, see Lipsius, book 3 of the Poliorcetica, dialogue 1.

Two beams are preserved at The Hague, of great length, so that they can easily be thrust forward by two hundred men; for little ropes are attached to them.

The greater tortoise was the Helepolis, which Demetrius, who was called Poliorcetes, employed. Marcellinus, book 23, says: “An immense tortoise is framed, its timbers fitted together with very long axles and iron nails, and it is covered with ox hides and a fresh weave of rods; its upper parts are sprinkled with mud, so that it may ward off fiery and missile blows. To its front are fastened extremely sharp three-forked points, heavy with iron weights, of the kind in which painters or sculptors represent thunderbolts to us, so that with their extended points it may tear apart whatever it assails. A numerous body of soldiers within directs this very strong mass with stakes and ropes, and with roused strength applies it to the weaker part of the walls; unless the strength of the defenders above prevails, it opens enormous entrances by battering the walls together.”

§ 4. Vineae were brought up for undermining walls, mantlets for driving away defenders. Vegetius, book 4, chapter 15: “The ancients called vineae what are now called causiae in military and barbarian usage. An engine is joined together from lighter timbers, eight feet high, seven feet wide, and sixteen feet long. Its roof is woven together with a double fortification of planks and wickerwork. Its sides also are fenced with wicker, lest they be penetrated by the impact of stones and missiles. On the outside, moreover, lest it be burned by fire cast upon it, it is covered with raw and fresh hides or with patchwork coverings. When several of these have been made, they are joined in a row; beneath them men, sitting protected, penetrate to the foundations of the walls in order to undermine them. Those are called mantlets which are woven from wicker in the likeness of an apse and protected with haircloths or hides; three small wheels are placed beneath them, one in the middle and two at the ends, and they are brought up after the manner of a cart toward whatever side one wishes. The besiegers apply them to the walls and, protected by their shelter, drive all the defenders from the city’s battlements with arrows, slings, or missiles, so that an easier opportunity of mounting by ladders may be furnished.” Wickerwork and planks imitated trellised vines; earth, and sometimes bricks against fires, were spread over them. They undermined the foundations with axes.

§ 5. Mice were smaller. Vegetius, book 4, chapter 16. Caesar, book 2 of The Civil War: “First, two beams of equal length are placed upon the ground four feet apart; into them small columns five feet high are fixed. These they join to one another by braces with a gentle slope, upon which the timbers that they place for the purpose of roofing the mouse are laid. Upon these they throw two-foot beams and bind them with plates and nails. At the outer edge of the roof of the mouse and at the outermost beams they fasten square strips four inches wide, to hold the bricks which are built over the mice. Thus, when it has been sloped and regularly built as the beams were placed upon the braces, the mouse is covered with bricks and clay so that it may be safe from fire cast from the wall. Hides are drawn over the bricks, lest water sent down through pipes be able to dissolve the stones. The hides in turn, lest they be damaged by fire and stones, are covered with patchwork coverings.”

§ 6. Moving towers were a work of greater size. Vegetius, book 4, chapter 17. See Lipsius, Poliorcetica, dialogue 4.

§ 7. Now all those things are useless, for our artillery would utterly scatter them with a few blows. Formerly they either burned them by making a sortie or set them afire with a phalarica into which they had placed materials that nourished the flames.

They caught hold of the ram with chains.

They placed cushions before it.

They made the wall higher, or drew up another one. If it is lower than the wall, it is rendered useless. But the besiegers deceive them by art. Vegetius, book 4, chapter 19, says: “It is agreed that the contrivance is rendered ineffective if it is found to be lower. But the besiegers are accustomed to employ a device of this sort. First they construct such a tower as seems lower than the city’s battlements. Then secretly they make another small tower of planks within it; and when the engine has been joined to the walls, that small tower is suddenly drawn out from the middle by ropes and pulleys. Armed men, issuing from it, immediately seize the city, because it is found to be higher."

A Rhodian engineer secretly dug through the earth by a tunnel, and the engine, as he approached it, sank down by its own weight when the ground yielded. Callias drew the Helepolis within the wall. Diognetus impeded the engine by casting refuse upon it. In Marcellinus a malleolus is an arrow shaped like a distaff and filled with fire. "The malleoli," he says, "a kind of missile, are formed in this manner. It is an arrow of reed, fitted between its point and shaft with a many-forked piece of iron, which is hollowed into the form of a woman's distaff upon which linen threads are spun. Its belly, delicately pierced at many points, receives fire together with some fuel in its very cavity; and, discharged slowly from a weak bow--for it is extinguished by a more rapid blow--if it adheres anywhere, it burns tenaciously. When sprinkled with water it excites fiercer heats of fire, and it is put to sleep by no remedy except dust cast over it."

The sambuca is so called, Vegetius, book 4, chapter 21, from its likeness to a cithara. For just as there are strings in a cithara, so in the beam which is placed beside the tower there are ropes which lower the bridge from the upper part by pulleys so that it may reach the wall. Immediately the warriors leave the tower and, passing over it, attack the city walls. It is therefore joined to the tower.

The exostra is a bridge which is extended from a tower, Vegetius, book 4, chapter 21. The tollenon is so called, Vegetius, book 4, chapter 21, whenever one very tall beam is fixed in the earth, and another longer crossbeam is joined at its highest point, measured at the middle, with such a balance that, if you depress one end, the other is raised. At one end, therefore, an engine is woven together from wicker or planks, in which a few armed men are placed. Then, when one end has been drawn and depressed by ropes, they are raised on the other and placed upon the wall.

On ballistae and the other engines, Vegetius, book 4, chapter 22: "Against these things the besieged were accustomed to defend themselves with ballistae, onagers, scorpions, crossbows, staff-slings, archers, and slings. A ballista is stretched with ropes, sinews, and cords. The longer the little arms it has--that is, the greater it is--the farther it discharges darts. If it is adjusted according to the mechanical art and aimed by practiced men who have first taken its measure, it penetrates whatever it strikes. The onager, however, directs stones, but it hurls weights according to the thickness of its sinews and the size of its rocks. For the larger it is, the larger the stones which it hurls after the fashion of a thunderbolt. No species of engines is found more violent than these two kinds. They called those devices scorpions which we now call hand-ballistae; they were so named because by small and slender darts they inflict death. I think it superfluous to describe staff-slings, crossbows, and slings, which present usage recognizes; nevertheless, by the heavier stones directed through the onager, not only horses and men are struck down, but also the engines of the enemy are broken."

The catapult hurled spears, the ballista stones, although at times the same engine discharged both kinds of missile. Valerius teaches from the African serpent that their force was not equal even to our smaller pieces of artillery. It could not be pierced by the cast of missiles; but at last, assailed by the engines of the ballistae, it fell beneath repeated and weighty blows of flints. Furthermore, those blows did not readily break wooden towers and hides; our artillery passes through everything. Scorpions discharged smaller missiles and were aimed by one man's hand. Other kinds of arms remain; because they belong almost exclusively to besiegers, I have deferred them to another chapter.

CHAPTER XX

Great Care Must Be Taken in the Levy

§ 1. Justus Lipsius, book 5 of the Politics, chapter 8, openly condemns the crimes of our soldiery. He denies that among us there is any form of selection. Men purchase a soldier; they do not select one. At the sound of the drum there assemble men unknown to one another and ignorant--dregs of their cities who, through poverty and the greatest crimes, have the strongest bond with sin, accustomed to robberies and unaccustomed to wars. I, certainly, would wish the selection of our soldiers to be better. Yet it too was defective in ancient times, and frequently consisted of the worst men, certainly of unwilling men; nor is our own selection so thoroughly to be censured. Let us therefore consider the ancients.

First, it belonged not to volunteers but to men compelled to answer when their names were called. From this cause the entire Roman state experienced so many dissensions, since the sharpest weapon of the tribunes was to obstruct the levies, which they sometimes did at the utmost peril of the fatherland. Indeed, after the fashion of runaway slaves, they were even branded with marks burned into them. The workers in the imperial arms-factories were marked in the same manner, as the constitution of Arcadius and Honorius has it, Code, book 11. Great was the obligation of all who were marked. Julian enacted a law that they should not be admitted into monasteries before their periods of service had been completed. Soldiers and arms-workers were therefore servile; how, then, were they to fight for liberty?

Next, since they were unwillingly bound by the military oath, they fought more timidly and looked back toward home. But volunteers possess greater eagerness. The Roman state--or rather, its calamities--also taught this. In the Second Punic War, Livy, book 22, eight thousand slaves were purchased. Each was individually asked whether he wished to serve. That soldier was of great use and deservedly numbered among the Roman citizens.

The history which Livy recounts in book 24 is not unpleasant. Tiberius Gracchus had legions composed in great part of volunteers, who had already preferred for another year to earn liberty rather than demand it. Yet, when leaving winter quarters, he had perceived that in the column there was a murmur among men complaining whether they were never to serve as free men. He had written to the senate, not so much what they desired as what they had deserved: he had made use of their good and brave service up to that day, and nothing was lacking in them for the model of a regular soldier except liberty. He had been permitted concerning this matter to do whatever he judged to be for the state. Accordingly, before he joined battle with the enemy, he announced that the time had come for gaining that liberty for which they had long hoped. On the next day he would fight with standards brought together in an unobstructed and open field, where the matter could be conducted by true courage without any fear of ambushes. Whoever brought back the head of an enemy he would immediately order to be free; against whoever abandoned his place he would proceed with the punishment of a slave. Each man’s fortune was in his own hand. Not only would he himself be the author of their liberty, but so would the consul Marcus Marcellus and all the fathers, who, when consulted by him concerning their liberty, had given him authority. He then read the consul’s letter and the senate’s decree. At this a shout was raised with immense assent. They demanded the battle and fiercely pressed him to give the signal immediately. After announcing the battle for the following day, Gracchus dismissed the assembly. The soldiers were joyful, especially those for whom liberty was to be the recompense for service rendered in the space of a single day; they spent what remained of the day preparing their arms.

On the next day, when the signals began to sound, they were the first of all to assemble at the praetorium, ready and drawn up. At sunrise Gracchus led the forces into the battle line. Nor did the enemy delay the contest. They were seventeen thousand infantry, for the greatest part Bruttians and Lucanians, and twelve hundred cavalry, among whom very few were Italians, nearly all the others Numidians and Moors. They fought fiercely and for a long time; for four hours the battle inclined to neither side. Nothing hindered the Romans more than the fact that the heads of the enemy had been made the price of liberty. For whenever a man had vigorously slain an enemy, first he wasted time laboriously cutting off the head amid the crowd and confusion; then, with his right hand occupied in holding the head, every bravest fighter was absent, and the battle had been entrusted to the sluggish and timid. When the military tribunes reported this to Gracchus--that no enemy still standing was now being wounded, that they were butchering the fallen, and that human heads rather than swords were in the soldiers' right hands--he ordered the signal to be given at once that they should cast away the heads and attack the enemy. Their valor was sufficiently clear and distinguished, and liberty would not be doubtful for vigorous men. Then the battle was renewed, and the cavalry was sent against the enemy. The volunteers, therefore--indeed, slaves--preserved the empire.

§ 2. Polybius explains the Roman levy in this manner: "When they are about to hold a levy, the consuls publicly proclaim the day upon which all Romans of military age must be present. They do this almost every year. When the day arrives and all the military youth has been assembled in the city and soon afterward on the Capitol, the junior tribunes divide themselves into four parts in the order in which they were appointed by the people or by the commanders. For four legions constitute among them the entire and principal division of the forces. They assign the first four of those appointed to the legion called the First, the next three to the Second, another four to the Third, and finally the last three to the Fourth. Of the senior tribunes they assign the first two to the First, the next three to the Second, the following two to the Third, and finally the last three to the Fourth. When a division of the tribunes of this kind has been made, so that all the legions now have an equal number of leaders, the tribunes of each legion sit apart and separately, and they draw the tribes by lot one at a time and summon whichever tribe the lot assigns. From it they choose four young men approximately equal in age and readiness. When these have been brought forward, the tribunes of the First Legion make the first choice, those of the Second the second, those of the Third the third, and those of the Fourth the last. When four men have again been brought forward, the tribunes of the Second Legion make the first choice, and so onward, while those of the First make the last. After this, when four have again been brought forward, the tribunes of the Third Legion choose first, while those of the Second choose last. Thus, because the choice always alternates and goes round in a circle, men of very nearly equal quality are taken for each legion."

They conduct this on the Capitol because they needed to be protected by the sanctity of the place. They draw the tribes by lot lest any tribe appear to have been passed over or burdened. Within a tribe even the soldiers themselves were sometimes selected by lot because they refused the oath. When a commander was popular or military service lucrative, they gave their names voluntarily; so Livy, books 10 and 42. Yet what sort of soldiers were these whom they ordered to be led away in chains, Livy, book 3; whose necks they twisted, book 4, while the harshness of the levy was hated because of the injury and mutilation of bodies? This is what men call hunting with unwilling dogs. Indeed, they sometimes sold them; the consuls Valerius and Fabius did this, Livy, book 8. With such a soldier no one now would attack the enemy--or would be slain at the first assault.

But those slaves were not bad soldiers; they were vigorous among the foremost. What if Spartacus or Eunus had led their fellow slaves against barbarians? Would they not have been of the greatest value to the Roman state? For if they had possessed auxiliary forces and resources, they would have accomplished more than all the Romans. As it was, although all the other things were present, expenditure certainly was lacking. Flamininus said of Philopoemen: "He has hands and legs, but no belly," for the resources for war were lacking to that great and vigorous man.

"But wicked men are selected." I admit it. We also use the labor of wicked men to dig mines and construct walls, and their crimes are profitable to the state. Nor are wicked men of no usefulness when they wage wars. First, the cities are cleansed of useless and harmful dregs, and what is purer remains. Next, it is more advisable that wicked, restless men known for crimes should fall in battle than good and quiet men and upright citizens; by the lesser evil, therefore, the worse fall and the better remain, who can defend and preserve the cities. Nor is it true that they cannot be taught discipline. For just as conspicuously wicked men are sometimes the best craftsmen, sailors, and merchants, so too they are warriors. They can preserve the ranks, confront dangers, and endure adversity. Fear of the commander and habit make them bold; at times they even learn piety in war, when, having received good instructors in morals, they are admonished concerning salvation amid uncertain dangers.

§ 3. But if a choice were given, I would certainly prefer volunteers, and men whose circumstances at home are straitened. Those who answer the roll-call unwillingly, who hide in workhouses and cut off their own thumbs so that they may not be compelled to serve, who always look back toward home, where they prefer to live abundantly and delicately rather than be exposed to danger amid the labors of war--these do not please me. Hence came the veterans' frequent complaints and riots over their discharge. Volunteers, however, have hope in war alone. The most powerful kings, who had the right to compel, nevertheless preferred to have volunteers. Xerxes, that great king, although he compelled so many peoples into wars, was anxious lest they give their names unwillingly, for they remembered that Greece had been fatal to the Persians. He therefore put on the fox-skin and sent men everywhere to spread the report that the leaders of Greece would betray their fatherland and that all were being summoned to spoils, not to a battle.

How great, indeed, was the harshness of levies, when Darius promised the old man Oeobazus, who asked exemption for one of his three sons, that he would leave him all three, and had them slain and cast before their father's eyes. Herodotus, book 4. Xerxes was still more cruel toward a Lydian who was his host and who, of five sons, asked for one as a consolation for his old age. The tyrant cut him in two and placed him upon the road so that the army, passing between the parts, might be consecrated to the infernal gods by a funereal purification. At Rome the path to honors was closed to those who had not served, so greatly did men need to be enticed to military service.

§ 4. Indeed, recruiters were sometimes not far removed from danger when they conducted a levy of unwilling men. Livy, book 21, says that two peoples, dismayed by the harshness of the levy, caused fear of revolt. Triumvirs were sent through the countryside to compel men into military service, Livy, book 23; sometimes senators, as by Attius, and legates, as by Cato. Civilis, when he invites the Batavians to rebellion, certainly adduces the levy among its causes: "A levy presses upon us, by which children are separated from parents and brothers from brothers, as though for the last time."

§ 5. One must labor especially at this: that reinforcements be sent every month. For thus, while a few are received little by little, they come with greater selectivity, and, mingled with the veterans, they learn the military art. In this way the Romans sustained their military strength, for daily even a victorious army becomes smaller. Nothing harms any forces more than time.

§ 6. The first principle of the levy concerns the people from which it is made. Vegetius, book 1, chapter 2, says: "The order of the subject demands that in the first part it be treated from which provinces or regions recruits ought to be selected. It is agreed that in every place both cowardly and vigorous men are born. Yet one people surpasses another in war, and the region of the heavens has very great influence upon the strength not only of bodies but also of minds. In this place I shall not omit those things which have been approved by the most learned men. They say that all nations neighboring the sun, dried by excessive heat, do indeed understand more but have less blood, and for that reason do not possess constancy and confidence for fighting hand to hand, because those who know themselves to possess little blood fear wounds. Northern peoples, on the contrary, removed from the sun's heats, are indeed more unreflecting but, abounding in a copious supply of blood, are exceedingly ready for wars. Recruits, therefore, should be selected from more temperate regions, in whom there may both be a supply of blood sufficient for contempt of wounds and death and no lack of prudence, which both preserves order in camp and is of no small use in combat and counsels."

I certainly shall not deny that the nature of a region is relevant to selecting a suitable soldier; yet history itself teaches that it is of slight importance. For lands once thought barbarous and unsuitable are now fruitful in the bravest men. Vegetius thinks those who are near the heats of the sun are timid because they possess little blood. I do not know how true this is. The Israelites were very brave men and were dried by the heat of the sun. The Carthaginians brought prudence and boldness into battles, yet they were scorched by the African sun; certainly, coming from the sun and the south, they defeated the Romans in the Italian winter, even in a pitched battle.

As for what Vegetius philosophizes concerning an abundance of blood, I do not know whether he would win the approval of philosophers, who locate courage and boldness not in much blood but in heat and spirits. Men fear wounds not so much because of the blood, which can easily be stanched, as because of mutilation and death.

Nor is it true that northern peoples are devoid of prudence and discipline in camp. It was so formerly, when they were barbarians; but now they are most steadfast in battle and most orderly in camp. Therefore the brave are to be selected from every nation and then formed and strengthened by discipline. For although those who inhabit a fertile land and the south are readily softened, there have nevertheless been many very brave men among them. Divine Scripture bears witness concerning the Anakim, Horites, and Zamzummim. Nor is what Lucan says of all men true, although it is true of many:

> Whatever slopes toward the eastern regions
>
> and the warmth of the world, the clemency of the climate > softens its peoples. There you see loose garments > and the flowing coverings of men.
>

Yet they cast off ferocity and grow in cultivation and prudence. The Romans, indeed, despised the Syrians. When Scipio had heard of the diverse arms of Antiochus and the names of his armed troops, he said: “When I was at Chalcis, my host set diverse meats before me; and when I marveled at their abundance, he added that they all came from a domestic pig, but had been prepared in different ways. Thus their arms are diverse, but they themselves are all Syrians.”

But the Jewish War certainly taught that they are by no means to be despised if they are trained. They held dominion for a long time and far and wide, and exhausted both Greeks and Romans.

§ 7. Many are accustomed to ask whether a soldier should be selected from the city or from the countryside. Vegetius, book 1, chapter 3, decides it thus: “It follows that we should inquire whether a recruit from the fields or from cities is more useful. On this point I believe there could never have been doubt that the rustic common people are more suited to arms: they are nourished beneath the open sky and amid labor; enduring of the sun; neglectful of shade; ignorant of baths; unacquainted with delights; simple in mind; content with little; their limbs hardened to the endurance of every labor; and from the countryside accustomed to carry iron, dig a ditch, and bear a burden. Yet necessity sometimes demands that even city-dwellers be compelled to arms. When they have given their names to military service, let them first learn together to labor, run, carry a weight, and endure sun and dust; let them employ a spare and rustic diet; and let them remain now under the open sky, now under tents. Only then let them be trained in the use of arms; and if a longer expedition arises, they should be detained chiefly in country districts and kept far from the allurements of the city, so that in this way strength may be added both to their bodies and to their minds. Nor must it be denied that, after the city was founded, Romans proceeding from the city always went to war; but at that time they were weakened by no pleasures and no delights. The youth washed away in the Tiber the sweat collected by running and exercise on the Campus Martius. The same man was warrior and farmer; he changed only the kind of arms. This is so true that it is agreed the dictatorship was offered to Quinctius Cincinnatus, an excellent man, while he was plowing. Therefore it seems that the strength of the army should be supplied especially from the fields. Somehow, a man who knows fewer delights in life fears death less.”

The rustic soldier pleases me because he is better suited to labors. Yet in city-dwellers there are many qualities in which they surpass country youth: they possess a more exact and practiced intelligence and are more capable in all things. Since the smallest part of military service is accomplished by bodily strength and force, while all its highest matters require industry, prudence, and dexterity, and since city-dwellers are more readily educated for this, I would prefer them to be selected. This is now all the more necessary because the kind of arms in present use requires dexterity more than strength: they carry neither shields nor stakes and are not oppressed by so many labors. Rome had soldiers selected from farmers; Pliny says that they were the bravest men and most vigorous soldiers, and men who thought no evil. Cincinnatus the dictator was also summoned from the plow-handle, and Regulus, cultivator of a poor little field, is adduced in favor of country youth. But when I consider the matter more carefully, I see that there were distinguished commanders, but not very many; for that reason consulships were frequently repeated for the same men. Later, however, when nobles commanded, there were more commanders. Indeed, even in the earliest times many wealthy men conducted affairs vigorously; in the times of Sulla and Caesar, and throughout the entire period following the Second Punic War, they had innumerable very brave men, and those from wealthy and elegant city-dwellers.

§ 8. Vegetius approves the ancient age for enlistment, namely the beginning of puberty, because a man is more quickly imbued with instruction and more perfectly learns what he imbibes from boyhood; his body is more suited to exercise; and he has time to learn everything. Yet they scarcely selected anyone under seventeen years of age unless necessity compelled them, nor did they imbue a recruit older than forty-six with training. Therefore the levy should be instituted with the greatest care, for an army is never weak when the matter has been conducted with a good selection.

§ 9. They institute a levy in two ways. Either they draw the whole army together into one place and display all their strength, in order to strike terror into the enemy; or they display the individual legions and centuries, so that it may remain uncertain how great the multitude is. The latter is much more to be approved, because what is unknown keeps the enemy more anxious, while strength which has been displayed makes the enemy cautious, so that he turns to a stratagem or to foreign auxiliaries.

§ 10. A state which desires to train its citizens as warriors should form them in this manner from boyhood. Only let it preserve a measure; for so should the hardy soldier be trained that he does not cease to be a good citizen. The Spartans educated and hardened their own men to endurance of hunger, thirst, labors, pains, and blows. They especially inflamed them with desire for victory. Cicero, book 5 of the Tusculan Disputations: “Companies of young men at Sparta contend with one another with incredible exertion, with fists, heels, nails, and finally teeth, so that they expire before admitting that they have been conquered.” The elders sowed rivalries and suggested contests. Yet in this way they kindled hatreds and civil quarrels, and they obtained neither a great nor a lasting empire. They also gloried excessively in nobility. Agesilaus therefore acted more arrogantly than usefully when the allies complained that many of their own men but few Laconians were serving. He ordered them to sit down, then summoned craftsmen by the names of their trades. When it appeared that most of the allies were craftsmen but none of the Laconians were, this was then esteemed a great matter. Our own times, however, have taught that craftsmen become altogether excellent soldiers.

CHAPTER XXI

Virtues of the Selected Soldier

§ 1. The virtues of soldiers are discerned either in the body or in the mind. The first virtue of a soldier is piety toward God, faith, and hope; for in this the soldier has the foundation of true courage. Wicked men, conscious of evil, cannot with a fearful conscience despise death, for wickedness is always timid. Therefore I would not wish a soldier to be such as Lucan describes:

> The peoples whom the north beholds are happy
>
> in their error, whom that greatest of fears, > the fear of death, does not press. Hence in their men
>
>
> the mind is prone to rush upon the sword, their souls capable > of death, and it is cowardly to spare a life that will return.

Superstition has never had a firm foundation; and therefore their onset was greater than that of men, but their constancy less than that of women. Although superstition, anger, madness, and like things can produce in them what truth can produce, nevertheless constancy cannot exist in them. For this reason Tertullian rightly proves the courage of Christians from the fact that they are so ready to die. For it is impossible that a man should readily cast himself into the danger of death if he thinks that he will die badly. Accordingly, that error of the Gauls concerning a life that would return by no means made them so steadfast that they endured against Roman arms. I am not unaware that most soldiers are impious; but they fight either so as not to lose their life or from some other desire, which readily grows faint when a greater fear approaches. Nevertheless, I do not forbid the selection of wicked men when there is a great scarcity of good men.

§ 2. In a soldier I desire moderate prudence; in a commander, the greatest. At times a battle is restored or a city preserved by the counsel of a single soldier. The Eretrians were bad soldiers, who, like swordfish, did not possess a heart; Themistocles therefore understood that they could easily be conquered. Many things must be done extemporaneously by military prudence which cannot await a commander's present order when he is farther away or when all things are in confusion. Next, unless a moderate degree of prudence exists, soldiers have no hope of military promotions.

§ 3. Let them be strangers to luxuries. A body going from the bedchamber to the battle line, from the shade into the sun, accustomed to a tunic, does not sustain the weight of a cuirass; a head covered with linen refuses a helmet; a hard sword-hilt chafes the hand softened by leisure. A stronger soldier, however, comes from rugged ground. Thus Jerome, to the monk Theodorus. Vegetius orders the limbs to be hardened to endurance by remaining under tents or beneath cold Jove. Delicacies of food were absent: bacon, cheese, and posca--vinegar mixed with water--were given. To this end vinegar was customarily distributed to the soldier, so that with it they might correct the taste and rawness of the water. They also wished a soldier to endure the sun and the injuries of the weather. Hadrian destroyed shelters made from branches because he wished the soldier to be enduring of sun and rains. Fulgosius, book 1, chapter 2.

§ 4. They ought also to be spirited and especially confident of victory. They chiefly become so when they judge their commanders experienced and approachable. Nothing gives a soldier equal courage with a good opinion of his commander, if they think that by some singular stratagem or prudence he will preserve his own men and defeat the enemy. When Fabius raised the spirits of his men against the Etruscans and adduced many arguments for victory, he added that one argument remained which could not yet be publicly set forth, lest it become known. Thus, when soldiers are otherwise brave in spirit, through confidence in their commander they encounter every danger very freely. For if they are hares in helmets, the commander's speech will comfort their trembling in vain. The mention of danger strikes the fearful. All timid living things are useless for battle. In vain will you exhort a deer to fight against dogs when you cannot bear either to see a dog or to hear its barking, but shudder at the mention of a dog.

§ 5. Boldness has frequently given a fortunate outcome. A certain Moorish cornicularius of Caesar roused some watchmen and led Pompey's garrison through the midst of Caesar's forces. Let the soldier therefore be bold, but let him employ the prudence and spiritedness of his commander.

§ 6. Let soldiers be strong rather than tall, with watchful eyes and an upright neck. Marius requires a recruit who has six feet, or five feet and ten inches. Meanwhile stature too must be weighed, because it adds strength. Pyrrhus spoke altogether like a commander: "Choose the tall; I shall render them strong by exercise." Brennus brought forward the most contemptible of the Greeks and compared them with the strongest of his own men; and thus he exhorted men so great to fight against men so small. Some tested courage by artifice.

When Chabrias was about to lead an army of recruits into battle, he issued an edict that those who were sick should lay down their arms. The timid pretended sickness. He sent them to preoccupy certain places, so that they might terrify the enemy by their multitude. Polyaenus, book 3.

§ 7. Experience itself also, acting as commander, separated the cowardly from the vigorous. When many men sought ranks from Theagenes, commander of the Athenians, he answered that he would grant them at Megara. Secretly, however, he sent cavalry ahead and ordered them to return against his own column in the guise of enemies. Then, as though alarmed, he exhorted them to battle and permitted each man to take his place wherever he wished. At this the brave and eager sprang forward into the first line, while the timid stood behind the standards. Theagenes promoted each man in the place where he found him. And when Iphicrates saw that many timid men were following him, he issued an edict that if anyone had left something behind, he should return in order to go against the enemy well equipped. When many used the opportunity, he rendered the rest more confident by saying that brave men would fight without slaves.

§ 8. Speed and agility are an indication of courage; anger is necessary in war. We remember no one swifter than Hazael, concerning whom Scripture speaks in the passage in question; and the matter itself shows that he nevertheless was a brave man.

§ 9. Finally, a multitude and crowd should be avoided. It has not strength but weight; it is more a hindrance than an aid. Hands are needed, not names. For in the greatest battles there are few who overthrow the enemy. If they preserve the ranks and fresh men are sent in, a battle line cannot be conquered unless all are slain. But now it generally happens through some accident that, when a very few have been slain, all are turned to flight.

§ 10. A multitude is harmful. The army of Xerxes so drained rivers that:

> We believe that deep rivers failed, > and that streams were drunk dry by the Mede.

Justin records three hundred seventy thousand; others five hundred myriads, that is, fifty times one hundred thousand. Ctesias records in the army of Ninus one million seven hundred thousand infantry, two hundred thousand cavalry, and a little fewer than ten thousand six hundred chariots. Darius led eight hundred thousand against the Scythians. A multitude impedes itself and renders itself exposed to the enemy. If there is a multitude, let it be divided into several armies.

§ 11. The Romans prepared suitable soldiers by varied exercise; for it was not permitted to obtain honors unless a great part of one's periods of service had been completed, nor to take a wife before ten periods of service.

§ 12. The principal quality in a soldier is obedience, which is exercised in a most serious matter, since at a command one must go to death. Therefore those men must be restrained who prefer to interpret their commanders' orders rather than carry them out, and who thrust themselves into command. Such was the Roman army in Macedonia. Plutarch, in Galba: "Most men assert that an army, like a body, ought to be moved by no impulse of its own, but only by the movements of its commander. For this reason they say that Aemilius Paulus, when he received the army in Macedonia full of talkativeness and curiosity and intruding itself into the cares and duties of the commander, instructed it that each man should furnish him a ready hand and a sharp sword; the remaining matters would be his care." Myronides issued an edict that the Athenians should go out; and when not all had yet gone out, he began the battle, interpreting delay as fear. Agesilaus required a horse and a man from the wealthy at Ephesus, and thus received vigorous men in place of cowards.

CHAPTER XXII

The Office and Arts of a Good Commander

§ 1. A commander is especially necessary to an army; for an army without a prudent commander is like a vast beast without a head, like Polyphemus, “a monster horrible, misshapen, huge, whose eye had been taken away.” For this reason Demades too called Alexander’s army a Cyclops, because all things were present to it except prudence, by which that mass might be governed.

An army without a commander is a crowd, a body without a soul, a bank of rowers without a helmsman. In sum, an army is worth as much as its governor. An army without a commander is a lion without eyes; a commander without a steadfast army is a head without a body. When Caesar proceeded in Spain against Petreius and Afranius, Pompey’s legates, he said, “I am going to an army without a commander”; when he proceeded into Thessaly against Pompey, “I am going to a commander without an army.” For the legates had steadfast legions, whereas a great part of Pompey’s men were recruits. Scipio, Pompey, Gracchus, Pelopidas, Epaminondas, and others have taught that good commanders with a middling army are of greater worth than a good army without a commander, for a good commander quickly forms a soldier.

§ 2. A commander of wars must be permitted great liberty in conducting the affair, nor should he be punished for an affair badly conducted. For since such great difficulties and such sudden changes arise in war that they cannot be foreseen by human counsel, liberty for a new counsel must be left in a new danger. Next, what is being done in the same camp is often unknown to each party, so far is it from being possible always to meet the contrivances of the enemy. Brutus was victorious against Octavius on his own wing; Cassius was defeated and, because he thought Brutus’s army had been routed, laid hands upon himself. Had he not done this, Roman affairs could have stood with equal fortune. The same occurred long before between the Aequi and the Romans, when Sempronius was consul, since each side believed itself defeated. Therefore, since such great confusion throws everything into disorder, magnanimous men should not be burdened with other dangers, but should rather be aided in adversity.

§ 3. Let him be prudent above all, since upon him depends the fortune of so many brave men and even of the kingdom. Let reason, not fortune, guide him in action; yet if fortune should invite him by an opportunity, let prudence govern that too. For an intelligence tested by dangers and affairs has been found able to accomplish very much in war, especially that virtue which the Greeks call ἀγχίνοιαν and the Latins call sagacity.

Great commanders have accomplished more by counsel than by force. The Carthaginians, because their commanders conducted wars with depraved counsel, crucified them even if prosperous fortune had followed. Valerius, book 2, chapter 7. For they attributed what the commanders had conducted well to the aid of the immortal gods, but what evil they had committed to their own fault. It is agreed that fortune is of no great importance. An army has scarcely perished except where there was an error in counsel. A provident commander is better than a bold one. And Caesar spoke truly: “It belongs no less to a commander to conquer by counsel than by the sword.”

§ 4. Let him be vigorous and energetic, not the shadow of a great name. Let him therefore be roused by dangers and animate others. Such was Lucius Marcellus: when he saw himself unexpectedly surrounded by the enemy, he charged into them and even carried off the spolia opima. Sempronius Tuditanus and Gaius Octavius, a tribune, passed through the enemy’s garrisons with twelve comrades. Vigor of mind and confidence produced victory. And when Leonidas was told that the Persians would create a cloud of arrows, he answered that he would fight in the shade. At times let the commander himself go before them by his example, as the greatest commanders have done. When, after Postumius’s exhortation, the soldiers asked what he commanded, he ordered them to imitate him; and, raising the standard, he went against the enemy and conquered.

§ 5. Let the commander of such great forces be blameless and injure no one; let him rouse all men by emulation of what is honorable and becoming. Such was the emperor Alexander, concerning whom his history bears witness: "Since, therefore, he was so great and such a commander at home and abroad, he entered upon the Parthian expedition. He conducted it with such great discipline and such great reverence for himself that it was said not soldiers but senators were crossing over. Wherever the legions made their march, the tribunes were girt for service, the centurions modest, and the soldiers amiable. Because of these so many and such great good qualities, the provincials received the emperor himself as a god. The soldiers themselves, moreover, so loved the young emperor as a brother, as a son, as a parent. They were honorably clothed, shod even for comeliness, nobly armed, and furnished also with horses and becoming saddlecloths and bridles, so that whoever saw Alexander's army would recognize the Roman state. Finally, he labored to appear worthy of that name--indeed, to surpass that Macedonian--and he said that there ought to be a great difference between the Roman Alexander and the Macedonian."

§ 6. Let him seek reputation from every quarter, not for the vanity of honor but for safety. Reputation is most powerful in war, and those whom reputation reports to have perished perish. Nowhere is an affair more tossed about by events; through the fall of one man a camp is conquered.

§ 7. Let him have piety especially at heart. Do not entrust yourself and your fortunes to an impious man. For in the end such men have at last perished miserably and have become examples. Even when the soldier is impious, he requires a pious commander.

§ 8. Wealthy men should ordinarily be selected, for they do not gape so eagerly after booty and are able to meet necessary expenditures.

§ 9. Let him have the affairs of the enemy thoroughly examined. Epaminondas used to say that the best commander was he who, although unable to learn the enemy's affairs with certainty, at least knew them by conjecture.

§ 10. Let him be an example of temperance and labors to the army. The commander's virtue is accustomed to be a great example. Cato was content with the wine which the rowers drank; Hannibal took food toward twilight; Aemilianus, Scipio, and Alexander took food while walking on the march. Masinissa, when ninety years old, took food standing.

§ 11. Let him be severe and be held to be such; let it scarcely be believed that he pardons offenses. For men swiftly and diligently obey such commanders, admire them, and, although they are sometimes angry with them, nevertheless revere them. Nothing except fear and severity restrains the soldiers' wantonness, wickedness, hands stained with blood, and spirit gaping after plunder. But a reputation for severity causes offenses to be avoided, punishments to be rare, and exasperations of minds to be absent.

Meanwhile two reefs must be avoided in this sea. The first is excessive savagery, lest he seem to call tortures and insults discipline. The other is that the soldier not be at the discretion of commanders, but the commanders be dragged along by military violence. The former of these calls forth sudden mutinies, the latter destruction. By the military law of the Turks every offense is punished by death. They certainly have this advantage from it: that the rest of the soldiers do not readily riot; yet they do not dare to restrain the Janissaries by that severity.

§ 12. He will render severity tolerable, indeed lovable, by much affability: if he employs beneficence at the proper time; if he avoids savagery of words when decreeing punishments; if he visits and cares for the wounded. But there is no greater force which joins them more closely than common danger. For this reason commanders have been accustomed in battle to call soldiers comrades and brothers. For benevolence alone makes men faithful. Thus that distinguished commander in Tacitus, book 1 of the Annals: "And in order that he might soften the memory of the disaster also by affability, he went about among the wounded, extolled the deeds of each man, and inspected their wounds; by hope for one, glory for another, and conversation and care for all, he strengthened them for himself and for battle."

§ 13. Let him have subordinate commanders, tribunes, and centurions who are strong in vehemence and speed, even if perhaps they lack prudence. It is expedient that some, but not all, be such. For certain things must be resolved suddenly and at the danger of a few, and these bold men rush upon them. Yet let him govern them himself, so that they expend their strength only at its proper time. For just as hunting dogs rise against the quarry with noble impetus but are held by leashes until the moment arrives, so these men ought to be esteemed highly, cherished, praised, and affected with rewards. They are accustomed to accomplish the greatest things and rouse others to equal distinctions. Indeed, let the commander not take it ill that he too is thought to be such, for the soldier rejoices in the ardor of his commander.

§ 14. Let him not change commanders. There is certainly something which I censure in the Roman military system. Since there were six tribunes in each legion, two commanded for two months, and thus after six months the command returned to the same men. Polybius: "Two tribunes make the entire inspection of the flank. Likewise, they are the men who conduct every other care of the camp. For, dividing themselves two by two, each pair commands for two months of a half-year's span, and those whom that lot touches then preside over the entire administration of the camp." The method by which the prefects commanded the allies was the same. At first light the horsemen and centurions come to the tents of the tribunes, and the tribunes to that of the consul; the consul gives the tribunes whatever order must be performed, the tribunes give it to the horsemen and centurions, and these to the common soldiers when the time for each matter comes.

This too was an evil of Roman ambition. For hence an opportunity was sought to harm rivals and please the soldiers when two men held command either simultaneously, on alternate days, or in alternate months. This was praiseworthy: that each morning the tribunes came to the commander, and the horsemen and centurions to the tribunes, to receive orders. Indeed, the soldiers came to the centurions, as Josephus says in book 4 of The Jewish War. Yet it could scarcely have happened that all the soldiers came to the centurion. Rather, it must be understood that the subsignani came; I do not think that the velites came, for they were scattered along the rampart. He then gives the tribunes the watchword and other commands. But when the tribune seeks the watchword, he at the same time reports to the commander the number of soldiers present. Thus Appian, book 5. And in Seneca, On Tranquillity of Mind, chapter 8: "That number of slaves was reported daily, like an army to its commander, to a man for whom two deputy slaves and a room a little larger ought already to have counted as wealth." Present-day frauds teach how prudently this was instituted, for they present blind--that is, fictitious--names to princes. This has now passed so far into custom that stealing in that manner is accounted industry.

The sum of all ranks tended toward this: that all should receive the command without error and swiftly. Livy, book 44: "He took care that everything in the column should be done in order and without confusion, at the nod and command of the commander. When what was to be done was announced to all at the same time, not all heard it; having received an uncertain command, some added more of their own than had been ordered, others did less. Then discordant shouts arose in every place, and the enemy learned what was being prepared before the soldiers did. It therefore pleased him that the military tribune should secretly give the command to the chief centurion of the legion, and that he in turn should tell each centurion next to him in order what needed to be done, whether it had to be carried from the foremost standards to the rear of the column or from the rearmost to the front."

§ 15. This also must be guarded against: that he should not place over others men infamous by some mark, although they appear to be excellent soldiers. What wonder is it that Elagabalus perished, concerning whom Herodian says: "Indeed, he placed a certain dancer over the armies, a man who in his youth had formerly performed publicly in the theater. He likewise placed one man from the stage over the youth, another over the senate, and another over the equestrian order. He entrusted the greatest offices of the empire to charioteers, comic performers, and actors of mimes. He gave the procuratorships of provinces to his slaves or freedmen according as each surpassed the rest in disgrace."

Nero too, through the height of madness, sent a freedman to the army. Tacitus, book 14. But he was an object of ridicule to the enemy, among whom liberty was still vigorous and the power of freedmen was not yet known; and they marveled that the commander and army which had completed so great a war obeyed men of servile condition.

§ 16. Let him be diligent and seize whatever opportunity there is for acting and conquering. Francesco Carmagnola, commander of the Venetians, used an opportunity excellently. For when the camps were near one another and one of his cavalrymen had enmity with one of the enemy's cavalrymen, and they wished to decide it by a duel, a place for the fight was appointed between the camps. While many hastened to the spectacle, the Venetian drew up the strength of his soldiers in the camp; suddenly attacking the unsuspecting enemy, he conquered and routed them.

The incident which I shall add shows how greatly opportunity prevails even against ingenuity. Cleomenes and the Argives had neighboring camps. The king announced everything by a herald; the Argives imitated him, so that when he dined, rested, or led out his men, they too repeatedly did the same things as though a common signal had been given. But on a certain day he secretly announced to his men that when the signal for dinner was given, they should take up arms. When this had been done, he came upon the Argives while they were dining and slew them. It was of such great importance to know what opportunity offered. Iphicrates the Athenian was in the utmost fear, but when he had learned that the Thracians would come by night from the hills through which alone there was a road to the camp, he secretly disposed his army along the sides of the road and kept very few fires burning in the camp. Then, attacking from the sides the multitude as it ran down, he slew it. How readily did a man of ingenuity turn the highest danger against the enemy and seek victory from their own counsel.

CHAPTER XXIII

The Prince or King Should Personally Be Present in a Great War

§ 1. Those who govern any single kingdom, however large, if a war should arise with an equal or a more powerful enemy, ought themselves, as kings, to preside over it and administer everything. For the presence of a good king carries very great weight; and deservedly did Antigonus say to a helmsman who warned him about the multitude of the enemy: "ἐμὲ δὲ αὐτὸν παρόντα πρὸς πόσους ἀντιτάττεις;"--"But I myself, present here--before how many do you place me?" Augustus discharged not only the office of commander but also that of soldier; and in the midst of an engagement, when the eagle-bearer of his legion had been gravely wounded, he took the eagle upon his shoulders and carried it for a long time. The first signal advantage of the royal presence is that it carries with it the supreme right of fighting and of changing everything according to the occasion. For where the supreme commander is, there the present opportunity can be met; where he is not, many things must be sought from elsewhere.

§ 2. Otherwise a king will make his commanders more powerful than himself; since they have the army in their hands and are experienced, they can easily bring an unwarlike prince into subjection. Examples of many commanders who cast kings down from the throne show this. For when victory is attributed not to kings but to their ministers, it is dangerous for kings to have powerful, spirited, and popular commanders of war.

§ 3. Let him be present at a battle in which the whole issue is decided; in lesser engagements let war be waged through his commanders. Sarbaras admired Heraclius: "How boldly," he said, "he stands for battle, and alone contends against a multitude, and like an anvil beats back the missiles." This can be done under necessity; otherwise one must never allow the army to be placed in peril in the person of one man. Augustus, as seemed good, either took part in wars or conducted them through his commanders. Suetonius, The Deified Augustus: "Of foreign wars he personally conducted only two in all: the Dalmatian, while still a young man; and, after Antony had been defeated, the Cantabrian. In the Dalmatian war too he received wounds: in one battle he was struck on the right knee by a stone, and in another both his leg and both arms were injured by the fall of a bridge. The remaining wars he administered through his legates, yet in such a manner that in certain Pannonian and German wars he either intervened or was not far away, advancing from the city as far as Ravenna, Milan, or Aquileia." Since, therefore, he ought to take part in battles rarely and without danger, much less does it befit him to put himself upon the road with a few men and reconnoiter the enemy. Theodosius did this when, accompanied by cavalry, he found the enemy--with the greatest boldness, indeed, but also with the greatest danger.

§ 4. If ever the king descends into the battle line, he must be subject to the doubtful chances of battles. Let him therefore either be protected by a guard in some place, or be in a neighboring city. Thus it was done in 2 Kings 18:2: "And the king said to the people, 'I too will go out with you.' And the people answered, 'You shall not go out; for if we flee, it will not greatly concern them about us; or if half of us should fall, they will not care enough, because you alone are reckoned as ten thousand. It is therefore better that you be a protection to us in the city.'"

Writers also blame, not without reason, the rashness of Alexander, because he was accustomed to take part in every battle and to fight with his own hand in the front line. Now, because of the uncertain missiles of engines, much greater care must be taken that he not be wounded in whom lies the danger of all. The saying was more glorious than prudent:

> First to enter the battle with his hand, last to cease from the fight.

And:

> βασιλεὺς τ' ἀγαθὸς κρατερός τ' αἰχμητής.
> A good king and a mighty warrior.

This is to be desired when necessity requires it; otherwise dangers ought not to be summoned against the king, who is the heart of the battle, any more than against the heart itself. In other matters let him maintain equality. Let it be unknown whether a commander or a soldier is marching; let him show that he endures labors, not merely command them. In this matter be cautious. Antoninus Caracalla furnished an example of a good prince, although he lacked constancy in the same conduct. Nevertheless, I judge that the things Herodian writes about him ought to be adopted by a good commander: "He himself," Herodian says, "readily performed every duty of military service whatsoever. If anything had to be dug, he was the first to dig; if a bridge had to be laid over a river, an embankment built, any work of the hands performed, or any labor undergone, he was the first to undertake everything. He was content with a meager table, little wooden cups, and vessels for food; he even ate bread made without care. For he was accustomed to take as much wheat as sufficed for one man, grind it with his own hand, make a lump from it, bake it upon the coals, and eat it. In short, he disdained everything more elegant and used only the cheapest things, such as were most readily available even to the poorest common soldier. Then he preferred to be called fellow soldier rather than prince; he generally made the journey as though himself traveling on foot, and only rarely mounted a vehicle or horse. He carried his own arms himself. Sometimes he even took upon his shoulders the longest military standards, very heavy with many golden ornaments and difficult to carry even for the strongest soldiers."

Trajan too always made the journey on foot with the soldiers and by that affability brought it about that a soldier never mutinied against him, as Dio attests. For the soldier is wonderfully kindled to labor when he sees his labors honored by the emperor's sharing in them.

§ 5. Finally, he avoids the disadvantages which arise from the command of others in wars. Machiavelli correctly enumerates them, but reaches a wholly wicked and impious conclusion. I shall transcribe his words, book 1, chapter 30: "If any prince wishes to avoid occasions for suspicions of this kind, lest he be compelled to be ungrateful toward his own men for their benefits, he must himself take part in conducting affairs, as the first Roman emperors formerly did, and as in our own age the Turk and other princes of distinguished virtue are accustomed to do. For if they are present and conduct the affair splendidly and prosperously, all praise and glory belongs to them. If, while absent, they conduct the affair well through others, then, because the chief praise seems to rest with the man who took part in the business, they think that they cannot enjoy the victory gained according to the judgment of their own mind unless they extinguish the glory of the man through whom the affair was so well conducted; and in this way they become unjust and ungrateful. And although they themselves seem to gain glory from those whom they offend in this manner, nevertheless, if anyone weighs the matter diligently, he will find that they lose more than they gain.

"Although this is so, nevertheless it cannot happen otherwise than that all who through imprudence or negligence remain idle at home, but entrust the administration of affairs to other commanders of theirs, fall into errors of this kind. Nor is there any method of helping them so that they are not borne in the direction in which nature leads them. But the military commander who, after an affair has been splendidly conducted, wishes to avoid his prince's ingratitude must do one of two things. For after he has obtained the victory, he must either immediately hand the army over to another and commit himself as a suppliant to the protection of his prince, and restrain all pride and ambition in himself. By this method alone will he be able to soothe the prince's mind, so that the prince can suspect nothing concerning him but has manifest cause for rewarding rather than injuring him.

"Or, if he does not wish to do this, let him know that he will have an ungrateful prince. He has a single defense by which to protect himself against ingratitude: he must reserve to himself with a courageous spirit the victory he has gained and show that it does not belong to the prince; he must either win over to himself the affections of the soldiers and the chief commanders of the army, or, if there are some whom he cannot win over by kindness, remove them from his path for the sake of protecting himself; contract friendships with neighboring peoples; successively occupy the more fortified places; and strengthen them with garrisons. By this method he will be able to repay an ungrateful disposition in kind. These alone are the methods by which a deserving citizen can take care that he is not oppressed by an ungrateful lord. But because it is so arranged that men do not know how to be either altogether good or outstandingly evil, they know neither how to return the army immediately after the victory has been gained, nor how to conduct themselves modestly and humbly, nor how to employ a certain outstanding and magnificent wickedness. And so, wavering between two extremes, they are crushed."

The first counsel certainly appears safe and is in truth just: that he who has gained the victory should return the army to the man under whose auspices he served. Hundreds of commanders do this today and have done it; but I do not advise them to cast themselves down and become wretched lest they provoke envy. For by that counterfeit modesty of theirs they reproach the prince for his faintheartedness and envy, and offend him more grievously. The second counsel is not only wicked and seditious but also rash. For that outstanding and magnificent wickedness scarcely ever attains a good end. Since the army is well disposed toward the prince, and since noble and military men do not at once change the religious obligation of their oath, he will not be able in a single moment to make them all deserters. And from where will provisions and money be supplied? Consequently, defections of commanders of that kind are rare today; for they can scarcely occur in a well-constituted state if the measures I advised above are observed.

§ 6. No one would readily believe how greatly the presence of the emperor wins men's affections. Tacitus, on Galba: "It was resolved that he should go into the camp; this would be honorable to the soldiers, whose favor, just as it is badly acquired by largess and canvassing, ought not to be disdained when gained through good arts." In this manner there is, most especially, one emperor; for the others depend upon the supreme king and upon others, and are compelled to have their counsels approved by others.

But there is one emperor. Three tribunes with consular power, when each formerly strove toward his own counsels, opened an opportunity to the enemy.

One emperor, moreover, treats matters with few men, and therefore more secret affairs are kept secret, and silence, the foundation of all good counsels, is preserved.

Discuss with many what ought to be done; with the very fewest--or rather with yourself alone--what you are going to do. When Metellus was asked what he was going to do on the following day, he answered that he would burn his tunic if it could disclose the matter.

§ 7. They esteemed the presence of a commander so highly that at times they led not only the unwarlike but even infants into battle.

The Macedonians placed their infant king in his cradle in the front line and conquered the Illyrians. Pity for King Clothar likewise made the Franks brave when they saw the infant, hanging from his mother's breasts, going before them.

The kings of the Persians were not accustomed to take part in battle, although Darius stood against Alexander. It is excessive if a commander is now exposed to blows when the safety of the army is placed in peril in him, or if, should he be captured, the kingdom is burdened by the expense. This happened to France under Francis.

In the year 1381 the Muscovite besieged Neuhusium, a fortress of Livonia, with three hundred thousand men; the prefect of the fortress pierced the commander's heart with an arrow, and the whole army was put to flight. Through commanders Justinian, Charles VI, king of France, the kings of Spain, and formerly Augustus brought very many wars to completion. A king has more duties than that he ought to be occupied with the labors of a commander, unless the danger is great.

CHAPTER XXIV

Military Discipline Commended

§ 1. This discipline is one of morals, exercise, and labor. Our ancestors had the greatest care for morals; and it was said expressly concerning war, Deuteronomy 23:9: “When you have gone out to battle against your enemies, you shall guard yourself from every evil thing.” No one doubts that this must be done even in peace, but especially in war, because in it there are manifold causes of sinning and, at the final peril of life, the soul ought to be prepared for God, lest, if the body falls, the impious soldier be condemned also by the second death. Accordingly, a good emperor will severely and constantly form the soldier who has been levied to virtue, to knowledge, and to military fortitude. For discipline is the most tenacious bond; from it come all triumphs. It was so cultivated among the Romans that they overcame even affection for their children. “The discipline of the ancestors,” Alexander says in Lampridius, “sustains the state; if it falls apart, we shall lose both the name of the Romans and the empire.” For whatever is done without order and art is weak, just as if one should strike a wall with the side of a ram rather than with its head.

§ 2. In antiquity moral discipline consisted chiefly in moderating food, drink, and other pleasures, and in guarding against thefts. They had readily obtainable food: bacon and bread. At times they were compelled to carry provisions for half a month, at times for an entire month. The Turks excel so greatly in this respect that, if they added the other things, they would become invincible. They abstain from wine; when there is an abundance of rice, they easily do without bread. But if rice is lacking, they sustain themselves with a powder which they carry with them, made from salted meat ground small; for they put it into hot water and from it make a porridge effective for strengthening their bodies. Those who are more barbarous feed on the blood and flesh of horses.

§ 3. Their drink was posca, water mixed with vinegar. When the soldiers asked for wine, a brave emperor pointed to the Nile.

§ 4. They are moved by regular signals, and not by others unless necessary for a stratagem. Some signals are vocal, some semivocal, and some mute. The watchword, which they publish by voice, is vocal; trumpets, drums, and pipes are semivocal; standards, dragons, the labarum, and eagles are mute. Trumpeters sound for works or for the soldiers alone; horn-blowers sound when the standards are moved.

§ 5. Free men and slaves alike swore that they would carry nothing away from the camp by theft, and that if they found anything they would bring it to the tribune. The law was severe: let no one seize a chicken, lest a trace remain by which he may be thought to have injured one who was at peace. Frontinus, Stratagems, book 4, chapter 3, relates that a fruit-bearing tree which the laying-out of the camp had enclosed remained on the following day with its fruit untouched. Aulus Gellius, book 16, chapter 4, gives the formula of the oath: “When a levy was held in ancient times,” he says, “and soldiers were enrolled, the military tribune bound them by an oath in these words: IN THE MAGISTRACY OF GAIUS LAELIUS, SON OF GAIUS, CONSUL, AND LUCIUS CORNELIUS, SON OF PUBLIUS, CONSUL, IN THE ARMY AND WITHIN TEN MILES OF IT, YOU SHALL NOT COMMIT THEFT BY MALICIOUS FRAUD, EITHER ALONE OR WITH SEVERAL OTHERS, TO A VALUE GREATER THAN ONE SILVER NUMMUS ON ANY SINGLE DAY; and, apart from a spear, spear-shaft, wood, fruit, fodder, wineskin, leather bottle, and torch, if you find or take up anything there which will not be yours and which will be worth more than one silver nummus, you shall bring it or report it within the next three days to Gaius Laelius, son of Gaius, the consul, or to Lucius Cornelius, son of Publius, the consul, or to whichever of them you wish, whatever you have found or taken up, without malicious fraud; or you shall return it to its owner, whom you judge it to belong to, as you wish what is right to have been done.”

The punishment for theft was to be beaten with a club, according to Polybius. Tiberius punished with death a soldier who stole a peacock, Suetonius, chapter 60. Because of the plundering of a single cock, Pescennius ordered ten tent-companions who had eaten what one man had seized to be struck with the axe, according to Spartianus in his life of Pescennius.

But very much has often been indulged to the soldier. Aurelian's letter has been praised rather than observed: "If you wish," he says, "to be a tribune--indeed, if you wish to live--restrain the hands of the soldiers. Let no one seize another man's chicken; let no one touch a bird; let no one carry off a grape; let no one trample the crop; let no one demand oil, salt, or wood; let him be content with his own ration. Let him have his goods from the enemy's booty, not from the tears of the provincials. Let the arms be polished, the iron tools burnished, and the shoes strong. Let the new garment displace the old. Let him keep his pay in his belt, not in the tavern. Let him put on his neck-chain, armlet, and ring. Let him rub down his own packhorse; let him not sell a captured animal; let him attend kindly to the centurial mule. Let each obey the other as though he were a slave. Let them be treated by physicians without charge; let them give nothing to soothsayers; let them conduct themselves chastely in their lodgings. Whoever starts a quarrel, let him be flogged."

§ 6. Let there be modesty in adornment, so that they appear rough rather than ornamented. For:

> The rough soldier is armed.

Those who are dressed too ostentatiously are sluggish for the works of military service; they fear the rain and take care both for their clothes and for their body. Here a prudent commander will imitate an ancient commander. When Chares saw that in foul weather the soldiers performed the work sluggishly because they were sparing their clothes, he ordered them to exchange clothes with one another. Since no one took account of another man's clothing, the work was quickly completed.

§ 7. The arms, nevertheless, should be polished and strong. Thus were the Silver-Shields; and in this matter especially military luxury is not useless, for in this way they cast their arms away less readily.

§ 8. The camp itself was also clean; the streets were accustomed to be sprinkled and swept.

That cleanliness was a defense against pestilence and contagion, although it is now scarcely ever observed. For this reason camps do not remain long without contagion.

§ 9. Let them abstain from lusts, for since they are generally men of little judgment, most are broken by pleasures. Antigonus consulted the chastity of citizens. For when he had heard, according to Frontinus, book 4, chapter 1, that his son had lodged in the house of a man who had three daughters of distinguished beauty, he said: "I hear, son, that you dwell in cramped quarters, since several masters occupy the house. Take more spacious lodging." And, after ordering him to move, he proclaimed that no one less than fifty years of age should lodge in the house of a mother of a family.

Quintus Metellus did not wish to have his son as a tent-companion, but wished him to earn his standing in the ranks. Rutilius did the same.

§ 10. Exercise is peculiar to Roman valor, because it was greater among them than among any nation. Josephus, book 3 of The Jewish War: "If anyone examines another part of the Roman order in military service, he will see that they possess this great empire as the reward of valor, not as the gift of fortune. For war itself is not for them the beginning of taking up arms, nor do they move their hands only when there is use or necessity, remaining idle in peace. Rather, as though born together with their arms, they never make a pause in exercise and do not await occasions. Their practices or exercises differ in no respect from the true employment of fortitude and boldness, but every soldier is trained daily with all eagerness as though for war. Hence they endure battles very easily and almost without any sense of labor. For neither confusion removes and disperses them from their accustomed order, nor does fear render them stupefied, nor labor weary them. Victory therefore follows them when they fight against men who have not been strengthened in the same way. And surely one would not err who said that their exercises are battles without blood, and their battles exercises with blood."

Hence they obtained the greatest victories with the smallest army; those who trained their men did the same. War therefore belongs not to multitude but to order and discipline. Xerxes complained that he had many human beings but few men, as Thermopylae showed. Who does not marvel that Cyrus began such great affairs at first with fourteen thousand men and Alexander with forty thousand? Epaminondas, with four thousand men, of whom four hundred were cavalry, defeated twenty-four thousand infantry and sixteen hundred cavalry of the Lacedaemonians. Fourteen thousand Greeks who set out with Cyrus the Younger defeated one hundred thousand barbarians and returned through an impassable route against the will of the barbarians.

They were exercised throughout the whole day; every class of soldier was exercised, even the veterans. The younger men trained twice a day, the veterans once. The commanders themselves were exercised. Silius, book 8:

> He himself among their midst gave signs of immense glory to come:
>
> to brandish the stake, to pass in a leap across mural trenches, > and, wearing a breastplate, to break by swimming the billowing ford--
>
>
> such were the spectacles of valor before the battle lines.
>
> Often on swift foot he himself outstripped a horse
>
> whose flanks were pierced, as it flew across the open fields;
>
> often, standing tall, he also cast both stone and spear
> across the breadth of the camp.

Agesilaus led the army around the camp three and four times every day, so that by cutting wood the enemy might be injured and the soldier exercised. The same judgment must be made concerning every kind of exercise, as I also advised above.

When Alexander wished to fill the ditch and make the rampart level at Tyre, he himself was the first to carry a basket of sand. Indeed, they thus won over their fellow soldiers. Livy, book 7, concerning Valerius: "No other man was more familiar with the soldier, because he performed without reluctance every duty among the lowest soldiers. Moreover, in military sport, when equals entered contests of speed and strength with one another, he was amiably ready to conquer and to be conquered with the same countenance; nor did he disdain any man as an equal who offered himself. In deeds he was kind according to the matter; in words he was no less mindful of another's liberty than of his own dignity. And--nothing is more popular than this--he administered his magistracies by the same arts by which he had sought them."

To this pertains what Plutarch says: that in the civil war Pompey, although already an old man and fifty-eight years of age, continually exercised himself among his men both as infantryman and as cavalryman. This indeed is not customary now; soldiers themselves are rarely exercised.

In rain they trained under porticoes roofed with reed or straw. Drillmasters--the παιδοδιδάσκαλοι, "teachers of the young"--arose later.

§ 11. The exercises were of many kinds and were always customarily required--for example, keeping the ranks. Vegetius, book 1, chapter 11: "Nothing must be guarded more carefully on the march or in the battle line than that all the soldiers preserve the order of marching."

There has been a great withdrawal from diligence in exercising, for the command of Augustus and Hadrian was that infantry and cavalry should go out for a march three times in a month. Although this was only one kind of exercise, it is nevertheless agreed that other methods also existed.

§ 12. Running. Vegetius, book 1, chapter 9: "The younger men must especially be accustomed to running, so that they may run upon the enemy with greater impetus; may swiftly occupy advantageous places when the need arises, or forestall adversaries who wish to do the same; may proceed briskly to reconnoiter and return still more briskly; and may more easily overtake the backs of those who flee."

Livy, book 27, says that the legions ran under arms for a distance of four miles. They ran every fifth day. When a run had been proclaimed for the Praetorians, Nero himself carried a shield before them.

§ 13. Accordingly, they ran armed and with their packs. Tullius, in book 2 of the Tusculan Disputations, acknowledges that the exercise of bearing burdens is severe and renders men strong:

"First, you see whence our armies have their name; next, what labor and how great a labor belongs to the column: to carry provisions for more than half a month; to carry whatever a man might wish for use; to carry the rampart-stake. For our soldiers do not reckon shield, sword, and helmet as burdens any more than shoulders, upper arms, and hands. For they say that arms are a soldier's limbs, and indeed they are carried so suitably that, if need should arise, after the burdens have been cast aside, they can fight with their arms made ready as though with their limbs." Virgil too describes the labor of the march:

> Just so the keen Roman, in his ancestral arms,
>
> as he makes his way beneath an excessive burden,
>
> stands in ranks in a camp already pitched
> before the enemy has expected him.

Among their burdens was the carrying of provisions for half a month. At times they carried enough for a whole month: Scipio Numantinus compelled them to carry thirty days' grain, Livy, Epitome, book 57. Sometimes they carried twenty-two days' provisions. Thus Caesar, book 2 of The Civil War: "The legionaries had some supply of grain, because they had been ordered to carry away from Ilerda grain for twenty-two days; the light-shielded troops and auxiliaries had none, since both their means of obtaining it were slight and their bodies unaccustomed to carrying burdens."

Alexander, according to Lampridius, changed the practice, for he ordered them to receive supplies at their stopping places; in enemy territory, in accordance with the ancient custom, they were compelled to carry seventeen days' provisions. At times they carried grain, at times flour, and sometimes twice-baked bread. The case of grain is established, for for this reason they also carried mills with which to break it. Livy, book 24, says that shields, helmets, spears, axes, mattocks, sickles, troughs, and mills were given to Scipio. Without doubt they also prepared flour while they remained in camp or while they were being prepared for a journey, for they did not live for the day alone. Indeed, I would believe that ordinarily they baked loaves unless they were called to a hurried journey. For they were accustomed to carry with them twice-baked bread, which they call buccellatum, according to Spartianus in his life of Pescennius and Ammianus in his life of Julian. The Greeks called them paxamatia. They carried them in leather sacks or upon carrying frames; the soldiers were commonly called "Marius's mules" when they had bound the rampart-stakes to their packs.

§ 14. Riding for a long time, mounting, and dismounting. For whenever the emperor commanded it, it had to be done.

§ 15. Rushing together in the likeness of a battle, chiefly so that they might learn to preserve the ranks. Care for preserving the ranks was foremost among the Romans, for when those are thrown into disorder, the hope of victory also recedes. They ought not to be packed so closely that room for fighting is lacking, nor spread so loosely that they can be broken through. They must also be accustomed to this: that they can change the formation of the battle line upon the moment.

§ 16. Performing works. Corbulo's distinguished saying was that the enemy must be conquered with the mattock. Galba, Suetonius says, strengthened both veteran and recruit by continual work.

§ 17. Fortifying the camp. They did not do this through slaves or camp-followers, but completed the labor with their own hands.

§ 18. They also exercised themselves by swimming. Vegetius, book 3, chapter 4: "In the summer season all must be compelled to swim." Formerly they learned to swim in the Tiber; public pools were also established for this use. Cato taught his son these things, and Augustus his grandsons. Plutarch concerning Cato: "He himself went before and taught his son not only to hurl missiles, fight with arms, and ride, but also to exercise at boxing, endure heat and cold, and overcome and cross by swimming the swirling and rapid currents of rivers."

Suetonius concerning Augustus, chapter 64: "He himself for the most part taught his grandsons both letters and swimming and other rudiments."

In the summer months every recruit alike ought to learn the use of swimming, for rivers are not always crossed by bridges. Plains are sometimes flooded, so that there is need of swimming if they wish to escape. Frontinus.

§ 19. They exercised themselves at the post. Vegetius exhibits the post exercises in book 1, chapter 11: "The ancients, as is found in books, exercised recruits in this manner. They wove rounded shields of wicker after the fashion of latticework, so that the lattice had twice the weight which a public shield was accustomed to have. Likewise, they gave recruits wooden clubs of double weight in place of swords. In this manner they were exercised at the posts not only in the morning but also after midday. For the use of posts is of the greatest advantage not only to soldiers but also to gladiators. Neither arena nor field ever proved a man invincible in arms unless he who was carefully trained was instructed at the post. Individual posts were fixed in the ground by the individual recruits so that they could not sway and projected six feet. Against that post, as though against an adversary, the recruit exercised himself with that lattice and club as though with sword and shield: now aiming as though at the head or face, now threatening from the sides, at times striving to cut down the knees and legs; he advanced, withdrew, assaulted, leapt upon it, and tested the post as though it were a present adversary--with every impetus and every art of fighting. In this practice that caution was observed: that the recruit should rise to inflict a wound in such a way that he himself exposed no part to a blow."

They struck the post not only with a club but also with a heavy pilum. Vegetius, book 1, chapter 14: "But I return to the undertaking. The recruit who is exercised with a club at the post is also compelled to hurl against that post, as though against a man, shafts of greater weight than the real missiles will be. In this matter the instructor in arms attends to it that he should whirl the shaft with great force and direct the missile with an aimed stroke at the post or beside it. For by this exercise strength increases in the arms, and skill and practice in hurling are acquired."

They said that one must strike not with a cut but with a thrust, for that wound opens the vital parts and, if driven in two inches, is mortal. Vegetius, book 1, chapter 12.

§ 20. Vegetius, book 2, chapter 13, seriously determines that skill in arms must be taught. Accordingly, instructors in arms, who are now almost wholly lacking, must be maintained. In the year 648 from the founding of the city, Rutilius, consul in the Cimbrian war, summoned instructors of gladiators from the school of Aurelius Scaurus to train the recruits. But Gaius Caesar trained recruits neither in a school nor through trainers, but in private houses through Roman knights and even through senators skilled in arms.

The fact that they were taught to strike with a thrust made the Roman especially formidable, since they knew that with a sure and aimed stroke he could touch τὰ καιρία--that is, the vital parts.

They were commanded to exercise horses not only on level ground but also among cliffs and ditches, Vegetius, book 3, chapter 2. Thus exercise from boyhood is of very great importance. From youth the Persians exercised themselves in hunting and horsemanship, Herodotus, book 1, and Strabo, book 5. Always girt with a sword, burdened with a quiver, and clinging to their horses, in the height of peace they practiced war. The Gauls were formerly so practiced in war that war was scarcely waged without them, Justin, book 25. Now, as soon as there is mention of war in Gaul, a levy is held for them in Germany and cavalry is sought.

§ 21. Marching in military fashion. Tertullian, To the Martyrs: "Even in peace they already learn to suffer war through labor and hardships: by walking about under arms, running across the field, constructing a ditch, and drying a tortoise."

Vegetius, book 1: "Furthermore, both the ancient custom has remained and provision is made by constitutions of the deified Augustus and Hadrian that three times in a month both cavalry and infantry be led out for a march--for by this word they name this kind of exercise. The infantry, armed and equipped with all their weapons, were ordered to go ten miles at the military pace and return to camp, in such a way that they completed some part of the journey at a more rapid run. The cavalry too, divided into squadrons and armed, similarly completed as much of the journey, so that for equestrian practice they at times pursued, at times gave way, and by a certain wheeling return renewed the charge. Not only on plains but also in sloping and steep places, both forces were compelled to ascend and descend, so that absolutely no event or accident might befall them in battle which good soldiers had not previously learned by continual exercise."

Vegetius, book 1, chapter 11: order cannot otherwise be preserved than if by continual exercise they learn to march swiftly and evenly.

In going and returning they completed twenty miles, and this in five summer hours; at the faster pace, twenty-four in four.

§ 22. Cutting down a forest. For this is necessary not only for making engines, fire, and roads but also for strength and exercise.

§ 23. Leaping over ditches. Plutarch attests that Pompey competed in leaping with the agile. Vegetius too has this exercise in book 1, chapter 9: "The soldier must also be trained in jumping, by which either ditches are leapt over or some obstructing height is surmounted, so that, when difficulties of that kind occur, he can cross them without labor. Moreover, in the clash and contest of missiles itself, the warrior who approaches with running and leaping dazzles the adversary's eyes and terrifies his mind, and inflicts the blow before the other can surely prepare himself either to guard against it or to resist." Sallust records this concerning the exercise of Gnaeus Pompey the Great: "He competed in leaping with the agile, in running with the swift, and with the strong at the lever." For he could not otherwise have been a match for Sertorius unless he had prepared himself and his soldiers for battles by frequent exercises.

§ 24. Striking appointed targets. Those who belonged to the light armament were exercised with shafts, javelins, pila, arrows, and slings; this they called by the single name "armament."

Vegetius, book 2, chapter 15, says that they were called armaturae and exculcatores. The first exercise was to throw shafts and whirl the stake. They did this under the supervision of centurions, and were said to throw "under the vine-staff" (sub vineam iacere).

In former times archers were of the greatest use. A third or fourth part of the young men was exercised in these things; Claudius and Scipio conquered by instituting archers. But now they are of little use, as are slings, which Vegetius sufficiently indicates were for driving off barbarians. They were always exercised in them, lest custom fail. Claudian, on the fourth consulship of Honorius:

> First train the columns with hard exercises, and prepare them for savage Mars;

let neither winter's rest nor sluggish winter quarters

enervate their hands with bodily ease.

See the laws of Theodosius and Valentinian, the law Duces, title On the Office of the Military Judge. Exercise, however, surpasses everything.

To dry the tortoise: in this manner its timbers were rendered stronger. The tortoise has been discussed in its proper place.

§ 25. Exercise is especially fitting for the man who fights for his fatherland and to whom it is not permitted to err twice. "The athlete," Vegetius says in book 2, chapter 24, "the hunter, and the charioteer, for a small reward or certainly for the favor of the common people, are accustomed by daily practice either to preserve or increase their arts. The soldier--by whose hands the state must be preserved--ought more zealously to preserve knowledge of fighting and practice in military affairs by continual exercises. To him falls not only a glorious victory but also more abundant booty, and the order of military service and the emperor's judgment are accustomed to raise him to wealth and dignities. Performers of the stage do not withdraw from their exercises for the praise of the crowd. The soldier selected under oath, whether a novice or already a veteran, ought not to cease from exercises in arms, since he must fight for his own safety and common liberty--especially since this is an ancient and prudent maxim: everything depends upon practice."

Hence it came about that among the Romans exercise in the camp was held more ancient than affection for their children: law Postliminium, section Filius, π., title On Captives.

An army is armed more strongly by nothing than by discipline. Pompey and Trajan were especially powerful through it. Salutary rigor conquers the empty appearance of clemency.

Hence great emperors went before their men. Marius, vigorous in digging and laboring, himself furnished his share of the common work. Antoninus always presented himself first in digging and in constructing embankments and harbors, Herodian, book 4.

Hence also those who were negligent in these indoor exercises were punished.

Those who were more negligent in exercise were compelled to receive barley in place of wheat. Vegetius, book 1, chapter 13: "The discipline of exercise was preserved among our ancestors in such a way that both the instructors in arms were rewarded with double rations, and soldiers who had made too little progress in that rehearsal were compelled to receive barley in place of wheat. Nor was their ration restored to them in wheat until, after furnishing proofs in the presence of the prefect of the legion, the tribunes, or the chief officers, they had shown that they had completed everything which belonged to military art." Plutarch, in his life of Marius, says that the Romans were so hardened by labors that you could see no man sweating or sighing. This was so in the long and laborious battle with the Cimbri. From this it has its name, so that an army is called exercitus, "the exercised body." Hippocrates says truly: "Ῥαθυμίη ὑγραίνει, καὶ ἀσθενὲς τὸ σῶμα ποιέει, πόνος δὲ ξηραίνει, καὶ τὸ σῶμα ἰσχυρὸν ποιέει."--"Idleness moistens and makes the body weak; labor dries and renders it strong." Labor in camp and on the march was great.

Josephus: "They carry a spear and shield; besides these, a saw and a basket, a mattock and an axe, and in addition a strap, a sickle, and a chain." Finally, they carried seven or twelve rampart-stakes apiece. Those stakes, indeed, are useless because of our artillery, except insofar as they can delay cavalry. If anyone could restore the other things, surely he would easily seize mastery of the world. For how great a protection it is that a soldier carries a month's provisions upon his shoulders! Where would an army not penetrate when its provision is at home with it?

Scarcely any common soldier had servants; ten men had one servant in common, who carried the mill and the other things. For cauldrons, the skins of tents, and other things were necessary. They also had some beasts of burden, for many instruments of war must be conveyed.

§ 26. One may well marvel at the ancient diligence in this matter when it is compared with our negligence. Octavius Augustus, in order to overcome Sextus Pompey, exercised his forces throughout the whole winter. Suetonius, The Deified Augustus: "Until, after ships had been built anew, twenty thousand slaves manumitted and assigned to the oar, and the sea admitted into the Lucrine and Avernian lakes, he made the Julian harbor near Baiae. After he had exercised his forces there throughout the whole winter, he defeated Pompey between Mylae and Naulochus."

§ 27. Accordingly, an ancient army, and every army which is rightly constituted, is not a mere multitude. A multitude is rather often harmful; a larger multitude is exposed to more accidents. Vegetius, book 3, chapter 1: "Accordingly, in lighter wars they believed that one legion mixed with auxiliaries--that is, ten thousand infantry and two thousand cavalry--could suffice. Praetors, as lesser commanders, often led this force upon an expedition. But if great forces of the enemy were reported, a man with consular power, as a higher-ranking commander, was sent with twenty thousand infantry and four thousand cavalry. But when an infinite multitude from the fiercest nations had rebelled, then, under the compulsion of extreme necessity, two commanders and two armies were sent with a command of this kind: 'Let the consuls, either one or the other or both, see to it that the state suffers no harm.'

"Finally, since in different regions the Roman people fought against different enemies in almost every year, these numbers of soldiers sufficed for this reason: they judged it more useful to have armies not so large as well equipped with arms. Nevertheless, this proportion was observed, that the multitude of allies or auxiliaries in the camp should never be greater than that of Roman citizens."

The other resources of the legions are worthy of wonder, so that Vegetius deservedly judges a legion to be a self-sufficient city. "A legion," he says in book 2, chapter 25, "was accustomed to conquer not only by the number of its soldiers but also by its iron implements. First of all, it is equipped with missiles which no breastplates and no shields can withstand. For it was accustomed to have one wagon-ballista for every century; for drawing each of these mules were assigned, and for arming or directing it one tent-party--that is, eleven men. For the larger these machines are, the farther and more forcefully they hurl their missiles. They not only defend the camp but are also placed in the field behind the battle line of the heavy armament. Neither armored cavalry nor shield-bearing infantry can withstand their force. There are accustomed to be fifty-five wagon-ballistae in a single legion.

"Likewise, ten onagers--that is, one for each cohort--are carried fully equipped on wagons by two oxen, so that if the enemy should happen to come to attack the rampart, the camp can be defended with arrows and stones. The legion also carries boats hollowed from single timbers, together with very long ropes and at times even iron chains, so that by joining these monoxylous boats together, as they call them, and covering them over also with planks, rivers which cannot be forded without bridges may be crossed without danger by both infantry and cavalry. It has iron grappling-hooks which they call wolves, and iron sickles fastened to the longest poles. Likewise, for conducting work on ditches, it has two-pronged hoes, spades, stakes, rakes, troughs, and baskets in which earth is carried. It also has mattocks, axes, adzes, and saws, with which timber and stakes are shaped and sawn. It has, besides, craftsmen with all their iron tools, who make tortoises, gallery-shelters, rams, covered sheds, as they call them, and even movable towers for attacking the cities of the enemy. But lest still more be said by enumerating individual things, a legion ought everywhere to carry with it everything which is believed necessary in every kind of war, so that wherever it pitches camp it may make an armed city."

CHAPTER XXV

Once Prepared, There Is Need of Speed

§ 1. When arms and men are now prepared, before all things there is need to attack the enemy swiftly and to anticipate report itself. For he who finds the enemy unprepared has attained half the victory. Thus Caesar was a great emperor if ever there was one, and the greatest orator gives testimony concerning him: "This τάχος," he says, "is of incredible swiftness." Plutarch shows the reason in his life of Caesar: "Since he saw that the beginning and first attack of his undertakings required no great force for the present, but that the enemy must rather be anticipated by the terror of boldness and by speed in timing--for the unexpected would strike and drive his adversaries more quickly than if he fell upon them with full preparation--he commanded his tribunes and centurions, armed only with swords and leaving their other arms behind, to occupy Ariminum, a large city of Gaul, with as little bloodshed and tumult as could possibly be."

There is much military prudence in these few words. First, a sudden attack does not require a great force, because it is generally made against unarmed men.

The Athenians went out from their city, celebrated the rites of Minerva, and, with arms concealed beneath their clothing, suddenly devastated the territory of the Lacedaemonians; laden with booty, they returned without a wound, because they had already conquered the enemy before the latter armed themselves. Next, it is agreed that those upon whom men come unexpectedly are struck with consternation by speed. For unforeseen things terrify. Caracalla, though not a good emperor, unexpectedly cut down with great slaughter the Parthians--otherwise a brave people--while they awaited the nuptials. Hence arose that saying: "Delay has always harmed those who were prepared." Caesar taught, both by words and example, that speed surpasses all things in military affairs. Accordingly, when setting out he forbade fires, lest the enemy learn that he was present and lest provisions fail his own men. And so, if you weigh everything correctly, he completed everything through speed. In Spain he conquered Pompey's legates more slowly because, overcome by anger, he had lingered at Massilia:

> Though we hasten toward the western pole of the world,
> there is time to destroy Massilia.

§ 2. If men who are prepared are slow, the greatest part of their preparations perishes. Sudden assailants do not even need preparation, because they are permitted to come upon men while they sleep. By speed Ariston conquered the Athenians, Aemilius the Veientines, and Aruns Hannibal. The speed of Lucius Marcius in Spain was distinguished: for after the Scipios had been slain in Spain, he occupied two camps in the same night. There was no station and there were no guards, and so the Roman entered as though into his own camp. Livy, book 34. Thus Thrasybulus was slain in his own tent through the negligence of the guards.

Amage, a barbarian queen--and indeed the wife of a cowardly king--snatched this praise from very many men. For when the Gersonitae were being oppressed by the king of the Scythians, she took 120 men with her and, after an uninterrupted journey to the palace, killed the gatekeepers and the king together with his friends, and ordered his son to reign justly.

It is therefore less wonderful that Solon, as though in a single assault, armed ships, captured the matrons of the enemy, and stormed the city. Aelian writes the history thus: "By a distinguished stratagem Solon captured Salamis. At Colias the Attic matrons were celebrating the feast of Ceres with gladness and dances. Through a pretended deserter he announced this to the Salaminians. Meanwhile, he ordered beardless young men dressed in women's clothing and carrying swords beneath their garments to conduct dances on the shore in place of the women. The Salaminians came to them and were killed; the young men boarded their ships and occupied Salamis." Aelian, book 8. Julius II suddenly attacked Bologna with equal speed and, armed, struck terror before the neighbors could take counsel. Thus he joined the Spaniard and the Frenchman to himself and held the Venetians suspended in terror. All congratulated him as victor who, had he been defeated, would perhaps have crushed him or, had he delayed, would have deserted him.

CHAPTER XXVI

Military Magistrates

§ 1. Lipsius, book 2 of The Roman Military System, says that military magistrates are of two kinds, common and proper: the common are the commander and the legates; the proper are the tribunes, the centurions, and the prefects of cavalry.

We described the commander previously. Among the Romans, however, he was of two kinds: either he served under his own auspices, when he was king, consul, dictator, or imperator; or under another's, if he was proconsul, propraetor, a man of consular rank, legate, or praetor. Cicero, book 1 of The Nature of the Gods and book 2 of On Divination, is witness that these men did not possess the auspices. They nevertheless had certain imitations of auspices, since a change is easy in superstition. For after sacrificing and taking the auspices they set out for their provinces; hence Scipio in Livy, book 28, attributes auspices to himself--although perhaps he is speaking of those very auspices which were customary in the legions.

§ 2. Commanders had legates. Their institution was that they should assist the commander by work and counsel; for they were πρεσβευταὶ, envoys, and σύμβουλοι, counsellors.

Sometimes the senate named them, sometimes the consul. The commanders themselves selected them for themselves, but not without a decree of the senate, as is established from Cicero's speech Against Vatinius.

§ 3. The duty of a legate was to bring forward for consultation everything which he thought pertained to the affair. Caesar, book 3 of The Civil War: "The functions of a legate and of a commander are different. The one must do everything according to prescription; the other must consult freely concerning the whole issue."

They possessed the insignia of command, Livy, book 29.

There were two for the most part, sometimes more, according as the senate decreed.

In the age of the princes, consular legates commanded entire armies. Men of praetorian rank commanded individual legions; these were also called legates of the legions, ὑποστράτηγοι and ὕπαρχοι, as though subordinate praetors and subordinate prefects. These same men were afterward called commanders.

§ 4. After the legates, the regular dignity was that of the tribunes. There were six in each legion; two at a time commanded in rotation. They administered justice in the headquarters and gave the signal. Livy, book 28: "They permitted the tribunes both to administer justice in the headquarters, and the signal was sought from them." The care of watches, fortifications of the camp, and exercises rested with them.

They therefore commanded not one cohort or a definite part, but the whole legion. Horace: "The Roman legion which obeyed me as tribune."

At first they were appointed by the kings, later by the people. Initially this was arranged so that the people should name six and the commander appoint the rest, whom they called Rufuli. In the year 444 from the founding of the city it was established that sixteen for the four legions should be appointed by the people, and the remaining eight by the consuls. Livy, book 9. Hence there were two classes of tribunes, Rufuli and those elected in the assemblies, and the latter were held in especial esteem. Sometimes men of consular rank were made tribunes. Livy, book 42: "Two consular military tribunes were sent with him." And in a great peril the senate forbade anyone to be made tribune unless he had held a magistracy.

If tribunes discharged their office rightly, they were readily admitted into the senate. Augustus gave the sons of senators a tribunate and a prefecture of cavalry wings, and the right of the broad stripe. From this they were called broad-striped tribunes, just as tribunes taken from the equestrian order were called narrow-striped tribunes.

It must by no means be approved that through canvassing they changed the tribunes every year; for when the emperors' freedmen afterward created six-month tribunes, it was like madness. Juvenal, Satire 8, ridicules them:

> He too grants the honor of military service to many;
> six months' service binds the seers' fingers round with gold.

§ 5. There were also tribunes of cohorts and of cavalry wings. Suetonius, in Claudius: "He so arranged the six-month military offices that after a cohort he gave a wing, and after a wing the tribunate of a legion."

Tribunes of cohorts are named in Caesar, book 2 of The Civil War. In his life of Probus, Vopiscus assigns six cohorts to one tribune; but Lipsius most correctly understands "tribunate" in these cases as "prefecture."

Tribunes possessed the right of golden rings, according to Appian in The Punic Wars.

The prefect of the camp began under Augustus.

§ 6. There were sixty centurions in each legion--that is, two in each maniple. They were appointed by two selections; the man chosen first was considered the more worthy. The centurions chose for themselves οὐραγοὺς, or optiones, who were their assistants, deputies, and subordinate centurions. The man chosen first commanded the right-hand century, the other the left.

Thus Polybius speaks of them in the translation of Lipsius: "From each of the aforesaid classes, except the youngest, they choose according to valor ten leaders of ranks. After these, in a second selection, they choose another ten; and they call all these men leaders of ranks. The man who was chosen first also becomes a participant in the council. These in turn choose an equal number of men whom they call uragi, or leaders of the rear. Thereafter, together with the leaders of ranks, they divide each age or class into ten parts, except for the velites, and to each part they assign from the men already selected two leaders and two uragi. They distribute the remaining velites, as numerous as they are, equally among all the parts. Each of these parts they call a rank, a maniple, and a standard; the leaders themselves they call centurions and leaders of ranks. In each maniple they also choose from the rest two standard-bearers outstanding in vigor of body and spirit. They rightly appoint two leaders in each maniple because, since it is uncertain what any man may do or suffer and military affairs admit no excuse, they never wish a maniple to be without a leader. When both, therefore, are present, the man chosen first commands the right part of the maniple, and the second the left. But when one is absent, the man who remains commands all."

§ 7. Here there are distinguished lessons of true military service and for strengthening spirits.

The first lesson: they choose according to valor, ἀριστίνδην, "by selection of the best," not, as sometimes now and under a declining empire, through favor, money, or other means. Scaeva in Lucan:

> There, promoted through much blood,
> he bears the Latian vine-staff after long service in the ranks.

Those who had not seen a camp used to demand the vine-staff by a written petition. Centurionates were obtained through friends, when:

> Pelopeia makes prefects; Philomela, tribunes.

"The strength of the legions," Vegetius says in book 1, chapter 3, "has been broken by the negligence of earlier times, when canvassing seized the rewards of valor and soldiers were promoted through favor who had been accustomed to be promoted through labor. Next, when tent-companions whose terms of service were complete had been discharged in the customary manner by letters of testimonial, no others were substituted. Furthermore, it is necessary that some should be weakened by sickness and discharged, some desert military service, and some perish through diverse accidents. Thus, unless a crowd of younger men succeeds every year--indeed, almost every month--in the place of those who depart, even a populous army is exhausted."

Although it is not foreign to reason that appointments be made according to the census, and it is agreed from the speech of Maecenas that men were sometimes made centurions at the outset, that nevertheless is rare and fitting only in the bravest and most prudent men, who grasped the rudiments without experience of military service. I believe that this happened among those who, having followed the camp as little children, crawled among the standards and learned the entire order and discipline.

The second: the consuls and tribunes assigned the rank. Since there were several of them and the business was conducted in the army, they could not easily place an unworthy man over brave men.

The third lesson: there was a double selection, so that greater regard might be had for valor.

The fourth: the first-rank centurion stood at the highest dignity. For he was first summoned to council with the legates and tribunes; but in alarming affairs the centurions of the chief ranks were also summoned. Thus Caesar, book 1 of The Gallic War, and book 5. Without doubt the prefects of cavalry were then also summoned; their dignity was greater than that of centurions.

The fifth: the tribunes appointed the optiones, but afterward this was granted to the centurions, so that they might choose brave and faithful men.

The sixth: they select two standard-bearers, for the standards were heavy, while each maniple had one standard. The eagle-bearers did not possess the dignity which our standard-bearers now possess. For the first-rank centurion governed the eagle; in Dionysius, book 10, he is also called prefect of the legion. "In another battle," he says, "in which it happened that the prefect of our legion fell and the eagle came into the enemy's power, I, fighting at the same time, both preserved the eagle and rescued the prefect. Returning thanks to me for this aid, he yielded the command of the legion to me and gave me the eagle." Indeed, he himself tore the eagle from the ground and gave it to the standard-bearer.

The seventh: those who had held the first rank attained the equestrian census.

§ 8. There are ten squadrons of cavalry; in each there are three prefects. The man named first commands the entire squadron; when he is absent, the second commands. Thus Polybius: "They likewise divided the cavalry into ten squadrons. From each they take three men who are to be leaders. These three themselves select uragi, or leaders of the rear. The man chosen first, therefore, commands the entire squadron; the remaining two hold the place of decurions, and thus all are called decurions. When the first is absent, the second assumes the place of prefect of the squadron."

§ 9. The allies had twelve prefects in place of tribunes. Polybius: "When the allies have been joined and assembled together with the Romans, their ordering and government is held by leaders appointed by the consuls. These are called prefects, twelve in number."

They were appointed by the consuls so that they might choose men who were more faithful and hold them bound by a benefit.

Finally, there were ten men in each tent-party. The man who commanded them was called a dean.

CHAPTER XXVII

Other Magistrates in Military Service

§ 1. Among the most ancient peoples of the East, the dignity next to kings was that of the master of the soldiers, such as the one in Genesis 26; in small kingdoms these men were both prefects of the praetorium and magistrates of the camp. The Assyrian also had Holofernes as commander of the army; Joab was over the army of David, who also had very many commanders, one in each tribe. Military service has always been ordered in every state. For an ordered and a disorderly army incur the same expenditures--indeed, the disorderly incurs greater ones--but the ordering was discerned in the magistracy and in the duties of its officers. Among the Romans under the emperors, military magistracies, just like civil ones, were gradually changed.

The admiral--ἀμηράλιος ἡγεῖται, says Codinus, τῆς ὅλης παντός--commands the whole fleet. The grand heteriarch presides over the reception of deserters. The prefect of the legions held nearly the office which the legates formerly held. Vegetius, book 2, chapter 9: "The prefect of the legion was its proper judge, possessing the dignity of a count of the first order; in the absence of the legate, as his deputy, he retained the highest authority. The tribunes or centurions and the other soldiers obeyed his commands. From him the watchword for a watch or for a march was sought. If a soldier had committed some crime, by authority of the prefect of the legion he was assigned by the tribune for punishment. The arms of all the soldiers, and likewise the horses, clothing, and grain allowance, belonged to his care. By his command the rule and severity of discipline, and the daily exercise not only of the infantry but also of the legionary cavalry, were maintained. As a diligent and sober guardian, he himself formed the legion entrusted to him by continual labors for every devotion and every industry, knowing that the valor of those subject to him redounded to the praise of their prefect."

The prefect of the camp was afterward added. Concerning him Vegetius, book 2, chapter 10, says: "There was also a prefect of the camp, who, although occupying an inferior dignity, was nevertheless engaged with matters of no small importance. To him belonged the positioning of the camp and the marking out of the rampart and ditch. The soldiers' tents or huts, together with all the baggage, were attended to at his direction. Moreover, sick tent-companions, the physicians by whom they were treated, and their expenses belonged to his diligence. He took care that wagons, pack-animals, and also the iron tools by which timber is cut or hewn, ditches opened, and a rampart constructed, together with aqueducts, timber or straw, rams, onagers, ballistae, and all the other kinds of artillery, should never be lacking. After long and approved military service, a man most skilled in all these matters was chosen, so that he might rightly teach others what he himself had performed with praise."

Tacitus, Annals 1, says that their dignity was greater than that of the tribunes. The grand stratopedarch presided over the whole army, in order to take care of food and equipment. Cantacuzenus, book 1, chapter 17, mentions the stratopedarch τῶν μονοκαβάλλων, who presided over those who served with one horse.

There was a stratopedarch of the Murtati, who were stationary javelin-throwers; a stratopedarch τῶν θράκων, who presided over the spearmen; and a stratopedarch τῶν τζαγγρατῶν, who presided over the bowmen.

The prefect of the craftsmen had under him all the craftsmen, the arms, the wagons, the sappers, and the others.

§ 2. The dignity of the masters of the soldiers was great. There were five of them in the East; they were also masters of arms. In the West there were two, and sometimes one.

In the fleet the drungarius obeyed the commander alone; he commanded the counts, the admiral, the protocomes, and drungarii of inferior rank.

The magistrates of the cavalry were formerly called τετραρχοὶ, Leo, Constitution 3, §43; he also calls them μεράρχες and στρατηλάτας.

At times triumvirs were created to conduct levies. Livy, book 25, says that this occurred in the Second Punic War, when there was a great scarcity of soldiers.

§ 3. There were also primipili, whose dignity was great; they supplied the grain allowance, according to Dionysius, book 9.

The counts of military affairs were made equal to the commanders of the provinces, Code, title 12, On the Counts of Military Affairs.

There were several of them. At one time they commanded infantry, at another squadrons of cavalry. Some were equal to the masters of the soldiers.

The counts of the schools and of the guards belonged to the offices of the palace.

§ 4. The prefects of frontiers and of soldiers were called commanders. Crispus was one of these, and he made a mockery of commands and powers; for this reason Nero caused him to be drowned in the sea.

The drungarii were afterward held to be higher than commanders and counts. A drungus is Δροῦγγος τῶν ἐκ τριῶν μοιρῶν συγκείμενον ἄθροισμα, an assemblage composed of three moerae, or parts. A meros, or μοῖρα, sometimes contained three drungi. For the names vary.

There is much mention of these men in Maurice and Codinus; the Deacon, book 25, names a drungarius of the watch.

The officers set over the labarum, or λαβάρων, as they were called, carried it by turns. They were fifty in number, according to Eusebius, book 2 of The Life of Constantine. They were men of the highest distinction and equal to men of consular rank, according to the Deacon, book 11.

Officers placed under the tribunes commanded a fixed number of soldiers, according to Suetonius in Otho.

There were also tribunes of the provinces, Cassiodorus, book 12, chapter 34: the tribune of the maritime districts; and tribunes of the praetorian cohorts.

The aphoplistae disarmed private persons so that they might not commit murders; Justinian abolished them in Novel 15. Our people call this office the red staff. After wars, a magistracy for restraining petty brigands is necessary.

They are also commonly called latrunculatores. The irenarchs were similar to these and prevented murders.

The metatores and measurers selected a place suitable for the camp.

> As a bold quartermaster, I shall come into the Hesperian fields.

The judge of the camp, later called κριτὴς φοσσάτων, judged among the soldiers, as the tribunes formerly did.

The camp instructors, ὁπλοδιδάσκαλοι, were present in each legion, as appears in the acts of the Thebans.

§ 5. Whether the evocati should be counted among the soldiers or among the military magistrates might seem uncertain; but in dignity they were equal to centurions, while in status they were private men. They were the most excellent soldiers of every class, who had completed their terms of service but voluntarily served for the sake of their country or of their commanders. Thus Dionysius says: “Among these men was L. Siccius, who commanded a cohort of eight hundred men who were already beyond military age and were not subject to the laws of military service, just as Siccius himself was not. Nevertheless, honoring the man and having received many benefits from him, they were unwilling to desert him when he went to war. And this band was by far the foremost of the entire army, whether in experience of battles or in steadfastness amid dangers.”

They were also taken from the allies, and in great number. Quinctius collected three thousand, and Plutarch calls them σόμωμα, the edge of the battle-line. In this respect those who had many beneficiaries were powerful. Octavian collected ten thousand from the Campanian beneficiaries of his father, according to Appian. He kept these under one standard as bodyguards. Tacitus calls it the standard of the veterans.

They were exempt from duties, unless the enemy had to be repelled. Many enrolled in the hope of commanding ranks. Caesar, book 1 of The Civil War, seems to make them equal to centurions: "He promises four iugera to each man, and a proportionate share to centurions and evocati."

Dio, in Augustus, says that they were permitted ῥάβδους φέρειν ὥσπερ οἱ ἑκατόνταρχοι, to carry rods like the centurions.

§ 6. When the state had been corrupted, almost all military offices passed into disgrace and profit-making. Thus no account was taken of valor, but only of money and vices.

Tacitus, book 4 of the Histories, shows what discipline there then was in the camp and what manner of levy: "At the command of Vitellius, the youth of the Batavians was summoned for a levy. This, burdensome by its very nature, the officials aggravated by avarice and lust: they gathered the old or infirm, whom they might release for a price; on the other hand, they dragged off immature boys conspicuous for beauty--and in most of them boyhood is tall--to be debauched. Hence arose resentment, and the authors of sedition, acting in concert, induced them to refuse the levy. Civilis summoned the leading men of the nation and the boldest of the common people, under the appearance of a feast, to a sacred grove. When he saw that night and merriment had warmed them, he began with the praise and glory of their nation and recounted their injuries and exactions and the other evils of slavery. For there was no alliance, as formerly; rather, they were treated as slaves. When did a legate come, accompanied though he was by a burdensome retinue and with insolent command? They were handed over to prefects and centurions, who, when they had glutted themselves with spoils and blood, were changed, and new pockets and various names for plunder were sought. A levy was at hand, by which children were separated from parents and brothers from brothers, as though for the last time. Never had the Roman state been more afflicted; there was nothing in the winter quarters except booty and old men. They should only lift up their eyes and not fear the empty names of legions. They themselves possessed the strength of infantry and cavalry, Germans were their blood-relations, and the Gauls desired the same thing. Nor would this war be displeasing even to the Romans; if its fortune were doubtful, he would impute it to Vespasian, while no account had to be rendered for victory." Heard with great assent, he bound them all by a barbarian rite and their ancestral imprecations.

CHAPTER XXVIII

The Domestic Soldier Is Preferable to the Foreign; Yet the Foreign Must Not Be Neglected

§ 1. This matter is most difficult not only to treat, but also in practice itself. I see authors go in opposite directions: some wholly recommend τὸ ξενικόν, the foreign soldiery; others, the domestic. Princes follow now the former, now the latter.

Against the foreign soldier, these things are generally said.

First, that foreigners are unfaithful and, when offered greater pay by the other side, cast off both right and divine law.

Second, that they do not obey, cannot be commanded, and cannot be governed--and that when danger is close.

Third, that they flee without shame and are bound by neither fidelity nor affection to the prince or the country, for the soldier is a mercenary.

Fourth, that they have no cause for which they should contribute their blood to another's dominion. Epaminondas exhorted his men to charge the Lacedaemonians, saying that when these had been slain, there would be no steadfastness in the rest.

Fifth, that when they come as auxiliaries, they regard the land as foreign and therefore, whenever they can, ravage the very land which they were hired to defend.

Sixth, that foreign auxiliary soldiers cannot readily be employed; for since they receive their pay from another, they will not be faithful to the man for whom they face danger, but to the man by whom they are supported.

Seventh, that he who wages wars by another's aid is in the power of the man by whom he is assisted. Auxiliary Goths plundered the East and invaded the West. After the Saxons had defeated the Picts and Scots, they possessed Britain.

Eighth, that the mercenary soldier is useless because he does not expose his life for a small stipend. Further, he is either brave or cowardly: if brave, he is to be feared; if cowardly, he is a traitor. Finally, what you give a domestic soldier remains in the kingdom; what you give a foreigner makes your neighbors stronger.

§ 2. Nevertheless, in my judgment many things must be considered in this matter, and at times foreign soldiers must be preferred to domestic ones. Nor must it always be asked what is best absolutely, but what can be done and what, after the circumstances have been considered, must be embraced.

§ 3. Accordingly, it is to be wished that, just as in the Roman state in the time of Romulus and the other kings all citizens were soldiers, so also in kingdoms and cities the care of war should be joined with the arts of peace, so that all citizens may always be prepared both to sustain and to make war and, when it is ended, may be content with the triumph and return to the civil arts. Thus Atilius Regulus asked the senate to permit him to return home to care for his farms, because they had been rather negligently managed by his tenants; and other Roman soldiers laid aside their arms most eagerly.

Yet I do not think such a state can be stable, because no such state has appeared down to the present day which endured for a long time. For even at Rome, although there were many thousands of citizens, nevertheless only a few were enrolled for wars. For what were two or four legions in comparison with two hundred or three hundred thousand citizens?

§ 4. Those who possess extensive kingdoms composed of diverse nations can not only levy soldiers from their subjects, but can also hire them from other peoples. For what we see done today in most kingdoms is no reason why we should condemn it, unless an evident reason persuades us otherwise. Nor do we approve Machiavelli's opinion that no kingdom and no state possesses a lawful ordering of warfare or skill in it. Thus, when the Roman emperor has war against the Turks, he employs not only Pannonian and German soldiers, but Italian and French soldiers also, thinking it contributes wonderfully to victory to exercise in camp the warlike men of every nation. Indeed, this was also the institution of the Romans: they conducted levies from all provinces and always had the auxiliaries of allied kings. Rarely, however, did the beginnings of disturbances arise from them; if anything adverse occurred, it began with the legionaries.

Machiavelli entirely rejects auxiliaries in The Prince, chapter 12, because there is no goodwill in them, they cost much, and they overthrow the prince. The Carthaginians were almost crushed by auxiliaries after the First Punic War. He adds other examples. Philip of Macedon, after the death of Epaminondas, was made commander by the Thebans; when he had gained victory over their enemies, he took away their liberty. When their prince Philip had died, the Milanese resolved to hire Francesco Sforza against the Venetians. After defeating the enemy at Caravaggio, he joined them in order to crush the Milanese, his masters. His father Sforza, while receiving pay from Joanna, queen of the Neapolitans, suddenly deserted her while she was unarmed, so that, to avoid losing her kingdom, she was compelled to cast herself into the arms of the king of Aragon.

If someone should object that the dominion of the Venetians and Florentines had been defended with these arms after the emperors had been driven back, and that their commanders had not brought it under their own power, I answer that the Florentines had a certain fortune favorable to them in that affair. For among their commanders who were vigorous and from whom they would have had something to fear, some suffered adverse battles, some met opposition, and ambition had carried the rest elsewhere. The man who administered the war unsuccessfully was John Hawkwood, whose fidelity could not be known when victory had been lost. But no one will deny that, if he had gained victory, the affairs of the Florentines would have been administered at his judgment. The Sforzas continually opposed the Braccios, each watching the other. Ambition drew Francesco wholly into Cisalpine Gaul, whereas Braccio turned against the state of the priests and the kingdom of Naples.

But let us proceed to what happened recently. The Florentines entrusted command of the war to Paolo Vitelli, a man of distinguished prudence who had acquired a very great name for himself from a private condition of fortune. If he had captured Pisa, no one would have denied that the state of the Florentines would have had to submit to his command. For if he had gone over to serve for pay on the enemy's side, there was no means of escape; if they had retained him, they were compelled to take action at his command.

If the progress of the Venetians is examined, anyone may understand very easily that they conducted themselves most safely and successfully when they waged wars with their armies gathered from the Venetian people. This was their custom before they turned their zeal toward expeditions on land. At that time, equipped with arms from the patrician order and the urban common people, they conducted themselves with the greatest bravery. But as soon as they began to wage war on land, they neglected this valor and followed Italian customs. At the beginning of the enlargement of their dominion on the mainland, both because they had not yet extended the boundaries of their state very far and because they were held in great esteem, they had no reason to fear greatly for themselves from their own commanders. But when the boundaries of their dominion had been extended and Carmagnola was made commander of the army, they then obtained a specimen of this error. For when they had recognized him as a most vigorous commander, after they had beaten the petty ruler of Milan under his leadership, but then saw him become more remiss in waging war, they judged that they would obtain no further victory with him as commander. Therefore, lest everything already gained be lost, they neither wished nor were able to dismiss him. Accordingly, to render themselves safe from him, they killed him. They then appointed Bartolomeo of Bergamo, Roberto Sanseverino, the Count of Pitigliano, and others of this kind commanders of their forces. With these men as commanders, it was to be feared that they would bring injury to their state sooner than advantage. This is what occurred in the war fought at Vailà, where in a single engagement with the enemy everything acquired by so many labors over three hundred years perished. With these arms only slow, late, and slight increases of affairs are made, but sudden and unforeseen losses and calamities break forth.

Yet, since we see that mercenary soldiers are now employed everywhere, it must not be thought that amid so great a desire for victory no state follows what is most prudent. Foreign auxiliaries must nevertheless be used with moderation. The Venetians appoint one of their own as commander at sea; they themselves pay the mercenary soldier on land through their own men; they join associates and councils to the commander; from the council chamber they themselves direct the wars; and they especially desire to prolong them, so that they may wear out the enemy by expense and not readily bring the matter to the hazard of battle.

Auxiliaries given by a more powerful man are pernicious unless he is faithful, as when you summon the Turk to your aid, as the Greeks did. But if they come from a faithful kinsman, they are salutary. Julius II summoned Ferdinand of Spain; Ferdinand now summons Philip, and he summoned him against the Venetians, yet he did not lose a foot of his land through him. Thus, where there are fidelity, fear of God, common advantage, friendship, affinity, and kinship, they readily take up arms against common enemies or common objects of suspicion. For it concerns the Spaniard as much that Bohemia be defended as that Italy be defended.

§ 5. First, in sedition and civil war most men employ foreign soldiers. Pompey brought barbarians from Asia, Caesar Gauls and Spaniards; the Caesars found foreigners most faithful to themselves. Now also foreigners serve in Belgium--Germans, Gauls, English, Scots, Irish, Italians, Epirotes, and Swiss; the Swiss too are hired by many for garrison service abroad. Princes must not be accused of tyranny for this reason. For when their own people sustain factions and conspire to violate the safety of the prince, the princes can by merit and right defend themselves with a foreign garrison. Nor do kings alone do this; states themselves also say that they protect the liberty of their citizens with a foreign garrison. The Batavians station French and British garrisons throughout their notable towns to keep their own citizens obedient. They would by no means do this unless they judged that it had been prudently devised against internal movements and foreign wars.

The arguments advanced by Machiavelli and others are not in truth of great weight. They say that the foreigner is unfaithful: πᾶν τὸ ξενικὸν, every foreign body, is of wavering fidelity. I indeed admit that many examples of foreign perfidy can be recounted, and that the Roman Empire was overthrown through Goths, Alans, and others who had come as auxiliaries. But there are more examples of domestic perfidy. Sulla alone brought more injury than all the barbarian multitude poured into the city by Alaric. Indeed, it was not so much the foreign auxiliaries as the perfidy of their commanders together with them.

For this reason auxiliaries must not be summoned from every nation, but from one among which laws and treaties, both public and private, are sacred. Thus no Christian prince summons Turks, Tartars, or Muscovites to his aid; for they are ἄσπονδοι, without treaty, and are especially glad when they have deceived with perjury. Constantine summoned ten thousand Turks into Greece. After they had gained victory, they refused to depart, and from this flowed the causes of many calamities. Hiero of Syracuse, when he saw that his mercenaries were growing insolent, so that he could neither retain nor dismiss them without danger, employed a stratagem and killed them all. This was cruel and harsh, but they had deserved it.

Second, foreigners generally obey more readily and fight more bravely, since they place the hope of their safety in the favor of the prince alone and in victory.

Third, shame also restrains foreigners from flight, because they do not wish to be seen as cowards by foreigners or by their own people, to whom they would have to return without glory.

Fourth, I do not know whether you will more easily find a man prepared to establish the dominion of a foreign prince over others than one prepared to fight for the power of his own prince over himself. Thus it was done formerly: foreigners established Roman dominion. As the Romans grew in power, they had allies whom they gathered at the same time, as Polybius says: “At this very time the consuls give notice to the magistrates of the allied cities in Italy from which they wish to have auxiliaries and fellow soldiers, and inform them of the number, the day, and the place at which the men whom they select must assemble. The cities, making a levy similar to that already described and likewise binding the men by oath, send them and appoint a prefect,” and so forth.

The Romans, when they were pressed by the most grievous war of Hannibal, hired auxiliaries for pay, that is, the Volones. Tome 1, book 2: Μεταστάντας δὲ ἀπὸ Καρχηδονίων Γαλάτας, ἢ ἄλλους τῶν σφῶν συμμάχων τινάς, οἱ Ῥωμαῖοι ἐπὶ μισθοφορᾷ ἀπεστελάβοντο, μήπω πρότερον τρέφοντες ξενικόν. The Romans hired for pay the Gauls who deserted from the Carthaginians and certain others of their allies, although previously they had not been accustomed to maintain foreign soldiers.

Fifth, foreigners plunder more readily, since they are moved less by affection for the country and by a sense of shame; citizens, however, are more skillful, being acquainted with the places and circumstances. Accordingly, the things said against auxiliary soldiers are empty, for provision against them can be made with little trouble. Although they receive pay from another, since they nevertheless receive it on your account, they will also esteem you greatly. One must, however, take care not to seek auxiliaries from a suspect man, lest he impose a bridle upon the victor. Thus the most faithful σύμμαχος, ally, is the one whose interest it is that you conquer and be as powerful as possible.

§ 6. A commander must take great care that foreign auxiliaries do not possess more strength in the camp than his own men. Scipio experienced this in Spain: he hired the Celtiberians with money, but when the enemy corrupted them with other money, he was crushed.

CHAPTER XXIX

Certain Regular Soldiers Must Be Maintained

§ 1. Although Servius instituted the order of the classes, the Romans at first nevertheless did not have regular soldiers. Rather, when the country had to be defended or a war waged, they conducted levies. Later, however, as their dominion increased, they maintained regular and permanent legions, and even praetorian soldiers for the protection of the prince. The Greeks had already done this formerly, and the orator of the Athenians recommended it. For Demosthenes, in Oration 4, thought that four legions should be maintained permanently.

§ 2. Great care must be applied so that there may be a supply of regular soldiers; for wars ordinarily arise suddenly and last a long time, and therefore there is need of a remedy that is swift and enduring. Hence Augustus, after surveying the whole mass of the empire, established regular soldiers, and this was preserved by his successors.

I see that practice concerning a permanent soldiery has varied greatly in many kingdoms, especially in France. Gregory of Toulouse, in his book On the State, says: "There are also many other disadvantages of foreign arms. Charles VII, king of France, considering these, after the English had been driven from the kingdom, established a regular soldiery of fifty thousand infantrymen, who, supported by continuous pay, were to devote their labor to military knowledge and meanwhile to assemble more readily against every incursion, while other men were being levied if greater forces were required. But because such men were devoted to brigandage, they were abolished by Louis II, who took Swiss guards into their place as attendants at his side. Again, however, Francis I, the king, mindful of the dangers to which Gaul had been exposed by foreign auxiliaries, restored in the year 1534 the legions of fifty thousand infantrymen; and when these afterward had been almost entirely extinguished, his son Henry II restored them, though without great advantage to the kingdom because of their undisciplined ordering."

Nor are there lacking men who judge that it is also not expedient for princes to employ their subjects in war, because arms make subjects fierce and therefore cause them more readily to raise their crests in rebellion. For they promise themselves everything from the strength of the sword and of arms, as examples still surviving in France and Flanders show.

§ 3. Honor must be paid to the regular soldier as one who is solicitous for the repose and peace of all. From this the whole nobility formerly had its origin. But it is that soldier who must be supported who serves as a defense, is exercised under good discipline, and is not permitted to rest or be idle. For the evils which arose from such soldiers flowed from another source.

The whole evil, I say, arose from neglected discipline. For if they were kept occupied with some work in different places and supported with moderate pay, they would easily protect even a great kingdom; indeed, they would render it unconquered.

§ 4. They must certainly be kept to their duty; otherwise they become burdensome to princes and intolerable to subjects. For arms give men the spirit to inflict injury; and because they put their lives in danger, they think they have earned everything. If they have failed to extort anything, they are more savage than enemies.

§ 5. They must also be exercised in time of peace; otherwise they very quickly grow feeble through idleness. Thus the garrisons of the present day are not schools for soldiers, but sources of corruption.

Agesilaus exercised his soldiers in the gymnasium and offered rewards for valor. Alexander ab Alexandro, book 1, chapter 20. Philip likewise exercised the Macedonians diligently. They often completed three hundred stadia under arms, carrying all their weapons, provisions, and utensils for sustenance.

§ 6. They must be stationed in different places, both because in that way they are a protection to more people and less burdensome, and so that they cannot conspire. For they do not perceive their own strength unless they are gathered together. When they have formed a marching column, they are terrifying.

§ 7. It is also a prudent policy to join together men of different nations. In this way they cannot easily conduct intercourse or enter into a conspiracy.

§ 8. Nevertheless, it is fitting that at times they should assemble together once, twice, or on some other occasion, to display valor or skill and to encourage mutual emulation.

CHAPTER XXX

The Division of the Roman Soldiers

§ 1. Polybius describes the division of the ranks in this manner: "When the tribunes at Rome have administered the military oath, announcing to each legion the day and place at which they are to assemble, and that without arms, they then dismiss them. But when they have appeared on the appointed day, the tribunes select from among them especially the young and poor for the velites; those nearest to them, for the hastati; those most flourishing in age, for the principes; and those greatest in age, for the triarii. For so many and such distinctions both of names and of ages and of arms exist among them in each legion. They divide them in such a way that the oldest in age, whom they call the triarii, are six hundred; the principes, twelve hundred; the hastati, the same number; and the rest, who are also the youngest in age, the velites. But if the number is greater than four thousand, they divide them proportionately, with the exception of the triarii, whom they always keep at the same number."

The reason why the triarii remained at the same number was that their dignity was great and their dangers rare. Therefore, lest they keep the most excellent part of the soldiery in the battle-line without employment, they did not wish it to be increased, although the other ranks were increased.

At this point I cannot pass over in silence what he says: that τῶν ἀνδρῶν τοὺς νεωτάτους καὶ πενιχροτάτους εἰς τοὺς γροσφομάχους, the youngest and poorest of the men, were chosen for the velites.

Here regard was had both to age and to wealth. Lipsius thinks that poor men who were strong in age and experienced were chosen for the triarii. But in the case of men who were very poor, or the poorest, I would deny it; and he himself agrees. They were certainly selected according to the census, and this practice continued for a long time. The objection was made against the Romans: "You select your cavalryman according to the census and your infantryman according to the census," Livy, book 37. In this respect, therefore, the institutions of the Lacedaemonians, in which particular regard was had for valor, are more pleasing. This practice harmed the Roman state very greatly. From it also arose the difficulties of levies, when men were unwilling to answer to their names and refused military service.

Indeed, I possess both a reason for my opinion and the approval of a commander of the greatest name. The reason is that, although, when pay was being given, it was humane for the sixth class to be exempt from service except in a great emergency and tumult, it was nevertheless a great error in a state devoted to military service and living amid perpetual enemies to give freedom from service to so great a multitude, especially when the state itself possessed the right of commanding magistrates. How many brave, active, and industrious men, who clamored for arms and Mars, is it credible there were among them? Certainly the whole of history bears witness that there was a very great multitude of poor men at Rome. Yet now the poorest men, made velites, stand foremost and are exposed to the enemy as light-armed soldiers.

For this reason Marius, as Sallust writes in the Jugurthine War, "enrolled soldiers not according to the custom of the ancestors nor from the classes, but as each man desired, for the most part men counted by the head." Behold Marius, a great commander in the most dangerous wars, changing the custom of selecting soldiers which had been practiced for so many years through the ambition of the rich: passing over the rich, he selected those counted by the head. These, according to Aulus Gellius, book 16, chapter 9, are the men assessed at no property or at exceedingly little. Plutarch also relates this: "When declared consul, he splendidly held a levy at once contrary to law and custom, enrolling very many men from the poor and from the servile class, although earlier commanders did not accept men of this kind but gave arms, like any other honorable thing, only to honorable and worthy men, since each man seemed to pledge his family property as a security."

He adds freedmen and the sons of freedmen. Macrobius, Saturnalia, chapter 11, teaches that this was retained in the Social War and proved worth the labor: "In the Social War, the service of twelve cohorts enrolled from freedmen displayed memorable valor."

Indeed, afterward poor men for the most part went to serve as soldiers and gained both property and reputation. The legions themselves indicate this fact: when their terms of service had been completed, they received lands, so that after exhausting labors they might not waste away in a destitute old age. In this manner, therefore, better provision was made for the state. For this reason also I approved above more strongly the levy of volunteers.

The velites, accensi, and rorarii, therefore, were not to be selected in this manner according to the census. Because they were going to be the bravest and most ready men in battle, they were thus being neglected.

§ 2. The hastati were so called because in ancient times they fought with spears, but afterward with pila and swords. That was a heavy manner of service and not of great use, since, when two pila had been cast in vain or received upon shields, they immediately came to swords. The hastati were young men. Livy, book 8, calls them "the flower of young men reaching maturity"; the principes, however, were mature men--Livy calls theirs the more robust age. From this you may gather that rich men, although recruits, were not among the velites.

§ 3. The triarii were so called because they sat down in the third rank or battle-line, or, as Varro says, were posted as a reserve in the last positions. They were weighty in age and in courage. They sat with one knee firmly bent. They were formerly called pilani; they numbered six hundred. With them were the eagle and the commander, the picked and extraordinary men, and also the evocati.

I see that our commanders have preferred another arrangement. For they place each of the bravest men in the first battle-line and in advantageous positions, whereas among the Romans the bravest rarely fought. Sometimes the velites, often the hastati, and ordinarily the principes routed the enemy; the greatest danger was announced when the affair had come down to the triarii. In arranging this rank, therefore, the rich consulted more for their own safety than for the public good, and wished the dangers to belong to the poor and the younger men. Yet it had this advantage, that very rarely was the whole battle-line put to flight. For when the younger men had been slain or had fled, the triarii, who possessed strength and courage, remained steadfast; but if they had received defeat at the beginning, the younger men would have scattered swiftly from fear alone. For it is easier to possess a soldier who fights bravely than one who, having seen defeat, does not flee.

This entire multitude, properly composed, was called a legion by the Romans. In it the velites, hastati, and principes numbered twelve hundred each; the triarii, six hundred. The total number of all was four thousand two hundred. If the legion was larger, the fixed number of triarii remained, while the others were increased in equal proportion, as has been said. The legion of Romulus consisted of three thousand; it did not have the velites separated from the rest.

§ 4. Another division of these soldiers is into maniples and cohorts. Polybius describes it in this way: "After this, together with the leaders of the ranks, they divide each age or class into ten parts, with the exception of the velites. They distribute the velites, however numerous they are, equally among all the parts. And they call each one of these parts a rank, a maniple, and a standard." There are thirty maniples: each class is divided into maniples.

> Thence Romulus divided the hundred Fathers into groups of ten, > and established ten companies of hastati.
>
> The principes had the same number of companies, the pilani the same, > and likewise those who served on duly allotted horses.

The velites were distributed equally among these. There were four hundred in each rank and forty in each maniple. A maniple consists of one hundred and twenty men, while a century consists of sixty. This applies to the hastati and principes; for the triarii are half their number. This is without the added velites; if you add these, there will be one hundred and sixty in each maniple and eighty in each century.

A cohort is constituted from three maniples--one of hastati, another of principes, and a third of triarii--with a maniple of velites added; there are four hundred and twenty men, like a small legion, for it contained all the kinds of the legion. Cohorts were named from a rustic enclosure. They were sometimes detached and stationed in garrisons where it was not necessary for an entire legion to reside. The Greeks call them σπείρας, and sometimes ἴλας, as if you were to say wings. At the beginning, however, maniples existed without distinction, and consequently cohorts did as well. For one hundred men, before whom a pole bearing a bundle of hay was carried, were called a maniple. Ovid, Fasti 3:

> A long pole bore suspended bundles,
> whence the manipular soldier has his name.

There are therefore ten cohorts in a legion. Romulus made a legion of three thousand men and then doubled it after the Sabines had been admitted. Scipio, Marius, and other ancestors made the legions larger.

There were three hundred cavalrymen divided into ten squadrons, each of which contained thirty.

§ 5. If we consider the infantry, the allies had the same number, but twice as many cavalrymen. They were stationed on either side, at the right and left. From the six hundred cavalrymen of the allies they called the third part extraordinary men, ἐπίλεκτες, picked men. Concerning them Polybius says: "The prefects first select from all the allies the men most suitable for the personal service of the consuls, both cavalrymen and infantrymen, whom they call extraordinary men. Interpreted, this means 'picked men.' The whole multitude of the allies, however, is as a rule equal in infantry to the Roman legions and double in cavalry. From these they take approximately a third part of the cavalry and a fifth part of the infantry for the extraordinary men. They divide the rest into two parts and call one the right wing and the other the left wing."

A portion of the extraordinary men, who were called the selected, always attended the commander. It was prudently done, first, that they divided the allies on either side for the sake of security. Second, they selected extraordinary men from both the infantry and the cavalry--that is, each man most ready and likely to dare something--and from these very men the selected, who under the appearance of honor were, as it were, hostages around the consul.

Later the number of the allies was much greater; and in the end we see legions enrolled first from Italy and finally from the whole empire. They call the forces of the allies horns and wings even when they speak of infantry.

CHAPTER XXXI

Cavalry Contributes More to Victory than Infantry

§ 1. This matter must be considered generally; for in certain wars cavalry is scarcely of any use, while in others cavalry accomplishes everything. When cities in mountainous places, or beside rivers and seas, are besieged, and when the contest is conducted by siegeworks, cavalry is not of great use. We are speaking, therefore, of war and battle, in which I affirm that the man who abounds in cavalry will easily become superior.

There are many reasons. First, the man who is preeminent in cavalry holds both his own territory and that of the enemy in his power. He conveys supplies freely, prevents all excursions and foraging expeditions by the enemy, and keeps him, as it were, in loose confinement. The Ottomans place the whole hope of their kingdom in the timariots, who constitute their cavalry and are able to harm the enemy especially when, in a great number which no one can resist, they rush into hostile land and in one assault produce the devastation of a full-scale war. The Tartars, and formerly the Huns, were very powerful through the same means.

It makes no difference to the argument that, as men say, heavy expenses must be incurred for cavalry; for a smaller number of infantrymen ought rather to be selected, and the expenses are compensated by the speed of the war. The expense can also be diminished if the cavalry become accustomed to live from enemy territory, which is easy for those who are superior.

In assaults upon cities and other stationary engagements, cavalrymen were also accustomed to dismount and fight as infantry. With the present license of soldiers, however, a commander will hardly accomplish this. But when a storm of cavalry was hurled forward in battle, the enemy quickly sought flight. In battles themselves, when cavalrymen are compelled to give ground, the infantrymen, as though abandoned, look only to flight.

CHAPTER XXXII

Camps Arranged According to the Custom of the Ancients

§ 1. It is agreed among all that the ordering of the Roman camps was most excellent. Lipsius describes it most accurately in book 5 of The Roman Military System. This is a schematic outline of it, in which I note these matters briefly.

1. The praetorium occupies the place most suitable for observation and command, and is in the midst of the commanders. They mark out for the commander a square place whose sides are two hundred feet long.

Here the commander's tent-companions, baggage, and other things were quartered. Around it were the quaestor, the legates, and the tribunes.

2. The quaestorium was on the right, two hundred feet long and one hundred feet wide.

3. The legates were stationed to the left of the praetorium, with their tents joined together; its length was one hundred feet and its width fifty feet.

4. The tribunes and prefects pitched their tents in a straight line behind the praetorium, each in a separate tent, so that all might have their own legion in view. Lipsius places the prefects of the allies at the sides and gives good reasons for it, though he thinks that they were placed without intervals.

The cavalry among the evocati were beside the prefects of the allies, and the infantry close to them. The extraordinary cavalry and infantry were stationed across the open space toward the rampart. Lipsius arranged this most prudently. Behold: they wished to entrust the protection of the chief commander and the other commanders to the allies. Why, unless so that, by trust thus placed in them, they might bind their fidelity more closely? But there was also another, more hidden reason: they kept the chief men of the allies near themselves, before their faces and eyes, lest they secretly form any plan or undertake an innovation.

Although these men surround the commander on every side and hold him under guard, it is nevertheless not so arranged that there is no citizen protection if it is needed. For the evocati, veteran soldiers, are on either side; there are several hundred men in his own tent-company; the quaestor and legates sit nearby with their men; and the tribunes are stationed in front, among whom there is always a refuge for him and, through them, a passage into the midst of the legions.

Another consideration is that the spaces here are large and empty. Why? Either for dignity or for usefulness. For dignity: there are the two forums, where, if any dispute or injury arises, those who can settle or punish it are near at hand. For usefulness: there is the great Quintana, because, if it is necessary to draw up the army within the camp, that can be done very easily there and in both forums. Likewise, if the army must be led out, when the extraordinary troops have been removed and set aside to the flank, there is a great space for arranging it. The rest of the distribution is clear to sight.

Lipsius places the velites near the rampart. Its system of foot-measurements must also be carefully noted here, though it does not apply to our camps. "I call podismi," he says, "footages, or measurements in feet. But because the foot is twofold, simple and great, we shall use both: the former in measurements of length or breadth, and the latter in measurements of both together. For in Varro a great foot is that which others call flat or spread out, and which our people commonly call square or superficial."

Those who relate that the Romans received this system from Pyrrhus seem to me to err; for before the war which they waged with Pyrrhus, I read of camps, a rampart, and all the rest. It is certain, however, that the Persians or Parthians instead borrowed many things from the Romans. They excelled to such a degree that they carried empty sacks with them and, in sandy places, filled them with sand to place them in front of the rampart.

§ 2. Our camps are arranged altogether better, and those who mark them out take the greatest account of the sites. Bernardino de Mendoza, part 1, chapter 36, requires so great a distance between the legions that other soldiers can be brought in if necessity demands. He also so arranges the camp that the standards stand at a definite interval, by which each man may easily find his own. He then creates greater spaces at the front and sides than existed among the ancients, chapter 36. He separates the watch station eighty feet from the standard. He places the king in the center.

There are still appointed inspectors of the rounds, although they also employ the labor of others. Those who are general inspectors and traverse the entire camp must know the languages of the nations serving on watch.

The master of the artillery resides near the commander, as do those assigned to the engines. The market for saleable goods must be neither far from the prince nor far from the judge of capital cases, because many disputes arise there. Men are generally grouped according to nations, so that individual nations occupy separate places. Mendoza orders the cavalry to be divided in the same way, so that the armored and light cavalry are separated; disturbances otherwise arise easily.

The fortifications which Mendoza describes yield little to the ancient ones. First, he orders a ditch to be dug down, and it is fitting that a rampart from the excavated earth be added. He orders the inner side of the ditch to be fortified with wagons. This fortification is stronger than the stakes of the ancients, for men could tear down a rampart with their hands, but by no means wagons. Artillery and loads, useful for offense and defense, can also be placed upon the wagons. I marvel that those who admire everything ancient do not understand that fortifications made from wagons are stronger and more convenient than the ancient ones were--not only because they are stronger, but also because they are movable and useful on a march.

Above all things the gunpowder must be guarded most carefully, not by gunners, who always need a burning match, but by spearmen and men bearing double axes.

Great care is taken concerning the gates, so that the soldiers can depart in complete ranks. The road which leads to the watering-place must also be wide, lest those going and returning hinder one another. If a river flows through the camp, this is greatly useful; nevertheless, provision is made so that the livestock are watered at a lower place or outside the camp, while the upper part is kept clean for the soldiers' uses.

Great account is also taken of the watches. Toward evening those whose duty this is come to the commander--indeed, most of the chiliarchs and centurions. At night the heavy-armed soldiery generally keeps watch, because greater protection is necessary.

Among prudent and resolute commanders the order of watches is very advantageous to security and health. A fourth part of the camp keeps watch; three parts rest. Therefore, if there are twenty thousand men in the camp, five thousand keep watch. Because armored soldiers and veterans are among them, this is a force great enough against sudden assaults. Nor is it burdensome for anyone to provide for the repose of the rest by his own labor every fourth day.

The watches are led out in the evening, lest the enemy discover the place where the advance sentries take their positions. The watches are ordinarily thirty paces from the ditches and rampart; the advance sentries are as far from them again as allows them to remain in sight.

Watches of cavalry are spread all around, so that no one can secretly enter or leave the camp. The watchword is not given to the advance sentries until they have taken their places.

Because camps are not always arranged in the same manner, but account is taken of hills, rivers, roads, and forests, provision is made in another manner lest men err on the roads or in finding the praetorium and other advantageous places. When cohorts have been stationed by tent-companies, the tribunes, centurions, and decurions immediately take care to traverse and observe those roads, and then the other soldiers do so. This is accomplished most readily when the standards are displayed and there is no great variation in the camp.

This must be attended to especially: not merely a good place but the best place must be selected for the camp. For if you pass it by, the enemy will take it, and thus you will be inferior to him because you have given him an opportunity against you.

CHAPTER XXXIII

Fortifications of Camps Are Necessary

§ 1. It has often seemed unworthy to our commanders to cherish a camp and place their trust in a rampart.

Thus at times they station even the greatest armies in an open field without any fortification. The Romans did not do so. Concerning them Polybius says that everything was ordered and fortified after the fashion of towns. These are the words of Polybius: “When these things have been established in this way, the whole shape of the camp becomes an equilateral square. Its parts, both in the division of the rows of tents and in their other arrangement, have an ordering like that of a city. They separate the rampart itself from the tents by two hundred feet on every side. This empty space supplies them with many notable advantages. It is suitable both for the departure and for the entrance of the troops--for individual bodies go out into this empty space beside their own rows of tents, and do not run together in confusion and trample one another. They also drive or carry into this place the livestock brought in and the booty captured from enemy territory, and guard them there during the nights. Its chief advantage, however, is that during assaults at night neither fire nor missile reaches them, except for a few; and even these are made almost harmless, both by the extent of the interval and by the tents placed around it.

“The two sides of the ditch and rampart which lie beside the two wings of the allies fall to the allies to construct; the other two fall to the Romans, one to each legion. Each side is divided among the maniples; the centurions have the care of the individual parts, and the men assist them. Two of the tribunes have the inspection of the whole work.”

You see everything fortified here. The soldiers are two hundred feet distant from the rampart, and the rampart and ditch themselves occupy enough space for them to be altogether safe.

§ 2. The allies constructed two sides and the legions two. The centurions measured them with ten-foot rods. The tribunes go around and do not depart until the entire work has been completed. The work of the rampart was of this kind: they first drew a ditch along the outside. Tibullus:

> Where it is fitting to draw before the camp a protecting ditch.

They dug it down so that it was eight feet wide and equally deep, so that, if an enemy leaped into it, his whole body would be below the earth. Its width was such that no one could leap across it. When a greater force was feared, it was made wider and deeper. Vegetius, book 3, chapter 8, says that at times it was nineteen feet, although the depth was not then equal to the width.

On the inner side of the ditch was added a rampart made from stakes and turf, or heaped earth, three or four feet high. The measure of each turf was half a foot in height, one foot in width, and one and a half feet in length.

But in danger, and I believe in winter camps, the mound was much higher. This followed naturally if the ditch was greater, for the mound grew from the earth taken from it. Book 3 of The Civil War: “In that place there was a ditch fifteen feet wide, and a rampart facing the enemy ten feet high; the mound of that rampart likewise extended ten feet in breadth.” The palisade stake was branched and sharpened, so that it could not easily be torn up or crossed. Thus camps were placed behind stakes fixed in the manner of very sharp sword-points.

It would be most useful to resume even today this method of fortifying camps, or to retain another equal to it. For the soldier rests safely and is not disturbed at a noise, being secure in the fortification of the place; this contributes very greatly to strength and health. Further, since a camp can be defended easily, it will be possible, even when the enemy is nearby, to send a force elsewhere as opportunity requires. Claudius Nero does this in Livy: leaving a garrison in the camp, he goes on a long march to meet Hasdrubal, defeats him, and returns to camp. He could not have done this unless the camp had been fortified. Third, far fewer soldiers are worn down by sentry duty.

§ 3. There was one gate in each side. The praetorian gate, which stood beyond the praetorium and faced the enemy, was the gate through which the army was led out into battle. Next were the two principal gates, because they corresponded to the principia. Finally, there was the decuman gate, because the tenth cohorts pitched their tents there.

Not content with this fortification, they at times also added towers. The History of the Gallic War, book 8: "He placed doors and higher towers upon the gates." Josephus, book 3 of The Jewish War, says that towers were positioned around the circuit; and at Numantia Scipio placed them at intervals of one hundred feet in every iugerum. Finally, there was often a double rampart and a double ditch.

§ 4. Those works were not difficult because of the multitude of those who performed the fortification. One side of the camp was 2,050 feet long. If an entire legion were assigned to fortify it, there would be two soldiers for one foot, if the exempt men were few. For centurions, cavalrymen, evocati, discharged soldiers, and volunteers had exemption from duties.

But there is no doubt that sutlers, servants of the camp, and slaves came to take part in these works and gave assistance. For why would masters, wearied by labor, have permitted their slaves to be idle? Florus, book 2, chapter 18, calls them servile works. Caesar in The Alexandrian War says: "Since he had believed that the great multitude of slaves which carried earth for the mound, in the manner of daily work, were soldiers." Trebonius also, in book 2 of The Civil War, summons men from the province for these works. The ditch was therefore drawn very quickly.

§ 5. But who acted more correctly: Lycurgus, who favored circular camps, or others, who favored square or quadrangular ones? Xenophon, in The State of the Lacedaemonians, says that Lycurgus approved the circular form: "I shall also say in what manner Lycurgus thought a camp should be marked out. Since he considered the angles of a square camp useless, they placed their camps in a circle, unless they were protected either by a mountain, a wall, or a river behind them." He gives as the reason that the angles were useless.

Yet it is more advantageous for camps to be square or quadrangular for the purpose of defense, since from one angle two sides can be seen and defended. Moreover, a square form is more convenient for every method of building than a round or oblong one. Nevertheless, if the matter is considered as a whole, nothing is better than to weigh the nature of the site. If there is a river, lake, mountain, valley, wall, marsh, forest, or something else that presents a natural fortification, they should employ it to reduce their labor. Beside rivers it is expedient for a camp to be extended lengthwise because of the convenience of obtaining water.

§ 6. Fortification ceased in the Roman military service for various reasons. The first was the indulgence of the emperors, when by their favor they made many men exempt. From this it followed that those who remained subject to duties were more heavily burdened--indeed, crushed.

The second cause was that, as a kind of military service was distributed through towns, the soldiers became unacquainted with the labors of a camp. Tacitus, Annals 13: "It was sufficiently established that in that army there were veterans who had never entered upon guard duty or watches, and who gazed at a rampart and ditch as though they were new and marvelous things. Gleaming and enriched, whether in helmets or breastplates, they had completed their military service throughout towns." From both causes the praetorians arrived at the utmost degree of idleness. For when Didius Julianus wished to lead them into the field and exercise them, they hired substitutes for the works at a price. More shameless still were the Egyptians, who, when ordered to fortify the camp with a ditch and rampart, cried out that the work should be contracted at public expense.

The third cause was the avarice and savagery of the centurions, who compelled men to purchase release from duties. Tacitus, Histories 1: "It was demanded that the payments customarily made to centurions for exemptions be abolished. For the common soldier paid, as it were, an annual tribute. Some wandered through the maniples, some on furloughs, and some within the camp itself, until they paid the price to the centurion. No one had regard for the amount of the burden or the kind of profit: by brigandage and plunder or by servile tasks they purchased release from military duty. Then each soldier who was richer than the rest was wearied by labor and cruelty until he purchased exemption. When, exhausted by expenses and made wretchedly feeble by idleness, he returned to the maniple poor in place of rich and idle in place of vigorous, another after another, corrupted by the same poverty and license, rushed toward sedition and discord and finally civil wars."

Afterward the centurions were paid from the public treasury, until at last they ceased to fortify camps. In the time of Vegetius, who lived under Valentinian the Younger, that knowledge had already died out. "The knowledge of this matter," he says, "has utterly perished; for no one for a long time has established a camp by drawing ditches and fixing stakes." Nevertheless, it was revived by many at intervals.

§ 7. Vegetius, book 1, chapter 21 and the following chapters, teaches the fortification of camps: "The recruit," he says, "must also learn the fortification of camps, for nothing is found in war either so salutary or so necessary. If the camp has been correctly established, the soldiers spend days and nights within the rampart in such security--even if the enemy besieges them--that they seem to carry a walled city with them everywhere. But the knowledge of this matter has utterly perished. For no one for a long time has established a camp by drawing ditches and fixing stakes before it. Thus we know that many men have frequently been afflicted by an unexpected arrival of barbarian cavalry by day or night. Not only do those who settle down without a camp suffer these things; but when, through some mischance, they begin to give ground in battle, they have no fortifications of a camp to receive them and fall unavenged like animals. There is no end to their dying until the enemy loses the will to pursue them."

They fortified the camp even amid the greatest dangers. Vegetius, book 1, chapter 25: "It is easy to fortify a camp when the adversaries are absent. But if the enemy presses upon them, then all the cavalry and half of the infantry are drawn up in battle-line to repel the attack; the rest behind them draw ditches and fortify the camp. It is proclaimed by a herald which century is first, which second, and which third, until the whole work has been completed. After this the ditch is inspected and measured by the centurions, and punishment is inflicted upon those who have worked too negligently. The recruit must therefore be trained for this use, so that, when necessity demands it, he may be able to fortify the camp without confusion, swiftly, and cautiously."

In the African War one part of the battle-line stood in the field while another performed the work. In the Spanish War against Afranius, the third battle-line deceived the enemy by performing the work secretly.

§ 8. Mendoza, part 1, chapter 52, relates another and rapid method of fortifying a camp. He bound small beams together at their joints and, in a very short time, erected a square platform thirty geometrical feet high and sixty wide. Four such structures suffice not only for defense but also for harassing the whole field, if they are placed in suitable positions; for they can be filled with musketeers and other soldiers. He requires no timbers larger than can be gathered and carried by horses or mules. A watchtower fifty feet high can nevertheless be placed above them. This can be done quickly. Other defenses must nevertheless be added, for those structures can easily be cast down by artillery.

§ 9. Of the works formerly used for fortifying camps and enclosing enemies, some were, as it were, barbaric and possessed little usefulness; others contributed to necessary protection. The work which Caesar made in book 1 of The Gallic War was altogether useful. "With the one legion which he had with him and the soldiers who had assembled from the province, he drew a wall sixteen feet high and a ditch for nineteen miles, from Lake Geneva to Mount Jura. When this work had been completed, he stationed garrisons and fortified strongholds, so that, if they attempted to cross against his will, he might more readily prevent them." By this he terrified the Helvetians so that they abandoned their plan and hope of breaking out. The extent was five of our miles, which Caesar occupied after fortifying it with strongholds. But if the Helvetians had not been frightened by that undertaking, it would not have been difficult to break the wall at some point and fill up the ditch.

The same Caesar, when he was besieging Alesia with no great number of soldiers, captured the city by fortifications in the face of the many thousands of men who were in the city and the two hundred and forty thousand infantry and eight thousand cavalry. First he made a circumvallation extending for eleven miles and a ditch twenty feet wide. Withdrawing four hundred feet from it, he made other fortifications. These were two ditches fifteen feet wide and of the same depth; he filled the inner one with water diverted from the river. Behind these he constructed a mound and rampart twelve feet high; to this he added a breastwork and battlements, with great forked branches projecting, which would delay the enemy's ascent. He also surrounded the entire work with towers standing eighty feet apart. Against those who came to aid the besieged he constructed other, similar fortifications, embracing fourteen miles.

It was barbaric and done for display when he attempted to enclose Pompey with a wall that extended for twelve hundred stadia--an extent of about one hundred and fifty miles, or thirty-seven of our miles. For he did not hamper Pompey the Great by such extensive contrivances; and how easily Pompey could have broken through them with an armed force!

Lucan describes it in this manner:

> Mountains are broken, and Caesar leads a level work
>
> through steep places; he opens ditches and stations towered forts > upon the highest ridges. Enclosing boundaries in a great circuit,
>
>
> glades and wooded wastes and forests, in a vast ring
>
> he pens the wild beasts. Fields are not lacking, nor forage lacking

Crassus constructed against Spartacus a ditch three hundred stadia long, fifteen feet wide and fifteen feet deep, and above the ditch he constructed a rampart of admirable height and strength, according to Plutarch in Crassus. These matters pertain to fortifications. They are now made in another manner because of artillery, but are neglected in camps.

§ 10. In the camps themselves were tents which seem to have been strong, because, as Polybius says, they even kept off missiles. In winter quarters and permanent camps they were perhaps made from boards, posts, and woven fencing; otherwise, they were of hide and stretched with ropes, and in this manner could delay missiles whose force was spent. Isidore adds boards and curtains. Curtains of linen easily resisted feeble missiles, and indeed missiles hurled strongly, especially when the curtains hung loosely. They certainly covered their upper parts with hides.

Tacitus, concerning the Frisians: "Drusus had ordered them, because of the narrowness of their resources, to pay a moderate tribute, namely, that they should furnish ox hides for the use of the camp." Caesar's soldiers in the African War made tents, some from clothing, reeds, and mats. Belisarius has tents made from boards in Procopius, book 2 of The Persian War. Herodes, in Trebellius, had embossed tents and gilded pavilions.

Their size was such that they easily held everyone, and indeed could also receive some multitude of visitors. If there were several legions, the camp was larger. If there were two consuls, each held his own praetorium and arrangement within a doubled space, as Polybius relates. In the battle at Cannae we read of a larger and a smaller camp, separated by a proper interval, undoubtedly for a proper reason, although it has not been explained.

I therefore conclude: individual soldiers are covered by breastplate, helmet, and shield; all together are covered by the rampart and encircling defenses of the camp. Camps which are unfortified are unarmed, and are then compelled to fight at the enemy's discretion.

CHAPTER XXXIV

Laws and Customs of Ancient Camps

§ 1. In camps there is the highest discipline and the highest order.

1. Two maniples have charge of the place which is before the tribunes; they are taken from the hastati and the principes. That place is the principia, where assemblies are held and all business is transacted.

2. Three maniples erect the tribune's tent. Vegetius, book 3, chapter 8.

3. From these men two watches are also formed, one before and the other behind the tent.

4. They served in the place of attendants. Alexander Severus permitted there to be no attendants: he would not allow anyone except soldiers to go before tribunes or commanders.

5. The triarii furnished the cavalrymen, as citizens of higher rank, with a guard. Polybius. They tended and watched the horses.

6. One maniple each day kept watch for the commander.

7. There were guard-posts at the gates, for entire cohorts and troops of cavalry kept watch. Sometimes several cohorts did so at a distance from the camp. They called these rural guard-posts. There were certainly several of them, and it was a capital offense to abandon them unless the men were swept away by great force. Thus Polybius and Suidas. Suetonius likewise says of Augustus: "He punished centurions who had deserted their post with death, just as he punished common soldiers." The chief matter was the careful distribution of the passwords.

8. Pammenes showed how great a care must be taken over the password. For after he had been shut in with a few men and could not escape, he learned the password of the enemy's camp from a deserter; trusting in it, he led his men through the middle of the camp, killed many of the enemy, and escaped.

9. The procedure concerning passwords was in truth different from ours. A small tablet was marked and returned before darkness; sometimes useful commands were announced in that order. Now only passwords are announced. The tribunes received them from the commander, and the tesserarii from the tribunes.

10. A maniple kept watch at the praetorium by night. Three further watches were established by night: one at the quaestor's quarters and two at those of the tribunes.

11. The velites fill the rampart; small tablets are also given to the watchmen.

12. Nothing was stricter than the rounds. Cavalrymen went around by night; sometimes, in danger, the tribunes and the commander himself did so. At times the watches were established with no intervening space. Later the centurions also made the rounds. Finally this became the particular office of those who were called circuitores. The decurion who ranked first in the troop performed this duty.

The tribune designated for these men in writing which watch they had to make and how many rounds. The man making the rounds goes with his friends. The punishment for a soldier or a circuitor who failed in the night watches was cudgeling to death.

13. Diligent care of the watches was exacted by bells rung in a fixed order at the same time. Alcibiades, fearing negligence among his men on watch, commanded that, when he himself was about to display a light from the citadel, everyone should raise up lights, and that whoever neglected to do so would pay the penalty. Thus, while they kept watch attentively for this signal, they avoided the danger.

14. Paulus Aemilius ordered the sentries to keep watch unarmed, so that they might remain awake more diligently. Plutarch, Paulus.

15. All newcomers must be questioned, so that the matter of spies may be ascertained.

16. Our first watch is from sunrise to noon; the second extends to sunset; the third to midnight; the fourth to sunrise. Ordinarily the masters of the watches make their rounds through them twice, and sometimes the commanders and those to whom the commanders entrust them do so.

17. If the enemy attacks by night, the sentries sound the alarm and indicate from what direction he is coming. The sentries join together and await the enemy. The alarm is then sounded at the commander's guard-post.

18. By frequent admonition the army must be trained not to be moved by any event or by any voice it hears unless it proceeds from the commanders and prefects. This must especially be guarded against by night, because that time is most liable to alarms.

CHAPTER XXXV

The Military March

§ 1. The ancients had two forms of military march, as Polybius observes. They depart from their camp in this manner. When the first signal has been given, they strike their tents and all pack their baggage. But no one is permitted either to take down or to set up a tent before those of the tribunes and commander are set up or taken down. When the second signal has sounded, they load the baggage upon the pack animals. At the third, the first men must advance and the whole camp must move.

They generally place the extraordinarii at the head of the column. The right wing of the allies follows them. After these come the pack animals belonging to the men just mentioned. The first Roman legion succeeds and follows their column, having its own equipment and baggage behind it; then comes the second legion, followed by its own pack animals and likewise by the baggage of the allies who are stationed in the rear. For the left wing of the allies is last in the column. The cavalry, moreover, are sometimes in the rear, each body behind its own division; sometimes they ride beside the pack animals, keeping and restraining them and also furnishing security.

But when there is apprehension about the rear, the remaining bodies retain the same manner and order; only the extraordinarii leave the front, attend to the rear, and are transferred there. On alternate days one legion and one wing lead, and the same bodies in turn follow, so that all may share equally in the advantage which comes from finding water or forage whole and untouched, as they continually change the order and advance first by turns.

They also employ another kind of column in times of insecurity, when they have open country. For they lead a threefold phalanx or battle-line, with its divisions at equal distances--the hastati, the principes, and the triarii. They place the pack animals of the first maniples before all of them, those of the second maniples behind the first maniples, and those of the third behind the second; and in this manner they always arrange the pack animals alternately. When the column has been formed in this way, if any hostile attack occurs, they incline at one time toward the shield and at another toward the spear, and bring the maniples out from among the pack animals and baggage into view of the enemy. Thus in a short time the body of armed men assumes the order for battle, except that the hastati must be brought out and the pack animals and the multitude following them must find a place suited to the emergency. When they have approached the place where camp is to be made, the tribune and those centurions who are always selected for this duty go ahead.

These arrangements were frequently changed according to the circumstance of places, enemies, and auxiliaries. Josephus, in book 5 of The Jewish War, says that, as Titus advanced into enemy territory, royal auxiliaries and all the allied forces went before him. After their armed men came Titus himself, having with him both other picked men and lancers, or scouts. After him came the cavalry of the legions, who preceded the engines; and after the engines came the tribunes and prefects of cohorts together with picked men. After these were the standards around the eagle, with the trumpeters before it. After these came the phalanx, or column of the legions, extended six men abreast. The servants and camp-followers of each legion came behind it and before its pack animals. Last of all came the mercenaries and their guards, the uragi, or men who closed the column.

Today they generally divide an army into two parts: by a term now customary they call the first the vanguard and the latter the rearguard. When the multitude is greater they add a middle body, which they call the battalion. The infantry is divided in this way; skillful commanders divide the cavalry differently. Although the ancients generally placed their camps in the same manner, they nevertheless had men who went ahead, who afterward were called measurers of camps. Silius:

> Bolanus hastens to seek ridges suitable for the camp.

All things in the march of our armies are better arranged, chiefly because of the multitude of wagons.

When the place was unknown, they used guides, deserters, and sometimes prisoners in bonds. It was a sign that they were leading by a direct way if they gave accounts that agreed.

§ 2. When the enemy is near, the dangers of a march are greater than those of a battle-line. This must therefore be done: the departure must be made as like a battle-line as possible. In a battle-line all are armed in mind and body, the place is known, and the enemy is before their eyes. The contrary happens on a march; it must accordingly be arranged so that every danger is guarded against with the greatest caution.

"First, therefore," Vegetius says in book 3, chapter 6, "there must be itineraries of all the regions." The Franks who formerly marched against Fredegund were pitiable, because they did not explore the roads even in their own kingdom. Fredegund sent ahead of her army a threefold row of leafy branches with bells, so that the enemy would think that he was encountering a forest and grazing pack animals, for the light was still dim. A Greek commander compelled his men to be attentive by another method. Diocles aroused vigilance by a notable device: when they were advancing without order, he repeatedly changed the password; consequently, believing that the enemy was present, they marched with the battle-line formed.

§ 3. The method of a march is generally the same as that of other military matters: a commander should do one thing and appear to the enemy to be about to do another. Agesilaus, when it appeared that the Thebans were going to impede his army in narrow places, marched toward the walls of Thebes. They withdrew in alarm, and Agesilaus escaped through the narrow places with no one opposing him.

Pericles acted admirably when he was driven within precipitous mountains where there were two exits. On one side he drew a vast ditch, as if he intended to keep the enemy away; toward the other he drove his soldiers as though he intended to break through. When all the enemy had assembled on that side, thinking that he would not cross the ditch, Pericles himself laid down bridges which he had made and crossed the ditch undisturbed. The chief point is this: the enemy must not know what is to be done.

Alexander made steps upon Mount Ossa and crossed over them while the Thessalians held the narrow places. Pompilius covered or dug up the well-worn roads with sand and prepared new ones.

§ 4. When any province is invaded, every effort must be made to occupy and fortify some place at the outset, so that the army may establish a footing in it and extend itself toward other places. This is not only useful, but is in some measure the chief point of the matter. The sick, provisions, and booty can be deposited in that place. Next, if reinforcements are sent, they have a place to which they may withdraw. Third, loss is inflicted upon the enemy and his authority is diminished; his people think themselves captives so long as the invader maintains himself in some fortified place. Finally, if he is defeated in battle, he has a safe refuge.

Fifteen years ago, when Ambrogio Spinola suddenly crossed the Rhine, he possessed nothing pacified in that province, and the enemy had fortified Rheinberg because they expected a siege. He joined the Rhine with a bridge and raised temporary fortifications, so that he would be prepared for every event. As this occurrence was unexpected by the enemy, so it was deeply grievous to him, but advantageous to Spinola; for, safely withdrawing from the river in this way, he swiftly occupied Lingen and other cities. Afterward, when he held Rheinberg in his power, he demolished the earlier fortifications and took down the bridge.

It was with no other intention that Count Bucquoy maintained Budweis in Bohemia with such great industry and courage that, if he had occupied all Bohemia with a larger army, he would scarcely have gained greater glory. Indeed, after Spinola occupied Wesel, he fortified it with works and a garrison, judging it to be of very great importance that he should possess a seat of war suitable for controlling the Rhine and the Lippe.

Wagons are used on the march and in battle; but in order that they may be joined and serve as a rampart, they are customarily fastened together with beams and chains. If smaller cannon, which military usage calls falconets, are placed upon them, they keep the enemy away and close the rear and flanks with the greatest security. They can be drawn by two horses. The Duke of Alba used them in the Low Countries with great advantage, and the Turks always use them. I would consider it most useful if several wagons of this kind followed and protected the flanks, each carrying eight or ten pieces twice as large as muskets and having their gunners in the same wagon. No armor would resist these, and by their number they would keep the enemy away.

§ 5. If cavalrymen go ahead in a large body, they serve as scouts, provided that some are also in the rear of the column. Vegetius likewise places cavalry at the beginning, with concealed purpose, because they can easily withdraw and join the column.

§ 6. Sometimes men are compelled to fight while on the march because they cannot escape in any other manner. Agesilaus, when he saw the allies drawing back, went through the narrow places and ordered the Laconians to go first and the allies to follow. The enemy attacked them and compelled them to fight bravely. Without doubt this was a hazardous cast of the die; for what if the allies had joined the enemy? Polyainos, book 2.

In the same manner Leucon too was lavish with the blood of his allies. For when the Heracleots were disembarking from a ship, and he had set armed men opposite them, he ordered those who were in reserve to kill the allies unless they prevented the enemy from disembarking.

When the enemy pursues, the road must be blocked by artifice until you escape to safety. Pompey blocked every road leading to the port of Brundisium; then, after posting archers, he led his army down to the ships. The archers followed by routes known to them and sailed in small boats to the fleet.

§ 7. When Iphicrates was about to march through a scorching region, he set out by night, after ordering his soldiers to take water for two days.

§ 8. When I consider everything, military service today seems to me more exact and more circumspect in taking precautions. For this procedure is observed on a march. While the man undertaking an expedition sets out with one army, he must gather another. If he conquers, he will easily pursue the victory or dismiss the newly levied soldier; if he is conquered, he will keep his allies and subjects in their duty and wrest the fruit of the battle from the victor.

There is now a particular officer who has charge of the guides, couriers, and those who reconnoiter the road and surrounding places. The master of the engines arranges the artillery and the things pertaining to it; under him are miners for leveling roads where there is need of it. The chief officer placed over supplies has care of provisions. He has his own standard so that he may easily be found.

They undertake the march in this manner. After the roads have been reconnoitered and outriders sent forward, the vanguard advances; in time of danger some field pieces are added to it. Then the artillery follows in this order. First come wagons loaded with stakes, mattocks, spades, and every instrument for digging. Then follow the smaller and larger cannon, and in like manner the smiths' tools. After these come lead, powder, ropes, and, as it were, their guard--mounted lancers and gunners. Wagons in which cannonballs are carried close them. Finally come the wagons of the master of the engines and everything pertaining to the engines, as well as provisions and what they call the hospital; they also carry the sick and wounded in wagons. Next are carried the commander's wagons and baggage. Then come the remaining soldiers, in the order which dangers and the character of the places require.

The commander is placed in the middle, both so that he may be safer and so that he may more easily hasten to every part and send commands. Yet it is sometimes necessary that the commander be among the first, as Mendoza relates that he himself saw. For when the commander knew that he was being sought and that the enemy was close at hand, he hastened, selected a place suitable for battle, fortified himself and drew up the battle-line before the last part had arrived, and won.

When cavalry spreads itself out, one must notice whether there is darkness or light beneath its feet. If there is darkness, the battle-line is deep; if there is light, there is only a front rank. If it is viewed from a higher place, an inference concerning the whole number will be easy.

When roads divide on the march, they are customarily guarded until the baggage has passed. If the army passes through a forest, men take possession of it after musketeers have been sent forward, so that the march may be safe. Today rivers can scarcely be crossed except by a stratagem and secretly, for cannon can scarcely be used in a river.

It is not advisable to place a camp in mountains, because supplies are easily obstructed. On a plain, a stream, forest, hill, or marsh is generally advantageous. There is a military proverb: "There is no advantageous place where there is another more advantageous." The chief advantage must therefore be sought. The most advantageous site for laying out a camp is one to which approach is difficult and departure easy.

They place the cavalry in such a manner that the fortifications are not seen until the work is finished. If villages are within the camp, the soldiers must not dwell in the houses, for they are easily attacked secretly and set on fire. But this matter is easily attended to.

The care taken over camps is immense. When the soldiers enter them, all the men of the vanguard remain standing in order until the middle body enters. The middle body remains standing until all the baggage has entered. Then all turn to the care of their bodies, except those on watch.

Watches are posted wherever it is thought that the enemy may approach either by force or by deceit. If the camp is near a forest or thicket, many advance sentries must be posted, so that the more distant may warn the others in order and all things may be reported to the commander. The rule of sentries today is that they hold their ground until they are driven away by force. They do not fight even if they are stronger; if they are attacked, they defend themselves and report everything to their own men. If they see that they are inferior, they retreat while preserving their ranks.

When the enemy can attack from many places, many strong watches must be established. From this it is apparent how thoroughly camps must be fortified. Cavalrymen who are to protect foragers are customarily sent ahead of them. When danger exists, a third part of the army keeps watch, and in the most extreme danger one half. Among the regular watches they also station extraordinary ones, which they call small watches, and arrange double advance sentries, so that security may be provided on every side.

Sometimes they place cavalry watches near the camp of the enemy, which on account of the danger they call lost watches. Scouts are customarily sent out by night. They are not given the password, lest, if one of them is captured, he be compelled to disclose it to the enemy. If they are to return by night, one soldier is sent ahead to the advance sentries and informs the prefect of the watches that the scouts are returning. He informs the commander. A companion from among those who know the password is added to the men entering the camp, so that they may be admitted. The same procedure is customarily observed by day when cavalrymen return from a distant mission. Thus there is now greater care of watches than formerly; and certainly, while I consider everything which anyone among the soldiers can observe, I clearly see that military prudence has increased from day to day.

§ 9. This must especially be noted: those err who think that any region is so fortified by rivers, forests, mountains, and other things that an enemy cannot enter it. Moses led an army through sands impassable because of serpents, under the guidance of ibises. They try places without a road. Hannibal broke through the Alps with vinegar. Recently men broke through into Bohemia although the way was besieged and denied them. Our own Bohemia is therefore a witness: in a single year a way was opened so many times for its devastation. Accordingly, an approaching enemy must be resisted with arms; everything else permits him to pass.

§ 10. It was formerly common for men to protect themselves by placing captives in the way of missiles. When Aemilius Paulus led his army against the Lucanians and the Tarentine fleet attacked him with scorpions, he covered the flanks of his men with captives. Agesilaus the Laconian did the same when returning from Phrygia.

CHAPTER XXXVI

The Crossing of Rivers

§ 1. Armies cross rivers in four ways: by bridge, by boat, by diverting the river into channels, and by swimming. For if it is possible to cross by a ford, there is no need of a new art. Then attention must be given only to this: that the enemy has not obstructed a slender stream by night so that, when the water swells, it is no longer passable. The Dutch garrison did this in the siege of Ostend. There is another danger if they cast down caltrops, which easily escape notice when the water has been disturbed.

§ 2. There is therefore severe difficulty at rivers. Vegetius, book 3, chapter 7. It is difficult, I say, when the enemy is nearby, for making a bridge is a greater labor. Boats are easily driven back by cannon and fixed stakes; today it is scarcely possible to cross by swimming, although under Charles V certain Spaniards swam across the Elbe. But the enemy's panic gave them their opportunity, for if even five cavalrymen had been on the bank, they could have repelled those approaching.

§ 3. The entire art therefore consists in pretending that one will cross in one place and crossing in another. When crossing a river, Labienus made a noise with oars in one place, so that he might appear to be crossing there; while the enemy prepared himself, Labienus crossed in another place. Sinan Pasha also did this in the year 1594. For after pretending that he would cross the Danube in several places, he crossed at one place distant from the Christian camp and at the same time carried off part of their baggage.

The Tatars crossed the Danube with utter foolishness in the year 1596, holding the tail of a horse with one hand and a sword with the other; but they were cut down when they had crossed. That method is dangerous, because horses are easily burdened, and if they perceive danger, they kick.

§ 4. They were accustomed to check the current of a river with horses or elephants. Caesar positioned cavalry above and below, so that they would break the river's current, in book 1 of The Civil War: "He leads out the remaining legions without baggage and, after stationing a great number of pack animals in the river above and below, leads the army across." Hannibal positioned elephants in the Po.

§ 5. Ice must be crossed cautiously. Scatter straw upon it and pour water over it so that it freezes, lest the pack animals or soldiers fall upon the slippery surface. Julius II crossed the Po in this way.

The Tatars were afraid to cross the frozen Danube. They therefore left a multitude of cattle together with their tents and withdrew as though afraid. The Hungarians who were on the opposite side drove the herds across. When the Tatars learned this and understood that an army could cross, they followed and devastated Hungary. Fulgosus, book 7.

§ 6. Datames joined carts to carts and affixed boards to the rims, so that they would not sink too deeply into the mud. He had ordered the strongest men to swim across together with the pack animals; these men drew the carts, and in this manner he led the army across. Rafts can nevertheless be joined together by an easier method.

To destroy bridges men are accustomed to send fire-ships against them. At present there is the greatest opportunity for this. They employed that art admirably at Antwerp; nor, when two attempts had failed, did they desist. The third caused immense loss.

§ 7. Because it is exceedingly difficult to cross rivers, very many stratagems have been devised for that labor. While the Pisidian inhabitants guarded the narrow places, Autophradates began to prepare a crossing elsewhere. When they went to meet him, he occupied the narrow places by night and led his army across.

Pompey repeatedly led his army out and brought it back into camp. When this had been done and the enemy thought that he was being mocked, he became negligent, and Pompey crossed by a sudden movement. Alexander and Xenophon, pretending to cross in one place, crossed in another.

By an amusing stratagem the Laconians sailed through a Carthaginian fleet stationed in their way and reached Syracuse. They had ten captured Punic ships; they caused these to be led first as if victorious, with the other ships joined to their sides and fastened to their sterns. By this appearance they deceived the Carthaginians and passed through.

The crossing of Sertorius was laborious. He drew a rampart in the form of a hollow crescent, filled it with material, and set it on fire, and in this way shut out the enemy. But much material was needed, lest the enemy attack when the fires were scattered. Today they can be kept away more easily because of the danger that gunpowder will catch fire. Pelopidas the Theban also did the same, as did Herculeius, the lieutenant of Sertorius, between two mountains.

Hanno, when shut in, heaped up light materials in a place suitable for breaking out and set them on fire. After the enemy had been called away to the other exits, he went out through the flames, the soldiers' faces protected by shields and their legs by cloth.

When the enemy occupied the bank of a river and Quintus Lutatius Catulus could not cross, he pretended that he was about to establish a camp. The Cimbri believed this to be true and did the same themselves. When they had gone out to gather wood and forage, Catulus crossed and attacked their camp.

When Croesus could not cross the Halys, he drew a ditch behind the army and diverted the river into it.

§ 8. Necessity often discovers many devices. When Metellus lacked ships for transporting elephants into Sicily, he joined barrels together and covered them with platforms. Hannibal ordered a soldier to wound an elephant beneath the ear and then to swim across the river. The beast, eager for revenge, followed him and gave the rest an example of daring the same thing. Otherwise the elephants could not be compelled by any force to cross.

§ 9. This principle is general: they should break in where they are not expected. Yet the industry of Scipio in this matter is both excellent and necessary. At Carthage he broke in by following the tide of the sea, declaring that he was following God as his guide.

Take an example from other actions in order to cross rivers, for whatever is done on land is less difficult than what is accomplished through the waves. Marius sent soldiers into a fortress over a rugged mountain. You will make the attempt through whirlpools. When Joshua had placed an ambush beside the city of Ai and the soldiers fled, he occupied the city through those who had been placed in ambush. Lucius Cornelius imitated this in many towns in Sardinia; Cato among the Lacetani; Lucius Scipio in Sardinia; Hannibal at Himera and Saguntum; Himilco at Agrigentum; Viriathus at Segobriga; Barca at Lilybaeum; and the Scordisci at Heraclea.

They sound the alarm in one part and attack in another. In this way Alcibiades occupied Cyzicus, Pericles a fortress of the Peloponnesians, Thrasybulus Miletus, and Antiochus Ephesus. Rivers, harbors, and marshes all furnish both greater necessity and greater opportunity.

Some made bundles of reeds and sedge in order that cavalrymen might place their arms upon them while they themselves crossed by swimming. Appian, book 8, writes concerning barrels: "But there was a great scarcity of timber and vessels with which, by joining them together, a bridge might be made. Certain workmen reported that there were very many empty, round barrels in the deserted fields there, which the inhabitants had formerly used for importing wine. Since these were hollow in the likeness of ships, when bound to one another they seemed likely to float after the manner of small boats. Indeed, once fastened together with bindings, with wickerwork laid over them and a great deal of earth heaped upon them, they could not sink. When this had been done, the soldiers easily crossed to the farther bank."

Lucan likewise, book 4:

> New devices for flight across the waters > are sought out. They do not extend keels in the customary manner > and raise sterns; instead they bind stout timbers, capable of bearing > great weights, in an unfamiliar construction.
>
>
>
>
> For empty barrels sustain a raft on every side;
>
> their row, bound with chains stretched at length,
> receives slanting alders in two ranks.

They also made bridges from inflated skins, lest the army's necessary march should sometimes be impeded by the courses of rivers, as very often happens. Resourceful necessity discovered a remedy for this matter which is both easy to make and of outstanding utility. It is constructed in the following manner.

Calfskins are softened by the Arabian art, for among the Arabs particular care is given to their preparation because water must be drawn from wells in skins. These, then, are carefully sewn as has been said, so that the structure is three and one-half feet in size. Thus, when the same skins have been inflated with air and swollen, they do not raise up a belly; rather, by a certain evenness, the very fullness of the skins produces level surfaces. They are bound to one another at their sides by straps fastened underneath. Rings project above them on one side, and hooks are inserted on the other. Thus the complete structure, joined part to part in the form of a bridge, is unfolded.

The same work, however, will be extended more easily aslant across the river to the opposite bank on account of the force of the current. Iron stakes are fixed on each bank, and strong ropes are stretched in the middle beneath the skins themselves to sustain the weight of those walking and above the edges for stability. By this novel and foreign preparation for a road, it will within a short space of time furnish a free opportunity to cross the river.

We must further be advised that coarse cloths should be spread over the joined skins beneath the feet of those walking, lest the smooth dressing of the hides deny them a firm footing. Nevertheless, hand-ballistae will be positioned on both banks, lest an enemy force hinder those working upon the bridge.

In the Mithridatic War Lucullus saved Cyzicus in this way. Florus, book 3: "But a messenger gave the townsmen confidence to resist by teaching them that Lucullus was approaching. Horrible to tell, he passed through the midst of the enemy's ships suspended from an inflated skin and guiding his course with his feet. To those watching from a distance he escaped like a sea-monster." Indeed, Gaius Caesar too, supported by inflated skins, often outran the messengers concerning himself.

Caesar says in book 1 of The Civil War that the Lusitanians did not go to war without inflated skins; and Livy, book 30, says the same of the Spaniards, who also placed their clothing in the skins. Others used shields. The Lycians secretly returned to their city by swimming underwater through the Xanthus; Brutus caught them in nets.

A safer method is to make dugout canoes, or small boats from one piece of wood. Caesar used these in Britain, and in Spain; Livy, book 30; Ammianus, books 14 and 24. They also carried skiffs with them. Julian did so in Persia, Ammianus, book 14. Semiramis had boats that could be taken apart and carried them upon camels. Diodorus, book 3. The emperor Alexander also laid a bridge upon dugout canoes when he crossed the Rhine. Caesar made ships against Sextus Pompey from wickerwork of willow and ox hides.

Battles very often arise at a crossing. Caesar, book 2 of The Gallic War: "The fighting in that place was fierce. Our men attacked the enemy while they were encumbered in the river and killed a great number of them. By a multitude of missiles they drove back the remainder, who attempted with the greatest boldness to cross over the bodies of their men. They surrounded with cavalry and killed the first who had crossed."

The ancients also drove off the enemy by ingenuity. Diodorus, book 19:

> παρασκευασάμενοι γὰρ δέσμους καλάμων εὐμεγέθεις ἐμβάλλουσιν εἰς τὴν λίμνην· ἐπὶ δὲ τούτων ἐπικάθηνται οὐ πλείω τριῶν, ὧν δύο μὲν ἔχοντες προσδεδεμένας πλάτας κωπηλατοῦσιν, εἷς δὲ φορῶν τόξα τοὺς προσπλέοντας ἐκ τοῦ πέραν ἢ βιάζεσθαι τολμῶντας ἀμύνεται.
>
> For after preparing large bundles of reeds they cast them into the lake. Upon these no more than three men take their seats: two, holding blades fastened to them, row, while one, carrying a bow, wards off those sailing against them from the opposite side or daring to use force.

The Liburnians acted bravely and amusingly when they occupied shallow places with only their heads projecting. They caused the enemy to believe that the sea was deep; and when a trireme pursuing them became entangled in the shallows, they captured it.

Men are accustomed to obstruct harbors and the mouths of rivers. Our countrymen have learned to obstruct a crossing in every manner. At Hamburg Duke Valdemar of Schleswig obstructed the Elbe with chains; at Danzig Stephen, king of Poland, obstructed it with a bridge. But here the river and the surrounding places must be considered.

CHAPTER XXXVII

The Formation of the Battle-Line

§ 1. The ancient Roman battle-line, as it seems to me, was certainly not established altogether advantageously. Livy, describing in book 8 the war between the Latins and the Romans, indicates that the younger and weaker men fought at the beginning. For the battle was especially like one in a civil war: so completely was there nothing among the Latins at variance with the Roman state except their courage.

Lipsius maintains that the hastati fought first in a stationary battle, and so it was done; for the light-armed soldiers ran forward. No account was taken of the velites. The reason why I think that the battle-line was not rightly established is that all the bravest men must be placed in the first line, so that they may overthrow or terrify the enemy at the first assault.

For there are two disadvantages in that battle-line. The first is that the war begins with the slaughter of the younger, poorly armed citizens. Once defeated, they withdrew; yet they were not defeated without slaughter, nor could they abandon their place and withdraw except under the utmost necessity, since death was the punishment for abandoning one's place. The other disadvantage is that the enemy's courage increased after he had routed the velites and hastati, and he pressed on all the more stoutly.

This certainly became evident in the Latin War, where the same battle-lines were on both sides: they could easily have been defeated if strong men had been opposed to the weak at the beginning. For when Manlius had ordered the accensi to run forward, the Latins suspected that they were the triarii, because the accensi were stationed behind the triarii. They therefore also roused their own men, who, while defeating and driving back the Romans in a fierce fight, became exhausted and had their spears broken or blunted. Manlius finally sent the triarii against these men and conquered.

But if he had sent the triarii out together with the accensi, he would have saved many citizens whom he allowed to be killed and defeated up to that point, until the enemy, wearied out, was exposed to fresh troops. Numisius, commander of the Latins, gives no false account of how great a slaughter occurred. He affirmed that Mars had indeed been impartial in the war; that both battle-lines had been laid low with equal slaughter; that only the name of victory was in the possession of the Romans, but that in every other respect they too bore the fortune of the vanquished; that both praetoria of the consuls were marked by death, one by the parricide of a son and the other by the slaughter of the devoted consul; that the whole army had been cut to pieces; that the hastati and principes had been slain; that slaughter had been wrought both before and behind the standards; and that at last the triarii had restored the situation.

But if they had strained against the enemy with all their strength at the beginning and preserved their youth, the Latins would by no means have thought of renewing the war. Yet, as I advised above, the leading men held the populace cheap and did not take it ill that the multitude of the poor should be exhausted through wars. The Turk now acts in the same manner in storming cities and in battles: he casts an unwarlike crowd before the enemy to be torn to pieces, until, when the enemy is weary with killing, he sends in the Janissaries.

Antiquity also approved my opinion. Homer places the weak in the middle of the battle-line and the strong in its first and last parts, with the best judgment: so that the enemy may be broken by the first assault; so that those in the middle may be incited by those before them and compelled by those behind; and so that they may be unable to flee. It must not be doubted that Homer speaks from the usage of ancient times; but he places the strong at the front:

Ἱππῆας μὲν πρῶτα σὺν ἵπποισι καὶ ὄχεσφιν, πεζοὺς δ' ἐξόπιθε στῆσεν πολέας τε καὶ ἐσθλούς, ἔρκος ἔμεν πολέμοιο· κακοὺς δ' ἐς μέσσον ἔλασσεν.

He placed the cavalry with their horses and chariots at the front. At the rear he placed many brave infantrymen as a wall of war, and he cast the weak into the middle. Certainly the cavalry and chariot-drivers were a principal part of warfare.

Next, it was anciently so among the Romans that the richest men, who were likewise the best armed, fought in the first battle-line, and the poorest in the last. Lipsius, book 4 of The Roman Military, dialogue 2. For after Dionysius had stated the property-rating and arms of the first class, he added:

> χώραν δὲ κατεῖχεν αὐτοῖς πολέμοις τὴν προηγουμένην ὅλης τῆς φάλαγγος·

it occupied the first place in wars and stood before the entire remaining force. Again, concerning the second:

> ἐκοσμεῖτο αὐτοῖς ἀγῶσι μετὰ τοὺς προμάχους·

it was drawn up in the battle-line after the foremost fighters. Concerning the third likewise:

> χώρα καὶ τάξις τούτων ἐν ταῖς μάχαις μετὰ τοὺς ἐφεστῶτας τοῖς προμάχοις· their place and station in battles was beside those who stood behind the principes. Finally, concerning the fourth:

> τάξιν ἔχειν ἐν τοῖς ἀγῶσι τὴν ὑστάτην·

it held the last place in contests. What, then, of the fifth class, Dionysius?

> τούτοις ἔξω τάξεως ἔταξε στρατεύεσθαι·

he says that he ordered them to serve outside the line of battle. Afterward, at the trial of Coriolanus, he repeats the same things in nearly the same number of words. I have adduced these passages at greater length so that the origin and order of ancient military service, and the manner in which it gradually changed, may be established once for all.

Accordingly, by the ordinance of Servius all the richest men were in the first battle-line. This is why Varro derived the name principes from the front, and asserted that they had anciently fought with swords from the beginning. The others followed in order of wealth, and at the extreme rear were finally the meaner and poorer men and those who fought with light missiles.

But who were those Quintiani outside the order? They were the accensi, according to Livy, and each was not even a regular soldier. These things were so in ancient times; but when experience and reason had shown that many features in that order deserved condemnation, they changed it over time. For what reason is there to expose all the best and richest men to dangers by placing them in the first battle-line? They were unwilling to do so and placed the principes in the second position.

Let it be permissible for me to agree with the ancients and to dissent from Lipsius--not because I approve the Servian order, but because I think that men who will fight bravely, rather than merely die, must be placed in the first battle-line. At the end, however, I would have a strong reserve placed for every contingency. Yet I would add velites, archers, and slingers to the front, but in such a manner that strong men protect them in stationary combat.

Later writers changed the places of the principes and hastati. Vegetius, book 2, chapter 20: “The combatants in the first battle-line were called principes; in the second, hastati.” And in book 1, chapter 15: “The first battle-line was of the principes, the second of the hastati.” Lipsius holds that this began under Trajan or Hadrian. Very rightly indeed, for now the battle-line was arranged according to equity and merit, not according to the caprice of the patricians. The order which history exhibits after the expulsion of the kings was the earlier one.

Now let the manner in which a battle-line must be formed when battle is imminent be explained by the example of a single legion; if need requires, it may be transferred to several. The cavalry is placed on the wings. The battle-line of the infantry begins to be arranged from the first cohort on the right wing. The second cohort is joined to it. The third cohort is placed in the middle of the battle-line. The fourth is attached to it. The fifth cohort occupies the left wing. But those fighting before the standards, around the standards, and also in the first battle-line are called principes, that is, regulars, and the rest are called principales.

This was the heavy infantry. They had helmets, cuirasses, greaves, shields, larger swords which they called spathae, and other, smaller swords which they called semispathae. They had five lead-weighted darts placed in their shields, which they cast at the first assault. They likewise had two missiles. The larger had a triangular iron head nine inches long and a shaft five and one-half feet long. They called it the pilum; it is now called the spiculum. The soldiers were especially trained to cast it, because when directed with skill and force it often pierced both shield-bearing infantrymen and armored cavalrymen. The other was smaller, with a triangular iron head five inches long and a shaft three and one-half feet long. It was then called the verriculum and is now called the verutum.

The first battle-line of the principes and the second of the hastati are taught to be equipped with such arms. After them were the ferentarii and the light infantry, whom we now call auxiliaries and light-armed troops: shield-bearing men equipped with lead-weighted darts, swords, and missiles, just as nearly all soldiers now appear to be armed. There were also archers with helmets, cuirasses, swords, arrows, and bows. There were slingers who cast stones with slings or staff-slings. There were also crossbowmen who discharged arrows from hand-ballistae or crossbows.

The second battle-line was more lightly armed; the soldiers standing in it were called hastati. In the second battle-line, however, the sixth cohort was placed on the right wing, and the seventh was joined to it. The eighth cohort held the center, with the ninth accompanying it. The tenth cohort always held the left wing in the second battle-line.

Scipio, the distinguished commander, teaches this; Lipsius also agrees with him in book 4, dialogue 6. Scipio employed it in Spain. After observing for several days that the enemy's battle-line was arranged with the best men in the middle and the weaker on the wings, he formed his own in the opposite manner and placed the auxiliaries in the middle, but the citizens and all the strength on the wings.

Finally, two supreme commanders, Caesar and Pompey, showed how much it matters that strong men be in the first battle-line. Caesar placed his strongest legions at the front in the battle-line at Pharsalus. Caesar himself, thus preserving the arrangement stated above, had placed the Tenth Legion on the right wing and the Ninth on the left, although it had been severely reduced in the battles at Dyrrachium. He joined the Eighth to it in such a manner that he made almost one legion from the two and had ordered each to serve as a protection for the other.

He had eighty cohorts in the battle-line, the total of which was 22,000 men. He had placed Antony over the left wing, Publius Sulla over the right, and Gnaeus Domitius over the center; he himself took his position opposite Pompey. At the same time, having observed the circumstances which we have explained, and fearing that the right wing would be surrounded by the multitude of cavalry, he swiftly drew individual cohorts from the third line and formed from them a fourth line.

Pompey acted in the same manner, as Caesar relates in book 3 of The Civil War: "When Caesar had approached Pompey's camp, he observed that Pompey's battle-line was arranged in the following manner. On the left wing were the two legions delivered by Caesar under the decree of the Senate at the beginning of the dissension, one of which was called the First and the other the Third; Pompey himself was in that place. Scipio held the middle of the battle-line with the Syrian legions. The Cilician legion, joined with the Spanish cohorts which, as we have shown, had been brought over by Afranius, was placed on the right wing. Pompey considered these to be his strongest troops. He had interspersed the rest between the center and the wings and had filled out one hundred and ten cohorts; these amounted to fifty-five thousand men. There were about two thousand evocati, whom he had dispersed throughout the whole battle-line."

Frontinus, book 2, says that Pompey placed the legions on the wings and in the center according to the valor of each and filled the intervening spaces with recruits. Thus he willed that the strongest should be first.

§ 2. It must be considered, first of all, that few men fight in a great battle: in a legion only one hundred fight simultaneously, except that when the first men have cast their spears, they sink down upon their knees and others cast theirs. This must be done especially when the enemy is superior in number, for he can easily be conquered by a few when the action takes place in narrow or rugged places. Those few must therefore be brave, so that they may inflict slaughter.

The Roman battle-line is accurately presented both by many writers and especially by Lipsius. According to Lipsius the battle-line among the Romans did not vary greatly, and it was generally either double or triple. It was double when the whole battle-line was divided into two wings, the right and the left. This arrangement very often prevailed in a consular army, when there were two legions and their own auxiliaries were joined to each. It is certain that this division was ancient and was employed by other nations as well. Polyainos indeed attributes its invention to Pan:

> Διονύσου στρατηγὸς ἦν ὁ Πάν, ὅτι πρῶτος τάξιν εὗρεν, ὠνόμασε φάλαγγα, κέρας ἔταξε δεξιὸν καὶ λαιόν· ταύτῃ τοι ἄρα κερασφόρον τὸν Πᾶνα δημιουργοῦσι.

Pan was the commander of Dionysus, or Bacchus, in military affairs. He first discovered an order of battle, named the phalanx, and established a right and left wing. From this they commonly depict Pan with horns. To seek out and set down a few examples of this disposition among the Romans would be to take drops from a bucket: there are six hundred of them.

It is triple when, besides the wings, another division also rises up in the middle. This too is frequent, not only when there are several legions but even when there are two--these being placed in the middle, with the allies at each wing. The matter is clear in itself, and the examples readily present themselves.

But there is also another method of a double and triple battle-line: in addition to that simple division, a separation and distinction are also made in the rear. Thus, if I have four legions, I place two in front with their allies and set the same number behind them, as reserves. The same was also done with two legions: either each wing of allies--or ala, if you prefer--was placed in front with the legions attached behind, or the reverse.

See the matter in Livy, in the battle of Marcellus against Hannibal: “The fighting continued for more than two hours. Then the right wing and the extraordinarii on the Roman side began to give ground. When Marcellus saw this, he brought the Eighteenth Legion into the first battle-line. While some gave way in alarm and others came up sluggishly, the whole battle-line was thrown into disorder.” Again, concerning the same Marcellus in another battle: “The battle long remained undecided, inclining to neither side. The Third Legion took the place of the First, and the left wing that of the right.”

There are also examples of the legions themselves disposed in this way. In Livy: “The praetor’s legions were in the first battle-line; Cornelius held his own in reserve.” Elsewhere: “Sempronius led his own legions into the first battle-line; the legions of Publius Licinius were stationed in reserve.” And there are more.

These legions or forces placed in the second or third position were called reserves or reserve forces. Livy again: “When the Twelfth Legion, which was on the left wing, gave ground, he brought the Thirteenth Legion from the reserves into the first battle-line as a support.” Sallust: “There, after changing the ranks, on the right side, which was nearest the enemy, he formed the battle-line with three lines of reserves.” Entire legions were not always substituted in this manner, but sometimes a number of cohorts. Livy: “He immediately sent the reserve cohorts, which were being preserved intact for the contingencies of a longer battle, into the first line.”

The following verses of Tibullus to Messalla pertain to these dispositions:

> If there is need, let the battle-line stand as a square column,
>
> so that the straight order may advance with fronts made equal; > or if it please you to behold a double Mars or a joined one, so that you, a soldier, may hold the left with the right and the right with the left, and so that the victory in a twofold event may itself be twofold.
>

He produces what he calls a varied aspect of battle. First comes the simple square formation, with a straight front; second, the double formation with a wing on each side; third, the joined formation, which I called triple, namely, one formation joined to the other two. For in this manner what is said here occurred: the soldier on the left sees with his own right the left side of the middle body, and the soldier on the right sees with his own left the right side of that same middle body. Look at it, and you will understand.

But what follows delays this interpretation, or rather calls it back: "and so that the victory in a twofold event may itself be twofold." For thus, in a triple battle-line, the victory and the event would be not double but triple. Does he therefore understand by "joined" the battle-line attached below and doubled, of which we spoke, so that one line is placed behind another? This is what I think. In either formation, certainly, a man sees with his right the left of the wing placed beside him, and conversely.

Nor would I object if the text were written: "to behold a double, separated Mars," so that he names only two dispositions: the simple, undivided square, and this one separated into two wings. The sense is easy in this way.

These are the principal and accepted formations among the Romans, although they varied them slightly by advancing or withdrawing them. Examples will teach what I mean. For generally they charged equally with each wing and at the same time. Cato, in Festus, called this "with a straight front"; Tibullus, in the verses cited, "with fronts made equal." Vegetius says on this subject: "One manner of fighting is with a long front and the army squared, just as even now battle is customarily conducted almost always."

The second manner of fighting is oblique, when one wing is advanced before the other. The Greek tacticians write:

Λοξὴ φάλαγξ, ἢ τὸ μὲν κέρας ἕτερον, ὁπότερον ἂν προηγῆται, πλησίον τῶν πολεμίων ἔχουσα καὶ ἐν αὐτῷ τὸν ἀγῶνα ποιουμένη, τὸ δὲ ἕτερον ἐν ἀποστάσει δι' ὑποστολῆς ἔχουσα.

An oblique phalanx is one which brings one wing--whichever has been designated--nearer to the enemy and conducts the battle upon it, but holds the other at a distance by withdrawing it.

Vegetius writes concerning this kind: "The second manner of fighting is oblique and is far better. Its method is as follows. When the battle-lines have been formed and come to the encounter, you will then separate your left wing"--he means the wing and soon afterward calls it so--"farther from the enemy's right, so that neither missiles nor arrows reach it. But join your right wing to his left wing, and there first begin the battle."

But he wishes battle to be joined from the right side only, not likewise from the left. He condemns the latter because, as he says, "the assault is then as though maimed, and men whose bodies are exposed attack the enemy with difficulty." He advises well in view of the ancient armor. For if you advance your left wing against the enemy's right, you plainly expose your uncovered side to the enemy, who will safely attack it with missiles or arrows from his own left. This is what Vegetius means when he says that exposed men then attack the enemy, because shields are of course carried on the left. Whoever sought another cause and referred it to the weakness of the left-hand parts assuredly understood neither Vegetius nor the matter.

Caesar fought Ariovistus by this method. Although he had formed a triple battle-line, he nevertheless "joined battle from the right wing"--these are his words--because he had observed that this part of the enemy was least strong.

The third kind occurs when, in a triple battle-line, you withdraw the third and middle body from the enemy and send in only the wings. Seneca touches upon it: "Just as the same army at one time is spread out more widely, at another is contracted into a narrow space, and is either curved into wings while the middle part is recessed, or extended with a straight front."

Scipio employed this in Spain. After observing for several days that the enemy's battle-line was formed with the best men in the middle and the weaker on the wings, he arranged his own in the contrary manner and placed the auxiliaries in the middle, but the citizens and all the strength on the wings. "When the time for beginning the battle had now come," Livy says, "he ordered the Spaniards"--this was the middle battle-line--"to advance at a slow pace. He himself sent a messenger from the right wing to Silanus and Marcius, ordering them to extend the wing on the left side in the same manner as they saw him extending his on the right, and with the light infantry and cavalry to join battle before the middle battle-lines could meet one another. When the wings had been drawn apart in this manner, there was a hollow in the middle, because the standards of the Spaniards advanced more slowly."

This foresight and formation gave certain victory, because the strongest met the weakest, while the others, awaiting their own enemy, remained idle in the middle and were finally terrified by the flight and slaughter of other men.

The fourth kind is contrary to this, namely, when the middle battle-line itself projects and charges the enemy first. The Greeks call it bent, ἐπικαμπής, or also convex, κυρτόν. Aelian writes:

> Ἐπικαμπὴς συμβαίνει ἡ τάξις, ἐπὰν τὰ μέσα τοῖς πολεμίοις προσπίπτῃ, τὰ δὲ κέρατα ἐκ τῶν ὀπίσω μερῶν ὄρθια ὑφ' ἑαυτὴν ἔχῃ τεταγμένα.

A formation is called bent when its middle falls upon the enemy, while it has its wings placed straight behind it. Hannibal used this most skillfully in the battle of Cannae, but with this additional art: he made his wings exceedingly strong and preserved them intact; then, after the middle had been driven back and a hollow had been formed, he sent the wings in from both sides against the legions, thereby establishing a certain cause of his victory.

How useful it would be for our commanders to consider and employ such things! I believe that they will gradually do so, as I see the native ability and training of certain men who are now growing up.

§ 3. This battle-line, therefore, was customarily divided into wings when there were two legions and auxiliaries, which held the extreme wings.

§ 4. Sometimes two legions were in front with the allies, while two were placed in the rear. Thus Livy, book 27.

§ 5. Sometimes the battle-line is crescent-shaped, with the wings projecting on both sides, such as that of Scipio.

In this battle-line Vegetius approves an oblique movement, so that battle is fought first against the enemy's left wing; for in this manner the attacking wing will rise up more vigorously and be less exposed.

§ 6. Contrary to this is the formation in which the wings are drawn back and the middle advances.

Hannibal defeated the Romans in this manner at Cannae, but only after he had conquered in the cavalry battle. Livy, book 22: "Toward the end of the cavalry contest the battle of the infantry began. At first the ranks of the Gauls and Spaniards held together both in strength and courage. At length the Romans, after long and repeated exertions, drove back with an oblique front and a dense line the enemy's wedge, which was too thin and therefore insufficiently strong and which projected from the rest of the battle-line. Then, as the enemy were driven back and retreated in alarm, the Romans pressed upon them and were carried in one continuous advance through the headlong column of fugitives, first into the middle battle-line and finally, with no one resisting them, reached the African reserves.

"These had stood with their wings drawn back on both sides, while the Gauls and Spaniards stood in the middle and their line projected somewhat. When this wedge had been driven back, it first made the front level; then, by continuing to give ground, it even produced a hollow in the middle. The Africans had already made wings around it. When the Romans rushed incautiously into the middle, the Africans surrounded them with their wings; then, by extending the wings, they also closed the enemy in from the rear. From this point the Romans, having to no purpose completed one battle and lost the Gauls and Spaniards whose rear ranks they had cut down, entered into a fresh battle against the Africans--not only an unequal one because they were enclosed against enemies surrounding them, but also because, exhausted, they fought against fresh and vigorous men."

§ 7. In ancient times great account was taken of reserves. Vegetius, book 3, chapter 17: "The best method, however, and one which contributes very greatly to victory, is for the commander to have behind the battle-line, prepared in reserve, the most select infantrymen and cavalrymen, together with deputies, companions, and tribunes who are free of other duties--some around the wings, others around the middle. Wherever the enemy presses more violently, they should suddenly rush forward, lest the battle-line be broken, and fill the places; and by adding valor, they should break the enemy's audacity.

"The Laconians first discovered this. The Carthaginians imitated them, and afterward the Romans preserved it everywhere. No better disposition is found than this. For the straight battle-line must attempt this alone, if it can: to repel or rout the enemy. If a cuneus, or wedge, must be driven forward, or a forfex, or shears, you must have men behind the battle-line from whom you may form the wedge or shears. If a serra, or saw, must be drawn out, it will likewise be drawn from the surplus troops. For if you begin to transfer a regular soldier from his place, you will throw the whole formation into disorder.

"If a detached globus, or compact body, of the enemy begins to press either your wing or any part, unless you have surplus men whom you can oppose to the body, whether you remove infantry or cavalry from the battle-line, while you seek to protect one place you will expose another to greater danger. But if you do not abound in a multitude of fighting men, it is better to have a shorter battle-line, provided that you place a very large number in reserve. For near the middle parts of the field you ought to have the most select men from among the well-armed infantry, from whom you may form a wedge and immediately break the enemy's battle-line. Around the wings, moreover, it is fitting for you to surround the enemy's wings with cavalrymen armed with lances and cuirasses and reserved for this purpose, and with light infantry."

At the beginning the Gauls had an assault more than manly; afterward, as they languished, one less than womanly, because without order and discipline they expended everything upon the first attempt. When their arms failed them, they fell. Indeed, this is true of most enemies: wars that are strong in their first assault vanish through delays.

§ 8. The greatest care must be given to forming the battle-line. For just as stones heaped together at random do not contain water and do not make a wall, so even the bravest men cannot withstand an enemy assault unless they are arranged in the best manner. Accordingly, Nestor, the wisest of the Greeks, forms the battle-line in Iliad 4. Pyrrhus excelled in this art, and Hannibal gave Scipio the first place in it. Hence kings were called λαῶν κοσμήτορες, "arrangers of peoples."

§ 9. Writers command that the battle-line be formed first, because this appears more courageous and because one can do it more conveniently. I think otherwise when the camp is fortified or when you cannot be compelled to battle: form your line second. For you see the enemy's order, which is a great advantage, and he is compelled to wait for you while armed. You will add courage to your own men if they think that you are arranging them prudently; this will also be so because the enemy follows your movement, if you are cheerful.

One must observe whether the adversary is swift and rash; for then such men will easily be conquered, because the man who stands first in battle-line is less able to act. Since the man who first takes his position in the battle-line cannot easily withdraw, he is compelled to await the other. When Hasdrubal had led out his army without food, Scipio commanded his own men to rest and take food. At the seventh hour, when the enemy was returning to camp because of hunger, thirst, and weariness, he led out his forces and conquered.

§ 10. It matters greatly on what side you attack in battle. When Scipio had Spaniards on his right wing and Hanno had Africans on his left, Scipio attacked the left wing; after defeating the Africans, he received into surrender the Spaniards, who were fighting for a foreign dominion. When Philip saw that the front of the Illyrians was strong and their wings weak, he attacked the wings and routed them.

Pammenes the Theban acted more dangerously. When he saw that the strongest Persians were on their right wing, he placed weak men opposite them on his own left and ordered them to flee, but with his own right wing he attacked and defeated the enemy's left. For he had ordered the men on his left to withdraw into rugged places.

The man who forms his battle-line second chooses on what side he will attack and whom he will oppose to whom. The arrangement of a battle-line therefore cannot be determined once for all, much less can the same intervals always be used. It must be disposed according to practical need, according to what the enemy does, or according to what one can advantageously do oneself.

When Scipio saw that Hannibal had eighty elephants, he established open ranks with large intervals, so that he could receive and elude the beasts without harm. When Archelaus had an abundance of chariots, Sulla fixed stakes so that they would be caught. He made open ranks and sent cavalrymen through them, who threw the battle-line into disorder.

§ 11. Sometimes it is better to form the battle-line first in order to inspire terror, but this has no place except against the inexperienced. Thus, when the Turks were about to fight at sea against Don John of Austria, they persuaded themselves that the Christians would flee as soon as they saw the fleet. Otherwise it is best to see what the enemy is doing, so that you may place obstacles in his way.

In the same manner, when Hirtuleius had brought his soldiers up to the rampart of Metellus Pius on a sweltering day, Metellus held his own men back until the sixth hour and then defeated the enemy when they had been exhausted by the heat.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

Stratagems of Those Engaged in Battle

§ 1. Those who deny that these are lawful think in a manner that is excessively old-fashioned and arrogant. Joshua and David employed stratagem, as did not only other great commanders but also holy men. Those are excessively simple who think:

> οὐδεὶς ἀνὴρ εὔψυχος ἀξιοῖ λάθρᾳ κτεῖναι τὸν ἐχθρόν.

No one of sound mind thinks it right secretly to kill a public enemy. "I do not wish to steal victory" is an impious rather than a noble saying. Holy and noble is that theft by which citizens are preserved and vain glory is despised for the sake of public safety. A skilled hunter takes wild beasts by guile. Augustine puts it excellently in his Questions on Joshua 4, questions 9 and 10: "When a war is undertaken justly, whether a man fights openly or from ambush makes no difference to justice." Indeed, if victory can be sought by a good guile or stratagem, one must not proceed by force, because danger would be encountered without cause. And the resourcefulness of that most warlike state is to be praised, which commanded that a cock be sacrificed for a bloody victory but an ox for an ingenious one.

Furthermore, this must be considered: success does not always attend one who is fully prepared against the weak, and victory can turn upon a very small matter. An example is the battle that took place in the city of Perugia between the noble and rival families of the Oddi and the Baglioni. Machiavelli relates the matter in book 3, chapter 14, of The Discourses. For when that city was afflicted by civil dissensions and was wholly divided into the two factions of the Oddi and the Baglioni, the latter, having become more powerful, drove the former into exile. The exiled Oddi had gathered an army through the assistance of friends and, having entered Perugia on a certain night, were secretly hastening to seize the forum. But because the individual streets in that city, fortified beforehand with chains stretched across them, impeded the passage of cavalrymen, a certain man with an iron hammer went before them and broke the fastenings of the chains. All the chains had already been broken except only the one that closed the entrance into the forum itself. When the same man was attempting to break it with great exertion, and was prevented from raising the hammer high enough by those who followed at his back and had already sounded the call to arms, he said to them, "Go back," so that he might, of course, break the chain more freely. But this utterance, sent like an echo from the first men to those behind, and by these to others, gradually reached the last men. It caused those at the rear, who did not understand why it had been uttered, to flee with great violence. The rest gradually followed them, abandoned their undertaking, and themselves became the cause of their own destruction, having been disturbed by so slight and accidental an occurrence.

All stratagems are lawful provided that faith and dignity are preserved; all that contain treachery are to be abominated. Pompey defeated Mithridates in Armenia by ordering his cavalry to withdraw until it had reached the place of ambush. Cassius in the same manner drew the Parthian into an ambush after showing cavalry in front and concealing infantry. Ventidius crushed them by the same means, so that they were compelled to depart from the province. Thus he defeated and killed Pharnapates. Caesar preoccupied the hills against Afranius; Juba drew Curio out into the plain and routed his encircled cavalry. Hannibal never failed to employ ambushes. He exposed a few soldiers to Fulvius through the mist and attacked the opposite part of the camp. Against Minucius he concealed infantry in the mountains, and he would have destroyed Minucius had Fabius not come to his aid. At the Trebia Hannibal with remarkable skill so deceived Sempronius that he wore out his fasting army in severe cold by making it cross the river. At Lake Trasimene he drew the Romans into the mountain, and Flaminius did not perceive the ambush before he was surrounded in front, on the flank, and in the rear and was destroyed with his army. He attacked Junius's camp after keeping the Romans disturbed for the entire night by means of six hundred cavalrymen. At Cannae he crushed the Romans by the pretense of six hundred deserters, a device Licinius the consul imitated against the Iapygians.

Care must diligently be taken that guiles do not become known. For how did it profit Semiramis to bring forward camels in the trappings of elephants if the Indians knew of it? What advantage did a childish stratagem bring the people of Fidenae when they sent infantry with torches into the army? Guiles are not guiles unless you manage them with cunning. Certainly the foremost prudence of a prince is to guard especially against the guiles of war. They depict a sword smeared with garlic and thereby separated from a magnet, and inscribe upon it the maxim, "Neither by force nor by guile," which is the emblem of an unconquered prince.

§ 2. Some stratagems belong to war, others to battles. Certain stratagems of war are general and must always be observed when this can be done. The Roman people had various stratagems, of which this was the principal one: they would not readily enter a war or attempt a new province unless they had friends in it or nearby whose assistance they could employ. They defended their Campanian friends against Samnium, and that became the cause of the destruction of the Samnites. They occupied Etruria through the assistance of the Camertes and Sicily through the Mamertines. The Athenians led them into Macedonia; the Rhodians, into Asia; the dissension of the Jewish brothers, into Syria; and royal offspring, into Egypt. By the same method the Spaniard occupied the greatest regions in both Indies, since they always procured with great effort, payment, and hope certain men who preferred foreign dominions. The Turk also overturns everyone while bringing assistance to others; he has faithful friends even in the midst of Europe.

§ 3. Another fraud is to introduce discussion of a truce and peace until one's forces are better prepared, or so that the spirits of the enemy may grow slack and, enticed by the sweetness of peace, abandon their care for war.

§ 4. This too is customary: to aid belligerents in such a way that assistance is sent to the weaker party until, after each side has been weakened, it submits itself to the victor. For a state that sustains a war not by its own assistance but by another's is in the power of its helper.

§ 5. A war must never be greatly feared when many conspire against one; for the man who can withstand their first assaults will easily overcome them all. In 1484 the Italians conspired against the Venetians. The latter won over Ludovico, duke of Milan, with gifts and easily dispelled every danger. Thus also, when the German princes conspired against Charles V, the war was brought to an end at its first assault.

§ 6. Some men have wearied an enemy with sleeplessness by nocturnal disturbances while remaining within a fortified camp. Epaminondas harassed the camp of the Lacedaemonians throughout the entire night by means of a few light-armed cavalrymen and on the following day attacked them when they were exhausted. When Epaminondas came to Mount Oneium, he ordered his army to rest; in the morning he defeated the enemy when they were worn out by their watch. When Titus Quinctius thought that the Volsci would attack his camp, he left a cohort on station during the night, but commanded the trumpeters to ride around the rampart on horses and sound their instruments; then in the morning he attacked and routed the weary enemy.

§ 7. Many men have used the enemy's superstition for their own advantages. I shall adduce only this single instance here, because it shows in a wonderful manner the remarkable wretchedness of the superstitious. Panarmus and Gonippus, Messenians, went into the camp of the Laconians with beautiful horses, white tunics, and purple military cloaks. They were believed by those men to be Castor and Pollux, killed many, mocked the superstition, and then returned unharmed to their own men.

§ 8. When the flight either of the entire army or of one part is feigned, great care must be applied lest some of the soldiers think that it is a true flight and panic arise. When the Romans on one occasion perceived that the enemy was strong, they ordered the velites and hastati to withdraw to their starting positions once battle had begun; then they killed those who followed with ill-considered ardor. Hannibal placed torches and hay upon the horns of oxen and drove them through the woods. While the Romans were astonished at the movement of fire by night, he escaped by another road. The Spaniards struck the Carthaginians still more violently with a stratagem, for they sent burning carts drawn by oxen into Hamilcar's army and threw its ranks into disorder.

§ 9. When Scipio saw that the strength of Hasdrubal's army was in the middle of the battle-line, he arranged matters in the battle-line itself so that those men should remain idle. For he ordered the wings to advance more swiftly and the middle battle-line more slowly, so that after the wings had been defeated the courage of the middle also might fail. Justinian, the prefect of the emperor Tiberius, conquered while he waited until the Persians had emptied their quivers; for when matters came to swords, he found them inferior.

§ 10. The best stratagem is to guard against opposing stratagems. Archelaidas, although unaware of the ambush, nevertheless ordered his men to advance in formation, saying that there was an ambush; and one truly existed, so that he easily dispersed the men lying in wait. Otherwise, both those who fall into an ambush and those who come to their assistance are in equal danger. Sertorius cast Pompey's soldiers into an ambush and slaughtered, while Pompey himself looked on, the legion that had come to their assistance; ten thousand were killed.

Assistance is cunningly diverted elsewhere, because that terrifies the enemy more. When Parmenion saw that the Tyrians had made a sortie and that the Macedonians were giving way and being hard pressed, he did not aid them but attacked the city. Polyainos, book 5.

§ 11. If a man, enclosed between mountains and rivers or the enemy's garrisons, despairs of being able to escape, he will display everything as though he were going to escape through trackless places, while in the meantime he secretly prepares everything pertaining to bridges and swimming the river; and after threatening one part, he will flee by another.

Iphicrates most skillfully corrected his error. When, on his way to Sicyon, he had passed beyond an ambush, someone from the city cried out, "Now you will pay the penalty." Suspecting that these were not empty threats, he swiftly withdrew by another road and crushed the ambushers.

§ 12. Remarkable also was the stratagem of Titus Didius, who, when he knew that a legion was to be intercepted, pretended that he wished to fight and, after leading out his army, diverted the enemy from concern for the intercepted legion.

§ 13. When camp is set opposite camp, it will be of great advantage if you divide the enemy's forces. For this purpose it will be especially advantageous to have a camp as strongly fortified as possible, so that many men may be dispatched in different directions from it.

§ 14. Men sometimes spread certain reports suddenly in order to animate their soldiers and terrify the enemy--for example, that the enemy's commander has fallen. When Quinctius saw that one wing was giving way, he proclaimed that the other had conquered, and thus added eagerness to his own men and fear to the enemy. This is also a customary means of terrifying enemies.

Edward of England withdrew Philip the Fair from his attack upon Belgium by fraud, for he persuaded Philip's sister that the princes of Gaul had conspired to desert him in the battle-line. Memnon of Rhodes persuaded the enemy that his soldiers were afflicted by mutiny and thereby drew them out into the plains. There was more pretense in Antigonus Hierax. After he had been defeated and had withdrawn his army into safe places, he pretended to be dead. Men were sent, supposedly by the soldiers, to seek the dead man's body and make surrender; when four thousand men had been sent to accept the surrender, Antigonus killed them.

§ 15. Fraudulence resting upon such petty lies is unworthy of a commander. The stratagem of Croesus, who opposed camels to horses because the latter cannot bear their smell, proceeded from natural observation and from intelligence and prudence. Pyrrhus likewise stationed elephants opposite the cavalry, so that he might fill both horses and horsemen with terror of the beasts.

§ 16. Cruel and rash was the deed of Sertorius. When the death of a certain commander was reported to him during battle, he killed the man who had reported it, lest the matter spread. It was cruel, I say, and rash, because others already knew it, and the messenger had not reported it to Sertorius alone. The anger and fear arising from this could therefore have turned the battle-line away.

§ 17. When Lutatius Catulus the consul had to cross a river with the Cimbri in pursuit, he pretended that he was going to fight, fortified a camp, and sent out foragers. Then, when the Cimbri did the same, he quietly crossed the river.

The man who has the greater number in battle must be admonished to fight with the utmost caution. For since the weaker man attempts everything, he does not require admonition; great forces produce pride, carelessness, negligence, and disaster. The weaker enemy must therefore be feared, because he will strike with an unexpected blow. But the stronger man has many resources for stratagems: he can suddenly extend the battle-line; he can place many men separately in ambush on the flank; he can send in what is, as it were, a new column from the rear; and he can detach men to attack the camp in the midst of the heat of battle. When he employs some or all of these measures, he does so not as though fearing the enemy but in order to finish the war quickly and with little loss.

§ 18. When a battle must be fought, the commander should be continually occupied in considering stratagems, for that is accomplished best which the enemy does not expect. After Epaminondas had created the expectation of a cavalry contest by raising an immense cloud of dust, he suddenly reached the rear of the unsuspecting enemy.

§ 19. Prudently to conceal and dissemble a disaster has brought the name of victory. Titus Licinius buried his own dead. When the enemy on the following day saw that far more of their own men had been slain, they immediately fled. Thus the nocturnal burial of the bodies produced a complete victory.

§ 20. Sometimes the enemy is deceived while he thinks provision is being made for him. Eumenes' soldiers were going to plunder the enemy's baggage at great risk. When he could not persuade them to change their plan, he warned the enemy to guard it better.

§ 21. When an enemy pressing upon you tries to compel you to do something which necessity demands, and you cannot escape the necessity, undertake it voluntarily and submit to the danger with great courage. For in this manner you will act in an orderly way, without disturbance or fear, and you will thoroughly terrify the enemy by the impression of magnanimity and boldness. Is it dangerous for your fields to be burned? Concede them voluntarily as a benefit. Timotheus permitted a part of the territory to the enemy and forbade ravaging with fire or sword.

When Chares the Athenian feared that his camp might be attacked out of contempt for the smallness of his force, he secretly sent many men out by night so that, when they returned in the morning where the enemy could see them, they might present the appearance of reinforcements. When Ptolemy had advanced before his army, he attached wagons to every kind of livestock and ordered them to be driven by cavalrymen; by raising a very great cloud of dust, he presented the appearance of an immense army. Gaius Marius and Sulpicius ordered camp servants mounted upon pack animals to appear from a mountain during the battle and present the appearance of another army; by this means they threw the enemy's battle-line into disorder.

§ 22. Whether it is better to make an assault upon the enemy or to sustain one is disputed among commanders. Decius attacked the enemy; Fabius sustained the assault. The soldier who attacks is more courageous; the one who receives the enemy is more prudent. If the intervening space is somewhat long, it is better to receive him, for the enemy arrives out of breath. If the enemy is more timid, he must be attacked; if he is bold, his assault must be sustained, for he will be wearied by his first onset.

But firearms have now changed the practice of war. When matters have come within missile range, the man who is ready first inflicts loss and kills some who would have done harm; but this depends upon other circumstances, and especially upon the place.

§ 23. The nature of places often profits more than the valor of the combatants or a veteran commander. Place certainly has the greatest importance for the matter. Marcus Curius defeated Pyrrhus by drawing the phalanx into narrow places.

Men generally contrive to fight from elevated ground. Thus Pompey defeated Mithridates, Caesar defeated Pharnaces, and Lucullus defeated Mithridates and Tigranes. Themistocles defeated Xerxes in narrow waters, the few defeating the many. Datames with a few soldiers always defeated many because he never joined battle without keeping the enemy confined by the narrowness of the places. Thus Aemilius Probus.

Sertorius wore down the Roman forces by skirmishes. Hannibal placed precipitous roads as an obstacle on one flank and defeated Marcellus; at Cannae he used the river Volturnus as a fortification. The Roman Hannibal, Caesar, imitated this in book 3 of The Civil War: "His right wing was protected by a certain stream with difficult banks. For this reason he had posted all his cavalry, all the archers, and the slingers on the left wing."

§ 24. Many men have made a suitable place by art. Cleomenes the Lacedaemonian encumbered with trees the plain upon which he was going to fight Hippias with cavalry and made it impassable for a horseman. Xanthippus led the Carthaginian army, which was strong in horses and elephants, into a plain and defeated the Romans. Clearchus caught the enemy's cavalry in pits that were suddenly made; Quintus Sertorius crushed the hostile cavalry by making trenches.

Camps must be fortified with wagon wheels sunk into the ground, chains, a rampart, and caltrops; the soldiery must remain united. The Germans, while pitching camp in different places in Gaul, were cut down by the Guises. Hannibal also awaited the wind at Cannae and conquered by this means. The Cimbri likewise fought against Marius on the Raudian Plain by the same stratagem. The Cimbri also employed the assistance of the sun so that, by the reflection of its rays, they might dazzle the enemy's eyes; but this was a small assistance. The Romans were also aided in the Pontic War by the setting moon. For since it was already near its setting behind the Romans and cast their long shadows, the men of Pontus, in great error, expended their missiles upon those shadows.

Because Eumenes was strong in cavalry, by occupying the ground he brought it about that he drew the enemy down into level places. Hannibal did the same, but cautiously, so that he took account of the cavalry engagements on each side; for he also defeated the Romans' left wing by stratagem.

§ 25. Therefore, just as a camp must be disposed according to the advantage of places, so I judge that a battle-line must be disposed. It is customarily divided in general into various forms: first, so that it is oblong; second, broad; third, resembling a crescent turned toward the enemy; and fourth, crescent-shaped with its horns turned away. For the remaining forms are generally not customary when battle is fought with an entire line. Nevertheless, an extraordinary formation must always be held in readiness.

§ 26. The instruction of Bernardino de Mendoza, part 1, chapter 44, is remarkable. "It is held to be a useful stratagem in battle," he says, "if some troop of lancers and firearm-bearing cavalry is drawn out from the right side of the column, even if it is a fifth part of the column, to attack the enemy from the flank when the battle grows hot. Thus, if the enemy turns against the troop, he presents a bare flank to the column; if he opposes himself to the column, he exposes his flank to the troop. Because the stratagem is of great assistance toward victory, I do not indeed know whether it has been customary among infantrymen; it was of great use to me among cavalrymen, when I arranged light-armed troops for this purpose. I observed that the enemy was affected by great loss in this way even if there were only twenty-five men in a single troop; and with divine assistance I broke up very many columns and, as a soldier, obtained notable victories for our king, the father of Your Majesty."

He teaches that lancers are most suitable for this plan. For a squadron of one hundred or one hundred and twenty lancers can disperse a squadron of four hundred or five hundred firearm-bearing cavalrymen if they divide themselves into smaller troops and attack impetuously in several places; for firearms are rendered useless in that manner and cannot be brought into action.

In their reserves our countrymen not only establish definite ranks but also keep for employment, even among the foremost troops, certain columns which they call "flying." These sometimes provoke the enemy, sometimes assist those who are hard pressed, and also fight, if the enemy has formed his battle-line first, until the other battle-line has been formed.

CHAPTER XXXIX

Other Forms of Battle-Lines

§ 1. Almost all outstanding commanders, because they do not fight without a favorable opportunity, have discovered something new in forming a battle-line. Hence wedges, compact bodies, shears, towers, and saws. They call it a wedge when the battle-line is triangular. Vegetius, book 1, chapter 26. The Greeks call it ἔμβολον, "a ram"; in the time of Ammianus it was called the "boar's head." Suidas, drawing from Agathias, as translated by Lipsius, says:

"Their form of battle-line was like a beak. For it resembled the letter Δ. The front part, where it ended in a point, was covered and dense, because it was fortified on every side with shields. You might say that they had fashioned a boar's head by this structure. But the legs on each side, arranged in depth according to ranks and cohorts and extended obliquely for the most part, gradually came together and separated until, having extended to the greatest breadth, they came to an end. Thus the middle space was left empty and the unprotected backs of the soldiers were visible rank by rank."

The Franks and Romans employed it when they wished to break through a battle-line. But it must be used when a way must necessarily be made, for it is an altogether dangerous thing. Secondly, it must be used only when the enemy's ranks are sparse; otherwise they will strike against a solid body. Thirdly, it must never be used when fighting against skilled men, for it is easy for them either to oppose a dense battle-line or to open their ranks so as to enclose the wedge in the middle. "Wedge" is sometimes said of the Macedonian phalanx and of another form of battle-line, as Lipsius teaches.

§ 2. The inverted wedge is the forceps, or shears; the wedge is received or worn away by this formation. The formation called a tower, and the one called a brick, do not differ from the preceding forms. In it men repeatedly advance and withdraw.

The Polybian legion had one hundred men in its front and thirty-four inward along its side; the triarii were half as numerous as the other divisions of the legion. In antiquity a soldier had three feet in every direction, so that he could handle his weapons conveniently, and this was the minimum. Polybius gives this account, but Vegetius speaks otherwise in book 3, chapter 14:

"Individual armed men have customarily occupied three feet each in a straight line. That is, within one thousand paces, one thousand six hundred and sixty-six infantrymen are arranged lengthwise, so that the battle-line does not show daylight through it and yet there is space for handling weapons. But they wished the distance in breadth between one rank and the rank behind it to be six feet, so that the combatants might have space to advance and withdraw; for missiles are cast more violently with a leap and a run.

"In these first two ranks men mature in age, confident from experience, and protected also by heavier arms are stationed. These, like a wall, must be compelled neither to give ground nor to follow another, lest they throw the ranks into disorder; instead they must receive the advancing adversaries and repel or rout them by standing and fighting. The third rank is formed of the swiftest light-armed troops, young archers, and good javelin throwers, whom they formerly called ferentarii. The fourth rank likewise is formed of the nimblest shield-bearers, younger archers, and those who fight vigorously with darts and martiobarbuli, which they call lead-weighted darts; these were called the light-armed troops.

"One must therefore know that, while the first two ranks remain standing, the third and fourth ranks always go forward first to provoke the enemy with missiles and arrows. If they have been able to turn the enemy to flight, they themselves pursue together with the cavalry. But if they have been repulsed by the enemy, they return to the first and second battle-lines and are received between them into their own places. The first and second battle-lines sustain the whole war when matters have come, as they say, to swords and javelins.

“In the fifth battle-line were sometimes placed wagon-mounted ballistae, hand-ballista men, staff-slingers, and slingers. Staff-slingers are those who cast stones with staff-slings. A staff-sling is a staff four feet long, to the middle of which a leather sling is fastened; propelled with both hands, it directs stones almost in the manner of an onager. Slingers are those who, with a sling made of flax or woven hair--for they say these are better--direct stones by whirling an arm around the head. Those who lacked them fought in this rank either with stones cast by hand or with missiles; they called them accensi, as being younger and added afterward.

“After all the others, the sixth rank was held by the strongest warriors, bearing shields and fortified with every kind of weapon; the ancients called them triarii. These men, so that, rested and fresh, they might attack the enemy more vigorously, customarily sat behind the last battle-lines. For if anything had befallen the first ranks, the entire hope of restoration depended upon their strength.”

And in chapter 15:

“Now that the manner in which battle-lines ought to be formed has been explained, I shall set forth the podismos, or measurement, of the formation itself. Within one thousand paces of ground, one battle-line receives one thousand six hundred and sixty-six infantrymen, because individual combatants occupy three feet each. But if you wish to arrange six battle-lines within one thousand paces of ground, nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-six infantrymen are necessary. If, however, you wish to extend this number in three ranks, you will encompass two thousand paces. But it is better to make more battle-lines than to spread out the soldiery.

“We have said, moreover, that six feet in breadth ought to intervene in the rear between the individual battle-lines, and the combatants themselves, standing, occupy one foot each. Accordingly, if you arrange six battle-lines, an army of ten thousand men will occupy forty-two feet in breadth and one thousand paces in length. But if you wish to arrange them in three, an army of ten thousand will occupy twenty-one feet in breadth and two thousand paces in length. According to this calculation, whether there are twenty thousand or thirty thousand infantrymen, they will without any uncertainty or difficulty be able to be arranged according to the measure of the podismos. Nor is the commander deceived when he knows how many armed men a place can contain.

“Finally, if the place is narrower, or if the multitude is sufficient, it is fitting for even nine or more battle-lines to be formed from them. For it is more expedient that they fight close together than separated too widely. For if the battle-line has been made too thin, it is swiftly broken through by an assault of the adversaries, and afterward no remedy can exist. Which numbers ought to be arranged on the right wing, which on the left, and which in the middle is either observed by custom according to their ranks, or certainly changed according to the character of the enemy.”

§ 3. The form of the battle-line is now determined according to the advantage of the places and according as the enemy establishes his own. Account is also taken of nations, some of which are more disposed toward certain forms; and therefore, if that form is adopted, they fight more skillfully and confidently. When the front is broad, they wish it to exceed the depth by one third; when the battle-line is deeper than it is broad, they require the same proportion. Nevertheless, I understand that this must be varied if the enemy’s battle-line or the situation of the places requires it.

The wings of firearm-bearing cavalry surround the flanks. Light-armed cavalry fights by troops; cuirassiers preserve their ranks more closely. Mendoza compares the battle-line to a human body. He says that firearm-bearers are like the hands and feet; light cavalry, the lower legs and arms; cuirassiers, the hips; legions of infantry, the breast; the commander, the head; and the baggage, the belly. The man who attacks the enemy puts forward his right hand; if he must wrestle, he exerts himself with all his strength at once.

When there are lancers and firearm-bearing cavalrymen, the latter occupy the battle-lines and begin the engagement a little sooner than the lancers; the lancers cast down those whose order has been disturbed. They employ these methods even in conflicts between few men. Some think that lancers are joined to others disadvantageously because they can effect nothing at a distance. But when joined to cavalrymen carrying long firearms and to infantrymen whom they call musketeers, they are useful. Therefore they must by no means be neglected.

CHAPTER XL

Various Examples of Battle-Lines

§ 1. Crassus formed a square against the Parthians, so that twelve cohorts held each side and a troop of cavalry was attached to each cohort. But he did this in alarm and like a man stunned. For by dividing the cavalry he rendered every part weak, although the Parthians were superior in cavalry.

§ 2. The Triballi in Stobaeus, Discourse 52, make a different disposition. The first part contains the weak, who provoke the enemy to battle; the second, the strongest; the third, cavalrymen; the fourth, women.

Xanthippus's battle-line was skillfully contrived. For he commanded the light-armed auxiliaries to provoke the enemy and withdraw; the bravest men then received the enemy, and while the battle took place between them, the auxiliaries were again to break out from the wings.

Cyrus, following Croesus's counsel, advanced into the kingdom of Tomyris, whereas otherwise he would have lost his kingdom. Herodotus, book 1. And there he established a new battle-line by which he also conquered.

§ 3. Those who have chariots and elephants place them in the first battle-line. For they very easily throw the enemy's ranks into disorder, whereas if they are in the middle of the battle-line they crush whatever stands in their way.

§ 4. The battle-line of the Hungarians against the Turks, established by Toroneus, had cavalrymen and infantrymen intermingled, so that it could not be surrounded; for he expanded the ranks in such a way that it was equal to a great multitude.

They now approve another method, which is customary. Against the Turks' crescent-shaped battle-line the army must be divided into three parts, so that two fight against the wings while the middle battle-line remains immovable until it comes together with the enemy and fights.

§ 5. Alexander also established another battle-line at Arbela. Frontinus, book 2, chapter 3: "When Alexander at Arbela feared the multitude of the enemy but trusted the valor of his own men, he formed a battle-line facing in every direction, so that, if surrounded, they could fight on every side."

§ 6. Vegetius proposes several kinds in book 3, chapter 20:

"There are seven kinds or manners of fighting when hostile standards clash on each side. The first manner of fighting is with a long front and a squared army, just as battle is customarily conducted even now and almost always. But men skilled in arms do not judge this manner of fighting to be the best, because when the battle-line is extended over a long space, the ground that occurs is not always level; and when a hollow or curve occurs in some part of it, the battle-line is frequently broken in that place. Moreover, if the adversary is superior in number, he surrounds either the right or the left wing from the flanks. In this lies great danger unless you have surplus troops to run forward and sustain the enemy. Only the man who has both more numerous and brave warriors ought to engage by this method, so that he may surround the enemy from each wing and enclose the hostile army, as it were, within his own bosom.

"The second manner of fighting is oblique, and is much better. In it, if you arrange a few vigorous men in a suitable place, even if you are troubled by the enemy's multitude and valor, you will nevertheless be able to carry off victory. Its method is as follows. When the formed battle-lines come to the encounter, you will then separate your left wing farther from the enemy's right, so that neither missiles nor arrows reach it. But join your right wing to his left wing, and there first begin the battle, so that with your best cavalrymen and most approved infantrymen you attack and encircle his left part, to which you have joined yourself, and, by thrusting it back and overrunning it, reach the enemy's rear. If you once begin to drive the adversaries from there, as your own men come up you will attain an undoubted victory, while the part of your army which you have removed from the enemy will remain secure. In this manner of fighting the battle-line is formed in the likeness of the letter A or a carpenter's level. But if the adversary has done this first, you will gather at your left wing those cavalrymen as well as infantrymen whom we have said ought to be placed as surplus troops behind the battle-line, and thus you will resist the adversary with great forces, lest you be driven away by his art.

"The third manner of fighting is similar to the second, but is worse in this respect: you begin from your left wing to clash with his right. For the assault of those who fight on the left wing is, as it were, maimed, and men whose bodies are exposed attack the enemy with difficulty. I shall explain this more clearly. If at any time your left wing is much better, join the strongest cavalrymen and infantrymen with it, and in the encounter apply it first to the enemy's right wing; and hasten as much as you can to drive back and surround the adversary's right part. But remove the other part of your army, in which you know that you have the worse warriors, as far as possible from his left, lest it either be attacked with swords or reached by missiles. In this kind care must be taken lest your battle-line be struck transversely by the enemy's wedges. Battle will be conducted advantageously in this manner in one case only: if the adversary has a weaker right wing and you a much stronger left.

"The fourth manner of fighting is as follows. When you have formed the battle-line, four or five hundred paces before you reach the enemy, who does not expect it, you ought suddenly to urge forward both your wings, so that from each wing you may unexpectedly turn the enemy to flight and attain victory more quickly. But although this manner of contest swiftly conquers if it brings forward trained and exceedingly brave men, it is nevertheless dangerous, because the man who fights thus is compelled to expose his middle battle-line and separate his army into two parts. If the enemy is not conquered at the first assault, he afterward has an opportunity to attack both the divided wings and the abandoned middle battle-line.

"The fifth manner of fighting is similar to the fourth but has this one thing in addition: it places light-armed troops and archers before the middle battle-line so that, by resisting, they may prevent it from being broken into. For thus it attacks the enemy's left with its own right wing and the enemy's right with its own left. If it can put the enemy to flight, it immediately conquers; if not, its middle battle-line does not suffer because it is defended by the light-armed troops and archers.

"The sixth manner of fighting is the best and almost similar to the second. It is employed by those who despair of both the number and valor of their own men, and, if they have formed their line well, they often attain victory although they have fewer men. For when your formed battle-line approaches the enemy, join your right wing to the enemy's left and there begin the battle by means of the most approved cavalrymen and the swiftest infantrymen. But remove the remaining part of your army as far as possible from the adversaries' right part and extend it in a straight line like a spit. For when you begin to cut down their left part both from the flanks and from the rear, you will without doubt turn them to flight. But the adversary cannot assist his struggling men either from his right part or from the middle battle-line, because your battle-line is extended and stretches in its entirety in the likeness of the letter I, and withdraws very far from the enemy. Battle is often joined by this method on marches.

"The seventh manner of fighting is one in which the advantage of the place assists the combatant. In this manner also you will be able to withstand the adversary both with fewer and with less brave men. That is, if on one side you have a mountain, sea, river, lake, city, marshes, or precipices from which the enemy cannot approach, and arrange the rest of your army in a straight battle-line. But on the wing which does not have a fortification you should place all the cavalrymen and ferentarii. Then you will fight more securely with the enemy at your discretion, because on one side the nature of the place fortifies you, while on the other almost double cavalry is placed.

"Nevertheless, this must be observed, for nothing better is found: whether you wish to fight with the right wing alone, place the bravest men there; or with the left, station the most vigorous there; or if you wish to form wedges in the middle by which you may break the enemy's battle-line, arrange the most experienced warriors in the wedge. For victory is customarily achieved by a few. It is enough that men selected by the wisest commander be arranged in those places which strategy and advantage require."

§ 7. The battle-lines of Archelaus and Sulla departed greatly from the common formation. Frontinus, book 2, chapter 3:

"Against Lucius Sulla, Archelaus placed scythed chariots in front to throw the enemy into disorder; in the second battle-line, the Macedonian phalanx; in the third, armed auxiliaries according to the Roman custom, intermingled with deserters of the Italian nation, in whose agility he had the greatest trust; and he stationed the light-armed troops in the last position. Then on each flank he placed cavalry, of which he had a great number, for the purpose of surrounding the enemy.

"Against these measures Sulla drew trenches of great breadth on each flank and fortified their ends with forts. By this method he secured himself from being surrounded by an enemy superior in the number of infantry and especially in cavalry. Then he formed a triple battle-line of infantry, leaving intervals through which he might send the light-armed troops and the cavalry, which he had stationed in the last position, when circumstances demanded it. He then commanded the soldiers before the standards, who were in the second battle-line, to drive thick, numerous stakes firmly into the ground. As the chariots approached, he withdrew his battle-line within the stakes and behind the standards. Then at last, after a universal shout had been raised, he ordered the velites and light-armed troops to shower missiles upon them.

"When these things had been done, the enemy's chariots either became entangled in the stakes or, terrified by the shouting and missiles, turned against their own men and threw the Macedonian formation into disorder. When it gave ground while Sulla stood firm, and Archelaus opposed his cavalry, the Roman cavalrymen, suddenly sent forward, turned them away and completed the victory."

CHAPTER XLI

Military Exhortation and the Responses of an Army

§ 1. A dismayed army is impelled to fight either by shame or by fear. By shame, as when the commander casts a standard among the enemy. Servius Tullius did this as a young man under Tarquin; Furius Agrippa, Titus Quinctius Capitolinus, Marcus Furius Camillus, and Salvius Pelignus imitated him. Or it occurs when the commander flies forward into the first battle-line. Thus Lucius Sulla, when the legions were giving way before the army of Mithridates, darted into the first battle-line with his sword drawn and told the soldiers that, if anyone asked where they had left their commander, they should answer, “In Boeotia.” Julius Caesar also sprang forward on foot into the first battle-line at Munda, and thus the soldiers conquered while they were ashamed to desert him.

Quintus Furius restrained men fleeing through fear by threatening that he would receive no one into the camp unless he was victorious. Scipio at Numantia threatened that those who fled would become enemies to him. Marcus Atilius and Philip of Macedon did the same. Priscus the dictator and Cornelius Cossus killed a standard-bearer who hesitated.

§ 2. A brief exhortation in a crisis is effective. Iphicrates promised victory if, when he gave the signal, they would advance one step; he gave it when the situation was inclining toward defeat and conquered. Epaminondas too employed the same kind of exhortation. When Alexander saw his men giving way, he said, “Once more, Macedonian men, let us advance once more”; and thus they drove back the enemy. Therefore, when the battle-line gives way, restrain those retreating; if they return, they have conquered. Caesar indeed:

> He himself puts swords into their hands and supplies their missiles;
>
> he himself moves forward the battle-lines and drives the backs of his men, > and with the butt of his reversed spear rouses those who cease and hold back.

§ 3. There is greater danger when an army is afraid. In such a situation it must be aroused by some remarkable confidence, and this generally can be accomplished in no other way than for the soldiers to think that there is a hidden reinforcement and a stratagem. Fulvius Nobilior gave courage to his men, who were about to fight the victorious Samnites, by saying that one enemy legion had been corrupted by him with money for the purpose of betrayal; and he commanded the tribunes, centurions, and chief centurions to contribute whatever gold and silver they had for the immediate payment of the reward to the traitors. Hence came eagerness and victory.

Therefore one must exhort not only openly--which is sometimes the act of a man who lacks confidence--but through hidden channels, so that courage may increase. When Lucullus saw the army of Tigranes from elevated ground, he said, “We have conquered, soldiers; we have conquered.” He pierced the legs and thighs of the cuirassiers with swords; they cut apart their spear shafts with swords.

§ 4. It is useful to arouse emulation. Against Ariovistus Caesar said that he would fight with the Tenth Legion. It gave him thanks for his judgment, and the others were inflamed by shame for battle.

§ 5. Marcus Fabius and Gnaeus Manlius inflamed soldiers who refused battle because of mutinies by delaying, since they could not endure the enemy’s insults. Lucius Sulla wearied his soldiers with works until they demanded battle; thus labor served in place of exhortation. When the Lacedaemonian soldiers had deposited their most precious possessions at Orchomenus, Agesilaus ordered the townsmen not to receive anything, so that the army might fight more ardently for its own property. Here avarice drove it into battle.

Sometimes terror is struck into the enemy and courage struck out of him by a single utterance. When the Ionians were wavering, Leotychidas spread the report that the Persians had been defeated at Plataea; by this means he animated them.

When Pan, the commander of Bacchus, learned that a hollow mountain was nearby, he ordered a shout to be raised by night; doubled by the echo, it struck terror into the enemy. When Aristomenes saw the triremes intermingled and the battle undecided, he ordered his soldiers to shout, "Permit them to flee." The enemy, truly thinking that their own men were fleeing, fled themselves as well.

§ 6. It was customary in antiquity to exhort men to battle by setting forth the enemy's arrogance and injustice. Thus, when the Carthaginian envoys brought most unjust conditions, Fabius filled the army with indignation. Epaminondas declared that the Lacedaemonians had resolved, if they conquered, to kill everyone of the male sex, to carry off wives and children into slavery, and to destroy Thebes. So great was the ardor of the combatants that they routed their adversaries at the first assault.

By now there is too much experience of this imposture, whereby, in order to move subjects against their princes, men invent everything done and not done. But such things are of use among the inexperienced, and if matters are properly arranged, the whole thing will become an object of ridicule. For what is easier than to expose the emptiest falsehoods? The same Frontinus in book 1, chapter 12, has examples of many men who exposed them all.

It easily falls back upon its authors, moreover, if they have soldiers subject to superstition. When Caesar knew that the Germans had a law against fighting during the waning moon, he defeated them in battle when they were hindered by religious scruple.

Although impostures must never be employed, they nevertheless have sometimes raised the foolish spirits of soldiers. Thus Archidamus secretly established and adorned an altar by night and led horses around it, so that Castor and Pollux might be thought to have been present.

Epaminondas by night arranged through an artisan that the statue of Pallas should hold in its hand the shield that at first had been placed before its feet. The Boeotians, born in dense air, thought that the goddess had taken up her shield and would be their protectress, and fought bravely. He also brought forward the prophet of Trophonius. Alexander likewise abused the superstition of his men. For he inscribed upon the diviner's hand letters that foretold victory; when the diviner held the entrails, the marks were imprinted upon them. Attalus did this still more carefully against the Gauls. Polyainos, book 4.

CHAPTER XLII

The Ancient Battle-Line Cannot Be Preserved in Our Time

§ 1. Machiavelli would wish it to be restored, but with no advantage to the state and with immense harm to the military. He thinks rightly in this: he judges that armies must be arranged so that all are not endangered by the fear or flight of a few. But in pressing the ancient Roman custom he acts beside the point. For the method of fighting which we now employ is much better and much firmer.

The first principle of the Roman battle-line was that exhausted or defeated velites withdrew into the ranks of the hastati, and the latter into the intervals of the principes. But such a withdrawal is not now approved; instead, one body after another is sent into the place of those who are weary. The Romans would have acted much more prudently if they had established matters so that, if they saw the hastati being hard pressed, they sent the principes to them, and the triarii to these.

For when Machiavelli thinks that disorder and the disruption of ranks would arise from the forward movement of those who occupy the second and third battle-lines, he does not sufficiently consider that graver disorder of the ranks arises from the withdrawal and virtual flight of men who give way or have been repulsed than from the forward movement of men who fight and bring aid. For those who are about to fight possess more reason and courage than those who are fleeing; the former advance forward, while the fleeing move backward. Indeed, to raise courage and sharpen boldness it is more effective to aid a man who stands and fights than one who gives way. Confidence is also taken from the enemy by our manner of fighting but increased by the order of the ancients; for he presses more fiercely upon men who give way but fears the man who stands.

§ 2. Furthermore, it must be observed that the nature of our artillery requires a different order of battle-line. For the guns must be brought before the battle-line and disposed with great care; they too must be avoided. This at least is certain: if skill is applied in aiming the artillery, victory is easy. I shall speak of this in its own place; for now it is sufficient if it is understood that the ancient battle-line cannot be established.

For the bravest soldiers now employ firearms, especially those they call muskets, and men rarely fight at close quarters unless one side is fleeing. Accordingly, missile troops are now the chief men and the body of the battle-line. It is prior in nature, moreover, that battle should be fought at a distance rather than at close quarters. Here the guns and muskets, which are the heaviest arms, are discharged at the beginning.

§ 3. In antiquity men sometimes evaded arrows by a swift forward rush. This cannot now be done, for firearms are not impeded by shields and breastplates.

Ventidius did not lead out his army against the Parthians before they were five hundred paces away; by a sudden forward rush he eluded the arrows and defeated the barbarians through the appearance of confidence. To attempt this now is the act of an insane man.

§ 4. Now the employment of artillery on the flanks requires another battle-line. When it is feared that the enemy may surround the battle-line, the fronts must be extended and artillery placed upon the flanks; during the fighting, however, they must be drawn in, and unexpected missiles discharged. In antiquity the cavalry was spread out; now it is held together and sent forward with the utmost caution.

CHAPTER XLIII

General Precepts for Forming a Battle-Line and Fighting a Battle

§ 1. One must not readily fight unless necessity compels it or you see that you have victory in your hands. An army eager to fight but unequal to the enemy must be restrained by a gentle method, so that its spirit may remain brave and eager and yet entrust itself to the commander's prudence. Sertorius taught the barbarous Lusitanians by an example that the Romans must not be conquered all at once but worn down in parts. Then, when he saw that they were going to fight with disastrous loss, he sent a troop of cavalry to provoke the enemy, sent assistance to it when it was hard pressed, and brought them all back. He thus showed what the outcome of the battle would have been if they had tried fortune with all their standards brought together.

§ 2. Battle must not readily be joined. Vegetius, book 3, chapter 9: "Therefore all things must be considered beforehand, attempted beforehand, and done beforehand, before the final extremity is reached. For good commanders always seek to conduct battle not by open combat, in which the danger is common, but from concealment, so that, while preserving their own men intact, they may kill as many enemies as they can, or at least terrify them. In this part I shall relate what extremely necessary measures were discovered by the ancients."

Paulus Aemilius said that an exceedingly good commander very rarely fought with standards brought together unless the highest necessity or the greatest opportunity had been given to him.

§ 3. Therefore he is a great commander who can endure taunts and the name of delayer with an even mind, lest he fight before the proper time or outside his own place and time. Fabius could endure it; Pompey could not. Accordingly, Fabius fought at the urging of others, and Pompey to his own hurt; for a colleague drew Fabius on, while the inexperienced bent Pompey. Against them all Pericles stood unconquered. When Pericles, unequal to the enemy but called to battle even with abuse by his own men, who were eager to fight, answered that felled trees very easily grow again but slain men are restored with the greatest difficulty. Plutarch, Pericles.

§ 4. The plan of Gnaeus Sulpicius the dictator was sound, when, as Livy says in book 7, he "protracted the war, being unwilling to commit himself to fortune against an enemy whom time and the foreignness of the place were making worse day by day."

What Machiavelli thinks--namely, that if the enemy wishes absolutely to enter battle, it cannot be avoided--is true. But if he wishes this, the prudent commander will enter battle to his own advantage and with certain victory. For just as a man who has fallen headlong into an absolute desire to buy and eagerly desires to buy another's farm is compelled to buy it for whatever price the seller names, so the man who rashly hastens into battle is compelled to accept the time and place according to the other's will. But it is dangerous to accept from the enemy the conditions for fighting.

Charles V was unwilling to fight the Germans because he did not doubt that their army would soon be dispersed. For he saw that within the league the cities which supplied its sinews were despised and complained with justice; he therefore thought that they would depart from the league, as they did.

§ 5. The necessity of fighting presses if one must yield a place while the enemy is near. For a man who is compelled to depart after removing the baggage scarcely escapes without battle if the enemy follows. For the enemy follows and, by occupying places advantageous to himself, will compel him to fight at a disadvantage.

One must fight when provisions or pay appear likely to fail, and much more if the enemy lays waste to the countryside. At other times, when necessary for safety, it is not dishonorable to defend the walls and not advance into the battle-line. When the Thebans besieged Sparta, all were eager to go out to fight, but Agesilaus delayed because he said that the Athenians also had once been confined within their city by the Lacedaemonians.

§ 6. Nor shall I condemn a commander if he withdraws for a time. For if a stratagematic flight which is soon turned against a careless enemy is praiseworthy, why is not one which lasts for weeks or months also praiseworthy? When Metellus saw that the enemy was eager, he led his army back. Agesilaus likewise, when he saw the order and forces of the Athenians to be such that he could not conquer, withdrew. Polyainos, book 2.

Contempt must not be feared but loved. For whoever despises the enemy is unprepared for battle. An eagerness to fight must be nourished in the soldier; foresight for victory belongs to the commander.

Nor must one readily undertake war against practiced men. When Croesus was contemplating wars against the islanders, Bias dissuaded him by saying that the islanders were preparing a great number of horses against him. Croesus laughed and said, “Would that I might catch them on the mainland.” Then Bias replied, “And they desire to catch Croesus at sea.” For a naval battle was as difficult for Croesus as a land battle for the islanders.

§ 7. One must not fight if there is a danger of losing a kingdom. The duke of Alba was unwilling to fight Guise in the kingdom of Naples, for the French, if defeated, would have lost only their army, while the Spaniards would have lost a kingdom.

§ 8. Nevertheless, I would sometimes advise battle if the enemy has an army of recruits, which becomes better through experience, while you have one of veterans; likewise, if the enemy is afraid.

Let the weaker man terrify; let the stronger render the enemy careless. It is a part of victory for the enemy to be terrified. The man who fears lives only by half. The suspicion of danger contributes as much to victory as danger itself.

A lion is terrified by the noise of wheels, the crowing of a cock, and fire. The enemy flees if you cast before him a mask of fear.

The man who has a veteran and victorious army, as did Hannibal and Caesar, can readily advance to battle. But lest he introduce vigilance into the enemy, it belongs to a commander to wish to appear afraid; it belongs to a Thraso to wish to be feared. Accordingly, an equal will never fight with an equal except to his own advantage. But the fear which makes the enemy cautious must be removed, while that which makes him flee must be struck into him.

CHAPTER XLIV

The Enemy Must Not Be Awaited at Home but Harassed in His Own Country

§ 1. If war has been altogether resolved upon and one's forces are thought equal or greater, it is not prudent to keep the army in pacified territory; it must immediately be led against the enemy. For those who fight abroad possess many advantages.

Great courage and confidence in one's forces are formidable in the man who attacks voluntarily.

Secondly, it contributes greatly to the reputation and authority necessary to those who wage war that you possess so much power that you can not only defend your own possessions but also lay claim to another's.

Thirdly, you can thus transfer your own dangers to the enemy. For if war is waged at home, the enemy is received within one's innermost parts; everything is driven off, carried away, and burned; a friendly and a hostile soldier are equally burdensome. Hence arise dejected spirits, complaints, mutinies, and disturbances, all of which are transferred to the enemy when the soldier is carried across into his country.

Hence we see that the Roman people, while struggling at home, nevertheless did not neglect the Spains but transferred the terror of war into Africa; and in this manner at last they recalled rather than drove Hannibal from Italy. Nor is it doubtful that, if the Romans had abandoned the Spains, they could not have defended their own Italy. For the Carthaginians, having attained undisturbed possession of the Spains, could easily have defeated the Romans by the forces and resources of that nation.

§ 2. Battle must not be permitted to a veteran army that is afraid, because it sees itself to be inferior for a certain reason. Whether it is timid or eager the soldiers themselves will declare, even unwillingly. Pallor and trembling betray the man who is afraid. They expressed approval by assent if they raised their hands, gave a shout, and struck their shields against their knees. Lucan, book 1:

> At once all the cohorts assented to these things > and, raising their hands high, promised whatever wars he called them to;
>
> so great a shout goes to the heavens.

Ammianus indicates the differences between their expressions: "After these words had been finished no one remained silent, but all the soldiers, striking their shields against their knees with a dreadful crash--which is a full indication of prosperity, for, on the contrary, when shields are struck with spears, it is evidence of anger and grief--approved with immense joy, except for a few, the judgment of Augustus."

CHAPTER XLV

It Does Not Belong to a Good Commander to Impose the Necessity of Fighting

Among the other precepts for destroying a state, Machiavelli in book 3, chapter 12, also thinks that a necessity of fighting must be imposed. These are his words:

"We have shown elsewhere how useful Necessity is for bringing human actions to completion, and at the same time we have demonstrated that men compelled by necessity have often performed deeds by which they were raised to singular glory. The moral philosophers also declared that the tongue and the hands, although in themselves they are most noble instruments, would nevertheless never have been able to advance and bring human affairs to the perfection and dignity in which they now stand unless some necessity had compelled them.

"Because this matter was not unknown to ancient commanders, and they readily understood that the spirits of soldiers compelled by necessity become brave and obstinate in fighting, they strove especially to impose upon their own men a necessity for battle by seizing any opportunity, but deliberately to remove that same necessity from the enemy. For this purpose they very often opened to the enemy a passage through routes which could easily have been guarded and closed to their own men a route which they could easily have opened.

"Therefore, whoever desires either to make the citizens of some city brave, bold, and obstinate in its defense, or to render another army brave and persistent in fighting in battle, ought to strive with the greatest effort to impose upon them the necessity of this thing, or at least to persuade their minds that such a necessity presses upon them."

This is evil and dangerous teaching. To impose upon oneself the necessity of encountering the utmost danger is not the act of a prudent or a good man. But those who did this either were rash or were already pressed by necessity; they did not cast themselves into a new necessity but displayed the one into which they had been cast. For who is so senseless as to reduce himself to such a condition that he is compelled to conduct the matter according to the enemy's will and judgment? The man who is compelled to battle is already in the enemy's power.

Who can approve Julian's rashness in a foolish plan harmful to himself and the entire empire, when he burned his ships so that the soldier, as a captive, might fight more bravely? Ammianus immediately says in book 23: "After crossing, he commanded that the bridge be torn away, so that none of the soldiers might retain confidence of returning from his own column."

And afterward: "Leaving the river on his left, with ill-fated guides going before him, he resolved to take the inland roads at a swift pace. And as though the deadly torch of Bellona had been applied, he ordered all the ships to be burned with fire except twelve smaller ones, which he arranged to be carried on wagons because they would be useful for constructing bridges. He thought that he had ordered this advantageously, lest the fleet left behind be of use to the enemy, or lest, just as had certainly been done from the beginning of the expedition, almost twenty thousand armed men be occupied in hauling and steering the same ships.

"Then, when every man, fearing for himself, murmured, and manifest truth showed that the soldiery, if perhaps repulsed by the aridity or height of the mountains, would not be able to return to the waters, and deserters under torture openly confessed that they had deceived them, it was ordered, with the greatest rush, that the flames be extinguished. And because the fire, having increased enormously, consumed most of them, only twelve could be preserved untouched; these were separated so that they might be guarded."

The army itself blamed these actions and Julian as well, for sadness entered everyone in place of courage.

No prudent man therefore casts himself into this danger. Instead, each man must act so that he can fight to his own advantage.

How much more prudently did Hannibal act when he feared Marcellus. He did not cast himself into an absolute necessity in which, if defeated, nothing but death remained; instead, he so arranged his battle-line that he could have a retreat into fortified places.

I add this also: you have been defeated if a cunning enemy thinks you have been placed under a necessity of fighting. For if he wishes to fight only to his own advantage, he has without doubt conquered.

CHAPTER XLVI

Stratagems of Those Conducting a Siege

§1. Speed has the greatest importance for taking cities, for the besieged cannot prepare what is necessary, and they do everything in alarm. Cato secretly completed a journey of four days in two days and took a strong town in Spain. No city, when unexpectedly besieged, long sustains force, because something necessary must inevitably be lacking. None is so weak that it is defeated without difficulty if it foresaw its fate, prepared its forces, and resolved steadfastly to resist. Yet, even when thus prepared, they can never be secure.

§2. The Lucensians were certainly deceived all too easily by Domitius Calvinus. For, when he repeatedly went around the walls with his army without attacking, they thought that he did this for the sake of exercise; and when they took no precautions, he suddenly occupied the fortifications. A commander, therefore, will always do something by which he may lead them into error; and even if they do not believe it, they will nevertheless entertain various suspicions.

§3. Hannibal captured cities by sending many men ahead in Roman dress who knew Latin. Antiochus brought the fortress of Suenda into his power in this way: after the foragers had been killed, he dressed his own soldiers in their clothes and sent them back with the grain. Thymarchus the Aetolian, using the cloak and cap of the slain Chamardes, was admitted in his place into the harbor of the Samians. The Arcadians were besieging a fortress of the Messenians; when they heard that other reinforcements were coming, they assumed arms and dress like theirs and, once admitted, occupied everything.

If you set fire to something nearby and the citizens pour out to extinguish it, the city can be taken amid that alarm. Thus Cimon the Athenian occupied a city in Caria after setting fire to a place and to a temple of Diana. Provision is therefore now made for one part to run to fires and another to arms.

It was already customary in ancient times to send soldiers into a city in another’s dress. When women were wandering around a city in Arcadia on a festival day, Epaminondas mixed his soldiers among them in women’s clothing; admitted into the city as night approached, they occupied the gates and opened them to their own men.

They are also accustomed to take cities by sending soldiers in the dress of merchants. Aristippus the Spartan took Tegea in this way, sending pack animals with sacks of grain.

The Thebans occupied the harbor of the Sicyonians by enclosing soldiers in a ship while merchandise lay above the decks.

Mainius took Dieppe through pretended deserters. Alençon, pretending to depart, returned and almost occupied Antwerp when one of the servants cried out that he had broken his leg and the horsemen and infantry halted; but at last he was repulsed by the strength of the citizens and withdrew. He undertook so great an enterprise too hastily.

Ranzovius relates in book 4, chapter 2, that a city was even set on fire by domestic birds by Hadding. Indeed, a city can be taken by a stratagem of this kind: if birds which are familiar and domestic to the besieged city, and nest in its houses, are caught by fowlers, and lighted pieces of tinder are fastened to their feet and feathers, and they are then released, these birds, returning to their customary lodgings in the houses, will set the city on fire everywhere. The fire, moreover, will not only bring enormous destruction upon the city, but will also compel the townsmen, running together from every quarter to extinguish the fire, to leave their posts for defending their walls and gates; and these, then deprived of their defenders, can be stormed. By this device Hadding, son of Gram, king of Denmark, stormed the city of Duna. For, when he was unable to gain possession of it because of its very high ramparts and walls, he had birds of different kinds, accustomed to dwellings in that place, caught by men skilled in fowling, and caused pieces of tinder kindled with fire to be fastened to their feathers. Returning to their nests, they filled the city with fire. While the townsmen ran together to extinguish it, Hadding stormed the gates, which were empty of defenders, and thereby took the whole city.

A commander may certainly imitate, when occasion permits, those things which are done without perfidy and perjury. But to proceed by frauds and perjuries is impious and detestable. And yet examples of this kind are more numerous than examples of a just stratagem.

Milo betrayed Tarentum after bargaining for his safety; Sosistratus betrayed Syracuse to Marcellus; Tarquinius, Gabii to his father; Eoneus, Tarentum to Hannibal; Mandro the pirate, Ephesus to Lysimachus; Zopyrus, Babylon to Cyrus. The histories of the gentiles contain innumerable examples.

The best-fortified cities have been compelled by hunger to surrender, and hunger has been increased by stratagem. Fabius withdrew from Campania at sowing-time, so that they would expend more grain upon the sowing; then, returning, he trampled down what had been sown. Antigonus likewise afflicted the Athenians in this manner. Others permitted many persons to take refuge in the cities under siege, so that the grain would be consumed more quickly. Thus Alexander took Leucadia.

By an evil deception, under the appearance of peace, Dionysius subdued the people of Rhegium and of Himera by hunger. For, after making a treaty and granting peace, he required them to furnish what was necessary for his army; when their grain had been exhausted, he compelled them to surrender.

Phalaris took certain fortified places by a more ingenious wickedness. For, after feigning the establishment of peace, he placed his own grain among them as a pledge and assurance of his friendship, and thereby brought it about that the townsmen consumed or sold their own grain. The tyrant, however, had deliberately ordered the roof-vaults to be opened so that his grain would spoil. Therefore, at the beginning of summer he besieged them and soon took them.

Nothing disturbs cities as much as the fear of a long siege. For ordinarily no spirit for defense remains unless they hope that the enemy will depart shortly or that assistance will come. Hence Clearchus the Spartan, knowing that the Thracians sustained themselves with the hope that food for the besiegers would run short, ordered a captive to be killed in the sight of their ambassadors and his flesh to be distributed among the soldiers' quarters as though for food. Terrified by this, they surrendered themselves.

When towns are held by a stronger garrison than can be overcome, one must act so that they withdraw it, and this can be effected in various ways. First, if you depart while feigning fear and despair, as Scipio brought cities in Africa into his power through Masinissa and the Numidians. For citizens, although they scarcely admit a garrison in the utmost danger, desire, once they have passed through the crisis, to be relieved of it.

Next, if many allies defend one city, should an army lay waste their fields or carry terror against them, they will presently disperse to defend their own possessions. In this way Scipio occupied Delminium. For, by pretending to despair of taking that town and to be preparing himself for other enterprises, he caused all who were defending it by common agreement to be summoned away, and he himself entered the city when it was empty of defenders. By the same device Pyrrhus took the capital of the Illyrians, and Rufinus took Croton, except that the latter also employed the perjury of a deserter.

When Fabius Maximus was about to fight the Etruscans, Umbrians, Samnites, and Gauls, he ordered Fulvius and Postumius to go against Sutrium; in this way he called the Umbrians and Etruscans away to defend their own possessions.

§4. Concord among those conducting a siege must be maintained, and suspicions must be avoided.

Domenico Michiel, doge of the Venetians, when he was under suspicion during the siege of Tyre, sent the planks of the ships' hulls to Warmund in the camp in order to show that he was not thinking about sailing away.

§5. It is also an ingenious device to bring one's own reinforcement in as though it belonged to the enemy. When Iphicrates understood that a Spartan garrison was to be brought into Corinth by night, he waited at the gates and entered with the last of them, and killed them.

§6. If a city is being besieged in vain, one must withdraw with the utmost caution.

When Philip was besieging Carrhae in vain and could not easily withdraw his artillery, he ordered it to be taken apart, but with the same sound with which it was usually assembled. The people of Carrhae, supposing that their walls were to be battered more fiercely, were fortifying them while he meanwhile departed.

§7. It is a harsh necessity when one's own villages and towns are burned lest they assist the enemy. This was customary among the Persians. Vercingetorix so thoroughly persuaded the Bituriges of this course in Caesar, book 7, that more than twenty towns were burned in one day. The same is found in Ammianus, book 24.

§8. Nor is the complaint less when the infirm are sent away; yet at times this is done necessarily. The Gauls do this: they order those feeble in health and age to depart. Caesar, book 7, and likewise book 8. At the same time they send away all the baggage.

§9. A shortage of water has compelled invincible cities in many places to surrender. Thus Bethulia came into the utmost danger and was saved by the prudent piety of one woman.

Scipio dug wells in the Spanish war, as Appian relates, but salt water was frequently found. Vitruvius, book 8, chapter 1, and Cassiodorus, book 3, teach how to find water.

It is a wretched practice, yet a customary one, to distribute water by measure. Josephus did this in book 3 of The Jewish War.

§10. Fortifications are the chief defense. They make walls not straight but angular. Vegetius, book 4, chapter 2:

"The ancients did not wish the circuit of a wall to be carried in a straight line, lest it be exposed to the blows of rams; but after laying the foundations, they enclosed cities with winding bends and erected more numerous towers at the very angles for this reason: because, if anyone wished to apply either ladders or machines to a wall constructed according to such an arrangement, he is overwhelmed not only from the front but also from the sides and almost from the rear, being enclosed as though within a curve."

Now they construct projecting fortifications and bastions, and separate them by a longer interval, because the artillery more easily reaches those who wish to occupy the intervening spaces.

In former times many fortifications were unconquerable; now scarcely any are. A fortification consists of nature, art, or both. Vegetius, book 4, chapter 1:

"Cities and fortresses are fortified either by nature or by hand, or by both, which is deemed stronger. By nature they are fortified either by an elevated or precipitous position, by the sea or marshes flowing around them, or by rivers; by hand, by ditches and walls. In that natural advantage, the very safe judgment of the person selecting the site is required; on level ground, the skill of the founder is sought. We see that the most ancient cities were established in open plains in such a way that, although the aid of favorable locations was lacking, they were nevertheless rendered unconquerable by art and labor."

In the siege of cities this is generally observed: all approaches and exits are closed, and the strength of the camp is of chief importance; for in this way they can sometimes shut in a great multitude with a smaller body of soldiers.

They are accustomed to approach the walls through trenches, because no arms can resist the enemy if artillery thunders against those approaching.

When the walls are battered, they do this continually, so that in one day they may cast down more than can be repaired in two days. They sometimes also discharge missiles at night, so as to impede those making repairs.

When a city is being attacked, all stand in order, so that, if some are driven back, fresh men may promptly succeed them. When the signal to attack has been given, the ruins of the demolished wall are battered with the smaller pieces of artillery until hand-to-hand fighting has begun; and because only a few can fight at one time, if the garrison is courageous it is scarcely possible to take the city unless they prevail through the exhaustion of the besieged.

As for fire-darts, they are nothing if compared with fiery cannonballs. In the game of chess, however it is begun, it is never concluded in the same manner. So too it happens in war and in a siege.

§11. Many towns are taken by fear alone. Philip ordered earth to be carried to a mound against the fortress of Trinassus; its defenders, supposing themselves to have been undermined by tunnels, gave themselves up.

Pelopidas the Theban, while besieging two towns of the Magnesians, ordered horsemen wearing wreaths to come from one of them in the dress of captives and to affirm that the other had been taken. Consequently the one which was being besieged surrendered itself through false fear, and the other through true fear.

A siege is also raised by fear alone. When Cato could neither send assistance to the Vergetes nor wished to refuse it, he ordered a third part of his soldiers to board ships, to plead the wind as an excuse, and to return; the mere report of assistance liberated his allies. Tynnichus liberated the city of Theodosia by the sound of trumpets, when the enemy believed that a great fleet was arriving.

§12. Vegetius, book 4, chapter 24, shows the great use of tunnels:

“Another kind of attack is subterranean and secret, which they call a tunnel, from the hares which dig caverns beneath the earth and are hidden there. Accordingly, a multitude of men is employed after the fashion of mines in which the skill of the Bessi searches for veins of gold and silver; the earth is dug with great labor and, after a cavern has been hollowed out for the destruction of the city, a path below ground is sought. This fraud operates by a twofold ambush. For either the tunnel penetrates the city, and at night, without the townsmen perceiving it, men emerge through it, open the gates, lead in the column of their own men, and kill the enemy unawares in their very houses; or else, when they have reached the foundations of the walls, they undermine a very great part of them and, after setting dry timbers beneath them, temporarily support the impending fall of the wall by this work. On top they add bundles of brushwood and other kindling for the flames. Then, when the fighting men have been made ready, fire is put underneath; and, once the wooden columns and floors have burned, the wall suddenly collapses and an entrance is opened for an assault.”

The Gauls were most skilled in tunnels because there are workings of copper mines among them. Caesar, book 3.

Alexander took Gaza through tunnels; the Romans likewise attacked Fidenae and Veii. Tunnels were made so that they might secretly reach the interior. Thus men went from the camp into the citadel of Fidenae. Livy, book 4. The tunnels driven toward Veii required great labor. Livy, book 5:

“Then the army was led to Veii and forts were constructed at closer intervals. By an edict that no one should fight without orders, the soldiers were transferred from the sallies--which were numerous and conducted rashly between the wall and the rampart--to the work. By far the greatest and most laborious of all the works was the tunnel begun toward the enemy citadel. Lest the work be interrupted, or continuous labor underground wear out the same men, he divided the number of workers into six divisions; six hours in rotation were allotted to the work by night and by day, and it was never abandoned before they made a way into the citadel.”

This is generally observed: when the tunnelers are about to break out, they display threats elsewhere, so that those intent upon empty dangers may not perceive the true ones.

Sometimes they undermined the wall alone and supported it with beams; when these had been burned, the fortifications fell. In our age, walls, towers, and bastions that have been undermined are hurled high into the air.

Sometimes they pretend to make tunnels when these cannot be completed. Charles of Naples deceived the garrison of the fortress of Matrone. For, after pretending that he was driving tunnels, he took care that rubble be brought from elsewhere and thrown down in their sight. Supposing it to have come from the foundations of the wall, they surrendered themselves. Fulgosius, book 7, chapter 4.

§13. Tunnels are rendered useless by opposing trenches. Sometimes they keep the soldiers away with stones and burning pitch. Caesar, book 7 of The Gallic War. During the siege of Apollonia, Trypho of Alexandria discovered where the enemy were about to enter by suspending bronze vessels, for these sound at the blows of those digging; he then killed them with water and heated dung. The people of Themiscyra sent bears and swarms of bees into the tunnels. To have discovered a tunnel, however, is to have conquered it. A bronze vessel sounds if you dig underneath it; in this way a bronze-worker detected a tunnel in the siege of Barca. Our basins and drums sufficiently indicate such places if peas are placed upon them.

§14. The diversion of rivers to other places is akin to tunnels. By diverting the Euphrates Alexander took Babylon, as Semiramis had done before him and as others relate of Cyrus. Lest the enemy perceive what was being done, Alexander constructed a mound, for which the Babylonians believed the earth was being carried out.

Publius Servilius compelled Isaura to surrender by diverting its river. Caesar compelled a city of the Cadurci to do so by drying up its spring through tunnels and denying access to the river by means of archers.

Cleisthenes acted more wickedly. For, after cutting off the watercourse of the Crisaeans, he restored it to them when they were afflicted by thirst, but poisoned the water with hellebore and killed them through looseness of the bowels.

§15. Other cities have been taken by fires and by smoke spread around them. The Turk took Famagusta. They heaped up and kindled a great pile of pine-torches, which burns very readily and exhales a deadly and foul smoke; bundles and timbers were added, and while it burned for four days and could not be extinguished, they meanwhile drove tunnels and compelled the defenders to accept terms.

§16. The Alexandrians entered the tunnels which Frederick had dug and killed his soldiers. Others dig wells to oppose tunnels.

CHAPTER XLVII

Stratagems of the Besieged

§1. Vegetius, book 4, chapter 7, enumerates two kinds of siege:

"There are," he says, "many kinds of defenses and attacks, which we shall insert in their appropriate places. At present it must be known that there are two kinds of siege. One is when the adversary, after arranging garrisons in advantageous places, attacks the besieged with continual assaults. The other is when he either prevents those enclosed from obtaining water, or expects their surrender from hunger after he has barred every supply-route. For by this plan he himself, idle and safe, wears out the enemy. Against these eventualities the possessors, even if alarmed by only a slight suspicion, ought most diligently to gather every supply of food within the walls, so that substance may abound for them while scarcity compels their adversaries to depart.

"Not only pork, but also every kind of animal which cannot be kept alive while enclosed ought to be allocated for salting, so that grain may suffice with the assistance of meat. Farmyard birds, however, are nourished in cities without expense and are necessary for the sick. Fodder must especially be gathered for horses; and what cannot be carried in must be burned. Supplies of wine, vinegar, other produce, and fruits must be gathered, and nothing that may be of use must be left to the enemy. For consideration of both utility and pleasure urges that the cultivation of gardens be practiced in the pleasure-grounds or courtyards of houses.

"Yet it profits little to have collected a very great quantity unless, from the beginning, its distribution is moderated by suitable stewards according to a wholesome measure. Those who began to preserve frugality amid abundance have never been endangered by hunger. An age and sex unfit for war have also frequently been shut outside the gates because of the necessity of subsistence, lest scarcity oppress the armed men by whom the walls were being defended."

Speed also is useful for everything. Because in cities, however strong they may be, there are usually more inhabitants than are occupied on watch, they must leave no stone unturned, construct great new works, and prepare everything. Let no age and no sex be exempted from labor.

In the Epirote war the Spartan women refused to depart from their men, but said that it was honorable for Spartan women to live or die with their men. Accordingly, they dug trenches, tended the wounded, and furnished every service to those fighting.

§2. When a city is being attacked, the first assaults must be resisted, for in this way courage readily increases in the besieged. Vegetius, book 4, chapter 12.

The besieged now have need of many things: gunpowder and the other things pertaining to artillery, of which I have spoken elsewhere.

§3. Vegetius, book 4, chapter 8, advises what must be prepared by the besieged:

"It is fitting to prepare bitumen, sulfur, liquid pitch, and the oil which they call incendiary, in order to burn the enemy's machines. Iron of both tempers and charcoal are stored in repositories for making weapons. Wood needed for spear-shafts and arrows is likewise laid away. Round stones from rivers, because they are heavier on account of their solidity and more suitable for those casting them, are most diligently collected; with these the walls and towers are filled. The smallest are to be cast by slings or staff-slings or by hand. The larger are directed by onagers. The largest, however, of weight and a rolling shape, are arranged on the battlements so that, when released down a slope, they may not only crush those coming up but also shatter their machinery.

“Very large wheels are also fashioned from green wood; or sections cut from the strongest trees--called rollers--are smoothed so that they may roll. Rolling down an incline with sudden force, these strike down fighting men and are accustomed to terrify horses. Beams also, floorboards, and iron nails of different sizes ought to be ready at hand. For it is customary to oppose the machines of those attacking by means of other machines, especially when height must be added to the walls or bastions by sudden works, lest the adversaries’ movable towers rise above them and take the city.”

§4. Cities can be saved especially by opportune sallies. Since these cannot be made with equal forces, they must be assisted by art; for the besieged are generally inferior either in number or in strength. Therefore, when they are about to make a sally, they must act so that they appear least likely to do so. When the Romans held Palermo, they displayed only a few defenders upon the walls and cut down Hasdrubal when he incautiously approached. By the same device the people of Asculum routed Pompey, and the Numantines routed Popillius Laenas. The people of Apollonia, when besieged by Philip, king of the Macedonians, admitted a Roman garrison by night and rested throughout the following day; then at night they came suddenly upon the enemy when he felt secure. Livy, book 33.

§5. It was also customary in ancient times to place hanging portcullises before gates. Vegetius, book 4, chapter 4:

“Care is taken, moreover, lest the gates be burned by fires placed beneath them; for this reason they must be covered with hides and iron. But what antiquity invented is of greater benefit: a defensive work is added before the gate, at whose entrance a portcullis is placed, hanging from iron rings and ropes, so that, if the enemy should enter, it may be let down and those enclosed may be destroyed. The wall above the gate, however, must be arranged to receive openings through which water poured from the upper part may extinguish the fire placed beneath.”

Livy, on the people of Salapia:

“The gate had been closed by the fall of the portcullis. Some raised it with levers; others drew it up with ropes to such a height that they could pass beneath it upright. The way was scarcely open enough when the deserters rushed competitively through the gate; and when nearly six hundred had entered, the rope from which the portcullis was suspended was released and it fell with a great noise. Some of the Salapians attacked the deserters, who were carrying their arms carelessly on their shoulders after their journey as though among peaceful men; others from the towers of the gate and from the walls kept the enemy away with stones, stakes, and javelins.”

The besieged can easily be liberated in any place if at first they remain quiet and then burst out with sudden boldness. The consul Furius, when at first he was besieged and was thought to be afraid, burst out by the rear gate and cut down the incautious enemy. Livy, book 3. Caesar also, in book 5 of The Gallic War, when he was so thoroughly despised that they began to tear apart the rampart by hand and fill the trenches, sent out infantry and cavalry from every gate and put the enemy to flight. Indutiomarus was thus routed by Labienus, and so too were the Pompeians in Africa. Marius also endured the insolence of the Cimbri for a long time until he accustomed his soldiers not to fear them.

Even when the wall has been breached, its defense is nonetheless easy, provided only that courage is present. They defend themselves in many ways, especially with weapons; therefore, when the defenders are brave, it is a small thing to have opened a doorway if it is barred with steel. Sometimes they suddenly block the openings with sacks filled with wool, barrels filled with earth or dung, beams, chests, baskets filled with earth, and iron stakes, with wet straw and earth placed around them. They throw down bundles of brushwood and set them on fire; they scatter caltrops and, in place of caltrops, planks filled with nails upon which the attackers may impale themselves; they send down a rotating machine and draw it back; sometimes they raise portcullises. It is best to dig close behind the breach, so that men cannot descend from the wall into the city, and to build defensive works at the sides of the demolished wall. Everything, however, must be prepared before the attack so that it may be at hand amid the utmost haste. They also throw stones and fiery materials of every kind, in which task women and boys can be of assistance.

When Conon was besieged, he sent two cutters which kept different courses; in the evening, after most of the enemy had approached the shore, they escaped.

When Hippodamas, while besieged, could not admit a messenger, he shouted to the man standing outside that the woman bound in the temple of Athena Chalcioecus was troubling him. That woman was an image of Hunger. Although the enemy heard, they did not understand the matter.

A prostitute informed Diognetus of Naxos after obtaining permission to send something to her brothers, the sellers of sweetmeats. She placed a lead tablet in a cake, upon which it was written that they should attack the Milesians by night when they were buried in wine. She had instructed the messenger, moreover, to tell her brothers to eat the cake themselves.

When the Spartan harmost had provisions for two days, a herald sent from Sparta was ordered to say, in the presence of the Athenians conducting the siege, what instructions he had. He said: "The ephors order you to be of good courage; assistance will come." The harmost replied: "Do not hurry; we have provisions for five months." Deceived by this falsehood, the Athenians raised the siege because winter was approaching. Polyaenus, book 2.

§6. No less ingenuity is required in displaying an abundance of supplies, lest the enemy hope that the city will be taken by hunger. The Athenians and Romans scattered wheat. When Hannibal had plowed up the place near Casilinum so that they could not gather herbs, the people of Casilinum cast seed upon it, so that they might appear to have grain until the harvest. The survivors of Varus led captives around their granaries for the whole night.

When the people of Segeberg were besieged by Waldemar and lacked grain, they nevertheless roughened and turned millstones so that the enemy might think that they abounded in it.

In the year 1535 the people of Münster, lest they appear to be deprived of food, began to plow the suburban field as though intending to endure the siege until the harvest. Others ordered empty granaries to be closely guarded.

Lucius Antonius acted more cruelly, for he filled the prisons with slaves and destroyed them by hunger because he was unwilling to expend food upon them or to release them; and that is the Perusine famine.

Francesco Barbaro held Brescia until the siege of the Visconti was raised, because, by bringing in mules laden with sand, he furnished the appearance that grain had been brought in and thus gave courage to the multitude.

§7. Many have endured hunger for a very long time. In famine the people of Petelia cast out their parents and children; they sustained life with hides, leaves, and every kind of animal. The people of Casilinum did the same, as did the Numantines. But stronger were the people of Cyzicus, who could not be driven to surrender by the death of their captives, nor could the people of Aegina, who preferred to behold the punishment of their hostages rather than desert the Romans. Caesar used to say that his plan was the same as that of physicians: to conquer by hunger rather than by the sword.

§8. They contrived to bring in supplies by various devices. At Casilinum the Romans first sent casks filled with flour down the Volturnus; then, after the casks had been caught by a chain, they scattered nuts upon the river. Hirtius sent livestock downstream to the people of Mutina.

There was a pleasing spectacle in bringing pigs into a city. When the besieged could not bring a drove of pigs into the city, they seized one and ran ahead with it; at its grunting the whole herd followed at a rush.

CHAPTER XLVIII

Flight Is Sometimes Permissible, and What Must Be Observed in Flight

§1. Flight is either stratagematic or genuine. We are treating the latter, which is twofold: that of the whole army or that of a part. I shall explain the whole class by a few propositions.

Proposition I. When danger threatens the whole army in a just war, it is better to fight with heroic courage than to flee, because there is great disgrace in flight. Judas Maccabaeus is an example, 1 Maccabees 9, from verse 6:

"And they saw the multitude of the army, that they were many, and they were greatly afraid; and many withdrew themselves from the camp, and there remained of them only eight hundred men. And Judas saw that his army had slipped away and that the battle pressed hard upon him, and he was broken in heart because he had no time to gather them, and he was disheartened. And he said to those who remained: 'Let us arise and go against our adversaries, if we shall be able to fight against them.' And they tried to turn him aside, saying: 'We shall not be able. Rather, let us save our lives now and return to our brethren, and then we shall fight against them; but we are few.' And Judas said: 'Far be it from us to do this thing, that we should flee from them; and if our time has drawn near, let us die courageously for our brethren, and let us not bring a charge against our glory.'"

Judas acted most bravely, and Nicolaus Serarius, a learned and equally pious man, defends him excellently. But it is asked whether he acted rightly in casting himself into so great a danger when he had so few men. I answer that he acted rightly, since he performed a work of heroic courage; and he rightly undertook it because he knew that great forces of the enemy had often been routed by a few with divine aid, and he himself had experienced it. For how great were the armies which Abraham, Gideon, Jonathan, David, and others led out to encounter hostile forces? Heroic courage does not enter the common and well-worn road of courage, but rather the steep and more difficult one, trusting more in God's strength than in its own.

And so, above, 2 Maccabees, the final chapter, verse 7: "But Maccabaeus always trusted with every hope that assistance would be present for him from the Lord." And in the same place, verse 9, he addressed them from the Law and the Prophets, reminding them also of the contests which they had previously accomplished; or, as it is still more forceful in Greek, προσυπομνήσας δὲ αὐτοὺς καὶ τοὺς ἀγῶνας οὓς ἦσαν ἐκτετελεκότες, bringing back to their memory also those very grievous contests which they had completed. Therefore, himself recalling all these same things to his own memory, and at the same time those magnificent promises made in the Law and the Prophets--of which Deuteronomy 28 speaks, and this book above in chapter 3, verses 18 and 19, and chapter 4, verse 8--the most valiant hero thus rushed against the enemy. Judas preferred to die in battle rather than appear to have refused battle, lest he appear to have hoped too little in God. His own glory also pertained to the glory of God.

Proposition II. Although this courage is most praiseworthy, a prudent commander can nevertheless deny the enemy an opportunity to fight and can even withdraw inferior forces, lest he engage an unequal enemy. For that caution harms the state less than a headlong battle does. Nor is danger prudently undergone when the hope of victory is slight. Therefore, one must do what Antigonus used to do, who preferred utility to empty glory; for while yielding ground he used to say that he was seeking the victory placed behind him. It is indeed more honorable to do this by declining battle, but if the army can be withdrawn without danger, it can be done even in the battle itself.

These things concern genuine flight, for feigned flight is praiseworthy, as when Paulus Aemilius pretended to be afraid until the Ligurians, after rashly attacking his camp, were cut down. Fimbria appeared so thoroughly to fear the son of Mithridates that the latter's horsemen, after advancing within the narrow passages of the defenses, exposed six thousand of their number to slaughter. Livius asked Hasdrubal to permit him to depart unharmed; by this pretense he led the enemy into a sense of security and cut him down. When Caesar, coming with two legions to Cicero's assistance, pretended to be afraid and held back his soldier, he caused the Gauls to approach the camp without caution and consequently killed them while they were out of formation.

The deed of Aristides of Elea was excellent. Dionysius was attacking Caulonia; Aristides displayed a reinforcement of twelve triremes. But when Dionysius opposed fifteen to him, Aristides withdrew as though afraid and at night kindled torches which the fleet of Dionysius followed. He gradually set other torches upon great pieces of cork and released them into the sea; then, withdrawing on an oblique course, he reached Caulonia while Dionysius followed the torches.

If the whole army genuinely flees, let it be collected, strengthened, and fortified as quickly as possible, and let ambushes be prepared for the enemy. If one part has been routed and the other has conquered, let the victorious part claim the victory for itself and make every provision so that it may be able to set an ambush; for then the enemy is exposed and feels secure.

Proposition III. It is never fitting for a commander to decree that the army should hurl itself away in a headlong rout after its ranks have been dissolved. For in battle a few perish; in flight almost all perish. The battle between Campson and Selim was famous. Men fell on both sides, but flight carried off more than the battle.

Proposition IV. A soldier is not permitted to flee for as long as the ranks remain, or the standard, the commander, or the centurion stands firm, even if he sees himself in the most immediate danger of death. For he promised this by oath. Therefore, if he flees, he is perjured. Next, he pledged his fidelity to the public good: by fleeing he betrays the state; by fighting and dying he preserves it.

Proposition V. If the standards have been captured, if a great part of the army flees, and if there is no hope at all in resisting, a soldier can flee. For he would die without any public utility, whereas a man who flees can fight again: ἀνὴρ ὁ φεύγων πάλιν μαχήσεται.

§2. It is commonly said as a proverb that there is greater art in fleeing than in fighting; but to flee ingeniously and to pursue victory elsewhere is praiseworthy.

Flight by stratagem is not cowardice, but industry, as I have said.

Plans for flight, therefore, are salutary when necessity causes it. Tryphon scattered gold so that the soldiers would be delayed. Sertorius and Viriathus wished their soldiers to scatter and to assemble at an appointed place. Many are saved in this manner; for if the enemy also scatters his men, he will do so at peril, and once the soldiers have assembled they will easily be able to harm him while he is dispersed. Those in pursuit, however, never scatter unless they wish to lose the victory. Callicratides pursued Conon with triremes, but when Conon saw that the fleet had been drawn apart, he raised the signal, attacked his pursuers, and defeated them.

When Afranius, fleeing Caesar, could not escape, he fortified a camp. When Caesar did the same and sent men out to forage, Afranius set out on his journey. This was great dexterity, and all the more distinguished because it deceived Caesar.

When Antony was being harassed by the Parthians in the morning, he delayed until the fifth hour. The Parthians, already tired and supposing that he would remain on that day, went back to tend their bodies; he completed a full day's march during the remainder of the day without interruption.

Philip, defeated in Epirus, sought a truce for burying the dead and thus escaped, abusing a pretense of piety for the preservation of the living.

The Carthaginians, defeated at sea, pretended that they were stuck in shallows and did everything that men who are stuck customarily do. The Romans turned aside because they supposed the places to be shallow and gave space to the fugitives. For, to the fugitives' very great advantage, the enemy avoided the very places through which they themselves were fleeing.

Titus Vastus placed an effigy in his bed and fled while the guards watched over the effigy. Polybius, book 8.

Nicon deceived the enemy by covering his own ship in the same manner as theirs.

Many, moreover, have employed the method of adapting the enemy's insignia and clothing to themselves.

Demetrius of Phalerum escaped by hiding himself in a wagon filled with straw. It was a most wretched escape, but salutary in the worst circumstances.

When the enemy attacked his rear in a narrow road, the same man opposed all the wagons and set them on fire; he delayed the enemy until he escaped. Polyaenus, book 4.

Artemisia had two standards, a barbarian and a Greek one, and raised whichever of them was advantageous. Polyaenus, book 8. When she was in danger of being captured by the Greeks, she ordered the Persian standards to be taken down and made an attack upon a Persian ship; by this means she sailed away to Caria.

When Aegyptus knew that he was being sought, and that there were accordingly men lying in wait upon a ship, he told the shipmaster to go and seek Aegyptus, for it was now time to sail. On hearing this, the men lying in wait rushed into the city to seek him; he cut the cable and sailed away. Polyaenus, book 6.

When Themistocles had been carried to Ionia, he disclosed himself to the shipmaster and threatened that, unless he sailed away, he would say that the man had been hired for money to carry him off. Thus, through fear of an accusation, the shipmaster conveyed his country's enemy to safety.

When Diotimus was fleeing with ten faster ships, he backed their sterns some distance into twenty Spartan vessels and sank them. Polyaenus, book 1.

When Eteonicus the Spartan was being besieged by the Athenians and heard that his own men had been defeated at Arginusae, he offered sacrifice as though at joyful news and ordered messengers wearing wreaths to go about. Consequently, the dismayed Athenians remained inactive. He escaped and led away his army. Of such importance is it to send messengers promptly. If Callicratides had perceived the matter before the Athenian commander, the war would have been brought to an end in both places. Eteonicus instilled error in the enemy and thus escaped.

When Brasidas and others were being enclosed by a rampart, they waited until the embankment had in fact been closed; and thus, in the narrow space, protected at the side and rear, they fought.

§3. It has been effected by various stratagems that the enemy should not pursue fugitives. Croesus delayed Cyrus from pursuing by means of flame. Polyaenus, book 7. Mithridates, while fleeing, placed the furnishings of a certain city in a public place; these delayed his pursuers so greatly that they refused to obey their commanders.

Frotho, king of the Danes, defeated by the English, delayed the victor by scattering money. The Gauls abandoned wagons laden with silk and other things and inflicted disaster upon the Caesarians while they contended over the booty. Antigonus likewise deceived the Gauls in this manner in ancient times, for avarice is exceedingly exposed to disasters.

Commius the Atrebatian is worthy of great praise. For, when defeated and fleeing Julius Caesar, he came to ships which stood upon dry ground. The wind was favorable, but the tide opposed him. He therefore ordered the sails to be spread; when Julius observed these from afar and supposed that Commius was departing with a favorable passage, he withdrew.

Iphicrates made a trench behind his soldiers so that they could not flee. But I believe it was rather so that they could not be surrounded from behind, for he was fighting with a small force against a great multitude; indeed, crossing the trench was not so very difficult.

§4. The protection of fugitives lies in concealing a defeat. Artabazus concealed his defeat while he crossed Thessaly. Some have deceived the enemy with fire.

Ammianus Marcellinus, when he could neither flee nor hide, sent a horse upon which he had placed a light across the plain to the right; while the Persians followed it, he himself escaped with his men to the left into the mountains.

It has also been a device of military cunning to give a public signal for flight, but meanwhile privately to warn the rear of the column to stand fast.

When Philip was being routed by the Thracians, he ordered the rear of the column to halt at the signal for flight, so that the others might occupy the road in advance. In slender hope, boldness is the safest course.

When Eumenes, fleeing from the Gauls, was carried in a litter, he ordered himself to be placed upon a hill. They suspected an ambush and desisted from pursuing.

§5. The flight of certain men has appeared ignoble, but nevertheless cunning.

Seleucus, fleeing from Cilicia, assumed the dress of an armor-bearer and performed that office for the commander Amyction. Niccolò Piccinino, enclosed in a sack, was carried through the midst of the enemy by his attendant Todeschino; when men asked what was being carried, the answer was “bread.” Fulgosius, book 7, chapter 3.

Lachares was fortunate in fleeing. At Thebes he hid up to his head in a sewer; at Sestos he went out with women mourning a dead man; at Athens he went out in a servant’s dress, with his face blackened, carrying a basket covered with dung. He then mounted a horse and delayed his pursuers by casting down darics. Bohemond, passing through the dominions of his enemy Alexius, caused himself to be carried in a coffin as though dead.

§6. When one must withdraw from the enemy because he is stronger, the first thing to be done is that it not be thought to occur through fear but through prudence; otherwise the soldiers flee. Next, everything must be done so that the enemy does not perceive the departure. Hence they are accustomed to place the cavalry at the opening, kindle fires at night, and feign battle. But one who has withdrawn far enough to cross a forest, mountains, or a river easily completes the rest of the journey; for, after stationing a garrison, he can delay the enemy until he has reached the appointed place. When the Greeks who had marched into Persia with Cyrus the Younger were being followed by the enemy, and consequently withdrew by night and pitched their camp farther away lest they be attacked in the darkness, the Greeks themselves set out by night and went so far ahead that the Persians first overtook them on the fourth day.

§7. The end of flight, however, is that they recover victory; of this Antigonus is a notable example. No one is easily found who recovered victory as nobly as that Antigonus of whom I have spoken. Polyaenus describes the matter in book 4.

Antigonus had one hundred and thirty ships, over which Nicanor presided. With these he engaged in a naval battle against Polyperchon’s fleet, which Cleitus commanded. The battle was joined in the Hellespont. Nicanor, after his men had been forced by inexperience into the opposing waves, lost seventy ships. Although the enemy plainly held victory in their hands, Antigonus arrived toward evening and did not fear the defeat he had suffered. Instead, he ordered those who remained in the other sixty ships to be ready and equipped for naval battle again during the night. He stationed the bravest of his attendants at the vessels and gave them instructions to threaten that they would bring death upon all who did not go forth into the battle.

And since the nearby city of Byzantium was joined to him by alliance and friendship, he ordered shield-bearing and light-armed soldiers and one thousand archers to be sent from there at once to handle the oars and to cast javelins and arrows into the enemy’s ships. These things were arranged in the course of one night. But when dawn began, while they were casting spears and darts upon the ships, and the enemy, not yet released from sleep but only then awakened, received wounds without precaution, some began breaking the cables, others drawing back the boarding-bridges, others raising the anchors--in brief, all began to raise shouting and tumult. Antigonus also gave the signal to the sixty ships to approach and make an assault with fury and force. Thus it immediately happened that, while some cast missiles from the shore and others brought hostile ships forward, the victors were overcome by the vanquished.

Parallel to this is the following deed of Sertorius. When Quintus Sertorius, military tribune under the praetor Didius, had his winter quarters in the city of Castulo, the people of Castulo received the enemy Gyrisaeni into the city by night, and together they began to attack and kill Sertorius's men. On hearing the clamor, Sertorius secretly went out from the city with a few men, halted not far from the gate, and began to collect his fleeing men and arrange them in battle-line. When he now saw that he had collected a sufficiently large body, he reentered the city by the same gate through which the enemy had gone. He found them scattered into different places and intent upon plunder alone; and thus he routed them within a short time and put on their arms. Having drawn up his battle-line in this manner, under the appearance of the Gyrisaeni he hastened toward Gyrissa. There, since no one suspected anything and they supposed that their own men were returning, the gate-leaves were opened. Thus he took the city and plundered it completely, so that he abundantly repaid the enemy for the evil they had inflicted at Castulo. Fulgosius, book 7, chapter 4.

§8. Those who are sailing sometimes direct lights one way while they themselves keep a different course without a lamp. When Frederick Marabotto the Guelf was fleeing Auria and had already despaired of being able to escape, he advised his triremes by night where he intended to sail; then he placed a lamp upon a shield which was cast toward the shore. The enemy followed it and gave him the opportunity to escape. Fulgosius, book 7, chapter 4.

CHAPTER XLIX

The Enemy's Flight Must Not Readily Be Blocked

§1. Scipio prudently used to say that a road should be prepared for those fleeing. Themistocles even advised Xerxes to flee, lest he keep so great a multitude of barbarians within the vitals of Greece. Alfonso had the same judgment: he thought that a silver bridge should be laid down for a fleeing enemy. Iphicrates also followed fugitives gradually and did not press them toward rivers, lest they despair. After a city had been taken, when they ran together in the forum, he ordered the gates to be opened so that, as they poured out, they might be cut down without danger.

The reason is that, when necessity presses experienced and brave men, it penetrates everything. It is a hard weapon, and those who fought under the utmost necessity have rarely been defeated. Despair makes men mad: because they fear nothing, they either conquer or are conquered with great slaughter. Pontius, commander of the Samnites, gives that warning when they could satisfy the Romans neither by surrendering those responsible nor by any other means.

The prudence of the Roman legates was distinguished when they opened a road to the Etruscans. Livy, book 2:

"Manlius also presented himself in person to restore the battle-line; the recognized faces of the two consuls inflamed the spirits of the soldiers. At the same time the enemy's battle-line was now weaker, since, trusting in their abundant multitude, they had withdrawn their reserves and sent them to attack the camp. Having made an assault upon it without a great struggle, they wasted time mindful of plunder rather than battle. The Roman triarii, who had been unable to sustain the first assault, sent messengers to the consuls to report the state of affairs, returned in a body to the praetorium, and of their own accord themselves renewed the battle.

"The consul Manlius, having been carried back into the camp, had opposed soldiers at every gate and blocked the enemy's way. This despair inflamed rage rather than courage in the Etruscans. For, after they ran wherever the hope of an exit displayed itself and had several times made a vain assault, one body of young men attacked the consul himself, who was conspicuous by his arms. The first missiles were received by those standing around him; afterward the force could not be sustained. The consul, struck by a mortal wound, fell, and all around him were routed. The courage of the Etruscans increased. Terror drove the Romans in alarm throughout the camp, and matters would have come to the extremity had not the legates, after seizing the consul's body, opened a way for the enemy through one gate. They broke out through it and, departing in a disordered column, encountered the other victorious consul. There they were cut down again and routed in every direction."

And in book 4, when the Volsci had been surrounded and formed themselves into a circle, Messius exhorted them and led them out, and inflicted enormous slaughter upon the Romans:

"Are you," he said, "going to expose yourselves defenseless and unavenged to the enemy's weapons here? Why, then, do you have arms? Or why did you voluntarily undertake war--you who are turbulent in peace but sluggish in war? What hope is there for you while you stand here? Do you think that some god will protect you and carry you away from here? A road must be made by the sword. Go in this direction in which you see me go before you; you who wish to see your homes, parents, wives, and children, come with me. No wall and no rampart, but armed men, stand in the way of armed men. You are equal in courage, and superior in necessity, which is the last and greatest weapon."

"After he had said this and was putting his words into action, they followed him with renewed shouting and made an assault where Postumius Albus had opposed his cohorts; and they moved the victors until the dictator came to his own men, who were now giving ground. The whole battle turned toward that point. The fortune of the enemy rested upon one man, Messius. There were many wounds on either side and much slaughter everywhere. By then not even the Roman commanders were fighting unwounded. Postumius alone, struck by a stone and with his head broken, withdrew from the battle-line. Neither the dictator's wounded shoulder, nor Fabius's thigh nearly fastened to his horse, nor the consul's severed arm removed them from so uncertain a battle.

"Messius's assault carried him with a body of the bravest young men through enemies laid low by slaughter to the camp of the Volsci, which had not yet been taken. The whole battle-line inclined to the same place. The consul, having pursued those pouring forth as far as the rampart, attacked the camp and rampart themselves; the dictator moved his forces toward the same place from the other side. The attack was no less spirited than the battle had been. They say that the consul even cast a standard within the rampart so that the soldiers would go up more fiercely, and that the first assault was made in recovering the standard."

If they had furnished those surrounded with an opportunity to flee, they could have destroyed the enemy without receiving a wound; as matters stood, the battle was renewed more severely than at the beginning. For one man--made mad by despair and anger, and fearing death accompanied by torment--is stronger than three upon whom no necessity of fighting presses.

§2. Therefore, fugitives must be pressed cautiously, lest necessity make them resist, so that they may flee more readily thereafter, believing that the victors will not press fugitives toward destruction. For those oppressed by a peril on either side nevertheless wage a memorable battle. Necessity sharpens even cowardice, and often despair is the cause of hope. Curtius, book 4, taught this. By his own example, the courageous soldier Sempronius Gracchus, having fallen headlong into an ambush, brought it about that they did not fall unavenged. Livy, book 34.

The prudence of the Roman Senate also sufficiently taught us that an enemy must not be enclosed: they decreed that the Gauls, who desired ships, should be conveyed across and assisted with provisions. The Gauls were also given the power to flee through the Pomptine territory. When the Carthaginians, surrounded, were resisting in despair, Lucius Marcius gave them room to flee and cut them down without danger as they fled. Caesar did this to the Germans, and Hannibal at Lake Trasimene. Antigonus allowed the Aetolians who were breaking out to flee and then cut them down from behind. Agesilaus likewise let the Thebans out, and Themistocles let Xerxes out.

Pyrrhus's precept was that fugitives should not be pressed forcefully, so that on another occasion they would flee more readily. For the man who knows that he will certainly die willingly desires to die together with others. "The one safety of the conquered is to hope for no safety."

Datames even defeated Lucullus in this manner. Concerning Datames, Frontinus writes in book 2, chapter 7:

"Datames, commander of the Persians, when he learned that part of his cavalry was deserting while he was fighting Autophradates in Cappadocia, ordered all the rest to come with him. After overtaking the deserters, he praised them because they had briskly gone ahead of him and even exhorted them to attack the enemy courageously. Shame brought repentance upon the deserters; and because they did not suppose that their plan had been detected, they changed it. Thus, while he despaired of his life because of the desertion of his own men, he obtained the victory."

Cato's deed was certainly distinguished. When the Aetolians were attacking Ambracia, he arrived in a small vessel and by voice, hand, and gesture appeared to be summoning ships of his own men which were arriving; the Aetolians therefore desisted from the attack.

Among the laws of Lycurgus was this: not to kill fleeing enemies. The Spartans, the best of soldiers, therefore observed it, so that they preferred to see an enemy fleeing rather than resisting.

CHAPTER L

The Method of Naval War

§1. The plan of Themistocles formerly, and afterward of Pompey the Great, was that particular account should be taken of fleets; for all things are possessed by him who holds the sea.

Hence the Romans always prepared a great fleet--or, rather, had one. Vegetius, book 5, chapter 1:

"The Roman people, however, in keeping with the dignity and advantage of their greatness, did not prepare a fleet for the occasion because of the necessity of some disturbance; but, lest they should ever sustain such a necessity, they always kept one prepared. For no one dares to provoke by war or inflict injury upon a kingdom or people whom he knows to be equipped and ready to resist and avenge. At Misenum, therefore, and Ravenna, individual legions stood with the fleets, so that they would not withdraw too far from the protection of the city and, when circumstances demanded it, might arrive by sea without delay and without a circuitous route at every part of the world. For the fleet at Misenum had Gaul, the Spains, Mauretania, Africa, Egypt, Sardinia, and Sicily close at hand. The fleet at Ravenna, however, was accustomed to seek Epirus, Macedonia, Achaea, the Propontis, Pontus, the East, Crete, and Cyprus by a direct voyage."

Dominion of the sea, therefore, contributes very greatly to power. The Spaniards say that a kingdom without a port is like an oven without fire. And indeed it has appeared in the case of Portugal, a kingdom not great, how by dominion of the sea the Portuguese occupied the Indies and preserve them even today. Lipsius counts more fleets in On Roman Greatness, book 1, chapter 5. He thinks that there were four upon the sea and three upon rivers.

§2. Vegetius demands the greatest care in building ships, because it is more dangerous for a ship to be defective than for a house. "The Liburnian," he says in book 5, chapter 4, "is constructed from cypress and from domestic and wild pine, larch, and especially fir, and should more advantageously be fastened with bronze nails than with iron ones. For although the expenditure may appear somewhat heavy, nevertheless, because it lasts longer, it is proved to bring profit. For rust quickly consumes iron nails through time and moisture, whereas bronze nails preserve their own substance even amid the waves." Timber must be cut from the fifteenth day of the moon through the twenty-third. It can be cut from the summer solstice until January.

Ships were of various kinds in former times. The largest had six banks of rowers or more, as Vegetius says; but he is speaking of the ordinary form of ships, for from the ship which is drawn by one bank of rowers they advanced as far as fifteen and sixteen banks of rowers. But biremes, triremes, and quadriremes were commonly used; they have that many banks of oars, rowers, and benches in each order. Indeed, when the Romans first took up maritime affairs, they thought the construction of quinqueremes difficult. Later, however, Antony and Augustus erected high fighting-towers upon their ships. Antony even had δεκήρεις, deciremes, as Dio records. Alexander the Great had twelve banks, as Pliny is the authority.

Ptolemy Philadelphus had two ships of thirty banks, one of twenty, four of thirteen, two of twelve, and fourteen of eleven; thirty hepteres, five hexeres, and seventeen quinqueremes. Great also, and like a town, was the ship of Ptolemy Philopator. It had forty banks; its length was two hundred eighty cubits and its height thirty-eight. There were four hundred sailors in it, four thousand rowers, and nearly three thousand soldiers; it had seven beaks and four rudders. Yet all these things were more for display than for use. For so great a multitude could neither live conveniently nor discharge its duties.

§3. Most approve smaller and more agile ships, because they are driven even by a lighter wind and do not strike upon sandbanks so easily. In the battle against Austria the Turkish ships discharged harmless missiles, because their prows were much higher. But nevertheless, if we wish to confess the truth, Augustus against Sextus Pompey and Antony used high fighting-towers upon their ships. And the six large Christian ships which, in front of the half-moon formation of our fleet, tore apart the hostile fleet won the victory for the Christians against the Turks in great part.

It is entirely necessary to observe the warnings of storms and obey them, for more fleets have perished by storm than by battle. When you have foreseen everything, one can still perish from thirst in the midst of water. Therefore provision must also be made concerning water.

If you are going to fight at sea, you will be able to advance first into the battle-line; for soldiers already prepared will be able to rest and take food. Nor are they wearied as in a land battle, yet they cannot fight unless the enemy approaches. Timotheus, commander of the Athenians, sent twenty very swift ships against the enemy to make sport of them. These wearied the enemy; afterward he himself cut them down when they were weary.

§4. Naval forces must be trained with enormous care, so that they become accustomed to pull the oars, direct the helm, cast and recover anchors, arrange ropes, spread and contract sails, turn ships, angle the sails, climb the mast, and keep watch from the fighting-top. Finally, they must be fearless before every danger; for, besides the common evils of war, the waters themselves and sea-monsters supply sufficient terror. Then there are the conflicts of winds, shoals, Euripi, whirlpools, tides, bays, promontories, rocks, sandbanks, and that which is especially pleasing to spectators, the stillness of the sea, or dead calm itself.

At night they signal everything to one another more easily by fires. The admiral's ship and vice-admiral's ship always carry a fire before them; but when the latter is present, the admiral's ship displays two, and all imitate this arrangement so that they do not collide through proximity. When a whirlwind arises, a signal is given twice with a great cannon that the ships need not follow the admiral's ship. They also have commands consigned in writing stating the place in which they ought to assemble if they are dispersed. If enemies appear at night, the ship that notices them gives the signal. A watchword for the ships is also given with great care. At sunset, and likewise at sunrise, all the ships come to salute the commander upon the admiral's ship. They receive the watchword in the evening; but if they are hindered by a storm, every captain has the watchwords for the whole week written down and distributes them.

Nothing is more dangerous than a naval battle, for the sea itself is an enemy: ships are easily pierced and burned; one must leap onto enemy ships and fight there. The ships themselves are sometimes entangled with one another and impede one another, and a conquered ship drags the victorious ship with it.

The order of naval battle generally is that the admiral's ship is in the middle, and the larger ships are joined to it, while the smaller hold the wings. I understand this to apply unless the enemy has stronger ships upon the sides. Great care must be taken that those ships which first receive the wind are strong, for the strongest can make the assault. They advance in an even order; the lighter ships regulate their sails so that they are not carried more swiftly than the heavier.

The enemy is harmed chiefly in two ways: by cannon and by grappling-irons, by which vessels are joined together. Formerly they did not have cannon with which to tear vessels apart, but drove the ships' beaks at speed into their sides. Now the method is different, for those who most quickly and skillfully thunder upon enemy ships, and who can strike mast, yards, or rudder, generally emerge victorious. Formerly they fought especially with fire: Cassius sent burning transports into the enemy fleet and set it on fire; Gnaeus Scipio hurled jars filled with pitch and pinewood upon enemy ships; Hannibal hurled vipers.

Against smaller firearms they protect themselves with thick planks, and sometimes with a double barrier of ropes one foot apart. Meanwhile they struggle with great disadvantages, whether while they fight with ships joined and fastened together, or while they cast the enemy's fires upon a ship; for at the same time they themselves too are endangered, lest they be burned together. Every noncombatant throng should be employed in repairing ships and caring for the wounded. The danger is increased by the fact that, when it comes to hand-to-hand combat, one ship attacks one, or two attack one; and thus there are at once as many battle-lines as ships.

§5. With the same wind a fleet advances more slowly--even when the ships are the same--than individual ships do separately. Therefore, when departure is necessary, a commander will prepare himself for a longer voyage than a merchant will.

When a maritime battle is to be fought, a flag is displayed from the admiral's ship. If a ship appears from elsewhere, the ship nearest to it suspends one flag; if two appear, it suspends two, and warns the commander of the fleet.

When scout ships judge that something is seen by them, if the commander wishes them to advance and investigate it better, he suspends a flag at the prow. Indeed, many things are indicated at sea by flags, because sight extends for the greatest distance across the water, whereas in fields it is impeded by thickets and other things.

When a ship has struck something or is stuck upon sandbanks, it fires a cannon three times, and someone requests assistance from the fighting-top by waving a flag. If a hostile ship secretly enters the fleet for the purpose of spying and there is suspicion of the matter, a flag of a certain or variegated color, such as all the ships possess, is raised from the admiral's ship. Since the spy ship cannot do this, it is immediately detected; it could nevertheless remain hidden if it had previously been informed about the kind of those flags.

§6. A fleet requires many more things than a land army; for the arms of fleets must be furnished in such a way that they can also fight upon land and besiege cities. Ranzovius recounts that many things were present in the Spanish fleet. He says in book 1, chapter 8:

"This fleet was assembled from 130 ships and carried 57,868 units of weight, or what they call lasts; 19,295 marines; 8,052 sailors and rowers; 2,441 larger cannon; 123,090 balls, or cannon-shot; 5,175 hundredweights of gunpowder; 1,238 hundredweights of lead; and 1,151 hundredweights of fire-kindling. There was, besides, an enormous supply of fresh water, wooden dishes, lamps, larger and smaller lanterns, likewise nails and oxhide, and a great quantity of flax and tow for stopping and repairing ships which opened at the seams or were pierced; also shields, many wax tapers, tallow candles, and rather long sacks.

"In addition, all those things were present which serve for moving the larger cannon: 40 mules, lower wagons, wheels, and other things of that kind; and, among other things, equipment sufficient for landing twenty of those greater wheeled cannon which they call cartauns. With these were also conveyed twenty-one of another kind, which, from the use that they render especially in the open field, are called field serpentines or culverins, and 3,500 balls with which these might be loaded.

"As for the smaller weapons, the fleet was abundantly equipped with them. There were at hand 7,000 longer handguns; 1,000 forked guns bent toward the stock, together with their requirements; 10,000 long shafts; 1,000 javelins and double axes; 6,000 shorter spears; and many other things prudently prepared, with which, if circumstances permitted, a land battle could be entered against the enemy and towns besieged and captured. At the same time there were present 700 miners, more than sufficiently equipped with their apparatus for use in driving mines.

"The number of all the persons for whose provisions provision had been made was 30,693. Of this class were hired soldiers, bold musketeers, physicians, surgeons, chaplains, monks, noblemen, and the other attendants of the fleet's supreme commander, judges, sailors, rowers, cooks, and similar persons necessary for the equipment of the fleet. For their sustenance for six months these provisions were held: 11,000 hundredweights of baked bread; 21,255 amphorae of wine; 6,000 hundredweights of salted meat; 3,433 hundredweights of cheeses; 8,000 hundredweights of salted provisions; 3,000 hundredweights of rice; 6,320 hundredweights of beans and vetch; 11,398 bath-measures of oil; 13,687 of vinegar in the same measure; and 11,870 pipes filled with drinking water.

"It was also learned from Spaniards whom the English captured that 12,000 ducats were spent each day to maintain the fleet, and that, in addition, a great quantity of gold and silver was conveyed upon the admiral's ships for the support of the war; but that ten thousand cannon-shots were discharged by the hostile English fleet against the fleet itself."

For the Danish fleet he gives this equipment of the admiral's ship: 100 gunners skilled in loading and discharging the larger cannon; 500 sailors; 700 marines; 20 whole and half cartauns; 14 whole serpentines or culverins; 14 three-quarter serpentines; 4 half serpentines; 15 falcons; 2 bronze fire-projectors; 8 tower-breakers or wall-mounted phalaricae; 8 Tyrian rams; 8 grappling-irons or hooks; 68 machines which they call Barssen; 100 hooked machines; 10 units of weight, or lasts, of gunpowder; besides lead, balls, and fuses or fire-kindling in great number.

Provisions were assigned to this same admiral's ship for six months' sustenance: 7,400 sides of bacon; 3,143 pieces of beef; 6,248 quarters of mutton; 6,248 smoked geese; 30 units of weight, or lasts, of butter; 60 lasts of pickled herring; 60 lasts of smaller cod; 1,480 wagonloads of stockfish or hake; 4 lasts of salted pike; 4 lasts of salted eel; 4,000 sea albicae; 8,000 dried sea-scallops or flatfish; 8 bundles of long cod; 8 bundles of larger cod or capitones; 24½ lasts of oats prepared for human food; 24 lasts of vetch; 402 lasts of bread; 700 lasts of beer; 4 lasts of Lüneburg salt; 10 lasts of coarse foreign salt; and 4 lasts of vinegar.

When ships are lacking, it is customary to detain merchant vessels after the price of carriage has been paid. The kings of Spain and Denmark are accustomed to do this; in this matter one must act so that justice is observed in all things.

Nevertheless, the care of provisions should come first.

οὐ γάρ τι στυγερῇ ἐπὶ γαστέρι κύντερον ἄλλο ἔπλετο, ἥ τ' ἐκέλευσεν ἕο μνήσασθαι ἀνάγκῃ καὶ μάλα τειρόμενον καὶ ἐνὶ φρεσὶ πένθος ἔχοντα.

Nothing else more shameless than the hateful belly comes upon a man, since it of necessity commands him to remember it, even if he is sorrowful and turns grief over in his mind.

In an army this evil is more grievous, because a soldier driven to corrupt and foul foods contracts plague and other diseases; and because he grows weak, his spirits fail and he becomes timid.

In order that provisions may be held, it will be advantageous to require not merely money--which, while passing through the hands of Harpies, is diminished--but grain, bacon, cheeses, butter, oil, fish, and other things. For subjects bring these more willingly, and they are kept more profitably.

CHAPTER LI

Scouts Must Be Employed

§1. To know the enemy's plans and conceal one's own has the greatest importance for victory. And scarcely anyone has been defeated in war except one who was ignorant of the enemy's design. Tomombeius lost a most valiant army and was stripped of his kingdom for almost this very reason: all his plans were betrayed.

To have known the enemy's plans is almost to have conquered. Fulvius Nobilior learned that the enemy would seize the rear of the column. He ordered the strongest legion to march first and the baggage to follow. The enemy, enticed by the opportunity, plundered the baggage. But Fulvius had directed five cohorts of the legion to the right and five to the left of the road, and they cut down the occupied enemy. Iphicrates did the same in a not dissimilar manner. Epaminondas said that nothing in a commander was more praiseworthy than to know the enemy's plans.

§2. Even amid military disturbance and slaughter, Germanicus had scouts among the Germans. Tacitus, Annals, book 1: "A longer route having been selected, the other things were hastened; for scouts had reported that that night was festive among the Germans and sportful with solemn banquets."

§3. Great kings sometimes go at their own peril to various places in order to learn the enemy's equipment. Saladin, hearing of the Christians' equipment, traveled through Germany, the Gauls, and Spain. Egnatius, book 9, chapter 8. More prudent in this class of action was Memnon, who sent another man with his envoy, namely a famous lyre-player to whom a multitude flocked. Polyaenus, book 5.

§4. Much less should the fortune of one's own army be unknown, for this has sometimes brought destruction. Indeed, men within the same army sometimes do not know the fortune of its parts. Brutus was victorious, while Cassius was defeated upon his own wing; and because Cassius thought that Brutus too had been defeated, he brought death upon himself. When the king of France had defeated the Swiss in Insubria, some intact formations of the Swiss thought that their own men were victorious, and on account of that error almost the whole army perished.

§5. Scouts must always be sent, but cautiously, lest after being intercepted and tortured they disclose your plans. Heraclides, under the appearance of a deserter, burned the Rhodians' dockyards.

§6. Every means, and sometimes novel stratagems, must be employed so that scouts may be discovered. When scouts were in the army of Chares, he ordered each man to seize the man nearest him and ask him his formation, standard, maniple, and mess-company. Since the scouts could not answer these questions, they were discovered. When Theognis ordered all to put on their own arms, he discovered the scouts. But when they hide among baggage-servants and merchants, those men too must be examined, for they are generally known by someone.

§7. Secret characters in letters, whether written upon the carrier's body or in some other manner, are now generally discovered. The safest course is to agree upon the characters before the parties are separated. Formerly, a Carthaginian wrote the secrets of the Romans upon a tablet covered with wax and sent them to his homeland. Demaratus the Greek gave warning of Xerxes' expedition. Gellius, book 17, chapter 9, says that letters inscribed upon heads whose hair had been shaved with a razor, and then concealed by the same hair after it had grown again, were sent to friends.

The Spartan scytale is made with remarkable art. Each party has a piece of wood of the same shape and size. A long strip of paper, like a strap, is wound around it and is then written upon. The recipient winds it around his own piece of wood, and it will reproduce the same conjunction of letters that was upon the first piece of wood. Nor can an enemy draw out any meaning unless he has learned the size of the pieces of wood.

Philip, most cunning of kings, wrote a letter to Antipater: “The Thracians have rebelled; come, leaving everything.” When the Athenians intercepted it, supposing that they had received the secrets of the Macedonians and being free from concern, they withdrew their fleet. Philip’s commanders passed over with no one opposing them.

There is indeed a great opportunity to delude the enemy if fictitious commands are sent to commanders. Yet to recognize them and distinguish the true from the fictitious will not be difficult if some sign known to them alone is added. Mendoza relates that during a siege a sheet enclosed in lead was given to two men, which they swallowed. The sheet was written in such a way that they themselves did not know its contents and could not disclose them even under torture; but they came to the enemy under the appearance of deserters.

Men not only intercept letters sent to allies, but also direct purported letters of the enemy to the enemy by imitating the seal and handwriting, so that they may afflict them with some error. They are accustomed to write letters for the punishment of deserters which are intended to be intercepted, so that the deserters’ credit among the enemy may be destroyed and they may appear to be scouts. Conon, abandoned by his allies, sent a deserter to report that they were fleeing. When the allies perceived men lying in wait, they returned.

§8. Every method of messengers and letters pertains to reconnaissance. Necessity has devised various ways of sending out messengers and delivering letters. Pontius Cominus lowered himself down the Tarpeian Rock and, after swimming across the Tiber, arrived at Veii; afterward he returned unharmed to the Capitol. A Campanian soldier carried a letter enclosed in his belt to the Carthaginians. Letters are also enclosed in the inner part of scabbards. By letters sent upon arrows and by persuading captives that he was coming to liberate the state of the Troezenians, Cleonymus fell upon them while they were divided.

Caesar’s messenger hurled letters into the camp, but there is a danger that they may not be noticed. Therefore, they are better sent through men secretly instructed for the purpose--through those who bring hay, straw, fruit, and similar things into camps. Letters are easily carried by unknown and lowly men. Eric, king of Sweden, wooed the queen of England by letters enclosed in a staff, but the Danish commander intercepted them. Harpagus inserted a letter into a hare.

§9. Scipio followed a remarkable method of reconnaissance. When Laelius was sent as envoy to Syphax, Scipio sent with him, in the place of servants, the choicest tribunes and centurions. Chasing a horse which had been let loose through the camp, they saw all its fortifications and obtained an easy victory for Scipio. The Carthaginians ordered Hamilcar to go to Alexander under the appearance of an exile and report Alexander’s plans to them. The same was also done with the Romans. Cato interrogated one enemy whom he had seized and tortured concerning the enemy’s plans. This is uncertain, since few generally know them.

In this matter, however, the greatest sagacity and the greatest prudence are needed. When Paulus Aemilius saw a great multitude of birds fly out of a forest all at once, he did not groundlessly judge that an ambush of Etruscans was there. By the same sign Tisamenus, son of Orestes, learned that the ridge was occupied by the enemy.

The Carthaginians seem to me to have signaled from a distance most expediently of all. For they could give a signal such that whatever was lacking could be seen at Carthage. They had made two water clocks of equal size and had also established rings at equal intervals. Upon these they had inscribed various things which they might at some time require--for example, engines, gold, grain, cavalry, and infantry. If, therefore, they requested any one of these things, when the water had descended to the ring upon which that thing was inscribed they kindled a fire. Upon seeing this and inspecting their own water clock, assistance was sent from Carthage.

Two things had to be diligently observed in this matter: first, that diligent account be taken of the turning of the water clocks; second, that the fire be made in a fixed manner and place, lest, if there were some accidental or hostile fire in the vicinity, the senate should think that assistance was being requested.

When letters are sent by pigeons, care must be taken lest the birds fall into the enemy's hands, as happened to the sultan while the Christians were besieging Ptolemais. When a signal is given by fires, contrary fires must be kindled so that the enemy may doubt whose they are. The Plataeans did this while they were being besieged by the Spartans. The enemy is especially deceived by changing signals. When the Arabs used smoke by day and fires by night to signify that enemies were approaching, they did this for successive days; but when the enemy was present, they deliberately omitted the signals. Since that omission was itself the signal to them, the enemies, thinking that they lay concealed, conducted everything with greater confidence.

CHAPTER LII

How Traitors Are to Be Endured

§1. Most men love treachery but hate traitors.

I call those men traitors who secretly surrender their homeland, prince, army, secrets, or other things to the enemy, or who share counsels with enemies for the destruction of those to whom they owe fidelity. Accordingly, those who open gates or bring about something advantageous to the enemy are called by this name. Those, however, who come from the enemy, secretly insinuate themselves, and employ fraud are not traitors. Indeed, in a just war this is a stratagem, not treachery. Such are those who secretly approach enemy places in rustic dress and by other means; they are scouts rather than traitors.

§2. Men frequently employ feigned treachery in order to draw into destruction those who know how to solicit the minds of soldiers; and thus even traitors are not easily trusted. Alcibiades, employing a fugitive, persuaded the Syracusans to leave the city, which he himself soon captured. He had an army at Catana. A fugitive asserted that the Catanians wished to crush the Greeks and could do so if they received assistance from the Syracusans. The Syracusans went to Catana with all their forces, and Alcibiades captured Syracuse undefended.

The Romans were too credulous. When they were going to free Piso, who was besieged in a tower, they heard from a fugitive the report which Mago had cunningly spread: that Piso had been captured. Terrified, they withdrew.

Guido of Friuli, while besieged, arranged that some citizens should bring certain enemies into the city through feigned treachery. He himself went out by another gate and cut down those who were outside and unprepared; then, returning, he killed or captured those who were wandering through the city intent upon plunder.

§3. When Frederick, king of Aragon, did not know in what place Robert of Naples was going to invade Sicily, he commanded certain citizens of Trapani to persuade Robert to besiege Trapani. As it happened, Frederick himself placed a garrison in it and compelled Robert to remain there throughout the summer, and even to make peace as winter approached.

Mentor, sending letters under the seal of the defeated Hermias, occupied many cities. Frederick, count of Ferrara, sent letters to the commander of Varrueal after imitating Sigismund's hand; he asked whether the commander required a garrison, and, when the latter answered affirmatively, Frederick sent his own.

§4. Care must be taken in various ways that credit be taken away from deserters; for this both restrains desertions, prevents the enemy from learning your plans, and punishes traitors. Hannibal took credit away from deserters. For when he knew that scouts of the Romans were in his camp, he publicly denied that his soldiers who had deserted to the Romans should be called deserters, since they were most skillful soldiers who, at his command, were gathering the enemy's plans. Hannibal was believed, and the genuine deserters, regarded as scouts, were sent back with their hands cut off.

It belongs to a good commander to conceal matters not only from the enemy but even from his own soldier and to deceive him. When Marcus Licinius Crassus was asked at what time he was going to move camp, he replied: "Are you afraid that you will not hear the trumpet?" With a similar plan Furius, having been cast into an unfavorable place, feigned hope in his expression and led the column around, bringing men ignorant of the danger out of it. Claudius Nero's deed was bold and then too hazardous: he kept Hannibal ignorant of it until he had killed Hasdrubal. Mithridates remained hidden from Pompey while passing by his camp. When Hamilcar was seeking Sicily, he gave out tablets which were not to be read unless the ships wandered away from the admiral's ship.

§5. Meanwhile, to use traitors also for concealing plans and to turn them to one's own use belongs to an industrious commander. Frontinus says in book 1, chapter 1:

"In the Parthian War against King Pacorus, Ventidius was not ignorant that a certain Pharnaeus, a Cyrrhestian by nation, one of those who seemed to be allies, was reporting to the Parthians everything that was being done among his own men. He turned the barbarian's perfidy to his own advantage. For he pretended to fear that those things which he especially desired to happen might happen, and to desire that those things which he feared might happen. Therefore, anxious lest the Parthians cross the Euphrates before the legions which he had beyond the Taurus in Cappadocia came to him, he carefully worked upon the traitor so that, with his customary perfidy, he would persuade the Parthians to convey their army across by Zeugma, where the route is shortest and the Euphrates flows in a confined channel. For he asserted that if they came that way he would use the advantage of the hills to elude the archers; but that he feared everything if they advanced into open plains.

"Induced by this assertion, the barbarians led their army around by the lower route. While they joined the more widely spread banks with bridges, which were for this reason more laborious, and constructed the apparatus, they spent more than forty days. Ventidius used this interval to gather his forces; and, having received them three days before the Parthian arrived, he joined battle, conquered the Parthians, and killed Pacorus."

That opportunity is never lacking, especially when wars are among neighbors. Therefore a commander ought to institute now one thing, now another, so that he may deceive the enemy; nor is there any doubt that those who seek a reward from the other side will report it.

The deed of Titus Didius was also prudent. Distrusting the small number of his own men, when he had decided to prolong the war until the arrival of those legions which he expected and had discovered that the enemy was proceeding to meet them, Didius called an assembly and ordered the soldiers to be made ready for battle. He deliberately commanded that the prisoners be guarded rather negligently. A few of them escaped and announced to their own men that a battle was imminent. But the enemy, from suspicion of battle and lest they divide their forces, omitted to intercept those for whom they had been lying in wait. The legions reached Didius in complete safety, with no one intercepting them. Frontinus, book 1, chapter 8.

CHAPTER LIII

Moderate and Fixed Pay Must Be Established

§1. The Romans gave no pay to their soldiers for nearly three hundred years, for they sent the wealthy into battle, and these sustained military service at their own expense. Nor is it surprising that this was so, for while their kings were at home they wore them down like slaves in various works--in constructing sewers, roads, walls, and temples--so much so that many voluntarily met death. For those living so wretchedly, it was desirable to perish in war and to obtain a noble death through wounds.

Justus Lipsius, in book 5 of On the Roman Army, thinks that something was paid to the soldier even before this. He proves it from Dionysius, book 5, and Livy, book 9. But he thinks that it was a public contribution toward the costs of war. I add that these things were sometimes required as a reward for the soldiers, or were customarily contributed by the citizens in a necessity.

§2. Afterward, when military service was too burdensome if each man served at his own expense, pay was established in the Veientine War. It is called ὀψώνια, because it was given for buying provisions. Polybius says that foot soldiers receive two obols in pay each day, commanders of formations twice that, and cavalrymen a drachma. According to the calculation of Justus Lipsius, this was ten denarii a month, that is, one philippus. It is a small payment now; at that time it was large, and, because it was new, also very welcome to the people. For that reason it also remained for a long time. But if we consider the cheapness of goods, we shall find that payment to have been by no means slight.

§3. Pay among the Greeks was generally of this kind. The Spartans promised one daric to a soldier, twice that to a centurion, and four times that to a commander, στρατηγῷ. Xenophon, book 7 of the ἀναβάσεως. The Athenians paid a drachma a day, which was more generous, for a daric is worth twenty drachmas.

§4. Every effort must be made that, just as grain was formerly given, so bread should now be given. Formerly, indeed, it was disgraceful to sell grain and to buy bread. But now, since neither grain nor bread is given, money is easily consumed, and then soldiers turn to plunder.

Four modii a month were given to a Roman soldier. This was the ration of slaves, although they sometimes received even five modii. Seneca, Epistle 71. Three times that amount was given to cavalrymen, that is, twelve modii, so that they could feed two servants. The cavalrymen of the allies received eight modii, because they were content with fewer servants.

§5. Meanwhile it was a golden custom to deposit money at the standards, so that the soldiers would not easily consume it and would not easily desert the standards. Vegetius discusses it in book 2, chapter 20:

“This, moreover, was divinely instituted by the ancients: from the donative which the soldiers receive, half should be sequestered at the standards and preserved there for the soldiers themselves, lest it be consumed by their comrades through luxury or the purchase of vain things. For most men, and especially the poor, spend as much as they have been able to possess. This setting aside of money is shown to be advantageous, first, to the comrades themselves; for, since they are sustained by the public ration, their camp property is increased by half from all donatives.

“Then the soldier who knows that his resources have been deposited at the standards thinks nothing of deserting; he loves the standards more and fights more bravely for them in the battle-line, in accordance with the custom of the human disposition, by which a man has the greatest care for those things in which he sees his substance to have been placed.

“Finally, ten purses--that is, ten sacks--were set up for each cohort, and this account was stored in them. An eleventh sack was also added, into which the whole legion contributed some small part, namely for burial, so that, if anyone among the comrades died, the expense of his burial might be provided from that eleventh sack. This account was preserved in a basket in the keeping of the standard-bearers, as they are now called. Therefore, standard-bearers were chosen as men not only trustworthy but also literate, who both knew how to preserve deposits and knew how to render an account to each man.”

There was often an enormous sum of money at the standards. Suetonius, in Domitian: “He prohibited the camps of two legions from being joined, and prohibited anyone from depositing more than one thousand sesterces at the standards, because Lucius Antonius, who was attempting a revolution in the winter quarters of two legions, seemed to have gained confidence from the sum of the deposits.”

§6. Besides these things they gave legumes, peas, lentils, and salt. Plutarch, in Crassus, regards it as an omen of every evil that, at the beginning, when necessities were being measured out, lentils and salt were given, because these things were regarded as funereal.

Of Carinus the emperor, Synesius says: τὸ δεῖπνον ἦν πίσινον ἕωλον ἔτνος, καὶ ἐν αὐτῷ τεμάχια ἄττα ταρίχη κρεῶν ὑείων. His dinner was a pea porridge from the previous day, and in it were several pieces of salted pork. Spartianus counts among camp foods bacon, cheese, and sour wine.

Metellus prohibited the sale of cooked meat; the soldiers themselves roasted or boiled it. Hence a soldier’s spit and pot were among his equipment. The soldiers themselves baked bread--useless labor, since it can readily be baked by bakers for a great multitude.

§7. These things were therefore given in such a way that something was nevertheless deducted from the pay, namely a fixed price. But they were given freely to the allies; I believe that the allies received less pay from their cities.

§8. Paymasters made agreements with the soldiers and gave money and rations as loans. For each solidus they could receive half a solidus, and nothing more for the entire period of deferred payment: law Quicumque, Code, On Public Receipts; law Iubemus, Code, On Disbursement.

§9. Great mutinies have frequently arisen in armies because pay was not rendered. Many devices have also been discovered for pacifying the soldier. Sometimes men employed a wicked art. When the soldiers sought an assembly from Iphicrates on account of their pay, he secretly instructed men skilled in the Persian language and dressed in Persian garb to say that the pay was approaching and that they themselves had been sent ahead. Thus the assembly was broken off.

When Demetrius lacked pay, he enrolled twice the number of soldiers so that, once the enemy had been defeated more quickly, he might compel them to pay the soldiers. When Antigonus, after becoming victor, had previously promised that he would give one gold coin to each Gaul, the Gauls demanded payment also for their boys and women, because he had said “to each Gaul,” and threatened death to the hostages. Antigonus said that he would give it and ordered those who would receive it to come; but he detained them until the hostages were returned. Polyaenus, book 4.

§10. When the credit of the state is intact, the best course in a necessity is to strike coins from readily available material. Perdiccas struck a tin coin and gave the grain of his region in exchange for it. The Venetians at Tyre employed leather money, the senate afterward making good the public credit. When the soldier is foreign and the prince’s credit suspect, this method exasperates the army more than it pacifies it.

CHAPTER LIV

The Method of Provisions and Pay

§1. Military provisions pertain to pay or sustenance, for all things are in vain if the soldier hungers. But because an immense expenditure and great care are needed here, so that provisions may be given at the proper time and not be corrupted, I preferred to speak of the matter separately.

§2. The power of a monarch must be estimated from the multitude and ready availability of his provisions. The Turk excels in the art of war and generally observes these practices: first, always to have forces prepared; second, to forestall the enemy; third, to strike treaties with the enemy's neighbors; fourth, gradually to occupy a region; fifth, to seize useful occasions for campaigns; sixth--and this especially obstructs rulers--not to keep faith. For that is the reason why those whom he besieges defend themselves to the extremity.

Those who write about his power exalt his strength beyond measure. As far as equipment for war is concerned, they say that he indeed possesses enormous and almost incredible resources. He has innumerable cannon. From all Hungary he carried away five thousand, from Cyprus five hundred, and from La Goletta not many fewer. The engines among the Turks are of such monstrous size that they demolish walls by their noise, not merely their blow.

It is established that he has never fought with all his strength against the king of Spain, although strength should not be measured from a battle. I assert that this power would be four times greater if he took account of provisions, that is, of agriculture. For now he is often left destitute, although from Egypt alone he could feed two hundred or three hundred thousand soldiers. But God did not will so savage a tyrant to excel in all things; he diminished the fodder of so savage a beast.

§3. This, therefore, must be done: the soldiers' beggary must be prevented; they must have food and the other things whose denial causes human nature pain. But the camp should be content with little. The Persians subsisted upon bread and water and sometimes watercress; now beggars, once they have fastened a feather to their hat, seek delicacies with the greatest insolence. The emperor Avidius Cassius permitted them to carry only bacon and hardtack. Vulcatius, in Avidius.

As Appian says, Scipio conducted foraging with great diligence. He marked out the place which he was going to harvest and rode around it himself with selected squadrons; by this method he eluded African ambushers. Tribunes sometimes received the ration from the soldiers, which Theodosius prohibited: law Septem, Code, On the Disbursement of the Military Ration. Alexander subjected to capital punishment tribunes who did this and who had taken anything through stellaturae. There is also a law of Justinian: law Secunda, § Pro limitaneis, Code, On the Office of the Praetorian Prefect of Africa.

§4. Caesar judged it best to conquer the enemy by hunger. Corbulo preferred the mattock: "For what can be accomplished by sweat does not require blood." Caesar always acted with the greatest diligence so that want would compel the enemy to battle. Marius always provided for himself so that want of provisions could not compel him unwillingly to battle.

§5. The care of surgeons and the wounded also belongs here: there should be as many surgeons as possible in camps, so that the sick may be cared for. Great care must be taken for health, because those dwelling in close quarters very easily spread pestilence. Accordingly, air, water, soil, cold, heat, clothing, and exercises must all be directed to this end: that the soldier remain healthy and vigorous.

§6. If anyone wishes to consider the costs of war, although they increase day by day, he will be able to take an example from Ranzovius's catalogue, book 1, chapter 7.

For the support of the commander of one legion, 400 florins were given each month. For his retinue and attendants--namely, a guard of eight praetorians; a mounted guard of the same number of horsemen; one wagon; a drummer; a trumpeter; a preacher; a secretary; an interpreter; a dispatch rider; a forerunner; and so forth--200 florins were given. To the military praetor, 40 florins; to the prefect of capital matters, 40; to the prefect of the watches, 40; to the assigner of lodgings, 40; to the legionary scribe, 40; to the administrator of the court, 32; to the judicial scribe, 32; to ten commanders of formations, 20; to the prefect of baggage-servants and camp-followers, 8; to the prefect of the prison, 12; to six lictors, 48; to the executioner, 16. The sum was 1,068 florins. This sum was given each month to the commander and attendants of one legion, and amounts to 12,816 florins for a whole year.

In place of travel money or hiring money, captains received 500 florins for each cohort, and one florin and ten batzens for each soldier. As concerns the soldiers' pay, the same commander established for each month--as is also observed in decrees of the Roman Empire concerning universal contributions--four florins for a foot soldier, but twelve florins for a cavalryman.

Privileges, or rather extraordinary pay and honoraria, were established for each month for the commanders and prefects of individual cavalry cohorts, which are commonly called standards: to the commander of cavalry, 200 florins; to the master of cavalry, 100; to the legate, 32; to the standard-bearer, 50. The sum was 382 florins. Moreover, for every twelve cavalrymen a packhorse and a four-horse wagon are assigned; single pay is rendered to the former, double pay to the latter.

From this, therefore, after a calculation has been instituted, we can gather in some measure what sum of money is required for the monthly or annual pay of a large or small army. Let us suppose, for example, that a certain king has decreed a war, for the conduct of which he wishes to enroll an army of 46,200 men, among whom are 6,000 cavalry and 40,200 infantry--approximately the army which one king probably leads out against another. He now deliberates with his men concerning the monthly and annual costs which the pay of so many soldiers will consume. Accordingly, from the figures just set down, he will institute a reckoning of this kind.

For 40,200 infantry.

The number of infantry constitutes 134 cohorts. According to common custom one cohort has 300 soldiers, among whom there are generally 96 recipients of double pay--namely, 82 armored pikemen who use long shafts, and 10 advance musketeers, by which name I call those who discharge larger guns of a more dreadful sound after placing them upon rests. These recipients of double pay, as their name also indicates, are entitled to two payments. Therefore, for maintaining one cohort, apart from the pay of the captain and the other prefects, 1,584 florins are required each month and 19,008 florins over the span of a whole year. Hence, for 134 cohorts, 212,256 florins will be counted for monthly pay and 2,547,072 florins for annual pay.

For the cavalry.

Six thousand cavalrymen constitute twenty cohorts or standards. Three hundred cavalrymen complete each cohort. Hence we shall reason thus: since twelve florins are paid to one cavalryman each month, one cohort requires 3,600 florins in one month and 43,200 florins in a whole year. The entire cavalry, however, which consists of twenty cohorts, claims for itself 864,000 florins for each month and 10,368,000 florins for a whole year. So much money must be procured for the common cavalrymen, without considering commanders, chiliarchs, masters, centurions, decurions, quartermasters, curators of provisions, and other administrators of military duties.

If one now wishes to investigate how great a quantity of silver is required for the entire army, the pay of the cavalry and infantry set down in the preceding rough outline, when collected, amounts to 1,076,256 florins for a single month and 12,915,072 florins for a whole year.

Moreover, for the principal commanders and their remaining attendants, the calculation of pay proceeds approximately in this manner. The 40,200 infantry make eight legions, assigning 5,000 to each. Each legion has its own particular head or commander and its other superior prefects, for whom, as is clear from the foregoing, monthly costs of 1,068 florins and annual costs of 12,816 florins must be collected.

If, for the individual magistrates of every cohort, 100 florins are counted as monthly pay, the cost pertaining to the lower commanders and prefects of the whole infantry will be 13,400 florins monthly and 160,800 florins annually. If the pay of the principal commanders and other legionary prefects just set down is added to these sums, the sum required for the superior as well as the inferior magistrates of the infantry comes to 14,468 florins for one month and 173,616 florins for a whole year.

The commanders and prefects of the cavalry, or of the twenty cavalry cohorts, cannot perhaps be maintained at a smaller cost. Accordingly, this sum doubled will give the pay of all those who hold command in an army of 46,200 men, though without including the supreme commander of the war: 28,936 florins in one month and 347,232 florins for a whole year.

Finally, if the preceding sum, which contains the pay of the soldiers--infantry and cavalry together--is added to these amounts, there emerges, after a fashion, the sum of sums, or aggregate of all the money that must be assigned for maintaining an army of 46,200 men: 1,105,192 florins for each month and 13,262,304 florins for a revolving year.

These figures, however, do not include the costs of cannon or of the vehicles by which pontoon bridges, ladders, rams, and other things necessary for a campaign and the storming of cities are moved; nor the costs of the horses drawing them, gunpowder, cannonballs, and reconnaissance. Experts in military affairs estimate the sum of these things as no smaller than that which pertains to maintaining the entire army. But even if the accounts are contracted as narrowly as possible, they will exceed a third part of the sum which I have stated.

Tables of pay decreed for the army to be enrolled against the Turk.

We shall now append those tables which were composed in the year just past, when a common deliberation concerning the Turkish war was undertaken among the estates of the Empire at the Diet of Regensburg.

First, it was proposed that an army of 60,000 Germans and Hungarians should be opposed to the Turks. Among them were to be 12,000 ordinary German cavalrymen; 5,000 cavalrymen equipped with longer firearms, whom they call arquebusiers; 12,000 Hungarian cavalrymen; six legions of German infantry, which, assigning to each 4,000 soldiers or ten companies, make 24,000 infantrymen; and finally 7,000 Hungarian retainers.

For the pay of this army and its magistrates, a calculation of this kind was instituted. First, for one thousand ordinary German cavalrymen--including the money to be spent upon the support of the commander, the master of cavalry, the prefect of baggage, and the decurions, and likewise the enlistment bounty and travel money, or the money with which the soldiers are first hired--17,000 florins were decreed for a month. Thus 12,000 cavalrymen claim 204,000 florins for themselves each month and 2,448,000 florins in a revolving year.

Furthermore, one hundred cavalrymen armed with long firearms necessarily require 1,400 florins monthly. By this reckoning, 70,000 florins monthly and 840,000 annually must be assigned to 5,000 cavalrymen of this kind.

Third, since five florins must be counted out to the Hungarian cavalrymen each month, 6,100 florins monthly must be assigned to one thousand cavalrymen, including at the same time the chiliarch’s allowance and the doubled pay of the pipers and guards. Hence, for 12,000 cavalrymen of this kind, 73,200 florins must be counted monthly and 878,400 florins annually.

Fourth, if 30,000 florins are assigned each month to each legion together with the commanders’ allowances, those six legions will require 180,000 florins monthly and 2,160,000 florins annually.

Finally, the monthly pay of a Hungarian retainer is two thalers. Hence, after a particular calculation has been completed--if the commanders' allowances and the doubled pay of the decurions, standard-bearers, and drummers are counted--20,620 florins monthly and 247,440 florins annually must be assigned for a force of 7,000 retainers.

Now, if all the expenses to be disbursed upon the whole army divided into these five kinds of soldiers are collected into one aggregate, the sum will come to 547,820 florins for each month and 6,573,840 florins for a revolving year.

Besides these expenses, their own costs must also be assigned to the supreme commander of the war, his legate, tribune, and the other attendants and prefects of the highest magistrates, as well as to scouts, bronze engines and those appointed to care for them, and the many other things necessary for war. Even if these are calculated most sparingly, they will equal 100,000 florins each month and 1,200,000 for a whole year. Yet not all things pertaining to the use of military artillery are included in the preceding calculation, but only their prefects and curators and the beasts appointed to draw them. If all are truly defined according to their costs, they will amount to a third of the other expenses of war.

§7. He describes provisions in this manner. For each horse six pounds of hay are given as nightly fodder; and to every nine horses as much oats as the common vessel called a tonna, in which herrings are pickled, holds.

To each man there are distributed daily two pounds of bread, one and one-half pounds of meat, one herring, and three measures of beer. For a whole week, two pounds of bacon, the same amount of cheese, and the same amount of butter are distributed. For a whole month, one cup of salt is distributed.

From this, a calculation of rations would have to be instituted according to the number of men. Thus, to make what we have said clear by an example, let the question be proposed how much monthly food is required for one cohort of soldiers, which according to common custom contains 300 persons. This question, solved by the rule of proportion, produces the following calculation of provisions.

For the monthly sustenance of three hundred soldiers there are due: 18,000 pounds of bread, that is, 180 hundredweights; 13,500 pounds of meat, that is, 135 hundredweights; 2,400 pounds of bacon, that is, 24 hundredweights; the same number of pounds of cheese; the same of butter; 9,000 herrings; 27,000 measures of beer, that is, 306 amphorae together with 72 measures; and 300 cups of salt.

§8. I have recounted above, in the same chapter concerning the method of naval war, the provisions for the fleet. The tables of the Danish fleet in 1567 contained: 20,854 sides of bacon; 6,040 pieces of smoked beef; 11,560 quarters of smoked mutton; 29,000 smoked geese; 104 lasts and 4½ tonnae of butter; 206½ lasts of herring; 206½ lasts of smaller cod; 5,104 wagonloads of stockfish or hake; 16 lasts of salted pike; 16 lasts of salted eels; 16,000 sea albicae; 32,000 dried sea-scallops or flatfish; 32 bundles of long cod; 32 bundles of larger cod or capitones; 87 lasts of oats prepared for human food; 81½ lasts of vetch; 1,366 lasts of bread, including bread twice baked; 4,741½ lasts of beer; 10 lasts of vinegar; 24 lasts of Lüneburg salt; and 31 lasts of coarse foreign salt.

§9. In order that what is needed for one ship may be understood, let the chapter cited concerning the equipment of the Danish admiral's ship be read.

§10. It has rightly been asked whether kings should act so that the costs of war are diminished or rather increased. I indeed would prefer that they be increased, lest wars be declared more easily and promptly if they are waged at small expense. Provision has been made for human nature by the fact that a man cannot be killed without great expense: if humanity does not spare a human being, at least avarice may restrain it.

CHAPTER LV

The Roman Soldiers' Discharges Are Not to Be Approved by a Prince

§1. The lawful terms of service were twenty years for infantrymen and ten for cavalrymen. If anyone withdrew himself from military service within that time, he was either liable to death or, after being beaten, was sold. Thus Matienus, a deserter from the army, after being beaten for a long time with rods, was sold for one sestertius. The term of service of the praetorians was reduced to the sixteenth year, that of sailors extended to the twenty-fifth.

This length of time, which seemed to many to have stabilized Roman military service, caused great loss. For it made that service as hateful as possible and provided many brave men with an occasion to buy themselves out of it. For apart from the fact that it was laborious and dangerous to be exposed to various enemies for twenty or twenty-five whole years, it could not even be just that, while so many hundreds of thousands sat at home in the theater or securely attended to their fields, a few should be afflicted with perpetual military service.

I speak of those who were not volunteers but were compelled and gave in their names according to law. That inequality displayed the state as badly constituted. Why should citizens banished to the Rhine or the Danube for twenty whole years be absent from their own people, while young city-dwellers were meanwhile nourished at home in leisure?

Nor was it useful to the state. For while some were detained in wars for so long, it was necessary for the rest to become unwarlike. Thus the state was left destitute of brave men. Indeed, although many took part in twenty or thirty battles, attacked cities, fought in skirmishes, and were diminished by hunger, plague, and flight, very few at all completed their service and reached twenty campaigns--much less twenty-five, since more die in the fleet. But even if those men returned home, broken by labors or mutilated, poor, and ignorant of domestic affairs, they could accomplish little for the state. Hence mutinies arose from them not seldom.

Suetonius, chapter 49:

"Whatever soldiers there were anywhere, he bound to a fixed rule of pay and rewards, defining according to the rank of each both the periods of service and the advantages of discharge, lest after discharge they could be solicited to revolution either by age or by poverty. And so that expenditure for maintaining and rewarding them might be available perpetually and without difficulty, he established the military treasury with new taxes. And so that what was being done in each province could be announced and learned more quickly and readily, he first stationed young men at short intervals along the military roads and afterward vehicles. The latter seemed more convenient, so that those who carried letters all the way from the place could also be questioned if circumstances required anything."

Who can doubt that the worst provision has been made for a city and kingdom in which those who sustained twenty years of the most burdensome military service are endangered by poverty?

§2. Hence benefits were devised: that they should be led into colonies, and that land and at the same time money should be given to them. But it is also burdensome to the state to enrich upon their discharge soldiers whom it had maintained with pay for twenty years.

For let us suppose that 4,000 veterans are discharged in each year, and that five iugera, agricultural equipment, and a young slave are given to each, twice as much to centurions, and three times as much to cavalrymen: this makes 25,000 iugera. If these are given for many years, it is necessary that within a short time all the soil pass to the soldiers. Nor can any state make such great distributions without injury to others.

Experience taught this so thoroughly that, when the state could not render those rewards at once, the soldiers were formally discharged and retained under the standards, exempt from all duties except battle against the enemy. Tiberius, an avaricious emperor, made discharges extremely rare, awaiting death from old age and profit from death. Hence the just complaint in Tacitus: that old men sustained thirty or forty campaigns. Nor can those men be brave who follow military service with so unwilling and sorrowful a disposition.

§3. Hence it came about that the soldiers, when they understood that they alone labored and that the strength of the empire resided in them while the rest were only a shadow, arrogated to themselves the right of naming the emperor and seized almost everyone's wealth for themselves. Hence also the saying: "Cherish the soldiers; despise the rest."

It is therefore much more equitable and safe either to accept volunteers or to shorten the term of service.

CHAPTER LVI

Truces Must Be Interposed and Observed

§1. A truce is peace in the camp, as Varro defines it. Gellius, book 1, chapter 25:

"A truce is not peace, for the war remains though fighting ceases; and we therefore think indutiae to be so called as though inde uti iam, 'from then onward to act now.' For a pact of truce is of this kind: that until a fixed day there should be no fighting and no harm inflicted, but that from that day onward all things should now be conducted under the law of war. Aurelius Opilius, in the first of the books which he entitled The Muses, defined a truce as occurring when enemies from both sides go among one another, from the one side to the other, with impunity and without fighting, so that the name seems to have been formed as though from intus and introitus, 'within' and 'an entrance.'"

Truces differ from peace because peace is considered perpetual, whereas truces, however long, are defined by a fixed period. The Veientes obtained from Romulus a truce of one hundred years, afterward one of forty. Livy, book 2. Yazdegerd the Persian, appointed guardian of Theodosius the Younger, likewise made a truce of one hundred years. Nicephorus, book 14, chapter 1.

§2. Truces must not be made deceitfully so that one who is in danger may escape necessity; safety must be sought by another way. Lysander, through perfidy toward the Thasians, killed those who had favored the Athenians after he had promised them impunity. Polyaenus, book 1.

The Corcyraeans acted wickedly and after the custom of their nation. For when the captives had submitted themselves to the judgment of the Athenian people, but in such a way that the treaty which had been made would become void if they broke it, the Corcyraeans advised flight because they feared that the Athenian people would judge too leniently. Thus they were delivered to the Corcyraeans as though breakers of the treaty and were all killed. Polyaenus, book 6.

The perfidy of Galba toward the Lusitanians was remarkable: after persuading them to lay down their arms as though they were friends, he stationed them in three places and killed them. Sulla, Archelaus, and Hasdrubal acted without sufficient honor when they escaped through lies and the pretense of truces.

§3. Let truces be made upon just and equitable conditions. Brasidas the Spartan proposed excellent conditions to the Amphipolitans. For when he saw that the city could be conquered only with difficulty, he promised the Athenians the opportunity to depart, and liberty to the Amphipolitans if they entered into an alliance with the Spartans. Polyaenus, book 1.

In entering into agreements and making peace, virtue and equality should be employed instead. Scipio brought the Spaniards to his side by virtue, returning the betrothed maiden and the money which was given for her ransom. In the same manner Alexander too joined entire nations to himself.

CHAPTER LVII

Rewards Must Be Distributed to Brave Men

§1. The Romans did this, if any people anywhere did, according to Polybius. Moreover, they admirably rouse and incite young men to undertake dangers. For when an occasion for action presents itself and some of them have acted bravely or spiritedly, the commander summons all the forces to an assembly, places beside himself those who were the authors of an outstanding deed, and first recounts their praises, both for this deed and for anything else they have accomplished in their whole lives that is worthy of praise and remembrance. After this he presents a spear to the man who has wounded an enemy; to the man who has struck an enemy down and stripped him, however, he presents a bowl if he is an infantryman, and phalerae if he is a cavalryman--although in former times he presented only a spear. These rewards are received not by one who has wounded or stripped an enemy in a regular battle or in the storming of a city, but by those who, in a raid, a skirmish, or some such occasion in which there was no necessity for individual men to incur danger, have then, I say, exposed themselves to it of their own accord and voluntarily. Similarly, when a man has defended and saved a citizen or ally, the commander honors him with gifts, and the tribunes compel those who were saved--unless, indeed, they do it voluntarily--to crown their savior. The man who was saved thereafter honors him throughout his whole life as a parent and is obliged to offer and accord him all things just as if he had begotten him. By an incentive of this kind they incite to contest and rivalry amid dangers not only those who are present and hearing them face to face, but also those who remain at home. For men who have obtained gifts of this kind, besides their glory in the army and their reputation at home, enter games and processions conspicuously when they have returned to their country, since only those who have been presented with them by the commander on account of valor are permitted to wear and display these decorations. In the most conspicuous part of their houses they place the spoils as indications and testimonies of their valor. Accordingly, since such care and diligence were exercised in the camp concerning both rewards and punishments, their military successes were deservedly fortunate and illustrious. That which is of the greatest power in every state--reward and punishment--possesses universal power in military service. In these rewards, however, worth and honor reside. The following are enumerated.

The first reward: a public commendation by the commander, while the generals, tribunes, centurions, and entire army stand in a circle. This practice has now fallen into disuse, for Christians and more cultivated men are not captivated by such encomiums as rustic hearts are. Since, therefore, the danger would be equal for the timid man and the brave--indeed, greater for the timid, for the danger is always greatest to those who fear most--boldness serves as a wall. Honor, in addition, incited the brave.

The second: the hasta pura, or unheaded spear. Polybius calls it γαῖσον; it was a δόρυ ἀσίδηρον, “a spear without iron”:

> You see that young man who leans upon an unheaded spear.

But why was it without iron? Because it was given for the sake of honor, not for fighting. This was the reward of the man who had struck down an enemy.

The third: the infantryman who struck down and stripped an enemy was presented with a bowl, the cavalryman with phalerae. In place of “bowl” Lipsius conjectures that ψέλιον, “armlets,” should be read. Phalerae, armlets, and torques were sometimes joined together. Am I mistaken in thinking that from this the Anakim too were formerly called Torquati, that is, wearers of torques?

The fourth: standards. In the Suda they are called ὑφάσματα, “woven fabrics,” although the word may also signify other textiles. In Vopiscus’s Aurelian we read that four two-colored standards were presented. After the naval victory Augustus presented Agrippa with a blue standard. Ribbons or insignia are still worn by soldiers and presented for the sake of honor; when frequently altered, they also deceive the enemy.

The fifth: various crowns. The civic crown was given to the man who had saved a citizen and killed an enemy; the siege crown, made of grass, when an army had been released from a siege; the mural crown to the man who had first mounted a wall; the camp crown to the man who had first mounted the enemy's camp, and this was also called the vallary crown; the naval crown to the man who had first set fire to an enemy ship; and the rostral crown to the man who had gained some great distinction at sea. The civic crown was made of oak, the siege crown of grass, and the others of laurel. Other crowns of gold were also frequently given for other deeds. Sometimes these rewards were given to whole maniples.

The sixth: oxen. Thus Scipio presented Laelius with a golden crown and thirty oxen.

§2. These rewards were powerful not only through their worth and the honor attending them when they were given, but were also useful for the future. For, first, they formed a step toward more honorable and more lucrative military service. This is still observed altogether, except where military service has been corrupted. The rewards involved in promotions were immense. Vegetius, book 2, chapter 21. Alexander gave great rewards to those who contended--namely, chiliarchies. Alexander ab Alexandro, book 1, chapter 20.

They were carried in front in a triumph, and indeed always. Valerius, book 3, chapter 2, relates of Sicinius: "Having followed nine triumphal chariots of commanders, he turned the eyes of the entire citizen body upon himself by the numerous procession of his gifts. For there were carried before him eight golden crowns, fourteen civic crowns, three mural crowns, one siege crown, 183 torques, 160 armlets, eighteen spears, and twenty-five phalerae"--decorations numerous enough even for a legion, much more for one soldier.

They were displayed not only in a triumph but also in the review of the cavalry--indeed, even when a man stood in danger, as Manlius Capitolinus did. Livy, book 6: "He not only recalled the distinctions of war but also brought them forth to be seen: the spoils of as many as thirty slain enemies, as many as forty gifts from commanders, among which were two conspicuous mural crowns and eight civic crowns. In addition, he produced the citizens he had saved from the enemy, among whom Gaius Servilius, master of the cavalry, was named although absent. And when he had recounted also the things done in war, matching the grandeur of the achievements with magnificent words in his speech, he bared his breast, distinguished by scars received in war. Repeatedly looking toward the Capitol, he called Jupiter and the other gods down to the aid of his fortunes and prayed that they would give the Roman people in its hour of peril the same spirit which they had given him when he protected the Capitoline citadel for the safety of the Roman people. He entreated them, individually and collectively, to look upon the Capitol and the citadel and so turn to the immortal gods when they passed judgment concerning him."

These rewards also opened an approach to public office. Livy, book 23: the senate was replenished from those who had been aediles, tribunes, or quaestors, or had received the civic crown. Finally, in the public games men attracted notice by relying upon their gifts.

Among us not only are insignia given, but men of the plebeian order are made knights and are presented with insignia and nobility. The lawful distribution of spoils also belongs among rewards.

Spoil is most advantageously divided equally, as was the custom among the Romans. Dionysius, book 7: "You all know that whatever spoils and booty we obtain from the enemy through our valor, the law commands all of it to be public property. Not only does a common soldier or any private person have no right to it; not even the commander himself does. Rather, the quaestor receives it, sells it, and deposits the money in the public treasury. Since we have inhabited this city, no one has--I will not say broken--but not even censured this law." Lycurgus forbade soldiers to strip their enemies, lest a soldier become rich and abandon the fighting. This was entirely disadvantageous, because he took away an incentive to fight.

And Polybius, book 10: "The Romans have the following custom and system in the storming of towns. At one time they divide the forces each day according to the size of the city, at another time they distribute them by maniples, but in such a way that they never employ more than half for this work. The rest remain in their ranks as reserves, sometimes outside the city, sometimes within it, yet so that they are always kept visible. Since the forces are usually divided into two Roman legions and two allied wings--for rarely do all four legions assemble together--all who have been assigned to booty and plunder carry whatever they have acquired, each to his own legion or wing. When this has been done, the tribunes divide it equally among all, not only among those who were on guard or held in reserve, but also among those who guarded the camp, and likewise among the sick, the wounded, or those sent elsewhere upon some duty. As soon as they come into the camp to go to war, they all swear that they will neither defraud nor withhold anything from the spoil. I have spoken of this matter at greater length in what I have written about the state. Moreover, when half the soldiers scatter after spoil in this way, while half preserve their ranks and guard and support them, it never happens that the Roman imperils the supreme issue. For, because the hope of gain is assured equally to all, whether they remain or engage in plunder, no one deserts his place or rank--a thing which often tends to harm others."

Citizens and allies shared the spoil in equal portions. This was done at that time; afterward it was changed, and the soldier was incited by the desire for spoil. At present it can scarcely be done otherwise, since there are such diverse nations in a single army.

CHAPTER LVIII

Military Punishments

§1. In military service--that is, in restraining men whom no piety or justice draws back from crime--great severity of punishments is needed; for unless fear is present, everything must necessarily go to ruin.

The first kind of punishment was a fine, and the power to exact a pledge so that it would be paid rested with the tribune. Polybius. The same also remains in present armies, although it is scarcely expedient to employ it, because every very wicked man is also very needy.

The second: if a man had neglected his watches, he was beaten with a cudgel. Polybius. The punishment is of this kind. Taking a cudgel, the tribune lightly touches and grazes the condemned man. When this has been done, all who are in the camp strike him, some with cudgels and others with stones, and kill most of them within the camp. But if anyone escapes, he will not be safe even so. How could he be, when there is neither a return to his country for him nor anyone among his relatives who will receive him under a roof? Thus those whom this calamity has overtaken perish most completely.

The third: they were exposed to swords, although this was rare. Tacitus, Annals, book 1: “The legions stood in assembly with drawn swords; the accused was displayed upon the platform by the tribune. If they acclaimed him guilty, he was cast headlong to them and slaughtered, and the soldiers rejoiced in the killings as though absolving themselves.” Now they are shot with the firearms of their comrades, and this death is considered more honorable.

They are handed over to the soldiers to be killed so that the odium may rest upon them, not upon the commanders. Alexander handed over to a cohort those whom he wished to be killed by tortures, so that the others might prove their loyalty by cruelty.

The fourth punishment: the Macedonians buried men beneath stones. Curtius, book 6: “At the given signal, all who had been named by Nicomachus were buried beneath stones according to the custom of their country.”

The fifth: those who had abandoned their rank were struck with the axe. Livy, book 2: the consul Appius scourged with rods and beheaded the centurions and soldiers receiving double pay who had abandoned their rank. An entire legion which had occupied Rhegium was beheaded. They are now struck down with the sword; rods are not customary in military service.

The sixth: to mitigate the punishment of death, bloodletting was devised, which was customarily performed for the sake of disgrace. Gellius, book 10, chapter 8: “This too was a military punishment in antiquity: to order a soldier’s vein to be opened and his blood released for the sake of disgrace. The rationale of this practice is not found in the ancient writings which I, at least, have been able to discover. But I think this was first done to soldiers whose minds were benumbed and had declined from their natural condition, so that it seemed not so much a punishment as a remedy. Later, however, I believe that through custom the same was repeatedly done for many other offenses, as though all who offended were regarded as less than sane.”

Other offenses were also punished. Polybius speaks of them in this manner: “Soldiers ought to pay attention and hearken to the tribunes, and the tribunes to the consuls. A tribune nevertheless has the right and power to fine, exact a pledge, and scourge. The prefects have the same power over the allies. The man who has stolen anything from the camp is beaten with a cudgel, as is the man who has borne false witness, the man who is discovered in the prime of life to have abused his body, and likewise the man who has been fined three times for the same fault. They punish acts of this sort as crimes. But they ascribe the following to cowardice and military disgrace: if any falsely report to the tribunes some brave deed of their own for the sake of honor and reward; if any who have been placed in a guard post or station desert their place through fear; or if anyone has cast away some part of his arms in the very crisis through fear. As a result, some men in guard posts deliberately perish when greater numbers rush upon them, since they are afraid to desert their post for fear of this punishment. Some, even in the very conflict, if by some accident a shield or sword or another weapon has been knocked from them, hurl themselves upon the enemy, resolved either to recover what they have lost or, by dying, to escape manifest disgrace and the reproaches of their own men."

The seventh: sometimes men are summoned to punishment by lot. Polybius: "But if it happens that a larger number have offended and that several maniples have abandoned their post together, they do not wish to beat them all with cudgels or kill them. Instead, they have discovered a measure and procedure at once expedient and terrifying. For the tribune summons the army, brings the guilty men into the midst, and sharply accuses them. He then chooses by lot sometimes five, at other times eight or twenty--in short, always considering the size of the multitude so that they amount to approximately a tenth part of the offenders--from among all the cowards. Those upon whom that lot has fallen he beats with the cudgel, without any possibility of entreaty, in the manner already described. Measuring out barley instead of wheat to the rest, he orders them to pitch their tents outside the rampart and the protection of the camp. Thus, because the danger and fear arising from the lot hang equally over all, and likewise because the example of the barley given reaches all, that custom produces the greatest measure both of terror and of correction."

This was decimation, customary among the Romans, which they sometimes changed into punishment of every twentieth or every hundredth man. Capitolinus, in his Macrinus: "When he suffered military mutinies, he decimated the soldiers much more often; sometimes he even 'centesimated' them"--which is his own peculiar word--"because he said that he was merciful when he punished every hundredth of those who deserved decimation."

The eighth: they were struck with a cudgel, or with a vine staff, by a centurion, sometimes severely. Catiline beat M. Marius with vine staffs throughout the whole city while the Roman people looked on. It is still the custom to strike with a cudgel, although not in the ancient manner.

The ninth: they were scourged with rods if, though liable to capital punishment or deserving it, they were permitted to discharge their debt with a milder penalty.

The tenth: to be fed with barley. Augustus decimated cohorts which had yielded their position and fed them barley. Suetonius, book 24. That punishment is not in use, just as decimation is not.

The eleventh: a soldier was said aere dirui or aes resignari when his pay was denied and his years of service did not advance. Valerius, book 2, chapter 7: "Consider how severely the senate regarded the fact that the soldiers had allowed the consul Quintus Petillius to be killed while fighting most bravely against the Ligurians. For it refused to allow the year to count toward the legion's term of service or to give it pay."

The twelfth: to pitch camp outside the rampart. Livy, book 10, shows that they were also deprived of tents. And Valerius, book 2, chapter 7: "They decreed that none of them should pitch his quarters within the camp, or fortify with rampart or ditch the place assigned outside it, or have a tent made of hides. They offered a return to their former military rank if anyone took two sets of spoils from the enemy."

The thirteenth: they were ordered to stand ungirded before the praetorium or in the headquarters, or to dig a ditch, clad only in a tunic for the mockery of all. Caesar Julian led men clothed in women's dress through the camp, thinking that this punishment would be more grievous to men than death. Charondas ordered those who had not taken up arms for their country to sit in the forum for three days in women's clothes.

The fourteenth kind of punishment, the gravest among the moderate ones: to change a man's kind of service. Cavalrymen were reduced to infantrymen, and infantrymen to slingers. Livy, book 25; Valerius, book 2; Ammianus, books 24, 25, and 29. If they failed in their duty in some respect, they were thrust down into an inferior branch of service. Captives returned by Pyrrhus were reduced from cavalryman to infantryman and from infantryman to light-armed soldier, and were ordered to pitch camp outside the rampart until each had taken two sets of spoils from the enemy. Otacilius employed the latter punishment against those whom Hannibal had sent under the yoke. Domitius Corbulo ordered them to redeem disgrace by valor.

The fifteenth: to take their dinner standing, for they always took their midday meal standing. Even now they are compelled to stand for many hours burdened with large firearms if they have committed some offense.

The sixteenth: it was also a military punishment to furnish a spear. Festus: it was called censio hastaria when, as a fine for a military offense, a soldier was ordered to furnish spears.

The seventeenth: to march among the baggage. Ammianus, book 25: "After taking away the standards and breaking their spears, he imposed upon all who were accused of having fled the requirement to march among the baggage, packs, and captives."

The eighteenth: they were also compelled to winter outside camps and towns. Livy, book 35; Valerius, book 2, chapter 7.

The nineteenth: among the Egyptians it was established by law that the tongue of the man who disclosed secret counsels to the enemy should be cut out.

The twentieth: among the Romans hands were sometimes cut off. Ammianus, book 29; Livy, book 35. Indeed, even legs were cut off. Ammianus, book 23: "Let each man follow his own standards, knowing that if he remains behind anywhere he will be left there with his legs cut off."

The twenty-first: at times a more severe punishment was to be raised upon a cross. Livy, book 30: "Those who were of the Latin name were struck with the axe; the Romans were raised upon crosses." A man who deserts to the enemy is tortured and condemned to the beasts.

The twenty-second: at times they were also deprived of burial. Valerius Maximus, book 2, chapter 7.

The twenty-third: Ammianus, book 29, says that deserters were burned. The tribune Hortarius was burned because he had written certain things to the enemy. Ammianus, at the passage cited, and book 21. Those who had given barbarians the opportunity to plunder, or had divided the booty with them, were burned alive.

The twenty-fourth: the emperor Avidius Cassius tied condemned men from top to bottom upon a stake 120 feet long, killing some by fire, others by smoke, and some by fear.

The twenty-fifth: men were also killed beneath a hurdle. Livy, book 4.

The twenty-sixth: they were also killed with arrows, as men now are with firearms. These punishments were unusual.

The twenty-seventh: Macrinus ordered a tribune who had allowed the watches to be deserted to be tied upon a wheeled cart and dragged, both alive and dead.

The twenty-eighth: Aurelian tied an adulterous soldier by the feet to the tops of two trees which had been bent down; when the trees were suddenly released, the man was torn apart and hung from both. Vopiscus, in his Aurelian.

The twenty-ninth: Macrinus also enclosed in ox carcasses two soldiers who had violated the chastity of their host's maidservant; the heads of the beasts were cut off so that the men could speak with one another more easily.

§2. Punishments were often great even where the faults were not great; their end, however, was discipline. The saying of Clearchus is ancient: "The commander should be feared more than the enemy." A soldier who refuses battle is punished capitally. Gaius Vacienus cut off the fingers of his left hand so that he would not have to serve, and was punished by confiscation of his goods. In Trajan's time, a father who rendered his son unfit for war was deported. Ammianus, book 15.

Avidius Cassius ordered centurions to be raised upon crosses because, without his command, they had killed three thousand Sarmatians who were behaving incautiously with only a few soldiers; he said that an ambush might have lain beneath it. Atilius Regulus ordered a fleeing army to be beaten. Cato put to death a soldier who, having been left behind after the fleet had sailed, begged to be taken aboard. When Valerius was consul, a defeated army was ordered to pass the winter under tents. Titus Scaurus forbade his son, because he had yielded his position, to come into his sight; through shame at the disgrace, the son procured death for himself.

Metellus Macedonicus ordered five cohorts which had yielded to the enemy to make their wills, and sent them back to recover the position, threatening that they would not be received except after victory. Manius Curius ordered a legion which had refused the war to cut straw while ungirded, abolished its standards and its name, and enrolled its men in the other legions as replacements. Lucius Piso ordered a cohort prefect to stand daily in the headquarters with the belt of his toga cut, his tunic loosened, and his feet bare, and to abstain from banquets and baths. Corbulo ordered Aemilius Rufus, a prefect of cavalry, to stand in the headquarters with his clothing torn.

In general, military service itself was a punishment, since the soldiers were compelled to labor even without necessity. For Publius Nasica, lest the soldiers decline or become corrupted in the idleness of winter quarters, ordered a fleet to be built.

CHAPTER LIX

Ancient Military Service Compared with Ours as Regards Arms

§1. It is worthy of inquiry and useful, not merely pleasant, to ask whether ancient military service is comparable with ours. Many admire everything ancient and despise our own things. Others walk a middle path; some disdain ancient military service in comparison with ours. There are five things to be considered in military service: namely, the levy, organization, arms, the battle line, and discipline. I have spoken about the levy: ours is more expeditious and, if the other things are added, is a levy of the best soldiers, because it consists of volunteers. Although a great part of the soldiers is drawn from the dregs of mankind, many princes, counts, noblemen, and rich men nevertheless enroll in military service and bring it about that this refuse of the common people is governed and submits to organization and discipline. Concerning organization also there is no question: the ancients have theirs and our men ours, but ours is exact and in part better, since they place the best men at the front and intend men under pressure not to yield but to be aided by those who come to their support. The question, therefore, concerns arms.

§2. Justus Lipsius is regarded as a most prudent judge of these matters, and he inclines strongly toward the ancients. Against our firearms he sets slings and javelins. First, he says that the lead was liquefied. Lucretius:

> A leaden bullet too,
> rolled through a long course, grows liquid.

Ovid:

> It burned no otherwise than when the Balearic sling > casts lead: it flies and grows incandescent as it goes, > and beneath the clouds finds fires which it did not possess.
>
>

Lucan:

> Then firebrands and stones fly, and bullets, loosened through the expanse > of air and melted by their hot weight.
>

Statius:

> Bullets destined to burn through the void of heaven.

Indeed, the same poet compares them with a thunderbolt:

> The flying bullets imitate lightning.

Perhaps you do not put faith in poets? Let our philosopher Seneca join them: “Motion thins the air, and the thinning kindles it. Thus a bullet cast from a sling liquefies, and through the friction of the air drips as though by fire.” Something of this kind is also written elsewhere in Aristotle. Yet this does not destroy the force of the missile; rather, it came fiery into the body in this manner.

Virgil:

> And with liquefied lead he cleaves the middle of his adversary’s temples > and stretches him out, extended over a great space of sand.

Behold, it kills with one blow. Nor do I marvel at David, who as a young man and one of the slingers struck down the enormous Goliath with this weapon. And so that you may know its force once for all and fully, take these words of Diodorus Siculus about the Balearic islanders:

βάλλουσι λίθους πολὺ μείζους τῶν ἄλλων, οὕτως εὐτόνως, ὥστε δοκεῖν τὸ βληθὲν ἀπό τινος καταπέλτου φέρεσθαι.

"They cast stones"--for you know that stones too, and not only lead, were sent from the sling--"much larger than other men do, so powerfully and vigorously that the missile seems to be carried from some catapult." As you see, he compares it with an engine of war, and he adds:

ὥστε θυρεοὺς καὶ τὰ κράνη καὶ πᾶν σκεπαστήριον ὅπλων συντρίβειν.

"So that they shatter shields, helmets, and every covering of armor." I deny--deny--that our firearms can have greater force, perhaps not even equal force. I except those which they call muskets. Now in one respect slings certainly prevail: they are carried much farther and do harm. Which of our firearms preserves its direction and force beyond two hundred or three hundred feet? It loses force or strays if you extend the range. But the sling's missile carried and retained force to six hundred feet, as is clearly written in Vegetius: "Archers or slingers," he says, "placed brooms--that is, bundles of brushwood or grass--as a mark, so that they were six hundred feet distant from the mark, in order that they might more often strike the mark with arrows or at least with stones aimed from the staff-sling." Here he joins the sling with arrows and gives both the distance which I stated; others even place slings ahead of arrows and maintain that their missiles travel farther. In Strabo you will read, μακροβολωτέραν τὴν σφενδόνην ἢ τόξον: "that the sling casts farther than the bow." In Dio:

οἱ σφενδονῆται μακροτέρω τῶν τόξων ἱέντες, πάντα καὶ τῶν καταφράκτων ἱππέων ἐλυμαίνοντο.

"The slingers, casting farther than the archers, injured every man, even among the cuirassed cavalry." He says this in his account of Marcus Antonius's campaign against the Parthians, who nevertheless, it is agreed, were well armed and employed arrows with the greatest skill. Yet the slings prevailed over them, as Xenophon too expressly writes in his account of his Greeks:

μακρότερον γὰρ οἱ τε Ῥόδιοι τῶν Περσῶν ἐσφενδόνων καὶ τῶν πλείστων τοξοτῶν.

"For the Rhodians slung farther than the Persian slingers, and indeed farther than most of the archers." They therefore cast far; but did they also cast accurately? Everyone affirms it, especially concerning the Balearic islanders, and says that they had learned those aimed blows from infancy. Indeed, it is also read in the Holy Scriptures that the inhabitants of Gibeah, numbering seven hundred, cast stones so accurately with slings that they could strike even a hair.

He extols the force of slings because the lead liquefies, because it cleaves the temples, because a sling-stone breaks shields and helmets, and because the force of the blow is carried to six hundred feet. The blow is also accurate, for the Gibeonites could strike even a hair.

Those forces seem great to me, but by no means equal to our firearms. For lead's growing liquid or a reed's burning is an indication of great violence, but not the greatest. Acestes casts into the air, and what happens is regarded as a portent:

For the flying reed burned amid the liquid clouds, marked its path with flames, and, consumed, withdrew into the thin winds.

Yet that reed was not carried more violently than our wall-breaking artillery, whose balls do not mark their path with flames, although sometimes combustible things are present. But, to confess the truth, the matter of the flame and the liquefied lead leaves me doubtful. Motion thins the air and renders it hot; but it is difficult to understand how heat so vehement could arise at such speed and in so very brief a time when the missiles do not strike a hard body. Experience, indeed, testifies to the contrary. Those struck by slings and arrows are harmed by a wound, not by a burn. But if the temples are cleft by liquefied lead, they must necessarily be burned and, when scorched, give off the smell of burning. If lead liquefies, iron also, when it is sent more violently from an engine, ought to grow incandescent, for the force of a firebolt cast from an engine is greater than that of a bullet from a sling. But experience teaches that the iron is not hot, for, when lodged in shields and wounds, it would burn them and destroy the wounded with immense pain. As it is, however, no one complains of burning but of the wound. Even those wounded with muskets, although the leaden pest remains lodged in their viscera, are nevertheless not burned; and yet the bullets from fire-vomiting engines ought to be hotter. The arms of the ancients, therefore, ought not to be preferred because their missiles take fire. Otherwise, when we strike a spark from flint, we would have to believe that its impetus was greater than when an artillery piece is discharged. Another cause of these effects must therefore be sought, which is not part of my undertaking. This is sufficient: ignition is not a sign of the greatest violence.

His argument from what is said about the breaking of shields is better. But not even on this account ought slings to be preferred to our artillery. In Virgil a brave warrior cleaves the temples with liquefied lead. And:

> We have seen Goliath, fearsome in body and spirit,
>
> fall by a feeble hand; against him a boyish right hand
>
> hurled a little stone with the whirring of a sling, > and pierced his bare forehead with a penetrating wound.

The stone lodged in the Philistine's forehead; but if David had used a firearm, the blow would have passed through the whole head and, carried far onward, would also have wounded another man in its path. Lipsius therefore deservedly grants greater force to muskets. As for what Diodorus Siculus relates about the Balearic islanders, it is not remarkable that large stones broke defenses of bronze which were borne against pila and arrows, since the coverings were not very strong. Meanwhile, I deny that, once the coverings were broken, the stones penetrated bodies; the force of the blow was broken by the coverings. Slings therefore did not penetrate bodies which were moderately covered but struck them and harmed them in the manner of stones hurled by hand. Hurdles, cloaks, and the curtains of tents were placed in their way. As to Vegetius's statement that a sling casts to six hundred feet, it is certain that firearms carry their blow farther, and a blow which penetrates. A sling will not pierce a board one inch thick, but an iron ball will pass through many at once.

It is agreed, moreover, that slingers cast farther than archers. For Homer's Ulysses sufficiently shows that arrows did not carry their blow far:

> δουρὶ δ᾽ ἀκοντίζω ὅσον οὐκ ἄλλος τις ὀϊστῷ.

"But with a spear I cast as far as no other man does with an arrow." Certainly no one casts a spear so that it flies beyond the range of an artillery piece. At times a pilum or arrow passed through shield and cuirass, but more frequently it remained lodged in them. So that you may see clearly how greatly our firearms excel arrows, two matters must be considered. First, pila and arrows lodged in shields so that they often burdened the bearer. But those shields were made of boards, wickerwork, and leather, all of which are playthings if referred to our military service; the smallest handgun, of the size of a palm, would penetrate them. Thus two thousand musketeers would easily defeat two veteran Roman legions drawn up in formation and armed in their own manner. But if one chose to set cavalry against them, one thousand cuirassiers would suffice against ten thousand men, or two legions, because Roman coverings do not withstand firearm balls and cavalrymen need not come within the cast of a missile.

Bernardino de Mendoza, part 1, chapter 52, teaches how great the forces of our firearms are: "At that time I presented to His Majesty an artillery piece of a new kind, cast from metal, whose price is forty crowns and whose weight is thirty pounds. The ball which it casts is one pound. It is, however, carried with such violence that it passes through a wall two geometrical feet thick. This is remarkable, since the instrument is so light and the ball heavy in proportion to it. Moreover, it does not easily grow incandescent, which is to be valued greatly. These pieces can be useful in a fleet, even if the ships are small, nor do the sides of any ships seem so strong that they will not perforate them. If several are joined together, they can also be employed in breaking walls." So great is the force of a firearm. Finally, with whatever force you hurl a sling-bullet against a tree, it rebounds; every firearm ball lodges in it. No other proof is required. It is permissible to set up anyone who denies this as the target. Nothing is more violent than the petard, which was invented a few years ago, for it carries off and bursts through gates. Ignited powder casts down mountains and ramparts together with their bastions.

§3. From this I also conclude that Roman arms ought not to be taken up again or mixed with ours. The outstanding judgment of all our commanders maintains this against certain writers, for they care neither for arrows, nor javelins, nor pila. First, because a pilum can be seen, it can easily be avoided. Second, pila can scarcely be cast beyond forty paces; the pilum-men can therefore be killed before they can harm the enemy.

§4. Besides the fact that the Roman legion cannot inflict harm, it is also naked if set against our firearm troops; therefore it can in no way hold its ground.

§5. Strength of body was required in Roman and Greek military service; in most parts of ours, dexterity is required instead. Provided that men know how skillfully to brandish a sword and handle a firearm, they easily learn the rest.

§6. The shield was the principal defense of ancient military service, and therefore ἀσπίζειν καὶ ὑπερασπίζειν, "to shield and to shield on behalf of," is applied by a Greek proverb to every kind of defense. But now no shield can be made which is trustworthy and turns away the iron balls of muskets or their leaden ones. For since a shield, so that it may cover the whole man when he inclines slightly, has a length of four feet, as Lipsius teaches in book 3 of On the Roman Military--and since a larger one exceeds this by a palm, while its breadth is two and a half feet--a soldier cannot carry such a shield by hand at the present time, because it must be four times thicker than it was formerly. For it must be made either of willow, fig, linden, birch, elder, or poplar, from which shields were made formerly, or of hard woods, oak, heart-of-oak, or cedar. If it is made of the softer woods, it must be one foot thick, for a musket-ball penetrates beyond that. If it is made of heart-of-oak, the wood will be heavier than can conveniently be carried, turned, and employed in defense. But if the shield is made of bronze or iron, the plate must necessarily be of a thickness which is excessively heavy for one hand. We easily gather that the shields of the ancients were not very thick from the fact that they were often made of wickerwork and covered with hides, and even those were considered heavy. Theocritus:

> Ἀχθόμενοι σακέεσσιν βραχίονας ἰτείνοισιν.

"Their arms burdened by wicker shields." But it would be ridiculous to set men armed with these against our firearms.

§7. Our soldiers generally cannot be sufficiently protected against firearm shots. For the armor of the ancients is useless, since it is easily penetrated. If it is made twice or four times stronger, it will be useless because of its weight. It has therefore seemed better to have unencumbered soldiers than immobile ones. Accordingly, our military service is more dangerous than ancient service. Although in former times men sometimes fought for whole days, battles now are concluded very rapidly, because naked men clash with naked men. More steadfast spirits are therefore required in it.

§8. Hence those who have the greatest number of cuirassed cavalrymen easily conquer, because, trusting in their defenses, they break through everything with the greatest boldness.

§9. Finally, this one thing must be lamented in our military service: although in former times defensive arms by which bodies were covered were devised against every offensive weapon with which life was assailed, now, so many years after firearms were invented for the killing of man, no cuirass or shield has yet been invented which can protect a man while he fights and charges. So much more ingenious is human nature for its own destruction than for its safety. But if any king could make an impenetrable shield or cuirass from some mixture of metals and of moderate weight, assuredly with one army he would easily obtain dominion over the world.

CHAPTER LX

The Discipline of Our Soldiers Compared with That of the Romans

§1. Justus Lipsius, in his commendation of Roman discipline, says that Justice, Chastity, and Innocence dwelt in their camps. Nor can I deny that many things among them were excellent. But I deny that their observance of laws and discipline was much better than ours. There are some examples of integrity but more of wickedness, and that vigor of discipline was frequently interrupted. Concerning the justice of the soldiers there is nothing to debate. It was said of those of old: "Law is where the reward is greatest." Marius denied that he had been able to hear the laws amid the din of arms. I understand their chastity much less, since fornication was freely permitted them. Women, indeed, were kept away from the camps of the Romans. Their successors too preserved this rule. A law of Frederick I says:

> No woman shall be with us in our camps;
>
> whoever is found guilty will depart, stripped of his spoils, > shamefully, and she will be mutilated in her nose, once restored.

But a more grievous crime nevertheless existed among the pagans. Scipio expelled two thousand prostitutes from the camp at Numantia, but the same Lipsius denies that they were women. What purpose did it serve to commend a chastity which dishonored the male sex by an unspeakable crime?

No other innocence greatly worthy of commendation remains, even while the state was uncorrupted.

§2. Our own practices, therefore, which possess so many soldiers who fear God, appear not to deserve contempt. For there are very many historical records even from the present age. This is an argument for their innocence: among the Romans very many commanders were killed by their armies; among our men this is scarcely heard of. Their organization also is not inferior today, although perhaps more costly.

§3. If we compare laws with laws, there is no doubt that ours are holier. If we compare customs with customs, judging from the observance of the laws, there are some matters in which we are surpassed; in most we surpass them. Those who are eulogists of time past and disdainful of the present will laugh at this. But I, unless I am mistaken, will prove it with the aid of the good God.

THE MILITARY LAWS, THEREFORE, ARE AS FOLLOWS.

I.

Let them not blaspheme; let them punish blasphemers; and let them swear that, where they have offended, they will pay a fine. Year 1530.

But the whole system of German military service was set down in the year 1570, and constitutions were made by the emperor and the princes. I shall present them at the end of the book, preserving the order of the articles, so that it may plainly appear that we by no means lack good laws, but sometimes lack the practice of the laws.

First, after the cavalrymen have thoroughly trained their soldiers through preliminary exercises, and have equipped each and every one of them both with belts, sleeves, cloaks, breastplates, gloves, and helmets suitable for fortifying and covering them, and also with two smaller handguns ready to hand, let them come with those men to the place and at the time appointed and established by Us and the Holy Empire for the army to be mustered. There, after receiving half a month's pay as enlistment money, let them render their faithful and steadfast service during the three months immediately following the levy, and in the other months which follow thereafter, for as long as it shall be necessary to Us and the Empire.

II.

Before the army is led out upon campaign, let N. kreuzers be paid to them for each horse and for each wagon. Let them notify the recruiting officers, in accordance with the oath by which they are bound, of the beginning of their departure, and let them advance four miles each day; nevertheless, let it be permitted at times to halt in order to take some rest.

III.

They shall thus proceed to the review of arms to await the levy. If it is deferred longer, let N. kreuzers be added for each horse for as many days as intervene, besides the expense of the wagons.

IV.

And so that their expedition may be more expeditious and entangled in no difficulty, the magistrates of every place to which they turn aside shall establish a tolerable rate for public innkeepers. Thus, being content with N. kreuzers for a cavalryman and horse and N. kreuzers for a wagon and horses, let them neither exact a greater price for lodging nor escape punishment for their exaction. Meanwhile, we desire our cavalrymen no less to remember moderation, so that they demand nothing beyond a sufficiently moderate and fitting table.

V.

At the beginning of the march, let the commander of the army and the master of the cavalry divide the cavalry into squadrons, and let them place over each squadron a decurion or a designated man. They shall arrange for the name of one or the other to be proclaimed and recorded in every place through which they march. From this it may be known, if complaints are lodged concerning any violence committed by the cavalrymen or any injury done to the inhabitants, against whom punishment must be taken according to the nature of the offense, either by bodily penalty or diminution of pay, so that the man who suffered the loss may be compensated.

VI.

After the muster has been held, one month’s pay shall be paid immediately to the cavalrymen--namely, N. florins for each horse approved at the levy--and likewise for a baggage wagon, the master of the decury, and other necessities, as is established in the agreements made.

VII.

Together with the levy, the month of meritorious service shall begin immediately and shall be completed by the passage of thirty days, whether they are dismissed by Us or the Holy Empire as no longer necessary a short or a long time afterward.

VIII.

To men who arrive after the first levy, at which we desire every man to be present with his men in readiness, neither shall a second levy be granted nor shall We or the Empire owe anything, unless manifest impediments arising from marriage have created the delay for some of them. But if any of the enrolled cavalrymen should bring more men than the number prescribed or permitted to him allows, wishing them nevertheless to be supported equally with the others, let him understand that We will be bound to him on no account and that the Empire will incur no obligation.

IX.

If, after the army has been mustered, We or the Empire should dismiss them as superfluous within or before the completed space of three months--in the first or second month, of which correspondingly fewer or more days will have passed--the pay for three months shall nevertheless be paid to them in full, although their departure is to be computed. On the other hand, a particular accounting shall be made if dismissal is given at any time in the third month.

X.

Whatever number of draft horses a man lacks from the prescribed number at the levy, the commissioners shall deduct the corresponding amount from his money. It shall be their responsibility to supply every deficiency among horses of this sort, whether their failing strength gives out or death leaves them broken down. Nevertheless, those which have fallen at the hands of the enemy shall be reckoned as whole and sound for the entire month and afterward replaced by others free from every defect.

XI.

If some exigency of war should demand the cavalrymen's wagons, especially at a time when they can do without them without notable loss, let them willingly surrender the wagons and obey the common necessity.

XII.

Let no one harness to a wagon a coursing horse which has been examined and approved, unless necessity demands it and the master, being informed, gives his consent. He shall not be impelled to grant this except by a matter of very great importance.

XIII.

Let each master lead approximately three hundred men beneath his own standard, according to the judgment and regulation of the recruiting officers and commanders.

XIV.

The master of a squadron shall be paid one florin each month for every horse approved through the levy.

XV.

Over every fifty men let their own decurion be placed, whose pay shall be twenty-five florins. Likewise, let a baggage horse be attached to every twelve horses, and let six florins be expended upon it. Let there also be allotted, above ordinary pay, thirty-two florins to the lieutenant; twenty-four to the standard-bearer; twelve apiece to each of two trumpeters, as also to the scribe, barber, and quartermaster; in addition, twelve to the gunsmith, six to the saddler, eight apiece also to two attendants if they are present at the levy, and finally twenty-four florins to one minister of sacred rites or preacher, if one is available.

XVI.

Although it is assigned to the decurions to form the whole body of cavalry and its leaders in military discipline and order, nevertheless, because masters have hitherto sometimes reserved this allowance to themselves and have consequently lacked designated decurions whom the cavalrymen assigned to definite places and stations might obey, confusions and disturbances have arisen rather often. Therefore, so that these may be avoided hereafter, let the masters take care to distribute the cavalrymen of their standard equally among decurions and to declare, by fixed names, each decurion over each body of fifty. Thus every decury may know whom it ought to follow whenever it is to be sent to any places or stations.

XVII.

Whatever, in addition, the commanders of the army and the masters of the cavalry receive to be divided among the leaders of ranks and common cavalrymen, let them distribute by name and in good faith. If they act otherwise, let them undergo the censure of an inquiry and punishment.

XVIII.

Whenever the soldiers are reviewed, let every decurion pass together with the fifty men entrusted to him, in the order in which they were entered in the levy-book.

XIX.

On every march, in foraging, and elsewhere whenever it shall be necessary, let the decurions carefully watch those committed to their care and custody, so that by this means accused offenders may more easily be investigated and punished.

XX.

Since trains extended to great length are burdensome to military operations for many reasons, let no master of cavalry be assigned more than twelve horses, no nobleman more than six or eight, and no count or lord more than ten or twelve, unless one among them, more powerful in resources and authority, should appear at the levy well equipped and prepared in every respect with a greater number. The recruiting officers may accordingly permit him more.

XXI.

Let neither the commanders nor the masters of cavalry permit several men to combine into one rank under the pretext of a single name. Instead, let them take care that each man pass through the levy in the place and rank which he holds in the register, with his own name and surname recorded and his horses entered.

XXII.

Among these cavalrymen, no lord or nobleman who serves with only four or three horses shall be permitted to use a servant--

XXII. --but let those who lead five or six horses have the use of only one servant. Even if they exceed the number six but do not reach twelve, let them still have only one; if any completely fulfill the number twelve, let them have the right to two servants.

XXIII.

Let every lord or nobleman who serves with six or more horses train one of his men who, equipped with a longer firearm, can skillfully employ it against the enemy, since we have found that a firearm of this kind is as advantageous to military operations as it is exceedingly useful to the cavalry itself.

XXIV.

In accordance with these constitutions, let the commander of the army and the masters of cavalry permit no cavalryman to enter the number of the enrolled, the levy, or its book unless the lord himself is present in the field; nor let them permit horses to pass under an assumed name which the men falsely claim, or under the person of one to whom they do not belong.

XXV.

Inasmuch as in these times the custom has also arisen that certain noblemen, after they have subjected their horses to some standard, themselves wish to live freely and be subject to no one, together with one or another coursing horse which they allege that they have in reserve; and inasmuch as this practice, because men of this kind obey no one other than their own mind and will, tends to produce inequalities and to disturb military discipline and even the battles themselves, partly through rebellion and partly through confusion; therefore let the masters leave no place among their men to any lord or nobleman who, equally with the others, is not entered in the register and held bound by the same laws of obedience.

XXVI.

As far as possible, the masters shall endeavor to recruit and gather their cavalrymen from noblemen, not from common soldiers. Moreover, at the levy let no extended ranks be approved for them, unless perhaps only in the case of veteran soldiers who have completed their service and whose valor has been proved; even then, with their own master individually interceding, let only so many horses be approved as the recruiting officer has seen fit.

XXVII.

Let every lord and nobleman clothe his men in such a way that, after their departure from home, their bodies are protected from cold and other injuries of the weather, and let their firearms likewise have their own coverings.

XXVIII.

Likewise, let every lord or nobleman so establish his men that they bring their service to be engaged until the end of the period prescribed, and indeed to remain obligated to Us and the Holy Empire for as long as need shall require. Let none of those who receive pay either demand or induce his lord to dismiss him while the campaign is still continuing, whether at the beginning of the opening year or toward the end of its completed circuit. Rather, let all remain steadfast, and while they remain let them not solicit greater pay. But those who, as deserters from military service, depart against the will of their lord without either an honorable or a causally justified dismissal shall, if apprehended, be delivered to punishment; if they escape by flight, let them be publicly proclaimed perjurers, under which name they shall everywhere be held infamous and shall nowhere be tolerated.

XXIX.

Let no man insolently insult his lord and no man show himself refractory. To point a firearm or sword at him shall be a capital offense.

XXX.

Let no one entice any soldier or servant away from another. But if anyone should depart from his lord with hostile intent or while manifestly guilty of some offense, or should be dismissed, let no other lord or nobleman following the same campaign receive that man unless the former lord has ratified it.

XXXI.

Conversely, let these men also preserve moderation and cultivate equity in treating their servants. If the contrary is done and spirits on both sides are inflamed through disputes and complaints, it shall belong to the masters of cavalry or the commander of the army to investigate the matter diligently. If they themselves cannot compose the dispute, it must be referred to the judgment of the military tribune, who, after hearing both sides and weighing the matter, shall assess the case according to truth and equity.

XXXII.

Let no commander or master release one or more cavalrymen from their oath or give them permission to depart without the knowledge and will of the commander-in-chief; nor let him dare to receive newly arriving cavalrymen and place them beneath the standards.

XXXIII.

If one or more of the cavalry should fall ill, or even, while engaged by command of his commander in honorable business, be led away captive by the enemy, they shall be regarded as sound and whole in every month while the army remains in the field. But their horses and armor shall also be produced at every review.

XXXIV.

If the horse or servant of any cavalryman should fall at the hands of the enemy, or perish through another manifest misfortune of war, then, unless the man substitutes another within one month, or at most two months, after the commissioner has learned of it, let him thereafter expect no pay for the one lost.

XXXV.

Let no man who wishes to preserve both the faith of the oath by which he has bound himself to Us and the Holy Empire and his own honor receive from another or lend to another any cavalryman, horse, armor, or other necessity of war, either at the review of arms or outside it. Instead, let each man diligently and sufficiently equip himself in every respect, prepared to go out and undertake watches with the same arms with which he appeared at the review. Whoever is improvident or negligent concerning this constitution shall be fined his pay.

XXXVI.

Apart from these, let no immunity from watches be given to any horses except the twelve belonging to the master of cavalry and the six belonging to the standard-bearer.

XXXVII.

Let the commanders and masters of cavalry labor with diligent attention and serious care, when arranging the marching columns, to ensure that the cavalrymen present around the standards, in accordance with the levy-book, both the horses and every item of equipment complete and filled out in their proper numbers and parts.

XXXVIII.

Whenever the commissioners come to them to inspect each standard separately, let the commanders and masters of cavalry permit one to be presented apart from another and the number of each to be taken. If a notable deficiency or one suspect in number is then encountered under any standard, inquiry must be made among the cavalrymen both so that the reason and origin of the deficiency may be established and so that the necessary care may be applied thereafter, lest by any fraud committed or by some small diminution of the number paid for by Us, We or the Empire be frustrated. Accordingly, we also desire the commanders, together with the masters of cavalry, to attend every review and always to be present with the recruiting officers, supplying whatever assistance, support, and aid they can, so that not only may the latter duly execute the matters entrusted to them, but service may also be rendered faithfully and steadfastly to Us and the Empire.

XXXIX.

Let the commander, the masters of cavalry subject to him, the leaders of ranks, and the cavalrymen observe Us in the first place, then the supreme legate appointed by Us and the military tribune, and thereafter the captains set over them. Let them await the command of these men in every contingency and outcome of affairs with the faith and obedience owed, ready by day and by night, with full or half-full standards and squadrons, collectively and individually, as either the matter itself or the command of Us and Our legate shall require, to enter the field, be placed in garrisons, perform watches, forage, and conduct escorts. Moreover, without the permission of their superiors let them neither depart with the standards or squadrons, nor otherwise from their rank or from camp, nor send away any baggage, nor even join battle with the enemy when not ordered. Rather, let each remain in that very place to which he is directed by the commander-in-chief, his commander, or his master. Let them obey these men in every place and at every time, in accordance both with what befits true soldiers and with what they owe by right to their commanders and captains and also by force of these constitutions.

XL.

Likewise, let the said prefect of the soldiers and his masters of cavalry, leaders of ranks, and cavalrymen, in proportion to the care they bear both for maintaining the dignity of their lineage and the equestrian order and for fulfilling the faith by which they bound themselves to Us and the Empire, also see to it that the cavalry law praised from antiquity is established, confirmed, and proclaimed with the utmost zeal and diligence. Let all subject themselves and obey it as the rule of perfect Justice, and let them also undergo judgments and punishments for offenses in accordance with these constitutions, the imperial decrees, and the laudable custom of war transmitted to Us.

XLI.

We, by the grace of God Emperor of the Romans, by imperial power and majesty, both from the authority of Our office and with the consent of the electoral princes, the estates general, and the counselors and legates of those absent, will that these equestrian laws, employed from antiquity with great praise, be restored to their former vigor and preserved. We further confirm and deliberately command that whatever is done duly and lawfully, in accordance with the established constitutions, within the boundaries of the Empire or outside them under the dominion of foreign rulers--not only by Us, Emperor of the Romans, at Our court and in Our campaigns and garrisons, but also throughout the entire Empire and through all Our hereditary dominions--be regarded as ratified, firm, and perpetual, to be pursued and executed without possibility of contradiction.

XLII.

Let all things which are handled and decided in any place before an equestrian court for as long as the campaign continues be committed to the book or volume in which the acts of the war are recorded. From it, after the war has found its end, let two copies be transcribed, to be secured by the seal either of the military tribune, if he was present, or of the commander.

XLIII.

And because, for some years past, disobedience, various confusions, and a certain rather free and unrestrained manner of living and acting have crept into the German forces--things which they did not derive from their ancestors, who carried away the palm of valor and probity before other nations and were especially renowned for their observance of military discipline--therefore, so that hereafter not only may precautions be taken against these evils, but Christian Piety, Good Order, Justice, and Obedience, upon which the safety and preservation of men rest, may also recover their former vigor and receive greater increase from day to day, let the cavalrymen henceforth restrain every license of life with the bridle of right reason. Above all, let them abstain from blasphemies and contempt of the divine word; let them inflict neither molestation nor violence upon anyone; and let them have no intercourse with immodest women or with women following the camp. If, however, women free from a shameful reputation are present, whose honorable service is employed and used both for attending to the sick, for washing, and for other things without loss of chastity, they may be tolerated with the consent of the commanders.

XLIV.

Let commanders, masters, and prefects also apply themselves most diligently to this: that, in accordance with the care by which they are solicitous to defend their own honor and discharge the faith they have given, they themselves should above all be zealous to institute a pious and Christian life and should be vigorous defenders of justice and of the poor, thereby offering their cavalrymen examples and incentives to imitate the good, rather than inviting them to evil by their own conduct.

XLV.

Let every lord and nobleman, together with his men, come when summoned to the sermon on Sundays and at other times whenever the signal is given by trumpet, and let them attend divine service. But if anyone is meanwhile found at drinking parties, taverns, or other places suspected of levity, let him be punished, with this distinction: let a servant be confined in prison, bound with fetters, unless another manner of punishment seems appropriate to the nature of the offense. But if he is a lord, let him, when called to account by his master or commander, first be sharply chastised in words; then, if he shows little or no amendment, let him be arraigned as guilty before the prefect and judge of the camp; finally, let the cavalry laws also be threatened against him, according to whose uniform and perpetual tenor, if he were thereafter to devote his life to crimes and disgraceful deeds through manifest wickedness, he should be punished by dishonorable discharge as an example to others.

XLVI.

Furthermore, by force of these constitutions, let none of the prefects of provisions draw and sell wine, beer, or anything similar while sacred rites are being performed and the sermon is being held.

XLVII.

Likewise, let there be severe punishment against those who blaspheme publicly, and let all who violate the sacred name of God by deliberate will be punished with an ignominious death.

XLVIII.

Since shameful drunkenness has gained such strength among the Germans, especially in war, that they consider nothing earlier and nothing more important than drinking together after the manner of beasts, by which fault the whole nation brings itself not only into contempt and infamy among others--

XLVIII. --but are also accustomed to procure little favorable success in military affairs and victory. Therefore, in accordance with these constitutions of Ours, we earnestly charge commanders, masters, prefects, lords, noblemen, and cavalrymen that they too endeavor to wash away this stain upon the soul and to set a limit upon drunkenness, and especially that they not allow their servants to be prone to this vice.

XLIX.

If anyone who holds an office is marked as so addicted to drunkenness that he cannot attend to and fulfill his office sufficiently, let his position be taken from him by the prefect of the camp and his commander and entrusted to another, more worthy man who is more sober. Let no one oppose this, and let no one undertake the patronage and defense of that man's cause, since this constitution and the personal oath by which each man is bound forbid it.

L.

In every offense worthy of accusation which has been committed by lords, noblemen, servants, or men of the highest or lowest rank, let neither the name of drunkenness be advanced nor approved by the prefect of the camp, the commander, and the equestrian court as an excuse for the deed or a mitigation of punishment. Rather, let judgment be pronounced more sharply and severely on this very account, and let the guilty man be condemned to a doubled penalty.

LI.

Let anyone who, rendered improvident by drunkenness or overcome by drunken sleep, has neglected a danger threatening from the enemy suffer punishment.

LII.

If any among the cavalry or the cavalrymen's servants should gorge themselves with wine to such a degree that they are found deprived of reason, let them immediately be consigned to prison and chains, and let them not be released without the consent of their commander or master. Let these superiors also possess discretion, after the matter has been ascertained, to punish those men and to leave to the equestrian court any who flee punishment.

LIII.

Whoever lays armed hands upon the prefect of the camp or the military tribune, or in any other manner opposes his commanders, masters, prefects of watches, or leaders of ranks--especially in matters which they impose by virtue of their office--shall, in accordance with the decree of the equestrian law, pay the penalty in his body and through the loss of honors and goods.

LIV.

Whoever has violated the authority of his superiors either through contempt or through an insulting word shall be arraigned before the equestrian court and punished according to the gravity of the matter.

LV.

Whoever has stirred up sedition against the commander-in-chief or others appointed as his superiors shall, when summoned to judgment, pay the penalty with his head.

LVI.

In the camp, with respect both to summonses and notifications and to commands and prohibitions, let all adapt and conform themselves, as they ought, to the requirements of justice and military discipline.

LVII.

Let no one lay hands upon the executors of justice--such as the prefects of capital matters, investigators of seditions, and their attendants or assistants, by whatever title distinguished--or oppose them either through violence or recklessness, or place any impediment in their way so that they cannot execute their office. Rather, let all strive to protect them against violators and to preserve them from every injury and violence, understanding that all these matters fall under the penalty of death.

LVIII.

If any cavalryman in camp or elsewhere hears and learns anything which could bring loss or impediment to Us, the Holy Empire, military service, Our provinces or peoples, or those of the Empire, or if he sees or knows of suspicious persons, he shall immediately disclose it to his master of cavalry or, if the gravity of the business so demands, to the commander himself. But if one or another does not do this, then, when the matter is discovered, that man or those men shall pay, as authors of the fault, with their heads or fortunes, without pardon.

LIX.

Let both those who draw up the ranks and the common cavalrymen diligently ensure that the columns march in a straight and unbroken order. Let no one dart about or wander before the standards; above all, let no one mingle with the baggage or wagons, or, by leaving camp too early, go ahead of his own standard. For a good cavalryman who loves equity and wishes to appear honorable ought to judge that consideration is owed not only to himself but also to his comrades, so that he appears present nowhere except at his own standard, to which he has been assigned. Accordingly, let him take care that neither through himself nor through his servants is the order disrupted by wandering horsemanship. He must in no manner and for no cause depart from this order without the knowledge of his commander or master. If the contrary is done, let punishment be incurred according to the discretion of the tribune or before the equestrian court.

LX.

Likewise, without permission received from Us, Our legate, and the commanders and officers subordinate to him, let no one depart from the camp or standard with one or more horses, or remain away at night after going out to forage. Whoever acts otherwise shall be fined according to the judgment of the marshal and commander and also according to the tenor of the equestrian law.

LXI.

Whoever deserts his station in the field without the consent and permission of his commander shall, besides the equestrian judgment which the marshal will pronounce against him as a fugitive and deserter, also suffer the free plundering by everyone of his horses, arms, and, finally, everything he possessed.

LXII.

Whoever has defected to the enemy shall be publicly proclaimed and declared infamous by the marshal and the equestrian court, with the disgraceful mark of desertion to the enemy.

LXIII.

Whoever, after abandoning his standard, has undertaken either secret or open flight shall be punished with disgrace and death. But if another man checks the fugitive then and there with a firearm or sword, let this not be imputed to him as a crime; rather, let it be regarded as a meritorious act.

LXIV.

Without the commander's permission, let them neither send a trumpeter to the enemy nor receive one sent by him, nor communicate with him through any exchange, whether of business, conversation, or letters. But if anyone receives some message or letters from the enemy, let him not conceal the matter from his commander and master. Instead, let him immediately arrange through that superior for the letters, closed, covered, and known to no one, to be carried to the commander.

LXV.

Let no man who follows the enemy's side, whether male or female, young or old, have free passage through the watches either when entering the camp or when departing from it. Rather, if such a person is observed, let the guards intercept the person and conduct him or her to one of the commanders or to the supreme commander of the army.

LXVI.

On marches and at stations, while the standards have been raised and are flying in good order, and also among guards who have been posted, let no one direct armed hands against another or engage in single combat with anyone. Let the man guilty of the deed immediately be delivered as a captive to the marshal by the leaders of ranks who are present, or be consigned to prison, soon to be arraigned and to pay the penalty with his head.

LXVII.

Let no one attack or assail anyone from behind, whether within or outside the camp, with a firearm or other lethal weapons. Let no one challenge another to an equestrian duel or violate him in any other manner, under the penalty established by the equestrian law.

LXVIII.

Whoever with wanton audacity has overwhelmed and violated another in that man's own tent or lodging shall incur the supreme penalty and the rigor of the equestrian court.

LXIX.

Whoever plunders horses or draft animals from plows; whoever destroys or breaks down without permission mills, ovens, and similar structures erected for the common use of the state, whether they belong to friends or enemies; and whoever pours out or destroys wine, grain, or flour, or wantonly inflicts any other loss, shall be punished in body.

LXX.

Let all take care not to put to death persons already of decrepit age, priests, preachers, or women when they are found unarmed, or likewise infants, under penalty of death.

LXXI.

Let no private person conspire or stir up disturbances against another; and let no nation of any kind or cohort of soldiers, whether infantry or cavalry, do so against another or call upon its own nation, under penalty of death.

LXXII.

Let no one render the watches uneasy by discharging a firearm, raising songs and shouts, or in other ways. Let the man who does so not go unpunished.

LXXIII.

Let no one maintain ancient rivalries and inveterate hatreds either in the field or in garrisons, or attempt vengeance. If he has some matter in dispute with another, let him either defer it until military service has been brought to an end, arrange for it to be settled by the marshal or officers, or have it decided by the common law. Whoever acts otherwise shall be punished according to what is equitable and just.

LXXIV.

If men, their anger aroused, should clash with one another and begin a contest, let the spectators who are present restrain the disturbance and bring the divided minds together again once peace has been restored. Let both reconciled sides thereafter uphold that peace steadfastly and willingly for as long as the campaign continues.

LXXV.

Let no one neglect his office and assigned part in keeping watch, refuse to perform it, or depart from his station sooner than he is led away from it. Rather, let him remain immovable in the place where he is posted. But whoever neglects this law shall be brought before the prefect of the field, his commander, and his master; unless he can sufficiently clear himself of his negligence, let him bear the sentence of the equestrian court and be dishonorably discharged without pay or honorable dismissal, or be punished in another manner as the matter requires.

LXXVI.

Let each man proceed to stand watch with the armor and arms assigned to him at the army's review. Except for a special cause of marriage, let no one dismount from his horse either during the daytime watches or the watches by night. Whoever acts otherwise shall forfeit his horse and armor as a fine to the governor of the field, to be divided equally with the prefect of the watches, while he is to be punished further after the matter has been ascertained.

LXXVII.

Let no one on watch raise the cry to arms without cause. Rather, let each perform his duty of watching with the greatest diligence so that no disadvantage arises from it to the commander or the army. But whoever has through his own negligence omitted anything in this duty shall clear himself before the marshal and the equestrian court.

LXXVIII.

Whoever goes to his watch so drunk that he can neither discharge the duty of watching sufficiently and properly nor give the watchword shall be punished by decree of the marshal and his commander or of the equestrian law.

LXXIX.

Let no one receive suspicious persons as guests or permit them to remain with him; rather, in accordance with the oath by which each is bound, let him deliver them to the commander of the army or his centurions.

LXXX.

If anyone should perceive a method of circumventing the enemy or forestalling adversaries, or if some plan and counsel should occur to him either for wearing down the enemy or preventing loss, let him report it secretly to the commander, the marshal, or his own leader; he will thereby obtain great and deserved favor.

LXXXI.

Let no one extort money by threatening fire or devastate the camp or any other place with flames except by command of the commander.

LXXXII.

If a battle must be fought or a conflict with the enemy undertaken in another manner, let each man remain in his own place, which he occupies by command of his superiors, and let him not depart from it without their will, under danger of infamy. Although his comrades might meanwhile prove victorious in another part, nevertheless the man who has carried out the command through obedience of this kind shall be held in equal esteem with those who, obeying in a different manner, contributed their aid to the accomplishment of the victory itself. For we must look to this: that obedience, as the foundation of every good government, be established on every side, and that, conversely, every disobedience be eliminated.

LXXXIII.

Although by the goodness of God victory over the enemy should fall to us, nevertheless let no one, without permission, abandon his rank or standard, carried away either by hope of booty or by eagerness to pursue the enemy. Instead, let each remain steadfast in his rank and conform himself to the command of his superiors, under danger either of contracting infamy or of violating his faith, lest through some confusion or disobedience on our side toward the enemy, loss or disadvantage flow back upon the whole army.

LXXXIV.

Let no one seize or take away from another, whether by force or in another manner, booty which that man himself has captured or lawfully acquired. But let them arrange for disputes and disagreements which arise from this cause to be distinguished and settled by their own commander or master, or--

LXXXIV. --by the marshal through the judgment of the equestrian court.

LXXXV.

Let no one despoil the suppliers of provisions within or outside the camp or lay hands upon them. Likewise, let no one rush into the place where provisions are kept or seize anything there by force. Let the man guilty of the deed be restrained in prison and punished by the marshal or equestrian law in his body and the goods of his fortune, as the offense requires.

LXXXVI.

Let no one who has gone out of the camp forestall others by buying provisions earlier; rather, let them await their free sale within the camp.

LXXXVII.

If any livestock or other provision is taken from the enemy, let no one divert any of it elsewhere without the permission of the marshal or his commander. Instead, let him sell it in the camp itself at a tolerable price. If a dispute arises concerning the price, recourse must be had to the same marshal as arbitrator.

LXXXVIII.

Whoever among the aforesaid cavalry, whether in camp or in other duties, notices anything which would bring disadvantage or impediment to Us, the Empire, military affairs, or the dominions subject to Us or the Empire, or whoever has knowledge concerning suspicious persons, shall take care to disclose it all without delay to his master or commander--indeed, if the matter has greater importance and weight, to the commander of the army himself. Whoever becomes known not to have done this shall be punished, as an author of the fault, in the goods of his fortune and in his body, without favor.

LXXXIX.

If We, Emperor of the Romans, or Our supreme commander and legate of the army should grant to one or more persons, cities, towns, villages, hamlets, houses, and other goods an escort, safe-conduct, safeguard, or immunities, or should bestow other favors, let Our cavalrymen attempt in no manner whatsoever, either by themselves or through others in their name, to attack or impair privileges of this kind.

XC.

Let them burden none of those who, whatever their condition, are subject or allied to Us or the Empire; let them impose tribute or exaction upon no one, and let them harm no one by pillaging or similar means, whether when beginning or ending their campaign, or at other times when they have passage or establish a stationary camp. On the contrary, let them most justly pay each and every person what they owe. Similarly, let public innkeepers show them equitable reciprocity in the prices charged for things. But when they are to be in the field against the enemy and under arms, let them have a more liberal supply of fodder.

XCI.

If at any time, because the pay ordered has not been provided at its proper time, they must live at the expense of innkeepers and common people, let them conduct themselves equitably and honorably, sparing their hosts and persons of slender fortune as far as possible. Let them keep a diligent account of what they receive by acknowledgments made and given in writing, and afterward permit an equal amount to be deducted from their pay.

XCII.

Conversely, payment shall be made to the poor for losses caused by the passage of cavalry and infantry, through the ordinary quaestor of Us and the Holy Empire.

XCIII.

When camp has been made in enemy territory, if that land nevertheless belongs to the Empire, let no one go out to harass the inhabitants with pillaging, exactions, or other injuries, and let no one permit this to be committed by his servants. Rather, let him watch them with painstaking care and ensure with diligent circumspection not only that they bring nothing belonging to another into the camp by an unjust means, but also that, as regards provisions and fodder, they follow the rate, measure, and ordinance which the prefect of the camp and the marshal shall prescribe to them at every time, in accordance with the oath which they have taken. If some cause of complaint should arise from this, let the masters restore the loss to the needy subjects with money to be subtracted from the pay of those who inflicted the loss. Let noble lords also compel their servants, when they have investigated the case and found them guilty, to make restitution. Indeed, let the guilty also be summoned to judgment and punished as plunderers.

XCIV.

But if, through the present aid of the divine Majesty, the commander of the enemy army or other commanders should be captured by Our cavalrymen, let persons of this kind be presented either to Us or to Our commander, or be delivered into the hands of the man who carries this commission for him--not without a rich reward and the bounty owed.

XCV.

But if persons other than the commanders and leaders already mentioned are made captives, let the man who captures and subjects them have discretion to treat them by exactions and by methods received in military usage. Nevertheless, let the commander-in-chief be informed of every captive, and let none of them be released without his consent.

XCVI.

And if any cities, citadels, villages, dominions, or nations are conquered by war, let all of them, together with their artillery, fortifications, and collected provisions, pass entirely into Our power and be conveyed to the Empire, not diverted elsewhere. Then, after such conquered cities, citadels, and villages, and such subjugated regions and peoples, have rendered homage and been received by Us into Our protection, We will that all the remainder of their substance, which otherwise would be booty by military custom, be immune from every injury and exaction, and We take precaution that no one dare invade it.

XCVII.

Since cavalrymen and infantrymen diverse in origin and nation flow together into a single army, so that the quarrels and disagreements which readily arise and are stirred up from so great a diversity, even from slight causes, may accordingly be avoided, let foreign nations by no compact assail one another with words or deeds, rend one another by conduct or insulting expressions, or attempt to issue forth and provoke one another to debate. Nevertheless, if one injured nation appears to have a just action against another, it must be instituted and pursued before the ordinary magistrate and according to the customary form of military law.

XCVIII.

If one or more among the cavalry offends against these constitutions, or in another manner commits an act contrary to military laws and customs, his own honor, or the faith he has given, let them bear punishment in body, by infamy, or through loss of goods, according as the nature of the offense demands, by the judgment of the prefect of the camp, the commanders and masters, or by decree and custom of the equestrian law.

XCIX.

And if this cavalry should lack an ordinary marshal, or the marshal should not be present, so that a lawful equestrian court cannot be held by him, then, when capital causes and other crimes nevertheless arise which, because of the accompanying guilt, do not admit delay or postponement of punishment, let the commander-in-chief meanwhile assume for himself the task of avenging injustice. Having summoned the masters of cavalry, lieutenants, standard-bearers, and also, if necessary, some of the centurions, and having interposed their judgment, let him, in accordance with these constitutions and the tenor of the equestrian laws, show himself no less sharp a judge against the accused and an avenger of crimes.

C.

Even among German cavalrymen, although they may possess fewer or more standards and may lack a designated marshal, let investigators of capital matters nevertheless be established. Whether they follow the camp on marches or are placed in garrisons, let the men experience them as avengers of evils by force of this constitution, which none of them may refuse.

CI.

If one or more men, after receiving enlistment money from a master, are not present in the ranks when the soldiers are reviewed, or, before or after the review while military order has not yet been established, withdraw with arms scarcely received, or arrange to be enrolled in another man’s service, let them, as is equitable, appear when summoned before the equestrian court and clear their deed. If anyone remains refractory, after an action has nevertheless been brought against him and the case heard, let judgment and sentence be pronounced just as against one who is present.

CII.

If, either during this campaign or during others beyond the boundaries of the Empire under foreign rulers, some error or dispute undertaken for the sake of honor has remained among Germans while they were performing military duties, and it is decided to prosecute it before the equestrian court, then, when the accuser comes and seeks justice against the opposing party who is remaining in Our army, let justice itself be rendered to him, and let the accused, lawfully summoned into court, answer. Meanwhile, the man who brings the case shall also bind himself to the marshal and the commander of the army by furnishing adequate security for everything required in a matter of this kind until it is examined and concluded by law.

CIII.

In all these matters let the said commanders, masters, and cavalrymen conduct themselves as befits soldiers of approved valor and good faith.

CIV.

Furthermore, the aforesaid commander must not only be personally present with and remain attached to the masters and cavalrymen subordinate to him; he shall also not dare to appoint a legate in his own place or entrust his delegated duties to another. Mindful of his dignity, he shall preserve the manner of duly carrying these things out in person, as the representative of the equestrian order, and of answering suitably when questioned concerning them.

CV.

Moreover, let the aforesaid cavalry submit to its review every month, or whenever it is requested, and let the payment of wages follow it. But if, because money is not ready, payment does not always and immediately follow the end of the month, let them patiently endure this delay and meanwhile faithfully perform their share of the duty, as just soldiers do, neither neglecting watches nor refusing marches.

CVI.

At the first review these constitutions and articles shall also be read publicly to the common cavalrymen in the open field beneath the raised standards.

CVII.

This reading of the constitutions and laws shall also always be repeated to the cavalrymen in the circle whenever the number of those serving is afterward taken, so that, their memory having been refreshed, they may more readily know how to direct and conduct themselves according to them.

CVIII.

In the same manner, if cavalrymen should afterward join, once the army is ready for action, and, after receiving enlistment money, be enrolled in the same military service, they shall be bound to observe these same laws no less than if they had contracted for service from the beginning.

CIX.

Let the masters be cautious and provident in gathering soldiers, lest any person of frivolous character, marked by the stigma of a shameful crime or infamy, mingle among their cavalrymen. This is both so that every danger of rebellion, confusion, and sedition may be the farther removed from the army and so that honorable and freeborn soldiers may live more quietly and attend to their duties more easily. But if any persons of this kind become known while lurking among the standards, they shall, on account of their crime--whenever and wherever they have committed it contrary to right--be arraigned before the equestrian court and, in accordance with the nature and measure of the offense, either expelled from the army or punished by another penalty.

CX.

Moreover, if among the enrolled soldiers there is found either a public despiser and blasphemer of God and the divine word, a notorious violator of virgins and women, a man who has bound himself by the crime of unjust homicide, or one who has brought disgrace upon himself through perfidious desertion to the enemy or another deed alien and unworthy of a nobleman, then, when charged and convicted, let him be punished according to the judgment of the equestrian court.

CXI.

Finally, if on this occasion something has escaped Us or been omitted in these articles which, both by the nature of what is right and by the custom and institution of the ancestors, is required to be observed by cavalrymen, let all be bound to follow and observe it just as if it had been expressly stated, and let transgressors be punished.

ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE CAVALRY LAW

I.

First, let all commanders, masters of cavalry, leaders of ranks, lords, and noblemen, together with the other cavalrymen who are their comrades in arms, be enrolled and admitted under the constitutions which have been set forth, in which are contained, in order, the articles of the equestrian law and military discipline composed and established by Us, Emperor of the Romans, by the electoral princes, and by the estates general of the Empire.

II.

When the assembly has therefore been held, let Our commander-in-chief--who has accepted as his foremost care the governing of the army of the Emperor of the Romans and the Empire--arrange for the whole cavalry to be summoned into one place, unless perhaps its greater multitude appears to require division into parts. Then let him, together with the marshal and those who hold the higher offices, go around the same body in a circle, while the herald carries a drawn sword before them. There, after the signal has been given by the trumpet, let him first address the cavalrymen openly with a gracious speech because they have offered their service with so liberal a spirit for Our good and the advantage of the Empire, and then let him speak the remaining words with kindness according to the following sense.

III.

Since obedience and good government are both exceedingly pleasing to God Himself and so salutary and useful to us that our German ancestors always judged that they must apply themselves to them with the most vigilant spirit, therefore he wishes, in Our name, in the name of the Empire, and also in his own name, to admonish all men that they should be willing to embrace discipline and obedience, follow laws and judgments, cultivate Christian charity, and adopt honorable conduct worthy of a nobleman. That is, they should be zealous for piety toward God and lovers of an honorable life and, conversely, should avoid and flee utterly deeds which are more like those of a rude pagan and an ignoble man than of a noble cavalryman imbued with illustrious blood and the Christian faith.

IV.

And so that these things may be observed more rightly and certainly, We wish Our constitutions and those of the Empire now to be read to them. They contain the most ancient and most highly praised articles of the equestrian law, which We and the Empire have ordered to be recalled to their former vigor, established, and put into practice for the advantage and glory of the German nation. In this manner they shall serve according to the ancient custom.

V.

Nor is there any doubt that, in accordance with the freeborn character of German cavalrymen, they will regard these very things as equitable and good, and will not only accept them with a willing and joyful spirit but also put them into effect. After these preliminaries, let the reading of the articles follow.

VI.

When it has been completed, let the commander-in-chief exhort them again that, with the sincerity which is proper, princes, counts, magnates, noblemen, and common cavalrymen--of whatever condition and whatever age they are, high or low, youthful or declining in years--should all be willing, as they ought, to conform themselves to what has been read, obey faithfully and obediently, and remain in the faith given to their commanders, the Emperor of the Romans, the Empire, Our legate, and the officers subordinate to him. Whether they occupy the open fields extensively or reside in garrisons, let each man by night as well as day, according to his own measure of strength and the custom of the ancestors, discharge his duty even with contempt for danger to his fortune and his head, prodigal of life and heedless of his goods. Let them not think themselves released from this faith before this military service is dissolved, unless death intervenes or other grave and just causes arise. Rather, let them maintain a spirit and conduct worthy of a freeborn German cavalryman, uphold equity and right, commend the whole military enterprise by fervent prayer to the almighty Deity, and finally show themselves free from every fault and disgrace and from the punishment of disgrace. At the end of his exhortation the commander-in-chief shall ask them, in accordance with ancient custom, to bind themselves by this oath and, with all raising their hands, to be willing to swear to these laws and to the performance of everything contained in them.

VII.

When the laws and articles of war have been read and the oath pronounced, the commander of the war shall establish the ranks of the legions and shall indicate to the cavalrymen those who are to hold the principal offices.

VIII.

First, let him take the sword from the herald’s hand and deliver it to the marshal. Let him entrust to the marshal the care of Justice, or of Equity and Right, for protecting the good and obedient and, conversely, punishing the wicked and guilty, earnestly impressing upon him the oath which he has taken with the common voice of all.

IX.

Then let the commander-in-chief name the remaining persons appointed to the other higher offices, and at the same time commend to them a diligent and faithful care of the number of their men, corresponding to the oath which they have taken. In addition, let him impress upon the cavalrymen collectively that they render to each and every officer of this kind the obedience which is proper in matters pertaining to each man’s particular office.

X.

Thereupon the officers in turn, after giving thanks, promise due submission to the commander-in-chief and the performance of their office to the cavalrymen.

When these things have been completed, the circle is dissolved at the sounding of the trumpets.

BY WHAT PROCEDURE THE CAVALRY LAW IS TO BE CONSTITUTED

Let the marshal appoint as his legate a nobleman distinguished by uprightness of life, maturity of judgment, and experience in affairs, and let him entrust to this man, besides other matters, the care of Justice and the equestrian law. Let there also be joined to him a person well skilled by practice to discharge the office of scribe. At the first equestrian court, let this man bind his faith by a public oath.

HOW THE SAME LAW IS TO BE OBSERVED

I.

So that the equestrian law may be duly observed, let it first be proclaimed throughout the camp by a trumpeter at the marshal’s command; or, if that appears more convenient, let it be announced in order to each part of the divided army.

II.

Then let the marshal, to whom the chief care and burden of justice has been committed, select three masters of cavalry, three lieutenants, three standard-bearers, likewise the same number of decurions, together with one cavalry commander. With these men let him enter and complete the court; indeed, on the preceding day as well let him take counsel with them, if it appears necessary and useful for the case that this be done beforehand.

III.

If the cavalry is more numerous, so that men are readily available from the multitude for this purpose, or if some capital cause or another grave matter of honor arises, let the court be doubled by establishing twenty-four persons and selecting more decurions from the standards accordingly.

IV.

When the aforesaid persons have assembled before or within the marshal's chamber and he is about to proceed to the place of judgment, let him arrange for a herald or another man to precede him, carrying a drawn sword before him, and for a trumpet blast to go before them, both to add authority to the law and to offer a terror to the soldiers. Let those persons follow immediately in pairs and in unbroken order, bearing their own swords resting upon their shoulders, with the point rising upward if the cause is capital, but fitted to the side if it is not a criminal cause.

V.

In every judicial cause, especially if it demands a penalty or concerns the preservation of reputation, property, or military discipline, let the marshal himself be present and administer justice and equity with the greatest zeal and defend it by his authority. But if civil causes of lesser importance arise while he is detained by more serious business, let his duties be fulfilled instead by his legate.

VI.

When the marshal and the others have taken their full seats in the place of judgment, let the marshal himself first place his sword upon the table. Then let the judges invert their swords, with the points turned toward the ground, if the cause is capital.

VII.

Likewise, let the book of constitutions be placed upon the table.

VIII.

After this, let the marshal first propose and command the judges who have been requested and appointed that they be willing to judge neither corrupted by money, gifts, and largesses, nor for the sake of obtaining a gift; and that, with hatred and envy removed, and without regard either for friendship or enmity, they instead hear the causes argued on both sides by allegation and defense, in accordance with the imperial constitutions and decrees, and deliver and pronounce sentence with that sincerity of justice with which they pray that they themselves may be judged by God the Judge at the Last Judgment. Then let him receive from each of them his pledged faith to preserve this equity, confirmed by the giving of the right hand.

IX.

Furthermore, let the marshal inquire according to custom concerning the court: whether the men in whose hands it rests are qualified; likewise, whether it is being held at a lawful time; and whether any impediment intervenes which forbids the imperial equestrian court from being held.

X.

Then he shall adjure the judges by almighty God, the fountain of all justice, and thereafter in Our name as the supreme magistrate, in the name of the Empire, and also in the name of Our commander: let no one speak without permission and without his advocate; let no one depart from the court, lest the surrounding crowd crush them.

XI.

Then let him inquire whether a day has duly been appointed for the litigants and whether they have been summoned.

XII.

In capital causes and those which concern the good of military discipline, let the investigator of capital matters come forward; and, if because of the greater weight of the matter it so appears to the marshal, let his legate come forward in addition to him. In civil causes, however, where a monetary dispute is brought, let the plaintiff and defendant, when they come forward, each request one person from the court and one or another from the assistants, by whose counsel they shall arrange for their cause to be pleaded and examined.

XIII.

In penal causes, the relevant article contained in the cavalry laws and the imperial law concerning crime are the most exact norm and rule of judgments.

XIV.

While the inquiry is conducted, let the cavalrymen be admonished under their oath that each man keep his vote concealed and wrapped in perpetual silence and bury it with himself in the same grave.

XV.

Before judgment is pronounced, if a criminal cause or a matter of honor is disputed among men of high station, let the marshal always disclose the matter itself to the commander-in-chief in order also to learn his mind. In accordance with the dignity of the person, the condition of the time, and the circumstances of affairs, the commander may consequently mitigate and soften the severity of the punishment.

XVI.

When judgment is pronounced in penal causes, let the marshal hold his sword in his hand with its point directed upward.

XVII.

But while the inquiry is being made and opinions delivered, let the others appointed to judge lower the points of their swords. When the judgment has been made public, let them then raise them, and let the marshal break his staff. Then let them depart from the court to the place from which they came, with each judge bearing his sword resting upon his shoulder or, if it was not a criminal cause, fastened at his side.

XVIII.

Finally, whatever is handled and concluded anywhere in courts of this kind while military service continues shall be written and recorded in good order in the book appointed for this purpose. When the war has now been completed, let two copies of this book be authenticated by the marshal’s seal, and let one be transmitted to Our chancery and the other to the chancery of Our beloved electoral prince of Mainz, so that anyone may have recourse to it in the future.

ARTICLES OF THE GERMAN FORCES

I.

The German forces shall first swear to Us, Emperor of the Romans, and to the Holy Empire that through faithful military service they will serve Us and the Empire both in averting evils and in advancing advantages. They shall likewise bind themselves by obedience to Our supreme legate, their commanders, captains, lieutenants, standard-bearers, leaders of ranks, quartermasters, and others appointed by Us to higher offices. All, of noble and ignoble blood and condition alike, shall take care not to resist or evade anything which they receive as commanded by these men under the equitable condition of a soldier. Let them beware of confronting them with a fickle and seditious spirit, violent hands, or an insulting mouth. Instead, let them be ready to approach and abandon the enemy and to obey every necessity whatsoever which arises on marches, in battles, in incursions, or on watches by day and night. But if anyone shows himself disobedient, let him be punished according to law by the judgment of the commander, as is declared in the articles written below.

II.

Let every soldier keep as far away as possible from all impiety both of words and of works, and let him entreat God with the suppliant prayer of his spirit for victory over the enemy. Whenever he is summoned by the sounding of the drum, let him come to the sermon and not omit it unless prevented by grave business. But if anyone does not fear to offend God with a blasphemous mouth or deed, let him be punished in body and life by decree of the commander and of the law. If anyone is found during the sermon and divine service in wine cellars, at drinking parties, or in other places serving as lodgings of levity and shamelessness, let the investigator have the right to place him in fetters and to fine him by judgment of the commander. Meanwhile, while sacred rites are being performed and the sermon is being held, let none of the prefects of provisions draw or sell any wine, beer, or anything similar.

III.

Whoever are to carry spears and shorter swords shall appear at the review of arms equipped with swords sufficiently strong for defense, serviceable sidearms for either hand, or suitable German swords. Above all, however, let the firearm troops equip themselves with trustworthy and serviceable swords. Let no one exchange his arms, of whatever kind; rather, preserving them with diligent custody and care, let him not destroy them by abusing them for cutting wood or for other purposes, so that, as good soldiers, they may bear and employ those same arms whole against the enemy when the time requires it. Whoever is found to have acted otherwise shall pay a fine for it, especially by diminution of his pay when the soldier is reviewed.

IV.

Likewise, let every man keep the aforesaid arms--and especially let the firearm troops keep the larger firearms and the things pertaining to them--placed in safety and readiness. Let them take every precaution not to be found without gunpowder, bullets, and tinder. But if anyone presents himself so unarmed on marches and watches that he can engage the enemy with neither sword nor firearm, let him pay the penalty in his body.

V.

Likewise, let all be provided with cloaks, so that they may more easily endure the onset of rains and the force of cold, and above all so that the firearm troops may cover their firearms and powder flasks and use them more conveniently.

VI.

Let every company under a standard, whether collectively, separately, or even by decuries, as the matter requires, present itself prepared and ready both to undertake marches and to perform station and garrison duty, obeying Our command, the command of Our commanders, and necessity itself.

VII.

If at any time a captain or another officer should, under the compulsion of necessity, entrust something not contrary to military valor to be accomplished together with the standard-bearers, leaders, and soldiers of another captain, they must obey these men just as if their own captain had given the command.

VIII.

Let them keep women in childbed, pregnant women, virgins, men worn out by age, those initiated into the priesthood, preachers of the divine word, and other ministers of the Church uninjured and unharmed, inflicting no injury upon them under penalty of death.

IX.

Under the same penalty, let them abstain from churches, monasteries, cloisters, houses and hospitals, and places consecrated to literary instruction, harming them in no manner.

X.

Let the passage of thirty days complete a month of paid service, according to accepted custom, and let four florins--each consisting of fifteen batzen or sixty kreuzers--be paid to each man for every month. But if, when the appointed time has already elapsed, a delay occurs in paying the money commanded, let them nevertheless neither more sluggishly nor more impatiently refuse to perform their turns of watch or to march against the enemy, as befits soldiers.

XI.

Whoever at any time and place either withdraws as a fugitive after receiving enlistment money or afterward departs from the army as a deserter without permission and an honorable discharge shall, if apprehended, be condemned to death once the cause has been introduced, even without being brought into court; and let his goods be subjected to plunder. But if he is not apprehended or brought back, let him be branded with the public mark of infamy and deprived of every freedom, security, and protection of safe-conduct.

XII.

Let no one depart from his rank on marches unless a grave cause presses. But whoever does not comply in this matter, let the commanders, leaders of ranks, and public officers bring him back into rank by force. If, resisting in turn, he rejects their commands and thereby furnishes a cause for his own killing, let the man who kills him not be summoned on a criminal charge.

XIII.

Whoever on marches or at stations, after being justly rebuked by another leader for causes arising from the fact that he conducts himself otherwise than befits a soldier, rises against him either supported by an assembled crowd or insulting him with reproaches shall be punished according to the commander’s decree and the prescriptions of the law.

XIV.

When opinions are requested, let the cavalrymen be reminded of their oath and obligation so that each man’s vote is preserved in silence to the grave. Let them show themselves equally ready and prepared to undergo the final hazard of life with courageous faith in defending the same matters. Indeed, for the sake of their honor and the oath taken, let them enter into neither conversation nor counsel concerning the betrayal of them.

XV.

By force of their oath, when danger and necessity from the enemy threaten and the captain or one of the commanders requests it, let them not refuse to be employed in laboring and building.

XVI.

When placed in a garrison of this kind, even if they are attacked by the enemy in one or more assaults, let them live content with their same ordinary pay, since We or the Empire owe them nothing additional for this. And let no one invade in order to plunder or force himself into citadels, cities, and other garrisons which are received under conditions, unless opportunity or an order has been given by the commander.

XVII.

Let them leave dismissed and unassailed all who have been presented by Us with a guarantee of safety or have come under oath into Our protection, devising nothing against them under penalty of death without the consent and permission of the commander-in-chief or the man performing his duty in his place.

XVIII.

Let them not plunder, pillage, or inflict any loss upon places which enjoy a safeguard, under penalty of death.

XIX.

If at any time We, or Our supreme legate whom We have appointed, engage in a second battle against the enemy, or if some principal fortification is captured by a powerful assault--which may God turn to good--then the period of paid service of each soldier, regardless of the point which the month has meanwhile reached, shall be regarded as completed and shall begin anew, although We or the Empire are to be bound to them for nothing beyond this. If, although money is not yet ready, it appears that further loss can be inflicted upon the enemy, let them not refuse, at the commander's order, to pursue them and deter them by whatever means they can. Whoever resists shall be regarded as perjured and afflicted with capital punishment. Nevertheless, in these matters We do not wish the established customs and agreements in kingdoms and hereditary provinces to be changed or prejudiced by Us; rather, let all things remain unmoved.

XX.

In battles and incursions and after their favorable success, let no one be more intent upon booty or gape more greedily after plundering goods.

XXI.

Without the knowledge and against the will of his captain, let no one go out of the camp to plunder or for other reasons, or remain away from his standard at night, under penalty both of death and of another punishment to be inflicted by decree of the commander.

XXII.

If one or more men incline toward flight in battle or elsewhere, let the nearest man either run them through or strike them. Indeed, if anyone weaving a flight of this kind is killed by someone, the killer has committed not a criminal deed but a deed to be rewarded with singular favor.

XXIII.

But whoever removes himself by flight shall first be reported by name to the commander; if he is afterward apprehended, let him pay the penalty with his head; if not, let him pay for his perfidy by the mark of public infamy.

XXIV.

By force of the oath they have taken, let them beware of holding assemblies without the knowledge and against the will of the commander. Those who hold them shall, as a faithless crowd and with every hope of favor cut off, be punished with death.

XXV.

Under penalty of death, let no one maintain any communication by conversation or letters with the enemy or with their drummers and trumpeters, whether in camp, on marches, or in garrisons; and let him neither send a messenger into the enemy camp nor receive one from it without the commander's order and permission.

XXVI.

Let no person among the enemy or those adhering to them, of whatever sex and whatever age, be permitted to enter and leave Our camp freely by passing through the watches. Rather, let whoever discovers them also apprehend them or conduct them either to his captain or to the supreme commander of the field.

XXVII.

If anyone should become aware of treason and of other crimes which one or more men intend or inflict either to the detriment of the army itself or to the injury of its commander, let him either immediately disclose the names of the evildoers before the master and the investigator of capital matters, so that by revealing his knowledge he may discharge his oath, or let him pay as though he himself were the author, guilty of the same perfidy.

XXVIII.

If anyone should discover a method dangerous to the enemy for harming them and suitable for aiding his own men, let him disclose and explain it to the commander or supreme commander-in-chief, and he shall receive great favor for this deed.

XXIX.

Let all diligently avoid quarrels arising from the insolence of mutual contention, under penalty of death, joined most closely to one another by peace and the concord which unites minds.

XXX.

During quarrels, by force of the oath he has taken, let no one employ lethal arms against another, such as firearms and longer swords. Meanwhile, let the free use of side-swords be permitted for defending life by cutting or thrusting.

XXXI.

If inveterate hatreds exist among some of the soldiers, let them lie still and remain at rest while this laudable campaign is conducted, unavenged by word or deed unless vindicated by law. Whoever acts otherwise shall, when summoned to judgment and convicted, be punished with disgrace and death.

XXXII.

Let no one stir up others against another. If, however, some dispute and disagreement should happen to arise among certain men, let the nearest who are present endeavor to render them peaceable, demanding an equitable peace from both sides. Whoever rejects that peace after it has been sought two or three times, and is killed by someone on that account, shall be judged to have atoned in this manner for the injury of thrice rejecting peace. The man who strikes one who seeks peace or is stripped of arms shall be arraigned and, according to decree, punished with an ignominious death.

XXXIII.

Whoever, after peace has been composed, attacks another standing before him with his arms, whether by hurling or casting them, shall be punished in body.

XXXIV.

If two or more men, after a disagreement has arisen, rush into blows, let no one, by joining the faction, support only one side. Rather, so that the evil may not receive a greater increase, let him interpose himself for the purpose of separating the altercation and ending the fight. Whoever acts otherwise shall be punished according to the judgment and decree of the commander or commander-in-chief.

XXXV.

Under penalty of death, let no one discharge a firearm at a place and time when danger and loss from the explosion are feared, whether this occurs in camp, in cities, or in citadels, especially when the watches have been posted and it is night.

XXXVI.

Whoever does not come when summoned to the watches shall be fined according to the commander's decree. If, however, he does not appear because of ill health, let him notify his captain through a comrade both of his absence and its reason, and ask permission from him.

XXXVII.

Whoever, when he ought to perform his portion of the watch, departs from his station without permission shall be punished with every favor cut off; and his comrades are bound by force of their oath to report this very act.

XXXVIII.

Let no one furnish a substitute guard against the will and without the knowledge of his captain. Above all, let each exercise diligent care concerning the watchword which will be designated to them at any particular time. For whoever consigns it to oblivion or gives a different one shall be arraigned and punished with an ignominious death.

XXXIX.

Whoever is found overcome by sleep while on watch, or departs before he is relieved, shall be punished capitally, beyond every favor which might remit fault or punishment.

XL.

When the night watches have been completed, likewise during the daytime watches and in the ranks, let no one quarrel with another either in the streets or in lodgings, under penalty of death.

XLI.

In friendly territory and upon land belonging to Us and the Empire, whether they are engaged in marches or encamped, let no one take anything from another by force or without paying the price, and let no one invade in order to pillage the poor common people. Rather, let each leave the host with whom he lodges in cities or villages satisfied by equitable payment.

XLII.

Whoever acts otherwise and furnishes cause for a just complaint shall, besides the restitution to which he will be compelled by his captain and commander, pay penalties in life and body when the matter has been ascertained.

XLIII.

Under corporal penalty, let no one stir up sedition and disagreements or raise a disturbance against a foreign nation, if one is present in the army; and let no one engage in a duel with anyone of that nation, so that greater disadvantage may be avoided. But if some controversy arises with it concerning any matter, let them refer it to their superiors, who will uphold justice and equity on both sides. And when provisions are carried to the army, lest the prefects of provisions be affected by any violence or molestation, let no one invade or plunder the provisions, either before or after they have been brought into camp, before their value has been assessed.

XLIV.

Under the same penalty, let no one run out of camp in order to buy provisions too early. Rather, let each endure the delay until they have been brought into the open area of the camp and a price has been placed upon them.

XLV.

When the prefect of capital matters or his officers are about to apprehend violators of the laws and of obedience, let no one impede them by gathering factiously against them or by attempting seizures beyond what is equitable. Rather, let them protect those officers. Whoever brings so much delay and impediment upon them that the guilty man escapes, snatched from their hands, shall pay the penalty which would have been inflicted upon the guilty man himself.

XLVI.

If anyone is caught in the commission of a flagrant crime--for example, manifestly guilty of a killing which has been committed, theft, treason, or similar offenses--when the investigator or his officers are not immediately present, let the nearest persons who are present detain the guilty man for the good of military discipline until the investigator comes with his men.

XLVII.

Let no one enroll his name under two captains, arrange to be reviewed twice, or pass under another man’s name. Let no one promise his arms to another as assured or lend them to him in order to deceive the army’s review. Whoever is guilty of this fault shall have punishment established against him.

XLVIII.

At the review, let each man declare, besides the name of purification which he received at the sacred baptismal font, his surname also. Indeed, let him name his native city or the place of his birth near that native city, so that they may be entered in the record.

XLIX.

Let no one, in violation of the faith of his oath, cause prejudice or devise fraud. Nor let anyone join aid and counsels with any man by any method through which We and the Empire might at last be burdened with unjust and unlawful military pay, circumvented, and deceived.

L.

At the review of the soldiers, let the commanders themselves and those who hold offices, as well as the noblemen, appear clothed in all their armor.

LI.

If cavalrymen and infantrymen must at any time reside together in one camp, let both sides endure this conjunction peacefully, and let the infantrymen willingly concede to the cavalrymen as much space as is sufficient for placing their horses.

LII.

Let each man remain content and with a peaceable spirit in the place which has fallen to him from the quartermaster.

LIII.

Under corporal penalty, let no one despoil a plow; let no one without permission destroy or break down mills, ovens, or anything constructed for the use of the state, whether it belongs to friends or enemies. Let no one from mere wantonness pour out wine, grain, or flour, or destroy them in another manner.

LIV.

Let no one slaughter men worn out by advanced age, preachers of the divine word, or women, if they are found unarmed, or infants either, under penalty of death.

LV.

Without a particular command of the commander-in-chief, let no one impose an exaction by threatening fire; and let no one set fire to a fort or anything else, under penalty of death, especially in places past or through which Our forces have a free passage, lest some obstacle be placed before the provisions.

LVI.

Let every man establish such a measure for himself in drinking together that he both restrains himself from drunkenness and does not importunately urge another to drink. If anyone when drunk inflicts either violence or hands upon another or commits another fault, let him undergo not merely a penalty as severe as if he had offended while sober, but one twice as grievous.

LVII.

Above all, let the man whose part it will be to keep watch take care not to admit drunkenness. But if anyone is found so drunk on watch that he cannot perform his turn sufficiently, let him be consigned to fetters and punished in addition according to the decree of his commander.

LVIII.

If, moreover, anyone is found upon public roads or on the marches themselves so dissolved by wine that, deprived of the necessary use of reason, senses, and limbs, he can neither stand nor walk, with an uncertain gait and wandering foot, let the investigator or his officers apprehend him and consign him to chains and prison.

LIX.

Under penalty of death, let no one, impelled by any necessity, raise the cry to arms against the will or without the knowledge of the commander.

LX.

And when the cry is raised, let each man seize as quickly as possible the area or place assigned to him, with no one remaining within his lodging except for a grave cause of ill health, under penalty of death.

LXI.

Whoever, oppressed by wine and sleep, neglects a danger threatening from the enemy or the signal for battle shall be punished with his head.

LXII.

Let each man possess, according to military law and custom, whatever he has acquired by plunder from the enemy in battles and incursions, except artillery, gunpowder, fortifications, provisions laid up, and other things which contribute to the support of a town; and except also the captive persons of the enemy's magnates, princes, commanders of the field, and prefects of camps. These shall come into the power and judgment of Us, Our commander-in-chief, or Our legate and must accordingly be delivered to them; meanwhile, however, let the merit of the man who captured them be compensated by the grateful return of a just reward. Likewise, under penalty of death, let no one release any captive without the commander's grant.

LXIII.

If anyone, injured either by the enemy or by another honorable cause, is weakened, or even through the dispensation of God suffers ill health, let him nevertheless meanwhile enjoy his pay.

LXIV.

Let those who have taken livestock or other provisions away from the enemy not conduct them elsewhere, but sell them in the camp itself, for the good and convenience of the common soldier, at a price which is not burdensome but tolerable and has been imposed according to the judgment of the investigator or their commander.

LXV.

Let no one seize or carry away by force the booty which another man has gained for himself. Those guilty of this fault shall be punished according to the commander's decree.

LXVI.

Let no one attempt to violate the freedom which executioners possess under the common law. Whoever violates it shall be punished with death.

LXVII.

While the order of march is being led, let no one march among the army's baggage unless he is weakened by grave ill health and has obtained permission for this indulgence from his captain.

LXVIII.

When they have received the command from the commander-in-chief or their captain, either at the very first levy or afterward, let each, in accordance with the faith pledged by his oath and under danger of losing reputation and honor, dismiss his baggage and any attachments of immodest women who adhere to him but are not truly wives.

LXIX.

Let none of the captains receive another's soldiers, if any desert from their own standard, without the knowledge and will of the other captain. Let no cavalryman who deserts his lord during the same campaign be enrolled in any body of infantry; and, finally, let no one entice any man away from another.

LXX.

Let no one challenge a fellow player by laying down a greater stake, and let not the man who has money present prolong the game. However great a winning it may happen that one man is to give another in the future, let the latter nevertheless owe him nothing.

LXXI.

If any do not observe these written articles, let them pay the penalties as perjurers and men guilty of a crime, in accordance with the decree of the law and the sentence of the commander-in-chief. If anything not alien to the name and valor of a soldier has been passed over in the laws related above, whether by forgetfulness or silence, let all offenses and errors of the soldiers nevertheless be left to the judgment of the commander-in-chief and punished by his avenging sentence.

LXXII.

Moreover, all infantrymen who, a short or long time afterward, begin to serve and earn pay for Us and the Empire in this army, give their names, and receive their allowance shall, although they were not present when the oath to these laws was sworn, nevertheless be bound by the same necessity and observance of them just as if they had been present in person.

LXXIII.

If forgetfulness of these constitutions should creep upon any, let them at any time approach the military praetor in order to receive a rereading and instruction concerning them, which he will be obliged to provide.

LXXIV.

Let them swear for three months. If their service is necessary beyond these months, by force of these constitutions let them serve, enrolled and accepted, for all the time for which there is need, neither refusing nor excusing themselves, understanding all things in accordance with the tenor of these written articles.

ANNOTATION OF CERTAIN ARTICLES ANNEXED TO THE FOREGOING

I.

Since German commanders, masters of cavalry, and captains are permitted and free to lead German forces to foreign rulers, not only in accordance with the privileges flowing down to them from their ancestors and the liberty transmitted to them, but also according to the tenor both of the former constitutions of the Empire and of those now in force; but since at the present time others who are not German by birth wish to arrogate and usurp the same right for themselves, not without prejudice and loss which could thereby flow back upon the German nation; therefore, henceforth no foreigner who is a native neither of the Empire nor of a territory committed to the protection and good faith of the Empire shall be permitted to collect, enroll, and lead German forces, whether cavalry or infantry, in the manner of a commander, master of cavalry, or captain. But if one or more foreign commanders and commissioners attempt the contrary within the Empire, every endeavor of theirs must be removed and prevented both by the general governors of the circles and by Us Ourselves whenever necessity demands it. Meanwhile, the magistrate to whom they are subject shall also take notice and establish punishment against any who, contrary to Our constitutions and those of the Empire, give their names to foreign commanders and commissioners, whether moved by a legal action brought against them or by his office. They shall never thereafter be tolerated among the number of German soldiers.

II.

The German forces and all others who are enrolled by foreign rulers and serve for annual pay shall specifically except in their letters of enlistment that they are never willing to take up arms against the Holy German Empire, their dear fatherland, or any nation thereof, whether those arms are to be taken up for offense or for defense. Indeed, let them testify beforehand that they give themselves to military service chiefly from zeal for its safety and love of its preservation, and that they will resist it in no manner whatsoever, whatever foreign princes may at last propose and prescribe to them.

III.

The German soldier, and the commanders and masters who govern him, while they serve under foreign rulers, shall observe the military order and discipline already related--

ANNOTATION OF CERTAIN ARTICLES ANNEXED TO THE FOREGOING -- CONTINUED

III.

--and shall establish and maintain it in conformity with the laws constituted by Us and the Empire, and, in addition, with the equestrian law and the articles already set down.

IV.

But if any one of the commanders, masters of cavalry, captains, or others who hold offices either among the cavalry or among the infantry--and, speaking universally, if any one of the soldiers--while they serve foreign princes should commit an offense against these laws of Ours and of the Empire, against the laws of the cavalry, and against the articles set down above, by departing from military order and discipline, or should in another manner impair his reputation and good name; and especially if leaders of ranks should deal perfidiously and unjustly with the soldiers subject to them, whether by the circumventions of enemies or by fraudulent devices, whether in relation to provisions or to clothing, or even by imposing unsuitable arms upon approved men, or by defrauding them, in whatever ways this can be done, of their pay and of the protection owed them against enemies: although all such men may have departed from that place unpunished, nevertheless let the ordinary magistrate to whom they are subject, as soon as he learns of it, summon them to judgment and inflict punishments upon them, whether moved by his office or by an action brought by someone. And if in any place a magistrate should be lacking, while the manifest deed demands punishment, it will be Ours--as those who wield the supreme power over affairs--to take cognizance of the cause, either by virtue of Our office or because a complaint is brought before Us, and, in accordance with Our constitutions and those of the Empire, the laws of the cavalry, and the articles, to establish and pronounce an equitable punishment against the guilty man.

V.

And because, in order to forestall losses and injuries of every kind, the matter altogether seems to demand good order--namely, that the companies under the standards be furnished with and consist of soldiers as thoroughly trained and experienced as possible, and also of a suitable equipment of arms, but especially of distinguished firearm troops, whose skill and valor are altogether of very great importance in these times of ours, when foreign nations in particular are instructed and trained in this kind of military service--it has therefore been established that under each standard there be four hundred men, and among these one hundred exceptionally well armed with long pikes, each of whom is to be furnished with a shorter firearm. Of this hundred, let the men be armored to half their bodies; those, namely, whose pay rises above eight florins are to march as heavy troops in full armor with completely mailed sleeves. In addition, let there be fifty veteran and thoroughly trained soldiers, who themselves are to carry their armor both for closely attending the standard and for whatever other use occasion may offer; besides broadswords and other shorter weapons, such as battle-axes, let each also carry a smaller flintlock firearm suspended from his belt. Let the remaining fifty form a body of common soldiers who carry pikes. All these things shall henceforth be earnestly commended to the commanders and captains at levies and enlistments.

VI.

Let the two hundred who remain be firearm troops, well furnished with siege helmets, swords, and likewise hunting guns equipped with fire-striking flints. Moreover, let them be trained every month and taught to discharge the firearm applied to the cheek. But let every man untrained in or ignorant of skillful shooting be demoted, as a punishment, from the firearm to carrying the pike, and let a man from the common soldiers who appears suitable be substituted in his place, so that both eagerness and spirit may be added to them for learning the art of shooting properly and for advancing in mutual view of one another.

VII.

And because foreign nations are becoming accustomed to use fearsome firearm troops equipped with a double firearm, let each company under a standard establish ten men of this kind.

VIII.

Of the aforesaid firearm troops, let the hundred already mentioned be maintained at five florins per month, fifty at six, forty at seven or eight, and the remaining ten, who are burdened with a double firearm, at ten florins.

IX.

Under each standard let there be at least eight or ten noblemen, or other soldiers of proven valor and singular experience, who, engaged for higher pay and furnished with their own horses--which it will be for them themselves to maintain--shall obey the will and necessity of their commander or captain, but shall serve especially in directing the firearm troops.

And these are the laws of German military service. If they were kept accurately and severely, the Sultan's arms would assuredly not be feared, nor would the ancient military service of the Romans seem worthy of admiration to us. And yet many things are observed excellently. But frequently want of pay, the commanders' dissimulation, the centurions' avarice, and the soldiers' license--especially in civil wars--not only oppress good laws but do not permit even their voice to be heard.

CHAPTER LXI

Victory Must Be Used Seriously, Justly, and Moderately

§1. What Maharbal said to Hannibal--"The gods, clearly, have not given all things to the same man. You know how to conquer, Hannibal; you do not know how to use victory"--has happened to many. The use of victory hung upon a moment no less than the winning of it. The delay of that day is sufficiently believed to have been the salvation of the city and the empire. Thus the Romans believed, as Livy bears witness; and not without reason, for if he had come upon the stricken city, he could easily have occupied it. A victory purchased with much blood is very easily spoiled. Therefore this must be done: they must bring the war to an end, not celebrate a triumph. After the Teutons had been defeated, Marius throughout the whole night terrified their remnants by means of a few of his own men; on the following day he conquered them. Hermocrates the Syracusan provided for the security of his men by introducing fear of a new enemy. Frontinus, book 2, chapter 9: "Hermocrates the Syracusan, after defeating the Athenians in battle, feared that the captives, an immense body of whom he had reduced into his power, would be guarded with too little diligence, because the outcome of the engagement could impel the victors toward feasting and freedom from care. He pretended that the enemy cavalry would come on the following night; by this expectation he brought it about that the watches were kept more attentively than usual." Lucius Martius, a Roman knight, diligently used his first victory. Frontinus, book 2, chapter 10: "Titus Martius, a Roman knight, who commanded the remnants of the army of the two Scipios, when two camps of the Carthaginians lay nearby, separated by a few miles, exhorted his soldiers and attacked the nearer camp in the dead of night. And when he had attacked an enemy disordered by confidence in victory and had not even left any messengers of the disaster, after giving the soldier a very brief time for rest, in the same night he hastily preceded the report of the deed and invaded the other camp of the same men. Thus, twice enjoying a similar outcome and destroying the Carthaginians everywhere, he restored to the Roman people the Spains which had been lost."

§2. Victory, therefore, must be used seriously, successes must be pressed, and the terrified must be pursued. For since even in great battles, as affairs are now conducted, few are killed and the rest easily collect themselves again, a recent victory generally gives more advantage in time than it inflicts damage, especially if the enemy too has inflicted deaths of his own and fortune has a way of returning. Pisistratus and Cimon, Athenian commanders, made outstanding use of victory. Pisistratus the Athenian, says Frontinus, book 4, chapter 7, "when he had intercepted the fleet of the Megarians, by which they had put in at Eleusis by night in order to carry off the Athenian women engaged in the sacred rite of Ceres, and had avenged his own people by inflicting a great slaughter upon them, filled the same ships which he had captured with Athenian soldiers, placing certain matrons, in the garb of captives, where they could be seen. Deceived by this appearance, the Megarians poured forth to meet them as though they were their own men sailing back with success, and, being unarmed, were again overwhelmed." Cimon, commander of the Athenians, after defeating the fleet of the Persians near the island of Cyprus, clothed his own soldiers in the arms of the captives and sailed in the same ships of the barbarians against the enemy in Pamphylia, near the river Eurymedon. Because the Persians recognized both the ships and the appearance of those standing upon them, they took no precaution. Thus, suddenly overwhelmed, they were defeated on the same day in both a naval and a land battle.

§3. As regards the defeated man, he must be treated in such a way that he either does not wish or is not able to rebel--indeed, that he neither wishes nor is able. That he does not wish it must be effected by kindness; that he is not able, by caution. The Romans established their empire in both ways. At the beginning they employed kindness: they received the defeated Tatius with the Sabines into the city. They also brought the Albans into the city together with their wealth, and thus took thought both for themselves and for the defeated, since they brought it about that they had, in place of enemies, friends and most faithful citizens. For afterward there was no distinction between Sabines, Albans, and others; all were Romans. It is not lawful to kill a captive who is not resisting, because when he is captured a pledge is given for his life; otherwise he would have defended himself. It is not lawful to rage against captives, as the Carthaginians did. Nevertheless, the goods of captives pass to the victor. The law is:

τὰ τῶν νικωμένων ἀγαθὰ τῶν νικώντων γίνεσθαι.

All the goods of the defeated pass to the victors. But if the Romans had wished to command that hostages, tributes, levies, and services be imposed upon the defeated, assuredly they would not have held those noble cities in obedience; they would have rebelled either among themselves or together with their neighbors. Afterward, when their power had matured, they did this and were more cruel in victory.

§4. But if it does not please the victors to admit them into the city and to the rights of citizens--as the Romans did when they were more powerful--let them make them allies and subjects. For after the Romans had acquired so many allies and citizens that they feared no other state, they made the defeated tributaries and subjects. In this kind of matter care must be taken that the subjects fare well; for thus the victors will bring it about that they do not fear being oppressed, and this security makes them faithful. Therefore let there be clemency in victory itself, because by the law of nations those who surrender are spared, so that hostility may cease after victory.

§5. A victory obtained in a just war against injury must also be just: it must not be grievous to the innocent; it must be welcome to auxiliaries and not burdensome to neighbors. To extort treasures by tortures, to slaughter the unarmed and those below the age of puberty, and to defile everything with lusts is unjust. The commander will avoid these things with greater care than the enemy's arms, for through them he will lose the fruit of victory.

§6. Let victory be moderate, lest it range about proudly, cruelly, and intemperately. Pride has indeed overthrown very many in the midst of victory itself. Pontius, commander of the Samnites, had conquered the Romans at the Caudine Forks by a stratagem--that is, by the noblest victory, without blood; for he had surrounded them by an encirclement. Although his father had wisely advised him either to dismiss all of them unharmed or to kill all of them, he made them more hostile to himself by provoking them with insult, for he sent them beneath the yoke. In like manner Sesostris, king of the Egyptians, offended the world by the insolence of his victory, when he drove Pharian chariots by the necks of kings, and when in the regions which he had easily occupied he erected carvings of female genitals as a reproach of their cowardice. And so within a short time the kingdom of Egypt fell. A man will be modest if he knows that he was victor by occasion alone and that, through an easy change of occasion, he can be defeated. Polybius speaks truly:

κρατεῖ ἐπὶ πάντων μὲν τῶν ἀνθρωπίνων καιρὸς, μάλιστα δὲ τῶν πολεμικῶν.

In all human affairs, but especially in affairs of war, occasion prevails--often more than valor.

§7. Let cruelty also be absent. Anger against a suppliant enemy is unbecoming; clemency is divine. Those who have not been cruel and savage must be preserved. Machiavelli's counsel is savage, book 3, chapter 31; for although he also approves other means, he nevertheless prefers the destruction of free cities. In On Princes, chapter 5: "When a territory under dominion has by ancient custom been free and its manner of living has been under its own law, a threefold method is offered for retaining your right over it. The first is that you utterly destroy it; the second, that you yourself migrate there to dwell; the last, that, exacting only an annual payment, you permit it to pass its life under its own laws and liberty. You are likewise to establish there a government of a few men who will take care that that dominion is preserved for you in friendship. Since that government has been established there by the prince, it knows that it cannot stand without his friendship and power, and therefore it will consider that all things must be earnestly done by it so that they may preserve that dominion for him. The Spartans and Romans can be examples for us. The Spartans possessed Athens and Thebes and established in them a government of a few, but nevertheless lost them. The Romans determined that Capua, Carthage, and Numantia were to be destroyed, and did not lose them. They wished to retain Greece approximately in the manner of the Spartans and did not abrogate its laws, but it did not answer their wishes, so that, in order to retain it, they were compelled to destroy many cities in that province. Therefore no counsel can be offered by which they may be securely possessed that is safer than destruction. For whoever gains power over a city accustomed to pass its life under its own laws and does not think that it ought to be destroyed should expect that it will destroy him. For at a time of revolt it always has something to which it may flee for refuge--namely, those ancient institutions of its own, which can never be handed over to oblivion either by length of time or by the conferral of benefits; and whatever is done, whatever is foreseen, unless the inhabitants have been drawn apart and dispersed, that name of liberty and those institutions never fall from their minds. At every turn of affairs an immediate return is made to them, just as we have seen done by the Pisans after so many years of that servitude into which the Florentines had driven them."

It is excessively harsh and barbarous to kill men lest they rebel at some time, when there are so many means of averting rebellion, such as migration, the removal of the noblemen, the introduction of colonies, the addition of citadels, and the taking away of arms. Nor is it doubtful that the Romans took the worst counsel for themselves when they destroyed Carthage, Numantia, and Corinth. For besides the fact that they fought against desperate men at the cost of great slaughter, they also diminished their own advantages: with the money and men by which they destroyed those cities, they could have acquired entire kingdoms. Nor was there any other cause than insatiable hatred or the empty glory of a name sought for commanders through the destruction of famous cities. Yet not even thus were they secure against rebellions. Let there be moderation, because victory stood at the distance of one blow: if in one moment he had anticipated you, the enemy sword which received your steel would have lodged in your throat. The pagan poet teaches us beautifully:

> ῥεῖα μὲν γὰρ βριάει, ῥεῖα δὲ βριάοντα χαλέπτει,
>
> ῥεῖα δ᾽ ἀρίζηλον μινύθει καὶ ἄδηλον ἀέξει,
>
> ῥεῖα δέ τ᾽ ἰθύνει σκολιὸν καὶ ἀγήνορα κάρφει
>
> Ζεὺς ὑψιβρεμέτης, ὃς ὑπέρτατα δώματα ναίει.
>
> Easily he exalts, and easily brings down the exalted.
>
> Easily he diminishes the illustrious and increases the obscure.
>
> Easily he straightens the crooked and reduces the proud to nothing-- > high-thundering Jupiter, who inhabits the highest dwellings.
>

The Romans sometimes exercised victory more mercifully according to the character of the commander. Marcellus was mild in victory, as Silius relates in book 14; but such commanders were rare.

When the Ditmarsians, hard pressed by the Holsteiners, had fled into a church and hoped that they would be safe through its sacred character, the Holsteiners attempted, after applying fire, to burn them alive. But the former made a sortie, avenged the victor's impious cruelty, and slew twelve commanders and counts and two thousand men.

§8. Nevertheless, a more severe vengeance is permitted against enemies who are savage and ignorant of human law. David sawed the people of the Ammonites and drove iron carts over them, not without a divine command, because they had deserved punishments of that kind. Otherwise one must deal very gently with those who, as subjects, serve their prince and neither examine the causes of the war nor are able to do so--indeed, even with those who appear to have rebelled. Sthenius had solicited the Mamertines to revolt, and Pompey was considering destroying them. Then Sthenius said: "You do what is not equitable, Magnus, because you prepare to kill so many innocent men on account of me alone, who am guilty." Pompey rewarded this greatness of spirit with the safety both of Sthenius and of the city. How much more savagely did Severus act, who slaughtered indiscriminately all who had stood on Albinus's side, though they pleaded in vain the necessity of the time? Indeed, severity is sometimes commanded. Saul was cast down from his kingdom because he had spared Agag, who deserved death. Because Ahab dismissed a man worthy of death, he was given in place of that man, and his people in place of the Syrian people.

§9. The Romans' disposition in victory was sometimes more peaceable, but for the most part there was excessive cruelty and arrogance. It was ordinary for the defeated to be sold; it was customary for them to be preserved for a triumph--that is, for certain death. Many were also condemned to the gladiatorial school or to the beasts, so that it is no wonder that nations resisted them more fiercely. Otherwise, until the signal for retreat was given, the Romans slaughtered all, even dogs and animals, in order to terrify. But this is a cause for resisting more bravely.

§10. Victor, do not shatter everything; for there is a protection even in disaster. Remember that you are now destroying what is yours.

§11. I also counsel the victor to make peace. If the Carthaginians had listened to Hanno after the victory at Cannae, they would have obtained from the Romans an equitable and honorable peace, far better than that which Hannibal sought from Scipio before the battle. It has happened to many that, having been inexorable when they denied peace amid another's disaster, they were afterward compelled, when fortune had changed, to seek it in vain. There is always a danger that the defeated may join themselves to someone more powerful and stir up a new war.

The defeated are wretched, but their last valor is more violent, because they fight for safety, while the victors fight for honor.

An equitable peace must be given; for no one will observe a harsh and insulting one any longer than is necessary. For who would persuade the Athenians to preserve peace with Minos when they were commanded to give > bodies of their children?

> Each year seven

Peace is most welcome and most lasting when, contrary to expectation, it is given advantageously and unexpectedly to the defeated. For this brings it about that the defeated are drawn onto the victor's side.

Restrain the victors, lest they scatter. A routed battle line has often routed its pursuers. Take care first that you are not conquered, and then that you conquer. When you have conquered, govern your spirit and show that you fought for the sake of peace. Those who cannot flee will fight, and they will either extort the peace denied them or impose their own upon the victor.

CHAPTER LXII

What the Defeated Man Must Do

§1. It is expedient for the victor to accept peace; for the defeated it is necessary. Indeed, it is sometimes advantageous to be defeated, so that men whose ferocity has been broken may learn to endure peace.

§2. Although he has been struck by a great disaster, nevertheless let him retain his spirit--indeed, also his arms: peace is better concluded beneath a shield. The Romans, defeated in three immense battles, to which the disaster in Spain was joined, retained their empire for this reason alone: that they did not fall in spirit. After the battle of Cannae the citizens were conspiring, the allies defected, and Hannibal sold the bankers' stalls. Nevertheless, Roman valor--or Roman fear of Carthaginian cruelty and perfidy--stood firm. By receiving disaster bravely, they made a step toward victory. Barbarians have sometimes imitated that valor. After Avaricum had been taken by assault, Vercingetorix neither failed in spirit nor hid himself in concealment, but moved about before the eyes of his fellow citizens and retained authority and praise amid adversity. Caesar, book 7.

§3. Let the defeated man, therefore, display his former courage and spirit and hope for better things, for the saddest things have passed. The fortune of one hour has accomplished little if the spirit is erect. A man who has often been defeated in battle can be victor in the war.

After the Venetians had been defeated in a very grievous battle by Francesco, Duke of Milan, when almost no one had escaped, within three days they repaired their army and compelled the enemy to seek peace. For Francesco Foscari, their doge, cast money into their midst and admonished all to contribute according to his example; he brought it about that all understood what greatness of spirit could accomplish. Egnatius, book 3, chapter 2.

§4. Defeated, strive with every force, art, and vigilance to spoil the fruit of victory; rouse your heart and discover every kind of honorable stratagem. The victor's freedom from care will furnish an opportunity. Do not pursue only old devices. New ones must always be discovered. Thucydides, book 1:

> ἥκιστα γὰρ πόλεμος ἐπὶ ῥητοῖς χωρεῖ, αὐτὸς δὲ ἀφ᾽ αὑτοῦ τὰ πολλὰ τεχνᾶται πρὸς τὸ παρατυγχάνον.

War can least of all be conducted according to settled prescriptions; of itself it skillfully contrives many things in response to the events which occur.

§5. If the victor commands moderate terms, let them be accepted; if grievous ones, let the defeated commit themselves to a powerful prince as deditícii, men who have surrendered. The Campanians, hard pressed by their neighbors, surrendered themselves to the Romans, and their enemies were destroyed. When the Florentines were being oppressed by Castruccio the Sienese, they received Robert, king of Naples, into their city. The forces of Castruccio, and afterward those of the Sienese too, were worn down.

§6. Draw your arms also. For if, after a great disaster, you trouble the unwary victor by skirmishes and small losses, you recover authority and tear the reputation of his victory. Let necessity remove sloth, for its bites are most grievous when it has been provoked. By whatever art you can, restore Mars in hope of peace. Pompey, defeated in Spain and driven from Italy, did not regard those disasters; defeated at Pharsalia, he sought Egypt. War was renewed in Africa, Spain, Philippi, and Sicily. Antony was afraid and did not renew the war, although he could easily have gathered Egypt and the aid of many nations; instead, he preferred to perish alone.

§7. A defeat is to be concealed as far as possible, but in such a way that remedies are not delayed. Meanwhile, cities must be occupied at the opportune time and fortified, and those who are wavering must be retained in obedience. Forces will never be lacking if you deliberate.

§8. All these things tend toward this: that you enter upon an equitable and entirely unsuspected peace. Such a peace is generally best agreed upon between those who appear equal. Can a prince make peace in such a manner that he compels private persons to remit the losses inflicted upon them? We certainly see it done in this way. Others think restitution should be made at common expense. It is, however, more difficult to make peace than to wage war. The English boast that they have defeated the French in war; they complain that they have been defeated in peace.

§9. Therefore let both the victor grant peace and the defeated accept it, for peace is the end of war. "For so great," says Augustine in books 19, chapters 11 and 12, of The City of God, "is the good of peace that, even among earthly and mortal things, nothing is customarily heard with greater pleasure, nothing is desired with more longing, and, finally, nothing better can be found. If at some time we wish to speak at somewhat greater length about it, we shall not, as I judge, be burdensome to our readers, both on account of the end of this city, concerning which our discourse is, and on account of the very sweetness of peace, which is dear to all. For whoever in any manner observes human affairs and our common nature recognizes with me that, just as there is no one who does not wish to rejoice, so there is no one who does not wish to have peace. Since even those who desire wars desire nothing other than to conquer, they therefore desire to arrive through war at a glorious peace. For what else is victory but the subjection of those who resist? When this has been accomplished, there will be peace. Wars, therefore, are waged with the intention of peace, even by those who endeavor to exercise military valor in commanding and fighting. Hence it is evident that peace is the desirable end of war. For every man, even by waging war, seeks peace, but no one seeks war by making peace. For even those who wish the peace in which they live to be disturbed do not hate peace, but desire that it be changed according to their own judgment. They do not, therefore, wish that there be no peace, but that it be the peace which they wish. Finally, even if they have separated themselves from others through sedition, they do not accomplish what they intend unless they maintain some kind of appearance of peace with the very men who have joined or conspired with them. Accordingly, robbers themselves, in order that they may be enemies of the peace of others more violently and securely, wish to have peace among their associates. But even if one man is so preeminent in strength and so wary of accomplices that he commits himself to no associate, and, laying snares for and prevailing over those upon whom he can, acts as a plunderer after they have been oppressed and killed, he certainly maintains some kind of shadow of peace with those whom he cannot kill and from whom he wishes what he does to lie hidden."

Although that peace is sought as something firm, nevertheless it will not exist without some war or suspicion of war. Injuries and suspicions have altogether filled human life, even the life of friends. "But not even the saints," says Augustine, book 19, chapter 10, of The City of God, "and the faithful worshipers of the one true and supreme God are safe from their deceits and manifold temptation. For in this place of weakness and in evil days even this anxiety is not useless, so that the security where peace is most complete and certain may be sought with more fervent desire."

Let us therefore aspire to this peace not only through wars but also through the peace of the human city: the most ordered and most concordant fellowship of enjoying God; peace where there is no evil and no contradiction; blessed and full peace; the peace of the Jerusalem above. You, O God, grant it in your strength, with abundance in your towers.

THE END.
