TEN BOOKS OF POLITICS, in which THE FORM, VIRTUES, AND VICES OF THE PERFECT COMMONWEALTH, the education of citizens, laws, ecclesiastical and civil magistracy, and the power of the commonwealth; likewise sedition and war, are treated suitably for common use and life.

BY THE REVEREND FATHER ADAM CONTZEN OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS, Doctor of Theology and Professor of Sacred Letters in the Archiepiscopal Academy of Mainz.

To the most invincible FERDINAND II, August Emperor.

With the permission of the superiors and the privilege of His Sacred Imperial Majesty.

SECOND, ENLARGED EDITION.

At the expense of JOHANN KINCKIUS, bookseller of Cologne, at the sign of the Unicorn. 1629.

Dedicatory Epistle to Ferdinand II -- Part I

[Scan as0003]

TO FERDINAND II, AUGUST EMPEROR, MOST POWERFUL, MOST INVINCIBLE, KING OF GERMANY, HUNGARY, BOHEMIA, DALMATIA, CROATIA, SLAVONIA, ETC.; ARCHDUKE OF AUSTRIA; DUKE OF BURGUNDY, STYRIA, CARINTHIA, CARNIOLA, AND WÜRTTEMBERG, ETC.; COUNT OF TYROL, ETC. ADAM CONTZEN OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS.

Of human works, August Emperor, the greatest and most necessary is government; for the human race cannot subsist without an order of commanding and obeying. Secondly, the prince is the most eminent image of GOD: by a certain intermediate majesty between God and men, he represents the immense majesty of the Divine Being. For this reason he is even called a god, because through the vicegerency of God he is exalted and sacrosanct. The force and dignity of princely government, however, must not be estimated by the display of wealth, the splendor of honors, the breadth of empire, or a retinue of attendants, but by the most profound providence of the wisdom of God and by the immutable decree by which He determined to govern this universe.

Indeed, no one can comprehend by thought and understanding how it happens that so many hundreds of thousands of men--among whom there are few good men, while many are estranged, proud, defiant, and obstinate--are obedient to the command of one man. Why do fortified cities, warlike nations, and the most extensive kingdoms not merely obey one man--even if he is sometimes wise and just, yet often either infirm through age or depraved in morals, and by the condition of nature liable to errors--but also expend, at the command of the ruler, their wealth, which avarice holds with the greatest tenacity, and life itself, which all are eager to retain? So steadfast a judgment concerning the common good by no means arises from the disposition congenitally and individually implanted in each person. For if we consult this disposition, we shall find each man so attached to himself that he places his own advantages and his own preservation before all things. Therefore, in addition to the appetites necessary for his own safety, the Supreme Divine Being has implanted in the mind of every man a will directed toward the common good and toward preserving human society. In all the best men this will is so firm that they consider obedience more important than life. We discern the efficacy of this principle even in the mute elements, and experience it much more clearly in the members of a single body. For, lest the association and communication of worldly things be abolished when their bond has been dissolved and their mutual influence obstructed, and lest this most artfully constructed machine fail anywhere through a gap and a void, all things come to the rescue contrary to their own natural character and inclination: light things tend downward, heavy things upward, while individual members suffer themselves to be burned and cut for the safety of the head. Since, moreover, we see the agreement of all nations, even barbarous ones, and of all ages in honoring and protecting kings, we readily understand that so great a concurrence arises not from opinion, training, and instruction, but from divine ordination.

That consideration of the commonwealth offers us two lessons, which are the solid and necessary foundations of public peace and human society. The prince will rest upon one, and the subject upon the other. The prince understands that he is the bond of so many men and things, and that he possesses over everyone the power which a head possesses over the members. He understands that his safety and honor consist in the health, vigor, and strength of all the members. Just as it has never been heard said that the head hates some one member or oppresses it more than the others, so a prudent and good prince will never allow himself, as a respecter of persons, to permit some of his subjects to be oppressed and harassed by others. Rather, through the golden equality of justice he will render each person, according to his station, unharmed and secure.

The other lesson is prescribed to private persons: let each remember that he is not merely a man, but a member within the great body of the commonwealth and of human society, and that he is such not by laws proposed and enacted by man, but by the divine ordinance which cries into the ears of all: “Let every soul be subject to the higher powers. For there is no power except from God; and those that exist have been ordained by God. Therefore, he who resists the power resists the ordinance of God. But those who resist acquire condemnation for themselves.”

It is a monstrosity if a member rebels against the head. Just as the involuntary movements of the frenzied and the epileptic strike horror into everyone, so in a commonwealth whatever is undertaken against the will of the prince carries danger together with deformity and is the work of a diseased part. Therefore, if anyone contrives to dissolve civil order and its bond by stirring up discord, secession, sedition, or civil war, he acts just as if he were to excite a tumult between the head and the members. He is no less insane than if he were to labor to interchange the positions and stations of the elements and to produce certain voids or intermundane spaces, so that they could not operate by mutual contact and influence. For the order of rulers and subjects in a commonwealth has been strengthened by the decree of the eternal Lawgiver just as firmly as the structure of the elemental world, which always coheres with itself and is nowhere interrupted. The omnipotent hand of the Creator could certainly have made the world in such a way that its individual parts would subsist in isolation, without the conjunction and fellowship of the others, and that within it every man would be sufficient unto himself. But it seemed good otherwise: He willed nothing to be solitary, nothing not to require others; He willed some things to depend upon other things, and all things upon Himself.

This most holy and supremely authentic constitution of the Supreme Divine Being, Most Invincible Emperor, compelled me, while teaching Sacred Letters in the Academy of Mainz, to break silence and write about the whole commonwealth. For after the first articles of faith, ignorance of which no excuse exonerates, it must be impressed upon all souls most forcefully and most frequently that every soul is subject to the higher powers. The present condition of Europe is also such that in no age and in no place has a solid and continual treatment of this doctrine been, or is, more necessary. Unless that doctrine prevails, the disturbances and confusions of political affairs will render the ordering even of other matters almost useless, since peace and concord are supremely consonant with Christian piety.

I am not unaware that the commonwealths of every nation have frequently been agitated by complaints, secessions, seditions, rebellions, and civil wars. For the causes of disturbances have always been avarice, ambition, lusts, and a most unhappy restlessness of the human race, while neither magistrates observe a limit in the exercise of authority nor citizens a limit in liberty; while excessive domination is sought on the one side and excessive license on the other. But this is an evil of every age. I complain of the singular unhappiness of our own age, and particularly of our Europe. For I deny that in any age or place there has been so great an obstinacy against obedience or so great a desire for license and anarchy as that which today disturbs and dashes together the nations of Europe. There were formerly more numerous and more savage seditions; but their causes, although neither just nor lawful, were nevertheless weighty and great, and made those seditions more excusable. For the commands of magistrates were generally harsh, avaricious, insulting, unjust, and cruel, and by them even a moderate people was provoked and inflamed to rebellion. The rebellions stirred up in our age have neither excuse nor pretext.

For the kingdoms of Europe are administered by the most moderate laws. By the oath of every prince, not merely is license restricted, so that a prince cannot do evil, but the liberty of many is also restrained, so that a prince cannot do that for which he was created. Hence all governments are mild and many are exceedingly mild. Yet amid so great a gentleness, equality, and servitude of rulers, the gravest rebellions are stirred up by the freest peoples and by nobles who are almost the masters of their own kings--not through any necessity or advantage, but solely through the intemperance of a liberty made wanton by excessive prosperity--with the ruin of nations and the danger of barbarous servitude, set before their eyes for their destruction. Free cities and magnates, injured by nothing, not even by a word, join in making the disturbances harsher and increasing their strength. They exhaust their citizens, plunder their treasuries, and assist the rebels with resources and counsel, solely from an inability to endure authority and peace. Europe’s misery teaches this through many examples; I shall be content with the most recent, which Your Majesty is experiencing.

In the whole world there are no subjects freer than those who rejected and attacked your August House, Most Powerful Emperor, its gentle scepter, and the waters of Siloah that flow in silence. Let them publish the causes of such great evils, which first recoiled upon them. It was not a bitter exaction of tributes, not shameful lusts, not cruelty, nor any other evil, but suspicions invented and spread among the common people. From these there immediately followed the barbarous slaughter of magistrates, their cause unheard and their defense denied. Some put forward religion as a pretext for their crime; but no violence had been inflicted upon anyone’s conscience, and no nation in Europe possessed greater religious liberty.

Indeed, they themselves sufficiently demonstrated that they had by no means stirred up such great disturbances for the sake of religion. For in those provinces there were Catholics, defenders of the Augsburg Confession, Calvinists, Anabaptists, Arians, atheists, or Epicureans; nevertheless, they elected a Calvinist antiking, who at once, at the beginning, terrified everyone so greatly through iconoclasm that most of those who were not Calvinists despaired of the liberty of their own religion. And now many of their own accord sought to obtain the favor of others through a change and transfer of religion.

It is therefore established that at this time the minds of men are inclined to reject lawful governments, especially the minds of those who, although they desire to be exempt from royal jurisdiction, nevertheless treat their own subjects as chattels. With as much obstinacy as they resist their superiors, they dominate their inferiors just as unrestrainedly. Not a few of them, killed by their own farmers, have paid excessively heavy penalties for the crime of both offenses.

I find two springs and, as it were, sources of so great and dangerous an evil, which, unless it is checked, will someday issue in great disgraces: seditious doctrine and examples. Each evil has grown strong. Pseudo-theologians, under the false appearance of religion, and pseudo-politicians, under the pretext of the public good, go about overthrowing the commonwealth and attacking kings. Each group is assisted by the example of those whose rebellion is judged to have succeeded well.

The doctrine of the pseudo-theologians is the destruction and plague of the commonwealth and of peace. For many, after disturbing ecclesiastical monarchy, expelling archbishops and bishops, and instituting annual or monthly presidents, attempt to introduce the same democracy--or, as they themselves call it, parity--into the commonwealth, so that they themselves may rule in their kingdom like tribunes of the plebs. They are called Puritans, a race of men spread through every corner of Europe to the great destruction of nations. Concerning them there survives a brilliant testimony of the Most Serene King of Britain. Writing a testament for his son in his second book, he pronounces as follows:

“Here in Scotland certain men from the ministry--headlong, fiery, and bold--became so popular with the common people amid this confusion of human and divine affairs that, having tasted the sweetness of dominion, they began to dream of a democratic form of commonwealth for themselves. Elated first by the overthrow of my grandmother and then of my mother--and success certainly flattered them too greatly--and finally having long taken advantage of my years as a ward for the establishment of their democracy, they had already devoured in certain hope the power of tribunes, so that in a popular commonwealth, since they could readily lead the common people wherever they wished, they alone might direct the decisive moments of all affairs.

“Therefore, neither during my years as a ward nor afterward did any sedition occur without the seditious attempting to make these men patrons of their own fury and madness. Frequent calumnies against me were spread in their tribunician assemblies, not because I had committed some crime, but because I was king, which was regarded as worse than every crime. And because shame prevented them from openly professing this cause of their hatred, they carefully investigated my life and morals, magnifying even the smallest errors without limit and seizing even false rumors for calumny. Although they wished it to seem that they distinguished blame from office and vice from the man, the mask nevertheless sometimes fell from them unawares, and they betrayed by their own evidence the designs which they concealed with such great diligence: namely, that all kings and princes are enemies of the liberty of the Church and do not bear the yoke of Christ with equanimity. With the wholesomeness of this doctrine they fed their flocks.

“But because learned and upright men from the ministry, ashamed of this rashness and audacity, endeavored to recall the rash to prudence and the disorderly to moderation, and to correct the unsound in mind no less by example than by speech, the factious men then placed the one defense of their fury in parity. Relying upon it, wicked, audacious, and ignorant men might refute the pious, wise, and moderate. This parity is the mother of confusion and the enemy of unity, which is the parent of order. If an arrangement of this kind prevailed in the commonwealth just as it did in the Church, it would be more certain than certainty itself that all things must be thrown into confusion.

“If you love both, drive this plague from each--the Puritans, I mean--whom you can neither bind by benefits, make faithful by oath, nor constrain by promises; ambitious without measure, slanderous without cause, and breathing nothing except seditions and calumnies; men for whom there is one rule of conscience, not the authority of the divine word, but the vanity of their own inventions. I call that great God to witness--and it is not lawful for one composing a testament to lie--that greater ingratitude or treachery can never be found among our Highland or Border robbers than among these fanatical scoundrels. Nor, if you have determined to live in peace, permit them to enjoy the same country with you, unless perhaps for the sake of testing your patience, as Socrates lived with Xanthippe.”

Whatever the mind dares to say or suspect concerning the Puritans is less than what that Most Serene King publicly judged in the same kingdom while those very men were still alive. From British, French, Belgic, and German practice, under the shadow of an imaginary king, they contrived a true confusion of all things: headlong, audacious, fiery, popular with the common people, dreaming of dominion, leading the people about, patrons in every sedition, among whom it was regarded as worse than every crime for you to be a king. These things are of such a kind that they alone can persuade a people eager for changes that government by the people is better than monarchy.

The pseudo-politicians nevertheless join them, and add oil to the furnace; that is, they add the appearance of the public good to superstition. This is their opinion: that cities do not flourish under kings; that talents and virtues are not held in esteem; and that everything depends upon liberty. I dispute against them in the work itself; for now, I disclose the sources of the evil. Aided by seditious theologians, when these men have crept into the mastership of a tribe, a council, a syndicship, or some other office, they first court the favor of the people, bring the magistracy into hatred and contempt, and, if fortune accommodates itself to their undertakings, cast it down from its height. In the council and in the assembly they proclaim that crimes are advantageous--the very crimes which bloodthirsty theologians had taught in the churches to be religious. Thus, with two bellows, superstition and the hope of private advantage, they drive the people into crime; then, when the people have been imbued with the contagion of wickedness, they employ them for profit until they involve them in utter destruction. For the people spend more upon these men in one half-year than upon their lawful lords in an entire decade.

The other origin of the evil is the example of those who are considered fortunate as a result of rebellion. This is the greatest enticement: when theologians have suppressed conscience and the religious obligation of an oath, politicians display a little gain, if they can show that those who have deserted their own prince flourish and are powerful. Moreover, the successful outcome of one nation does more to inflame the minds of fools than the examples of ten nations which perished through rebellion avail to deter them. So much concerning doctrine that corrupts the commonwealth. It is permissible to speak freely and confidently about it, since the books stand publicly available. I shall speak more briefly about the other means by which monarchies are attacked--namely, the vaunting of aristocratic and democratic happiness--because the matter is so clear that whatever is said in words is more obscure than what shines forth in the facts.

The Most Serene King of England complains of both in his book The True Law of Free Monarchies. For he says that the error of the common people, proceeding from those who wished to be regarded as teachers of wisdom, brought destruction upon the most flourishing commonwealths and fear upon the others. He then says that rebellions have been established by example: “Impiety, caressed by fortune, which has not seldom granted a prosperous outcome to seditions stirred up against kings, has confirmed very many in this error.”

Machiavelli asserts--and I dispute against him in the first book--that no commonwealths flourish except free ones and that monarchies are destructive to cities. Very many who followed in his footsteps so extol the resources and happiness of those who passed from royal government into another form of commonwealth that they invite everyone to imitate them. My concern is with their orators, historians, and writers; I neither assume judgment over the commonwealth itself nor make another’s lawsuit my own.

The confederated Belgic provinces stand before us. Their advocates praise them in such a way that they attempt to entice kingdoms and nations into mutual alliances and into fellowship with what they present as a most powerful nation. They say that this small corner of Europe, contending with the Ocean, has grown through its assumption of liberty to such power that its strength must either be envied or feared by kings. They call its Estates most illustrious and most powerful; they immeasurably exalt everything belonging to them and disparage that of others. Not only books and speeches serve as examples of this, but also the lofty airs of merchants and agents in public affairs, who admire their own things and despise those of others.

Philipp Clüver dedicates his Ancient Germany to the Estates. He enumerates the first and greatest reason in this way: "Because YOU ALONE NOW, together with your neighbors and confederates, preserve with the greatest praise and glory the renown of the German name--most celebrated in Roman as well as Greek monuments from the most ancient times because of its immeasurable zeal for ancestral liberty and its most courageous defense--by those same deeds by which your ancestors once preserved it diligently, with the highest praise and glory, throughout the whole world among all nations, peoples, and kings." Behold how royally he speaks! He thinks that his own countrymen ALONE ARE NOW Germans, while the others are either shadows or barbarians.

All their writers and merchants speak in accordance with that opinion, so that in many places the common people have now been thoroughly persuaded that their power is supreme, their resources infinite, and that alliance with them will render everyone invincible. Hence arise new hopes and new counsels, and in certain parts of Europe a desire to change the commonwealth that is as dreadful as it is calamitous. Hence we have seen civil wars raging with barbarous hatred, slaughters, and examples of bestial cruelty in many places, while through right and wrong men inflame themselves to obtain the power which they admire among their neighbors. In my treatise I shall teach, from the judgments of the most excellent men and from the custom and experience of every age, that very many are deceived by this doctrine and these examples.

As for the Batavian Estates, whose happiness appears to incite others to daring, the contrary judgments of two men make me doubtful: those of the Most Serene King of Great Britain and of Barnevelt--two men, I say, in one of whom there is royal authority, and in the other the fullest knowledge of that commonwealth. The king's judgment was delivered in a public speech in the year 1609 at the assembly of the kingdom, first to the minds of all and afterward to print. He addresses his Scots in this way:

"As for the confederated provinces, there, certainly, after the recent truce and our peace with the Spaniard, with all human and divine things confused together, the order of the commonwealth has almost passed into anarchy; nor has this occurred without the direction of heavenly Justice. For those who received our schismatics, men devoted to their own opinions and turned away from the unity of our Church, and who opened, as it were, an asylum to all the hydras of religions, have now, from so manifold a contagion, been brought to such a point that they can scarcely say what religion they themselves defend. Thus they have now become men of no party and enemies to one another, although previously they could easily have been held together with us in the same communion of sacred rites and peace."

Anyone can readily understand Barnevelt's opinion from the Apology published by him. He complains that in 1586 he found the order inverted; that the governors of the cities were ill-disposed toward the Estates; that many preachers did not acknowledge the States; that the common people were alienated; that twelve per hundred was paid in interest and two coins to the brokers; that Leicester possessed greater authority than the States; that the burdens were greater than the revenues; that the people and the city magistrates desired peace; and that much money had been granted by the kings of France and Britain, yet matters had nevertheless come to such a point that the burdens of expenditure exceeded every kind of revenue and contribution, however greatly increased, by twenty-six million. Finally, everything had grown to such an extent that the treasurers reported that the expenses could not be sustained and that the country would be reduced to desperation; for this reason he had become an advocate of a truce. If that old man spoke these things among his own countrymen and among men acquainted with the facts as truthfully as he did confidently, he makes the happiness of that commonwealth highly suspect to me. Although neighboring kings had given it more than twenty-five million pounds, it had nevertheless burdened its citizens so greatly that

Holland and West Friesland, which at the beginning contributed scarcely 1,800,000 florins, were by the end compelled to pay 4,000,000 pounds and a further two million, and nevertheless to incur debt. For he himself professes all these things.

To maintain the commonwealth steadfastly against so many disadvantages and to bring back onto the path men drawn elsewhere either by superstition or by the hope of advantages is most difficult. This was what I proposed to do when I undertook the subject of politics. Many did this before me, and while I revere most of their splendid statements, I find three deviations and, as it were, rocks against which they strike in such a way that some injure the commonwealth through wickedness, others through excessive attachment, and still others through imprudence.

Those who through wickedness make the prince crafty, cunning, secretive, suspicious, and malevolent overthrow him. While ordering him to be cautious and afraid, they instruct him to confine his subjects like enclosed wild beasts. When subjects read such books, they become indignant; and when they endeavor to fortify themselves in opposition, rebellions are stirred up. Others contend so fiercely out of excessive attachment to their own form and the ideal which they have conceived that they despise all others. Someone born in a democracy thinks that the world will collapse unless the consuls come from the lowest common people. If his country is governed aristocratically, he scarcely regards those who lack a pedigree as human beings. I recently saw a British writer who attempted to prove that every nation not governed by royal command departs from natural law. Although the writings of these men commend one form of commonwealth, they are nevertheless destructive in other states.

Very many fall through imprudence. They labor at censuring the vices of princes and devote themselves wholly to prescribing laws, but do not instruct subjects to obey, although governing rightly matters little unless the man who commands right things is obeyed. Having therefore embraced all these matters briefly, Most Invincible

Emperor, I address and dedicate them to Your Majesty, not so that they may benefit you, but so that, through the title of your August Majesty, they may be recommended to the noble youth, who must be imbued from their tender years with the best and most salutary precepts of politics, so that they may someday be able to govern the commonwealth in the part entrusted to them. No one doubts that a political work is owed to Your Majesty, who is placed upon the highest summit of the world, since we behold expressed in you the model of the best emperor.

There are two principal virtues in a king: Piety and Justice. Prosperity in affairs follows Piety; the love and fidelity of subjects follow Justice. Not only your subjects but even your enemies have very frequently praised your Piety. It joins kings to God, so that they depend upon God, refer everything to God, and make their majesty a servant for extending His worship. They owe God a twofold worship: first because they are Christians, and second because they are kings. They pursue good things and avoid evil things because they are Christians; they command good things and prohibit evil things because they are kings.

When you entered upon this royal path of reigning, God attended you with His aid and protection. For He deposited with you pledges of His benevolence so great that nowhere are their equals found, and so singular that very few similar ones are discovered. While you were still an archduke, powerful and wealthy enemies with a great army suddenly attacked you when you were unprepared, and stubbornly continued the war they had begun even at an unsuitable season of the year. In this unexpected circumstance you by no means lost heart. You entrusted your cause to the just and omnipotent right hand of the Divine Being and requested aid. He gave it; He did not delay when you had been placed in straits, nor did He merely extricate you from the war, but, while the threat of doom still stood and dangers sounded around you, He raised you, not yet secure at home, to the kingdom of Bohemia. This appeared all the more wonderful the more manifestly the conflict between your enemies and the divine counsel appeared.

They were endeavoring to crush your fortune so that you might never gain access to your hereditary kingdoms and provinces. But the Inhabitant of Heaven, your protector, exalted your head and moved the nobles of Bohemia to crown you king while you were entangled in a serious war, amid the danger both of the war and of your rivals. This was an entirely new event, and scarcely is any such recorded in history: that those who could have delayed the business and remained spectators should wish to involve themselves in the contagion, expense, and danger of another's war. But God willed it to occur at a dangerous time, both to raise you by so immediate a benefit and to show your enemies that they were kicking against the goad. When the war had at last been quieted, the Hungarians sought the King of Bohemia as their king. That assembly was plainly agitated by great disturbances when, behold, amid the commotion of affairs, sorrowful news arrived from Bohemia: the nobles had cast off their fidelity, violated the magistracy, and were preparing arms with great determination. Secretly and openly, by deceit and by force, they were attempting to drive the Hungarians into fellowship with their most abominable crime. Certainly no one thought that the Hungarians would persevere in their design when they saw that, if they crowned as king one whom they knew would pursue his right by war, they would have to undertake war against their neighbors. Yet, moved not at all by the defection of others, they raised you through the very waves, while God held the helm, and placed you upon the high throne.

Nor was this the end of the dangers through which both the constancy of Your Majesty and the benevolence of the eternal Majesty toward you were to become renowned. Bohemia and its neighboring provinces had defected; Hungary was suddenly being inundated as if by a torrent; Austria was wavering; the hereditary dominions were being solicited; and the whole barbarian world was being stirred up against you. Yet the insolence and taunts of the enemy were more grievous than all these things. But God, the protector of kings and the vindicator of right and equity, reduced such turbulent counsels and so manifold a power to nothing and made your dangers glorious for you.

For while you were being pressed by war in Hungary and Bohemia, while threats were being cast from Batavia and Britain, and all Germany was held suspended in the greatest fear of the outcome, the Prince-Electors, following the direction of God and trusting in your virtue, by unanimous consent and every vote constituted you August Emperor and lord of affairs. When you had been adorned with the diadem and insignia of the Empire, they bound their fidelity by oath. They did this with as much resolution as if all those kingdoms and magnates had sought the imperial office for you through embassies. Not only did those whose judgment of your virtue was true and whose benevolence and respect were constant elect you by agreement, but even the man who accepted the election of the Bohemians was not permitted by God to deny you his vote--a wholly singular and distinguished proof of divine favor.

Nothing customarily appears more wonderful to me than that wretched vacillation of your enemies in their counsels. At the time when they could have harmed you very greatly with little or no labor, their mouths were constrained by bit and bridle, and they themselves were brought to do that which the divine hand had decreed should be done. When their strength had now been broken and yours made firmer, He permitted them freer reins, lest what they had intended should remain hidden. For what the Hungarians could have done while you were entangled in the Bohemian wars is evident from what they did afterward, when they set rivals against you and rebelled against you as though against a foreigner.

How wonderful it is that the Hungarians and others changed neither their fidelity nor their votes at the report of the Bohemian defection! Yet that transition certainly offered a favorable opportunity for changing the state of affairs without danger. Indeed, it is also a distinguished proof of divine kindness that they could neither postpone nor obstruct the assembly of the Empire by evasion or tumult. Instead, forgetful of all their stratagems, they armed you with the supreme authority and power of the Empire, so that it might be evident to the whole world that they were waging not only unjust wars against an innocent man but also impious wars against their own lord and emperor. Finally, your Helper adorned all those events with the distinguished victory for which the whole world congratulates you, and demonstrated that His gifts are without repentance. Behold for yourself the fruit of Piety, which possesses the fruit of the life which now is and of that which is to come.

The other imperial virtue is Justice, for the preservation of which the prince is appointed. The other virtues are personal; Justice belongs to others. Justice has been entrusted to the good faith of the prince; contempt for it is the plague of the state. This was the virtue that reconciled the minds of all to you. I am silent for now concerning the care for right and equity which you displayed in the causes of private persons--a care so great that no one complained against your tribunal, and that even those who did not love your Religion sought you as their prince and as the patron of Justice.

It is a distinguished trophy of Justice, and one pleasing to all Europe, that you preferred to submit the cause of your position and kingdoms to adjudication rather than to conduct it by war and shed blood. Therefore, we see that your cause has been approved not only by most of the princes of the Empire, but even by foreigners--the Frenchman, the Pole, the Dane, and the Swede--and indeed by the father-in-law of your enemy, who refused, by a destructive precedent dangerous even to himself, to raise his son-in-law into another man's kingdom.

Your faithful subjects have declared their love toward you sufficiently and more than sufficiently. Although deceived and oppressed by garrisons, as soon as they were able they surrendered themselves to your commanders. Indeed, the farmers, whose judgment concerning a just and equitable prince is more sincere and whose love is most uncorrupted, joined you as soon as they perceived the assistance of your armies. They killed many who were unfaithful to you and oppressive to themselves; they did not permit the opposing soldiers, whom the anger of the victor had spared, to depart unharmed. When victory had been won, adherents of the Augsburg Confession triumphed no less than Catholics, because they perceived that they too had been liberated from Calvinist tyranny.

Therefore, with a great spirit protect and restore Justice. The greatest part of mankind is a friend to Justice; bound by love of you and by your benefaction, it will fortify your Empire under God. In this multitude I too pray for prosperity for you, and daily I pray: "O Lord, save the King." But you: "Gird your sword upon your thigh, O Most Powerful. You have loved justice and hated iniquity; therefore God, your God, has anointed you with the oil of gladness above your fellows. For truth and meekness and justice, your right hand will lead you wonderfully." Proceed therefore prosperously and reign. This is my prayer and the prayer of all who love true peace and justice.

At Mainz, in the year 1620, on the seventeenth day of December, on which, amid public rejoicing over the recovery of Bohemia, the Most Reverend and Most Illustrious Johann Schweikhard, Archbishop of the Holy See of Mainz, your Archchancellor throughout Germany and Electoral Prince, gave thanks with his subjects to GOD MOST GOOD, MOST GREAT, congratulated Your Majesty, and pronounced new vows for your safety and that of the whole Empire.

Authorization of the Most Reverend Lord Stephan Weber

[Scan as0017]

AUTHORIZATION OF THE MOST REVEREND LORD, LORD STEPHAN WEBER, BISHOP OF MYSIA, SUFFRAGAN OF THE MOST REVEREND AND MOST ILLUSTRIOUS ARCHBISHOP OF MAINZ, DOCTOR OF SACRED THEOLOGY AND CENSOR OF BOOKS.

The ten books of the Politics, composed by the Reverend Father Adam Contzen, priest of the Society of JESUS and Doctor and Ordinary Professor in our fostering Academy of Mainz, and examined and approved by theologians of the same faculty and by others, have been presented to us. We therefore permit them to be committed to print for the common benefit. Since in these books the author discusses the constitution, causes, end, laws, magistrates, and power of the whole commonwealth, and even seditions and wars; and since he demonstrates the rule and method of administering the commonwealth successfully, both from Divine Letters, sacred Councils, the writings of the Fathers, and the decrees of Theology and the Canons, and from natural reason, civil law, the ordinances and deeds of princes, the customs of kingdoms, and examples from ancient and recent history, we trust that they will be useful alike to private persons and to those placed in magistracy. At Mainz, in the year 1621, on the sixth day of May.

Stephan Weber, Bishop of Mysia and Suffragan of Mainz, named above, has signed in attestation.

Approval

I, JOHANN COPPERUS, Provincial of the Society of JESUS on the Rhine, by the authority granted to me by our Very Reverend Father MUTIO VITELLESCHI, Superior General of our Society, permit these ten books of the Politics, composed by Father ADAM CONTZEN, theologian of our Society, and read and approved by the theologians appointed for that purpose, to be committed to print. At Mainz, on the twenty-second day of April, in the year 1620.

Johann Copperus.

Imperial Privilege

Since, by a decree of His Sacred Imperial Majesty, all and singular printers and booksellers, and others engaged in any trade in books whatsoever, are seriously and firmly prohibited from daring or presuming, within the boundaries of the Holy Roman Empire and of the kingdoms and hereditary dominions of His Imperial Majesty, to reprint--whether in a similar or another kind of type or format, whether in whole or in part--any books hitherto published by our Fathers or to be published hereafter; to send them to another to be reprinted; or to import, sell, and distribute copies printed elsewhere, secretly or openly, without the judgment and attestation of the aforesaid Fathers: I, Johann Copperus, Provincial Superior of the Society of JESUS throughout the Province of the Rhine, by the authority granted to me for this purpose by our Very Reverend Father General Mutio Vitelleschi, grant to Johann Kinckius, citizen and bookseller of Cologne, authorization to print these ten books of the Politics, composed by Father Adam Contzen, theologian of our Society, and read and approved by the theologians appointed for that purpose. In attestation of these things, we have desired to give him this certificate, signed by our hand and fortified with our seal. At Mainz, on the twenty-second day of April, in the year 1620.

Johann Copperus.

CHAPTER I

Reasons for Writing about the Commonwealth

The Efficient Cause, Matter, Form, and Kinds of the Commonwealth

§ 1. As I undertake to set forth civil doctrine, I am not unaware that an accusation stands prepared against me, and that I must plead a case concerning the very title. For since the envy of the malevolent always opposes honorable endeavors, and in this age--exceedingly fruitful in vices no less than in virtues--no one can either teach rightly or act rightly without the disparagement of many, it ought to seem surprising to no one if, in these disputations, which are liable not only to the judgments, censures, cavillations, and reprehensions of readers and writers, but also, if an error has been committed, to the vengeance of those who reign, we experience harsh judgments and the hostile dispositions of many.

§ 2. There are, however, four things that are placed as obstacles at the very entrance and outset of the work. First, the profession of the religious order to which I have given my name appears altogether to forbid and prohibit the treatment and study of secular affairs. For why do you, to whom the world has been crucified--or ought to have been--set a worldly commonwealth in order? Why do you, who have been crucified to the world (unless you falsely profess religion), while hanging from your cross, fasten laws upon kings and kingdoms? What part can you have in the court, in the council chamber, in tribunals, or even in seditions and wars, when zeal for prayer and the study of the sacred Scriptures ought to have struck every recollection of these things from you?

Secondly, it is a work full of perilous hazard to prescribe not only laws but also counsels to rulers, for good counsels have cost many dearly. How readily offense arises in this matter, even when fault and error are absent, anyone who does not know is never fit to write on politics.

Thirdly, it appears an excessively proud--or, rather, insane--profession to wish to teach the senate, princes, kings, emperors, and pontiffs; for to obey them when they command, and not to write the laws of command, is the part of a good citizen.

Finally, he who has never taken part in any department of the commonwealth, but nevertheless writes counsels and laws concerning the administration of the commonwealth, will never be able to escape the ridicule directed at Phormio of Ephesus. Hannibal judged him the most foolish of all old men because, in the presence of a veteran and a commander of many triumphs, he declaimed about marking out a camp, drawing up a battle line, and engaging in battle. Surely it appears no less foolish if one who has not even been a praetor at Formiae or in the Alps forces upon the rulers of the world--whom education has formed for command, practice has exercised, variety of events has instructed, and age and prudence have confirmed--the method and manner of governing a commonwealth. For if in all arts the greatest distinction comes from practice or from practitioners, and if only by experience is it learned how arduous and how subject to fortune the burden of governing all things is, why do you not consider the persons of your hearers, lest you be laughed at before you are heard? Do you not fear that untimely wisdom may be wearisome to the powerful and a laughingstock to the wise? I, however, do not fear these things at all, nor indeed ought I to fear them. You, whoever you are who will read these things, weigh the reasons with me.

§ 3. In the first place, to treat of the reciprocal duties and obligations of kings, princes, and subjects, and of the government of the whole commonwealth, is not only not foreign to our Society, but is so proper and closely connected to it that it can neither avoid this office nor delegate it to another, provided that it wishes hereafter to persist in the standards of its constitutions and in the footsteps of the Fathers. We interpret Sacred Scripture and the whole of Scholastic Theology both privately and publicly; but Sacred Scripture no less than Scholastic Theology carefully forms the commonwealth, and prescribes not only the duties of peace, but also the method of justly waging or refraining from war.

Nor do we concern ourselves with human judgments where a divine oracle goes before us, which sends kings to priests and theologians. Deuteronomy 17:18: “After he has sat upon the throne of his kingdom, he shall write for himself the Deuteronomy of this law in a volume, receiving a copy from the priests of the Levitical tribe; and he shall have it with him and shall read it all the days of his life, that he may learn to fear the Lord his God and to keep his words and ceremonies, which have been commanded in the law. Nor shall his heart be lifted up in pride above his brethren, nor shall he turn aside to the right hand or to the left, that he himself and his sons may reign for a long time over Israel.”

Therefore, he who explains Scripture ought to institute a disputation concerning the just and unjust law of kingship, such as is set forth at 1 Kings 8:11; and whoever has undertaken the public office of teaching is a debtor not only to private and unwise persons, but also to magistrates and wise persons. But if kings are commanded to hear and to learn, it also belongs to theologians to teach. Concerning kings and their instruction, Wisdom itself pronounces thus, chapter 6:1: “Wisdom is better than strength, and a prudent man than a strong man. Hear therefore, O kings, and understand; learn, O judges of the ends of the earth. Give ear, you who hold multitudes under your sway and take pleasure in the crowds of nations; because--”

“--power has been given to you by the Lord, and might by the Most High, who will inquire into your works and search your thoughts; because, although you were ministers of his kingdom, you did not judge rightly, nor keep the law of justice, nor walk according to the will of God. Terribly and swiftly he will appear to you, because a most severe judgment will be made upon those who rule. For mercy is granted to the lowly, but the powerful shall powerfully suffer torments.”

Therefore, the magistrate must be instructed with great care from the divine writings, so that he may judge the people of God in justice, and God’s poor in judgment; so that he may hope in the Lord, and in the mercy of the Most High may not be moved.

§ 4. Hence it is that God always joined prophets and priests to kings as instructors, admonishers, praisers of deeds rightly done, but fearless censurers of crimes. Samuel was joined to Saul; Nathan to David; Shemaiah to Rehoboam; Ahijah to Jeroboam; Hanani to Baasha; Elijah to Ahab; Elisha to Jehoram; Isaiah to Hezekiah; Jeremiah to Hezekiah’s descendants; and others to others. They delivered precepts concerning the right government of the commonwealth; and although they discharged an extraordinary office of embassy, the diligence of ordinary teachers was not on that account without employment. For they too admonished the magistrate; and when they turned the duty of teaching and reproving into silence or flattery, they were accused and condemned as defendants upon a charge of injured eternal majesty, and heavenly justice required the blood of perishing souls from the hand of the shepherds.

Nor has the instruction of devout theologians ever been lacking to Christian kings. Examine both the writings and the deeds of Saints Athanasius, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Leo, Gregory, Remigius, and others, and you will find that care of the commonwealth was always of chief importance to them. Nor was the mind of the Scholastic theologians different. Their works concerning the commonwealth--and, above all, the work of Saint Thomas Aquinas On the Government of Princes and the commentaries upon Aristotle’s Politics--are in men’s hands. And would that those sincere and Christian expositors, rather than new, detestable, atheistic, Epicurean ones, were offered to the courts of princes.

If, therefore, care for the commonwealth, love of country, and the instruction of princes and subjects are imputed to me as a fault, so many great and holy names must likewise be summoned with me to trial, and prophets, priests, and teachers must be entered among the accused. For it is not just that, in an equal cause, I should be condemned and others acquitted. Nor, when disputing about worldly empires and secular affairs, do I depart from spiritual care and duty, since my purpose is so to order the temporal commonwealth that it may direct earthly good and happiness toward spiritual and heavenly good and happiness. For the aim and end of my undertaking is to show how all human things, private as well as public, are to be directed toward the highest good and ultimate end.

Therefore, just as the Apostle instructs us spiritually when he says (1 Timothy 2:1), "I beseech, first of all, that supplications, prayers, petitions, and thanksgivings be made for all men, for kings and all who are in high station, that we may lead a quiet and tranquil life in all piety and chastity; for this is good and acceptable before God our Savior," so also that doctrine must be judged spiritual by which kings and those invested with high station so restrain, instruct, and draw their subjects by arms, laws, and example that they may lead a quiet and tranquil life in all piety and chastity. And so I can not undeservedly hope that this labor of mine will be good and acceptable before God our Savior, and salutary to all who wish to use it.

§ 5. But if you wish to inspect and weigh the other functions of our Society, you yourself will admit that this study is most consonant with it. In schools, in churches, and in assemblies, almost all of us must treat daily of every kind of duty: all must be instructed, admonished, and strengthened toward virtue and a blessed life; subjects must be taught to obey the magistrate, to acknowledge the right of superiors and their own obligation to obey; magistrates must be admonished to use their right for the preservation of those who obey, not for their own advantages, lest power be a perpetrator of injuries, but rather their banisher and avenger, an armed guardian of what is equitable and honorable.

This care extends more widely than to private persons and embraces public affairs as well, for the household government and morals of private persons also depend upon the right constitution and government of the commonwealth. Certainly, we labor in vain to form tender youths within the walls of schools for prudence, modesty, and piety, if, after they have been released from tutelage, they are swept away into common evils by the violence of public vices. Few cultivate virtue amid public license; many, steadfast for a long time, at last admit its enticements, and finally even perpetrate crimes.

But there will be a proper place for speaking--or, rather, weeping--about this matter. For the present it is enough to understand that, without the best government of the city, without public discipline as the enemy and avenger of vices, the exhortations of religious men possess little strength. For if, in addition to allurements that by their own sweetness cling tenaciously as though with birdlime, there are added the examples of many, impunity, ancestral custom, and public authority that either approves, dissembles, or at least is unequal to the vices, who will deny that the case is lost?

• In § 3, the HTML transcription's datae est a Domino potestas has been read as data est a Domino potestas, an evident error of agreement.

§ 6. If, however, Theology excludes me from civil disputations, I shall return by another road and, by counsels that take a middle course, put myself forward as a professor of History and Philosophy. For I have read histories and expounded them to my hearers so that young men might imbibe civil prudence with agreeable ease. Philosophy, moreover, the banisher of vices and commender of virtues, has a most excellent work: to establish laws, to constitute the order of the commonwealth, and to discover, for the peace, advantage, and happiness of both, an equality between rulers and subjects who are unequal. Which of the ancient philosophers did not discourse upon the commonwealth? Who did not establish laws? So that it may not be necessary to proceed through examples, consider Plato and Plato's disciple Aristotle, who bestowed more labor upon illustrating moral philosophy than upon the subtleties of dialectic or the investigation of the secrets of nature.

What, then, did Aristotle do? He wrote ten books of the Nicomachean Ethics, two books of the Great Ethics, seven books of the Eudemian Ethics, one book On the Virtues, eight books of the Politics, two books of Economics, and one book On Nobility. But perhaps these things are slight. What, however, is more wonderful than that which trustworthy authors relate? Diogenes Laertius, in his catalogue of Aristotle's books, says: "Πολιτειῶν," he says, "πόλεων δυοῖν δεουσῶν ἑξήκοντα καὶ ἑκατόν· καὶ ἰδίᾳ δημοκρατικαί, ὀλιγαρχικαί, ἀριστοκρατικαί, τυραννικαί.” “Constitutions of one hundred and fifty-eight cities, and, separately, democratic, oligarchic, aristocratic, and tyrannical constitutions.” Ammonius, in his Life of Aristotle, says that he accompanied him as far as the Brahmans and there established two hundred and fifty-five constitutions. Indeed, Cicero too testifies in Book V of On Ends that he wrote a very great many works about these matters: “From Aristotle we have learned the customs, institutions, and disciplines of almost all cities, not only of Greece but also of the barbarian world; and from Theophrastus, their laws as well.” And Varro, in Book VI of On the Latin Language, cites Aristotle’s “Νόμιμα βαρβαρικά”--Ordinances of the Barbarians.

All those works have perished; nevertheless, books concerning some of the following are cited, namely, the commonwealths of the Athenians, the Aeginetans, Aetolians, Agrigentines, Ambraciots, Argives, Arcadians, Bottiaeans, Geloans, Delians, Euboeans, Epirotes, Thessalians, Ithacans, Himeraeans, Carians, Corcyraeans, Cians, Cyonians, Cymaeans, Cypriots, Lacedaemonians, Leucadians, Locrians, Massilians, Megarians, Methonaeans, Melians, Naxians, Opuntians, Orchomenians, Samians, the people of Samothrace, Sicyonians, Syracusans, Tarentines, Tegeans, Tenedians, Troezenians, Tyrrhenians, and Phocians. Although these are few, and some of them rather obscure, there is no doubt that he was more industrious concerning the famous and illustrious commonwealths. If, therefore, this was granted to Aristotle as a matter for praise, why should it be imputed to me as a fault?

But if I were even to prepare commentaries upon Aristotle’s Politics itself, young men--and perhaps statesmen--would owe me gratitude, and the examples of weighty authors would defend me: Thomas Aquinas, Jacques Lefèvre, Bernard of Siena, Antonio Montecatini, Ciriaco Strozzi, Denis Lambin, Donato Acciaioli, Guillaume Grégoire, Giovanni da Fabriano, and others. The sectarians too would plead my cause, for Camerarius, Melanchthon, and many others also sweated in this arena. Let that field therefore be free to me as well, and let neither the malevolence of enemies cut off the Society’s opportunity to teach well nor the timidity of friends make it more difficult.

§ 7. But it is dangerous. As though our Society could discharge any office without danger, when it proceeds with perpetual constancy amid continual dangers--on one side surrounded by open enemies, on the other assailed by clandestine rivals, who display friendship in their words and countenance, but in deed and intention are more harmful than manifest enemies by as much as concealed hatreds are stronger than professed ones. Accordingly, no peculiar danger hangs over me in this cause. For there is no fear that my ship will be dashed against a rock if it holds to the course by which so many vessels have hitherto gone and returned unharmed. Nor do I see what I ought to fear, unless perhaps I diminish the power of princes or appear, on the contrary, to speak too harshly against the liberty of peoples. This I shall easily guard against if, walking upon the middle road, I set forth those things that are certain concerning the majesty of princes and the right of the people, and leave to the jurists those that are ambiguous and exposed to calumnies.

§ 8. Nor need I fear the suspicion of pride if I assume for myself the teaching of the commonwealth. For if it is not only permitted to me, but necessary by reason of my office, to speak about Sacred Scripture and heavenly things, why should it be a crime if I speak about earthly things? Kings, princes, and senators of commonwealths certainly need instruction, counsels, and, when they wish too much to be permitted to them, frequent and grave admonitions by which they may be brought back within bounds. The children of magnates are born under no different condition from the children of the poor: just as they are constrained by bodily weakness and mortality, so too are they constrained by ignorance and depraved passions. Look upon empires, and you will perceive the truth. Consider the errors of rulers; consult the deeds done from Julius himself down to Constantine, and from Constantine down to Charlemagne. You will see that some failed in fewer matters, others in more, and most in the most depraved and foulest matters, and that they administered dominion avariciously, cruelly, lustfully, and--what pertains to the present subject--with the greatest folly and without any principle of politics.

If, nevertheless, anyone is indignant that laws should in any manner be written for kings, let him receive these writings of mine as though they had been dictated to the children of princes, magnates, nobles, and senators, a distinguished number of whom our Society instructs in the studies of humane learning and wisdom. Let them read and learn, so that when they have been placed at the helm nothing may be lacking except experience. Although experience can accomplish much, it nevertheless does not suffice by itself, since accurate reasoning and manifold prudence are needed for judging the very things that occur in counsels and affairs to be conducted. Evil princes have experienced conspiracies by their own men and enormous hatreds, whose source and origin was cruelty; but they suspected every other thing, cast the causes upon others, intensified their cruelty as though by that remedy alone they could meet the machinations of their adversaries, and hastened their own destruction.

What, then? Do you dare to write about governing a city when you have never governed one? See how readily I answer the question that appears difficult. Young men sometimes hold the helm of the commonwealth, the unskilled do so on occasion, and all who have ever ruled were at one time inexperienced, because they had only begun their government. God alone has held an eternal dominion without a beginning. If, therefore, you admit an inexperienced man to kingship, why do you remove him from counsel? An unskilled hand certainly applies a remedy with greater danger than an inexperienced mind recommends one; for counsel can be disregarded or corrected, whereas a harmful drug is never administered without the destruction of the sick man.

Next, look around the Christian world and, from the many thousands who serve princes as counselors, count those who have governed a commonwealth or any part of one. When you have driven these men from all courts, you will also be able to deter me from writing. I know for certain that neither Plato, Aristotle, Lipsius, nor others governed a commonwealth. Yet if kings obeyed their counsels, assuredly many kings would consult more prudently for their own safety, longevity, and reputation, and--what is the principal matter--for the welfare of their peoples.

I confess that it is burdensome and almost proud to wish to teach the experienced, and perhaps also dangerous to teach princes; nevertheless, even the greatest pilots are accustomed to be admonished by passengers in great storms. [Cicero, Philippic VII.] That well-known saying is wise: “ἐρέτην χρῆναι πρῶτα γενέσθαι πρὶν πηδαλίοις ἐπιχειρεῖν”--one ought first to be an oarsman before holding the helm. [Aristophanes, Knights.] Yet we know celebrated admirals whose hands were not hardened by the oar. He who is ignorant of the arts does not readily judge concerning them, for while craftsmen labor, certain things spontaneously disclose themselves to them that lie hidden from others. Nevertheless, Fulgentius spoke truly: “An evil life plunges immature old men into Tartarus; a good life conducts mature young men to the kingdom.” [Epistle 2.] This is so not only with respect to the heavenly kingdom, but also to this earthly kingdom, which nevertheless is given both to the good and to the evil. Kingship, accordingly, belongs to young and old alike.

Experience is an excellent teacher, but right reason is a better one. He who has read, heard, and seen many things concerning the commonwealth often judges it better than one who has had experience of it. Isocrates spoke truly: “Πάντας ἀνθρώπους πλείους ἐπιστήμας ἔχειν διὰ τῆς ἀκοῆς ἢ τῆς ὄψεως”--all men have imbibed more branches of knowledge by hearing than by seeing. [Panathenaicus.] Physicians embrace all diseases in their knowledge and cure them by art, although they have felt few diseases, or often none; but those who are tormented by diseases are ignorant of the method of healing. Therefore, one who has not struggled with those evils will also be able to preserve the health of the commonwealth--that is, peace and tranquility--and to allay and restrain its diseases--that is, seditions and wars--provided that he has learned suitable remedies from the sayings and deeds of the wise and has wisely applied them to the commonwealth.

I praise experience, but I prefer reading, history, and knowledge. For who can experience everything? A lifetime is spent in one kingdom, one town, one court, and frequently in one function. A man knows the character of his own prince, his own nation, and his own colleagues; if anyone thinks to transfer these things to others, he will act just as one who wished to practice horsemanship at Venice or seamanship at Nuremberg.

As to Hannibal's judging Phormio mad because he discoursed about war in the presence of a commander, although he himself had never seen a camp and had never heard the sound of a trumpet except at spectacles: Hannibal went astray through self-confidence and Punic pride. Antiochus, who approved of Phormio, judged much better. For how many things could Phormio have taught Hannibal even about war? Namely, that he should not act treacherously; that he should not be cruel toward the conquered and those who had surrendered; that he should make use of victory; that he should not enervate his soldier with Campanian luxuries; that he should not fight Scipio without some advantage of his own; and that he should not cast everything upon the hazard of a single battle.

Finally, it was necessary for one who both wished and was able to conquer the Romans by means of Antiochus's forces to win the king's favor by courtesy, if he shunned flattery. But Hannibal, with barbarian arrogance, alienated from himself a king accustomed to the soft speeches of his own men, and by one witticism delivered the Romans from the greatest dangers. For when the king displayed to him an army splendid in costly clothing and gleaming weapons and asked Hannibal whether he thought these things would be enough for the Romans, he said, "Entirely enough, even if they are exceedingly avaricious." Since by this piece of wit he had mocked the royal equipment, all its commanders, and indeed Antiochus himself, he was held in contempt by those who were indignant; and thus by one witticism he benefited the Romans more than Scipio did with so many legions. But if he had approved those forces, exercised them gradually, and enrolled new soldiers, it would not have been difficult to overthrow the Roman Empire with such resources.

But reason often escapes great men in the greatest affairs, and the principle of true statecraft escapes the most practiced statesmen. This happened altogether to Hannibal, who was acquainted with a popular commonwealth but inexperienced in kingship. For while, as an exile, he dealt with the king with the same liberty as though, as a consul of Carthage, he were contending with a rival senator, he lost a most splendid opportunity to liberate both himself and his country. Nor am I moved by the bulla-wearing crowd who admire the cleverness of his answer and extol Hannibal's experience, when they admit that an experience confined within Carthage alone, as within a narrow lake, could not hold its course upon the ocean and amid the variety of commonwealths and nations. For whatever Hannibal did afterward, he was never able to obtain the power to conduct the war according to his own judgment.

Experience, accordingly, although praiseworthy, is nevertheless always incomplete. It is often found in a commonwealth in which no one is wise and in which, because of the stupidity of the nation, the senate has passed into a proverb. Some call political knowledge and prudence a practical discipline. Besold says that jurisprudence is subordinated to it. Different men have held different views.

And I judge these things sufficient for my defense. But if we weigh in our minds the necessity for these disputations, which the license of our times produces, we shall certainly all understand that I have undertaken this labor rightly, deservedly, and from plain necessity. For at the present time it is not one class of men that overturns commonwealths, but very many, who nevertheless demand to be regarded and called statesmen. Some, without learning and without experience, rely upon their own judgment and devise certain novel and astonishing things. They do less harm for the very reason that they generally collapse in the actual attempt and at its beginnings.

Some cling so closely to the institutions of the ancients that they approve nothing unless it is drawn from the Athenian, Spartan, or Roman commonwealth. They are involved in great errors. For, in the first place, they must necessarily judge all who were born after Augustus to be ignorant of ruling and counseling--and thus even Augustus himself, who changed almost all the ancient statutes, although he generally retained their names and appearance in order to deceive the people. For who does not know what a difference there is between a consul who is Caesar's follower and flatterer and a consul of unimpaired liberty? He, therefore, who directs his mind's eye toward the truth itself will find many things in the commonwealths of the ancients that are scarcely commendable, and very many better things in new kingdoms and cities.

Most men also frequently err in judgment and affection: now they praise this man, now that one, and take sides. Most defend the victors and, as is customary in human affairs, lean toward the fortunate wall. Many, in order to delight and to obtain admiration for their work, prefer to speak and write things that are specious rather than true.

But in the present age there has grown strong--and in many places has almost prevailed--a detestable class of pseudo-statesmen who, in place of a true and legitimate commonwealth, erect a "πονηρόπολιν," that is, a city of impious, ruined, and utterly nefarious men. In the preceding century Niccolò Machiavelli carried the torch before them, with which he scorched many kingdoms. For when he teaches that religion is to be accommodated to dominion, that vices and errors are to be approved for the sake of the kingdom, that utility is to be placed before justice, that factions are to be admitted, and other things of which we shall treat in their proper places, what else does he do than make the prince unjust, impious, crafty, a dissembler, and a hypocrite?

In this matter, indeed, he departs from the ultimate end and therefore builds ruin; and since he is involved in continual error and deprived of divine wisdom, he does not even instruct the prince in human prudence. For he cannot perpetually conceal hypocrisy, since nothing feigned can be lasting; and perfidy and dissimulation, once disclosed, take away trust forever. But no one whom neither his subjects nor his neighbors trust can retain dominion for long.

Against these men, I have resolved to demonstrate the true and solid art and power of ruling: founded upon divine laws, constituted by natural reason, and armed with true prudence, religion, and virtue. Yet I shall do so not from my judgment alone, but from the divine writings, the teachings of the holy Fathers, the laws of legitimate princes, just custom, the order and manner of commonwealths, approved history, examples and reason, and the natural judgment of men. And thus I shall bring forward whatever I judge to pertain to the security and majesty of government, to the tranquility and advantages of subjects, and to the salvation and happiness of all, rulers as well as people.

• All six Greek passages omitted by the HTML have been restored from printed pages 2--4. Contzen's immediately following Latin renderings have been translated in full; no duplicate English renderings have been added.

• In the Diogenes Laertius quotation, the print reads δεουσῶν; the reading is preserved rather than normalized to the δεούσαιν found in some modern editions.

• Contzen excerpts Isocrates with the infinitive ἔχειν; the continuous text of Panathenaicus §150 has the participle ἔχοντας. The wording printed by Contzen is retained.

• πονηρόπολιν is the accusative of a Greek compound meaning a wicked city; Contzen's own following Latin, rendered "that is, a city of impious, ruined, and utterly nefarious men," supplies its translation.

• The HTML's editorial expansion Rempublicarum [(perhaps: Rerum publicarum)] senatores in § 8 has been rendered according to the evident sense, "senators of commonwealths."

CHAPTER II

The Necessity, Utility, and Dignity of Civil Doctrine

§ 1. Certain matters are disputed not because they are doubtful, but for the sake of order. Of this kind is what I am about to say concerning the necessity, utility, and dignity of civil doctrine, which I judge especially necessary among all doctrines. For since human beings are borne by their nature toward society and mutual intercourse, and make use of the benevolence and assistance of other human beings--for God has not permitted the human race universally to live after the manner of the Scythians, the Wagon-Dwellers, or the σποράδων ("scattered") Arabs, although not even that savagery of the barbarians could have existed altogether without government--it was necessary that commonwealths be constituted. Human beings therefore entered into society with one another and established the commonwealth.

Within it, "τῶν ἀρχόντων καὶ ἀρχομένων"--the order and alternation of rulers and subjects--is necessary. This order is so necessary that God preferred to permit power to evil men rather than that human beings should be restrained by no power, and accordingly judged it better that many just men should be subject to one impious man than that they should be subject to no one. But if a polity is necessary, political science is also necessary. For how will either command or obedience be rightly exercised if they are destitute of the prudence required for governing and obeying?

The ruin and happiness of kingdoms generally arise from the error or prudence of the ruler. As Augustine teaches [City of God, Book V, chapter 19], if those who are endowed with true piety and live well have pursued this knowledge of governing peoples, nothing is more fortunate for human affairs than that, through God's mercy, they should possess power.

The difficult dispositions of subjects declare this necessity still more fully, so much so that it is far easier to find a brave man who can conquer an enemy than a prudent man who can govern a citizen. "Δύσκολόν ἐστι τὸ θρέμμα ἄνθρωπος"--man is a difficult and troublesome animal. He can bear neither servitude nor liberty; under a mild government he grows wanton, under a harsh one he becomes exhausted, and under either he rises against his ruler. Or, if his attempt is restrained through fear of a more severe power, he avenges and consoles himself with complaints.

How great an art is therefore needed so that this animal--fierce, proud, changeable, unstable, presumptuous, and equitable toward no one less than toward him whom it is compelled to obey--may walk according to the standard of right; so that so many thousands of human beings may tend toward the same point and, indeed, may attain one and the same best end by such diverse roads? We entrust a field and a vineyard only to an experienced cultivator; no one entrusts himself to a shipmaster ignorant of the sea and its waves; we do not admit even an unskilled flute-player to our banquets. And shall we allow that great ship, carrying so many souls, to be endangered by the ignorance and indolence of one man?

Government, therefore, is necessary, as is knowledge of administering government. This knowledge is more difficult because it is compelled to prescribe the law and measure of life to both good and evil persons. Every good man is governed very easily, but an evil man with the greatest difficulty. Nevertheless, he must be governed, lest he harm the good man, and so that, although he does not cease to be evil, he may nevertheless be unable to do the evils he desires. Here perpetual vigilance is needed, so that the spring of vices may be stopped up and not pour itself forth into shameful deeds; and the matter must be handled with distinguished dexterity and knowledge, so that, if it pours out its poison, the poison may be diverted and flow away with the least possible injury to others.

§ 2. Great and plainly divine is the knowledge of physicians. They so care for the human body--a structure composed of so many and such various members, comprising organs assigned to such contrary functions, veins, arteries, internal organs, muscles, humors, and spirits--that they preserve the analogy, symmetry, and friendly concord of all its parts with all the others. They thereby bring it about that the temperament and constitution of all the parts is agreeable and favorable to them all, and that every member is sustained by every other member.

But in a prince this knowledge is more laborious by as much as the body of the commonwealth is larger and more at variance with itself than the human body; and it is more sublime by as much as it is more worthy to take thought for all than for individuals. The great philosopher, the unhappy teacher of an unhappy Caesar, said prudently: "All this that you see is one; we are members of a great body." It is your task, O prince, to preserve the concord, tranquility, unity, and love of a great body--a free body, of members separated from one another, of members mutually hostile, of members rebelling against their own head, that is, their ruler. How exquisite an art and how enlightened a prudence this requires is taught us by the small number of those who have been able to do it and the multitude of those who have not. If one wished to contend by examples, I should oppose hundreds to every single one. It is a great power of divine ordination that power should exist in the world and that power should be from God, even when it is conferred by good men upon evil men, or upon good men by better men; but it is great rashness to exercise power without the knowledge of governing.

§ 3. When the commonwealth is badly administered, all other things are deprived of their proper ends. For commerce will terminate in frauds and impostures; navigation in piracy; agriculture in disputes; judgments in robberies; military service in brigandage; the liberal arts in idleness; religion in superstition; and sacred rites in bare and empty ceremonies. For a public vice communicates its poison to all the actions of private persons, and the very ornaments of the city are turned toward its destruction. The necessity of this knowledge--and the utility contained within that necessity--has therefore been demonstrated. A few words must now be said concerning its dignity, for nothing sufficient can be said on behalf of that dignity.

§ 4. When we name the knowledge of commanding, we appear to have praised it sufficiently. It is the mistress of all arts, the moderator of all civil actions, the preserver of human society, and the greatest of all human branches of knowledge. Thus judges the most prudent of the philosophers, Aristotle, Politics, Book I, chapter 1: "Since," he says, "we see that every city is a certain society, and that every society has been joined together for the sake of some good--for all men do all things for the sake of that which appears good--it is manifest that all societies tend toward a good as toward some goal; μάλιστα δὲ, καὶ τῷ κυριωτάτῳ πάντων, ἡ πασῶν κυριωτάτη, καὶ πάσας περιέχουσα τὰς ἄλλας. αὕτη δὲ ἐστὶν ἡ καλουμένη πόλις, καὶ ἡ κοινωνία πολιτικὴ"--"but that society which is the chief and mistress of all societies has proposed to itself that good which is most excellent of all; and this is the society that is called a city or commonwealth, or civil society."

The knowledge of establishing and preserving human society must therefore be the most excellent, since it has the public good proposed to itself. Hence divine majesty has surrounded kingship with such splendor and attached so many ornaments to it, in order to show that governing the world is the greatest work. Hence it honors princes with the name of gods, because they are participants in divine power.

But I do not wish to linger longer upon this matter. The restless ambition of many is sufficient even if it is not inflamed by the praise of kingdoms. Would that it endeavored to acquire the knowledge and faculty of commanding before dominions themselves. But we experience that for the most part it happens otherwise. "Τυραννὶς χρῆμα σφαλερόν, πολλοὶ δὲ αὐτῆς ἐρασταὶ εἰσιν"--government is indeed a slippery thing, but it has many lovers. The bright splendor of kingship blinds the eyes with a false brilliance. The beginnings of honor are joyful, while a sick mind is tickled by public congratulation; care and the true heat of labors soon follow. But those who have been deceived praise majesty and government, for, as the disciple of Socrates rightly judged, they see "τὸ μὲν πρόσωπον ἡδύ, τὰ δὲ ἐν δόμοισι λυπηρά"--a flattering frontage and entrance, but miserable things within the house.

§ 5. Eternal majesty, which administers the world without anxiety, will compensate good princes for such immense care, labor, misery, and endurance with the appearance of worldly honor and the reality of supermundane glory. Evil rulers, however, gaping after empty things and content with vanity alone, undertake government--that is, the care of another's welfare--often amid public hatred. It is indeed a miserable but customary thing to undertake so many evils with no fruit, and not even with the hope of any good.

I have also judged that the reader must be admonished of this: in political disputations there cannot and ought not to be that subtle, acute, demonstrative exactitude--ἀκριβολογίαν--which is customarily employed in physics or mathematics. For I have undertaken to instruct a prince not so that he may dispute in the schools, but so that he may govern peoples. Nor, in moral and human affairs, in which equitable moderation--ἐπιείκεια--indulgence, clemency, and often even severity and threats graver than the truth intervene, do the nature of the subject and the method of treatment permit apodictic demonstrations to be employed.

§ 6. Finally, I judge that this too must not be concealed. I do indeed seek the best commonwealth and seek to fortify it with religion, virtues, education, laws, ecclesiastical and civil magistrates, and civil and military power against the internal and external enemy; nevertheless, I do not seek to constitute a Platonic commonwealth. For Plato describes for us a city such as can be wished for, not one that can exist in this world--that is, in this heap of evils and province of wickedness. For I shall institute a discourse not about commonwealths that never have existed and never will exist, but about those that exist or can exist.

I indeed desire a commonwealth in which the best and wisest prince always commands the citizens with love and equity, as a father commands his children; in which good citizens, harmonious among themselves and obedient to the prince, all desire and pursue honorable things. But those commonwealths are in Utopia [printed: Outopia]; I have resolved to treat of our own. I have resolved to instruct commonwealths in which there are a few very good men, many of middling character who are free from vices rather than possessed of virtues, and not a few very bad men who are restrained by fear of the laws alone, so that they are not criminals in public. Neither the rising nor the setting sun has ever seen another and better commonwealth, although it has often seen many worse ones.

Why, therefore, should I indulge in ideals and superfluous speculations by which present goods can neither be defended nor advanced, remedies applied to evils already implanted, nor approaching evils met? Therefore, as Aristotle rightly admonishes in Politics, Book IV, chapter 1, let us consider Τὸν δυνατόν--that which is possible--as the condition of the commonwealth. And if we cannot make it the best, let us nevertheless draw it as far away as possible from the worst. Otherwise, if it were established that such a commonwealth had ever existed, it could also be hoped for now.

What Seneca says in Epistle 90 is not altogether empty: "A world not yet exhausted produced better things." And the poet, the hater and mocker of his own age, says:

> Then, in a new world and beneath a fresh heaven,
> human beings lived otherwise.

And perhaps Plato suspected that so holy a commonwealth had once existed. "οἱ παλαιοὶ," he says, "κρείττονες ἡμῶν, καὶ ἐγγυτέρω θεῶν οἰκοῦντες." (Politics, Book II.) "The ancients were better than we are and dwelt nearer to the gods." I shall concede this concerning many, but deny it concerning more. I remember that the inheritance of the world was too narrow for two brothers; that afterward arose the wars of the Giants; and that soon the entire human race, with eight souls left as seed, was swallowed by the waters--and that even among these there was Ham the mocker. I remember wars of kings before the very ark and the aged Noah; the fires of Sodom; and the destructions of the Canaanites and Horites. Therefore, vices existed then as well--very many and atrocious vices--and times more criminal than our own. While reading history, I perceive each man to be an accuser of his own times and a praiser of ancient ones. But the cause is surely that we experience our own evils with grief and fear, whereas we read of past evils in order to beguile time.

> Shame, truth, and fidelity have fled;
> into their place have succeeded frauds and deceits.

These three good things have fled, but from those places in which they once existed; for in many places neither shame, truth, nor fidelity ever existed except in very few persons. Therefore, in treating of the commonwealth, I shall so compose my arguments as to establish that many within it are evil; that all the good are in greater danger of becoming evil; that the evil have less hope of becoming good; and that the prince ought to take thought for both.

Some who have professed to transmit the secrets of dominions, under a flattering title, have brought forward nothing except the best-known matters, already long ago written down by Plato and Aristotle. There exists a treatise by Arnold Clapmar On Secrets, but secrets already made public in books and practice. If there is any secret, it is this: to conceal the art of governing. For no one desires to be deceived by artifice and governed in that way, but rather to be directed toward a good end by charity and prudence. The highest thing is piety, and authority is its effect--an authority that cannot be retained if God pours contempt upon the prince.

CHAPTER III

The Definition of the Commonwealth

§ 1. I take the name "commonwealth" in the broadest sense, so that it embraces monarchy, aristocracy, and πολιτείαν properly so called, or government by the people. Nor do I locate the distinction in breadth of command or in the narrow boundaries of kingdoms. For I do not hesitate both to call a small town a commonwealth and to call the ruler of a single city a king.

The Greek expression πολιτεία is not customarily understood in the same way. For it is sometimes used strictly for that form of commonwealth which is popular. Aristotle, Politics, Book IV, chapter 8, calls it "μίξιν ὀλιγαρχίας καὶ δημοκρατίας," a mixture of oligarchy and democracy. And in Politics, Book I, chapter 1: "ὅσοι μὲν οὖν οἴονται πολιτικὸν καὶ βασιλικὸν καὶ οἰκονομικὸν καὶ δεσποτικὸν εἶναι τὸν αὐτὸν οὐ καλῶς λέγουσι." Those who say that the political ruler, the kingly ruler, the household ruler, and the despotic ruler are the same do not speak rightly. For he judges that these differ not only in multitude and fewness, but also in kind. He calls "political" the one who rules and obeys by turns, and "kingly" the one who rules alone and does not obey; yet he says that there is another diversity in the actual government of the commonwealth, and in this way πολιτεία is used strictly.

In other places, however, Aristotle interprets "polity" as every commonwealth. For in Politics, Book III, chapter 14: "ἴσως δὴ καλῶς ἔχει μετὰ τοὺς εἰρημένους λόγους μεταβῆναι, καὶ σκέψασθαι περὶ βασιλείας, φαμὲν γὰρ τῶν ὀρθῶν πολιτειῶν μίαν εἶναι ταύτην." "It will perhaps be right after this discourse to pass to another subject and to treat of kingship. For we say that kingship is one of the well-constituted polities." Indeed, he himself expressed the difference between the meanings in explicit words in Ethics, Book VIII, chapter 1: "Πολιτείας δέ ἐστιν εἴδη τρία, ἴσαι δὲ καὶ παρεκβάσεις, οἷον φθοραὶ τούτων· εἰσὶ δ' αἱ μὲν πολιτεῖαι, βασιλεία τε καὶ ἀριστοκρατία. Τρίτη δὲ, ἡ ἀπὸ τιμημάτων, ἣν τιμοκρατικὴν λέγειν οἰκεῖον φαίνεται, πολιτείαν δὲ αὐτὴν εἰώθασιν οἱ πλεῖστοι καλεῖν." "There are three kinds of polity, and the same number of deviations from them, or corruptions of good polity. The polities are kingship and government by the best; but the third is that which is based upon a property assessment, which it appears should properly be called τιμοκρατικήν; most men have customarily called this one a polity."

There is therefore a twofold polity: the former, which contains three kinds, and the latter, which is the last of the three kinds. I had to give this warning lest a dispute about words be raised against us hereafter. Indeed, the Latins also use the name "state" in this way. Pliny, Book VII: "The Egyptians have a royal state, the Attic people a popular one," and so forth. And Cicero, Book III of On the Laws: "But since the royal kind of state, approved at one time, was afterward rejected not so much because of the faults of kingship as because of those of the king, only the name of king will appear to have been changed; the thing itself will remain, if one man commands all the other magistrates."

§ 2. Aristotle therefore defines πολιτεία, or the commonwealth, in Politics, Book III, chapter 6, in this manner: "ἔστι δὲ πολιτεία πόλεως τάξις τῶν τε ἄλλων ἀρχῶν καὶ μάλιστα τῆς κυρίας πάντων." "A polity or commonwealth is the ordering of a city and of its magistracies, both the others and especially that one which is supreme over all." Plutarch says: "The commonwealth is a certain body fitted together from members, which is animated by the benefit of a divine gift, is moved at the command of the highest equity, and is governed by a certain light of reason."

Scipio in Cicero, as reported by Saint Augustine in City of God, Book II, chapter 21, said that the commonwealth was the property of the people. He determines, however, that a people is not every assemblage of a multitude, but an assemblage united by agreement concerning law and by community of advantage. From this he gathers that there is then a commonwealth--that is, the property of a people--when it is conducted well and justly, whether by one king, by a few of the best men, or by the entire people. The people, however, contains all who are in the commonwealth; for when "the people" is said without qualification, even the king and the senate are reckoned among the people.

This definition is obscure. For a field, walls, a treasury, porticoes, and other things are the property of the people, yet these do not constitute the commonwealth, but are ornaments or aids of the commonwealth. Indeed, debt and similar losses are also things belonging to the people. Next, the people itself is a material part of the commonwealth, since it is called an assemblage; yet the people will not rightly be called the property of the people. But if you prefer to define in the abstract, as they say, the people will be still less a part of the commonwealth.

Justus Lipsius, Book II, chapter 1, defines civil life as "that which we, mingled together, lead in a society of human beings for mutual advantages or use." He names prudence and virtue as its guides--rightly, indeed, lest advantages and use be referred solely to utility and pleasure, but principally to moral goodness. I therefore judge that these definitions differ more in words than in meaning. But because I write not for Stoics or Spartans, but for statesmen and the people, it has seemed good to me to give a definition that contains all the causes, and to give it in the concrete so that it may be readily perceived. A commonwealth, therefore, is an assemblage of human beings, associated by the guidance of nature through agreement concerning law and community of advantage, for the purpose of living well and happily.

§ 3. The efficient cause is a certain guidance and impulse of nature implanted by God; therefore God too is a cause, for the things that are from nature and in nature are referred to God. Hence Aristotle rightly concluded: "διὸ πᾶσα πόλις φύσει ἐστί." "Therefore every city exists by nature." And in Politics, Book I, chapter 2: "From these things, therefore, it is evident that the city must be numbered among those things which exist by nature; that man is by nature a civil animal; and that one who is without a city by the impulse of nature, not by a fault of fortune, is either a wicked man or better than man, like the one against whom this reproach was cast by Homer:

> Ἀφρήτωρ, ἀθέμιστος, ἀνέστιος.
> Without council, without law, without hearth."

Those, therefore, who were μισάνθρωποι, haters of human beings, overwhelmed natural στοργήν, or affection, and its effect by the magnitude of their vices. Such was that petty Greek Timon, and such were tyrants who wished that the whole people had a single neck; who called themselves the scourge of God; and who thought that a slain enemy smelled good, but a slain citizen better. The material cause is an assemblage of human beings: common people, senators, nobles, princes, and kings. I exclude slaves, however, for they are not a part of the commonwealth, but organs and certain animate instruments. Yet because they too are human beings, and often human beings more excellent than their masters, the commonwealth shall also undertake their care and protect them against cruel and injurious masters.

§ 4. The form is the principle of law to which the people has consented--that is, the ordering, through command, of rulers and subjects. From this form arises the threefold commonwealth. From this point it is also apparent that, when that consent is absent, there is no commonwealth, but some other assemblage, such as one of slaves living under the power of some master.

Accordingly, the emperor of the Turks does not possess a commonwealth properly so called. For since he has an absolute right of life and death over his subjects, and even over the supreme commanders of war; since all publicly declare that all their possessions and they themselves have been delivered into the great emperor's ownership as chattels; and since that right is greater and more unrestrained than that of masters over slaves formerly was, there is here no government other than δεσποτικόν, and in no way a civil one. For although he possesses cities, he nevertheless does not rule them by the law of citizens, but by the absolute discretion of domination. Those great cities, therefore, are nothing other than certain more capacious workhouses for slaves; and the great pashas and beylerbeys are like certain household-steward slaves, destined to die at the nod of their master without any protection of law or right.

§ 5. The end is to live well and happily. Aristotle explained this as follows: "The perfect society composed of several villages is a city, which possesses the limit of all αὐταρκείας--that is, which is altogether and perfectly sufficient to itself. It arises, indeed, for the sake of living, but exists and endures for the sake of living well." The end of all things, however, is happiness. When happiness is located in virtue, it produces a good commonwealth; when it is sought in pleasure, riches, and honors, there will indeed be a commonwealth, but one that is vicious, restless, and short-lived, and while it pursues false happiness it will entangle itself in true calamities. It is helpful in this matter to hear a wise slave:

> What of that town which you saw--did it seem fortified to you by a wall?
> P. If its inhabitants are well mannered, I judge it splendidly fortified;
>
> if treachery, embezzlement, and avarice are exiles from the city;
>
> envy is the fourth, ambition the fifth, disparagement the sixth, > perjury the seventh--
>
>
> S. Excellent!
>
> P. negligence the eighth, > injury the ninth, and crime the tenth, the worst thing to encounter.
>
> Unless these are absent from it, a hundredfold wall is too little to preserve its affairs.

I shall seal this with a judgment of Plato: "ἔστιν ἄρα ταὐτό, ὡς ἔοικε, βασιλεὺς, τύραννος, πολιτικὸς, οἰκονόμος, δεσπότης, σώφρων, δίκαιος· καὶ μία τέχνη ἐστί, βασιλικὴ, τυραννικὴ, πολιτικὴ, δεσποτικὴ, δικαιοσύνη, οἰκονομικὴ, σωφροσύνη." "The king, tyrant, statesman, household manager, master, temperate man, and just man therefore appear to be the same; and there is one art: kingly, tyrannical, political, masterly, domestic, justice, and temperance." In a word: he administers a commonwealth with great art who lives and commands temperately and justly.

• All eight Greek passages omitted from the HTML transcription have been restored from the scans of printed pages 6--7. Because Contzen supplies a complete Latin rendering after each passage, no redundant translation directly from the Greek has been added; his Latin renderings remain translated in full.

• The Greek terms retained by the HTML in Beta Code or transliteration have been restored in Greek script as πολιτείαν, πολιτεία, τιμοκρατικήν, μισάνθρωποι, στοργήν, δεσποτικόν, and αὐταρκείας.

• The Aristotle quotation from Politics I.1 ends with the printed λέγουσι, rather than the received λέγουσιν; the printed reading is retained.

• The Homeric quotation is printed without the received closing ἐστιν; Contzen's following Latin likewise renders only the three adjectives, so the shorter printed form is retained.

• In the final quotation (Plato, Rival Lovers 138c), the print has ταὐτό rather than received ταὐτόν and places δικαιοσύνη before οἰκονομική, although the following Latin rendering reverses the latter order. Contzen's printed Greek and his Latin order are preserved in their respective places.

CHAPTER IV

The Material Cause of the Commonwealth

§ 1. A commonwealth is composed of villages or hamlets, villages of households, and a household of spouses: thus nature and experience teach us.

Three classes of human beings are necessary to a commonwealth: farmers, craftsmen, and soldiers. Socrates requires farmers, magistrates, and soldiers. But there can be a commonwealth in which the magistrate is drawn from the farmers. For Cincinnatus was summoned from the plow to the dictatorship, and after his victory the triumphing farmer worked his own land; and when Regulus was conducting affairs exceedingly well in Africa, he obtained from the Roman people a cultivator for his little field, lest he be summoned away from the midst of his victories to his meager little farm. Farmers can therefore hold magistracy, and the same men can be craftsmen and soldiers.

Nevertheless, the principle is different. There is need of few magistrates, for it is enough if every hundredth man presides; but an abundance of craftsmen and soldiers is necessary. It is therefore generally necessary for these to be distinct from farmers, since soldiers must frequently remain far from home and the critical moments of circumstances--at which an enemy must be repelled or attacked--are uncertain.

§ 2. This distinction is required not only in constituted commonwealths but also among barbarians. For both the Garamantes, who lived without a magistrate, and now the Brazilians and inhabitants of Florida divide duties between soldiers and farmers; but because they are naked and armed with clubs and bows, they scarcely need craftsmen.

The ancients did not rightly judge that a commonwealth coalesces from similar persons. For the greater the variety of offices, labors, arts, and conditions, the more abundant and well-equipped the commonwealth is. Aristotle weighed this accurately, as he did other matters, in Politics, Book II, chapter 2, when he said:

> A city not only consists of several human beings, but of those differing in kind; for it cannot consist of similar persons.

For a city is one thing, a συμμαχία, or military alliance, another; since the auxiliaries of several cities form one army from the same class of human beings. But I shall speak of the variety of human beings within a city in its proper place.

§ 3. Since Aristotle defines the city as a composition from villages so populous and well equipped that it possesses πέρας αὐταρκείας, the summit of abundance and, as it were, a horn of plenty by which it is sufficient to itself from itself, prudent men not undeservedly ask concerning what αὐταρκεία, or sufficiency, he appears to be understood.

For if he speaks of the things necessary for food, clothing, defense, and attack, such a commonwealth will be shown nowhere. For, to preserve human society, God willed that some human beings should need the aid of others. Some kingdoms may have been sufficient to themselves in that respect, such as Egypt and Italy; cities were by no means so--not even Sparta, the cultivator of harsh sobriety. For it was necessary for Sparta to seek rowers, money, and engines elsewhere. But in the present time we see that the most powerful and celebrated cities especially need foreign defenses.

Nor will anyone have explained the matter sufficiently if he calls that a city which either possesses sufficiency from itself or possesses suitable strength and means for acquiring it. For wealthy households can do this, and villages much more so. Therefore another sufficiency must be sought by which a city or commonwealth is constituted. For commonwealths are not distinguished from villages by resources, multitude of human beings, or walls, since Sparta was celebrated for poverty, counted no more than two thousand citizens, and did not fortify itself with walls; yet for many years it commanded many very wealthy cities, indeed all Greece, and even Athens itself, "μεγαπόλεσιν Ἀθήναις," the great city.

I therefore define "Αὐτάρκειαν," or sufficiency coalesced from the conjunction of villages, as existing when some nation or assemblage of a people is so associated that, free from every external dominion, it employs an absolute and complete sovereignty and, dependent upon no one, can freely determine concerning itself. For if it is subject to another sovereignty, it will not itself be an integral commonwealth, but a part and accession of another commonwealth, from which it borrows magistrates and laws.

That Aristotle thought and taught thus is evident from Politics, Book III, chapter 1. After he taught that the city is one of the τῶν συγκειμένων, composite things, he says that it must be asked who is a citizen. "For a city," he says, "is a multitude of citizens." He then defines a citizen not by resources or residence, but by "τῷ μετέχειν κρίσεως καὶ ἀρχῆς"--by the fact that he possesses a share in judging and commanding. Finally he decides the entire matter in these words: "ᾧ ἐξουσία κοινωνεῖν ἀρχῆς βουλευτικῆς, ἢ κριτικῆς, πολίτην ἤδη λέγομεν εἶναι· πόλιν δὲ τὸ τῶν τοιούτων πλῆθος ἱκανὸν πρὸς αὐτάρκειαν ζωῆς." "One upon whom the power has been conferred to share in a magistracy concerned with deliberating and judging, we call a citizen of that city; and a city is a multitude of such citizens that possesses the things sufficient for life." For political life, namely, which is discerned in sovereignty over the greatest matter and in liberty dependent upon no one.

A city must therefore be constituted from these persons, and it is called a free commonwealth--whether it is a kingdom, an aristocracy, or a polity strictly so called--if it is endowed from itself and within itself with the power of supreme magistracies and judgments. This is one body moving and nourishing itself, not a part of another body. In this commonwealth, greatness or smallness makes no distinction. For just as the compact and industrious little body of an ant is no less complete in all its parts than the vast bulk of an elephant, so also a small commonwealth can obtain its own perfection and need not yield to immense monarchies in the just ordering and administration of laws and magistrates, if regard is had for the advantage of each and all of the citizens.

For that commonwealth is most flourishing in which individuals flourish. Just as a body is healthy, strong, and beautiful if there is a proper temperament of all the humors, a measure of the members, a symmetry and joining together consonant with nature, and a pleasantness of color, so in a commonwealth the fitting connection of all its parts with one another, and a certain life belonging to law and an integrity of administration, render all persons flourishing, wealthy, peaceful, and happy.

• The HTML's vteres in §2 has been read as the evident veteres ("the ancients").

• All four Greek passages omitted from the HTML transcription have been restored from the scan of printed page 8. Because Contzen supplies a Latin rendering or explanation for each, no redundant translation directly from the Greek has been added; his Latin remains translated in full.

• Greek retained by the HTML in Beta Code or transliteration has been checked against the scan and restored in Greek script as συμμαχία, πέρας αὐταρκείας, αὐταρκεία, and τῶν συγκειμένων.

• The print reads μεγαπόλεσιν Ἀθήναις and gives the gloss "the great city Athens"; the Greek dative plural agrees with the grammatically plural place-name.

• The final Aristotle excerpt is shorter than the commonly received text: the printed Greek omits the words corresponding to "of that city," although Contzen's following Latin rendering includes them. Both the printed Greek and the fuller Latin rendering are retained.

CHAPTER V

That the Commonwealth Is Not From Fate, Chance, or Fortune, but From God

§ 1. By "fate" I mean not divine ordination, foreknowledge, and permission, but that which men wish to depend upon a necessary connection of things, upon the world, and upon the position of the stars, concerning which the eloquent but impious poet exclaims:

> Alas, that the gods have contended as inferiors to the fates.

If some good and orthodox authors use the name of fate while thinking rightly about divine providence and freedom of the will, I do not reprehend their opinion. Nevertheless, I prefer to correct their manner of speaking rather than dispute dangerously on account of the weakness of many. Let them hear the counsel of Augustine, City of God, Book V, chapter 8:

> But as for those who apply the name "fate" not to the constitution of the stars as it exists when each thing is conceived, born, or begun, but to the entire connection and sequence of causes by which everything that happens is brought about, it is not necessary to labor and contend greatly with them in a controversy over a word. For they attribute the very order and a certain connection of causes to the will and power of the supreme God, who is most rightly and truthfully believed both to know all things before they occur and to leave nothing unordered--from whom are all powers, although the wills of all are not from him.

That they call principally the very will of the supreme God--whose power extends invincibly through all things--"fate" is proved thus. These verses, unless I am mistaken, belong to Annaeus Seneca:

> Lead me, highest Father and ruler of lofty heaven,
>
> whithersoever it shall please you; there is no delay in obeying.
>
> I am present, energetic. Make me unwilling: I shall accompany you groaning;
>
> as an evil man I suffer what it was permitted me as a good man to do.
> The fates lead the willing and drag the unwilling.

§ 2. We detest the fate of the astrologers, enclosed within the insuperable force of the stars, and the fate of the Priscillianists, Bardesanists, and others, which is more powerful than almighty God himself. We acknowledge the gentle providence of God, which through intermediate causes orders and permits events according to their capacity and does not wrest their decisions from free wills. Accordingly, we reject these statements which are uttered by the impious with a profane meaning, such as:

> The fates rule the world; all things stand by a fixed law.

> From the origin of the world this day remains fixed > for war, and the peoples were born for battles.
>

>

> Does anyone seem to himself to have so much power
> that he might even overcome the fates?

Unless these statements are softened by a benign interpretation, they cannot be tolerated. The importunity of atheists compels me to dispute at greater length about this matter. For while they revive those fates, long since buried, and lead them out of darkness, they not only entangle kings and commonwealths in the worst arts, but also make them subject to soothsayers, astrologers, and magicians, so that they commit themselves and the commonwealth to the most criminal and ruined of human beings.

Behold a man whom you would deservedly deny to be a Christian and by trusting whom you would lose your kingdom sooner than learn true things. In Book II, chapter 28 of Discourses on Livy, he speaks thus:

> If we contemplate the vicissitude of affairs, we shall discover that many things occur through fate pressing in such a way that no one can go to meet them, although remedies may have been at hand. [Machiavelli devises an impious fate.] And if certain things of this kind happened to the Roman people, among whom virtues of every kind shone forth and the study of religion and especially of military affairs flourished, to whom ought it to appear wonderful if they also befall other commonwealths and provinces in which none of these virtues shine so brightly? Account must therefore be taken especially of those things which appear to occur by fate itself, or the influence of the stars, and which fortune does not permit us to resist. The most evident example of them is that which the Roman people received in the Gallic disaster.

§ 3. He therefore calls the influence of the stars "fate," and a fate from the stars that is inevitable. "I shall pronounce only this," he says, "concerning the powers of fortune and the necessity of fate, which will readily appear to one who runs through histories of every kind: human beings cannot avoid the necessity of fate, but they can produce and advance an easier outcome for the things that hang over them from it, and so weave the webs of the Parcae, but not unweave or break them." And in chapter 25 of his Prince:

> It is not obscure to me that there are, and formerly have been, very many of the opinion that the administration of human affairs is so completely held by fortune and by God himself that it cannot be corrected in any way by human prudence--indeed, that no remedy can be applied. On that account it could be thought that one should not labor much in these matters, but should permit oneself to be borne wherever fortune drives. This opinion has been received with greater conviction in our times because of the manifold transformation of affairs, since changes have always been seen, and are seen daily, beyond every human conjecture that could be formed. When I had sometimes considered this in my mind, I inclined in some part toward that opinion. But lest our free choice be extinguished, I follow this opinion: that one half of our affairs is administered at the discretion of fortune, while the other, or a little less, is left to us to administer. For I am accustomed to compare fortune to a mountain river that lays all things low. When it is borne headlong, it pours into the fields, lays trees low, and tears up houses; carrying away much earth from here, it deposits that same earth elsewhere. It drives all things before it; all things flee from its sight; all things yield to its fury, every means by which it could be restrained having been removed.

Behold, he compares fortune to a mountain river which can be resisted by no force, art, or reason.

My prince, senate, city, and army shall entrust themselves to the one, true, good, and just God. They shall certainly persuade themselves that the wanderings of the stars, or their fixed periods and circuits commanded by God, pertain in no way to them and possess no jurisdiction or efficacy over their own freedom or that of others. Thus they shall neither be cast down in spirit amid evils, mindful that it is God who appoints an end to sorrowful affairs, nor be elated amid prosperity, ignorant of the hidden counsel by which pride is suddenly punished. In this way, by a great and hidden but never unjust efficacy, in a moment that which had long been a forest becomes ashes; at the sound of a trumpet, that which had been a camp becomes a heap of corpses.

Truth compels Machiavelli himself to acknowledge this, either unwillingly or unknowingly. For what does he mean when he says that we can weave the webs of the Parcae? They therefore do not carry things along by the inevitable necessity of the heavens and configurations of the stars, but each man is the craftsman of his own fortune, as the proverb says. For if that necessity has as its causes the positions, aspects, elevations, retrogradations, houses, inclinations, and triangles of the stars, their ἐπισκιάσεις, or overshadowings, their obscurations, obliquities, and the συζυγίας, or conjunctions, that are as vain as they are innumerable and are, as it were, their marriages, it is no more within the power of human beings to weave their own fates than to restrain the most rapid courses of the stars, since the fates fixed to the heavens are drawn along by an immutable and insuperable connection and by adamantine bonds.

Next, how can a human being who is wholly driven by fate produce and advance an easier outcome for those things that hang over him from it? I shall use Machiavelli's examples. He attributes to the inexpugnable necessity of the fates the battle of the three Fabii--who had been sent as legates to compose peace between the people of Clusium and the Gauls--by which they incited the Gauls against the Romans. He imputes Camillus's exile to the same fate, so that the Gauls could not be resisted by so distinguished a commander. Indeed, the stars also brought it about that they did not name a dictator; that the tribunes did not fortify the camp; that they were not mindful of the gods; that they did not draw up the battle line after taking the auspices and obtaining favorable omens; that they did not close Rome; that they did not permit the unarmed multitude to flee; and that they did not destroy Rome. As he thinks, the stars carried these things along by absolute necessity.

In these matters I ask first how either Camillus or Manlius could have produced a better outcome from these fates. For either that better outcome, which he locates in human prudence and caution, was outside the force of fate and the conspiracy of the stars, or it too stood bound by the same chain of necessity beneath the blow of fate and the engine of fortune. If the better outcome was from fate, then the fidelity and industry of Camillus could no more produce and advance it than they could those things which had already happened by fate. If the better outcome was within Camillus's discretion, outside the right and dominion of fate and fortune, why does he not place the remaining things in the same category? For if he liberates some things from fate, by what right does he deliver the others over to the fates?

It belongs to a man of little consideration to ascribe calamities to fate and a better outcome to ourselves. For if calamities occur by an unforeseen and inflexible necessity, we cannot turn them aside in any other direction. For it is as much in the fates that I receive upon my bare breast a blow balanced with a heavy weight as it is in the fates that I be wounded. For if the fates bring disaster, they also keep under number its measured magnitude, manner, and all the critical details of its circumstances. If they strike, they strike by determination; and nothing is now ours except to suffer--although, if he philosophizes consistently with his beginnings, he will assign to the fates even how much and how greatly it hurts. For if the heavens fated a bloody death for Julius Caesar, they also decreed twenty-three wounds: the first from Casca beneath the throat, the second and only fatal one beneath the breast, and the remaining ones lighter. What Machiavelli asserts concerning fate is therefore empty and contrary to his own opinion.

This, as I have shown, belongs to an imprudent man. But his judgment that they were forbidden by fate to be mindful of the gods and to draw up their line after taking the auspices and obtaining favorable omens possesses an impiety peculiar to itself together with its folly. For if he speaks as a defender of fate and an astrologer, what protection could there have been in the gods, since they are inferior in contending with the fates, and since Jupiter himself subjects the prayers and unjust anger of Juno to the fates?

> The fates will find a way, he says.

The auspices, inspections of entrails, disembowelments of wretched cattle, a cleft liver, discolored entrails of victims, birds on the left, and every observation of chance utterances cannot bend the violence of the fates. If, therefore, it was in the fates that the Romans be conquered, no birds and no hecatombs could avert the evil.

If he is a Christian, how does he judge that it came from fate that the battle line was not drawn up after taking the auspices and obtaining favorable omens? If the fates forbade magical consultations, the tripudium solistimum, and the rebounding of food cast from the chicken's greedy mouth, he now ascribes something good to the fates, because it was not glorious to conquer even by such deceptions. But what is his meaning, what is his religion, when he judges the prevention of so many crimes--the chief of which were magic and idolatry--to have been the cause of the disasters and the loss of the city?

You are a Christian, and yet among the causes of the commonwealth's affliction and reduction to extreme straits you also relate this: that they did not seek counsels from a demon, did not offer it nefarious sacrifices, and did not obtain favorable omens? So many armies that despised the gods attained victory while fighting without taking the auspices or obtaining favorable omens. Why, therefore, is this reprehended in the Romans?

But let us dispute that controversy more widely, for it is necessary to ascribe the safety of all kingdoms to God: all things are from God. "All things that are not from God are perverse." Tertullian, On the Apparel of Women. "For God has as his witnesses this whole thing which we are and in which we are." The same Tertullian, Against Marcion, Book I: "He disposes all things that exist by word and reason, and completes them by power." "The safety of human beings is in God's guardianship," said even that man who doubted concerning God, in Book III of On Ends.

Let no king swell with pride. We are all servants, for we have God as Lord. God is the Lord of so many cities and so many kingdoms in which you are worshiped more laboriously than God; he leaves to you their usufruct and their use for an uncertain time. So many peoples serve you; you serve the one God who subjected them to you. There is no more pernicious plague of the commonwealth, no disaster that has more greatly oppressed its vital parts, than when the authority of the magistrate and the majesty of government are broken. Yet the calamity is greater when the prince or commonwealth stands accused of injury to the supreme majesty.

CHAPTER VI

That the Commonwealth Depends Upon God Is Proved by Testimonies of Sacred Scripture

§ 1. This disputation of mine is against atheists, blasphemous deniers of divine providence and benevolence, who judge it harmful to the commonwealth not to have sacrificed to demons. I am not unaware that one ought to fight against them with reason and secular literature rather than with the divine Scriptures. Nevertheless, I have judged that these weapons too must not be omitted; even if they do not wound an enemy who flees them, they will nevertheless weary and terrify him.

My reason is fourfold. First, the consideration will be useful and agreeable to orthodox princes and counselors, and exceedingly efficacious for detesting Machiavellianism. Secondly, it will benefit many whom an ambiguous ἐποχή, or suspension and hesitation, holds between piety and dissimulation. For it is necessary that a Scripture so ancient, so venerable, commended by so many thousands of years, should possess some authority even among unbelievers. Thirdly, there is hidden within the words of God a certain power and efficacy more penetrating than any two-edged sword, which often works conversion even in the hearts of the impious. I judge this to be the reason why the holy Fathers, when disputing against the gentiles, frequently opposed the oracles of the divine writings to their fables. Finally, sacred history, if you join to it the oracles of the prophets, convinces not only the faithful but also the gentiles and atheists that God exists and that all the kingdoms of the earth are in his hand.

I shall therefore use the sacred writings here as well. For whom shall I believe concerning God more than God? [Ambrose, Against Symmachus.] I shall cast the testimonies into three classes. For sometimes God himself is said to govern all things; at other times he is said to give, take away, and transfer kingdoms; and finally, he long ago predicted every change of kingdoms. If, therefore, God takes part in--and indeed presides over--all administrations of all kingdoms; if he declares that he gives and transfers kingdoms; and if he announced the destructions of cities and changes of monarchies long before they occurred, how do not all things depend upon him who created all things, foreknew all things, and was even concerned to disclose all things to his friends the prophets?

§ 2. The whole of Sacred Scripture is occupied in demonstrating that all things depend upon God and that all things are governed at his discretion. What else does the production of things and construction of the world proclaim than an author? The sacrifices of the two brothers teach that he attended to individual things, some of which he regarded and some neglected. He then submerged the crimes of the primeval world beneath avenging waters together with the whole race of human beings, but did not involve the just Noah and his household in the same punishment. How great were the losses the same God inflicted upon the Egyptians? He not only led out and led back the waters of the Red Sea, but afflicted them with frogs, flies, and darkness. No less an artificer in small things than in great ones, he therefore chastised and subdued the pride of an impious nation with the vilest little animals. Consider the slaughter of one night and the one hundred and eighty-five thousand deaths in the Assyrian camp during Hezekiah's reign, and deny that God was then propitious to Israel and hostile to the Assyrians. Let us therefore believe God; he is the best witness concerning his own kingdom.

Deuteronomy 17:20: "Nor shall his heart be lifted up in pride above his brethren, nor shall he turn aside to the right hand or to the left, that he himself and his son may reign for a long time over Israel."

1 Kings 8:7: "But the Lord said to Samuel: Hear the voice of the people in all the things they say to you; for they have not rejected you, but me, that I should not reign over them."

1 Kings 12:12: “But when you saw that Nahash, king of the children of Ammon, had come against you, you said to me: By no means; rather, a king shall command us--although the Lord your God was reigning among you.”

1 Chronicles 29:11: “Yours, O Lord, is magnificence and power and glory and victory, and to you belongs praise; for all things in heaven and on earth are yours. Yours, O Lord, is the kingdom, and you are above all princes. Yours are riches, and yours is glory; you rule over all; in your hand are the greatness and dominion of all.”

Job 34:18: “Who says to a king, ‘Apostate,’ and who calls leaders impious.”

Job 34:24: “He shall break many and innumerable men and make others stand in their place.”

Luke 1:33: “And he shall reign in the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end.”

Isaiah 24:23: “And the moon shall blush and the sun be confounded when the Lord of hosts shall reign upon Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and shall have been glorified in the sight of his elders.”

Ezekiel 20:33: “As I live, says the Lord God, in a strong hand and an outstretched arm and poured-out fury I shall reign over you. And I shall lead you out from the peoples and gather you from the lands in which you have been dispersed; in a mighty hand and an outstretched arm and poured-out fury I shall reign over you.”

Jeremiah 23:5: “Behold, the days come, says the Lord, and I shall raise up for David a just shoot; and a king shall reign, he shall be wise, and he shall execute judgment and justice upon the earth.”

Daniel 4:31: “Therefore, after the end of the days, I, Nebuchadnezzar, lifted my eyes to heaven, and my understanding was restored to me; and I blessed the Most High and praised and glorified him who lives forever, because his power is an everlasting power and his kingdom is unto generation and generation.”

Daniel 4:14: “By the sentence of the watchers the decree was made, and the word and demand of the holy ones, until the living know that the Most High rules in the kingdom of human beings, and shall give it to whomsoever he wills and shall appoint the lowest man over it.”

Psalm 47:9: “Because God is king of all the earth; the Lord shall reign over the nations.”

Psalm 93:1: “The Lord has reigned; he is clothed with beauty.”

Psalm 97:1: “The Lord has reigned; let the earth rejoice.”

Psalm: “The Lord has reigned; let the peoples be angry.”

§ 4. If, therefore, the kingdom is the Lord’s; if it is he who gives power over the nations so that he may rule them with an iron rod [Revelation 2:27 and 19:15]; if weakness does not befall God, he himself is both protector of the kingdom and, when offended, its destroyer. An enemy need not be feared by a prince whose calculations depend upon God, for earthly power is no more capable of casting down than divine guardianship is of raising up. “No human force resists divine forces.” [Cyprian, Book II, Epistle 6.] And Philo truly says well: “Whoever has a covenant with God holds the summit of happiness.”

Let princes therefore hold this: God is the supreme governor. Just as, when God is offended, there is nothing that can support them, so, when God is propitious, no adversity will harm them. For those whom almighty guardianship undertakes to defend cannot be conquered even if they are assailed by the forces of the whole world, because God--with whom they are, and with whom they reign--is unconquered.

§ 5. The same God testifies that he not only reigns and governs dominions, but gives, takes away, increases, and diminishes them.

1 Kings 15:28: “And Samuel said to him: The Lord has torn the kingdom of Israel from you today and has delivered it to your neighbor, who is better than you.”

Wisdom 10:10: “But she led the just man, who was a fugitive from his brother’s wrath, along right ways; and showed him the kingdom of God; and gave him knowledge of holy things; honored him in his labors and completed his labors.”

Wisdom 10:14: “And she did not abandon him in chains until she brought him the scepter of a kingdom and power against those who oppressed him; and she showed those who stained him to be liars and gave him everlasting glory.”

Isaiah 10:10: “As my hand found the kingdoms of the idol, so also their images from Jerusalem and Samaria.”

Isaiah 13:19: “And Babylon, that glorious city among kingdoms, renowned in the pride of the Chaldeans, shall be as when the Lord overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah.”

Isaiah 14:16: “Those who see you shall bend toward you and gaze upon you: Is this the man who troubled the earth, who shook kingdoms, who made the world a desert and destroyed its cities, who did not open the prison to his prisoners?”

Isaiah 60:12: “For the nation and kingdom that will not serve you shall perish, and the nations shall be devastated with desolation.”

Isaiah 62:3: “And you shall be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord and a diadem of the kingdom in the hand of your God.”

Ezekiel 32:1: “And it came to pass in the twelfth year, in the twelfth month, on the first of the month, that the word of the Lord came to me, saying: Son of man, take up a lamentation over Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and you shall say to him: You have been likened to the lion of the nations and to the dragon that is in the sea; and you tossed your horn in your rivers, troubled the waters with your feet, and trampled their streams. Therefore thus says the Lord God: I shall spread my net over you amid the multitude of many peoples, and I shall draw you out in my dragnet. And I shall cast you upon the earth; I shall throw you upon the face of the field, and shall cause all the birds of heaven to dwell upon you, and shall satisfy the beasts of the whole earth from you. And I shall place your flesh upon the mountains and fill your hills with your corruption. And I shall water the earth with the stench of your blood upon the mountains, and the valleys shall be filled from you. And when you have been extinguished, I shall cover the heavens and cause their stars to grow dark; I shall cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give its light. I shall cause all the lights of heaven to mourn over you, and shall place darkness over your land, says the Lord God. And I shall provoke the heart of many peoples when I have brought your destruction among the nations upon lands that you do not know. And I shall cause many peoples to be astonished over you, and their kings shall fear for you with immense horror when my sword begins to fly before their faces; and on the day of your ruin individuals shall suddenly be astounded for their own life. For thus says the Lord God: The sword of the king of Babylon shall come upon you; by the swords of the mighty I shall cast down your multitude--all these nations are unconquerable--and they shall devastate the pride of Egypt, and its multitude shall be scattered. And I shall destroy all its beasts of burden that were upon the many waters; the foot of man shall trouble them no more, nor shall the hoof of beasts of burden trouble them.”

Daniel 2:21: “And he changes times and ages; he transfers and establishes kingdoms; he gives wisdom to the wise and knowledge to those who understand discipline.”

Daniel 5:18: “O king, the Most High God gave kingdom and magnificence, glory and honor, to Nebuchadnezzar your father. And because of the magnificence which he had given him, all peoples, tribes, and tongues trembled and feared him. Whom he willed, he killed; whom he willed, he struck; whom he willed, he exalted; and whom he willed, he humbled. But when his heart was lifted up and his spirit hardened unto pride, he was deposed from the throne of his kingdom and his glory was taken away.”

Daniel 5:28: “PHARES: your kingdom has been divided and given to the Medes and Persians.”

Daniel 7:14: “And he gave him power and honor and a kingdom, and all peoples, tribes, and tongues shall serve him. His power is an everlasting power that shall not be taken away, and his kingdom one that shall not be corrupted.”

§ 6. The third argument is taken from predictions. Long beforehand, all the things that were to come were disclosed to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the other patriarchs for their descendants; all future things were laid open to the leaders Moses and Joshua and to the other prophets. By the providence of God, therefore, kingdoms stand and fall.

See Numbers 24:7: “Water shall flow from his bucket, and his seed shall be in many waters. His king shall be taken away because of Agag, and his kingdom shall be removed.”

Deuteronomy 3:21: “I also commanded Joshua at that time, saying: Your eyes have seen what the Lord your God did to these two kings; so shall he do to all the kingdoms through which you are about to pass. Do not fear them, for the Lord our God shall fight for you.”

2 Kings 11:11: “And so the Lord said to Solomon: Because you have had this within you and have not kept my covenant and the precepts that I commanded you, by rending I shall rend your kingdom and give it to your servant. Nevertheless, I shall not do it in your days, on account of David your father; I shall rend it from the hand of your son. Nor shall I take away the whole kingdom, but I shall give one tribe to your son on account of David my servant and Jerusalem, which I chose.”

2 Kings 3:10: “Thus shall I deal with him: the kingdom shall be transferred from the house of Saul, and David’s throne shall be raised over Israel and over Judah, from Dan as far as Beersheba.”

Daniel 2:39: “And after you shall arise another kingdom, inferior to you, of silver; and another third kingdom, of bronze, which shall command the whole earth. And the fourth kingdom shall be like iron: just as iron breaks and subdues all things, so it shall break and shatter all these things.”

Presentiment and prediction of future things is therefore an efficacious antidote against the atheism of statesmen. For if the eternal God announced to his servants--and through them to the impious world--the destruction of kingdoms and the crimes of kings that were to be punished so long beforehand, no one can doubt that the world is administered by a most watchful providence and immutable justice.

§ 7. The books of many authors and the opinions of the most ancient men reported by later ones teach that certain elaborate arguments of the ancient philosophers for the existence of divination had been collected. Indeed, there was agreement in establishing divination among all who said that gods existed, except Xenophanes of Colophon and Epicurus, as Cicero is the authority in Book II of On Divination.

I mean all who conceded that something could be known. For how could the Academics, who contended that nothing could be known--so far that they professed not even to know this, that they knew nothing--being doubtful of everything and always ἐπέχοντες, suspending judgment, prove divination, when they did not know that they themselves existed? The reasoning of the others who believed that gods existed was this: if divination exists, gods exist; and if gods exist, divination exists. For these reciprocate with one another. Those ancients were criticized by the men who followed them most nearly. For the latter thought that future things could be signified by nature without God and that there could be gods who bestowed no divination upon the human race.

But both the former and the latter, ignorant of the truth, bound themselves by various fraud and superstition. They brought the matter to such a point that both those who thought that the gods and religion were defended by them and those who boasted that they abolished superstition equally weakened every power and faculty of divining, or brought it into ill repute by great crimes. For by what futile reasoning do Chrysippus, Diogenes, and Antipater fight for knowledge of future affairs? They say in Cicero, On Divination, Book II:

> If gods exist and do not declare to human beings beforehand the things that are to be, then either they do not love human beings, or they are ignorant of what will happen, or they judge that it is of no concern for a human being to know what is to come, or they do not judge it to belong to their majesty to signify beforehand to human beings the things that are to be, or not even the gods themselves can signify them. But they do not fail to love us, for they are beneficent and friends of the human race. Nor are they ignorant of the things constituted and designed by themselves. Nor is it of no concern to us to know the things that are to be, for we shall be more cautious if we know them. Nor do they regard this as foreign to their majesty, for nothing is more excellent than beneficence. Nor are they unable to foreknow future things. Therefore, gods do not exist and do not signify future things to us; but gods do exist; therefore, they signify them.

There are indeed certain true things in this reasoning if they are referred to the one true God, who is most beneficent toward us, who first loved us, so that for the reconciliation of the whole world he gave his only-begotten Son, and who foreknew the outcomes of all things, however secret and hidden--both those which occur by his will and those which do not lack his permission. Nevertheless, gentility cannot prove its own predictions from this, since he willed that very many things should lie hidden even from the best and his closest friends.

Then, by bringing forward examples of their soothsayers that were partly manifestly false and partly ambiguous and pliant in speech, they made a matter doubtful among themselves and exposed it to the mockery of atheists, when they announce certainty of outcomes from entrails, birds, omens, lightning, dreams, and finally frenzies. What is easier than to refute the fables about Tages the plowed-up seer, the snakes of Gracchus, the sparrows of Calchas, Aius Locutius, the razor of Tarquinius, the tripudium solistimum, Epimenides the Cretan, the Babylonian observations of four hundred and seventy thousand years, and the rest, since they were generally accustomed to be mocked by the gentiles themselves? Vain, therefore, superstitious, and often frenzied are the approvers and defenders of gentile divinations.

§ 8. Yet, on the contrary, the reasoning of those who abolished all presentiment and prediction of future affairs was not probable. For in taking from God his right and foreknowledge they were sacrilegious, and their arguments have no weight in a matter of the greatest gravity. For what they attempt to prove by an enumeration of all things--that prophecy or any foreknowledge of fortuitous events cannot exist--they get wrong in each individual case.

The argument of all atheists is found in Cicero, On Divination, Book I: things perceived by the senses are handled by art; things in philosophy are established concerning duties; things are transmitted in physics, dialectic, and medicine; these do not belong to soothsayers or prophets; therefore, there is no divination. Reason, however, will show that true predictions exist in all these things; and although no reasons appear why these things rather than those should occur, nevertheless by divine disclosure a prophet knows what could not be known in itself. And the dullness of men otherwise acute when assailing foreknowledge of future things is astonishing. For since it is within a man's power to predict the future things that he himself has resolved to do, why can he who is the almighty author not be the revealer of his own counsels? There can therefore be divination concerning all those things, because they all depend upon a certain outcome.

Others deny divination and foreknowledge because they execrate Stoic fate. For they think that foreknowledge, prediction, and fate are joined by an indissoluble bond and so bound together that either fate must be conceded or the other two denied. Cicero argues thus in his books written On Divination, as Saint Augustine noted in City of God, Book V, chapter 9:

> Cicero attempts so to refute them that he does not think he can prevail at all against them unless he abolishes divination. He attempts to abolish it by denying that there is knowledge of future things; with all his strength he contends that it is altogether nonexistent, either in God or in man, and that there is no prediction of affairs. Thus he also denies God's foreknowledge and attempts by empty arguments to overthrow every prophecy, which is clearer than daylight, setting against himself certain oracles that can readily be refuted--although not even he himself refutes them. But his discourse reigns supreme in refuting these conjectures of the astrologers, because they truly are such as to destroy and refute themselves.

Yet those who constitute either the stars or the fates are much more tolerable than he who abolishes foreknowledge of future things. For both to confess that God exists and to deny that he foreknows future things is the most manifest insanity. When Cicero himself saw this, he also attempted to assert that which is written, "The fool has said in his heart: There is no God"--but not in his own person. For he saw how odious and troublesome it was, and therefore, in his books On the Nature of the Gods, he made Cotta dispute about this matter against the Stoics; and although he assigned the defense of the Stoics' side to Lucilius Balbus, he preferred to cast his vote for Cotta, who contends that no divine nature exists. But in the books On Divination, arguments from Cicero himself most openly attack foreknowledge of future things.

He appears to do all this so that he need not assent that fate exists and thereby destroy free will. For he thinks that, once knowledge of future things is conceded, fate follows so necessarily that it cannot be denied at all. But it is so clear and manifest that some prophecy of future and hidden things exists that whatever is assumed to prove it appears less clear. For every history, sacred and profane, is full of many predictions, and not all are invented or fallacious--those made with the aid of demons are true, but made deceitfully. For though very many are empty and invented, most of the things customarily related certainly do not exceed the faculty of those spirits. Lest I draw the matter out any farther, I shall bring forward what Augustine recounts concerning Albicerius in Book I of Against the Academics.

§ 9. Here Licentius, whom after that definition I had long thought would ask what he should say, immediately added: "Why, therefore, do we not call that infamous man wise whom we ourselves know well to be accustomed to dissolve himself among innumerable harlots? I mean that Albicerius who, at Carthage, for many years gave marvelous and certain answers to those who consulted him. I could recall innumerable things, were I not speaking among men who have experienced them and were a few things not now sufficient for what I intend. When a spoon could not be found in the house, did he not, when questioned at your command"--he was speaking to me--"answer most swiftly and truthfully not only what was being sought, but also specifically whose thing it was and where it lay hidden?

"Likewise, when I was present--I omit the fact that he was not mistaken at all concerning the thing about which he was asked--when the boy who was carrying the coins had stolen a certain portion of them while we were proceeding to him, Albicerius ordered all of them to be counted out to himself and compelled the boy, before our eyes, to return those he had taken away, before Albicerius himself had seen those same coins at all or had heard from us how much had been brought to him.

"What of the fact that we have learned from you that the most learned and illustrious Flaccianus was accustomed to marvel at him? When Flaccianus had spoken about buying an estate, he brought the matter to that diviner so that, if he could, he might declare what Flaccianus had done. And the diviner immediately pronounced not only the kind of transaction but also the very name of the estate--at which Flaccianus cried out vehemently in astonishment--although it was so absurd a name that Flaccianus himself scarcely remembered it.

"Now I cannot tell without amazement of mind what happened when our friend, your disciple, wishing to mock him, insolently demanded that he say what he himself was silently turning over in his mind. Albicerius answered that he was thinking of a verse of Virgil. When the man, dumbfounded, could not deny it, he went on to ask which verse it was. Nor did Albicerius--who had perhaps scarcely seen the outside of a grammarian's school--hesitate confidently and volubly to recite the very verse. Therefore, either the things about which he was consulted were not human affairs, or without knowledge of divine things he gave such certain and true answers to those who consulted him. But either is absurd. For human affairs are nothing other than the affairs of human beings, such as silver, coins, an estate, and finally even thought itself; and who would not rightly judge those things to be divine through which divination itself comes to a human being? Albicerius was therefore wise, if by that definition we concede wisdom to be knowledge of human and divine things."

Then the other said: “First, I do not call that ‘knowledge’ in which the man who professes it is sometimes mistaken. For knowledge consists not only of things comprehended, but of things so comprehended that no one can err in it or be shaken when driven by any adversaries whatsoever. Hence certain philosophers say most truly that it can be found in no one except a wise man, who must not only have grasped that which he maintains and follows, but must also hold it unshaken. But we know that the man you recalled often said many false things, which I discovered not only when others reported them to me, but sometimes perceived myself while present. I would therefore by no means call him knowledgeable when he often said false things--nor would I call him so if he consistently said true things.

“Judge that I have said this concerning soothsayers, augurs, all those who consult the stars, and interpreters of dreams. Or produce, if you can, anyone from this class of human beings who, when consulted, never doubted his answers and, finally, never answered falsely. For concerning prophets I think I need not labor, since they speak with another mind.

“Next, although I concede that human affairs are the affairs of human beings, do you think anything that chance can either give us or take from us is ours? Or, when knowledge of human affairs is spoken of, is that said to be the knowledge by which someone knows either how many or what kind of estates we possess, how much gold, how much silver, or finally what verses belonging to others we are thinking about? That is knowledge of human affairs which knows the light of prudence, the grace of temperance, the strength of fortitude, and the sanctity of justice. For these are the things which, fearing no fortune, we dare to call truly ours. If that Albicerius had learned them, believe me, he would never have lived so luxuriously and disgracefully.

“As for his saying what verse the man who consulted him was turning over in his mind, I do not think this should be numbered among our affairs. I do not deny that the most honorable disciplines pertain to a certain possession of our mind; but because even the most unskilled man is permitted to recite and pronounce a verse belonging to another, when such things have entered our memory it is not marvelous if they can be perceived by certain very vile creatures of this air whom men call demons. I concede that we can be surpassed by them in acuteness and subtlety of the senses, but I deny that we can be surpassed in reason; and it happens in some manner unknown to me, most secret and remote from our senses. For if we marvel that a little bee, by I know not what sagacity in which it surpasses a human being, flies from wherever it is to honey that has been set out, we ought not therefore to prefer it to ourselves or even compare it with us.

“Accordingly, I would have preferred that this Albicerius, when questioned by one who desired to learn, had taught the meters themselves, or, when compelled by one of those consulting him, had sung verses of his own concerning a subject immediately proposed to him. You are accustomed to recall that the same Flaccianus often said this when, with great elevation of mind, he mocked and despised that kind of divination and attributed it to I know not what most abject little soul--for thus he spoke--by which Albicerius, as though moved or instigated by a spirit, was accustomed to give these answers. For that most learned man asked those who admired such things whether Albicerius could teach grammar, music, or geometry. But who knew him and did not confess him to be most unskilled in all these things? Therefore, he finally exhorted those who had learned such things to prefer their own minds without hesitation to that divination, and to labor to instruct and support their minds by these disciplines, through which it might fall to them to pass beyond and fly above that true nature of invisible living beings.

“Now, since divine things are, with everyone conceding it, much better and far more august than human things, how could he attain them when he did not know what he himself was? Unless perhaps you think that the stars, which we contemplate daily, are some great thing in comparison with the truest and most secret God, whom perhaps the intellect rarely reaches and no sense reaches at all, whereas the stars are present to our eyes. Therefore, these are not those divine things which wisdom professes that it alone knows. But the remaining things which those men--I know not who--who divine abuse either for empty boasting or for profit are surely viler than the stars. Albicerius therefore did not participate in knowledge of human and divine affairs, and our definition has been tested by you in that manner in vain.”

Finally, since we ought to judge whatever is outside human and divine affairs to be most vile and altogether to despise it, I ask: in what affairs does that wise man of yours seek truth? “In divine affairs,” he said, “for virtue even in a human being is without doubt divine.” Did Albicerius, then, already know those things which your wise man will always seek? Therefore, leaving these things aside, let us treat of true divination.

§ 10. Next, we see how great is the sagacity in physicians, philosophers, and others, and how great a prediction arises in the minds of prudent men from a small circumstance. What cause, therefore, shall we say there is why that creative mind, passing through the secrets of all causes and governing their outcomes, cannot know them thoroughly? If it knows them, why can it not communicate them? Can God not signify to a human being what a friend can relate to a companion?

§ 11. Thirdly, the authority of the Scriptures can remove absolutely every doubt, even among the gentiles. For no one is so inexperienced in human affairs, no one so obstinate, that he either calls into doubt or despises the whole history of the human race. But when those transformations of commonwealths which the world experienced with great rending of itself had been predicted so eloquently and distinctly--when, as fires raged in different directions, it was harassed on both sides; when the Chaldeans succeeded the Assyrians, the Medes and Persians the Chaldeans; when the Macedonian, accustomed to make funeral offerings to his flatterers with the deaths of nations, enveloped the Persians together with Asia, as though in one common ruin; when, I say, those things had been predicted so eloquently and distinctly, Cyrus himself named and Alexander and his princes described--the prophecy cannot remain concealed when it has been written by the repeated convulsion of the world and in the blood of many nations. Saint Augustine once used that argument and taught that the remaining things would come to pass because the greater part had already occurred.

Since these things, therefore, were predicted, we learn that those affairs whose many fulfillments we behold are governed by God, so that with right piety we may trust that the remaining things will occur.

CHAPTER VII

That Kingdoms Depend Upon God Is Proved From Daniel's Prophecy

§ 1. I now judge that I have demonstrated sufficiently from the Scriptures that earthly kingdoms are begun, increased, preserved, and cast down not by fortune or chance or fate, but by the will of God. Yet my mind is resolved to linger here and to bring forward this providence in a clear matter and most familiar history, as though for an example of the others. The words of Daniel, chapter 8, are as follows:

> In the third year of the reign of King Belshazzar, a vision appeared to me. I, Daniel, after that which I had seen at the beginning, saw in my vision, when I was in the fortress of Susa, which is in the region of Elam; and I saw in the vision that I was above the gate of Ulai. And I lifted up my eyes and saw; and behold, one ram stood before the marsh, having lofty horns, and one higher than the other and growing upward. Afterward I saw the ram brandishing its horns against the west, against the north, and against the south; and all the beasts could not resist it or be delivered from its hand. And it did according to its will and was magnified.

> And I understood; but behold, a he-goat of the goats came from the west over the face of the whole earth and did not touch the ground. Moreover, the he-goat had a distinguished horn between its eyes. And it came as far as that horned ram which I had seen standing before the gate and ran at it in the impetus of its strength. And when it had approached near the ram, it was enraged against it and struck the ram and broke its two horns; and the ram could not resist it. And when it had cast the ram to the ground, it trampled it, and no one was able to deliver the ram from its hand.

> But the he-goat of the goats became exceedingly great; and when it had grown, the great horn was broken, and four horns arose beneath it toward the four winds of heaven. But from one of them came forth one little horn, and it became great against the south, against the east, and against the host. And it was magnified even unto the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars and trampled them. And it was magnified even unto the prince of the host; and it took away from him the continual sacrifice and cast down the place of his sanctuary.

§ 2. And at verse 19 and those following:

> And he said to me: I shall show you the things that are to be in the last time of the curse, because the appointed time has its end. The ram which you saw having horns is the king of the Medes and Persians. But the he-goat of the goats is the king of the Greeks, and the great horn which is between its eyes is the first king. But because, when it was broken, four arose in its place, four kings shall arise from his nation, but not in his strength.

> And after their reign, when iniquities have increased, there shall arise a king shameless of face and understanding propositions; and his strength shall be reinforced, but not by his own forces. And beyond what can be believed, he shall lay waste all things, prosper, and act. And he shall kill the mighty and the people of the saints according to his will, and deceit shall be directed in his hand. And he shall magnify his heart, and through the abundance of all things shall kill very many. And he shall rise against the prince of princes and shall be broken without a hand. And the vision of evening and morning which was spoken is true. Therefore seal the vision, because it shall be after many days. And I, Daniel, languished and was sick for days; and when I had risen, I performed the king's works, and I was astounded at the vision, and there was no one who could interpret it.

Weigh these things and reckon within yourself how accurately Darius and Alexander are described, along with their deeds and the transfer of the monarchy to an ignoble corner of Greece. The ram is Darius, who stands before the marsh or before the river--in Hebrew, liphne haubal, "in the sight of the Ubal." For even after the remainder of Asia was lost, Darius placed his hope in the rivers and standing marshes of water from the Euphrates and Tigris, since he held Media, Persia, the Assyrians, and the whole barbarian region together with Bactria. Here, therefore, the ram stands confidently.

The lofty horns are the kingdoms of Media and Persia. For although very many kingdoms obeyed Darius, the Medes and Persians nevertheless ruled. The higher horn, however, was the Persian kingdom, which had been far inferior to the Median, but grew powerful after Cyrus and was more excellent than the kingdom of the Medes. It is therefore said to grow upward, or to ascend at the end. Since Cyrus, himself a Persian, possessed the Persian dominion by inheritance but the Median as a dowry, he preferred the Persians to the Medes. Hence the monarchy is customarily called Persian, not Median, by authors.

That ram brandishes with its horns--menagag, that is, it attacks with the horn, κερατίζει--as is said in Exodus 21:28 and verses 31 and 32 concerning kings who violently oppress a province, and in Deuteronomy 33:17, "The horns of the rhinoceros are his horns."

Against the west--in Hebrew, iamma, πρὸς θάλασσαν, toward the sea, namely the Mediterranean. The Jews were accustomed thus to call the west because the sea enclosed the western side of Palestine. But the Persian dominion was scarcely bounded by the sea. To the west of Persia were the Babylonians, Syrians, part of Armenia, and the islands of the Mediterranean Sea. In the south they conquered Arabia, Egypt, part of Libya, the Ammonians, and the southern Indians. In the north they conquered part of Armenia, Pontus, and Colchis. Herodotus, Book I; Xenophon's Education of Cyrus and ἀναβάσει (Anabasis); the Halicarnassian, Book I; Curtius; Ctesias in his Persian History; and innumerable others expound these matters.

No one could resist it--no one, that is, among the Asiatic nations; for the Greeks and Scythians resisted, although afflicted with the greatest disasters.

Daniel was not ignorant that a king or kingdom was signified, yet he could not yet know who it was. But behold, there comes the he-goat of the goats, the king of Greece, Melech Iavan. The king of Javan, or king of the Ionians--for among the Greeks, ἴων, and among the Hebrews, יוי, because Hellas does not recognize consonantal yod; hence Ionia among the celebrated cities of the Greeks. Moreover, Javan was a son of Japheth and a brother of Madai.

The Persian is a ram because, as Theodoret says, the dominion, now heavy with resources, fatness, and luxury, and scarcely master of itself, was assuredly being conquered by the Greeks through those things in which it most abounded, such as money, because the soldiers were neglected through the avarice of the governors. Accordingly, at this time it was like a golden animal which by its golden fleece generally profited others, the strength of the bear having long since failed. For they either hired the generals of the Greeks with money or corrupted them, so that the ram now bore its fleeces not for itself but for others.

The king of the Greeks is the he-goat of the goats. "He-goat--he-goat" is said in Hebrew, yet with two words: vehazaphir veschaghir, both "he-goat" and "male goat." The Seventy, however, call it τὸν τράγον τῶν αἰγῶν. Others read "hairy he-goat"; our interpreter and the Seventy read an addition at the end in this manner: hazephir haschehiroth, "he-goat of the goats." Thus most interpret it, and it is called the same in verse 5: zephir hahazim, "he-goat of the goats," just as though it said one from a herd of goats or the offspring of a she-goat. Thus in Leviticus 4:28 it is said, "a female kid or she-goat of the goats."

Some think that the maternal origin is indicated by this addition. For after Philip died, only his mother Olympias survived. Alexander was dearer to her than to his father, so far that he is thought to have been aware of his father's murder. Certainly Olympias could not conceal the joy she had conceived at her husband's death, so far that at night she placed a crown upon Pausanias the parricide as he hung upon the cross. She would not have dared so infamous a crime unless she thought it would please her son, who at last even denied that Philip was his father and killed those who praised Philip. But I prefer that he should be named "he-goat of the goats" by a Hebrew expression rather than that I should follow an uncertain exposition.

He is a he-goat who, by a swift leap as though he did not touch the earth, flew, as it were, across great kingdoms. Darius did not boast emptily that so much land still belonged to him that even to traverse it--not merely to conquer it--would be laborious. "A man would grow old," he says in Curtius, "merely by traveling over so much land, even without battle." But Alexander, as roe deer are accustomed to do, poises himself from cliff to cliff without traversing the valley, and thus subdued so great a monarchy in six years.

In the first year he restrained many rebellious nations and extinguished seditions. Then, setting out at a rapid pace, he was appointed commander of Greece while he prepared the Persian war. In the very midst of the undertaking, it was announced that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedaemonians had defected to the Persians and would draw the whole of Greece with them by their authority and power. At the same time war had to be waged against the barbarians at the Ister. Intending to meet these disturbances, he overwhelmed Greece with such speed, with his army equipped and prepared, that those who had not perceived him coming could scarcely believe they saw him.

§ 3. Next, upon the Adrastean plains, or at the Granicus, he put six hundred thousand Persians to flight and killed one hundred and twenty thousand cavalrymen, although nine infantrymen and one hundred and twenty cavalrymen from his own army were killed. He waged several wars against Darius's governors, whom he conquered by terror of his name; he wore them down in three battles after the battle of Issus. When crossing Mount Taurus he covered five hundred stadia--that is, fifteen German miles--at a run. Tyre delayed his impetus a little, for it presented more difficulty than the entire Persian kingdom. But when it was captured, Egypt, Cilicia, and Rhodes came under his dominion without a contest. Meanwhile, as though at leisure, he saluted Jupiter Ammon, founded Alexandria, and finally defeated and buried Darius at Gaugamela. For this reason he is called the exceedingly swift he-goat who did not touch the earth.

He is also called a he-goat because he was harsh, inhuman, lustful, and had not only a bloody court but even bloody banquets, infamous for the killings and perils of his closest friends. Curtius, Book VI, says that when freed from cares he admitted pleasures, games, and herds of concubines. What kind of man he was in the storming of cities is taught by Eleadas, a captive after Thebes had been conquered: "Now there remains a crowd of old men and women, weak indeed but also harmless; and this very crowd has been harassed by rapes and insults so that they have never suffered anything more bitter." Nor were the Greek kings who followed dissimilar to Alexander: distinguished for lusts, pride, and cruelty, they afflicted the world and were hostile to one another in perpetual wars. For Daniel speaks about kings in such a way that he embraces the whole body of the kingdom.

§ 4. The he-goat, however, came to the horned ram--bahalker anaim, "lord of the horns"--in the impetus of his strength: ἐν ὁρμῇ, says the Greek, which the Hebrew calls bacchamath cocho, "in the fervor or blazing anger of his strength."

But when it had drawn near the ram, it was enraged against it--ἐξηγριώθη. Although it had formerly been a domestic and tame animal, it is now changed into a fierce and savage beast. The Hebrew has vaithmarmar: it made itself savage and gathered all its anger against one. Who would not think that Daniel, when writing these things, had been present at the deeds? They had indeed long contended in courtesies and humanity while the war continued, but when it came to the actual matter, he was driven by the Furies. "Alexander," says Justin, "undertook all the most dangerous things; and wherever he saw the densest enemy forces fighting most fiercely, he always plunged himself into that place and willed the dangers to be his own, not his soldiers'."

He drew near: he destroyed three armies of the commanders and then put Darius himself to flight. In the second battle each king was wounded; in the third Darius perished. But concerning Alexander's enraged disposition toward Darius, let us hear Curtius, Book IV. "For you undertake impious wars"--the Macedonian reproaches Darius's legates in this way--"and, although you possess arms, you bid for the heads of your enemies, just as you lately, king of so great an army, wished to purchase my assassin for a thousand talents. I therefore repel war; I do not inflict it." And because Darius had omitted Alexander's title of king, he added: "Hereafter, when you write to me, remember that you are writing not only to a king, but also to your own king."

But nothing enraged him more than the letters of which Curtius speaks in chapter 4. Letters of Darius were then intercepted, by which the Greek soldiers were solicited to kill or betray the king. Therefore Alexander said in his response to the legates: "But if he sought peace at least in good faith, I might perhaps deliberate whether I should grant it. In truth, since he solicits now my soldiers by letters to betray me, now my friends to destroy me, he must be pursued by me to extermination, not as a just enemy, but as an assassin and poisoner."

§ 5. Behold for yourself the enraged he-goat rushing with a violent impetus against the ram without regard for its own safety. Could not God, who predicted these things so long beforehand and foresaw them from eternity, have fortified the ram and turned away the he-goat?

It truly broke its two horns. "By this battle," says Justin, "he seized the whole of Asia in the fifth year after receiving the kingdom. His success was so great that after this no one dared to rebel, and the Persians patiently received the yoke of servitude after so many years of dominion." After Persepolis had been destroyed, even the Medes did not attempt to resist.

All the beasts could not resist it or be delivered from its hand. The reason was that the ram had now been abandoned by God; accordingly, it did not conquer even once in so many battles. For the iniquities of the Persians and Medes had now grown great and were no longer tolerable to the world. Nor was Alexander ignorant of this. In Justin, Book II, the matter is narrated thus: "Before any ship departed from shore, he sacrificed victims, seeking victory in the war in which he had been chosen as avenger of Greece, so often attacked by the Persians; they had possessed dominion long enough and to maturity, and the time had come for successors who would act better to take their turn." Thus it could not happen that the Persian should resist or at least conduct the war; but, destitute of assistance and wisdom, he delivered all things into the victor's hands.

When it had cast him to the ground, it trampled him. Alexander had pursued him as an assassin and poisoner. When Darius saw his men being conquered, he himself wished to die, but was compelled by those closest to him to flee, as Justin relates. He was therefore cast down to the ground while Hyrcania, Bactria, and half the kingdom still remained. He was bound with golden chains by his own governors Nabarzanes and Bessus and cast into a wagon covered with hides. Finally, when ordered to mount a horse, he refused to accompany the parricides. "Then indeed," says Curtius, Book V, "inflamed also with anger, they cast weapons at the king and left him pierced through with many wounds. They also wounded the beasts of burden so that they could not proceed farther, after killing the two servants who accompanied the king."

All these things are attributed to the he-goat of the goats because he was the cause of all of them and, pressing upon the fugitive, used to say: "Our victory is placed within that body." But Curtius, Book V, points him out to us lying upon the ground, as though reciting Daniel's very words: "When Darius was about to see Artabazus for the last time, he embraced him; and, drenched with many tears, ordered him, though clinging to him, to be pulled away. Then, having covered his head so that he might not gaze amid his groans upon the man departing as though from a funeral pyre, HE CAST HIMSELF FACE DOWN UPON THE GROUND." Thus cast down and trampled, he most miserably lost his life.

Then Persepolis was trampled, burned in mockery at the nod of a petty courtesan; and captives whose price had rendered them pitiable were killed, for the wealthy victors preferred to kill the most worthless of the captives rather than sell them.

The distinguished horn, ἐπίσημον, between the eyes is Alexander--not the first king of Macedonia, but the first commander of all Greece and monarch of Asia. He is more powerful than his successors, projecting upon the forehead between the eyes--that is, among his father's most clear-sighted generals; for no one readily led the ranks unless he was sixty years old. Therefore the he-goat is both the king himself and the kingdom of Greece.

But the great horn was broken--either struck down by drunkenness or by Babylonian poison--when it had stood for twelve years.

§ 6. When it was broken, four kings arose. The Hebrew calls them four Malchivoth, kingdoms. Our interpreter read niem in place of uth, namely, melachim. No judgment concerning the true ancient reading can be established from the word, for it is iaghamodenna, whose beginning possesses the mark of the masculine, but whose ending is feminine; I find nothing similar to it. Accordingly, either there is an error in the Hebrew, or it is an indication that the discourse concerns kings and kingdoms--that is, persons and things.

There were more kings and kingdoms, but the principal ones with which the passage deals were only four: Macedonia, Egypt, Asia, and Syria. The principal kings were Philip, or Arrhidaeus; Antigonus; Ptolemy; and Seleucus. From these things I conclude that there is a providence directing all things; all things are subject to it; at God's discretion all things stand and all things fall--they are not only foreseen and predicted.

The things said in chapter 11 must be considered no less. It says that three kings were to stand in Persia--Cyrus, Cambyses, and Darius, for it omits Smerdis as a tyrant of a few months--and that the fourth, namely the great Xerxes, was to be enriched with the greatest resources and, when he had grown powerful, was to rouse everyone by means of his riches to war against Greece. Then Alexander, a strong king, shall arise and rule with great power from Macedonia as far as the Ammonians and India. But once the kingdom has been acquired, his kingdom shall be broken and divided toward the four winds, into four principal kingdoms and many other smaller ones, but not among his descendants. For all his posterity was extinguished within the twelfth year, nor did it pass according to his power, for no one among his successors obtained even a tenth part of his power.

The happiness of Alexander was miserable. When he was about to go against the Persians, he had polluted himself with kindred blood. After his death Olympias, besieged by Cassander and judged an enemy by the Macedonians, was ordered by a public judgment to die. Barsane and Roxane were killed with their children. A certain part and the name of the kingdom were granted to his brother Arrhidaeus, but he too was soon extinguished.

§ 7. The kingdom was torn even among outsiders--those, namely, who were not from the nobles of the Macedonians. Torn among members of the household, torn among outsiders. Livy, Book XLV: "The greatest kingdom and name of the Macedonians upon earth, pulled apart into many kingdoms at the death of Alexander while each man seized its resources for himself, with its strength torn apart, stood for one hundred and fifty years from the highest summit of fortune to its final end." Does he not appear to be writing a commentary upon Daniel? O depth of the wisdom of God, how unsearchable are his judgments and untraceable his ways!

After Alexander's death, his commanders placed diadems upon themselves, and evils were multiplied upon the earth. His mother, brother, wives, and children, almost all his commanders and princes, and the Silver Shields, enriched with the spoils of the world, paid for the success of that one robber: within sixteen years they were cut down and consumed by wounds mutually inflicted. Olympias killed Arrhidaeus; Cassander killed Olympias and two daughters-in-law with two grandchildren; Demetrius extinguished Cassander and his whole house, as though making a funeral offering to Alexander's family; Perdiccas killed Meleager; Ptolemy, Cleomenes and Perdiccas and others; Philotas, Python;

Antigonus, Eumenes and the Silver Shields. After thirty-four commanders, Alexander's fellow soldiers, had now been extinguished, the last ones, Seleucus and Lysimachus, came together in battle.

"It was a spectacle of the foulest kind," says Orosius, "that two kings--of whom Lysimachus was seventy-four years old and Seleucus seventy-seven--should meet to seize one another's kingdoms, stand in a battle line, and bear arms. This was indeed the last war of Alexander's fellow soldiers, but one that had been preserved as an example of the greatest misery. For although, after thirty-four commanders of Alexander had now been extinguished, they alone possessed the world, they did not regard the exceedingly narrow bounds of their old age and life, but judged the bounds of their dominion over the whole world too narrow. In that war, after he had previously lost fifteen children through various misfortunes, Lysimachus, dying not without spirit, was added as the final heap upon the ruin of his house.

"Seleucus, rejoicing in so great a victory and because--which he judged greater than victory--he alone had remained from the companies of Alexander the Great and had proved the conqueror of conquerors, boasted that it was not a human work but a divine one. He was altogether ignorant that not long afterward he himself would become an example of human frailty. For after only seven months, he was surrounded by an ambush and killed by Ptolemy, whose sister Lysimachus had had in marriage; and together with his life he likewise lost the kingdom of Macedonia which he had taken from Lysimachus." Thus those who had defiled the whole world with killings, ambition, and debaucheries perished by this end, through the fire of divine vengeance bursting forth from the throne. These things, indeed, occurred among members of the household.

But what of the outsiders? As soon as they heard of Alexander's death, the Indians, after killing his governors, vindicated themselves into liberty; and the Seleucids did not long command beyond Persia and Media. Justin, Book XLI, relates that Arsaces the Parthian revolted; Theodorus says that a thousand cities of the Bactrians did so at the same time, and that the peoples of the whole east followed their example, as did, by an equal principle, the Pontic and Scythian nations, whence new kingdoms and commonwealths afterward emerged.

And the king of the south shall be strengthened: Ptolemy the son of Lagus, who obtained Egypt, the southern part of the Macedonian kingdom, was a most prudent man, as the historian says. "But Ptolemy in Egypt prepared great resources by skillful industry; for he had both won over the Egyptians to his favor by distinguished moderation and bound neighboring kings to himself by benefits and services. He had also enlarged the boundaries of his dominion by acquiring the city of Cyrene and had already become so great that he did not so much fear his enemies as was himself to be feared by them." Let what Pausanias says about him in the Attica be consulted. Amid the other commanders contending with one another, he had an opportunity to grow, since he possessed a stable kingdom not exposed to any incursions. He was called Soter by the Rhodians because he assisted them against Demetrius. After taking Jerusalem he captured one hundred and twelve thousand Jews, but treated them most humanely, so that many went voluntarily from Judea into Egypt. He entrusted fortresses and cities to them because, from the response of Jaddua to Alexander, he knew that they were the most steadfast keepers of an oath.

He is one of Alexander's commanders. Ptolemy Philadelphus was the killer of brothers who plotted against him. He possessed one hundred thousand infantry, two thousand chariots, four hundred elephants, one hundred and fifty warships, a thousand cargo ships, an annual revenue of fourteen thousand eight hundred talents of silver, and finally one million five hundred thousand artabas of grain. An artaba contains three modii and one third.

But at the end of the years, after many troublesome contests between the kings of Asia and Egypt, the daughter of the king of the south--Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt--shall come to the king of the north, Antiochus Θεὸν, to establish friendship, with a great dowry, so that she even acquired the name φερνοφόρος, "dowry-bringer." But she shall not retain the strength of the arm, nor shall she be a bond between the two kingdoms.

For Laodice, the former wife of Antiochus, shall kill her husband with poison, appoint Seleucus Callinicus king, and deliver Berenice with her son to the princes at Antioch to be killed. Indeed, those who brought her there and were sponsors of the marriage shall likewise be killed.

But one shall stand from the shoot of her roots, namely Ptolemy Euergetes, Berenice's brother, who occupied almost the entire kingdom of Seleucus. Justin narrates the history in Book XXVII: "When Antiochus, king of Syria--the God, namely--had died and Seleucus had succeeded in his place, at the urging of his mother Laodice, who ought to have restrained him, he began the auspices of his reign with parricide. For he killed Berenice, his stepmother, the sister of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, together with his little brother born from her. By perpetrating this crime, he both incurred the stain of infamy and involved himself in a war with Ptolemy.

"Moreover, when Berenice learned that men had been sent to kill her, she shut herself within Daphne. When it was reported to the cities of Asia that she was being besieged there with her little son, remembering the dignity of her father and her ancestors and pitying the misfortune of so undeserved a fate, they all sent her assistance. Her brother Ptolemy too, roused by his sister's peril, left his kingdom and flew to her with all his forces. But before the arrival of assistance, Berenice--since she could not be conquered by force--was surrounded by deceit and slaughtered. The matter appeared undeserved to all; and so, when all the cities that had revolted had prepared an immense fleet, terrified by this sudden example of cruelty and at the same time intending to avenge the woman whom they had been about to defend, they delivered themselves to Ptolemy. If he had not been recalled to his kingdom by a domestic sedition, he would have occupied the whole kingdom of Seleucus."

Accordingly, it is apparent why Daniel says: "Moreover, he shall lead captive into Egypt their gods and carved images, and likewise precious vessels of silver and gold." Historians say that he brought back those things which Cambyses had formerly carried away. Recalled by domestic sedition, he carried away with him four thousand talents of gold and two thousand five hundred gods; but he occupied all things as far as the Euphrates.

§ 8. I refrain from expounding the remainder. If you add the names of the kings to those passages, you will compose a complete history from the prophecy. You, reader, consider God's foreknowledge, which most accurately sees through all deeds and all the minds of all persons; revere the divinity conscious of every outcome. And you will discover that all things are from God and are preserved by God; that without God human counsels fall into futility and are turned into the greatest calamities. Those powerful marriages first dashed kings, queens, and children against one another, and then the kingdoms themselves, in a war of mutual extermination.

Foreknowledge of future things is therefore the surest and never-fallacious sign of the divinity that governs all dominions. Thus Isaiah 41: "Announce to us the things that shall come in the future, and we shall know that you are gods."

Among these I also count that most manifest prophecy concerning Cyrus, which was shown to him after two hundred years, when he had obtained the kingdom, as Josephus narrates in Antiquities, Book II, chapter 1.

CHAPTER VIII

That the Commonwealth Depends Upon God Is Shown by Testimonies of Christians

§ 1. This could appear superfluous, since many of the Fathers have written entire treatises on this matter; nevertheless, to taste a few things from them for the disputation undertaken will not have been useless.

Tertullian, Apology Against the Gentiles, chapter 17: "That which we worship is one God, who by the word with which he commanded, the reason by which he disposed, and the power by which he was able brought forth from nothing this entire mass, together with all its equipment of elements, bodies, and spirits, as an ornament of his majesty." And chapter 18: "See, therefore, whether he dispenses kingdoms, to whom belong both the world that is ruled and the human being himself who rules; whether he arranged the vicissitudes of dominions at their appointed times in the world, who existed before all time and made the age of bodies into time; whether he raises or casts down cities, under whom the human race once existed without cities."

Saint Basil, Hexaemeron, Homily 7: "No man endowed with knowledge of the stars, no Chaldean conjecturing from the rising of the constellations the tumult of a tempest in the air, taught the hedgehog; but the ruler of seas and winds imprinted upon this little animal too an evident and open trace of his immense wisdom. There is absolutely nothing that does not fall beneath God's providence. There is altogether nothing neglected by God. That ever-watchful eye searches all things and beholds all things; it is present to all and provides to each the means of safety. If God does not exclude the hedgehog from his providence, does he not search out the things that pertain to you? Does he not behold them?"

And upon these words of Psalm 32, "A king is not saved by great strength": "No military army, no fortification however great, no walls of cities, no phalanx of infantry, no troop of cavalry, no preparation of naval defense produces safety for a king. Κύριος καθιστᾷ, καὶ μεθιστᾷ βασιλεῖς--the Lord establishes and removes kings. A king is therefore preserved not through great strength, but through divine grace."

Athanasius, Oration Against the Gentiles: "Thus also in the order and harmony of this universe, it is necessary that we observe that God is the ruler of all these things, and that he is one and not several. For that order of disposition and concordant harmony of all things declares that it has not many but one leader and ruler, namely the Word of God."

Then, in the same oration: "The almighty, altogether complete, holy Word and Reason of God himself, lying upon all things and everywhere unfolding his powers, illuminating all things--both those that appear to the eyes and those that escape the eyes--contains and binds together all things within himself. He leaves nothing deserted by his power, but in all things vivifies and preserves all things, individual things individually and the whole publicly: the beginnings and elements of every sensible substance."

Irenaeus, Against Heresies, Book III, chapter 41: "God has providence over all things; for this reason he also gives counsel. But in giving counsel he is present to those who possess providence over conduct. It is therefore necessary that the things which are foreseen and governed should know their ruler; for they are not irrational or empty, but possess a sensibility that perceives the providence of God. And for this reason some of the gentiles, who served enticements and pleasures less and were not led away so far by the superstition of idols, moved by his providence, although only slightly, were nevertheless converted, so that they said that the maker of this universe was the Father who provides for all and disposes the world for us."

Augustine, City of God, Book V, chapter 10: "For we do not place either the life of God or the foreknowledge of God beneath necessity if we say that it is necessary for God always to live and to foreknow all things, just as his power is not diminished when it is said that he cannot die or be deceived. For he is unable to do this in such a manner that, if he were able, he would assuredly be of lesser power. He is rightly called omnipotent, although he cannot die or be deceived. For he is called omnipotent by doing what he wills, not by suffering what he does not will. If that happened to him, he would by no means be omnipotent."

Augustine, City of God, Book IV, chapter 28: "Just as the Romans were able to possess golden money although they did not worship the god Aurinus, so too they could have possessed silver and bronze money even if they worshiped neither Argentinus nor his father Aesculanus; and so with all the things that it is wearisome to unravel. Thus, therefore, they could in no way possess a kingdom against the will of the true God. But if those false and many gods were unknown or despised, and that one God were known and worshiped with sincere faith and morals, they would both possess a better kingdom here, however much they possessed, and afterward receive an everlasting one, whether they possessed one here or did not."

Augustine, City of God, Book V, chapter 1: "Let us now consider in sequence for what cause God--who can also give those goods which even men who are not good, and therefore not happy, can possess--willed the Roman Empire to be so great and so long-lasting. For that multitude of false gods which they worshiped did not bring this about; we have already said many things, and shall speak whenever it seems opportune. The cause of the greatness of the Roman Empire was therefore neither fortuitous nor fatal, according to the judgment or opinion of those who call things fortuitous which either have no causes or do not come from some rational cause, and call things fatal which occur by the necessity of some order apart from the will of God and human beings. Human kingdoms are constituted entirely by divine providence."

Peter Chrysologus: "The power of the Lord is no greater in confirming the most powerful kingdom than in overturning the poor man's hut. For who in Greece was more powerful than Alexander? Yet it is read that not his own son, but the son of a dancing woman succeeded him."

§ 2. Therefore Augustine truly says, City of God, Book V, chapter 11:

> Accordingly the supreme and true God, with his Word and Holy Spirit--which three are one--one omnipotent God, creator and maker of every soul and every body, by participation in whom all who are happy in truth, not in vanity, are happy; who made the human being a rational animal from soul and body; who neither permitted him when he sinned to be unpunished nor abandoned him without mercy; who gave to good and evil alike existence together with stones, seminal life together with trees, sentient life together with cattle, and intellectual life with angels alone; from whom is every measure, every form, every order; from whom are measure, number, and weight; from whom is whatever exists naturally, of whatever kind it is and of whatever estimation; from whom are the seeds of forms, the forms of seeds, and the movements of seeds and forms.

> He also gave to flesh its origin, beauty, health, fecundity of propagation, disposition of members, soundness, and concord; and to the irrational soul he gave memory, sensation, and appetite, but to the rational soul, in addition, mind, understanding, and will. He left not only heaven and earth, not only angel and human being, but neither the inward parts of a small and contemptible animal, nor a bird's little feather, nor a little flower of grass, nor a leaf of a tree, without agreement among their parts and a certain peace, as it were. He must in no way be believed to have willed that the kingdoms of human beings and their dominions and servitudes should be foreign to the laws of his providence.

Assuredly, he to whom such small things are a care will never neglect things so great. He numbered our hairs--indeed, as Tertullian observes, the bristles of pigs. Did he not number the provinces of kings and the cities of the earth?

Saint Augustine, City of God, Book V, chapter 19, most beautifully describes the same thing and shows that even evil men do not reign without providence:

> But he who despises the judgments of those who praise him also despises the rashness of those who suspect him. Yet, if he is truly good, he does not despise their salvation, because he who has virtues from the Spirit of God is of such great justice that he loves even his enemies. He loves them in such a way that he wishes whisperers or detractors, when corrected, to have as his fellow citizens not the earthly fatherland but the heavenly one. But amid his own praises, although he regards lightly the fact that men praise him, he does not regard lightly the fact that they love him; nor does he wish to deceive those who praise him, lest he deceive those who love him. And therefore he earnestly insists that the one from whom a human being has whatever is rightly praised in him should rather be praised.

> But he who despises glory and is greedy for dominion surpasses beasts either in the vices of cruelty or in luxury. Certain Romans were such men. For when they had lost concern for reputation, they did not lack desire for dominion. History reveals that there were many. But Nero Caesar was the first to obtain the summit and, as it were, a certain citadel of this vice. His luxury was so great that nothing manly was thought to be feared from him; his cruelty was so great that he would have been believed to possess nothing soft, had it not been known. Yet even to such men the power of ruling is not given except by the supreme providence of God, when he judges human affairs worthy of such masters. The divine declaration concerning this matter is open, when the Wisdom of God speaks: "Through me kings reign, and through me tyrants hold the earth."

Saint Augustine therefore concludes, City of God, Book V, chapter 21:

> Since these things are so, let us not attribute the power of giving kingship and dominion to anyone except the true God, who gives happiness in the kingdom of heaven to the pious alone, but an earthly kingdom to both the pious and the impious, as it pleases him to whom nothing unjust is pleasing.

CHAPTER IX

That the Commonwealth Is From God and Depends Upon Him Is Known From Other Predictions

§ 1. Among sincere and orthodox judges this argument is less firm than that which we drew from the sacred writings. Among pseudo-statesmen, however, who do not believe Sacred Scripture but do not dare altogether to deny the history of the human race, it must necessarily possess great weight. For if there is divination, then there is also the providence of some divine power; if there is providence, then the administration of affairs belongs to the divine power; human affairs are therefore governed not by chance or by human reason alone.

That prediction of future affairs exists is shown not only by the things we have discussed from the sacred writings, but also by many things which have happened in common life and still occur, which confirm it in such a way that no one can deny them unless he is altogether averse to every knowledge of humane learning and history.

§ 2. True prophecy and oracles, among whomsoever they are found, disclose contingently future things or manifest hidden things only when God speaks--things which no one except God alone could disclose. For unless a more excellent and divine light shines forth, we altogether remove natural prognostications--προγνώσεις--and the skill of conjecturing which we concede to statesmen, physicians, and philosophers from the predictions of which we are treating.

We detest as impious and frequently deceitful those who, with the aid of demons, abuse knowledge of hidden things or presentiment of certain future things. But we judge that those who thought--as found in Cicero, On Divination, Book II--that the minds of prophets were roused and enlivened for the presentiment of future affairs by some exhalation of the earth, although Plutarch too holds this in the book in which he asks for the causes why the oracles ceased, depart very far from true reason and almost rave. For what affinity, analogy, or relation of cause can the foul moisture of the earth or the stench of caves possess with those affairs which depend upon the will of God and the free choice of a human being?

I therefore exclude these things and that whole class of oracles which once afflicted the entire world. Yet from that very class we also infer divine providence. For if demons often possess true prophecies because they behold things separated by a great distance or know the hidden counsels of human beings and the certain causes of events, we also learn from this that the world is governed by providence. For since they are evil and maleficent spirits, yet provident, crafty, and strong, it is necessary that their force and wickedness should be restrained by a greater force and fear. This can be done by no human being but by God, since even one demon, with such agility, strength, knowledge of all natural things, and especially because it cannot be seen or wounded, could destroy all human beings. The superstitions of the gentiles generally depended upon the imposture of these spirits. But afterward their prophets, when their frauds became manifest, lost their authority and the prices paid for their lies; finally, the demons themselves were also made speechless.

§ 3. The Sibylline books possessed the chief authority; a more prudent and cultivated age rejected almost all the others. Suetonius, in Augustus: “Whatever prophetic books of Greek and Latin origin were commonly circulated under no authors or insufficiently suitable ones--more than two thousand gathered from every side--he burned. He retained only the Sibylline books, these too after holding a selection, and stored them in two gilded cases beneath the base of the Palatine Apollo.” Augustine mentions those same books in City of God, Book XVIII, chapter 22, when he proves that the Erythraean Sibyl also predicted many things concerning Christ the Lord.

God willed to admonish not only holy and pious persons concerning future things. Since they were few and among many peoples scarcely any, he used the voice of the impious, as that of Balaam in Numbers 22 and 23. Hence also among the gentiles there are innumerable true portents and indications concerning commonwealths and kingdoms, either to be newly established or to be changed. Examples occur in Lipsius's Monita and in all writers, especially those of the later age, and above all in the various predictions of various events in the Constantinopolitan Empire.

The histories of the martyrs and holy Fathers, moreover, relate very many things. Although the profaneness of pseudo-statesmen is accustomed to laugh at them, nevertheless no one who prudently and without prejudice weighs the deeds and teaching of those men can suspect anything fraudulent or imposturous. Dominions and the victories by which they obtained them were certainly predicted to very many. It was said to Constantine the Great, "In this sign you shall conquer"; different things were predicted to others, and not without fulfillment.

An eagle, the emblem of dominion, overshadows Marcian while he sleeps; the thing happens again in Africa, so that the barbarians marvel and voluntarily grant the captive his liberty. Then, after Theodosius dies, he is soon adorned with an empress as wife and with the imperial power.

Admirable is what Lipsius, in Book I of the Monita, recounts after others. Compare with these what happened in the age of our fathers to LOUIS, king of Hungary. Suleiman, prince of the Turks, was preparing war against him, and he likewise was arming himself. He was dining in the citadel of Buda, the doors of the palace then being closed according to custom. At the gate stood someone with a human appearance, but lame, distorted, and foul in his remaining clothing and cultivation. With a sharp and shrill voice he cried out and demanded a conversation with the king. He was neglected, and they thought him a beggarly fellow. When he cried out more and more that it was necessary to meet the king and no other, the matter was reported to the king. The king sent one of the more splendid courtiers, who had been commanded to present the king's name and person and draw out whatever this might be.

He came and addressed the lame man privately. After looking at him, the lame man denied that this was the king. "And since," he said, "the king disdains to hear me, go and announce that he shall perish shortly and certainly." With the words he vanished from the eyes of those standing there. The threat was all too true. The king, near the town of Mohács, was defeated in a great battle and, while fleeing, fell into marshes. As he struggled out, his horse collapsed upon him, and he was crushed or suffocated. He was in his twenty-first year.

CHAPTER X

That Kingdoms Are Governed by God Is Shown From the Sayings of the Impious and Unbelievers

§ 1. Although the wise man of this age, whose teaching in many matters approached very near to the truth, rightly said that "the human race has always deserved badly of God," he himself thought badly and foolishly concerning God. Nevertheless, there are implanted in minds ἀντιλήψεις, preconceptions, and certain sparks of that great light which shone in the purity of primeval grace, flashing among clouds of the thickest darkness. These direct the mind besieged by its own darkness, and often enamored of its own ignorance, toward its end, or at least do not permit it to sleep idly and securely upon its vices and grow torpid in a heavy lethargy.

In these matters the world of the impious generally agrees with the best men, although afterward there is a great difference of judging and acting in the choice made. Sudden and great dangers strike religion into the faithful and turn them toward piety, prayer, and detestation of sins; they inflame superstition in the impious and drive them to atrocious crimes. The Ninevites and Bethulians fast and pray when destruction is before their eyes. But the king of the Moabites sacrifices his firstborn upon the walls and is delivered more miserably than he would have been conquered. Curtius casts himself down for the danger of the legions. The Romans bury a Greek man and Greek woman, a Gallic man and Gallic woman. The Carthaginians burn patrician boys of select beauty and character as a whole burnt offering to Satan.

All naturally perceive that some divine power--ἀποτρόπαιον--is fit and beneficent for averting calamities and diminishing evils; all trust that, by propitiating it, they shall possess it as an ally; all acknowledge that they and their affairs depend upon another. They err only in identifying it. "If the Tiber rises to the walls, if the Nile does not rise over the fields, if the sky stands still, if the earth moves, if there is famine, if pestilence--the cry immediately is: 'The Christians to the lion!'" Tertullian, Apology, chapter 40. Thus the most guilty cried out for innocent blood, either because they thought or pretended that Christians were the causes of every public disaster and every popular misfortune.

This, therefore, ought especially to strike our age's secret apostates and perfidious dissemblers: among the impieties of the gentiles, their atheism was exceedingly rare. I am not unaware that very many things are excellently said by them, yet true things are mingled with errors and falsehoods, as in Plato, Laws, Book IV: "Ὡς θεὸς μὲν πάντα, καὶ μετὰ θεὸν τύχη, καὶ καιρός τ᾽ ἀνθρώπινα διακυβερνῶσι ξύμπαντα." "God, and with God fortune and occasion, govern all things."

Why does he thrust upon God fortune--which is nothing, or, if it is anything, is rash, blind, and subject to God--συμβασιλεύουσαν, and add it, as it were? Why does he thrust upon him καιρόν, occasion, as a partner in his kingdom, when every opportunity is from God? Nevertheless, even the authority of those who err ought to prevail against our pseudo-statesmen when they speak true things, because their understanding is not so far removed from the truth that all but the very few wandered into such great impiety.

Tertullian certainly teaches in the Apology that the Platonists located God within the world and seated him within that which he governs after the example of a shipmaster. Nor did the great admirer of Plato--who is as a certain god to Cicero--himself depart from Plato. For thus he speaks in Book I of On the Nature of the Gods: "There is some God within the world who governs it." The same man, in On the Laws: "There is no nation so savage or so iron-hearted that, even if it is ignorant what sort of God it ought to have, it nevertheless does not know that it ought to have one." And in Book II he demonstrates "that the world and all its parts were constituted by the providence of God from the beginning, are administered at every time, and that provision is made by God for individual things."

§ 2. He received these things from Plato, Laws, Book I, where Plato asserts that a commonwealth cannot be governed without the assistance of the divine power. For just as beasts and living creatures devoid of reason cannot take care of themselves or govern themselves by themselves, but require the command of a human being to govern them, so human beings cannot be led to happiness unless God himself governs and leads them by the hand. It is assuredly so, for our acts of providence are timid and uncertain.

§ 3. Aristotle himself, Metaphysics, Book XI, chapter 10, teaches that there is one God, the administrator of all things. And in On the World: "What a pilot is in a ship, a driver in a chariot, a precentor in a chorus, a law in a city, and finally a commander in an army--this God is in the world." Altogether true: "Εστὶν γὰρ ἡ πρόνοια ἰδίᾳ καὶ δημοσίᾳ, καὶ πανταχῇ." Divine providence is discerned in private and public affairs, everywhere among the nations.

Philo appears to have borrowed this from Aristotle: "It must be believed that, just as a charioteer stands over a chariot or a pilot over a ship, so in all affairs there stands over them the one who presides over bodies, souls, living creatures, minds, angels, and all natures contained by earth, air, or heaven, both visible and invisible. For he governs the whole world as it depends upon himself."

Seneca says most rightly in On Providence, chapter 1: "For who would believe that so great a work stands without a guardian, and that this course and recourse of the stars are chance impulses?" Indeed, even those who perish are a care to him: "μέλει μοι ὀλλύμενοί περ--they are a care to God, although they perish." Plato in the Epinomis asserts that the gods care for great and small things, and that things which happen suddenly are not unforeseen by them. For an eclipse is produced by a sudden obscuration of the light and yet many centuries beforehand is marked out for a certain hour and moment of the hour.

§ 4. Beautiful and plainly royal is the speech which Cambyses delivered to his son when he was about to depart among the Medes: "I commend this one thing above all, and I desire it to be stored in your memory as a precious treasure given by your father. Be a friend to God and pious toward him, and undertake nothing unless the divine power has been invoked. For the nature of mortals is weak and dull; but nothing escapes the wisdom of God, and all things fall according to the desire of those to whom it is present."

He himself, unmoved and always like himself, moves all these things, and principally moves them through his deputies. Lipsius excellently expounded this in the preface to his book On the Roman Military: "Just as in the world above there is one God who governs and regulates this entire structure, so upon earth he has appointed certain men as his administrators and deputies, to guard and administer it in its parts. He has willed that certain of these grow into great resources, forces, and works. What else does he do but show in an image that heavenly power, without end and measure, which he himself possesses and channels through those streams and conduits? Therefore, just as when we gaze upon the heaven and those flashing stars we are led from them to a certain pure, first, and inaccessible light, so from this human greatness we are led to its author and fountain, God."

And Seneca: "God is near; he is with you; he is within you. Thus I say, Lucilius: a sacred Spirit sits within us, observer and guardian of our good and evil deeds."

§ 5. Distinguished indeed is the preamble of the Locrian laws enacted by Zaleucus--if only it spoke about one God--which Stobaeus reports in Discourse 42: "All who inhabit the world or a region ought to be persuaded that gods exist, because this becomes manifest from an inspection of heaven and the entire world and from the most beautiful disposition and order of the things within them." "For providence is the maker and governor of all matter," says Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, Book III--"of all things, for not only of great things but also of the smallest."

§ 6. Epictetus transmitted to us the distinction among human beings emerging from error and darkness toward the light of truth: "As regards the gods, there are those who deny that any divine power exists. There are those who grant that one exists but say that it is inactive, careless, and provides for nothing. There are third men who say that it both exists and provides, but only for great and heavenly things and for none of the earthly. Fourth men say that it provides for both heavenly and earthly things, but only universally, not for individuals and each one separately. But the fifth, in whose party are Ulysses and Socrates, assert and establish this: 'O God, I DO NOT LIE HIDDEN FROM OR DECEIVE YOU EVEN IN MY SMALLEST MOVEMENT.'"

Accordingly, Cicero in Book IV of the Academica neither justly nor truly blames the Stoics because they bring down God's majesty to the perfection of bees and ants. For God does not make these things while solicitous, anxious, and busied, or drawn away from greater affairs, but without labor or care and, as Clement of Alexandria says, "οὐ μεριζόμενος, οὐκ ἀποτεμνόμενος, οὐ μεταβαίνων ἐκ τόπου εἰς τόπον, πάντῃ δὲ ὢν πάντοτε, καὶ μηδαμῇ περιεχόμενος, ὅλος νοῦς, ὅλος φῶς, ὅλος ὀφθαλμός, πάντα ὁρῶν, πάντα ἀκούων, πάντα εἰδώς"--"not divided, not cut apart, not passing from place to place, but existing everywhere always and circumscribed nowhere; wholly mind, wholly light, wholly eye; seeing all things, hearing all things, knowing all things."

He who acknowledges him and conducts all things in his sight can readily give good counsels and expect that the great παντοκράτωρ, the "Almighty," will confirm them and grant success.

CHAPTER XI

It Is Taught by Reason That Divine Providence Governs All Things

§ 1. Until now I have brought forward the testimonies of others. I shall now confront atheists, Epicureans, and followers of Diagoras in their own home and pursue their conscience until I extort either a confession of truth or assent.

I prefer to introduce the first argument in the words of an excellent philosopher rather than my own. Seneca, On Providence:

> It is superfluous at present to show that so great a work does not stand without some guardian; that this fixed coursing of the stars is not the product of chance impulses; that things which chance sets in motion are often disturbed and quickly collide, whereas this unobstructed velocity proceeds at the command of an eternal law, carrying so many things by land and sea and so many exceedingly bright lights shining according to their appointed arrangement; that this order does not belong to wandering matter; and that things which came together rashly would not hang with such great art that the earth's exceedingly heavy weight should sit unmoved and watch the flight of the heaven hastening around it; that the seas poured into the valleys should soften the lands and perceive no increase from the rivers; and that immense things should be born from the smallest seeds.

> Not even those things which appear confused and uncertain--I mean rains and clouds, the blows of crashing thunderbolts, fires poured out when the summits of mountains are broken, tremors of the quaking ground, and the other things which the tumultuous part of nature sets in motion around the earth--occur without reason, although they are sudden. They too possess their own causes no less than things which, seen in foreign places, are marvels, such as warm waters amid the waves and new expanses of islands springing up in the vast sea.

> Now, if anyone observes shores laid bare when the sea withdraws into itself and covered again within a short time, he will believe that by some blind rolling the waves are now contracted and driven inward, now break forth and return to their station at a great course; although meanwhile they increase by portions and approach greater or smaller at their appointed hour and day, according as the lunar star has drawn them forth, at whose discretion the ocean overflows.

What cause shall we assign to all changes unless they begin from some one thing and tend altogether toward one end? The stars and their spheres are swept along at a most rapid speed which we can attain by no understanding; yet by that motion they receive no good proper to themselves, but minister to the lower world and to human beings--not by their own will or knowledge, but by the force and decree of a certain supreme intelligence and power.

§ 2. The metaphysicians and theologians explain another argument to us. For the whole universe and the aggregate of all the things within it cannot be from itself, nor did individual things create themselves by their own power; rather, they began to exist from another, and therefore are preserved and directed toward their end by another. The actions and concurrence of so many causes are needed for the particular production, preservation, and increase of things. How, therefore, could they exist from themselves? Or how could they fail if they exist from themselves--that is, through their own essence? That which is from itself does not need another's assistance in order to continue to exist. If, therefore, all things have their origins from another--that is, from God--it is necessary that they exist, be preserved, ruled, and governed by God. No one can deny this right to a δημιουργῷ--to a craftsman--over his own works. That things are not from chance I have already taught by the first argument.

§ 3. If kingdoms are not administered by divine power and providence, they cannot even be ruled in this way. For if God exists, he necessarily exists, and the stability and vicissitude of all human affairs depend upon his nod. If God does not exist, he necessarily does not exist; for God's coming into being belongs among those things which cannot occur.

Since, therefore, nature has given a certain general conception of God, implanted in everyone--for every soul is naturally Christian and, when adversities press or dangers threaten, invokes God and expects help from God--that sense born within every soul and implanted by nature is not so deceived that it pursues ἀδύνατα, things which cannot exist in the nature of things. For if God does not exist, nothing so foreign to reason, so absurd to thought, and so contradictory can be imagined as that God exists. But an opinion that so entangles and overturns itself cannot be natural to everyone.

The most wicked human beings furnish proof. When they see Nemesis and the approaching company of deserved punishments, they understand that such great evils are being prepared for them by God. See the noble Antiochus, now too late displaying a shadow of piety through servile fear. Hear the tyrant of the Romans complaining that he is daily destroyed by the gods, even worse than he feels. See another fleeing every peal of thunder and terrified at every flash of lightning, badly sheltering himself beneath underground vaults and a sealskin.

Why, therefore, can there not be some mind, mistress of all things, uncreated and creative, when the mind of the impious disputes so acutely against its own maker? From where do you possess that force by which you comprehend hidden things, store them in memory, and gather one thing after another by reasoning? No one will pronounce that a mind so capacious, so noble, penetrating all things by understanding, desiring some things and most freely rejecting others, has its origin from anything other than a certain most excellent mind and intelligence. For how will a brutish thing devoid of reason be able to produce and order such great skill in understanding and perceiving and such swift movements of desire?

§ 4. Our most learned Lessius, in On Providence, argument 12, teaches that very many absurdities follow if we deny that God exists. These are his words:

> If there is no divine power and no providence by which human affairs are governed, many absurdities assuredly follow, foreign to every reason and sound judgment, which clearly prove that this can in no way be established.

> For first it follows that the first and supreme truth concerning divine power and providence opens the door to mortals for every impurity of life, every iniquity and injustice, every pride, arrogance, and tyranny, and finally for perfidy, perjuries, sacrileges, and every class of crimes. For nothing is so monstrous, unjust, or impious that, when fear of the divine power has been removed, the human mind will not dare to undertake and accomplish it, according to that saying of the Psalmist: "The fool has said in his heart: There is no God. They are corrupted and have become abominable in their iniquities," and so forth. Behold the fruit of that teaching and persuasion: the foulness and abominable enormity of every crime.

> That this follows is manifest. For just as, if there is some divine power, the first and supreme truth is that there is a God who governs the world, so, if there is no divine power, the first and supreme truth will be that there is no God who governs the world. For it will be the truth concerning that which is apprehended by all as the supreme and first principle of all things. But this truth will extinguish in human minds every fear and reverence of the divine power; and when fear has been removed, the way lies open to every crime. But what more absurd thing can be said or thought than that the first and highest truth and the greatest secret of divinity, when known or apprehended by human beings, should open the way to every wickedness and shameful deed and make them the most criminal and impure?

Secondly, it follows that that which is false and impossible and a mere chimera is the cause of all religion, piety, justice, temperance, modesty, benevolence, patience, and finally of every virtue and moral goodness--as well as of peace and tranquility in the commonwealth and every good in the human race. For persuasion concerning the divine power, and love and fear of it, produce all these goods; and the greater and more vehement these have been, the greater the goods that arise from them in human minds and in the political condition. Hence there has never existed a well-constituted commonwealth in which religion and persuasion concerning the providence of the divine power did not flourish; and privately, the more reverent and religious each person was toward the divine power, the more distinguished he was in probity and innocence of life. On the contrary, the less anyone esteemed the divine power, the more criminal he was, as is evident from both profane and sacred history.

But to what madness does it belong to believe that a false and impossible fiction possesses such great force toward every virtue, while solid truth possesses such great enticement toward every shameful deed and destruction?

Thirdly, it follows that true and highest wisdom extinguishes every virtue and makes human beings the worst, whereas the highest error and madness arouses them toward every virtue and makes them the best. For if there is no divine power, it is the highest error and madness to believe certainly that there is a divine power and providence, while it is the highest wisdom to believe that these are nothing except human fictions and chimeras. Likewise it follows that truth and wisdom are exceedingly pernicious to a human being and the commonwealth, but error exceedingly salutary; that truth and wisdom must be concealed as much as possible, as the poison of minds and every commonwealth, but error promoted by every means, as the fountain of every good; that the highest light of the intellect brings the greatest darkness upon minds, and the greatest intellectual darkness produces the light and beauty of minds. All these things are full of frenzy and madness.

Fourthly, it follows that all those who were ever most distinguished for wisdom, holiness of life, miracles, and the prophetic spirit were deceived in the greatest matter and were unable to attain the truth concerning the nature of the divine power. For all these men acknowledged and supremely venerated divinity and providence. But those who were infamous for impiety, foulness of life, and every enormity of crimes alone grasped this secret, for all who despised the divine power were such men. The worst of all mortals, therefore, were the wisest, but the best of all were the most foolish and enveloped in the greatest darkness of ignorance and errors.

Fifthly, it follows that to love God, fear vengeance, offer sacrifices, pray to the divine power, celebrate it with hymns and praises, and keep an oath are not good things, but empty, foolish, impious things contrary to right reason, no differently than loving, fearing, worshiping, and praising a chimera or another fiction of the human mind. For if divinity is a fiction like a chimera, it is manifest that no more should be rendered to it than to a chimera.

>

Sixthly, it follows that to be impious, sacrilegious, blasphemous, and a despiser of the divine power is not evil or contrary to right reason, but that these things are good and worthy of praise, since they are consonant with true teaching about the divine power. For if there is no divine power, all those acts by which it is despised and afflicted with ignominy are good: both because they are certain declarations of a secret truth and because they are effective for removing from human beings a false persuasion concerning providence and the divine power--just as insults against the idols of the gentiles are praiseworthy because by them we testify that no divinity inheres in the idols. Nothing is more contemptible than that which neither exists nor can exist.

Seventhly, it follows that the world is like a ship tossed upon the sea, destitute of helm and helmsman; likewise, like the greatest commonwealth composed of every class of human beings, in which there are no laws, no judge, no ruler, and no guardian of tranquility and the public good. If it is so, how can the world continue to exist, especially since it consists of things so unlike, contrary, and contending? For just as a ship without a pilot is tossed here and there by chance impulses until it is dashed upon rocks, strikes shoals, or is swallowed by the waves, and as a commonwealth without a ruler consumes itself with slaughters and seditions, so the world will necessarily be borne along in the most disordered manner and dissolved by the conflict of contraries if there is no ruler who directs it and causes contending things to conspire in concord.

Eighthly, it follows that this universe and the formation and arrangement of its parts arose by chance and coalesced into this form and appearance. For if there is no mind that formed its individual parts and arranged and composed them into this structure which we see, it must necessarily be confessed that the whole happened by chance, according to the opinion of Democritus, who established that all things were formed from the chance impulse and concurrence of atoms. But what else is this than sheer folly and want of reason? Someone sees a most splendid palace perfected with the highest art, whose structure all architects marvel at. He asks what craftsman constructed it. He is answered that it was constructed by no craftsman, but that once a mountain planted with trees existed in the same place; when it collapsed through an earthquake, its parts leapt apart, and by this fall and collision the individual parts were so formed that they suddenly coalesced, in place of a shapeless heap, into this appearance of a substructure and the form of a palace. Who will be so witless as to believe this?

>

These and many other things manifestly follow when that principle has been established. Everyone sees how foreign all of them are to every appearance of truth, how opposed to the light of reason, and how horrible to utter. Therefore that principle too, which is the fountain of such streams, must be most foreign to truth.

Someone will say that false persuasion in religions often possesses the greatest force for deterring human minds from crimes and impelling them toward probity and justice. For the gentiles, who established several gods according to the multitude and diversity of human affairs and thought that human affairs were conducted by their providence and that rewards or punishments were decreed for mortals according to their merits--although all these things were false and impossible--nevertheless, from this conception of mind, abstained from many injuries and crimes by which they believed those divine powers were offended, lest they incur their wrath and pay penalties either in this life or in the future. Accordingly, the argument which we brought forward above in the second place, number 141, could appear to someone by no means firm.

I answer: the persuasion of the gentiles was indeed false in particular--insofar as they thought that these or those beings were divine powers and cared for human affairs--but not in general, insofar as they thought that there was some divine power to which human affairs were a care and which required an account of deeds. Hence, when either through fear of offending the divine power or through desire to please it they abstained from evil or did some good, they were impelled not by the force of the persuasion insofar as it was false concerning such a particular divine power, but insofar as it was true in general. For they erred only in the subject to which they attributed the nature of divinity and providence, attributing it to those to whom it ought by no means to have been attributed and venerating it in them. Accordingly, they did not abolish the very formal nature of divinity and providence, but established it; and therefore they retained in some manner the true foundation of political justice.

> But if there is no divine power and no providence, the very foundation in general is altogether false and fictitious, and therefore it cannot happen that it should possess any force toward probity of life. Or if it possesses any force--as experience establishes that it possesses the greatest--it is evident that it is not a fictitious but a true thing.

I wished to report these things in the words of the supreme theologian because I judge that they can be stated neither more briefly, nor more vigorously and clearly.

§ 5. These things are so self-consistent that everyone renders testimony to God in the tribunal of his own mind. "I summon a new testimony," says Tertullian in his book On the Testimony of the Soul, > indeed, one better known than all literature, more debated than every doctrine, more commonly published than every publication, greater than the whole human being--that is, the whole of that which belongs to the human being.

What, therefore, does he demand from the soul?

> If we do not please you when we proclaim the Lord--under this single name, the one from whom are all things and under whom is the universe--speak your testimony, if you know it thus. For we hear you too, openly and with a complete liberty that is not permitted to us, pronounce thus at home and abroad: "What God shall have given"; and "If God shall will." By that expression you both signify that some one exists and confess all power to him whose will you look toward. At the same time you deny that the others are gods when you call them by their proper names--Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Minerva. For you confirm that he alone is God whom you name only "God," so that even when you sometimes call those others gods, you appear to use a name belonging to another and, as it were, on loan.

> Nor are you ignorant of the nature of God which we proclaim. "God is good"; "God does good": these are your expressions.

And afterward:

> Hence, O soul, from consciousness you have it ready at home and abroad, with no one mocking or forbidding you, to proclaim: "God sees all things"; "I commend it to God"; "God will repay"; and "God will judge between us." From where is this in you, O soul that is not Christian?

Tertullian marvels that even in the temples of demons they implore God as judge, and therefore exclaims: "O testimony of truth, which among the demons themselves makes a witness of the Christians!"

> These testimonies of the soul are as simple as they are true; as ordinary as they are simple; as common as they are ordinary; as natural as they are common; as divine as they are natural. I do not think they can appear frivolous and cold to anyone if he considers the majesty of nature, from which the authority of the soul is assessed. As much as you grant to the teacher, so much will you adjudge to the pupil: nature is the teacher, the soul the pupil. Whatever the former taught or the latter learned was delivered by God, the teacher, namely, of the teacher herself.

> It is for you to judge what the soul can presume concerning her principal instructor from her who is within you. Perceive her who causes you to perceive. Consider her as a prophet in presentiments, an augur in all things, and one who foresees among events. Is it marvelous if, given by God to the human being, she knows how to divine? It is equally marvelous if she knows him by whom she was given. Even when circumvented by the adversary, she remembers her author, his goodness, his decree, her own end, and the adversary himself. Is it thus marvelous if, given by God, she proclaims those same things which God gave his own people to know?

> But he who has not judged outbursts of this kind from the soul to be the teaching of nature and the tacit trusts of an inborn and innate consciousness will say rather that the habit of speaking in this manner has been strengthened from opinions circulated among the people and from the use of published writings, as though into a fault.

Finally:

> "Human being" is one name belonging to all nations, and there is one soul; the voice varies, but there is one spirit; the sound varies; each nation has its own language, but the subject matter of language is common. God is everywhere, and God's goodness everywhere; the demon is everywhere, and the curse of the demon everywhere; the invocation of divine judgment everywhere; death everywhere and consciousness of death everywhere; and testimony everywhere. Every soul by its own right proclaims things concerning which we are not permitted even to mutter. Therefore every soul is deservedly both accused and a witness: as much accused of error as it is a witness of truth. And it shall stand before the courts of God on the day of judgment, having nothing to say. You used to proclaim God and did not seek him; you abominated demons and adored them.

§ 6. Finally, all things tending in a most orderly manner toward their ends show that God is the maker and ruler of all dominions, and therefore of the whole world. For what art, what intelligence, can order actions, instruments, times, place, circumstances, and connected things so fittingly and without error? Yet the things themselves recognize none of these; they are produced and produce through a certain instinct and impulse of nature, ignorant of their own undertaking.

Consider a grain of mustard. It is small among seeds, and yet its smallest portion is alive and, by a rich and oily moisture, is to emerge into a tree. But within the smallest particle of the smallest seed there is the greatest variety of parts. One part is strengthened into the trunk and, as it were, wood; another softens into pith; another is stretched into bark; another unfolds itself into a leaf; another into a flower; another lowers itself downward into the earth to draw up juices. Nor is it divided only into these parts, but also into particles of the parts; for trunk, bark, leaves, and flowers possess their own flesh, bones, veins, and coverings, so far that there is no tree which you could not readily divide into hundreds of heterogeneous parts.

How, therefore, is there so great a power in so slight a little body, parts so distinct, and such marvelous efficacy in them that they distribute the raw humors of the earth, toward such various ends, into things so diverse? For one part they thicken and harden into wood, another into bark, another into flower, another into leaves. What works these things except distinguished wisdom, the architect of all things? And it directs all these things toward one end, namely the utility of human beings.

For whose sake, therefore, will anyone say the world was made? For the sake, namely, of those living beings that employ reason: these are gods and human beings, than whom assuredly nothing is better. Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, Book II; and Lactantius, On the Anger of God, chapter 13. True is the opinion of the Stoics, who say that the world was constructed for our sake. For all things of which it consists and which the world generates from itself have been accommodated to the utility of the human being. Seneca says exceedingly well in On Benefits, Book VI, chapter 23, if only he acknowledged one GOD:

> Add now that external things do not compel the gods, but their own eternal will is a law to them. They established things which they would not change. Accordingly, they cannot appear about to do something although unwilling, because they willed to persevere in whatever cannot cease; nor do the gods ever repent of their first counsel. Without doubt, it is not permitted for them to stop and depart in the contrary direction. But they remain in their purpose not because their own force holds them there through weakness, but because it is not permitted to depart from the best things, and it was thus decreed to proceed.

> In that first constitution, when they disposed all things, they also saw our affairs and took account of the human being. Accordingly, they cannot appear to run their course and unfold their work for their own sake alone, because > we too are a part of the work. We therefore owe a benefit both to the sun and moon and to the other heavenly bodies, because although the things for which they arise are more important than they are, they nevertheless assist us, who are going toward greater things.

>

> Add that they assist by design, and we are therefore placed under obligation: we did not fall ignorantly into their benefit, but they knew that we would receive these things which we receive. And although a greater thing was proposed to them, and the fruit of their activity was greater than the preservation of mortal beings, nevertheless their mind was also directed toward our advantages from the beginning of things, and that order was given to the world so that it may appear that care of us was not held among the last things.

> We owe dutiful affection to our parents, and many did not come together in order to beget us. The gods cannot appear not to have known what they were about to produce, since they immediately provided nourishment and assistance for all; nor did they beget through negligence those for whom they had generated so many things. For nature considered us before it made us, nor are we so slight a work that we could have fallen from its attention.

Would he not appear altogether Christian if he attributed these things to the one true God?

If, therefore, so great a mass turns for our sake; if things so small are composed with such great artistry and providence that within almost a single grain there is no less material for wonder than within the most immense spheres of the heavens, certainly the same God governs the society of human beings, the alternating turns of commanding and obeying, and all rewards and punishments.

How could he neglect the government of the most excellent creature, when he equipped the commonwealth of vegetables, so to speak, with laws so harmonious and so full for being born, growing, flowering, bearing fruit, and producing seed, and did so for this end, that they should serve the human being? If, therefore, he judged brute servants, estates, and beasts of burden worthy of such care, who would marvel that he judged us worthy to be ruled, he who governs all our possessions? For he does not imitate foolish parents who prepare fields, money, houses, and a household for their children, but neglect the children themselves.

CHAPTER XII

That the Commonwealth Is Ruled by God Is Shown by Examples

§ 1. There will be a place more proper to this disputation in Book II. For I shall show that the wicked are punished and good princes favored and defended.

Divine vengeance proceeds with a slow but weighty step, although punishment is sometimes made present swiftly. Indeed, this most especially demonstrates the active force of divine judgment against transgressors. Although no one among sinners escapes, but is either soon led to punishment or is deferred--unless through repentance and good deeds he anticipates the avenging hand of the divine power--the greatest part of punishments is preserved for the future. Yet in the meantime so many temporal evils precede those everlasting evils that no one can doubt that God exists, who rules and judges mortal affairs, rewards the good, and avenges himself upon the impious. He judges the world in equity and the peoples in his truth.

What some interpret as the necessity of fate, and others as a fortuitous event, is the judgment of God. Hence come the marvelous and unexpected revolutions of affairs. There is no year that is not marked by some distinguished fall or death of powerful persons--indeed, no day that does not see certain men lying low in the evening whom it had seen proud in the morning. This is not done by > a star and the wondrous power of hidden fate, but by God--God, I say, because he calls the stars and they say, “We are present”; he who made those lights not for their own service, but for the utility of human beings.

§ 2. Struck by that judgment, the first fratricide, wandering and trembling with perpetual dread, carried the marks of his crime around the world. By that judgment the flood inundated the lands, heavenly flame burned the Sodomites, the Red Sea overwhelmed the Egyptians, and Israel destroyed the Canaanites. By this judgment Korah, Dathan, Abiram, and many thousands fell in the desert. For many years Israel was oppressed by the tyranny of neighboring kings; afterward it was afflicted under its own kings and condemned to seventy years of servitude.

But let us consider greater examples. God permitted the avarice of the Assyrians to exhaust all Asia; he despoiled them through the Chaldeans; and the luxury of the Chaldeans through the Medes and Persians, who ruled most widely and, raised even to the highest summit and openly displaying vices greater than their dominion, were compelled through the Macedonians, the most contemptible nation of Greece, to accept the yoke of servitude. But he cast the Macedonians, who had collided among themselves, before the Romans to be defeated, crushed, and stripped to the bone.

Then, when the sins of the Romans exceeded their measure, so that they could neither be tolerated any longer nor bear a remedy, he first wore the Romans down by mutual slaughter and then divided them among the Cimbri, Heruli, Goths, Vandals, Lombards, and other barbarians. Now all Asia, the more excellent portion of Africa, and noble Greece pay the penalties of despised religion beneath the bitter and harsh dominion of the Ottomans.

All disasters that have afflicted either the whole world or its parts in turn are executions of divine judgments. “We read,” says Tertullian in the Apology, chapter 40, “that Hierapolis and the islands of Delos, Rhodes, and Cos perished together with many thousands of human beings. Plato also records that a land greater than Asia and Africa was taken away by the Atlantic Sea. The earthquake also drank up the Corinthian Sea. And the force of the waves severed Lucania from Italy and banished it into the name of Sicily.” The punishments were exceedingly ancient, but the crimes which drew punishment as their companion were still more ancient.

The ancients relate that during the reign of the impious Phaethon, Greece and Ethiopia were devastated by fires and the king himself destroyed by a thunderbolt. In vengeance for adultery, the kingdom of Priam and barbarian opulence passed into funeral pyres. Sardanapalus the Assyrian, together with a herd of shameful men and women, brought his immense luxury to an end in his burning palace. A most just thunderbolt crushed Tullus Hostilius, king of the Romans. We read of the fires of Jerusalem, Athens, Rome, Sidon, Tyre, Thebes, Persepolis, Saguntum, Corinth, Carthage, Numantia, Byzantium, Nicomedia, Aquileia, Padua, Antioch, Basel, Venice, and other cities, and that they were frequently repeated. I pass over earthquakes and other misfortunes.

I would show the great rewards given to the piety of kings and peoples, so that by this part too I might establish God's rule, but I prefer to defer them to that part in which I shall treat of piety. For no thing demonstrates divine sovereignty within the commonwealth more clearly than the rewards of virtue.

CHAPTER XIII

The Objections of Atheists Are Answered

§ 1. There are many things which atheists seriously, and the weak and inexperienced for the sake of learning, are accustomed to object against providence and the government of God. For since the world is, as Eusebius defines it in book [reading uncertain], "Σύστημα δὲ οὐρανοῦ, καὶ ἀέρος, καὶ γῆς καὶ θαλάττης, καὶ τῶν ἐν τούτοις φύσεων," a system or structure composed of heaven, air, earth, water, and the natures which are in these; since it is the common city of human beings and angels, so that one commonwealth is formed from the whole world--so much so that the Stoics say that heaven is properly a city, while they affirm that those which we inhabit are indeed called cities but are not cities--if, therefore, this commonwealth is governed by the best, most provident, and wisest prince, God, it is necessary that it also be ruled in the best and most tranquil manner, and that it be well with the good and ill with the wicked. Rewards should have been established for the well-deserving, punishments for the impious.

But in that commonwealth of the world, they say, in that vast city, the felicity of the wicked is often greater; and that weapon not only strikes lowly souls ignorant of heavenly things, but is also fixed in strong and fortified breasts. Why, therefore, do adverse things happen to good men and prosperous things to the wicked? This man plundered a province, drinks into the daylight, and, as the poet says, enjoys himself while the gods are angry.

> Licinus lies in a marble tomb, but Cato in a small one,
> Pompey in none: do we believe that there are gods?

Thus in David, Psalm 72:9: "They have set their mouth against heaven, and their tongue has passed through the earth. And they said: How does God know? And is there knowledge in the Most High? Behold, these themselves are sinners, and, abounding in the world, they have obtained riches. And I said: Therefore I have justified my heart without cause, and I have washed my hands among the innocent. I thought that I might know this: it is labor before me, until I enter into the sanctuary of God and understand concerning their last things."

This, then, is an ancient complaint:

> Τολμῶ κατειπεῖν, μήποτ᾽ οὐκ εἰσὶν θεοί·
>
> Κακοὶ γὰρ εὐτυχοῦντες ἐκπλήσσουσί με.
>
> I dare to say: are there gods?
> For prosperous wicked men render me astonished.

The second argument is that results generally correspond to industry, labor, counsels, cunning, and human providence; therefore human minds ought not to be turned toward other things, but each man ought to trust in his own ability and providence. Hence the Spartans warned that fortune must be invoked with the hand set to work, and the Attic people said, "Σὺν Ἀθηνᾷ καὶ χεῖρα κίνει," "With Pallas, move your hand as well." These do not yet wander far astray; worse is this saying:

> Divine power is not yet absent, if prudence is present.

For it sets human--that is, most wretched--prudence in the place of divine power. And others say: Why was God so inequitable in the distribution of fate that he prescribed poverty, wounds, and bitter funerals for good men? And so, if God does not bring it about, error, imprudence, or sloth brings it about. The Romans subdued the world, but by labor, boldness, endurance, the appearance of justice, and prudence. The Laconians held the sovereignty of Greece, but by their own industry. If in every matter you employ stratagem, there is no reason for you to seek another God.

Hence come words impious and hostile to God. “That wise man, full of joy, cheerful and calm, unshaken, lives with the gods on equal terms,” says Seneca, Epistle 59. And not merely on equal terms, but not needing God: the same author, Epistle 31, says, “This is the supreme good; if you attain it, you begin to be an associate of the gods, not a suppliant.” But, that you may behold the highest summit of madness, hear Sextius in Seneca, Epistle 73: “Sextius used to say that Jupiter can do no more than a good man. Jupiter has more things which he may bestow upon human beings; but between two good men the richer is not the better, any more than, between two men who possess equal skill in directing a helm, you would call him the better whose ship is larger and more splendid.” And Seneca in that place: “In what does Jupiter surpass a good man? He is good for a longer time.” These are their words, and they exclaim:

> By this way one goes to the stars.

Here they make human beings equal to God not only in wisdom but also in felicity, so much so that someone spoke less wickedly when he said:

> My right hand is a god to me, and the missile weapon which I brandish.

The third argument: it is unworthy of divine majesty to summon it down to all things, even the vilest--to the offspring of worms and ants, and to the works of human beings, very many of which either are vicious or are joined with vices.

The fourth argument is this: Nature performs all things by the same course; the circuits of the heavens are fixed; the changes of the lower world are likewise, in their own fashion, not very different; the perpetual alternations in the birth and death of animals and plants, and also infancy, adolescence, manhood, and old age succeeding in the same manner in all human beings, show that nature suffices for itself and that all these things occur by a certain natural law and necessity, and not by some other mind which exercises dominion over nature itself.

The fifth argument: Monsters are born; therefore that most wise mind errs and fails in its work. Hence come two-headed, three-bodied, hundred-handed, and six-fingered creatures; and, by an opposite error, one-eyed and one-handed creatures; indeed, by an unsociable conjunction of natures, men who are half oxen or oxen that are half human, fetuses with a dog’s face, an ape’s hand, or goats’ feet. Error occurs in other ways too: by distortion of limbs and by the magnitude of certain limbs or of the whole body. And so the weary or exuberant workwoman often produces Longhands, giants, and dwarfs. To what end are there so many poisons of serpents and plants, so many terrors of wild beasts, and so many annoyances of insects, if provision has been made for us by God? Hence also arise the very many complaints of very many men against the works of God.

Hence it is that Cotta the Academic, in the third book On the Nature of the Gods, denies everything to God or attributes all evils to him, even crimes themselves. “For if,” he says, “the gods gave reason to human beings, they also gave malice. For malice is a crafty and deceitful method of doing harm.” From these things they conclude that fortune, prudence, cunning, successful crimes, human life, and all affairs rule events, and that no account is to be taken of a more divine providence.

§ 2. These are ancient objections proposed not by one man alone; nevertheless, a true and solid answer has customarily been given not only by the holy prophets and Fathers, but also by the most excellent of the philosophers.

§ 3. The first argument has always moved very many. The philosophers themselves in Cicero, and Cicero himself in the fifth book On the Nature of the Gods, can scarcely defend the gods. I shall set forth the complaints in Cicero’s words and shall answer them.

“Telamon,” he says, “indeed concludes the whole question in one verse: whether the gods neglect human beings.

> For if they cared, it would be well with the good and ill with the wicked; which is now far from the case.

They certainly ought to have made all men good, if indeed they took counsel for the human race. But if that was too little, they ought at least to have taken counsel for the good. Why, therefore, did the Carthaginian crush the two Scipios, most valiant and excellent men, in Spain? Why did Maximus carry out the funeral of his consular son? Why did Hannibal kill Marcellus? Why did Cannae take Paulus away? Why was the body of Regulus handed over to the cruelty of the Carthaginians? Why did the walls of his own home not protect Africanus? But these things are ancient, as are very many others. Let us see things nearer to us. Why is my maternal uncle, the most innocent and likewise most learned P. Rutilius, in exile? Why was my companion Drusus killed in his own home? Why was Q. Scaevola, high priest, a model of moderation and prudence, slaughtered before the image of Vesta? Why also were so many leading men of the state killed by Cinna? Why could Gaius Marius, the most faithless of all men, order Q. Catulus, a man of the most eminent dignity, to die?

"The day would fail me if I wished to enumerate the good to whom things turned out badly; and no less if I were to commemorate the wicked for whom they turned out excellently. For why did Marius, after becoming consul for the seventh time, die so prosperously as an old man in his own home? Why did Cinna, the most cruel of all men, reign for so long? But he paid the penalty. It would have been better for him to have been restrained and prevented from killing so many eminent men than for him to pay the penalty himself at some later time. Q. Varius, a most savage man, perished with the greatest torment and punishment; but because he had taken away Drusus by the sword and Metellus by poison, it would have been better for them to be preserved than for Varius to pay the penalties of his crime.

"Dionysius was tyrant of a most opulent and most prosperous city for thirty-eight years. How many punishments before him did Pisistratus, Phalaris, and Apollodorus endure in the very flower of Greece, although they first tortured and killed many! And many robbers often pay the penalty; nevertheless, we cannot say that more captives have not been cruelly killed than robbers. We have learned that Anaxarchus, the Democritean, was tortured to death by the Cypriot tyrant, and Zeno of Elea killed under torture. What shall I say of Socrates? I am accustomed to shed tears at his death when reading Plato. Do you see, therefore, that in the judgment of the gods--if they see human affairs--the distinction has been removed? Diogenes the Cynic indeed used to say that Harpalus, who in those times was regarded as a prosperous robber, bore testimony against the gods, because he lived so long amid that fortune.

"Dionysius, of whom I spoke before, after he had pillaged the sanctuary of Proserpina at Locri, was sailing to Syracuse. And when he was holding a most favorable course, he said, 'Do you see, friends, what good navigation is given by the immortal gods to sacrilegious men?' And the clever man, when he had perceived it clearly and well, persisted in the same opinion. When he had brought his fleet to the Peloponnese and entered the sanctuary of Olympian Jupiter, he stripped from him a golden cloak of great weight, with which Gelo the tyrant had adorned Jupiter from the spoils of the Carthaginians. And in this too he jested that a golden cloak was burdensome in summer and cold in winter; and he threw a woolen mantle over him, saying that it was suitable for every season of the year.

"The same man ordered the golden beard of Aesculapius at Epidaurus to be removed [the transcription is defective here], for it was not fitting, he said, for the son to be bearded when the father was beardless in all his sanctuaries. He then ordered the silver tables to be removed from all the shrines on which, according to the custom of ancient Greece, the words 'Of the Good Gods' were inscribed, saying that he wished to make use of their goodness. The same man without hesitation took away the little golden Victories, bowls, and crowns which were supported by the outstretched hands of the images; and he said that he was receiving, not removing, them, for it was folly to be unwilling to take from those from whom we prayed for good things when they were offering and giving them.

"They say that this same man carried the things which, as I have said, had been taken from the sanctuaries into the forum and sold them through a herald; and, when the money had been exacted, he decreed that whatever each man possessed from the sacred things should be returned by each man to its own sanctuary before a fixed day. Thus he joined injury toward human beings to impiety toward the gods. Therefore neither did Olympian Jupiter strike him with a thunderbolt, nor did Aesculapius destroy him by making him waste away with a wretched and lingering disease. He died in his own bed and was carried to the pyre of Tympanis; and the power which he himself had obtained through crime he handed down to his son in place of an inheritance, as if it were just and legitimate."

He concludes at last in this fashion: "Therefore the prosperities and favorable affairs of wicked men refute--as Diogenes used to say--the force and power of all the gods."

§ 4. First, indeed, I answer that human judgment is deceived in the case of many human beings. For it is evident that those whom Cicero calls the best and holiest were entangled in many crimes and deserved to undergo punishments. Scaevola, Catulus, Drusus, Metellus, and the others whom he deplores as most holy men slaughtered with torment by the most savage men seem to me not to have been much better than their enemies--nor indeed Socrates, the most shameful teacher of crimes and every outrage. Who, however, will call the Romans innocent if he considers that, as they sat daily at the spectacles of the arena, they ordered the deaths of guilty and innocent alike? "Burn, scourge, cut, kill!" These were the customary words of the entire amphitheater. What greater thing did Phalaris do? Or Pisistratus? They killed fewer for their own protection than those most excellent Roman men killed for pleasure.

Second: human goods are not of such a kind as to contribute any weight toward felicity, nor are human evils such as can make men wretched. For how are poverty and exile burdensome except by estimation alone? Was Fabricius wretched when, beside the hearth, he dined upon the very roots which, as an old triumphator, he had pulled up while clearing his field? Or, to come to our own people, was the patriarch Jacob wretched when by night he placed a stone under his head? Or Paul and Antony, eating bread beside a spring? It is an error to judge that men are not happy unless they heap into their belly fish from a distant shore and fowl from beyond the seas, unless with exotic seasonings they rouse the sluggishness of a nauseated stomach, so that by a novel pleasure they may pile up dishes that will do them harm.

A good man is not rich; a wicked man abounds. What follows? The former will live frugally, the latter disgracefully. Tiberius Caesar sold a mullet of four and a half pounds; Apicius and P. Octavius bid for it. Octavius bought it for five thousand sesterces, that is, one hundred and twenty-five Philippics. Seneca, Epistle 95. Were those gluttons who bought the delicacy which Caesar sold happy? Or was the good man wretched if he could not buy what Caesar did not desire?

Caligula dined for ten million sesterces, and the ingenuity of all men was required so that the revenue of a middling province might become the cost of one dinner. Its price in our coinage is two hundred and fifty thousand Philippics. Let us hear even the pagans themselves, and rich men. Seneca, Consolation to Helvia: "Why do you seek so many things? Evidently our ancestors, whose virtue even now sustains our vices, were unhappy: they prepared food for themselves with their own hand; the earth was their bed; their roofs did not yet gleam with gold; their temples did not yet shine with gems. And so at that time oaths were sworn religiously by gods of earthenware. Those who had invoked them returned to die before the enemy lest they deceive them.

"Evidently our dictator lived less happily: while he heard the ambassadors of the Samnites, he himself turned the cheapest food on the hearth with his own hand--that hand with which he had already often struck the enemy and had deposited his laurel in the lap of Capitoline Jupiter--than Apicius lived within our memory. In that city from which philosophers had once been ordered to depart as corrupters of the young, he professed the science of the cookshop and infected the age with his discipline. It is worthwhile to know his end. When he had poured one hundred million sesterces into his kitchen, when he had swallowed up so many imperial gifts and the enormous revenue of the Capitol in individual revels, burdened by debt he was then compelled for the first time to inspect his accounts. He calculated that ten million sesterces would remain to him; and, as if he would live in the extremity of famine if he lived on ten million sesterces, he ended his life with poison. How great was the luxury for which ten million sesterces was poverty! Go now, and suppose that the measure of money pertains to the matter, not the mind. Someone feared ten million sesterces and fled by poison from that for which others pray in their vows."

God's judgment, therefore, must not be censured in these matters, since that man is happy who desires less, and that man is unhappy whose appetite is immeasurable and incomprehensible, whose desire finds nothing sufficient.

§ 5. But many of the good pass their life amid hunger, thirst, prison, slavery, and torments, while in the meantime the wicked overflow with every pleasure. Their condition is harsher, I confess; nevertheless, this too confirms divine providence for us more than it overthrows it. Even for the public there is great utility in such examples. Reason taught unbelievers what faith taught Christians: we call them trials, they exercises. A wise man regards all adversities as exercises. Virtue withers without an adversary; endurance shows what it can do.

Seneca, On Providence, chapter 2: "Do you not see how differently fathers and mothers show indulgence? Fathers order their children to be roused early to undertake their studies; they do not permit them to be idle even on holidays, and they draw sweat from them, and sometimes tears. But mothers wish to cherish them in their bosom and keep them in the shade: they wish them never to weep, never to be sad, never to labor. God has a father's disposition toward good men, and loves them stoutly. 'Let them,' he says, 'be agitated by works, pains, and losses, that they may gather true strength.' Things fattened through inactivity languish; they fail not only through labor, but through bulk and their very burden. Untouched felicity does not endure any blow; but when it has had a continual struggle with its own inconveniences, it acquires a callus through injuries and yields to no evil; but even if it has fallen, it fights from its knee." These are the words of the Roman wise man.

§ 6. Next, adversities are medicines and means of calling men away from vices; they benefit those very men who suffer them. Hear Jerome on Ezekiel: "What is thought to be punishment is medicine." But because my business is with atheists, let them hear those whom reason led to the point from which they, falling away from faith, have fallen headlong.

Seneca says in On Providence, chapter 3: "Is it for their benefit to be cast into exile, to be led into poverty, to carry out the funerals of children and wife, to be affected by disgrace, to be disabled? If you marvel that this is for someone's benefit, you will marvel that some are cured by iron and fire, and no less by hunger and thirst. But if you consider within yourself that, for the sake of a remedy, some men have their bones scraped and picked out, their veins extracted, and certain limbs amputated which could not remain attached without the destruction of the whole body, you will allow this too to be proved to you: certain inconveniences are for the benefit of those to whom they happen, just as, by Hercules, certain things which are praised and sought are against those whom they have delighted--things very similar to indigestion, drunkenness, and the rest which kill through pleasure."

And a little later: "Let us come to Regulus. How did fortune harm him by making him an example of fidelity, an example of endurance? Nails pierce him, and wherever he has rested his exhausted body he lies upon a wound, and his eyes are suspended in perpetual wakefulness. The more torment, the more glory there will be. Do you wish to know how little he repents of valuing virtue at this price? Restore him and send him into the senate: he will express the same opinion.

"Do you therefore think Maecenas happier? Anxious because of his amours, and weeping over the daily repudiations of his peevish wife, he seeks sleep through the music of harmonies sounding softly from afar. Though he drug himself with unmixed wine, divert himself with the noise of waters, and beguile his anxious mind with a thousand pleasures, he will be as wakeful upon feathers as the other man upon the cross.

"Calamity is the opportunity of virtue. And so God tests, hardens, recognizes, and exercises those whom he loves. Those toward whom he seems indulgent, whom he seems to spare, he preserves soft for evils to come. For you err if you judge anyone exempt: his portion will come to the man who has long been prosperous. Whoever seems to have been dismissed has been deferred. Why does God afflict every excellent man either with ill health or with other inconveniences? Why also are dangerous tasks commanded to the bravest men in camps? A commander sends the choicest men to attack enemies in ambushes by night, or to explore a route, or to drive a garrison from a position. No one of those who go out says, 'The commander has deserved ill of me,' but, 'He has judged well.' Let all who are commanded to suffer things lamentable to the fearful and slothful say the same. We have seemed worthy to God that he should test in us how much human nature could endure.

"Flee pleasures; flee enervated felicity, through which minds grow sodden and, unless something intervenes to remind them of the human lot, are stupefied as if by perpetual drunkenness. A man whom windowpanes have always protected from a draft, whose feet have grown warm among fomentations repeatedly changed, whose dining rooms have been tempered by heat introduced beneath and poured around their walls--a light breeze will not chill this man without danger. Since all things which have exceeded measure do harm, the intemperance of felicity is most dangerous. It disturbs the brain, summons the mind into empty images, and pours a great quantity of intervening darkness between falsehood and truth. Why should it not be better to sustain perpetual unhappiness, which summons one to virtue, than to burst under infinite and immoderate goods? Death is lighter for the fasting; men burst from indigestion.

"And so the gods follow this method with good men which teachers follow with their pupils: they demand more labor from those in whom there is more certain hope. Surely you do not believe that the Spartans hate their own children, whose character they test publicly by applying blows? The fathers themselves exhort them to endure bravely the strokes of the lash and, when they are lacerated and half-dead, ask them to persevere in offering wounds to wounds. What wonder is it if God harshly tests generous spirits? An example of virtue is never soft. Does fortune scourge and lacerate us? Let us endure it. It is not cruelty; it is a contest. The more often we enter it, the stronger we shall be. The most solid part of the body is that which frequent use has exercised. We must offer ourselves to fortune so that by fortune itself we may be hardened against it. Gradually it will make us equal to itself; frequency of undergoing danger will give contempt of dangers.

"Thus the bodies of sailors are hardened by enduring the sea; the hands of farmers are calloused; soldiers' arms have strength for hurling missiles; the limbs of runners are nimble. In each person that which he has exercised is most solid. Through endurance the mind arrives at contempt for the power of evils. You will know what endurance can accomplish in us if you consider how much labor supplies to peoples who are unclothed and stronger through poverty.

"Why, however, does God allow any evil to happen to good men?" Seneca, On Providence, chapter 6. "In truth, he does not allow it. He has removed all evils from them: crimes and shameful deeds, wicked thoughts, greedy counsels, blind lust, and avarice threatening the possessions of another. He protects and vindicates the men themselves. Does someone also demand this of God, that he preserve even the baggage of good men? They themselves release God from this care: they despise external things. Democritus threw away his riches, judging them a burden upon a good mind. Why, therefore, do you marvel if God allows to happen to a good man what a good man sometimes wishes to happen to himself? Good men lose their sons: why should they not, when sometimes they themselves kill them? They are sent into exile: why should they not, when sometimes they themselves abandon their country, never to return to it? They are killed: why should they not, when sometimes they lay hands upon themselves? Why do they suffer certain harsh things? That they may teach others also to suffer: they were born as an example."

§ 7. But are the wicked happy? See the same wise man: "Those whom you regard as happy, if you see them not where they meet your view but where they lie hidden, are wretched, filthy, and shameful, ornamented on the outside after the likeness of their walls. That is not solid and genuine felicity; it is a crust, and indeed a thin one. And so, while they are permitted to stand and be displayed according to their will, they shine and deceive; when something occurs which disturbs and uncovers them, then it appears how much deep and true foulness another's splendor has concealed."

If you are pleased to hear pious and sound teachers, they will teach us the rationale of providence more rightly and clearly. Augustine, The Literal Meaning of Genesis, book 11: "Why also does God permit this--to be tempted? Is it because virtue is proved and exercised, and the palm is more glorious for one who, though tempted, has not consented than for one who could not be tempted? Since even those who, after deserting the Creator, go after the tempter, increasingly tempt those who remain in the word of God, furnish them an example for avoiding desire, and strike a pious fear into them against pride? Hence the Apostle says: 'Considering yourself, lest you also be tempted.'

"For it is remarkable how greatly that humility by which we are subjected to the Creator--lest, as if not needing his aid, we presume upon our own powers--is commended to everyone throughout all the divine Scriptures with continual care. Since, therefore, the just make progress even through the unjust, and the pious through the impious, it is said in vain: 'God should not have created those whom he foreknew would become wicked.' For why should he not create those whom he foreknew would profit the good, so that they might both be born useful for exercising and admonishing their wills and be justly punished for their own will?"

§ 8. Do you envy the prosperity of the wicked, or even shed tears over it? What is the cause of such great disturbances? Are not gladiators also distended with fattening so that they may perish more splendidly? Do not those condemned to fight wild beasts eat a final public meal? David resolves the question, but in the sanctuary of God and in their last things. For when the wicked are deferred here, they are reserved for punishments without end; and when the good labor here, they are exercised so that at the end they may obtain the inheritance.

The majesty of so great a reward is so arduous, its sweetness so pure and honorable, its eternity so secure and unchanging, that one must strive toward it through the most freely undertaken labors of doing and suffering, not through pleasures and earthly rewards. This whole thing which is called the human race, this whole mass of mortality, will come to examination, will come to the scales; all the works of human beings will be weighed there. For the present a cloud enfolds them, but the merits of each are known to God.

God did not wish to reward justice with gold. For what sort of justice is that which is maintained for the sake of gold? As though gold were more precious than justice itself, or, when someone denies another man his possessions, the man to whom he denies them suffers a greater loss than the man who denies them: the one loses his garment, the other his fidelity.

§ 9. It pertains especially to providence that God should leave the causes which he created with their own properties and powers, and that he should permit freedom in acting to those which he made free. Hence each person ought to impute his own failure to himself, not to God. For there is no praise of virtue unless labor is undertaken voluntarily and for an honorable end, nor any glory in avoiding a crime unless its enticements have been voluntarily despised. He who is innocent through fear is not innocent; much less does one who is wicked or good by necessity merit praise for virtue or vice.

§ 10. Nevertheless, the sole cause of this blasphemy--why they say that God turns his eyes away from the works of the faithful but attends the wicked with benevolence--is that they judge that all things are ended by death and that no life of the soul survives after death, either for the rewards of merits or for the punishments of transgressions. But this is itself a principal judgment in favor of eternity: by it we recognize that all the deeds of human beings, which here are assessed with such unequal punishment and reward, are at last made equal. You marvel that Nero is not killed immediately, that the Sicilian tyrant rages for forty years. Judge him most wretched for whom so many years have turned into greater torments.

Slow vengeance takes away excuse from the impious and gives the penitent time to amend. You would wish punishment to be made present as soon as someone has committed a crime; therefore, lest only a few live for a long time, fear that swift vengeance ought also to have taken you away.

§ 11. Finally, God wished certain evils to be common and certain favorable things to be available to all. Tertullian, in the Apology, chapter 41: "For he who once appointed eternal judgment after the end of the age does not hasten the separation--which is the condition of judgment--before the end of the age. Meanwhile he is equal over the whole human race, both indulging and rebuking. He wished both benefits to be common to the profane and inconveniences to his own, so that by equal participation we might all experience both his gentleness and his severity. We who have learned equity in his presence love his gentleness and fear his severity; you, on the contrary, despise both. And it follows that all the blows of the age, if perhaps they come from God for our admonition, come for your chastisement.

"Yet we are harmed in no way: first, because nothing concerns us in this age except how quickly we may depart from it; next, because if anything adverse is inflicted, it is assigned to your merits. But even if some things strike us too because we adhere to you, we rejoice rather at the recognition of divine predictions, which plainly strengthens the confidence and faith of our hope. But if all evils come to you from those whom you worship because of us, why do you persist in worshiping those so ungrateful and unjust, who ought rather to have assisted and vindicated you in the distress of the Christians--whom they ought to separate from the merits of the Christians?"

§ 12. It very often seems marvelous to me that the wicked, who will pay such great penalties, generally live anxiously even in this age, struggle with the most grievous calamities, and indeed obtain horrible ends. Yet even in this respect the severity of divine justice shines forth. For it will not permit sinners to pass their lives secure in present goods, since fear of future things would restrain many too little, and certain impunity would furnish the greatest enticement to crime.

§ 13. The second argument, in which the subtlety of human prudence marvelously pleases itself, was drawn from the result of industry. For good counsels ordinarily have fortunate outcomes, but foolish counsels calamitous ones; therefore there is no other providence which governs or corrects human counsels. But this reasoning also deceives by the appearance of truth. For not all things well deliberated have fallen out fortunately, so that a man deservedly lacks success if he judges that the soundness of counsels ought to be estimated from the outcome.

Nevertheless, even if everything which is conducted by counsel and reason in administering the commonwealth were prudently instituted and were always led to the desired ends, and no rash undertakings ever turned to good, God's part in the government of the city would not on that account have to be taken away from him. Experience of each is manifest, as is the reason. The smallest thing often disturbs counsels that have been most excellently instituted and renders them not only useless but even destructive. First Corinthians 1:19: "For it is written: I will destroy wisdom, and I will reject the prudence of the prudent. Where is the wise man? Where is the scribe? Where is the investigator of this age? Has God not made foolish the wisdom of this world?"

Egypt possessed a great reputation for wisdom. Instructed by Joseph, it cultivated Greece--for which of the wise did not deal with the Egyptians? Yet what did God say? Isaiah 8:10: "Enter upon a counsel, and it shall be dissipated." And 19:11: "The wise counselors of Pharaoh have given foolish counsel. How do you say to Pharaoh, 'I am a son of the wise, a son of ancient kings'? Where are your wise men now? Let them announce to you and indicate what the Lord of hosts has thought concerning Egypt." Why, indeed, was it foolish? Because, as he says in verse three, "I will cast down its counsel."

But because atheists have no faith in the sacred writings, they must be refuted by their own wisdom. With how great wisdom did many lawgivers found and adorn a commonwealth, and yet in those very laws how wretchedly did they compel the city to labor and the citizens to collide with one another? Indeed, these instances are so numerous that the patriarch of false politicians, in book 2, discourse 29, says that Fortune casts darkness before the minds of human beings lest they break the force of her onset. He speaks impiously, indeed, since he ascribes to fortune the divine vengeance by which God denies them wisdom; yet he speaks suitably for the purpose, so that we may recognize that the outcomes of human counsels are never not in doubt.

For many things intervene which cut through anxious cares and deceitful hopes. The fraud of Mettius was cunning, but Tullus made it ineffectual with a single word, when he falsely declared that it had been done by his command. A wolf reduced Dionysius from the scepter to the schoolmaster's rod, for it intercepted the letters, together with flesh, from the bag of the sleeping letter-carrier. A soldier dragged Claudius forth and by chance made him emperor. The death of Commodus was hastened because Philocommodus childishly carried out the paper on which the names of those marked for death had been written. How many battles, how many armies, has one utterance ruined and reduced all counsels to nothing?

§ 14. The cause of the blasphemous error is that we see the beginnings, transformations, and destructions of empires occur through intermediate causes highly suited to those ends. Hence they attribute the entire event to the causes which appear and do not know the eternal cause which governs even the intermediate causes. When the vast bodies of kingdoms tend toward their setting and, as it were, their death, many signs and criteria appear beforehand to prudent men, by which they prophesy the future ruin with certain foreknowledge.

When the Persian empire was already standing on a slippery place, monstrous luxury, sloth, the abandonment of military discipline, commanders inexperienced and slothful in war--with no one whom one could trust unless he came from Greece--avarice, outrages against subjects, ambition, and consequently discord among counsels and the alienation of peoples hastened every evil. Divine justice withdrew the gifts of courage and prudence from men so criminal and so arrogant.

§ 15. What was advanced in the third place--that infinite majesty ought not to be present to the smallest things--can move no one who has learned that the divine power is a mind of infinite efficacy, which has all the sands of the sea and all the particles of the universe numbered; that God is one who does nothing anxiously, nothing while distracted; who is not called away from the protection of individual things by the knowledge and government of all things; to whom all the hairs of our head are numbered; from whose care nothing can be exempted, just as it cannot exist without him. There were not lacking among the ancients those who considered care of the smallest things foreign to God. Pliny, book 2, chapter 7: "It is ridiculous that that supreme being, whatever it is, should exercise care over human affairs. Are we to believe, or doubt, that it is not polluted by so manifold a ministry?" Far better is Epictetus: "You, God, I do not deceive even in the smallest thing."

The reasoning is firm. For if God administers the greater things, his power must also be in the minute things, and therefore his providence too; for the greatest things consist of those minute things. God could not create the world such as we see it unless he had first known it completely. He could not know the whole unless he examined the individual parts. For how could he create an animal if he did not hold its veins, arteries, fibers, pores, and the instruments of all its actions perceived and comprehended in his mind?

It would therefore be unworthy of that majesty to be ignorant of even the smallest thing, not always to behold the smallest thing in the clearest light, or for anything to escape his awareness and knowledge even for a moment. For if we establish that some things can lie hidden from God, and lie hidden for a brief time, there is no reason why we should not say that very many things lie hidden for the longest time--indeed, that all things always lie hidden. For why should he know those things but not know these?

I shall state the most impious doctrine of all which follows from this reasoning: namely, if God is ignorant of certain things and is deceived, since he is immutable, he cannot ever learn those things either. And therefore that God from whose majesty they consider the care of small things foreign is not even God, but a block of wood which is ignorant of all things. You say that the majesty of God is polluted by contact with filthy things, yet you cannot deny that the rays of the sun shine upon every sewer and pestilential pool without contaminating themselves. Saint Augustine excellently says in book 9 of The City of God: "God, who is assuredly incapable of contamination--far be it that he should fear contamination from the man whom he put on, or from the human beings among whom he lived in a man."

§ 16. The fourth argument most strongly asserts the government of God. For the fixed order of all motions, the conflicts of the elements, and a certain equality among them are not preserved except by incredible wisdom. For how, by fortune or chance, are the same things always born or destroyed according to the same plan? And why do those who gather from the features of bodies that the soul is mortal not rather conclude, from the soul's perspicacity, agility, and marvelous nature of thinking and reasoning, that so spiritual and divine a power is not corporeal and cannot be corrupted by the death of the body?

§ 17. The fifth argument concerned the errors of nature, or monsters; for these appear unable to exist if this universe is administered by God, since it is necessary that he be free of every error.

I answer that the wandering of nature in its parts does nothing against the common providence of God. "It is God," says Saint Augustine, book 16 of The City of God, chapter 8, "who himself knows where and when anything ought, or ought to have been, created." He intimates the cause: "Knowing the beauty of the universe, by either the similarity or the diversity of which parts he should weave it together. But he who cannot behold the whole is offended as if by the deformity of a part, because he does not know with what it agrees and to what it is referred."

God therefore has his own reason why he permits these defects in created things; for all those things which occur from the hidden causes of the world have been placed beneath that providence. Fabulous histories of monstrous human beings relate that some are one-eyed; others have feet turned backward behind their legs; others are Sciopods, Pygmies, Astomi, Onophthalmi, Cynocephali, and others marvelous by their very rarity. I am not led to believe that these exist or have existed. Rather, those historians, glorying in their curiosity, seem to have lied with unpunished vanity. If, nevertheless, such things existed, and if they were human beings, the judgment of Saint Augustine concerning them in book 16 of The City of God, chapter 8, pleases me: "But if they are human beings, concerning whom those marvels have been written, what if God wished to create certain nations thus for this reason: lest, in the case of those monsters which are known among us to be born from human beings, we should think that his wisdom, which fashions human nature, had erred, as though it were the art of some less perfect craftsman? Accordingly, it ought not to seem absurd to us that, just as there are certain monstrous human beings in individual nations, so in the whole human race there are certain monstrous nations."

Nor did Aristotle think otherwise: "ἔστι γὰρ τὸ τέρας παρὰ φύσιν τι, παρὰ φύσιν δ' οὐ πᾶσαν, ἀλλὰ τὴν ὡς ἐπὶ πολύ· παρὰ γὰρ τὴν ἀεὶ καὶ τὴν ἐξ ἀνάγκης οὐδὲν γίνεται παρὰ φύσιν. A monster is something contrary to nature, but not to every nature; rather, to that nature which is customary for the most part. For nothing ever occurs contrary to the nature which is eternal and which exists by necessity." Accordingly, when something monstrous is born, God himself does not err; rather, secondary causes, because of a defect, excess, or intemperance of matter and the violence of surrounding impediments, produce something new or rare which adorns the variety of the universe, although it possesses deformity within its own kind.

The works of God should no more be blamed on account of these than on account of the magnitude, smallness, and form of bodies which is found among all human beings. For whom has he fashioned so exactly proportioned in every limb that he does not possess something which is more becoming in another? Therefore, just as amid so great a dissimilarity of faces we admire divine workmanship, so we by no means say that his industry has failed when he willed certain persons to be deformed. He directed natural causes in such a manner that, according to the powers implanted within them, they should effect that which God wills.

Small things teach how great the workmanship is. Shave an eyebrow: how much beauty is taken away from the body! Turn an eye aside a little: the most beautiful face will be deformed. These things, therefore, just as they occur from the hidden causes of those who generate, are likewise governed by hidden divine providence.

Saint Augustine speaks most excellently in book 11 of The City of God, chapter 22: "Nevertheless, this cause--that is, the goodness of God for creating good things--this cause, I say, so just and suitable, when diligently considered and piously pondered, terminates all the controversies of those who inquire into the origin of the world. Certain heretics did not see it, because many things which do not agree with this needy and fragile mortality of the flesh, now coming from a just punishment, offend it: such as fire, cold, a wild beast, or something of this kind. Nor do they attend to how those things thrive in their own places and natures, and are disposed in beautiful order; how much beauty they contribute, according to their portions, to the universe of things as if to a commonwealth; or how much convenience they furnish to us ourselves, if we use them fittingly and knowingly.

"Thus even poisons which through unsuitability are destructive are, when suitably applied, turned into salutary medicines; and, on the contrary, even these things in which men delight, such as food, drink, and this light, are perceived as harmful through immoderate and untimely use. Hence divine providence admonishes us not to censure things foolishly, but diligently to inquire into the utility of things; and where our ability or weakness fails, to believe that utility to be hidden, just as certain things were hidden which we have scarcely been able to discover. For even the concealment of utility is either an exercise of humility or a wearing down of pride, since no nature at all is evil, and this name signifies nothing except the privation of good. But from earthly things all the way to heavenly things, and from visible things all the way to invisible things, some goods are better than other goods; yet they are unequal so that all things may exist.

"God, however, is so great a craftsman in great things that he is not lesser in small things. Those small things must not be measured by their own greatness--for they have none--but by the wisdom of the craftsman. Thus, in the visible form of a human being, if one eyebrow is shaved away, how nearly nothing is taken from the body, and yet how much is taken from its beauty, because beauty consists not in bulk but in the equality and proportion of the members."

§ 18. I shall conclude this disputation concerning God as governor of the commonwealth with a distinguished discourse of Saint Augustine. Although this matter has also been treated above, it nevertheless seems to me to be expounded more vigorously by that most ingenious of all men.

In The Literal Meaning of Genesis, book 5, chapter 22, he argues thus: "And surely, if those who deny this and do not acquiesce in sacred utterances of such great authority saw in this part of the world--which they suppose to be disturbed by fortuitous motions rather than ruled by the wisdom of the divine supremacy, and, as if to prove this, misuse a twofold argument, either the one recalled above concerning the inconstancy of weather or the one concerning the felicities and infelicities of human beings, because these do not occur in accordance with the merits of their lives--if they saw as great an order as appears in the members of the flesh of any living creature, I do not say to physicians, who because of the necessity of their art have diligently laid open, counted, and investigated these things, but to any human being of moderate sense and consideration, would they not cry out that God, from whom comes every measure of dimensions, every equality of numbers, and every order of weights, does not cease from its government even for a point of time?

"What, therefore, can be thought more absurd or more foolish than that the whole should be empty of the direction and rule of providence when you see its outermost and smallest parts formed with so great an arrangement that, when considered somewhat more attentively, they strike one with an ineffable awe of admiration? And since the nature of the soul excels the nature of the body, what is more demented than to think that there is no judgment of divine providence concerning the morals of human beings, when in their flesh such great indications of its skill shine and are demonstrated?

"But because these smallest things are at hand for our senses and we easily investigate them, the order of things shines forth in them. But those who think that nothing exists except what they can see--or, if they think that something else exists, think it to be such a thing as they are accustomed to see--judge those things whose order they cannot see to be disordered.

“We, however, whose steps the same divine providence directs through Holy Scripture lest we fall into that perversity, let us attempt, with its assistance, to investigate from the works of God themselves where he created these things simultaneously, when he rested from his completed works, the forms of which he works through the order of times even until now. Let us therefore consider the beauty of any tree in its trunk, branches, leaves, and fruits. This form did not spring forth suddenly, so great and such as it is, but in an order which we also know. For it rose from the root which the shoot first fixed in the earth, and from there all those things, formed and distinguished, grew. Furthermore, that shoot came from the seed. Therefore all those things were originally in the seed, not in the bulk of corporeal magnitude, but in causal force and power. For that magnitude was gathered from the abundance of the earth’s moisture. But in that tiny grain there is a more marvelous and excellent force, by which the adjacent moisture, mixed with the earth as though it were material, had power to be turned into the quality of that wood, into the spreading of its branches, into the greenness and form of its leaves, into the forms and abundance of its fruits, and into the most orderly distinction of all its parts. For what rises or hangs from that tree which has not been drawn and brought forth from a certain hidden treasury of that seed?

“But that seed comes from a tree, although not that tree but another, and that tree in turn from another seed. Sometimes, however, a tree also comes from a tree, when a shoot is removed and planted. Therefore seed comes from tree, tree from seed, and tree from tree. But seed in no way comes from seed unless a tree first intervenes. A tree, however, comes from a tree even if seed does not intervene. Thus, in alternate successions, the one comes from the other, but each comes from the earth, and the earth from neither of them. Therefore the earth is their prior parent. So also with animals, it can be uncertain whether seeds come from them or they from seeds. Whichever of these is prior, it is nevertheless most certain that it came from the earth.

“But just as in the grain itself all the things which would rise into the tree through the course of time were invisibly present together, so also the world itself must be conceived, when God created all things simultaneously, to have possessed together all the things which were made in it and with it when the day was made: not only heaven with the sun, moon, and stars, whose form remains in revolving motion, and the earth and the abyss, which undergo movements that are, as it were, inconstant and, joined beneath, supply the other part to the world; but also those things which water and earth produced potentially and causally before, through the delays of time, they arose in the manner now known to us among those works which God performs even until now.”

CHAPTER XIV

The Form of the Commonwealth, and Its Various Kinds

§ 1. Unless I am mistaken, enough has now been said about the parts and members which constitute the commonwealth, and about its author, God, and its nature. We must now treat of its form itself and of the divisions which arise from it.

Form--or, as Aristotle and Plato call it, "τὸ εἶδος," species, or "τὸ εἶναι" itself, that is, essence--is that which constitutes from human beings the assembly which is called a commonwealth. It is the order of those who command and those who obey, a certain harmony and soul, embracing, binding together, and giving life to diverse dispositions and functions. When this form perseveres one and the same, the species of the commonwealth is said to remain the same. If this is changed, although the buildings, walls, suburbs, and even the human beings remain the same, nevertheless the same commonwealth cannot remain. One commonwealth was established at Rome when, after Tarquin had been expelled, sovereignty was in the hands of the consuls; another when by the royal law power again devolved upon one man.

§ 2. It is customary for all authors to make the form of the commonwealth threefold. For there is monarchy, aristocracy, and polity, or government of the people. This is taken from Plato: "Εἶτ' οὐκ οἶσθ', ὅτι τῶν πόλεων αἱ μὲν τυραννοῦνται, αἱ δὲ δημοκρατοῦνται, αἱ δὲ ἀριστοκρατοῦνται;" If it is not evident to you, some cities are administered by one man, some by the people, and some by the best men. Aristotle, imitating his teacher, says in book 3 of the Politics, chapter 7: "It is necessary that either one, or a few, or many command." This is the most widely accepted division.

Yet one may observe in it that it is not a "τῶν ἀμέσων" division, that is, one whose members differ with equal breadth. Plato, therefore, sometimes establishes two species. For either one man or several govern the commonwealth. If one, it is called a kingdom or monarchy; if several, they are either a few or the whole people. From this arise two species of "ἀρχῆς τῶν πλειόνων," rule by several: government by the best and government by the people.

But let us hear Plato, book 3 of the Laws: "There are, as it were, two mothers of constitutions, from which one would speak rightly if one said that all the others had been born. The one is rightly called monarchy, the other democracy, or government of the people; and the Persian nation holds the extreme of the former, while we hold that of the latter." And in book 5: "Εστὸν γὰρ δύο πολιτείας εἴδη. Let there therefore be two species of constitution."

The same author in the Statesman establishes seven forms of administration: royal, tyrannical, government by the best, government by a few, popular government according to laws, and popular government contrary to laws. Those are six species, three legitimate and three by no means legitimate. The best is separated from these, namely monarchy, or the principate of one man bound by good writings, that is, by laws. It was necessary to give this warning so that the nature of the commonwealth and all its parts might be examined thoroughly. Nevertheless, since it has thus been accepted, let it stand that there are three legitimate forms of the commonwealth and three departures of those forms from good government. We shall speak of each of them in turn.

§ 3. We now establish that at this time those three species of commonwealth have generally been so tempered that nowhere is a pure monarchy, aristocracy, or polity found. For all emperors, kings, and princes--I do not speak of the Turk and the Muscovite--and any who have a similar form possess a power circumscribed by definite laws; they have bound themselves to their commonwealth by many oaths. This is far more true of those who undertake magistracies among the best men or from the people. Accordingly, almost all the kingdoms of Christians are aristocratic and political monarchies.

The Roman Empire itself possesses a marvelous mixture of the three forms of commonwealth. Its supreme head is the august Emperor, who possesses jurisdiction over all but must judge according to the laws. The best men are the seven electors and the other princes; nor is the nobility without its distinctions and its liberty confirmed by many privileges of the emperors. The people are not excluded either. Free cities possess their own governments; their votes are heard in public assemblies; access to certain highest magistracies lies open to very many. The emperor cannot oppress the princes, nor can they oppress the nobility, since many princes from the nobility are patrons of their own nation. But neither, while the Emperor's authority remains, do the cities fear the power of neighboring princes.

The Swiss imitate democracy, and formerly either expelled the nobility or reduced it into the ranks; nevertheless, the best men administer affairs. The Venetians indeed possess one duke, but the whole power is in the hands of the best men, or the nobility, which is said to be threefold: old, middle, and new. Nevertheless, a way to the lesser dignities lies open to many citizens, but all things are carried out by the vote and decree of the nobles.

§ 4. I judge this to be the sole cause why the forms of Christian commonwealths are now changed more rarely, whereas we see that formerly at Rome, Athens, and Carthage men for the most part continually pursued revolutions: error arose from the excess of one part. Just as sick bodies are engaged in continual tossing and seek relief from pain by a change of place--because they cannot shake out the evil clinging to their entrails, they embrace variety in their suffering--so is the health of a commonwealth disposed. For when one of its parts, either the prince himself, the best men, or the lowest common people, grows contrary to the laws and with damage and oppression to the other members, the whole body is shaken and torn apart, and it seeks change.

For if a prince employs his power contrary to right, the best men, detesting not so much the prince as the conduct of the prince, prefer governments of the best. But when they see that, after power has been conferred upon a few men, new petty tyrants daily succeed one tyrant, they demand again either a king or government of the people. But when they experience still more inconveniences in the latter, they hate the tribunes and endure much more bitterly a liberty oppressed under the name of liberty.

Yet in this they perpetually err: when they wish to correct the whole commonwealth, they do not act so that, with laws made equal, they may coalesce into one concord and friendship. Rather, they agitate beyond measure that part which seemed to oppress the others and attempt utterly to subdue and destroy it. They then transfer its strength to another part, which they render more insolent than the former. For their intention is not to make the balance equal or moderate the city, but to depress and conquer the other part. Nor do I remember any commonwealth being corrected in which these things were not done.

§ 5. It remains for me to explain what form of commonwealth agrees with diverse nations. For, when the nature and disposition of human beings have been understood, the lawgiver will easily determine the form of the commonwealth, and the magistrate will govern without danger.

Aristotle, book 6 of the Politics, chapter 7, judges that an aristocracy should be established in a place where there is need of heavy-armed soldiers and cavalry. For to support horses for war and maintain heavy armor belongs not to men of small means, but to the rich. If, therefore, the rich are compelled to sustain dangers, take the expense of war upon themselves, and defend the fatherland, it is also just that they obtain the first parts in attaining honors and magistracies, so that benefits and dangers may reside in the same men.

Conversely, where there is need of light-armed soldiers and frequent sorties, government of the people is more suitable. For this must be considered: that those who are exercised in arms should obtain dignity in the commonwealth. Armed men are not accustomed to obey the unarmed for long, nor to lay down their arms except when it has seemed good to them, for they cannot be compelled. He who denies just things to a man holding weapons gives him all things.

§ 6. The inclinations and customs of minds must be considered. For some prefer a king, as did the Persians after the slaughter of the Magi and the Israelites in the time of Samuel. Others abominate the royal condition and even its name, as did the Romans after the Tarquins had been driven from the city. When liberty was restored to Greece through Quinctius, Greece cast birds stunned from the sky by its applause and shouting and threw heaps of flowers upon the proconsul. But the Parthians and several other nations requested a king from the same people.

§ 7. Nor indeed is it expedient for all peoples to be free. And so Augustus deprived many cities of liberty because they did not use it rightly. The Roman people itself, already unlike itself, when vices had grown within it so that they could no longer be sustained by the virtue of their ancestors, could not be the arbiter of its own liberty, since it now distributed honors according to price and partisan zeal, not equitably:

> The yearly contests return for sale upon the Field, their own senator reproaches them.

Saint Augustine perceived this in book 1 of On Free Choice: "Can it ever be unjust that the wicked should be wretched but the good happy? Or that a modest and serious people should itself create magistrates for itself, but a dissolute and worthless people should lack that license? I see that this is an eternal and immutable law. At the same time, I judge that you too see that in that temporal law nothing is just and legitimate which human beings have not derived for themselves from this eternal law. For if that people at one time justly gave honors and at another time justly did not give them, this temporal alternation, in order that it might be just, was drawn from that eternity according to which it is always just for a serious people to give honors and for a frivolous one not to give them." By this, as though by a balance, we shall weigh which form of commonwealth and which arrangement of magistrates are suitable for each nation.

§ 8. I shall set down examples concerning distant or ancient peoples, lest I touch upon our own vices. These are so peculiar to individual nations that, although they are reproached for them by all other peoples, they nevertheless cherish them at home and do not recognize them.

Those who inhabit the regions within or nearest the tropics are cowardly by nature, headlong through fear, rash, and cruel when they rule. Almost all are of a servile disposition, especially those who, on account of the heat, are dark in body. For by excessive heat the heat implanted within them is called forth; the vital spirits and those which they call animal spirits are attenuated and weakened, so that neither their passions remain sound nor their reason remains steady. Accordingly, those who inhabit the region around the Cape of Good Hope, the Brazilians, and other peoples, if they were compared with Europeans, could be judged brute beasts rather than human beings. God could give them no better or more desirable gift than a good and merciful king, or absolute monarchy, for they themselves were born to obey; many of them are not only savage but also eaters of human beings.

But those whom the penetrating cold of Boreas burns are strong in boldness, but it is an unreflecting boldness. Therefore they too are less suitable for aristocracy unless they are mingled with foreigners or carefully instructed. Just as temperate regions produce healthier bodies, so they produce better and more moderate dispositions, and therefore dispositions more suited either to rule or to be ruled in a civil manner. Certainly, if we recall ancient things, the Germans, Franks, and before them the Cimbri, Heruli, Goths, and Vandals, and after them the Northmen, Huns, and Danes, proceeding from the north in very great numbers, possessed incredible boldness and savagery; afterward they established the commonwealth with great prudence and moderation.

§ 9. What, then, concerning those cities which are opulent through manifold commerce? They will embrace either the principate of one or government of the people. For if they are within a vast kingdom, they will easily distribute their commerce and will have secure trade. Experience has taught that autonomous and opulent cities which have powerful neighboring princes are often endangered. Accordingly, even cities flourishing and free under the shadow of the Empire formerly selected princes as patrons and protectors for themselves.

Great commercial cities scarcely endure government by the best, the reason for which is this: very many from the lowest common people are most swiftly raised to great riches and to the authority which accompanies riches. The best men and nobles have annual revenues which in no way attain the profits of commerce. It is therefore necessary that one of two inconveniences occur. Either the nobles, imitating the most sumptuous merchants, contract debt, diminish their patrimonies, and, being needy yet retaining their dignity, turn themselves toward evil arts, embezzlement, extortion, and calumnies; or, if they make expenditures equal to their means, they are surpassed by very many of their subjects in liberality, splendor, household, and power, and are therefore despised. But overthrow of the constitution follows contempt. Authority is nevertheless preserved if they obey one man, as occurs in the German Empire, where the Emperor protects the authority of the magistrate.

I understand this to apply where the government of subject provinces is not annexed to the city, as it is among the Venetians. For where they also rule abroad, they have quite enough to support their power and authority.

The Republic of Venice also employs another method. For at one time it enrolled three hundred wealthy citizens at once into the body of the nobility with equal right. By this act it both assisted the treasury and cut off the causes of seditions, by admitting the more powerful citizens into its own party and casting before others the hope of equal dignity.

CHAPTER XV

The First Species of Commonwealth Is Monarchy, and It Is Manifold

§ 1. Monarchy is the principate of one man, whom all the rest obey. Aristotle divides it into two kinds in book 3 of the Politics, chapter 7: into "βασιλείαν," or kingdom, and "τυραννίδα," tyranny. He defines "Βασιλείαν" as "Τὴν μοναρχίαν τὴν πρὸς κοινὸν ἀποβλέπουσαν," that which regards the common utility. Lipsius defines it as: "The rule of one man, conferred, accepted, and conducted by custom or laws for the good of those who obey." But he says that tyranny is "μοναρχίαν πρὸς τὸ συμφέρον τοῦ μοναρχοῦντος," a monarchy which regards the utility of the monarch.

This, therefore, is the general distinction between a legitimate kingdom and a tyrannical one: a king regards the good of his subjects, a tyrant his private good. For either the lust for dominion, by which the human race is crushed, or other things which appear good fascinate the tyrant; the safety of his subjects rouses the king. Nevertheless, that safety also requires him sometimes to assume dominion. For this reason, as Tranquillus is our authority, Augustus deprived certain federated cities, which through license were rushing headlong toward destruction, of their liberty. He acted rightly and prudently if he did so not in order that he himself might rule, but lest they perish.

A strict law has indeed been imposed upon every magistrate: amid so great an abundance, amid so unrestrained a power, amid so great an importunity from friends seeking their own things, to keep watch over the advantages of strangers--often ungrateful men, and sometimes enemies. But the useful is what Plato has defined for us: "Δίκαιον τὸ τῆς καθεστηκυίας ἀρχῆς συμφέρον," "The just is the utility of the established government." This is also what Antigonus admonished his son when he was exulting in a youthful manner: "Know, my son, that our kingdom is a splendid servitude." Excellently said, if his deeds had corresponded to his words; for a servant regards the utility of his master, not his own.

§ 2. The kinds of kingdom are exceedingly various, differing not so much in power and breadth of sovereignty as in custom, law, and usage. For some devolve by hereditary right upon sons and male-line relatives, as do the kingdoms of the Spains, Gaul, and Britain, and many principalities of Europe. Others are given by election, as are the empire of the Romans, the kingdom of the Poles, and ecclesiastical principalities.

Some kingdoms are free, so that absolute power over all things is in the hands of one king: war, peace, sacrifices, and the pronouncement of law. This kingdom is called "παμβασιλεία" and exists without any law. The other kingdoms are constituted by laws.

§ 3. Aristotle defines "Παμβασιλείαν" as "ὅταν ᾖ πάντων κύριος εἷς ὤν": when one man, existing alone, is lord of all things, or when a king commands everyone according to his own will. He himself compares this kingdom with household government. For just as a household is an economic kingdom, so a city is a political kingdom. Such a kingdom is described in Daniel 5:19: "Whom he wished, he killed; and whom he wished, he struck; and whom he wished, he exalted; and whom he wished, he humbled." Thus did that Chaldean, whether by right or by injury.

The Persian kingdom at one time did not differ greatly from it. Although founded upon laws, it nevertheless sometimes crushed the laws by violent power. When Xerxes summoned the princes of Asia to deliberate about bringing war upon the Greeks, he showed himself the sole monarch. He affirmed that he had summoned them lest he use his counsel alone; but they should know that it belonged to them to obey him rather than to advise him.

Nor indeed is the rule of the Turks very different; to its subjects it is savage and burdensome, if ever any rule was. For that tyrant pronounces himself the absolute lord of life, death, and all fortunes. The Muscovite also governs his people altogether despotically, as if they were slaves. That saying of Mahomet Vesitus is known: the Muscovite and the Turk alone are lords of their kingdoms. The tyranny of the Inga in Brazil was formerly not dissimilar. There no one possessed property of his own, but held it by the benefit of the Inga, nor did that property pass to heirs. Nevertheless, certain laws have been given to the Muscovite prince, as also to the Turk, but where there is so great a power, lawless license generally reigns.

Nevertheless, in the heroic ages rules of this sort were formerly legitimate and just. For if someone had transmitted an art to a multitude, freed them from servitude, gathered together those who were scattered, or affected them with some distinguished benefit, kings were created by willing people; and because they were regarded as rare examples of good and just men, the people freely entrusted themselves to their prudence and virtue without agreements and laws. For they did not prepare the protections of right and laws where they suspected no outrage and no injury.

A prince will not readily exercise absolute power even in a just cause--for example, by killing an accused man unheard, although he himself knows that the man is guilty.

An anonymous book On the Right of Free Monarchy has been published which approves the tyrannies of barbarian kings and pretends that 1 Kings, chapter 8, supports such great evils. But even authors who are not pious refute those impious things: Lorichius, Commonplaces, "On the Institution of the Prince," title "On the Power of Princes"; Buchanan, On the Law of the Scottish Kingdom; Haffenreffer on the passage in Deuteronomy, chapter 17; Althusius, Politics, chapter 19; Gentilis, Royal Disputation; Hunnius; Keckermann; and very many others. Indeed, there are among them those who judge that proceedings can be taken against such rulers by public authority: Lansius, discourse On the Royal Law, theses 94 and 101; Johann Gerhard, One Hundred Political Questions, final decade. But more concerning these matters elsewhere.

Nor was a reason lacking by which those men might defend their kings, namely: "τὸ καθόλου μόνον λέγειν τὸν νόμον, ἀλλ᾽ οὐ πρὸς τὰ προσπίπτοντα ἐπιτάττειν." A law speaks only universally and does not adapt itself to those things which happen; and thus in every art it is foolish to judge according to written prescriptions. But I shall speak of this matter in its own place. Let us now proceed in explaining the divisions of kingdoms.

§ 4. There both formerly were, and now are seen, various forms of kingdoms which prescribe definite laws to the supreme power. There are four principal forms. For sometimes the prince possessed the right of declaring and conducting war, pronouncing law, and performing sacrifices. The same man was commander, judge, ruler, and pontiff. In certain places he pronounced law and commanded the citizens, but did not possess the right of conducting war. In some places he bore only the care of sacrifices.

There were many kings who performed all those functions, but according to the prescription of laws. For Romulus and his successors administered the commonwealth according to laws. Then the kings and leaders of the Jews who flourished after the Babylonian captivity were commanders, judges, rulers, and pontiffs. This is generally the arrangement of all sovereignties which exist today, except that they abstain from the priesthood. Yet there is also great variety among them, according as it has seemed good to each commonwealth to guard itself against the license of those who reign.

§ 5. Kingdoms which endured only in war were very few and rare. At Rome in the greatest dangers a consul named a dictator, who, when the war had been conducted, abdicated his magistracy. His command was plainly royal and almost without laws, but nevertheless depended upon the people who moderated it; for at one time they made the master of the horse equal to the dictator.

Among the Spartans there was a perpetual dictatorship so far as the direction of wars was concerned. For at home the supreme power was in the hands of the ephors, not the king. The king possessed no right of life and death over citizens except in the camp; a Roman dictator was permitted to kill a citizen even without his cause having been pleaded. Plato in his letters vehemently commends a power tempered by so gentle an equality, being, of course, a lover of the people and of liberty according to the institution of the Greeks. Otherwise, that order impeded the greatest affairs and was a cause of disasters to the Spartans. Aristotle, book 3 of the Politics, chapter 14, calls it military command: "αὕτη οὖν ἡ βασιλεία, οἷον στρατηγία τις αὐτοκρατόρων, καὶ ἀΐδιός ἐστι. This kingdom, therefore, is, as it were, a certain military prefecture of commanders, and it is perpetual."

Under the name of so mild a command, lest he be hateful to the free cities of Greece because of the royal title, Philip of Macedon attempted to establish his tyranny. For in the council of Greece he brought it about that he was decreed leader of the war, as if he were about only to undertake dangers against the Persians and by no means to violate the liberty of Greece.

In former times Agamemnon possessed a similar power, when Europe and Asia collided in a prolonged duel. For in assemblies and in the gathering of kings he endured curses and abuse; even Thersites and every most foul man called the king "Δημοβόρον βασιλέα," "devourer of the people." But outside the assembly, in battle and on expeditions, he possessed "καὶ κτεῖναι κύριος ἦν," the right of killing. He himself professes this in Iliad 2:

> Ὃν δέ κ᾽ ἐγὼν ἀπάνευθε μάχης -- -- οὔ οἱ
> Ἄρκιον ἔσσεται φυγέειν κύνας, ἠδ᾽ οἰωνούς·
>
> Πὰρ γὰρ ἐμοὶ θάνατος.

>

> But whomever I shall discover to have withdrawn from the battle,
>
> it will not be easy for him to escape the dogs and birds,
> for the power of death is in my hands.

Homer himself sufficiently indicates that this kind of command is useful neither in time of war nor in time of peace, since by disputes in the assembly they take authority away from the commander and fight only according to their own judgment. Hence the anger of Achilles brought it about that nearly all Greece perished, and yet Agamemnon could not compel him to battle.

§ 6. Another kind of kings is recalled by Aristotle, whom in book 3 of the Politics, chapter 14, he calls "αἰσυμνήτας." They were often employed by the ancient Greeks. Princes evidently chose certain persons by their vote either to preside throughout their whole life and always, or for a definite time, or for definite affairs, as when the Mytilenaeans chose Pittacus against the exiles. "αἰσυμνητεία" seems to have arisen from almost the same causes as the dictatorship, so that constitutions otherwise free and popular might more easily be composed by the rule of one man.

§ 7. We rarely read that kings were created solely for the sake of sacrifices, nor are they judged worthy of the name of kings. At Rome a King of Sacred Rites was created. Livy, book 2, and Dionysius, book 5, give the cause. Livy's words are: "After the kings had been expelled and liberty obtained, care was then taken for divine matters; and because certain public rites had habitually been performed by the kings themselves, lest there should be any longing for kings, they created a king of sacrifices. They subjected that priesthood to the pontiff, lest the honor added to the name should obstruct liberty, which at that time was their first care."

Dionysius says that he was designated by the pontiffs and augurs; Aulus Gellius, book 15, chapter 27, that he was created in the centuriate assembly. He possessed not only no political or royal dignity, but was not even permitted to hold a magistracy; indeed, he was not permitted even to address the people. Moreover, after the sacrifice had been made before the assembly, he hurried away in flight. He was therefore a mockery of the expelled kings rather than a king.

CHAPTER XVI

On the Corrupt Form of Monarchy Which Is Called Tyranny: Its Origin, Properties, and Condemnation

§ 1. All kinds of government, when they decline from their end and, through the fault either of those who rule or of those who obey, depart from justice, disturb the commonwealth marvelously and generally drive it to utter destruction. Just as there are three legitimate forms of commonwealth, so there are likewise the same number of deviations from them. The abuse of royal power is tyranny; that of aristocracy, oligarchy; that of polity, democracy. No general name has been established for these three vices. It could be called "κακοπολιτεία," the bad or corrupt administration of the commonwealth. Its definition is: "Ἀρχὴ πρὸς τὸ συμφέρον τῶν ἀρχόντων," government which regards the utility of those who govern.

By the name "those who govern" I also understand those who are joined to the rulers. For many act tyrannically more for the sake of their relatives, sons, or a definite party within the commonwealth than for their own sake. Someone, therefore, will offer a fuller definition if he says: it is government which regards the utility of those who govern or of some party within the commonwealth. Sulla attempted to establish the resources of the nobility, Marius to protect the power of the common people, and Caesar his own good; no one regarded the good of the whole commonwealth. Nor was the disposition of the others who belonged to the parties any better. In secret they pursued plunder, proscriptions, the auction spear, and the destruction of their enemies; they pretended to seek the good of the commonwealth.

§ 2. Therefore, when the end of monarchy has been changed, tyranny is introduced in place of kingship. For it is "Τυραννὶς μοναρχία πρὸς τὸ συμφέρον τῷ μοναρχοῦντι," monarchy directed toward the utility of the monarch. Aristotle makes three kinds of it in book 4 of the Politics, chapter 10: that of barbarians, that of the Aesymnetes, and the third, which is tyranny most of all, "ἀντίστροφος τῇ βασιλείᾳ," that which is opposed to kingship. He rightly calls this tyranny most of all. For the other forms of command can be just, although rarely, because there have been very few holy kings who, governing all things according to their own judgment without law, did injury to no one.

§ 3. But the third kind of tyranny is the most grievous evil, a violent and widely extending evil. Its origin is manifold, but it can be referred to one of three kinds. For legitimate princes, having changed their conduct, often change into tyrants. Next, the powerful friends of princes rise against their own lords and seize the kingdom. Third, within a polity demagogues and fickle leaders of the people usurp tyranny over those whom they have deceived.

§ 4. The first and most ancient origin of tyranny, therefore, is the change of kings for the worse. Ambition, avarice, and lust are the companions and plagues of power. For just as there is scarcely any prince who at the beginning does not display mildness, clemency, and liberality, so, when their sovereignty has been established, very many put off the simulation of virtue, and many put off virtue itself. This change is familiar to human weakness, and power drives minds inclined toward worse things onward with great force.

> If they do not know crimes,
> a kingdom will teach them.

Thus speaks Atreus while making his sons partners in his crimes. Hence it happens that, just as

> The gentlest lot among kingdoms
> is under a new king,

so the saddest is under a tyrant who fears nothing and has been brutalized by flatteries. The force toward vices is great in a kingdom because license is great, truth is insolent, and evil is approved. Saul was called king by divine testimony and vote, and nevertheless power changed him and handed him over to Satan. Royal license finally destroyed the wisdom of Solomon after it had flourished for a long time. Asa, Amaziah, Joash, and others, driven sideways by fortune and felicity, did many things tyrannically, although their beginnings had been most illustrious.

Let us see foreign examples. Romulus, agreeable at the beginning, finally advanced to such insolence and cruelty that he was torn apart by the hands of the fathers. The Roman fathers themselves acted moderately as long as they restrained their desires through fear of the Tarquins; once the Tarquins had been removed, they began to oppress their own citizens. The decemvirs for writing the laws were able to simulate virtue for only one year.

Tiberius, the most profound master of simulation and dissimulation, for a long time refused to accept the sovereignty which he nevertheless exercised. He called it a great beast, a wretched and burdensome servitude. Nonetheless, having assumed the persona of a citizen, he conducted himself as though he were a private person. But with how great a savagery he afterward reigned is unknown to no one, so that this was deservedly proclaimed concerning him:

> He has reigned with much blood,
> whoever came from exile to sovereignty.

For after mild beginnings, when his frenzy for slandering and accusing had blazed forth, his rule was nothing but a slaughterhouse of nobles, so that the event confirmed the foreboding of Augustus. Augustus pitied the Roman people, which would come under jaws that chewed so slowly. Suetonius, Tacitus, and others in their accounts of Tiberius.

Gaius was received with great joy; by every kind of popularity he conciliated the affections of human beings toward himself. He acquitted the condemned, restored exiles, and pardoned the accused. But a little later he migrated into his own character and showed how much the greatest vices could accomplish amid the greatest fortune.

Claudius, otherwise foolish and a block of wood, within a short time conciliated so much affection toward himself by affability and beneficence that, when he had set out for Ostia and it was announced that he had perished, the people did not cease to attack the soldiers as traitors and the senate as parricides with dreadful curses. But within a short time the most obtuse prince, and the most cruel through fear, paid the interest on that joy with great calamities.

The senate judged with the best right that Nero's first words and deeds ought to be engraved upon columns of gold and silver, and not many princes attained the standard of his first five years. The vices of scarcely anyone surpassed the remainder of his life. Neither Galba nor Vitellius nor even Domitian had harsh beginnings. Diocletian, Maximian, and even Julian himself had bloodless beginnings to their reigns.

The dispositions of princes are therefore changed, and they involve first the commonwealth and then themselves in great disasters. Nor is it marvelous that they are changed, since everyone invites them to joyful and pleasant things, and few to honorable and harsh things. Yet leading men and the people are frequently at fault when by biting sayings, seditions, and conspiracies they exasperate princes and compel them to become estranged and then, under the pretext of guarding themselves, cruel. Many peoples would enjoy the kingdoms of benevolent princes if they could bear civilly, or overlook, their moderate vices which do not burst forth into the destruction of their subjects or public disgrace. While they censure and expose those vices in an importunate manner, they do not amend them but, like wounds that have been irritated, make them worse and estrange the prince from themselves.

§ 5. The second origin of tyrants comes from the sloth or indulgence of princes, when they place certain friends in charge of affairs, from which those friends arrive at such increases of power that they are now equal to princes, or even superior, and certainly stand upon a position too firm to be cast down. One may well marvel at the custom of kings and princes in fostering the excessive power of friends whom, after they have raised them almost to an equal summit, they begin to fear or envy and often even to hate.

Examples exist under almost all princes: Sejanus, Germanicus, Felix, Plautianus; but, to pursue better-known examples, Rufinus, Eutropius, Stilicho, Alaric, Aetius, Narses, Belisarius, and Aristonicus, who, although they were powerful, offended the emperors and perished wretchedly or without glory. But if we look at tyrants, we shall learn that a great part of them arose from this source. Galba, Vitellius, Vespasian, Severus, Macrinus, Philip, Gaius, Diocletian, Julian, and more than a hundred tyrants who raged during their reigns began their tyranny from the power which they had received from the emperors, and they turned benefits toward overthrowing their benefactors.

Great danger always threatens princes from great men. Accordingly, the power of the prince, which in him is single and united, is soon divided by the prince among many equals. But if one man is second or third to the prince in dignity, his power must nevertheless be so moderated that he obtains from it more honor than strength. But if all things are conferred upon one man, justice is disturbed; people attribute to the prince the evils which that one man perpetrates; no one speaks his opinion freely. Since that one man is hated by many and is not ignorant of it, he attempts to overthrow many, to despoil the prince of friends, and to cast him into difficulties, so that he may now hold him bound and dependent. But how the prince should guard against this I shall say in its own place. For now the source and origin of tyrants is being shown.

Hence, therefore, many tyrannies have arisen, but peoples have nevertheless imposed more of them upon themselves. This was exceedingly customary in ancient times, as Aristotle teaches in book 5 of the Politics, chapter 10: “But the tyrant is taken from the people and multitude against noble and illustrious men, lest the people receive any injury from them.” This may be understood from events. For nearly all tyrants were made from fickle guardians and leaders of the people--if it is permissible to say it--having obtained trust among the people by falsely accusing and slandering distinguished and illustrious men.

In no other manner did Manlius and the Gracchi seek tyranny, and Marius and Caesar obtain it. And so it was in smaller sovereignties: Panaetius at Leontini, Cypselus at Corinth, Pisistratus at Athens, Dionysius at Syracuse, and, in later ages, many in the cities of Italy--Florence, Siena, Genoa, Milan, Pisa, and very many other cities--which were administered with much variation and lived under the most cruel demagogues until they were recalled to moderate and legitimate governments. For the most part, the people entangle themselves in their own evils. For when the people exalt citizens beyond what is just, after those men have obtained dominion, they oppress the same people contrary to right.

There are many signs by which we may distinguish a tyrannical principate from a legitimate one.

§ 6. The first is a simulation of virtues, especially justice and clemency. For although every tyranny is burdensome and hateful, one tyrant is nevertheless more humane than another; yet all display virtues which they do not possess, at least at some time. For men extremely wicked, like Nero, who boasted that no prince had known what was permitted to him, are rare. Therefore, whoever teaches a prince to simulate virtues and embrace vices is a detestable instructor of tyranny.

You will detect the simulation if tyrants display clemency and justice toward certain persons but employ cruelty and violence toward others. Andronicus Comnenus condemned those convicted of guilt without any distinction of dignities. His justice could have been praised if he had not himself inflicted the greatest injuries in the greatest matters. Alexander was sometimes merciful, but nevertheless killed a great part of his friends. How merciful did Caesar appear to Cicero? And yet he slaughtered one million one hundred thousand persons in a war which was not always necessary, but which he waged because he had been enticed by ambition and avarice.

The clemency of Octavian is praised because he pardoned Corocotta, a famous robber; but the proscription, which he exercised more bitterly than his colleagues, shows that he was cruel. So do the many knights sacrificed at the Julian altar, and that savage utterance with which alone he met those who begged him: "You must die." Nero, when he was asked to sign the condemnation of two soldiers, said, "How I wish I did not know letters." Shall we for this reason count among the merciful, on account of those years, this enormous and monstrous creature, mud kneaded with blood? If, therefore, we consider these things, we shall not readily believe those virtues to be genuine upon which fear, hope, and ambition sometimes impress their traces. For vices often produce imitations of virtues.

§ 7. The second sign of tyranny, as Aristotle says in book 5 of the Politics, chapter 11, is "Τὸ τοὺς ὑπερέχοντας κολούειν, καὶ τοὺς φρονηματίας ἀναιρεῖν": to diminish eminent men and remove from the midst prudent men of great spirit. Thus Periander advised Thrasybulus when he cut off the taller ears of grain, and Tarquin advised his son by cutting off the poppy heads.

For magnates and tyrants possess a perpetual cause of contention. They exercise rivalry with one another as though they belonged to the same craft: tyrants [wish] to command by supreme right; the best men are unwilling to obey except in a civil manner. Accordingly, it is proper to tyranny to hate virtue, slaughter the brave, and envy everyone. The nobility experiences the cruelty of tyrants most of all. For cruelty consumed the Roman senate and the knights under nearly all the Roman emperors who reigned with much blood. Nor did counsels ever fail men so remarkably wicked. The varied deaths ordered for Regulus piecemeal seemed too laborious; he therefore advised Nero that the entire senate could be destroyed by a single word.

§ 8. The third indication of tyranny is to make subjects "μικροψύχους," human beings of pusillanimous, servile, and abject spirit, lest anyone think about vindicating liberty. Hence so many deaths were ordered in the Roman commonwealth if anyone as a private person seemed to pursue greater things.

There are at this time two powerful monarchs, the king of the Spains and the emperor of the Turks. The diverse pursuits of each show the latter to be a tyrant and the former a legitimate king. The Spaniard, at very great expense, exercises his subjects in academies, commerce, the art of war, and navigation; he rouses them to great things and expends such great resources to nourish and strengthen their spirits, upon the dignity of princes and the splendor of the nobility. The Ottoman, however, oppresses so many peoples with ignorance, poverty, and servitude. He fattens the Timariots and Janissaries, as though they were his attendants, upon the spoils of provinces; nevertheless, he raises them toward nothing greater than the hope of daily plunder and pleasure, and holds them by this enticement of impunity, which is the enlistment-bounty of every most foul man. Accordingly, although he has many bold and rash soldiers, he nevertheless possesses no provident and brave commanders--indeed, not even soldiers, but slaves prodigal of their lives.

Nor do the princes of the Muscovites protect their sovereignty and authority in another manner. In order that their people may admire the prince alone, they permit no one to visit foreign regions, lest they return home more prudent and instructed than is expedient for so despotic a sovereignty. They admit no schools except those in which people learn to read and write; nor is it free from danger to have shown a desire to advance in letters. This is so that no one may be wiser than the prince or equal to him. Accordingly, when inquiry is made concerning a great and hidden matter, they say proverbially: "God knows this, and the Grand Duke." It is therefore tyrannical for a ruler to claim for himself alone whatever a subject possesses that is ample, excellent, or beautiful, whether in movable things or even in talent and gifts of mind. Seneca was in extreme danger because he seemed eloquent to Gaius. Another man was killed because he had turned eyes upon himself with more conspicuous clothing, another with the arrangement of his curls.

§ 9. The fourth sign of tyranny is what Aristotle calls "ἀδυναμία τῶν πραγμάτων," the removal of the power to conduct affairs. For in this manner the tyrant judges himself secure: if no one is able to do anything, how will he overthrow the tyranny if he possesses no power in the commonwealth? Accordingly, a tyrant does not trust friends. He knows that although everyone wishes to extinguish tyranny, almost only friends are able to do it. Hence tyrants variously change, persecute, and kill them.

§ 10. The fifth sign is if they set subjects, friends, and princes against one another and render them mutually suspect. Aristotle, book 5 of the Politics, chapter 11, judges this useful to a tyrant: namely, if they agree badly among themselves, slander one another, if discords exist among friends, and citizens are alienated from the nobility. For since every tyranny is weak of itself--for tyranny is the vice and error of kingship--it is brief by its own nature. Consequently, it is supported and endures more by the dissensions and weakness of others than by its own strength. I shall show in its own place that this counsel is destructive. For now I present only the signs by which tyranny may be recognized.

§ 11. The sixth indication of tyranny is to raise ambitious, avaricious, and cruel human beings to honors and dignities, and then to strip those same persons of their goods and life. Tyrants employ wicked human beings like sponges: dry and thirsty, they immerse them in the resources and blood of the provinces; when full, they squeeze them and plunder under another's name. Dionysius hung up full wineskins and threw away empty ones. What is more atrocious than the utterance of that beast who scarcely ever entrusted a magistracy to anyone without adding: "You know what we need," and, "Let us bring it about that no one possesses anything"?

That tyranny extends widely throughout Turkey. For scarcely anyone is found richer than the pashas and beys; and nevertheless their goods pass to an heir only rarely, but generally return to the fisc. There are other things which good kings sometimes do rightly and which are not proper criteria of tyrants: for example, supporting foreign soldiers, being feared, employing scouts and Corycaean informers, exacting great taxes, and severely punishing transgressors. I shall treat of these in their own place.

§ 12. Would that, would that all men avoided tyranny and the tyrant as earnestly as they condemn them. If any thing is destructive to the world and burdensome to itself, it is tyranny. The condition of tyrants is laborious; their joy is rare, their rise unhappy, their end most wretched. For how few among them have completed life by their natural fate? Juvenal speaks truly in Satire 10:

> To the son-in-law of Ceres without slaughter and a wound > few kings descend, and tyrants by a bloodless death.

§ 13. The causes by which tyrants are removed through death are injustice, fear, and outrage, which Aristotle enumerates in book 5 of the Politics, chapter 5.

Turn your eyes around the whole world. Consider not those petty tyrants of towns--Alexander of Pherae, Dionysius of Syracuse, Phalaris of Acragas, Hanno the Carthaginian, Clearchus of Heraclea, Nabis the Chalcedonian, Hipparchus of Athens, the Pisistratids, and the Perianders--nor the poetic tyrants Diomedes the Thracian, Phineus, Eryx, Antaeus, Mezentius, and the Cyclopes. Rather, consider the great tyrants bearing the name of kings: the Antigonids, Seleucids, Antiochids, Perdiccases, Lysimachuses, Gaiuses, Neros, Vitelliuses, Galbas, Othos, Domitians, Commoduses, Maximini, Michaels, Phocases, Mauricii, and Aristonici. You will find that all continually passed their lives in fear; all feared those whom they terrified; fear returned upon its authors; and very many, although they lived fortified by swords and employed armies and citadels for their protection, perished by the sword or by a fouler death.

> I have seen bloodstained leaders shut in prison,
> and the back of a powerless tyrant torn
> by a plebeian hand.

For just as a tyrant takes liberty and quiet away from everyone, so he takes security especially from himself. For how can he live peacefully, securely, and quietly when no one is secure because of his cunning, violence, and injustice, and everyone trembles beneath his blow? How fearful was Constantius Augustus after he had turned his paternal kingdom into a tyranny! Whatever made a noise, he judged to be directed toward the destruction of his safety. Marcellinus, book 14.

They themselves sometimes recognize their deserts. Thus Adonibezek, Judges 1:7: “Seventy kings, the extremities of their hands and feet having been cut off, gathered the remnants of food under my table. As I have done, so God has repaid me.” And Mauritius at Constantinople: “You are just, O Lord.”

This too is added to the wretchedness of tyrants: in whatever manner they are killed, even through fraud and injury, those who dared to do it nevertheless possess great praise among the wicked, even if they accomplished the deed through crime and contrary to the sanctity of an oath. This certainly pertains to the accumulation of their wretchedness: although their killing is unjust, it is nevertheless pleasing to many.

The prince of philosophers gives the cause in book 2 of the Politics, chapter 7: “Indeed, human beings inflict the greatest injuries because of immoderate desires, and not because of necessary things. For example, they seize tyranny and oppress the people with impious dominion, not so that they may avoid growing cold, but that they may fulfill their lusts with impunity. Therefore great rewards are proposed not for the man who kills a thief, but for the man who kills a tyrant.”

Nor is the sentiment of the nefarious attendants and ministers of a tyrant different. Dio narrates a bold deed of a senator concerning Caligula. After Gaius had been killed, the Praetorian soldiers, disturbed and running together, asked who had killed him. Valerius Asiaticus, a man of consular rank, calmed them contrary to expectation. For he ascended a high and elevated place and cried from it: “Would that I had killed him!” Stupefied by these words, they ceased to riot. The Praetorian soldiers--Gaius’s Praetorians, partners and instruments of all his crimes and participants in his lusts and plunder--moved by one utterance abandoned vengeance and showed by their action that he seemed to them to have been killed justly.

Therefore, since tyrants live, like lions, tigers, bears, and eagles, by mangling and plunder, and consequently know that they are exposed to the hatred of everyone and sought by the plots of everyone, after the likeness of wild beasts which love precipitous places and caves, they prepare citadels, camps, and arms by which they may be protected and conceal themselves as much as they can. They are equally hateful to God and human beings. Therefore even the man who kills them through crime is often pleasing to those who suffered injury.

CHAPTER XVII

The Definition and Consideration of Aristocracy

§ 1. The second species of commonwealth exists when several persons command. It is divided into two: either a few and the best men, or the whole people, participate in sovereignty.

In agreement with what has been said, "Ἀριστοκρατίαν" may be defined as "Τὴν ἀρχὴν τῶν ἀρίστων πρὸς τὸ τῶν ἀρχομένων συμφέρον," government by the best which regards the utility of those who obey. Aristotle, book 4 of the Politics, chapter 7, requires in this government men who are best without qualification: "Ἀριστοκρατίαν μὲν οὖν καλῶς ἔχει καλεῖν, περὶ ἧς διήλθομεν ἐν τοῖς πρώτοις λόγοις, τὴν γὰρ οὖσαν τῶν ἀρίστων ἁπλῶς, κατ᾽ ἀρετὴν πολιτείαν, καὶ μὴ πρὸς ὑπόθεσιν τινὰ ἀγαθῶν ἀνδρῶν, μόνην δίκαιον προσαγορεύειν ἀριστοκρατίαν· ἐν μόνῃ γὰρ ἁπλῶς ὁ αὐτὸς ἀνὴρ καὶ πολίτης ἀγαθός ἐστιν. We may therefore call that constitution an aristocracy--as we treated it before--which is composed of men who are best without qualification and according to virtue, not those who are good according to a hypothesis or for some definite end. For in this commonwealth alone the man who is good without qualification and the good citizen are the same."

It will indeed be difficult not to explain its definition but to put it into use, if we consider human affairs. For who will recognize only the best men? Who will raise them to magistracies? Cato suffered an electoral rejection. Aristides was driven out by ostracism. Therefore no rather than many such "ἄριστοι," or best men, command. Yet the Philosopher responds in book 3, chapter 7, that "Ἀριστοκρατίαν" is said to be "διὰ τὸ τοὺς ἀρίστους ἄρχειν, ἢ διὰ τὸ πρὸς τὸ ἄριστον τῇ πόλει, καὶ τοῖς κοινωνοῦσιν αὐτῆς." A government may be called an aristocracy, or government of the best, either because the best men command or because they refer all things to that which is best for the city and its citizens. Yet this can also agree with other forms, for the best is sought in kingship and popular government. And a man who is not the best, yet is not unjust, can have this proposed to himself.

§ 2. We shall therefore call those men the best who, in comparison with others, are less wicked, or in whom more proofs of virtues are found than among the common people. But since the selection of men who are best without qualification is difficult--for every most worthless man very easily creeps toward the helm by simulating probity, and, once in power, reveals poorly concealed vices to the destruction of the commonwealth--an administration is not to be censured as corrupt if nobles and rich men frequently undertake a magistracy while better and more prudent men from the common people are passed over. For so long as an account of the common good is maintained, the form of the commonwealth remains legitimate.

Account must indeed be taken of nobles and rich men. For they prevail in birth, education, natural disposition, and power. They therefore possess a greater spirit for repelling enemies and a sharper stimulus for defending the fatherland, in which they possess fortunes and honors. In a public danger they fear that they will privately lose more; for when their fatherland has been oppressed or destroyed, they cannot be so honored elsewhere. The reasoning concerning the poor is different. For those who sustain life by their labor and industry do not judge themselves to owe much to the fatherland and easily find another fatherland where nourishment is supplied to their labor and art. Since, therefore, nobles are more loving toward their fatherland, braver, and more faithful, and it is in their interest that the condition of the commonwealth remain, those who excel in these things are generally deservedly judged the best men.

§ 3. Aristocratic commonwealths have been few and not long-lasting. The Spartan commonwealth belonged to the best men, but it was so intermingled with royal and popular government that it was by no means a pure aristocracy. The Carthaginian commonwealth joined longevity and power--a rare work, which none except the Venetian has thus far been able to imitate. Yet not even the latter is purely aristocratic, but rather a harmony composed of all forms. The power of the principate is in one duke, the chief of the senate. The Great Council, or senate, consists of the nobility; all nobles are admitted to it when they reach their twenty-fifth year. Nevertheless, commoners too are assumed into various courts and offices.

I omit the free cities of Germany--Nuremberg, Ulm, and Frankfurt--which are governed by the patrician nobility, because they are not absolute commonwealths but parts of the Roman Empire and obey the Emperor.

The Roman aristocracy endured for a brief time, from the expulsion of the Tarquins until their death. For when fear of the kings had been removed, it degenerated into an oligarchy. Then the common people, inflamed by the injuries of the fathers, extorted tribunes, magistracies, and sovereignty through various seditions.

Many things are necessary for defending an aristocracy because there are very many causes why it perishes. For that reason it is not readily long-lasting.

§ 4. First, therefore, the best men must strive and exert themselves with the greatest force actually and truly to be "ἄριστοι," the best. For the eternal divine power favors virtue and advances it, and human beings do not disdain to be ruled by better men. This is the foundation without which all the other arts of politicians construct nothing but ruin. Therefore let them employ right, equity, clemency, affability, and liberality toward the citizens; among themselves, with harmonious opinions, let them regard the public good.

Nevertheless, because there are always many wicked, ambitious, and restless men in a commonwealth, and all are inclined to disparage those who command, virtue also employs political counsels and a stratagem that is not dishonorable; it removes inexperienced and destructive rulers from the helm. Yet I advise that this be done in such a way that the first account is taken of virtue, and every simulation is removed as a stain and plague.

Many of those who strive to establish a commonwealth of the best go astray not only because they attribute too much to the wealthy, but also by oppressing and harassing the common people. In the course of time, however, it is necessary that a true evil arise from false goods. For the resources and prerogatives of the rich dissolve the commonwealth more readily than those of the common people, as Aristotle truly warns in book 1 of the Politics, chapter 12. Good counsels for preserving aristocracy therefore proceed from virtue and tend toward the common good.

§ 5. The second measure is that some share of magistracies, offices, and honorable functions should be entrusted to many from the people. Yet these should be of such a kind that they either burden those who sustain them with expense--which rich men, enticed by the sweetness of honor, nevertheless readily bear--or possess something of envy; and then they should conciliate no power or favor among the people. There are also many functions whose administration possesses no dignity but profit. It is fitting that these be entrusted to industrious citizens who are under obligation to the rulers. For nothing is more dangerous than for a few men to draw all things to themselves.

The admonition of the philosopher-politician in book 3 of the Politics, chapter 11, is excellent: "To entrust no magistracies to them, however, and for them to participate in none is horrible and fearful. For when many are without honor and poor, it is necessary that the city be full of enemies. It remains, therefore, that they should participate in deliberating and judging. For this reason Solon and certain other lawgivers place them in charge of the assemblies for creating magistrates and of demanding accounts from those who have held magistracies; but they do not permit them to hold a magistracy by themselves and alone. For when they have all been collected and gathered together they possess sufficient understanding, and, mixed with better men, they benefit cities, just as impure nourishment joined with pure nourishment makes the whole more useful than a small quantity of the pure. For each man separately is imperfect and maimed in judging."

Hence these advantages follow. First, the people do not judge the government to be an aristocracy but a popular commonwealth, when they see their fellow tribesmen taking part in public affairs. Next, many, enticed by hope, favor the best men and are faithful to them, since they themselves also expect equal things from them. Of this kind are the care of provisions, wine, grain, shops, roads, courts, and private lawsuits, in which they can be colleagues of the best men.

An example may be seen in the Republic of Venice. For although the whole authority and power--that is, the right of judging and commanding--is in the hands of the senate, that is, approximately two thousand five hundred nobles, they nevertheless admit commoners too to many functions and honors, such as the prefectures of certain arts and the offices of scribes and secretaries. Yet the nature of these offices is such that through them the commoners are bound more and more to the nobility and are, as it were, made its slaves.

Nor is this institution of the Venetians new. The Romans and Carthaginians formerly employed it, and those free cities which protect a domestic aristocracy under the eagle of the Empire also employ it now.

§ 6. The third measure is that provision should be made for the grain supply. For this is the tightest bond by which the multitude is held. I do not approve Roman customs, for by supplying bread to the multitude from the public resources they exhausted the treasury and nourished a useless and most vicious crowd; but I recommend moderate care.

The Venetian senate expends a great sum of money every year so that the things necessary for sustenance are both imported abundantly and procured at a low price. Scarcely any other thing establishes government more firmly. For when the people, who are generally led by advantages, observe that those men take counsel for the city so paternally, they honor and love them in the manner of sons. Indeed, this is also most agreeable to justice. For since the best men are raised to the highest honors and possess the greatest emoluments from magistracies, it is equitable that some things from the public goods should also be directed toward citizens of small means and the people, who have no share in the highest honor.

§ 7. The ingrained evil of nobility, pride, must be guarded against. For nothing exasperates more among equals or those who are almost equals. It must be guarded against in sons and little grandsons too, lest they become accustomed to despise companions and citizens.

At Rome the laughter of a little woman struck the consulship from the nobility. There were two sisters, one married to a patrician and the other to a plebeian. The latter had visited the former. But while the husband, a consul, was returning home and the lictor, according to custom, struck the door with the fasces, the woman who was in the plebeian marriage became frightened at the unfamiliar noise and was laughed at by her sister with a reproach concerning her ignoble marriage. Without delay the wife impelled her husband to hope for and seek magistracies; he impelled his fellow citizens, and thus the aristocracy, already declining, was converted into democracy.

Unless this is guarded against, there arises a city of slaves and masters, not of free persons, and of human beings who partly envy and partly despise one another. These are very far removed from friendship, society, and civil communion. For society is a communion pertaining to friendship. Indeed, we do not wish to enter into the fellowship of a journey with enemies.

§ 8. Liberality, which belongs to private persons, also possesses very great importance: that they should concede to citizens of smaller means the use of their possessions. It is indeed excellent also to imitate the counsels of the Tarentines. For by sharing with the needy the use of their beasts of burden and possessions, they procured for themselves the benevolence of the multitude. Therefore the nobles will employ the labor of the more industrious citizens in caring for villas, fields, and other things, will attend them with a liberal and honorable wage, and will admit them to their table. If individual best men employ this method, they will hold a great part of the city bound to themselves by sharing their household property.

§ 9. If the commonwealth is powerful, wages war, and commands various provinces, there is a great opportunity to benefit others in great fortune; for they will be able to enrich very many. Aristotle, book 6 of the Politics, chapter 5, testifies that the Carthaginians did this. His words are: “Administering the commonwealth in a certain such manner, the Carthaginians gathered the goodwill of the people toward themselves. For whenever they send some from the common people to the surrounding cities, they enrich them. This too belongs to the humanity of cultivated, refined, and prudent nobles: after distributing the needy among themselves, to supply them with assistance for making a livelihood and to exhort and rouse them to perform work."

Nor was the judgment of the Romans different, who drained the refuse of the city and the army into colonies.

§ 10. The Philosopher proposes another counsel to us as though it were cunning. Namely, if the tribes are diverse and some persons from them possess the right to pronounce an opinion in the council, equality should exist in appearance in this manner: the nobles and rich should be compelled to attend, or a pledge should be seized; an excuse should not be accepted; and then, when asked, they should be required to explain their opinion and the judgments of their mind. The others should neither be compelled to assemble nor, if present, to express an opinion; neither an excuse nor a fine should be exacted from them.

By that stratagem they bring it about that the citizens judge themselves to be in a better condition than the nobles, because they possess an equal right of coming and deciding but by no means possess an obligation to come. Accordingly, they can attend to their own affairs according to their judgment; and if they please to come, they are free to remain silent in an invidious or hateful matter and to express an opinion in other matters. In appearance, therefore, the poor seem to be relieved and the rich burdened by that law. But in reality the matter is conducted by artifice. For this is what is sought: that the nobles should assemble in great numbers and be exercised in public affairs, while the common people are excluded through the appearance of privilege.

They are accustomed to summon the senate very frequently, draw out time by speaking, and deliberate about the smallest matters until the citizens, through weariness and contempt, cease to present themselves; then, when the opportunity arises, they treat of the highest affairs of the commonwealth. If they do this to defraud the commonwealth, they must now be called not the best men but oligarchs and tyrants within their own polity. If those counsels are directed toward preventing inexperienced, turbulent, and wicked human beings from violating the laws with their vote and bringing the commonwealth into danger, they are established without injury. For the right of that law is this: that a wise and upright senator should be commanded to assist the fatherland with counsel, while the inexperienced and wicked man should be freed by law from judging.

The other provisions tend toward the same thing:

> Let not a noble or rich man refuse a magistracy, or let him pay a great fine; let it be free for a plebeian to renounce every magistracy.
>
> Let nobles be compelled to judge causes; let citizens be assumed only if willing and pleased.
>
> Let nobles bear arms, let them be exercised in them, and let them go first against the enemy; let the other citizens possess the care of their own home.

These provisions are not inequitable if they possess a legitimate end. For the poor are freed from labor, burden, and envy, yet are not barred from magistracy, judgments, or military service.

§ 11. A similar stratagem is that, where the common people plot against an aristocracy and desire that some of their own be inserted into the nobility, the best men should arrange that all the best and most pleasing men from the nobility should be competitors, while the candidates from the common people should be the more contemptible. For thus the people will reverence the dignity of the magnates, despise the worthlessness of the others by comparison, and in addition envy their equals.

This was done at Rome. Military tribunes with consular power were created, and access to that magistracy lay open to plebeians as well as patricians. In order to strike reverence into the common people, the patricians produced the foremost and most eminent of the fathers as candidates. Thus they often prevailed so that no plebeian was designated by the common people.

But this is not firm. For the dignity of the best men often excites hatred and envy, striking malignant eyes by its light alone. At Rome, although at first the common people created patricians as magistrates, content that account had been taken of their own people, they nevertheless gradually became bolder and mingled some from their own body with them; at times they chose all from their own order; and frequently they also assisted by their vote bold and cunning human beings whom they hoped would oppose the patricians most strongly. Nevertheless, it possesses great force for the security and authority of the best men if it is evident that others are not more suitable, and that other human beings would exist, but not other conduct.

What Livy narrates in decade 3, book 3, concerning Pacuvius Calavius is distinguished. Since he happened to be in the highest magistracy in the year when the affair at Lake Trasimene was conducted badly, and since the common people had long been hostile to the senate, he judged that on the occasion of revolution they would dare a great crime: if Hannibal should come to those places with his victorious army, they would slaughter the senate and hand Capua over to the Carthaginians. He was a wicked man, but not utterly ruined. Since he preferred to rule in a commonwealth that was intact rather than overthrown, and believed that no city deprived of public counsel could be intact, he entered upon a plan by which he might both preserve the senate and render it subject to himself and the common people.

After summoning the senate, he prefaced that the counsel of defecting from the Romans would in no way please him unless it had been necessary, since he had children by the daughter of Appius Claudius and had given his daughter in marriage at Rome to Livius. But he said that a greater and far more fearful danger threatened. For now the common people, through defection, intended to remove the senate from the city and, by slaughtering the senate, wished to hand the commonwealth, emptied of it, over to Hannibal and the Carthaginians. He could free them from that danger if they entrusted themselves to him and, forgetting their contests within the commonwealth, trusted him.

When all, overcome by fear, entrusted themselves to him, he said: “I shall shut you in the senate house and, as if I myself were a participant in the contemplated crime, by approving counsels which I would oppose in vain I shall find a way to your safety. For this accept whatever pledge you yourselves wish.” Once the pledge had been given, he went out, ordered the senate house to be closed, and left a guard in the vestibule, lest anyone approach the senate house without his order or be able to depart from it.

Then, after summoning the people to an assembly, he said: “What you have often wished, Campanians--the power to exact punishment from a wicked and detestable senate--you now possess, not by storming the houses of individuals in a tumult, which they protect with guards of clients and servants, with the greatest danger to yourselves, but safely and freely. Receive them all, shut in the senate house, alone and unarmed. Do nothing in haste or perhaps rashly. I shall give you the right to pronounce judgment concerning the life of each, so that each may pay the penalties which he has merited. But above all you ought to indulge your anger in such a way that you hold your safety and utility preferable to anger.

“For you hate these senators, as I judge. But you do not wish to possess no senate at all, since you must have either a king--which is to be abominated--or a senate, which is the sole council of a free city. Therefore you must do two things simultaneously: remove the old senate and enroll a new one. I shall order the senators to be called individually and shall consult you concerning their lives; what you determine concerning each shall be done. But before punishment is exacted from the guilty man, you shall enroll in his place a brave and energetic man as a new senator.”

He then sat down and, after the names had been cast into an urn, ordered the man whose name first came out by lot to be summoned and brought out of the senate house. When the name was heard, every man shouted that he was wicked and worthless and worthy of punishment. Then Pacuvius said: “I see what judgment has been given concerning this man. He is cast out as wicked and worthless; choose a good and just senator.”

At first there was silence because of the lack of a better man to submit. Then, when someone had put aside shame and named someone, a much greater clamor immediately arose: some denied knowing him; others cast against him now reproaches, now his low condition and sordid poverty, or his shameful kind of trade or gain. This happened much more in the case of the second and third senator, so that it became apparent that the human beings regretted the former senator; but someone to substitute in his place was lacking. For it was not worthwhile that the same men be named again: they had been named for nothing other than hearing reproaches, and the remaining men were far lower and more obscure than those who first came to mind. Thus the human beings dispersed, saying that every most familiar evil was especially tolerable and ordering the senate to be released from custody.

Pacuvius, a man otherwise wicked, certainly acted wisely. For very many men reduced a magistracy into order; very few amended the commonwealth. This man made the senate acceptable to the citizens and made it more moderate.

§ 12. The seventh measure consists of the mutual rights of patrons and clients, and so great a bond that, during a space of six hundred years, dissensions between the patricians and the common people scarcely descended to blood. But after those bonds too had been removed and fraud joined to the client, the commonwealth perished by mutual slaughters and was handed over to one tyrant. That custom has not yet died out among the Venetians. The name of protectors and the ancient right which existed among the ancients also remain in Germany, by which many provinces were said to be in the clientship of powerful families.

§ 13. It is prudent to establish various orders and distinctions among citizens, yet with such moderation that injury is inflicted upon no one. Thus was > Martial Rome threefold in cavalry, common people, and senate.

That multitude and diversity brings it about that they do not readily conspire, and this is so in every form of commonwealth, but especially in an aristocracy. For the middle order, or that of the knights, vehemently desires that the authority of the senate be preserved safe and sound. If the common people remove the senate from the midst or undertake to diminish its right, the entire dignity of the equestrian order will also be destroyed. Nor will the common people rise so readily against the senate, from which it stands at a long interval and which it sees surrounded by squadrons of knights.

But neither ought the best men to fear the equestrian order. For if it attempts anything, it will not be difficult to restrain it by summoning the common people to their aid. I confess, nevertheless, that this diversity of orders is a nursery of many lawsuits and seditions. But this arises from the errors of those who govern, when law is pronounced unequally, one order is suppressed, and the other exalted to the detriment of the others.

These measures are generally observed in an aristocracy. In it this must especially be observed: that the few should command in such a manner that the many do not hate and abominate the constitution of the city. For a power which violently holds many unwilling persons is brief. Every aristocracy is therefore brief; nevertheless, where it exists, it is better that there be two other orders than one alone.

§ 14. It has been asked whether there was a monarchy when the Triumvirs oppressed Rome, when the two Antonines reigned, and when Maximian and Diocletian reigned with equal right. Bodin denies it in book 2, chapter 2 of Six Books of the Commonwealth; others affirm it. If you consider the words, it should be called a dyarchy or triarchy. If you consider the thing, it is a monarchy; for one of them always possesses primary authority and selects the other. But if their power is altogether equal, they nevertheless administer as though they were one; the whole government is as though that of one and will return to one. For when kings adopt their sons as partners in the kingdom, they are not judged to change the form of the kingdom but to establish the monarchy.

These things must therefore be estimated morally, not metaphysically. By the same reasoning, when daughters who are heirs of kingdoms marry foreign husbands and administer with equal right--as Ferdinand and Isabella administered Spain, and Albert and Eugenia Belgium--there is nevertheless no new form of commonwealth.

Those who deny that a head exists in an aristocracy, and therefore reject that kind of government, emphatically deny that they are political thinkers. For the greater part of the senate agreeing in one opinion is the head, since its counsel is united. Nor is the condition of a metaphorical and a physical head the same. Therefore neither the individual leading men nor senators are heads or possess sovereignty; rather, the entire senate together, or its greater part, does.

CHAPTER XVIII

On Oligarchy, Which Arises from Corrupted Aristocracy

§ 1. "Oligarchy" is sometimes employed for aristocracy, but properly and precisely it is defined by Aristotle as "Ἀρχὴ πρὸς τὸ συμφέρον τῶν εὐπόρων," government instituted for the utility of the rich. Book 3, chapters 7 and 8: "ὅταν κύριοι ὦσι τῆς πολιτείας οἱ τὰς οὐσίας ἔχοντες," when those who possess property are dominant in the commonwealth. It would perhaps be called more rightly "εὐποραρχία" or "πλουσιαρχία" when counsel is taken for the advantages of the rich and not of the whole commonwealth.

It can certainly happen that within some commonwealth there are more rich men than men of moderate or small means, as Aristotle testifies was the case at Colophon before the war of the Lydians. Therefore, if elsewhere there are more rich than poor, it will nevertheless be called an oligarchy, the dominion of a few. For although it is not then that of a few, when it was established it first belonged to a few; and even now in every commonwealth the number of the rich is small, while that of men of moderate and small means is very great.

§ 2. When magistrates are created on account of bodily height or beauty, as formerly among the Ethiopians, it is not an oligarchy, because those gifts can belong to men of moderate and small means as well as to the rich. Nevertheless, the name agrees with it, for it is necessary that the power belong to a few; very few excel in bodily dignity. If these men regard the common good, it will be called an aristocracy; if the good of only one party, an oligarchy.

Therefore, although, if only the rich command, it must be called "ἀρχὴ τῶν εὐπόρων," government of the rich, it can nevertheless also be "ἀριστοκρατία," aristocracy, if they do not command for the utility of the rich but of everyone. Plato observed this most prudently: "ὅταν ἄρα οἱ πλούσιοι ταύτην μιμῶνται, τότε ἀριστοκρατίαν καλοῦμεν τὴν τοιαύτην πολιτείαν, ὅταν δὲ τῶν νόμων μὴ φροντίζωσι, ὀλιγαρχίαν. When, therefore, the rich imitate that form, we then call that commonwealth 'ἀριστοκρατίαν'--'aristocracy'; but when the laws are neglected, we call it an oligarchy." The laws are neglected when the rich refer all things to their own advantages and desires.

The dominion of a few and of the rich is therefore not unjust if it keeps its aim, which is the safety of all. For it is equitable that the man who expends ten thousand gold pieces for the commonwealth should be preferred to another who contributes only ten to the common fund. Yet the man who furnishes so much to his fatherland ought not to obstruct the advantages of a citizen of smaller means.

§ 3. Aristotle recognizes four kinds of oligarchy in book 4 of the Politics, chapter 5. The first exists when a magistrate is selected according to the census, so that the poor are excluded. At Rome the senate was selected according to a census qualification of eight hundred thousand sesterces. Thus indeed the prices of life perished; nevertheless, they judged that the splendor of the most august order must also be increased by domestic means. Accordingly, when his census was diminished, both senator and knight lost his dignity.

The second kind exists when certain men are chosen according to the census, but those men select others for themselves, whether from those qualified by the census, from the best men, or from everyone.

The third exists when a son succeeds his father, as generally occurs among the Venetians, where all nobles who are twenty-five years old possess the right to enter the senate. Nevertheless, there is no corrupt oligarchy in these arrangements if the public good is regarded, but either aristocracy or polity. For just as in a kingdom one man can succeed one man without thereby incurring the mark of tyranny, so in an aristocracy several can succeed several while the integrity of the best government is preserved.

The fourth kind, therefore, is a corrupt oligarchy, when affairs are conducted not by law but by the decisions of those who govern, and all things are administered for the advantages of the powerful. This kind of government is most destructive because in place of one tyrant it possesses several petty tyrants, and those cruel and needy. Just as this government is wicked, so it can by no means be long-lasting, since the greatest part of the commonwealth hates the smallest and desires it to perish.

Not only injury but even the suspicion of injury must be avoided. Otherwise anyone at all, however weak, can be a leader against them; nor in their overthrow is anything more difficult than the first utterance. At the beginning of the preceding century, many cities of the Empire rose against their own magistracy, and slaughters and plundering occurred. It makes no difference whether they suspect the senate truly or falsely.

The memory of the disturbance at Frankfurt is recent. Its leaders were human beings of the lowest condition but exceedingly powerful through the favor of the people, because government by the best was hateful. They could have done more harm if they had begun the sedition more moderately. Formerly at Massilia and Heraclea the rich rioted against the few and changed the form of the commonwealth. Aristotle, book 5 of the Politics, chapter 6.

§ 4. A tyranny of several is therefore overthrown with the easiest effort, but never more easily than when dissensions arise among them, or when one of them reveals secrets or makes himself popular. They do this either when they have suffered injury and seek power, or when they have broken and squandered their own resources and strive to conceal private disgraces with public evil. The more savage and importunate they are, the briefer their government is.

Those whose conspiracy is most inequitable have perished through foul examples. Aristotle recalls in book 5 of the Politics, chapter 9, that there was one of this kind: “For now in certain oligarchies they swear thus: ‘I shall be ill-disposed toward the people, and I shall devise against the people whatever evil I can.’” But it is necessary for them both to think and to display and simulate the opposite, signifying in the prescribed words of the oath that they will inflict no injury upon the people.

They swear, therefore, that they will be enemies of the people, and perjure themselves that they will be friends.

CHAPTER XIX

On Polity Strictly So Called, or the Popular Form of Commonwealth

§ 1. Aristotle and others sometimes call "Πολιτείαν" (polity) "δημοκρατίαν" (democracy). But because we are now distinguishing the parts, each must be treated properly and precisely. Thus Aristotle too, in book 3, chapter 7 of the Politics:

"ὅταν δὲ τὸ πλῆθος πρὸς τὸ κοινὸν πολιτεύηται συμφέρον, καλεῖται κοινὸν ὄνομα πασῶν πολιτειῶν, πολιτεία. But when the multitude administers the city for the public good, that form of commonwealth is called by the name common to all constitutions, polity." Polity must therefore be defined as "ἀρχὴ τοῦ πλήθους πρὸς τὸ κοινὸν συμφέρον," government by the multitude which regards the common utility.

§ 2. The foundation and aim of this administration are liberty, and then equality. The people readily obtains liberty, but equality with the greatest difficulty. For although they are equal in this, that all command and obey in turn, nevertheless turns of commanding come to very few. Liberty, however, consists not in living according to one's own judgment and being altogether under one's own power, but in living according to the laws, subject to one's own magistrate, and under this condition: that the power of commanding should also belong to oneself. For thus the right and honor of the city is equal for all.

§ 3. There are various degrees and forms of polity. That one is most perfect when, without distinction of birth or wealth, all dignities and magistracies can be entrusted to everyone. This, I say, is most perfect within its own kind, evidently the most exact preserver of liberty and equality. It is nevertheless weak, tumultuous, and a promoter of the most foul human beings.

§ 4. Other forms are more tempered. For since there are various kinds of human beings within a commonwealth--craftsmen of necessary and useful things; craftsmen of things serving pleasure and display; farmers; herdsmen; merchants; soldiers; rich men and nobles living from their revenues; learned men; priests--and since there is also great diversity among magistracies and civil functions--for some magistracies are primary, others secondary; certain functions honored but expensive, others difficult but profitable--from this arises a great variety in constituting polities.

For they do not entrust all functions to everyone, but different functions to different persons with discrimination: honored and expensive functions to nobles and the wealthy; laborious functions to the industrious; judicial functions to equitable, experienced, and prudent men. From this distribution arise great varieties of government, for nothing prevents magistracies from being in the hands of one group and judgments in those of a different group. For certain peoples it is sufficient to possess the power of choosing magistrates from the best men; some are content if an account of the honors administered is rendered to them.

§ 5. In preserving the popular form, very great labor is expended lest one man institute a tyranny or a few men an oligarchy. Consequently, the administration is generally accustomed to fall back into the vice called democracy.

The first measure is that men generally of the middle condition should be brought to the helm of the commonwealth. For they do not possess such power that one man can seize tyranny, and they are too numerous for the establishment of an oligarchy; nor are they turbulent because of poverty and domestic difficulties. Aristotle warned of this in book 4 of the Politics, chapter 12: "Moreover, the lawgiver must always assume the middle classes in the administration of the commonwealth. For whether he establishes laws suitable for oligarchy, he ought to direct the laws toward the middle classes, or whether laws agreeable to democracy, these men must be joined to the laws. But wherever the multitude of those in the middle exceeds either both extremes or only one of them, there it can happen that the form of administering the commonwealth is firm and stable. For it is not to be feared that the rich and poor will ever agree and conspire against these men, since neither will ever wish to serve the other."

For that moderation of the middle classes possesses something good, and those who are in the middle are judged good citizens. Therefore Phocylides too, in the Philosopher's judgment, spoke wisely:

> Πολλὰ μέσοισιν ἄριστα, μέσος θέλω ἐν πόλει εἶναι.
> Many things are best for those in the middle; I wish to live as one in the middle within the city.

§ 6. The second measure is that within the polity and power of the people itself it should be arranged that a ready road to honors not lie open to every worst and most audacious man, but that great account should be taken of the best part among the people. For just as in an aristocracy the form of government is changed within a short time unless every best man obtains a magistracy, so also the best and most upright part must be sought from the people. "Βέλτιστος δὲ ὁ δῆμος, ὁ γεωργικὸς ἐστι. The best people," says the Philosopher, "is that which practices agriculture."

No one doubts that the matter formerly stood thus. Hence the rural tribes were honored in the city, while the urban tribes were not free from contempt and stigma; for the dregs of the people and those who lingered beneath the rostra were cast into those tribes. Aristotle supplies the reason why the urban common people were more corrupt: because, accustomed to leisure and assemblies, they become cunning, fraudulent, desirous of revolutions, and ambitious; but the rural people, occupied by agriculture or pasturing livestock, rarely attend assemblies and rarely approach seditious gatherings.

There was formerly also another cause: the idle little common people, accustomed to assemblies, theaters, and spectacles and conquered by pleasures, scarcely raised their thoughts to the consideration of what is honorable and equitable. But now in well-ordered cities the reasoning is different. For citizens are less infected by tribunician assemblies, detestable spectacles, and public corruptions of morals; next, in schools and churches they are instructed toward virtue and piety. The rural common people are less cultivated and frequently less religious. Accordingly, with the times changed, the urban common people must be regarded as better.

The most flourishing cities of Europe teach that I judge thus. In their tribes, which consist of merchants and craftsmen, the greatest account is taken of justice, public honor, and piety. From these men, especially in free cities, serious, prudent, and moderate men are annually chosen to govern the commonwealth, for they are far removed from the causes of ancient corruptions. For how many thousands are there among them who, instructed from childhood by sacred sermons, pious readings, and the institutions of the Christian faith, have not even once drunk in through their eyes or ears the foulness of the theater, the cruelty of the arena, or turbulent declamations? Indeed, they do not admit criminals and infamous persons; they expel those who have been admitted.

Therefore the warning which the Philosopher gives in book 6, chapter 3--that the urban multitude should never be summoned without the rural--has no place here. I shall concede it concerning those ancient buffoons who regarded nothing except bread and circuses, who judged that money from the treasury by which the fleet should have been supported ought to be expended upon payments for the theater, who deprived poets of payment because they had abstained from obscene words, and who crowded around every wicked and seditious man. The urban common people admit such men to no share in public affairs; they do not even possess a place in the tribes.

§ 7. The third measure is that the election of magistrates should not occur in an assembly of everyone according to the Roman custom. For crowds, fights, ambitions, and corruptions cannot be avoided there. Rather, let the ancient arrangement of the Mantineans be approved. Among them certain persons--"αἱρετοὶ κατὰ μέρος"--chosen according to a division of the people entrusted the magistracies.

I saw in Münster of Westphalia, a distinguished and cultivated city, certain persons first chosen by the whole people who would designate others, by whom the senate is chosen annually.

That arrangement is thoroughly popular, for those electors are established by the consent and vote of everyone. The election is then conducted with such care that no one can know who the final selectors are. They are enclosed after the manner of cardinals, decide concerning the whole senate, and elect it before night. There can be no corruption by gifts here, no solicitation for honor. Those electors judge it to pertain to their own reputation that they should mingle no man with their city's council unless he possesses proven virtue and prudence. But if favor or kinship should induce one or another to nominate someone, the others would nevertheless resist and would not wish to bargain away their own reputation for another man's honor. This arrangement certainly surpasses the Roman assemblies in many respects.

§ 8. The fourth measure is that they should establish, with no less care than the magistrates themselves, many serious men who demand from the magistrates an account of their administration of the commonwealth and present it to the tribes. "Τὸ γὰρ ἀπ᾽ ἄλλων κρέμασθαι, καὶ μὴ πᾶν ἐξεῖναι ποιεῖν, ὅπερ ἂν δόξῃ, συμφέρον ἐστίν. For to depend upon another's judgment, and not to be permitted to do everything one pleases, is useful." Indeed, there is no greater enticement to sin than impunity for sin.

This matter possesses such great importance that I judge the safety of the Republic of Venice to depend upon it for the greatest part. For the prefects of all the cities so conduct their government that they know certainly that an account must be rendered by them. Inquiry is made into their private life, their public acts, and their judgments.

This is easier and more effective in a polity than in the aristocracy of the Venetians. For in a popular form those who transgress in a magistracy can readily be punished because they are men of middle condition, not eminent in resources, clients, or power, so that they might evade or break the laws. In an aristocracy something is conceded to nobility, affinity, ancestors, and the hope of equal impunity.

§ 9. The fifth measure is that they should not offend or irritate the best men and the nobility, but should hold them in honor and esteem and revere them. They should entrust very many and the most honored magistracies to them; and when they have given commoners as colleagues to them, they should nevertheless grant the first place to the patricians. For thus the patricians will be most favorably disposed toward the common people and will strive to approve themselves to them.

Nor do I judge that any polity has thus far perished unless, first changed into a democracy, it vexed the best men and the rich with injuries and outrages. For from this certain men of the nobility have received an occasion to vindicate themselves. Men of great spirit and impatient of outrages, when they have despaired concerning their own affairs, readily overthrow the whole commonwealth. And just as, when kings degenerate into tyrants, there are many who seek the praise of a slain tyrant even at the danger of their life and are not deterred by the punishments of others, so, when a polity departs from law and seeks not the common utility but that of men of small means, and begins to oppress and despoil the nobles and best men through servitude, many avengers arise. For that commonwealth is a tyranny with many heads; just as it cannot be dispatched by a single blow, so it can be torn into parts and divided.

Read the Greek and Latin histories and, after the Empire ceased or declined, the Italian histories. You will find that the greatest calamities were introduced by exiles. Exiles, however, arose from the conflicts of citizens raging mutually against one another, and the struggles arose from the corrupt administration of the commonwealth.

To embrace the matter in one statement: the best form of popular commonwealth is that in which the supreme power is in the hands of the people, the highest honor in the hands of the best men, and those of small means are assisted with the greatest care; in which the dignity of the best men depends upon the votes of the people; and in which honor is conferred upon the best men by the willing people. For where that moderation is employed, no part of the city will wish the form of the commonwealth to be changed, and therefore they will defend the present condition by consent.

CHAPTER XX

On Democracy, Which Is the Vice of Polity Strictly So Called

§ 1. Democracy is "ἀρχὴ πρὸς τὸ τῶν ἀπόρων συμφέρον," government which regards the utility of the poor or those of small means. The end of this government is diametrically opposed to oligarchy. For the latter pleads the cause of the rich; the former, that of those who are poor or of small means; neither pleads that of the whole commonwealth.

No democracy has ever been long-lasting; or, if any endured for some time, it was agitated by perpetual dissensions and ended either in the tyranny of one or in oligarchy. It has ended more often in tyranny, because the dregs of the people, when divided within itself and unable to prevail, entrusts itself to one man from whom it expects rewards for the power it has given; but it is afterward oppressed by him.

The reason why that administration cannot be long-lasting is that, when the advantages of citizens of small means are provided for through injuries to the more honorable, it is necessary that the principal part of the city--without which the other part cannot exist--suffer distress. For if the nobility is harassed with outrages, or the condition of the city is so tossed about in the hands of the poorer men that the rich are uncertain about their property, who can doubt that the latter will either finally draw power to themselves or desert a commonwealth in which they are the mockery and prey of every most sordid man? Nor will they remain inactive for long in that danger when they possess a great faculty of taking vengeance.

§ 2. Democracy can exist even where the number of the poor is smaller than that of the rich, if the helm of administration is turned according to the judgment and advantages of the poor. Nevertheless, the portion of those of small means and of those who either possess no property or possess little is generally greater.

Formerly, however, in military cities the supreme power often resided among the lowest persons. To this form must be assigned those periods of the Roman commonwealth when the common people beneath the rostra enacted laws; when votes returned for sale annually upon the Field; and when the Praetorian soldiers, or a few legions, despising the authority of the senate and people and bargaining for gifts, plunder, and license, raised monsters of human beings to the august summit and soon killed those same men by a nefarious crime.

The reason why the man to whom the people has entrusted itself oppresses it with tyranny is that he distrusts that he can otherwise be safe. Since many wicked men seek many things and terrify him, he cannot hold them by love for himself; therefore he prepares force.

§ 4. There are four kinds of democracy. The first exists when the more honorable part of the city, which possesses moderate means, deliberates after excluding the rich and entrusts magistracies to rich men as well as those of moderate means. Because this form attributes more to magnates, it is firmer. For it does not exclude the rich and noble from public affairs, and it entrusts itself to be ruled by the fidelity of those whom it possesses as candidates and suppliants.

The second form exists when it is permitted to everyone, so far as birth is concerned, to administer the commonwealth, yet no one is admitted unless it is possible for him to be at leisure. This administration generally also belongs to the best men, for craftsmen, merchants, and others are removed.

The third form exists when by law even those who cannot be at leisure are admitted to the helm. Yet because they possess no leisure from their own affairs and do not wish to attend to public affairs to the detriment of their domestic property, they voluntarily abstain from magistracies.

The fourth species of democracy--or rather a tyranny of many, as Aristotle judges in book 5, chapter 11 of the Politics--exists when the poor are not merely admitted to government but are given payment so that they may be at leisure. That arrangement harms justice in many ways. For honorable and noble men suited to administering public affairs are barred from taking counsel for their fatherland by filth so unbecoming and indeed extreme. Next, since money must be gathered from the entrails of the commonwealth to support the leisure of the poor, the nobles and rich suffer injury, since they are compelled with their own money to buy magistrates for themselves and indeed to bring it about by their own resources that they cannot attain honors--than which nothing is more bitter. Finally, men of this sort are generally inexperienced in affairs, desirous, and abuse power.

But although a good man would not wish to conduct government for the sake of either money or honor, he nevertheless customarily undertakes this burden lest a worse man command him. For men judge there to be the greatest necessity of assuming the helm lest it be entrusted to the inexperienced and all be endangered for that reason. In this democratic tyranny, however, by violence, laws, and payment it is arranged that honorable men should not preside over the commonwealth, but that every most foul and needy man should command.

§ 5. Moreover, various democratic laws against the best men have been devised by popular leaders; nevertheless, those laws oppressed the people itself and converted liberty under the name of liberty into tyranny. Yet the tyranny of no single person is to be equated with a raging people.

The first law is that a magistrate should come from everyone. Both examples and reason teach how destructive it is. For what is more foreign to true reason than that rulers of the commonwealth should be placed in command by the judgment and opinions of the most imprudent? That those who possess the highest honors and supreme power should be selected from the dregs of human beings? No one entrusts a vineyard to an inexperienced cultivator or a field to an ignorant farmer. What prudence, then, is it to entrust bodies, fortunes, and liberty to the judgments of human beings seeking their own advantages?

What popular leaders say--that the common people generally do not err in selecting magistrates--is altogether otherwise. No one is a less suitable arbiter of his liberty than the people; no one abuses it more in any matter than in creating magistrates. All seek the man whom they judge advantageous to themselves, not the one useful to the commonwealth. Let us trust the Roman people, whose assemblies, after the likeness of the Euripus, changed in different directions. Cato twice suffered electoral rejection; Clodius, Vatinius, Piso, and Antony sat upon the curule chair.

§ 6. The second law: to command in turn and frequently change governments. The people loves this, but it leads to anarchy and license. For what man born from the common people, endowed with a brief power already about to expire, will restrain wicked and audacious human beings from injury to citizens? Who will contain by the fear and force of laws and penalties those whom he is going to see in the supreme position the next day, when the wheel of the assemblies turns? The powerful man whom you irritate today you will experience as your lord tomorrow. As a private person you will receive your enemy armed with public authority. To report familiar things, consider Cicero alone. During his most glorious consulship, the preserver of the fatherland aroused against himself the hatred of the most powerful citizens, and their hatred possessed such force that he was driven into exile.

§ 7. The third law: to divide the goods of condemned men among the common people. If the people judges the case, it would be manifestly inequitable, as Aristotle warned in book 6, chapter 5. Who doubts that a needy judge can be induced without difficulty to condemn an accused man by whose destruction he has determined to increase his own property? If those judgments are in the hands of the best men but the plunder in those of the common people, although there is less danger, it is nevertheless not equitable that a public fine be expended for the advantages of one party. Next, after neglecting labors, they will begin to direct slanders against the rich.

§ 8. The fourth law: that accusations against noble and brave men should be frequent. Nothing was more customary at Athens, and for this reason they fell.

§ 9. The fifth law: that magistrates should be selected by lot. Certainly nothing is more suitable than this law for overthrowing the commonwealth.

§ 10. The sixth law: that revenues should be distributed to those who come to the assembly.

§ 11. The seventh law: that the wealthy should receive no payment for the labor of judging, but those of small means a large payment.

§ 12. The eighth law: that no craft should prevent one from commanding.

§ 13. The ninth law: that no one, except rarely, should hold any magistracy twice.

§ 14. The tenth law: that this can nevertheless occur in a dangerous war.

§ 15. The eleventh law: that no magistracy should be perpetual; indeed, that all should be exceedingly brief, so that more persons may command.

§ 16. The thirteenth law: to admit foreigners also to honors.

§ 17. The fourteenth law: secretly to oppress the nobility, while outwardly cultivating it, and to entrust to nobles certain magnificent and expensive functions.

§ 18. The fifteenth law: to guard against their being irritated.

§ 19. The sixteenth law: to inflame them mutually against one another and wear them down with enmities; to furnish with honors and power, and defend, those from the nobility who possess many enemies.

§ 20. The seventeenth law: to institute very many tribes and intermingle them as much as possible.

§ 21. The eighteenth law: to unite various associations of craftsmen, merchants, and others.

§ 22. The nineteenth law: to permit the license of living as each person wishes. "ἥδιον γὰρ τοῖς πολλοῖς τὸ ζῆν ἀτάκτως, ἢ τὸ σωφρόνως. For it is sweeter for the multitude to live without order than temperately."

§ 23. The twentieth law: to surround all magistrates with the guardianship of other magistrates, lest they be able to do anything against the will of the people. Thus at Rome the tribunes of the common people often vetoed the best counsels and, under the appearance of defending the common people, disturbed the commonwealth.

If we weigh the origin, rationale, and examples of all those laws, they can do little to establish the democratic constitution. Consequently, no democracy was ever stable or without perpetual disturbances. Besides Athenian and Roman history, one may read the history of the Florentine Republic from the times of Frederick, in which you will read with astonishment of the greatest and swiftest changes of affairs, internal battles, and fighting from towers.

CHAPTER XXI

That the Best Form of Commonwealth Is Monarchy Tempered by Aristocracy and Polity

§ 1. I propose a question debated not only in the senate house and in an assembly of the people, but also in scholastic exercises. The reason is that it supplies abundant material to ingenious and eloquent human beings for speaking against tyranny, anarchy, and servitude, and in favor of liberty and equality. Accordingly, some inveigh against the excessive power of one man, others against the ambition and dissensions of equals, and others against the confusion and rashness of the common crowd. They do this with all the greater applause because examples of affairs badly administered are lacking in no age, and indeed abound in most. But let us speak of this matter politically and in a manner suited to the institutions of the commonwealth.

§ 2. First, when we compare the three forms of commonwealth with one another and inquire into the best, it is evident that this must be done by a prudent and suitable analogy. For the vices and injuries of one government must not be compared with the virtues and benefits of another, but goods with goods, evils with evils, lesser goods with lesser, and greater with greater; likewise, evils must be weighed with an equal balance. The best monarchy must be compared with the best aristocracy and polity, the middling with the middling, and the worst with the worst.

When, therefore, the matter stands at the same degree, it is asked which commonwealth is better, firmer, and happier. Is that government which is described in Judges 2:6--"Therefore Joshua dismissed the people, and the children of Israel departed, each into his own possession, that they might obtain it. And they served the Lord all his days and all the days of the elders who lived for a long time after him and knew all the works of the Lord which he had done with Israel"--is that aristocracy of elders to be preferred to the monarchy of David or Solomon or another king who regards the common good?

§ 3. Next, all things in this disputation are not to be discussed minutely and mathematically. Rather, because we are treating of the commonwealth, they must be treated in a moral and civil manner. For in vain do we form and construct in thought some Platonic or Utopian city if we give counsel to our cities, in which there are many imprudent, improvident, and wicked human beings, and frequently those very persons whose office it is to protect justice and equity are such.

The founder of a commonwealth ought not to regard one human being or one certain and definite period, but to embrace the whole duration. For although it may happen that one particular prince is excellent and the best men at some time praiseworthy, nevertheless conduct is frequently changed in power, and wicked rulers more frequently succeed good ones. Accordingly, that form of commonwealth must be established in which magistrates are permitted to do the greatest amount of good and the least amount of evil, so that the people may be safe by its laws and not by the virtue of one human being.

The lawgiver, therefore, will not fear to abandon many excellent goods in order to avert the most dangerous evils. Nor will he judge the form of that city most excellent in which one particular thing has been arranged excellently unless provision has been made from every direction concerning all things. All moderate things must rather be chosen than extremes attended by great danger. For amid such great desires, faithlessness, and ambition among human beings, it is impossible to establish a commonwealth in which there is no danger. I shall therefore speak distinctly concerning the best form of commonwealth.

§ 4. FIRST. A despotic form of commonwealth, in which the prince is absolute lord of all things, is unworthy of praise, inequitable, and not long-lasting. I call that form despotic which belongs today to the emperor of the Turks, which seems formerly to have belonged to Nebuchadnezzar and the kings of the Egyptians, and which now belongs to certain barbarians. The inhabitants of the Turkish Empire call themselves slaves of their emperor. No one is secure in fortune or life; all things depend upon the nod of the most cruel, most arrogant, and most lustful tyrant. They even refer the very air which they breathe as something received from the great lord.

It is unnecessary to bring forward arguments. For there is no one who does not flee servitude and embrace liberty; but in that empire everyone, even wives and children, serves servitude. Indeed, divine Scripture numbers being oppressed by servitude among the greatest punishments but regards being asserted into liberty as the highest benefit. Isaiah 19:4: "And I shall hand Egypt into the hand of cruel lords." And when God had subjected the Jews to Shishak, or Sesostris the Egyptian, he said: "Nevertheless they shall serve him, that they may know the distance between my servitude and the servitude of the kingdoms of the lands."

Nor can a supporter of tyranny respond and say that an absolute lord can take account of the common good and that such a commonwealth will be like a great household. For if he is lord, he therefore expends the slaves for his own utility, and all the subjects are the possession of the great lord. Accordingly, they are held to care for the advantages of the lord, not their own.

I am not ignorant that the barbarism of certain nations, from native slowness and stupidity of disposition, is such that they seem born for servitude. If they have been captured in a just war, so that they can be reduced into servitude, I do not deny that they ought to possess the same man as king and lord. But this pertains to a few, since, although there are many who have surrendered within a great nation, few have merited servitude. Provision must be made for the whole nation in a royal manner, so that its people may be rightly instructed in religion, humanity, and civil order. It belongs to barbarians, however, to abuse the weakness and stupidity of wretched people for their own gain.

§ 5. This government cannot be long-lasting because it is violent and because everyone condemns it, even those who live amid the highest honor and pleasures. Those whose fortune is most wretched attempt extreme things; and since they consider all things better than those which they suffer, impelled by a slight movement, they dare something great and unexpected. For although they hope for nothing, they nevertheless possess nothing about which they may despair, since to remain in a most afflicted condition is the part of the despairing, but to move and disturb something is the mark of a spirit that is not ignoble.

Seneca therefore spoke wisely in truth: "Power which is exercised to the injury of many cannot stand for long," book 3 of On Anger, chapter 16. Phalaris reigned for more than thirty-two years, but after his first frenzy had raged itself out, he cultivated justice and clemency. He possessed ability and force for seizing power, but moderation was needed for retaining it. Although all hold tenaciously that one ought to leave a tyranny dragged by the feet, not seated upon a horse--Livy, book 24--nevertheless, very many who abused excessive power have been cast down and readily shaken off.

For since a human being is a political animal, while the most absolute monarchy is violent dominion and more suitable for wild beasts, it is not according to nature and therefore cannot be perpetual. Finally, since so great a power readily exceeds the limits of reason and crushes peoples, it comes about that it corrupts the commonwealth itself. All are free by nature; disaster introduced the name of servitude. Therefore a commonwealth in which there is no liberty is contrary to nature.

§ 6. The Turkish Empire is customarily objected against this, because it has now persevered for many years in the family of the Ottomans, although they oppress all those subject to it with inequitable and burdensome dominion. In that kingdom no one serves more abjectly or more dangerously than the man who moves amid the greatest dignity and power.

I indeed acknowledge that the iron yoke imposed by the Ottomans upon the peoples of Asia and many parts of Europe and Africa has almost grown old, so that it could seem a just government. The complaints of so many nations and the groans of cities testify to it. That tyranny has now persevered for three hundred years; for it was established in the year

1300 by the industry and fraud of Ottoman. It is therefore a savage and long-lasting sovereignty. Nor--shame!--are there lacking among Christians those who suggest Mohammedan counsels to their princes, in order to establish the strength and longevity of principalities by such barbarian examples.

§ 7. But I by no means attribute the stability of that monarchy to its unjust and barbarous domination, but principally to the just vengeance of the divine power, which rules and crushes with an iron rod nations that are impious, apostate, impure, and ignorant of being ruled. It both permits the tyrant to rage and corrupts the counsels and removes the courage of wretched nations, lest they rise to vengeance.

Next, the mutual enmities and wars of its neighbors raised that monarchy to be fearful to everyone. But because the long-lasting power of the Turks dazzles the eyes of many political thinkers, I intend to consider the matter more deeply.

In the year 1300 Ottoman struck down in various battles the petty rulers of the Turks, who were weakened by discord, and from the spoils of many he himself became a great emperor. He presided over the sovereignty for twenty-seven years, a man of great counsel and, when sudden circumstances occurred, of rash but nevertheless fortunate audacity.

Ottoman's son Orchan began his sovereignty with the parricide of two elder brothers. He conducted it somewhat better than he began it. He added a great part of the Empire of Constantinople to his own kingdom, assisted not by his own virtue but by the long dissensions and civil wars of the two Andronici, grandfather and grandson, and then of Cantacuzenus and Palaeologus. For while they contended in crime, faithlessness, and mutual slaughter, he readily occupied regions deprived of aid. Drawn into assisting the parties, as is customary for magnates, he converted the calamities of his neighbors into an opportunity for growth.

Amurath succeeded Orchan. In ambition, endurance of labors, cunning, military discipline, strength, equity, affability, moderation, and blandishments he was superior to all the leaders of the Turks. Access to him was easy; his countenance was mild; in distributing honors and addressing men he displayed the greatest humanity. Therefore at that time the face of the sovereignty was different, and under the growing monarchy there was, if not unimpaired liberty, nevertheless great security. Yet he did not break the Empire of Constantinople by his own martial power. He was summoned by Palaeologus, whom the Greek leading men, assisted by the Bulgarians, were oppressing, and he defeated them. Then again one of his soldiers, carried into Europe by the avarice of a Christian shipmaster, gained an easy victory over the Greeks.

Amurath's son Baiazet, the killer of his brother Solyman, was more ferocious. He stripped Sigismund, king of Hungary, of his camp, but in that battle the fault was rather with our men than courageously conducted by the Turks. For while the French, contrary to the wishes of their leaders, rushed forward without counsel, they were surrounded by cavalry and utterly destroyed. In 1402, he was defeated by Tamerlane and enclosed in a cage; at that time the Turkish Empire was affected by a great disaster. For besides the 140,000 who fell in the battle line, one hundred and twenty thousand were crushed by cavalry.

Calepinus, son of Baiazet, restored the collapsed affairs. After gathering the veterans and being assisted by Greek princes, he then established them by a successful battle against Sigismund of Hungary. For the cavalry of the Christians, borne against the enemy in a rash attack, was driven into flight before aid could be carried to it by the infantry, and it exposed the disordered infantry line to be destroyed by hostile arrows.

Moses killed Orchan, the son of Calepinus, after surrounding him with ambushes; Machomet killed Moses. Machomet was the first to render harsher and more atrocious the kingdom which until that point had been in some fashion political. For by force, fraud, and arms he oppressed and stripped of their dominions the petty kings and princes of the Turks who were suspect to him for any reason whatever. That destruction extended so widely that a little afterward there were no princes, but mere slaves. He died in the year 1419. From this one may gather that until that time the Turkish monarchy had been tempered by the power of the best men.

Another Amurath followed, whom John Hunyadi defeated in five battles and whom Scanderbeg, after driving him away from the siege of Croia, compelled to die. He inflicted disasters upon the Greeks, but their sloth was so great that, when about to fight, they selected as commander no one from their own nation but Mustapha, Amurath's paternal uncle; and when he had been defeated, they placed in command of the army another Mustapha, Amurath's thirteen-year-old brother. What wonder is it, therefore, if Amurath increased in power when the other Christians were inactive, certain ones even betraying them, and the Greeks entrusted the fortune of their sovereignty to an exiled boy?

This sovereignty degenerated into a perfect tyranny under Machomet II, who occupied Constantinople in 1453--not by the courage of his own Turks, but by the faithless labor and avarice of the Illyrians, Wallachians, Dardanians, Serbians, and Bulgarians. For these nations had come to him in the hope of military plunder. Savage toward his own people, a despiser of every right, oath, and divine power, he acted as a most absolute tyrant after the rival king at Constantinople had been removed. That beast died in 1481.

Then it became evident with how little counsel that kingdom had been established. For the purple-clad pashas and Janissaries disagreed concerning the successor, so that they came to battles and slaughters. The Janissaries, with men of that family striving in his favor, declared Baiazeth emperor. Others chose Corchutus, the son of Baiazeth, so that, with a boy as king, they themselves might be lords of affairs. But the youth yielded to his father, and the soldiers were placated by a largess. His brother Gemes brought no less a war against him and, defeated in three battles, fled to the Christians. Baiazeth inflicted many disasters upon the Venetians, but soon, after being repressed, was compelled to make peace. From the Persians, however, he suffered greater disasters, so that little was lacking before he lost northern Asia in a single expedition.

Meanwhile, his three sons, Selymus, Acomathes, and Corchutus, contended for sovereignty. Selymus obtained it with the assistance of the Janissaries and killed his father with poison. He killed not only his brothers but the sons of his brothers. He crushed the Persians, but with one hundred thousand of his own men lost.

Solimannus followed Selymus, and Selymus III followed Solimannus; they surpassed their ancestors in savagery and rapacity.

§ 8. After examining these things well, we shall discover that this sovereignty had endured for one hundred and sixty years from the time when it began to be most absolute and plainly tyrannical. Yet it was most unhappy. First, within the Ottoman stock itself, from which one man is destined for the kingdom either by the blandishments of some concubine or by a military disturbance, the entire remaining house is compelled by its death to furnish security to the man who reigns. A crowd of brothers and nephews is slaughtered so that one man may command without fear. Yet that has never occurred. For the sons and descendants of Baiazet were worn down by civil and foreign wars.

Evils are therefore perpetual in this kingdom. First, since there are many sons, as is natural amid the great license of many marriages, all nevertheless conceive a hope of sovereignty, either from the favor of their father or that of the Praetorian soldiers. Next, the fear of death joined to it sharpens that hope, since nothing intermediate is left between throne and tomb, between diadem and noose. What, therefore, should men about to die fear? Extreme fear produces confidence and the pursuit of an honorable and glorious death.

Third, that fear and hope render sons suspect and hostile to their father. For when they have learned by the slightest sign that one is preferred to the others, they now judge themselves condemned to death by their father. I add that they reduce the entire imperial house to one head; if anything human should happen to him, either no heir or a boy will then exist.

Innumerable calamities for the subjects arise from this. Agriculture is altogether abandoned. They plunder the regions so thoroughly that scarcely the necessities of life are left to them. No farmer thinks about private property, for even noble and very fertile fields lie uncultivated far and wide, and through the injury of those who reign all things tend toward devastation. Arms are taken from everyone; only a few men, as if they were robbers, are permitted everything. From this it is evident that this kingdom is most weak and has stood through the discord of its neighbors--if to be stained with so many calamities and slaughters is to have stood. I therefore conclude that that absolute and despotic monarchy is destructive, brief, full of fear and blood, and exposed to everyone who attacks it.

§ 9. It must therefore be established, second, that a tempered monarchy is to be preferred, one in which the authority of the best men, or of the senate, possesses force and in which the cities and other orders possess some power. Yet in it this must be guarded against: that the king should not command on sufferance; rather, when he has judged justly and according to the laws, his power should be supreme. For if the vigor of the supreme power withers, it is necessary that the property of the subjects be plundered and carried away, since without fear of the laws the injuries of the more powerful continually increase.

The first reason is that we see that most wise men judged thus: Plato in the Statesman; Aristotle in book 3 of the Politics, chapter 5, and book 8, chapter 10; Herodotus, book 3. Indeed, that Homeric saying has been approved by everyone:

> Οὐκ ἀγαθὸν πολυκοιρανίη· εἷς κοίρανος ἔστω.
> The dominion of many is not good; let there be one lord.

Philo, in the book On the Confusion of Tongues; Plutarch, in the Banquet of the Seven Wise Men and likewise On Monarchy, Oligarchy, and Democracy; Demosthenes, Against Androtion and Against Timocrates; Maecenas in the presence of Augustus; Philostratus in the presence of Vespasian; Isocrates, in the Nicocles; Stobaeus, discourse 45. The holy Fathers possessed the same opinion: Justin, Exhortation to the Greeks; Cyprian, On the Vanity of Idols; Athanasius, Oration Against the Idols; Jerome, the letter to the monk Rusticus; Saint Thomas, book 4 of Against the Gentiles.

Indeed, you will not readily find a dissenter even among those who, educated in a free commonwealth, held honors and magistracies. Cicero certainly admits that at one time the government of one man pleased the city and that the royal kind of constitution was rejected not because of the kingdom but because of the vices of the king. Book 3 of On the Laws.

§ 10. Not only is this the opinion and consensus of the wise, but it is also the practice of the whole world. For all ancient nations first obeyed kings. Cicero, book 3 of On the Laws. Justin, book 1: “In the beginning of affairs and nations sovereignty was in the hands of kings.” Seneca judges the royal kind of constitution to be according to nature in book 1 of On Clemency: “For nature devised a king. This may be recognized from other animals and from bees, whose king possesses the most spacious chamber in the middle and safest place. Moreover, he is free from labor, the exactor of the works of others; and when the king is lost, the entire swarm falls apart.”

Antiquity and sacred and profane history have confirmed the same thing for us by their authority. For after, while Noah and his sons were still living, the construction of the insane tower introduced the confusion of tongues, individual families began to possess kings. Indeed, even Nimrod, son of Cush and grandson of Ham, born near the very ark which had enclosed the whole human race within narrow spaces, planned a kingdom against his neighbors. For “he began to be powerful upon the earth and a mighty hunter before the Lord.”

Certainly, from the flood to Peleg there are 101 years. But he received his name from the fact that in his days the earth was divided, Genesis 10:25. From Peleg to Abraham there are 191 years. But at that time all things were already full of kings and cities; indeed, alliances and servitudes of kings were already known. For the kings of Canaan served Chedorlaomer, king of the Elamites, for twelve years, and the king of Shinar, or Babylon, was allied with him.

The Elamites are Persians. Thus it is marvelous that, while Noah and indeed Shem, Japheth, and Ham were surviving, and while even Arphaxad, Salah, Eber, and Peleg, who had been educated under one grandfather and beneath one roof, were looking on, their descendants waged such great wars that they came all the way from Persia with a hostile army, struck the Rephaim, Karnaim, Zuzim, Emim, and Horites, and rushed as far as the wilderness of Paran.

Therefore, when they no longer lived under a true father of the household, they nevertheless did not wish to exist without a single magistrate, but placed over themselves men in whose integrity, prudence, and courage they trusted. Nor did that custom afterward cease to exist. Thus in 1 Kings 8 the Israelites request a king: “Establish a king for us, that he may judge us, just as all nations possess.” The liberty of commonwealths existed in Greece and in a few Italian and Punic cities. For few desire liberty; the greater part desire just lords.

§ 11. The second reason by which monarchy is commended to us is longevity. The kingdom of the Assyrians persevered for 1,240 years; that of the Medes, 260; that of the Persians, 233 and, after the power of the Greeks had been abolished, 480; Sparta, 500; and the kingdoms of the Moabites, Ammonites, and Egyptians for very many years. Of all cities which possessed aristocracy or polity, the government was exceedingly brief, followed by tyranny or destruction.

Tyrants infamous for cruelty, avarice, and outrage existed in Greece and Italy because they judged that the brief power of the people must be worn down by burdensome servitude.

The Sicilian cities were free, but at intervals of time they were given as plunder to tyrants. How often did Athens, Corinth, and the other cities of the Greeks suffer tyrants? During the four hundred years between the kings and the Caesars in which Rome professed that it possessed liberty, did it not live as if in a perpetual contest and disturbance? Hence came secessions; hence the broken fasces of the consuls and, through hatred of a commander, victory furnished to the enemy; hence tribunician power, the sharing of marriages and honors, military tribunes, decemvirs for writing the laws, dictators, and masters of the horse. What year passed without disturbance, except when a common fear from an enemy threatened the parties? The inhabitants of the Roman city therefore collided with one another until the commonwealth arrived at one man.

The Republic of Venice alone, although it belongs to the best men, now numbers one thousand years, which is the sole example of a long-lasting aristocracy. But because it possesses a perpetual duke whom they call great, its government customarily seems to me as monarchical as aristocratic.

For although the authority of deciding and commanding is in the hands of the senate or Great Council, the duke is nevertheless the head of the senate and of the whole commonwealth. First, that magistracy or principate is perpetual, a thing which lovers of aristocracy are certainly accustomed greatly to dread. Therefore Antony, in order to conciliate the affections of human beings, abolished by an enacted law the name and power of dictator in perpetuity, because Julius Caesar had accepted a perpetual dictatorship.

Next, it belongs to the Venetian duke to summon the senate and consult it. Although he himself determines nothing except from a decree of the senate, this is the same as if at Rome he held a perpetual consulship. That kind of commonwealth certainly draws very much from the royal kind of government. Third, since at Venice there are easily sixty-nine councils, tribunals, or orders of judges, the duke can attend and preside over all of them; no one is ignorant of how important this is within a commonwealth. Fourth, royal honor is conferred upon him, whether you consider his public retinue or the observance of others toward him.

Finally, the fear of the best men shows how great the duke’s power is. For they are accustomed to raise to that summit a man advanced in age, moderate, loving the commonwealth, and of a civil disposition, and to strive with the greatest care lest he be able to become more powerful either by conciliating popular favor to himself or by courting the friendships of princes. For if some Sulla, Marius, or Julius obtained the authority with which the duke of Venice is endowed, he would subject the whole commonwealth to himself without a difficult outcome. In that matter he would be assisted not a little by the very form of the decrees, all of which are written out and published in the duke’s name.

He who weighs these things will readily understand that the longevity of the aristocracy comes from its conjunction with monarchy. For perpetuity of dignity; the right to summon and consult the senate; the right to approach all councils and assemblies of judges with dignity and prerogative; princely honor and splendor; and the power of publishing decrees in his own name are so proper to monarchy that the Romans abominated each as though royal.

What else did Pompey, although chief of the senate, desire than to belong to one who reigns? What did Caesar desire except that account should be taken of him while absent? How great were the wars which arose between father-in-law and son-in-law, because

> Caesar could not endure a superior,
> nor Pompey an equal?

Why was Caesar sacrificed with so many wounds before the statue of Pompey? Because he retained a perpetual dictatorship. But the great duke of Venice must deservedly be regarded as a perpetual consul or dictator, in whose name all things are conducted and to whom ambassadors direct their speech in the council. Although his power is not altogether dictatorial, his honor is nevertheless royal.

Accordingly, in this respect I prefer the Republic of Venice to the Roman commonwealth. For it is free from innumerable dangers which arose from the rivalries of ambitious men; nor in it > do the yearly contests return for sale upon the Field.

§ 12. The third reason why I prefer monarchy is that in it concord and the conjunction of minds can be preserved most fully and readily. No commonwealth can subsist without concord; scarcely any has perished without discord. Unity is readily preserved under one man. Accordingly, God also willed in his Church to remove occasions of dissension and schism by establishing one governor and head. This was also the mind and opinion of political writers. Tacitus, Annals 1: "There was no other remedy for a discordant fatherland than that it should be ruled by one man."

Nature itself dictates the reason to us. For in government by the best, power is scattered among several men. Since it is tossed by diverse opinions and affections, it tears the commonwealth apart. Where one man commands, the minds of individuals accommodate themselves to his commands and cannot divide the city, being subjected to one greater power.

If we consider the dissensions of the best men in the Roman city, we shall find them both perpetual and most destructive. At Athens, where the popular kind of constitution prevailed, the discord and mutual hatred of the leading men were so great that no one among the best men escaped exile or a fine. For contests among powerful men always exist unless some greater power restrains and binds the strength and desire of each. Two consular colleagues were rarely harmonious; ten tribunes, most rarely. The Italian cities in the times of Frederick and afterward were almost exhausted by continual contests among magistrates, while they imposed and suffered exiles in turn. At Florence neighbors fought against neighbors from towers; at Milan nobles and common people raged mutually against one another; the people of Padua, Verona, and elsewhere, through hatred and disgust for their own citizens, preferred foreign judges.

§ 13. The fourth reason: not only can concord be guarded more readily, but justice also, if one body of government is ruled by one soul. For when the best men command, they have regard for one another, forgive themselves, and indulge one another so that they themselves may enjoy equal impunity. Meanwhile,

> Whatever madness kings commit, the Greeks are punished.

Kings possess greater care and more effective authority for preserving justice, and less cause for violating it. For either the prince himself pronounces the law, and thus does not readily depart from integrity and rectitude, or he establishes judges whom the obligation to render an account readily holds in their duty. They can neither oppress an accused man nor gratify relatives or powerful men, since appeal to the prince and examination of the sentence pronounced not only commend observance of the laws but also announce immediate punishment to a transgressor.

For princes most readily punish wicked judges, although they themselves may not be lovers of justice. The reason for this is that, to their greatest glory, they punish them as public robbers; next, they also conciliate to themselves the love of their subjects as a protection, since they themselves are enemies of those whom everyone hates; finally, it is an ancient practice to enrich the treasury by the deaths and confiscations of wealthy magistrates. Since judges established by kings therefore are not ignorant that they themselves must at some time undergo judgment, they take great care lest by their own condemnation they be compelled to render the prince's reputation celebrated and increase the fisc.

The despotic government of the Ottomans is harsh, but nevertheless, amid so crude a tyranny, the prefects of provinces and cities vehemently dread every appearance of injustice. Many are slaughtered in individual years for the smallest offenses after their goods have been confiscated. That savagery renders the cruelty of the tyrant more tolerable to the peoples, since they understand that the instruments of tyranny are punished.

No one will estimate more readily the great indignity and violence with which justice and laws are harassed among the best men than one who weighs the deeds of the Romans, who were regarded as the most just of nations. Let us hear from a Roman consul what justice suffered among those lords of the earth. He says in the fifth oration Against Verres: "An opinion destructive to the commonwealth and dangerous to you has now become inveterate. It has grown widespread in the speech of everyone, not only at Rome but also among foreign nations: with the courts as they now exist, no wealthy human being, however guilty, can be condemned."

Nor did Verres boast without cause: "Those men ought to fear who stole enough only for themselves; I have plundered enough that it can suffice for many. Nothing is so sacred that it cannot be violated, nothing so fortified that it cannot be taken by money."

Nor did Cicero hesitate to profess this publicly before the Quirites when he spoke in favor of the Manilian law: "It is difficult to say, Quirites, in how great a hatred we exist among foreign nations because of the injuries and lusts of those whom in these years we have sent to them with command. For what sanctuary in those lands do you judge to have been sacred to our magistrates? What city holy? What house sufficiently closed and fortified? Rich and abundant cities are now sought against which a cause of war may be brought because of the desire to plunder." And: "Do you judge that you send an army for allies against enemies, or, under the pretense of enemies, against allies and friends? What city exists in Asia which can contain the minds and spirits not merely of a commander or legate, but of one military tribune?"

The same man exclaims: "There is no severity in the courts, no religious scruple; finally, the courts are now judged not to exist at all." Nothing, however, demonstrates the corruption of the courts more than what Cicero dared to recall at Rome before an assembly. He judged that foreign nations would send ambassadors to the Roman people requesting that the law and court concerning extorted money be abolished. For if there were no courts, they thought that each man would take only as much as he judged sufficient for himself and his children. Now, because courts of this kind existed, each man took as much as would be sufficient for himself, his patrons, advocates, praetors, and judges. This certainly was infinite: it was possible to satisfy the desire of the most avaricious human being, but not that of a most harmful victory. "O courts worthy of commemoration, and illustrious reputation of our order, when the allies of the Roman people do not wish courts concerning extorted money to exist, although they were established by our ancestors for the sake of the allies!" Thus a Roman consul spoke concerning his own commonwealth.

The aristocratic form of the commonwealth was the cause of so great a wickedness and shamefulness. For since the best men were joined to one another by kinship or affinity, were entangled in the same faults or desired indulgence for themselves from others, lived avariciously, needily, and prodigally, and finally conciliated the favor of powerful men to themselves through shameful deeds and flatteries, they destroyed the people, provinces, commonwealth, and at last themselves.

For the world, which could satisfy the desire of even any single most avaricious man, did not suffice for so many thousands, especially when new robbers were sent every year. Having squandered their patrimonies, they judged that by the vote of the people they had obtained the right to harass and despoil the provinces. Justice is therefore difficult under the rule of the best men and of the people; it is preserved more readily even under an inequitable king. One man also restrains desire more readily, either by abundance or disgust, than many.

§ 14. The sixth reason. Although the complaint concerning the rarity of good princes is ancient, and is circulated either through the malice of the common crowd, which willingly disparages the magistrate, or because it is true--namely, that all good princes could be inscribed upon one ring--I nevertheless find more commonwealths administered rightly by kings and monarchs than by the best men or the people. For one man tenacious of what is right and honorable is found more readily than many.

Cicero censures Cato's imprudence because he expressed his opinion amid the dregs of Romulus as though he were in Plato's commonwealth. Who, therefore, was a good man in so vast a senate house, in so numerous an army of conscript fathers? Shall I indeed number Cato himself among the good? I do so with the agreement of Tullius, who in his letters complains that Cato had been malicious toward him. But he is not a good senator who is malicious toward the father of the fatherland.

Since there is, therefore, a great rarity of good, constant, and prudent men, it is necessary that, where many are employed in magistracies, those commonwealths should generally be administered by wicked, fickle, and foolish men. This is all the more so because the wicked open a path for themselves through canvassing, largess, fraud, audacity, and violence; the good rely upon virtue alone, which nevertheless is frequently oppressed by slanders and is often hateful. But the multitude of distinguished men which we see today in certain commonwealths is the work of the Christian faith, not of political discipline.

§ 15. The seventh reason is drawn from the nature of the people, who are accustomed to fear a king but envy the best men. For a king, as though a god, seems to have been placed above envy; the best men seem to be citizens and, in their own manner, equals. But spite blazes among "ὁμοίους" and equals. Hence a king is accustomed to be better disposed toward the people than the best men; and, conversely, histories relate the marvelous affections of peoples toward their kings. With how great a joy do they receive them? With what weeping do they accompany them when dead? Evidently they trust the kings but regard the best men with suspicion.

For it belongs to the king to protect the people, and he is generally formidable only to the powerful. "Βούλεται δὲ," says Aristotle, "ὁ βασιλεὺς εἶναι φύλαξ, ὅπως οἱ μὲν κεκτημένοι τὰς οὐσίας μηδὲν ἄδικον πάσχωσιν, ὁ δὲ δῆμος μὴ ὑβρίζηται μηδέν. The office of a king is to take care that the wealthy suffer no injury and that the people are subjected to outrage in no matter." Princes generally do this; but in another kind of commonwealth the rich aspire to immeasurable resources through the harassment and outrages of those of small means. Since, however, that city in which ruler and subjects are joined by mutual charity and concord is firmer and better than one in which subjects hate the magistrates, there can be no doubt that monarchy ought to be preferred to the other forms of commonwealth.

§ 16. The eighth reason. Nothing is more shameful or destructive in a commonwealth than contempt for magistrates. It occurs most rarely in a kingdom and always in popular government and the government of magnates. If a prince is fickle, foolish, poor, fearful, or lustful, he is accustomed to be despised. For these vices are accustomed to excite the biting sayings and disdain of peoples more than hatred. Yet, because the audacity of wicked and seditious men is strengthened by these things, that prince is readily overthrown. For the man commands on sufferance whom good men pity and wicked men despise.

But although all these things are present in a prince or monarchy, they are nevertheless not readily recognized or assessed. He can perform many things by himself and many through his servants spiritedly, prudently, magnificently, and chastely, which conciliate a reputation for honor and the stability of the kingdom.

Alexander the Great, a most shameful man, attained great praise by guarding the wife and daughters of Darius chastely. Claudius, fickle, foolish, and timid, was protected for a long time by the magnitude of the sovereignty; for men revere so great a power even in the most contemptible little man. Thus at the beginning of his reign he was certainly most pleasing. But if those disgraces are detected among the best men, they are published without fear by rivals, received most greedily by peoples, and, since there is nothing by which authority may be retained, they are held in the greatest contempt among everyone. This occurs even more in a democracy, when vices born amid domestic filth seize the helm of the commonwealth and display mimes and buffoons rather than rulers to the peoples.

§ 17. The ninth reason. Monarchy possesses united forces; other kinds of commonwealth possess dispersed forces. Themistocles envies Aristides and is tormented by his trophies. Pompey is burned by Caesar's glory and would destroy his father-in-law even with the loss of the Gauls. Cato barks at Scipio, and Hanno at Hannibal; they prefer to lack victory rather than to see a fellow citizen glorious through victory.

Hence a commonwealth of the best men or of the people is never "αὐτάρκης" and sufficient to itself. Rather, when it is necessary to exercise power, when it is assailed by a disturbance or war, they designate a monarch. In war they place one commander in charge; in danger a consul names a dictator. Let us therefore conclude this part and establish with ourselves: there ought to be one God in the world, one sun, and one leader in one commonwealth. But now let us hear those who think otherwise.

CHAPTER XXII

That the Arguments for Government by the Best Men and by the People Are Weak

§ 1. The importunate conduct and vices of tyrants bring it about that learned men and political writers advance many things against the governments of kings and princes, as if I were defending the Mezentii, Phalarides, Neros, Ucilini, and similar disgraces to human nature, the memory of whom ought not even to cling to the minds of princes. Accordingly, I prefer a benign, moderate, prudent, and frugal prince to the dominion of the nobles or the common people.

I condemn the tyrant; I reject the absolute governments of the Scythians, Persians, and Turks, and "τὰς αὐτοβασιλείας," or autocratic monarchies. I proclaim a monarchy tempered by laws, constrained by customs, supported by the authority of the best men, and answerable to the just wishes of a good people. I approve fidelity bound by a reciprocal oath. To state it in one word: I approve that commonwealth in which the prince can do the greatest possible good and the least possible evil; in which the laws possess more power than might; in which a private person can contend with the king under equal right; and in which the supreme power does not judge it unworthy of its majesty to lose a case and be cast out of a private possession.

This is a great and plainly royal dignity of the Franks: when a lawsuit arises concerning possessions, they respond to their subjects under equal right. I judge that king who first enacted so salutary a law to have been above kingship. If we weigh these things rightly, we shall find that most arguments against monarchy have already fallen.

But now let the defenders, as they wish to appear, of the best men and the common people plead their cause.

§ 2. First, divine authority is objected against us, for God is most gravely angered at the Jews when they request a king. God says in 1 Kings 8:7: "Hear the voice of the people in all things which they speak to you. For they have not rejected you, but me, lest I reign over them. According to all their works which they have done from the day on which I led them out of Egypt even to this day, just as they abandoned me and served foreign gods, so they do also to you. Now, therefore, hear their voice."

And chapter 12:16: "But even now stand and see this great thing which the Lord will do in your sight. Is it not the wheat harvest today? I shall invoke the Lord, and he shall give voices and rains; and you shall know and see that you have done a great evil in the sight of the Lord by requesting a king over yourselves." The people too, stunned by the tempest and thunder, recognized its transgression. "Pray," it says, "for your servants to the Lord your God that we may not die; for we have added to all our sins the evil that we requested a king for ourselves." It is therefore evil to request a king, and kingship is not from God except when he is angry and punishing.

The reason which is added is certainly grave: "They have rejected me, lest I reign over them." Therefore, when a mortal human being is exalted into a kingdom, there is a withdrawal from the kingdom of God, and the immortal king is cast down from his throne.

§ 3. The answer in this case is not difficult. For the faculty of establishing a king is conceded by a divine oracle in Deuteronomy 17:15; and in Genesis 17:6 it is promised to Abraham that kings will be born from him. But there would be no favor in the promise if every kingdom were unjust and kings detestable after the likeness of robbers. Finally, God did not command the Israelites to return to aristocracy or democracy, but commanded that a kingdom should exist, and he gave many kings of distinguished virtue and knowledge of ruling.

In what, therefore, did they sin by requesting a king? First, they were ungrateful to Samuel, their prophet and leader. Although he had deserved excellently of them and governed the commonwealth excellently, they compelled him to abdicate his power and subjected him to a king. Next, they departed from the will and government of God, by whose command and authority Samuel and the other judges had been given. Their power was less than royal power. For although this government was monarchical, the liberty of the best men and people was nevertheless very great, so much so that each did what seemed right to himself. They therefore importunately desired to change the form of commonwealth established by God.

Third, there was no sufficient cause for changing the commonwealth. For although Samuel's sons, degenerate from their father, did not walk in his ways but turned aside after avarice, accepted gifts, and perverted judgment, they could nevertheless have been corrected by Samuel and the commonwealth, cast down from their dignity, and judges of proven integrity and holiness established. It was not necessary to introduce a new form of commonwealth for that reason--as if kings could not also pervert judgment.

Fourth, they distrusted God and were ungrateful for his benefits, for through a vain fear of the Ammonites they requested a king. Samuel reproaches them for this in 1 Kings, chapter 12: "Now, therefore, stand, that I may contend with you in judgment before the Lord concerning all the mercies of the Lord which he performed with you and with your fathers: how Jacob entered Egypt and your fathers cried to the Lord, and the Lord sent Moses and Aaron and led your fathers out of Egypt and placed them in this place. They forgot the Lord their God, and he handed them into the hand of Sisera, commander of the army of Hazor, and into the hand of the Philistines and the hand of the king of Moab, and they fought against them. But afterward they cried to the Lord and said: 'We have sinned, because we abandoned the Lord and served the Baals and Astaroth; now, therefore, rescue us from the hand of our enemies, and we shall serve you.' And the Lord sent Jerubbaal, Bedan, Samson, Barak, Jephthah, and Samuel, and rescued you from the hand of your enemies round about, and you dwelt confidently.

"But, seeing that Nahash, king of the children of Ammon, had come against you, you said to me: 'By no means; rather, a king shall command us,' although the Lord your God was reigning among you. Now, therefore, your king whom you selected and requested is present; behold, the Lord has given you a king. If you fear the Lord and serve him and hear his voice and do not provoke the mouth of the Lord, both you and the king who commands you shall be followers of the Lord your God. But if you do not hear the voice of the Lord but provoke his words, the hand of the Lord shall be upon you and upon your fathers."

Finally, they requested a king such as all the surrounding nations possessed, evidently so that they might feed their eyes upon that external splendor and arrive at distinguished power and license. For the magnates contemplated honors and courtly dignities for themselves, and the people resources and luxury. Thus everyone, disgusted with present things and gaping after future ones, requested a king, as if God could no longer raise up any Gideon or Samson. In this matter they transgressed gravely by rejecting God, their supreme commander, who had been accustomed to establish judges and leaders of war, and by despising his most special and benevolent providence, by which he himself governed his people and directed them with a gentle government without tributes and exactions.

§ 4. Second, they object: Prudence is greater among many; among princes there is the greatest scarcity of truth. It is therefore better that the safety and fortunes of peoples be entrusted to the counsels of many than to the judgment of one man, however prudent.

I answer that this indeed is to be desired: that one man should command in the place of many; that kings should possess force in prudence and counsel and, above all, be governed by the divine Spirit itself, like David and Solomon. But wisdom does not always accompany the scepter, and the pride of the purple frequently excludes the Holy Spirit. Hence come rash counsels and frequently precipitate conduct of affairs without counsels--not through the fault of kingship, but of kings.

Nevertheless, I do not see why kings cannot possess counselors proven in prudence and experience; and it is evident that a great part of the best men is often untrained. Certainly now in Germany, Italy, and the other kingdoms of Europe we see an extraordinary abundance of wise and brave men. Therefore, although either ability, learning, or prudence may partly fail the prince, he will nevertheless decree many salutary things according to the opinion of his council; and because what has been decreed depends upon one man, it can be effected swiftly. In the deliberations of the best men, although there is agreement, nevertheless, because of rivalry, favor, and other inconveniences, they arrive at execution slowly and not without altercations. Whatever superiority a multitude of votes might therefore possess in counsels, it loses through delay and impediments in conducting affairs.

§ 5. Third, they object: Several persons are corrupted with greater difficulty and judge more incorruptly; one man is readily enticed into fraud.

I answer that I taught the contrary in the preceding chapter: judgments in an aristocracy and polity were more corrupt than in a kingdom, as was evident from the example of the Romans. In a popular commonwealth the great city of Athens, "μεγαλοπόλιες Ἀθῆναι," inventress and nurse of all arts, supplies us with a proof. It seems similar to a monster that in the same city in which the cultivation of letters and arts and philosophy fixed its highest summit, judgments were also most corrupt, most inequitable, and truly predatory.

I do not accuse the Areopagus, although even its judgments lost their authority; nevertheless, its judgment owes its integrity not to fidelity but to night and darkness, and indeed to ignorance of the accused. I speak of the judgments of the people, than which nothing was more shameful, destructive, or unjust. They afflicted good and just men, even men unknown to them, by ostracism and harassed them with exiles. In this matter most cultivated Attica surpassed every barbarism.

I brought forward above the reasons why judgments of the best men and of the people are readily corrupted. Now I shall speak of corruption by gifts, which much more readily penetrates the homes of avaricious and needy judges than those of kings, whose immense resources bring it about that the sordid gifts of private persons are despised. For if a prince either possesses something of nobility in his spirit or displays it in his conduct, no one will readily show that he despises him so much that he boasts that he can purchase him for himself at a price and draw him into the shameful obedience of betraying justice.

Since, therefore, small and moderate gifts possess no weight amid the most ample fortune of kings, and since access to them is difficult and dangerous, more sincere judgments can be expected from them. But even a few coins, bullocks, little hares, little cheeses, and fruits of the strawberry tree, when carried into the homes of citizens, crush Themis--what wickedness!--in her own sanctuary, that is, in the tribunals. I would bring forward proof from Cicero concerning the corrupted and violated Clodian trial if modesty did not restrain me.

But I appeal to commonwealths. Who today accuses princes or kings as though they were hunters after gifts? This complaint concerns those who pronounce law upon the lower benches. It is less when princes are severe and strict defenders of justice and never pardon a corrupt judge. It is greater when princes are negligent and slow. It is greatest when no higher magistrate makes inquiry, or if that censorship is given to relatives, connections by marriage, and persons under obligation, and directed against those who have at some time conducted a prevaricating censorship or are feared as though they will conduct one. These things generally occur in government by the best men. Hence so many laws in cities struggle with so many frauds: that two brothers, father and son, or father-in-law and son-in-law should not sit in the same court.

§ 6. The fourth objection: No one dares to admonish a prince who errs, much less censure or teach him. But if anyone dares things that are true and strong, readily overcome by the multitude of flatterers, he is compelled to depart to the other side or withdraw from the court. Princes judge being admonished to be the same as being conquered; they judge their majesty injured unless someone praises even the vices of kings.

But in another form of commonwealth, since an adversary threatens each of the best men from the opposite side, all transgressions are not only noted but even drawn into judgment. In every aristocracy there are parties, and because many are equal, all are watched by all and held in their duty. Aristides fears Themistocles, Demosthenes Aeschines, Pompey Caesar, each of them Crassus, Cicero Clodius, Scipio Cato; all fear many, and no one is free of danger. But that mutual fear restrains avarice, checks lusts, and represses anger.

I answer that a prince in whose presence truths are kept silent is most wretched, and more wretched is he whose evils are also praised. Nevertheless, kingship is not inferior to aristocracy on account of this. Or if the "αὐθάδεια" and pride of princes, ignorant of admonitions, often reject counsels, other goods by which this evil is compensated are nevertheless not lacking, as was explained some time ago.

But the conduct of a few is maliciously and enviously transferred to everyone. We know many kings who not only did not turn away timely admonishers, but attended their sincere liberty with beneficence and adorned them with dignities. Many also bore rumors, jests, and the sharp speech of the common people with a gentle and civil spirit, judging it sufficient if they had obtained this: that no one could do them harm.

In this matter the moderation of Augustus Caesar must certainly be commended greatly. He was content to bar from his house a historian by whom he had been gravely injured. But since I am treating of virtues, I shall treat this praise of civility there.

For now this is certain: princes have many admonishers. For they possess without offense the books of ancient and living authors, although they sometimes read their own errors in them; they hear sacred sermons; they themselves examine their conscience and demand an account from themselves. Finally, no prince is so unhappy that he does not possess many who counsel him freely and whom flattery and unbecoming servitude offend. This is especially true if they are Christians, among whom there cannot be lacking men like Hilary, Ambrose, Chrysostom, and Gregory, whose liberty can stand against the sins of those who reign.

Only let public, bitter admonition resembling reproach and mockery be removed from the midst, both because it is dangerous to admonishers and because it rouses exasperated powers to excuse and defend their error, lest princes appear to have been conquered, and not to amendment, which ought also to be the end in censuring private persons. For importunate liberty is foolish rashness. It does not correct the man who errs, since it always needs pardon itself and rarely obtains it.

He cannot be a teacher and corrector of a prince with whom matters are conducted excellently if he escapes punishment and if, by admonishing another, he does not overthrow himself. The people praises things spoken freely and delights in abuse of princes; but the same people does not marvel at the destruction of those who act thus--indeed, afterward it pours itself out in praises of the prince who rages. It judges that the man who spoke in such a way that the prince was deservedly angered against him deservedly perished.

Who approved Galba's rashness when in the forum he told Julius the dictator that he was being summoned concerning the money for which he had become surety to Pompey the Great, his son-in-law? For thus he reproached Caesar with his slain son-in-law and his goods subjected to the auction spear. Caesar did not rage then, but Rome nevertheless marveled that this was not Galba's final act of audacity. For he could have conducted the matter privately or through a written petition.

The common crowd is astounded by the mad harshness of Theodorus of Cyrene. For when he answered Lysimachus, who was threatening death, "A magnificent thing has fallen to you, because you have attained the power of a cantharid beetle," prudent men disapprove. For what purpose was served by driving a tyrant voluntarily cruel into madness through contumacy and giving him an occasion to seem to rage justly? And certainly, when raised upon a cross, he learned the difference between rotting on the ground and rotting aloft.

Through this perversity of admonishing, many persons make princes worse. Since they seek the praise of constancy and liberty rather than the good of the commonwealth or the amendment of princes, they must be kept far from princes. For they exasperate them and imbue them with the most perverse and destructive opinion that they are not loved by their subject peoples; conversely, they themselves begin to hate those peoples. They are inflamed much more when they understand that the things said against them are received by the citizens pleasantly and with applause. But I shall give counsel concerning admonishing princes in its own place. For I prefer this to admonishing princes and, unless I am mistaken, it is safer.

§ 7. The fifth objection. Laws are the soul of the commonwealth. Where laws either do not exist or are harassed by the more powerful, the commonwealth is corrupt. But who can enclose a prince within the barriers of the laws?

I answer with the great emperor that it pertains to the majesty of one who commands that he should obey the laws. Therefore I have already excluded "παμβασιλείαν," or universal monarchy, and the absolute dominion of one man over the rest. Yet that dominion is no more burdensome than the absolute government of the best men over the rest, for in the latter there are as many tyrants as heads. What good shall we judge those men likely to bring to the citizens who, when enrolled in the senate, swore, as Aristotle says, "ὅτι τῷ δήμῳ κακόνους ἔσομαι," "that I shall be ill-disposed toward the common people"?

The Roman citizens certainly experienced this when they seceded to the Sacred Mount and when, by the counsel of Coriolanus, grain was denied them. What equity of laws existed at Rome when even the tribunes themselves brought forward many bills conjointly? Appius Claudius says that this was the same as if someone set poison together with food before a man whom hunger presses and ordered him either to abstain from that which gives life or to mingle what is deadly with what gives life. Gather everything praised in the Roman commonwealth and show that the senate, the best men, or even the decemvirs for writing the laws were ever able to be restrained by laws.

§ 8. The sixth objection. Liberty is equal for all, and everyone ought to enjoy it. But where more persons participate in liberty, there the commonwealth is more just. Thus the wisest founder of a commonwealth, Aristotle, book 2 of the Politics, chapter 2: "διόπερ τὸ ἴσον τὸ ἀντιπεπονθὸς σῴζει τὰς πόλεις· ἐπεὶ καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἐλευθέροις καὶ ἴσοις ἀνάγκη τοῦτ᾽ εἶναι. Therefore equality and reciprocal alternation preserve cities; for among free and equal persons it is necessary that this exist." But nowhere is equality less than in monarchy, where all obey one.

I answer that Aristotle pronounces judgment for us. "Δῆλον," he says, "ὡς τοὺς αὐτοὺς ἀεὶ βέλτιον ἄρχειν. It is manifest that it is better for the same persons always to command." Nor is that injustice detected here, for equality agrees only with equals, and inequality with unequals; it is contrary to right to attribute equal things to unequals. Nor is there any commonwealth in which everyone can command.

Next, liberty is badly estimated when it is denied to exist under a prince. For some pursue an extreme license of liberty which is the beginning of extreme servitude; others do not judge themselves free unless they command; still others cannot bear even laws and a master. They are certainly deceived. Liberty is indeed that power of living as you wish, but it is nevertheless necessary that you wish justly and rightly. For just government and the restraint of written laws are not opposed to liberty.

There is no reason why we should call the Roman people free when quarreling with its patricians but call the Jews slaves under David and Solomon. Nor ought those who live under kings to be classified by the appellation of slaves because they are oppressed in a servile manner by wicked and unjust kings, since the common people never lived under an equal condition beneath the best men. We in Germany properly call certain cities free and their citizens free, although they are ruled by Caesar and call him their supreme head and lord. Therefore those who measure liberty by "ἀναρχία," or anarchy, and the wandering license of nomads err just as much as those who measure it by impunity for crimes.

§ 9. The seventh objection. Princes remove leading and illustrious men from the midst because they fear them; they hate men prudent and upright in life as troublesome censors of a luxurious court. But among the best men and among the common people these men alone are raised to the summit. The supreme power of one therefore oppresses virtue; but where there is government by several, because honor and magistracy are given as a reward to virtue, probity, industry, and courage are sharpened.

The answer: Princes are not accustomed to persecute good men unless they are plainly tyrants; and in a commonwealth of several, fraud and audacity more often than virtue obtain the people's fasces. For who can excuse the ostracisms of the Athenians and the exiles of virtues ordered by the people? Since they had frequently lost liberty and experienced the most grievous servitude from the sudden setting of liberty, they therefore rose against everyone in whom virtue, industry, eloquence, or resources seemed to be eminent. They removed not vices but suspicions of vices and dangers.

Concerning the Romans we possess an abundant witness in T. Quinctius in Livy: "Discord among the orders is the poison of this city. The contests of the fathers and common people--while neither for us is there a limit to sovereignty nor for you a limit to liberty; while you are weary of patrician magistrates and we of plebeian ones--have raised their spirits. By the faith of the gods, what do you wish for yourselves? You desired tribunes of the common people; for the sake of concord we conceded them. You desired decemvirs; we permitted them to be created. You became weary of the decemvirs; we compelled them to depart from the magistracy. While your anger against those same men as private persons remained, we permitted the noblest and most honored men to die and be exiled. You wished to create tribunes of the common people again; you created them. Although we saw that it was inequitable to the fathers, we saw consuls of your parties created and even a patrician magistracy made a gift to the common people.

"Tribunician aid, appeal to the people, decrees of the common people imposed upon the fathers--under the title of equalizing the laws, we endured and endure our rights being oppressed. What end will there be to dissensions? When will it be permitted to possess one city, when this common fatherland? We, conquered, rest with a more equitable spirit than you as conquerors. Is it enough that we must fear you? Against us the Aventine is seized; against us the Sacred Mount is occupied. When the Esquiline was almost taken by the enemy, and the Volscian enemy was climbing the rampart, no one drove him off; against us you are men, against us you are armed.

"Come now: when you have besieged this senate house, rendered the senate hostile, and filled the prison with leading men, go out with those same fierce spirits beyond the Esquiline Gate; or, if you do not dare even this, look out from the walls upon your fields devastated by sword and fire, plunder driven away, and houses smoking after being burned everywhere. But, you say, the common interest is in a worse position through these things: the field is burned, the city besieged, the glory of war is in the hands of enemies. In what condition, then, are your private affairs? The report of his own losses from the fields will now be brought to each. What is there at home from which you may replenish them? Will the tribunes return and restore what you have lost? They will heap upon you as much voice and words as you wish, and accusations against the leading men, laws one upon another, and assemblies."

Indeed, monuments relate that Camillus was exiled; Tarquinius Collatinus cast out of the city solely through hatred of his name; Valerius regarded with suspicion because he was building a house upon the Velia, a more elevated place; the Scipios made to waste away in the country; and others, through the fault of an ungrateful fatherland, possessed the most wretched ends. Thus princes must be judged moderate if one pleases to consider the rivalry and malice of citizens ordering wicked things.

Those who compelled a city still retaining the spirit of its ancient liberty to serve unworthy persons under violent and savage domination increased hatred of the principate. Indeed, conspiracies, seditions, sarcasms, and slanders inflamed the harshness of masters. Now in Europe there is a different appearance. How great is the rivalry among the most powerful kings to join brave, noble, and prudent men to themselves? I judge that the king of the Spains alone possesses so many men outstanding in experience, ability, and wisdom that he could furnish us even one hundred Scipios. Count the commanders, masters of cavalry, and tribunes, and admire the supports of so great a monarchy.

"Kings," they say, "hate brave men and remove them from the midst." I appeal to the history of our age and seek outstanding men slaughtered by the tyranny of kings. I deny that even one can be produced, unless one pleases to deplore those who, convicted of injustice, plunder, an offense against majesty, or treason, paid deserved penalties. For we do not now treat of those whom kings or princes following new opinions tortured and killed on account of the ancient faith and religion, although the people and petty tyrants killed more.

§ 10. The seventh objection. Nothing afflicts and tears apart the commonwealth as much as variety and inconstancy of laws and actions. For it altogether removes the ruler's authority; next, it renders everyone uncertain about his own affairs and therefore hostile to the prince. For just as no prudent man builds a citadel upon ground shaken by frequent earthquakes, so all are alienated from and withdraw from a prince who is carried into contrary courses, because he readily overturns his benefits and changes friends. Even those who have received benefits fear that, having changed his mind, he will soon take back what he rather cast away than gave and add loss and outrage besides.

Niccolò Machiavelli, book 1 of Discourses on Livy, attempts to prove that there is greater constancy among the people. But he compares a prince released from the laws with a people which employs no laws, and a prince who administers the commonwealth according to the prescription of the laws with a people which employs good laws; and in each case he prefers administration by the people. For the Romans most bitterly hated kingship for four hundred years. The people rarely affects manifestly wicked human beings with honor. The people rages more gently and is placated more readily. The reason why the people's inconstancy is censured by writers is not that the people transgress more than princes, but that it is safer to exaggerate the vices of the people than those of princes, for no individual is censured here.

I answer first that Machiavelli admits that he speaks and teaches against all writers. Livy in many places, and all the other writers with nearly one voice, testify that the multitude of the people is inconstant, variable, and mutable. What all writers and all rulers of peoples testify, one Machiavelli ought not to have denied--much less strike everyone with a grave accusation, as though they exaggerate the transgressions of the people and close their eyes to the vices of princes.

That is a malicious and manifestly false slander. For men who lived among a free people testify to it, for whom it was dangerous to praise monarchy and censure the people. Plato says: "The people is ungrateful, lightly sated with any thing, mutable, cruel, envious." But let us hear Tullius, the greatest patron of the people, thundering against his own people after receiving the greatest benefits from the people: "Within an inexperienced multitude there are variety and inconstancy and, just as frequent changes of weather, so frequent changes of opinions." For His House and For Plancius.

"The people does not always judge in assemblies, but is generally moved by favor, yields to prayers, and creates those by whom it has been most thoroughly canvassed. Finally, if it judges, it is not led to judging by any selection or wisdom, but sometimes by impulse and even a certain rashness. There is no counsel in the common crowd, no reason, no discrimination, no diligence. Wise men always judged that the things which the people had done must be endured, but not always praised." And For Murena: "No strait and no Euripus possesses so many movements and such great and various agitations of waves as the procedure of assemblies possesses disturbances and surges. One intervening day, or one night placed between, often disturbs all things; and a small breeze of rumor sometimes changes the whole opinion. Often, even without any evident cause, something other than what we judge occurs, so that sometimes even the people marvels that it was done thus, as if it had not itself done it."

These are Cicero's words concerning the people that was lord of the nations, the people which daily heard orators and the most prudent men contending concerning the commonwealth and, having heard them, commanded with supreme power what it wished to be done. The cause of so great a mutability is rightly pronounced by the same man: "It estimates few things from truth and many from opinion," For Roscius of Ameria. "They judge honorable that which is praised by many." Since inexperience therefore often errs, is led by opinion, and hears imprudent and fickle human beings, it is necessary that it change often and be a source of honor and profit to its tribunes.

But the hatred of the Roman people against those seeking kingship was constant and bitter. Entirely so, because they feared tyranny; Cicero testified to this in his book On the Laws. For he who had seized dominion at Rome would reign with much blood. But I observed two things in the Roman commonwealth which implanted hatred of tyrants in the city. First were the examples of the Sicilians and of many cities in Greece which were tormented by barbarous and monstrous tyranny. In the period of Roman liberty the affairs of the Persians flourished; in Sicily there were Gelo and the Dionysii; in Greece Periander, Thrasybulus, Alexander of Pherae, and the Thirty Tyrants at Athens; and scarcely any city was ruled at that time without savage cruelty. Hence came so great a hatred of kings and, among a warlike people, a hand ready against them; and punishments imposed when the cause of suspected persons had scarcely been heard--certainly while the lawsuit was pending.

Under a mild and just king extreme liberty is not greatly desired; most live content with quiet and the protection of their affairs. But when they grow pale beneath the blow of a raging tyrant, they pour themselves into whatever nearby opportunity for liberty is opened, although with great danger.

But an angry people too, they say, rages more gently. Indeed, there is no beast more cruel than the people. The ambassadors of the fathers objected to the Roman common people that, through hatred of cruelty, they were rushing into cruelty; before they were free, they wished to dominate their adversaries. If you intend to consider the cruelty of peoples, see the Lemnians, Etruscans, Samians, and Athenians. The cruelty of the Lemnians passed into a proverb, so that whatever was done most monstrously was said to have been done by a Lemnian hand. The Etruscans joined living bodies to dead ones, for this was not the deed of Mezentius alone. The Samians carved an owl upon the foreheads of the Athenians; the Athenians carved a Samian ship upon the foreheads of the Samians--cruelty repaid by a foul example between the most cultivated peoples.

Do you wish me to speak concerning the Romans? The first emperors were cruel and certain monsters of human beings; I except no one, neither Augustus nor Titus. Yet the people was more cruel than they, delighted throughout entire days by the torments and deaths of the amphitheater. Next, were those very monsters not drawn from the citizens? Were the Roman best men gentle? Fimbria, Sulla, Telesinus, Catiline, Pompey, Pollio, Marius, and those who belonged to the Marian or Sullan parties--that is, all Romans. Few kings equaled the cruelty of the Roman leading men. But the Roman people surpassed them all, displaying horrible examples in the punishment of Nero, Caligula, Galba, and other princes, most cruel in punishing cruelty. The medicine exceeded its measure; the guilty and innocent perished.

The people is therefore both inconstant and cruel. The cause of its inconstancy is that it does not judge and is moved only by slight things, and therefore it is also moved to the other side. Although kings too frequently rave, nevertheless the ignorance of the people is greater, since its greatest part is occupied by private affairs. In the judgment of the people no one fears his own personal disgrace or hopes for praise if the counsels turn out badly; each imputes them to others rather than himself. For why should the reputation of the commonwealth touch the most sordid human beings? But where there is a prince, he both fears to establish what must immediately be changed and necessarily turns away from sudden transformations of affairs and the desire to fasten and unfasten laws as from a plague of the commonwealth.

CHAPTER XXIII

Machiavelli's Opinion concerning Monarchy, and Its Arguments Refuted

§ 1. I shall set forth and examine the opinion of a man who follows his own judgment rather than a prudent one, so that it may be evident to all that he not only employs weak reasoning but also sins against the fidelity of history and deduces conclusions and consequences from things that are utterly false. In book 2, chapter 2 of Discourses on Livy, he writes thus:

Love of preserving liberty, which at that time resided among many nations, rendered victory over neighboring and certain other peoples difficult and arduous for the Roman people. For they endeavored to defend it with so much zeal that they could not be conquered and overcome except by a certain extraordinary valor. As proof of this fact, you have examples of so many dangers which they were willing to undergo for the sake of defending and recovering it, and of so many and such dreadful punishments exacted from those who had furnished the cause of its loss. Nor is it obscure from the reading of histories how highly liberty ought to be valued, and how great and how difficult for a people the yoke of servitude is.

In our age a single nation seems to survive in which there are free cities; formerly the freest peoples existed throughout every region of the world. Certainly, in Italy, between the Alps, which divide Cisalpine Gaul from Tuscany, and the furthest shore of Italy, many free peoples dwelt: the Etruscans, Romans, Samnites, and others. Nor is mention made of any kings who then ruled in Italy, apart from the kings of the Romans and Porsenna. Although the histories have handed down nothing to memory concerning the destruction of his stock, it is nevertheless established that Tuscany, over which Porsenna had ruled, was free at the time when the Romans undertook war against Veii. Indeed, it enjoyed liberty with so much delight and held the designation of monarchy in so great hatred that, when the Veientes had created a king for the sake of defending themselves and had sought aid from the Etruscans against the Romans, the Etruscans, after long deliberation upon the matter, finally judged that assistance ought not to be brought to them so long as they had a king. For it was not fitting to bring aid to those who had subjected their fatherland to the government of one man.

Nor without cause does the love of liberty reside in every people. For experience testifies that no city enriches its citizens except in a time of liberty, nor even acquires dominion or augments the public resources in any manner. It is worthy of the highest admiration that the Athenians, freed from the tyranny of Pisistratus, were able to augment their strength and power so greatly within the space of one hundred years. And it is still much more astonishing that the commonwealth of the Romans, after the kings had been expelled, was able to arrive at so great a summit. All these things happen because it is not the resources of private persons but those which are public and common that augment the commonwealth; nor is account taken of the public good except in free cities, in which that which can equally benefit all or as many as possible is always decreed, while no account is taken of certain few whom that which benefits all might perhaps harm. The contrary occurs in those cities which obey the government of some prince. For in them it generally happens that what can benefit the prince harms all the citizens.

Hence it happens that, if a free commonwealth is reduced beneath the tyranny of someone, it may number among the lightest losses arising to it from that event the fact that it can no longer be augmented either in resources or in dominion, but begins even to decline gradually. For although we concede that this tyrant, beneath whose government it has been reduced, is an industrious man and outstanding in military valor, nevertheless he converts what he acquires to his own private advantage, not to public uses. And since, through fear of vengeance, he does not dare to select from his subjects, whom he rules tyrannically, all the most outstanding men and put them in charge of affairs, if he should occupy any cities besides, he certainly will not make them tributary to this commonwealth. For the tyrant's aim is not to augment the power of his subjects, but to preserve them in subjection to himself and to crush the strength by which they might someday shake off the yoke. On this matter many excellent things are read in Xenophon's book on tyranny.

Since these things are so, it ought to seem astonishing to no one that the ancients burned with so great a zeal for liberty and held the name of tyrants in so great a hatred. Thus, when a messenger once reached the army concerning the slaying of Hieronymus, grandson of Hiero of Syracuse, and all the soldiers were roaring against the conspirators, nevertheless, when it was reported a little later that liberty was being proclaimed publicly at Syracuse, they laid aside their anger against the conspirators and began to deliberate concerning the manner of preserving liberty.

For the same reasons those who had been willing to become the authors of liberty's loss were very often afflicted with enormous punishments. Although very many examples of these exist, in this place I shall adduce only one, and that a dreadful and memorable one, which occurred at Corcyra in the time of the Peloponnesian War. For since all Greece was then divided into two factions, one of which endeavored to retain the friendship of the Athenians and the other that of the Spartans, and the best men at Corcyra, having become superior, had once taken liberty away from the people, it afterward happened that the people, assisted by the aid of the Athenians, again conquered the best men.

And so, after the yoke of servitude had been shaken off, they confined all the best men in a certain large prison. Then, leading them out of it ten at a time, one group after another, as though they wished to send them into exile, they afflicted them with various punishments. When the others in the prison were finally made more certain of this fact, they resolved to defend themselves from such foul punishments in whatever manner they could. Therefore, making an assault upon those who were entering the prison, they repelled them and prohibited their entrance. But when the people learned of this fact, they stirred up a tumult, opened the flooring laid over the prisons, and suffocated everyone at once through the collapse of the walls.

Several other examples of cruelty of this kind also occurred then in defense of liberty. Yet human beings are accustomed to avenge liberty when it has been taken away with a greater impetus than they are accustomed to be carried against those who wished to take it away. But not without reason might someone marvel in this place at the cause why those ancients seem to have labored far more for public liberty than we see done in our age. I indeed think that this happened for the same reason on account of which those same men were braver than ours, and that this reason depended for the greater part upon education itself and upon the difference between their religion and ours.

For since from our religion we perceive the truth of things, we learn from it at once to despise the honors and pomp of this world. But the pagans valued all these things greatly and thought that the highest good was situated in them; for this reason they were more ready and fierce defenders of things of this kind. This is apparent from many of their institutions. For if you compare even their sacrifices with ours, in theirs you will discern a certain dreadful magnificence, but in ours a certain delicate softness. In theirs the slaughter of many animals was joined to pomp and magnificence, and this terrible sight rendered even human beings fierce; ours lacks all these things.

The religion of the pagans rendered human beings blessed by no things other than glory and the praise of valor for affairs conducted well and successfully in war or peace. From the institution of our religion, those who are humble and devoted to the contemplation of divine things are judged more blessed than those who have accomplished great affairs. It establishes the highest good, moreover, in humility and contempt for the things of this world. The pagans believed that all things stood in the contrary manner, for they judged that the highest good was situated in greatness of spirit, in strength of body, and in all the other things customarily done by the bravest men.

This institution of the Christians' life seems to have rendered the world unwarlike, so that it is customarily a certain prey for criminal and faithless princes. For most mortals, through hope of the blessed life, think more about enduring injuries than about avenging them, as though heaven ought to be acquired without any arms, by leisure alone. But that explanation of our religion is not free from error, and those who have so interpreted it were abject human beings to whom leisure rather than valor was dear. For the defense of one's fatherland and the enlargement of its dominion by a legitimate manner are in no way opposed to the Christian religion. It is permitted to all to love their fatherland, to hold it in honor, and to prepare themselves for its defense.

But that inept manner of education brings it about that, if in our age you traverse the entire world, you can by no means find so many free peoples and so many free commonwealths as formerly existed, nor human beings who are lovers of liberty and its keen defenders. Indeed, the magnitude of the Roman Empire also contributed not a little to this, since it subjected the free commonwealths throughout the entire world beneath its yoke. But even after the Roman Empire had been destroyed, nevertheless only a very few were able to recover their former liberty.

At the time when the Roman Empire was being increased, there were found in every region many free peoples, many free commonwealths excellently instituted, and the keenest defenders of liberty; and consequently they could not be conquered and overcome by the Roman people without extraordinary valor. The Samnites alone can serve as an example. Livy testifies that they were so powerful in peace and war, and so keen as defenders of liberty, that they waged war with the Romans for forty-six years and could not be conquered entirely before the time of the consulship of Papirius Cursor, who was the son of the first Papirius, although they had suffered innumerable slaughters.

For this reason it is all the more worthy of pity if anyone sees in our age that region almost desolate which was formerly inhabited by so many free human beings and adorned with so many free and excellently instituted cities. All these things derive the cause of their difference from liberty and servitude. For whatever cities and regions enjoy liberty are augmented in resources, dominion, and multitude of human beings. For who would not more gladly procreate human beings in those places where marriages and resources are free than where there is fear that, if by your labor you have acquired something for educating your children, it may be taken from you by some tyrant? Where liberty exists, you are able to promise yourself not only that the children whom you beget will not be slaves, but also, if indeed they devote themselves to virtue, that they will be employed in public affairs.

Resources are augmented here, not only from agriculture but also from all other honorable arts, because we are all so disposed that we gladly acquire in that place where we hope to be able to enjoy in safety the things acquired. In places of this kind all competitively take account both of public and of private advantages and endeavor to augment them. But where human beings are oppressed by the yoke of servitude, all things occur in the contrary manner, and all the more so, the harsher the servitude has been.

The servitude of those cities and regions which obey the dominion of a free commonwealth seems harshest. First, it is customarily of the longest duration, so that no hope of attaining liberty is set before them. Next, free commonwealths, for the sake of augmenting their own strength, are accustomed to diminish the power of cities subjected to their dominion and to suck out almost all their vital juice. Princes are accustomed to act otherwise--not those who are wholly barbarous, such as in our age are the eastern princes, corrupters of all civil life. The others, instructed in humane arts, are accustomed to be more equitable and to love their subjects; and they permit not only that their subjects acquire property by their customary arts, but leave their ancient statutes and laws intact, so that if, on account of this servitude, they can receive no further increase, they may nevertheless be able to preserve the things previously acquired by them.

And indeed in this place I speak of a principate which is occupied by an external man; concerning the tyranny which a citizen invades in his own fatherland, we spoke above. If you contemplate all these things diligently, it ought not to seem astonishing that the Samnites arrived at so great a power at the time when they enjoyed liberty and, after it had been lost, were ultimately reduced to the lowest condition. On this matter Livy says in the Punic War that the Samnites were oppressed by a single legion of the Romans near Nola to such a degree that they were compelled to send ambassadors to Hannibal for the sake of imploring aid. The ambassadors also complained of their misery before the Carthaginian: they were those who had waged war with the Roman people by their own strength for one hundred years and had often withstood two consular armies; now they had been reduced to such misery that they could not withstand a single legion.

§ 2. The Machiavellian propositions are these. First: In our age a single nation survives in which there are free cities, whereas formerly there were innumerable free peoples. Second: No commonwealth other than a free one enriches its citizens or acquires dominion. Third: In a monarchy it ordinarily happens that what is advantageous to princes harms citizens. Fourth: When some free commonwealth oppresses other cities with servitude, that servitude is both long-lasting and most harsh. Fifth: Account is taken of the public good only in free cities. Sixth: The Christian religion brings it about that human beings are not lovers of liberty; the Roman Empire also contributed not a little to this.

§ 3. These things must be considered from reason and experience. For Machiavelli himself denies that, when the Romans possessed dominion, there were free nations, except for a very few. If we regard more ancient times, sacred scripture teaches us that there were kings throughout the whole East, and this from the time of Abraham down to the Roman Empire. The Roman wars teach sufficiently that Italy possessed free peoples in the time of the Roman kings and consuls; nevertheless, not all were free, but many cities also had their own kings. Gaul and Germany, except when their inhabitants dwelt dispersedly, were governed by kings and petty kings, as likewise were the Spaniards and, apart from the Carthaginians, the Africans.

Now Venice, Genoa, Ragusa, Switzerland, Holland, indeed also cities of Germany, and the Kingdom of Poland, although it has a king, are free. But many abuse the name of liberty. For why is Venice free, because many myriads of citizens are so governed by a few nobles that they are compelled to obey their word, while they themselves do not rule in turn, but the Colony of the Ubii is not free, which is so governed by its own citizens that it possesses alternations of obeying and commanding, the moderated governments of magistrates, and the readiness of citizens in obeying, although it recognizes the emperor as its supreme head? But it recognizes an emperor who, according to the laws and received rights, examines and decides controversies.

If these things are examined by reason, we shall find very many entirely free cities in Europe. For liberty is various, and that which is judged the greatest, and exists in democracy, is plainly the worst of all. The Roman common people extorted this liberty to its own destruction: first laws, then tribunes, finally participation in magistracies and intermarriage, until all things were now within its power. Thus the Roman people would have denied that the Venetian people was free. For the former sought and retained tribunician aid against the fathers; the Venetian people remains within the power of the nobles.

§ 4. Second, he says: No commonwealth enriches its citizens unless it is free. If he speaks of a free commonwealth such as the Roman or Athenian commonwealth was, where the supreme power was in the hands of the people, then no commonwealth is now free, and none enriches its people; for all are governed by princes or by the best men, unless one pleases to except the Swiss. But there are many distinguished cities in our age, and there were formerly, which we see have attained great resources under the government of kings. Look upon the distinguished cities of Europe under the emperor and under the kings of France, Spain, Poland, and Britain, and show me free cities formerly in Greece with equal cultivation, equal felicity, and equal resources.

In Italy, in Samnium, in Campania, and in Latium there were free peoples, but certainly their cities were small, rustic, poor, and--to speak truly--barbarous rather than free. Florus, the epitomator of Roman history, says that his Quirites led a rustic life and carried off rustic spoils, the cattle of the Volscians and the flocks of the Sabines, until, after they had entered Asia, they carried resources and luxury home. But in Asia, what cities and of what quality were founded, fortified, and adorned by kings and burdened beyond measure with riches? Babylon, Nineveh, Ecbatana, Persepolis, Sidon, Jerusalem, Damascus, Tyre, Memphis, Sardis. The Holy Spirit in Ezekiel describes for us the riches of Tyre as an example of a prosperous city.

But in Italy Rome was then the greatest, and Capua next. For when a triumph was celebrated over Tarentum and Pyrrhus, they received their first experience of riches. “Before this day,” says Florus, book 1, chapter 28, “it had seen nothing but the cattle of the Volscians, the flocks of the Sabines, the wagons of the Gauls, and the broken arms of the Samnites. Then, if you looked upon the captives, there were Molossians, Thessalians, Macedonians, Bruttians, Apulians, and Lucanians; if upon the processions, there were gold, purple, statues, paintings, and Tarentine delicacies. But the Roman people looked upon nothing more gladly than those beasts which it had feared, with their towers: they followed the conquering horses with necks lowered, not without a sense of their captivity.”

The Roman consul himself, when he speaks of the ancient Romans, teaches us that they were ignorant of Asiatic riches. The Romans judged that only three cities in all the lands--Carthage, Corinth, and Capua--were able to sustain the weight and name of empire. Therefore what Machiavelli reports in the third place is false: that in a monarchy all things are referred to the advantage of the prince; for a legitimate prince regards the advantage and safety of the people, and by this end is distinguished from a tyrant. Moreover, to possess opulent peoples is also the advantage and dignity of the prince. And so the Roman city also grew under kings, as did the other Italian cities; the affairs of the Corinthians grew under the civil and humane administration of tyrants. Therefore, he who accuses princes of being intent solely upon their own advantage condemns them all, by one vote, of tyranny unless they are extraordinarily clement and liberal.

§ 5. It is therefore a consequence that this statement too is false, which he makes: In free cities alone is account taken of public advantage. Is that truly so? Did those who defended their peoples and poured out their blood, not from desire for dominion but in defense of their fatherland, and the founders of so many cities, temples, and academies, accomplish nothing for the public good? Cobblers, evidently, and athletic anointers, while they are elevated by an annual government, take account of the public good, but kings and princes devote themselves only to their own affairs.

The contrary must therefore be established: in the government of the best men and of the people, each person is more zealous for his own advantage than for the public advantage. For the best men endeavor to turn the majesty and advantage of government toward themselves--to such a degree that at Rome the tribunes so often cried out, both spitefully and truly, that there were two cities. The common people regarded its own advantages: agrarian laws, new account books, and assemblies; it sought bread and circuses and the gifts of candidates. There was no mention of public advantage except where the magnitude of danger also threatened private losses.

T. Quinctius Capitolinus spiritedly reproaches his citizens with this: “But through these things the common interest is in a worse position: the field is burned, the city is besieged, the glory of war is in the hands of enemies. Yet in what condition are your private affairs? Now the report of his own losses from the fields is being brought to each. What, finally, is there at home from which you may replenish them? Will the tribunes return and restore to you what you have lost? They will heap upon you as much voice and words as you wish, and accusations against the leading men, laws one upon another, and assemblies. But from those assemblies no one of you has ever returned home increased in property and fortune.

“Has anyone carried anything back to wife and children besides hatreds, offenses, and public and private enmities, from which you are always safe not by your own valor and innocence but by the aid of others? But, by Hercules, when you served your campaigns with us as consuls, not with the tribunes as leaders, and in the camp, not in the forum, the enemies trembled at your shout in the battle line, not the Roman fathers in the assembly.”

§ 6. Finally, we admit that the Christian religion brings it about that human beings are less lovers of liberty, and this not only because they estimate fleeting and perishable things at their own value. For, instructed by divine oracles, they hope that one day they are to be asserted from servitude and the workhouse into the liberty of the children of God.

They believe and follow the admonition of the Apostle: “Let each one remain in that calling in which he was called. Were you called as a slave? Let it not be a care to you; but if you can become free, use it rather. For he who was called in the Lord as a slave is the Lord’s freedman; similarly, he who was called as a free man is a slave of Christ. You were bought with a price; do not become slaves of human beings.” 1 Corinthians 7:20.

But they fear the governments of princes less--indeed, they willingly entrust themselves to them--because those princes also know that they are slaves of Christ and treat their fellow slaves moderately and clemently, mindful that they themselves stand in the sight of their common Lord. For where among Christian princes are found the familiar and customary savagery and plunderings of the ancients? But I shall show that it is a slander that our religion makes men soft, not brave, when I treat of fortitude.

Now I shall refute this impious pseudo-politics by the testimony of Tertullian and by reason. For if Christians so despise death and torments, how brave would they be in battle, they who possess so great a desire for an honorable death? They endure so many devices of executioners when they are able to rescue themselves from vexations with one word, if they should say, “I am not a Christian.” Certainly, if I wish, I am a Christian; you will therefore condemn me if I wish to be condemned. But since you cannot do what you are able to do against me unless I wish it, what you are able to do is now a matter of my will, not of your power. Hence the common crowd also rejoices vainly in our vexation; hence the joy which they claim for themselves is ours also, since we prefer to be condemned rather than to fall away from God. On the contrary, those who hate us ought to grieve, not rejoice, because we have attained what we chose.

Certainly, one who is prepared to die and laughs at torments is not unfit for war. And in the Apologeticum, chapter 5: “Therefore, you say, why do you complain that we persecute you, if you wish to suffer, since you ought to love those through whom you suffer what you wish? We plainly wish to suffer, but in the manner in which a soldier also wishes war. No one indeed suffers willingly, since both trembling and danger are necessary; nevertheless, he both fights with all his strength and, when victorious in battle, rejoices--the man who complained of the battle--because he obtains both glory and spoil.

“For us, the battle is that we are summoned before tribunals, so that there, under peril of the head, we may contend for truth. But victory is to obtain that for which you have contended. That victory possesses both the glory of pleasing God and the spoil of living eternally. But we are overcome. Certainly, when we have obtained our object. Therefore we conquer when we are killed; finally, we escape when we are overcome. You may now call us Sarmenticii and Semaxii, because, bound to the stake of half an axle, we are burned amid a surrounding mass of faggots. This is the attire of our victory; this is our palm-embroidered robe; in such a chariot we triumph. Deservedly, therefore, we do not please the conquered.

“For this reason we are judged desperate and lost. But this desperation and destruction, when it is among you for the sake of glory and fame, raises the standard of valor. Mucius willingly left his right hand upon the altar. O sublimity of spirit! Empedocles gave his whole self to the Etnaean fires of the Catanians. O vigor of mind! A certain foundress of Carthage gave herself to the funeral pyre as a second marriage. O proclamation of chastity! Regulus, lest he alone live in exchange for many enemies, suffers tortures over his whole body. O brave man, and victor in captivity!

“When Anaxarchus was being pounded to destruction with the pestle for barley-groats, he said, ‘Pound, pound the sack of Anaxarchus! For you do not pound Anaxarchus.’ O magnanimity of the philosopher, who jested even thus concerning his own end! I pass over those who contracted for praise with their own sword or some other gentler kind of death. For behold, contests of torments also are crowned by you. An Attic courtesan, when the executioner was now exhausted, finally spat her own chewed-off tongue into the tyrant’s face, so that she might spit out her voice also and be unable to confess the conspirators, even if, when conquered, she had wished to do so.

“Zeno of Elea, when asked by Dionysius what philosophy furnished and when he had answered, ‘Contempt of death,’ was cast, insensible to suffering, before the tyrant’s scourges and sealed his judgment even unto death. Certainly, the scourges of the Laconians, made more bitter beneath the eyes of kindred who even exhort them, confer as much honor of endurance upon their house as they have shed blood. O permitted glory, because it is human, to which neither a lost presumption nor a desperate persuasion is imputed in contempt of death and of cruelty of every kind; for which it is permitted to suffer as much for fatherland, for empire, and for friendship as it is not lawful to suffer for God!

"And nevertheless you both cast statues for all those men, inscribe images, and engrave titles for eternity, so far as you are able by means of monuments. Evidently, you yourselves also furnish this resurrection, in a certain manner, to the dead. Is he who hopes for the true resurrection from God, if he suffers for God, insane?"

Therefore softness is not the cause why Christians love their kings, but the ordinance of God, the moderation of those who command, and the virtue of those who obey. For the Romans also rejected their kings only on account of their vices. Florus himself is a witness, book 1, chapter 8: "Finally, the importunate domination of that proud man was of some--indeed, of the greatest--benefit. For thus it came about that the people, agitated by injuries, was inflamed with desire for liberty." Most wisely, therefore, did Tertullian show that Christians were brave and could bear commands, since they could bear martyrdoms.

I shall conclude a little differently. If through the Christian religion so many Muciuses, so many Anaxarchuses, so many Zenos, so many Laconians, and all in a better cause, have been made, the Christian religion does not enervate the strength of human beings but confirms it. But concerning these things in their own place. Now, against the pseudo-politician, I give this warning: when I praise the just government of a just prince, I do not act against liberty.

It is an inestimable good to become one's own. But, as Aristotle says, Metaphysics 1, chapter 2, the free man exists for his own sake, not for another's. All judge loss of liberty the gravest, and the poet sang with applause:

"οὐ θνῄσκει ζῆλος ἐλευθερίας."

The love of liberty does not die.

And rightly Strabo also:

"Ἐλευθερία μόνη ἴδια ποιεῖ τῶν κτησαμένων τἀγαθά. Τὰ δ᾽ ἐν δουλείᾳ τῶν ἀρχόντων, οὐκ ἀρχομένων ἐστί."

Liberty alone makes the goods of those who possess them their own; but the things that are under servitude belong to those who command, not to those who obey. But I have now shown that to obey a just government and one according to laws is not servitude, but the safest liberty. But if the prince departs from justice and breaks the laws through avarice, anger, and lust, nevertheless the tyranny of one will not be more grievous than the savagery and outrages of many masters.

CHAPTER XXIV

That the Magistrate Is Obligated to His Fatherland

§ 1. This question is customarily proposed concerning the prince; but because I have undertaken to instruct not only the prince but also the senate and the people, I have had to dispute concerning them all generally. The question, taken thus, is twofold. For it is asked: Can the supreme magistrate do more than the whole commonwealth? Next: In what matters is the magistrate obligated to the commonwealth?

The first question is difficult and perhaps dangerous. For if you say that the magistrate can do more, you will perhaps kindle tyranny; if you attribute supreme power to the commonwealth, you will seem to reduce kings to order. Therefore a method must be found by which both the magistrate, who is the head and likewise a part of the commonwealth, may be assured of his authority and the commonwealth may preserve its own right.

§ 2. Therefore, first I answer: Every commonwealth which places magistrates over itself--whether it elects a king, as formerly the Romans and now the Germans and Poles do; or a council of the best men and a public council, as the Romans did after the kings had been expelled; or designates rulers from the whole people, as we read was also done at Rome after patrician magistracies had been shared with the common people, and as now the Swiss and the federated provinces of Belgium have for their custom--every such commonwealth, I say, whatever magistrate it elects, ought to bind him by the prescription of certain laws, to deprive him of power over certain matters, and to reserve that power to itself. Otherwise it will introduce over itself a dominion almost despotic, as we now see has been done in Muscovy and Turkey; we have already rejected that form of commonwealth above as destructive.

Next, no province in Europe now struggles beneath governments of this kind, nor do Christian princes or magistrates seem to affect such a form. Nevertheless, if there is some such commonwealth, as that of the Turks now is, there is no doubt that supreme power is in the hands of one man, and neither any one of the others nor all together can lawfully oppose themselves to him, any more than slaves can resist masters. But that is a commonwealth of workhouse slaves, not of citizens.

§ 3. Second, I establish this: In a commonwealth constituted by laws, supreme right is in the hands of the magistrate, both because he is eminent above all private persons and because in certain matters he can do more than the whole commonwealth. Therefore his power is rightly, simply speaking, the greatest; nor is tyranny to be feared from this, for there can be supreme power even if it cannot do all things. But that power is called supreme which, according to the laws, has no equal or superior.

Accordingly, I call the king greater than the whole multitude. For no commonwealth can cast down its king from the throne; and although they may have designated him by the freest votes, nevertheless, once they have transferred their power to him, they cannot revoke it at will. Next, not even the whole commonwealth is able to impede or delay the exercise of royal right and its legitimate functions. For it did not institute an imaginary or painted king, but conceded to him the sword and the use of the sword.

Third, the commonwealth cannot compel its magistrate to yield even part of his right, but is bound to preserve it whole for him and diminished neither by force nor fraud. Finally, in the administration of justice, the defense of the innocent, and the pardon of offenses, even if the leading men, the council, and the people dissent from the king, they are nevertheless compelled to follow, assist, and support him. For the whole remaining commonwealth cannot compel the prince to release a guilty man, abandon the cause of an innocent man, or punish according to the laws a defendant to whom he could otherwise show indulgence.

It is my intention to demonstrate the matter by an excellent example conspicuous for the firmness of government. In the Samnite War, Camillus the consul named L. Papirius Cursor dictator. He named Fabius Maximus master of the horse, and, setting out for Rome to renew the auspices, commanded Fabius not to fight in his absence. But Fabius, having obtained an opportunity to conduct the affair successfully, engaged the enemy and carried back a distinguished victory. The dictator arrived while the soldiers' joy and congratulations were still fresh, threatened the master of the horse with death, and ordered him to be stripped and the rods and axes made ready. But the Triarii received and protected him when he implored the soldiers' fidelity, and the army pleaded on behalf of the master of the horse, now also a victor.

Yet they did not move the severe and excessively imperious dictator. Ordered to appear the next day, Fabius, when he understood that he would have him as a still more hostile judge, fled to Rome. He appealed to the foremost of the fathers and hoped that through the intercession of the senate he would be immune from the dictator's savagery. Papirius nevertheless persisted in his judgment until at last Fabius's father appealed to the people. In Livy he concludes his speech thus: "Since in your presence neither the authority of the senate, nor my age, for which you are preparing childlessness, nor the valor and nobility of the master of the horse named by you yourself, nor prayers--which have often softened an enemy and placate the anger of the gods--possess any force, I appeal to the tribunes of the common people and appeal to the people. I bring as judge over you, who flee the judgment of your army and flee the judgment of the senate, the one body which certainly can and does possess more power than your dictatorship. See whether you will yield to an appeal to which Tullus Hostilius, a Roman king, yielded."

But what did Papirius do after Fabius's most odious speech? He still persevered in his undertaking and demanded the master of the horse for punishment. What did the Roman senate, the Roman people, and the tribunes of the common people themselves do here? The people began to plead, and the tribunes of the common people likewise, that pardon might be given to the youth of Fabius and that the punishment of the master of the horse might be remitted for their sake. Fabius's father, prostrate upon his knees, entreated on behalf of his son.

Then indeed Papirius declared that he granted the condemned man to the people and the tribunician power. His words are: "It is well, Quirites. Military discipline has conquered; the majesty of command has conquered--things which had been placed in doubt, whether they would exist at all after this day. Q. Fabius, who fought contrary to the commander's edict, is not released from guilt; rather, condemned for his guilt, he is granted to the Roman people, granted to the tribunician power as it pleads, not as it brings lawful assistance.

"Live, Q. Fabius, happier because of this consensus of the city to aid you than because of the victory in which you exulted a little while ago. You dared a deed for which not even your parent would have granted you pardon, if he had been in the same position in which L. Papirius was. You will return into favor with me when you wish. You will furnish nothing greater to the Roman people, to which you owe your life, than if this day has given you sufficient instruction that in war and peace you must be able to endure lawful commands."

I judge Papirius's severity in rejecting a suppliant rash and not to be imitated by any prince. Yet I judge that he acted lawfully and according to the laws. Neither the senate, nor the people, nor the tribunes could exempt from punishment a man lawfully condemned by the dictator; that entire popular and aristocratic commonwealth was a suppliant to the dictator. If that temporary magistrate was greater than the whole commonwealth, who would marvel that this is admitted in a monarchy?

But if in the administration of justice the prince depends upon the people or upon the senate and people, what will arise from this except appeal to the people, evasions of the laws, and eternal lawsuits? Next, the authority of the ruler must fall into contempt and ridicule if the people sits as his judge and renders void what has been judged rightly. Nor do I see how there is any monarchy if in every government supreme power is in the hands of all together.

I see that this also has assuredly been received through custom in the Roman Empire: although the German princes have established a measure and limits for the imperial power, they nevertheless preserve its authority in judging safe and intact. For this reason, when some of the princes attempted to diminish this right and endeavored to obtrude a certain other judgment of princes, they were gravely admonished by the Catholic princes not to pluck away and enervate the force, right, and gravity of the empire. They also exhorted the Emperor Matthias himself to protect the right of the empire whole, inviolate, and sacrosanct. Let it therefore remain established that supreme right resides with the prince. For although he is bound to his citizens by the laws and his oath, he himself is nevertheless the guardian of those laws.

§ 4. Third, it is most certain that it is useful and salutary not only for the whole people, but also necessary for the magistrate's peace and long duration, that there should be many things which he cannot do, but in which a lesser magistrate and the people can do more than he. First, that he cannot impose new tributes or establish new taxes without consulting the commonwealth, which has been established most wisely in Spain, Germany, and other kingdoms. For by no other thing is sin committed more grievously, and nowhere do more grievous disturbances arise, than through the excessive and harsh exaction of tributes and taxes. Since this touches individuals, it is equitable that, with the commonwealth consenting, they should rather be given by willing persons than extorted from unwilling persons with curses and imprecations against the prince and the groaning of the poor.

Deservedly, therefore, in this matter a bridle is placed upon princely license and upon the greed of ministers who, while they profess that they are defending the prince's fisc and treasury, seek their own profits by no unfamiliar arts. The fisc has many patrons and itself patronizes many.

§ 5. Next, it is most consonant with the laws of a good city that the authority of establishing and abolishing laws ought to be in the hands of the commonwealth, not of one magistrate, whether that magistracy is a principate or a senate of the best men. Since I shall treat this matter in the book on laws, I refrain from bringing forward the reasons here.

§ 6. Third, neither should it be within the power of one prince to select his successor. I think that this is observed in all provinces where the principate is conferred by election and votes; but where succession occurs by inheritance, this must be done by the norm of laws and by custom, not by the prince's will. And if a controversy arises concerning the heirs, the whole commonwealth will resolve it. For it ought to be able to do more than a doubtful heir, since this is a matter of the greatest consequence for everyone.

The reason why, where a prince is established by election, I would not wish the judgment even of a moderate and prudent prince to prevail is this: every worst man will insinuate himself through dissimulation and fraud; he will remove by plots, slanders, and the sword his rivals or those in whom he suspects that there is hope of the kingdom. Augustus was uncertain concerning an heir, and the man whom he appointed would become lord of affairs. What slaughters, what tragedies did that power produce? Germanicus and his stock were removed from the midst by the arts of women, and at last a successor was selected from exile who was to reign with much blood. Augustus himself said that he grieved for the lot of the Roman people, which would be beneath such slow jaws. He nevertheless made Tiberius emperor, whether from necessity, as though unequal to the latter's power, or from choice, so that he himself might be rendered more commendable and more desirable by the monstrous conduct of his successor. Nor was the condition of Tiberius better: after better men had been killed in various outcomes, Caligula succeeded him.

§ 7. Fourth, concerning peace and war also I would prefer the right to belong to the commonwealth rather than to the prince, although I see that this right belongs for the most part to kings, so that they are arbiters of wars and peace. The reason is that wars will thus be begun more slowly and ended more quickly. Princes, often greedy for praise and obstinate in vengeance, leap to arms for slight causes. Noble tribunes incite them; they set before them examples of Alexanders, Scipios, and Caesars and assail as though cowardly those who sit inactive at home and accomplish nothing. This is a great error of fierce human beings, as if it were not the greatest work of all to contain so many thousands of human beings and so many hundreds of wicked men in peace and to compel them by authority and fear to live without injury to others.

That praise belongs to beasts: that the one stained with more slaughters is the bravest. A prince is selected for preserving human beings; otherwise, when a prince is peaceful, a notorious robber will be called more glorious. But since very many of the best and wealthiest of the subjects desire and seek peace, and since it concerns them especially that their lives and fortunes should not be committed to the uncertain die of wars, equity demands that their consent also be sought. This is especially advantageous to the prince, for he will experience as faithful helpers those who already decreed the war beforehand.

But since during a time of war the reputation of princes is torn apart especially, and since it can never be otherwise--for whatever losses subjects receive from the enemy and from friendly soldiers, they impute them all to the prince--it must be diligently arranged that war and the expenses for war should be decreed by the judgment of all. When this has been done, the prince will not indeed escape all detractions and slanders, but he will nevertheless attain this: that he does not possess everyone as an adversary, but has some as approvers.

§ 8. Fifth, I greatly approve what has been established in many provinces of Germany, especially ecclesiastical ones: that a prince should not be permitted to contract debt without the knowledge or against the will of his subjects. For in this manner a part of the kingdom is mortgaged to outsiders, its strength is dissipated, and the necessity of a new tribute is imposed under another name while either the principal or the interest must be discharged. Indeed, I judge it more tolerable to come to the aid of the prince's necessities by some mild tribute than to render the fatherland obligated to moneylenders and to expose the majesty of the prince to ridicule.

These are the principal things which are prudently reserved to the commonwealth as certain possessions of its own. There are others peculiar to many kingdoms: that it is permitted to assemble conventions of princes without the king's command; to establish a tribunal independent of the king; that the king has no right in punishing the offenses of princes or nobles; and that appeal from the king to lesser magistrates is given. I shall treat of these matters in their own place. Now I teach only this: it is altogether useful that the power of princes should be so enclosed by laws that it cannot easily wander beyond bounds and pass over into tyranny, yet so free that it suffices for coercing the wicked and protecting the good and is a terror to enemies.

For many provinces, while they cut down the authority of princes excessively, have been overthrown; for wicked human beings, contemptuous of a precarious and, as it were, enslaved power, confound all things from top to bottom.

§ 9. The other obligation of the magistrate is discerned in the performance of his own office. Cicero said excellently and, as I think, from his heart, that he desired two things: first, that when dying he should leave the Roman people free; second, that as each man was disposed toward his fatherland, so also should he enjoy that fortune. He attained neither. For, when about to die, he saw his fatherland captive, and its defenders paid for their love of country with death and exile. Nevertheless, he showed us what sort of prince and what sort of citizen he wished: namely, one most loving toward his fatherland--the whole of it, I say, and the individual orders, individual parts, towns, villages, and human beings within that fatherland.

For even in private persons so great is love of fatherland that one fatherland embraces all the affections of all, as the same Cicero says in book 1 of On Duties. To demonstrate love for it, they imagine that Ulysses, the wisest man, preferred his fatherland to immortality:

"ἱέμενον τὸν καπνὸν ἀποθρῴσκοντα νοῆσαι ἦς γαίης"

Desiring to see smoke rising from the hearths of his fatherland.

If by nature nothing is more closely joined than fatherland; "οὐδὲν γὰρ ἐστὶ οἰκειότερον πατρίδος"; if no good man hesitates to die for the fatherland, if he will benefit it; if we ought to die for it and to stake and, as it were, consecrate all our possessions, with how much love and zeal toward it ought the magistrate, the prince of the commonwealth, to be affected? He ought not only to love the fatherland, to which he must furnish all things without payment, but that fatherland from which they possess so many pledges of reciprocal affection, and by which they have been carried up to honors, resources, and glory.

For the obligation of princes is most extraordinary and most grave. For, first, the fatherland has committed itself to their affection, fidelity, diligence, and justice. No one is so barbarous that he does not love the person whose so great love toward himself and so distinguished a judgment he has experienced. Next, the fatherland supports the prince most magnificently and sumptuously. Amid so many thousands of poor persons and so many myriads sustaining life by hard labor, all things are supplied to the prince most abundantly, not merely for necessity but for display, magnificence, and recreation.

Something is deducted from the industry of merchants, the vigils of craftsmen, the sweat of countrymen, and the hardships of miners for the prince to consume upon luxury and dignity. But it is not, nor ought it to be, the sentiment or will of the fatherland that it should confer these resources upon one or a few so that magnates may luxuriate from the labor of all, but that by their affection, prudence, labor, even dangers and death, they may render all and each safe and unharmed.

If a soldier is unwilling to discharge the duties of the camp, if he fears to stand in the battle line, the commander will withdraw his pay. But if a prince is guided by religion and conscience, he readily understands that he is supported by so great honor and such great resources in order that he may benefit his fatherland; that the royal retinue, purple, crown, conferred honors, splendor of the court, delights of the most exquisite banquets, treasures, and obedience of peoples are the pay for his labors, the earnest-money for his vigils, the alleviation of his greatest cares, and an incitement that he may augment his fatherland's goods and transfer its evils upon himself, and that he may judge negligence in caring for it a most grave disgrace.

Aristotle says excellently in book 5 of the Politics, chapter 9: "Those who are to conduct the greatest magistracies of the whole city, and in whose hands is the supreme power of the commonwealth, ought to possess three things: first, benevolence toward the condition of the commonwealth; next, the greatest faculty for discharging the duties of that magistracy which they conduct; in the third place, virtue and justice in each form of administering the commonwealth, according to the form of each commonwealth."

§ 10. I shall treat of the duty of magistrates in a separate book. Now I give this warning: the greatest care, industry, and diligence in every kind of affair is required in a prince. I judge that many princes otherwise blameless and just will be examined before the King of kings and Lord of lords in the most severe inquiry and condemned by the most sorrowful sentence because they did not conduct themselves in their office with the diligence with which they ought, and dedicated to amusements the time owed to serious business and the public safety.

For if, through the negligence of an advocate, a client has lost his case; if, through the sloth of a vine-dresser, the autumn harvest has perished; if, through a soldier's drowsiness, a town has been brought into danger, pardon is denied in the lesser offense. What if through a prince's negligence in the council chamber the whole commonwealth suffers loss--who will pardon him? It is easier to estimate than to expound the labors and miseries of a prince, if he himself understands the magnitude of his duty and the dangers of errors. It is wretched and full of innumerable cares to become a prince. For since individuals are bound to individual concerns, the whole mass of cares rests upon the prince--a mass burdensome even to a pagan prince, more troublesome to a Christian, who believes that he must prove to God the sedulousness and integrity of his duty.

It is necessary that those pressed by so great a weight of affairs either grow weary and almost fail in strength, or become stupefied so that they do not feel the gravity of their burden. Septimius Severus, praised by historians but impious and a monstrous persecutor of Christian piety, was raised from a common soldier through every grade of honors and labors to the imperial summit. When dying, as he reviewed all the deeds of his life, he said, “I have been all things, and nothing is of advantage.” I do not doubt that this is the utterance of all princes.

Let an aged prince come forward before me, one who has now transferred the scepters to his heir. Let him say how he was offended and despised by his own people; what offenses of ministers he was compelled to dissemble; by how many plots of enemies and how many slanders of the malevolent he was assailed; how often he was led into fraud; how importunately he was vexed. I do not doubt that, if he recounts the entire course of his life without disguise, it will happen that he himself marvels that he was able to endure so much.

But if there is also a prince to whom piety is dear, who emulates justice, loves the commonwealth, and knows that an account concerning all things must be rendered to God, with what horror will he examine himself? Did he furnish promptly, diligently, and seasonably, without harm and without price, all things which had to be furnished to God, to the poor, and to the rich? Kingdom, scepters, and majesty are benefits of God; the greater they are, the more grievous are the judgments established for those who sin. For the more indulgent the liberality, the more inexcusable is the abuse of largesse. Gifts are augmented, and the accounts of gifts increase. As much majesty as is added, so much servitude--and servitude of the most dangerous kind--is demanded.

I shall close this part with a sentence of St. Augustine: “In this do kings serve God: if in their kingdom they command good things and prohibit evil things, not only those which pertain to human society but those which pertain to divine religion.”

CHAPTER XXV

That It Is Better for a Prince to Be Hereditary than to Be Elected

§ 1. Not only the altercations of those who dispute, but also the judgments and practices of the greatest empires, render the question difficult. The Germans who possess the imperial government, the Poles, and others elect kings; the Spaniards, French, English, and most others possess hereditary lords. Whose institutions and laws, therefore, are to be approved? Is it fitting for me to judge concerning the ancient compacts and customs of kingdoms?

It is indeed fitting, if the purpose is to give counsel to the commonwealth. Nor will the heirs of kingdoms bear it ill if I prefer elected rulers, because they are friends of elected rulers; nor will elected rulers grow angry with one who praises hereditary kingdoms, since they too possess many hereditary things. For if either the emperor or the electors of emperors prefer all things to be established by free votes, let them themselves yield their inheritances and dominions and commit them to the decision of election. I shall therefore explain my judgment clearly and briefly in a few propositions.

§ 2. Proposition 1. A polity, or popular government, necessarily requires election. For since access to honors ought to lie open to all citizens, while those who can command must be few, a distinction must be made by election.

§ 3. Proposition 2. In an aristocracy also, election is necessary. For there are more of the best men than can be in magistracy. But if some obtained dignities by right of birth, the others would be excluded, and the commonwealth would degenerate into the domination of a few.

§ 4. Proposition 3. In general, I prefer hereditary succession to election.

The reasons which induce me to judge thus are various, and I bring them forward into the midst for everyone to consider.

§ 5. The first reason. In antiquity kings were born, not elected; but that which is most ancient in the commonwealth ought not readily to be changed. For the dignity of kings is most similar to paternal power. Those who were more prudent among the fathers governed the family; next, the firstborn were lords of their brothers, and the sons of their mother bowed before them. Isaac, his eyes growing dim but obeying the divine oracle, gave Jacob dominion over the brother who had preceded the supplanter by a brief interval of birth. “I have established him as your lord,” he says, “and I have subjected all his brothers to his servitude.” Genesis 27:37.

Concerning Reuben also he says the same: “First in gifts, greater in command,” because he too was the firstborn, but had fallen from his dignity through incest. Therefore the heads of families held that position by the valuation of primogeniture, not by the election of their brothers; and the first kingdoms were nothing other than great families. To Ishmael also were born twelve princes of their tribes, Genesis 25:1. At the same time also the Horites on Mount Seir entered upon their leadership by inheritance, as is established from Genesis 36:20.

Indeed, that custom remained afterward. For the king of the Moabites seized his firstborn son, who was to reign in his place, and offered him as a holocaust upon the wall. The kingdoms of the Assyrians, Chaldaeans, Egyptians, Medes, and Persians were also hereditary. By divine gift also princes were born from the stock of David; and among the Israelites, even in the schism itself, the sons of tyrants were the successors of their fathers unless, when another tyrant pressed upon them, they were slaughtered before obtaining government.

Nevertheless, the election of kings was not unknown even in that age. For in Genesis 36, from verse 31, eight kings of the Idumaeans are enumerated, none of whom obtained the kingdom by inheritance. Nor is it credible that they all obtained the kingdom of a warlike nation by adoption or tyranny; therefore they were elected.

§ 6. Therefore those prudent and great men ought not to be heard who maintain that election is more ancient and that in those heroic times kings were made in scarcely any other way, principates in peace or war being assigned by the prerogative of valor or strength. For they say that it belongs to nature to subject inferior things to superior ones. Hence Brazilians, when brought to Charles IX, king of France, marveled that strong and tall Swiss obeyed a small and tender king.

Those great men err. For in the heroic ages we see that those who fought at Troy were kings and sons of kings; most even referred their descent to the gods. If the matter is to be determined by fables and demigods are to be adduced, I shall collect in Egypt, through fifteen dynasties and 3,317 years, many kings, and the first eight as heirs by a continuous succession of children. Afterward, women also were admitted to the succession by a law enacted.

But I pass over those things. In the time of Moses, Dardanus reigned at Troy; his descendants were Erichthonius, Trosillus, Laomedon, and Priam. Who would deny that the government of Troy was hereditary? The kings of Tyre were Abibaal, Hiram, then Astarthus, Asserimus, and Pheles. The kings of Mycenae were Pelops, Eurystheus, Atreus, Agamemnon, Orestes, and Penthilus, the last of the Pelopidae.

Of the kings of the Athenians, Erichthonius, son of Vulcan, founded a family which held government for 285 years. Then, after the government had been transferred to Melanthus, it had fourteen kings, so that a son always succeeded his father. In the Spartan kingdom there was greater variation, heirs being driven out by tyrants; but many things show that it too was held by succession. It was not only hereditary but even dotal, for Menelaus, son of Atreus, received Sparta as dowry after marrying Helen. Afterward, the kingdom of the Heraclidae endured through an uninterrupted series of descendants longer than any other.

Among the Corinthians also in the age of the heroes, kings were born: Sisyphus, son of Aeolus, Ornition, Thoas, Damophon, Propodas, and Doridas; the Sisyphidae reigned for 259 years. I refrain from speaking of Janus, Saturn, Faunus, Picus, and Latinus, kings of the Aborigines, lest I seem to wish to establish the matter even by fables. But that ancient opinion of certain men who affirm that kings were formerly made by election and that the kingdom was granted by the prerogative of valor or strength must be plucked out. Certainly the kings themselves would deny it and would say, “I am a son of wise men, a son of ancient kings.” Nevertheless, I do not abolish every election: namely, if they should begin a new kingdom, if the royal stock should fail, or if an heir should be judged unfit for the kingdom.

§ 7. The second reason is taken from election itself, which is exposed to tumult and the new machinations of seditious persons. For transitions of affairs are opportune for evil attempts. And since the future outcome is uncertain, the spirits of many are raised and the hopes of many are inflated--all of which are restrained if the successor is not uncertain. The canvassings of the Roman assemblies, when a consul--indeed, an aedile--was elected, were turbulent and attended with blood, although that magistracy was annual. What if they had contended for a perpetual dictatorship?

How greatly dominions are endangered at the time of a new election is demonstrated by the very anxiety of human beings, and so many examples have taught it down to the present. And it is assuredly wretched that not only in a political magistracy but also in ecclesiastical offices and among sacred men an election sometimes cannot be conducted without a great wound to the Church and commonwealth. But no one acquainted with history is ignorant of what disasters election introduced into the Roman Empire. Nero rages at Rome; Galba brings savagery and avarice from Spain, Vitellius from Gaul, and Otho sets out from the city. They were equal in strength and vices; meanwhile Vespasian is elected in another region. If you regard the times of the Antonines and Gallienus, thirty tyrants invaded the government simultaneously. For while fortune permits and while it is lawful to hope, anyone attempts what can be done and judges that he has attained what he dreamed while awake.

§ 8. The third reason. The foundation and safety of government is the authority of the ruler; contempt is its ultimate destruction. But the dignity and authority of those who are born from kings is greater. He who owes the kingdom to the vote--that is, to the benefaction--of others is compelled to attribute many things and indulge many things to the authors of his majesty, and to dissemble concerning their offenses lest he seem ungrateful. Electors also provide for their liberty by many compacts and guarantees, so that they attribute as little power as possible over themselves to the man whom they have determined to elect. As much as they diminish from his power and arrogate to their own privileges, so much they detract from his authority; for authority is unstable when it is not supported by solid power.

Next, they do not value highly a man whom they have at some time seen as an equal and at another time as inferior to themselves. The Romans despised Tiberius, whom they had seen as an exile and cloaked after the custom of petty Greeks; from this arose suspicions, slanders, conspiracies, and the butchery of nobles. Galba was held in contempt as a man who previously, burdened by debt, had scarcely been able to remain at Rome; therefore the briefest government and a most shameful end befell him.

The soldiers killed Aelius Pertinax, Macrinus, Maximinus, Balbinus, Pupienus, Tacitus, Probus, and Carus with his sons almost in mockery, just as they had created them emperors. Nor was there greater reverence toward them than toward fellow soldiers who had deserved the cudgel. For once the insignia and name of Augustus had been taken away, since they excelled by no distinction or prerogative of virtue or lineage, the soldiers slaughtered most of them with exquisite punishments as the lowest and most guilty of human beings. From equality, therefore, comes contempt; from contempt, when something is commanded rather harshly, come indignation and the communication of one's grief with others; from these come plots and the destruction of one party, and more often of both.

Third, it is necessary that a king, unless he possesses extraordinary strength of spirit, should command timidly, not without cause fearing the rivalries and enmities of powerful and audacious human beings. For when he weighs the brevity of life and the variability of fortune, he will not readily offend, however deserving they may be, those whom he suspects will someday command. He will not judge it wise to leave many enemies to his family, sons, and wife. From this follows the great power of magnates, their greater impunity, the oppression and outrages of inferiors, the slowness of judgments, the delay of causes, and the difficult execution of pronounced sentences and adjudged matters.

I am not ignorant that by the providence of kings who possess a heroic spirit and an unstained equity in judging, the wicked attempts of all can be resisted; but I give warning of what follows from the nature of election. Fourth, if the man who has been elected by the votes of the commonwealth has sons, who does not see that the father will canvass all those possessing the right to vote on behalf of his sons and do all those things which eloquent and humble candidates are accustomed to do? Cicero judged it most alien to his circumstances to accuse Verres when he was seeking a magistracy, for all the friends of Verres would oppose his candidacy. And it is necessary that a prince who designates his son as his successor by the votes of others should often lay aside his majesty and conduct himself as equal or inferior to his subjects.

But if his spirit is insufficiently firm and he thinks himself a father more than a king, he will often concede many things and dissemble many things so that he may prepare voters for his son. Many things will also be requested from the father through the son who is a candidate for the kingdom, things which custom, reason, and equity will prohibit him from furnishing; and nothing will readily be denied to the person from whom the kingdom is sought. Nor will kings be lacking who, by giving and indulging beyond due measure, take greater account of their own blood than of justice.

§ 9. The fourth reason. What if the condition of that kingdom in which the king fears that he will be the last of his family is not even safe? Nature has so arranged it that parents are no less industrious and keen in procuring honors for their children than for themselves. Ptolemy, king of Egypt, after he had established his son as king in his own place, stood among his bodyguards as his guardian; to such a degree did he judge that to be the father of a king was something more august than to be a king.

Severus slaughtered, for the sake of his sons, all whom he suspected would attempt some novelty. Gordian, hearing that his son had been killed by the Maximini, was overcome by grief and strangled himself with a noose. Nero's mother judged that her son's government was well purchased by her own life; for when seers had foretold that, if he should rule, he would kill his mother, she said: "Let him kill me, provided that he rules." Demetrius yielded his wife to his enamored son, with a signal outrage to the three. Since, therefore, so great is the force of human affection and blood, they ought certainly to fear that a father will strive by force, fraud, and blandishments to bring it about that his son cannot be barred from the kingdom. Nor do I see why this should be difficult, especially if the son shows himself fit for the kingdom and the father draws part of the nobles to his judgment.

§ 10. The fifth reason. If you regard the advantage of the kingdom, succession possesses many advantages in which election is deficient. He who hopes that he will leave heirs of his majesty cares for all the business of the kingdom as his own, provides for his heirs, and takes thought for the treasury, arsenals, and safety of the citizens. Thus David arranged all things carefully for Solomon.

But he who at his death will end government in his family has no great cause to provide for the protection and dignity of the kingdom far into the future, since it will soon be in the hands of others and perhaps even of enemies. Rather, he will direct every thought toward furnishing defenses and security for his children and family, to whom he leaves envy and many enmities, so that, once private persons, they do not suffer not only the mockeries and commands of the new king but also a shortage of necessary things.

§ 11. The sixth reason. The officials and ministers of those who have been elected are less faithful and in some measure more rapacious. For since they are not ignorant that their functions too will die with the life of the prince, they hasten toward resources and honors. For after the principate has been changed and transferred into another family, the old ministers are either dismissed or placed after others, because each man rightly judges that his own people, whom he possessed as faithful men and friends when he was a private person, ought also to enjoy the honors of their lord.

§ 12. The seventh reason. Affection toward a hereditary prince is greater, because from him not only, but also from his ancestors and descendants, every private person expects benefits. They are accustomed to disdain new rulers before they begin to love them; and after all their benefits the rulers attain much if a successor is awaited civilly, together with the honor of another family.

§ 13. The eighth reason. A single reason is given for election: that it is possible to select from thousands the best and most prudent man, the most distinguished when fortitude and justice are considered. But this matter failed so often formerly--and now also, I fear--that it is rarely secure. I do not wish to blame the voters, as though they had elected wicked men. Human weakness, sudden felicity, arrogance made more insolent by emergence from slender circumstances, suspicions, opinion, contempt, and fear can cast down from his mind even a successor whose mind was well founded.

If they did not know crimes, the kingdom taught them; a flatterer instilled them; a minister induced them. Kingdoms made many good men wicked; few were made better in a kingdom. The reason why voters chose wrongly was love, hatred, and hope. These passions have been brought into every assembly and will not readily go into exile in the future.

Alexius, about to die without an heir, deliberated concerning a successor. Accordingly, different men were named by different persons in various ways, but all named those who would be opportune and useful to themselves. No one possessed any care or thought concerning the election of the man who would command best and according to the public advantage. Choniates, On Alexius.

The excuse for the Neronian election among the Romans, in Tacitus, book 13, is more honorable: "Others, on the contrary, said that it had turned out better than if Claudius, feeble from old age and sloth, were called to the labors of military service and were to obey servile commands. Burrus and Seneca, nevertheless, were known by experience of many affairs; and how much strength did the emperor lack, since at the eighteenth year of his age Cn. Pompey, and at the nineteenth Caesar Octavianus, had sustained civil wars? Most affairs in supreme fortune are conducted by auspices and counsels rather than by weapons and hands. He would plainly give proof whether he employed honorable friends or otherwise; whether, after envy had been removed, he selected an outstanding commander, rather than a destructive one supported by favor through canvassing."

This excuse concerning Nero is more modest and rests upon some hope. Otherwise, scarcely any successions designated by the vote of the senate or soldiers were praiseworthy. Claudius was a blockhead and a monster, and lively only when he ordered men to be led away unheard. Nero was chosen by the senate; Galba, Otho, and Vitellius by the soldier. Titus succeeded his father and was accordingly among the good princes. Nerva lacked strength and age, not goodness. Trajan was both most shameful and cruel; I do not intend to collect the monsters that followed. Charlemagne and his progeny were better. Never were there so many good emperors in one series as from Albert II, from one family, down to Matthias I, who now sustains the honor of the empire.

Therefore those who approve election stir up great contests in a commonwealth. They render all things venal when morals are corrupt. Julian--not that apostate, but the one who preceded Severus--openly promised money to the praetorians if he were elected. Otho professed that he would possess only that which the soldiers had left him. Severus ordered the soldier to be cultivated and advised that the others be despised. The soldiers raised to government only each most loathsome man and one under whom they might conduct themselves more licentiously.

I know that Probus is excepted, whom they proclaimed prince; but soon, offended by his probity, they killed him. Nevertheless, they marked their own crime and the emperor's integrity with an epitaph: "Here lies Probus the emperor, truly probus." They therefore confessed that they were wicked men who had removed Probus.

What was more turbulent than the elected kings of the Goths in Italy--Athalaric, Theodahad, Witiges, Ildibad, Alaric, Totila, and Teia? All were wicked, badly elected, reigned badly, and perished badly, killed by their own people; captivity freed Witiges from that disgrace. The Goths who were in Spain possessed kings far worse than the Italian ones. Therefore I appeal to examples; the multitude of examples and the antiquity of ages have taught that the best men are not always carried up to the royal throne by election.

§ 14. I am not ignorant that various things are objected to me. First: The sons of kings, educated amid delights and flatteries, are inflated by pride, broken by pleasures, and do not know how to estimate the necessities of their subjects. Second: They readily burst forth into tyranny and regard the kingdom as though it were a patrimony, their subjects as though they were slaves. Third: In election a field is opened to virtue, and many will endeavor to prove themselves to their fatherland if they see that access to supreme government lies open to good men. Fourth: Succession took its beginning from flattery and evil arts. Fifth: Through succession it is often necessary to possess as prince a boy, a woman, a fool, an avaricious man, or a cruel man. A good man can certainly be elected; this lies within the power of the electors. Sixth: It is equitable that one who will command all should be elected from all. Seventh: Poland, a most flourishing kingdom, rich in men and virtues and warlike, creates its king by election, and quite often a foreigner. The imperial government of Germany is given by the vote of electors and is nevertheless governed by the best laws.

Eighth: Hereditary successions have possessed their own certain and great vices. For the sons of heroes have generally been banes. Solomon departs from the piety of David, and Rehoboam from the wisdom of Solomon. Jehoshaphat, a good king, intervenes; but Jehoram, Athaliah, Joash, and Amaziah were impious. Jotham fears God, but Ahaz made a secession from God and religion. Hezekiah, a most holy king, possessed in Manasseh and Amon a most wicked son and grandson. The fervent piety of Josiah is praised, but his degenerate posterity paid for its crimes by destruction and captivity.

Finally, nowhere is labor expended with so much zeal in procuring succession without sedition as in the monarchy of the Turks, but nowhere is it more unhappy. To recount a few things: Bayezid II slaughters the sons of his fleeing brother; the sons of Bayezid make war concerning the succession while their father is alive; at last Selim, as victor, kills his father in his absence, and his suppliant brothers and their sons in his own sight, by the noose. That tyranny is never reached without the slaughter of blood relatives. Therefore election seems to be better than hereditary succession.

§ 15. These things have been answered in part, but I shall explain the matter more clearly.

Proposition 4. Election rather than succession is suitable to certain peoples, not because the former is to be preferred to the latter simply, but either by reason of their customs and regions or by reason of the parts of the commonwealth constituted long ago, which it belongs neither to a good man nor, therefore, to a political writer to change.

Accordingly, to elect some one king in a very broad kingdom is not unsuitable and does not possess all those disadvantages which I recalled above, if that kingdom embraces many princes and, as it were, lesser kings, as we see occurs by custom in Germany. For when this empire was first transferred into Germany, it did not seem good to bind it to some one house, but that it should be a benefit common to all. Nevertheless, the disadvantages of election down to the present have been very numerous, as have discords and wars; but the small number of electors removes very many dissensions. For there are six, and if the number of votes is equal, the king of Bohemia is added as arbiter and elector. Of these, three are archbishops, who cannot aspire to the kingdom; four are secular electors, who can themselves be elected, but there is always someone among them who cannot be elected on account of age or other causes.

Thus the election is by no means turbulent, nor are the other princes, although powerful, indignant that they are excluded from the votes; rather, they acquiesce in the laws. Next, the election of the Germans is joined with succession, not by a prescribed right or custom which possesses the force of law, but by the prudence, moderation, and affection toward the fatherland of the princes who are electors. Let us recount the monuments of antiquity: we shall find almost no emperor's son passed over in a peaceful election, although they were adolescents; nor do I think that it will readily happen in the future that supreme government will be conferred upon anyone other than the emperor's son.

Formerly Augustus, Tiberius, and others endeavored through adoptions of stepsons or grandsons to retain the diadem within their own family. Sons of emperors commanded: Titus, Domitian, Commodus, Caracalla, Heliogabalus, Gallienus, Carinus, Numerianus, Constans, Constantine, Constantius, Gratian, Valentinian the Younger, Arcadius, Honorius, Theodosius the Younger; then the progeny of Charlemagne and of the Ottos, a few others, and now that of the Austrians. Thus in the Roman Empire election was mingled with succession. In this manner the disadvantages of the fourth and fifth reasons were generally absent. For if the emperor possesses sons--or indeed if he is without children, provided that he possesses brothers worthy of government--he seems certain concerning the succession. Thus he will neither diminish the vigor of the government through anxiety nor neglect the affairs of the empire as though they were to be alienated from his family.

§ 16. The Germans also remove contempt for the ruler, for they generally elect the most powerful princes and those of the most illustrious name, such as Maximilian I, duke of Austria, and so forth; Charles V, the most powerful monarch of all Europe; Ferdinand; Maximilian II; Rudolf; and Matthias. For it is established that those princes were most noble and powerful.

Since, therefore, the order of election is accurately observed, since succession--although without prejudice to the freest election--is joined to election, and since great princes are elected, they avoid many detriments of election and attain many of its advantages. But this must be attributed to the gravity of the nation, its sincerity, love of peace, and zeal for the fatherland, especially because the princes of Germany, although most tenacious of their own right and dignity, nevertheless are not desirous or ambitious for what belongs to another. Accordingly, we owe peace and concord to their customs, not to the nature of election or the form of the commonwealth.

Look upon the customs of the Turks: see the mutual slanders and slaughters of brothers; see decrepit fathers slaughter sons in their sight and these fathers be removed by those sons with poison. How great would be the discords, what corruptions of commanders and soldiers, if election should fall amid those customs? Let the moderation of the most august Austrian house be an example for us. The Emperor Matthias lives; his brother Maximilian lives, and another brother, Albert, prince of the Belgian provinces. The emperor has now yielded the Kingdom of Bohemia, Silesia, and Moravia to Ferdinand and will soon yield the remaining territories. Maximilian and Albert, whose right and succession is the nearest, assist that cession. Charles V himself and Philip, king of the Spains, had formerly yielded those regions to Ferdinand.

Compare the desires, frauds, and slaughters of the ancients with these things. See Romulus and Remus, whose kingdom was one hearth and merely the hope of a rustic city, and nevertheless:

"The first walls were drenched with a brother's blood."

But although the moderation, prudence, and gravity of the German princes is such, they nevertheless do not bring it about that during the time of an interregnum all are not in great fear lest most grievous wars someday wear down the fatherland. Recall to memory the Henrys, Louises, Fredericks, and Alberts; you will see:

"Standards, equal eagles, and javelins threatening javelins."

Nicetas, a foreign writer concerning us, judges thus: "O how much worse is the vote and election of many than that of one! You, illustrious Roman Empire and majesty to be adored by nations, what tyrants have you endured? What sort of lovers have sought you? Beneath what men, laid low, have you given possession of yourself? What sort of men have you adorned with crown, diadem, and purple garment?"

But let complaints cease. Let us pay vows to God for those princes and furnish such morals as deserve and bear good princes.

The Poles also have approved election, but in truth they too have often suffered enormous losses: they were deserted by Henry, king of France, and at one time elected two men through contrary partisan zeal. But in this part also the Poles conduct the matter moderately and prudently. First, they never excluded or passed over an heir and did not transfer the kingdom into another family, except when they deposed Ladislaus and substituted Wenceslaus of Bohemia in his place; nevertheless, they afterward restored Ladislaus.

They took account of royal daughters no less prudently than humanely. Hedwig, from the stock of the extinct royal family, was placed in marriage with Jagiello, who was prince of Lithuania, so that at least in this manner they might display their affection toward their kings; that deed occurred in the year 1380. They did not withdraw from the Jagiellonian family so long as heirs from it lived. When they had died, this also was arranged: that Anna, who remained from the royal stock, should marry Stephen, a distinguished hero. The fact that Sigismund III was born from Catherine, Anna's sister, rendered him commendable to them.

Therefore they prudently mingle election with succession, so that although the votes of the electors are entirely free, nevertheless so great an affection toward the children of their kings remains as if the kingdom were hereditary. By this one thing they protect the peace, tranquility, honor, and majesty of the kingdom. Nevertheless, they have not lacked enormous disadvantages. For since the nobility is magnanimous and warlike, if they were willing to endure a hereditary king, one to whom the kingdom belonged as his own, they could with easier business than any nation occupy all territories as far as the Euxine Sea and invade either the territory of Constantinople after crossing the Danube or Asia after crossing the Black Sea. The Turk assuredly fears this; and therefore he dissembles, as much as he can, the losses inflicted by the Poles and is content to purchase peace in whatever manner.

§ 17. I have discoursed concerning election and succession; now those who prefer the liberty of election must be answered. I shall not refute them in such a manner that I do not concede that there are many advantages of election in which succession is deficient, but in such a manner that, when all the advantages and detriments have been collected into one, I show that there are more detriments in election and more advantages in succession.

First, the arrogance and delights of kings who were born and educated in the purple are objected without cause. The pride of those who came to the kingdom from a private fortune was more intolerable. For a sudden and unaccustomed raising on high makes men swollen. And just as the eyes of those around whom a great light is suddenly poured when they rise from sleep grow dim, so private persons, stunned by the novel splendor of unexperienced majesty, forget themselves. Indeed, nature is so arranged that solar rays falling upon an opposing face drive out memory, especially from those accustomed to shade.

Thus Aristotle also, no poor teacher of kings, admonishes us in book 5 of the Politics, chapter 8: "The common method of preserving every commonwealth is to adorn no one beyond measure, but rather to attribute honors that are small and of long duration than great ones swiftly; for through such things men become worse. And not all can bear prosperous fortune." Certainly not all--indeed, few. Otho was the best servant before government and the worst master, as was cast about concerning him in a proverb.

On the contrary, an emperor spoke prudently when, having been carried from command to the imperial summit by the soldiers' impetus, he cried: "O fellow soldiers, you have lost a good commander, nor yet have you made a good emperor." I do not deny that there is danger in the children of kings. "Most command their desires less amid the obediences of fortune." Curtius, book 8. Nevertheless, because tender dispositions are most readily incited toward love of the honorable and right, and because the natural quality of a human being is such that he is not born good or evil from the stock itself--I speak of that evil which is outside the inherited guilt of origin--but receives a disposition inclined toward each, all can be rendered better by care, work, and unwearied labor, even contrary to the inclination of nature.

§ 18. Nevertheless, in our age the children of princes have always possessed the least license. Formerly that manner prevailed, when their tender age was compelled to behold blood not only in the amphitheater but even at a banquet, and when, without their knowing, injuries to every kind of morals were displayed upon the stage. Now princes generally select those who are to instruct their children with as much judgment as many commonwealths employ in placing not even a prince over themselves. Meanwhile they are taught to moderate their passions, love justice, pity suppliants, and benefit all. But education must be treated in another place. I come to the second objection, which concerns the danger of tyranny.

I said above that tyranny is to be feared in every kind of government. I also added this: an elected prince possesses more cause to change the principate into tyranny than does one who commands by hereditary right. For the former shears and flays more greedily because he is soon to depart; the latter awaits the produce of the following year also and plants pear trees for his grandchildren to pluck.

§ 19. But third, they say, by election a field is opened to virtues. First, how many can hope? Out of one hundred myriads scarcely one commands. Next, what kind of virtue is it to hope for a kingdom as the reward of virtue? That hope will make dissemblers and candidates for the purple, not cultivators of true piety and justice. But what if the worst men are selected after the good have been passed over?

I do not speak of the Ethiopians, who placed over themselves as king a man selected from bodily beauty, a fallacious and fleeting thing; nor of others who estimated that dignity by the mass and magnitude of bodies. For it is easy to surpass them, as also the Auruncans, peoples of Peru, who placed a heavy log upon the shoulders of several men: the one who had carried it longer before collapsing was proclaimed king. Nevertheless, we who mock barbarians discern these and fouler things among the most cultivated peoples.

The Quirites elected Romulus, a fratricide; most of them were robbers and men who had escaped punishment by the asylum. After his death, they summoned Numa, a magician and impostor, from the Sabines. In Tullus Hostilius there was an appearance of fortitude, but the deeds of a robber, since without any right he stirred men at rest to arms. Ancus, the most ambitious of the men of his time, received the kingdom by artifice. Priscus also imposed upon a rustic people through Greek arts. Servius, truly a slave, obtained the kingdom by fraud; Tarquin killed him.

There were seven kings. Romulus was changed into a tyrant and torn apart by the senate. Numa occupied the government by a simulation of piety. Tullus administered it tyrannically. Priscus thrust himself in by deceptions; Servius by the fraud of a woman; Tarquin by the slaughter of his father-in-law. Behold, consider these things and give virtue hope of honor. See Claudius, lifted into the camp by the shout of one soldier, command; see Otho purchase the government of the world for a few coins; one man selects Vitellius, and the stupor of the soldiers follows. Probus, while he is commended to the army so that they may name a brave, clement, and upright emperor, becomes Augustus through the prerogative of his name. Regillianus from his name, Proculus from a game, are imposed upon the world as robbers rather than princes.

§ 20. What is said in the fourth place--that succession arose from flattery--I refuted above when I showed that it is most ancient and was approved even among the people of God. But often a boy unequal to so great a burden will put on the purple. That will be rare; nevertheless, Solomon also was a boy and possessed adult brothers when all Israel marveled at his prudence. The boyhood of kings can be ruled by the prudence of mothers, guardians, and kinsmen. Joash also, as a boy, did what was right before the Lord all the days in which Jehoiada the priest taught him. The five-year period of Nero himself, with Seneca and Burrus as guides, surpassed many good princes. Boys too can command, but with the support and guidance of old men.

Theodosius the Younger was a boy, but what prince equaled the government of the boy? I dread the danger of the age, and I hear God saying: “Woe to the land whose king is a boy.” But I join Benaiahs, Jehoiadas, Senecas, Burruses, and Pulcherias for supporting weakness. For this reason Scripture does not reject tender age simply, but measures a land’s unhappiness by two things: namely, if its king is a boy and its princes eat in the morning. For if you place beside youth, which is inclined toward amusements and delights, voluptuous princes and artificers of enticements and banquets, truly not even safety itself could preserve that land.

§ 21. The seventh objection was that it is equitable that one who will command all should be elected by all. This is plebeian and, as Aristotle is accustomed to speak, “ἄγρειον.” It has been taken from tribunician declamations; now it has been refuted by laws, practice, reason, and the advantage of the commonwealth itself. It is certainly established that there is no people which as a whole elects its prince, except perhaps among Peruvians, cannibals, or wandering Ethiopians; nor did that “ὀχλοχειρία,” or mob election, ever turn out rightly for them.

I pronounce that these things are generally so, for I have never judged that the best princes selected from the common people should be placed after Sardanapaluses and purple-born plagues. Otherwise, there is in nobility a certain disposition toward great things and, if it is polished, honorable ones. They see the images of their ancestors in the archive so that they may imitate them. Father Aeneas and maternal uncle Hector are a great incitement toward virtue. Euripides says nobly:

“οὐκ ἔστι τοῦδε παισὶ κάλλιον γέρας,”

“ἢ πατρὸς ἐσθλοῦ κἀγαθοῦ πεφυκέναι.”

“No distinction is more beautiful for children than to have sprung from a good and honorable father.”

But only so that the progeny is no less of virtue than of blood; otherwise, the greatness of the father does not bring the son forward but overwhelms him. What Spartianus says is false and odious, but received by the inclined ears of the common crowd: “Almost none of the great men left behind a son who was excellent and useful; most left such sons that it would have been better to depart without posterity.” It is false. Many left good sons and many middling ones; many corrupted them by error and many by neglect of education; some corrupted themselves willingly.

Heliogabalus was a monster of government. “If I have an heir,” he says, “I shall give him a guardian who will compel him to do those things which I myself have done and which I am about to do.” Therefore it is frequently the fault of fathers; often the depravity of sons is obstinate against every labor of education.

§ 22. Those who leave kings free judgment in selecting a successor to the kingdom from among their children fill all things with slaughters. Plutarch writes concerning Pyrrhus, and others concerning others. No firstborn will permit himself to be excluded; and if he is excluded, avengers will not be lacking. The case of Pertinax is different, who wished election to be seen as reserved to the senate.

Hereditary succession is not a benefit of the dead man, but a prerogative of the family. Thus Philip pressed his right in Portugal; thus the Britons rendered Edward’s testament void.

A firstborn son born while his father was not yet king is preferred to the others, although they were born in the purple. Thus the jurists hand down by consensus. Ulpian, in law 5, On Senators. For the rationale is the same.

CHAPTER XXVI

That the Governments of Women Are to Be Admitted, but Rarely

§ 1. I do not judge it equitable for a woman to hold government over men unless, in an extraordinary danger or through heroic virtue, the woman should be an example to the men themselves. Nevertheless, women are not excluded from public life through injury and contempt for their sex, but because they are weaker. "The counsel of a woman is without strength, that of a boy imperfect," says Aristotle in book 1 of the Politics.

Those who proclaim that all women are wicked and all instructed in the same school for wickedness are injurious toward their own mother. It is not astonishing that all speak against that sex which is defended by no one. Let us weigh the matter in a political and humane manner. For what an impudent persecutor of women says is bitter:

"Γυναῖκες εἰς μὲν ἐσθλὰ ἀμηχανώταται"

"Κακῶν δὲ πάντων τέκτονες σοφώταται."

"We women are indeed most unfit for good things, but most cunning artificers of all evil things."

But it has seemed otherwise to others. The case is before the judge. The Salic Law bars women from the scepter. "Lilies do not spin," Philip of Valois announces to Edward the Briton. Cujas, book 8 of Observations, chapter 14; Tolosanus, book 7, chapter 16; Heigius, book 1, question 7. It seemed otherwise to the Spaniards, English, and Scots, and also to the Austrians.

§ 2. First, indeed, there is the natural weakness of women. Men, because they are strong and ambidextrous, can rule and be ruled; but women are ruled only, for they are subject to men. And they speak truly when they repeat what Hippocrates teaches in the Aphorisms, section 7, chapter 44: "γυνὴ ἀμφιδέξιος οὐ γίνεται"; "A woman does not become ambidextrous." Pliny also teaches this, book 7, chapter 17.

Weakness of counsels also follows this infirmity of nature. Assuredly, by the Roman laws a tutor and curator is given to women although they are fully adult, indeed even after the husband's death. Cicero, For Flaccus: "Women are not permitted to conduct any matter without the counsel of tutors and procurators." And For A. Caecina: "What a woman promised without a tutor as author is not owed." And For L. Murena: "Our ancestors wished all women, on account of the weakness of their counsel, to be within the power of tutors."

At Athens, a limit upon their transaction of business was prescribed by law, and it was defined as six modii of barley. This also seems to have been transferred to the Romans. "Our ancestors," says Cato in book 4 of the Macedonian War, "did not wish women to conduct even a private matter without an author." Much more, therefore, are they to be barred from scepters. That defect is one of judgment and prudence, from which arises a certain inconstancy of will, an inclination toward a fall, and a lack of control over the passions. Thus they neither possess authority nor can execute most things without others; it is also not fitting for them to speak in public.

"γυναικὶ κόσμον ἡ σιγὴ φέρει."

"Silence is a woman's ornament."

§ 3. For these reasons the Parthians and Thracians treated women after the fashion of slaves; more mildly did the Lydians and Numidians, among whom women commanded at home and men outside. More mildly, but not rightly; more consonant with nature and reason was the law of Romulus, by which a chaste wife who was compliant toward her husband was mistress of the family equally with the man. For since a woman has been added to a man and it has been said, "You shall be beneath the power of the man," and since Lucretius sings truly in book 5:

"The whole male sex far excels in art and is much more skillful," equity demands equal rights for the same nature, so that the man may command after the manner of a father of a family, not with the harshness of a master.

Those who cast down into the condition of female slaves the women from whom they were born with pain and by whose milk they were nourished are ungrateful toward nature--women whom they ought to assert into liberty, even at peril of their own head, lest they be slaves. But if, because their nature is less noble than that of men, they must for that reason be deprived of participation in liberty, "Τὸ χεῖρον γὰρ ἀνάγκη νικᾶσθαι ὑπὸ τὸ κρεῖττον, ὅπου τὸ χεῖρόν ἐστι." For it is necessary that what is inferior should be conquered by what is better, wherever the better exists. Let us also diminish the civil standing of men debilitated by vices, in strength, and in mind, and consign them to workhouses. For there are many women more excellent than many men in many things, as Plato says in book 5 of the Republic.

Therefore the liberty of women, their right within the family, and their honor must be defended no less than their chastity and reputation. For the Christian law also orders that more abundant honor be placed around the weaker vessels, 1 Corinthians 12:23. But only so far that they are companions and assistants, not that they dominate.

Among the Achaeans indeed dominion and the conduct of business resided with women. Hence in Homer's Iliad they are called insultingly, "κρατούμενοι," or "those ruled [by women]," "Ἀχαΐδες οὐκ ἔτι Ἀχαιοί": "Achaean women, no longer Achaeans." Histories hand down that the Lycians also were subjected to governments by women. And, what I grieve to report, Tacitus says concerning the unconquered Germans: "A woman dominates; to such a degree do they degenerate not only from liberty but even from servitude." At Rome it was the highest reproach to live an Achaean life. For Plutarch says most truly: "ἡ φύσις παρανομεῖται γυναικοκρατουμένη"; "It is a transgression of nature to be governed by a woman."

§ 4. Therefore I approve a middle way. Let women and slaves not be held in the same position, as occurs among barbarians according to Aristotle's testimony. Nor let a husband possess the right of death over them, as among the Gauls, as Caesar teaches in book 6; much less let old women be sold, oppressed by labors, or even buried alive, as was customary among the most monstrous of the barbarians, the Parthians and Thracians.

Conversely, I would not wish government to be conferred upon them by human law unless a great reason demands it. For if it is fitting that an honorable woman should obey her husband, how is it suitable that she should command armies and kingdoms? A man is rendered infamous if he obeys his wife; a wife infamous if she commands her husband.

§ 5. This is a strong presumption against the scepters of women, but not a judgment by which all power and right of governing is denied them. For although the laws order that a woman obey her husband, she is nevertheless mistress of the family--that is, of the maidservants and servants--and illustrious women retain right over their cities and dominions.

§ 6. Therefore I judge the government of a woman legitimate and useful to the commonwealth when, after her husband has died, the children are heirs at an age too young to administer government. Then I judge that, together with the tutors, the mother must be admitted not only to a share in the kingdom but even in precedence over the tutors, with chief authority for educating the son and governing. For she is the mother of the family, and care of the offspring ought not to be denied to her. But that care possesses as an annex the care of the inheritance--that is, of the kingdom. Nor will maternal authority suffice for ruling the son and the son's ministers unless she also possesses lawful power in the kingdom.

Next, great dangers surround an infant king; and many make use of his age for wrongdoing, many attempt novelties. In this necessity no one is more sagacious than the mother, no one more faithful to the son, especially since the son's danger will also drag the mother with it. And the practice of the noblest kingdoms possesses this rule. France does not allow women to be heirs of the kingdom, nor does almost any part of Germany. Nevertheless, queen mothers and princely matrons in Germany, as the most loving guardians and helpers of their sons, are always held in chief honor and consulted concerning public business. I judge that this is done most prudently for many reasons.

For first, it is a decree of divine law that a son should honor his mother. Therefore to approach her, seek counsel, and admit her into participation in affairs is consonant with the bond and obligation of nature. For whom will the prince trust if he does not trust his mother, by whose pain he was born, from whose breasts he hung, and whose safety rests upon the preservation of her son?

Next, it is useful to none of the administrators that the mother should be separated from the administration of affairs. The prince will soon grow to adolescence and recognize the authors of that alienation. He will either disdain the ministers or certainly cast them away when they are detected in some error. Nor will errors be lacking among many; and if they are lacking, nevertheless they will not escape denunciations. Meanwhile the mother will be reconciled with her son; they themselves will pay the penalties of their ill-considered rashness.

But if they possess the prince's mother as conscious of and authorizing their business, their accounting will not be difficult with such an advocate, nor, in an offense, their pardon with such an intercessor. Therefore it is advantageous to all that authority should remain with the mothers of princes.

§ 7. Second, I approve the government of a woman when, according to the laws of the kingdom, she herself is the heir. For if a farm or castle ought not to be taken from a woman because she is a woman, neither, therefore, should a kingdom, unless by the laws of the kingdom the inferior sex is barred from the scepter. This, nevertheless, under the condition that, with the fatherland consenting or not opposing, she should come under the laws and into the house of a husband; meanwhile, she herself should administer the state.

In this matter, the advantage of the fatherland and the integrity of religion show that two things must be observed. First, let her not love a bridegroom unwelcome or suspect to the fatherland; next, let the fatherland not obtrude upon the heir a man hateful to her. Rather, by mutual consent let them select both a good husband and a good prince. By this method the Spains grew to so great a magnitude; and the best poet begins Roman majesty from a dotal kingdom, "when an only daughter preserved so great a house."

But it is fitting that this kingdom of a woman should be brief. For there are customarily many competitors when a wife draws so great a dowry; some even advance to such shamelessness that they adorn nuptials with war and blood. For most of the wars which Francis, king of the Gauls, waged with Charles, duke of Guelders, although other causes were displayed as pretexts, tended toward this: that Charles should select for himself a son-in-law from the princes of Gaul. This was so much the case that at times the king himself and Charles were ignorant of the true and inward cause of the war, as Commynes, a most prudent counselor of kings, left in writing.

§ 8. Third, I approve it if the matron is of proven constancy, piety, and prudence, of royal lineage, and possesses the favor of the common crowd and the nobles, especially if otherwise seditions and the promotions of unworthy persons are feared. Pulcheria assuredly preserved the commonwealth while her brother was alive and vindicated it excellently after he died, calling Marcian, a man both brave and just, into partnership.

§ 9. The crimes of women in administering governments which political writers enumerate provide insufficient cause for us to bar all women from public affairs. Jezebel was impious, Athaliah cruel. Laodice, the wife of the Cappadocian, was the murderess of six sons born from herself, much more savage than Medea. Cleopatra was wanton and savage toward her brother. Messalina, Faustina, and Fredegund were monstrous harlots; for these royal women are adduced.

But if we employ that argument, we should not judge even men to have the right to command; they have sinned more often and in more things. Against one Jezebel I set Ahab together with all the apostate kings of Israel; against Athaliah, Abimelech, who killed all his brothers, seventy men, upon one stone. They are indignant that Laodice was savage toward her sons; the Turks do this daily, for they are not ignorant of the law and custom by which they decree government for one and death for the others.

We deny that Messalina, Faustina, and Fredegund commanded. They were powerful harlots and poisoners, and they employed male administrators no better than themselves. Nero surpassed Messalina; Commodus, his mother Faustina. We certainly can recount excellent heroines and bring forward women constant beyond manly strength.

The first is Jael, wife of Heber the Kenite, blessed in her tent. She gave milk to him who sought water and offered butter in the bowl of princes. She put her left hand to the nail and her right hand to the workman's hammers, struck Sisera, and sought a place for the wound in his head. The second is Deborah, who judged the people, for all Israel ascended to her for every judgment. Judges 4 and 5: "Arise, arise, Deborah; arise, arise, and speak a canticle. The remnants of the people were saved; the Lord contended among the brave. The leaders of Issachar were with Deborah and followed the tracks of Barak, who exposed himself to danger as though plunging headlong into an abyss."

I would not even exclude from the kingdom that wise woman who settled a most grievous sedition through her eloquence, 2 Kings 20. For she went out to the people and spoke wisely to them, and they cut off the head of Sheba, son of Bichri, and cast it to Joab. She furnished more than victory itself, more than David's bravest army. The histories of Judith and Esther also are known; I hasten to others: Mamaea, the mother of Alexander; Placidia; Pulcheria; finally Matilda, who, although of unequal power, nevertheless with the highest constancy, fidelity, piety, and prudence defended Italy and the Church against the most powerful kings.

I add to them Isabella, wife of Ferdinand; Irene Augusta; and especially Libussa, queen of the Bohemians, whose government was peaceful, just, and brave. Then she lost the kingdom not through sloth or tyranny but by making a correct judgment for the people, as Aeneas Silvius relates. Two of the best men were contending before her concerning possession of fields. A sentence was pronounced from goodness and equity: the more powerful was condemned in favor of the humbler. He, as if it were an injury for the more powerful man to succumb in a trial, appealed to the people and said that it was dishonorable and unworthy that so great a people, so many nobles, and so great a government should be subject to the judgment of one woman.

The multitude, stirred by his voice, began to accuse government by a woman, to bring forward the customs of neighboring nations, and to seek a man who would rule over them. Libussa, after ordering silence, said that she had perceived the desire of the people and would not frustrate them in it; after her father's death she had held government for her subjects, not for herself. She ordered them to return on the following day. They obeyed; they departed and returned.

When Libussa saw in the assembly that the multitude was present, she said: "Bohemians, down to this day I have commanded you peacefully and gently, as is the custom of women. I have taken from no one what was his; I have injured no one. You have experienced a mother, not a mistress. But my government is unacceptable to you. You act with me according to the custom of human disposition: nothing pleases a human being for long. Peoples desire a pious and just prince more readily than they endure one.

"Be free, therefore, by my judgment. I shall give you a man who will be over you and judge your heads according to his own decision, as you wished. Go, saddle my white horse and lead it into a broad, open field; release it there free and unbridled, following it wherever it goes. The horse will run for some time; finally it will halt before a man eating upon an iron table. He will be my husband and your prince."

The speech was pleasing to the assembly. The released horse traversed ten thousand paces. At last it halted beside the river Biela before a plowman named Primislaus. The nobles and people, reassured after they saw the horse standing and caressing and fawning upon the plowman, came nearer and said: "Hail, good man, whom the gods have given us as prince. Unyoke the oxen, mount the horse, and come with us. Libussa seeks you as husband, Bohemia as leader." Primislaus, although rustic, received the messengers kindly and answered that he would do what was asked. Thus the most learned man relates it most briefly from Silvius.

But if the rationale of those who admit women also into the hope and inheritance of the kingdom does not yet please, let them assuredly hear of many other reigns by no means to be regretted. Semiramis augmented Babylon. Tomyris propagated the bounds of her government widely and--what is a distinguished glory--satiated the slain Cyrus with blood. Rhodogune vindicated her fatherland; and the kings of the Persians, delighted by her valor, stamped coins with an image of Rhodogune startled, her hair loosened and blowing. For when she heard of the defection of her people while she was washing, she set out against the rebels without drying her hair and even bound herself by an oath that she would not wash her hair unless victory over the enemies had been carried back.

Zarina, queen of the Sacae, by prudence and clemency led her nation toward a gentler and more humane cultivation and founded many cities. So great was her glory among her own people that the Parthians defected from the Medes to her, a distinguished commendation of government by a woman. For they preferred her justice and humanity to the insolence of the Medes and judged that so great was the strength in a woman that they did not doubt they could be defended by her against their former lords.

With how great valor did Blanche, queen of France and mother of St. Louis, both administer the kingdom and educate her son? Margaret, queen of England and wife of Henry VI, when her husband's zeal for quiet withdrew his mind from public affairs, administered all things in peace and war as an equal to great kings. She restored Henry, captured by conspirators, to liberty by war; expelled from the kingdom, with an indefatigable spirit she sought it again three times with a fleet.

The Poles, bravest of peoples, conferred government upon the heroine Wanda. Since she said, "I prefer to be a prince rather than the wife of a prince," she lived unmarried and triumphed over the Marcomanni. What people is fiercer, what people more arrogant, than the Lombards? Nevertheless, when Authari died and, as occurs, they divided into factions concerning the successor and sedition and civil war began to grow, they conferred government upon Theodelinda of Bavaria, Authari's wife, under this law: that whomever she chose as husband, the entire nation would also venerate as king. Thus it was done. She named Agilulf, and from his government that nation began to be more cultivated and humane.

And these things suffice concerning the first causes of the commonwealth--efficient cause, matter, and form. Now let us treat of the end.

CHAPTER XXVII

That Majesty Shines Forth in All These Forms

§ 1. In all these forms shines forth human majesty, but one of divine origin and nearest to God. For it--as they are accustomed to speak--is either real or personal. The former endures together with the kingdom, even when there is an interregnum; the latter, attached to persons, shines forth now in one, now in several, whether in a king, the best men, or the people. But wherever government exists, there is care for another's safety. Oppian, book 5 of the Halieutica, names kings "ὀλύμπια τείχεα γαίης," "the heavenly walls of the earth." See Augustine, The City of God, book 19, chapter 15. For government undertakes that all are to be defended, whether its reign extends widely or its city bounds are narrow. Alexander used to say that the world was one city and that his camp was its citadel.

By real majesty the kingdom is constituted, and its fundamental laws are confirmed by common consent. Personal majesty is the power of governing and disposing all things. Hence there is something admirable and beyond nature when all obey one or a few, as Tolosanus and Lipsius rightly teach. Thus also Fasti 5:

"Hence Majesty was born, who tempers the whole world, and on the day she was brought forth, she was great."

Hence the crime of injured majesty is the gravest among all, because it is against the greatest thing and against all.

§ 2. The rights of majesty are: to give laws, not receive them; to dispense contrary to the laws; to defend the fatherland; to administer the highest affairs; to judge all and be judged by no one. Majesty is the right or power itself from which all these so great effects flow.

The regalia are the effects of majesty, or rights consequent upon majesty, among which many number being released from the laws, as Bocer, book 1 On Regalia, §2, and Arnisaeus, book 2 On the Right of Majesty, number 1. They all arise from the supreme power of commanding, which contains both lawgiving and judging.

§ 3. They distinguish the regalia into greater and lesser. They call the former rights of dignity and the latter rights of utility or of the fisc. Not rightly; for those of the fisc contain all the defenses and sinews of power. Without them majesty is either nothing or precarious. Thus they are not lesser but great, often greater than those which are called rights of dignity.

Joachim Stephani, book 3 On Jurisdiction, chapter 8, §2, says that the regalia consist in "αὐτεξουσία & δεσποτεία." This is confusedly said and not truly. For we do not acknowledge "δεσποτείαν" in a moderate government. If we speak properly, it is the name of a private person; if broadly, it is power itself. Next, "αὐτεξουσία" is each person's free judgment, which is supreme in the supreme prince--but "νόμιμον," or lawful; otherwise it is unjust.

But I would not wish that name to be abused in this matter, lest the will of the prince be judged justice. Those things assist royal dogs--parasites who are destroyers of kingdoms--excessively.

§ 4. The regalia which are customarily given to lesser princes in a kingdom are called so improperly, for they are "ἀπόρρωγες," or offshoots, and communications of rights similar to supreme right. The highest right of princes under a king in Germany is to promulgate edicts and establish laws. Therefore what Fachinaeus, Bocer, Camman, and others refer among the things reserved to supreme majesty is false.

It belongs to the same authority to establish new laws and to approve or repeal old ones. Bodin, book 1 of the Politics, number 94. But, as I said, not only an evident advantage but a certain necessity ought to exist for departing from that which has long seemed equitable. Law 2, On the Constitutions of Princes. Every most factious person learns to dispute all laws when he sees that what was long held sacred is repudiated.

CHAPTER I

The Connection and Order of the Two Following Books

ON RELIGION TO BE MAINTAINED IN THE COMMONWEALTH

§ 1. In the first book we treated of God, the principal cause of the commonwealth, from whom all power comes and in whom it terminates; of the human beings from whom that political body is fitted together as though from its members, and is moved and acts; and likewise of its manifold form. Now a discourse must be undertaken concerning the cause which is first in the mind of the agent and last in the execution of the work--namely, concerning the end of the commonwealth. Since that end consists in the exercise of virtue and the contemplation of what is honorable, we must hereafter speak concerning the virtues of magistrates and subjects. But since true faith in God is the foundation of all virtues, I shall treat principally of it in the second book, and of the others in the third book.

Although that doctrine might seem to pertain to individuals rather than to the commonwealth, nevertheless, mindful of my undertaking, I shall accommodate all the precepts of the virtues to the formation of magistrates and of subjects insofar as they are citizens and members of a great body, so that it may be wholly evident to all by what things the majesty of governments has grown, and by what things it has been afflicted and given over to destruction.

CHAPTER II

The End of the Commonwealth Is Its Happiness

§ 1. The happiness of individual human beings and of the whole commonwealth is the end. All seek this; in this are all the things that make one happy. There can be many who do not seek to be rich, kings, or brave; there is no one who wishes to be wretched or does not wish to be happy. The ancients believed Happiness to be a goddess--almost truly, for Lucullus was the first to establish a temple for her. But no one who worships the gifts of God in place of God can be happy.

§ 2. All therefore seek to be happy; but in what thing does happiness consist? For if it consists in riches, pleasures, freedom from pain, or honors, the commonwealth must be directed toward those goods; if in virtue, the minds of human beings must be exercised toward this. The commonwealth must therefore stand or fall with this judgment. For τὸ τέλος, "the end," is the target, cynosure, and norm by which all public and private plans are directed. What must be sought so greatly in life as what its end is--what is the final and ultimate thing to which all counsels for living well and acting rightly must be referred? Seneca, Epistle 71: "Whenever you wish to know what must be avoided or what must be sought, look to the highest good and the purpose of your whole life. For whatever we do ought to agree with it. No one will arrange individual things unless the sum of his life has already been set before him. No one, although he has his colors prepared, will reproduce a likeness unless it is already settled what he wishes to paint. We err for this reason: we all deliberate about the parts of life, but no one about the whole. He who wishes to shoot an arrow ought to know what he seeks, and then direct and govern the missile with his hand."

Since these things possess the greatest force in private life, they possess so much the greater force in the commonwealth as the fall of great bodies is more serious. For if some Epicurean or Aristippean should set an end for the city, all will be dissolved into pleasures; they will become Sicyonians, Sybarites, and Babylonians. They will overthrow everything honorable and, finally, the commonwealth itself.

It is indeed untimely now to pursue the opinions of the ancient philosophers. For who is now so mad as to place the highest good in pleasure or riches, although he lives in such a way that he seems to acknowledge no good besides feeding and lust?

I leave these things to the philosophers in their thinking-shops. I deny that anyone who refers all things to his own advantage and pleasure can be a statesman; I affirm that he cannot be a good citizen. He will not protect right, he will not rescue an innocent person from punishment, he will not offer food to one perishing from hunger, much less will he put on arms or descend into the arena except for the sake of pleasure. Such savagery and brutish folly will remove from the midst every association of the human race and civil fellowship.

§ 3. More humane, and in a certain manner more cunning, is the reasoning of others who think that commanding is a great part of happiness, and therefore that government exists for its own sake. Dionysius indeed substituted the schoolmaster's rod for the scepter at Corinth and, lest he should not command, sought a scholastic kingdom. Caesar's mind was no different: he preferred to be first in an Alpine town rather than second at Rome. But not even that error is tolerable, as St. Augustine rightly says in book 5 of The City of God, chapter 24:

"For we do not call certain Christian emperors happy for the reason that they either ruled longer, or left sons ruling after a peaceful death, or subdued enemies of the commonwealth, or were able both to guard against and to crush hostile citizens rising against them. For certain worshipers of demons, who do not belong to the kingdom of God to which these men belong, deserved to receive these and other gifts or consolations of this wretched life. And this was done by his mercy, lest those who believed in him should desire such things as though they were the highest goods.

"But we call them happy if they rule justly; if, amid the tongues of those who honor them sublimely and the exceedingly humble services of those who salute them, they are not exalted, but remember that they are human beings."

§ 4. If we also weigh the matter by human reason, this readily occurs: kingship is not the ability to command, but a duty. For neither does the principate exist for its own sake, nor is the prince an end to himself; rather, the supreme good of both is the safety and protection of peoples. No prudent person will have thought that so many thousands of cities and peoples which obey the king of the Spains exist for his sake, but that the king exists for the peoples, and that the king's duty is to provide for the safety of all and to remedy the evils of all.

Therefore, since servitude exists not for its own sake but for the sake of the master, and kingship is servitude, it does not exist for its own sake. Thus Antigonus most prudently said to his son when he was conducting himself rather insolently and fiercely: "Know, my son, that our kingship is a splendid servitude." There is also the royal utterance of Sopater to his brother Demetrius in Stobaeus, Sermon 44: "See that you are worthy of government, not by the condition of the commonwealth, but by excellence of virtue and devotion toward your subjects. Those whom previously you did not acknowledge, and whom you thought pertained to you no more than any human being does by the common nature of all, once made prince you ought to revere as now known and familiar."

Would that all kings, in imitation of Moses, the mildest of human beings upon earth, loved their own people. Numbers 11:11: "And he said to the Lord: Why have you afflicted your servant? Why do I not find favor before you? And why have you placed the weight of this whole people upon me? Did I conceive all this multitude, or beget it, that you should say to me: Carry them in your bosom, as a nurse is accustomed to carry an infant, and bear them into the land concerning which you swore to their fathers?" Moses, established as prince by God, is oppressed by the weight of the people, and God shows how capacious the bosom of princely clemency ought to be. "Carry it," God says; "carry it as a nurse, solicitously, gently, as one who will render an account to me, the parent." To that sense another also rightly said: "A good king is a public servant." And Antoninus the Philosopher received royal adoption sadly, not ignorant how many cares and dangers one headband bound together.

Therefore happiness in kingship exists only in opinion; and when opinion deceives, it removes all happiness, for error makes people wretched. If we also believe those with experience, we shall discover that magistracy is not even to be desired. "The inexperienced man seeks great power; the experienced man hates it," Pompey used to say. But if he had not hated it too late, he himself and his sons, after nations had been triumphed over, would not have made expiation by so pitiable a death.

I would scarcely believe Themistocles if, endowed with the highest talent, he could not have condemned his own ambition. He used to declare that he preferred to go to the tomb rather than to the tribunal (Aelian, book 6). It is assuredly a great servitude; but because it is splendid and honored, it is loved, especially because insults are feared in private life.

§ 5. So great a labor and care, therefore, belongs not to one who is happy but to one who is busy. Seleucus used to say: "If the common crowd knew how laborious it is merely to read and write so many letters, it would not judge the diadem worth lifting even from the ground." It is beautiful, I confess, to admit into one's mind the care of the whole commonwealth, to undertake the destinies of a people, and, in a certain manner forgetful of oneself, to live for nations; to receive innumerable reports from every direction and send out as many commands; to think about so many cities, nations, and provinces; to endure anxieties all nights and days and to take thought for the safety of all. This is beautiful; it is not happy. For happiness is not laborious, is not anxious, does not expend itself upon the advantages of others, but accomplishes whatever it does without any vexation.

Antiochus had this consolation for his defeat: when conquered by the Romans and ordered to reign within Taurus, he declared that he would be freed from a great care because he had been enclosed within modest boundaries of a kingdom. Henry VII, son of Frederick II, applied himself continually to affairs and remembered to take food only late.

When admonished that he should have regard for his strength and health, he answered: “For a private person, every time is a time for food when he wishes or is accustomed; but for a king, if he does not renounce his name, only that time in which he is free.”

Alfonso, king of Aragon, experienced this; for when an old man pressed upon him rather importunately during dinner, he said that asses were happier than kings: “For while they eat, their drivers take the packsaddles from them; but this old man places one upon me while I dine.” Tiberius testified that he was a servant--with a feigned mind, but with an utterance to be emulated by good kings: “I have said both now frequently and at other times, Conscript Fathers, that a good and salutary prince, whom you have furnished with so great and so free a power, ought to serve the senate and all citizens, often and generally even individuals; nor do I repent of having said it.” Tiberius said it but did not do it. Charles V both said it and added weight to his words; for by deed he showed what kingship was. Lord of as many kingdoms as others scarcely are of cities, he wished to die a private person; and when he transferred the Belgian provinces to his son Philip, he said: “O son, I place a great burden upon you. For throughout the whole time of my principate I never had a quarter of an hour free from great cares and anxieties.”

Therefore, if he is an emperor in the true sense of the name, if he weighs his duty not merely in appearance and name, and if he considers not the purple, scepter, and diadem but the affair of the people, he is never his own, always the commonwealth’s, and often even the property of individuals. Rudolf I accomplished this excellently, as he did many other things. For when he saw poorer persons being kept away by his attendants, he exclaimed: “By God, permit human beings to come to me; for I was not called to government so that I might be shut up in a little chest.”

§ 6. Those occupations are grave and troublesome; nevertheless, because they are mingled with the sweetness of commanding and the enticement of the highest honor, they are loved by the frivolous and tolerated by the serious, and therefore are thought to hinder happiness less. But if princes should look upon the dangers and evils, they will confess themselves most wretched. This is indeed accustomed to happen to wicked princes; for because they lay aside the care of the commonwealth, they are oppressed by fear. Indeed, as perpetual labor exercises the good prince, so fear--a worse evil than labor--exercises the wicked one.

Hear the oracle of a wise man fleeing government (Vopiscus, Proculus): “You do not know, friends, what an evil it is to rule. Naked swords hang over our necks; spears threaten from every direction, missiles from every direction. The guards themselves are feared; the companions themselves are dreaded. Food is not taken for pleasure, a journey not for authority, wars not according to judgment, arms not according to devotion. Add that every age in government is criticized. Someone is old: he is judged incapable; but if he is not, madness is within him. For because you desire me as emperor, you draw me into the necessity of death. But I have a consolation for death: I shall not be able to perish alone.”

§ 7. What furies, what torments shall we believe tore apart the mind of Heliogabalus? Aelius Lampridius writes thus concerning him: “And it had been predicted to him by Syrian priests that he would die a violent death. He had therefore prepared cords entwined with purple, silk, and scarlet, with which, if necessary, he might end his life by a noose. He had also prepared golden swords with which he might kill himself if some violence pressed him. He had also prepared poisons in thunderstones, hyacinths, and emeralds, with which he might destroy himself if anything more grievous threatened. He had also made a very high tower, with gold and jeweled tablets laid beneath it before him, from which he might cast himself down, saying that even

“his death ought to be precious and in keeping with the appearance of luxury, so that it might be said that no one had perished in such a manner. But those things availed nothing. For, as we have said, he was killed by buffoons and dragged most foully through the streets. This was the end of the name of the Antonines in the commonwealth, since all knew that this Antoninus had been as false in life as in name.”

If anyone, seeing him swimming either among roses or in pools of perfumes, thinks that he was happy, he is no less mad than the gladiator himself. He certainly was not secure, although security in the possession of good is the first portion of happiness. If he knows the dangers that threaten, he is anxious; if he is ignorant of them, he is foolish; nowhere is he happy. Therefore the flattery that is in the open will not inflate a wise king, but the envy that is always hidden, and the conspiracy that must always be feared, will restrain him with salutary fear.

§ 8. What, therefore, is the happiness that is the end of the commonwealth and, as they say, the highest good? I answer:

The end of the commonwealth is the highest good, the public good, the civil and human happiness of all and of individuals, consisting in acts of virtue; also divine happiness, toward which human happiness tends and without which human happiness is scarcely obtained. To these I add external order, peace or the defenses of war, an abundance of resources, and a copious supply of provisions. Since individuals do not suffice for themselves, they unite into one so that they may live honorably, peacefully, easily, and abundantly. Aristotle describes the public good to us no differently: "Εστὶ δὲ πολιτικὸν ἀγαθὸν τὸ δίκαιον. Τοῦτο δὲ ἐστὶ τὸ κοινῇ συμφέρον." "The civil good is right, or what is just; for this is suitable to all." Those words must be understood concerning a distinguished part of happiness; for generally, where administration is just, the commonwealth flourishes most greatly.

Moreover, the same Aristotle, book 7 of the Politics, chapter 2, affirms that the happiness of each individual human being and of the city is the same. His words are: "Whether the happiness of each individual human being and of the city must be said to be the same or not remains for us to explain. But this too is readily apparent. For all would grant with one voice that it is the same. For whoever places living well for one human being in riches also declares a city happy if it is wealthy and abundant; and whoever places the tyrannical life before all others also pronounces the city that commands the most people the happiest; and if anyone especially admires and approves an individual on account of virtue, he will also have said that the more adorned with virtue a city is, the happier it is.

"But there are now two things that need consideration: one, whether that life is more desirable which is passed in participation in the administration of the commonwealth and the city, or rather the private life of a foreigner, segregated and released from civil society; the other, what form of administering the commonwealth and what disposition--or ordering or, so to speak, arrangement--of the city must be judged best, whether participation in civil society is desirable and to be sought by all, or by some not at all but nevertheless by most."

And in chapter 3 he says that εὐδαιμονίαν is πρᾶξιν, "that happiness is action," and finally concludes that the same life is the best end for each individual human being and for the whole commonwealth.

§ 9. Nevertheless, I propose that two things be observed here. The first is that the happiness which we define is very imperfect, scarcely to be designated by the name of happiness; for it is both inconstant and insincere, contaminated by the intervention and mixture of many evils. It is rather the way to true happiness; nevertheless, he who is upon the way of happiness is also called happy. Thus the royal prophet also pronounces: "Blessed is the man who has not gone away in the counsel of the impious, and has not stood in the way of sinners, and has not sat in the chair of pestilence, but his will is in the law of the Lord." Yet that happiness does not consist in the goods of pleasures, resources, and honors, which call the mind away from the good and do not lead it to the end.

The second admonition is that I join to happiness begun, or to the actions of the virtues, peace, resources, fortifications, and dignity--not as though people could not be happy without these things. Certainly the poor, the afflicted, and the martyrs have been happier through contempt for and loss of these things. But because these things are sought in the commonwealth, and are preserved well and with virtue--for that fortitude by which people can sustain calamities gladly and willingly belongs to few--the safety of all must therefore be pursued. Although the Stoics deny that soundness of limbs, health, strength, honors, and resources are goods, nevertheless the holy Fathers also number these things among the good gifts of God, which ought both to be sought and to be causes for thanksgiving. For it is permissible to use these as defenses toward true happiness; but when they are absent, the wretched are often cast headlong into crimes through need.

This, therefore, is the political end; yet it tends farther and searches out a richer happiness--namely, heavenly happiness. For the earthly city was established by God for this purpose: that it might transfer its citizens to the heavenly city. Hence it comes about that the earthly commonwealth ought not to be separated from the Church, but that there ought to be the highest conjunction of both. Nor will anyone obtain natural good and the moral virtues without the assistance of more divine grace.

Let no one teach that this can be done; it has not hitherto been done. All things were full of vices and crimes wherever the grace of God was not acknowledged. The Christian religion teaches us that without a special influx of divine goodness, one can neither arrive at perfect virtues, even human and moral ones, nor avoid sins for long. Aristotle himself, book 1 of the Ethics, chapter 9, and the final book, final chapter, taught that attaining the virtues is a divine gift. But we shall treat of that matter afterward in its own place. Now let us establish this with Aristotle, book 7 of the Politics, chapter 18: "Εὐδαιμονίαν εἶναι ἐνέργειαν καὶ χρῆσιν ἀρετῆς τελείας." Happiness is action and the use of perfect virtue, with those aids added which conduce publicly to virtue.

CHAPTER III

That Virtue Must Necessarily Be Cultivated in the Commonwealth

§ 1. Let no one attempt to remove virtue from the commonwealth. It is an arduous thing; a narrow path leads to it; it has need of a spirited guide and teacher. Vices are learned without a master, and they drag those prone to them down the slope. I commend virtue, as the supreme treasure of the commonwealth, to kings, aristocrats, and the people. Virtue regulates kingdoms, cities, and provinces; it bears laws; it cultivates friendships; it distributes duties among relatives and children. Let princes and the people pursue virtue, but especially the prince, whose virtue has three distinguishing marks: for it both benefits the greatest number, is most conspicuous, and instructs, preserves, and corrects the commonwealth by example, not merely by deed.

No one is ignorant that it benefits the greatest number, since we read that great vices joined with supreme power have destroyed the world, and that all have been restored by the virtue of one good prince. For what floods, fires, famines, and pestilences are, wicked magistrates are; and just as provinces are compelled to endure storms and public brigandage, so too the losses caused by evil princes.

But what fertility of the earth is, what a favorable wind is to the sea, what the sun is to the world, this a prince endowed with virtue provides to the commonwealth. He speaks thus with himself: “Of all mortals I have found favor and been chosen to discharge the office of the gods--of God--upon earth. I am the arbiter of life and death for nations; what condition and lot each person has is placed in my hand. I shall therefore do this: harm no one, benefit all. The fatherland is a sacred thing; to harm it is sacrilege. But he harms the fatherland who injures individuals; and he who possesses power in the fatherland but does not aid individuals does not use his power rightly.”

§ 2. But the principal glory of princes lies in example. The most faithful manner of giving precepts is to teach by examples; for virtue is shown by example, not recommended. The heliotrope and certain other plants are bent toward the movement of the sun by continual turning, and the people, intent upon the morals of princes and aristocrats, are drawn by their example. But they are drawn more powerfully when there is a departure from virtue, because enticements coming from so great an authority do not bring shame with them but wipe it away from those who possess it. Nazianzen truly said: “Subjects imitate the vices of their governors more readily than their virtues.” Accordingly, this too is true: princes harm more by example than by sin. For camps are accustomed to be very like their king; and because those who pursue a contrary life seem to condemn the deeds of magistrates, magnates sin most dangerously, since their crimes are born for the ruin of others. Therefore a good prince is exceedingly praiseworthy, whose condition is such that right deeds possess a double reward from the edification of others, and offenses a greater punishment from the corruption of subjects.

Yet the citizen is not to be excused, although the prince has supplied examples by his vices, although the commonwealth, wounded by another’s deed, has rushed headlong into vices. For he too, because he is a member, is burdensome by his disease not to himself alone, but makes the whole commonwealth worse and infects his neighbors by the contagion of his corruption. And although a disease that descends from the head is more serious, nevertheless that which clings to the members is often more troublesome. We see daily how private and foreign vices increase and spring up in the commonwealth. Nothing can be opposed to these more powerfully than the examples of magnates and of citizens of greater standing, which are stronger than punishments and laws. Moreover, the same change that is accustomed to occur in the prince follows in the people, but more swiftly when it is toward evil.

Next, it is highly fitting that princes and the whole commonwealth labor at this: that they struggle toward virtue especially when placed between contrary vices. For unless the prince’s diligence and the severity of the commonwealth oppose them, custom, like a torrent, will abandon the whole people to the open field of vices. There are often atheists, impious persons, dissemblers, and the ambitious in courts; the prince must therefore take all the greater care lest he become worse through their company. For he who perseveres as good among the wicked must be exceptionally good.

§ 3. I am ashamed to say it, yet it must not be kept silent: in the courts of Christian princes there are often such corruptions that purveyors of vices and peddlers of lust, drunkenness, and vanity seem to have established their seat in them. How often have I heard courtiers complain that they could not tolerate that life any longer, that by the continual practice of drinking their strength was buried, their intellect diluted, and their death hastened--and they drank, and drank down a great cohort of weariness and fevers. This is the supreme evil in courts: that their examples flow out among the common people. At public assemblies a law necessary for the Germans was passed against pledging drinks and compelling men to equal draughts. It could have been observed, but at its first utterance it was crushed by the license of the court, and thereafter employed only in mockery.

Would that what Tacitus says of Roman morals did not apply to our commonwealth: “Modesty is scarcely retained amid honorable pursuits, much less is anything of upright morality preserved amid contests of vices.”

§ 4. The first care of the commonwealth ought also to be divine worship, because it is under one God and can be corrected by him alone. If it publicly repudiates reverence, fear, and love for him, there is nothing by which it may be brought onto the way; it reckons it of little importance that it is vicious if it thinks sin will go unpunished. Nor has any other thing destroyed the highest powers more than liberty to sin. In a private person, poverty, fear of the laws, an accuser at hand, and a mocking neighbor restrain and curb this liberty; in magistrates, unless it is checked by reverence for God, it will burst forth into public disgraces. Therefore, under God alone as judge of the contest and judge, they stand before him who regards

> The settled law and divine right of the mind, and the holy recesses
>
> Of the soul, and the heart steeped in noble honor.
>
> This I bid them bring to the temples, and they will sacrifice acceptably with meal.

For the divine power demands not ceremonies but the purity of an undefiled heart. The mind of that man, cultivated more by eloquence than by life, also acknowledged this when he said:

> The heavenly powers rejoice not in a slaughtered ox,
> But in faith, which must be displayed even without a witness.

§ 5. Fourth, if we seek the end, it lies in virtue while we live, and in the reward of virtue while we die--or rather, while we pass to immortality. If the commonwealth neglects this, it runs beside the way and indeed labors, but falls away from the fruit of its labor; finally, troublesome to itself and dashed against itself, it will either be crushed by its own vices or yield to an external enemy into servitude. This was the outcome of all--of all, I say--commonwealths, when evil morals brought the laws under their power, when laws without efficacy were fastened to the wall, while evil morals insulted those wretched laws and, with their standard raised and in square battle formation, entered the citadel of liberty.

§ 6. Finally, the natural judgment of our conscience impels us to embrace virtue and flee vice. For no good work is ever deprived of its most pleasant fruit, nor is a crime committed without a savage bite; for only after its commission is its magnitude and atrocity understood. The sorrowful thought of duty violated in any manner torments and reproaches the mind; approval of justice and honor preserved raises it up with quiet and joy and kindles it toward better things. Nor can this be torn away from the impious without its always striking with a muffled lash, so much so that it ravages and afflicts not only the mind but the body besides.

Those testimonies are greater than every exception for everyone, because each person announces them to himself, each speaks thus to himself and feels himself convicted. Seneca speaks truly in Epistle 105: “A great portion of security is to do nothing unjustly. The uncontrolled lead a confused and disturbed life; they fear as much as they harm, and are at leisure at no time. For when they have acted they tremble, they remain fixed; conscience does not permit them to do anything else and continually forces them to look back upon themselves. Whoever expects punishment suffers it; and whoever has deserved it expects it. Some circumstance affords safety amid a bad conscience, but none affords security. For even if he is not detected, he thinks that he can be detected; he is disturbed among his dreams, and whenever he speaks of someone’s crime, he thinks of his own.

“It does not seem sufficiently effaced to him, nor sufficiently concealed. The guilty man has sometimes had the good fortune of lying hidden, never the assurance.”

§ 7. Crimes can therefore be safe from a human being, but cannot be secure; from God, however, they cannot even be safe. Epicurus himself, amid his cups, perceives that force. Thus he writes to Menoeceus: οὐκ ἔστι τὸν λάθρᾳ τι ποιοῦντα πιστεύειν ὅτι λήσει, κἂν μυριάκις ἐπὶ τοῦ παρόντος λανθάνῃ· μέχρι γὰρ καταστροφῆς ἄδηλον, εἰ καὶ λήσει. “It is not possible for one who does something in secret to trust that he will escape notice, even if he should escape notice ten thousand times at the present; for until his destruction it is uncertain whether he will escape notice.” Seneca expresses it thus in Epistle 97: “It can befall a guilty man that he lies hidden; confidence that he will lie hidden cannot befall him.” Οὐδεὶς οὕτως οὔτε μάρτυς ἐστὶ φοβερὸς, οὔτε κατήγορος δεινὸς, ὡς ἡ σύνεσις, ἡ κατοικοῦσα ταῖς ἑκάστων ψυχαῖς. “No witness is so formidable, nor any accuser so vehement, as conscience dwelling in the minds of all.”

Take this away from a private person, from a senator, from a king, and you have driven them all together into an evil dwelling. Take it away from a commonwealth, and from so many nations you will make a single slaughterhouse. He therefore puts off humanity who dares deny what nature herself declares. But I desire a prince who not only does not fear himself, but even lives in public, who does not desire to lie hidden; who frequently impresses this upon himself: “What you think secret is the rumor of the people; you are the last to learn of a deed which you ought to have prevented.” Hear, prince, the counselor of a Roman prince, Seneca, Epistle 43: “Then judge yourself happy when you can live in public, when your walls cover you but do not conceal you--walls which for the most part we judge to stand around us, not so that we may live more safely, but that we may sin more secretly. I shall tell you a thing from which you may estimate our morals: you will scarcely find anyone who can live with his door open. Our conscience, not pride, has set doorkeepers before us. We so live that to be suddenly looked upon is to be detected. But what does it profit to hide oneself and avoid the eyes and ears of human beings? A good conscience summons the crowd; a bad one is anxious and troubled even in solitude. If the things you do are honorable, let all know them; if shameful, what does it matter that no one knows, when you know? O wretched you, if you despise this witness.”

Therefore cultivate virtue, whose prerogative is also this: that those who do not imitate it nevertheless admire and look up to it; that it is not removed by calamity but persists unmoved amid either fortune.

CHAPTER IV

Machiavelli's Impious Doctrine Is Refuted

§ 1. Vices have no need of a teacher, because examples always strike those they meet: every age will produce Clodiuses, not every age Catos. We are readily inclined toward worse things because neither a leader nor a companion can be lacking; indeed, the thing itself advances even without a leader and without a companion. We are not merely inclined toward vices, but headlong. Indeed, as Cyprian reproaches Demetrianus: "Amid the very adversities in which the soul, constricted and hemmed in, scarcely breathes, you have leisure to be evil and, amid dangers so great, to judge not yourself so much as another. You are indignant that God is indignant, as though by living badly you merited something good, as though he did not still permit all those things that happen to be less and lighter than your sins."

But this is a peculiar evil of our age: to possess a public teacher of vices, one celebrated besides with the morals of many voting in his favor. He is Machiavelli. He so instructs a prince toward virtue that he nevertheless also permits vices and sets them before the virtues as though more useful to a kingdom. Let us therefore hear him. In The Prince, chapter 15, he says: "I know that no one will fail to confess that it would be a thing celebrated with the highest praises if a prince were adorned with all those qualities which, from what has already been said, are considered good. But since they can neither be possessed nor, because the condition of human life opposes it, preserved, it is necessary for him to employ that prudence by which he may flee the infamy of those vices through which his government could be taken away from him. Let him also beware, if it can be done, of those which nevertheless will not take it away; but if this cannot be accomplished, they can be disregarded with less loss. And assuredly let him not labor greatly if he incurs the infamy of those vices without which he could not easily preserve dominion. For if the matter is diligently considered everywhere in the mind, certain things will be found which are said to bear the appearance of virtue but which, if you follow them, will result in your great evil; while, on the contrary, some things will be discovered vicious in appearance which, if you assume them, will return to your security and safety."

And in chapter 16: "And again, if someone should say that many princes have existed who accomplished great things with their armies and who nevertheless excelled in that beneficence, it must be said that a prince makes expenditures either from his own goods or those of others. If the first, he ought to be sparing; if the second, it is necessary that he omit no part of liberality. Yet for a prince leading an army on campaign--which army must be sustained by booty, plunder, and tribute--and handling the possessions of others, this liberality is necessary; otherwise the soldiers would not follow him. But that which is neither yours nor your people's can be bestowed more liberally, as it is agreed was done by Cyrus, Caesar, and Alexander. For that which you expend from the goods of others does not take away your reputation but rather increases it; but loss comes to you when your own resources are consumed."

In chapter 17 he advises the prince to act so that he is feared rather than loved, and says that a prince already engaged with an army and possessing the management of a multitude must determine entirely to reckon the name of inhumanity as nothing. Accordingly, he even attributes Hannibal's achievements to that man's savage cruelty. In chapter 18 he also teaches him to deceive and dissemble.

These things are drunk in by ready ears; they were practiced of old even without a teacher. Yet they are altogether false and ruinous to the commonwealth, and we shall have to treat them rather often in this book and the following one.

§ 2. I shall now proceed against him from his own words. In chapter 9 of Discourses on Livy, he thinks that Romulus's deed is excused by the successful result that followed the killing of Remus. Let us establish that these things be introduced into morals, and that Machiavelli himself be killed so that his colleague may alone be secretary to the Florentine Republic. Let there also be a right to kill others, seize property, and swear falsely for the sake of a kingdom; and let us concede these things not only to kings, but to praetors, senators, and nobles. What peace can exist in so great a disturbance of the commonwealth?

Let him himself decide the question--eloquent against himself--in chapter 17: “Unless the kings had immediately been expelled from Rome, it was necessary, as it assuredly seems to me, that the city be weakened and lose its former virtue and strength. For consider how depraved and corrupt in morals those kings already were at that time. But if the same corruption had been propagated as far as a third successor, it would readily have crept also into the people; and with them infected, the city could never have been restored and recovered its strength and virtue. But because this destruction had indeed occupied the head of the commonwealth, while the other members were not yet infected, the remaining members could, once that destructive head had been removed, be healed and the liberty acquired be preserved.

“For it must be established as certain that a city which has grown accustomed to obey the command of a prince and in which the morals of the people are wholly depraved cannot preserve liberty for itself if it should obtain it, not even if that prince’s entire family should be extirpated; but it will continually be compelled to obey new lords, who will expel one another, while without a prince it will never subsist--unless perhaps some one citizen should arise in it whose heroic virtue and goodness preserve it for some time. But not even this could last longer than the life of him who preserves it, as we know befell the Syracusans, who at different times preserved liberty by the virtue of Dion and Timoleon, but, when these had died, returned beneath the ancient yoke of tyranny.

“But the most evident example of all is that of the Romans, who, after the Tarquins had been cast out, immediately grasped the method of preserving liberty; but after Gaius Caesar had been killed, and Gaius Caligula and Nero removed together with the whole stock of the Caesars, they were able neither to preserve liberty nor to introduce any beginning of it. The cause of so great a difference depended solely upon the fact that in the time of the Tarquins the morals of the Roman people were not corrupt, as they afterward were in the age of Gaius Caesar, Caligula, and Nero. This can be gathered even from the fact that at that time, to preserve the people’s zeal against tyranny, the oath by which they swore that they would never consent that anyone should reign at Rome sufficed. But after Gaius Caesar had been killed, neither the authority and severity of Brutus nor the legions stationed in the East could move the people to defend with a constant and firm mind the liberty which Brutus had introduced into the city in imitation of the first Brutus.

“So great a corruption had by then infected the morals of the Roman people, especially of those who had belonged to the Marian faction; and when Gaius Caesar had obtained leadership in that faction, he had won over the plebs to himself and gradually subjected them with so great an artifice that they did not feel the yoke being placed upon their necks. This example of the Romans is most suitable to the proposed disputation, but examples are also not lacking of peoples to whom the same thing that befell the Romans has occurred in our own age. For the Milanese and Neapolitans, in whatever manner they may be freed from the yoke of servitude, can never preserve liberty; and this befalls them because of the depraved and corrupt morals of all. The Milanese themselves, after Filippo Visconti had died, had obtained liberty and wished to introduce a method of preserving it, but they could not preserve it. It was therefore auspicious and fortunate for the Romans that their kings quickly began to grow insolent and to be depraved in morals; for thus it came about that they were expelled before that corruption of morals could also creep into the people. If it had infected them also, the many contentions of plebs and senate which afterward arose could not have obtained so happy an end that they profited the city rather than bringing any loss upon it.”

§ 3. Indeed, in chapter 18 he also denies that liberty can be restored to a people if it is corrupt in morals. But I conclude in like manner that a kingdom also cannot be preserved when the corruption of morals is extreme. For why can the liberty of the people not be preserved amid extreme corruption? He answers: “Because scarcely any laws can curb the extreme corruption of a people. For neither are good morals preserved in a city without good laws, nor good laws except through people of good morals." Entirely excellent--but on behalf of truth and against his own propositions. Good laws therefore need a good guardian and a good avenger; but such is not an evil prince.

In the time of Caligula there was extreme corruption, good laws, and the worst morals; there came in addition a most shameful prince, who exhausted the treasury, killed two hundred thousand soldiers, and cut down the senate. What if he had been able to live and command longer--with need pressing, lusts increasing, and cruelty grown savage? Would he not have reduced Rome to a solitude? Vices therefore destroy the commonwealth; virtues preserve and fortify it. Let us hear the voice of nature: she will testify that vices are against God and nature, and therefore cannot subsist unless they are mingled with virtues.

Moreover, there are two kinds of sins: some are seen in the corruptions of disgraceful acts, others in deeds of doing harm. Both overturn the commonwealth by their own wickedness, but more swiftly those that are injurious to others. For since these are hateful and give offense, they necessarily violate charity, stir up enmities and wars, and commit the human race to hatred and fury. Hence therefore arises the vengeance of those injured--or flight, if vengeance is despaired of or believed likely to cost dearly. Show me a divided household or army, a city turned against itself, and you will understand that it can be preserved only by peace; but crimes are troublesome to all, often even to those whom they profit.

If therefore virtue is in exile, if all in the commonwealth are unjust, avaricious, lustful, and timid, if judgments are predatory and laws conquered, a city cannot stand amid these vices. Seneca speaks elegantly and wisely in book 2 of On Anger, chapter 31: "It is impious to harm the fatherland; therefore also a citizen, for he is a part of the fatherland. The parts are sacred if the whole is venerable; therefore human being is sacred to human being, for he is a citizen with you in the greater city. What if the hands should wish to harm the feet, or the eyes the hands? As all the members agree with one another because the preservation of the whole concerns each one, so human beings will spare individuals because we have been born for union. Society, however, cannot remain safe except through the love and guardianship of its parts. We would not even crush vipers and water-snakes, and any things that harm by bite or blow, if we could tame them as we can other animals, or bring it about that they should not be a danger to us or to others. Therefore we shall not harm a human being because he has sinned, but lest he sin; punishment will never be referred to the past but to the future. For it is not angry, but takes precaution. For if everyone whose nature is depraved and disposed to evil must be punished, punishment will except no one."

§ 4. Experience supports the reasoning. If vices are once admitted and approved because they are thought sometimes to have profited, they assuredly cannot be endured when they grow. In the ancient age, luxury played with water in little Rome; to have worn a gold ring, built a suburban villa, or dined for ten asses was a great thing. But afterward pearls were trodden underfoot, royal structures were cast into the sea, and the revenues of provinces were heaped together for a single dinner: thus pomp, thus plunder, thus cruelties grew. What then? Can the commonwealth remain safe even while evils so mature and so great reign? If it cannot, let them be met at their beginnings, because once strengthened they either conquer or are conquered at greater loss.

Cities and kingdoms have this property: that when they have withdrawn too far from virtue, they burst like excessively swollen bodies. Vices have this property: that they do not stand still. It is an ancient complaint that wickedness reigns, that human affairs slip toward worse things and rush into every impiety. Vices do not remain in place, but through practice and imprudence acquire confidence. Vices are needy; they are nourished only by injury to others. They advance and increase until they are crushed by divine vengeance. Since therefore nature recommends virtue and exercises her force within us to such a degree that even what we cannot or will not do we nevertheless judge to have been rightly done in others--and Juvenal truly said,

> Never will nature say one thing, wisdom another-- he therefore fights against nature and against the judgment of all wise persons who introduces crimes and the simulation of virtue into the commonwealth.

CHAPTER V

That the Commonwealth Cannot Be Governed without True Virtue and Piety Is Taught from Sacred Scripture

§ 1. It is agreed that without a true understanding and worship of God, without religion, without justice, prudence, temperance, fortitude, and--in one word--without true, solid, and genuine virtue, no commonwealth can be happy for long, but must struggle with many seditions, wars, and disadvantages; and that it experiences these the more greatly the more it departs from virtue, but experiences lesser evils if it somehow maintains possession of certain virtues.

First let us hear God concerning this matter: the holy divinity, the God whom we believe both to exist and to be a rewarder; but those who do not believe this will experience him as avenger. Yet I maintain this: kingdoms are not always given on account of justice, since I see that the most savage of human beings have commanded; but there are only the most wretched kingdoms in which great vices rule, and kingdoms are overthrown through vices. The Lord warns the Israelites, Deuteronomy 9:4: "Do not say in your heart, when the Lord your God has destroyed them in your sight: 'Because of my justice the Lord has brought me in to possess this land,' when those nations have been destroyed because of their impiety.

"For you do not enter to possess their land because of your just deeds and the equity of your heart; rather, because they acted impiously, they were destroyed as you entered." The crimes of the Israelites were serious, so that they deserved death, much less the best of all lands; but on account of Abraham and the patriarchs, with Moses interceding, pardon and Palestine were given, while very numerous and very powerful nations were destroyed because of impiety that was now complete. For the same oracle teaches that it had not yet been completed in Abraham's time, Genesis 15:16: "But in the fourth generation they shall return here, for the iniquities of the Amorites are not yet completed up to the present time."

§ 2. To this pertains that whole speech of Moses which is in Deuteronomy 11, 12, and 13, and especially chapter 28: "But if you will hear the voice of the Lord your God, so that you do and keep all his commandments which I command you today, the Lord your God will make you higher than all the nations that dwell upon the earth. And all these blessings will come upon you and overtake you--if only you will hear his precepts. Blessed shall you be in the city and blessed in the field. Blessed shall be the fruit of your womb and the fruit of your land, and the fruit of your beasts, the herds of your cattle and the folds of your sheep. Blessed shall be your storehouses, and blessed your remnants. Blessed shall you be when entering and when departing.

"The Lord will give your enemies who rise against you falling down in your sight; by one way they will come against you, and by seven they will flee from your face. The Lord will send blessing upon your cellars and upon all the works of your hands, and will bless you in the land which you will have received. The Lord will raise you up as a holy people to himself, as he swore to you, if you will keep the commandments of the Lord your God and walk in his ways. And all the peoples of the earth will see that the name of the Lord has been invoked over you, and they will fear you. The Lord will make you abound in all goods: in the fruit of your womb, the fruit of your beasts, and the fruit of your land which the Lord swore to your fathers that he would give you. The Lord will open his best treasure, the heaven, that he may give rain to your land in its season; and he will bless all the works of your hands. And you will lend to many nations, and you yourself will receive a loan from none. The Lord will establish you as the head and not the tail; and you will always be above and not beneath--if only you will hear the commandments of the Lord your God which I command you today, and will keep and do them, and will not turn aside from them either to the right or to the left, nor follow foreign gods or worship them.

“But if you will not hear the voice of the Lord your God, so that you keep and do all his commandments and ceremonies which I command you today, all these curses will come upon you and overtake you. Cursed shall you be in the city, cursed in the field. Cursed your storehouse, and cursed your remnants. Cursed the fruit of your womb and the fruit of your land, the herds of your cattle and the flocks of your sheep. Cursed shall you be when entering and cursed when departing. The Lord will send upon you famine and hunger and rebuke in all your works which you perform, until he crushes you and destroys you swiftly because of your most wicked inventions in which you abandoned me. May the Lord join pestilence to you until he consumes you from the land which you enter to possess. May the Lord strike you with want, fever, and cold, with burning and heat, with corrupt air and blight, and may he pursue you until you perish. May the heaven above you be bronze, and the earth you tread iron. May the Lord give dust as the rain of your land, and may ash descend upon you from heaven until you are crushed.

“May the Lord deliver you falling before your enemies; by one way may you go out against them, and by seven may you flee, and may you be scattered through all the kingdoms of the earth. And may your corpse be food for all the birds of heaven and beasts of the earth, with no one to drive them away. May the Lord strike you with madness and blindness and fury of mind, and may you grope at midday as the blind man is accustomed to grope in darkness, and may you not direct your ways. At every time may you endure calumny and be oppressed by violence, and have no one to deliver you. May you take a wife, and another sleep with her. May you build a house and not dwell in it. May you plant a vineyard and not harvest it. May your ox be slaughtered before you and you not eat from it. May your ass be seized in your sight and not be returned to you. May your sheep be given to your enemies and there be no one to aid you. May your sons and daughters be delivered to another people while your eyes see and fail at the sight of them the whole day, and may there be no strength in your hand. May a people whom you do not know eat the fruit of your land and all your labors; and may you always endure calumny and be oppressed all your days, and be stupefied at the terror of the things your eyes will see. May the Lord strike you with the worst ulcer in your knees and calves, so that you cannot be healed from the sole of your foot to the crown of your head. The Lord will lead you, and the king whom you establish over yourself, into a nation which neither you nor your fathers know, and there you will serve foreign gods, wood and stone.

“And you will be lost, as a proverb and a tale among all the peoples to whom the Lord will lead you. You will cast much seed into the earth and gather little, because locusts will devour everything. You will plant and dig a vineyard, but you will not drink wine nor gather anything from it, because it will be laid waste by worms. You will have olive trees in all your boundaries and will not be anointed with oil, because they will shed their fruit and perish. You will beget sons and daughters and will not enjoy them, because they will be led into captivity. Blight will consume all your trees and the crops of your land. The stranger who dwells with you in the land will rise above you and become higher, but you will descend and be lower. He will lend to you, and you will not lend to him. He will be the head, and you will be the tail.

“And all these curses will come upon you and, pursuing you, will overtake you until you perish, because you did not hear the voice of the Lord your God nor preserve his commandments and ceremonies which he commanded you. And they will be signs and wonders in you and in your seed--in joy and gladness of heart because of the abundance of all things. You will serve your enemy whom the Lord will send against you, in hunger and thirst and nakedness and every want; and he will place an iron yoke upon your neck until he crushes you. The Lord will bring upon you a nation from afar and from the outermost boundaries of the earth, like an eagle “flying with violence, whose language you cannot understand: a most insolent nation which will not show regard for an old man nor pity a little child, and which will devour the fruit of your beasts and the crops of your land until you perish, and will not leave you wheat, wine, and oil, herds of cattle and flocks of sheep, until it destroys you and crushes you in all your cities, and your strong and lofty walls in which you had confidence throughout all your land are destroyed. You will be besieged within your gates throughout all your land which the Lord your God will give you;

and you will eat the fruit of your womb and the flesh of your sons and daughters, whom the Lord your God gave you, in the straitness and devastation with which your enemy will oppress you.

“The delicate and exceedingly luxurious man among you will begrudge his brother and the wife who lies in his bosom, lest he give them any of the flesh of his sons which he will eat, because he has nothing else in the siege and want with which your enemies have laid you waste within all your gates. The tender and delicate woman who was not able to walk upon the ground nor set down the print of her foot because of her softness and excessive tenderness will begrudge her husband who lies in her bosom concerning the flesh of her son and daughter, and concerning the uncleanness of the afterbirth which comes forth from the midst of her thighs, and concerning the children who were born at that very hour; for they will eat them secretly because of the want of all things, in the siege and devastation with which your enemy will oppress you within your gates.

“Unless you will keep and do all the words of this law which are written in this volume, and fear his glorious and terrible name--that is, the Lord your God--the Lord will increase your plagues and the plagues of your seed, great and persistent plagues, the worst and perpetual infirmities; and he will turn upon you all the afflictions of Egypt which you feared, and they will cling to you. Moreover, the Lord will bring upon you every illness and plague not written in the volume of this law until he crushes you; and you will remain few in number, who before were like the stars of heaven because of your multitude, since you did not hear the voice of the Lord your God. And just as the Lord formerly rejoiced over you, doing good to you and multiplying you, so will he rejoice in destroying and overthrowing you, that you may be taken away from the land which you enter to possess.

“The Lord will scatter you among all peoples, from the summit of the earth to its boundaries; and there you will serve foreign gods, which neither you nor your fathers know, wood and stone. Among those nations also you will not rest, nor will there be rest for the sole of your foot. For there the Lord will give you a fearful heart, failing eyes, and a soul consumed by sorrow; and your life will be as though hanging before you. You will fear by night and day and will not trust your life. In the morning you will say, ‘Who will grant me evening?’ and in the evening, ‘Who will grant me morning?’ because of the fear of your heart by which you will be terrified and because of the things you will see with your eyes. The Lord will lead you back by ships into Egypt by the way of which he said to you that you should see it no more. There you will be sold to your enemies as male and female slaves, and there will be no one to buy.”

If the world believed these things, if these sounded privately and publicly in the ears of kings and counselors, we would now possess the matter as settled. Those cunning devices and prudence of counsels would melt away at this thunder. I am not ignorant that the impious have reigned, for the Canaanites also already ruled in Abraham’s time; but as morals slipped toward worse things, calamities, the companions of impiety, increased until they were utterly destroyed. Nor were the kingdoms of others due to merit, but in order that they might punish the wicked. “Kingdoms,” says Cyprian in On the Vanity of Idols, “do not fall to anyone by merit, but are varied by chance. Furthermore, before them the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians held command, and we know that the Greeks and Egyptians reigned. Thus, in the alternations of powers, a time to command befell the Romans also, just as the rest. But if you return to their origin, you blush. A people is gathered from criminals and the guilty, and, when an asylum has been established, impunity for crimes creates their number. In order that the king himself may possess primacy in crimes, Romulus becomes a fratricide. And in order to make marriage, he inaugurates a thing of concord through discords.”

§ 3. The wicked punish the wicked; the impious are dashed against the impious, and both are broken. Nor is it remarkable, for it is a battle of potsherds and clay. “This is the portion of an impious man with God and the inheritance of violent men which they will receive from the Almighty. If his sons are multiplied, they will be for the sword, and his grandsons will not be satisfied with bread. Those who remain of him will be buried in destruction, and his widows will not weep. If he heaps up silver as though earth, and prepares garments as though clay, he will indeed prepare them, but the just man will be clothed in them, and the innocent will divide the silver. Want will seize him like water; a tempest will oppress him by night. A burning wind will take him up and carry him away, and like a whirlwind will snatch him from his place.”

"God," says David, "will destroy you unto the end, and will pluck you out and remove you from your tabernacle, and your root from the land of the living." And Psalm 91: "When sinners have sprung up like grass and all who work iniquity have appeared, it is that they may perish for ever and ever."

The impious therefore perish, although they blossom most splendidly with swift germination. But there is no need to remain upon this passage: the whole of Scripture indicates this to us. Abraham, an exile from his fatherland, follows God when he calls and is defended; even his increase is a terror to kings. The same God is given as a possession to Isaac and Jacob. That commonwealth was happy when Joshua and pious judges administered it; but when they did evil in the sight of the Lord, they were delivered into servitude to neighboring kings.

Let us read the history of the kings, and the fortune corresponding to each one's morals. David, a man according to God's heart, raised the kingdom to its highest summit, although it suffered disasters on account of his sins. Solomon administered it peacefully and most happily until by his vices he stirred up Hadad the Edomite and resigned ten tribes to Jeroboam. As the deeds of Rehoboam and Abijah were rash and impious, so too their calamities were new: the city was captured, the temple plundered, and royal dignity transferred from gold to bronze. Asa, pursuing virtue, removed the impure and reduced his mother to her proper station; he defeated Zerah the Ethiopian, who was drawing one million men with him, but at last, turning away from God and afflicted by arthritis, he died through his own fault alone. Asa's son Jehoshaphat was pious, brave, and renowned, but he had as heir the degenerate Jehoram, who defiled the kingdom with fratricide and idolatry; therefore the Edomites and other tributary nations revolted.

But it is preferable to hear from Scripture itself the vengeance of God upon the impious king, 2 Chronicles 21:12: "Letters were brought to him from Elijah the prophet, in which it was written: 'Thus says the Lord, the God of David your father: Because you have not walked in the ways of Jehoshaphat your father and in the ways of Asa, king of Judah, but have proceeded along the way of the kings of Israel and have made Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem fornicate, imitating the fornication of the house of Ahab; moreover, you have killed your brothers, your father's house, who were better than you: behold, the Lord will strike you with a great plague, together with your people, your sons, your wives, and all your substance. But you will fall sick with the worst disease of your belly until your vital parts come forth little by little on each successive day.'

"The Lord therefore stirred up against Jehoram the spirit of the Philistines and of the Arabs who border upon the Ethiopians; and they ascended into the land of Judah and laid it waste, and plundered all the substance found in the king's house, and moreover his sons and wives; nor did a son remain to him except Jehoahaz, who was youngest by birth. And beyond all these things the Lord struck him with an incurable disease of the belly. And as day succeeded day and the spans of time rolled by, the cycle of two years was completed; and thus, consumed by a long wasting disease, so that he even discharged his entrails, he was deprived alike of disease and life. And he died in

"the worst infirmity; and the people did not make funeral rites for him according to the custom of burning, as they had done for his ancestors."

After him Ahaziah, Athaliah, Joash, and Ahaz obtained wretched ends, with the shaking of the whole kingdom. Hezekiah restored all things by his piety; Manasseh lost them. Josiah, again imitating his grandfather, restored the former happiness; his descendants perished by impiety.

§ 4. It would be easy to object that the lot of other nations was happy amid the greatest crimes; but I appeal to the whole of history. Success exists in some one matter; happiness in the whole commonwealth does not. If it pleases, let us examine the kingdom of Macedonia, which is accustomed to be adduced as an example of human happiness. After war had been waged in Greece and his brothers and relatives killed, Alexander entered Asia; he passed twelve years most calamitously in the greatest care, pain, many wounds, fury, the blood of his household, conspiracies, and fear, until he perished through drunkenness or poison. A little later all his posterity was cut off--and not only it, but also his commanders and the Silver Shields whom he had burdened with the spoils of the East. But it is no happiness to rage for twelve years so that the whole nobility may obey. He who reads history with prudence will understand that the kingdom of Macedonia, while King Alexander and his commanders strove together, was unhappier than the kingdom of Israel, even when it paid penalties for evil morals. In this it is also memorable that so many commanders, apart from the Ptolemies and Seleucids, were cut off together with their entire families.

But here we are treating of the kingdom of Israel and Judah, concerning which 4 Kings 17:6 says thus: "In the ninth year of Hoshea, the king of the Assyrians captured Samaria and transferred Israel into Assyria. He settled them in Halah and in Habor beside the river Gozan, in the cities of the Medes. For it came about, when the children of Israel had sinned against the Lord their God, who had led them out of the land of Egypt, from the hand of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, that they worshiped foreign gods. And they walked according to the rite of the nations which the Lord had consumed in the sight of the children of Israel, and of the kings of Israel, because they had acted similarly.

"And the children of Israel offended the Lord their God with words that were not right, and built themselves high places in all their cities, from the watchmen's tower to the fortified city. And they made themselves statues and groves upon every high hill and beneath every leafy tree; and there they burned incense upon altars according to the custom of the nations which the Lord had transferred from before their face. And they did the worst things, provoking the Lord; and they worshiped uncleannesses concerning which the Lord had commanded them not to do this thing. And the Lord testified in Israel and in Judah by the hand of all the prophets and seers, saying: 'Return from your most wicked ways, and keep my precepts and ceremonies according to all the law which I commanded your fathers and as I sent to you by the hand of my servants the prophets.'

"They did not hear, but hardened their neck according to the neck of their fathers, who were unwilling to obey the Lord their God. And they cast away his statutes and the covenant which he made with their fathers, and the testimonies by which he testified against them; and they followed vanities and acted vainly, and followed the nations that were round about them, concerning which the Lord had commanded them not to do as they did. And they abandoned all the precepts of the Lord their God, and made themselves two molten calves and groves, and adored the whole host of heaven; and they served Baal, and consecrated their sons and daughters through fire; and they devoted themselves to divinations and auguries, and delivered themselves up to do evil before the Lord, so that they provoked him.

"And the Lord was exceedingly angry with Israel and took them away from his sight, and none remained except the tribe of Judah alone. But not even Judah itself kept the commandments of the Lord its God; rather, it walked in the errors of Israel which it had committed. And the Lord cast away all the seed of Israel and afflicted them and delivered them into the hand of plunderers until he cast them from his face." Divine wisdom, therefore, which is the fountain of all goods, defines happiness by religion and virtue.

CHAPTER VI

All Holy Men Estimated the Happiness of the Commonwealth from Virtue

§ 1. The harmonious and true judgment of all the saints is that there are two foundations of political society, justice and religion, and that as soon as a prince withdraws from God, he also experiences the greatest rebellion within himself. True piety alone is sufficient for princes unto safety; just as, on the contrary, without it armies, horses, attendants, the force of swords, innumerable forces of men, gold and silver, and whatever other equipment there is besides, profit nothing. These things are spiders' webs unless they stand firm through piety.

It is indeed not right to number Tertullian among the saints, because although he began rightly, he nevertheless fell with great scandal to the Church. Yet he, before the rest, pressed this argument in the Apologeticum. This was the judgment of the nations: if the Tiber rose to the walls, the Nile did not rise into the fields, the heaven stood still, the earth moved, or famine or pestilence invaded the world, immediately the Christians, as guilty of the crimes, were sought for the lion. But he proves that the gentiles especially furnished the causes, and that those evils are now lighter because the Christians are intercessors before God. The common judgment of the world, therefore, was that punishments are inflicted for offenses.

St. Cyprian also, in the book On the Vanity of Idols, teaches that the disasters of the Jews were the punishment of impiety: "The Jews first possessed favor before God. Thus once they were just; thus their ancestors obeyed religious observances. Hence both the sublimity of their kingdom flourished and the greatness of their race advanced. But afterward they became neglectful, undisciplined, and proud, and, inflated by confidence in their fathers, while they despised the divine precepts, lost the grace given to them. But how profane their life was, and what offense was contracted from violated religion, they themselves also testify; although they are silent in voice, they confess by their outcome: scattered and wandering, they roam alone, exiles from their own sky, and are tossed among the dwellings of strangers."

And St. Jerome, on Jeremiah 15: "I shall give them into heat, or commotion, and the straits of the whole earth." This was fulfilled in part under the Babylonians and is now fulfilled in whole, when an impious people imitated the worst king, who had filled Jerusalem with the blood of the just from gate to gate. From this we learn that peoples are generally destroyed by the crime of kings, princes, and governors. The supreme destruction, therefore, is an impious prince.

§ 2. St. Ambrose, on Jonah 4, says that the sole means of preserving the fatherland is the uprightness of the citizens, just as their sins are the cause of its overthrow: "The Ninevites possessed so great a wisdom that they defended themselves not by external protections but were saved by their own devotion. For they did not immediately despair of their safety because they heard from the prophet that they would be overthrown together with the walls of the city; rather, when their destruction close at hand was announced, they armed themselves all the more with religious acts. Nor did they abandon their city to be overthrown, but instead remained in it--wise indeed, so that the city which was afflicted by the sins of its citizens might be saved by the prayers of its citizens, and that religious devotion might confer safety upon the city to which an evil manner of life had brought destruction. For it was just that the very persons whom it had endured as sinners should be its own defenders.

"For destruction is inflicted upon a city only because of the sins of its citizens. Cease therefore to sin, and the city will not perish. Why do you flee your fatherland? If you wish to be safe, flee rather from your sins. If you cease to sin, the enemy has been conquered. Divine Scripture says to Abraham that the fatherland can be saved by ten just persons. Therefore, if the just are those who make the fatherland safe, assuredly the unjust are those who abandon it. And if the former obtain favor because of their presence, it is necessary that the latter deserve offense because of their desertion. Plainly unjust and impious is the son who abandons his mother when she is in danger. For the fatherland is in a certain manner a sweet mother, who bore you, who nourished you, who made you rich so that you might be able to suck."

And St. Augustine, on Psalm 118, especially impresses virtue upon princes: "It must be greatly attended to that, within the sanctuary of his mind, humility should sit presiding in its chair in the man who is set above others for governing human beings; and when others stand outside in attendance upon him as he judges, he should with vigilant eye look unceasingly upon the judge before whom he himself must one day stand to be judged concerning these things." Deservedly, indeed: for an appeal to God remains open to all who have been condemned under any law; whoever has lost his case is restored in full before that great tribunal, and is sometimes raised up to the honor of his own judge.

The same Augustine is witness, in book 2 of The City of God, chapter 23, that the Roman commonwealth perished through evil morals: "While that commonwealth was therefore perishing through evil morals, their gods did nothing to direct or correct its morals so that it should not perish. Indeed, they contributed to the depraving and corrupting of its morals, so that it should perish."

Finally, in book 19 of The City of God, chapter 21, he teaches that a commonwealth cannot exist without justice: "For he briefly defines a commonwealth as the thing of a people. If this definition is true, there never was a Roman commonwealth, because it never was the thing of a people, which he wished to be the definition of a commonwealth. For he defined a people as an assemblage of a multitude associated by agreement in law and community of advantage. What he means by agreement in law he explains in his disputation, showing by this that a commonwealth cannot be administered without justice. Where true justice is therefore absent, there can be no law. For what is done by law is assuredly done justly; but what is done unjustly cannot be done by law. For unjust enactments of human beings are neither to be called nor thought laws, since they themselves also say that law is that which has flowed from the fountain of justice; and what is accustomed to be said by certain persons who think incorrectly is false: that law is what is useful to him who possesses greater power.

"Accordingly, where true justice does not exist, there cannot be an assemblage of human beings associated by agreement in law, and therefore no people according to that definition of Scipio or Cicero. And if no people, then neither the thing of a people, but the thing of some sort of multitude which is not worthy of the name of a people. And by this reasoning, if a commonwealth is the thing of a people, and there is no people which is not associated by agreement in law, while there is no law where there is no justice, it is gathered beyond doubt that where there is no justice there is no commonwealth. Moreover, justice is that virtue which distributes to each his own. What justice of a human being is there, then, which takes that very human being away from the true God and subjects him to unclean demons?"

§ 3. Orosius too attributes to the religion and piety of Christians the fact that the world is shaken by lighter evils; Arnobius indeed expressly strives to prove it. So much did they attribute to piety and virtue. Hippolytus the martyr predicted that the gravest calamities would invade the world in a great column at the time when, morals having been loosed, Antichrist would reign most widely, when the laws of all kingdoms would fall; and, alas, preparations and preludes to those evils now already exist.

In this manner the bishops [name illegible in the print] exhort Emperor Leo to virtue: "When these things have been well arranged, the hand of the enemies is turned to fear, and those who formerly had learned rashly to resist will, confounded because of the greatness of your faith, come to ruin. For, being established as imitators of those princes who were illustrious for justice and equity, you will most readily prevail over present affairs." And the bishops of Mesopotamia: "When your piety, together with the priests of Christ, holds and confirms these things, it will govern the rudders of the empire in peace."

And Julian, bishop of Cos: "Marcian is crowned with the diadem of divine love; receiving spiritual truth also, and kindled by desire for the orthodox faith, he hastened that the dogmas of the Apostles should be confirmed by the prelates of the Church. When your piety imitates this, it both obtains victory against the barbarians and destroys the enemies of truth as well." The sixth synod promises Constantine IV that because of his piety God will make all his acts happy and prosperous, he who promises in his holy Gospels, saying: "Seek first the kingdom of God, and all these things will be added to you."

The seventh synod to Constantine and John: "May God the Savior of all, who reigns with us, grant his peace to the Church as his reward; and may he preserve your empire, together with the senate, commanders, and most faithful army of soldiers, for many years, and grant us victory. For he himself said: 'As I live, says the Lord, those who glorify me I glorify.' He it is who, girding you with power, will remove from you every hostile assault and procure obedience among you." The Synod of Toledo to Sisenand: "The wrath of heaven has so changed many kingdoms of the earth that, because of their impiety toward the faith and morals, one was dissolved by another. Hence we too ought to guard against the fall of nations of this kind, lest we be similarly struck by a headlong plague and punished with a cruel penalty."

Most truly Ambrose, Epistle 31 to Valentinian: "This is the love to be expected; this is the love greater than empire: if the faith is kept safe, which preserves the empire."

§ 4. We too experience in Greece and Hungary what Jerome complained of concerning his own times in the epitaph for Nepotian: "By our sins the barbarians are strong; by our vices the Roman army is overcome. Wretched are we who so greatly displease God that through the hands of the barbarians his anger rages against us. Hezekiah did penance, and one hundred eighty-five thousand Assyrians were destroyed by one angel in a single night. Jehoshaphat sang together the praises of the Lord, and the Lord conquered on behalf of him who praised. Moses fought against Amalek not with the sword but with prayer. If we wish to be raised up, let us prostrate ourselves.

"For shame! A mind foolish even to cruelty! The Roman army, victor and lord of the world, is conquered by these men, fears these men, is terrified at the sight of those who are unable to walk, who think themselves dead if they touch the earth. And we do not understand the voices of the prophets: 'A thousand flee when one pursues.' Let us cut away the causes of the disease, so that the disease may likewise be taken away."

Would that these things were impressed upon the hearts of all amid today's calamities. Although many endeavor to resist the calamities, nevertheless few abandon the vices because of which we suffer them.

St. Augustine, book 5 of The City of God, chapter 25: "The good God, lest human beings who believed that he must be worshiped for the sake of eternal life should think that no one could obtain these high stations and earthly kingdoms unless he supplicated demons, on the ground that those spirits possessed great power in such things, filled Emperor Constantine--who did not supplicate demons but worshiped the true God himself--with earthly gifts so great as no one would dare desire. He also granted him to establish a city as an associate of the Roman Empire, as though a daughter of Rome itself, but without any temple or image of demons. He ruled for a long time; as sole Augustus he held and defended the whole Roman world. He was most victorious in administering and waging wars; he was prosperous in all things in suppressing tyrants; he died at a great age from disease and old age; he left sons ruling."

St. Gregory Nazianzen teaches in his oration against Julian that an empire is overthrown by impiety: "With the saving doctrine of Christ poured out far and wide and flourishing especially around us, to attempt to overturn and undermine the Christian religion would have been nothing other than to tear down the Roman Empire and endanger all parts of the commonwealth, and to receive from our own selves those things than which not even enemies could imprecate anything more grievous against us."

St. Chrysostom on Isaiah: "'The affairs of princes do not stand rightly'; of these things we speak very often. It is an immense danger. But what is its cause? 'The thoughtlessness,' they say, 'of those who exercise the principate.' It is not the thoughtlessness of princes; rather, our injustice is a punishment exacted for our crimes. Our crimes have mixed all things above and below, have contrived whatever calamities exist, have armed the enemies, and have brought it about that we descended as conquered. A swarm of evils has flooded in from no other source than this cause."

Today also, how many persons amid lawsuits, usury, hatreds, drunkenness, and adulteries accuse the idleness of princes, although by their own sins they draw punishment upon themselves, and desire peace for no other reason than that they may indulge their vices and pleasures securely.

But lest I pursue more, the following may be read: St. Cyril, On the Right Faith in Our Lord Jesus Christ, to Theodosius; Hilary on Psalm 137; Gregory to Theodoric the Frank; St. Leo to Theodosius and the Augusta Pulcheria; Athanasius to Constantine and Jovinian; John to Justinian; the Council of Meaux to Charles the Younger, king of the Franks; Symmachus to Anastasius; the Council of Paris to Louis and Lothair; St. Bernard to Louis; Hormisdas to Justin; Nicholas to Michael; and the bishops of the Spains at the coronation of the king.

CHAPTER VII

That Pious Princes Agree with the Holy Fathers

§ 1. We deservedly ought to believe so great an authority, since they had no occasion or cause for deceiving. I omit those kings who are in Scripture, because those who do not acknowledge divine oracles yield more readily to human testimonies. Nevertheless, all prudent princes have considered that decree to have been declared to themselves which the divine oracle announced to David: “If your sons will keep my ways and walk before me in truth, with all their heart and all their soul, a man from the throne of Israel will not be taken away from you.”

Philip the Arab, since he was not ignorant that he had obtained the empire by parricide, having been instructed better concerning religion, stood as a suppliant among the penitents before the Church at the command of Fabian the pontiff. By his deed he showed that no governments acquired by crime are lasting, for he too was soon killed.

Among princes scarcely any obtained greater glory than Constantine, for he both ruled most widely and cultivated religion before the rest: he closed the temples of demons, built temples for the true God, and fostered the commonwealth. Yet he attributed all things received to piety and subjected all matters in the judgment of religion to the Council of Nicaea. Jovian, a man of the greatest spirit and loftier than the august empire itself--first a confessor and afterward the successor of him whom he had endured as a tyrant--denied that, being a Christian, he wished to command an army which worshiped false gods, because he judged that amid such great crimes no happiness of the commonwealth could exist.

Theodosius and Valentinian wrote to the Synod of Ephesus that through those things which pertain to preserving piety and religion they could attain all other things also. Accordingly, Theodosius himself, accustomed to sing Psalms and say prayers with his wife Eudoxia and his sister Pulcheria, held the kingdom for a long time and happily.

The same is the judgment of Justin to Hormisdas, of Honorius to Arcadius, of Justinian II, of Charlemagne to the bishops of Spain, and of the others whose commendation is in history and whose memory is among posterity.

But in this matter no reasoning can be produced more illustrious, more effective, and more approved through many centuries than the law of the Roman Empire--that is, the public law of the world--which has now been accepted by so many nations and confirmed by so many kings that to wish to tear away its primary part is to disturb human affairs and overthrow the commonwealth.

CHAPTER VIII

It Is Taught by Testimonies of the Civil Law That Religion Must Be Cultivated Seriously in the Commonwealth

§ 1. The emperors Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius: "We desire all the peoples whom the government of our clemency rules to conduct themselves in that religion which the religion introduced by the divine Apostle Peter and continued from him until now declares that he delivered to the Romans, and which it is evident that Damasus the pontiff and Peter, bishop of Alexandria, a man of apostolic holiness, follow: that is, that according to apostolic discipline and evangelical doctrine we believe in one Godhead of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, under equal majesty and under a pious Trinity."

§ 2. Nor do the same men merely think thus, but they willingly and of their own accord abrogate their own laws if any have crept in against religion. To Eutropius, praetorian prefect: "Let there be no place for the ministries of heretics; let no occasion lie open for exercising the madness of a more obstinate mind. Let all know that even if anything has been obtained by this kind of people through some special rescript elicited by fraud, it is not valid. Let the crowds of all heretics be restrained from unlawful congregations, but let the name of the one highest God be celebrated everywhere. Let the observance of the Nicene faith, long ago delivered by our ancestors and confirmed by the testimony and assertion of divine religion, possess enduring permanence."

Marcian, in the best faith, to Palladius, praetorian prefect: "Let no cleric, soldier, or person of any other condition hereafter attempt to treat publicly of the Christian faith before crowds gathered and listening, seeking from this an occasion for tumult and perfidy. For he also does injury to the judgment of the most reverend synod if anyone should strive to reconsider and dispute publicly what has once been rooted and rightly settled, since the things now established concerning the Christian faith by our commands by the priests who assembled at Chalcedon are recognized as defined according to the apostolic expositions, like the institutions of the 318 holy Fathers at Nicaea and of the 150 in this royal city."

Justinian indeed says: "Applying every providence concerning the most holy churches, to the honor and glory of the holy and incorrupt consubstantial Trinity, through which we have believed that both we and the commonwealth will be kept safe, and adhering also to the doctrine of the holy Apostles concerning the creation of irreproachable priests--who are ordained chiefly for this purpose, that by their prayers they may obtain the kindness of the most humane God for common affairs--we enact by the present law."

And to Epiphanius: "Always applying every providence concerning the most holy churches,

"through which we have believed that both our empire is sustained and common affairs are fortified by the grace of the most merciful God; and striving for both our own souls and those of all others to be saved; and for that reason being continually solicitous lest the resources of the most holy churches, in whatever city they have been established, be diminished by any means; lest the divine liturgies performed in them be hindered by the absence of the priests most beloved of God or be tended unsuitably; and lest the property of the most holy churches be consumed by the expenses both of journeys and of priests traveling here and the clerics accompanying them."

And to John, praetorian prefect: "With God furnishing us aid, we desire to establish by laws and fulfill by works all things which, for the honor of the holy Catholic Church, we hasten to accomplish according to God's pleasure. And indeed we have already established with his aid many things which accord with ecclesiastical doctrine and condition."

Justinian, the distinguished lawgiver, excellently expounded this in Novel Constitution 137: “If we strive for the civil laws, whose authority God in his kindness toward human beings entrusted to us, to be kept firmly by all unto obedience and security, how much more zeal ought we to employ concerning the keeping of the sacred canons and divine laws, which were defined concerning the salvation of our souls? For those who keep the sacred canons are worthy of the aid of the Lord God; but those who transgress them render themselves liable to judgment. Therefore the most holy bishops, to whom it has been entrusted and committed both to examine and preserve the canons, are subject to greater condemnation if they leave uncondemned and unpunished anything that has been neglected from them.

“Assuredly, since the canons have hitherto not been observed rightly, we have consequently suffered various complaints against clerics, monks, and certain bishops, on the ground that they did not live according to the divine canons, and that some among them were found who neither retained nor knew even the prayer of the holy oblation or of holy baptism. Understanding, therefore, and fixing in our mind the judgment of God, we have commanded both the investigation and correction of the individual things reported to us to proceed canonically. For if the general laws do not permit the things sinned by laypersons to remain without investigation and punishment, how shall we suffer the things canonically established by the holy Apostles and Fathers concerning the salvation of all human beings to be despised?

“Assuredly, we have discovered that many fell into sins especially because synods of the most holy priests were not held according to the things defined by the holy Apostles and Fathers. For if this had been observed, each person, fearing a grave accusation in the synod, would assuredly have striven both to learn the sacred liturgies thoroughly and to live temperately, lest he be subject to the condemnation of the divine canons. This also afforded certain persons an occasion of sinning: that bishops, presbyters, deacons, and other clerics are ordained without examination and testimony of right faith and an honorable life. For if those destined to pray for the people are found unworthy of the divine ministry, how will they be able to make God propitious for the transgressions and offenses of the people?

“That the ordinations of priests ought to be conducted with all diligence and rigor is taught to us also by Gregory the Theologian, who is numbered among the saints and followed the holy Apostles and divine canons. For thus he says in his great Apologeticum: ‘But who, directing himself according to Paul’s canons and definitions which he established concerning bishops and presbyters--that they should be dry, or sober, modest, not given to wine, not strikers, fit to teach, irreproachable in all things, and not associating with the wicked--will not discover that he wanders greatly from that rectitude of the canons?’ And the same man again speaks in these words: ‘One ought first to be greatly cleansed, and then to cleanse; to become wise, and then to teach wisdom; to become light, and afterward to illuminate; to approach God, and then to lead others to him; to be sanctified, and then to sanctify; to lead by the hand with hands, to counsel with counsel.’

“And again the same Gregory, numbered among the saints, writes this concerning the same persons in the same oration: ‘Who, like a potter turning his earthenware in a single day, would thus suddenly fashion a guardian of true worship, standing with the angels, singing praises with the archangels, and sacrificing together with Christ?’ By these words the Theologian indicates what sort of persons ought to be promoted to the priesthood. But concerning those who are ordained unworthily, the same man says these things in the same oration: ‘Although they have brought nothing to the sacred altar of God and to the priesthood, nor first sweated and labored in virtue and what is beautiful, they are shown simultaneously as disciples and teachers of piety; and before they have been purified, they purify; yesterday sacrilegious, today priests; yesterday outside the sacred rites, today prelates of the mysteries; veterans in wickedness, novices in piety; persons who are the work and fabrication of human favor, not of the Holy Spirit.’

“Moreover, Basil, numbered among the saints, also teaches that the divine canons prohibit those who have married a second wife from being clerics, saying thus: ‘The canon has excluded twice-married men from the ministry, and those begotten from them.’ Thus far St. Basil. But the Fathers possessed so great a care for priests that those who assembled at Nicaea issued a canon having the following content: ‘The great synod has wholly forbidden a bishop, presbyter, deacon, or anyone at all who is in the clergy to possess a woman brought in under pretext, unless perhaps a mother, sister, aunt, or only those persons who escape suspicions.'"

§ 3. The constitution of Tiberius Constantine displays no less piety in words: "Since works that befit God and have, together with him, the same origin as the human race are to be beneficent toward suppliants, to extirpate evil deeds, and both to consider and to perform whatever things are useful to subjects; and since we have judged those very things to be the principal distinguishing mark of imperial majesty, from the time when God gave us the command and rudders of the commonwealth, on no day or night, so to speak, have we held anything more ancient or dear than zeal for those things."

§ 4. What King Reccared admonishes in the Third Synod of Toledo ought also to obtain the force of law: "Although the omnipotent Lord God granted us to ascend the summit of the kingdom for the advantages of the peoples and committed the government of not a few nations to our royal care, we nevertheless remember that we are constrained by the condition of mortals and cannot merit the happiness of future blessedness otherwise than by devoting ourselves to the worship of the true faith and pleasing our creator at least by the confession of which he is worthy. For this reason, by as much as we are raised above our subjects by royal glory, by so much ought we to be provident in the things that pertain to God, either to increase our hope or to take counsel for the nations entrusted to us by God."

Justinian, Code, title 4: "We believe most certainly that the purity and honor of priests, their fervor toward the Lord God and our Savior Jesus Christ, and the perpetual prayers sent forth by them furnish much favor and increase to our commonwealth; through these it is given to us both to subjugate barbarians and reduce under our dominion those whom we did not possess before. And by as much as honor and dignity are added to their affairs, by so much the more do we believe our commonwealth also to be increased. For if they display an honorable and wholly irreproachable life, and instruct the rest of the people so that they, looking toward their honor, abstain from many sins, it is plain that from this the souls of all will also become better, and suitable clemency will readily be bestowed upon us by the most high God and our Savior Jesus Christ."

For this reason good emperors possessed so great a care for protecting true religion, abolishing the heresy of the Jews and the superstitions of the gentiles, that they endeavored, insofar as lay within them, to restrain the negligence and ambition of bishops.

§ 5. Emperors strike heretics with many laws to show that the commonwealth cannot be preserved amid so great a variety of religions and license of the impious.

Constantine, Constans, and Constantius: "The privileges bestowed in consideration of religion ought to benefit only the observers of the Catholic law. We desire heretics not only to be excluded from these privileges, but also to be constrained and subjected to various public duties."

Gratian, Valentinian, and Valens, Augustuses: "Let all heresies forbidden by divine laws and imperial constitutions remain perpetually at rest. Let no one hereafter attempt either to teach or learn any profane precepts which he has discovered. Nor let their prelates dare to instill a faith which they do not possess, or create ministers who are not such. Nor, through the connivance of judges and of all to whom care concerning this matter has been committed through paternal constitutions, let audacity of this kind be neglected and increase. Moreover, under the designation of heretics are contained, and ought to succumb to the sanctions enacted against them, those who are found to have deviated even by a slight argument from the judgment of the Catholic religion and from the straight path."

And afterward: "Arians, Macedonians, Pneumatomachi, Apollinarians, Novatians or Sebatians, Eunomians, Tetradites or Tessarescaedecadites, Valentinians, Paulians, Papianists, Montanists or Priscillianists, Phrygians or Pepuzites, Marcionists, Barborites, Messalians, Euchites or Enthusiasts, Donatists, Audians, Hydroparastatae, Tascodrogites, Batrachites, Hermogenians, Photinians, Paulinians, Marcellians, Ophites, Encratites, Carpocratians, Saccophori, and the Manichaeans, who have arrived at wickedness reaching even to the lowest depth of crimes, are nowhere to possess the ability to assemble or remain in a Roman place." There are also laws concerning the Manichaeans' expulsion from cities and their delivery to capital punishment, "since no place is to be left here in which injury is done even to the elements themselves."

Thus, in title 7, the same Augustuses Theodosius and Valentinian condemn decurions who are Nestorians. Marcian likewise condemns the Eutychians in the law Quicumque.

§ 6. But so that it may also appear how much that matter was at heart for later emperors, it is worthwhile to hear the constitution of Emperor Frederick: "Moreover, we condemn believers in, receivers, defenders, and supporters of heretics, firmly establishing that if, after any such person has been marked by excommunication, he has disdained to make satisfaction within a year, from that time he shall by the law itself be infamous; he shall neither be admitted to public offices or councils, nor to choosing others, nor be admitted to testimony. He shall also be incapable of making a testament, so that he has neither a free power of making a will nor access to hereditary succession. Moreover, no one shall answer to him concerning any matter, but he himself shall be compelled to answer others. But if perhaps he has been a judge, his judgment shall obtain no validity, nor shall any causes be brought to his hearing. If he has been an advocate, his patronage shall in no wise be admitted. If a notary, instruments prepared by him shall be judged utterly without effect."

§ 7. The imperial code, title 7, demonstrates how great a severity they employed against apostates. Thus the emperors Theodosius and Valentinian, in the law Apostatarum: "Let the sacrilegious name of individual apostates be assailed by the continual voice of accusation, and let investigation of a crime of this kind be restrained by no limitations of time. Although previous prohibitions suffice for them, nevertheless we also repeat this: that after they have departed from the faith they shall possess no ability to make a testament or donate anything, nor shall they be permitted to defraud the law under the appearance of a sale; but the whole shall descend by intestacy preferably to relatives who follow Christianity.

"Moreover, we desire an action against sacrileges of this kind to be perpetuated to such a degree that we do not deny to all coming by intestacy, even after the offender's death, an unrestricted voice of suitable accusation. Nor shall we permit this to stand as an obstacle: if nothing concerning the profane person was brought into contestation while he lived. But lest the interpretation of this crime wander more widely in uncertain error, we pursue by the present oracles those who, clothed with the name of Christianity, have performed sacrilegious sacrifices or commanded them to be performed. Their perfidy, proved even after death, is to be punished in this manner: with donations and testaments rescinded, those to whom legitimate succession would convey it shall possess the inheritance of persons of this kind."

§ 8. They also oppose the wickedness of the Jews, title 9: "Jews will be condemned both to confiscation of goods and perpetual exile if it is established that they circumcised, or caused to be circumcised, a person of our faith."

And in the Code, title 10, law Iudaeus: "A Jew shall neither be permitted to purchase a Christian slave nor obtain one as a gift or by any other title. But if any Jew has possessed a slave who is either a Christian or one whom he believed could be possessed from any cause although of another sect or nation, and has circumcised him, he shall not only be fined by the loss of the slave but also punished by a capital sentence, with liberty being given to the slave himself as a reward."

§ 9. They also attacked and crushed with laws and immense penalties the impiety of the pagans, which was powerful in practice and strength.

Thus Emperor Constantius: "It has been resolved that temples in all places and all cities shall immediately be closed, and, access being forbidden, the license of sinning shall be denied to all the abandoned. We also desire all to abstain from sacrifices. But if they should perhaps perpetrate anything of this kind, let them be laid low by the avenging sword. We also decree that the property of the slain be claimed for the fisc, and that governors of provinces be punished similarly if they neglect to avenge the crimes."

And the emperors Valentinian and Marcian: "Let no one, with the intention of venerating and adoring, reopen shrines which were long ago closed. Far be it from our age that the former honor be restored to unspeakable and execrable images, the impious doorposts of temples be wreathed with garlands, profane fires be kindled upon altars, incense be burned upon them, victims be slain, wine be poured from bowls, and sacrilege be regarded as religion. But whoever attempts, contrary to this sanction of our serenity and contrary to the prohibitions of the most holy ancient constitutions, to perform sacrifices shall lawfully be accused before a public judge as guilty of so great a crime and, when convicted, shall undergo confiscation of all his goods and capital punishment. Those conscious of the crime and the ministers of sacrifices shall sustain the same penalty which was inflicted upon him, so that, terrified by this severity of our law, through fear of punishment they may cease to celebrate forbidden sacrifices. But if a most illustrious man who is governor of a province, after lawful accusation and after the crime has been proved at the inquiry, should dissemble in avenging so great a crime, the judge himself shall be compelled immediately to pay fifty pounds of gold to our fisc, and his office fifty also.

"Let no one dare to attempt the things that have rather often been forbidden to persons of pagan superstition, knowing that he commits a public crime who has dared perpetrate these things. Moreover, we desire deeds of this kind to be cut away to such a degree that, even if something such should be perpetrated on another's estate or in another's house, with the owners of course knowing, the estate or house shall be adjudged to the most sacred rights of the treasury. But the owners, for the sole reason that they knowingly consented that their own places be contaminated by such crimes, if indeed they are adorned with some dignity or military rank,

"shall be punished by loss of military rank or dignity, and also by confiscation of their property; but those established in private or plebeian condition, after corporal tortures, shall be assigned either to labor in the mines or to perpetual exile.

"If anything has been given or bequeathed to places or persons, or for the construction of pagan error, the city in which the persons dwell or under which the places are subject shall receive it; but it shall be expended in the likeness of imperial revenues. Governors shall punish the impieties of pagans and report to the emperor those things which exceed their own power.

"Those who after holy baptism remain in the error of the pagans are punished by capital punishment. But those who have not yet been baptized shall bring themselves, together with their children, spouses, and all their people, to the holy churches, so that they may cause their little children to be baptized without delay, while the older are first taught the Scriptures according to the canons. But if, in order to possess military rank, dignity, or property, they pretend to be baptized and leave their children or spouses, or their domestics, in error, and those who belong to them and are joined by kinship, they shall be deprived of their property and suitably punished, and shall not engage in public affairs. But if they have not been baptized, they shall have no share in any part of public administration, nor shall they be owners of movable or immovable property; rather, the fisc shall claim these things, and they shall be suitably punished and go into exile. But if they appear to sacrifice or worship idols, they shall be punished like Manichaeans. Moreover, a pagan shall not teach any kind of doctrine, nor shall they enjoy the public grain allowance, not even according to the sacred register."

All these things are directed to this: that since all make a display of piety, the true may be introduced and the false abolished.

CHAPTER IX

By the Judgment of Impious Human Beings, All Private and Public Happiness Comes from Virtue

§ 1. So great is my confidence in the cause that I deliver the decision to an adversary: let him speak testimony for us against himself. A cause to which aid is furnished from the opposing camp cannot appear bad. Profane authors relate that their princes were reduced to madness because piety was violated. Look upon Tiberius in Tacitus, book 6 of the Annals: "What am I to write to you, Conscript Fathers, or how am I to write, or what at this time am I altogether not to write? May the gods and goddesses destroy me worse than I feel myself perishing daily, if I know." To such a degree his own crimes and disgraceful deeds had turned against him as punishment. Nor without reason was the most distinguished teacher of wisdom accustomed to affirm that, if the minds of tyrants were laid open, lacerations and blows could be seen, since minds are torn by cruelty, lust, and evil counsels just as bodies are by lashes.

For among all the evils of sinners this is the greatest: that every crime is a punishment to itself.

Plato in the tenth book of The Republic: "I ask," he says, "that you explain what reward justice receives from gods and human beings, so that it may also carry off the palm from opinion and manifest estimation, by which it too adorns its cultivators, after it has been openly seen that by its very appearance it confers benefits upon us and does not deceive those who truly possess it."

"You ask what is owed. First, indeed, you will grant me this: that what sort each of the two is--the just and the unjust--does not escape the gods." "We grant it." "If it does not escape the gods, the former will be loved by God, the latter held in hatred, as we confessed at the beginning." "It is so." "The best things are altogether bestowed by the gods upon the friend of the gods, insofar as this can be done, unless some evil threatens from an earlier offense and a certain necessity." "Altogether." "Thus one must judge concerning the just man: whether he is subject to poverty, diseases, or any other things that seem evil, these things ultimately conduce to some good for him, either living or dead. For he is never neglected by the gods who will emerge as just and endeavor, through the duties of virtue, to become like God insofar as is permitted to a human being; for it is fitting that such a man not be despised by one like him. But concerning the unjust man, one must judge altogether to the contrary."

And in book 4 of The Laws he impresses these things with many more words, so that it is remarkable that so great a knowledge of virtue and piety flourished in a gentile philosopher.

§ 2. Aristotle teaches wholly the same things: for him only the wise person is happy, and he proclaims that commonwealth happiest in which virtue is cultivated most greatly. This is so true that without reverence for God good laws are of no profit, nor is any discipline preserved, and therefore the ruin of governments necessarily follows.

Valerius, book 1: "Governments do not hesitate to serve sacred rites, for God is the keen avenger of his divinity. Although punishments for evil deeds are sometimes late, they are nevertheless never ineffectual."

§ 3. Certain persons became so religious from this that they ended in superstition. Hence the image of Hercules is carried before the army into battle against Porus, Curtius, book 8. Hence the Germans carry into battle images and standards taken down from groves. Hence the innumerable imitations of piety recounted in sacred and profane histories.

Bias makes laws with the Prieneans: "Let the prince of the Prieneans be religious and the highest defender of sacred buildings; otherwise, if he does not revere God, there is no reason for human beings to hope that justice will be commanded to them by him."

And Xenophon, On Revenues: Σὺν θεῷ τῷ προϊσταμένῳ, εἰκὸς καὶ τὰς πράξεις προϊέναι ἐπὶ τὸ λῷον ἀεὶ τῇ πόλει. "If affairs begin with God, it is reasonable that the undertakings will turn out for the advantage of the city."

§ 4. How great a care the nations possessed concerning religion Plutarch shows in his book Against Colotes: "In the constitution of laws, the first and greatest thing is opinion concerning the gods. Therefore Lycurgus consecrated the Lacedaemonians to the gods, Numa the Romans, Ion the ancient Athenians, and Deucalion almost all the Greeks, rendering them devoted and bound to the gods by vows, oaths, divinations, and all things through hope and fear. And if you traverse the lands, you may find cities lacking walls, letters, kings, resources, or coin, and knowing nothing of gymnasia and theaters; but no one has ever seen a city lacking temples and gods, which does not employ prayers, an oath, or an oracle, does not sacrifice for the sake of goods, and does not strive to avert evils by sacred rites. But I think that a city could more readily be founded without ground than that, with opinion concerning the gods utterly removed, a civil community could assemble or remain standing."

Papinian therefore also says rightly: "That is the highest reasoning which acts on behalf of religion."

Isocrates to King Nicocles: "Preserve," he says, "the religion you received from your ancestors, and consider this the solemn and most beautiful sacrifice and the greatest worship: if you yourself are the best and most just. For there is greater hope that persons of this kind will obtain something good from the gods than those who build altars and shrines."

Varro, book 14, chapter 7: whenever the senate was convened at Rome, no matter was treated before religion.

It was also provided by the law of Octavius that supplication should first be made with incense and unmixed wine. And Plutarch, in the life of Marcellus, is assuredly witness that the Romans judged religion to possess more force than arms for preserving the commonwealth.

§ 5. From that source flowed hatred against Christians, as though they were enemies of piety. "Through sacrilege," says the superstitious man, "this year has withered; it was necessary that all things perish because they were denied to the religions."

Claudian, an enemy of the true religion, nevertheless sings that victory depends upon piety:

> O you too greatly beloved by God, for whom Aeolus pours
>
> Armed winters from his cave, for whom the sky fights,
> And the winds come in league at the trumpet calls.

Nor does Cicero speak badly, if he changes the persons: "With piety toward the gods removed, it is necessary that trust and the association of the human race, and justice, the one most excellent virtue, also be removed." Let piety therefore be preserved in the commonwealth. For just as pearls, although they are born in the sea, nevertheless possess more kinship with heaven, whose face they reproduce, so a pious and noble commonwealth depends more upon heaven, from which it draws its origin, than upon the earth on which it lives.

But human affairs would have been most badly provided for if the government and happiness of the commonwealth did not depend upon virtue and piety. Just as neither a household nor a commonwealth would appear to be ordered according to a certain reason and discipline if in it there were no rewards for right deeds and no punishments for sins, so there is assuredly no divine governance of the world over human beings if in it there is no distinction between good and evil persons. But leaving behind those who either did not acknowledge God or did not worship him, but vanished in their thoughts, let us fight atheists with other weapons.

CHAPTER X

From the Nature of Virtue We Are Taught That It Is Necessary to the Commonwealth

§ 1. If we consider the duties and functions of the virtues, and the infinite desires and deviations of the vices, we shall readily conclude that no commonwealth can stand without the cultivation of the virtues and the flight from and punishments of the vices. Let us establish a human being adorned with many gifts of fortune, distinguished by eloquence, strength, beauty, and resources, but foolish--some Nabal, as it were, and a golden wether. He will assuredly be able neither to administer the commonwealth, govern a household, nor be useful to friends; he is commended to his relatives, lest he turn all those things into the reproach of himself and his friends. Can a city therefore be governed, a war waged, or a kingdom maintained without prudence?

Next, let the commonwealth indeed be prudent, but a deserter of justice: will it be able to stand? It will endure for a time, like certain bands of brigands. If justice is absent, the stronger will despoil the inferior; he will suffer the same from one greater; weapons will remain to those despoiled. Now, amid rods, axes, red-hot plates, racks, pyres, and crosses, wickedness exults; all things are full of evils; the name of innocence has almost perished, because οὐδὲν οὕτω ῥᾴδιον ὡς τὸ γίνεσθαι κακόν, "nothing is so easy as becoming bad." Unhappy wickedness finds rivals; what if it should flourish and thrive?

Third, without fortitude and constancy there can be no city, indeed no justice; for if the judge is fearful, he will not pronounce sentence against the powerful. The soldier will flee before the trumpet and surrender himself to the enemy as bloodless booty. What shall I say of temperance? Let him be wise, just, and brave. If he is the slave of drunkenness or lusts, he will not be able to be happy. Luxury broke the strength of Samson; lust and its companion idolatry cast down the wisdom of Solomon. The calamitous ends of the Babylonians, Tyrians, and indeed of many regions of the world teach this: very many kingdoms were overthrown by lust; one adulterer committed Asia and Europe to war; and incestuous marriage-beds again, the Trojans and Latins. Therefore, if these vices are strengthened and become powerful, if they pass into morals and into a second nature, there will cease to be a place for remedy. But when the poison has so occupied the inward parts that the contagion rejects medicine, the evils are ended only by death and destruction, as in Sardanapalus, Nero, Gallienus, Heliogabalus, and the other pests of the human race, whom God willed by their horrific ends to be examples unto the detestation of crimes.

§ 2. Since those virtues are therefore altogether necessary to the commonwealth, and nevertheless cannot be stable without true piety and fear of God--for religion is the foundation of every virtue--it is necessary that he who governs the helm of the commonwealth keep continually before his eyes the supreme Lord of all things, to whom an account must be rendered even of right deeds. Otherwise, when occasions offer themselves, even good princes will readily slip toward worse things.

Nor will subjects be able to be contained in duty without fear of eternal punishment or hope of reward. For fear of the laws and the penalties customarily inflicted upon the guilty possess little effectiveness for terrifying and obstructing crimes. Many despise death, or do not so fear it that they bring themselves to restrain their desires by that thought. They also hope that they can deceive and escape punishments until they are in the very chains. Therefore, he who has cast away piety will not only dare whatever crimes he has conceived whenever there is hope of lying hidden, but will carry the criminal desires of a criminal mind into prisons, chains, the rack, and pyres. He will not be corrected by lashes but made more savage; he will condemn not the crimes but their unhappy outcomes, and will prepare himself for the future so that he may offend more cautiously and secretly.

CHAPTER XI

Friendship and Concord Cannot Exist without Virtue

§ 1. The friendship of citizens, like the harmonious adjustment of members in a body, is necessary for the safety of the commonwealth; for there is no gathering, no assembly, without friendship. Friendship, I say, that is gratuitous, not venal, not a cunning observer of its own advantage. But true friendship does not exist without virtue and cannot exist without it; therefore neither can the commonwealth.

Friendship ought first to be entrusted through practice, weighed by proofs, and free from suspicions. Its most tenacious bond is similarity of morals; it is fostered by conversation and services. But if each person does all things for his own sake, if each one's end is his own advantage, the most beautiful thing of all after the virtues falls--namely, friendship. Cicero rightly teaches that the Epicureans, who said that they did all things for the sake of their own pleasure, removed friendship altogether. Plato therefore taught excellently that to lack friends and faithful men is a greater sign of vice than any other can be, and that to abound in friends is an indication of virtue, Epistle 7.

But the rich, and those who are in principate and power, have the greatest need of friendships, as Aristotle admonishes in Ethics 8, chapter 4. So great is the necessity of friendship that even the wise person seems to need it; certainly everyone desires to possess very many friends. But true friendship is that toward which no advantage or natural propensity carries a human being, but an honorable reason for deserving well of another. The sweetness of friendship is innate in us, and nature has implanted a certain stimulus toward loving and joy concerning friendship.

None of these things can exist in a commonwealth of atheists. If a tyrant plunders and rages; if wisdom, the examiner of true affection, is absent; if justice is neglected; if each person measures all things by his own pleasure, no one will love another. A new poison will permeate households and the families of the powerful, and will stir the natural affections of parents and children mutually against one another. The judgment of Epicurus and of political atheists is that friendship is not the reward of virtue and that each person does all things for his own sake. The words of Epicurus in Laertius are: ἕνεκα γίγνεσθαι τὴν φιλίαν διὰ τὰς χρείας, "friendship comes about because of needs." So much so that Plutarch, in his book On Affection for Offspring, testifies that this disgraceful doctrine of Epicurus was refuted by a shout from the theater:

Μισθῷ γὰρ ἀνθρώπου τίς ἄνθρωπον φιλεῖ;

> For who loves a human being for a human being's payment?

He says that this was an object of admiration in the theaters; but according to Epicurus a father and mother love a son in this way, and the children themselves love their parents in this way.

Seneca speaks with much greater wisdom, Epistle 9: "The wise person, even if content with himself, nevertheless wishes to have a friend--if for no other reason, so that he may exercise friendship, lest so great a virtue lie idle. Not for the reason which Epicurus stated in this very epistle: that he may have someone to sit beside him when sick, or assist him when cast into chains and in need; but that he may have someone beside whom he himself may sit when that man is sick, someone whom he himself may free when surrounded by an enemy guard. He who looks to himself and for this reason comes to friendship thinks badly; as he began, so will he end.

"He has prepared a friend who will bring aid against chains; as soon as the chain rattles, he will depart. These are the friendships which the people call temporary. He who was adopted for the sake of utility will please as long as he is useful. For this reason a crowd of friends sits around the flourishing; around the fallen there is an immense solitude, and friends flee from the place where they are tested. For this reason there are so many impious examples, some abandoning through fear, others betraying through fear. It is necessary that beginnings and ends agree with one another. He who began to be a friend because it is expedient will be pleased by some price against friendship, if any price in it pleases him beyond friendship itself. For what do I prepare a friend? That I may have one for whom I can die, that I may have one whom I may follow into exile, to whose death I may oppose and devote myself. That which you describe is commerce, not friendship: it approaches for advantage and considers what it will obtain."

Friendship is therefore necessary, but that friendship which, as the philosophers establish as certain, can exist only among the good. The Stoics say: φιλίαν ἐν μόνοις τοῖς σπουδαίοις εἶναι διὰ τὴν ὁμοιότητα. "It exists among the good alone, and this because of similarity." But since among the wicked there is no love of a friend, nor anything in which one approves the other, it is necessary that through the vices of the wicked the commonwealth utterly perish, because all plead their own private cause and no one the public cause.

CHAPTER XII

Examples Teach That Things Turned Out Unhappily for the Impious and Prosperously for the Good

§ 1. It is scarcely worthwhile to collect examples; Thomas Bozius has done this at length and laboriously in eight books On the Ruins of Nations. To this I appeal to all and admonish that, if words do not satisfy anyone, he should tremble at the examples of the whole world. We are moved more by a few examples than by very many words; but now there are more examples than any volume could contain words. Let each person, contemplating in those examples an image of his own danger, abstain from vices.

§ 2. I shall omit those familiar things: the Flood and the vices of the primeval world settling into the waves; the fires of the Pentapolis; the Canaanites destroyed; fifty nations that afflicted the chosen people cut off; the corpses or slender remains of nearly all ancient cities; and the changes of all kingdoms with the shaking of the whole world. Let us look upon one commonwealth--not its whole course, but a brief and nevertheless most calamitous time.

Julius Caesar, the most disgraceful of human beings, cut down 1,100,000 in various battles in Gaul; afterward he wages civil wars and is himself preserved for his enemy for a few years, until he is sacrificed by many wounds in the sight of the senate. Poisons from domestic plots avenged Augustus and Tiberius; the avenging sword, Gaius; a mushroom, Claudius; his own hand, Nero. No less were those who followed vessels of wrath and examples of heavenly vengeance. Vitellius, Otho, and Galba seem to have been raised to government so that history might not be silent about their bloody and horrific ends. The force of disease and despair brought Vespasian’s life to an end; Titus, dying by a brother’s poison, was buried nearly alive; a conspiracy of Domitian’s household, among whom was his wife, crushed him. Disease and sorrow extinguished Nerva; poison given in food, Trajan; impatience with torments, and starvation voluntarily undertaken, Hadrian--and avenged Christian blood. Apoplexy carried off Lucius Verus; voluntary hunger, Marcus Aurelius.

Commodus, the most criminal of all, was slaughtered with mockeries added. His successor Pertinax, after he had ruled for eighty-two days, was stripped of government and life by his own praetorians. Severus, often assailed by plots from his son Antoninus Caracalla and attacked by open parricide, died of sorrow. Caracalla himself, after he had killed his brother Geta in his mother’s bosom, was stabbed by his own centurion; for he was a parricide, incestuous, and especially an enemy of his father, mother, brother, and God. The emperors Macrinus and Diadumenian afterward fell by the hands of their own soldiers. The slain Heliogabalus’s body was dragged and cast into the Tiber. Not even a certain piety profited Alexander so as to prevent his being killed by Maximinus. But Maximinus was slaughtered together with his son, and their heads sent to Rome for the consolation of the afflicted city. Soldiers killed Balbinus and Pupienus--raised to government by the senate--after subjecting them to mockery and torturing them most dreadfully.

Philip, Gordian’s colleague and unmindful of his benefit, killed him most cruelly and indignantly. Philip, together with his son, although now a Christian with changed morals, was nevertheless struck down by Decius in vengeance for his offenses--the father at Verona, the son at Rome. Their successor and parricide Decius, after his son had been slaughtered by the commander Trebonianus, while fleeing the sword of his own soldier, was swallowed in a marsh together with his horse. Gallus and Volusianus, while marching against Aemilianus, were killed by their soldiers, and Aemilianus four months afterward by the same men. Valerian served a servitude in Persia. His son Gallienus, together with his brother and sons, was killed by his own commanders. Claudius, broken by plague, died; his brother Quintillus, made emperor by the soldiers, was killed by the same men on the seventeenth day. The same punishment befell Aurelian, and the fortune of Probus was no different; his parricidal soldiers set up this epitaph for him: “Here Probus has been placed, truly upright." God struck Carus with a thunderbolt from heaven. Carinus, conquered in battle in vengeance for adultery, was afterward stabbed by a member of his household. Numerian was killed by his father-in-law Aper, and Aper by Diocletian. Diocletian ended his life through sorrow, Maximian Herculius by a noose.

Behold, in the most noble and powerful monarchy, the most thoroughly furnished with laws, the emperors succeeding one another in uninterrupted order for three hundred years: all died by violent death, none extinguished on his own day, none by his own fate. I permit you to except one, Antoninus Pius, whom they report to have died from disease. Behold, the wrath of God is revealed against all impiety and injustice; resources or majesty protect no one. Why did God for so long avenge himself upon the wicked by so conspicuous an example? Assuredly, lest anyone be ignorant that punishments for crimes are made present, and lest a private person hope for impunity when he saw the heads of the world destined for the executioner in so long a series.

Look upon so many deaths of emperors; but first let us consider the monstrous, shameful crimes hostile to the nature of things; then the remarkable misfortunes of the many tyrants who warred with them, the senators who were killed, and the cities that were overturned, so that it may appear most clearly to us how the wrath of God is revealed against every impiety and injustice of human beings who hold the truth of God in injustice.

For emperors and heads of peoples fell amid the greatest shaking of the world, through the flanks of princes and the destructions of peoples.

CHAPTER XIII

That the Simulation of Virtue, and Especially of Religion, Is Harmful to the Commonwealth

§ 1. The pseudo-statesmen sometimes also praise virtue; but when it is seriously required in a prince, when the senatorial order and the tribes of the people are formed toward it, they set before us the shadow and dead image of virtue in place of virtue itself. They consider it sufficient to simulate justice and temperance; they fashion for us a city which is Helen outside, Hecuba within. They so instruct the prince that he formulates prayers in these words:

> Grant me to deceive; grant me to seem just and holy.
> Set night before my sins, and a cloud before my frauds.

But they fashion senators and tribunes not dissimilar to the prince:

Οἳ τ' εὖ μὲν λαλέουσι, κακῶς δ' ὄπιθεν φρονέουσι.

> Who indeed speak well, but afterward contrive evil.

Machiavelli assuredly denies that a prince can be good, chapter 15: "For the manner in which human beings live is so far removed from that in which it would be right that they live, that he who neglects what is done in order to follow what ought to be done summons ruin for himself in learning this, rather than willing that counsel be taken for his safety. For he who strives to profess himself a good man in every part must assuredly be endangered among so many who are not good. It is therefore necessary for a prince, if he wishes to be safe, to have perceived the manner by which he can be not good, and, according to the necessity of the matter, either turn this to his use or not turn it.

"Therefore, setting aside the things fashioned in the mind concerning a prince only, and discoursing concerning those things which are true, I say that all human beings--and especially princes, since they are placed in a higher position--are accustomed to be noted for some of the following qualities: one is called liberal, another restrictive and tenacious; one munificent, another a plunderer; some cruel, others merciful; some breakers of treaties, others religious; some effeminate and soft, others, on the contrary, manly and fierce; many humane, others swollen with pride; very many lustful, some endowed with chastity; integrity of life is perceived in not a few, most harmful fraud in many; very many are harsh in morals, some adorned with affability and mildness; some grave and severe, others, on the contrary, light and dissolute; many cultivate piety, while, on the contrary, there are those who oppose it exceedingly--and other things similar to these."

Since therefore he denies that a prince can be good, he nevertheless admonishes him to beware of the infamy of those vices by which his government might be taken from him, and not to labor greatly concerning the others, without which he cannot easily protect his dominion. And chapter 18: "He who was more sagacious, so that he expressed the nature of foxes better, found all things turning out more happily. But since there are two kinds of contending, one by the right of laws, the other through force; and since the former is proper to a human being and the latter to beasts, one must have recourse to the latter if it is not sufficient to employ the former. Accordingly, it is necessary that a prince hold the right use of both, beast and human being.

"This part was delivered to princes under a certain covering by the ancient writers, who assert that Achilles and many other princes of old were entrusted to Chiron the centaur to be educated and placed under his discipline. For in saying that they had a teacher of mixed kind, both human being and beast, they teach nothing other than that the use of both natures will be necessary for a prince. Since therefore it matters greatly that a prince skillfully put on the nature of a beast, he must assume the morals both of the fox and the lion. For the lion does not guard himself against snares, while the little fox fears wolves. Therefore, in order that snares be perceived, one must act the little fox; but in order that wolves be terrified, the leonine nature must be assumed. Those who simply insist upon the lion's tracks assuredly do not grasp the matter itself.

"A prince who is endowed with wisdom ought therefore to avoid those promises which he sees will be contrary to his own advantages. And indeed, if human beings were all upright, this precept would have been plainly useless; but since they are wicked, their wickedness and perfidy must be carefully eluded. Moreover, causes will never be lacking to human beings by which they may introduce a color over violated faith. Almost infinite recent examples could be brought forward on this matter and show how many treaties of peace, promises, and agreements have been rendered ineffective and vain by perfidy. But it matters greatly that one know how rightly to clothe this nature with color, both by simulating and dissimulating. For human beings are so simple and so compliant with present necessities that one who is deceitful and instructed in the art of simulation will immediately have someone who delivers himself to be deceived by him. Such persons must therefore be guarded against all the more, and their art frustrated by art."

And even if that teacher of vices had said none of the other things, these assuredly suffice abundantly to overthrow the commonwealth.

§ 2. Nothing is more shameful than a simulator, whom no one except a madman can believe even when he acts seriously. For the present I shall omit most things against hypocrisy and the deceptive art of simulating and dissimulating, but shall touch chiefly upon those which pertain to civil government.

The Holy Spirit frequently impresses that simulation, deceit, and hypocrisy greatly displease God. Job 8:13: "The hope of the hypocrite will perish. His folly will not please him, and his confidence will be like spiders' webs." And Job 36:13: "Simulators and the cunning provoke the wrath of God." And Psalm 5:8: "The Lord will abominate the bloodthirsty and deceitful man." The same things are repeated in Job 15:34 and 20:5; Psalm 54:24; Matthew 7:5; Luke 16:15. The magnitude of this crime is taken from four causes.

§ 3. First, it most gravely offends God, because it always joins and couples two crimes. For, as St. Augustine says on Psalm 36: "Simulated innocence is not innocence, and simulated equity is not equity, but a double iniquity, because it is both iniquity and simulation." A most beautiful reason has been given. Alfonso explained it when, returning victorious from Africa to the island of Aenaria, he heard that Antonio Piceno, a distinguished craftsman of simulation, had ended his life most wretchedly, eaten away by little worms because of his blasphemies and hypocrisy. He said that hypocrites were so hateful to God because they bewitched and deceived mortals, made God the mediator of this crime and perfidy, and undertook crimes under the pretext of so great a majesty. Therefore they are not only consigned to eternal punishments after death, but are generally punished and tortured in the sight of the human beings whom they deceived.

Accordingly, we see that when God brings out what was done in darkness and makes it manifest in the sight of this sun, the error is removed. For unless divine justice, the immutable exactor of sincerity, acted so severely against those wicked persons, human beings, from the habit of deceiving, would judge that they could deceive even God. Isaiah, chapter 29:15, testifies that counselors and statesmen who thought thus were not lacking to perishing Judaea: "Woe to you who are deep in heart, so that you hide counsel from the Lord, whose works are in darkness, and who say: 'Who sees us, and who knows us?' This thought of yours is perverse, as if clay should think against the potter and the work should say to its maker, 'You did not make me,' and the thing fashioned should say to its fashioner, 'You do not understand.' Will not Lebanon yet, in a little and a short time, be turned into Carmel, and Carmel be reckoned as a forest?"

§ 4. Second, the simulator himself both readily slips and is cast headlong by his own arts, so that he can never escape. For he cannot be admonished and corrected, since he himself, as though innocent and just, anticipates chastisements as the leader and author of others. They are tombs, but closed ones, and for as long as they can, they restrain their stench.

Such were the monks in Syria and Egypt whom they call Sarabaites; Jerome calls them Remoboth. They feigned holiness by habit, gesture, and solitude, while most wicked in their minds. They are obstinate in this very evil: that whatever good thing they are commanded to do, they simulate it.

§ 5. Third, human beings are accustomed to be offended by nothing more than the simulation of justice and piety, just as they are delighted by sincerity and faith. It is an oracle of St. Ambrose, book 2 of On Duties: "Direct simplicity of mind abounds for all things and sufficiently commends itself." Therefore nothing in the commonwealth is more harmful than suspicion of simulation, which renders all benefits ineffectual and every courtesy and every humanity hateful. Without a reputation for faith and piety the commonwealth cannot be governed; but if simulation is perceived, the most extreme hatreds and contempt follow. It is certain that nothing feigned and painted is the work of true virtue; indeed, it is not even accustomed to endure. At the beginning it blossoms; in its course it is scattered and dissolved like a little flower. But what is right and sincere is established upon a deep root. Not even simulators and the wicked themselves can endure hypocrites who are rivals in their art.

Assuredly, a certain poet contemplates flight lest he injure his eyes, so burdensome to him was the sight of simulation--Juvenal, Satire 2:

> I desire to flee from here beyond the Sauromatae and the icy
>
> Ocean, whenever they dare anything concerning morals,
>
> Who simulate Curii and live Bacchanals.
>
> First, they are unlearned--although you may find all things full
>
> Of plaster busts of Chrysippus. For the most perfect of these is
>
> One who buys an image of Aristotle or Pittacus
>
> And commands archetypal Cleantheses to guard his shelf.
>
> There is no trust in the face; for what street does not abound
> In gloomy obscenities?

But where will you flee? Perhaps you will carry a hypocrite with you even beyond the icy Ocean; perhaps some pus is concealed in your own heart, and a foul crime is covered by a polished forehead. Perhaps the countenance is a lamb's, while the inward parts are a dragon's. How hatefully Seneca lashes these things in the Hippolytus:

> Where is that countenance, and the feigned majesty of the man?
>
> And his bristling appearance, seeking ancient and bygone things?
>
> And the gloomy old age of morals, grave in aspect?
>
> O deceitful life, you bear hidden thoughts,
>
> And put a beautiful face upon troubled minds.
>
> Modesty conceals the shameless man, quiet the audacious,
>
> Piety the impious; the false approve true things,
> And the soft simulate hard things.

§ 6. I doubt whether any prince surpassed Tiberius in the art of simulation. Dio of Nicaea describes his nature: "Tiberius was a patrician and learned, but of a peculiar and uncommon nature and morals. For he so concealed all the affections of his mind that he scarcely ever said what he desired, and his will and desire fought against his speech. For he professed hatred for what he sought most greatly and dissembled what he hated. He was angry although disturbed by no circumstance; when angry, he was thought to possess the most tranquil and equable mind. He pitied those against whom he had acted severely, and was sometimes angry with those whom he pardoned. He so embraced the most hostile human beings as those most familiar and closely joined to him; but, on the contrary, he conducted himself no more truly with his closest friends than with the most alien human beings. Finally, he thought that the mind of a prince ought to be known to no one.

"If this had stood alone in Tiberius, his will could not have been obscure to those who tried and strove to know it, since they would have taken everything in the contrary sense. For when he had denied that he wished something, they would have judged that he desired it most greatly; and when he said that he desired it, they would then have judged that he did not wish it. But beyond the things said above, he bore it grievously when he suspected that anyone was conscious of and a participant in his counsels; and he commanded many to be killed for no other reason than that he said his will had been observed and perceived by them. Accordingly, almost the only man safe--and this occurred very rarely--was he who neither was ignorant of his character and morals nor revealed that he knew them. For in this manner those who obeyed him were not deceived and did not therefore come into his hatred by showing that they perceived the things he did.

"Endowed with these morals, Tiberius, as though he had immediately obtained the empire, sent letters from Rome not only to the army but also to all nations; yet in them he did not write that he had been made emperor, because he rejected that name decreed to him by the senate together with his other names, and admitted the inheritance of Augustus but not his surname."

§ 7. Such was the disposition of the prince, fashioned for dissimulating and simulating. But now let us look upon the things that followed from it. First, when he had refused the empire, there was more dignity than faith in such speech. Therefore someone objected that others were slow to perform what they promised, but Tiberius slow to promise what he would perform; for only when he spoke in the senate was he a delayer.

§ 8. Second, he had now accustomed his mind to simulation to such a degree that he could not bring forth sincere words. "And in Tiberius," says Tacitus in book 1 of the Annals, "even in matters which he did not conceal, whether by nature or habit, his words were always suspended and obscure. But then, when he strove utterly to hide his thoughts, they were entangled all the more in uncertainty and ambiguity." How great a loss joined with dishonor it is for deceit and falsehood to appear in every speech of a prince, and for the fox's skin always to flash forth!

§ 9. Third, nothing was accomplished by so great an art. For just as actors or hypocrites are regarded as better hypocrites by as much as they adapt voice and gesture to theatrical trifles with greater skill and assimilate feigned things more closely to true ones--for hypocrites are simulators, as though reciters of other persons, as Augustine says in the Sermon on the Mount and Basil in the homily On Fasting--so magistrates are judged more cunning and fraudulent by as much as they simulate benevolence, justice, and piety with greater art.

For no one believed Tiberius. Behold the miseries of the subjects under that ape. Tacitus, Annals 1: "But the Fathers, who possessed one fear--that they might appear to understand--poured forth into complaints, tears, and vows, stretching their hands toward the gods, toward the image of Augustus, and toward his own knees." Nor without cause. It was afterward understood that the doubt had been introduced in order also to inspect the wishes of the nobles, for he stored away words and countenances, twisting them into a charge. Great was the danger for minds so consternated, so doubtful. For if even one man of the spirit of Brutus or Cassius had then existed, by one word he could have freed all the Fathers from so great a fear. Assuredly that prince possessed no true friend: a painted friend of all human beings, a true enemy, he wasted away in the dreadful hatred of all.

§ 10. Fourth, not only the things which he simulated openly and concerning which they labored lest they appear to understand, but all his secrets were published. The quaestor Crispinus charged Marcellus, praetor of Bithynia, with treason and accused him of having held sinister conversations concerning Tiberius. The charge was unavoidable, since the accuser selected from the prince's morals each most shameful thing and cast it against the defendant. For because they were true, it was believed that they had also been said. Therefore all his secrets lay open, and what was covered by so great an art was already rumor.

Suetonius, chapter 66: "Moreover, various reproaches from every direction burned his anxious mind, since every one of those condemned cast every kind of insult upon him, either in his presence or by placards set in the orchestra. By these he was indeed affected in the most diverse ways, sometimes so that from shame he wished all to be unknown and concealed, and sometimes so that he despised the same things and voluntarily brought them forth and published them. Indeed, he was also torn apart by a letter from Artabanus, king of the Parthians, who cast parricides, killings, cowardice, and luxury against him and admonished him to make satisfaction as soon as possible, by voluntary death, to the greatest and most just hatred of the citizens. Finally, having become weary even of himself, at the beginning of a letter he all but professed the sum of his evils."

§ 11. Fifth, he was never secure by that simulation. Clemens, a slave of Agrippa, had prepared a force not to be despised in vengeance for his master, and many secretly assisted him. Lucius Scribonius Libo was attempting revolution; there was a mutiny of the soldiers in Germany and Illyricum. Finally, hateful to everyone at Rome, Tiberius shut himself upon an island. What disposition human beings had toward him was disclosed at his death. For the people rejoiced so greatly at his death that, when the first report arrived, some, running about, shouted that Tiberius should be dragged into the Tiber; some entreated Mother Earth and the gods of the dead not to give the dead man any dwelling except among the impious; others threatened his corpse with the hook and the Gemonian stairs.

He also passed his life in perpetual fear. For through fear of Sejanus, when the matter was uncertain, he prepared ships and contemplated flight to any of the legions, repeatedly observing from the highest rock; and, lest the messengers delay, he had commanded signals to be raised far off according as each thing had been done. But even after the conspiracy of Sejanus had been crushed, no more secure or steadfast, he did not depart during the following twelve months from the villa called that of Jupiter.

§ 12. Sixth, hence there was no care for the commonwealth in the senate, even if the most extreme things of the empire were dishonored, for inward dread had besieged it. Meanwhile simulation did not abandon Tiberius even when he was now dying; for even when failing, he ordered a banquet to be renewed, until Macro, prefect of the praetorian cohort, ordered the old man to be smothered by a heap of clothing. Thus it came about that he possessed no friend except a simulated one. By the just and true judgment of God he perished by his own arts: throughout his whole government he had labored to disclose the secrets of his heart to no one, and had killed many solely because they seemed to have perceived his will and counsels.

§ 13. Simulation is therefore useless to a government and always ruinous to a prince. Human minds are so constituted by nature that they immediately hate a person whom they hold suspect and perceive to be distrustful; they neither commit themselves to him nor remain faithful, for mutual trust binds trust.

Nor can simulation in a prince be concealed for long. With the passage of time many things must be done which had been covered, while their contraries had been simulated.

The observation and experience of one year therefore instruct most people sufficiently concerning the nature of a prince.

They see persons driven into exile or slaughtered whom a little before the prince appeared to carry in his bosom. They cannot doubt that those persons were raised on high so that a heavier fall might shatter them.

The following admonition is therefore for a good prince:

> You live--and rule--rightly if you take care to be what you hear yourself called.

For the simulator, however, this is the proper admonition: Ἐχθρὸς γάρ μοι κεῖνος ὁμῶς Ἀΐδαο πύλῃσιν, ὅς χ᾽ ἕτερον μὲν κεύθῃ ἐνὶ φρεσίν, ἄλλο δὲ εἴπῃ.

He is as hateful to me as the gates of the infernal regions,

Who hides one thing in his mind and speaks another.

§ 14. Therefore the evil of hypocrisy is supreme, because it secretly covers, fosters, and increases all crimes. Since so many true evils are concealed by a thin, uncertain, and mutable simulation of false good, it is necessary that the commonwealth perish by that art.

§ 15. Nevertheless, atheists remain in their opinion and maintain that opinion can accomplish the same thing as truth. Minos, king of the Cretans, pretended that he was descended from Jupiter. He was accustomed to descend into a deep cave of the most ancient superstition, as though to receive laws from Jupiter. Following his example, Numa wished it to be believed that he held nocturnal meetings with Egeria, was instructed by her, and delivered sacred rites received from the immortal gods.

Lycurgus, with a similar fabrication, declared Apollo the proposer of his laws. Zaleucus persuaded the Locrians that he had employed Minerva's counsel. Scipio Africanus did not go forth to business unless he had delayed in the cell of Jupiter. Sulla embraced a small image of Apollo before battle and asked it to hasten what it had promised. More foolishly than all, Sertorius deceived the Lusitanians--a nation fierce and barbarous at that time, now the most cultivated of all--by leading around a white doe, tame and familiar, as though prophetic.

Therefore a prince can sometimes employ simulated religion.

I indeed confess that the common people are held by superstition and are sometimes moved by it more strongly than by true religion. Just as those who suffer from pica are carried more ardently toward inhuman and filthy foods than healthy persons, whom natural appetite stimulates, so a people whose morals are already corrupt is led by the shadow and vanity of religion. But when superstition is treated, I shall show that this is not only impious but useless to a kingdom.

But because they employ examples, these too must be refuted. For I deny that the sacrileges of feigned religion ever turned out well either for these men or for others.

§ 16. Minos bound the minds of the Cretans by superstition, so that they received the laws as though from Jupiter's parchment. Thus indeed; but the Cretans neither preserved the laws and were infamous for two things, being counted among the three worst kappas--namely, because they were fraudulent and contentious. Hence the name "Cretism" denotes malicious cunning, and "syncretism," according to usage, a fraudulent pacification.

Minos himself paid penalties for simulation. For although he boasted that he enjoyed conversation with Jupiter, was admonished by him concerning all matters, and even possessed foreknowledge of the future, he did not know his domestic disgraces. That unhappy simulator went so far as to possess an adulterous wife--that is, a simulator, or, if tales are to be believed, a follower of the most impious lust--and no faithful person at home to disclose the arts of Daedalus. Nor, when Theseus guided his footsteps by the dowry-thread and led away his daughter, did Jupiter his father admonish him. Nor did he foretell the king's unhappy death when Minos went to Sicily to avenge the injuries received from Daedalus, although this pertained more greatly to the king's safety.

For whether he was killed by Sicilian women, as Herodotus says, or was suffocated by Cocalus with the heat of a bath, as Diodorus maintains, he gave a distinguished proof that God is the avenger of simulated religion and wills to be honored only by true and sincere religion. He was also regarded as a fool by his subjects: although foreknowing the future, he was ignorant of the lusts of his wife and daughter.

§ 17. Numa and Lycurgus imitated Minos. Numa, a magician, indeed established superstition at Rome. Augustine speaks prudently concerning him in book 3, chapter 9 of The City of God: "That man ought to have been congratulated for so great a leisure, if only he had known how to expend it upon salutary things and, with most destructive curiosity neglected, to seek the true God by true piety. But as it is, the gods did not confer that leisure upon him; rather, perhaps they would have deceived him less if they had not found him at leisure. For by as much as they found him less occupied, by so much the more did they occupy him. Varro discloses what he attempted and by what arts he was able to associate such gods with himself or that city. If it pleases the Lord, this will be discussed more diligently in its own place."

But for the present, since the question concerns their benefits, peace is a great benefit. Yet it is a benefit of the true God, generally bestowed even upon the ungrateful and wicked, like the sun, rain, and other supports of life. But if those gods conferred so great a good upon Rome or Pompilius, why did they never afterward furnish it to the Roman Empire during its more praiseworthy times? Were the sacred rites more useful while they were being instituted than when they were celebrated after institution? But at that time they did not yet exist and were being added so that they might exist; afterward they did exist and were preserved so that they might profit.

What, then, is the reason that those forty-three--or, as others maintain, thirty-nine--years were passed in so great a peace while Numa reigned, but afterward, with sacred rites instituted and those very gods who had been invited by the rites now acting as guardians and protectors, scarcely one year, after so many years from the founding of the city down to Augustus, is commemorated as a great marvel after the First Punic War, in which the Romans were able to close the gates of war?

Thus Numa, by simulating, made the city unhappy; afterward no one believed him, for all confess that he simulated conversations with the gods. But many gods were added afterward, and they were not content with Numa's divinities; and Rome, burdened by so many divine powers, lived amid perpetual disaster.

§ 18. Lycurgus and Zaleucus are also praised. But although I grant that certain things in each are worthy of praise, I condemn their vain pursuit of the glory of divination. Lycurgus gave laws to the Lacedaemonians, but laws which no city wished to employ and which soon became obsolete. He indeed bound all by oath that they would preserve the laws while he was away; but lest by his return he release them from the religious obligation of the oath, he chose voluntary exile. And lest he himself someday return to the fatherland through weariness of wandering, he took his own life. He was unhappy not only in his death but also in his laws, a great part of which Lacedaemon soon abrogated, whether by practice and morals or by contrary sanctions.

Lycurgus was therefore not wise, as is evident from his laws, which are in Xenophon's Constitution of the Lacedaemonians. Next, if he loved his fatherland, he should have returned himself and brought good laws into morals; for even while present he could compel them by oath. But if he did not wish to return, why did he kill himself? What had he himself deserved so badly from himself that, contrary to the law implanted by nature, he wished to be his own executioner? Did he trust himself so little? Was the desire to see his fatherland so great that it could be quieted only by death? Although others--and I believe this more readily--relate that, inflamed by grief and anger because he understood that his laws were being violated, he wished by death to withdraw himself from that insult.

§ 19. Zaleucus, the lawgiver of the Locrians, also paid penalties for hypocrisy. For when he had established that an adulterer's eyes should be dug out, and his son had deserved that punishment, he divided the punishment with him so that his son would not be altogether blind: one eye was dug out for his son, the other for himself. But not much later all the laws were neglected and adulteries went unpunished.

The matter is more obscure concerning the death of Zaleucus; nevertheless, many things throughout history teach of the disasters of the Locrians, showing that they were not made happy by the lawgiver's simulation. The case of Lycurgus is better attested from Plutarch, Herodotus, and Stobaeus. It will suffice me to append what Valerius Maximus has in book 5, chapter 3: "Lacedaemon produced no man greater or more useful than Lycurgus, since Apollo at Delphi is reported to have answered him when he sought an oracle that he did not know whether to number him among human beings or gods. Yet neither the highest sincerity of his life, nor his most constant love toward the fatherland, nor laws salutarily devised could assist him so that he did not experience hostile citizens.

“For he was often attacked with stones, at one time driven out by public fury, and even deprived of an eye; finally, he was expelled from his own fatherland. What should other cities do when even that one, which claims for itself the outstanding praise of constancy, moderation, and gravity, proved so ungrateful toward one who had deserved so well?” Behold a distinguished priest of feigned sanctity and simulation, and the punishment of violated religion made present for you. How, therefore, was Lycurgus happy amid these things through simulation?

§ 20. Concerning Scipio, it is agreed that he was not at all superstitious, that his simulation was mocked at Rome by his adversaries, and that he contended against Hannibal by virtue, not superstition. Nevertheless, he paid penalties: despised and with the people offended, he grew old upon his little farm, and died wasted away by sorrow. Sulla too was assuredly not at all happy: after abdicating the dictatorship, he was consumed by worms at Puteoli. The outcome mocked the divinations of Sertorius; for, killed by his own men amid a banquet, he taught the Lusitanians that he had not been a prophet. Why did that beast foretell the time and manner of all things to be done, but warn nothing concerning the death of Sertorius, which was followed by the servitude of the whole nation?

§ 21. Vain and hateful, therefore, is the simulation of virtues; indeed, it is generally destructive. The reason is that although the rude common people are led by vanities, nevertheless among the citizens there are many who both recognize and laugh at these things. Who does not know that Proculus swore falsely when he said that Romulus had been seen by him departing into heaven and being called Quirinus? It was said with perjury that Drusilla, Augustus, and Tiberius had gone to the gods; nevertheless, no one believed them for so good a report.

For these things are accustomed to be derided. But if the stupidity of certain persons is entangled by and trembles at such things, it is nevertheless readily instructed by the witty sayings of clever human beings, so that those who hunted a reputation for sanctity by deceptions are regarded as impostors. But if it happens that they err and slip in any matter, as human weakness does, a great part of their authority immediately falls.

Finally, let the prince, magistrates, and people hold this fixed: that the reputation which is tossed about by the opinions of fools is made of glass, and once broken can be repaired among neither the wise nor fools; but such is the glory that does not arise from truth. That saying of Cicero is an oracle: “True glory puts down roots and is also propagated; all feigned things quickly fall like little flowers, nor can anything simulated be lasting.”

When their fraud has been detected, aristocrats come into the greatest contempt. No one laughs at a grave matron if she lacks the grace of beauty; but if her painted purple and antimony run down, she becomes the tale of the common people, because she affected an allurement beyond what was fitting to her age. Thus the impiety of magnates is less detestable if it lacks a veil of piety. Applause was given to him who said that fraud in a prince is more shameful than violence. Deservedly indeed; I add also that the fraud of princes is violent. For if a higher power wishes to circumvent you by malicious deceit, you will permit yourself to be deceived with less danger than you will judge the fraud once understood. For when deceived you will bear only the loss; if you meet the fraud, you will be counted among the enemies, as though conscious of the prince’s sin.

CHAPTER XIV

Superstition Must Be Removed from the Commonwealth

§ 1. There are two rocks against which religion and piety, if they turn aside from their right course, are dashed and frequently shattered. One can be seen from afar, for it rises above the waves and openly threatens those sailing by with the sea's immense ridge; the other lies hidden beneath the waves and catches the unwary, and therefore is avoided only by the skilled and vigilant. Those rocks are impiety and superstition. Hence there are two kinds of those who administer the commonwealth: one plainly of atheists, the other of the superstitious.

Those who are altogether atheists rejoice to be called politicians, by an altogether false name; for nothing is more opposed to civil prudence than atheism and ignorance and contempt of God. Nevertheless, atheists, or pseudo-politicians, hold a twofold opinion concerning the governance of the commonwealth. For some openly remove from its midst not only all religion but also superstition. They follow the Epicureans and Diagoras, as Mezentius does:

> My right hand is my god, and the weapon that, as a missile, I hurl.

And older than Mezentius was Capaneus, who was heard speaking in the midst of the stars, in book 10 of the Thebaid:

> Do no divine powers stand for trembling Thebes?
>
> Where are those sluggish offspring of the infamous earth,
>
> Bacchus and Alcides? It is irksome to challenge lesser beings.
>
> You rather should come--for who is worthier
>
> To meet us? See, ashes hold Semele and her tomb.
>
> Come now, Jupiter, strain against me with all your flames.
>
> Are you stronger at frightening timid girls with thunder
> And destroying the towers of your father-in-law Cadmus?

Antiquity sings to us of such Giants and Aloadae; but those accursed prodigies among humankind have never been wanting. Dionysius plundered temples as a jest; Brennus likewise plundered Delphi, and others did the same. Nor were they wanting in Christian times. Frederick II said that there had been three distinguished impostors who had led the human race astray: Moses, Christ, and Muhammad. Many now tend toward the same position, for, since amid so great a variety of religions they cannot choose any, they are without all religion.

I have long been arguing against these men. For they are little concerned about the piety, justice, and innocence of their peoples; they hold it sufficient if they use them as subjects and if they obey their will. Indeed, they desire them to be devoted to crimes, enervated by lusts, and given exclusively to pleasures, lest they dare to move anything against their rule. Among them one sin alone is acknowledged and punished: the crime of injured human majesty. But they err, and by their error overthrow both themselves and the commonwealth. For it cannot happen that they govern gently a people depraved by pride, luxury, anger, and avarice. Such people therefore need a harsh and imperious ruler, just as untamed horses with defiant mouths must be restrained by a sharper bridle and hard curb-bits. Then from license arises greatness of expenditure; from this, poverty, whose offspring are injustice, theft, rebellion, and a desire to disturb or overthrow the commonwealth.

§ 2. The other kind of atheists consists of those who are themselves held by no superstition, yet judge that the common people must be oppressed by the terrors of the shades of divine powers. They add ceremonies to ceremonies and divinities to divinities--irreligious founders of various religions. Very many magistrates of states have done this, and Varro teaches that it was already long ago established as custom. He says that there are many true things which it is not only not useful for the common people to know, but also many things which, although false, it is expedient for the people to judge otherwise; and that for this reason the Greeks enclosed initiations and mysteries in secrecy.

"Here certainly," says Augustine in book 4, chapter 31, "he betrayed the whole counsel, as it were, of the wise men through whom states and peoples were to be governed." And in chapter 32: "He also says that, concerning the generations of the gods, peoples were inclined more toward the poets than toward the natural philosophers, and therefore that their ancestors--that is, the ancient Romans--believed both in the sex and the generations of the gods and established their marriages. This assuredly appears to have been done for no other reason than that it was the business of supposedly prudent and wise men to deceive the people in matters of religion and, in that very thing, not only to worship but even to imitate the demons, whose desire to deceive is very great. For just as demons cannot possess any except those whom they have beguiled by deceiving, so too human princes--not indeed just men, but men like demons--recommended to the peoples as true, under the name of religion, things which they knew to be vain, in this way binding them, as though more tightly, to civil society, so that they might possess them similarly as subjects."

"But what weak and unlearned person would escape at once deceitful princes of the state and demons?"

Cicero, in book 1 of On the Nature of the Gods, teaches that Augustine does them no injury: "Who was ever so blind in contemplating things that he did not see that these forms of human beings had been transferred to the gods either by some design of the wise, so that they might more readily turn the minds of the unskilled from the depravity of life toward the worship of the gods; or through superstition, so that there might be images which, when venerating them, they would believe themselves to approach the gods themselves? Moreover, poets, painters, and craftsmen increased these same things. But it was not easy to represent gods doing and contriving anything in the likeness of other forms."

§ 3. This whole kind of superstition must therefore be driven out; for it matters little whether superstition is introduced into the commonwealth by a superstitious man or by an atheist.

The harms of superstition are indeed great. First, because it is itself a pretender to, and corrupter of, true religion, and by error holds minds captive as though in chains. Plutarch marvels in his Camillus:

Ἀνθρωπίνην ἀσθένειαν ὁρῶ, οὐκ ἔχουσαν ἀλλ' ἐκφερομένην, ὅπου μὲν εἰς δεισιδαιμονίαν καὶ τύφον, ὅπου δὲ εἰς ὀλιγωρίαν τῶν θεῶν καὶ περιφρόνησιν.

He marvels at human weakness, having no limit but rushing beyond bounds, here into superstition and pride, there into neglect and contempt of the gods. Superstition, therefore, belongs to timid and petty minds and makes commonwealths liable to impostors. Indeed, by the appearance of piety it makes human beings not merely servile but even childish.

§ 4. Next, excessive anxiety about worshipping and fearing the gods makes minds anxious--indeed, it makes human beings foolish and ridiculous. Thus it particularly assails barbarians, little women, and those whose judgment in discerning matters is weak from youth or old age. I know that among the Romans, even when already cultivated, superstition was great; but its fabricators were generally objects of mockery. Numerius Atticus indeed swore that he had seen Augustus ascend into heaven, but no one believed him, not even Livia, although for so infamous a perjury she had paid the man a million sesterces.

§ 5. Third, worshippers of vain divine powers and those addicted to superstitions never remain in the middle, but pass into vain, absurd, horrible, and shameful things. For superstition is a dreadful thing, and there is no crime so foul to tell or deed so monstrous that it has not driven into it minds subject to false religion and opposed to truth.

Augustine, however, sets forth its miserable and ridiculous vanity in book 6, chapter 10 of The City of God: "Certainly the freedom which this man"--Seneca--"lacked to dare to censure openly this civil theology, which was most like the theatrical one, as Varro censured the latter, was not altogether lacking to Annaeus Seneca, whom we discover from certain indications to have flourished in the times of our apostles; it was lacking not entirely, but in some part. For it was present to him when he wrote, but absent when he lived. For in that book which he composed against superstitions, he censures this civil and urban theology much more copiously and vehemently than Varro does the theatrical and fabulous theology. For when he treated of images, he says: 'They dedicate the sacred, immortal, and inviolable gods in the vilest and immovable material; they clothe them in the shapes of human beings, beasts, and fishes, while some clothe them in mixed sex and differing bodies. They call things divine powers which, if they suddenly met us after receiving breath, would be considered monsters.'

"Then a little afterward, when, commending natural theology, he had arranged the opinions of certain philosophers, he posed a question to himself and said: 'Someone will say in this place: Am I to believe that heaven and earth are gods, and that some are above the moon and others below it? Am I to endure either Plato or the Peripatetic Strato, of whom one made God without a body, the other without a mind?' And, responding to this, he says: 'What then? Do the dreams of Titus Tatius, or Romulus, or Tullus Hostilius appear truer to you? Tatius dedicated the goddess Cloacina; Romulus, Picus and Tiberinus; Hostilius, Pavor and Pallor, the ugliest affections of human beings, of which one is the motion of a terrified mind, the other of the body--not even a disease, but a color. Will you rather believe these divine powers and receive them into heaven?'

"But concerning the cruelly shameful rites themselves, how freely did he write? 'One,' he says, 'cuts off his male parts; another cuts his arms. Where they fear angry gods, how will they merit those gods as propitious? But gods ought not to be worshipped at all if they desire this. So great is the madness of a mind disturbed and driven from its seat, that the gods are appeased in a manner in which not even the most savage human beings and those whose cruelty has been handed down in tales rage. Tyrants have torn apart the limbs of some men; they ordered no one to tear apart his own. Some have been castrated for the pleasure of royal lust; but no man, at his master's command, laid hands upon himself lest he be a man. They cut themselves to pieces in the temples; with their wounds and blood they make supplication. If anyone has leisure to observe what they do and what they suffer, he will find things so unbecoming to the honorable, so unworthy of the free, so unlike the sane, that no one would doubt that they were mad if they were mad with fewer companions; as it is, the multitude of the insane is the defense of their sanity.'

"Next, the things which he relates were customarily done on the Capitol itself, and which he convicts altogether fearlessly--who would believe them to be done except by mockers or madmen? For when he had derided how in the Egyptian rites the loss of Osiris was mourned but soon afterward there was great rejoicing at his discovery, although his loss and discovery are fabricated, while that grief and joy are truthfully expressed by those who had lost nothing and found nothing, he says: 'Yet this madness has an appointed time. It is tolerable to be insane once a year. Come to the Capitol: you will be ashamed of the publicly displayed madness and of the duties which vain frenzy has assigned to itself. One submits names to the god; another announces the hours to Jupiter; one is a lictor, another a conveyer, who by the vain motion of his arms imitates one conveying. There are women who arrange the hair of Juno and Minerva, standing far from the temple--not merely from the image--and moving their fingers in the manner of those adorning hair. There are women who hold a mirror; there are those who summon the gods as sureties for their court appearances. There are men who offer petitions and teach them their case. A learned arch-mime, an old man now decrepit, daily performed a mime on the Capitol, as though the gods gladly watched one whom human beings had ceased to watch. Every kind of craftsman, laboring for the immortal gods, sits idle there.'

"And a little afterward: 'Yet these,' he says, 'even if they promise the god a superfluous service, promise one neither shameful nor infamous. Certain women sit on the Capitol who think themselves loved by Jupiter; they are not terrified even by the sight of Juno--most irascible, if you wish to believe the poets.'"

§ 6. Let those things be ridiculous; but how shameful are others? The Babylonians prostituted the whole sex in the worship of their divine power; I prefer to pass over the shameful acts of others in silence. Let us consider the cruelty of superstition. They slaughtered human victims to Tauric Diana and brought foreigners to the altar; nor were the Greeks more merciful, to whom it is said:

> With blood you appeased the winds, and by a maiden's slaughter;
>
> With blood must the return be sought, and atonement made with an Argive life.

For many, too, the bloody oracle of a demon was destruction:

[Printed page 90]

Καὶ κεφαλὰς ἄδῃ, καὶ τῷ πατρὶ πέμπετε φῶτα.

> And send heads to Pluto, and a man to the father.

When danger threatened Rome, a Greek man and a Greek woman, a Gallic man and a Gallic woman, were buried alive in the earth. At Carthage noble youths were burned to Saturn. The very people of God sacrificed their sons to the idol Moloch. The king of the Moabites offered his firstborn son and heir to the kingdom upon the wall to a demon. Heliogabalus and Julian examined the entrails and fibers of human beings who had been sacrificed. The Malabars, from no hatred but solely from superstition, hurled weapons among themselves; but those who fell among them were judged blessed. American priests gave plucked-out eyes in honor of the sun. Superstition is therefore of the greatest danger if an unskilled multitude is stirred up against the senate, king, or chief men. What crimes will a commonwealth flee when an opinion of religion and sanctity drives it to such atrocities? Great, therefore, was the error of the wise men whose foolish heart was darkened: to commend such great crimes to peoples under the name of religion.

§ 7. Fourth, many examples declare this. Daniel 14:26: "Daniel therefore took pitch, fat, and hair, and boiled them together; and he made lumps and gave them into the dragon's mouth, and the dragon burst asunder. And he said: Behold what you worshipped. When the Babylonians had heard this, they were exceedingly indignant; and, assembled against the king, they said: The king has become a Jew. He has destroyed Bel, killed the dragon, and slain the priests. And when they had come to the king they said: Hand Daniel over to us, otherwise we will kill you and your house. The king therefore saw that they pressed violently upon him and, compelled by necessity, handed Daniel over to them. They cast him into the lions' den, and he was there six days. Moreover, in the den there were seven lions, and two bodies and two sheep were given to them daily; and these were then not given to them, so that they might devour Daniel."

The imposture of the petty sacrificers had been detected and the beast burst asunder; but superstition was so opposed to truth, or so heedless of the fact, that the whole city rose against the king himself. Thus superstition is not only imperious but seditious. The Magi among the Persians commanded kings; Egyptian priests were no less fearsome to kings. Superstition pronounced law even to the Roman Empire. Metellus the pontifex maximus detained Postumius, the Flamen of Mars, who was consul, lest he depart for war in Africa and abandon the rites of Mars. Because Tiberius Gracchus said that he had taken the augural tent defectively, he brought it about that, by order of the senate, Gaius Figulus returned from Gaul and Scipio Nasica from Corsica. Publius Clodius Siculus, Marcus Cornelius Cethegus, and Gaius Claudius, because the entrails had been brought to the altars of the immortal gods with too little care, were at various times and in different wars ordered--and even compelled--by the pontifex maximus to depart from their provinces. Livy, book 26.

There are innumerable examples of these things. But certainly, if commands were taken away from Sulla, Marius, Caesar, Pompey, and Antony because of trifles of this kind, truly they would make all things pay for it with a great slaughter. And yet how often did they observe signs from the sky? How often by auspices did they disturb elections, wars, and peace? Hence Augustine spoke most truly: "Rome lived more happily with fewer gods"; for the greater number filled minds with superstition and emptied houses. Cicero perceived the same thing; for, lest his house be restored to him, its site was consecrated by his enemies.

I pass over what occurred in Christian times. The world has suffered very many things because superstition raged with savagery and avarice. Tertullian reproaches the gentiles with this in chapter 44 of the Apology: "But no one observes that injury to the commonwealth, as great as it is real; no one weighs that injury to the state, when so many just persons are expended, when so many innocent persons are squandered. For now we call your own proceedings to witness--you who preside daily over the trials of prisoners, who conclude indictments with sentences. So many guilty persons are reviewed by you under various indictments of crimes: which of them is an assassin? Which a cutpurse? Which a temple-robber, or a corrupter, or a robber of bathers? Which of them is also inscribed as a Christian? Or, when Christians are brought forward under their own designation, which of them is also such as all those guilty persons? From your people the prison always seethes; from your people the mines always sigh; on your people the beasts are always fattened; from your people the providers of spectacles feed their herds of criminals. No Christian is there, unless he is simply only a Christian; or, if he is something else also, he is no longer a Christian."

§ 8. In the history of the Jews also, public calamities followed superstition. Jerubbaal, the bravest of the leaders, was demanded for punishment because he destroyed the altar of Baal. Jeremiah was stoned, and the remnants of the land of Israel departed into Egypt. In the time of the Maccabees, the Sadducees and Pharisees disturbed the commonwealth and brought destruction upon the royal family. What formerly harmed the Palaeologi, what harmed the Bohemians, except error and rivalry in false religion? What of the dreadful superstition of the Calvinists today? Is it not an inciter of rebellions, and does it not contrive the increase of its sect through civil bloodshed? There can be no honorableness in that sect in which falsehood is law, the devil religion, and factions the works.

§ 9. Fifth, God is truth; only by true things is advancement made with him. The society of the human race is from nature and from truth; only by true things is advancement made in it. Therefore, when action is taken through simulation and fraud, the return upon lying is small: amid so many who have eyes, the people are not deceived for long. Every superstition, because it consists in opinion, is easily changed; and because it consists in an absurd opinion alien to reason, even those who seemed most obstinate become ashamed of their madness. For what if someone instructs the wretched and shows that it is not human beings who are preserved by images, but images by human beings?

Therefore, the prince who deprives those subject to vain religions of their reason is in perpetual danger lest a fraud so well known to the wise become known also to the deceived peoples. Once that error has been removed, whatever protection there was in superstition will go away into smoke--indeed, it will turn into hatred and contempt. For when the people understand that they have been led into fraud by empty and vain things, that through panic fear they have suffered loss of property or reputation, that they have trembled without cause, and that they have been an object of mockery to the prince or aristocrats, they are no less indignant than if they had been confined by prison and chains and bound to another's will. For this is the nature of human beings: no one wishes to be deceived, and one who has been deceived turns his anger against the author of the deception.

That fraud never remains hidden, because by its increase and mass it is compelled to betray itself. The Romans once believed that the gods existed. But after altars began to be decreed to proconsuls, after the flattery of the Smyrnaeans established a temple to Porcius, after the Alabandans imitated a servile religion, who did not laugh at the novel gods? Especially since those new heavenly beings were consecrated whom no sane person would wish to have as parents. When Augustus, while alive, was worshipped through altars and flamens; when Livia was priestess of her husband and made him by poison, from a terrestrial god, a celestial one; when all the provinces imitated this--and kings too, or assuredly were compelled to it; for neglect of the rites of Augustus was charged against the Cyzicenes, with crimes of violence added, and they therefore lost the liberty given during the Parthian war--what wise person did not laugh when he saw Caligula come forth in the garb of Hercules or Venus? When he saw Augustus, adorned with thunderbolts and rays, placed upon an altar? Indeed, when he saw that house approached through temples? But although in reality no one believed it, they nevertheless said that they believed it.

Pliny speaks absurdly in his Panegyric of Trajan: "Tiberius dedicated Augustus to heaven, but so that he might introduce back again the charge of injured majesty; Nero dedicated Claudius, but so that he might mock him; Titus dedicated Vespasian, and Domitian dedicated Titus--but the former so that he might be seen as the son of a god, the latter as a brother. You have restored your father to the stars, not to inspire fear in the citizens, not in contempt of the divine power, not for your own honor, but because you believe him to be a god."

What are you saying, most prudent man and, unless I am mistaken, most studious of all human beings? Your Quirites made so many gods whom they did not believe to be gods.

> With a flamen and altars he worshipped Augustus; with a calf and lamb he appeased him;
>
> The inscriptions bear witness, the decrees of the senate disclose it,
> Establishing a Caesarean temple in the likeness of Jupiter's.

Pliny does not believe that they were gods, nor does he believe that the Romans believed it. Yet he says that Trajan believed his father to be a god. What then? Did Pliny believe it? How does he believe Trajan's father to be a god if neither Augustus, nor Claudius, nor Vespasian, nor Titus was a god? Or again, if Trajan had not come to the empire, would his parent have been worshipped as a divine power?

§ 10. This evil is ancient: kings' ambition for divine honors. Curtius, in book 8, relates the speech of Cleon, a man of the most abject flattery, in which he speaks on behalf of Alexander's divinity. He says that the Persians acted not only piously but also prudently in mingling their kings among the gods, since the majesty of command is the safeguard of safety. They acted impiously and imprudently: impiously, because they adored the most abominable human beings as the holiest divine powers; imprudently, because, when they saw them take pleasure in an empty and false honor, they did not judge them worthy even of a moderate honor, but made them proud and hateful to their peoples. For divine honor, transferred to kings among human beings by sacrilege, afflicted both the kings themselves and the kingdom.

Certainly no divinity defended Cyrus from death, nor did the queen of the Massagetae judge him a god when she enclosed his head with Persian blood in a skin. No one believed Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, who was endowed with the vilest morals and was the murderer of his brother and his sister, who was also his wife, to be a god--any more than the Egyptian bull which Cambyses slaughtered. The sword proved that Cambyses was not a god when, falling from its sheath as he mounted his horse, it inflicted a deadly wound upon his thigh. The Magi, having ruled for a few months, were killed without any reverence for royal divinity. Darius followed; being more moderate, he reigned more happily. Xerxes, although he almost believed himself a god, wrote letters to mountains and inflicted lashes upon the sea; he was killed by Artabanus. After seven months of tyranny, Artabanus paid the penalty.

The longest rule was that of Artaxerxes Longimanus, who, as it appears, was a worshipper of God; for he commanded that the building of Jerusalem and the temple be completed and held the most holy man Nehemiah exceptionally dear. And so he administered the kingdom happily for forty years. Next, the divinity of Sogdianus lasted only seven months. Artaxerxes was wounded by Cyrus, who neither loved his brother nor feared God. Nor did Darius, the son of Artaxerxes, ever regard him as a god; for if he had thought him a god, he would neither have sought his concubine Aspasia nor, after sending in Tiribazus, have attempted to inflict an abominable murder upon his father. But neither did Artaxerxes regard his son Darius, whom he had made king, as a god; nor did the princes of Persia, by whose judgment he was slaughtered as a parricide. Ochus then came to the throne after killing his brothers, but was killed by the general Bagoas. Arsames, the son of Ochus, was made king by Bagoas and was destroyed four years later. The last of the kings was Darius Codomannus, whom Alexander overthrew; he was treated contemptuously by his own friends and slaughtered with immense cruelty.

§ 11. From this certainly the faithful person will learn the rectitude of divine judgments; but the impious man and impostor will learn that superstition and vain fears instilled into the people not only do not help to protect a kingdom but greatly harm it. For they prepare hatred and contempt. The Roman emperors can also serve as evidence. While they lived, divine honors were lavished upon them and altars were set up upon which oaths had to be sworn by their name; yet, when the least occasion was given, the Romans dragged their new gods with the hook and hurled them down the Gemonian stairs.

Numa's counsel, therefore, was imprudent: he thought that the most effective means of keeping the multitude--rude in those times--in its duty was to instill fear of the gods. For when that vain fear of monstrous divine powers was dispersed by some good ray of the light implanted by nature, they judged that there was no God, and through weariness with superstition stripped off all religion. Indeed, when a savage and ungovernable multitude has been captured by vain religion, it obeys seers better than leaders; but when it understands that the seer is betraying his trust and, like that oracle, φιλιππίζειν--"to Philippize," or favor Philip--it suppresses every consciousness of right and judges that there is no divine power, because where it believed that divine power alone resided, there it found sheer fraud.

Finally, superstition makes nations restless and mutable; experience has taught this. But where there is restlessness and changeableness, there too is sedition. The cause is that all false and vain things frequently change, and that, when religions suffer a defect in some slight ceremony, they judge all things to have been thrown into confusion. The Romans, certainly, in order to diminish the superstitions by which they were burdened, forbade Sibylline verses to be held and read privately. Dio, book 54. Augustus gathered together from every quarter and burned more than two thousand prophetic books, of both Greek and Latin kind, which circulated commonly under no authors or authors of little fitness; after making a selection, he stored these too in two gilded cases beneath the base of Palatine Apollo. Thus they also frequently persecuted foreign religions because they did not dare to recall their ancestral ones to the assay and anvil.

§ 12. The Egyptians were most tenacious of their superstitions. Cicero speaks truly of them in book 5 of the Tusculan Disputations: "Who does not know the custom of the Egyptians, whose minds are steeped in depraved errors? They would undergo execution sooner than violate an ibis, an asp, a cat, or a crocodile." Diodorus Siculus describes a sedition born from superstition: "Ptolemy"--he says--"whom the Romans afterward restored to the kingdom, had at first been named ally and friend by the senate and people of Rome, and there was great public rejoicing and a gathering. Romans too were in the crowd, and among them a soldier by chance--for not intentionally--killed a cat. Shouting, anger, and tumult arose. Neither the ignorance of the wretched man, nor reverence for the Roman name, nor the king's authority--although he had sent the foremost of his courtiers to quiet them and make entreaty--none of these things, I say, availed to prevent the man from immediately being torn apart by thousands of hands, so that nothing remained for funeral or pyre."

The matter is therefore clear concerning the superstition of the Egyptians. Since the authors have much to say about their most restless life, I must recount a few things, so that it may appear that the companion of extreme obstinacy in superstition is the greatest levity and mutability. These are Hadrian's words to the consul Servianus, by which he testifies that he learned that all Egypt was frivolous, wavering, and flitting about at every movement of rumor, and that its people were the most seditious, cowardly, and injurious. The cause was perpetual dissensions and conflicts over religion; for cities often join battle with one another over ridiculous things.

Next, those most religious people, who were set up by kings as though gladiators for mutual quarrels concerning divine powers--that is, garlic and onions, for these divine powers grew in gardens--were insolent and faithless toward kings. Seneca, in chapter 9 of the Consolation to Helvia, calls Egypt faithless; and in chapter 17 of the same discourse: "And so this talkative province, inventive in insults against its prefects--a province in which even those who avoided guilt did not escape ill repute--looked up to him as the one example of holiness; and, a thing most difficult for it, although dangerous witticisms also please it, restrained all license of words." Herodian, book 4, says: "The Egyptians are by nature people disposed to mockery and formed for uttering taunts or jests. They hurl many of these against eminent men, things which appear pleasing or witty to themselves, but which bite and sting those against whom they are hurled." Innumerable killings and disturbances followed these insults.

Examples are the kings called Philadelphi, Philometores, and Physcones--because of a brother and mother killed, and because of the fat of a pendulous belly. Although these names conveyed insults concerning crime, they nevertheless clung perpetually as though proper and family names. Flavius Vopiscus calls them windy, furious, boastful, injurious, and avid for revolution. Ammianus records that the Alexandrians were also deceitful, always thinking one thing and pretending another, becoming inflamed at every movement, contentious, and most vehement demanders of restitution. Philo of Alexandria, a domestic witness, also testifies to this in Against Flaccus. Juvenal, Satire 15.

Dio likewise says of the Alexandrians: "The Alexandrians have sufficient spirit to hear anything; and by nature they are most ready rashly to carry out in words whatever they have proposed to themselves. The same people are the most unfit of all for war and its labors, although in the seditions which occur among them both most frequently and on the greatest scale, they repeatedly come to killings and, through zeal for contending about the matter proposed, hold life in the greatest contempt and judge death in those conflicts to be a certain good especially to be sought."

Thus the Egyptians were frivolous, discordant, and seditious, and in addition so fraudulent that their malicious cunning passed into a proverb. Aeschylus:

δεινοὶ πλέκειν τοι μηχανὰς Αἰγύπτιοι.

> The Egyptians are excellent at contriving devices.

And Theocritus:

οὐδεὶς κακοεργὸς δαλεῖται τὸν ἰόντα παρέρπων Αἰγυπτιστί.

> No evildoer harms the passer-by by creeping up in Egyptian fashion.

That these things were accustomed to arise, and to draw their habitual character, from sacred rites and superstitions is easy to gather from the things Herodotus relates in his Thalia. For because of an ibis, a cat, and other trifles, they raged so greatly:

> We see peoples for whose anger it does not suffice
>
> To have killed someone, but who have believed his breast, arms,
>
> And face to be a kind of food.

§ 13. A poet indeed, but with historical truth, teaches that superstition is the source of all these evils--Juvenal, Satire 15:

> Who does not know, Volusius Bithynicus, what monsters
>
> Demented Egypt worships? One part adores the crocodile;
>
> Another trembles before the ibis glutted with serpents.
>
> The golden image of the sacred long-tailed ape gleams
>
> Where the magic chords resound from half of Memnon,
>
> And ancient Thebes lies buried beneath its hundred gates.
>
> Here they venerate blue fishes; there, a fish of the river;

Whole towns worship a dog; no one worships Diana.

To violate a leek or onion and break it with a bite is sacrilege.

O holy nations, for whom these divine powers grow

In gardens! Every table abstains from wool-bearing animals;

There it is sacrilege to slaughter the offspring of a she-goat;

But it is permitted to feed on human flesh. When Ulysses,

Astonishing him, related over dinner such a deed

To Alcinous, perhaps in some he had stirred bile or laughter,

As a lying teller of marvels. “No one casts this fellow

Into the sea, worthy of the savage and genuine Charybdis,

Who fabricates monstrous Laestrygonians and Cyclopes?

For I would sooner believe in Scylla, or the Cyanean rocks

Colliding, and skins full of tempests,

Or Elpenor, struck with the slender wand of Circe,

Grunting with his fellow oarsmen as pigs.

Did he judge the Phaeacian people so empty-headed?”

Thus someone not yet drunk would justly speak, one who had drawn

The least wine from the Corcyraean jar;

For this Ithacan alone sang these things, with no witness.

We shall relate wonders indeed, but things done recently,

When Iuncus was consul, above the walls of hot Coptus--

A crime of the common people, and more grievous than all tragedies.

For, though you unroll all the tragic robes, no people

Among the tragedians commits a crime from the time of Pyrrha.

Hear what example dreadful savagery has produced

In our own age. Between neighboring peoples an old

And ancient feud exists--an immortal hatred

And a wound never to be healed. It still burns

Between Coptus and Tentyra. Hence the highest fury

On both sides among the common people, because each place hates

The divine powers of its neighbors, since each believes that only

Those gods whom it itself worships ought to be held as gods.

But at the festival of one people, all the leading men

And commanders of its enemies thought the opportunity should be seized,
Lest they should feel the glad and cheerful day, the great joys
Of a feast, with tables set and arranged at the temples,
And with a couch kept wakeful, on which the seventh sun sometimes Finds a man lying through night and day. Egypt is savage indeed;
But, so far as I myself have observed, in luxury its barbarous throng Does not yield to infamous Canopus. Add that victory is easy Over men drenched, stammering, and staggering from unmixed wine.
On one side, therefore, there was men's dancing to a black piper,

Perfumes of every kind, flowers, and many garlands on the forehead;
On the other, fasting hatred. But the first quarrels begin
To resound in their burning minds. These are the trumpet of the brawl.
Then they meet with equal shouting, and the naked hand
Rages in place of a weapon. Few cheeks are without a wound;
In the whole contest scarcely anyone--or no one--has a nose intact.
You could now see throughout all the ranks half-faces,
Faces of another form, bones gaping from broken cheeks,
And fists filled with blood from eyes.
Yet they themselves believe that they are playing and exercising Childish battle lines, because they tread upon no corpses.
And, indeed, why should so many thousands of a brawling crowd
Do so, if all are alive? Therefore the attack grows fiercer,
And now with arms bent they begin to hurl stones
Sought along the ground--the weapons of domestic sedition--
But not a rock of the weight with which Turnus and Ajax,
Or the son of Tydeus, struck the thigh of Aeneas;
Rather one which right hands unlike theirs, born in our age,
Are able to discharge. For this race was already diminishing
While Homer lived. The earth now produces evil and puny men.
Therefore whatever god looked on laughs and hates them.
Let the story be resumed after this digression. When one side,
Increased by reinforcements, dares to draw iron

And renew the battle with hostile arrows, all who dwell
In neighboring Tentyra, shaded by palms, press upon the backs
Of those who excel in rapid flight. Here one man slips,
Hastening his course through excessive fear, and is caught.
The victorious crowd cuts him into very many pieces
And little portions, so that one dead man may suffice for many;
With the bones gnawed clean, it eats him whole. It did not cook him
In a blazing bronze cauldron or upon spits; so long
And slow did it judge waiting for fires, content with the raw corpse.
Here one may rejoice that it did not violate the fire
Which Prometheus, snatched from the highest region of heaven, Gave to the earth. I congratulate the element, and think that you too Exult. But the man who endured biting the corpse
Never ate anything more gladly than this flesh.
For in so great a crime, do not ask and doubt whether
The first throat felt pleasure. But the last man,
Who stood when the whole body had already been consumed,
Draws his fingers along the ground and tastes something of the blood.
The Vascones, as report has it, prolonged their lives
By the use of such foods; but the case is different. There
The blame there lies with fortune: the extremity of wars, extreme circumstances,
And the dreadful famine of a long siege.
For this example of food which is now at issue ought to be pitiable.
The people just mentioned, after all herbs and every animal,
After whatever the madness of an empty belly compelled,
While their pallor and leanness and thin limbs moved even enemies
To pity, tore with famine limbs not their own, ready
To eat their own also. What human being or god would have denied Pardon to those who suffered dreadful and monstrous things,
And whom the very shades of those whose bodies they ate
Could forgive? Zeno’s precepts advise better than we do,
For he judges that some things, not all, must be done for life.
But whence was the Cantabrian a Stoic, especially

In the age of the ancient Metellus? Now the whole world

Has Greek and Roman Athens. Eloquent Gaul has taught

The Britons to be advocates; Thule now speaks of hiring a rhetorician.

Nevertheless, that noble people of whom we spoke--and Saguntum,

Equal in courage and fidelity but greater in disaster--excuses

Some such deed. Egypt, more savage than the altar by the Maeotic Sea,

Does not. For that altar, inventor of the abominable Tauric rite,

Sacrifices human beings, so that you may believe the poems which now

Hand these things down to be worthy of trust--but no more than that.

The victim fears nothing further or more grievous than the knife.

What accident drove these men? What so great hunger, what arms

Hostile to their rampart, compelled them to dare so detestable

A monstrosity? Or would they create another object of reproach

For land dry around Memphis when the Nile was unwilling to rise?

With a madness in which neither terrible Cimbri nor Britons,

Fierce Sauromatae, nor monstrous Agathyrsi ever raged,

This unwarlike and useless common people rages,

Accustomed to spread little sails upon earthenware skiffs

And lean upon the short oars of painted pottery.

You will find no penalty for the crime, nor will you devise

Punishments worthy of peoples in whose mind anger

And hunger are equal and alike.

§ 14. To all these is added a greater evil, and one dangerous to those who reign: namely, concern for future things, auspices, entrails, and the impostures and profits of seers. By these whole nations have often been sent into the greatest dangers. Croesus, deceived by an oracle, became the mockery of his enemy. Demons, by lying, drew Julian into Persia. The seers sang:

We gods shall go against Theren; victory is certain.

I, Mars, unconquered in arms among the gods, shall be the leader.

Indeed, even Ahab, a patron of impious superstition, was deceived by his prophets and destroyed himself, his army, and his family. This thing frequently afflicted the Gauls and Germans. Plutarch, in his Caesar: “Moreover, the prophecies of their divining women disturbed them more, women who foretold the future by inspecting the eddies of rivers and observing the windings and noises of streams. They forbade battle to be joined before the new moon had shone. When these things had been reported, Caesar, since he perceived that the Germans were at rest, judged that he would act best if he fought with them while they were sluggish rather than, by awaiting their times, fail in his desire. And so, by attacking their fortifications and the mounds on which they had settled, he harassed and provoked them so that they descended with fury to fight. After routing them with immense slaughter, he pursued them thirty-seven thousand five hundred paces all the way to the Rhine and filled this whole plain with corpses and spoils."

Those predictions were also destructive to Spain. Our Mariana relates the affair in book 2, chapter 14 of The Education of a King: "It was harmful that Martin Barbuda, Master of Alcántara, deceived by a certain John, a magician who had long conducted a life secret from everyone and promised victory as though by divine admonition, contrary to the laws of the treaty recently struck with the Moors, gathered a great but disorderly multitude of men under the appearance of religion and, while making an incursion into the territories of Granada, was surrounded by the enemy's onset and perished with all his men. And the eighth day commemorating Christ restored to life, white both in fact and in name, was turned black; and by a noble example it was established that fraud is often present beneath an extraordinary appearance of holiness."

We therefore do not wish the prince readily to lend his ears to these human beings. We do not wish him to consume whole days and nights in prayers and anxiety of mind, which would be no less harmful. But he ought so to order himself that he does not labor greatly over future events; that he places the hope of safety in divine protection and piety; and that, to treat illnesses, he summons none other than those skilled in the medical art and employs wholesome herbs according to their counsel.

§ 15. But it is so clear that useful counsels are hindered by these things, that seditions, hopes of revolution, and plots arise, that no times of a pagan emperor were without them. For under what emperor were there not investigations against those who had consulted magicians concerning the prince's life or his successor? Moreover, this great mystery of impiety vehemently afflicts the minds of the ignorant common people. To tremble at every movement, every advance, every voice, every meeting with either human being or beast, at the song of an ominous bird, at the flight of birds, at a morsel falling from the mouth of a chicken--and not only to tremble, but to lead out an army or confine it in camp, to cross the sea with a fleet or remain in harbor, and to govern the arts of war and peace--is of such great folly that it does not seem capable of befalling a human being.

Julian is terrified by a falling star and consults soothsayers, who advise him to do nothing. Augustus was of such a character regarding religions, as Suetonius says, that "he was somewhat excessively frightened by thunder and lightning, so that always and everywhere he carried the skin of a sea-calf around as a remedy; and at every suspicion of a greater storm he withdrew into a concealed and vaulted place, having once been terrified during a nocturnal journey by a flash of lightning," as we said above.

Alexander was even more pitiable than Augustus; he conducted himself in such a way that there was nothing so small or absurd--provided only that it was unusual--which he did not turn into a prodigy or omen. Consequently, the palace was full of sacrificers, purifiers, and diviners.

But if an enemy rushed upon him while heaven thundered, would the veteran commander not hide himself in concealment? If the army were held by an equal fear, would it not become bloodless booty solely because its members falsely believed their own destruction to be indicated by the lightning?

§ 16. Superstition makes people trembling, unwarlike, and servile, just as true religion makes them spirited, brave, and confident in the protection of the divine power. The Egyptians, the most superstitious of nations, were unfit for war; they were almost always enslaved. Indeed, although they possessed so fertile a region, they ministered to foreigners in the vilest occupations. And so, by way of contempt, they were called ἀχθοφόροι, πλινθοφόροι--burden-bearers and carriers of bricks. Yet they were of a huge and sinewy body, which, however, they exercised not with arms but with servile burdens, because they possessed minds humbled by fear of the gods and pressed down toward the earth.

Thus Aristophanes jokes about those βαστάζοντας--"carriers":

δύ᾽ ἅρματ᾽ εἰσέθηκε καὶ νεκρὼ δύο, οὓς οὐκ ἂν ἄραιντ᾽ οὐδ᾽ ἑκατὸν Αἰγύπτιοι.

> He placed upon it two chariots and two dead men,
> Whom not even a hundred Egyptians could carry.

For how can there be a great spirit in one who venerates such worthless things as a divine power? Who locates the supreme good in the smallest things? How servile in spirit are the Turks? They say that the stars hang from golden chains; they superstitiously supply food to animals. Some Indians build hospices and palaces for birds, while meanwhile neglecting human beings. How superstitious are the Americans and Japanese! Yet they are all foolish, unwarlike, abject, and, as it were, born to serve. For since they are compelled to fear all things, they cannot be magnanimous.

CHAPTER XV

Machiavelli's Imprudence and Superstition Demonstrated

§ 1. Since many of the pagans judged it to have been done wisely that they restrained the multitude by fear of ceremonies and by a certain tragedy of religion, I have already refuted this. But because Machiavelli, who wished to be regarded as a Christian, nevertheless leads his prince to the same thing, what he wrote in book 1, chapters 11, 12, 13, and 14 of Discourses on Livy must be examined. For these writings combine great imprudence with the utmost superstition.

Chapter 11: "Although Rome derived its first origin from Romulus and ought deservedly to acknowledge him as a daughter acknowledges her father, nevertheless the immortal gods saw that the laws and institutions established by Romulus were not sufficient for acquiring so great an empire. Therefore, when he departed from this life, they moved the senate to choose Numa Pompilius as his successor, so that he might supply the things which had been neglected by Romulus. When, therefore, he had come to power, he found the Roman people trained in the arts of war and fierce; and since he desired to train them for peace and tranquillity, he directed all his effort toward establishing the worship of religion. He established it so excellently that for many centuries nowhere among nations was there so great a fear of God as that which existed among the Romans from Numa's institution; and this thing greatly advanced all those institutions."

He proves that Rome's safety depended upon that reverent worship of religion because they were accustomed to keep the oath which they had been compelled to swear. Thus, after the disaster at Cannae, Scipio compelled the frightened youth, who under the leadership of Metellus were contemplating departure to some king, to swear at sword-point that they would not desert their fatherland. Thus Titus Manlius compelled the tribune Pomponius at dagger-point to swear that he would desist from accusing Manlius's father. Accordingly, he affirms that the Romans owed more to Numa than to Romulus. Finally he concludes in these words: "Since these things are so, I conclude that the worship of religion instituted by Numa Pompilius was one of the principal causes because of which the Romans were so fortunate in conducting affairs. For where religion exists, good laws and good discipline have a place; and from these arise fortunate and happy outcomes of affairs, especially in military expeditions. Conversely, with religion removed, the commonwealth must fall; for with fear of God removed, impiety follows, and from this the ruin of empires. For although the prince himself may perhaps be pious and may in some manner compensate by his virtue for the impiety of his subjects, nevertheless, because he is mortal and perhaps also of a brief life, it must happen that, when he dies, the virtue which had prevailed gradually declines together with the empire."

§ 2. In chapter 13 he says: "I think that I shall not act irrelevantly if, by setting forth examples, I show that the Romans often settled a disturbed commonwealth and undertook certain expeditions by the assistance of religion. Although many examples of this kind occur in Livy, I shall nevertheless adduce only these few.

"After the Roman people had created tribunes of the plebs with consular power, and all of them except one were plebeians, there arose in Rome in the same year a severe plague and scarcity of grain; in addition, certain other portents appeared. The patricians therefore seized this occasion and asserted that these calamities had been sent upon the Roman people by the immortal gods because of abuse of the majesty of government and wrongful usurpation of tribunician power, and that the gods could not be appeased otherwise than if the lawful arrangement of tribunician power were restored. Terrified by this matter, the plebs created all the tribunes from the patrician order.

"In the very long siege of Veii also, when the soldiers, wearied by tedium, wished to return to Rome, they were kept by their leaders in continuation of the siege under a certain pretext of religion. For when the Alban Lake had risen, they interpreted the oracle of Apollo as though that inundation of waters announced that the city would be taken in that year; and a seer, who was held captive at Rome, was employed for the expiation of this Alban prodigy and the appeasement of the gods. Persuaded by all these things, the soldier patiently endured the hardships of war; and from this it came about that Camillus, having been created dictator, took the city which the Roman people had besieged for an entire decade. The Romans would never have accomplished these things so happily, nor could they have restored tribunician power to the patricians, unless, assisted by the pretext of religion, they had known how to keep both the soldiers and the plebs in their duty.

"Similar to these examples is what happened when Terentillus, tribune of the plebs, wished to promulgate the Terentillan law, concerning which we shall dispute later. For then also, to quiet the disturbances which this matter had produced, the Fathers employed a certain pretext of religion in two ways. First, they ordered the duumvirs to consult the Sibylline books and then announced from them that danger threatened the state of losing its liberty in that year unless men abstained from seditions. Although the tribunes charged that this had been done by the Fathers to obstruct the law, it nevertheless moved the minds of the plebs so greatly that it no longer followed the tribunes with such ardor.

"Next, when, amid the same disturbances, a certain Appius Herdonius, with the aid of exiles and slaves--of whom he had four thousand five hundred with him--occupied the Capitol and citadel by night, and there was danger that, if either the Aequi or Volsci, perpetual enemies of the Roman name, should arrive, they would take the city; and when the tribunes still did not cease to press the promulgation of the law and asserted that this too had been fabricated by the Fathers in order to obstruct the law, then the consul Publius Valerius, a grave and eloquent man, came out from the senate and, mingling threats with arguments, demonstrated to the people what dangers threatened the city because the Capitol had been seized and how untimely that occasion was for carrying the law. He accomplished so much that all were bound by oath not to depart from the consul's will. The plebs therefore followed him and recovered the Capitol.

"But when Publius Valerius had been killed in that assault and Lucius Quinctius Cincinnatus had succeeded him in the consulship, he resolved to lead the legions against the Volsci and Aequi, lest he leave the plebs leisure or furnish it an opportunity to consider and press the same Terentillan law. But when the tribunes tried to frustrate this and asked by what arrangement the consuls would lead out an army, since no one would permit them to conduct a levy against the will of the tribunes, Quinctius said: 'But we have no need of a levy. For when Publius Valerius gave arms to the plebs for the recovery of the Capitol, all swore allegiance: that they would assemble at the consul's command and would not depart without his command. We therefore proclaim that all of you who swore allegiance are to be present armed at Lake Regillus tomorrow.'

"Although after these words the tribunes resisted and attempted to release the plebs from its religious obligation, on the ground that the oath had been rendered not to Quinctius, who was then a private man, but to the consul, nevertheless the plebs, moved by reverence for religion, preferred to follow the consuls rather than appear to violate its oath in any manner. To such an extent, assuredly, were those times happy and human beings very little evil. And as Livy says: 'That neglect of the gods which holds our age had not yet arrived, nor did each man make oaths and laws suitable to himself by interpreting them; rather, he accommodated his own morals to them.'

"With these things thus established, when the tribunes saw that they could not resist the consuls, they themselves descended to the consuls' will through fear of losing their dignity; and an agreement was made that throughout the entire year neither would they themselves do anything concerning the Terentillan law, nor would the consuls summon the plebs from the city to war. Here too, accordingly, you perceive that the senate, by the assistance of religion, quieted these turbulent movements of tribunician power and overcame the present difficulties, and that it could not have overcome them without religion."

§ 3. In chapter 14 he says that the Romans employed auspices, yet frequently fought contrary to omens and at other times interpreted them contrary to common usage, as Papirius did against the Samnites. For when the tripudium solistimum had falsely been reported to him and this had been disclosed to the commander, who was now intent upon the business, he answered the messenger: “May you indeed be honored for your courage and diligence. But if the one who attends the auspice reports anything falsely, he takes the religious guilt upon himself. To me the tripudium has been reported, and it is an excellent auspice for the Roman people and army.”

When he had said these things, so that the outcome might answer his omen, he commanded the centurions to station the chicken-keepers among the foremost standards. And so, while the standards were advanced against the enemy, before the shout was raised and battle joined, a chicken-keeper was struck by a spear discharged at random and fell before the standards. When this was reported to the consul, he answered that all things would now proceed under good auspices, since the chicken-keeper had expiated his falsehood by his own destruction and the gods, now appeased, would assist the army. In this passage you perceive manifestly that Papirius interpreted the auspices so that he neither omitted the opportunity of fighting contrary to what they appeared to advise, nor could anyone nevertheless object to him that he had despised the auspices and religion.

The senate approved that dexterity and, by decreeing honors, ratified it publicly.

§ 4. Although the preceding arguments have shown that this is impious imprudence, I shall now nevertheless demonstrate it from histories and from the commonwealth itself--and, unless I am mistaken, from Machiavelli himself.

First, he says that the immortal gods saw that the laws enacted by Romulus were insufficient for acquiring so great an empire, and that they therefore moved the senate to choose Numa so that he might supply what was lacking. What here should I first marvel at or censure? Did the gods foresee that Romulus’s laws were insufficient? But neither the divine powers of Romulus nor those of Numa not only foresaw anything, but even saw anything. All those gods grew without foundations and were therefore inclined toward ruin. Romulus made a few gods, Numa more. But those were not gods whose divinity was weighed according to human judgment, since those human beings were propitious to the god: for unless they had decreed it, that crowd of little gods would never have been adorned with ray and stars.

Minucius Felix judged better concerning this business: “The Romans were not so great because they were religious, but because they were sacrilegious with impunity.” But nevertheless the gods moved Numa to establish divine powers and, as Machiavelli wishes, to deceive the simple people. Yet those gods did not suffice for posterity.

“Nor,” says Augustine in book 3, chapter 12 of The City of God, “did Rome deign to be content with these sacred rites, although Pompilius had established so many there; for it did not yet possess the chief temple of Jupiter himself. King Tarquin built the Capitol there. Aesculapius, moreover, left Epidaurus for Rome so that, as a most skilled physician, he might practice his art more gloriously in the most renowned city. The Mother of the Gods also came--I do not know whence--from Pessinus. For it was unworthy that, while her son already presided over the Capitoline Hill, she herself should still lie hidden in an ignoble place. Yet if she is the mother of all the gods, she not only followed certain of her sons to Rome but also preceded others who were to follow. I marvel indeed whether she herself gave birth to Cynocephalus, who came much later from Egypt. Whether the goddess Fever was also born from her, let Aesculapius, her great-grandson, see to it. But from wherever she was born, I do not think that the foreign gods will dare to call her, a Roman citizen, an ignoble goddess.

“Under the protection of so many gods--who can number them? Native and foreign, heavenly, terrestrial, infernal, marine, of springs and of rivers; and, as Varro says, certain and uncertain; and in every kind of gods, just as among animals, males and females--under the protection, therefore, of so many gods, Rome ought not to have been shaken and afflicted by such great and horrible disasters, of which I shall commemorate a few out of many. For by her great smoke, as though a signal had been given, she had gathered far too many gods for her protection; by instituting and furnishing temples, altars, sacrifices, and priests for them, she offended the supreme and true God, to whom alone these things, rightly performed, are owed.

"And she certainly lived more happily when she had fewer. But the greater she became, the more she judged that more must be employed, as a ship employs sailors; I believe she despaired that those fewer gods under whom, in comparison with her worse life, she had lived better were sufficient to assist her greatness. For first, under the kings themselves, except Numa Pompilius, of whom I have already spoken above, how great was the evil of discordant strife which compelled Romulus's brother to be killed?"

§ 5. I omit the twelve select gods and the twenty celestial gods. Was that crowd necessary--Cautius, Ops, Lucina, Vagitanus, Cunina, Rumina, Statilinus, Mens, Adeona, Volumnus and Volumna, Bellona, the rustic god, Honorinus, Victoria, Aesculanus, Fessonia, Pellonia, Spiniensis, Fortuna, the goddess Mutua, Agenoria, Stimula, Murcia, Jugatinus, Vallonia, Runcina, Sera, Segetia, Tutilina, Flora, Matura, Ruana, Carda, Limentinus, Forculus, Silvanus, Fever, Fear, Flora, Rest, and the one who alone has a rightful name, Cloacina? These and more were added; for I omit many because I cannot name them honorably. Therefore, if Machiavelli judges that the Roman state stood by the superstition of these gods, he departs very far from the truth. For what did Fever and Pallor foresee concerning the commonwealth?

§ 6. Second, it is owed to Numa that the Romans preserved the religious obligation of the oath, as Metellus did with his companions, and Pomponius. But they observed the religious obligation of the oath not from fear of vain divine powers, but from natural reason and a certain fear concerning the eternal divine power, whose implanted πρόληψιν--"preconception"--they could not shake off; and much more truly from fear of death and infamy. For through their gods--Apollo, Mercury, Venus, and Jupiter himself--they learned to swear falsely and deceive.

Do you wish me to set the crowd of perjurers against these very few? First, Numa himself was an occupier of the kingdom through guile and a corrupter of so great an empire through the fraud of religion introduced among the citizens. Next, Tullus Hostilius, waging war against the treaties of Alba--that is, against its parent--was consumed by lightning together with his whole house. Tarquinius Priscus was killed by the sons of Ancus contrary to the pledged faith. Servius was killed by his son-in-law. Tarquinius Superbus, a parricide, erected the Capitol and reigned. Brutus expelled his colleague Collatinus without cause. Roman youths conspired against their fatherland on behalf of tyranny. Where here is Numa's profane piety?

"The Roman senate dealt according to equitable and moderate law while fear from Tarquin and the grave war with Etruria remained. Afterward the Fathers exercised the plebs by servile domination, decided concerning their life and body in the royal manner, drove them from their land, and, with the rest excluded, acted alone in government. Harried by these cruelties, and especially oppressed by usury, the plebs, since it bore tribute and military service at the same time amid continual wars, occupied the Sacred Mount and the Aventine under arms, and then procured for itself tribunes of the plebs and other rights. The end of discord and strife on both sides was the Second Punic War." Thus Sallust.

It was therefore not through religious piety but through fear that the Fathers showed themselves equitable; and because fear is not a lasting teacher of duty, when it was removed they proceeded to injuries against the plebs. What of Sergius Galba, a man of the utmost perfidy, who sold some and slaughtered others of seven thousand Lusitanians, although he had summoned them after giving his word? The senate banished Bituitus, king of the Arverni, perfidiously captured, to Alba for confinement.

I am not ignorant that there was a greater religious regard for the oath at Rome than among any nation. Cicero, book 3 of On Duties: "Our ancestors wished there to be no bond tighter than an oath for binding faith." Aulus Gellius and Dionysius praise this. Dionysius, book 2, refers it to Numa; Polybius likewise in book 6. But this was in comparison with the Carthaginians, Egyptians, and other most faithless nations.

For as regards fidelity to an oath, I appeal to an author who knew Roman affairs better and assessed them more prudently than Machiavelli: Augustine, book 3, chapter 2 of The City of God: "Therefore the great gods Neptune and Apollo, not knowing that Laomedon would deny them their pay, became builders of the walls of Troy for nothing and without thanks. Let them consider whether it is not more serious to believe in such gods than to swear falsely by such gods. For even Homer himself did not readily believe this, since he makes Neptune indeed fight against the Trojans, but Apollo for the Trojans, although the tale relates that both were offended by that perjury. If, therefore, they believe the tales, let them blush to worship such divine powers; if they do not believe the tales, let them not put forward Trojan perjuries, or let them marvel that the gods punished Trojan perjuries but loved Roman ones.

“For whence did the conspiracy of Catiline, in so great and so corrupt a state, have also a great abundance of those whose hand and tongue were nourished by perjury or civil blood? For what else did senators so often corrupted in judgments, or the people so often corrupted in voting or in whatever cases were treated before it in assemblies, do except sin also by swearing falsely? For amid the most corrupt morals the ancient custom of swearing was preserved for this purpose: not that they might be restrained from crimes by fear of religion, but that perjuries too might be added to their other crimes.”

§ 7. But whatever religious regard existed in the oath soon vanished through contempt for vain divine powers that laughed at and taught perjuries. Therefore, later men swore by the genius of Caesar; and when an oath was demanded of Christians by the safety of Caesar, Tertullian, Apology 35, says: “We swear, just as not by the genii of the Caesars, so by their safety, which is more august than all genii.” This, moreover, was judged the greatest oath at Rome, not because they were moved by religion, but because vengeance was readily at hand. “It is safer,” says Minucius, “to swear falsely by the genius of Jupiter than by that of Caesar.”

§ 8. Third, he praises the Romans because they employed the pretext of religion. For when they had created plebeian tribunes with consular power, they persuaded the people that the plague which was raging had been sent because of abuse of the majesty of government; and thus the plebs created all the tribunes from the Fathers. Next, they fabricated that the inundation of the Alban Lake portended the capture of Veii in that year, so that they might keep the soldier in the siege. Third, they first obstructed the Terentillan law by a pretense involving the Sibylline books; then they led the Quirites, bound by the religious obligation of their oath, against the Volsci.

But all the centuries of the Quirites will give testimony for me and for the truth: namely, that by those deceptions the authority and strength of the nobility collapsed. For, to omit the tribunes, after a five-year contest they made consuls from the plebs, the first of whom was Lucius Sextius. This was done while Camillus the liberator was still alive. When a new plague afterward arose, a remedy was sought through new religious rites--that is, dramatic games--and not by depriving the plebs of the right to undertake the consulship. And so the Terentillan law was carried, superstition was shaken off, and not in this manner only: they also transferred the priesthoods and auspices to themselves.

Do you desire, reader, to see the fruit of so trivial and so brief an imposture? Read the speech of the consul Decius Mus: “Since this is so, to whom among gods and human beings can it appear unworthy,” he says, “to add pontifical and augural insignia to those men whom you have honored with curule chairs, the bordered toga, the palm-embroidered tunic, the painted toga, the triumphal and laurel crown, and whose houses you have made distinguished among others by the spoils of enemies affixed to them? If a man who has been adorned with the attire of Jupiter Best and Greatest, borne through the city in a gilded chariot, and ascended the Capitol, is he not to be seen with the sacrificial bowl and augur’s staff, with his head veiled, slaughtering a victim or taking an augury from the citadel? Although the consulship, censorship, and triumph will be read with equanimity in the inscription beneath his image, if you add the augurate or pontificate, will the readers’ eyes not endure it?

“For my part--may I say it with the gods’ pardon--I hope that by the benefit of the Roman people we are already men who render no less honor to the priesthoods by our own dignity than we receive, and that we seek them for the sake of the gods more than for our own sake, so that we may worship publicly those whom we worship privately. But why have I thus far conducted my case as though the patricians' claim regarding the priesthoods were intact and we were not already in possession of one most ample priesthood? We see plebeian decemvirs for performing sacred rites, interpreters of the Sibyl's verses and of this people's fates, and likewise overseers of the Apollinarian rite and other ceremonies. Nor was any injury done then to the patricians when, for the sake of the plebeians, the number was added to the duumvirs for performing sacred rites; and now a tribune, a brave and vigorous man, has added five places of augurs and four of pontiffs, to which plebeians may be nominated--not that they may expel you, Appius, from your place, but that plebeian men may assist you also in administering divine affairs, just as in other human affairs they assist according to their manly share.

"Do not blush, Appius, to have as colleague in the priesthood one whom you could have as colleague in the censorship and consulship, to whom you can be master of the horse when he is dictator, just as you can be dictator when he is master of the horse. A Sabine newcomer, the founder of your nobility--whether you prefer Appius Clausus or Appius Claudius--was received into their number by those ancient patricians. Do not disdain to receive us into the number of the priests. We bring many honors with us--indeed, all the same things that have made you proud. Lucius Sextius was made the first consul from the plebs; Gaius Licinius Stolo the first master of the horse; Gaius Marcius Rutilus the first both dictator and censor; Quintus Publilius Philo the first praetor. Those same things have always been heard: that the auspices are in your possession, that you alone have lineage, that you alone have lawful command and auspice at home and in war. Up to now this has been equally prosperous for plebeian and patrician, and so it will be hereafter.

"Or have you ever heard it said at Rome that the patricians were first created not by descent from heaven, but that those who could name a father and grandfather--that is, nothing further than freeborn men--were patricians? I can now name a consul as father, and my son will now be able to name one as grandfather. There is nothing else at issue, Quirites, except that we should attain all things that have been denied. The patricians seek only a contest and do not care what outcome the contests have. I judge that this law, which may be good, favorable, and fortunate for you and the commonwealth, ought to be commanded as you have been asked." Thus the fraud, once disclosed, harmed more than it profited during the brief time when it lay hidden.

§ 9. They turned the overflowing of the Alban Lake into a prodigy signifying that Veii would be taken in that year. This was a political lie, intended for a brief time and rash--especially since its interpretation was entrusted to a captive. But how was Camillus uncertain of his own fate, which was already impending, while he predicted the fatherland's fate from the outpouring of the Alban waters? I, if it pleased me to prophesy, would affirm instead that the outpoured multitude of the Senones, which devastated everything all the way to Rome--and Rome itself, except the Capitol--was signified by that portent.

But Papirius interpreted the auspices dexterously. It is plainly so. Nor did Claudius act badly when he commanded that the chickens should drink, since they were unwilling to eat; and Scipio acted wittily when, after the commander's slip while disembarking from his ship appeared ominous to the inexperienced soldier, he drew it into a favorable auspice by saying that he held Africa. Thus Augustus, when a comet appeared which is ordinarily regarded as fatal to kings, said that it pertained to the king of the Persians, because that king was long-haired. All these things altogether destroy the superstition of auguries and furnish an occasion for mocking this entire kind universally.

In the same manner Cicero acts in books 1 and 2; although himself an augur, he denies that either Romulus or anyone possesses true auspices, yet says they are retained for the opinion of the common people and the great advantages of the commonwealth. But against Cicero, the Christian Cicero rightly teaches in book 2, chapter 5 of The City of God: "For what kind of thing is that which they said was a most beautiful auspice, which I commemorated a little before: that Mars, Terminus, and Youth were unwilling to yield their place even to Jupiter, king of the gods? For thus, they say, it was signified that the Martial people--that is, the Roman people--would yield to no one the place it held; that no one would move the Roman boundaries because of the god Terminus; and that Roman youth because of the goddess Youth would yield to no one.

“Let them therefore see how they regarded that king of their gods and giver of their kingdom, since they set those auspices against him as an adversary to whom it would be glorious not to yield. Yet if these things are true, they have altogether nothing to fear. For they will not confess that the gods yielded to Christ, who were unwilling to yield to Jupiter. For, with the boundaries of the empire preserved, they could yield to Christ both from the seats of places and, especially, from the heart of believers.

“But before Christ came in the flesh, before, finally, those things which we bring forth from their books were written, yet after that auspice occurred under King Tarquin, the Roman army was several times routed--that is, turned to flight--and proved false the auspice that Youth had not yielded to Jupiter. The Martial nation was crushed in the city itself when the Gauls prevailed and broke in; and the boundaries of the empire were constricted into a narrow compass when many states defected to Hannibal. Thus the beauty of the auspices was emptied out, and obstinacy against Jupiter remained--not the obstinacy of gods, but of demons. For it is one thing not to have yielded, another to have returned from the place whence you had yielded.

“And yet afterward, in the eastern regions, the boundaries of the Roman Empire were changed by Hadrian’s will. For he conceded three noble provinces--Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Assyria--to the empire of the Persians, so that the god Terminus, who according to them protected the Roman boundaries and by that most beautiful auspice had not yielded his place to Jupiter, may appear to have feared Hadrian, king of human beings, more than the king of the gods.”

§ 10. It is time for us to hear the pseudo-politician speaking against himself for once. In book 1, chapter 12 of Discourses on Livy, he requires true worship: “Whatever princes and commonwealths desire to preserve themselves ought, before all other things, to devote themselves to this one thing: that they rightly establish and venerate the true worship of religion. Nor will you ever be able to have a surer judgment concerning the ruin and destruction of any religion than if you perceive that divine worship is held in contempt and scorned within it. But, so that you may understand that the matter is so, observe upon what foundation the religion of the place in which each person is born rests, because every religious worship stands upon some foundation.”

Next, in chapter 15, he relates the history of the monstrous conspiracy of the Samnites. Reduced to straits, since they had decided to attempt every extremity and nevertheless understood that they could not conquer unless they had the most resolute spirits among their soldiers for fighting, they fled to religion as their final remedy. For from an old book, with Ovius Paccius as priest, a man advanced in age, they sought a sacrifice according to the ancient religion of the Samnites.

When the sacrifice had been completed, their commander ordered every most noble man to be summoned by an attendant. The apparatus of the sacred rite was of such a kind that it could suffuse the mind with religious awe. For a place stood enclosed with latticework in the middle of the camp and covered with barriers and linen, extending equally two hundred feet in every direction. In the middle were altars, victims slaughtered around them, and centurions standing about with drawn swords. The soldier was brought to the altars more as a victim than as a participant in the sacred rite and was compelled by oath not to disclose what he had seen and heard in that place. Then he was compelled to swear by a certain dreadful formula, composed as a curse upon his person, family, and stock, unless he went into battle wherever the commanders led them, and unless, if he himself fled from the battle line or saw anyone fleeing, he immediately killed him.

At first certain men who refused to swear were cut down around the altars; then, lying among the heaps of victims, they served as a warning to the others not to refuse. So that those bound by this oath might be held by a greater religious obligation, they also adorned them with various distinguishing marks. For, out of the forty thousand whom they had gathered, they clothed about half in white garments and assigned them decorated arms and crested helmets so that they might stand out among the rest. At last they encamped at Aquilonia.

But when the consul Papirius was about to fight against them, he made light of all these things and addressed his own soldiers lest they be terrified by a religious oath of this kind: “Crests,” he said, “do not make wounds; rather, a Roman javelin passes through painted and gilded shields, and the whiteness of clothing and a gleaming battle line, where the affair is conducted by the sword, will be stained with blood. Finally, all these things will recoil upon their own heads, since in an abominable sacred rite they mingled the slaughter of human beings and cattle and, because of treaties so often broken, incited gods, citizens, and enemies against themselves.”

At last the Romans conquered in the conflict because their courage instilled in the Samnites, through remembrance of disaster so often suffered, a greater fear than religion could infuse into them of either courage or obstinacy for fighting. Although this is so, we nevertheless see plainly that, when their affairs were so deeply afflicted, they fled to religion as their final remedy and placed so great a hope for the recovery of courage in no other thing. From this it is possible to understand how much protection anyone may possess in the right use of true religion. And so I have judged that this matter must be discussed in this place, as one which depended upon the most necessary institutions of the Roman commonwealth.

From these things I conclude that no fabricated religion is lasting, and that Roman soldiers, such great despisers of religion, could laugh at the foolishness of their augurs; and therefore that it is the most inconsiderate rashness to rest upon that foundation which can be overturned by one blow and a slight jest. The consular augur confesses that it is so: “Antiquity erred in many things,” he says, “and we see it changed either by practice, learning, or age.” Since, therefore, those opinions are ordinarily changed by practice and learning, the lawgiver who contrives a true and stable commonwealth will not employ them. Although such a commonwealth derives all things from truth, nevertheless its most solid foundations are very frequently shaken by the vice of human beings. How will it be stable if its highest interest and safety depend upon the most foolish and most inconstant opinions of the common people?

CHAPTER XVI

The Prince Must Establish Nothing in Religion

§ 1. To the prince is entrusted the care of protecting true religion; nevertheless, he has absolutely no power to institute or innovate it. The magistrate is the foster-father of the Church; he bears the sword for the vengeance of the evil and the protection of the good. By "evil" I mean thieves, the incestuous, robbers, blasphemers, and the impious. For he avenges not only his own majesty, but much more the divine majesty, which is true and immense, of which every majesty that appears great and dreadful to human eyes in purple and diadem is an ἀπόῤῥοια--a streamlet and trace. Certainly it is fitting that the Best be worshipped by the best, the divine power by the prince, and the King of all kings especially by all kings. Thus Aristotle too, in book 7, chapter 8 of the Politics, says that the first royal care is τὴν περὶ θεῶν ἐπιμέλειαν, the solicitude that concerns divine things.

Let it therefore remain certain and fixed that the prince himself ought to be religious, a keen guardian of religion, and a vigilant avenger of impiety.

§ 2. The prince will nevertheless attend diligently to this: that he himself does not innovate the ancient religion or fashion any articles under the name of reformation. For the prince is not the arbiter of religion but its disciple. Let him hold in mind, and demonstrate in practice, that piety is to be cultivated and not rendered perplexed by political edicts. Let him hear Saint Cyprian, Epistle 73: "Nor, dearest brother, do we propose this without the authority of divine Scripture: that we say that all things have been arranged by God under a certain law and proper ordinance, and that no one can usurp for himself, against bishops and priests, anything which is not within his own right and power. For Korah, Dathan, and Abiram also attempted to usurp for themselves, against Moses and Aaron the priest, the license of sacrificing; yet they did not do with impunity what they unlawfully dared."

There are many enactments on this matter not only of the holy Fathers but also of emperors and kings. It is not within my undertaking to pursue them all; I shall admonish only concerning those which pertain to polity and government.

§ 3. The first reason is that the administration of the commonwealth is connected with religion, as I demonstrated in my book On the Peace of Germany. Therefore, when religion is changed, a disturbance or change of the commonwealth must follow. And since true religion is one, while departures from it and mutually conflicting sects are infinite, it will belong to princes to permit no departure from the truth. For since the stimulus of religion is vehement, and there are many who refuse to abandon ancient things even when death is set before them, the indignation of many and discord of all arise.

Next, when the kings of Egypt fabricate or permit new superstitions, they gave the strength of the kingdom to be torn apart by civil contentions. Nebuchadnezzar almost deprived himself of his most faithful and prudent chief men when he disturbed his subjects by the dedication of a new statue. Antiochus the Illustrious for the same reason destroyed both his kingdom and himself when he persecuted the piety of the Jews. If he had defended it and wished to have so brave a nation as a friend amid so many wars, he could easily have obtained dominion over all Asia. Thus Constantius, Valens, Justina, Justinian, Heraclius, Leo the Isaurian, and others innovated religion to the greatest harm of the commonwealth.

§ 4. The second reason is taken from the nature of magistracy and the court. For since every power is liable to flatteries, men readily creep in under an appearance of sanctity who pervert magnates by lying and flattering. Thus Constantius was led astray by Eusebius, Valens by the Eusebians, and Leo the Isaurian by a Jewish sorcerer. An impostor who was a Monothelite corrupted Justinian when he was already old. But whatever rests not upon divine institution but upon human things is wholly fluid and momentary.

No clearer example of this principle exists than the calamities of our own age display to us. Because by a certain law the princes in Germany regulate religion according to their own judgment, there is hence so great a variety and ignorance of religions that almost no religion survives. Because this is not yet wholly evident to foreign nations, it must be shown clearly and forcibly.

It is the hundredth year since Luther, led by weariness with the ancient faith, together with disgust for monastic discipline and by ambition, laid the foundations of a new heresy. Meanwhile, all things have changed, so that Germany appears to me not unlike ancient Egypt, in which the madness of all superstitions aroused daily disturbances and wars. In this one respect the condition of Germany is worse than that of Egypt: the Germans move about in perpetual change, and things which have pleased them rashly very quickly displease them, whereas the superstition of the Egyptians was more constant.

In these days a man came to me and offered a paper containing an invitation to the jubilee of the γνησίως (genuine) Lutheran churches. For ten Lutheran doctors incite all the others to jubilate because Luther made his attack upon the pontiff one hundred years ago. Behold absurdities most worthy of laughter, if the malicious blindness of these most wretched human beings did not call instead for pity and tears.

This rejoicing must therefore be treated, so that the whole world may recognize that there is no constancy in a religion which depends upon the opinion of princes. For this reason the Zwinglians two years ago prudently kept silent concerning their own jubilee, lest they furnish laughter to everyone: they are scattered into so many sects, of which none retains the Zwinglian archetype--indeed, there is none which is not compelled to condemn Zwingli. Although I have disputed copiously concerning this matter in three books--namely, The Jubilee of Jubilees, its Apology, and its Coronis--the disasters of our fatherland are not to be repeated here. From those books magistrates will see how, through the vaunting of religions, faith and piety, and finally human beings and kingdoms, perish.

§ 5. First, those ten commissioners jubilate and exult over the worst affairs, while meanwhile the other Lutherans are so oppressed that, unless moderate men intervene, there is danger that they will be compelled to migrate to Veii or the Sacred Mount. For the condition of the γνησίως Lutheran churches was already miserable fifty-seven years ago and, in their own judgment, almost desperate; but now it is much more afflicted. Yet it is preferable to hear the whole tragedy from themselves. No one lies to his own disgrace. In its preface, the Synod of Mansfeld, an eloquent herald of its own miseries with grief and groaning, expresses the progress of political religion:

“But it is not so greatly to be wondered at,” they say, “that the opinions and sects of fanatical human beings are daily multiplied.

“First, because, since truth is unwelcome to human beings and they do not acknowledge the goodness of God, God is accustomed, in order to punish this sin, to send effective and signal errors, so that human beings believe a lie and are punished for the very reason that they do not believe the truth but delight in injustice. Second Thessalonians 2.

“Second, sects must grow because truly all princes and magistrates neglect their duty in this matter and instead strengthen the wantonness of intellects, because they permit anyone the license to fabricate according to his judgment any false opinion whatever.

“Third, those fat and powerful doctors, as the Psalm calls them, the authors of sects, unite with one another with the greatest effort; they mutually protect the same opinions and the same dispositions. They live peaceably with one another; one defends and excuses another. And although a man may by no means approve another’s sect, he nevertheless loves him, so that it happens as is commonly said: ‘Spare me, so that I may spare you; at least close your eyes if you do not wish to approve, and I shall do the same.’ Thus it often happens that some heresiarch does not attack another’s sect which he does not approve; and if for a time he does something, he nevertheless does not persevere. For this reason the prophet David complains with grief in Psalm 17 concerning the success of heretics, when he says: ‘Their fat ones are joined together.’

“Fourth, the matter has now come to such a pass that many at this time account it a place of shame and disgrace to oppose false brethren and the authors of sects by voice or writings, although this was always the greatest honor in the Church and was celebrated as a true proof of Christian virtue.

“Fifth, what prevents various heresies from arising at this time, when no human beings must endure greater insults, injuries, curses, and taunts than those very men who oppose fanatical doctors? Indeed, by way of insult they are called Stoics--that is, harsh and precipitate men, who wish to have nothing in common with others and to whom nothing belonging to others is pleasing--as though it were a great virtue to be most lightly and even willingly seized and carried about by every wind and breath of false dogmas.

“Next, they are called clamorous--that is, wranglers and brawlers, who with full lips and importunate shouting sound the trumpet-call for the sedition and tumult of human beings. They do not see that the deed they censure decrees the highest praise to us. For it is more tolerable and better to play Cato and the Stoic in these affairs and shout until hoarse than by shameful silence to throw all windows open to frauds. For the wolf is driven off not by silence but by a voice. We pass over the fact that Scripture itself commends the cries of prophets and doctors and, conversely, censures silence so greatly that it compares Silenuses and Mutiuses of this kind to mute dogs.

“Sixth, fanatical human beings have sufficient opportunities to grow at this time because, through a certain dread and fear of losing tranquillity, fortunes, favor, and praise, almost all sincere doctors also remain silent, act feebly, and with horrible rashness and unconcern commit the business to itself and its own fortune. And although some cry out, nevertheless, since they are most shamefully deserted by others, they cannot alone sustain upon their shoulders the mass of so great a business.

“Seventh, even if any sincere doctors still survive and have not yet been infected by the poison of fanatical opinions, they are nevertheless feeble, fearful, and of a spirit somewhat too abject to be willing to incur danger for truth. They therefore remain at rest and are spectators of that drama, although at first they do not wish to applaud it. But if the catastrophe is favorable to the other party--namely, to those men who shout and scribble--they wish it to be favorable to themselves also and arrogate no small part of the victory to their own courage and constancy. But if the contrary happens, as a good cause is often oppressed by violence, they withdraw their neck from the noose, professing that nothing was done by them, and therefore for the sake of external peace surrender themselves, against their conscience, to the others, whose cause is unjust. When heretics therefore observe this,

“that we do not press our purpose together and with the same fidelity, they are emboldened, maliciously and obstinately cling to the falsehoods they have instituted, and repeatedly devise other new ones.

“Eighth, sects also grow because of that new tyranny which arises in the Church. If anyone does not immediately approve another’s error, he incurs the indignation and offense of the more powerful and is often endangered in his life. The applauders of sects establish this tyranny in others; and they themselves are so far from being free of this tyranny that they cannot restrain themselves even when the most humane conferences and dealings are instituted with them. Thus they strike human beings so that they can no longer profess their own opinion freely. Accordingly, all devote themselves to this one thing: that they force errors upon others by a tyrant’s violence. Nevertheless, with God’s help, they will not do this forever. AMEN.”

CHAPTER XVII

The Method of Preserving True Religion

§ 1. First, indeed, this one thing must be done in the commonwealth: that one true and ancient faith, handed down by the Scriptures and apostolic tradition and known to the holy Fathers, be taught and preserved after all superstitions have been torn out.

For the conflicts of those who think differently not only rupture peace, but also break covenants, religion, and fear of the divine power joined with veneration. For no one readily enters into friendship with one whom he knows to be an enemy of God. And the illustrious example of Theodoric, commander of Africa, is praised: for although he was an Arian, he nevertheless immediately killed a deacon who had defected to Arianism in order to gain the prince's favor--not through an error of understanding, but through the baseness of flattery; for he judged that one who had violated faith with God would not keep faith with him. Without faith, therefore, friendship cannot exist, since friendship is agreement in human and divine things together with charity. This agreement does not exist if each regards the other as impious and detestable. Then all strive, with a certain great desire, to protect and increase their own religion. Our age teaches this, which has seen no heresy so foul, so abhorrent from piety and reason, that it has not embraced it most eagerly--although, as is the custom of those who love greatly, it has very quickly grown weary of it. Hence the most bloody wars are those waged from an opinion of piety, in which killing is judged holiness and falling in battle happiness. No regard is had for affections or kinships; public and domestic peace is disturbed; battles are mingled in the same house; the magistrate necessarily has one part of the people, and often both, as an enemy, for he can comply with only one; and his authority falls, since he is judged impious and profane by the greater number. But these matters have already been discussed above. Let us now set forth the means of preserving religion.

§ 2. The first thing, and as it were the foundation for preserving truth and faith, is to resist vices, beat down the arrogance of subjects, restrain lusts, and set a limit to avarice. No heresy has ever arisen for its own sake: through the novelty of a superstition, nourishment or impunity has been sought for some vice. A human being whom his crimes weigh down is readily driven into error; and just as there are certain prognoses of diseases in a human being, so in the commonwealth there are προγνώσεις, and conjectures, of heresies and superstitions. Seneca speaks truly in Book III of On Anger, chapter 10:

"It is an old saying that a weary man seeks a quarrel. But the same is true of a hungry and a thirsty man, and of every human being whom anything torments. For just as sores hurt at a light touch, and afterward even at the suspicion of a touch, so an afflicted mind takes offense at the slightest thing, to such a degree that a greeting, a letter, a speech, and a question summon certain persons into a quarrel. Diseased parts are never touched without complaint. It is therefore best to apply a remedy to oneself at the first sensation of the evil; then also to grant the least possible liberty to one's own words and to check the impulse. But it is easy to detect one's passions when they first arise: signs precede the disease. Just as indications of storm and rain come before the things themselves, so there are certain forerunners of anger, love, and all those tempests which torment minds. Those who are accustomed to be seized by epilepsy understand that an attack is already approaching if warmth has left the extremities, if their sight is wavering and there is a trembling of the sinews, if memory slips away and the head grows dizzy. They therefore anticipate the incipient cause with their customary remedies, and whatever estranges the mind is repelled by smell and taste; or they fight cold and stiffness with fomentations; or, if the medicine has accomplished too little, they avoid the crowd and fall without a witness. It will profit us to know our disease and to crush its powers before they have room to spread. Let us see what it is that especially excites us. One person is moved by insults in words, another by insults in deeds. This man wishes his nobility to be spared, that man his beauty; one desires to be accounted the most elegant, another the most learned; this one is intolerant of pride, that one of obstinacy; one does not think slaves worthy of his anger; this one is savage within his house and mild outside it; one judges it an odium to be asked, another an insult not to be asked. Not all are struck on the same side."

Heresies arise on account of each of these things: hope has driven one person, fear another, indignation another, drunkenness another, and lust and ambition very many, into new opinions and sects.

§ 3. A prudent magistrate will observe and correct these things in the commonwealth. The ambition of Jeroboam alone introduced superstition among the ten tribes; partly ambition and partly court hatreds produced the dissensions of the Pharisees and Sadducees, when hypocrites began to creep up to powerful men by evil arts. This is, and always has been, the disposition of heretics: before they rendered themselves unworthy of the fellowship of the faithful and liable to punishments through error and obstinacy, and before they separated themselves with the loss of the people, they did so through crimes. What Cyprian writes concerning Novatus in Epistle 49 applies to them all:

"For nothing concerning Novatus needed to be reported from there to you, since he ought rather to be exposed to you by us: Novatus, always greedy for revolutions, raging with the insatiable rapacity of avarice, swollen with the arrogance and stupor of a proud swelling, always ill-known to the bishops here, always condemned by the voice of all the priests as a heretic and a perfidious man; always inquisitive in order to betray, flattering in addition in order to deceive, never faithful in order to love; a firebrand and flame for kindling the conflagrations of sedition, a whirlwind and tempest for bringing about shipwrecks of faith, an enemy of quiet, an adversary of tranquillity, a foe of peace."

Then he describes his character in such a way that he seems to portray the wrathfulness of Hus, the luxury of Luther, the cruelty of Zwingli, the lusts of Calvin and Beza, and the secret murders of the Anabaptists:

"Nor," he says, "should anyone wonder at this in such men. Evil men are always carried along, demented by their own fury, and after they have committed crimes they are agitated by the very consciousness of a criminal mind. Nor can those remain in the Church of God who have maintained neither divine and ecclesiastical discipline in the conduct of their actions nor the peace of good morals. People despoiled by him, widows defrauded, and monies also denied to the Church exact from him those punishments which we behold in his madness. His father also died of hunger in a village, and afterward, at his death, was not even buried by him. His wife's womb was struck by his heel, and, the miscarriage being hastened, the offspring was forced out unto parricide. And does he now dare to condemn the hands of those who sacrifice, when he himself is more guilty in the feet by which the son who was being born was killed? He had long feared this consciousness of his crimes. On this account he held it as certain that he would not only be expelled from the presbyterate but also prohibited from communion; and, as the brethren pressed the matter, the day of examination was imminent, on which his cause would be heard before us, had persecution not come first. Receiving this as a certain object of prayer whereby he might escape and gain exemption from condemnation, he committed and confounded all these things, so that he who was due to be cast out of and excluded from the Church might anticipate the judgment of the priests by a voluntary departure--as though to have anticipated the sentence were to have escaped the punishment."

Such things apply to all the ancients. Lust drove Nicolaus of Antioch into heresy; no cause other than monstrous lusts severed Cerinthus, Menander, the Gnostics, and the Manichaeans from the Church. It is not necessary to speak of the Donatists, Arians, Macedonians, and Mohammedans. Concerning Luther, Oecolampadius, Carlstadt, Zwingli, Calvin, Menno, and the rest, they themselves bear mutual witness that they were most corrupt in disposition, practice, and morals. The magistrate, therefore, should hold as entrusted to himself what the Apostle sets before Timothy, 1 Timothy 1:18: "This precept I entrust to you, son Timothy, according to the prophecies going before concerning you, that in them you may wage the good warfare, having faith and a good conscience, which some, rejecting, have suffered shipwreck concerning the faith; among whom are Hymenaeus and Alexander, whom I have delivered to Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme."

§ 4. The second thing is that sacred doctrine be investigated with great care and zeal; that suitable teachers be appointed; and that they labor to teach, preach, catechize, and profit others by word and example. For since faith is from hearing: "How shall they believe him whom they have not heard?" Romans 10:14. "And how shall they hear without one preaching? But how shall they preach unless they are sent? As it is written: How beautiful are the feet of those who proclaim peace, of those who proclaim good things! But not all obey the Gospel. For Isaiah says: Lord, who has believed our report? Therefore faith is from hearing, and hearing through the word of Christ. But I say: Have they not heard? Indeed, their sound has gone forth into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the whole world."

For there was no other cause of so many errors than that sacred doctrine was neglected, and ignorant, profane men and soldiers occupied the benefices, priesthoods, and honors of the learned: little children wailing in their cradles were made bishops; scarcely born, they were already abbots.

§ 5. The third thing, which I have already advised above, is that even those whose dignity, as it is superior to every command, is likewise accustomed to be impatient of admonitions, should hear bishops and teachers. Most praiseworthy is that law of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, Augusti, Title 2, law With every innovation ceasing: "We command that antiquity and the ancient ecclesiastical canons, which have prevailed until now, be preserved also throughout all the provinces of Illyricum; so that, if any matter of doubt should arise, it ought to be reserved--not without the knowledge of the most reverend man, the bishop of the holy law of the Church of the city of Constantinople, which rejoices in the prerogative of ancient Rome--for a sacerdotal assembly and holy judgment."

Those emperors acted excellently, according to the mind and judgment of Constantine the Great, who attended the Council of Nicaea not as lord, but as disciple. Theodosius not only valued Ambrose, who opposed and rebuked him, more highly than the flatterers of his purple, but also loved him. For flattery, when it becomes apparent, offends great men, because it is a reproach of pride; sincerity is loved, because it is confidence in virtue. Since bishops have been commanded by the severe law of God to persevere in teaching, admonishing, reproving, and punishing, even when death is proposed as the penalty, no one ought to doubt that the necessity of obeying has been imposed upon all, since so weighty a province of ecclesiastical government is enjoined upon them. But if that principle is removed, truth cannot be defended for long. Golden are the admonitions--but strong ones, and given to the strong--of the most valiant martyr Saint Cyprian in Epistle 55:

"But if the matter is thus, dearest brother, that the boldness of the most wicked is feared, and that which evil men cannot accomplish by law and equity they accomplish by rashness and desperation, then it is all over with the vigor of the episcopate and with the sublime and divine power of governing the Church; nor can we any longer either endure as Christians or be Christians, if matters have come to this, that we should fear the threats and snares of the lost. For Gentiles and Jews threaten, and heretics and all whose breasts and minds the devil has besieged daily testify with a furious voice to their poisoned rage; nevertheless one must not yield merely because they threaten, nor is the adversary and enemy therefore greater than Christ because he claims and assumes so much for himself in the world. There must remain with us, dearest brother, the immovable strength of faith, and a stable and unshaken virtue must withstand all assaults and attacks of the barking waves, by the strength and mass of an opposing rock. Nor does it matter whence terror or danger comes to a bishop, who lives exposed to terrors and dangers and yet is rendered glorious by those very terrors and dangers. For we ought not to consider and behold only the threats of Gentiles or Jews, when we see that the Lord himself was seized by his brethren and betrayed by him whom he himself had chosen as an Apostle; and in the beginnings of the world none but a brother killed righteous Abel, and a hostile brother pursued the fleeing Jacob, and the boy Joseph was sold by his brethren; while in the Gospel also we read it to have been foretold that those of one's household would be enemies the more, and that those who had first been joined by the sacrament of unanimity would themselves deliver one another up. It matters nothing who delivers up or rages, when God permits those whom he disposes to be crowned to be delivered up. For it is no disgrace to us to suffer from brethren what Christ suffered; nor is it glory to them to do what Judas did."

§ 6. The fourth thing is that provision be made aright not only for the learning and integrity of life of bishops and teachers, but that they also be fortified with resources and authority. For if the dignity of governors and judges must be strengthened so that by the excellence of lawful power they may settle civil controversies, with how much ampler majesty must those be adorned who judge concerning heavenly and eternal matters? I am not unaware that the resources of bishops and the clergy appear excessive to many; but I shall dispute concerning that matter in the book on the ecclesiastical magistracy. For now I advise that it profits the commonwealth very greatly if the resources of the churches are great. For first, if the prelates of religion live upon a very slender crust of bread, they are turned toward cares for bodily things; and not only do they lose the opportunity for studies, but they cannot even procure suitable books.

Then they are readily despised not only by the rich and arrogant, but also by the moderate. For this reason the Romans, among whom worshipers of the gods were nevertheless held in great contempt, and some were even infamous, added dignity together with the thing itself to the supreme pontiff. Certainly under the old law the majesty of the priesthood was not much less than that of the kingdom, and at length it even coalesced with the kingdom. Third, experience has taught that, when priests are occupied with solicitude for domestic affairs and distracted by the evils of their household, the teachers themselves treat sacred doctrine incidentally and hold it, as it were, in second place; for their first care is living, their second teaching. Hence, if we look upon the Lutherans and Calvinists, we shall easily see that, after the heat of the first fury subsided, and after the multitude of apostates--who, educated in Catholic academies, turned their knowledge into poisons--failed, all things are full of ignorance, impiety, and contentions, and that the name of evangelical ministers is now utterly despised. For because most of them are fathers of families and poor, they are led more by hunger than by piety to retail fables to the people. Hence through fear and hope they are pliable in every direction, and, as actors are accustomed to do, they accommodate themselves to the theater. They hold their reputation and the opinion of their constancy cheap while they gape after the increase of their property.

Therefore, in order that the prince may have prelates and teachers of religion who are constant, of good reputation, noble, powerful, and faithful to the kingdom, he will increase their advantages and will even entrust fortresses and courts to them, as we see done in the Empire and in other kingdoms. For since they are devoted to peace and have remote from them causes for raising tumult, they very greatly assist the cause of the commonwealth.

§ 7. The fifth thing, and a solid safeguard against novelty and discord, is that the handles and beginnings of contentions be cut off, the wantonness of intellects be restrained, and those who judge it more glorious to dispute than to live be banished betimes. The king of Britain shrewdly advised the nobles of Holland to crush the Arminians in the blade; if they had done this, there would have been no need to fight against so great a crop.

This evil is not in the people but in the leading men, and it was so of old. Cyprian, Epistle 64: “But as to contention and guile, what does it concern me to speak, when those vices are more grievous not among the common people, but in our own number?” The mother of these diseases, however, is pride and the greed for human praise, which also often begets hypocrisy.

True is the complaint of a great man: “For often I have perceived, with sorrow and groaning, that many disturbances among the weak are brought about through the contentious obstinacy or superstitious timidity of certain brethren. In matters of this kind, which can be brought to no certain conclusion either by the authority of Holy Scripture, by the tradition of the universal Church, or by usefulness for the correction of life--merely because there lies beneath them some manner of reasoning on the part of the person thinking, or because he himself was thus accustomed in his own country, or because he saw it where he regards his sojourn, the farther removed from his own people, as having made him the more learned--they stir up questions so litigious that they judge nothing right except what they themselves do.”

When this zeal for contention rushes upon the commonwealth and religion, it excites the greatest quarrels and hatreds among the closest friends and carries them into the contrary error. Thus Eutyches, by assailing Nestorius, plunged into heresy.

§ 8. Frederick, Elector Palatine, acted advisedly of old when, at the beginning of the changed religion, the Academy of Heidelberg was divided into two factions, Lutheran and Calvinist: he enjoined silence upon both parties. The nobles of Holland acted advisedly when they endeavored to establish concord between the old and new Calvinists and commanded that no one accuse or condemn another of impiety. But where superstition is at issue on both sides, there can be no stable concord, unlike when the liberty of error against truth is taken away. At the beginning of emerging heresies, all demanded, as if by a certain right, the authority of Scripture and the liberty of prophesying or interpreting. But that liberty of errors afflicted the commonwealth in many ways. For it always changes everything, and soon seeks again what it changed, or turns it in another direction. Julian, the most cunning tyrant and apostate, was not ignorant of this; for by an entirely new kind of persecution he inflicted more damage upon the churches than by raging against them. For he permitted each person to live according to his own judgment and to teach according to his own rite, so that by license he might increase the dissensions of Christians.

But if the magistrate should seriously weigh the evils that emerge, he will readily understand that, just as, if license to steal, commit adultery, and rob is permitted, all crimes and shameful acts will soon inundate everything, so, where wickedness has been introduced of thinking about God at will, of blaspheming, and of impious ceremonies and rites--a wickedness destined to range most freely against everything and everyone--the commonwealth must necessarily collapse.

§ 9. The sixth safeguard for preserving religion is the prudent force and compulsion, fines, and punishments employed by the prince and every magistrate according to the laws. I know that it appears harsh to give laws to free minds and bind consciences, since each person ought to be the arbiter of his own salvation or destruction, and God himself is not accustomed to compel anyone to salvation. Indeed, this appears absurd to many, since that severity of laws makes hypocrites, not worshipers of true piety. Do you think that by threats and fear of torments you can compel anyone to love God, or to judge true what he thinks is false?

Nevertheless, not only has this right been given to the prince, but without the crime of neglecting his duty he can in no way omit some severity. When Saint Augustine was consulted concerning this matter, he answered in this manner:

“It displeases you that you are dragged to salvation, although you have dragged so many of ours to destruction. For what do we wish except that you be apprehended and brought forward and preserved, lest you perish? But whatever injury you have suffered in your body, you did to yourself, for you refused to use the beast of burden immediately brought to you and dashed yourself heavily upon the ground. For indeed the other man who was brought with you, your colleague, arrived unhurt, because he did no such things to himself. But you do not think that even this ought to have been done to you, because you judge that no one should be compelled to good. Attend to what the Apostle said: ‘He who desires the episcopate desires a good work’; and nevertheless, in order that they may undertake the episcopate, so many are held unwillingly, led away, shut in, guarded, and suffer so many things which they do not wish, until there is present in them the will to undertake the good work. How much more must you be dragged away from the pernicious error in which you are enemies to us and led to the truth, either to recognize or to choose it--not only that you may possess honor wholesomely, but also that you may not perish most wickedly. You say that God gave free will and that therefore a human being ought not to be compelled even to good. Why, then, are those of whom I spoke above compelled to good? Attend, therefore, to what you do not wish to consider. A good will is mercifully bestowed precisely so that a human being’s evil will may be directed. For who does not know that a human being is condemned only by the desert of an evil will, and is delivered only if he has had a good will? Nevertheless, those who are loved must not therefore be permitted, with impunity and cruelty, to follow their evil will; but, where power is given, they must both be prohibited from evil and compelled to good.

“For if an evil will must always be permitted its own liberty, why were the Israelites, refusing and murmuring, prohibited from evil by such harsh scourges and compelled toward the Promised Land? If an evil will must be permitted its own liberty, why was Paul not permitted to go where he was going with the most wicked will by which he persecuted the Church, but was laid low that he might be blinded, and blinded that he might be changed, changed that he might be sent, and sent that he might suffer for truth the same things that he had done in error? If an evil will must always be permitted its own liberty, why is a father admonished in the Holy Scriptures not only to rebuke a stubborn son with words, but also to beat his sides, so that, compelled and subdued, he may be directed to good discipline? Hence the same Scripture says: ‘You indeed strike him with the rod, but you deliver his soul from death.’ If an evil will must always be permitted its own liberty, why are negligent shepherds rebuked, and why is it said to them: ‘You did not call back the wandering sheep; you did not seek the lost’? You too are Christ’s sheep; you bear the Lord’s mark in the sacrament which you received, but you wander and perish.

“Let us not therefore be displeased with ourselves because we call back the wandering and seek the lost. For we do the will of the Lord, who admonishes us to compel you to return to his fold, better than we would consent to the will of wandering sheep and permit you to perish. Therefore do not now say what I hear you say continually: ‘Thus I wish to wander; thus I wish to perish.’ For we do not permit this at all, so far as we are able. Just now, when you cast yourself into the well so that you might die, you assuredly did so by free will. But how cruel would the servants of God be if they permitted you this evil will and did not deliver you from that death? Who would not deservedly blame them? Who would not rightly judge them impious? And yet you willingly cast yourself into the water so that you might die; they raised you unwilling from the water, lest you die. You acted according to your will, but unto your destruction; they acted contrary to your will, but for the sake of your salvation. If, therefore, this bodily salvation must be guarded in such a way that it is preserved even in the unwilling by those who love them, how much more must that spiritual salvation be guarded, in the desertion of which eternal death is feared?”

§ 10. The seventh thing is what was customary of old: the prohibition of pestilential books. To our sectaries this indeed appeared unjust at the beginning, but now they themselves employ the same law, and prohibit not only books of the Calvinists but even those of their own people. There are the complaints of Illyricus and of others: that the presses of Wittenberg and Leipzig stand open to some and are closed to the rest. Since our most learned Jacob Gretser has written most accurately concerning this matter, I refer the reader to him.

CHAPTER XVIII

The Method of Restoring True Religion

§ 1. Most of the things that have been said concerning the preservation of truth and religion also avail for bringing those who wander back into the way. Yet they must be handled in one way and another by political men. Truth is discovered with difficulty, but it is persuaded to one who wanders with much greater difficulty. Nevertheless, it is the prince's duty to apply himself also to this: that depraved opinions be removed from the midst, that his own honor be restored to God, and that provision be made for the salvation of souls that are perishing.

§ 2. The first method is that what musicians do with strings, so as to bring them back little by little into harmony, and physicians in diseases, who draw off harmful humors piecemeal and at intervals, must likewise be done in a commonwealth which labors under the sickness of errors and superstitions. I do not approve the slow and ineffectual advances of the languid, when the undertaking is often abandoned; I counsel that all things which can be applied be attempted, but with a slow and firm step, lest the work be precipitated. Gentle commands and admonitions are of the greatest advantage here.

§ 3. Second: it would be difficult for no prince of Europe, if only he wished it, to recall the minds of human beings to the ancient rites of our forefathers--a thing which formerly was thought never to be possible. For many now begin to love the ancient religion, and they cannot be induced by any calumnies of the ministers to prevent many from returning every year to Catholic unity:

> So greatly can long-lived age change things.

What they most ardently desired, they now disdain or even hate. That levity of the common people which marvels at new things and despises old ones is fatal. Therefore, when heresy was in its course, it could be stopped or checked by no force; afterward it proceeded more languidly, and, divided and dashed against itself, lost its impetus; finally it turned backward. Many provinces of Germany, after undergoing several religions, now retain none, their attention fixed upon the will of their lords. The cause of this matter, as I have said, is levity and ignorance of the truth. Another reason is that they cannot long remain ignorant of the wickedness of heresies and heretics, and that they experience everything being changed in almost every single year. Of their own accord they depart in different directions, so that they cannot stand for long. Just as, if you release a crowd of blind persons from a prison, it is easier for none than for all to reach the goal, so, if the magistrate prudently uses this argument, they will permit themselves to be led spontaneously into the way, weary of so many pathless places and having experienced so many deceits of criminal apostates.

§ 4. Therefore one must act with this gentleness, unless perhaps those heresies are of a kind which admit no delay, such as those of the Müntzerites and Anabaptists, and of those who rise up against the magistracy. For, like acute diseases, these deny place and time to a slow medicine; therefore they must be suppressed by a swift and perilous remedy.

§ 5. Third, heresiarchs and teachers of errors must be driven from the commonwealth--on one occasion, indeed, if it can conveniently be done; but if not, gradually and little by little. There is no need of proof in this matter. For, once the turbulent and dizzy Aeoluses have been driven away, the sea which they stirred from its deepest bottom will grow quiet of its own accord. And an error which lacks patronage will fall without a battle. Therefore those emperors who punished Arius, Nestorius, Vigilantius, and others with exile can never be praised enough; but execrable were the Vandals who trampled assembled priests and bishops in Africa beneath horses, or transported them to desert places. There are many reasons for expelling violators of religion, although they scatter their poisons with the people's favor; but the magistrate will do this lawfully and justly, and will allow no calumny to be inflicted. Three powerful princes of Germany effected a change from the Lutheran religion to the Calvinist, or, as they themselves call it, the Reformed: the Elector Palatine, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Margrave of Brandenburg, also an elector. And although almost all their subjects hated Zwinglianism, they accomplished that transfer without any tumult--except that Berlin presumed to grow angry.

§ 6. In these changes I have observed approximately the following things from the history of the religion changed in the Palatinate, from the Marburg proceedings, and from the Brandenburg edict.

First, they concealed the intention of changing religion and extirpating Lutheranism--not, indeed, so that the more prudent would remain ignorant of it, but lest the people be disturbed.

Second, by the artifice of the Zwinglians certain persons were suborned to request the exercise of the Reformed religion, and to do so with many gentle words, lest the prince appear inclined of his own accord toward a hateful novelty, but rather appear to indulge the consciences of his subjects, and to love and foster liberty. For a prince's affability is commonly praised when he shows himself able to be entreated even in those matters which it would have been better to deny.

Third, one church, or a second, was requested for them. Not even this appeared harsh to the people, since they would retain several and were not excessively solicitous about those.

Fourth, here nevertheless the jealousy of the Lutherans opposed itself, for they perceived that, together with a church, revenue and sustenance were being taken away. The sagacious foresight of the politicians was not ignorant of this, and therefore they contrived a conference and pacification. They met at court; the matter was argued in the prince's council; a notary and witnesses were denied. This must by no means be approved; rather, if a conference is to be instituted, liberty and advantages proper to each party must be left to it. For those who have been pressed by another's power and have occupied the worse position are judged the victors--as were the Arminians in Holland, since, if those whom the prince's favor protected trusted their cause, they ought to have contended with equal right and arms.

Fifth, a decree was published concerning not calumniating, not contending, not condemning others beforehand, and concerning fostering peace and concord. This edict of the princes was effective for the instituted change of religion. For in this way it was brought about that no one dared contradict the Calvinists, Zwinglians, and Sacramentarians--indeed, dared not even name them. But error made much progress when it obtained this: that it should not be uncovered. Yet not even then did any of the people make a disturbance, since otherwise many of the more moderate detest contentious and insulting sermons. For this reason, therefore, the prince was not reviled as a patron of heresies, but praised as a lover of peace, especially since he permitted thesis and antithesis to be taught.

Sixth, an academic disputation was instituted with a Calvinist presiding, who afterward was also appointed ordinary professor.

Seventh, not even after all these things did it appear that this had been done so that Zwinglianism should succeed Lutheranism, but so that peace should be established. For nothing else was then required than that the Lutherans, retaining both dignities and revenues, should be willing to sit and deliberate together with the Reformed in the consistory concerning ecclesiastical matters. When they refused this, they were accused as proud, obstinate, disobedient to the magistrate, and seemed to have deserved dismissal, because they spurned their colleagues and peace.

All these things had thus far been transacted in such a way that they might test what the people could bear. For if a tumult arose, if the co-guardians who had been appointed with John Casimir for the purpose that he should not change the religion bestirred themselves, there was a plausible excuse for these proceedings.

Eighth, when the people of Heidelberg petitioned for the retention of the Lutheran preachers, the matter was passed over in silence, and meanwhile it was arranged that those preachers should be represented as excessively obstinate and headstrong. The common people therefore easily desisted from their petition; and if those who were present displeased them, they requested at least other men, more moderate and suited to peace. For they believed that the offense was against the men, not hatred of Lutheranism; and therefore they continued to hope, and, while there was hope that liberty of belief could be obtained by entreaties, they abstained from force, until finally they laid aside concern for Lutheranism and hope.

Ninth, when everything now appeared secure, the Lutherans were commanded to depart from the parochial house; all the churches were given to the Calvinists. Those who were being driven into exile did not dare complain, but, turned toward domestic cares, requested posthumous and honorific pay, immunity from taxes, and similar things, while the Calvinists laughed profusely that a matter of so great a mass had come down to such humble and abject entreaties.

Tenth, since the academic auditors were Lutherans, they too were dealt with by various arts. Calvinism was offered to the pensioners, or electoral alumni, or dismissal was placed before them; a Zwinglian catechism was forced upon all in place of the Lutheran one. Thus in a brief moment the greatest conversion occurred, as though without movement; for the rural preachers readily changed opinions with the prince.

Eleventh, in the Hessian change I also noted this: that when the Lutherans, both academic professors and preachers, refused to yield their offices and honors, the prince said that he wondered at this, since he had not yet received them into those positions and put them in possession; for at the death of the deceased prince their places too had become vacant, and the rights were in his own power.

Twelfth, in Hesse too they proceeded slowly and piecemeal. Calvinism was not presented whole, but only a certain part which seemed small--namely, the restoration of the precepts of the Decalogue and the breaking of bread. And so, although at the beginning the people of Marburg anxiously ran to the sermons of the Lutherans whom they had heard were about to depart, and took the Supper, they nevertheless afterward made no disturbance, but gradually migrate to Calvinism, being destined to obey much more readily if they are summoned elsewhere--namely, into Arminianism or another sect.

Thirteenth, writings followed from both sides, but those whose favor came from the court prevailed. Moreover, it helped very greatly that the wickedness in morals of the Lutheran ministers became known; on this account they dishonorably dismissed certain of them beneath the gallows.

§ 7. The fourth method is one which I see was employed of old and is now also in vigor--namely, that those who are opposed to true religion be barred from honors, dignities, and public offices. Nor is it unjust that one who obstructs the safety of the commonwealth should not obtain honors and resources from the commonwealth. Those accused of great crimes are barred from honors; why should blasphemers and despisers of truth be admitted?

Theodosius thus decreed; and before him the three sons of Constantine the Great took away from heretics all privileges which had been granted out of regard for religion, On Heretics, law Privileges. Frederick condemns not only heretics but also those who receive and favor them, and commands that, unless they make satisfaction within a year, they be infamous. He also commands that they not be employed for public offices or councils, or for electing anyone, and adds other penalties which were noted above in the constitution. There are many advantages to this policy. For if adversaries of religion are in dignity, they will have many means by which they may oppose themselves to the prince and harass his subjects without the prince’s knowledge. For no one who maintains a religion different from that of his prince is as faithful to him as he is to others with whom he agrees. Then subjects come more slowly to truth when they see their own perfidy honored in the associates of their errors. Third, only the true and Catholic faith grows by persecution, because it alone rests upon hope of future goods; superstitions, unless perhaps in the first impetus, are diminished and vanish when advantages are taken away. Certain princes of Germany understood how important this matter was at the last diet held at Regensburg. For they requested that the Emperor choose court counselors in equal number from the different religions, although they themselves do not employ Catholics--indeed, neither do the Lutherans employ Calvinists, nor the Calvinists Lutherans.

§ 8. The fifth method is that, when some entire heresy is to be extirpated, and this must be done moderately and by reason, not by sheer command, those things should first be seized upon which are ill-reputed among the common people and which at first sight display their absurdity even to the unlearned. The Calvinists furnish an example. In order that they might easily wear down the authority of the Lutherans, they often employed the name of Luther with veneration, but called all those Lutherans against whom they acted Flacians; the Flacians, however, were especially a sect of stupidity and madness among the Lutherans. Thus Pareus, who wishes that all Lutherans had one neck, professes that he acts against Ubiquitarians, violent enemies of truth. When the people of Utrecht endeavored at their synod to extirpate rigid Calvinism, they prohibited by edict that which was the chief point of its impiety: all should beware of teaching those things from which God could be held the author of sin. Therefore, when an orthodox magistrate wishes to restore ancient piety by right of return, he will take care that the manifest enormities of the opinions--in which there is greater shame even among the shameless--are seized upon first. For they conceal many things and shadow many things with words, for which, if you look upon the matter itself, there is no pardon. These must be drawn into the light, so that they may be routed with deserved hatred. For thus authority will be taken away from false teachers caught in manifest crime. To have displayed such superstitions is to have refuted them.

§ 9. The sixth method of restoring piety and abolishing error is to turn the quarrels of those who wander to one's own advantage. For who would not readily reduce the Puritans in England to order if he extorted from them approval of the bishops, or those same Puritans from Belgium if, while the controversy raged, he adhered to the milder party? For variety of belief makes doubtful those who seemed certain to themselves. Thus, when the prince's assent is added to one party of those disputing, it easily overthrows the other and renders the whole liable. The Apostle is a great example: in a council which consisted of different sects, by approving the true opinion of one he earned the vote of acquittal, and brought it about that, hindered by their own dissension, they could not conspire against truth. I would especially recommend this to an orthodox prince, for he will use the dissensions of those who wander no less conveniently than the concord of those believing rightly in order to extirpate errors. For even in battles, not only skill and strength in military affairs, but often also the enemies' carelessness or lapse have offered to a commander the most desirable opportunities for accomplishing the business. Let him only remain on watch, so that he may see the critical moments and make a remedy for diseases which is not only suitable but also opportune. A regimen cures many. Formerly, when rigid Calvinism was assailed by the Lutherans in the very heat of its paroxysm, the evil was exacerbated and sudden coercion brought much damage; now, of their own accord, the Arminians have remitted the harshest part of the rigor, judge the Calvinists impious, persecute them in the Academy itself, and compel them to be exiles in other towns; they would dare more and more atrocious things did they not fear the forces of the opposing party. Certainly, if the generous force of Maurice alone stood on behalf of the mild party, the rigor of the Counter-Remonstrants would soften or be broken.

§ 10. The seventh method is that clandestine and public assemblies be prohibited. Thus Arcadius denied Gainas a church for Arian perfidy; thus the emperors Leo and Anthemius forbade the pagans to assemble for impious rites, Code, Title 11: "Let no one dare to attempt those things which have rather frequently been forbidden to persons of pagan superstition, knowing that he commits a public crime who shall dare to perpetrate these things. Moreover, we will offenses of this kind to be cut away to such an extent that, even if any such thing be perpetrated on another's estate or in another's house--the owners manifestly knowing it--the estate or house shall be adjudged to the most sacred rights of the treasury. But the owners, for this alone, that they knowingly consented for their places to be contaminated with such crimes, if indeed they are adorned with any dignity or military office, shall be punished by loss of the military office or dignity, and also by confiscation of their property; but those established in a private or plebeian condition shall, after bodily tortures, be assigned either to work in the mines or to perpetual exile." And before him

Valentinian and Marcian decreed: “Let no one reopen, with the intention of venerating and adoring, the shrines which were formerly already closed. Far be it from our age that the ancient honor be restored to unspeakable and execrable images, that the impious doorposts of temples be wreathed with garlands, profane fires be kindled upon altars, incense be burned upon them, victims be slain, wine be poured in libation from bowls, and sacrilege be regarded in place of religion.”

§ 11. The eighth method is to bring the obstinate to their duty by severity of laws and punishments. The penalty for violated religions differs in one place and another, but everywhere there is some penalty--deservedly and by right. For what is committed against divine religion is directed to the injury of all; what harms all harms to the peril of the commonwealth, and therefore ought to be repelled by the commonwealth. But since these things are taught with danger among those whom conscience does not permit to be at rest, I prefer, concerning that whole class of evil, to cite and set forth a great doctor of the Church.

First he teaches, Epistle 50, that many were corrected in this way: “For that which befell the accusers of Saint Daniel befell the Donatists. For just as the lions were turned against the former, so the laws by which they wished to oppress the innocent have been turned against the latter--except that, because of the mercy of Christ, those laws which appear adverse to them are rather for them, since many have been corrected through them and are corrected daily; and, being corrected and delivered from that furious destruction, they give thanks. And those who hated now love; and, once health has been received, they rejoice over the most wholesome laws that had been troublesome to them, as greatly as in their madness they detested them; and now, with a like love together with us, they are stirred up against those who remain, with whom they would have perished, that together we may press on lest those persons perish. For a physician is troublesome to a raging madman, and a father to an undisciplined son--the former by binding, the latter by beating--but both by loving. But if they neglect them and permit them to perish, this false gentleness is rather cruel. For if a horse and mule, in which there is no understanding, resist with bites and kicks the human beings by whom their wounds, which must be cared for, are handled; and although human beings are often endangered and sometimes injured amid their teeth and kicks, they nevertheless do not abandon them until, through medicinal pains and troubles, they restore them to health: how much more must a human being not be abandoned by a human being, and a brother by a brother, lest he perish eternally, when, once corrected, he can understand how great a benefit was being furnished him when he complained that he was suffering persecution?”

But here let that law prevail: that it restrain by loving, not by raging; that it chastise in order to correct, not take vengeance in order to overthrow.

Then he continues: “Why, therefore, should the Church not compel her lost sons to return, if lost sons compelled others to perish? Although even those whom they did not compel, but only seduced, if they are called back through terrible but wholesome laws into her bosom, their pious mother embraces more tenderly and rejoices over them much more than over those whom she had never lost. Does it not pertain to pastoral diligence that even those sheep which were not violently snatched away but gently and softly seduced, and which wandered from the flock and began to be possessed by strangers, once found, should be called back to the Lord’s fold, if they should wish to resist, by terrors or even pains of scourges?”

§ 12. These are Augustine’s words. Yet at another time he held this opinion: that it should not be sought from the emperors that they command the Donatist heresy altogether not to exist. But afterward he changed, for he judged medicinal trouble necessary for depraved, cold, and hard minds. “Hence,” he says, “it came about that, when causes of this kind had been brought to his knowledge, the religious and pious emperor preferred by most pious laws altogether to correct the error of that impiety, and, by terrifying and coercing, to bring back to Catholic unity those who bore the signs of Christ against Christ, rather than merely to take away their license to rage and leave them license to wander and perish. But when the laws themselves had now come into Africa, those especially who were seeking an opportunity, or feared the savagery of the raging, or were ashamed to offend their own people, immediately passed over to the Church. Many also, who were held there solely by a custom handed down from their parents, and who had never before considered what sort of cause the heresy itself possessed, and had never wished to seek and consider it, soon, when they began to attend to it and found nothing in it worthy of the losses they were suffering, became Catholics without any difficulty. For solicitude taught those whom security had rendered negligent. Many who were less capable of understanding by themselves what difference there was between the error of the Donatists and Catholic truth followed the authority and persuasion of all those who preceded them. Thus, when the true mother joyfully received great hosts of peoples into her bosom, there remained hard crowds, standing in that pestilence with an unhappy obstinacy. Of these also, very many communicated by dissimulation; others lay concealed by reason of their small number. But those who dissembled, by gradually becoming accustomed and by hearing the preaching of truth--especially after the conference and disputation which took place at Carthage between us and their bishops--were in great part corrected. Yet in certain places where a more obstinate and implacable multitude prevailed, which the smaller number whose opinion concerning communion was better could not resist, or where crowds subject to the authority of a few more powerful persons obeyed toward the evil side, labor was required for a somewhat longer time."

The same author, Against the Letters of Petilian. Petilian said: "But if it had been permissible for anyone to be compelled by law even to good things, you wretched men ought yourselves to have been compelled by us to the purest faith. But far be it, far be it from our conscience that we compel anyone to our faith." Augustine answered: "No one indeed is to be compelled to faith unwillingly; but through severity--indeed, through the mercy of God--perfidy is accustomed to be chastised by the scourges of tribulations. Is it the case that, because the best morals are chosen by freedom of the will, therefore the worst morals are not punished by the integrity of the law? Nevertheless, discipline which avenges evil living is inverted unless it is preceded by doctrine concerning living well. If, therefore, any laws have been established against you, by them you are not compelled to do well, but are prohibited from doing evil; for no one can do well unless he has chosen, unless he has loved, which lies in free will. But the fear of penalties, even if it does not yet possess the delight of a good conscience, at least restrains evil cupidity within the barriers of thought. Yet those who established the adverse laws by which your audacity is repressed--are they not those concerning whom the Apostle says: 'For not without cause do they bear the sword; for they are ministers of God, avengers unto wrath against him who does evil'?"

§ 13. What, therefore? Will the prince act against all by right and law, and compel them to faith? Not against all, but nevertheless he will act on behalf of all. If they are few, if it can be done without disturbance, let him command that heresies, magicians, and idolaters not exist; but let the vigor of the laws be exerted gradually, except where there is danger of contagion. Let those who are pernicious be removed; the prince's authority will lead the remaining crowd. Shame restrains many, fear many, but most are held by empty security, as though nothing better appears for them to follow. Within a few years more than one hundred thousand were converted to the truth in France, more in Germany. No prince of Germany who attempted to bring his people to the Catholics experienced force contrary to his laws. Only the Belgians rebelled; but religion was neither the sole cause nor the pretext. Privileges and liberty were held forth, together with dominion by a foreign nation, always hateful to cultivated peoples; and the exaction of tithes incited the people to sedition.

§ 14. Nevertheless, the decree of politicians who think otherwise remains: they are not to be compelled, for thus they both remain impious and add dissimulation to impiety, and the crime is doubled. Thus you will make worshipers of the purple, not of God. But they err, and oppose the peace of the commonwealth, not religion alone. For first, it is commanded by a wholesome law that they not do evil, not worship a demon by idolatrous sacrifices, not lay waste churches, mock sacred things, inscribe God upon their crimes, and assail truth. For although they obey unwillingly, it is nevertheless better that, when compelled, they be borne into crimes in mind alone than in both mind and deed together. In the same way, the dread of secular laws also deters many who are already guilty in mind and will from daring and obtaining their object.

§ 15. Nor is law accustomed merely to lead persons away from evils, but also to introduce them into the school and sanctuary of virtue. For it commands honorable and pious things and prohibits their contraries. It commands pious things, I say, and commands them to act piously, not by simulation; let each person impute hypocrisy to his own wickedness. Even the obstinate are commanded to honor the magistrate, because the command is right; nor ought the law for that reason not to command honorable things because a dissembling mind vitiates honorable deeds, but it ought to admonish them to accomplish of their own accord what duty requires. Yet, for the most part, when they are impelled toward honorable things, gradually they also perform them honorably and apply their minds to virtue, since it is necessary for the hands to be applied to the work. But if the hardness of some resists, it is nevertheless softened by custom; and tender age, not yet imbued with evils, is imbued fresh with piety and will carry the sweetness of its good odor into old age. I certainly remember that children were the authors to many parents of laying aside error; and when they grow up, lay aside the bordered toga, and enter a tribe or senate, they show themselves the best citizens of the commonwealth. We now see many thousands doing this in Germany, especially in Bavaria, Styria, Carinthia, and Belgium. And so even a reformation which does not help the advanced nevertheless presents childhood as Catholic.

§ 16. The ninth method, and almost the most efficacious of all, is that the governors of the commonwealth cultivate integrity of life and purity of morals. At the beginning I spoke concerning the morals of all; now I advise particularly that reformation will be slow and difficult unless prelates and teachers shine before the whole commonwealth not only by distinguished innocence but also by a reputation for innocence. For since superstition is a thing so malicious and calumnious that it detracts from the virtue and reputation of the most holy, exposes even the most blameless Athanasiuses to the speech of human beings by fabricated crimes, and drags them to tribunals by the purchased perjuries of witnesses, as though in another's crime there were sufficient cause why heresies should not be abandoned, who can doubt that, when the crimes of priests are public, they are tolerated to the great loss of religion? The shameful life of clerics--of clerics, I say, of clerics, but evil ones--made, increased, and preserves heresies. Frequently I enter into disputation with heretics or with those who believe heretics. After arguments which are solved and turned back with the least labor, they turn to the accusation of clerics and bring forth things which can neither be denied nor defended.

What, therefore, will the commonwealth do in this matter? First, it will labor that bishops and prelates be chosen who are chaste, liberal, sober, courageous, and zealous for divine law, who will reform morals; the princes themselves should add whatever power they can. Nor is the remedy difficult: is a canon or parish priest a drunkard or keeper of a concubine? Let an accuser be opposed to him; let another candidate for his dignity and prebend come forward; once convicted, let him be deposed and another receive his bishopric. If the prelates connive with one another and do not correct the vices of their own people, let the Vicar of Christ grant free power of reforming to kings and princes, as he recently entrusted it, to the great benefit of the province, to a certain most serene prince. But since I have dealt sufficiently with this matter in Book II, chapter 9, On the Peace of Germany, and this place requires the same things, I prefer to transfer those things here rather than rehearse them here in other words.

§ 17. In the first place, as a thing supremely necessary, without which no peace will ever be established, and once established will not endure, I place the restoration of ecclesiastical discipline where it has grown feeble, and its preservation where it flourishes. The cause of old and recent heresies and persecutions was, for the most part, the dissolution of the Christian clergy and people. It is an ancient wound of the Church, but one which is renewed excessively, so that it may never grow old throughout the whole world and may never be perfectly healed. "The Lord," says Saint Cyprian, "wished his household to be tested," when, namely, he permitted persecution. He speaks, however, of that which occurred under Decius and which was preceded by thirty-eight years of peace in Africa. "And because long peace had corrupted the discipline handed down to us by God, heavenly censure raised up faith which lay prostrate and, I might almost say, sleeping; and although we deserved to suffer more for our sins, the most clement Lord so moderated all things that everything which was done appeared to be a trial rather than a persecution. Each person devoted himself to increasing his patrimony and, forgetful of what believers had either done before under the Apostles or always ought to do, they gaped after the increase of their possessions with the insatiable ardor of cupidity. There was no devoted religion in priests, no entire faith in ministers, no mercy in works, no discipline in morals. The beard was corrupted in men, the appearance painted in women; eyes were adulterated after God's hands had made them; hair was falsified by falsehood. There were cunning frauds for deceiving the hearts of the simple, treacherous wills for circumventing brethren; to join the bond of marriage with unbelievers, to prostitute the members of Christ to Gentiles; not only to swear rashly but even to perjure oneself; to despise superiors with a proud swelling, to curse one another with a poisoned mouth, and to be divided from one another by obstinate hatreds. Very many bishops, who ought to be an exhortation and example to the rest, despised divine administration and became administrators of secular affairs; abandoning their chair, deserting the people, wandering through foreign provinces, they hunted the markets of profitable commerce; while brethren in the Church hungered, they did not come to their aid; they wished to possess silver abundantly, to seize estates by insidious frauds, and to increase capital by multiplying usury."

These are the words of the holy martyr in his treatise On the Lapsed, in the age of the martyrs. Our evils have had more grievous causes, a greater loss of discipline, and a greater dominion of vices, which at length ended in rebellion and heresy. Nor is it wonderful. Without care for discipline, not only can the peace of religion not be maintained, but not even religion itself. "Discipline is the guardian of hope, the bond of faith, the guide of the saving journey, the kindling and nourishment of a good disposition, the teacher of virtue; it causes one always to remain in Christ and continually to live for God, and to attain to heavenly promises and divine rewards." Cyprian, On the Discipline and Dress of Virgins.

At this time nothing prevents most people more from returning to the ancient religion than the examples of certain persons who live badly in it. For the common people estimate doctrine from life. When they behold a man enslaved to riches, burning with lusts, swollen with arrogance, they do not believe that they can rightly learn from him the doctrine of liberality, chastity, and modesty. Do you marvel that those who wander are not converted? Do you marvel that you labor without fruit? They doubt your faith because it lies hidden in the mind; your vices are in the open. They avail more toward hatred than uncertain faith toward love. You promise the food of the word of God to the hungry. But while you offer it with an impure and festering hand, you render it suspect and cause enemies to blaspheme the name of the Lord. Your sin is indeed exceedingly great before the Lord, because you draw human beings back from the Lord's sacrifice--not from a sacrifice of rams and calves, but from the sacrifice of prayers, faith, and piety. They are turned away from God whose minister they see stained by so many vices. By nothing do heresies grow more than by the vices of clerics and by the sins of laymen, who so infect their offspring with their vices that it never becomes accustomed to piety. The heretics themselves testify to this: when convicted by Scriptures and reasons, they turn to the accusation of the Roman Curia and of the whole ecclesiastical estate. I shall answer them in another place, for they are no more excusable than the children of Israel, who, drawn back from the sacrifice of the Lord by the crimes of Hophni and Phinehas, worshiped the Baals and Ashtaroth.

Now I admonish those who live from the Church, have grown fat from Christ's patrimony, and receive large donatives from the pay of our commander, but by their sloth, ignorance, drunkenness, and baseness betray their own camp to the enemies, in no way solicitous about the destruction of perishing souls and locating the peace of the Church in the opulence and quiet of prebends. O good God, if it is expedient for him who shall have scandalized one of these little ones who believe in you that a millstone turned by an ass be suspended from his neck and he be drowned in the depth of the sea, what mountains or rocks will be able to suffice to bind to so many necks? How often must those be drowned who scandalize not merely the little ones but the whole world: great and small--the little ones who believe in you, the great so that they cease to believe, and unbelievers so that they do not come to faith?

It has been said to all Christians: “Be without complaint and simple children of God, without reproach in the midst of a depraved and perverse nation, among whom you shine as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life, unto my glory on the day of Christ,” Philippians 2:15. But to bishops and prelates it is said: “Be an example of the faithful in word and conduct, in charity, in faith, in chastity,” 1 Timothy 4:2. And: “In all things present yourself as an example of good works, in doctrine, in integrity, in gravity; a sound, irreproachable word,” Titus 2:7. And why? He adds the reason: “So that he who is opposed may be ashamed, having nothing evil to say concerning us.” Not by word alone, but above all by example, did the Apostles convert the world; by examples men travel again to unbelief, for while they deny conscience, they make shipwreck concerning the faith. For because they live badly in the sight of the people, so far as lies in them they kill those by whom they are known. Everyone who lives badly in the sight of those over whom he is placed, so far as lies in him, kills.

What, therefore? Do you foretell perpetual war in those regions where ecclesiastical discipline is neglected? Either war, or servitude, or destruction. For if morals are amended, abuses taken away, and scandals removed, a very brief war will be followed by solid victory. If God is further provoked by sins, those who wander will be confirmed in heresy; those who hesitate and are doubtful will be plainly turned away; and God will strike away license and wantonness, as he has now done in many places.

If bishops and prelates are unequal to the vices of certain persons, God the Zealot will send a stronger avenger, by whom he will at once take away the impious man and his impiety. Thus the Turks occupied Asia, Egypt, and Greece, while neither the clergy obeyed the bishops nor the bishops the supreme shepherd, and while their morals surpassed the wickedness of barbarians. We see that it is generally so arranged that, when vices have climbed to their summit, all things fall together. But they must be believed to have climbed to their summit if they are committed by public law, or by custom and approval; if they break all the force and vigor of the laws and the authority of the magistrate. What cannot be healed dies away. Religion will perish in Europe unless an integrity of morals corresponds to the sanctity of religion. “What, then, do you think must be reformed?” someone who both fears and needs reformation will say to me. In general, whatever has been deformed; whatever, even if it is not deformed, nevertheless, through the circumstances, is the cause of some deformity in the Church.

CHAPTER XIX

Other Lesser Aids for Restoring True Religion

§ 1. There are very many things, according to the variety of times and places, which prudence and an ingenious love of piety suggest and which can be applied to those who are perishing, so that they may be saved. The Chinese are captivated by admiration for the mathematical disciplines; the Japanese rejoice in a prudent exposition of moral matters; very many of the Indians are captivated by beneficence, the Americans by ceremonies and music. Therefore all things must be attempted for the salvation of human beings, since that ever-watchful Dragon contrives all things for their destruction. For the commonwealth is wretched if, indeed, a great multitude overflows in it, but a multitude of those who are perishing.

§ 2. In the first place I set pious and grave music, which should not caress the ears by modulation and harmony alone, but much more instruct the mind by the light of words and thoughts, and affect the will by holiness. Truth is most readily learned and retained by that sweetness. This is clear from the example of those who teach falsehoods and of heresiarchs. Paul of Samosata changed ecclesiastical hymns into foul and flattering songs. The Arians and Pelagians also destroyed faith and discipline by this aid to their errors. Indeed, the audacity of certain persons advanced so far that they even introduced Sotadean songs into the Church. Nor have our own times been rendered infamous by the multitude and foulness of sects in any other way than by songs which insinuate heresy with sweet melody and sound forth mockery of truth. Thus Lutheran hymns, thus Bezan hymns, have killed more souls than writings and declamations. Why, therefore, should an orthodox prince not employ for medicine what impostors devised for destruction? Those things once moved Augustine, Confessions, Book X, chapter 33: “How greatly I wept during your hymns and canticles, sharply moved by the voices of your sweetly sounding Church! Your voices flowed into my ears, and your truth was distilled into my heart, and from it the affection of piety grew warm, and my tears ran, and it was well with me together with them.” And afterward: “Thus I fluctuate between the peril of pleasure and the experience of wholesomeness, and I am led more--although not uttering an irrevocable judgment--to approve the custom of singing in the Church, so that through the delights of the ears the weaker mind may rise up into the affection of piety.”

Aristotle, in his books of the Politics, prescribes many things concerning music which some have judged superfluous or even insufficiently consonant with the gravity of the subject. But Plato truly thought so as well; and Tullius, the father of his commonwealth and a skilled craftsman of governing, says in Book II of On the Laws: “For I agree with Plato that nothing so flows into tender and pliant minds as the varied sounds of singing; and it can scarcely be said how great their force is in either direction. For it both incites the languid and renders the excited languid; it now relaxes minds and now contracts them. And it was important to many cities in Greece to preserve the ancient mode of sounds. When their morals slipped into softness, they were changed together with their songs--either depraved by this sweetness and corruption, as a certain man thinks, or, when their severity had collapsed because of other vices, there was then also room for this change in ears and minds that had been changed. Therefore that man, the wisest of Greece and by far the most learned, greatly fears this stain; for he denies that musical laws can be changed without a change in public laws.”

Germany and Gaul have taught this. For while minds hung in doubt, new music intervened in place of that old music, sweetly severe and the servant of virtue--a new music more licentious, which by enticing sweetness offered heresies smeared upon incautious minds. Now, therefore, it is the office of a prudent physician to season truth and holiness with greater sweetness of harmonies, lest they strike harshly upon minds which have slipped into softness and be rejected. For this reason, after the likeness of David, Asaph, and Jeduthun, many most learned men have adorned psalms and hymns with musical modes; very many bishops have also introduced sacred songs in the vernacular language into the churches.

§ 3. This remedy is sweet, but nevertheless wholesome. The one which follows is harsher, yet neither unjust nor difficult: that before the public announcements and contracts of marriages, both bridegroom and bride be compelled to give an account of their faith. That matter produces no few advantages. For first, they can be instructed and educated in the truth through this occasion. Then a certain care for religion is instilled into all; and in this way, while they promise that they will be in the Church and will embrace the ancient faith, little by little they are bound to the truth and love it.

Heretics must also be caught by their own arts. For when I once heard Lutheran youths hurling dreadful things against the Calvinists, although their prince, after expelling Luther, commanded Zwingli to be received, I wondered that they had not yet been dragged into that trap. And when I asked how Lutheranism was left to them while the reformation was raging, they answered that for the present they rejoiced in the liberty of youth and did not greatly care about the threats of a raging minister, but that a time would come when they saw that the yoke must be undergone. For when they had begun to aspire to marriage, they must yield to consistorial violence and, together with a wife, receive the concubine of shameful obscenity--namely, Calvinism. So harsh is the condition among heretics of men taking wives and women marrying, for whom a new plague and pestilence must be led into the nuptial chamber. How, therefore, will an orthodox prince excuse himself to God if he himself does not take greater account of salvation and decree by a law enacted that, together with the sanctity of the sacrament and the indivisible bond of marriage, they join the truth of sincere and chaste religion--especially since only in the orthodox faith is the nuptial covenant contracted without the stain of fault?

§ 4. Other things also are connected with marriage: namely, that no one approach the laver of regeneration except according to the Catholic rite; that no one enjoy the right of godparents unless his sincerity in the faith has been ascertained; and that no one obtain the honor of ecclesiastical burial unless he has shared the sacraments of the Church with them.

§ 5. But if the souls of those who wander must be restored to the way gradually and by pious art, the propagators of perverse dogmas cannot be left alone. Let the orthodox magistrate apply himself to this: that their appointment, presentation, confirmation, and examination be entrusted to him. For thus he will bar every most harmful person; he will set over those synagogues men who are divided among themselves, incurious about controversial matters, and devoted to domestic affairs or even to the prince; and he will extinguish the heat of heresy. Nor will he remove the unlearned; for thus the error will be despised, and, because the unskilled are accustomed often to err, constancy will be taken away.

§ 6. He will nourish dissensions among the teachers who wander and bring it about that they confer often and accuse one another. For thus, when all understand that nothing certain is found among them, they will readily give their hands to truth. That discord is also useful for recognizing the morals of the most wicked human beings. For if anyone should wish to read the contentious books of the Lutherans against the Calvinists, or of the latter against the Lutherans, he will persuade himself that they are not invectives of human beings against human beings, but the furies and roarings of demons against demons. From these a just cause for change will be offered to the prince, and a cause for inquiring into the origin of such great evils; for if he discovers the things to be true, he will punish the guilty; if false, the calumniators. For he will bring the truth of the errors into public view.

§ 7. There are many other things which prudent charity and care for one’s neighbor will of themselves dictate to a prince. All those things which conciliate love and veneration for the magistrate also avail to this end, that they readily embrace the prince’s judgment in religion. Of this kind are remission of tributes and burdens; prompt aids when some part of the dominion has been disfigured by fires or collapses; and provision for the grain supply. For by these it is brought about that they hate whatever they think adverse to the magistrate. If the prince employs these together with divine grace and fervent prayers, within an altogether brief time he will extirpate heresies, although at the beginning they appear more powerful than the laws themselves and the magistrate.

CHAPTER I

All the Moral Virtues Are Required in a Well-Constituted Commonwealth

ON THE VIRTUES NECESSARY TO THE COMMONWEALTH

§ 1. I have already explained in the preceding book that virtue is necessary to the commonwealth; I have demonstrated this concerning faith and religion. It now remains for me to treat of the other virtues that are necessary to the prince, senators, and citizens. I treat of civil life, and of that life for which nature itself has fashioned and advances us. For although virtue itself has very great force in household management, in private dealings, and in private life, nevertheless every virtue without exception is necessary in the commonwealth. Wherever its protection has withdrawn, there the enemy is admitted. Silence overthrew silent Amyclae; lust, Colchis and Crete; avarice assessed the Roman city in bracelets; credulity received Zopyrus as a traitor; through ambition almost all kingdoms have perished. Wherever there is even a small departure from what is right, the commonwealth lies open to blows; nor is any vice so small that it does not suffice to overthrow great kingdoms, if you despise it. It is an oracle of Pythagoras:

> Ἀρετὴ τὸ ἰσχύον μόνον, τὰ δὲ ἄλλα λῆρος.

For virtue alone is powerful; all other things are trifles: riches, the strength of walls, a fleet, an army, auxiliaries--if they are apart from virtue, they accomplish nothing other than that the ruins may terrify with a greater crash as they fall. While morals had not yet declined, not even Manlius could drive the people into servitude; but when the commonwealth had been corrupted, even princes flatter Claudius and enroll Nero among the gods. The commonwealth desires examples of all the virtues, just as it desires those devoted to and skilled in all the arts. For if examples of any virtue are lacking, the enemy is invited through a breach in the rampart.

These were the last words of a bad but shrewd emperor, who found it easier to think and speak rightly than to act rightly: “Everywhere I received a commonwealth in disorder; I leave it pacified even as far as the Britons. An old man, infirm in my feet, I shall leave a strong empire to my Antonines if they are good, a feeble one if they are bad.” It was an oracle. They were bad; swiftly they destroyed both the empire and themselves.

But it is too little for one member in so great a body to be sound. For a state which the virtue of one or a few raises up will not be able to stand if the impulse of the multitude drives and snatches it into vices. The influence of the ruler toward virtue is indeed supreme; yet frequently the vices of the multitude outweigh it. “We are pliant and are led in whatever direction by the prince, and, so to speak, we are followers; we also desire to be dear to him and approved by him. Those unlike him have hoped for this in vain; and by a continuance of compliance we arrive at the point that almost all human beings live by the morals of one man” (Pliny, Panegyric). And so the ancients thought no gift of the gods more excellent or more beautiful than a chaste and holy prince, one most like the gods. For if a prince prefers pleasures and riches to virtue, the people must necessarily become vicious by a swift contagion.

§ 2. There is need, moreover, of all the virtues as though they formed one indivisible body; for they are all fitted and joined together among themselves and, as the Stoics were accustomed to say, ἀχώριστοι, “inseparable.” I do not agree with those who think that one virtue is diversified by its duties. This is a Stoic doctrine. For Chrysippus speaks thus in Laertius:

> Τὰς ἀρετὰς ἀκολουθεῖν ἀλλήλαις, οὐ μόνον τῷ τὴν μίαν ἔχοντα τὰς πάσας ἔχειν, ἀλλὰ τῷ τὸν κατὰ μίαν ὁτιοῦν ἐνεργοῦντα κατὰ πάσας ἐνεργεῖν, οὔτε ἄνδρα τέλειον εἶναι, τὸν μὴ πάσας ἔχοντα τὰς ἀρετάς, οὔτε πρᾶξιν τελείαν, ἥτις οὐ κατὰ πάσας πράττεται τὰς ἀρετάς.

The virtues accompany one another, not only because he who has one has them all, but because he who acts according to one acts according to them all. Nor is the man perfect who does not have all the virtues, nor is the action perfect which is not done according to all the virtues.

There is not so great a conjunction of the virtues as they devise, such that none can exist without another; nevertheless, no virtue in its own condition is altogether perfect without the fellowship and companionship of the others. For one is an aid to another, so that it may perform perfect actions consistently; one protects another and makes it invulnerable. And this is what Cicero in book 5 of On Ends, and afterward Jerome, admonishes: "Since the virtues are so coupled and joined together that they all participate in all, and one cannot be separated from another, nevertheless each has its own proper office, so that fortitude is discerned in labors and battles, temperance in pleasures, prudence in choice." And Seneca, Epistle 67: "When someone endures torments bravely, perhaps he employs all the virtues, although one--patience--is at hand and appears most of all. Yet fortitude is there, of which patience, endurance, and toleration are branches. Prudence is there, without which no counsel is entered upon, and which advises one to bear as bravely as possible what one cannot escape. Constancy is there, which cannot be cast down from its station and does not relinquish its purpose when any force attempts to wrench it away. There is that indivisible company of virtues. Whatever is done honorably, one virtue does, but upon the judgment of the council. But what is approved by all the virtues, even if it seems to be done by one, is desirable."

§ 3. All participate in all. And it is necessary that this occur in the commonwealth. Otherwise, what happens to a soldier whom his comrades have abandoned alone in the battle line will befall a solitary virtue: while he fights most bravely, even the most cowardly of the enemy strikes him down from the rear or the flank with a stealthy wound. Samson's fortitude, stripped of the aid of chastity, fell and lay in bonds and filth. The sacrilegious ambition of King Uzziah removed his great virtues from the commonwealth; intemperance overthrew John Maccabaeus. If we also consider our own men, we shall find that sometimes all the virtues have yielded to one vice. What drove Tertullian, with so great learning, gravity, and holiness, out of the Church and into the Montanists, if not a proud obstinacy excessively tenacious of its own judgment? What turned Hosius, renowned throughout the whole world and already in extreme old age, aside from his course, if not fear of torments? For so many virtues and labors, deserted by fortitude, fell at a single blow, as it were. Haste in judging, and a certain indulgence toward his own talent, destroyed Origen.

But since it is rare for a man in the commonwealth to be fortified by the company of all the virtues, and since even the most fortified things are fragile in some part of themselves, it is nevertheless necessary that all these virtues exist in the commonwealth. The fierceness of some must be tempered by the counsels of the prudent; the levity of others must be restrained by gravity; pleasures must be chastised; ambition must be suppressed, so that there is no virtue which is not taught by morals and words. Since, therefore, these goods rarely come together in any one person, let the commonwealth act so that it may at least have them dispersed. It is most difficult for someone to be both vigorous in battle and good in counsel. An equal talent for both camp and gown is not frequently found. Therefore let the legislator so govern his citizens that one supplies the mind, another the hand; and let the warlike right hand strike and avoid the enemy by the counsel of the prudent man, so that it may be unconquered.

§ 4. The conjunction and harmony of the virtues is also discerned in a certain moderation, which consists in a mean. In all of them there is a certain firmness, which is the greater the more virtues are present, just as that battle line is strongest which has both the greatest number and the best soldiers. All are also ruled by a certain equality that directs actions. All are bound together in one prudence; for there is no action of virtue unless prudence has directed it. What is done rashly is impulse, not virtue; and although it has been done with a good outcome, it nevertheless has not been well done.

§ 5. A discourse concerning the political virtues must therefore be undertaken, but concerning true virtues, for I rejected hypocrisy and dissimulation already in the preceding book. Now I also give this warning: vices must not be honored with the names of virtues. This is the most ancient evil of states and will be the last, unless I am mistaken. They call license liberty; they think audacity fortitude; they impose avarice under the name of frugality, prodigality under the name of magnificence, and pride under the name of magnanimity, as though under a covering, upon inexperienced minds. In the schools, when young men have entangled their equals by an ambiguous word or a twisted argument, they rejoice as victors and grieve as defeated men. But in the state, it is not words but the things themselves that entangle many and lead them into fraud. Dissimulation itself is more ingenious in devising things than truth is. Pliny, Panegyric. Horace also gives that warning:

> As those hired to mourn at a funeral say
> And do almost more than those who grieve from the heart.

Vices creep in under the name of virtues. Flattery surpasses friendship in blandishments, and the flatterer often drives out the friend, pleasing by the very thing by which he harms. If rashness is successful, it is praised as fortitude. Fawning enemies call the timid man cautious, the coward moderate. For evils have often presented the appearance of what is honorable.

§ 6. Finally, I wish these things to be understood in such a way that they know there is need of virtue, not of impulse. In virtue there are order, decorum, and constancy; it has harmony among all its actions; it itself distributes duties; it itself moderates all things. It is exceedingly harmful that those who read histories at once admire the sudden desire for action which they call ὁρμήν and number it among the virtues. Many have done something with a noble, liberal, or temperate mind, but once or perhaps twice; their whole life is discordant with the one deed. Such men are most dangerously employed in public affairs, for they have the reputation of a good man and the vices of the ruined. He did something that was right, or in which there was the likeness of what is right, but that was an accident, not an exercise of character. In a state, however, there is need of a brave and constant virtue, one that rests upon judgment and prudence.

Moreover, the virtues I require in the commonwealth are prudence, justice, fortitude, temperance, and friendship with true charity, which contains all those virtues. Just as these embrace various parts within themselves and are pressed on the opposite side by various vices, so they supply abundant matter for discussion. But now let us speak of prudence.

CHAPTER II

Prudence Is Necessary to the Commonwealth, and Its Office and Function

§ 1. Prudence is a habit of acting with true reason concerning those things which are good or evil for a human being (Aristotle, book 6 of the Ethics, chapter 1, and St. Thomas, Summa theologiae II--II, question 47).

[Printed page 111]

He calls it right reason concerning things to be done, τῶν πρακτέων. Clearer is the definition of others derived from Cicero: knowledge of things to be done and to be omitted. For this definition comes to the same thing: knowledge of things to be sought and to be avoided; or: knowledge of things good, evil, and neutral. Prudence therefore extends most widely and is occupied in the actions of all the virtues; like a blameless mistress, it sets for all of them certain boundaries and a measure, > Beyond or short of which what is right cannot stand.

It is therefore the eye, cynosure, and leader of all the virtues; for neither temperance, nor justice, nor fortitude exists unless prudence moderates it. Οὐκ οἷόν τε ἀγαθὸν εἶναι κυρίως ἄνευ φρονήσεως: nothing can properly be good without prudence, Aristotle teaches in book 6 of the Ethics, chapter 5. For since every virtue consists in a mean, in choice, and in measure, without that ruler and dispenser the mean cannot be chosen nor the measure found; without this plumb line nothing but a ruin is built up. That magnet directs the course of navigation, unmoved, toward the goal of happiness and carries a torch before it; when this is extinguished, all things are in darkness. Hence let the commonwealth pursue a ray of divine light through so great a darkness with unclosed eyes. “For where there is no prudent governor, the people will fall; but safety is where there are many counsels” (Proverbs 5).

§ 2. Perfect prudence must hold first place in all affairs: ἅπαντα δὲ διὰ τὸ φρονεῖν καθίσταται; all things obey prudence.

Its functions are to investigate a matter by counsel and in that counsel to understand and select what is right and to reject what is harmful; to determine what, above all, must be done out of many things, and whether anything must be done at all. The most ingenious of poets expressed this:

> You have a right hand useful in war;
>
> Yours is a talent that needs our direction.
>
> You bear strength without mind; mine is the care of the future.
>
> You can fight; with me Atreides chooses
>
> The times for fighting. You avail only in body,
>
> We in mind; and by as much as he who steers the ship surpasses
>
> The oarsman’s office, by as much as a leader is greater than a soldier,
>
> By so much do I surpass you.

If, therefore, the commonwealth, senate, or prince is without this, what else shall we say it is than an eyeless Cyclops, which pours out its mighty strength upon the wind, dashes it against the rocks, and at last overwhelms itself with its own mass?

§ 3. The parts of prudence are innumerable--namely, as many as there are kinds of virtues and of things to be done. Nevertheless, for the sake of order and discipline, it is customarily divided into certain species. One is discerned in individual and private actions and extends most widely, for it embraces all duties that pertain to the ordering and adornment of the mind. The office of another is to administer the family property and the household, which they call economic prudence. But that which is most excellent is called political prudence, which presides over peace and war, kingship, aristocracy, polity, and laws. He who governs that most difficult animal, the human being, needs to know, take up, and arrange as many affairs--so great and so dissimilar--as political prudence moderates and brings to their ends. The human being's nature is greedy for liberty, and command is so troublesome to it that it obeys grudgingly even when useful and just things are commanded benignly: οἱ ἄρχοντες μισοῦνται· φιλελεύθερον γὰρ τὸ ἀνθρώπινον, says the scholiast on Thucydides. Rulers are hated because the human race loves liberty.

§ 4. Eight parts constitute complete prudence: memory, docility, reason, understanding, quick-wittedness, foresight, circumspection, and caution. Consideration of these has great force in all actions, for they generally concur in giving counsel. First, certainly, for pronouncing an opinion in public affairs or giving counsel, I require memory of many things, and a vivid recollection--acquired either by learning or experience--of outcomes and causes. He who is ignorant of the things done before him is always a child. So many and such varied things have been written that they could instruct even a blockhead; but such is the weakness of human talent that, when people read adverse and prosperous events, they take good omens for themselves and believe the flattering things. Although I admire the memory of Caesar or Mithridates, I do not demand it in a prince. I nevertheless judge that prudence must consider the outcomes of notable affairs, not only ancient but also recent. Memory is not indeed worthy of the name of prudence; nevertheless, we read of certain exceedingly prudent men who were distinguished by memory. Mithridates of Pontus addressed twenty-two nations, each in its own language; Cyrus could repeat the names of his soldiers, and Lucius Scipio those of the Roman people; on the day after he had come to Rome, Cineas addressed the senate and the equestrian order by name. Hadrian, Seneca, Porcius Latro, and others were strong in an excellent memory. But those marvels have scarcely appeared once in individual ages; I set before my prince those things which can come into use.

Let prudence and reflection upon useful things be in him. When food retains its own nature and floats undigested upon the stomach, it is a burden and irritates and oppresses health; when it has passed into the blood, it supplies strength and fills the veins. In the same way, knowledge of affairs ought not merely to reside in the memory but to pass into the understanding, and with its wholesome juice to strengthen and support the firmness and constancy of counsels. Nothing harms prudence more than the unconsidered rashness of inexperienced men, who either possess no part of human affairs or have lightly touched history without meditation; yet I have observed that these men most frequently display themselves in citations. I judge them like Calvisius Sabinus, and altogether his twins. In him, amid the greatest poverty of a poor little memory and utter thoughtlessness, there was a most greedy desire for glory, Seneca relates in Epistle 27:

"In our memory Calvisius Sabinus was a rich man: he had both the estate of a freedman and the character of a freeborn man. I have never seen a man more indecently happy. His memory was so bad that now the name of Ulysses escaped him, now that of Achilles, now that of Priam--men whom he knew as well as we know our schoolmasters. No aged nomenclator, who does not return names but imposes them, ever saluted the tribes as wrongly as he did the Trojans and Achaeans. Nevertheless he wished to appear learned. And so he devised this shortcut: for a great sum he bought slaves, one who should possess Homer, another Hesiod; in addition, he assigned one slave to each of the nine lyric poets. There is no reason for you to marvel that he bought them at a great price: he had not found them ready-made, so he contracted for them to be made. After this household had been procured for him, he began to harass his dinner guests. He had these men at his feet, and, when from time to time he requested verses from them to repeat, he often failed in the middle of a verse.

"Satellius Quadratus--a gnawer at foolish rich men and, what follows from that, a grinner at them, and, what is joined to both of these, a mocker--advised him to keep grammarians as excerpt-readers. When Sabinus had said that each slave cost him one hundred thousand sesterces, he replied: 'You could have bought as many book chests for less.' He nevertheless was of the opinion that he himself knew whatever anyone in his household knew. The same Satellius began to urge him to wrestle, though he was a sickly, pale, thin man. When Sabinus answered, ‘And how can I? I scarcely live,’ he said: ‘Please, do not say that; do you not see how many very strong slaves you have?’”

Far more troublesome than Calvisius are those who have scraped together varied stories from commonplace collections and recite them without order, without regard to time, and without decorum or prudence.

§ 5. Memory is not always, but nevertheless frequently, accompanied by a second aid to the actions of prudence, εὐμάθεια, or docility, which in this place I restrict to the actions of prudence. It is the mark of a great mind, since it does not possess all things from itself, to learn without shame--not only from books, which arrogance does more readily, because it is conscious of its own ignorance, but also from colleagues in the senate chamber and in the prince’s council: to hear and judge their opinions, even those of younger men, and to exchange the opinion you have pronounced for a better one. In this part prudent men often err most seriously, while they stubbornly urge not what is best to be done, but what they themselves have judged best.

§ 6. More excellent than docility, but rarer, is quick-wittedness, ἀγχίνοια, by which, through a swift movement of the mind, the rationale and means of resolving a difficulty is found. For it settles arduous affairs suddenly and in a short time, and procures reputation and authority. By such fortunate quick-wittedness Solomon adjudicated the most intricate affair of all, in which neither witnesses nor other proofs were present; without threats and tortures he elicited the litigants’ secrets. For when he had ordered the disputed infant to be divided by the sword and a part to be given to each woman, true affection immediately revealed the mother, and cruelty the stranger.

§ 7. The fourth part is reason or intelligence, which is a habit--the faculty of knowing and judging other things from things known and thoroughly perceived. For it is necessary that he who has learned very many things bring them into use, when there is need, by a discursive movement and activity of mind, and bring them toward the public advantage. The Crotoniats were at war against the Sybarites. The horses of the latter, as men utterly ruined by luxury, had been trained so that at certain measures of the trumpet they would leap and turn to dances. Since the Crotoniats had learned their disposition and this training, they turned it to their own advantage. For, having imitated the melody of the Sybarite dance, they easily crushed the dancing and disordered cavalry: the beasts of burden, upon hearing the accustomed song, were so impelled toward their usual sport that neither the ranks could be preserved nor the battle line governed.

§ 8. That reason chiefly looks to three things: first, that it act with foresight; second, with circumspection; third, with caution.

Foresight, therefore, is the part of prudence which looks ahead to future things and orders present things toward them. For when it foresees future things, it disposes present things so that the former may readily be met; when it looks upon present things, it easily conjectures what is to come and, by its care and solicitude, acts either so that evils may be averted or may fall most gently, or so that good things may be most opportune. Πρόνοια, foresight concerning future things before they occur, has never been sufficiently praised and ought to be the sole care in the commonwealth. For although our acts of foresight are timid and uncertain, nevertheless the wisest of all human beings truly admonishes us: “The cunning man sees evil and hides himself; the little ones pass on and sustain losses” (Proverbs 22); and: “The shrewd man sees danger and is hidden; the simple break through and suffer harm.” It was the utterance of a wicked but nevertheless provident king when he declared Rome to be for sale if it should find a buyer: from present conditions he foresaw the outcome, and the buyers were already threatening. After Greece and Carthage had been conquered, Scipio foresaw the destruction of Rome, and therefore judged that luxury must be resisted; but morals conquered care, and the conqueror of nations fell through her own delights and left the spoils of the world to the fiercest of barbarians. Thus Hannibal the enemy judged better concerning Fabius the Delayer than did his friends at Rome. For when all interpreted his delay as a reproach, Hannibal alone feared him and foretold that the cloud hanging upon the mountain would someday bring forth storms.

In this comparison and ordering of present and future affairs, judgment and action must be circumspect and cautious.

§ 9. Prudence has as its proposed end a good end, and as proposed means those things that lead to the end and are good or indifferent. But it is too little to have these rightly unless all the adjuncts and the things that surround the affair are also surveyed. This part of prudence is called circumspection. Images of emperors were formerly honored with civil reverence; this could seem a duty, but because images of the gods were joined to those statues, the crime of idolatry was connected with the veneration of lawful magistracy. It therefore belonged to prudence to look around, lest, while they honored the emperor, they should worship a demon. Macrinus, raised to the imperial office, recognized that military discipline had fallen and resolved to repair and restore it by crosses and unaccustomed punishments. He had a right end proposed, but neglected a circumstance; for he ought to have considered what was the principal circumstance--namely, the long-established and strengthened license of the camps, which must never be torn out by a single assault, but little by little. The deed was one of great constancy, but nevertheless it increased the calamities.

When Julian was reigning, an idol-serving temple attendant sprinkled Valentinian, then a tribune and afterward made emperor, with lustral water. Valentinian both gave him a slap and cut off the part of his garment upon which a drop had fallen, and so incited the tyrant to persecution. I praise the zeal; I require circumspection. I praise more highly the Christians of Antioch, who at first, during that time, prudently abstained from things sacrificed to idols according to the custom of the Church; but when Julian abused that law for their disgrace and deprivation and polluted all the food in the marketplace with sacrifices, they freely ate the food and mocked the idols while eating. For the tyrant's malice and the insults of the Gentiles brought it about that Christ was worshiped with ingenuous liberty rather than with anxiety.

§ 10. In pursuing goods, caution against evils also has great importance. For many advantages in the commonwealth, even those received in practice and even those long blameless, must be abandoned so that the evils customarily following them may be avoided. What obstructs virtue must always be considered, lest the whole labor perish by a single accident. Written bonds and contracts are full of precautions; our life is almost empty of them. With how many formulas do buyers protect themselves, and what little word dearer than gold is inserted in the records? Is the commonwealth, exposed to so many evils, treated negligently? First the strength of the enemy and all obstacles are brought into counsel. When Antiochus looks upon his resources and golden arms, he anticipates victory in his mind; Hannibal, who knew the military practice of the Romans, judges that all those things will pass into plunder. This part of virtue rarely accompanies even the most perfect men. Cassius and Brutus endeavor to free their fatherland from tyranny; because the disposition of Antony and of others who rejoiced in civil blood had not been sufficiently perceived, they imposed three most cruel tyrants upon their fatherland in place of one moderate one.

§ 11. The final thing that pertains to true prudence is understanding, or a true estimation of moral principles, from which the rules and actions of prudence are deduced. For just as all sciences have certain principles of their own, from which they derive conclusions by certain and true reasoning, so also prudence rests upon certain general principles which all judge true when they have apprehended them at first sight. They are these: God is to be worshiped, one must act justly, magistracy must be obeyed, and the other things which all by consensus judge true. Therefore those in whose minds so great a darkness of vices has settled that they tremble and are blinded at so clear a light lack not only the virtue itself but the principles of prudence. This is exceedingly rare even in the worst people, for almost all seek honorable pretexts even while they contrive crimes.

§ 12. And these things I establish generally concerning prudence in this manner. I commend it to the prince and senate and generally hand down its laws.

The first: Let them esteem as small nothing in the commonwealth which can be the decisive point of a greater advantage or danger. “The unforeseen force of death has seized, and will seize, nations”--indeed, a force that has been despised. The Romans fear the Parthian, and a poorly girded boy will rule over those who fear foreign things. Ishbosheth fears David, but is killed by brigands. Philip is armed against the Persians and is slaughtered by Pausanias.

The second: Just as good physicians skillfully forestall the causes of disease, let all who administer the commonwealth prudently, not by impulse, anticipate all dangers. It is easy to support a tottering column; to raise one that lies fallen is laborious. And so let them always look upon the corpses of other commonwealths--such as the Athenian, Corinthian, Spartan, Tyrian, and Carthaginian--the scars of others, and ἰάματα, “remedies,” so that they may guard against living wounds.

The third: It must be established with certainty by all kings, commonwealths, and peoples that all kingdoms which have hitherto perished have perished through imprudence in wars and seditions. For although accumulated iniquities drew down deserved punishment, nevertheless all counsels were corrupted so that the enemy could not be resisted. I freely appeal to all histories: among so many changes of kingdoms, overthrows of states, destructions and migrations of peoples, I seek one ἔνστασιν, “counter-instance,” and find none; nor, reader, will you find one. Let us look at the Western Empire. The emperors were unwarlike and inconsiderate; the commanders of the army were barbarians--Stilicho, Arbogast, Aetius. For what shadows of emperors were Maximus, Avitus, Majorian, Severus, Anthemius, Olybrius, Glycerius, Nepos, and Augustulus? All were subject to the barbarians. And lest any assistance should be present, Aetius was killed, and indeed by the hand of Emperor Valentinian. Eudocia summoned Genseric to Rome. Theodoric killed the Suevi in Aquitania. Ricimer conspired against his master; Basiliscus, having set out for Africa, surrendered the fleet of the Constantinopolitan emperor to Genseric in order to win the favor of Aspar and Ardaburius. Orestes and Odoacer were summoned for vengeance. But those times were such that all, as though by agreement, made and killed emperors in sport; and administration under the tyranny of the prefects was so intolerable that, according to the testimony of Salvian in book 4, the inhabitants of the Roman Empire fled from its cities to the barbarians and preferred hard servitude to a wretched liberty.

The fourth: The supreme law of prudence is not to trust oneself, but gladly to hear others.

The fifth: No commonwealth has ever been governed with so great a wisdom that wise men and the people have not found much wanting in it. Let the rulers of peoples certainly persuade themselves of this: that they rule amid great complaints from their subjects. For they rule over many wicked people, and over very many desiring contrary things; and they themselves also often stray.

The sixth: Let no one among the subjects complain against the magistracy unless he is one who has administered his house without the complaint of his household, inhabited a city without offense to his neighbors, and entered upon an inheritance without disputes with his kinsmen. For if those men raise so great storms in a little lake, what wonder is it if tempests arise upon a vast ocean, where the winds are free to fight?

CHAPTER III

Those Who Prefer Prudent Princes and Magistrates but Imprudent, Foolish, and, as They Say, Simple Citizens Are in Great Error

§ 1. No discussion is more difficult than a discussion concerning prudence. For many fear lest there be too many prudent people and lest wisdom, if made common, become cheap; they would wish to arrogate so great an honor to themselves alone. Let wisdom, they say, belong to the prince, from whom counsel is derived, and let it belong to those few who are around the prince, while all effort is expended, as it were, in obeying and executing commands. Let no one be more learned, no one more prudent, than the prince. They praise the custom of the Muscovites, among whom all must be less wise than the Grand Duke, and to be excessively devoted to prudence is a crime of majesty. They therefore approve the counsels of tyrants, who remove vivid and ready talents from their midst, lest there be anyone who censures or exposes things not well done. They praise the ancient stupidity of the Arcadians, the Lesbian and Cumaean asses, the minds of the Abderite common people, and the childishness of the Thracians, who could not proceed in counting beyond four and who, when their leader threatened that he would climb to Juno by the ladders which he had caused to be made and accuse them, were terrified and granted everything that was demanded. They judge that Brazilians, Americans, Guineans--in one word, golden slaves, wethers, and blocks--are proper subjects.

But I affirm entirely the contrary: it is altogether expedient for the commonwealth that all should be strong in wisdom, judgment, and talent, so that they can judge concerning public and private affairs. The greatest and truest simplicity does not injure true wisdom, since the Lord commands that dovelike simplicity be joined with serpentine sagacity. I banish crafty, cunning, and deceitful citizens from the commonwealth; wise, cautious, circumspect, and intelligent citizens I judge not only useful, but also people to be instructed in these things with the greatest care.

§ 2. The reasoning of the pseudo-politicians is that through inexperience, imprudence, and want of consideration citizens may be prompt and pliant toward commands; that they may not examine the princes' orders, and that they may repose trust in the speeches and persuasions of counselors, courtiers, and senators. But they will attain these things better by teaching them prudence than by casting them into stupidity and keeping them in it. I shall not employ the argument of the Stoics and say that all who have not attained the highest summit of wisdom are foolish and consequently insane, and that therefore the prudence of the pseudo-politicians is insane, since they devise a commonwealth in which they alone seem wise and wish the rest of the crowd to be stupider than a terebinth. Those things belong to the Porch of Chrysippus, as does the equality of virtues and sins. I do not believe it, if only for this reason: since the whole Stoa confesses that it has hitherto produced no wise man, Cleanthes, Zeno, Chrysippus, and the others of that sect must be insane; but it is fitting that the insane possess no public authority, since, when they ought to be commended to the custody of their kinsmen, they have by a domestic judgment lost the right to pronounce an opinion and give a vote.

I omit these things. For if I followed them, no king, no consul, and no praetor would be sane; all would be insane, for no one would be wise. I speak in a civil and human manner. It is expedient neither for kingship, nor for aristocracy, much less for polity, that the citizens be foolish, dull, and stupid, such as the Ethiopians around Cape Verde, the Brazilians, the Mexicans, and formerly the Thracians,

Phrygians, Arcadians, and others whose rudeness was mocked in the proverbs of more cultivated nations.

§ 3. The first reason is valid and, from the nature of the thing, refutes their erring wisdom. For the dunces with whom they wish the state to be filled do not sufficiently weigh either the dignity of magistracy or the obligation of obeying, and therefore obey neither readily nor constantly. They define the prince's duty by a triumphal robe, scepter, diadem, procession of attendants, hunts, and courses at the table. They cannot even suspect what cares oppress and what torments vex that shadowy happiness.

§ 4. Hence another reason follows: namely, that magistracy is not loved by such men, since they do not recognize the causes for loving it; and from this it is customary for the worst thing to occur--that they perform their duty through fear alone. “A similarity of morals joins friendships,” Quintilian says; “somehow the lights of minds see and recognize one another, and no one can love in another anything except what he silently approves.” For they cannot have a fellowship of affairs and persons so as to live in common, much less, as friends, will they expose or devote themselves to death for the prince’s sake. Friendship will never flourish in those mushrooms, with which and for which they might die. For such men do nothing by judgment, prudence, or regard for the public good.

§ 5. The third reason is this: that crowd is the most inconstant of all, and therefore a government hanging upon mobility so slippery is fragile. For a foolish multitude is led by the lightest impulse and is credulous toward specious words. And so they represent the Gallic Hercules as leading foolish nations by their ears with a golden chain hanging from his mouth; and when the Thracians saw ladders being made by which their accuser would ascend to Juno, they became afraid. We see stupidity exposed to every imposture. Histories teach that peoples were alienated from kings by one speech. At Athens the foolish people was led by orators; at Rome the men beneath the Rostra were the slaves of the tribunes. Everything barbarous is ἠλίθιον--foolish, simple, and therefore easily deceived, but, on the contrary, faithless.

Trajan’s letters recount so many conquered nations that it was difficult to retain their names; but because they were barbarous, they rebelled with the same levity with which they had acceded. In the year of Christ 116, the Cyrenian Jews, ignorant of all things except wickedness, revolted upon a slight occasion under their leader Andrew, and two hundred thousand were killed. The ignorance of those whom Artemion seduced was no less, and the disaster even greater, for with an army sent against them, as many were slaughtered more cruelly. What aroused the sedition of Münzer and Campanus except the uncultivated malice of a people ignorant of its duty and zealous for new things? For when religion had been abjured, it was also easy to alter the commonwealth.

§ 6. The fourth reason: a stupid people cannot resist enemies, for war is an affair of prudence, skill, and stratagems. How easily did Cyrus seize the whole world, and the Spaniards the Indies, though they were comparable neither in bodily mass, strength, nor multitude? One part of Belgium resists for so many years in an almost equal contest, while such extensive dominions come beneath the yoke and desert their kings, because they know neither how to protect them nor to defend their own things. Therefore these men advise the prince just as if a commander should select foolish soldiers who can only hear the trumpet and strike. You would not require prudence in battle, in camp, or in a garrison.

In this year the Portuguese fought a battle against barbarians; letters from India relate the history in this manner. Another enormous fleet of two hundred ships was approaching from the Acehnese--people of the island of Sumatra and perpetual enemies of the Portuguese. Of these, sixty were triremes, and quadriremes larger than those of our countrymen, whose cannon vomited stone balls of thirty and forty pounds. The king of the Acehnese himself sailed in that fleet, together with sixty thousand fighting men. Four Portuguese squadrons unexpectedly encountered that fleet--which it can be believed had conspired together with the Dutch for the destruction of Malacca--and attacked it, with a daring or a fortune the greater of which you might doubt; and after a most bitter battle they routed it, two whole days having been spent in fighting. As many as forty triremes or quadriremes of the enemy were sunk; thirty thousand human beings are written to have fallen. Indeed, in that very confused multitude the cannon fought among themselves against one another; a multitude of other vessels perished; one Portuguese ship of more than a hundred tons, having caught fire, was entirely burned--whether by accident or by enemy force.

Behold what prudence and dexterity bestowed upon the Portuguese, and how the barbarians perished through their own stupidity.

§ 7. Finally, who would prefer a stupid slave to a prudent one? What besides the mill could you safely entrust to a slave who does nothing by reason but is driven by impulse wherever he is moved? Do you therefore wish citizens to be those who cannot go but must be carried? Whom, when your wise mind has deserted them, the enemy may overwhelm as they stand stupefied in the midst of the whirlwind of affairs? “The life of a fool is thankless, it is fearful, it is borne wholly toward the future.” Seneca speaks not only of the life of Baba and Ixion, whom stupidity ennobled, but of the life of those whom pseudo-political prudence calls simple. For disgust with present things, security concerning future evils, and the ostentation of frivolous people cast them headlong into things that will harm them. Do you seek such citizens, subjects, and defenders of the fatherland, whose folly will sell itself to the enemy sooner than it will conquer him?

But since we are treating of the commonwealth, ancient examples can also teach us. More experienced and wiser men have commanded barbarians and stupid men. The Trojan War exercised the victors and the conquered for ten years; in one siege they served half a lifetime of campaigns. Those who as recruits pitched the first tents of the camp, as veterans, aided by hand and stratagems, undermined the walls. Afterward Antenor, Diomedes, Aeneas, Acestes, and the others, scattered through the lands, established kingdoms, prudent and skilled in ruling. The more cultivated Greeks obtained Ionia and the best part of Italy and Africa. Seneca says truly in his Consolation to Helvia: “What do Greek cities intend for themselves in the midst of barbarian regions? What does the Macedonian language intend among Indians and Persians? Scythia, and that whole tract of wild and unconquered nations, displays cities of Achaea planted upon the shores of Pontus. Neither the savagery of perpetual winter nor the dispositions of human beings, bristling in the likeness of their climate, obstructed those transferring their homes. There is an Athenian crowd in Asia; Miletus poured out the population of seventy-five cities in diverse directions. The entire side of Italy which is washed by the lower sea was Greater Greece. Asia claims the Etruscans as its own; Tyrians inhabit Africa, Carthaginians Spain; Greeks thrust themselves into Gaul, Gauls into Greece. The Pyrenees did not prevent the passage of the Germans. Through trackless and unknown places human restlessness has tossed itself.”

If you examine all things, history, which is the teacher of prudence, will demonstrate that a few prudent people who employed laws and discipline held government over many savage and strong peoples. The Germans and Gauls indeed formerly changed their abodes, but occupied kingdoms only after they had been taught civilization. But the Greeks, more civilized than others, and the Tyrians, more civilized than the Greeks, founded long and enduring empires.

The prince must therefore do this: see that all, so far as can be done, are exercised in every respect, but especially in prudence. For thus he will easily rule by good reason and good law those who have learned to follow reason as their leader; and he will correct those who err with a gentler command.

For correction accomplishes more with a prudent man than a hundred lashes with a fool. For stupidity is the mother of all evils: it is always beginning to live, has the slightest occasions for treachery, and is, like a golden flock, a source of profit to the more cunning.

CHAPTER IV

Cunning, the Imitator of Prudence, Is Harmful to the Commonwealth

§ 1. Cunning, craftiness, and like words are customarily taken in either sense. Augustine, Epistle 29: "For, as you know, certain vices are contrary to virtues by an evident distinction, as imprudence is to prudence. But there are certain things which, because they are merely vices, are therefore contrary, yet are similar by a certain deceptive appearance, as not imprudence but cunning is to that same prudence. For now I call that cunning which is more commonly understood and named among the malicious, not as our Scripture is accustomed to speak, which often places cunning in a good sense. Hence: 'Be cunning as serpents'; and this: 'That he may give cunning also to the innocent.' Although among them too the most eloquent man of the Roman tongue said, 'Yet neither deceit nor cunning for taking precautions was lacking to him,' placing cunning in a good sense. But among them this is exceedingly rare; among us it is exceedingly frequent."

Augustine is altogether right. For Cicero, in book 5 of On Duties, calls cunning those whom the Greeks call πανούργους, and places them plainly among vice: "Not open," he says, "not simple, not ingenuous, not a good man, but crafty, obscure, cunning, deceitful, malicious, sly, practiced in deception, artful." In the first book he himself explains what cunning he understands: "Injuries also frequently arise through a certain chicanery and an excessively cunning and malicious interpretation of the law. From this, 'the highest law, the highest injury,' has now become a proverb worn by speech." In this kind many sins are also committed in the commonwealth, as by the man who, when a truce for thirty days had been made with the enemy, laid waste the fields at night, because a truce of days, not of nights, had been made.

Nor is our own man indeed to be approved, if it is true that Quintus Fabius Labeo--or whoever else it was, for I possess nothing beyond hearsay--was given by the senate as arbiter to the Nolans and Neapolitans concerning the boundaries of their territory. When he had come to the place, he spoke to each party separately, urging them not to act or seek anything greedily and to prefer retreating to advancing. When both had done this, some land was left in the middle. And so he fixed their boundaries as they themselves had said; what was left in the middle he adjudged to the Roman people. This is indeed to deceive, not to judge. Therefore such cleverness must be avoided in every affair.

§ 2. I therefore define malicious and deceitfully practiced cunning as a habit of mind for deceiving and harming others. The end of prudence is always good; but the ways and means which it chooses for reaching its purpose must also be right, for the wise person does not strive toward his undertaking through crimes. But the cunning or crafty man, whose mind turns and rolls swiftly in conducting affairs, either chooses an evil end, or evil or counterfeit ways to a good end. If he uses a fallacy of words, it is evil deceit; if malice in actions, it is called fraud, although usage in speaking has long since abolished those distinctions. God detests that deceptive cunning: "The Lord will abominate the bloody and deceitful man" (Psalm 5:7); and, "The Lord will destroy all deceitful lips" (Psalm 11:4). But deceitful men are hated not only by God but also by human beings beyond what can be said.

Cicero, book 2 of On Duties: "Of these two, therefore, justice possesses more power for creating confidence, since it has sufficient authority without prudence, while prudence without justice has no power at all to create confidence. For the craftier and more cunning anyone is, the more hated and suspected he is when the reputation for probity has been removed. Therefore intelligence joined to justice will have as much strength as it wishes for creating confidence. Justice without prudence will have much power; prudence without justice will have none." Who has not detested Cleomenes, a leader notorious for fraud, who perished in prison, killed by the captives with a deserved wound? Lysander, the leader of a magnanimous state, was endowed more with Spartan power than with spirit; he accomplished almost everything by his foxlike devices. Aristomenes the Messenian was the object of the greatest hatred while alive; after his death his heart is said to have been found bristling with hairs. I scarcely believe that those who believe this have a heart, Pliny relates in book 11, chapter 37. After frequently deceiving the Spartans, he was at last killed by them.

The cause of hatred is that no one wishes to be deceived: people prefer that a thing be openly denied them rather than that hope be deferred and mocked by fraud and flattering words. But a greater evil is that malice of nature, once exposed, utterly abolishes all confidence thereafter, as I taught in book 2. But princes and magistrates in whom no confidence is placed are without protection, although they possess kingdoms, resources, and armies.

Pericles acted shrewdly but maliciously. For when he had sworn that he would spare his enemies if they put down their iron, he killed those who had iron clasps upon their military cloaks. The cunning of the Calvinist Church setting out for Florida was no different--indeed, it was more cruel; their history relates the affair. In the year 1556 a French fleet was going to Brazil. It carried thirteen ministers who were to serve the Brazilians; all were inflamed to transport the Reformed Church. They drove off much plunder. On the voyage they took a Portuguese light vessel through surrender, yet promised the Portuguese that, if he quickly found and brought another light vessel, the one they had seized would be returned. The Portuguese, released with an armed force, came upon another Liburnian vessel, captured it, and brought it to that holy Church. The matter greatly pleased our centurions, says the historian, for the vessel was excellent and full of white salt; as they had decreed, they brought it to Villegagnon in Brazil. But in keeping faith with the Portuguese concerning the restoration of the light vessel, they showed themselves so cruel that, after Spaniards and Portuguese had been thrown together into one and the same vessel, not even a morsel of sailors' bread was left to them; the sails were deliberately torn, and even the skiff, without which they could not reach land, was taken away. They would have seemed to have adopted a gentler counsel if they had sunk the wretched men than if they released them thus; for unless a skiff from somewhere else came to the aid of those in distress, it is certain that they perished at last either by shipwreck or by hunger.

§ 3. The Romans indeed believed that the gods delighted in deceit. Valerius, book 7, chapter 3: "When Servius Tullius was reigning, a cow of exceptional size and extraordinary form was born to a certain head of a household in Sabine territory. The most trustworthy interpreters of oracles answered that it had been produced by the immortal gods for this purpose: that the fatherland of whoever sacrificed it to Diana on the Aventine would obtain command of the entire world. Its master, joyful at this, drove the ox to Rome with the greatest haste and placed it before Diana's altar on the Aventine, intending by the sacrifice to give the Sabines dominion over the human race. When the priest of the temple had been made more certain concerning the matter, he instilled a religious scruple into the stranger, so that he should not slaughter the victim before he had washed himself in the water of the nearest river. And while he sought the channel of the Tiber, the priest himself sacrificed the cow and, by a pious theft of the sacrifice, rendered our city the mistress of so many states and so many nations."

This too was foul malice amid error, and he sacrificed fraud to the demon no less than the ox. But when I censure cunning, I do not mean that which has a good and right end proposed and does not employ evil means in pursuing it; for I relegate that honorable cunning to stratagems. David feigns madness in danger of death; Solomon in judgment at first sight displays cruelty; Marcus Volusius, a proscribed aedile, deceived the triumvirs in the garb of a beggar and arrived safely in the camp of Brutus. "Somewhat more splendid," says Valerius, "was the aid of last resort in the same kind of case employed by Sentius Saturninus Vetulio. When he heard that his name had been posted among those proscribed by the triumvirs, he immediately assumed the insignia of the praetorship. With men suborned to precede him in the manner of lictors, attendants, and public slaves, he commandeered vehicles, occupied lodgings, removed those in his path, and by so audacious an assumption of command poured the thickest darkness upon enemy eyes in the greatest daylight. Likewise, when he came to Puteoli, just as though he were conducting public business, he seized ships with the greatest license and made his way to Sicily, then the surest refuge of the proscribed."

Anaximenes freed his fatherland Lampsacus by an ingenious and praiseworthy craftiness. For when Alexander was advancing with the greatest zeal toward its destruction and saw Anaximenes, his tutor, coming out beyond the walls, because it was evident that he would oppose his own entreaties to the king's anger, Alexander swore that he would not do what he requested. Anaximenes then said, "I ask that you destroy Lampsacus." This swiftness of sagacity snatched the town, renowned for its ancient nobility, away from the destruction for which it had been destined.

Such things must often be employed in counsels of peace and war. Others are things that cause harm unjustly or consist in lies, perjuries, and wicked dissimulation; these I wish to be removed utterly from the commonwealth. For no path except the right path leads to the end; to turn reason given by God toward frauds and malice is an outrage.

§ 4. Many nevertheless admit frauds; indeed, they substitute cunning for prudence. We live among evil people, they say; princes themselves

> Keep a cunning fox beneath a stale breast.

Kingdoms are overthrown through fraud; why should you not preserve them by the same means? He always performs his duty who takes counsel for the advantage of human beings.

Machiavelli indeed thinks these things openly and wickedly. Others do so more gently, for they make cunning and fraud threefold: light, intermediate, and grave. They counsel the light, tolerate the intermediate, and condemn the grave. Thus Justus Lipsius in book 4 of the Politics.

He calls distrust and dissimulation light fraud; but he describes it in such a way that it seems to contain caution and taciturnity rather than any vice. He forbids princes to believe readily, because they lie open to injury; because offenses against them are committed with less fear and for a greater reward; because confidence is rare in a court--indeed, among so many peoples there is scarcely one faithful person. These, I say, are precepts of virtue, not indulgence toward vices. For nothing is more useful than a wise distrust. Nor is the dissimulation by which one covers one's mind always vicious. A matter which he can believe only rashly and foolishly is proposed to the senate or to the prince, but he nevertheless has no need to say that he believes none of it. He suppresses his judgment; for why should he carry his mind on his forehead or tongue? Silence is a faithful reward. Yet I do not wish dissimulation to advance farther, to ambiguous and fraudulent utterances, when injury to God and human beings lies there; for then he will be guilty of a graver fraud.

Justus tolerates, but does not counsel, intermediate fraud. In it are conciliation, corruption, and frustration through letters and embassies. But these things too must be distinguished. You shall never draw the subject of another into friendship with you or with your commonwealth by a lie and wicked dissimulation, for God forbids it: "Do not wish to use any lie, for the repeated use of it is never profitable" (Ecclesiasticus 1); and, "Elaborate words do not become a fool, nor a lying lip a prince" (Proverbs 17). He says these things rightly, for he confesses that they are sins, albeit small ones. But if that is so, not only must they not be counseled; they must be dissuaded by every means.

§ 5. What, therefore? Will it not be permissible to preserve a state by one little lie? Do not daily perjuries so often resound without causes, or for ridiculous and often even evil causes? Surely one guilt, and not a great one, will forestall and avert so many crimes that would occur in its destruction. Permit a lighter evil by which you may exclude a graver; tolerate smoke lest you fall into flames.

But the oracle of uncreated wisdom, of creative wisdom, thunders against these fearful voices of human wisdom. The vessel of election, the teacher of the nations, cries aloud that evils must not be done so that goods may come (Romans 3:6): "For if the truth of God has abounded in my lie unto his glory, why am I still judged as a sinner? And why not--just as we are blasphemed and as some say that we say--let us do evils that goods may come? Their condemnation is just." Therefore no lie belongs to prudence; no prudence lies; every lie belongs to folly, because carnal prudence and malicious cunning are folly before God, before the angels, in the infallible tribunal, according to the eternal sentence.

§ 6. Against all the pseudo-politicians let Augustine alone come forward for me. He too had been nobly engaged in political life and among the dignities of the powerful, and, in accordance with the custom of his own and our time, had told many lies in unbelief; for sins belong not to times but to human beings. He wrote one book On Lying and another Against Lying, from which whoever wishes to read him rather than the teachers of lies will draw the true judgment. For in the book On Lying he proves that none of the eight kinds of lies is lawful, even if it brings about no one's harm and the advantage of many. Next, a lie must never be told, even to escape any evil whatsoever, since it is written: "The mouth that lies kills the soul." Third, vain is the excuse of those who lie so that what ought to be detested still more may be avoided.

"But in this," he says, "human beings err because they subordinate precious things to cheaper ones. For once it has been granted that some evil must be admitted lest another more grave be admitted, each person measures the evil not by the rule of truth but by his own desire and custom; and he thinks that graver which he himself abhors more, not that which truly must be avoided more. This entire vice is begotten from a perversity of love. For since there are two lives of ours--one eternal, which is divinely promised, and the other temporal, in which we now are--when anyone has begun to love this temporal life more than that eternal one, on account of the life which he loves he thinks that all things must be done. Nor does he esteem any sins graver than those which injure this life and either unjustly and unlawfully remove from it something of advantage or, by an inflicted death, take it away entirely. And so they hate thieves, robbers, the insulting, torturers, and killers more than the lascivious, drunken, and luxurious, if these trouble no one. For they do not understand, or do not care at all, that the latter do injury to God--not indeed to any disadvantage of his, but to their own great destruction--when they corrupt his gifts in themselves, even temporal gifts, and through those very corruptions are turned away from eternal gifts."

He had said a little earlier that one must not lie even for the praise of God. Afterward he adds: "One must not lie with the sixth kind either, for the truth of testimony is not rightly corrupted even for anyone's temporal advantage and safety. But no one must be led to eternal salvation by the aid of a lie." And he adds the reason: "For no one must be converted to good morals by the evil morals of those converting him."

But what of this--is not a little lie praiseworthy for the good of the commonwealth? Augustine answers: "For neither anyone's temporal advantage nor safety is to be preferred to perfecting faith. And so, although someone offended by right deeds should retreat from virtue, right deeds must not on that account be abandoned." In the other book, which is written Against Lying, he labors to show that a lie must not be abused either for the peace of the Church or for the conversion of those who err. The Priscillianists thought that their heresy must be concealed not only by denying and lying but even by perjuring themselves; but it seemed to certain Catholics that they ought to pretend to be Priscillianists so that they might penetrate their hiding places. He says that their design is contrary to Paul's judgment, which forbids doing evils so that goods may come.

Since snares and hunts altogether similar to these entangle the unwary throughout the whole world by means of lies, let us compare their deeds with one another. The end of the Catholics was most honorable: to remove the danger of an obscene heresy from the Church and to draw the heretics out of their hiding places so that they might be converted. Augustine teaches that this must be done piously and truly, not by lying, and proves it by the sacred writings; but he also adduces reasons from the very midst of the nature of things.

§ 7. First, there are many kinds of lies; there is none that is not contrary to truth. Every lie, therefore, is in evil, and injury inflicted upon God is graver than human disadvantages. But since that injury touches few people, let us look at the human disadvantages.

§ 8. Second, while human and foolish wisdom opens a crack for fallacy, from small beginnings it builds for itself a broad and open gate. Moreover, so great a blindness has occupied the minds of human beings that it is too little for them if we say that certain lies are not sins, unless in certain cases they also say that it is a sin if we refuse a lie. And in defending lying they have been brought to the point of saying that the Apostle Paul used even that first kind, which is the most criminal of all. He says that the first kind of lie occurs when someone lies in the doctrine of piety.

§ 9. Third, and what is more pitiable, that prudence, as customary as it is harmful, brings it about that confidence is abolished. For what envoy, what orator now trusts--not to say another envoy or orator; not to say the prince to whom or against whom he is sent--but even his own prince, by whom he is sent? For the envoys themselves are often deceived. "And what is more pitiable," Augustine says, "even those who have now been made, as it were, our own cannot discover how they may trust us. For if they suspect that we speak even the Catholic dogmas themselves deceitfully so that we may conceal some other thing--I know not what--which we think true, you will certainly say to one suspecting such things, 'I did that then for this reason: that I might capture you.' But what will you answer when he says: 'How, then, do I know whether you are doing it even now, lest you be captured by me?' Or can anyone truly be persuaded that the man who lies in order to capture does not lie in order not to be captured? Do you see where this evil tends: namely, that not only do we rightly seem suspect to them, and they to us, but every brother to every brother? And thus, while the endeavor through lying is that faith may be taught, what is accomplished instead is that no one should be trusted. For if we also speak against God when we lie, what evil so great will be able to be found in any lie that we ought by every means to avoid it as most criminal?"

Look upon obscure words, covered faces, the gentle torments of cups, and trials made through the most intimate friends: you will affirm under oath that through this doctrine confidence has now perished from the world, or certainly lies hidden among a few.

§ 10. Fourth, this excuse does not suffice: I lie not only for the advantage of my own commonwealth but even for the good of my adversaries, so that they may become friends and, by inflicting injury upon us, may not sin more gravely. "This opinion," St. Augustine says, "dishonors the martyrs; indeed, it abolishes holy martyrdoms altogether. For according to these men the martyrs would act more justly and wisely if they did not confess to their persecutors that they were Christians and did not make them murderers by their confession, but rather, by lying and denying what they were, both preserved for themselves the advantage of the flesh and the purpose of the heart, and did not permit their persecutors to fulfill the crime conceived in their minds. For those men were not their neighbors in the Christian faith, so that they should have been obliged to speak to them with their mouth the truth which they spoke in their heart; rather, they were moreover enemies of truth itself.

"For if Jehu, whom among others they seem prudently to regard as an example of lying, lied that he was a servant of Baal so that he might kill his servants, how much more justly, according to their perversity, would Christ's servants in time of persecution have lied that they were servants of demons, lest the servants of demons kill the servants of Christ; and would they have sacrificed to idols lest human beings be killed, if Jehu sacrificed to Baal so that he might kill human beings? For according to the excellent doctrine of the lie-speakers, what would harm them if they pretended to worship the devil in the body when the worship of God was preserved in the heart? But the true martyrs, the holy martyrs, did not so understand the Apostle. For they saw and held what is written: 'With the heart belief is made unto justice; with the mouth confession is made unto salvation'; and, 'In their mouth no lie has been found.' And thus they went blameless to the place where they will not guard against being tempted further by liars, because in their heavenly assemblies they will no longer have liars either as strangers or as neighbors."

The reasoning is weighty: so many thousands could have freed themselves from the gravest torments and death, and others from crimes, by one little lie; and nevertheless they preferred to hold to truth through so many torments. What reasoning, therefore, compels you to lie in little temporal affairs, and indeed to those who will not believe?

§ 11. Fifth, if one must lie so that we may lead human beings to praise God, we teach not only the speaking of true things but also lying. If, therefore, we refer this to the commonwealth and profess the art of lying as honorable, I think we shall state no reason why we should not be attacked with our own arts, and accomplish this: that, by our own desert, all others who can do so lead us into fraud. But if lies are lawful and without harm because they are opportune for the advantages of the commonwealth, in that manner adulteries too will be chaste, thefts just, homicides blameless, and poisons permitted. Histories disclose human crimes to us. There have been those who slaughtered flocks of illustrious men as though they were victims for their own security. There have been those who pursued adulteries with matrons--not so much from lust, although they were most impure, as from a zeal for prying into the secrets of their husbands.

For he who has once admitted into government sins as though either necessary or useful, because small guilt is well counterbalanced by enormous advantages to public affairs, is not far from refusing no crime which he judges conducive to what they call reason of state. They make use of the offense of a small fraud:

"What if you utter a little word for the public safety otherwise than you think--have you sinned?" Will not that man also say: "What if I also add an oath to a useful and salutary lie? What difference does it make that I lie with God as witness, if I lie in his sight? How great a sin is there in one little soul, if for the common good it is dismissed from its little body? How great an evil is there in one embrace, that it should not be permissible to preserve life and the state even through pleasures?" Tiberius killed many because he knew that they had perceived his mind. Others did many things by which they showed this: that they fled no crime which offered advantage and pleasure. For this opinion not only presents small offenses as almost nothing but also, in comparison with public safety, preserving a kingdom, or conquering an enemy, defends great crimes as though pardonable and prudently admitted.

Zopyrus, the servant of Darius and an example of wicked compliance, when he saw that Babylon was being besieged in vain, fled into the enemy city after his body had been torn with lashes and mutilated--an injury which he himself had inflicted upon himself--and complained that his king had treated him with that cruelty. His wounds created confidence, for no one suspected so effective and so cruel a deceit. No prudent man would have endured those things even if a kingdom were the reward for himself, much less for an impious king. He counted lying praiseworthy and built confidence in the lie by means of torments. But this had been too little, for the Babylonians were not ready to believe; and so by a greater crime the lives of many were expended upon his frauds. For he had agreed with the king that, if he were placed in command of the army by the Babylonians, the king should expose soldiers to them when they sallied out, whom by that disorder and fraud he could easily cut down. And thus, by perjury, mutilation of his body, and successful parricides, he most criminally betrayed to a most savage enemy those by whom he had been elected to the highest dignity, and carried about forever the marks of shameful compliance and perfidy.

I use a familiar example which is customarily brought forward to commend fidelity; but here all things are full of perfidy, both in the king and in Zopyrus. It is of more value, indeed, that fidelity be preserved than that Babylon be captured. I shall conclude this argument with a judgment of St. Augustine: "It indeed matters very greatly from what cause, for what end, and with what intention anything is done. But things which are established to be sins must be done under no pretext of a good cause, with no supposedly good end, and with no seemingly good intention." Augustine, the same man who ought to possess great authority in this important case, proceeds:

"But when the deeds themselves are already sins, such as thefts, debaucheries, blasphemies, or other such things, who is there who says that they are to be done for good causes, so that either they are not sins or, what is more absurd, they are just sins? Who is there who says: 'So that we may have something to give to the poor, let us commit thefts against the rich; or let us sell false testimonies, especially if innocent men are not thereby injured, but rather guilty men are rescued from judges who would condemn them'? For two goods are accomplished by this sale of a lie: money is obtained from which the needy person may be fed, and the judge is deceived lest a human being be punished.

"If we can, why do we not also suppress true wills and substitute false ones, so that unworthy people who accomplish no good from them may not possess inheritances or legacies, but rather those by whom the hungry are fed, the naked clothed, strangers received, captives redeemed, and churches built? For why should those evils not be done for the sake of these goods, if for the sake of these goods even those things are not evil? Again, if certain impure and wealthy women appear likely to enrich their lovers and debauchers besides, why should a merciful man not undertake those parts and arts and use them for so good a cause, so that he may have something from which to bestow upon the needy? And why should he not listen to the Apostle saying: 'He who was stealing, let him now steal no more; rather, let him labor, working with his hands what is good, so that he may have something from which to give to one who has need'?"

§ 12. Evil, therefore, will not be good, even if it is perpetrated for the cause that there may be something from which good is done. Who would say such things except one who strives to overthrow human affairs and all morals and laws? He sins less who sets a good end before evils--who steals from a rich man so that he may give to a poor man, who sins not from avarice but from pity; but prudence does not rule that corrupt pity--error possesses it.

Will prudence, then, never counsel lying? Not even so that grave sins of others may be avoided? Let them hear the great and holy dictator of politics: "If we open this road to sins, so that we commit lesser ones lest others commit greater, all things will enter and reign over an infinite space, with a broad boundary--indeed, with no boundary, but with all limits torn out and removed. For when it has been determined that one human being must sin less lest another sin more, then surely by our thefts the debaucheries of others will be guarded against, and by debaucheries, incest; and if some impiety is seen that is even worse than incest, it will be said that incest too must be committed by us, if it can be contrived in this manner that the impiety is not committed by others.

"And in each individual kind of sin, thefts for thefts, debaucheries for debaucheries, incests for incests, and sacrileges for sacrileges will be thought necessary--our sins for the sins of others--not only lesser for greater, but even, if the very greatest and worst are reached, fewer for more, if the course of affairs should so turn itself that others will not otherwise abstain from sins unless we sin somewhat less, but nevertheless sin. Thus, whenever an enemy who has power of this kind says, 'Unless you are criminal, I shall be more criminal,' or, 'Unless you commit this crime, I shall do more such things,' we would seem to ourselves to admit a crime if we wished to abstain from crime. What else is it to judge this wise than to be unwise, or rather to be insane? For I must guard against damnation arising from my own iniquity, not from another's, whether perpetrated against me or against others. For the soul that has sinned shall itself die."

§ 13. But human weakness still rises up, brave only in the defense of vices. Augustine himself confesses that he is not yet in the number of those whom compensatory sins do not disturb. Behold, a sick man is in danger from a grave disease, whose strength could no longer bear it if the death of his only and dearest son were announced to him. If he asks you whether the son lives, when you know that he has ended his life, what will you answer? For whatever else you say besides one of three things--"he is dead," "he lives," or "I do not know"--he believes nothing other than that the son is dead, because he understands that you are afraid to say it and unwilling to lie. It has the same force even if you remain silent in every way. But of those three, two are false--"he lives" and "I do not know"--and cannot be said by you except by lying. But if you say that one true thing, namely, that he is dead, and the death of the distressed man follows, it will be cried out that he was killed by you. And who could endure human beings exaggerating how great an evil it is for a salutary lie to be avoided and for truth, the murderess, to be loved?

"I am moved vehemently by these objections, but it would be a wonder if wisely too. For when I shall have set before whatever eyes my heart possesses the intelligible beauty of him from whose mouth nothing false proceeds, although where truth grows more and more clear as it radiates, there my palpitating weakness is beaten back, I nevertheless am so inflamed by love of so great a beauty that I despise all human things which call me back from it. But it is much that this affection should persevere to such a degree that the effect may not fail in temptation. Nor, while I contemplate the luminous good in which there are no shadows of lying, am I moved by the fact that, when we are unwilling to lie and human beings die upon hearing the truth, truth is called a murderess. For if an immodest woman demands debauchery and, when you do not consent, dies disturbed by savage love, will chastity too be a murderess?"

What if it should be permissible to preserve a soul by a lie? An infant is held captive. Can I deceive the guards by a lie so that there may be access to him for baptizing him? Augustine denies it, for if they can be deceived by a lie, why can they not also be enticed by debauchery? The conclusion, therefore, is: "Either lies must be guarded against by acting rightly, or they must be confessed by repenting; but, since they abound, they must not be increased by living unhappily and by teaching them."

These things are Augustine's, from whom we also learn this: the rationale of those who frequently use lies without harm to another and repent of those committed is far different from that of those who increase lies without measure by teaching them.

I wished to teach most of these things in the words of so great a doctor. For if any theologian, especially a religious, gives these warnings, those deceitful and obscure schemers, compliant with their princes in frauds, immediately object: "Be unconcerned about what those young men from the school or shade say; we do not judge them suitable arbiters of civil discipline. A man not ignorant of the things that occur in this life is required, and the Italian Maculonus must not be condemned so strictly." For thus they wrest words of a good man, spoken without complete caution, into the worst sense. But let them acknowledge that Augustine neither lacks talent nor is inexperienced in human affairs, and that he is a constant censor of vices.

§ 14. But what is it in which that prudence vaunts itself while the crowds favor it? By my cunning I preserved the city; I resolved intricate affairs; I removed the commonwealth's fear--how great the utility of one lie! But God did not will it; he prohibited even a useful lie. Will you take better counsel for the commonwealth than God? It is the Lord who, unless he guards the city, the man who guards it lies in vain. But I ascend the tower and proclaim with the voice of God and the voice of nature: the fellowship of the human race is not preserved by sins, but dissipated.

All things depend upon God, upon supreme truth, supreme power, and supreme goodness. Do you judge your little subtleties and little lies necessary for so great a mass of affairs? Unless you teach that one must lie, will human affairs slide backward? O pure deity, O most limpid truth, disperse the wretched clouds of vanity with a ray of true light! In your hand are all the ends of the earth and the hearts of kings; yet these men trust that by their fallacies and frauds they can regulate and administer all things. It is great imprudence to wish, without God and against God, to secure happiness not for one human being alone but for the commonwealth. Do you please yourself so greatly that you think a prince will be happy through your lie?

What, then, shall I do when I must either lie or incur danger? You indeed will do what is not lawful and what I dissuade: you will lie. But you ought rather to incur danger than to lie, because he who forbade you to flee danger by a lie can free you from it; or, if you undergo it, can turn it into greater goods. But if you persist in the purpose of lying, he will cast you into other evils from which you will emerge neither by lying nor by telling the truth. Commit the affair and the waves of your thoughts to omnipotent wisdom, certain that human affairs--even the wills of wicked men, the artifices of courts, and the sly counsels of cities--are so ordered by infinite wisdom that the most provident goodness of God suffices for the common safety, and a cunning in lying within you, contrary to the laws of God, is not required.

§ 15. But to me, considering the affair in human terms, a great part of calamities seems to arise from that deceitful art. First, they conduct the affair not with simplicity, prayer, modesty, contempt of self, hope, and confidence in heavenly aid; rather, they summon troops of fallacies into their breast and, as the more cunning little slaves are accustomed to boast in comedy, place every protection in crafty deceits. And so the outcome of such counsels is generally unhappy: "They enter upon counsel, and not from God"; therefore it is dissipated.

Next, those cunning counsels contend with equal fallacies of the adversaries, wherefore greater distrust, dissimulation, and fraud arise on both sides, as does knowledge of the mutual fraud. "Rome too has its Hannibal," the Carthaginian used to say, when Fabius recovered Tarentum by the same art by which Hannibal himself had seized it. Third, those who have practiced the art of deceiving for so many years are not faithful counselors to princes or senators to states. By a severe but just vengeance of God, those inventors of frauds have generally paid the penalty to their own prince or fatherland: Themistocles, Pericles, Theramenes, Lysander, Cleomenes, Aristomenes--I omit others, for politicians cannot read here all the deeds or ends of these men. Let them recall what is easiest for them: namely, within these last twenty years, the lamentable falls, disgraces, dishonorable removals from office, poverty, disasters of family, and sometimes prisons and death of men swollen with prudence and of cunning men ruling in courts, assemblies, and public affairs.

CHAPTER V

Diligence Must Be Joined to Prudence

§ 1. I would wish that what always sounds in the Church in the Apostle's voice were inscribed upon the citadels of all princes and the senate houses of all cities (Romans 12:8): ὁ προϊστάμενος ἐν σπουδῇ. "He who presides, with solicitude, zeal, diligence." Prudence cannot be idle. I take diligence and solicitude as the same, as do the ancient translator of Scripture and St. Thomas. For although among non-Christian writers solicitude signifies a vicious and anxious restlessness and agitation of mind, it nevertheless has a better signification among our writers. St. Thomas says: "One is called solicitous as though sollers citus, 'skilfully swift,' insofar as someone, from a certain skilfulness of mind, is swift in pursuing the things that are to be done." Diligence, therefore, is an alacrity and faculty of mind by which swiftness, with right reason, is prescribed for those things which have been prudently resolved.

The enemies of this virtue are ἀμέλεια, negligence, when, with care and solicitude set aside, good counsels perish through not acting--a frequent but deadly evil in the commonwealth; next, sloth, or ὀκνηρότης, when the times for action are postponed until affairs come into danger; third, torpor, or νωχεία, which so dissolves the mind that it interrupts things well considered and rightly begun. O prince, O consul, O commander:

> Ἔργοις φιλόπονος ἴσθι, μὴ λόγοις μόνον.

> Love labor in deed, not only in words.

The saying is brief, but it embraces all the things of prudence: νόει καὶ πρᾶττε--think and act. For diligence is truly the mother in every good thing. A little earlier I praised the verse concerning wisdom:

> Ἅπαντα δὲ διὰ τὸ φρονεῖν καθίσταται.

>

> All things serve wisdom.

But a similar saying demonstrates that this must be understood of efficacious, laborious, and operative wisdom:

> Τῆς ἐπιμελείας πάντα δοῦλα γίγνεται.

> All things serve diligence.

§ 2. I indeed judge every care, solicitude, diligence, and vigilance of the magistrate honorable and almost royal. For whatever things, having been prudently resolved, are executed with princely authority and swift vigor are great because they pertain to many. Every virtue requires ἀκρίβειαν, exactness, and that the result answer the art precisely; but under government, diligence even in small things is of the highest importance and is a certain and stable proof of a mind not degenerate. To many it is accustomed to seem beneath majesty to take an interest in the accounts of quaestors and to exercise care over expenditures. But in truth this especially procures and strengthens majesty; otherwise, through that negligence the treasury is exhausted and the rapacity of officials and ministers is increased without measure. And when war threatens, all flee; for both those who have plundered wish to preserve their possessions, and those who have no hope from a poor prince transfer themselves to the rich.

Then indeed they feel the penalties of negligence, when citadels, revenues, and towns must be pledged--not to friends and faithful men, but to thieves who buy the prince for themselves with the princes' money. I shall discuss this matter in book 8. For now I admonish that the lively eyes of princes and senators must be cast upon the smallest things. All those smallest things are decisive points of the greatest things. The sum is this: either let the prince or senate do all things itself, or let it demand accounts of all things done; if it can do neither, let it act so that all believe that accounts of all things must be rendered daily.

Not only is this useful to the commonwealth and an antidote to embezzlement; it also conduces to the safety of administrators, of whom there is not one in a thousand who is not compelled to disgorge things badly acquired and restore them with disgrace, since no one lacks an enemy and, in truth, an accuser. Princes sharpen the industry of others by example: the prince carries a palisade, raises an earthwork, sights the cannon, polishes the sword, exercises the horse, demands accounts, and learns small things. Majesty is not reduced to the ranks; rather, distinction from majesty is added to common works. The majesty of God is infinite, and nevertheless he always looks upon all lowly things: he disposes limbs and members for flies and fleas, and executes these small things without diminution of majesty just as he governs the world. Therefore in Amos 7:1 God himself is named "the Maker of the locust." For the same wisdom of his shines in great and small things.

§ 3. Finally, who does not daily experience what the disadvantages of negligence are? I do not treat of private matters; public ones lie open to everyone's eyes. Nothing is so rightly constituted that idleness does not overthrow it. The opportunities of affairs never wait for the idleness of rulers. I condemn precipitation in counsels, which nevertheless is sometimes successful not by its own merit but by the indulgence of the divine power; but I condemn still more delay and languor, which corrupt all things. For just as diligence corrects the depravity of nature, so negligence in a great body nourishes and increases the plagues of all diseases. There is nothing that persistent labor and intent and diligent care do not conquer; and, on the contrary, there is nothing that does not waste away through idleness and fall through relaxation and torpor.

Why do you look upon distant things? The surest protection is from what is nearest--indeed, from yourself. The magistrate, therefore, will imitate farmers, whose rustic axiom is this: wherever the eyes of the present master have frequently approached, in that part the fruits abound to a greater degree; for the master's eye feeds the horse. Therefore let no one, like the Chinese king or the later Persians, think that the fruit of kingship is leisure with dignity; rather, let him judge that it is royal to act well and to hear ill. The gait of the Egyptian king was a matter of ridicule to Scipio and the Roman envoys: it displayed ἀεργίαν, idleness, and ἀδυναμίαν, weakness.

The constancy of Alexander Severus in laboring is to be praised. Lampridius describes it thus: "Indeed, if necessity compelled, he gave his attention to business before daybreak and prolonged it to a late hour; nor did he ever become weary or withdraw morose or angry, but always with an even countenance and cheerful toward all things. For he was of enormous prudence, a man upon whom no one could impose, and one whom, if anyone wished cleverly to attempt to deceive him, he understood, and the man paid the penalty."

And Herodian: "He himself made the journey without interruption, greatly regarding neither feast days nor any labors, equally enduring cold and heat. Often he also went through the highest mountains in a savage winter, with snow falling heavily from the sky, his head uncovered, so that in deed he might exhort the soldiers to alacrity and endurance of labors. Therefore they were incited to endure all things not by a certain fear and law, but rather by emulation and the prince's example. He also sent men to occupy the narrows of the Alps and beset the approaches to Italy."

Nor did he wish others to act differently, for he gave the watchword "Let us labor," just as Pertinax had given "Let us serve as soldiers." Hadrian was energetic and laborious, if any emperor was; for he frequently traversed the provinces, administered justice, and punished the greed of governors. The poet Florus mocked his august labors: "I do not wish to be Caesar--to walk among the Britons and endure Scythian frosts." To him Hadrian wittily replied: "I do not wish to be Florus--to walk through taverns, hide in eating houses, and endure round mosquitoes." Vespasian indeed died amid imperial cares while he was attending to embassies; his maxim was this: “An emperor ought to die standing.” What would he have thought concerning those whom soft inactivity buries alive? In the morning, after he had awakened from sleep, he read letters, conducted public business, inspected petitions, and heard parties. Domitian too, among his greatest vices, retained this through a certain emulation. Trajan, however, sat upon the tribunal and heard cases without weariness.

§ 4. But as in other affairs, so especially in military affairs, in which it is not permissible to err twice, there is need of most cautious speed. For it strikes great terror into enemies and does not grant those terrified an interval for recovering themselves. But how will a prince suffice for so many and such minute cares? I answer: not only lesser kings and commanders, but even monarchs and lords of very many kingdoms, can have ordered times for arranging affairs.

§ 5. First, therefore, let the prince arrange his times in order; for things out of order hinder not only themselves but also those things which are well ordered. If he distinguishes these times, affairs will present themselves in their order, and times will not be lacking for them; yet neither will times--which the prince will count as profit--remain over for vices. The time expended upon business is sacred; that expended upon other things is profane, unless it is expended so that health may be equal to the business.

Second, if there are several provinces, he will assign their own counsels to each, just as to individual affairs, and thus he himself will also be able to be present with them by turns.

Third, if seven hours are allotted to sleep, two to food, and the same number to recreation and honorable relaxation of the mind, thirteen will remain for business. If he so arranges these that all can say:

> The day itself is distinguished by a beautiful order of affairs,

he himself will dispatch many affairs. For fixed hours he will assign to fixed consultations, and other hours which he wishes to be free for extraordinary matters and for hearing the wretched, widows, and wards. For pity is due first to them, and the prince ought especially to be a father to those deprived of other protection.

It pleases me here to append what the most prudent man Antonio de Guevara rightly and wisely wrote concerning Marcus Aurelius, in imitation of Xenophon’s Education of Cyrus. “By these intervals,” he says, “the excellent emperor Marcus Aurelius divided his times, so that he might have sufficient time both for caring for his own affairs and for public business. For a man released from cares and solicitude--not idle--accomplishes many things even in a short time; one distracted by solicitude scarcely accomplishes a few in a long time. He ordered his time so that he slept seven hours at night, rested at noon for one, and allotted two to lunch and dinner--not because he lunched or dined for so long, but because the banquet was prolonged by the disputations of philosophers. For during all seventeen years he was never seen to take food without hearing either a reader or a philosopher.

“Although he commanded many kingdoms and provinces, he gave individual hours to the affairs of Asia, Africa, and Europe; but for two hours on each day he associated familiarly with his children, wife, and friends. He likewise allotted one hour to extraordinary business--for example, hearing the complaints of the oppressed, the grievances of the poor, the burdens of widows, and the spoliations of wards. For poor people, who have little power, must be heard by princes who love the praise of clemency just as much as rich people, who possess very much.

“Whatever remained of either daytime or nighttime was distributed to the reading of books, the writing of works, the composition of poems, the investigation of antiquities, the conversations of learned people, and the disputations of philosophers; for nothing was more pleasant to him than learned conversations.

“Unless he was hindered by difficult wars or called away by arduous business, ordinarily in wintertime he always went to bed at the ninth hour and arose from bed at the fourth; and lest he be idle, he always had a book placed beneath his pillow, by reading which he passed the time until it grew light. For it was solemn custom for fire to be carried before the Roman emperors--glowing coals by day, but lamps to be lit in their chambers at night--so that candles might burn while they watched and lamps while they slept. It was instituted by the Romans that oil born from the olive tree and wax prepared by the industry of bees should be burned before princes, so that they might remember that they ought to be as placid and mild as oil born from the olive, and as useful to the commonwealth as the bee in the hive.

"When he had risen at about the sixth hour, he dressed publicly, not in a common manner but rather with the greatest pleasantness, by asking those standing around how they had passed the whole night and by explaining either what he had dreamed, what he had meditated upon, or what he had read. Once dressed, he washed his face and hands with scented waters, since he especially delighted in pleasant odors and was endowed with so acute a sense of smell that he was sometimes not a little offended when passing foul and fetid places. First thing in the morning he ate one or two morsels of the electuary diastoechados and drank three cups of Cretan wine or a little distilled liquor, because his stomach and breast were weaker from excessive exertion in studies. For those devoted to studies are exposed to various diseases, as experience teaches, since, enticed by the sweetness of studies, they do not perceive the harm to life.

"In summertime, first thing in the morning, he walked on foot along the bank of the Tiber for about two hours and heard while standing those who addressed him; and this was certainly wise. For a prince who is sitting always makes him who speaks brief. As the day gradually advanced and the heat grew stronger, he ascended to the Capitol, where he was awaited by the senate. When it had been dismissed, he went to the amphitheater of Titus, where the envoys and procurators of the provinces assembled, and remained there for a good part of the day. When he had eaten lunch and withdrawn for a little while, he went to the temple of the Vestals and heard the individual nations in the order assigned to them by him. He ate only once in the day, and that sometimes rather late, but pleasantly and abundantly, rejoicing in few dishes, but the best; for foreign and varied feasts always produce foreign diseases and infirmities.

"Not rashly did he go out to walk through the city more than once in each week, without any retinue either of his own people or of strangers--attended by only ten or twelve servants--so that all needy people and orphans might have free power to speak to him and, if they wished, to complain concerning his officials. For it can in no way happen that anyone heals the commonwealth unless he whose duty this is thoroughly knows its diseases."

§ 6. Experience teaches that a prince can perform these things and embrace the care of all. Unseasonable and seasonable banquets, journeys, hunts, fowling, games, and other pleasures take away much time. If they cut off a part from these, so much time will be supplied for ordering serious affairs very well that all subjects will enjoy the prince's vigilance, all faithful administrators will rejoice that their works are inspected, and the wicked will be in continual fear.

The province of magistrates is certainly hard and laborious. Since through their negligence justice is oppressed, religion despised, enemies gain strength, and satraps exercise tyranny, their negligence is very often a mortal sin--indeed, among mortal sins the most detestable. By one word, one subscription of a name, one cast of the eye, how many scandals can they remove, how many good men can they raise up, how many efforts of the wicked can they repel? Nor can they be excused. They tolerate no negligence in their own affairs; people fly to execute the commands of the court. How, amid so many acts of obedience, do they not understand that the most exquisite diligence is required from them?

Distinguished counsel was given to Augustus by Maecenas: "It belongs to the best and excellent prince not only that he himself perform all things according to duty, but that he also take care by what means all the others may become as excellent as possible." Let him try to learn all things; this belongs to diligence. I know that many things must be forgiven to one who knows all things; but if he is blind to many, most things will be done in such a way that they ought not to be forgiven. People fear and dread to offend again one who forgives; they mock one who is ignorant. He who sits at the helm never dozes without danger; yet a shipmaster is in one part of the great sea, which is often at rest, while all the storms of the whole kingdom beat upon a prince wherever he sits. Unless he watches perpetually, they will shake him out. Yet he ought to fear not for himself but for his people, so that the people too may fear for the prince, upon whom they know their safety depends.

§ 7. There is one distinguished abridgment of diligence by which things well constituted are faithfully completed with swift execution and without great labor. I have observed the Reverend Father General employ it in our Society, and provincials also employ it sometimes; it will be applied with great advantage in the governance of the commonwealth. When commands and constitutions are sent by the prince to distant places, let this clause be added to the diploma: that the inferior magistrate write concerning the execution performed--whether it has been performed, whether it cannot be performed, or whether he judges that it will be performed--and order the cause to be written if anything obstructs it.

For that precaution instills great solicitude for obeying; otherwise, those through whom it occurred that the prince's command was not obeyed are themselves compelled to write letters bearing witness to their own negligence. But if, from the circumstances of the place, there should appear a just cause why it was not obeyed, when the inferior magistrate is ordered to write this very thing, full knowledge of the affairs will be gathered from those letters. With the same efficacy, good laws--even ancient ones which have yielded somewhat to customs--will be restored to force and practice without trouble to the prince. For if viceroys, governors, and satraps are ordered at a fixed time to make the prince more certain concerning them, they will strive to prove their work to the prince and to show that by their care and labor his will has been satisfied.

The mutual fear of ministers among themselves is also a great bridle, since without the knowledge of the other one cannot sin, and with his knowledge does not dare. The prince will instill this fear in all with easy care if at fixed times he demands a sincere report, confirmed even under oath, concerning the condition of the province, the administration of justice, the morals of governors, the treasury, and the complaints of subjects--not only from viceroys, governors, and satraps, but also from their counselors, assessors, quaestors, and praetors. I shall say more concerning this matter when I treat of magistracy. For now my purpose was only to show how a prince can most rightly direct very many things with the least trouble to himself. For if those letters arrive at a fixed time and errors are corrected, he will correct more by a word than by a laborious and costly journey, which, although I sometimes counsel it, I do not approve when frequent.

Therefore, although I praise Hadrian's diligence in greatly disturbed affairs, I nevertheless prefer that, when the commonwealth is at peace, the prince ordinarily remain in one place or another. Since, therefore, the prince himself cannot be present at all business, while there are many duties and many places which never enjoy the sight of their lord, this is the most convenient means by which he can preside over all, even though he is not present among all. Although it is necessary that he forget many things and fail to notice many things, nevertheless, because all things come beneath his gaze, security is taken away from malicious ministers.

§ 8. I summon my prince to labors and solicitude; I shake delights and pleasures, sleep and inactivity from him. He follows willingly if he has weighed that, when he ascended the throne as lord of all, he placed the care of all upon himself together with the diadem, and that he cannot be negligent without both the destruction of many and condemnation to the gravest eternal punishment. In a private person:

> Ἔργον δ' οὐδὲν ὄνειδος, ἀεργίη δέ τ' ὄνειδος.

To work and labor is not a disgrace, but sloth and cessation are a disgrace. In a king, prince, or senate it is not only a disgrace; it is a crime, it is perfidy, it is often robbery, often tyranny, when through their idleness the injuries of the wicked rise up against their subjects.

Human weakness desires a quiet and unencumbered life; flatterers inculcate it; harpies, for whom wealth grows from the prince's lack of diligence, drive him toward idleness. But he will hold to the right path:

> Τὴν μὲν γὰρ κακότητα καὶ ἰλαδὸν ἔστιν ἑλέσθαι, ῥηϊδίως· λείη μὲν ὁδός, μάλα δ᾽ ἐγγύθι ναίει.

Τῆς δ᾽ ἀρετῆς ἱδρῶτα θεὸς προπάροιθεν ἔθηκε

ἀθάνατος· μακρὸς δὲ καὶ ὄρθιος οἶμος ἐπ᾽ αὐτὴν καὶ τρηχὺς τὸ πρῶτον· ἐπὴν δ᾽ εἰς ἄκρον ἵκηται, ῥηϊδίη τε ἔπειτα πέλει, χαλεπὴ περ ἐοῦσα.

It is easy to embrace idleness; the road is level and very near. But God placed the sweat of virtue before our eyes; long, steep, and rough is the road to it. But after you have gained the summit, it then becomes easy, although it had been difficult.

Let the prince have men by whose liberty he may be admonished and incited to labors. Under the morning twilight, someone from the company of honored men cried aloud to the Persian kings: "Arise, king; care for the commonwealth," as Plutarch writes in the book On the Education of a Prince; and: "Care for those things, O king, for which Oromasdes wished you to labor." Sometimes scarcely a year repairs the negligence of one moment; sometimes even successors are compelled to lament it. Therefore a true prince and lover of his fatherland will foster royal care beneath his breast even when the rest are released into games. The great commander Epaminondas, while the citizens celebrated festivals, alone made the circuit of the walls. When his friends asked about his untimely solicitude, he replied that he was solicitous so that the citizens' joy could be secure. And indeed, at his death Theban dignity and liberty fell, because the labor and care of princes had been turned into delights.

§ 9. Do you therefore set all hard things before the prince? All things hard, anxious, and solicitous; for I ought not to be a flatterer, but an admonisher. To me he is truly a prince whom cares possess to such a degree that he would prefer private leisure, if this would be for the commonwealth's good. Those from whom the splendor of majesty, foolish flattery, senseless joy, and fawning acts of obedience have taken away the sense of this solicitude perform their duty least of all; rather, they criminally do not know the grievous things which they especially ought to know. Those who thought they would render an account to no one wished to strip themselves of public cares. What will the prince do whose zeal, vigilance, diligence, solicitude, and idle word--not merely his leisure and idleness--will be judged destructive to peoples?

You will see utterances fall from the most powerful human beings raised on high by which they wish for leisure, praise it, and prefer it to all their goods. Meanwhile they desire to descend from that summit of theirs, if it can be done safely; for even if nothing external assails or shakes it, fortune collapses upon itself. The divine Augustus, to whom the gods granted more than to anyone, did not cease to pray for rest for himself and to seek release from public affairs. All his conversation always returned to this, that he should hope for leisure for himself. With this sweet consolation, though false, he comforted his labors: that someday he would live for himself. In a certain letter sent to the senate, after he had promised that his rest would not be empty of dignity or discordant with his former glory, I find these words: "But these things can be done more splendidly than they can be promised. Yet desire for a time most greatly wished for by me has carried me so far that, since the joy of the reality still delays, I might take beforehand some pleasure from the sweetness of words." Leisure seemed so great a thing that, because he could not possess it in use, he took it beforehand in thought.

He who saw all things depending upon himself alone, who gave fortune to human beings and nations, thought that day most joyful on which he would strip off his greatness. He had experienced how much sweat those goods shining through all lands pressed out, how much hidden solicitude they covered. Compelled to decide by arms first with citizens, then with colleagues, last with relatives, he shed blood by sea and land. Driven about by war through Macedonia, Sicily, Egypt, Syria, Asia, and almost every coast, he turned armies wearied by Roman slaughter toward foreign wars. While he pacified the Alps and subdued enemies mingled into the midst of peace and government, while he advanced the boundaries beyond the Rhine, Euphrates, and Danube, in the city itself the swords of Murena, Caepio, Lepidus, and the Egnatii were sharpened against him. He had not yet escaped their plots when his daughter and so many noble young men, bound together by adultery as though by a sacrament, terrified his already broken age; afterward a woman together with Antony was again to be feared.

Amid so many evils and cares a prince cannot interpret his summit as a place of rest. Labor, and great labor, dwells upon it; if he flees this labor, he betrays at once both the commonwealth and his own salvation.

CHAPTER VI

Justice Is Especially Commended to the Prince

§ 1. Justice is the bond of the commonwealth; the prince's labor and prudence must serve it. For this is the cause for which princes are constituted, and when they have overthrown it, they are cast out. The Greeks say that it is more beautiful than the morning star. Justice is twofold: universal justice, which is also called perfect, concerning which there is an ancient saying:

Ἐν δὲ δικαιοσύνῃ συλλήβδην πᾶσ᾽ ἀρετή ᾽στιν.

In justice, in sum, is every virtue. This justice ought to shine in the prince as in the jewel of the whole province, and in the senate as in a girdle that encircles the world and measures seasons and labors in a fixed succession. For the whole world confirms by its testimony the saying of Bias: "Magistracy reveals the man." This justice is not a part of virtue, but the whole of virtue; and injustice is not a part of viciousness, but the whole of viciousness. This injustice is ἀνομία, or iniquity. There is another justice, which they call particular and which is properly ἰσότης, or equality. It is defined as that which renders to each his own right. More suitably for my purpose, the jurists say: "Justice is the constant and perpetual will to render to each his own right." For it signifies a habit and inclination of the mind.

There are two kinds of this justice. It is occupied either in distributing public advantages and burdens, or in contracts, such as purchases, sales, exchanges, and agreements. In the former kind it does not maintain the equality that exists in the latter, but employs analogy or proportion, which they call geometrical, by which equal things are apportioned to equals and unequal things to unequals from the goods and burdens of the commonwealth. It apportions a greater stipend to the tribune than to the centurion, and to the centurion than to the decarch or soldier; for as dignity is compared with dignity, so stipend is compared with stipend. There is a similar distribution in civil affairs; for the measure of tribute or the necessity of military service is greater for the rich and noble, but that must be counterbalanced by prerogatives of honor and advantage. But because desire violates equality in all these things, it must be restored by laws and judgments, and, when their force is broken, by sword, punishments, and wars.

§ 2. The prince sits as arbiter of so great a good, bringing all unequal things down to a level by his nod and equating all things according to their proportions. Nor is there another origin of principate; for when the weaker saw that they were oppressed, they transferred all their right and strength to one more powerful man by whom they might be defended.

Therefore let the prince, the optimates, and whoever has been raised on high by whatever hand or fortune render to each his own, not claim what belongs to another, neglect private advantage, and guard common equity. For thus the Milanese Doctor, who presided not as a judge but as a bishop, admonishes.

You are a priest of right, whoever you are who govern the commonwealth in any part. I exhort you to exhibit in yourself what the panegyric praises in Theodosius: "You are the same man you were, and only as much is lawful to you through yourself as was lawful before through the laws. You experience supreme right in the faculty and abundant opportunity of benefiting, not in security for sinning."

§ 3. God is the beginning of justice so salutary and so necessary. Its beauty is infinite, because it contains the whole order of the commonwealth, since it is a virtue, as Aristotle says, toward another. For the oppressed flee to the prince's justice as to a most sacred altar, as Archytas used to say, so that the sanctity of justice may protect those whom neither common nature, nor strength, nor prayers defend from injury. It was honored formerly, for it is the mistress and queen of the virtues, the empress even of kings. They say that it was the custom among the Egyptians that, when diplomas had been given throughout the kingdoms, they commanded the governors of cities to resist without hesitation if the kings commanded anything unjust. For they judged that no one was harmed when justice was observed.

Ambrose, both in the tribunal and at the altar a wise and distinguished priest of justice, says in book 1 of On Duties: "Great is the splendor of justice, which, born for others rather than itself, assists our community and society and holds an exalted place, so that it has all things subjected to its judgment." And the disciple of Ambrose, greater than his master, says on Psalm 64: "Your temple is holy, wonderful in justice. These are the goods of his house. He did not say, 'Your holy temple is wonderful in columns, wonderful in marbles, wonderful in gilded ceilings,' but 'wonderful in justice.' You have eyes outwardly with which to see marble and gold; inwardly is the eye with which the beauty of justice may be seen. Inwardly, I say, will be the eye with which the beauty of justice may be seen.

"If there is no beauty of justice, whence is a just old man loved? What does he bear in his body that delights the eyes? Bent limbs, a wrinkled brow, a head made white with gray hairs, and weakness on every side full of complaints. But perhaps because this decrepit old man does not delight your eyes, he delights your ears. With what utterances? With what song? Even if perhaps he sang well as a young man, all things have failed with age. Or perhaps the sound of his words delights your ears, though with fallen teeth he scarcely fully pronounces words? Yet if he is just, if he does not covet what belongs to another, if from what he possesses he gives to the needy, if he admonishes well and thinks rightly, if he believes with integrity, if he is prepared to expend even his broken limbs for the faith of truth--for many martyrs were also old--from what source do we love him? What good do we see in him with the eyes of flesh? Nothing.

"There is, therefore, a certain beauty of justice which we see with the eyes of the heart, and love, and for which we burn. How greatly human beings loved it in the martyrs themselves while beasts tore apart their limbs! When blood befouled all things and their entrails were poured out by the bites of beasts, did their eyes not possess only what they might shudder at? What was there to be loved, except that in that foulness of mutilated limbs there was the unimpaired beauty of justice?"

Plato speaks in the same sense--indeed, those holy Fathers speak from Plato's meaning. He says that nothing is better than justice, which holds first place among the virtues and is their first ornament. O holy and praiseworthy justice, beneath you, and through you, chastity reigns, peace triumphs, security and dignity flourish, and fruit is brought forth in patience. Justice makes kings greater than their kingdoms--indeed, sons of God. It draws even strangers and posterity to love it. Frederick, ruler of the Roman Empire, was educating the boy Ladislaus, king of Hungary and Bohemia. Those to whom utility was more powerful than honorableness urged him to join two most flourishing kingdoms to himself through the fall of one little body, without envy or infamy. But to Frederick, truly great, justice was of greater value than a heap of kingdoms; indeed, with a salutary admonition he suppressed the criminal counsels. "What, then?" he said. "Do you wish a rich king rather than a just one?" By this answer he struck them, since they saw that he would employ against themselves the same right which they had prescribed to him against another. Imitate this, prince; you have no greater gift from God.

§ 4. How different from him was Valentino, the tyrant of Italy, who retained by slaughters what he had seized by force and at last was compelled by death to restore it. And nevertheless he found a praiser; for Machiavelli, in chapter 7 of his Prince, after he had recounted Valentino's crimes, says: "Therefore, when all the reasons for these deeds of Prince Valentino have been brought together in sum, I do not see in what matter I should censure him. Rather, I judge that he should be proposed for imitation by all those, as he was by me, who have been advanced to governments with fortune as leader and by the arms of others. For otherwise, since he bore a great and exalted spirit, and the purposes of his mind impelled him toward higher things, he could not administer his affair."

But he both swiftly perished, and it is certain that kingdoms are preserved only by justice. If what is stronger is judged more equitable, first the weak, and then the strong when oppressed by stronger men, perish. For right and equity are the bonds of states; without them, what are kingdoms except great robberies? Kings are therefore δικασπόλοι, "ministers of justice," for there is no commonwealth where there is no justice. And so Scipio argues splendidly in Cicero, as St. Augustine reports: “Therefore,” he says, “where there is no true justice, an assembly of human beings associated by a consensus of right cannot exist, and therefore neither can a people. And if it is not a people, neither is it the affair of a people, but of some multitude unworthy of the name of a people.”

There has never been another cause why peoples and provinces acquired by labor and blood revolted except injustice; for this reason governments are transferred from nation to nation. This affair drew the cities of Liguria and Lombardy away from the German Empire and dispersed them among various dominions. For when they had complained before the emperor and had shown that in two years alone they had suffered more harm from the German prefects than from tyrants during all the rest of the time, and nevertheless were held in contempt, they revolted. Having made a conspiracy and obtained security, they turned injuries against one another. For human beings first customarily act so that they cannot be oppressed; when they believe that they have obtained this, they also seek the power by which they can oppress others.

And so they bring it about that what Augustine inculcates to us in book 2 of The City of God, chapter 4, is true: “With justice removed, what are kingdoms except great robberies? For what are robberies themselves except little kingdoms? The band itself of human beings is ruled by the command of a leader, is bound by a compact of association, and divides booty by an agreed law. If this evil grows so greatly by the accessions of abandoned men that it also possesses places, establishes settlements, occupies cities, and subjugates peoples, it assumes the name of a kingdom all the more openly--a name conferred upon it not by desire taken away but by impunity added. For a certain captured pirate answered that famous Alexander the Great elegantly and truly. When the king asked the man what it seemed to him that he kept the sea hostile, he answered with free insolence: ‘The same that it seems to you that you keep the world hostile. But because I do it with a little vessel, I am called a robber; because you do it with a great fleet, you are called an emperor.’”

§ 5. I see that most kingdoms of this kind existed formerly. What else was Nebuchadnezzar than a great robber? He killed whom he wished and kept alive whom he wished. And what sort of robberies were the kingdoms of the Medes, who did not seek gold and silver but killed little children with arrows? The administration of the Persians was no better: their injustice was equal toward strangers and members of the household; for the fault of one, all his kindred were punished although innocent. Because the empires of the Greeks and Romans have more writers, they also supplied more examples of injustice punished. Therefore no riches and no power is stronger than justice; but there is no firmness of a kingdom so great that injustice does not dissolve and break it.

The reason for this is that the beginning of justice proceeded from nature; then certain things came into custom from a consideration of utility; afterward fear of the laws and religion sanctioned both things proceeding from nature and things approved by custom. When injustice removes these, it overthrows nature and again scatters the association of human beings which came together into an assembly to repel injuries.

§ 6. Therefore cultivate justice, prince, and be diligent in cultivating it. Against the crowd of courtiers be active and inquisitive, trust few, and scrutinize the smallest things; you will find no small deceits in the smallest ministries. Esteem nothing small. For where the affair even of abject human beings is conducted, where the eternal destruction of your magistrates--judging beneath you and at your peril--is to be feared, we call all things great. This extends so far that not even among monetary affairs, whether to be acquired or lost, should the things which the ecclesiastical Doctor discusses appear small, whether the money is great or small. For justice is not small, and we certainly ought to preserve it even in a small sum of money, as the Lord says: “He who is faithful in the least is faithful also in much.” What is least, therefore, is least; but to be faithful in the least is great.

For just as the principle of circularity is that all lines are drawn equal from the central point to the circumference, and this is the same in a large disk as in a little coin, so, where small things are conducted justly, the greatness of justice is not diminished. Finally, when the Apostle was speaking concerning secular judgments--which surely concern nothing but monetary affairs--he says: “Does any one of you, having a matter against another, dare to be judged before the unjust and not before the saints?" Why is it that the Apostle is so indignant, so corrects, so reproaches, so rebukes, so threatens? Why is it that he testifies to the disposition of his mind by so frequent and so harsh a change of voice? Finally, why does he speak so grandly concerning the smallest things? Did secular business concerning that affair merit so much? Far from it. Rather, he does this on account of justice, charity, and piety, which--even in affairs however small--are great, as no sober mind doubts. Augustine, On Christian Doctrine, book 4, chapter 18.

§ 7. Nor can justice be defended by words or kindness alone; there is need of the sword and instruments of torture. Otherwise, in its own sanctuary, in its own tribunal, justice will be oppressed. The sanctity of all laws and the integrity of all judges rest upon the vigilant, severe, constant, inexorable justice of the prince. Its primary function is to appoint suitable judges and to punish prevaricators without hope of pardon. I praise the clemency of princes; but in the case of governors and judges who take gifts, who have delivered an inequitable sentence, and who have dissembled the injuries of the wretched, let severity alone have a place.

Louis XII, king of France, thought that the prince who does not punish a crime when he can is no less guilty than the man who perpetrated it. I judge this to be most true, therefore, in this most grave and difficult censuring of inferior magistrates. For through dissimulation not only does the audacity of the inequitable and rapacious increase, and the weakness of the innocent become their prey, but the prince's good faith is also accused, as though he were an associate of honored and purple-clad thieves. For if the prince is said to be ignorant, the excuse is judged insulting, if it is not even his care to have knowledge of others' calamities, when it belongs to him to bring the remedy.

In other matters an excuse has a place: if there has been a faltering in war; if battle was begun with too little courage or too little prudence; if a garrison surrendered through fear; if an error was made in an embassy; if the prince's grain supply was preserved negligently. To exact, severely and constantly, penalties for justice violated by its own judge is not cruelty, but a most beautiful virtue among the parts of justice. He who is fierce against wolves is merciful toward sheep. The security of the unjust is the destruction of the best men.

No city, no household, not even one single human being can be governed without justice; and nevertheless rebellion against justice arises everywhere. O wretched human race! O dreadful spectacles, and yet daily ones! Scourges resound; full prisons are squalid; cords tear; claws shriek; rivers swallow; wheels are burdened; flames devour; quadrupeds drag men apart--and justice is not sufficiently sanctioned by so many punishments. The crimes that are avenged are always perpetrated by new authors. Amid so many deaths of the wretched, the thefts and robberies of judges, governors, and purple-clad men ought not to be unpunished. For how will men who sin more gravely avenge those crimes?

Who will give me holy kings, severe avengers of their own tyrannical men who range through their subjects' fortunes and make a mockery of them, and guardians of kingdoms? Germany and Gaul once had Clovis and Charlemagne; Gaul had Sigebert and Louis; Spain, Alfonso the Chaste and Ferdinand III; England, two Edwards, two Ethelberts, William, Oswald, and Edmund; Hungary, Stephen and Ladislaus; Poland, Casimir and Boleslaus the Chaste; Germany, Rudolf and Henry; Denmark, Canute; Bohemia, two Wenceslauses; Norway, Olaf; Sweden, Henry; Austria, Leopold; Burgundy, Sigismund. Other kingdoms have had just, holy, severe, laborious kings who judged that no license capable of doing harm was to be permitted to their men, and who kept the good in their duty by their own sanctity and the wicked by the vigorous justice of vengeance.

I am not ignorant that clemency is expected of me, that human life is sacred, and that a magistracy occupied with the lives of guilty men is most difficult. But so many calumnies and oppressions of the innocent, and the so intolerable insolence of certain magistrates who crush the heads of the poor together with the dust of the earth, compel princes to be severe. Let him be gentle in spirit, let him be mild, let him be slow to punishment and swift to rewards. Yet let him condemn--even with tears, after the example of Bias--the wicked and rapacious judge, the client or intimate who has abused confidence in the king's love for crimes and the calamities of the needy; but let him condemn him nevertheless.

Let him expend guilty blood, although it be that of a friend, upon justice and the public peace, not upon the sweetness of vengeance.

Themistocles used to say that he preferred to go to a tomb rather than to a tribunal. This is a remarkable example of mildness--if he said what Aelian recounts concerning him, or felt what he is reported to have said. Here the prince must be brave and cautious. Brave, because powerful men must be dragged to punishment; the condemnation of cheap blood is easy, because there is no difficulty in its execution. Brave, because the laws often act against friends, kinsmen, and brothers. Cautious, because powerful men have many patrons, and many arts, if they do not defend a bad case, at least prolong it; and, if all else fails, guilty men purchase perjuries.

Walk upon the royal road, you who rule the multitude. Think all men yours; consider all to be your sons. He is more closely joined to you whose cause merits your patronage. This is your condition: when judging between friends, you will have one of the two as an enemy. Do not fear; God is present to justice. Even men not particularly just will furnish examples for you. Publius Rutilius refused a friend's inequitable requests. The friend, raging, said: "What need have I of your friendship if I do not obtain what I ask?" Publius replied: "Rather, what need have I of yours, if I am to do something dishonorable for your sake?" The friend of Rutilius acted most wickedly, for he wished friendship to be the procuress and broker of injustice; Rutilius acted excellently, for he renounced false friendship in order to patronize true justice.

Agis likewise resisted the desire of his parents. Although they pressed him importunately, lest he fail their cause, and urged him by their paternal right, he remained unmoved: he had already surrendered himself to his country and its laws and could not act against those laws whose obedience and veneration he had learned from his parents.

Antigonus showed the same affection for his brother Marsyas and the same constant will for a reputation of justice. For when Marsyas, on account of their brotherly intimacy, requested that his case be heard at home within the walls, Antigonus answered nothing except: "If we are doing nothing besides what is right, it will be done better in the forum, with everyone listening." This equality in judging is altogether necessary for a kingdom. For if people see the prince yield to affections in certain cases, they cry out that justice has been taken away universally. Of those who have lost a case, few acknowledge that they were defeated by right; instead, they become angry either at the judge or at their advocates. They assert that even their most inequitable suits were condemned not by right and laws but by hatred and money, count themselves, according to the customary manner of human beings, among those whom it is agreed were unjustly oppressed, and seek consolation for their loss from slander and insults against their rulers.

§ 8. But if it pleases us to recount examples of those who gravely avenged the crimes and robberies of their judges, I fear that too many will occur. And this is by the fault of the supreme magistrate, who entrusts the web and guardianship of right, laws, sanctity, and equity to depraved and perverse violators of the laws, just as one entrusts a sword to madmen. Yet they themselves are not free of fault, because it is manifest madness to undertake burdens which you cannot carry. For burdens greater than the bearer must necessarily crush him. Therefore let there be the greatest solicitude in appointing good judges; thus there will be fewer punishments of those who have failed in their duty. Yet even thus there will be many punishments of those whom either the opportunity for sinning has made wicked or the license of power has exposed.

What Cambyses, king of the Persians, did belongs to a crude antiquity and is not praiseworthy in every respect; nevertheless, by this one splendid deed amid infinite crimes he is celebrated. Sisamnes had sold judgments for a price. Cambyses ordered him killed, his skin stripped off, and the tribunal covered--or, as others say, fitted together--with it; and, to show that he was angry at injustice and not at the man, he wished Sisamnes' son to pronounce law from the same seat, admonished that, terrified by his father's punishment, he should pronounce law according to the prescription of the laws, not from love of gifts. This latter act was harsh and, in keeping with the king's disposition, plainly barbarous; but nevertheless it is something that inculcates zeal for justice in a prince.

Aurelian pursued provincial thieves--men guilty of extortion and embezzlement--beyond measure in a military fashion, so that he punished them with immense penalties and torments. Severus was violently moved against inequitable judges and judged that their eyes should be dug out with a finger. Andronicus punished Theodore, a foremost man, with twelve strokes of clubs because, when he had lodged with farmers, he had paid absolutely nothing. I make an end; the most learned Justus Lipsius and others adduce more examples in their admonitions.

I give this warning: if princes are severe, they will have many Vespasians, who administered a province as governor with a better reputation than he administered the Empire when made Augustus. Tranquillus speaks thus of him: "Thereafter, having obtained Africa by lot, he administered it with the greatest integrity and not without great dignity, except that, in a certain disturbance at Hadrumetum, turnips were thrown at him. He certainly returned no richer, since, his credit now almost ruined, he mortgaged all his estates to his brother and was compelled, in order to sustain his dignity, to descend to the profits of mule-dealing; on account of this he was commonly called the Muleteer."

A muleteer of this kind should certainly be preferred to all knights and masters of knights, if the other things corresponded. Therefore in your kingdom let those words and precepts be heard which Comnenus repeatedly inculcated upon his prefects: "Leave behind either injuries or life; for that you should act unjustly and live is neither pleasing to God nor tolerable to me, his minister." Agapetus spoke truly:

> Δυσθήρατος ἐστὶν ἡ τοῦ δικαίου εὕρεσις, ῥᾳδίως ἐκφεύγουσα τοὺς μὴ λίαν προσέχοντας.

Justice is difficult to capture; it easily slips from the hands of those who do not attend diligently. When you have commanded, subscribed, sealed, and sent a messenger, there will be someone who evades, someone who delays the commands, someone who warns the accused. I certainly approve the saying of St. Cyprian: "The justice of the king is the peace of peoples, the protection of the fatherland, the immunity of the common people, the fortification of the nation, the care of the sick, the joy of human beings, the temperateness of the air, the serenity of the sea, the fertility of the earth, the consolation of the poor, the inheritance of sons, and for himself the hope of future blessedness."

§ 9. Therefore let him inquire into judges. In Spain and Venice commissions of inquiry are most useful and ought to be introduced everywhere. For without justice concord cannot be preserved, nor without concord can a city remain safe. A judge ought to regard justice, not the will of the prince; much less ought the prince to regard the judge, whom he will rightly condemn if he sees that the judge has pronounced not according to justice but according to the prince's affection. Hanno, bishop of Cologne, ordered the eyes of inequitable judges to be torn out; he left one of them one eye so that he might lead the rest home. Philip of Valois provided by testament that an inquiry should be made into the judges even after his death. This ought altogether to be done. If human punishment is evaded, divine vengeance will nevertheless seize both the judges and the prince by whose connivance a judge sins--perhaps late, but gravely. Nor is discretion in determining permitted to a judge; rather, a law is laid down. The supreme prince alone can grant pardon for an offense; this too has been granted to the princes of Germany among the regalian rights. And certainly to bend and mitigate the harshness of the laws by kindness is a royal work.

Nor will the prince easily concede to a judge the diminution or remission of a punishment. Although Charles V made great concessions to the Senate of Milan, he retained this part for himself. The decrees of France do not concede it even to the king's mother. In Spain there is a singular tribunal in which deliberation is held concerning the giving of pardon and the granting of grace. Jerome Casteg, On the Union of Portugal and Castile, book 8. Charles ordered a judge hanged who had punished by cutting off the hand of a guilty man worthy of hanging.

§ 10. It has been asked whether a prince can judge in his own case. They answer affirmatively from law 3, Concerning Those Things Which Are in Testaments; law 41, Concerning the Institution of Heirs; and the final section at the end of the Institutes, Concerning Ordinary Substitution. They add that he cannot be alleged as suspect. I see that many of the heretics think thus, and some Catholics also have sometimes appeared to me to approve the same thing.

Now this matter can be asked in two ways. First, whether, every law set aside, it is inequitable by nature itself to have the same man as judge and adversary. Second, whether in well-constituted commonwealths and kingdoms, where there is an order of laws and judgments, this is lawful. It seems to me contrary to nature and justice that an emperor, king, or prince himself should judge in his own case. A judge, or δικαστής, is in the middle between the parties, so that he may protect the equality of right on both sides. Second, in the commonwealth of the Hebrews it was not lawful for Ahab to deliver judgment between himself and Naboth; therefore he took refuge in calumny. Third, a private person defeated by that judgment is never bound to acquiesce. For since princes are changeable, subject also to affections and errors, and for the most part also lovers of themselves and tenacious of majesty, no one is bound to entrust himself to the judgment of a man whom he knows and experiences as an adversary.

The highest reason for this matter is that, when truth and justice are investigated, in order that the investigation and adjudication may be legitimate, the parties ought to be equal in all things, so that only the weight of the case and the reasons may constitute inequality. Let this be an example. The empress Eudoxia entered a widow's vineyard and plucked grapes; therefore both she and the emperor contended that the vineyard had passed into the empress's right. If in her own case either she herself or the emperor is judge, the matter is already concluded, for the matter has been decided in the highest tribunal. But the widow denies that Caesar or his wife can be given to her as judge. Nor is it less unjust for her to be compelled to undergo such a judgment than to yield the estate. For she is in the worse position not by the kind of case but by the desire of the judge, which obstructs the establishment of equality between the litigants. This judgment, therefore, is always contrary to justice by its own nature.

But the prince, even without affection, will pronounce sentence against himself. A heroically just prince will sometimes do this; but no one believes that all will always do so. God alone is judge in his own case, because his will is immutable justice and his judgments are true, justified in themselves. God alone is truthful, but every human being is a liar. Why, then, will a senator be compelled to abide by the sentence of Gaius or Nero when they themselves are present and torture him with their countenance? The prince is sometimes said himself to judge because he pronounces through his judges; but in this case they are sworn not to the prince but to the whole commonwealth and to justice. Therefore the prince may neither inquire into them nor show that their sentence displeased him if he lost the case, for he casts fear into the judge.

§ 11. Hence in all kingdoms governed by law and institutions, the cases of kings and princes against subjects are judged by others. The count palatine judges the emperor's case when he judges in Caesar's court, according to the Golden Bull. The king of France, Spain, or Bohemia can be sued by his subjects. Hence there are so many royal advocates in France. Hence, I think, law π., Concerning the Right of the Fisc. Hence the holy constitution of Philip II, king of the Spains, that the president of the royal council should pronounce against the fisc in a doubtful case. For no commonwealth wished to commit the bodies and fortunes of its subjects to the private affections of princes, but to the public declaration of justice. Therefore the rejection of a suspect judge belongs to natural right, so that it cannot be denied; and the custom of all nations proves this. But if the prince himself is suspect--and in his own case he is always suspect--his judgment is refused much more justly than that of any inferior person, because both appeal is cut off and execution is readier.

Nor can the commonwealth grant this. For just as it cannot determine that Gaius's estate be given to Titius--for that is spoliation--so neither can it determine that Gaius, without fault, come into danger of losing his estate. For to cast an innocent person without cause into danger of life and fortunes is as inequitable as to strip him of life or fortunes: unequal in degree, indeed, but like in injustice. Will you then compel me to entrust myself to my adversary, to whom my losses are profit? Will kinship, affinity, a similar case, or favor toward an enemy--that is, something extraneous--bring it about that I am not compelled to abide by the sentence of an adversary, but will the person himself, αὐτότης, not bring this about?

CHAPTER VII

The Commonwealth Ought to Keep Faith with All

§ 1. I have demonstrated that prudence, diligence, and justice are necessary to the prince. For if he is destitute of wisdom, none of the remaining virtues will attain its purpose. But if diligence is necessary in a private house, lest the whole house perish through a defect of the roof, how great a diligence is at last demanded in that vast body in which some part is always being injured? For the idleness of the prince involves great danger. Agapetus the Deacon seriously admonished Justinian concerning this matter:

> Ὥσπερ ἐπὶ τῶν πλεόντων, ὅταν μὲν ὁ ναύτης σφαλῇ, μικρὰν φέρει τοῖς συμπλέουσι βλάβην, ὅταν δ᾽ αὐτὸς ὁ κυβερνήτης, παντὸς ἐργάζεται τοῦ πλοίου ἀπώλειαν· οὕτω κἂν ἐν ταῖς πόλεσιν, ἂν μέν τις τῶν ἀρχομένων ἁμάρτῃ, οὐ τὸ κοινὸν τοσούτῳ, ὅσον ἑαυτὸν ἀδικεῖ· ἂν δὲ αὐτὸς ὁ ἄρχων, πάσης ἐργάζεται τῆς πολιτείας τὴν βλάβην. Ὡς οὖν μεγάλας ὑφέξων εὐθύνας, εἴ τι παρίδοι τῶν δεόντων, μετὰ πολλῆς ἀκριβείας, ἃ λεγέτω πάντα, ἃ πραττέτω.

Just as among those who sail, if one of the sailors has erred, he brings a small loss, but if the helmsman errs, he causes the loss of the whole vessel, so in the commonwealth, if one of the subjects sins, he harms himself more than the commonwealth; if the prince sins, he brings detriment to the whole commonwealth. Therefore, since he will have to render a great account if he has neglected anything among those things which ought to be done, let him both say and do all things with great exactness.

From this prudent diligence follows justice, concerning which I spoke just now; and the inseparable companion of justice is faith, or constancy in words and deeds.

It must therefore be established that the commonwealth ought to preserve faith safe and intact. Faith adorns the prince; perfidy disgraces him. Deceit attacks the fickleness of the people more severely. An upright senate is accustomed to cultivate faith most steadfastly. Faith, moreover, must be kept with the people, and in turn the people are bound to the prince; then it must be kept with private persons; third, with neighboring commonwealths; finally, with enemies. And not only in prosperity, but in every fortune, constancy in all words and deeds must remain. Let the saying of the Roman sage in Epistle 88 adhere to the mind and grow old together with it: “Faith is the most sacred good of the human breast; it is compelled by no necessity to deceive and corrupted by no reward. Burn,” it says, “strike, kill; I shall not betray. But the more deeply pain seeks secrets, the more deeply shall I conceal them.”

Therefore let truth be preserved in deeds, words, and the whole of life. Socrates said that truth and virtue were the same. Plato judged truth to be, not indeed the τέλειον ἀγαθόν, the supreme and perfect good, but ἀγαθοειδές, good-like; for it always adheres to the highest good and attends it as light attends the sun. “Οὐδέν,” he says, “οἰκειότερον τῇ σοφίᾳ τῆς ἀληθείας.” Nothing is more closely joined and familiar to wisdom than truth. It removes the crowd of evils: “Ἡγουμένης τῆς ἀληθείας, οὐκ ἂν ποτε χορὸν αὐτῇ κακῶν ἀκολουθῆσαι.” The chorus of vices does not follow when truth leads.

§ 2. And first, the prince ought to preserve altogether whole and uninjured the faith which he gave to his subjects. Whatever princes promised at the beginning of their assumption of power to the estates concerning liberty, privileges, immunities, and donatives must be performed, provided that they are just and honorable. For inequitable or shameful things are never promised without crime and are performed with a greater crime than that with which they were promised. The emperor binds himself in many ways to the Church, the princes, and the subjects; and I think that there is no people in Europe which does not admit a sworn prince and commonwealth.

Therefore shameful is the method of those princes who, after they have placed their powers in safety, seek various pretexts for violating promises. Nor are wicked craftsmen lacking for cloaking perfidy, to whom nothing is so accepted as to deceive faith. Deceit certainly does not make men just; for faith is the foundation of justice. Although, indeed, where the magnitude of profits is regarded, unbroken faith rarely remains, nevertheless the judgment of the Roman consul remains firm and valid: “Nothing holds a commonwealth together more powerfully than faith.”

§ 3. Certainly perfidy brings the least evil upon those who are deceived and harms its author most. For no perfidy is lasting. What prince who occupied power through force and blood did not give his own blood to his successor? What murderer of his own prince, who succeeded through crime, was not sacrificed by his successor for the safeguarding of power? For it is the custom of princes to give every tyrannicide over to death, both so that they may not appear to have committed the slaughter by their own command and so that they may meet conspiracies beforehand. Why, then, should anyone bind himself with perfidy, which even the man to whom it brought a kingdom will avenge? For they prefer to punish the audacity of conspirators rather than to appear to owe a kingdom to another’s crime. Thus perfidy has no place anywhere, neither among those whom it has ruined nor among those whom it has benefited.

Among all who were notorious for perjury and perfidy, Lysander the Lacedaemonian possessed the greatest name among the ancients. To cruelty, avarice, and lust he finally added shamelessness, so that, when he was to return to Sparta, he asked Pharnabazus for testimony to his continence and equity, by which he might be assisted against the accusations of citizens before the ephors. But Pharnabazus avenged perfidy by deceit. For after he had ordered a commendatory letter for Lysander to be written, and Lysander had approved it, while it was being sealed he substituted another one entirely like it, which explained Lysander’s wickedness and crimes. The ephors ordered Lysander himself to read it in the senate; and so the perfidy by which alone he believed himself safe returned upon his own head.

§ 4. But the reason why punishment soon overwhelms the perfidious, the perjured, the ἀσπόνδους, contemners of treaties, is the vengeance of the divinity itself, which is always provoked by the perfidious. For he who deceives others by false promises and calls God as witness--what else does he do than either mock God or command him to be the minister of his

And so when Sennacherib had broken faith, he first fled after his soldiers were slain, and then was butchered by his sons before his own idol. For he who mocked whatever divinity he believed in, and who severed the commerce of the human race, was deprived of life by those whom he brought into the light, by a great crime indeed, yet according to his own desert. Zedekiah likewise violated faith with an impious king, but he nevertheless paid the penalty by the destruction of his nation.

Antiochus the Illustrious, in 1 Maccabees, and his son Eupator are a sorrowful example of violated faith. He and his princes swore to the Jews. “And he entered into the mountain and saw the fortification of the place, and he broke more quickly the oath which he had sworn and commanded the wall round about to be destroyed.” But Alexander and Demetrius soon exacted the penalties of the violated oath. For when the army had seized Antiochus and Lysias in order to offer them to Demetrius, and he had answered, “Do not show me their face,” the army killed them. Alcimus, Bacchides, and Nicanor perished by the same perjury. For Nicanor and Bacchides fell; Alcimus died with great torment. Demetrius also, deserted by the Jews on account of his notorious perfidy and defeated by Alexander, was deprived of kingdom and life.

But neither was perfidy fortunate for Alexander. Led into deceit by his father-in-law Ptolemy through the covenants of marriage, and defeated by a perfidious Arab, he was punished with decapitation. Shortly afterward Ptolemy likewise paid the penalties of perjury and contempt for human right: he died on the third day and paid for three days of joy with immense infamy. But the other Demetrius, for whom Jonathan preserved kingdom and life--how ungrateful, how forgetful of his oath he was! “And he lied in all the things which he said,” says Scripture, “and estranged himself from Jonathan; he did not repay him according to the benefits which he had bestowed upon him.” Avenging justice did not delay the punishment. Routed in battle by Antiochus through Tryphon and cast down from the kingdom, he was at last stripped of his camp by Arsaces the Mede and cast into chains.

But Tryphon, after he broke the faith given to the Jews and removed the young Antiochus his lord by parricide, paid the penalty, late indeed but within a few years, as a fugitive, and was killed by his own men. Nor indeed did Antiochus Sidetes perform the things promised to Simon Maccabaeus; Tryphon therefore killed him as he occupied his brother's kingdom.

Demetrius, the son of Demetrius, succeeded, together with his father's perfidy and hatred. Alexander Zabinas harassed him with war and perjuries for six years. Demetrius' son was Antiochus Grypus, while Antiochus Cyzicenus was the son of Antiochus Sidetes. For a short time they fought, not more with arms than with perjuries and by soliciting peoples to perfidy, until Antiochus Grypus was butchered by the most perfidious Heracleon, and Antiochus Cyzicenus by Seleucus, the son of Grypus. Their sons likewise waged war, as their fathers had, with perfidy and contempt for every treaty.

What of the two Antiochi, sons of the former men, for eleven years--one the son of Grypus, the other of Cyzicenus; Seleucus, son of Grypus; and Philip and Demetrius, sons of Cyzicenus? Did not the perfidy of all their predecessors reach these men, and Philip, who survived them all by two years? At last, after Tigranes was defeated, the dominion of the Macedonians came into a Roman province; and with the resources of great kingdoms luxury is always their ruin, and thence come perfidy and perjuries, civil wars and ruins, which gave beginnings to the kingdoms of Europe today.

After such clear examples, it is irksome to recall others: Manuel Comnenus, betrayer and likewise poisoner of Emperor Conrad and the German army. I pass over the sole art of the Turks when their affairs are prosperous--perjuries. For since they judge it holy to destroy enemies in whatever way, they hold no treaties valid except when it pleases them. Consult history, especially Bonfini concerning the siege of Famagusta. Although their malice in agreements is so manifest, nevertheless Murad, about to fight Ladislaus, king of Hungary, whom he alleged had first broken the treaties, arraigned him as guilty before the tribunal of God. For before the battle he read aloud the letters that witnessed the treaty and thus concluded his speech in Bonfini: "These, Jesus Christ, are the treaties which your Christians struck with me. By your holy name they swore and violated the faith given under your name; perfidiously they denied their God. Now, Christ, if you are God, as they say, and we are hallucinating, avenge, I pray you, your injuries and mine. Show to these men who have not yet known your holy name the penalties for violated faith."

However the matter was conducted, after these words the uncertain battle inclined and was more favorable to the Turk. In the memory of our grandfathers also, treaties between Louis and Charles the Bold were rather frequently broken and still more shamefully renewed, but by the perfidy of the counselors more than of the king and duke. For often, although they clashed with all their strength, neither king nor duke knew the true cause of the war, as Philippe de Commines recounts.

Philip of Valois likewise had promised Louis the Bavarian by oath that he would act so that Edward, king of Britain, might be reconciled to the Roman Pontiff; and although he seemed outwardly to conduct this matter solicitously, he nevertheless secretly obstructed it. He paid for the perjury so fraudulently covered by a vast slaughter and almost the destruction of the French nobility; and, routed by the Englishman at Crécy, he showed that God is never deceived. Claudian therefore sings falsely:

> Now he who breaks treaties is enriched;
>
> he who keeps them is in need.

Rather, because what the better instructor of morals, Theognis, sings is true:

> Παῦροι τῶν πολλῶν πίστιν ἔχουσι νόῳ.

Few among the many have faith in mind.

For this reason kingdoms are oppressed by so many calamities. I have related the examples of the Seleucids, of whom it can truly be said:

Faith never enters a royal threshold.

Nor was the perfidy of their own people ever absent from a royal threshold; by it they paid the penalties for the perfidy they exercised against others. They thought it prudence to deceive others by an oath until, deceived themselves, they perceived destruction.

§ 5. Deservedly did those Thracians perish who, during a truce agreed for the days, invaded the fields of the Boeotians by night in order to plunder them. Deservedly also did Cleomenes afterward rage against himself. For when he had sworn that he would deliberate all things with the head of Archonides--which Archonides understood according to the Greek custom as though Cleomenes had promised to do all things according to his counsel--Cleomenes turned the matter into a cruel mockery: he carried the head of Archonides around and held his deliberations concerning the things to be done in its presence.

Among the other origins of calamities for Suleiman was the killing of Ibrahim, whom, after he had advanced him to the highest position, he swore that he would never kill. He therefore caused Ibrahim's throat to be cut while he was sleeping. For the Turkish pontiff had interpreted it to be lawful because he denied that sleeping men were counted among the number of the living. But that fraud binds the perjury; it does not release it.

§ 6. The second reason why nothing that is faithless is stable is drawn from the nature of the thing itself: because he who has lost faith can lose nothing further. Therefore, when human beings observe someone acting either by manifest perjury or by criminal sophistries, they not only furnish him no faith but hate him in turn and strive to withdraw from his friendship and to place themselves and their possessions in safety.

Everyone thinks it madness to entrust oneself to the man who has denied faith. Thus this is the greatest evil of the perfidious man: no one is faithful to him. If no one is faithful, therefore, he cannot be safe. Although friends devote themselves, although armies, with swords placed at their necks, swear to your safety, although they surround you with a multitude of ambitious guards--if you yourself teach them to deceive faith, you will alienate even the most faithful men. And since otherwise,

No fortune ever stands long for mortals

when faith totters,

you will find faith wholly closed to the wretched and doubtful man. You will hold no one bound by love or mutual faith. Payment inflames avarice; it does not bind hearts to the giver if he is perfidious. That whole crowd thinks itself to have an oath to fortune, not to faith.

Sejanus was once faithful to Tiberius. "Sejanus," says Tacitus in book 4, "suspended above Caesar by knee, countenance, and hands, set himself against the falling masses; and in such a posture he was found by the soldiers who had come to their aid. Greater from that event, and although he advised ruinous things, he was heard with confidence as one not anxious for himself." What, therefore, made him from faithful into faithless, an ambusher, and an aspirant to power?

Taught to deceive by Tiberius' perfidy itself, he had determined to occupy the empire. A perfidious man is very like ice; no one but a fool builds upon it. Thus, just as ice is without houses, so the perfidious man is stripped of friends. We see, indeed, that those who cross rivers bound by frost are always in a state of suspense and anxiety and are afraid if the slightest cracking sound occurs, since they are not ignorant that they stand upon a fragile nature. The friendship of the perfidious, through which very many have perished, is more uncertain.

Cyrus acted prudently when he employed Hyrcanian leaders. When they said that hostages should be awaited so that he might set out under a pledge of faith, he answered: “I think that the pledge for us all is in our minds and in our hands. For we seem to be so disposed in our minds that, if you are truthful, you will have us fit to deserve well of you; if you deceive us, we judge the condition of our affairs will be such that we shall not be in your power, but we believe that you, with the gods helping us, will be in ours.” But this was altogether to distrust the barbarians. And since perfidious princes can by no means be in another’s power, it is certain that no faith is placed in them. The Parthians have no faith except insofar as it is expedient; and thus, always clashing against themselves, they were worn down until they were reduced to servitude. Just as the Syrians have no faith, so they have never had any liberty.

§ 7. Therefore Francis, king of the Gauls, also spoke rightly in a human manner. For when he had Charles V in his power and was admonished by his men to hold him captive in violation of faith, he said: “If faith were exiled from the whole world, it nevertheless ought to be preserved by kings, who can be constrained by it alone and by no fear.”

Our Germany, always an unshaken preserver of faith, held the Empire for a very long time; and, what you may marvel at and not find in another nation, for so many years no king of Germany, no Augustus, was led into captivity by foreigners or fell in battle. Yet they waged very many wars and subdued the Pomeranians, Rani, Livonians, Slavs, Helvetians, and others.

But you may marvel at this also: in almost eight hundred years only six emperors were reduced to order by their own people--Charles the Fat, Ataulf, Wenceslaus, Henry III, Otto IV, and Frederick II. And these too had degenerated from German sincerity. Deservedly, indeed, faith and the religion of the oath were furnished by their own people to emperors tenacious of faith and the oath. You, reader, compare these things which I have said concerning the ancient emperors with these present ones. Meanwhile, while civil perfidy devastated the eastern empire, it polluted itself with the blood of eighty-six or eighty-seven emperors. They had learned to deceive faith and were crushed and cut down by their own deeds.

The perfidious Zeno was buried alive by his wife Ariadne. Anastasius, who obtained power by the crime of the perjured and parricidal Ariadne, paid the penalties of perfidy when struck by lightning. Heracleonas and his wife Martina deprived Constantine, the son of Heraclius, of life; but he, with his nose cut off, and she, with her tongue cut out, perished detestably in exile. Constans killed his brother Theodosius, and in vengeance for his brother’s death he was killed by Andrew, almost the only man whom he trusted. From Philippicus, than whom no one was more criminal and who held all faith as a mockery, power was taken away together with his eyes. No one was more wicked than Copronymus, who kept faith with no one; but as he died he cried out that he had been delivered alive to unquenchable fire. Leo IV was killed by his own men; Leo the Armenian, by Michael the Stammerer. Andronicus, Isaac, and Alexius, all perjured, fell by the perfidy of their own men.

Who, therefore, would not say that those who teach perfidy and perjuries overthrow the commonwealth? For how can commerce, wars, peace, cities, or households stand without faith? If the prince can violate faith, who will be bound to preserve it?

§ 8. But must faith be kept with one who violates faith? Indeed, it must be kept even with treaty-breakers and barbarians. Caesar, to be sure, according to Plutarch, judging it madness to keep faith with men so perfidious and barbarous, led an army against them. Nevertheless faith must be kept, nor must another’s perfidy be punished by your perfidy. For if Hannibal besieged Saguntum contrary to the treaty, it was not therefore lawful for the Romans to break the peace afterward made with the Carthaginians. Nor, if Roman legates were violated by the Carthaginians, was it therefore right that Hanno likewise be led into chains. Much less, if the Lusitanians attacked the Romans contrary to their oath, did it therefore become Lucullus to entice the Lusitanians by a promise of impunity and butcher them.

Yet when enemies deceive faith within the same agreement, the man whom another's perfidy has afflicted is released from obligation. For if the Messenians plunder Spartan territory during an agreed truce, the Spartans will repay like for like by the best right. For those who exercised hostilities rendered the common peace void. But when, after the first treaties have been violated, a new one is struck, it is not lawful to violate it because the first treaties were violated.

CHAPTER VIII

The Commonwealth Ought to Be Grateful Toward Those Who Have Deserved Well

§ 1. Gratitude is akin to faith, just as not to acknowledge a benefit, or to repay it with evil deeds, is a kind, as it were, of perfidy. It belongs to a great spirit to be grateful.

For--as you say--all foolish men are wicked; but he who has one vice has them all; and all men are foolish and wicked; therefore all men are ungrateful. What, then? Is reproach not directed against the human race from every side? Is it not a public complaint that benefits have perished, and that there are very few who do not in turn deserve most wickedly of those who have deserved well of them? And there is no reason for you to suppose that this is only our murmuring, since we count as most wicked and depraved whatever has fallen short of the rule of right. Behold, I know not what voice is sent forth, not secretly from the house of the philosophers but from the midst of the assembly, to condemn peoples and nations:

> No guest is safe from guest;
>
> no father-in-law from son-in-law; even the favor of brothers is rare.
>
> The husband threatens the destruction of his wife, and she of her husband.

This is already something more: benefits have been turned into crime, and the blood of those for whom blood ought to be shed is not spared. We pursue benefits with sword and poisons. To lay hands upon the fatherland itself and to crush it with one's own fasces is power and dignity. Whoever has not stood above the commonwealth thinks that he stands in a humble and abject place. Armies received from it are turned against it, and this is the commander's address: "Fight against your wives; fight against your children; assail altars, hearths, and household gods with arms. You who, not even when about to triumph, ought to enter the city without the Senate's command, and for whom, as you led back a victorious army, a senate-house would be provided outside the walls--now, after citizens have been slain, drenched in kindred blood, enter the city with standards raised. Let liberty grow mute among the military standards; and let that people, conqueror and pacifier of nations, now that wars have been removed far away and every terror suppressed, be besieged within its walls and dread its own eagles."

Coriolanus is ungrateful--dutiful too late and after repentance for his crime. He laid down his arms, but laid them down in the midst of parricide. Catiline is ungrateful. It is too little for him to capture the fatherland unless he overthrows it, unless he sends cohorts of the Allobroges against it, unless an enemy summoned from beyond the Alps satisfies ancient and innate hatreds, and Roman leaders pay to Gallic tombs the funeral rites long owed them.

Gaius Marius is ungrateful: brought from the soldier's boot to the consulship, unless he equals Roman funerals with Cimbrian slaughters, unless he not only gives the signal for civil destruction and butchery but is himself the signal, he will perceive his fortune to have been insufficiently changed and restored to its former place.

Lucius Sulla is ungrateful: he healed the fatherland with remedies harsher than its dangers. After he had walked through human blood from the citadel of Praeneste all the way to the Colline Gate, he produced other battles and other slaughters in the city. He butchered two legions crowded into a corner--cruelly, after victory; impiously, after a pledge of faith--and devised proscription. Great gods! A man who killed a Roman citizen received impunity and money, and almost a civic crown.

Gnaeus Pompey is ungrateful. In return for three consulships, three triumphs, and so many honors, which for the greatest part he had seized prematurely, he returned this gratitude to the commonwealth: he introduced others also into possession of it, as though he would diminish the odium of his own power if what ought to have been lawful to no one had become lawful to several. While he desired extraordinary commands, while he distributed provinces so that he might choose them, while he so divided the commonwealth among the triumvirs that nevertheless two parts were in his own house, he reduced the Roman people to such a state that it could not be safe except by the benefit of servitude.

Ungrateful was Pompey's own enemy and conqueror, who turned the war from Gaul and Germany round upon the city; and that friend of the plebs, that popular man, placed his camp in the Circus Flaminius, nearer than Porsena's had been. He did indeed moderate the right and cruelty of victory; he fulfilled what he used to say: he killed no one except an armed man. What then? Others wielded arms more bloodily, yet, when at last they were sated, cast them aside. He quickly sheathed the sword but never put it down.

Antony was ungrateful toward his dictator, whom he pronounced to have been killed lawfully, and whose killers he sent away to provinces and commands; but after the fatherland had been torn by proscriptions, incursions, and wars, after so many evils he assigned it not even to Roman kings, so that the city which had restored full right, liberty, and immunity to the Achaeans, Rhodians, and very many renowned cities would itself pay tribute to eunuchs.

The day will fail one who enumerates the ungrateful, even to the final destructions of the fatherland. It will be equally immense if I begin to run through how ungrateful the commonwealth itself has been toward its best and most devoted men, and how it has sinned no less often than sin has been committed against it. It sent Camillus into exile; it dismissed Scipio. After Catiline, Cicero was exiled, his household gods overthrown, his goods plundered; everything was done that Catiline would have done if victorious. Rutilius bore as the price of his innocence that he lay hidden in Asia. The Roman people denied Cato the praetorship and utterly denied him the consulship.

We are publicly ungrateful. Let each man question himself: there is no one who does not complain of someone as ungrateful. Yet it cannot happen that all complain unless complaint must be made concerning all. Therefore all are ungrateful. Only that? All are covetous too, all malicious, and all timid--those especially who appear bold. Add that all are ambitious and all impious. But there is no reason for you to be angry. Pardon them: all are insane.

I do not wish to recall you to uncertainties, so as to say: "See how ungrateful youth is." Who does not desire his father's last day, provided he is innocent; await it, provided he is moderate; think of it, provided he is dutiful? How rare is the man who fears the death of the best wife without also calculating it? For what litigant whom you have defended, I ask, has the memory of so great a benefit lasted beyond the next few matters?

This often applies to princes and commonwealths, among whose errors, among others, it is not the least to return either no gratitude or evil gratitude to those who have deserved well. How much detriment the commonwealth has incurred from this matter is taught both by the nature of the thing and by these examples. Nor is it wonderful that the commonwealth is ungrateful toward citizens who have deserved well of it, and that others in turn are ungrateful toward it, because no one is sufficiently grateful to God for so many goods.

§ 2. The Romans were ungrateful toward those who had deserved well of them: they drove Tarquinius Collatinus into exile solely from hatred of his name; they compelled Valerius to incur danger on account of the house erected on the Velia; they were either cruel or unjust toward Manlius, Camillus, Scipio, and Cicero. The Athenians were no less so. Through the barbarous law of ostracism they were the most ungrateful of all nations; among them great benefits were a matter of certain danger. This arose precisely from the fact that, since they had endured many grave tyrants--men whom before they had regarded as renowned, beneficent, and popular--they thereafter began to distrust everyone equally. The Lacedaemonians were no milder; the Carthaginians were the cruelest of all and the most ungrateful toward their generals.

§ 3. The vice of ingratitude extends widely, so much so that an Italian asks whether princes or the people are customarily more ungrateful. I would prefer their morals to be such that one could instead ask whether the people or princes are customarily more grateful. He concludes that ingratitude arises from avarice and ambition, and then from suspicion; that the people are never ungrateful from avarice, and much more rarely than princes from suspicion. But I can by no means approve these things as prudently said.

For an avaricious people frequently, through desire for money, deprives brave men who expend themselves for their fatherland of a just honorarium. Amid their very dangers, while Philip carried around the terror of war and deceit, the Athenians not only sat idle in the theater, but also judged that the naval fund should be spent as payment for the theater. The Romans appointed a day for Camillus to stand trial, as though he had distributed the Veientine booty inequitably. Whence came so great an injury against so great a man, unless from avarice? How great were the contests which the Agrarian Laws stirred up at Rome, by which the revenues, the sinews of the commonwealth, were cut? That avarice, moreover, not only took away the donatives of commanders and the rewards of armies, but wore down the commonwealth more than the wars themselves. Thus even the people are ungrateful from avarice.

And they are so all the more because the optimates will not easily consent to great advantages for one citizen who has deserved splendidly; for what is given extraordinarily to one is withdrawn from his colleagues. But ungrateful citizens envy the wealth of their preservers after receiving safety, although they have received life and wealth from those same men.

The people are not customarily ungrateful from ambition, indeed, because they are not customarily a competitor for great deeds and rewards

but, because they are governed and, as it were, animated by a few men, they are led by the ambition of those men. Popular leaders and demagogues, moreover, are accustomed to envy renowned men, detract from their praises, and exercise rivalries and hostilities. Scipio sails to Africa and undergoes dangers; meanwhile the ungrateful Senate and ungrateful people listen to Cato barking against his greatness. Thus by another's ambition,

> As wood movable by another's sinews > is led.

In place of ambition, however, the people possess the implanted poison of envy. They are so imbued with it that they cannot bear those who have deserved best, and they grieve more that the faculty of doing good remains to great men than they rejoice in the benefit. Then the people are not only an unfit but also a malevolent assessor of benefits. For since individuals care little for the commonwealth, they value no benefits highly unless private advantages are joined to them; and nevertheless, when they have obtained those advantages, they expect more or complain that greater ones have been given to others. But the highest ingratitude is not to acknowledge a benefit.

Nor is it true that the people do not have many causes for suspicion. Athenian, Corinthian, and Roman history teaches the contrary. The people, who for the most part are ignorant of the sequence of the deed, suspect plots against liberty, embezzlement, judgments, and all matters. But princes, since an account is customarily rendered to them personally for the most part, have knowledge of all things. Nowhere are the people more moderate, more cultivated, and more fitted for magistracies than in the free cities of the Empire. Yet a hundred years ago most cities rose up from suspicions against the senate, and some also shed blood. Today many harbor grave suspicions concerning senators and would demand accounts if they did not remain quiet out of regard for a greater power.

§ 4. Princes, however, have a twofold condition. Some possess a single principality and have neighboring enemies or rivals. If they have a renowned commander in war, fortified by victory and the favor of provincials, they easily suspect and fear him. The reason is that such commanders almost equal the prince and, if they wish, will either betray him to the enemies or themselves succeed him. These princes are customarily ungrateful through suspicion, and often even wish death upon their commanders to their own ruin. This is all the more so if they perceive that their own resources are slender in comparison with so great a name.

Others are very powerful and possess many provinces, governors, and viceroys. Such princes are rarely ungrateful through suspicion, because even the most renowned commanders stand far below the greatness of their lords. Thus envy is not customarily dominant in such men either. Then a probable fear never arises from a commander's perfidy, because he has neither the strength nor the spirit, after occupying the tyranny of one province, to rouse the entire body of the kingdom against himself. Although these things are so, nevertheless both the people and the prince frequently sin in this matter. Gratitude, however, procures friends and preserves the commonwealth.

§ 5. For, first, it is of great importance that gratitude be laid up for those who have deserved well of the commonwealth. An ungrateful prince will scarcely retain good men, and never men of great spirit. If you are ungrateful for the great labors of any citizen whatsoever, you will not only have him as a mortal enemy, but will also blunt the industry of others and bring it about that they look elsewhere and seek where they may bestow their benefits better and with hope of advantage. For in truth:

> τὴν εἰς ἀτιμίαν ὀλιγωρίαν οἱ φιλότιμοι, καὶ οἱ ἐπιεικεῖς φέρουσι βαρέως.

Those desirous of honors, and prudent men, bear it heavily when they are neglected through contempt. The deeds of great men when left without honor have brought on immense calamities. Coriolanus pressed his ungrateful fatherland with siege; Carbo attacked it through barbarians; Narses imposed the Lombards upon Justinian. Boniface, count of Africa, brought in the Vandals. For those who, after their illustrious labors, the dangers they have encountered, and the fidelity they have expended together with their blood, experience the dispositions of princes or of the commonwealth as estranged from them--if they are strong in resources and tenacious of their dignity--generally devise something so as to take care (as Octavian used to say) that they cannot be removed. And so they conciliate to themselves the spirits of the soldiers, conspire with neighbors and sometimes with enemies, occupy fortifications, and avenge the contempt shown them. What ambition does in frivolous men, indignation does in others. Accordingly, from the ingratitude of princes and commonwealths many pernicious tyrannies have arisen. And certainly, even if a prince's ingratitude is not a just cause of rebellion, yet among the common people it is a plausible one, and favor is shown to an injured man who pursues his injuries. And this is all the more so because ingratitude is a shameful vice. Herodian says truly:

> Καὶ τὰ μὲν δεινὰ τῷ ἔργῳ ἀεὶ μνημονεύεται. Τὸ γὰρ λυπῆσαν δυσέξαλειπτον· τὰ δὲ χρηστά, ἅμα τῇ ἀπολαύσει, καὶ τὴν περὶ αὐτῶν μνήμην συναναλίσκει.

The memory of grievous things that have happened always remains; for whatever causes sorrow is erased with difficulty, but the memory of benefits is consumed together with their enjoyment.

They oppress those by whose labor they were freed from fear, and begrudge them the fruit of their labors. For after the daughters of Jerusalem sing, "Saul has slain a thousand, and David ten thousand," the safety of the whole kingdom, when joined to the praise of the bravest man, is now unwelcome. Saul is therefore angry with David, all of whose benefits were burdens to him, whose punishment he counted as gain. He disdains to appear to have been affected by a benefit, as though he were the lesser man, and--as is characteristic of raging men--he does not forgive the benefit. He overturns all the benefits and remembers only that he has been placed second. Nor is it wonderful that men are moved when they behold new tablets drawn up concerning benefits, a thing most pernicious to states; God himself detests forgetfulness of benefactors. After God, the Israelite people owed life and liberty to Moses. "I see," says God, "that this people is stiff-necked. Let me alone, that my wrath may be angry against them and I may destroy them; and I will make you into a great nation." But the mildest of mortals, forgetful of his own dignity, intercedes for the ungrateful. If those stiff necks had obtained another prince, they would have lain crushed in the very desert among thorns and thistles. Joash removed from their midst Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, to whose father he owed his life, his kingdom, and piety more excellent than life and kingdom--so much more powerful was one unjust offense than a kingdom bestowed. Thus nothing grows old more quickly than a benefit. From this, great disasters flowed into that commonwealth.

Augustus often considered returning command to the people, but examples of an ungrateful people frightened him. He had read, in a deserted town, the epitaph of the elder Africanus, who had restored the commonwealth by conquering Carthage: “Ungrateful fatherland, you shall not even have my bones.” He knew that Africanus's brother Scipio Asiaticus, after he had filled his fatherland with the riches of the most opulent part of the world, was ordered to be led to prison as one accused of embezzlement. There came to his mind the unworthy death of the younger Africanus, which found no avenger in the Forum. The speech of Publius Lentulus was in men's hands, in which he reproached the people for ingratitude and prayed to the gods that he might never return to his fatherland; and he died in Sicily. He also knew that Cicero had been driven out, that slight gratitude had been shown to Pompey, and that death had even been inflicted upon Caesar. And so, from fear of ingratitude, he retained the scepter and, under the most savage tyrants, brought it about that Rome should serve.

The Roman people owed much to those men because they did not think about avenging the old wrongs; for what could those men not have done--supreme commanders of their own times--if they had gone over even to enemies who were not strong? Sertorius taught what they could have done; the tyrants who followed taught it. Greece's greatest men were Solon, Miltiades, Aristides, Themistocles, Alcibiades, and Phocion. All of them were, as Themistocles used to relate, plane trees beneath which the people took refuge when a storm raged, but which they abandoned when the sky was clear. And although no one avenged his injuries, yet if Themistocles had preferred to pour out his fatherland's blood rather than drink bull's blood, he would have destroyed the three foul beasts of Athens: the owl, the dragon, and the disorderly people. Therefore those men perceived that their beneficent deeds perished, and they drew others back from benefits. For he who bestows upon the ungrateful sends benefits into a perforated cask, while there are as many cracks in the commonwealth's cask as there are forgetful, ungrateful, and malicious souls.

When Pythius, the son of Atys, had won Xerxes over by means of an army, money, and obedience, Xerxes overturned all those benefits when Pythius asked that, out of five sons, he might be permitted to retain one as a consolation for his old age--and he lost him. For Xerxes, provoked, immediately commanded that Pythius's eldest son, whom the unhappy love of his father had desired, be cut through the middle. Nor did he wish his cruel ingratitude to be concealed, for he ordered the parts of the corpse to be set out on either side of the road so that the army might pass through their midst. I judge Xerxes to have been conquered on that day on which, by this mournful proof, he displayed an ungrateful spirit to so many peoples whom he could scarcely bind to himself by benefits. For who would take up arms for such a monster? Who would not believe that it would go well with the human race if so malignant a spirit were removed from its midst? Pindar said too little:

> Παλαιὰ μὲν εὖδει χάρις, ἀμνήμονες δὲ βροτοί.

Ancient gratitude indeed sleeps, but mortals are forgetful.

He said too little, I say: new, fresh, flourishing, and living gratitude sleeps; and men are not merely unmindful, but do not even feel gratitude. Emperor Frederick complained that men were made faithless by benefits. It is so, because great benefits furnish an opportunity for displaying faithlessness. The ungrateful man therefore turns the poison upon himself while he alienates everyone from himself. “To this ungrateful man,” says Seneca in Book IV On Benefits, “who is a defrauder of benefits and whose spirit has fallen wholly in this direction, no one will give a benefit any more than he will entrust money to a bankrupt or commit a deposit to a man who has already denied several deposits.”

§ 6. Therefore let the prince be grateful, and the commonwealth grateful; but let it bestow gifts in such a manner that it makes no one an object of fear to itself. Let it give quickly and honorably, and let its gifts be lasting and splendid. But those who receive should know that they owe not only gratitude, but also a lawful use of the benefit, so that they may turn it toward the safety and liberty of the commonwealth. Meanwhile, let princes consider as addressed to themselves what Seneca admonishes in his book On Benefits:

"There is no reason, however, why the multitude of the ungrateful should make us slower to deserve well. For first--as I have said--we increase that multitude ourselves; then, not even sacrilegious men and those who neglect the immortal gods deter the gods from this so lavish benignity. They employ their own nature and assist all things, and among them even the wicked interpreters of their gifts. Let us follow them as guides, so far as human weakness permits: let us give benefits, not put them out at interest. He deserves to be deceived who, when he gave, thought about receiving back. 'But it turned out badly.' Both children and spouses have disappointed our hope; nevertheless we both rear children and marry, and we are so persistent against experience that, though conquered, we return to wars, and, though shipwrecked, to the seas. How much more fitting it is to persist in giving benefits! If anyone does not give because he has not received back, he gave in order to receive, and makes a good case for the ungrateful, for whom it is shameful not to repay if they are also permitted to do so. How many are unworthy of the light? And nevertheless the day arises. How many complain that they were born? Nevertheless nature begets new offspring and permits even those who would prefer not to have existed to exist. It is the property of a great and good spirit not to pursue the fruit of benefits but the benefits themselves, and even after wicked men to seek a good man."

CHAPTER IX

The Prince and the Commonwealth Ought to Be Liberal

§ 1. In Chapter XVI Machiavelli commends to his prince the appearance of liberality, but in reality avarice. First, indeed, he does not deny that it would be best for the prince to be regarded as liberal; but surely it is better that he both be liberal and be regarded as such. For if he is not truly liberal but only hunts after the reputation, he will cast himself and the commonwealth into great evils: either, liberal only in countenance and words, he will deceive men and thus incur hatred, and by delaying his benefits will himself spoil them; or, by failing to observe a measure, he will take away from the worthy what he may bestow upon the unworthy.

§ 2. Next, he rightly reproves the man who, in order to retain the name of beneficence, pours out everything, who must thereafter turn to plunder and rapine, and whom public hatreds will easily overthrow, since he takes from all what he gives to a few. Third, he says that it is better for him to be sparing, for in this way all from whom he has taken nothing will be his friends. Fourth, that a reputation for liberality is necessary to those who are about to seize a principality. Finally, he advises him to be generous with what belongs to another.

And again, if someone were to say that many princes have existed who performed great deeds with their armies and yet excelled in that beneficence, it must be said that a prince makes expenditures either from his own goods or from those of others. If the former, he ought to be sparing; if the latter, it is necessary that he omit no part of liberality. But this liberality is necessary to a prince who leads an army on an expedition--an army that must be maintained by booty, pillaging, and tribute--and who handles the goods of others; otherwise the soldiers would not follow him. What is not yours or your people's can be conferred more liberally, as it is agreed was done by Cyrus, Caesar, and Alexander. For what you spend from another's goods does not diminish your reputation but rather makes it more abundant; but from the consumption of your own resources comes detriment to you. And there is nothing that consumes itself more than liberality, in the use of which you lose the ability to use it and are reduced to want or to contempt of you; or, if you judge poverty to be avoided, you then turn to rapine and to procuring hatred for yourself.

This counsel is wicked, for in order that princes may appear liberal, he commands them to be robbers and plunderers of the whole world. But that course turned out well neither for Cyrus, nor for Alexander, nor for Caesar--wealthy brigands--and it will not turn out well for any prince. Apart from the civil wars, Caesar cut down eleven hundred thousand human beings, and almost always had avarice as the cause of his wars; at last he paid for all those things with his own wounds. Alexander was harassed by a brief enjoyment of goods ill-gotten, and he devoted his whole progeny to the vengeance of the nations he had violated. Cyrus's insatiable greed wasted away in human blood.

Yet I advise this to a prince: if he wages a just and lawful war, let him show himself munificent toward his commanders and soldiers, and let him distribute not only booty, but also villages, castles, cities, and little provinces as fiefs or on an emphyteutic tenure to those who have deserved well, together with a new title of honor. For in this way he will always secure a faithful and ready band of soldiers and commanders, because they will defend their own possessions more steadfastly than the prince's. But those matters pertain not so much to liberality as to military prudence, which I shall discuss in Book X.

§ 3. True liberality, therefore, is fitting for a prince and is especially becoming, because, as a virtue that wins the greatest favor, amid so great an abundance of material it appears altogether divine. It is a measured rule in preserving and expending wealth, holding the middle between the extremes of avarice and prodigality. In the affection it is named benignity; in the effect, beneficence. The Greeks sometimes call it ἐλευθεριότητα, sometimes δαψίλειαν; but εὐδαπανία especially expresses the force of this virtue, for liberality places all expenditures well. And although they are received by the ungrateful, another's baseness nevertheless does not contaminate the dignity of liberality, just as it is not contrary to the beauty of the sun that its shining rays fall into caves and sewers.

There are, moreover, two kinds of liberality: one of giving a benefit, the other of repaying one. I dealt with repaying in the preceding discussion, for it pertains to gratitude. I now deal with giving, of which the manner is likewise twofold, for it is accomplished either by service or by money. It is always a great virtue, whether it is brought forth from the treasury or from labor. “He who gives benefits,” says Seneca, “imitates the gods; he who demands them back, moneylenders.” Nothing is more adapted to the nature of man than liberality. For by nature we are inclined toward liberality. Nature commands human beings to benefit human beings. But it placed the prince on high so that he might demonstrate his greatness by doing good.

The beneficence which is in a prince also has this feature, that it is most properly called liberality. For it is so called not because it is given to free men, but because it proceeds from a free spirit--one not coerced, not bound, and not demanding repayment. The prince is supremely free in giving; neither fear extorts his liberality nor hope bids for it. Nature commends beneficence to all; the prince, because he is a father, and the commonwealth, because it is a mother, and both, because each is rich, ought to exercise it. For a prince to be conquered in arms is human; to be conquered in liberality is disgraceful. Anaxilaus was capable of a great monarchy, for he judged the happiest thing in a kingdom to be not to be conquered in benefits. I consider it a great thing among human affairs to be incapable of being conquered in this way; yet I consider that kings can be conquered. For it is a matter of great virtue to be the friend and intimate of a prince who can easily be offended and, when offended, can do much harm. To be the prince's friend, I say--not the friend of his purple, nor of one's own hope.

Nor did Alexander define the best king badly: he is the one who binds both friends and enemies by benefits. By benefits, not words; for liberality in words together with a restriction of benefits scarcely becomes even a private person, and that pretence cannot be concealed for even one year. For when many petitioners understand that words have been given them, they think themselves mocked by a flattering prince, not assisted by a beneficent one. Only by a favorable interpretation might a prince approve the softened form of this:

> Let him be munificent in praise, but not prodigal of gold.

For that great flatterer retains an image of liberality, and in words shows what is becoming, while avarice forbids deeds akin to the words. Yet I do not say these things in order to maintain that the affections ought not to be shown. For, as Seneca rightly admonishes in On Benefits, neither gold nor silver nor anything of those things which are received from one's neighbors is a benefit; rather, it is the very will of the giver. Care must be taken that the man who receives the gifts recognize this will.

Therefore let the prince determine that what Ptolemy, the richest of kings, said is true and has been set before him for imitation: “It is more kingly to enrich than to grow rich.” And what Artaxerxes said with the same meaning: “It is more kingly to add than to take away.”

§ 4. Therefore let the prince be generous. But in beneficence let him follow measure and reason, not impulse.

First, indeed, let him make a selection of those to whom he gives, for benefits are not to be poured out rashly upon the multitude.

> When you have undertaken to bestow benefits upon the multitude, > many must be lost in order that you may place one well.

You will not understand this as though the prince ought not to show himself beneficent toward the wretched common people, for those in misery must especially be succored. But judgment ought to accompany that liberality; otherwise, if by inept largesse he fosters the vices of the people, under the appearance of liberality he deceives both himself and the peoples. The grain-distribution and the meat-distribution were a foul corruption of the Roman plebs; luxurious ambition fattened the crowd beneath the Rostra and in the theater, which was fit for being driven to riots in every vice. Augustus condemned this, but did not dare remove it. Thus Suetonius: “He writes that he conceived an impulse to abolish the public grain-distributions forever, because through reliance upon them the cultivation of the fields had ceased; and yet he did not persevere, because he held it certain that at some time they could be restored through ambition. And so thereafter he moderated this matter in such a way that he took no less account of farmers and merchants than of the people.”

No less criminal is a false liberality of another kind, which was also prohibited. Caesar decreed, as Tacitus says in Book XIII, that no magistrate or procurator who governed a province should present a spectacle of gladiators or wild beasts or any other public entertainment. For previously they afflicted their subjects no less by such largesse than by seizing their money, while through canvassing they defended what they had committed through lust. I would not even approve the custom of the Persians, among whom it was customary for a king to deny nothing to the first petitioner. For, such is human malice, something joined with disgrace or injury could be sought, and the new king would be compelled either to dishonor the beginnings of his reign by a crime or, contrary to the received custom, to deny the requests with the reproach of avarice.

§ 5. Second, it belongs to liberality to give things that will not cause harm. I am not speaking of cruel gifts, of δῶρα ἄδωρα, of gifts that are no gifts, such as those of Heliogabalus, who scattered presents so that those running together for them would crush one another and perish transfixed upon the soldiers' shields. Rather, I speak of those gifts which do harm more secretly, such as those of Vespasian, who appointed the most avaricious men as provincial governors and afterward slaughtered them when they were full of plunder, so that he was said to use them as sponges. Why does he entrust jurisdiction to an irascible man, the treasury to an avaricious man, an army to an insolent man? He will not give even money to a prodigal any more than he will give a sword to a madman. Now it is so common that a great part of princes' gifts is lost and that a man is struck by the very adornments bestowed upon him.

Seneca says in Book IV of On Benefits, Chapter X: “To return a deposit is a thing desirable in itself; nevertheless, I shall not always return it, nor in any place whatsoever, nor at any time whatsoever. Sometimes it makes no difference whether I deny it or return it openly. I shall consider the advantage of the man to whom I am about to return it, and I shall refuse him the deposit if it will harm him. I shall do the same in the case of a benefit. I shall see when I give, to whom I give, in what manner, and why. For nothing must be done without reason; and it is not a benefit unless it is given according to reason, since reason is the companion of everything honorable. How often have we heard this utterance from men reproaching their own ill-considered gift: ‘I would rather have lost it than given it to that man’? An ill-considered gift is the most shameful kind, and it is much more grievous to have given a benefit badly than not to have received one in return. For it is another's fault that we do not receive back; that we did not choose the man to whom we would give is ours. In making my selection, I shall regard nothing less than what you suppose I will regard: from whom I am going to receive back. For I choose one who will be grateful, not one who will repay. Often a man who will not repay is grateful, and a man who has repaid is ungrateful. My assessment is directed toward the spirit. Therefore I shall pass by a rich but unworthy man; I shall give to a poor good man. For he will be grateful in the utmost want, and when he lacks everything, his spirit will remain. I do not seek profit from a benefit, nor pleasure, nor glory. Content to please one man, I shall give for this purpose, that I may do what I ought; but what I ought to do is not without selection. You ask what sort that selection will be? I shall choose a man of integrity, sincere, mindful, grateful, abstaining from another's goods, not avariciously tenacious of his own, and benevolent.”

And in Book II, Chapter XIV: “There are certain things which will harm those who command them to be given; not to give but to deny these is a benefit. Therefore we shall assess the advantage rather than the will of the petitioners. For often we desire harmful things and are not permitted to discern how pernicious they are, because affection interrupts judgment. But when desire has subsided, when that impulse of the blazing spirit which puts counsel to flight has fallen, we detest the authors of pernicious, evil gifts. As we deny cold water to the sick, and a sword to those who mourn and are angry with themselves, or to lovers whatever their ardor seeks to use against themselves, so shall we persevere in not giving things which will cause harm, even when they ask earnestly and submissively, and sometimes even pitiably. It is proper to regard both the beginnings of one's benefits and also their ends, and to give things which delight not only when they are received but also after they have been received. There are many who say: 'I know this will not profit him, but what am I to do? He asks; I cannot resist his entreaties. Let him see to it: he will complain about himself, not about me.'"

§ 6. Third, it is neither becoming for a prince, I add, nor safe, to give without reason. Seneca says in Book II of On Benefits, Chapter XVI: "The frenzied Alexander, who conceived nothing in his spirit that was not grand, was giving a city to someone. When the man to whom it was being given had measured himself and shrank from the ill will belonging to so great a gift, saying that it did not suit his fortune, Alexander said, 'I do not ask what it is fitting for you to receive, but what it is fitting for me to give.' This utterance appears high-spirited and kingly, although it is most foolish. For nothing is fitting for anyone in itself; it matters what is given, to whom, when, why, where, and the other circumstances without which an account of the deed will not stand. Most swollen creature! If it is not fitting for him to receive this, neither is it fitting for you to give it. Let there be a proportion of persons and dignities; and since there is everywhere a measure of virtue, what exceeds sins equally with what falls short. Let this indeed be lawful for you, and let fortune have raised you so high that your distributions are cities: how much greater a spirit did it take not to accept them than to scatter them? Yet there is someone too small for a city to be founded in his lap. Who would think that he was going to receive, or had received, anything great when he sees an uncultivated and unworthy man made the master of a state? What will be bestowed upon veteran commanders, comrades-in-arms, and the flower of the Macedonian nobility? Each man grieves more that he has been placed after one unworthy man than that he has been made equal to many. If a city is to be given because you are king, give it to your own men and to the veterans of your father. Prince, give to the faithful; give to prudent counselors; be sparing toward lyre-players, fowlers, and entertainers--this is praiseworthy. Those men soothe the senses for a brief time; the others relieve a great part of your labors and die for you."

§ 7. Fourth, this rule must be observed: let liberality be proportionate to one's means; thus you will give without yourself being in want. Yet I forbid it to be sordid. Dio writes of Galba: "He was insatiable in heaping up money, as though he lacked many things, and he expended so little of it that he bestowed upon some men not drachmas but obols." Antigonus mocked Diogenes more in jest than from avarice. For when Diogenes asked for a talent, he refused and added that it was more than a Cynic ought to ask; but when, after being refused, Diogenes asked for a denarius, he replied that it was less than it was fitting for a king to give. Let liberality, therefore, be proportionate to one's means. In whatever way you can, be merciful: if you have much, bestow abundantly; if you have little, strive gladly to impart even a little. Aristotle says that it pertains to liberality not to bestow in such a way as to leave fewer things for oneself. For great liberality can exist even amid small resources.

Seneca says excellently in Book I of On Benefits, Chapter VI: "It is the spirit which exalts small things, makes sordid things illustrious, and dishonors things great and held in esteem. The things themselves which are sought have neither nature, neither of good nor of evil; it matters where the directing spirit impels them, by which a form is given to things. Therefore the benefit itself is not what is counted out or handed over. Just as even in victims, though they be the finest and shine with gold, the honor of the gods does not consist in them, but in the pious and upright will of the worshipers. And so the good are religious even with meal and a little sacrificial cake; the wicked, in turn, do not escape impiety, although they have stained the altars with much blood. If benefits consisted in things and not in the very will of doing good, they would be greater in proportion as the things which we receive are greater. But that is false. For sometimes he who gave small things magnificently binds us more: he who in his spirit equaled the riches of kings; who bestowed a little, but gladly; who forgot his own poverty while he regarded mine; who had not only the will to assist but an eager desire; who thought that he was receiving a benefit when he gave; who gave as though he would not receive, received as though he had not given; who both seized and sought an opportunity that might profit. On the contrary, thankless are those benefits--as I have said--which, although they appear great in substance and appearance, are either extorted from the giver or fall from him; and what is given with a ready hand comes much more agreeably than what is given with a full one. ‘What he conferred upon me is little, but he could do no more. But what this man gave is great; yet he hesitated, yet he delayed, yet he groaned when he gave, yet he gave haughtily, yet he paraded it about, and wished to please not the man upon whom he bestowed it. He gave to ambition, not to me.’”

§ 8. Fifth, let him also give quickly. He who was willing late was unwilling for a long time. Delayed gratitude makes a benefit unwelcome. Every benignity hastens; it is characteristic of one who acts willingly to act quickly. But in a prince inequality must especially be guarded against in this matter. He has an aged minister, a veteran commander; that man sees others enriched in a short time for slight services that involved no danger, while he himself is abandoned--and it is not so bitter to be abandoned as not even to be admitted into the crowd. Whatever they see given to men less worthy, they think has been taken from themselves. Therefore, in this matter a most honorable promptness must be established. For they cease to love a prince by whom they think themselves passed over. A stage-player or flatterer in one hour snatches away what a senator awaits for ten years, what a faithful soldier has earned with much blood. And sometimes a new lyre-player receives the rewards of a veteran commander.

But if they observe that order is preserved and that honors and riches are distributed with regard to merits, they will attempt to prove their service for the opportune time, and will judge not that they themselves have been deferred, but that others have been sent ahead.

§ 9. Sixth, a prince must often moderate his liberality not according to his own judgment but according to the good of the commonwealth, for gifts must often be conferred upon the unworthy so that they may do no harm. It pertains to the stability of rule to bind the spirits of wicked men by benefits, so that they may do harm less or later, or may abandon an altogether depraved will. At the beginning of his reign Nero bound every very powerful man to himself by largesses, as Tacitus relates.

After a drinking-party, liberality and affability were Alexander's salvation, for one of the conspirators disclosed the devices undertaken for his murder. The wicked whom you have bought in this way will not be faithful, nor will traitors to whom you have given a price; rather, after receiving the bait, they will withdraw, lest they seem to owe obedience. Nevertheless, they will hope again.

§ 10. Seventh, to give willingly, to give quickly, and to give before you are asked are the adornments and, as it were, the seasonings of benefits. But to give even secretly and without causing shame to the recipient is greater than the gifts themselves. It is a rare virtue to be unwilling that one's liberality be known to men, and to wish it to be hidden even from the recipient. Rare, I say, and so praised in Saint Nicholas, bishop of Myra, and celebrated throughout the Christian world by the pleasantness of little gifts received with gratitude: many have given more; few have escaped the recipient's awareness. Those who give with the best spirit and do not reckon up their benefits so that they may pass into the form of a debt nevertheless desire those to whom they give to be grateful. That holy bishop wished the benefit to be pure; he permitted nothing to be deducted from it and therefore concealed it. But God, who had seen in secret, made it public in the sight of this sun, and seeks imitators.

§ 11. A liberality that supports ancient and noble families and raises up afflicted cities is welcome and suitable for strengthening a kingdom. Suetonius relates thus of Vespasian: “He was most liberal toward every class of human beings. He made up the senatorial census; he sustained impoverished men of consular rank with five hundred thousand sesterces annually; he restored to a better condition very many cities throughout the whole world which had been afflicted by earthquake or fire.”

Tiberius incurred great hatred because of certain noblemen who were poor not through their own fault but through the injustice of fortune and whom he haughtily rejected. The reason is that nothing appears so wretched to everyone as nobility cast down; all favor such men, all pity them, and sometimes even their enemies do. Therefore the glorious liberality of a prince affects the spirits of all, especially those of noble and powerful men. Many examples show how much pity a noble house and disposition arouses for itself when it has undergone an unworthy fortune.

Valerius, Book VIII, Chapter I: "Aulus Gabinius, in the greatest heat of his infamy, was subjected to the votes of the people, with Gaius Memmius as his accuser, and seemed to be a man whose hope was cut off, because both the prosecution was plainly discharging its part and the supports of the defense rested upon feeble trust, while those who were judging, with headlong anger, eagerly sought the man's punishment. The lictor and prison therefore stood before his eyes. Meanwhile, all these things were dispelled by the intervention of favorable fortune. For Gabinius's son Sisenna, driven by consternation, prostrated himself as a suppliant at the feet of Memmius, seeking some alleviation of the storm from the place whence the whole violence of the tempest had burst. The insolent victor repelled him from himself with a savage countenance, struck the ring from his hand, and allowed him to lie upon the ground for some time. This spectacle caused Laelius, with all the tribes of the plebs approving, to order Gabinius released, and furnished a lesson that neither ought one insolently to abuse the outcome of prosperous affairs, nor ought anyone hastily to be broken by adverse ones.

"Likewise, Lucius Piso, accused by Publius Claudius Pulcher because he had inflicted grievous and intolerable injuries upon the allies, escaped the fear of an undoubted ruin by a chance assistance. For at the very time when grim votes were being cast concerning him, a sudden violent rainstorm broke out. And as he lay prostrate on the ground kissing the feet of the judges, he filled his face with mud. When this was seen, it transferred the whole court from severity to clemency and gentleness, because they judged that he had paid the allies sufficiently grievous penalties when he had been brought to this point of necessity: that he was compelled either to cast himself down so abjectly or to raise himself so hideously.

"Quintus Flavius the augur was prosecuted before the people by Gaius Valerius the aedile. When he had been condemned by the votes of fourteen tribes, he cried out that he, though innocent, was being crushed. Valerius replied in an equally clear voice that it made no difference to him whether he perished guilty or innocent, provided that he perished. The violence of this statement gave the remaining tribes to his adversary. He had cast down his enemy; when he believed that same man certainly ruined, he raised him up and lost the victory in the midst of victory itself.

"Marcus Aemilius Scaurus also, when accused of extortion, brought a defense so ruined and given up for lost into court that the accuser said that the law permitted him to summon one hundred and twenty men to give testimony, and that he would not object to Scaurus's acquittal if he named just as many from whom he had taken nothing in the province. Although he could not make use of so favorable a condition, nevertheless he was acquitted because of the extreme antiquity of his nobility and the recent memory of his father."

If the people so favor the wicked--indeed, if even the sworn judges themselves do so--how much love will the commonwealth or the prince gather for itself if it makes innocent and good men, whom impoverished nobility burdens more than it adorns, equal to the honor of their birth? Lactantius spoke truly of all liberality in his book On the Anger of God: "Justice and beneficence are as immortal as the mind and soul, which by good works attains the likeness of God."

§ 12. Ninth, I would also admonish the prince to exercise liberality toward his own family and agnates. But because, out of many, few sin in that direction, while the churches frequently complain that the riches of provinces are heaped upon little nephews and little kinsmen, the hand which is munificent toward its own family alone and not toward the fatherland seems instead to need restraining. I shall speak opportunely of this matter when I have treated magistrates.

§ 13. Tenth, let a prince never pour out everything from a full granary, or, as the Greeks say, from a βαθὺν σάκκον, "deep sack." Let him give frequently and in portions. The reason is that in this way recipients will remember both the present gift and past gifts, and benefits are heaped upon benefits; then, if they receive the whole at once, they easily run away, whereas an eager hope for the future detains those who otherwise would depart. Hence princes frequently have it in their mouth that this is given not as a gift but as an indication of favor; that it will not be the last, but will be the beginning of a more ample beneficence.

Finally, no one has received so much from a prince that he has not wished for more and does not hope for more. Seneca described this disposition in one man, but it exists in almost all, in Book II, Chapter XXVII of On Benefits: "Gnaeus Lentulus the augur, the greatest example of riches before his freedmen made him poor--he saw four hundred million sesterces belonging to him; I spoke precisely, for he did nothing more than see them--was of a disposition as barren as it was petty. For although he was most avaricious, he let coins escape more quickly than words, so great was his poverty of speech. Although he owed all his advancements to the deified Augustus, to whom he had brought poverty laboring beneath the honor of nobility, and though he was now the first man of the state in money and favor, he was accustomed from time to time to complain to Augustus, saying that he had been drawn away from his studies; that nothing had been heaped upon him equal to what he had lost by abandoning eloquence. But among other things the deified Augustus had also conferred this upon him: he had freed him from ridicule and useless labor. Greed permits no one to be grateful, for what is given is never enough for a depraved hope. The greater the things that have come to us, the greater the things we desire; and avarice placed amid a heap of great wealth is much more aroused, just as the force of an immense flame is fiercer the greater the conflagration from which it has flashed forth."

Therefore a prince can enrich many, but satisfy few.

§ 14. Eleventh, care must also be taken that liberality not appear compelled. Daniel, long neglected by Belshazzar and already almost unknown, is summoned in the utmost necessity; honors and the third place in the kingdom are offered to him. But he did not want the gifts of a kingdom about to perish, which would have made his cause worse before the conqueror, and so he freely rejects them: "Let your gifts," he says, "be yours, and give the gifts of your house to another."

When Antiochus and other kings of Syria were in fear and danger, their promises toward the Jews were abundant but unwelcome, because they were extorted by fear. Therefore the prince will promptly preoccupy the spirits of the nobility and the plebs by gifts and advantages. For what is given in danger they think has been thrown away because it cannot be retained, and they think it will be recalled when the fear has been removed. When the kings had been expelled and the Roman Senate saw a great mass of war approaching from Etruria, it prudently granted much to the people--indeed, it courted the people: the consul lowered the fasces; it permitted appeal to the people; it was liberal toward those bound by debt and debtors; it lived on equal terms of law with the plebs; and, what is of the highest importance for conciliating the spirits of the common people, it remitted taxes, took care for the grain supply, and gave salt without charge.

If these things are given in such a way that they appear to be gifts of necessity, besides being harmful they alienate the people still more. For from the prince's great fear and distrust of his own affairs they judge him prodigal and no longer liberal, though until now he has devoted himself to avarice. Just as, when they see merchandise thrown into the sea from a ship breaking apart, those standing on the shore, although they do not see the cause of such great losses, nevertheless infer that the passengers are in great danger, so also, when the plebs suspects hidden dangers from an avaricious prince's sudden largesse, it transfers its hopes and affections elsewhere.

§ 15. Twelfth, give to the powerful. In Tacitus, Book III, Nero binds each of the most powerful men by largesses. In a good cause, for the safety of the people, the prince will carry owls to Athens, wood into a forest, and water into the ocean. For because the greed of the rich is more aroused, and the costly life of the powerful needs many things, to conciliate them by gifts belongs to liberality; but to alienate them by neglect belongs to avarice. The prince will not fear to imitate the example of a prudent supplanter, who said, Genesis 32:20: “I shall appease him with the gifts which go before me, and afterward I shall see him; perhaps he will be propitious to me.”

§ 16. Thirteenth, since princes are in great danger of avarice and tenacity--for patrons of the treasury and of rapine are always present, and besides this human nature is greedy for riches, while with an increase in money the madness of greed is increased--he will ensure this one thing before all else: that he not be ready to receive. And so he will moderate all tolls and tributes. He will appoint just and upright collectors.

Therefore he will certainly persuade himself that such abundance as exists in bodies when a quantity of vicious humor distends them is not the support of a kingdom but its pestilence: when treasuries swell with unjust exactions, but the subjects have neither property nor any hope except in a change of affairs. Such is the prince who is never wearied τῷ κερδαίνειν--“in making gain,” as Epictetus said to Hadrian. Such is the prince who heaps the riches of the world into one house, as Severus, the most avaricious of all emperors, had undertaken to do. Such was Justinian, whom Zonaras records to have been always avaricious, always needy, and often prodigal. Yet there is no need of ancient examples: the emperor of the Turks exceeds the rapacity of all, for he judges everyone's resources to be his own.

§ 17. Let a magnanimous prince weigh in his own mind that it is greater, and certainly more welcome, to benefit all than to possess great riches. For to what purpose are great treasures unjustly collected and heaped up over many years, which one Julius will break open and one Gaius will dissipate? The labor of avarice belongs to the avaricious man; the advantage belongs to his successor, and often to an enemy.

An example for us is Haolonus, mentioned in the history of Hayton the Armenian, Chapter XXVI, “Armenia.” He, the brother of Mango Khan, the fourth emperor of the Tartars, baptized in the year 1258, captured Baghdad, or Babylon, and ordered the caliph to be brought to him and all his treasure to be carried to him. Haolonus then said to him, “Why did you not summon your neighbors and mercenaries to you with so great a treasure, to defend you and your country from the incursions of the Tartars?” He replied, “I seemed to myself to have enough strength if I fought with my own men alone.” Haolonus answered, “You are the master of all who believe in Mohammed the false prophet; therefore so great a master ought to be nourished by no food other than this treasure. Let this be your food.” Thus he shut him inside a chamber filled with gold and gems, without any food, and compelled him to die of starvation.

Midas's fate in this respect was milder, for by his touch he turned everything into gold; for at least he delighted his eyes by variety and transformations of things.

Deadly money adheres to an avaricious prince no less than to private persons, and it is not torn away without feeling. Avarice may even appear to be proof of a great spirit: it lies upon heaps of gold and silver, cultivates fields under the names of provinces, and under each individual steward possesses territories wider than those which consuls used to receive by lot. This vice is fatal among the powerful. For they draw not merely estates and houses, but kingdoms and nations into their patrimonies. They join not only house to house and couple field to field, but join kingdoms to kingdoms and seas to seas, and expend the deaths of nations upon a single title.

CHAPTER X

Parsimony Is Necessary to the Commonwealth, and Prodigality Pernicious

§ 1. Parsimony, which the Greeks call φειδὼ, remains joined to liberality by a perpetual bond; indeed, it is the fountain and sinew of liberality. It is a rich and present revenue, a short road to wealth for private persons, and a most honorable road to supreme power for a prince and a commonwealth. I do not define it by the sordidness of certain men, which disgraces even private persons. I detest the Phasaelites and the Sidetans, the extremes among the Pamphylians, because they gave occasion to a proverb. Nor do I judge that Fabricius, cooking a turnip more for a display of glorious sordidness than from political moderation, acted rightly. Blessed are those who have held the mean. Let the commander's table be furnished with liberal and manly parsimony; let tribunes, centurions, and every very brave man be invited as testimony to fidelity and valor. Let no prince imitate those things which the Romans themselves preferred to admire rather than follow. Nor are these precepts of the times but of nature, which placed majesty in a prince together with liberality. Pyrrhus, a commander of such great prudence and of such great armies, at the same period treated his own men with liberal magnificence and was a match for the Romans.

Parsimony, therefore, is the virtue by which men acquire property, preserve what has been acquired, increase it, and restore it, by a lawful and honorable measure and toward a good end. In this no less does the splendor of liberality shine forth than in conferring gifts. Nor, among the people, is the esteem of parsimony which retains less than that of liberality which expends. Its end is not only that the treasury may be equal to expenditures and that the province may have a reserve fund laid up against the uncertainties of the times, but also that it may not be necessary to oppress any of the subjects with tributes. This benefit extends widely, for it is conferred upon all from whom nothing is taken away. Then, a prince will never be poor if he is sparing. It is agreed that in our own time many ecclesiastical and secular princes have gathered great riches from provinces of moderate size not only without vexing their people, but have also restored many towns, villages, monasteries, and churches. Certainly the Most Reverend Julius, Bishop of Würzburg, after endowing the academy, furnishing a distinguished and wealthy poorhouse, and building and restoring citadels, monasteries, and churches, left the commonwealth in the best condition; and yet he did not manage its economy unbecomingly and displayed magnificence in many things.

§ 2. Therefore let the first consideration make the prince sparing, not avaricious. Long experience has taught that nothing illustrious has been accomplished except by sparing men. For although Caesar and Alexander were prodigal at the beginning, they nevertheless acted thus, especially in civil wars, from necessity, not from liberality or prodigality. It is more difficult to retain command than to acquire it: it is seized by force, but retained by justice, industry, parsimony, and a treasure stored away for uses. Alexander was avaricious, not sparing, and sometimes prodigal; nevertheless he attempted to establish his kingdom by riches and parsimony. Certainly he retained much from the spoils of the East: his noble but unfortunate defendant objected to him that thirty thousand mules carried captive gold for him. Caesar, now victorious, demanded money back from Antony; and when Antony indignantly said, “Money from me, Caesar? Did he conquer without me? Why do I not rather demand it from him?” Caesar compelled him to pay. Nero, after pouring out his resources, turned to rapine. And he taught that what Timotheus once reproached Aristophon with was most true: “For him to whom nothing is enough, nothing is shameful.” He must take from another who cannot borrow from himself--that is, from parsimony. For this counsel from Socrates was also given to kings, although it was spoken to Aeschines as a private man: παρ’ ἑαυτοῦ δανείζεσθαι, “to borrow at interest from oneself.” Poverty will halt at whatever place frugality has taken its stand.

§ 3. The second rule of parsimony is that they not give where they ought not, but give where giving is required. How many errors are committed in this matter I shall say elsewhere, when I teach my prince to gather riches. Now I admonish that much is often given to the devil, little to Christ. Let us listen instead to the discourse of the bishop and martyr of Carthage, in his book On Works and Alms:

"Let each man place before his eyes the devil springing forth into the midst with his servants--that is, with the people of perdition and death--and, with Christ himself present and judging, challenging the people of Christ to an examination of comparison and saying: 'For those whom you see with me, I neither received blows nor endured scourges, nor bore the cross, nor poured out blood, nor redeemed my household at the price of suffering and gore; but neither do I promise them the heavenly kingdom nor call them back anew to paradise with immortality restored. And what precious gifts, what great gifts, sought by what excessive and long labor, they procure for me with the most costly preparations, either pledging or selling their property to procure the gift! And unless the presentation turns out honorably, they are cast out with abuse and hissing and are sometimes almost stoned by popular fury.

"'Show your gift-givers to be such men, O Christ: admonished by your precepts and about to receive heavenly things in return for earthly ones, those rich men, those men overflowing with abundant resources. In the Church, with you presiding and looking on, do they present a gift of this kind, their property pledged or sold--indeed, transferred to the heavenly treasuries by a change of possession for the better? In these fleeting and earthly gifts of mine, no one is fed, no one clothed, no one sustained by the solace of any food or drink. All things perish amid the fury of the one presenting them and the error of the spectator, through the prodigal and foolish vanity of pleasures which frustrate. There, in your poor, you are clothed and fed; you promise eternal life to those who work, and scarcely are your men, who are honored by you with divine recompenses and heavenly rewards, made equal to mine, who are perishing.'"

§ 4. Amid such great preparations, how often is hunger imposed upon the poor? Indeed, the poor are bought so that they may be torn apart, as the cruelty of the amphitheater commanded to be done. But since both parsimony and prodigality are discerned in various things, profusion must be avoided by a prince in absolutely all of them. For if, by the law of the Twelve Tables, the administration of a patrimony is taken away from a prodigal no less than from a madman, who would bear a king prodigal of his own peoples? Who would wonder at sedition amid such contempt of the subjects? Antiochus was prodigal of riches and contemptuous toward his own people. "It happened," 2 Maccabees 4:30, "that the Tarsians and Mallotians raised a sedition because they had been given as a gift to the concubine of King Antiochus."

The frugality of others consists in their table, as did that of Severus, of whom Lampridius says: "This was his daily provision for a banquet: thirty sextarii of wine for the whole day; thirty pounds of fine bread; fifty pounds of the bread which followed, for distribution. For from his own hand he always gave the attendants at the banquet both bread and portions either of vegetables, meat, or legumes, behaving with altogether elderly maturity as the father of a household. Thirty pounds of different meats were also prescribed, and there were chickens and eggs; a goose was also employed on feast days. On the Kalends of January, however, and on the festivals of the Mother of the Gods, the Apollinarian Games, the banquet of Jupiter, the Saturnalia, and feast days of this sort, a pheasant was served, and sometimes even two were set out, with two chickens added. He had a hare daily and game frequently, but divided it with his friends, and especially with those whom he knew not to have it of themselves. Nor did he send any of such gifts to rich men, but always received them from those men. He had daily four sextarii of millet without pepper, and two with pepper."

§ 5. The prodigality of others was immense, as the same author relates monstrous things of Antoninus Heliogabalus. "He had couches made of solid silver, both dining-couches and bedroom-couches. He quite often ate, in imitation of Apicius, the heels of camels, combs cut from living chickens, and tongues of peacocks and nightingales, because whoever ate these was said to be safe from epilepsy. He also presented to the courtiers immense feasts filled with the entrails of mullets, the brains of flamingos, eggs of partridges, brains of thrushes, and heads of parrots, pheasants, and peacocks. Indeed, he ordered so many beards of mullets to be presented that he served them in place of cress, parsley, bean-plants, and fenugreek in full bean-dishes and platters--a thing especially astonishing. He fed dogs with the livers of geese.” What will you do with this monster, to whom so many things that would cause harm--indeed, so many evils--were pleasing?

§ 6. Some have exhausted themselves by the prices of clothing, something frequent among private persons. Gaius Caligula, the heir of the most avaricious Tiberius, poured out everything in every manner. “He put on no garment twice,” says Suetonius, Chapter III. “He gambled at dice for four hundred thousand sesterces on a single throw. He fished with a gilded net, with cords woven of purple and scarlet. He is said never to have made a journey with fewer than one thousand carriages, with silver shoes for his mules, muleteers clothed in Canusian cloth, and a band of litter-bearers and runners adorned with bracelets and trappings.” What ornament must we believe to have been absent, if not the necks but the hooves of asses were shod underneath with silver?

The prince will take the greatest care that citizens not burden themselves by the expense of dinners or clothing. From this come many destructions of souls. Thus Propertius once sang:

> The matron walks forth clothed in the wealth of her descendants, > and draws the spoils of our reproach across our faces.
>

The luxury of clothing is very often derived from the wages of a prostitute. Spartan matrons dressed modestly; harlots splendidly.

Caligula used to boast, repeatedly saying, “A man ought to be either frugal or Caesar.” Indeed, for several days he scattered coins of no moderate sum from the roof of the Basilica Julia among the plebs. He also built Liburnian ships of cedar, with jeweled sterns, many-colored sails, great spaciousness for baths, porticoes, and dining rooms, and also with a great variety of vines and fruit-bearing trees, in which, reclining at table by day amid choruses and symphonies, he might traverse the shores of Campania. I judge that not even infinite worlds could suffice for this man, for there is no bottom to infinite greed.

What wonder is it that, after such great luxury, Galba's frugality in diet and his parsimony in making expenditures, as Plutarch relates, were imputed to him as sordid vices when he obtained command? For empty opinion accompanied his moderation and temperance.

Many in former times poured out everything upon mimes, human monstrosities, and parasites. Aurelian is no less to be blamed than the gullet of the man whom he fed deserves to be consigned to Orcus. These are the words of Victor: “But in a wondrous manner he delighted in mimes; and he was delighted most vehemently by Phagon, who ate so much that in one day before his table he ate an entire boar, one hundred loaves, a ram, and a little pig; and, with a funnel applied, drank more than a large jar.”

§ 7. Some men's structures have exhausted all their wealth. What wonder?

> Rome will become a house; migrate to Veii, Quirites.

Rome when burned gave the greedy and needy monster an opportunity to plunder the provinces, while money was sought for the imperial city.

The prince will attend diligently to what must be given and when his hand must be drawn in. Witty and urbane was Alfonso's reply to a prodigal knight who asked for gifts inopportunely and repeatedly: “I shall sooner make myself poor than make you rich.” But sumptuary laws, economy, and the other matters must be treated minutely and individually when I discuss wealth.

§ 8. At this point I admonish that whatever is conferred upon the wretched and needy contains a promise not only of eternal life but also of temporal life. “Therefore,” says Daniel 4:24, “O king, let my counsel be pleasing to you, and redeem your sins with alms and your iniquities with mercies toward the poor; perhaps he will forgive your offenses." And the liberal king: "Blessed," says Psalm 40:1, "is he who understands concerning the needy and the poor; on the evil day the Lord will deliver him. May the Lord preserve him and give him life, and make him blessed upon the earth, and not deliver him into the soul of his enemies. The Lord will bring him aid upon the bed of his sorrow; you have turned all his couch in his infirmity."

Tiberius replied excellently to Sophia, an avaricious and scheming woman, that he in no way obstructed the advantages of the treasury who assisted the poor and redeemed captives. Divine liberality showed this also by a distinguished miracle, when the treasure of Narses the eunuch was disclosed. This happened in the year of Christ 582, by which God adorned liberality toward the poor with so illustrious a testimony.

Radegund, the captive Thuringian and wife of Chlothar, experienced no lesser beneficence: when from a vessel of eight modii, as the history calls it, she drew forth wine for the poor, the cup was always full. It pleased God to give to the most holy queen material equal to her spirit. When Gualbertus had distributed grain from the third hour all the way to the ninth, supplements were given by a hidden power so that abundant produce filled the granary. Greatest in this virtue, as always, was Flavius Constantine, who by a law promulgated in the year 322 commanded that the poor be fed from the public granaries. O God, how far did that soul then differ from the ancient executioners, who bought the poor for the sword, the mines, naval combats, and wild beasts? The same liberality was in his son Constans, who sent Paul and Macarius through Africa with alms; and by that liberality he raised up the Church, oppressed by the Donatists, something that until then had been attempted in vain by so many laws.

He who is God, rich toward all, is never conquered by human liberality; and I judge that there is no one to whom what he has expended toward his neighbors with a benign spirit has not been repaid with much interest. Saint Germanus, as Constantius the priest relates in his life, had ordered three gold pieces to be given to beggars. The deacon--as the spirits of ministers are solicitous--had expended two; but a little afterward two hundred were returned to the holy bishop. It was signified by an oracle that there would have been three hundred, so that a hundredfold might be returned even in this life, if the deacon's avarice, by retaining one, had not lost one hundred.

Therefore, care of the poor is a support of the kingdom; but the care is twofold: first, that they not be the prey of the rich; second, that they be enriched by the commonwealth and the prince. Euphemianus, the parent of Saint Alexius, was of a noble and truly Roman spirit. If ever he had been less benign toward the poor, as a severe exactor of liberality he thought that the accounts stood against himself, and, prostrate upon the ground, cried out with voice and tears: "I am not worthy to walk upon the earth of my God."

§ 9. Prostrate your heart before your God, O prince, from whose single, brief, and slight pleasure--better omitted--a thousand poor persons could have been refreshed. See also whether your delights have been collected from the sweat of a thousand poor persons. Weigh in your spirit not what great men do, but what ought to be done.

CHAPTER XI

Affability Is a Distinguished Ornament of Citizens and Princes

§ 1. Saint Thomas, Summa theologiae II-II, Question 114, Article 1, refers affability, which the Greeks name εὐπροσηγορίαν, to the virtue of justice. Under this I also place courtesy, humanity, εὐτραπελίαν, and φιλανθρωπίαν, which are nearly the same virtues, or certainly very closely neighboring ones. Affability holds the mean between contentious quarrels and flatteries. For it so moderates fellowship and friendship by words and deeds that, through its humanity, it delights others becomingly and for a good end. Courtesy, or urbanity, which the Greeks call εὐτραπελίαν, moderates severity or moroseness, and excessive relaxation, which they are accustomed to call buffoonery, and which the Apostle also condemns by the name εὐτραπελίαν. For nothing is more difficult than to hold the measure in courtesy and urbanity.

Humanity, according to the custom of speech, is accustomed to embrace all those things. In Sermon VIII On the Words of the Apostle, Saint Augustine calls him humane who shows himself a human being, and especially one who receives a human being as a guest. Φιλανθρωπία, or humanity, is a certain benevolence common toward all human beings, implanted by nature and the force of society. Those who have put it off, like that Timon μισάνθρωπος, "the misanthrope," must be regarded as beasts--and all the more so, the more they extend deadly hatreds to the whole race. But we are now treating the humanity which is displayed by signs, words, and deeds, in which a prince ought to excel. For humane men cherish every class of human beings and repel injury from all, even from the lowly and from slaves. This also, as Aristotle admonishes, causes our spirit to be moved by the suffering of guilty men when they are tortured and torn, although you do not pity them. If this virtue has driven firm roots in the spirit, it will easily disclose itself toward others. I called it a virtue because Aristotle so teaches in his little book On Virtues, referring the pretence of humanity to injustice.

But it is enough for me that my prince should φιλανθρωπεύεσθαι, "practice humanity," showing himself benign, courteous, and affable toward everyone--as an ornament of virtue. "Humanity," says Seneca, Epistle LXXXVIII, "forbids one to be haughty toward one's associates; it forbids one to be avaricious. In words, deeds, and affections it shows itself courteous and accessible to all. It considers no evil another's. But it especially loves its own good when that good is going to become a good for someone else." Such a man will in no way be ἄμουσος, ἀγροδίαιτος, ἀπρόσιτος: he will appear unskilled, rustic, and difficult of access neither to his own people nor to strangers.

§ 2. Among these morose men I place those whom Seneca judges to foster a delicate kind of irascibility. They are δυσάρεστοι, "hard to please"; and therefore, since many things are done by many persons before them, while very many displease them, they must turn out bitter, harsh, irritable, rabid, clamorous, and rough. Let no senator of this kind in the senate-house, nor any prince in his court, when he is inhuman and, as the Greeks say, ἀπάνθρωπος, persuade himself that he has any human being as a friend. All services are unwelcome if courtesy is absent; all gifts are poisoned by the inhumanity of the giver. At the summit of command harshness of words is atrocious. Even when kings command arduous things, let their words be gentle.

§ 3. One objection is customarily made: authority and majesty, which those who think it beautiful to form Timons, Stoics, and Scythians out of princes suppose are brought into contempt by affability and courtesy. Authority does not lie in roughness and moroseness, but hatred does. Since everyone hates this in a prince, and concerning it they speak with one another against the prince, I do not see what authority it procures for him. Do you suppose that man possesses authority against whom this is cast:

> σοὶ δέ τις ἐν στήθεσσιν ἀκήλητος νόος ἐστίν;

Odyssey κ.

> But in your breast there is an implacable mind.

That majesty belongs to the Cyclops, who was:

> Accessible to none in countenance, nor affable to any in speech.

I would never wish the man who presides over human beings to put off humanity. Let the prince be sparing in words, stern in countenance, a strict exactor of duties. Thus he will be revered. This is well done, but let all those things in their proper place be seasoned with much sweetness; let men know that benignity is natural to the prince, and severity extorted by the vices of others. Those who make use of an inhuman prince do what mountebanks do, who lead lions, bears, or similar wild beasts about for gain at public spectacles. First, they never do anything except for their own advantage, nothing for the prince's good, for they do not love him. Next, they never entrust themselves and their own possessions to him, for they rightly hold his savage disposition in suspicion. It follows from this that they place greater trust in another prince.

The first and principal fruit of humanity is that men procure friends for themselves. There are those who prefer a prince who speaks courteously to one who gives haughtily. Caelius preferred to be consulted by Caesar rather than gilded by him.

> Indulgence especially captures minds with its right hand;
>
> harshness bears hatred and savage wars.
>
> We hate the hawk because it always lives in arms,
>
> and wolves accustomed to go against the fearful flock.
>
> But the swallow is free from plots against human beings because it is gentle, > and the bird of Chaonia has towers which it may inhabit.

The man who joined the highest courtesy to the highest eloquence, Cicero, did not fail to know this; he would never have attained the consulship except through courteous and flattering eloquence. “It is difficult to say,” he writes in Book II of On Duties, “how greatly courtesy and affability of speech conciliate the spirits of human beings.” There also survive letters of Philip to Alexander, of Antipater to Cassander, and of Antigonus to Philip--three most prudent kings--in which they command them to attract the spirits of the multitude to benevolence by benign speech and to soothe soldiers by flattering discourse. This is more powerful even than lavish largesse. “What companions more fitting for liberality,” says Valerius, Book V, Chapter I, “could I give than humanity and clemency? For they seek the same kind of praise: the first of these is displayed in want, the next amid occupation, the third in doubtful fortune. And although you do not know which one you should approve most, nevertheless the commendation of that one whose name was sought from the human being himself seems to run ahead.”

He then proceeds to relate examples of humanity, or rather of humane liberality. Among the rest, distinguished is the deed which Alexander, mindful of his father Philip's precepts, accomplished. While Alexander traversed all nations in his tireless course, in a certain place, when oppressed by a winter storm, he noticed a Macedonian soldier, already exhausted by old age, stupefied by excessive cold, while he himself sat in a raised seat near the fire. Having made an assessment not of fortune but of the age of each, he descended, and with those hands by which he had crushed the power of Darius he placed the body doubled up by cold in his own seat, saying that what among the Persians would have been capital--occupying the royal throne--would be salutary for him.

§ 4. If that king's other deeds had been similar, neither would so many plots have surrounded him, nor would Babylonian poison have taken away from him the fruit of so many victories. What of Quintus Aelius Tubero? Did he not draw upon himself rejection and disgrace by the inhumanity of his deed? Valerius, Book VII, Chapter V: “Quintus Aelius Tubero, when asked by Quintus Fabius Maximus--who was giving a banquet to the people in the name of his uncle Publius Africanus--to furnish the dining room, covered Punic couches with kidskins and set out Samian ware in place of silver vessels. By the ugliness of this affair he so offended everyone that, although he was otherwise regarded as an outstanding man and had descended into the Campus as a candidate in the praetorian elections, supported by Lucius Paulus his grandfather and Publius Africanus his maternal uncle, he departed from it marked by rejection. For just as they always approved continence in private, so in public the greatest care was taken for splendor. Therefore the state, believing that not merely the number present at one banquet but the whole state had lain upon those little skins, avenged the shame of the feast by its votes."

§ 5. Store also in your spirit what happened to Scipio Nasica. The affair is related thus by Valerius: "Publius Scipio Nasica, the most illustrious light of power in the toga, he who as consul declared war upon Jugurtha, who received with most holy hands the Idaean Mother as she migrated from her Phrygian seat to our altars and hearths, who suppressed many pestilential seditions by the strength of his authority, under whose leadership the Senate gloried for several years--when as a young man he sought the curule aedileship and, in the manner of candidates, grasped rather firmly the hand of a certain man hardened by rustic labor, he asked him by way of a joke whether he was accustomed to walk upon his hands. This saying, taken up by those standing around, flowed out to the people and brought about Scipio's rejection. For all the rural tribes, judging that their poverty had been reproached by him, unsheathed their anger against his insulting urbanity."

Therefore golden is the precept of that most prudent governor and bishop, Ambrose, in Book II of Duties, Chapter VII: "Goodness," he says, "is popular and welcome to all, and nothing so easily glides into human senses. If it is aided by gentleness of manners, accessibility of spirit, moderation of command, affability of speech, honor in words, a patient interchange of discourse, and the grace of modesty, it is incredible how greatly it advances toward the accumulation of affection. For we read not only in private persons, but even in kings themselves, how greatly the ease of flattering affability has profited, or how greatly pride and swelling of words have harmed, so that they shook kingdoms themselves and dissolved power."

He then adds two illustrious examples. The first is of Moses. "How great were the insults," he says, "inflicted by the people of God which Moses swallowed; and although the Lord wished to punish the insolent, he nevertheless frequently offered himself for the people, so that he might withdraw the plebs from divine indignation. With what gentle discourse after their injuries did he address the people; he consoled them in their labors, soothed them by oracles, cherished them by works; and although he spoke steadfastly with God, nevertheless he was accustomed to address human beings with a humble and pleasing appellation."

The second is of King David. "What of his imitator, holy David, chosen out of all to govern the plebs? How gentle and flattering, humble in spirit, diligent in heart, accessible in speech. Before his reign he offered himself for all; as king he placed his own military service on an equality with all and shared the labor: brave in battle, gentle in command, patient under abuse, more ready to bear injuries than to repay them. Therefore he was so dear to all that, when a young man, he was sought for the kingship even against his will and, though resisting, was compelled; when an old man, he was asked by his people not to take part in battle, because all preferred to be endangered for him rather than that he be endangered for all. Thus by gratuitous services he had bound the plebs to himself."

Humane men, therefore, attend others with benevolence, assistance, and dangers themselves; against rough men they cast this:

Ἀλλ᾽ ἤτοι κεῖνον μὲν ἐάσομεν, ἤ κεν ἴῃσιν, ἦ κε μένῃ.

But let us leave that morose man alone, whether he goes or remains.

For the punishment of inhumanity is ready at hand: solitude, and the mockery of all who do not need their aid. The morose man is hated by his own people, but by strangers he is both hated and mocked. The authority of Scripture is also at hand for us here. “A sweet word,” says Scripture, Ecclesiasticus 6:5, “multiplies friends and mollifies enemies. And a gracious tongue abounds in a good man.”

Cato, with immense haughtiness, refused to hear Eumenes. Nicomedes, unmindful of royal dignity, put on the cap and professed himself a freedman of the Roman people.

§ 6. The second good of humanity, therefore, is the reconciliation of enemies. It was said to Rehoboam with good counsel, 3 Kings 12:7: “If today you obey this people, and serve them, and yield to their petition, and speak gentle words to them, they will be your servants all their days.” But he alienated them from himself by roughness. Much more prudently, when a Roman commander could restrain his mutinous soldiery neither by force nor by authority, he called them “Quirites”; by this humanity he made them obedient.

Alexander the Great dispelled, by humanity alone, the supreme danger in which he was placed. The conspirators had assembled; that night had been appointed for the crime. But when he went out and addressed the conspirators rather flatteringly--men whom he supposed had increased their watches for his protection and honor--by that courtesy he moved one of them to make a disclosure. Courtesy shining forth from serenity of countenance also brought safety to Augustus. Thus Suetonius: “Whether in conversation or silent, his countenance was so tranquil and serene that one of the leading men of the Gauls confessed among his own people that he had been restrained and softened by it, so that he did not, as he had intended, when admitted nearer under the pretence of conversation during the passage of the Alps, thrust Augustus over a precipice.”

§ 7. Am I mistaken, or is it from that unvarying humanity that today the title “Serenity” is bestowed upon the greatest kings? For humanity is in the countenance as much as in words. Serenity of countenance therefore furnished authority to a man for whom savageness and a centaur-like gloom would have been ruinous.

Let gentle words be joined to benignity of spirit and serenity of brow; for, as a queen used to say with manly prudence, silken words ought to be employed by kings. The wisest of kings instructs us excellently, Ecclesiasticus 18:15: “Son, in good things do not give a complaint, and in every gift do not give the sadness of an evil word. Will not dew cool heat? So too a word is better than a gift.”

§ 8. Lest anyone wonder, let him look at those who attempt to seize a tyranny, for they accomplish more by flatteries than by gifts. Look at Absalom, courteously saluting all, hearing their cases, embracing them, and thus enticing their spirits by an appearance of humanity, so that they preferred a parricidal son to David, their liberator and most just and brave king. Prince, I admonish you: boldly emulate Absalom for the good of the commonwealth. By a pretence of humanity he was preparing to destroy his parent and brothers and to oppress the people by tyranny; do you, by true humanity, keep spirits so bound and constrained that another's pretence does not cast you into danger.

By what did William of Nassau draw the Belgians, a most cultivated nation whose principal gift is courtesy, away from Spanish rule more than by the affability and humanity which he opposed, to its discredit, to Spanish gravity? Imitate him, whoever rules peoples, and especially you senators of cities and men of patrician blood. The greatest kings have gone before with a great example. Caesar had learned to address nearly every one of his soldiers by name. Nor was any commander loved by his soldiers for so long and so steadfastly. Antoninus the Philosopher calmly gave his right hand to those who approached and barred no one from access. Hadrian dealt most pleasantly and civilly even with the humblest citizens. Let a Christian prince do this more sincerely, to whom it is said, “Make yourself affable to the congregation of the poor,” Ecclesiasticus 4:7. For those whom he addresses, and those whom he despises, are members of Christ; Christ does not disdain to call them brothers. He ought to please those whom he commands if he desires them to be ready and brave for commands. Above all, as Antalcidas replied when asked, he pleases human beings who speaks the most pleasant things.

§ 9. How greatly this virtue of which I treat avails either for preserving or for overthrowing the commonwealth the voice of nature teaches. For all men, even kings and great men, when they are in danger, turn to humanity and courtesy. When the outcome of battles is doubtful, when spirits waver, they employ humanity alone. Therefore, if in the greatest dangers affability can sustain a tottering commonwealth and can even raise one that has fallen, who denies that it can thus be preserved? What was more abject than Pompey's party after the battle of Pharsalus, after Pompey's murder commanded by a boy king? Yet Cato raised it up, not by gifts--for he had been conquered and was an exile--but by soothing the spirits of the soldiers through humanity and binding them to himself, while he goes before, while he shows how to endure labors rather than teaches it. He stands while the camp-follower drinks. Nor throughout that whole journey could it be discerned whether he was commander or soldier, except that he was the first to undertake the greatest share of labors and dangers.

§ 10. Three things in particular must be guarded against in the courtesy of governors. First, let him not furnish easy access to the wicked, for that accessibility is not the accessibility of a modest prince but the prostitution of supreme power. Andronicus always furnished access to flute-players and harlots. The kings of the Chinese associate only with eunuchs and concubines. By that relaxation or flattery the life of the subjects is dissolved. I therefore seek a prince such as Paul the Deacon describes Valentinian in Book XI. He says that Valentinian was of an acute disposition, becoming in countenance, grave in spirit, most cultivated in speech, although sparing in speaking; severe and vehement in punishing crimes; industrious in business; patient in adversities; most hostile to criminals; temperate in food and drink; most friendly to those excelling in virtue and to religious men; so that by everyone's judgment he was said to be most similar in character to Emperor Aurelian. For what honor will a noble man judge to have been furnished him by the prince's accessibility if he observes that the same access always lies open to infamous persons and Jews?

Therefore let the prince's virtue profit all, but not the wicked except for their correction. For it is necessary that a prince be held in hatred by the good if they understand him to be the friend of the wicked. Alexander Severus carefully guarded against both, as Lampridius is the authority in his life: “When Septimius Arabianus, notorious for the crime of thefts and already set free under Heliogabalus, had come among the senators to salute the prince, he exclaimed: ‘O divine powers, O Jupiter, O immortal gods! Arabianus not only lives but even comes into the Senate. Perhaps he also hopes for something from me; he judges me to be so foolish, so stupid.’ He was saluted by name, that is, ‘Hail, Alexander.’ If anyone bowed his head or said anything too flatteringly, he was either cast aside as a flatterer, if the quality of his station permitted, or was mocked with immense laughter if his dignity could not be subjected to a graver injury. When saluted, he offered a seat to all senators; and indeed he admitted to the salutation none but honorable men and men of good reputation.”

§ 11. The second is that by excessive accessibility he not come too near to flattery and blunt the force of command. Excessive familiarity is not to be borne even in a father. Gravity must be retained, self-seeking must be removed. “Gravity shines forth pleasantly when haughtiness has been removed,” said a good poet and the best senator. Nor is the proverb empty, but taken from experience:

> Καλὸν φύει καρπὸν οἱ σεμνοὶ τρόποι.

Splendor and gravity of character bear the most beautiful fruits. Through mere familiarity with excessively flattering masters, fear grows obsolete among slaves. It is as harmful for them not to fear as it is hard to obey a cruel master. Flattering men grow cheap through association.

§ 12. The third is that by accessibility and courtesy he not prostitute his fidelity: let him not promise things which he does not intend to discharge. Vespasian gave counsel altogether most badly for his reputation and, if he had lived longer, for his safety. For when many petitioned, he himself, rich in promises, promised everything; when asked the cause, he replied, “It is not becoming that anyone depart sorrowful from Caesar.” The utterance is more splendid than prudent, and therefore neither true nor useful to the prince. Neither frugality nor the treasury suffices for so many expenditures and disbursements as are demanded by the desires of many thousands. Therefore he cannot satisfy all; for this reason he must not promise to all.

For when something has been promised by the princely voice, they think it is owed. When they perceive that they have been mocked by a joyful countenance, or held in suspense, they conceive the gravest indignation and judge themselves to have been affected by an injury if the benefit has been denied. And although what was wickedly sought is deservedly denied, nevertheless, after it has been promised, if it is not given, they accuse the prince's fidelity. For it belonged to prudence to examine the justice of the requests before the promises. Otherwise the prince is judged to have promised either rashly or fraudulently. Thus no one will depart joyful from him; for however much he promises mountains of gold, nevertheless, since he has so often deceived, he will not create trust. There is no need to explain how shameful it is, after flattering indications of a beneficent will and after fidelity has been bound by a promise, still to doubt the prince's intention, since even private and slender men count this dishonorable for themselves. And so Vespasian was hated, and after he had deceived a few no one thereafter trusted him.

§ 13. What certain princes possess is not courtesy but pusillanimity, so that they think it kingly to promise many things but to prevent them from being granted through administrators. He promises abundantly to the petitioner, takes care that letters be written, and entrusts execution to the satrap or quaestor; meanwhile, either the form of the letters or the manner of the mandate is such that the ministers understand that the man is being led on by an empty hope and has received words. In this matter, indeed, there are many offenses: the prince's fidelity is prostituted; the immense hatred of the man who is exposed to mockery is contracted without cause; authority grows cheap among the officials. For they never trust his countenance, never his words, by which they have experienced so many men led into deceit. At last they are also indignant that they are ministers of most mendacious courtesy; and they rightly foretell that they themselves will be remunerated not with wealth or dignities but with the benevolence of words. This is to be mocked by one's own prince.

Therefore let the prince's courtesy be honorable, grave, and faithful. By this he will lead where he wishes--not wild beasts, like Orpheus, nor stones, like Amphion, but human beings following of their own accord. And with the easiest labor he will gather the most abundant fruits.

It belongs especially to humanity to hear everyone. Law 6, π; law Adducis, title On Appeals. Antonius Perezius says well: “If a prince denies an audience to the people, neither do the people furnish him their spirit.” Demetrius wickedly cast the petitions of suppliants into the river in their presence.

CHAPTER XII

Chastity Ought to Be a Matter of Great Care in the Commonwealth

§ 1. The prudence of the prince and of the whole commonwealth, justice, and the virtues connected with them have been discussed; it follows that I deliver precepts concerning temperance, which is especially concerned with moderating pleasures by reason. Its principal parts are chastity and sobriety; gentleness and clemency are annexed to it. These must be discussed in order.

I join chastity and modesty, although the former restrains lust, while the latter removes the signs of wantonness through shame. The thing itself altogether teaches that lust and every incitement to lust must be removed from the commonwealth. Distinguished is Agapetus's precept and his serious admonition to his prince:

> Βασιλέα σε κατ' ἀλήθειαν ὁρίζομαι, ὡς βασιλεύειν, καὶ κρατεῖν, τῶν ἡδονῶν δυνάμενον, καὶ τὸν στέφανον τῆς σωφροσύνης ἀναδήσαμενον.

I define you as an emperor in truth, since you are able to rule and hold pleasures under your power, and are bound with the diadem of temperance.

§ 2. Reader, I beg you--whether concern for the court and princely counsels occupies you, or you deliver your opinion among fellow senators--I beg you not to pass over this part of the discussion as though it pertained only to churches and monasteries. It is of principal concern to the commonwealth that both princes and private persons live chastely and modestly. The causes and origins of wars and tumults, and the manifold occasions for overturned kingdoms, have very frequently been lust. Seditions arise from injustice, fear, and contempt. Aristotle says in Book V of the Politics, Chapter X:

> Τῆς δὲ ἀδικίας μάλιστα δι' ὕβριν.

But out of every kind of injury, they arise especially on account of insult. Of the attacks that are made upon kings or tyrants, some are made upon the body and head of the princes themselves, and others upon the principality. Those which are made on account of insult pertain to the body. Since insults have many kinds and many parts, each of them arouses anger. Indeed, of those who become angry, almost all invade another for the sake of avenging an injury received, not for the sake of preeminence.

For example, the attack upon the Pisistratids was made because they had affected Harmodius's sister with disgrace and dishonor and had attempted to inflict sexual violation upon Harmodius. For Harmodius attacked them because of his sister, Aristogiton because of Harmodius. Men also plotted against Periander, tyrant of Ambracia, because, while they were drinking together, he asked a boy who was with him and whom he kept among his delights whether he was already pregnant by him. Violence was inflicted upon Philip by Pausanias because Philip had permitted him to be affected with insult and dishonor by Attalus without punishment; upon Amyntas, surnamed the Little, by Derdas, because Amyntas had boasted that he had enjoyed his youthful age; and upon the eunuch by Evagoras the Cyprian. For because that man's wife had been taken from him by the eunuch's son, he killed him as though he had received an insult.

Many attacks were also made upon certain monarchs because they had taken chastity from someone by violating his body--for example, Crateus's attack upon Archelaus. For Crateus always bore it gravely and painfully that Archelaus had intercourse with him for the sake of violation. And so, although the following pretext was far slighter and this cause less weighty, it was nevertheless sufficiently suitable and just: that Archelaus had given him in marriage none of the daughters whom he had promised to give him. Rather, he betrothed the elder to the king of Elimea while entangled in the war which he waged with Sirras and Arrhabaeus, but the younger to Amyntas's son, thinking that by this arrangement the latter, especially since he had been born from Cleopatra, would by no means dissent from him. But the origin of the estrangement from the prince was that Crateus had borne it grievously that he had submitted to his lust in sexual matters.

Hellanocrates of Larissa attacked him together with Crateus and for the same cause. For when he saw that he was not recalled from exile by the man to whom he had given the flower of his age to be used and enjoyed, especially since Archelaus had promised that he would do this, he judged that the intimacy with him had been instituted not because of amorous desire but for the sake of insult. Parrhon and Heraclides of Aenus killed Cotys, avenging an injury to their father. Adamas abandoned Cotys and revolted from him because he judged himself affected with insult in having been castrated by him when he was a boy.

It is indeed so. A foreign woman overturned Troy. Lavinia in turn delivered Italy, and in turn incestuous marriage-beds, to the descendants of Troy. A stranger's love crushed the newness of the Punic kingdom and its rising citadels, and delivered them into the hands of the barbarian Hiarbas.

That virtue was rare among the nations. Therefore, when Valerius invokes it, he scarcely finds where it may have a place: “Whence,” he says in Book VI, Chapter I, “shall I invoke you, Chastity, the principal support equally of men and women? For you inhabit the hearths of Vesta consecrated by ancient religion. You lie upon the couches of Capitoline Juno. By constant station you frequent the summit of the palace, the august household gods, and the most sacred marriage-bed of the Julian clan. By your protection the insignia of boyhood are defended. Out of regard for your divinity, the uncorrupted flower of youth remains. With you as guardian, the matron's robe is esteemed. Be present, therefore, and acknowledge what you yourself wished to be done.” But chastity wanders far from these things.

The cause of so great an evil is that God delivered them into passions of dishonor. For such grave vices followed idolatry. Tertullian explained this in his book On Modesty, Chapter V, where he places fornication midway between idolatry and murder: “There is also a dignity of evil in that it is placed at the summit or in the midst of the worst things. I behold a certain pomp and raised platform of adultery: on this side a procession led by the idolatry which precedes it; on that side an escort furnished by the murder which follows it. Without doubt, it has taken its seat worthily between the two most eminent pinnacles of crimes, and through their midst it has filled, as though vacant, a place of equal authority in guilt. Who will tear it, enclosed by such sides and supported by such ribs, from the body of the things adhering to it--from the bond of neighboring crimes, from the embrace of kindred wicked deeds--so as to separate it alone for the fruit of repentance? Will not idolatry on this side and murder on that side detain it? And if they have any voice, they will cry out: ‘This wedge is ours; this joining is ours. We are marked off by idolatry; with it distinguishing us, we are joined. We attend upon it as it shines forth from our midst. Divine Scripture has embodied us together; the letters themselves are our glues; now it cannot exist without us. I indeed, idolatry, very frequently supply occasion for adultery. My groves know, and my mountains, and living waters, and the very temples in cities, how much we procure for the overthrow of chastity.’” Thus idolatry was the common bawd of the world, the procuress of lusts, and the violator of marriages.

§ 3. But Seneca is the best witness to the morals of his own time, in Book III of On Benefits, Chapter VI: “Then he does not desire it to become known to all how many are ungrateful, for the multitude of sinners will take away shame from the thing, and a common curse will cease to be regarded as a disgrace. Does any woman now blush at divorce, after certain illustrious and noble women reckon their years not by the number of consuls but by the number of husbands, and depart for the sake of marriage and marry for the sake of divorce? That was feared so long as it was rare; but because no public records were without divorce, by often hearing of it they learned to do it. Is there now any shame in adultery, after matters have reached such a point that no woman has a husband except to provoke her adulterer? Chastity is a proof of ugliness. What woman will you find so wretched, so sordid, that a single pair of adulterers is enough for her, unless she has divided the hours among individual men and the day is not sufficient for all; unless she has been carried to one and remained with another? She is uncultivated and old-fashioned who does not know that the adultery of one man is called marriage. Just as shame for these offenses has now vanished after the practice wandered more widely, so you will make the ungrateful more numerous and more daring if they begin to count themselves." Histories teach that what Seneca says is truth, not hyperbole.

Thus, under such morals, the mass of so great an empire could not stand. And although, through the zeal of brave and sometimes prudent emperors--Vespasian, Trajan, Hadrian, and the Antonines--it moved its arms, at last it grew languid and served barbarians.

Therefore, let those who deny that chastity is necessary to rulers, and who do not disapprove the Babylonians, Corinthians, and Sybarites, look upon the transformations not of one commonwealth but of the whole world. After all flesh of the primeval world had corrupted its way, the cataclysm destroyed it by inundation. The sorrowful monuments of the Sodomites and Gomorrheans remain to the present day. The destructions of the Midianites and Benjaminites are recalled daily. A son rebelled against David the adulterer. At Rome kingship ended through adultery, and the decemvirate was abolished through lust. Every age has had lusts and punishments for lusts. The immodesty of the Sybarites was punished with such severity by the Crotoniats that "Sybaritic evils" passed from it into a proverb. Lacedaemon paid grievous penalties for impious lust when its strength was worn down in the battle of Leuctra. The Volsinians were thus reduced to servitude. Philip of Macedon was killed because he did not avenge the obscene injury inflicted by Attalus. Bryas was stripped of command because of violence inflicted upon another's betrothed. Antiochus, king of Syria, called θεὸς, "God," was killed by Laodice because he had married Berenice. Ptolemy Philopator perished after being attacked by plots even from his wife. Antoninus

Verus, poured out into wandering lusts, was killed with poison by his wife Lucilla. Fredegund, his mistress, killed Chilperic, king of France and infamous for adulteries, through Landeric. Julian, a nobleman, attacked Roderic, king of the Goths in Spain and the violator of his daughter, with a most grievous war; for after the Saracens and Moors had been brought into alliance, the Goths conquered, and seven hundred thousand human beings slain, the Spains were oppressed by the harshest and most enduring servitude, into which one man's lust cast them. Why should I recall the Sicilian Vespers, in which the Gauls were slain as though in a single hour, and the right to the kingdom was transferred to Constance, Frederick's wife? A great disaster was inflicted upon a most noble kingdom when it was deprived of the strength of that island. The cause was the wantonness of governors and soldiers.

Therefore divine justice, always vigilant as the avenger of luxury, rises vehemently against lusts even in this life. "Adultery and fornication are a fire consuming even to destruction and rooting out all offspring," Job 31. "He who is an adulterer, through want of heart, will destroy his own soul, and he gathers dishonor to himself, and his reproach will not be blotted out," Proverbs 6. And Wisdom 3: "The children of adulterers will come to destruction, and the seed of an unlawful bed will be exterminated." Certainly Scripture most frequently recalls this also among the causes of perishing Israel. For this vice is foul, and because nature is prone to it, it is always punished by God with great examples. But because my business is not only with pious governors of the commonwealth and their counsels, but also with atheists and those whom advantage alone, or reason of state, moderates in delivering an opinion and making laws, let us explain the cause itself why lust is so harmful.

§ 4. The stimulus toward pleasures is sharp, and it belongs to a brave and prudent man to be an enemy to the sweet evil. Love and desire are vehement; they never lay down hope; whatever is preserved they desire more. That flame at first warms with a slight fire, but presently burns out the whole of virtue and the spirit. It never stops at what is lawful, never at what is small; it purchases unlawful things with money, life, and reputation. And if any other vice does so, this one certainly passes most quickly into a monster. Shame forbids the recollection of the deeds of the ancients and their monstrous lusts.

During Julian's reign, the inhabitants of Arethusa and Heliopolis showed themselves most cruel toward virgins because the virgins had been taught chastity by Christian governors. The cause of such great cruelty among the Heliopolitans was that the virgins were forbidden to prostitute themselves to those they met before they were given in marriage, for they had formerly employed that law. They were therefore borne against chastity with a rage so great as was not fitting even for punishing lusts. And so what Cicero admonishes in Book IV of the Tusculan Disputations is especially forceful here: “He who has hurled himself headlong cannot hold himself back when he wishes.” Bodies given to a precipice have no command of themselves. If lust has hurled the spirit headlong, the choice of crime indeed remains in the falling man's liberty, but it is a wretched choice, which by its impulse urges on the ruin rather than struggles against it.

Therefore, since this evil is violent and, if it falls upon powerful men, most insulting, great harms must necessarily arise from it. For the good which is taken away--namely, chastity--is regarded as the greatest. Mortals can bear two things with the greatest difficulty: losses and contempt.

> Lost money is mourned with true tears.

In the deaths of parents, spouses, brothers, and relatives, rehearsed and often feigned tears flow; no one has mourned shipwrecks, the destruction of villas, or the confiscation of a patrimony with a hired mourner going before. True grief has sufficient strength for tears. And so, on account of adverse things which they see others enjoy, human beings retain anger either perpetually or for a very long time, and, though it has been effaced, sometimes renew it by sight and hearing.

They receive contempt of themselves, and especially insult joined with loss, much more harshly. They interpret the supreme insult to have been done to themselves in the chastity of themselves or their people being taken away, because they value it highly--or at least wish to be seen to value it highly--and because it is infamous to be negligent concerning the chastity of one's own people. Virginius killed his daughter, whom Appius Claudius sought for violation after judgment had been given against her liberty and for her enslavement, and judged it better to be the killer of a chaste daughter than the father of a corrupted one. With the same spirit, Pontius Aufidianus killed his daughter, corrupted by her tutor, after he had taken punishment from the corrupter. Publius Maenius punished a freedman who had given his daughter a kiss. Nor was Roman severity so great only toward chastity itself. Publius Atilius Philiscus, who had himself made shameful gain, nevertheless killed his daughter when she was discovered in violation: thus, once a victim of lusts himself, he nevertheless exacted chastity from his daughter. Quintus Fabius Maximus, accusing his son of doubtful chastity, brought it about that by voluntary withdrawal he avoided his father's sight. Scantinius, tribune of the plebs, because he solicited the son of Marcus Claudius Marcellus for violation, was condemned by the Roman people upon one witness. Gnaeus Sergius also paid the penalties for a lustful intention, for he was condemned by the Quirites because of money promised to a matron. The master of Titus Veturius, by then made a slave from the son of a commander, was led to prison by a decree of the Senate. Gaius Pescennius, a man illustrious through many offices, was compelled to die in prison because of an unspeakable violation. Laetorius Mergus, a military tribune accused upon a solicitation to violation, withdrew himself from judicial inquiry and punished the attempted crime by voluntary death.

Nor were these things done only in a better commonwealth and under a stricter discipline. Even when morals had already been corrupted, Marius pronounced that Gaius Luscius, his sister's son, who had been killed by the soldier Plotius on account of an attempted violation--and indeed a tribune killed by his own soldier--had been slain lawfully. Certainly he was worthy of seven consulships, if only for this judgment. Sempronius Musca caught Gaius Gallus in adultery and cut him down with scourges. Gaius Memmius beat Lucius Octavius with cords. Carbo Accienus, caught by Vibienus, and likewise Pontius, caught by Publius Cernius, were castrated.

These are examples of Roman chastity, in which commonwealth public honor long flourished beyond that of other nations. Afterward all things were overturned: after Curio, son of a most grave father, incurred sixty million sesterces of another's debt through injury to noble young men; after Clodius, having bought the court and committed violation, escaped the penalties of adultery; after Gemellus, a court attendant, invited the consul and tribunes and established a brothel in his house, in which he prostituted Rome's freeborn but degenerate blood; after Catiline killed his only son so that he might obtain marriage with Aurelia Orestilla.

§ 5. Nor was chastity of less value among foreign nations. After their husbands had been slain in battle, the wives of the Teutons asked Marius that they too be given to the Vestal virgins to cultivate virginity; when this was denied, they killed themselves, for they regarded chastity as preferable to life. This is less marvelous in Hippo, a Greek woman, who cast herself into the sea lest she be made a mockery. Democles, fleeing the lust of Demetrius Poliorcetes, plunged himself into a boiling cauldron. The Athenian daughters of Phaedo, after their father had been killed, embraced one another and cast themselves into a well, lest they be compelled to live unchastely. Timoclea did better: she cast her violator into a well. Brasilla of Dyrrachium, by a chaste deception, lured a soldier to his own death, lest she suffer violence. Sophronia, a Roman woman, forestalled the injury of Maxentius with a sword. Fifty Spartan virgins preferred to die rather than endure the insulting lust of the Messenians. Digna, a woman of Aquileia, when Attila occupied the city, leapt from a window into the river flowing past. Pelagia, together with her mother and sister, underwent the same fate for chastity. I omit Camma, Panthea, the wife of Orgiagon the Gallograecian, Cyane, Valetia the Tuscan, Chiomara, and others concerning whom Plutarch and others write--especially since Christian virgins and matrons surpass them, for whom the cry “Christians to the lion!” was welcome, but “the virgin to the procurer!” was horrifying. I do not bring forward so many armies of virgins fighting more bravely for chastity than any legions, lest political writers judge that I wish to construct a Parthenon, not a city.

I wished to establish only this: violated chastity has customarily been avenged with a grave penalty. For every family is inflamed to avenge a sexual violation, and anger scarcely ever comes to rest unless blood has been shed. And there is scarcely any father or brother who would not bear more patiently that his sister be led to the funeral pyre than to dishonor. From this cause, therefore, great disasters and conspiracies must arise. This is so not only if the powerful sin in this matter, but also if private or very lowly persons do so, should either no penalty or a light one be inflicted for the fault, and much more if it is passed over in silence.

§ 6. The second cause is that by that vice men's prudence, sagacity, and care for the future are blunted. This one thing is most pernicious to the commonwealth. Nothing is so deadly to minds as lust. “The lust of luxury,” says Augustine, “claims the whole body, inward and outward, for itself, and moves the whole man, with affection of the mind and appetite of the flesh joined together, so that pleasure follows, greater than all pleasures of the body; yet its extremity is reached in such a manner that almost all the sharpness and vigilance of thought is obstructed.” And so, in a commonwealth in which shame is oppressed and luxury exults freely with the reins given to it, there is a great number of the blind, the ecstatic, and the stupid. Good and brave counsels are rare.

For not even Solomon himself, after he gave himself to lusts, reigned wisely and politically; and for that reason he was greatly hated by everyone. “Your father,” says the people, “placed a most harsh yoke upon us.” And the foolish young man admits: “And now my father placed a heavy yoke upon you”; and: “My father cut you with whips, but I shall beat you with scorpions.” Behold what lust did--how it struck the art of ruling out of the wisest man, so that he did not even instruct his son rightly. A blind love inheres in all vices, as Claudian truly says in Against Eutropius:

> But because a blind love inheres in vices, every future thing
>
> Is despised, and present things commend their brief fruit.
> And lust, heedless of loss, rushes into what is forbidden.

§ 7. Minerva is fashioned chaste, and the Muses virgins, because chastity is not only the companion of wisdom but also its cause and preserver. Nor is this so only by divine ordinance, which did not will to send the pure light of wisdom into souls contaminated by luxury; nature too teaches it. For those whose minds are occupied by the enticements of shameful acts cannot conceive serious thoughts concerning studies. So many comedies, both ancient and modern, teach men to love, yet they present to us no young lover who is prudent; or, if they attribute prudence to him, they also make him a conqueror of love and a hater of the brothel.

§ 8. The third cause is that there is not, in a ruined city, that vigor and strength of bodies which exists in one well regulated in its morals. Brave and rustic Persians conquered the Babylonians--men, to say it in a word, fit for prostitutes. The rustic hardiness of the Macedonians conquered the Persians when they had now been enervated; the Romans, while lusts had not yet become common, conquered those enfeebled Macedonians; the Heruli, Goths, Huns, and others of the barbarians conquered the Romans, until they too succumbed to men stronger than themselves. Diogenes sharply and cynically objected to the Greeks that, while they lived, they caused their bodies to putrefy by baths and lust, but when the same bodies were dead, they seasoned them with spices and ointments against putrefaction. It is an altogether inverted concern: to putrefy the living, and at great expense to dry the dead.

§ 9. Finally, where there is little regard for shame and chastity, the whole commonwealth must necessarily be badly administered. For marriages are uncertain; every offspring either is spurious or is held to be so. For if a daughter will never be able to name her mother's adulterers without drawing breath thirteen times, as it is in the Satire, who will believe that she was born of a lawful marriage-bed? From this it also happens that very many flee marriages, not from love of chastity but from the liberty of whoring, and then truly because they fear men lying in wait to take their own place in marriage.

Seneca relates that in his time the corruption at Rome had been so great that no woman married except in order to provoke her adulterer. “Messalina,” says Dio, “a lustful and intemperate woman, also compelled the other women to live luxuriously and wantonly; and she brought it about that many women in the palace, in the presence and sight of their husbands, had intercourse with adulterers. She herself esteemed their husbands and increased them in honors and dignities; but she hated the others who did not permit it, and destroyed them by every means.” Who, under such an emperor and such an Augusta, mistress of the emperor, would have wished to take a wife? Therefore let the commonwealth defend chastity publicly and privately, and repress and restrain luxury and lust. Many things avail for this purpose, but especially those which I shall set forth.

§ 10. Let that care, I say, be public; for it is of greater importance that a city be cleansed of evil morals than of infected bodies. Yet no contagion is more ready to spread than in this part. The loss of shame is the most certain parent of every crime. And license permitted by laws brings not satiety but incitement. Morals are easily changed for the worse; the severity of laws scarcely ever turns vices toward the good. When shame has perished, it does not know how to return. Therefore, unless public authority, seriously armed by laws and penalties, opposes lusts and makes ready the fasces and axes, every disgrace and horror will overflow, and the city will be a great brothel.

When Stratonicus had departed from Heraclea, he kept looking back as though anxious, and did all the things done by those who do not wish to be seen. When his companions wondered, he replied that he feared lest someone see him departing from a brothel. For those who leave a brothel are ashamed of the crime committed.

§ 11. Therefore let the insolence of lusts be restrained by severity of laws. Examples are not lacking. Jovianus enacted by a capital law that anyone who looked upon a sacred virgin with an unchaste gaze should be punished. And Title 11, §1, On Extraordinary Crimes: “Solicitors of others' marriages, likewise disturbers of marriages, even if they cannot obtain the effect of their crime, are punished on account of the intention of pernicious lust.” And §2: “He who, after a boy has been led away or his companion corrupted, has persuaded him to sexual violation, or has importuned a woman or girl, or has done anything for the sake of unchastity, furnished a house--or, according to others, a gift--and given a price by which he might persuade him, is punished, when the crime has been completed, with death; when it has not been completed, he is deported to an island. Corrupted companions are visited with the supreme punishment."

The humanity of the Theodosian and Valentinian laws also comes to the aid of those whom another's wickedness compelled to be unchaste: "If fathers and masters acting as procurers impose upon their daughters or maidservants the necessity of sinning, let the daughters and maidservants, after imploring the help of bishops, be released from every necessity of their miseries." Let the prince follow the prescriptions of the divine laws in his city.

I see that adulteries were once checked by severe laws. In our Germany, after her hair had been cut off, an adulteress was beaten with whips, naked, through the entire village; and, execrable and hateful to everyone, she was consumed by grief and want of food. The ancient Romans strove to remove the seedbeds of every lust in the very blade of grass; for it was a capital offense for a woman to have drunk wine. They thought that shame would be cheap to her who, although she was otherwise weak in judgment, had by drunkenness--or certainly by the danger of drunkenness--made a path for unchastity. The Pisidians were more lenient: after placing the adulteress together with the adulterer upon an ass, they led them about for some days for everyone to ridicule. The Arabs punished adultery with death, and the Egyptians with a thousand blows; but they cut off the adulteress's nose, so that she who had been an enticement to another's crime by her beauty, and had prostituted her own chastity, would displease by deformity.

Formerly many nations had no laws concerning chastity. They say that Hyettus the Argive was the first to carry a law against adulterers, after he had killed Molurus, whom he had discovered in adultery with his wife, and had received a part of Orchomenus in Attica. They say that Draco the Athenian imitated him; he was said, on account of his severity, to have written his laws in blood. Zaleucus, lawgiver of the Locrians, deprived adulterers of their eyes. Deservedly, for the eyes are leaders in love and impose upon the mind. And so, when his son had offended against his father's law, the indulgent father divided the penalty and, as Aelian relates:

ὑπὲρ τὸ ἕτερον τῶν τοῦ παιδὸς ὀφθαλμῶν, ἀντιδιδόναι τὸ ἑαυτοῦ, ἵνα μὴ ὁ νεανίσκος τυφλωθῇ τελείως.

In place of one of his son's eyes, he gave his own in exchange, so that the young man might not be blinded completely.

Plato advises that the inflamed impulse of lust must be moderated by reason and restrained by fear of the laws. In Book IX of The Laws, he condemns with death not only inverted lust and adultery, but every resort to prostitutes. He concedes to a husband the right of life over an adulterer--a deed which our laws also do not punish, for they remit penalties to righteous grief. The same is also permitted to a father against the corrupter of his daughter, yet in such a manner that he does not spare his daughter either. The Gortynians led an adulterer crowned with wool to the magistrate, and thereafter held him forever incapable of bearing witness. The people of Lepreum led adulterers into the forum, led them about for three days, and rendered them contemptible for their whole lives. The Romans ordered adulteresses to go about wearing the toga.

The Athenians' punishment of persons guilty of adultery was foul and not well ordained according to the gravity of a well-ordered commonwealth. The rich redeemed themselves with money; the punishment of the poor was παρατιλμός, καὶ ἀποῤῥαφανίδωσις,

plucking out the hair and rhaphanidosis--the insertion of a radish--which contained more disgrace and foulness than befitted a grave people. Among the Parthians, adulteries were punished most gravely; they generally shut their wives and other women inside the house.

§ 12. Therefore let public power restrain lusts by laws in all citizens. Let it not imitate the Spartans, who at first lacked those laws. Plutarch tells the matter thus in his Laconic Sayings: In Lycurgus's times such great chastity of wives existed among everyone, and they were so far removed from that shameful conduct which afterward became prevalent, that formerly it was incredible that the crime of adultery could be found among the Spartans. A saying is reported of Geradas, a man of the greatest antiquity at Sparta. When a certain guest asked him what penalties adulterers paid among the Spartans--for he saw nothing concerning this enacted by Lycurgus--he replied, “There is no adulterer among us, my friend.” When the other rejoined, “What, then, if one should arise?” “He will give,” he said, “a bull so great that, with its neck stretched beyond Taygetus, it may drink from the Eurotas.” And when the other said with a laugh that it was impossible for so great a bull to be found, Geradas replied, “And by what means could an adulterer arise at Sparta, where riches, delights, and artificial adornment of the body are held to be a disgrace; but modesty, moderation, and the observance of obedience owed to the magistrates are, on the contrary, accounted an honor and a praise?”

But that praise was brief. For Aristotle is the authority, in Book II of the Politics, Chapter IX, that they were ruled by their wives and that the license of the women from that city was extreme:

> Διὸ παρὰ τοῖς Λάκωσι τοῦθ’ ὑπῆρχε, καὶ πολλὰ διῳκεῖτο ὑπὸ τῶν γυναικῶν ἐπὶ τῆς ἀρχῆς αὐτῶν. καίτοι τί διαφέρει γυναικὸς ἄρχειν ἢ τοὺς ἄρχοντας ὑπὸ τῶν γυναικῶν ἄρχεσθαι; ταὐτὸ γὰρ συμβαίνει.

The wives of the Spartans administered many things; but it is all the same whether wives govern the commonwealth or command those who govern it. For the same outcome occurs in either case.

But, in general, the chastity of the Spartans is rendered suspect to me. Certainly Helen was twice abducted in heroic times. She was led away by Alexander the Phrygian only with her own consent. Then Euripides deservedly reproaches them that a virgin cannot be chaste at Sparta, since virgins are accustomed to wrestle with young men beside the Eurotas. But there is greater testimony in Aristotle, Book II, Chapter IX of the Politics:

> Ἔτι δὲ ἡ περὶ τὰς γυναῖκας ἄνεσις, καὶ πρὸς τὴν προαίρεσιν τῆς πολιτείας βλαβερά, καὶ πρὸς εὐδαιμονίαν πόλεως· ὥσπερ γὰρ οἰκίας μέρος ἀνὴρ καὶ γυνή, δῆλον ὅτι καὶ τὴν πόλιν ἐγγὺς τοῦ δίχα διῃρῆσθαι δεῖ νομίζειν, εἴς τε τὸ τῶν ἀνδρῶν πλῆθος καὶ τὸ τῶν γυναικῶν, ὥστε ἐν ὅσαις πολιτείαις φαύλως ἔχει τὸ περὶ τὰς γυναῖκας, τὸ ἥμισυ τῆς πόλεως εἶναι δεῖ νομίζειν ἀνομοθέτητον· ὅπερ ἐκεῖ συμβέβηκεν. ὅλην γὰρ τὴν πόλιν ὁ νομοθέτης εἶναι βουλόμενος καρτερικήν, κατὰ μὲν τοὺς ἄνδρας φανερός ἐστι τοιοῦτος ὤν, ἐπὶ δὲ τῶν γυναικῶν ἐξημέληκεν. ζῶσι γὰρ ἀκολάστως πρὸς ἅπασαν ἀκολασίαν, καὶ τρυφερῶς.

Moreover, indulgence and leniency toward women is useless and harmful both to the design which they formed concerning the administration of their commonwealth and to the happiness of the city. For just as the parts of a house are man and woman, so plainly one ought also to judge that a city is divided into two equal parts, into the multitude of men and of women. Therefore, in whatever forms of administering a commonwealth that which pertains to women is badly ordered, in them one must judge that half the city is not regulated by laws, as happened there. For although the lawgiver wished the whole city to be strong and robust for enduring and bearing labors, in the men he plainly attained what he wished; but toward the women he showed himself negligent. For they live intemperately and luxuriously, let loose and poured forth, plainly, toward every kind of intemperance.

At first many things were permitted to the women because the men were living far from home on account of the Arcadian and Messenian war. Lycurgus wished to subject them to laws, but they protested; and so he was compelled to desist from his undertaking, as Aristotle relates in the same place. From this fountain innumerable evils arose: for both the Helots frequently rebelled, and the citizens were reduced to a great paucity, and the very land also came together into the vast estates of very few men. This ἀνομία, “lawlessness,” therefore brought destruction upon the Spartans. For I would not judge the men good in that city where the wickedness of the women is free. From this there also arose greater crimes τῶν παιδεραστῶν, “of the pederasts.”

Therefore that city perished through a scarcity of laws. In the Roman commonwealth the laws, conquered by vices, yielded. The emperor Alexander did not dare to prohibit male prostitutes; Philip, however, abolished them in the year of the Lord 249. So great was the departure even from the ancient morals of the gentiles.

§ 13. But enactments of laws profit little unless they are guarded by the vigilance of magistrates. The proverb of the Greeks is true:

Ἰσχυρόν ὁ νόμος ἐστίν, ἂν ἄρχοντ᾽ ἔχοι.

A law is a strong thing if it has a ruler to assist it. For if Neronian luxury reigns, if Gaius erects a brothel in the palace, if Messalina compels, what will wretched laws be able to do? Who will condemn what the emperor does? Who will flee what the wife of Augustus commands? The laws are holy, but Maxentius compels matrons to death through fear of disgrace. What will laws avail while that man reigns who pardoned only those who confessed unchastity, because he thought that no one could live chastely? Therefore let there be an example in the prince and in the leading men, through which the laws may acquire authority and force. Let not even prostitutes now proclaim:

Happy are the ages which oppose you

With morals; let Rome now possess shame.

This is a danger to everyone; but when so favored an evil, drawing authority from the foremost men, has driven out shame, it cannot be excluded by any force. Now, indeed, as formerly too, punishment rages more against the weaker sex. But the law and obligation are equal on both sides. Pope Innocent truly says, as it stands in Cause 32, Question 5: “The Christian religion condemns adultery by an equal rule in either sex. But women do not easily accuse their husbands of adultery, and hidden sins do not have vengeance. Men, however, have been accustomed more freely to denounce adulterous wives before priests. And therefore, when their crime has been disclosed, communion is denied to women. But while the deed of men remains hidden, no one easily abstains on the basis of suspicions; yet he will certainly be removed if his crime is uncovered. For since the cause is equal, the principle of vengeance sometimes comes to rest when proof is lacking.”

§ 14. There is also great weight in public morals and practices. If you wish minds to be chaste, take care that things whose poisons reach the mind do not meet their eyes or ears. The habit of hearing and seeing also takes to itself license for doing. There is no need to educate people for wickedness: without an evil example they are teachable, and contrariwise they are teachable through good examples. What does it profit to prescribe right things privately if the public discipline is such as could soften even Lycurgus? Private evils can be corrected; public evils wish to be cultivated. From this come the destructions of cities.

From this look broadly upon the flourishing cities

Which luxury once overturned. Surely neither the anger of the gods, Nor weapons, nor enemies harm as much as pleasure alone,

Gliding into souls.

Therefore, when luxury, the public dissuader from what is honorable, has grown strong, all things yield and the commonwealth perishes.

For luxury overturns other kingdoms through vices,

And pride through hatreds. Thus the Spartan, wickedly raised aloft,

Overturned Athens, and he himself fell in the same way before Thebes; thus the Mede

Took the reins from the Assyrian, and the Persian took them from the Mede;

The Macedonian subjected the Persian, himself destined to yield

To the Romans: these things were confirmed by the Sibyl's auguries.

First delights, soon satiety, then violence, and finally destruction broke out in cities. Certainly, when Diogenes was returning from Lacedaemon to Athens and was asked where he was going and whence, he replied, “From men to women.”

It therefore falls to the commonwealth to remove from its midst every incitement to luxury, such as unchaste spectacles, dangerous dances, lascivious public displays of women, and much more houses of prostitution and brothels. The reasoning of those who judge that worse things are prevented by those public pleasures is most wicked. Wherever those things have grown strong, every most shameful act is perpetrated. Flight consults best for chastity. But flight cannot exist if the incitements of lust are public; if one must be blind in order not to see evil; if in porticoes, in the forum, and in the streets everything abounds in shameful things; if, as Pliny says in Book XXXI, Chapter I, it pleases men to conceal lusts in drinking vessels; if enticing images are placed with impunity in the sight of the young. Poison is not publicly sold; toxins of souls are sold in the marketplaces of Christians, while the magistrate does not prohibit it.

That magistrate who passes over unspeakable things in silence will pay the penalties. If you learned that your daughter had bought those shameful images, to be instilled into her thought through the pigment of colors, you would blaze up with deserved indignation. If anyone related those things in the presence of your children, you would appoint a day for his trial as a corrupter of youth. Is it a greater thing to disclose them by words, or to place them before faithful eyes so that they may adhere more tenaciously? Everyone sees this; your own people see it; those who will relate it to your people see it.

§ 15. Nor should enticements alone be removed; impediments and reins should also be placed upon luxury. Let everyone be occupied with serious thought, works, and labors; let idleness be banished. Love reigns in an empty breast. Movement and activity do not admit so biting a rust. Leisure always gives a changeable mind, rarely a good one. Love is idle; it occupies the lazy. This vice is dispersed by business; true care disperses so vain an anxiety. Certainly Theophrastus defines love thus:

> Ἔρως πάθος ἐστὶ ψυχῆς σχολαζούσης.

Love is a passion, or disease, of a soul living idly. The cause, therefore, of so many evils--and the first cause--is the neglect of the nobility, while they neither educate nor harden their sons for honorable labors, but lead them to dishonorable amusements. Hence > from the tender nail they contemplate wickedness > and incestuous loves.

And so, although these desires belong to all human beings and are conquered with difficulty--“Every evil,” says Cyprian in On the Good of Chastity, “is conquered more easily than pleasures, because whatever the former is, it is horrible; but the latter is enticing”--nevertheless they belong especially to the rich, because idleness and kindling are present. Then, after the rich, they belong to able-bodied beggars who live for the day. For since they act without any care, are often filled by the benevolence of men, are wicked through habit and association, and strike against shameful things with their eyes and ears, they must necessarily be exercised very frequently in playful and never serious thoughts, whose image is readier to hand and whose pleasure is more titillating. Such men must be driven to labors not only for other causes but also on account of their morals. Nor will the magistrate regard this as a small thing. The same vices exist in rags and purple; the same lust exists in a jewel and in filth.

Augustine rightly says in On the Honesty of Women, Chapter II: “Among all the contests of Christians, only the battles of chastity are hard, where the fight is daily and the victory rare. For chastity has been allotted a grave enemy, whom it resists daily and always fears.”

§ 16. Let the commonwealth also lay up with deep attention what the holy fathers prescribe to individuals: namely, that the first titillations of the devil must be opposed. Cyprian says this in On Fasting. “Lest the tares of wickedness grow, they must be crushed in the seed,” says Jerome on Ecclesiastes, Chapter IX. Therefore, from a high watchtower, let the helmsman look ahead to the coming storm, draw in the sails, and draw up the ship. If new actors are being prepared, if new theaters, if foreign luxury of clothing, if new contrivances of foods are breaking in, let him resist seriously while these things have not yet occupied the houses of the powerful. If the prince desires to be chaste, let him be sober and withdraw from the body the material of so grave a conflagration. This is Ambrose's counsel in Book I, Chapter XIV of On Penance: “Lust is a grave fire, and therefore let us not give it the nourishment of luxury. Lust is fed by banquets, nourished by delights, kindled by wine, and set aflame by drunkenness. For wine and youth are a double conflagration of pleasure.” Why do we add oil to the flame? Thus Saint Benedict, Bernard, Francis, Martinian the Hermit, and innumerable others fled wine as poison and satiety as a plague.

Boldly, O prince, cut down the growing forest of luxury; take away occasions, remove the instruments of lusts and the allurements of delights, although the city may appear less cultivated and less opulent, although something may be lost to the treasury. Frugal moderation is preferable to lavish and luxurious riches. Conquered Greece weakened its conquerors; Asia, reduced to a province, laid them prostrate.

§ 17. But nothing assists chastity as much as care for religion. It raises minds to God daily; it considers eternal goods and punishments. He who in prison is condemned to an evil lodging already looks upon the cross or pyre before his eyes; he whose doubtful life shipwrecks batter; he who grows pale in battle--fear strikes every lustful thought from him. In the same way, faith in and dread of eternal punishment extinguish the ardor of pleasures as it creeps upon him with an alluring agitation.

Antonius of Siena tells of a distinguished man of his own order, that is, of the order of Saint Dominic, against whose chastity a wicked she-wolf laid snares. He constructed two blazing pyres and cast himself upon one of them; if that little bed pleased her, he said that he invited the woman to the shameful deed. For that crime which the punishment of eternal fire would follow deserved to be perpetrated in fire. Other things are sometimes too small to be able to withstand the impulse of the most vehement delight; love sends many into dangers. The Daunian youth fixes his gaze upon the virgin and burns more keenly for arms. He too despised death who, swimming across the Hellespont, more frenzied than the very waves, prayed:

> Spare me while I come; drown me while I return.

Hence the Church numbers so many thousands of chaste persons, so many armies of virgins. Deservedly the Christian religion glories in chastity as a distinguished token of truth. For how many thousands of virgins could have escaped torments and death on condition of marriage, and nevertheless preferred chastity? No torments could compel those weak in sex and age, and placed in the midst of enticements, to admit enticing pleasures. How, then, are you a participant in the grace of God if you are so conquered by the sweetness of lusts that you pursue delight even through dangers?

And nevertheless there are men who, on account of the incontinence of the wicked, do not hesitate to pollute cities with brothels, as though graver harms were avoided by a smaller loss. They permit fornication among Christians lest men blaze up into adulteries, incests, and other disgraceful deeds. It is an error, and indeed a grave one; for in that license the wicked receive their first lessons, so that they dare greater things. In no vaulted chamber is there fornication alone. Marriages are violated there too. Nowhere are there greater dangers for matrons than where prostitutes instruct the young.

Around the year of Christ 437, under the Augusti Theodosius and Valentinian, Florentinus, a most illustrious man and most worthy of command, greatly desired procurers to be expelled. When losses to the treasury were raised as an objection--for the procurers paid a tax--he repaired the loss by a substitute payment from his own estate, so that as much as was lost to the empire through those plagues having been driven away might be supplied from private revenue. It was a great praise to have consulted for public chastity by losses of his own. But by how much greater was the shame of having accepted the tax of procurers from a most holy man? Let us not marvel at our own times: the men are new, the vices old. Gold is given to the empire so that there may be no procurers; gold is accepted so that victims of public lusts may not be exposed for sale.

Would that kings constantly follow either the sanctity of married life or celibate purity. There are many examples among Christians: Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, concerning whom Dubravius writes; Casimir, son of Casimir III, king of Poland; Emeric, son of Stephen V, king of the Hungarians; Edward, king of England; Henry I, head of our commonwealth. Wonder comes upon one at so many royal virgins of such admirable holiness; from them there is an easy conjecture concerning the others. I shall report the catalogue from Book XXII, Chapter II, On the Signs of the Church, by Bozio, whose words are these:

"Perpetual virginity of mind and body, dedicated to God, is a divine gift; but it is by far the most divine if there is joined to it, in addition, not some middling but a most excellent preeminence of the remaining virtues. The North produced very many such women, from which region it followed the Roman pontiff. Of this kind were Milburga, Mildreda, and Miluida, daughters of Merualdus, concerning whom Polydore writes in Book IV. There was Fara, abbess of the monastery of Hibrigensis, who flourished in the year 640; Francongota in 660; Edilberga, daughter of Anna, king of the East Angles; Itta, together with her daughter Gertrude, foundress of the monastery of Nivelles, in 650; Edilburga, abbess of the monastery of Beretingensis; Edeldrudis, daughter of Ana, king of the Angles, in 680; Hilda, daughter of the nephew of Edwin, king of the Angles, in 630; Irmina, daughter of King Dagobert, foundress of the monastery which is called Horreum, or commonly Oeren, at Trier, in the year 710; Modesta of Trier in 680; Severa, abbess of Saint Symphorian at Trier; Athela, daughter of King Dagobert and abbess of a certain monastery at Trier; Thecla the Englishwoman, abbess of the monastery which her brother Boniface, archbishop of Mainz, built in Germany near the Main at Eizingen; Lioba the Englishwoman, who presided over the monastery which the same prelate founded at Bischofsheim in the year 730; Amalberga, whom King Charles frequently and ardently sought as a wife, in 772; Anastasia and Basilissa, abbesses of Horreum at Trier in 760 and 780; Mathilda, sister of Emperor Henry I and Bruno, archbishop of Cologne, abbess of Saint Servatius in Saxony, in 990; Wiborada, a nun of Saint Gall, in 920; Walburga the Englishwoman, abbess at Heidenheim in Eichstätt and sister of Saint Willibald, in 750; Benedicta, abbess in the convent of Suvestris; Notburgis, nun of the Capitol at Cologne; Hadeloga, abbess of the monastery of Rinchingensis; Landrada of Liège; Waldrudis of Mons; Gladesindis of Metz; Lutrudis of Corvey; Cecilia, abbess in Suvestris; the empress Richardis, who, after the death of Charles the Fat, her husband, devoted herself to Christ and presided over sacred virgins; Jutta, sister of Count Meginhard of Sponheim, in 1136; Hildegard, admirable disciple of Jutta, in 1160; Elisabeth, abbess in the monastery of Schönau, in 1165.

"Adelaide, abbess of Vilich in the time of Heribert, archbishop of Cologne; Surius reports her life, Volume VII, February 5.

"Brigid the Scot, in the year 518 or 522; Surius, Volume I, February 1.

"Catherine the Swede, daughter of Saint Bridget, in the year 1381; Surius, Volume II, March 22.

"Elisabeth, daughter of the king of Hungary; Volume VI, November 19. Ermelende, virgin; Volume V, October 29. Hedwig, duchess of Poland; Volume V, October 15. Hunegundis; Volume IV, August 25. Landrada; Volume IV, July 8. Margaret, daughter of the king of Hungary; January 28, Volume I. Margaret, queen of Scotland; Volume III, June 10. Mary of Oignies; Volume III, June 23. Maxellendis, virgin and martyr; Volume IV, July 30. Monegundis; Volume IV, July 2. Noilburgis; Volume V, October 31. Liduvina; Volume II, April 14. Ludmilla, duchess of Bohemia and martyr; Volume VII, September 16. Lutgardis; Volume III, June 16. Lutrudis; Volume V, September 22. Opportuna, virgin; Volume II, April 22. Ositha, virgin and martyr; Volume V, October 7. Richardis Martianensis; Volume III, May 12. Walburga; Volume III, May. Bridget the Swede."

The East and Greece formerly possessed some such women; but now whom can they name? Whom could Africa produce as her own? Whom Muscovy?

Virgins excelling at once in sanctity, learning, and published writings: those virgins or women who brought to light, in published writings, most illustrious monuments of a manly and not effeminate genius were at once admirable and most highly praised in every memory of mortals. But those women, for the most part--if assemblies alien from us produced any--were given over to lust or some vice. For that poet did not sing foolishly in the third Satire that a woman did not please him > who, with speech whirled around, twists

> a clipped enthymeme.

But Germany and the North brought to light not only certain learned women, but also most incorrupt guardians of inviolate virginity, and, beyond this, women most preeminent in divine virtues and most illustrious in sanctity. For such were those five whom we mentioned in Sign 37, On the Spirit of Prayers, Book IX, Chapter XII: Hrotsvitha, Elisabeth, Hildegard, Gertrude, Mechthild, and Bridget the Swede, although the last was a widow.

Therefore it is especially to be wondered at that, after so many thousands of years have now elapsed, not even one woman similar to these virgins can be produced from the whole North before the northern peoples obeyed the pontiff. Indeed, from the whole world not even one virgin can be named of whom there exist books of such great piety and learning for every method of rightly ordering life and forming morals as exist from these virgins. Was it not, therefore, an excellent thing to have obeyed the popes? Is anything similar found among any heretics who have ever existed? Let all Greece, mistress and parent of the best disciplines, be summoned, and let her bring forth, if indeed she can, a woman of her own whose writings of such great piety exist, sealed by most illustrious and divine examples of morals and an innocent life. Will Germany, Saxony, Scotland, and Sweden therefore surpass the nurse and mother of the good arts? Certainly so. Go now, and call the northern peoples barbarians. Are those barbarians among whom there are such virgins and women? Call them barbarians as much as you wish: those barbarians will surpass the wisest of all mortals. Of so great importance, plainly, is obedience to the Roman pontiff.

When the Christian commonwealth has considered these things, let it exhort itself with Saint Augustine's argument: "Will you not be able to do what these men and these women did?" But I am pleased to transcribe the whole passage from Confessions VIII, Chapter XIII: "There appeared from that direction toward which I had turned my face and into which I trembled to pass the chaste dignity of continence, serene and not dissolute in her cheerfulness, honorably enticing me to come and not to doubt, and extending toward me, to receive and embrace me, pious hands filled with flocks of good examples. There were so many boys and girls, there much youth and every age, and grave widows and aged virgins; and in them all continence herself was by no means barren. And she laughed at me with an exhortatory ridicule, as if she said, 'Will you not be able to do what these men and these women did? Or indeed are these men and these women able in themselves, and not in the Lord their God? The Lord their God gave me to them. Why do you stand in yourself, and do not stand? Cast yourself upon him; do not fear. He will not withdraw himself so that you fall. Cast yourself securely; he will receive you and save you.'"

And if not everyone can do what these men and these women did, because the struggle of perpetual virginity is great, its glory distinguished, and the prerogative of its crown exceptional, will they not at least be able to confine and moderate their desires by the laws of sacred marriage?

I shall close with the judgment of Saint Jerome in Book III Against Jovinian: it is the voice of a most learned man that chastity must above all be retained, since when it has been lost every virtue collapses. In this lies the sovereignty of womanly virtues. It commends a poor woman, exalts a rich one, redeems one who is deformed, adorns one who is beautiful. It deserves well of ancestors, whose blood it does not corrupt by a furtive offspring; well of children, who need neither blush concerning their mother nor doubt concerning their father; well, above all, of herself, whom it vindicates from the dishonor of an alien body. There is no greater calamity of captivity than to be dragged to another's lust. Act bravely, O prince; act through laws. Christians can live chastely, so many thousands of whom have met death for chastity.

Let chastity be preserved with great zeal, lest there be not a city but a conflux of bastards and degenerates.

CHAPTER XIII

Spectacles Harm Good and Chaste Morals, and Therefore Must Be Abolished, or Only Those Which Excite to Virtue Retained

§ 1. Tertullian divides spectacles into four kinds: the madness of the circus, the unchastity of the theater, the atrocity of the arena, and the vanity of the xystus. The Greeks celebrated the Nemean, Pythian, Isthmian, and Olympic games; they contended in racing, singing, wrestling, boxing, and the speed of horses. Various games were combined with these principal ones. Today some of these remain; of certain others only traces survive.

Tertullian deservedly calls the circus a madness on account of the expense and the frenzy of those favoring different colors, and the tumults arising from it. I shall treat the atrocity of the arena and the vanity of the xystus when the discussion has reached fortitude. Now it is necessary to discuss the unchastity of theaters, which is opposed to temperance. Chastity was attacked in all the contests, not in the theater alone. For Tertullian says in On Spectacles, Chapter XXI: “Thus it happens that the man who scarcely lifts his tunic in public from necessity of the bladder exults in the circus only by casting all shame in the face of everyone.” In the xystus also they exhibited the unchaste wrestling contests of prostitutes and effeminate men; in the arena they cast naked human beings before beasts; and, lest any evil be lacking, the one cause of everything was the flame of impiety and impurity. Nor was chastity to be sought in cruelty, because every luxurious man is cruel and all cruelty is luxurious. For those to whom the torments and deaths of innocent persons are a delight, and who bend over bodies squalid with their own blood with the most patient eyes--it is not marvelous that they are enslaved to other pleasures.

Gladiatorial spectacles were abolished early by Christian emperors. Circensian, theatrical, and xystic spectacles remained longer. Arcadius and Honorius abolished the foul games of Maiuma: the final law, π., On Maiuma, in the Theodosian Code. Chariot races and the running of horses could otherwise be tolerated by their own nature. But the contests of factions stirred up tumults. Nevertheless the bishops opposed themselves to them all. See Arnobius, Book II, On the Amphitheater; and, before everyone, Tertullian, On Spectacles, and the booklet on the same matter attributed to Saint Cyprian; Lactantius, Book VI, Chapter XX; Augustine; Jerome; and others in various books. Constantine abolished the gladiatorial games--Eusebius, Book IV of his life, Chapter XXVIII, and Sozomen, Book I of his History--but they revived. Attend to the things said in Book II of the Code, On Gladiators. Indeed, when Augustine treats of Alypius, he recalls the combat and the conspicuous wound.

As the authority of the bishops increased, theaters and stages were abolished on Sundays and on the feasts of the Nativity, Epiphany, Easter, and Pentecost. Thus the law Dominico, On Spectacles, in the Theodosian Code. See also Canon 66 of the synod celebrated in Trullo.

§ 2. The wise men of old will indicate to us how great a stain and plague spectacles brought upon morals. “Nothing,” says Seneca, “is so harmful to good morals as to sit idly at some spectacle.” Saint Cyprian sets forth the causes in the first epistle To Donatus: “Turn your gaze from here to the no less lamentable contagions of another spectacle. In the theaters too you will behold what is both a grief and a shame to you. The tragic buskin is a verse recital of ancient crimes: the ancient horror concerning parricides and incests is repeated by an action expressed after the likeness of truth, lest that which was once committed grow obsolete as the ages pass. Every age is admonished by hearing that what has been done can be done. Crimes never die through the old age of time; offense is never buried by the times; wickedness is never interred by oblivion. Those things become examples which had ceased to be crimes.

"Then it delights a man, in mimes, through instruction in shameful deeds, either to recognize what he has done at home or to hear what he can do. Adultery is learned while it is seen; and with the evil of public authority acting as procurer for vices, the matron who had perhaps proceeded chaste to the spectacle returns unchaste from the spectacle. Beyond this, how great a stain upon morals, what kindling of disgraceful deeds, what nourishment of vices, to be polluted by actors' gestures! To see, contrary to the covenant and law of birth, an elaborate performance of men enduring incestuous obscenity! Men are unmanned; every honor and vigor of their sex is softened by the dishonor of an enervated body. The more anyone has broken a man into a woman, the more he gives pleasure there. He grows in praise from his crime, and the fouler he is, the more skillful he is judged. He is watched--O abomination!--and watched willingly.

"What could one who is such not persuade men to do? He moves the senses, soothes the affections, and storms the stronger conscience of a good breast. Nor is the authority of an enticing disgrace absent, so that destruction may creep upon human beings through the softer hearing. They represent an unchaste Venus, an adulterous Mars, and that Jupiter of theirs, a prince no more in kingship than in vices, burning toward earthly loves with his very thunderbolts--now growing white in the feathers of a swan, now flowing down in a golden shower, now springing onto the stage toward the puberty of boys, carried off with birds as his servants. Ask now whether one who watches can be uncorrupted or chaste. They imitate the gods whom they venerate; for the wretched, offenses become religious acts.

"O, if only, stationed in that lofty watchtower, you could introduce your eyes into secret places, unclose the covered doors of bedchambers, and open hidden inner rooms to the consciousness of the eyes. You would see things done by the unchaste which a chaste brow could not even behold. You would see what it is itself a crime to see. You would see what men maddened by the fury of vices deny that they have done and hasten to do. Men rush upon men with insane lusts. Things are done which cannot please even the very men who do them. I lie if one who is such does not rebuke others; a shameful man defames shameful men and believes that he has escaped the one who knows, as though it were not sufficient that he cannot escape his own conscience. The same men are accusers in public and defendants in secret, at once censors of and guilty before themselves. They condemn outside what they perform within; they willingly admit what, when they have admitted it, they accuse--an audacity agreeing altogether with vices, and a shamelessness corresponding to the unchaste. I do not wish you to marvel at what men of this kind speak with that polluted mouth: whatever sin is now committed by the voice is less."

He exaggerates nothing. He keeps silent about those things which modesty prohibited him from saying. Heliogabalus ordered to be exhibited in reality the things which the mimes imitated. No one can be excused on the ground that the Athenians did those things long ago. Aristophanes, the most wicked of all, reproaches the wickedness of the whole city because by a public decree they removed from his place an aged poet who abstained from obscene taunts. Believe steadfastly that minds so fit for prostitutes deserved whatever evils they afterward suffered.

§ 3. "The theater," says Tertullian in Chapter X of On Spectacles, "is properly the shrine of Venus. In this manner, finally, that kind of work arose in the world. For the censors often destroyed theaters just when they were springing up again, consulting for morals, whose immense danger from wantonness they plainly foresaw. Thus already from this point the heathens' own judgment, which makes with us, may yield as testimony against them, and the prerogative even of human discipline may serve us for an amplification of the charge. And so Pompey the Great, lesser only than his own theater, when he had built that citadel of every shameful deed, sometimes fearing a censorial censure of his memory, placed a temple of Venus above it. Summoning the people to its dedication by edict, he called it not a theater but a temple of Venus, 'beneath which,' he said, 'we have placed the tiers of spectacles.' Thus he covered a condemned and condemnable work with the title of a temple and mocked discipline by superstition.

"But Venus and Liber agree with one another. Those two demons of drunkenness and lust have conspired and sworn together among themselves. Therefore the theater of Venus is also the house of Liber. For they also called other theatrical games Liberalia in their proper designation, not only because they were devoted to Liber--as the Dionysia are among the Greeks--but also because they were instituted by Liber. And plainly the patronage of Liber and Venus exists even in the theatrical arts, in those things which are private and proper to the stage, concerning gesture and looseness of body. For, dissolute, they sacrifice softness to Venus and Liber--to the one through sex, to the other through looseness."

And in Chapter XVII: "In like manner, we are ordered to remove all unchastity. Therefore in this way we are also separated from the theater, which is the private consistory of unchastity, where nothing is approved except what is disapproved elsewhere. Thus the whole of its favor is in the greatest degree fashioned from filthiness, which the Atellan gesticulator and which the mime also represent through women, banishing the shame of their sex so that they blush more easily at home than on the stage; which, finally, the pantomime suffers in his body from boyhood so that he can be an artist. Even the prostitutes themselves, victims of public lust, are brought forward on the stage, more wretched in the presence of women, from whom alone they were hidden; and they are paraded before the faces of every age and every dignity. Their place, their fee, and their encomium are proclaimed, even to those who have no need of it. I keep silent about the rest, which ought to lie hidden in darkness and in its own caves, lest it contaminate the day. Let the Senate blush; let all the orders blush. Those very destroyers of their own shame, growing afraid to bring their gestures into the light and before the people, blush once a year. But if unchastity must be execrated by us, why should it be lawful to hear what it is not lawful to speak? Since we also know that scurrilities and every idle word are judged by God, why should it equally be lawful to hear things which it is a crime to do? Why should those things which, uttered by the mouth, defile a man not be thought to defile a man when admitted through eyes and ears, since ears and eyes are attendants of the spirit, and he whose attendants are polluted cannot be presented as clean?" Therefore the prohibition of unchastity also contains the prohibition of the theater. Cyprian agrees in his book On Spectacles; Lactantius, Book VI, Chapter XX; Augustine, Book XX of The City of God, Chapters IV, V, VI, VII, VIII, X, and XIII.

You will perhaps say that lascivious comedies are prohibited, not grave ones, not tragedies. But tragedy too represents ancient crimes, so that it may be established that what has been done can be done; and tragedies should be exhibited only with great discrimination. This, therefore, is the sum, and the rule which must be observed in these games.

§ 4. First, neither the commonwealth nor the prince is permitted to introduce such spectacles; neither can permit them. An actor is infamous and is not admitted to the communion of the Church. There is an example in Saint Cyprian, Epistle 61: "Because of your affection and our mutual modesty you judged that I should be consulted, most illustrious brother, concerning what I think of a certain actor who, established among you, still perseveres in the dishonor of that same art of his; and, as a master and teacher not of boys who are to be educated but of boys who are to be destroyed, also instills into others what he learned wickedly--whether such a man ought to communicate with you.

"I think it agrees neither with the divine Majesty nor with evangelical discipline that the modesty and honor of the Church should be defiled by so shameful and infamous a contagion. For since men are prohibited in the Law from putting on a woman's garment and those of this kind are judged accursed, how much greater a crime is it not only to receive women's clothing, but also to represent shameful, soft, and womanly gestures through instruction in an unchaste art? Nor should anyone excuse himself if he himself has ceased from the theater while he nevertheless teaches this to others. For he cannot be seen to have ceased who appoints substitutes and supplies many successors in place of himself alone--educating and teaching, contrary to God's institution, how a male may be broken into a woman and sex altered by art, and how the Devil, who stains the divine creation, may be pleased through the offenses of a corrupted and enervated body.

"But if such a man pleads his want and the necessity of poverty, his necessity too can be assisted among the others who are sustained by the Church's provisions, provided that he is content with more frugal but innocent food. Nor let him think that he must be bought off with a salary so that he ceases from sins, since he renders this not to you but to himself. For the rest, let him seek as much as he wishes from that source."

§ 5. By the example of the Roman Empire, they say that they are able to permit--indeed, to seek--pleasures for the people. But among the Romans there was at first a moderation of stage players; then stages and theaters were often abolished and actors driven into exile. For they were becoming accustomed to idleness and vices, since, as Varro reproaches them in Book II of On Agriculture, "They preferred to move their hands in the theater and circus rather than among crops and vineyards." They learned by experience that virtue could not stand in the kingdom of pleasure, and that innocence could not remain among so many incitements to vices. Therefore they often condemned these things, and most wickedly resumed what they had rightly renounced. The matter departed into such great madness that performers received the pay of generals and armies. At so great a price were purchased the kindling of disgraceful acts and the stain of morals. So great was the reward for violators of morals. Thus Tertullian speaks: "Theaters arose for violating morals. So many unclean spirits sit there as there are human beings whom the theater holds."

§ 6. So great, so pernicious an evil can be abolished by the prince with one word, with one sheet of paper; and because he can oppose it so easily, if he does not do so, he himself cannot be saved. For what Christian will stir up a tumult? Then too, very many subjects, and indeed soldiers, are offended by these delights of princes and cities. Now the defenders of the fatherland in garrisons and camps are in want, while those who render service of no worth, pernicious service, live in gold and purple and insult those who pursue honorable things. But how can a commonwealth stand in which actors are equated with generals? We read with wonder of the wealth of Roscius and others, and from them we learn the madness of public vanity.

The Spartans did better in removing actors altogether than those who resolved to regulate them by laws. For although actors were sometimes compelled by the commands of princes to abstain in public, many seditious things were nevertheless attempted by them in public and many foul things within houses. Augustus was indeed just and severe toward Stephanio and lenient toward Pylades, but at last steadfastly brave; yet in the rest of his life he was indulgent and a corrupter of morals, for he himself lived most shamefully, and his wife and daughters were a public disgrace. Therefore stage players and performers must altogether be removed from our midst--much more foreign ones, such as Britons and others who wander everywhere through Germany; for they are infamous on account of their theatrical art and introduce great corruptions.

I would not, however, abolish every apparatus of the theater and every study of comedies; but I would readily concede it when bound by definite laws.

§ 7. First, let it excite to virtue both those who declaim and those who see and hear either a fable or a true history. We possess one play of Plautus more modest than the others, the Captivi:

> Certainly, he says, it will be expedient to give attention to this play.
>
> Its subject has not been handled before, nor is it like the others;
>
> Nor are there filthy and unmentionable verses in it.
>
> Here there is neither a perjured procurer nor an evil prostitute,
>
> Nor a vainglorious soldier.

Therefore let the plays be holy and implant virtue. Let them teach civil prudence. Let nothing be spoken in a theater of Christians which could not also be spoken in a church. For your hearer is a temple of the Holy Spirit, to whom it is impious to commend trifles, much less obscenities. For the chief of all political writers and instructor of a great king rightly says in Book VII, Chapter XVII:

> Οἷον, αἰσχρολογίαν ἐκ τῆς πόλεως, ὥσπερ ἄλλο τι τῶν φαύλων, ἐξορίζειν.

Foul speech, like other evils, must be utterly banished from the city.

Second, let there be such moderation of gestures as not only pleases, by its gravity, men who are civilly and elegantly mannered, but which the actor can retain through the whole remainder of his life, so that the stage may contribute to living courteously and agreeably in human society, and so that even the roughness and sluggishness of rustic young men may be formed.

Third, when the affections of vicious men--for example, of the proud, avaricious, and angry--are represented by voice and gesture, let the character of the verse and action be such that hatred and detestation of the vices is produced. And let the cause of evil never be acted so skillfully that the cause of good appears to have fallen. Thus there will not occur what sometimes happens: that actors carry into private conversation the gait, expression, and tossings of the arms which they displayed properly in theaters; and those who seemed to simulate pride in the theater exhibit it as reality in life.

Fourth, let them never represent the affection of a lover by words or gestures--not even for the purpose of showing the disastrous end of unchastity. Therefore the actor will not bring forward Hemor, son of Sichem, wounded by love, in order that, through the destruction of all the citizens and the sexual outrage avenged, he may strike greater fear. Nor will he present Delilah's flatteries in order that Samson's fates may be sung. There is a great difference among these matters. To think and speak about pride, avarice, or drunkenness, and to simulate its affections, does not lead the mind away from virtue. But the disease of lust is contagious; it is transmitted by the slightest breeze. This vice, too, when rebuked somewhat inconsiderately or immodestly, often rages more vehemently. Men behold the angry and the drunken without anger or drunkenness of their own, and by the very sight have learned to condemn those vices. Improvident minds do not safely hear the lusts of others, except incidentally and in passing. If you dwell upon representing loves, the mind is infected with vice before it hears the catastrophe to the end.

Fifth, I do not condemn charms and witticisms, provided they are pointed, honorable, and pertain to contempt for vices. For nothing can be said wittily except against a vice. If you jest against an innocent person, it is an insult. In the very jest, let something of a good disposition shine forth; let foulness never insinuate itself. Nazianzen says excellently:

> Εἰπεῖν, ἀκοῦσαι, ἢ δρᾶσαι, μικρὸν μέσον.

Speaking, hearing, and doing stand at a short interval. Therefore let the jest be noble, not malevolent, not foul, because one ought not even to hear such a jest.

What Antonius of Siena relates in the history of the Dominican Fathers is marvelous. A young man had disclosed his love to Lucia, a chaste and holy virgin, and among his flatteries had written that he was wounded and captivated by the beauty of her eyes. But she, unaccustomed to a procurer's flattery and at the same time concerned for the lover's salvation, sent her eyes, torn out, to the young man, with an inscription added: that he now possessed the very cheap thing which she had valued less than her God. How chaste was that spirit, which tore out eyes violated by an impure letter because they had pleased her lover! How would that virgin have detested theatrical obscenities when she avenged a letter in this manner?

Sixth, let no woman enter the stage, nor any man in a woman's costume. Let even the clothing of that sex, whom modesty and laws confine at home, be absent from the theater. I have never approved a young man, in feminine dress, simulating a woman--even one holy, modest, and chaste--or having his hair arranged and being adorned by women, so that he may be seen in public as though a woman. I rejoiced that this judgment of mine was approved by our Society; for it prohibited our pupils from coming forth upon the stage in women's clothing in the future. And in general I dislike the cause of chastity being pleaded in the theater. Chastity is modest and tender, safer by fleeing and hiding; it does not desire to appear in public even for its own praise. Let faith, fortitude, prudence, and sobriety have their parts. Let chastity enjoy its own conscience alone at home. If it is praised in public, let this be done sparingly and modestly.

Seventh, let no one proceed onto the stage for the sake of gain--no one who does not sustain his life by another art or support himself and his family from domestic resources. Therefore I have already utterly proscribed from my commonwealth stage players and mountebanks who prepare a living by jesting, speaking obscenely, and deceiving; whose praise grows from crime; and who are considered more skillful the fouler they are. Men of this kind are generally most wicked. For since they are oppressed by poverty, they labor to gather crowds and please the people; hence they say and do those things by which every most foolish man is delighted. Hence they do not care what they say, provided they extort money. Therefore it was badly provided for the commonwealth when that dregs was supported at public expense, and laughter and instruction in foulness were purchased with so great a concern. Roscius received a daily wage of one thousand denarii, as Macrobius testifies in Book III of the Saturnalia. But surely, is it lawful, contrary to right, that those things which the provinces contributed be spent on the amusements of the worst men? It also disturbs the peace of the commonwealth.

Eighth, just as obscene license ought not wander about the prince's table, but instead a benign invitation, nobility of jest, and love of studies, so let sacred, honorable, political, and learned comedy--an indication of a liberal disposition and a pledge of future hope--delight the eyes of the Christian people with grave courtesy and easy dignity. And let it be brought about that every most honorable and most noble person comes to practice in this matter. Rule 13 of the prescribed plan of studies for the rectors of the Society has encompassed all these things in brief words:

“13. The subject of tragedies and comedies--which ought to be only in Latin and very rare--shall be sacred and pious. Nothing shall be inserted between the acts which is not Latin and decorous; nor shall any female character or clothing be introduced.

“14. But let him take great care to prevent the pupils, while preparing themselves for things of this kind, from suffering a loss of morals or studies.”

CHAPTER XIV

Sobriety Is the Firmament of the Commonwealth

§ 1. Many things have been said by the wise, and many by the temperate, in favor of sobriety against intemperance. But drunkenness, though rebuked in gatherings and even at banquets, rules; and it is much easier to praise virtue than to follow it. Therefore I shall speak about temperance to those who seek dishes and wine. I shall also speak to the Germans, that is, to my own fatherland. Although this vice reigns most widely among them, one must nevertheless not despair of a remedy, since many princes and magnates have brought their courts back to moderation and continence.

They say that certain men asked Charles V to prohibit revels and drinking bouts, but that he replied with a laugh that this would be just as if he prohibited thefts among the Spaniards. One must not judge that the emperor spoke in this way out of despair of reformation, but in order to remind men who sharply censured the vices of another nation of their domestic evils. And so I too shall admonish them concerning these things; for the time will come when so great an evil will either be removed by the diligence of princes or oppressed by barbarian servitude.

Germany has always acknowledged this evil as its own, and therefore has carried very many laws against it, even in public diets and assemblies. I shall review the more recent ones.

In the year 1500, at the Diet of Augsburg under Emperor Maximilian, the following was decreed concerning compulsory drinking: “And although, by the consent of the electors, princes, and other estates, it was established and enacted at the last diet concerning compulsory drinking and drinking bouts that the magistrates of all provinces and places where that custom of drinking was not so ancient should apply themselves to the matter, so that it might be abolished, prevented, and gravely punished, we have nevertheless understood that this constitution of ours and of the Empire has thus far been little observed, but that the said abuse and intemperance is growing stronger and increasing everywhere in all the provinces from day to day. Therefore, since it is so much more necessary that this evil be met with greater care and vehemence than has formerly been done, we prescribe and command each and every elector, prince, and other estate, of whatever dignity, condition, or province they may be, unless they wish to incur the righteous indignation of Our Majesty and fall from favor, that they severely prohibit drinking bouts of this kind everywhere in their electorates, principalities, provinces, dominions, and territories, punish them with a grave penalty, and execute this command with every zeal.”

§ 2. But in the year 1512, at Cologne, an even graver penalty was decreed.

§ 3. “Likewise, although drinking bouts have very gravely been prohibited rather often at previous diets, this has nevertheless thus far been little observed and put into execution--indeed, it has been neglected by those who ought to have maintained and enforced the command--and because, above all, from this imitation in drinking a larger draught of wine arises drunkenness, and from drunkenness frequent blasphemies, homicides, and innumerable other evils, so that those drinkers cast themselves into a present danger to honor, reputation, the salvation of the soul, reason, life, and fortunes, let each of the magistrates of all the provinces, highest and lowest, ecclesiastical and secular, reform that vice first in themselves and then in their subjects, and prohibit everyone from that lust for drinking under the gravest penalties.

“And if any of the nobility are unwilling to restrain themselves from it, let us, the electors also, the princes both ecclesiastical and secular, and every magistrate avoid them, dismiss them from courts, and remove them from offices and duties; and let none either of the princes or of the other lords admit those dismissed for this cause into his service. But let men of lower condition and lot be subjected to corporal penalties for the same fault. But if any magistrate has been negligent toward his subjects in watching over, enforcing, and executing this command of ours, then let the fiscal officer of Our Imperial Majesty summon those subjects who have transgressed before our Imperial Chamber, so that the deserved penalties may be exacted from them. But wherever that depraved custom of drinking, handed down from ancestors, has already taken root, let the magistrates give diligent effort to its abolition."

O happy fatherland, if those amphorae and Maximins are exterminated from courts, churches, and cities, and punished.

In the year 1548, at Augsburg, the following was decreed by Charles V with the consent of the Empire:

"Since, as daily experience teaches, God is most gravely offended by drunkenness--for various vices, evils, and injuries spring from it--and at previous diets it was established concerning drinking bouts and contests of cups and wine that, in order to remove and abolish drinking bouts, the magistrate should punish severely those guilty of that crime; nevertheless constitutions of this kind have thus far been little observed and put into execution. Rather, that depraved custom of drinking has grown and spread more broadly everywhere from day to day, having driven deeper roots. From it have followed blasphemies, robberies, homicides, adulteries, and gravest offenses of that kind.

"It is added that, through drunkenness, secrets which deservedly ought to be concealed are repeatedly revealed. These vices render the Germans--whose valor was known long ago and greatly praised--exceedingly contemptible among foreign nations. It has likewise often happened in war that, on this occasion, grave dissensions, seditions, and rebellions have arisen among the soldiers themselves, and disobedience toward commanders and military magistrates has sprung up. From this the dearness of provisions is also increased; honorable banquets and social gatherings, for which the Germans were formerly especially commended, are abolished, diminished, and avoided. This is to say nothing of the fact that the vice of drinking is the fountain of every evil and exceedingly pernicious to the eternal salvation, honor, favor, reason, longer life, and bodily strength of human beings.

"Therefore, having considered these things, we command each and every elector and prince, both ecclesiastical and secular, and the other estates of whatever dignity, condition, or province they may be, that they themselves abstain altogether from drinking bouts, both so that they may shine before their subjects by example and so that they may have so much greater power to exact due penalties from transgressors. In their courts let them command courtiers, and in princely dominions, provinces, territories, and domains their subjects, under grave penalty, to abstain from every drinking bout, by whatever manner, words, or form it is instituted or may be devised for institution; and let them diligently enforce this command. Especially, let them also command heads of households diligently to admonish their whole household--children, male servants, and maidservants--to abstain altogether from oaths, blasphemies against God, his most holy mother, and the other saints, and from drinking, as we too prescribe severely here and will to have diligently observed.

"We also will that magistrates give this business to their parish priests and preachers, so that on every Sunday they may set it before the people and command them to abstain from drinking, enumerating for this purpose the vices which are generated from it. For this it will be necessary that a catalogue of them be furnished to the priests by the magistrates."

In the year 1570, at Speyer, Maximilian established the following concerning the military order, §48:

"Since, to our sorrow, the matter has come to such a point that among the Germans, especially those in military service, the detestable and bestial custom of drinking is the principal exercise--from which grave disgrace, dishonor, infamy, danger, and contempt threaten the whole nation, and above all because victories are consequently rarer and the outcomes of war often more unfortunate--let it be severely commanded to the master of cavalry, military magistrates, as also to lords, nobles, and knights, by force of this military constitution, that they restrain themselves from continual and perpetual drunkenness, but especially that they do not permit it to their attendants and servants." And §49 admonishes thus:

“But if any one or more military magistrates, having been accused, shall have been discovered to be so given to the bestial and detestable vice of gorging himself that he by no means performs his duty according to necessity, let him be removed from office by the military prefect or his commander, and let it be entrusted to men more sober. Nor is it lawful for anyone, whoever he may be, to oppose himself, aid that man, or defend him, by force of the present constitution and the obedience owed to it.” And §50:

“Likewise, by the military prefect, the commanders, and the equestrian court, in all offenses which were committed in drunkenness by lords, nobles, or soldiers, of whatever condition or lot they may be, and which come to be punished, let drunkenness in no way be accepted or admitted as an excuse or a mitigation of penalties. Indeed, let offenses of this kind be fined and punished the more severely and gravely, even with twice as much.” And §51:

“He who, through drunkenness, has neglected a hostile danger, being stupefied by sleep or in some other manner, shall pay for the negligence with his head.” And §52:

“Each and every soldier, foot soldier, and other man occupied in the service of the cavalry who shall have been discovered to have drunk in the manner of beasts and to be so drunk that he is without power over himself and his reason shall be led directly to prison and bound with iron, nor shall he be released without the will of the commanders or master of cavalry. In addition, it shall be lawful and right to punish such men according to the gravity and confession of the offense, and to summon and drag before the equestrian court those who have opposed themselves to this proceeding.” Finally, §78:

“Therefore, anyone who has been discovered in the watches after drinking, or drunk, so that according to the necessity of the matter he cannot keep watch and give the true and proper password, shall be punished according to the judgment and sentence of the military prefect, the commanders, or the equestrian court.”

I therefore bring these laws forward at the beginning so that I may meet the objection of those who judge that one must despair of Germany and deny that sobriety can be restored. Emperors and princes have good hope; I add that they are also able to apply a remedy, if they will.

§ 4. The Africans, according to Augustine's testimony, were prone to drunkenness, but in his church there was nevertheless so great a care for sobriety that Augustine deservedly says in Sermon 231 On Time: “Although, with Christ's favor, dearest brothers, I believe that you dread the evil of drunkenness as a pit of hell, and that not only do you yourselves not wish to drink beyond measure, but do not adjure or compel others to take more than is fitting, nevertheless it cannot happen that there are not some negligent persons who are unwilling to be sober. You who always offer sober banquets, do not take it as an injury to us that it is necessary for us to rebuke certain drunkards.

“For since, dearest brothers, the evil of drunkenness is a grave vice and hateful to God, it has been admitted into custom by many throughout the whole world to such an extent that by those who are unwilling to know God's precepts it is now neither thought nor believed to be a sin. This goes so far that at their banquets they ridicule those who are able to drink less, and through inimical friendship are not ashamed to adjure men to take more drink than is fitting. For to the man who compels another to make himself drunk by drinking more than is necessary, it would be a lesser evil if he wounded the other's flesh with a sword than if he killed his soul through drunkenness.

“And because our bodies are earthly, just as, if rain is excessively heavy and prolonged, the earth is flooded and dissolved into mud, so that no cultivation can take place in it, so too our flesh, when it has been made drunk by more abundant drink, will be able neither to receive spiritual cultivation nor to bring forth the necessary fruits of the soul. And therefore, just as all men desire their fields to receive sufficient rain so that they may both be able to exercise cultivation and rejoice in an abundance of fruits, so too in the field of the body they ought to drink only as much as is fitting, lest through excessive drunkenness the earth of the body itself, as though turned into a marsh, be able to generate worms and serpents of vices rather than bring forth fruits of good works.

“For all drunkards are such as marshes appear to be. Your Charity is not ignorant of what is born in marshes: all that is born there is recognized as having no fruit. Serpents and bloodsuckers are born there; frogs and diverse kinds of worms are born there, which can generate horror rather than supply anything profitable for sustenance. Those plants or trees which are accustomed to be born either in the marshes themselves or around their banks appear to have no usefulness, to such a degree that every year they are consumed by fire. See: what is born from drunkenness is prepared for fire.”

Why do we either write books or preach in churches or debate in academies concerning these things? The belly has no ears; but the ears of drunkards also lack hearing, and their head lacks a brain. Nevertheless one must not yield to vices but go against them. Thus the wise men and prophets acted formerly. Nor must the anger of drunkards be feared, because very soon they will rot away.

They cry, “Be ashamed, and let there be shame upon you! Why are you unable to drink as much as we?” For they say that those men are not men. And see the misery of drunkards: those who lie in the sewer of drunkenness say that they are men, and they say that those who stand honorably and soberly are not men. They lie prostrate and are men; the others stand upright and are not men?

Therefore, since the drunk are outside their own power and, because they lack reason, are incapable of admonition, let us admonish the sober to restrain them.

§ 5. First, the law of the great king upon whom every kingdom depends was given to everyone. You see the foundations of the German laws in the decrees of God and the oracles of the Most High, and you see that Germany's princes and leading men are not ignorant of their own evils, but either love them or are too weak to remove them. But let us look upon the divine laws, and measure our commonwealth and morals by them.

Leviticus 10:8: “And the Lord said to Aaron: You and your sons shall not drink wine or anything capable of making drunk when you enter the tabernacle of the testimony, lest you die; because it is an everlasting command throughout your generations.” Let drunkenness not approach ceremonies destined to perish; to have tasted wine at all is held to be an offense requiring expiation. How shall Christians drink the cup of the Lord while still belching from drunkenness?

Proverbs 20:1: “Wine is a luxurious thing and drunkenness tumultuous; whoever delights in these will not be wise.” And 21:17: “He who loves feasts will be in poverty; he who loves wine and rich foods will not be enriched.” And 23:1: “When you sit to eat with a prince, attend diligently to the things which have been placed before your face, and set a knife at your throat, if nevertheless you have your soul in your power. Do not desire his foods, in which is the bread of falsehood.”

And 31:4: “Do not give wine to kings, O Lemuel, do not give wine to kings, because there is no secret where drunkenness reigns, lest perhaps they drink and forget judgments and alter the cause of the children of the poor.”

Ecclesiasticus 19:1: “A drunken workman will not become rich, and he who despises small things will fall little by little. Wine and women cause the wise to apostatize and will reprove the prudent.” And 31:12: “You have sat at a great table; do not open your jaws over it first.” And verse 17: “Do not be compressed at a banquet.” Chapter 37:32: “Do not be greedy at every feast.”

Isaiah 5:11: “Woe to you who rise in the morning to pursue drunkenness and to drink until evening, so that you may grow hot with wine. The cithara and lyre and timbrel and pipe and wine are in your banquets, and you do not look upon the work of the Lord or consider the works of his hands.” And verse 22: “Woe to you who are powerful at drinking wine and strong men at mixing drunkenness.” And 22:12: “And the Lord God of hosts shall call on that day to weeping and lamentation, to baldness and the girdle of sackcloth; and behold joy and gladness, killing calves and slaughtering rams, eating flesh and drinking wine: Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we shall die,” and so forth. And 28:7: “But these also did not know because of wine, and wandered because of drunkenness. Priest and prophet did not know because of drunkenness; they were swallowed by wine, wandered in drunkenness, did not know the seer, and were ignorant of judgment." And 56:12: "Come, let us take wine and be filled with drunkenness; and as it is today, so shall it be tomorrow and much more."

Ezekiel 16:49: "Behold, this was the iniquity of Sodom your sister: pride, fullness of bread, abundance, and the idleness of her and her daughters; and they did not extend a hand to the needy and poor."

Daniel 5:2: "Therefore, being now drunken, he commanded that the vessels of gold and silver which Nebuchadnezzar his father had carried away from the temple which was in Jerusalem be brought, so that the king, his nobles, his wives, and his concubines might drink from them."

Hosea 4:11: "Fornication and wine and drunkenness take away the heart."

Joel 1:5: "Awake, drunkards, and weep and howl, all you who drink wine in sweetness, because it has perished from your mouth."

Micah 2:11: "Would that I were not a man having the spirit, and that I spoke falsehood instead: I shall drip down wine and drunkenness for you, and this shall be the people upon whom it is dripped."

Romans 13:13: "As in the day, let us walk honorably, not in revels and drunkenness, not in beds and unchastities, not in contention and rivalry."

1 Corinthians 10:6: "But these things were done as a figure for us, so that we should not be desirous of evil things as they also desired." And 15:32: "If according to man I fought with beasts at Ephesus, what does it profit me if the dead do not rise? Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we shall die."

Galatians 5:19: "But the works of the flesh are manifest, which are fornication, uncleanness," and so forth; "drunkennesses and things similar to these, which I foretell to you, as I have foretold, that those who do such things shall not obtain the kingdom of God."

Ephesians 5:18: "And do not be drunk with wine, in which is luxury."

1 Thessalonians 5:6: "Let us keep watch and be sober; for those who sleep, sleep by night, and those who are drunk are drunk by night. But we who belong to the day, let us be sober." 1 Timothy 3:2: "Therefore a bishop ought to be irreproachable, the husband of one wife," and so forth; "not given to wine, not a striker," and so forth.

1 Peter 4:3: "For the past time is sufficient for accomplishing the will of the gentiles, for those who walked in luxuries, desires, drunkennesses, revels, drinking bouts, and unlawful worships of idols." Hebrews 12:16: "Lest there be any fornicator or profane person, like Esau, who for one meal sold his birthright."

§ 6. I have long remembered that my business is with those men who measure everything by their own advantages, not by the integrity of the commonwealth but by reason of state, as they themselves are accustomed to speak. And so I must also say this: a commonwealth in which drunkenness rules cannot stand for long. For drunkenness is both hostile to God and contrary to the order by which alone the commonwealth stands.

For what region was there which, although it embraced drunkenness, did not condemn it? What region did not perish through it unless it corrected it early? Lacedaemon, that harsh but brief guardian of virtues, ruled while sober and served while drunk. When Leotychidas was asked why they avoided drunkenness by a severe law, he replied, "Lest others deliberate for us." For a drunkard, like a ward, is in another's hand. Solon punished an offense of drunkenness with death. Pittacus visited one who offended while drunk with a double penalty. The laws of Germany in a certain manner imitate this, for they establish a graver penalty for the offenses of drunkards. In Spain, if anyone is a drunkard, he is deprived of the honor of giving testimony; in Italy he is held up to mockery and regarded as in a certain manner infamous. Therefore we possess the testimony of the Creator, the holy fathers, and human laws, together with the consensus of all nations. If anyone resists it, assuredly he must be cast out of every commonwealth as insane and as one contemplating madness.

§ 7. A commonwealth which takes no account of temperance, and which either passes over in silence or incites the drunkenness of its citizens, is cruel. It raises a people weak, diseased, useless for conducting affairs, contemptible to neighbors, and exposed to enemies. For the vinousness of fathers and grandfathers transmits into sons and grandsons arthritis, dropsy, coma, inflammation of the eyes, tremor, epilepsy, and apoplexy, and frequently together with them poverty and want. Sobriety is the cause of health; intemperance brings in a cohort of diseases. Golden are the words of Hippocrates:

> Ἄσκησις ὑγιείης, ἀκορίη τροφῆς, ἀοκνίη πόνων.

The exercise of health is slenderness of diet and unwearied endurance of labor. Socrates lived healthy for a very long time at Athens--that is, in the fatherland of luxury and diseases--because he lived soberly. Fortune sets out an ostentatious table; virtue a sparing one. Indeed, even great fortune sets out a sparing one, provided that it is not luxurious. Health requires a sparing table; fever and dropsy are never satiated. Nature is content with few things. As everyone admits, one lives well and healthfully on water. “You have the Nile, and you seek wine?” Pescennius Niger said to a soldier rioting from desire for delicacies.

The old age of Augustus flourished through abstinence and would have been longer if his wicked wife had not hastened it with a poisoned fig. He furnished a dinner of three courses, or most abundantly six, with no excessive expense but the greatest courtesy. Thus Suetonius testifies. What do you hear? Three or six courses on the table of Augustus, the lord of affairs, to whom the Parthians returned the standards and the Indians submitted their kingdoms? What satrap, what citizen furnishes a dinner to a friend in this manner? Constantius too was long-lived; the history of his life teaches the cause. At Caesar's banquet he forbade a pheasant, a sow's womb, and an udder to be demanded and brought in, content with the chance food of a munificent soldier.

But the cause why wine and excessive food bring diseases upon the body--so that they rightly call ἰόν, “poison,” τὴν κακίστην τροφήν, “the worst nourishment”--is easily explained by natural philosophers.

§ 8. Whatever is supplied to nature beyond its appetite and powers weighs it down, oppresses it, and weakens it to such a degree that it is turned into poison. It excites an immense struggle and is cast out with convulsion of the breast, nausea, shaking of the head, injury to memory, and the functions of the entrails turned to the contrary.

Wine taken copiously, especially wine that is sweet and spirituous, evaporates upward in great abundance, fills every passage and cavity of the brain, puts reason to sleep, and soon that cloud congeals through cold. With both the passages of breathing and the nerves which administer sensation oppressed, it sometimes threatens immediate death. Thus Alexander the Macedonian died; thus Andebundus, king of England, was carried out from a banquet. Alexander's drunkenness was always a spectacle; but the funeral rites of Calanus the Indian were set before the entire army as a terror. For a drinking contest was instituted. A talent was promised to the first man, thirty minae to the second, and ten to the third; but it was a bloody contest. Thirty-five men, seized on the very field by sudden cold, shivering, and syncope, breathed out their lives. Six who were carried back to the tents died shortly afterward. Promachus the Macedonian, who merited the talent, died within three days after receiving it. Thus Chares of Mytilene writes concerning Alexander.

But if death does not follow, nevertheless the falling sickness, which is customarily called Herculean, is at hand; for Alcides was subject to it, and not undeservedly, since he bore away the palm among drinkers. They relate that his cup could scarcely be carried by two men. Therefore they called immense mixing bowls Heraclean. All the senses, especially the eyes, are rendered duller; the voice is blunted by drunkenness; color dies away; the breath is corrupted. Ears, lungs, stomach, joints, and intestines have their own vices from a debauch; frenzy also frequently breaks out from it.

What is more miserable than Zeno, who, as a mockery to the peoples, was buried alive first in wine and then in earth? His mind was altogether alienated through drunkenness, with the plebs reproaching him:

"Zeno, rise up; have you drunk again?" When this happened frequently, Ariadne, through hatred of so many vices, ordered him, half alive, to be cast into an imperial tomb and it to be closed with an immense stone. When he returned to himself there and, with immense lamentation and bellowing, wailed, he was neglected through fear of Ariadne and compelled to die. Zonaras, Annal III.

Nor is the end of Michael dissimilar in the same Zonaras. While he was overwhelmed by undiluted wine and oppressed by the deepest sleep, his hands were then cut off so that he could not flee because of drunkenness; a soldier of Basil pierced him through, and by drawing out his entrails with a sword ended his drunkenness and life.

Aristotle briefly explains whence those things arise, Section III, Problem III. He says that drinkers are δυσρίγους, "prone to chills," and that they are most quickly seized by pain of the sides and other conditions of this kind. For wine brings much moisture and much cold and overcomes natural heat. But wine induces old age and tremor:

> Ὧν γὰρ θερμὸς ὁ οἶνος μετὰ τῆς φυσικῆς ὑπαρχούσης θερμότητος, μᾶλλον ἀναλίσκει τὰ ἐν σώματι ὑπάρχοντα ἐφόδια τῷ οἰκείῳ θερμῷ.

For since wine is hot, when joined to the body's natural heat it more effectively consumes the nourishment in the body belonging to its natural and innate moisture. Hence it happens that among these men some are oppressed inwardly by water, others by a flux, others by another discharge, and very many other disorders of the same belly exercise them. For both the remaining humors remain sharp and unfit, and those liquids which have come from without cannot be thickened because of the weakness of their proper heat. But the heat itself remains weak for this reason: because the matter by which it can still be maintained is weak. So it is with a fire which a reed produces, for because of the weakness of its material it is weaker than a fire furnished by wood.

But Aristotle plainly teaches in Problem XXIII that one's age is diminished by wine: "Why does one who was previously emaciated and then drank much undiluted wine fall down dead? And why are very many drinkers, although they have in no way emaciated themselves, nevertheless made dry by a large and universal draught of undiluted wine? For this must be investigated, since wine is hot by its own nature, and just as life plainly is maintained by heat, so death occurs by cooling. Is it the case that, as from hemlock, so one must die from undiluted wine, although one's own heat is thereby gradually extinguished, but by a different manner? For hemlock wastes natural heat by cold. And just as a small fire is extinguished by excessive fire or by the sun, so the body's inward heat is overcome and extinguished by the heat of wine, if it is excessive."

Or, if another similitude pleases: just as heated wine, when it is cooled, loses its natural heat and subtlety, because its fiery, airy, and more delicate parts vanish and the baser matter remains, so too the natural moisture, which philosophers call radical moisture, is dissipated and dissolved by excessive adventitious heat. From this tremor and cold of bodies grow strong. Hence drunkards rejoice in the sun.

This having therefore been established, a rightly ordered commonwealth and a political prince ought to remove drunkenness as poisons and hemlock are removed, and to punish offenders by laws. For it makes no difference whether by the cold of hemlock or by the heat of undiluted wine you exhaust the heat implanted in nature and induce a deadly cold. Drunkenness, I believe, kills more slowly but more cruelly, wrenching the unhappy soul away amid a great concurrence of diseases and symptoms. Indeed, Caelius Rhodiginus relates in Book XXVIII, Chapter XXXI, that certain men became mute from drunkenness and, suffering convulsion or spasm, immediately fell down; others, when fever supervened, sought a remedy from the lesser evil.

Thus, therefore, I maintain that the life of many nobles and rich men in Germany could be twice as long if they cultivated sobriety--indeed, healthier and more pleasant. I say of the rich, for drunkenness is more frequent among them, rarer among the poor, and less harmful to bodies hardened and dried by labor. For just as individual bouts of drunkenness diminish vital heat and the vegetative moisture of nature, so too they tear away a part of life and accelerate death. And so the unjust inviter drives men toward death while he serves delightful poisons; and when men "drink health," as they speak, they subtract years from themselves. You will find many old men nowhere except in the harsher places of Germany, where poverty and lack of wine have taught sobriety. Nor shall I deny that many leading and wealthy men, obedient to the laws of temperance, live moderately amid splendid fortune. But the paucity of these yields to the multitude of the others. From this another evil follows: very many men, their fathers removed by an immature death, are wards; both their estates are dissipated and, with greater harm, their education is neglected.

§ 9. Beginning again from higher principles, I undertake to explain how great a corruption there is in wine and how great a plague to life comes from it. Aristotle says in Book VII, Chapter XVII of the Politics:

> Φαίνεται δὴ διά τε τῶν ἄλλων ζώων ἐπισκοποῦσι, καὶ διὰ τῶν ἐθνῶν οἷς ἐπιμελές ἐστιν εἰσάγειν τὴν πολεμικὴν ἕξιν, ἡ τοῦ γάλακτος πλήθουσα τροφὴ ἀσινοτέρα δὲ, διὰ τὰ νοσήματα.

It is plain, if anyone considers other living creatures and the nations which take care to induce a bodily habit fit for war, that an abundant supply of milk is most suited to bodies, yet without wine because of diseases. Therefore Aristotle also prohibits dark wine to nurses, lest vinous and hot milk infect the tender limbs and humors of infants; for as the flavor of the fodder is, so too are the force and property in the milk.

I do not think that wine must be prohibited to women in Germany, although this was provided by laws at Rome and although Egnatius killed his wine-drinking wife with a club and was acquitted of the killing by Romulus. For the region is cold, and its wine is for the most part more diluted than Greek, Italian, and Spanish wine. And so that law of Romulus--"If she shall have drunk wine at home, let them punish her as an adulteress"--was abrogated even at Rome. Nor does that consequence of vices which the ancients connected always exist: that adulteries and poisonings follow the use of wine. For physicians frequently prescribe wine in Germany and the northern regions; and Guevara, a man prudent as well as severe, concedes a little wine to women in his very hot Spain for thickening milk, although it is so diluted that the rawness of the water is corrected rather than any flavor perceived by the tongue.

But let each person judge these matters as he wishes, provided that what I have resolved to conclude from them is introduced into morals, and everyone acknowledges how much harm to bodies exists in the abuse of wine. For if wine drunk by a mother or nurse, subdued by the stomach, tempered with other nourishment, thickened into blood, and then by the most perfect digestion converted into milk exercises such power upon nurslings that it kindles them with an alien heat and renders them epileptic, ecstatic, stupefied, stupid, and diseased, what must be judged if both parents and the grandparents received those vices by inheritance, increased them by intemperance, and transcribed them into their offspring?

§ 10. For the same cause the custom of many who frequently drip wine into infants is also foul--πῦρ ἐπὶ πῦρ ἐπάγοντες, as the Greeks say, adding fire to fire.

Plato prohibits wine from being given to children before their eighteenth year. The Suebi, formerly imitating Plato, according to Caesar in Book IV, did not even permit wine to be imported, lest they become soft. The Bohemians, by contrast, in the age of their great-grandfathers poured noble wines into infants so that they might learn to drain immense cups at court. Roman youths wearing the toga praetexta

abstained from wine. Avicenna altogether denies it to children, for it is just as if one adds fire to fire, and this in weak matter. He concedes it temperately to young men and as much as they can endure to old men. Children's bodies are porous, loose, and hot; therefore they are most easily inflamed by wine. Their nerves are weak and their brain infirm. Thus Galen too says in his Regimen of Health: "Wine is most hostile to children, because they are excessively inflamed by it and because their nerves and brain cannot resist its violence. It dries vehemently and overturns the state of the mind not only for the present but disturbs it for the whole of life."

If you bend violently strong wood or a bronze bow, it possesses powers by which it may spring back and restore itself to its straightness. If you bend wax, lead, and tender shoots, they easily follow the hand, but they cannot return whence they were drawn. Thus voluntary madness from drunkenness indeed disturbs robust bodies, hardened arteries, strengthened nerves, a compact and thickened brain, and its strong little membranes in men, and renders them weaker--for wood once bent is never restored altogether to its former integrity, and a bow long bent loses its strength. But if the ardor of Liber falls upon the tender entrails of children, it so dilates, twists, contracts, and dries them that by no art can they recover their natural constitution.

Memorable is the example of a boy of Pergamum who, when thirsty, drank somewhat undiluted wine. He remained awake for a long time; fever followed the wakefulness, frenzy followed the fever, and finally death. "But we do not always see those things." It is true: wine does not produce the same evils in everyone, but contrary ones--dropsy in one, burning fevers in another, wasting and sleep in some, shouts and songs in others. Chaeremon says in Aristotle's Problems that wine operates according to the characters of those to whom it applies itself. And so it harms gradually and little by little until it uses up the whole man.

I have heard young men complaining of sleeplessness; I have seen men otherwise strong from whom wine had taken away, if not their mind, certainly their health and vigor of mind. Sleep denied to nature in youth is a certain sign of a short life. Dryness drives away sleep, but wine dries young men especially; that humor, overwhelming tender nature, takes away its sweet and life-giving juice. Just as dry wood is moistened by water yet lacks native and vital sap, and that moisture effects nothing except that it rots more easily, so too are bodies which are washed in wine rather than drink it.

Thus Diotimus the Athenian, whom they jestingly called a chous, because, with a funnel applied, he drank without breathing. There are some so inexperienced in affairs that they judge the natural heat to be restored and increased by the heat of wine with which drunkards grow hot, although experience teaches them that on the following or third day all things grow cold and the limbs tremble. But I speak concerning children. In cold places I would concede them no wine, or little and diluted wine; in hot places none at all. Cast a tender flower into must: you will receive it pale and without sap. No less does the slight flame of Falernian wine burn delicate entrails and hurry them into premature old age more quickly than the beard.

But what need is there of disputation? You may traverse all Europe: in cultivated cities you will find the pale faces of young men, slender bodies, thin little legs; in villages, strong offspring, lively color, muscular upper arms, broad shoulders, robust and masculine supports of the legs, and longevity. But concerning this matter eternal truth is my witness, Ecclesiasticus 37:34: "Because of debauchery many have died, but he who is abstinent will add to life." Therefore let princes lay it up in their inmost mind that more persons must not perish in peace than in war. For what does it profit the commonwealth that swords are sheathed--or, as Scripture speaks, turned into plowshares--if the aconites of intemperance, if the poisons of wine rage more freely than any wars? Those who neglect these things sin against the health of human beings. "To sin against a human being's health is the crime of homicide," says Cassiodorus.

The wretched flee plague and epidemic pestilence, although, if seized by it, they will die without crime. They follow the intemperance of wine and will die with dishonor and eternal destruction. What Augustine said concerning the son of one head of a household in a sermon on chastity--"What does it profit a man to have a son, nourish him, and love him, if he nourishes him for eternal torments?"--I say to the prince: What does it profit a prince to have subjects if all, or a great part, are being prepared for a miserable spectacle and the torments of hell?

§ 11. Enough has been said concerning the evils of the body whose cause is drunkenness; the plague of minds is greater. I am not speaking of the offense against the divine power and of sins, but of impediments to talent, memory, judgment, and alacrity. Drunkenness takes away memory, scatters the senses, and confounds the intellect, as Augustine teaches: “Drunkenness makes a beast out of a man, a weak man out of a strong one, and a fool out of a prudent one.” As Origen and Jerome testify: “Nothing so overwhelms the understanding as feasting and drunkenness.” Cleomenes, when he emulated the ἄμυστιν--the drinking at one draught--of the Spartans, Scythians, and Thracians, was reduced to insanity.

The natural cause of insanity from wine is that it alters the body remarkably, especially by attacking the head and brain. Hence spasm, convulsion, frenzy, stupor, watering of the eyes, tremor, and the disturbance of the brain and its instruments as though of a clock or of strings produce stupidity. Campanian mothers are said to have smeared hedgehog's blood upon their breasts so that they might rear fierce offspring. But there was neither an abundance of that blood nor such efficacy in it, nor were the Campanians fierce, but luxurious. Caligula's nurse gave her nursling the blood of a girl torn apart and mangled together with her milk; yet this was not the cause of that cruelty of his by which he afflicted the human race. He took the greatest pleasure from slaughter, intent without satiety upon the spectacle of shed blood, as Dio testifies in Book LIX. But an inhuman nature, education, and drunkenness brought this about, and those were the evils of the times.

Certainly it was not without cause that the Lord said in Hosea 7, “The princes began to rage from wine.” Not without cause did Pythagoras say that three clusters grow upon the vine: the first of pleasure, the second of drunkenness, the third of insanity. Athenaeus, Book II, Chapter I, relates from Timaeus of Tauromenium that certain young Agrigentines came to such insanity that, while drunk, they thought that they were sailing and, as though a storm had arisen and as if they wished to lighten the ship of its cargoes, threw all the furniture through the windows. When the senate sent officers, they adored them as Tritons and promised victims and sacrifices if they should escape the storm. On the third day they scarcely returned to their mind; the house was called the Trireme. Therefore that temporary insanity, more frequently impressed upon the mind through wine, disturbs the judgment even of men when sober.

Histories relate the most foolish deeds of drunken princes even when they were at their most sober. Sardanapalus entrusted his forces and the care of his kingdom to others. Cambyses, intolerable to everyone and the most foolish of all, afflicted his father's empire. Bonosus, in his own age the most capacious of drinkers, merited hanging by his imprudence. Marcus Antonius, the most talented of the Romans, conducted very many things effeminately and childishly. Claudius, that stock and mushroom, who, as someone says, was so foolish that he could reign--what of the fact, as Seneca jokes, that when he saw his own funeral and obsequies, he then first understood that he was dead? That man, I say, held large and continual banquets. Caligula, Gallienus, and Maximinus, by the habit of drinking deeply, fell into the greatest disgraces.

§ 12. But what is the chief point: it is established that princes have overthrown the commonwealth through drunkenness. Alexander the Macedonian, the fortunate robber of Asia, conducted very many things youthfully and foolishly, and no one was more desirous of wine than he. No one would call Caligula sane if he should read even one chapter concerning his deeds in Suetonius; but if that man had lived a few years, he would have squandered the whole empire.

“But, lest I enumerate individual things,” says Suetonius, “he consumed immense resources and all that wealth of Tiberius Caesar, twenty-seven thousand times one hundred thousand sesterces, before a whole year had turned. Therefore, exhausted and needy, he turned his mind to robberies through a various and most exquisitely contrived class of false accusations, auctions, and taxes. He denied that those whose ancestors had obtained Roman citizenship for themselves and their posterity possessed it by right, unless they were sons, for he said that ‘posterity’ ought not to be understood beyond this degree. When the diplomas of the deified Julius and Augustus were produced, he lamented that they were old and obsolete. He charged that census declarations had been wrongly submitted if afterward any increase whatsoever had accrued to them for any cause.

“He rescinded as ungrateful the wills of former chief centurions who, from the beginning of Tiberius's principate, had left neither him nor himself as heir; likewise, as invalid and empty, the wills of all others whom anyone said had intended, when dying, to leave Caesar as heir. When this fear had been injected, and he was now openly named heir both by strangers among their friends and by parents among their children, he called them mockers because they persisted in living after naming him, and he sent poisoned dainties to many. He moreover took cognizance of such cases after first fixing the amount of money for the completion of which he would sit; only when it had been completed was he roused. And, not patient even of a very little delay, he once condemned more than forty defendants on diverse charges by one sentence, and boasted to Caesonia, when she had awakened from sleep, how much he had accomplished while she took her midday rest.

“Having announced an auction, he put up and sold the remnants of all his spectacles, himself seeking the prices and extending them so far that some men, compelled to buy certain things at an immense price and stripped of their goods, cut their own veins. It is well known that when Aponius Saturninus was sleeping among the benches, Gaius admonished the auctioneer not to pass over a man of praetorian rank who was repeatedly nodding to him by a movement of the head; nor was an end made to the bidding until thirteen gladiators were knocked down to the unwitting man for nine million sesterces.”

Why should I set Nero before you, singing with a lyre among stage-players? And surely nothing was more foolish than he after he began to be drunk.

Tacitus shows how ruinous the gluttony of Vitellius was: “A foul and insatiable lust for feasts. From the city and from Italy the incitements of his gullet were carried in, while the roads from both seas resounded. The leading men of the cities were exhausted by the preparations for banquets. The cities themselves were laid waste. The soldier degenerated from labor and virtue through habituation to pleasures and contempt for his leader.”

And Tranquillus speaks in more words: “Most notorious above the others was the arrival-banquet given to him, at which two thousand of the choicest fish and seven thousand birds are reported to have been set out. He himself surpassed this too at the dedication of a dish which, on account of its immense size, they continually called the shield of Minerva, ἀσπίδα πολιούχου, ‘the shield of the Guardian of the City.’ In this he commingled the livers of parrotfish, the brains of pheasants and peacocks, the tongues of flamingos, and the milt of moray eels sought by ship-captains and triremes from as far as the Carpathian Sea and the strait of Spain. Moreover, as a man not only of profound but also untimely and sordid gluttony, he never restrained himself even at sacrifices or on any journey from chewing, right there among the altars, entrails and grain-cakes almost snatched from the hearth, and, around the cookshops of the roads, smoking dishes or those of the preceding day and half-eaten.”

He whose mind always dwells in dishes thinks nothing lofty, nothing worthy of a prince.

What of Gallienus? When the empire was being assailed by the armies of thirty enemies and tyrants, if at any time he had awakened from drunkenness, he was accustomed to ask: “And what do we have for luncheon? And what pleasures have been prepared? And what sort of dinner will there be tomorrow? What sort of Circensian games?” Thus Trebellius Pollio. Behold the care of a foolish emperor now reduced to the utmost straits. The same Trebellius speaks thus: “And lest his pitiable ingenuity be passed over: in springtime he made bedchambers of roses. He built fortresses out of fruit. He preserved grapes for three years. He presented melons in the depth of winter. He taught how must might be possessed throughout the year. He always supplied green figs and fresh fruit from trees in months foreign to them.”

Was Heliogabalus sane, concerning whom Aelius Lampridius says: “He is reported to have exhibited naval Circensian games in canals filled with wine”? For in comparison with so furious a prodigality, it is not worthy of mention to relate that six hundred ostrich brains were served at one dinner, or that there were swimming-pools full of wine. It was once the height of luxury to give naval Circensian games. This man makes navigable canals out of wine. But whence such insanity? He had arranged matters with Pescennius in such a manner that the latter might attend to the empire while Heliogabalus himself might be free for pleasures.

Therefore immoderation in food and intemperance in drink, which overthrow prudence, the dispenser of all duties, must altogether be avoided. Prudence is not to be demanded from a man who is never sober. Most true is what Seneca says in Epistle LXXXIII: "Vices conceived in wine have force even without wine." And indeed this is especially true of that vice which is proper to wine: thoughtlessness, stupidity, and insanity. "The use of wine," says Philo in On Monarchy, "weighs down the soul, blunts the senses, and burdens the body."

The greatness of princes ought to produce not a license to sin, but a sense of shame.

§ 13. I shall finish with the example of a private man, which Seneca describes thus in Chapter X of the Consolation to Helvia: "Apicius lived in our memory; in that city from which philosophers were once ordered to depart as though they were corrupters of the young, he professed the science of the cookshop and infected the age with his teaching. It is worthwhile to know his end. When he had poured one hundred million sesterces into his kitchen, when he had swallowed up so many distributions of princes and an immense revenue of the Capitol in individual feasts, oppressed by debt he was then for the first time compelled to inspect his accounts. He calculated that ten million sesterces would remain to him; and, as though he would live in extreme hunger if he lived on ten million sesterces, he ended his life with poison. How great was the luxury of the man to whom ten million sesterces was poverty! Go now, and suppose that the measure of money pertains to the matter, not to the mind. Someone feared ten million sesterces and fled by poison from what others seek in prayer. Yet to that man of so depraved a mind his last draught was the most wholesome."

Drunkenness is therefore the mother of stupidity. Augustine speaks excellently: "If a drunkard swallows wine, he is swallowed by it; he becomes abominable to God, is despised by angels, derided by men, confounded by demons, and trampled upon by everyone. The drunkard confounds nature, loses grace, forfeits glory, and incurs damnation." How he confounds nature Augustine has already expounded above in Sermon CCXXXI. Within the memory of the ancients no nation was slower or more stupid than the Thracians; the common people could not count beyond four. Their stupor, propagated into their offspring from perpetual drunkenness, was a marvel to others. For the offspring of drunkards is deficient either in body or in mind, and more frequently in both. Nor unjustly, although with great bitterness, did Diogenes say to a young man who was dazed and ecstatic, ἐκστατικῷ:

> Ὁ πατήρ σου μεθύων σε ἔσπειρε.

"Your father begot you when drunk." I have already intimated the reason why drunkenness obstructs wisdom even when that madness has now subsided. It must now be treated more fully.

§ 14. Those in whom yellow bile predominates are quick in talent; those in whom melancholy predominates are prudent and especially to be employed in public affairs. But the melancholy must be finer and nobler, one which does not have a mixture of stupidity joined to it. It belongs to a prudent man to remember and to understand, or to judge rightly. The seat of memory, imagination, and images is the brain; its temperament both retains past things and serves judgment through the imaginative faculties. If it flows with excessive moisture or is chilled, memory wavers. If it grows hot beyond measure, frenzy is engendered. Memory and judgment, therefore, consist in a mean temperament of the brain.

Pure and uncorrupted air itself is fertile in good talents, such as Attic, Palestinian, and German air. Thicker and more dreg-filled air possesses sluggish talents. You would swear that a Boeotian had been born in thick air. Excessive cold renders talents torpid and as though lethargic, as are the nations of the Lapps toward the north. Excessive heat frequently renders them utterly stupid, such as those of many Ethiopians. Hence, amid the equality of souls, there is so great a diversity of talents that some human beings appear almost to be brute animals to others.

From both considerations it appears how much sobriety contributes to wisdom. For if purity of the air which we draw is necessary to talent, lest by the onset of a more turbid atmosphere the purity of the brain be corrupted and its order disturbed, how much greater is the confusion in the most violent beating of drunkenness, which is so great that it swells the tongue with moisture, weakens the whole body, and casts it down? Next, wine kindles excessive heats, especially in the head itself, the citadel of wisdom; it renders the vital and animal spirits more turbid and dreg-filled. And, what is the chief point, it extinguishes native heat. Therefore men easily forget past things and consult with little sagacity concerning future things. For while the head frequently seethes with wine, that which is delicate and lucid vanishes; the inferior and impure parts remain. Hence we often see veteran counsellors of princes grow torpid amid the very business and be surpassed by the perspicacity and diligence of younger men.

Seneca speaks concerning talents: “Daily the matter has been brought into a worse condition, whether through the luxury of the times--for nothing is so deadly to talents as luxury--or, when the rewards of the most beautiful thing ceased, every contest was transferred to disgraceful things.” But when that stupor also belonged to the parents, it is frequent for men altogether dull and stupid to be born. But, to conclude, I affirm this as observed by all philosophers and physicians: children become slow and stupid through much food, drink, and sleep, and grow more defectively.

§ 15. Two things are customarily objected to me. The first is that some men are capable in drinking and their mind is vigorous in wine. The second is that many men distinguished in talent and prudence deliberate most wisely during intervals of sobriety. As examples of the former they put forward Bonosus, who, while drinking and urinating, invited the enemy's envoys and made them drunk so that they might disclose secrets; he himself could sustain much wine. They also put forward Cambyses, concerning whom Seneca relates in Book III, Chapter XIV of On Anger:

“Praexaspes, one of his dearest men, admonished him to drink more sparingly, saying that drunkenness was shameful in a king whom the eyes and ears of all followed. To this he said: ‘That you may know how I never lose possession of myself, I shall prove presently that both my eyes and hands remain at their duty after wine.’ He then drank more liberally than at other times, from more capacious cups. When already heavy and drunk, he ordered his reprover's son to proceed beyond the threshold and to stand with his left hand raised above his head. Then he drew his bow and struck the young man's very heart--for he had said that he was aiming at it--and, when the breast had been cut open, showed the point adhering in the very heart; and, looking back at the father, asked whether he had a sufficiently sure hand. But he denied that Apollo could have discharged an arrow more surely. May the gods destroy him wickedly--a slave more in soul than in condition. He was the praiser of a thing of which it was excessive merely to have been a spectator. He considered the breast of his son split into two parts and the heart beating beneath the wound an occasion for flattery.”

They recount various examples of the latter marvel, even of men still living. Yet it is not difficult to meet the thoughtless patrons of vinousness. And first, indeed, the examples of two most shameful men, a king and an emperor, ought to have moved them to detestation of so foul a crime. Cambyses remained in possession of himself because his drunkenness from anger was greater than his drunkenness from wine. Indeed, the former shook off the latter. However he acted, he was not only cruel but most foolishly cruel. For he could not, unless insane, have been ignorant that by a deed so cruelly injurious the hatred of all was kindled against him. Therefore, although his right hand did not err, the counsel of his mind was nevertheless the insanity of a most insane mind.

The emperor Bonosus could not become drunk; for he did not drink but poured wine through his body as through a wineskin or channel. Hence, when someone saw him hanged, he said that an amphora was hanging--a jest that was also cast against Maximinus. I come to the other part, which I shall easily carry if my discourse is with the vinous men themselves, not with the eulogists of vinous men. For those who do not preserve moderation in food and drink perceive in fact that the digestion of varied courses is turbulent and unequal. Aristotle says in Problem I that many foods are more easily eaten than digested. They also confess that they have attended more funerals caused by luxury than by old age. They see that Macrobius spoke truly: “Those who frequently become drunk quickly grow old.” Saturnalia, Book VII, Chapter VI. Most true also is what Arnobius says in Book VII: “Wine weakens the sinews of all the virtues.” But how? Because it diminishes wisdom, the bond and framework of all the virtues. It diminishes wisdom because it wrenches the seat of memory, imagination, and the internal senses, confounds the organs, and displaces them from their natural constitution.

But let us consider the matter itself. Those wise and talented drinkers prepared a name for themselves before they began to wear away their talent; now they retain it because they are talkative, because they prevail in experience, because they know precedents. But if new and difficult matters are proposed, if the battle-line of an adversary assails them, if there is need of much meditation, reading, and comparison of laws, then at length it will appear how much sagacity and understanding Bacchus has struck away with his thyrsus. Then they will say:

> The bottom is turned in our wine-jars, and our opinion in us.

Let those talented and prudent men, after the ample drinking-parties of some years, be recalled to the academies and preside over disputations; let obscure and difficult matters be vigorously argued: they will seriously deplore their loss. Although even now they frequently pay the penalty, for to this day those very men do things which are prudently corrected by younger men. This is bitter and almost insulting, but sometimes necessary. For:

> Πολὺς γὰρ οἶνος πολλὰ ἁμαρτάνειν ποιεῖ.

> With much wine many errors are committed.

Themistocles passed a prodigal, criminal, and voluptuous youth with such wickedness and contumacy that he is said to have driven his mother to hang herself; but afterward he was the pillar of Greece. He was a man of great talent and a great spirit. But he had not yet buried his talent altogether, and amid a scarcity of good and brave men he suddenly shone forth. Yet he did not long maintain that position, for he conducted many things wickedly and foolishly. For what sort of plan was it to burn the whole fleet of victorious Greece in order that he might procure the empire for the Athenians alone? What else was this but to expose his unarmed fatherland to the barbarians? For Greece would not have fought on behalf of allies so treacherous.

Next, he himself is witness to how prudently he exercised command. “That boy,” he says, “commands the Greeks: for what he wishes, his mother wishes; what his mother wishes, I wish; what I wish, all the Greeks wish.” Behold the wisdom of a drunken leader, who could govern neither his son nor his wife--not even his agents; for he was overwhelmed by great debt. What wonder that this man fled his fatherland? Let them therefore cease boasting of the prudence of drunkards in political affairs. I can name men who, removed from affairs by premature delirium, passed an inglorious old age; others who altogether lost all authority. There remains an example full of ill will, but because it is fruitful in truth and has not been noted by many, it must be brought forward; for a man ought to hear his own vices, whether they delight him or are objects of hatred.

§ 16. Germany is divided into three parts, if you regard temperance. The first part is laborious, a hardener of sons and a drinker of water, in which the use of beer is rare and that of wine most rare. The second part abounds in wine and delicacies; in it the rich especially are drunken and rear their sons delicately. The third part is intermediate, akin to the virtues of the first and the vices of the second. All these parts, however, are not widely separated in place but in morals. Among them I have now observed many things over several years, and I appeal to all to whom old age has conferred experience. I was able to note what I shall say all the more conveniently because for twenty-four years the young in diverse colleges and academies were known to me, and I noted differences of talents.

First, in cultivated cities abounding in wine and given to delicacies, I have observed that many children of the wealthy and the magnates are little sound in mind and that some are altogether foolish; and this evil has been spread widely through many distinguished families. The natural cause is the drinking of mothers while they carry a child and while they nurse. For many at that time guzzle not only Rhenish wines but Spanish, Cretan, and dark wines, and force them upon their tender children. The most cunning appetite for wines invents the claim that this contributes to health, firmness, and the fostering of heat; but however useful this may be to mothers, undiluted wine is certainly poison to the talents of their children.

In this matter civic matrons offend more than noblewomen who are accustomed to dwell in fortresses, both because the discipline of nobility is more severe than that of luxurious cities--for they are accustomed to rear their children for labors and warfare and to habituate them to ordinary food--and because in cities there is not only an abundance of such things, but they are customarily given as gifts by relatives. Women and children do not easily abstain from delicacies. Therefore I judge that some law for restraining female appetite must be introduced in cities, and I demand the skill of physicians by which the health of mothers and offspring may be regulated.

But by what law will you restrain the women Bebrias and Ebrias, especially the mistresses of the cellar? What if the husband too is Bebrius Ebrius? The evil is difficult to cure because it is hidden, and when it has appeared the medicine is late; for the son, his mind injured, now carries about the drinking habit of his mother. Nevertheless, let the husband, preacher, and confessor admonish her. Above all, let parents and magistrates devote themselves to making it disgraceful for a daughter of a household to have drunk wine. Indeed, let it be so infamous to be regarded as a female drinker that such women can scarcely hope for an honorable marriage. Finally, let parents and husbands be both a lesson and an example of temperance. Otherwise they will always chatter in the woman's ear, “Where you are Gaius, there I am Gaia.” A drunken old woman was dragging a drunken old man.

Second, I have observed that children reared delicately and accustomed to sip the last drops of little cups are for the most part talented, lively, and ready in memory until their twelfth or fourteenth year. But when they have left the grammar schools and are now applied to making verses and composing a speech by their own effort, most fail because there is need of reasoning, judgment, labor, and exertion of mind; and they show that the flower of their talent was perishable. When they come to philosophy, they fall in the first contest and either desert their studies altogether or display some title of doctorate purchased in Italy.

There is not one cause, for they waste their age either through negligence or other vices. But I am speaking of those who lack neither instruction nor labor, but whose talent, after it had built up great expectation in childhood, suddenly eludes the hope of everyone. The cause is that, while tender, because of the softness of the brain they quickly impress upon their memory things heard, for figures are easily impressed upon soft things. Therefore, since their study is occupied almost entirely with memorizing lessons and retaining the explanation of words, and since they are also by nature hot and lively for contests and literary exercises, from this they are called talented, but falsely. For they are stupid and slow, but their slowness is covered by age, ease of memory, and inborn alacrity. Nor is this astonishing, since, under the name of childhood and ingenuous simplicity, the stupidity of their children deceives the parents for some years.

“But many also possess precocious wisdom. They act dexterously and speak as men.” It is plainly so; and that very precocious maturity, if it is from wine, is a sign of a talent that will not endure. Those fruits which anticipate their season, hurried to maturity by the external heat of furnaces, are not only very short-lived but also exhaust their own stock. For while alien heat digests their rawness, it also drinks up their vital parts. Death, therefore, always begrudges precocious talents; or, if they have always matured beforehand, they very quickly decay.

But why does the wine of grandfathers and parents, and much more wine poured into a tender age, make children precocious; why, if taken moderately by men, does it sharpen wisdom, but, if copiously, blunt it? The cause must be deduced from the principles of nature. The minds of children are deficient in wisdom for this reason: the brain, filled with much moisture, is least fit for the acts of wisdom. That raw moisture is dissipated more quickly in some and more slowly in others, but it must be digested naturally, not violently. If the extraordinary heat of wine approaches, all those things are quickly dissipated, but, as I have said, not without injury to nature. For adventitious heat, consuming vital moisture and heat, accelerates old age; thus when they are men in age, they are infested by the chill and delirium of old men.

A moderate amount of wine sharpens the spirits and firm nerves of men, because with its slight heat it cannot harm strong things, yet it rouses and takes away their torpor. We plainly discern the same thing in plants. The warmth of a nearby fire and of furnaces ripens the sap, forces it to swell into buds and to break out into flowers; but that same heat immediately plucks away the beauty of the opened flower, so that, when it has begun to be looked at, it quickly withers. For the swelling and germination were contrary to nature. Thus, therefore, stands the rationale of vinousness in the commonwealth, and this is the outcome of children delicately reared. Although parents perceive these things, they nevertheless drag them to banquets and utterly corrupt with delicacies those who ought altogether to abstain from wine and to be fed sparingly, so that their extraordinary heat might be moderated for procuring longevity and talent. But I shall treat these things more fully when I discuss education. For we see many parents so stupid that they marvel that their sons are bad when they themselves have taught them nothing good. Vice has no need of a teacher; it is enough not to be restrained, enough for leisure to be granted and pleasures permitted.

§ 17. A third consequence follows from these things: the sons and posterity of the rich, for the most part burdened with another's money, are reduced to want. Sometimes, indeed, this happens by an unforeseen evil, and they are worthy of compassion. For the most part they cast themselves into the perils of poverty and are deservedly exposed to reproaches. The cause is the habit of delicacies, ignorance of household management, and flight from labor.

I see that the wealthiest men of the cities are those who come from some laborious region or whose parents and grandfathers immigrated. For they brought temperance and frugality with them, are devoted to labors, and rear their children severely. Therefore they easily preserve and increase their estate while the others dissolve in luxury. Nor is this all; that education extends itself more widely. In provinces and cities devoted to wine and luxury, I see that parish priests, schoolmasters, and scribes of towns are almost all newcomers--not because the people of those places disdain these offices, for very many of them are poor and live wretchedly, but because talents and industrious labor are lacking. Yet if they disdain those offices, do they also spurn greater ones?

Look in the cities at the colleges of canons, the principal preachers, doctors, and prelates, and count those who have been raised from delicate little flowers to those honors: you will find few; frost struck down most of them in flower. Review the courts of princes: you will understand that the chief places in prudence and counsel are conceded to those whose adolescence was exercised by labors and temperance, whom their native land did not corrupt. This is all the more astonishing because the recommendations of others have very great force in churches, in the commonwealth, and at court, yet we see men of lesser means, and frequently foreigners, preferred. The reason is that, when it comes to the matter itself, learned, industrious, untiring, and laborious men are sought, such as none of those whose childhood was corrupted by delicacies is--or if there is any such man, there is scarcely one in each court.

§ 18. I have spoken concerning the avoidance of drunkenness. But I shall add one thing which can, and indeed ought, to be adapted to other matters, but which in this cause is dangerous to princes. For I am thoroughly persuaded that many princes and magistrates have been eternally condemned both because of other sins of their subjects and because of drunkenness. I shall set forth my opinion briefly with this declaration: if even one sound-minded man out of a thousand doctors contradicts it, I shall absolve the magistrate from danger.

First. It is undoubted that care for the salvation of subjects, the divine glory, and the removal of scandals is incumbent upon the magistrate.

Second. It is also certain that drunkenness is a sin, that immense evils arise from it, and that good things are impeded.

Third. From this I conclude by an evident consequence that the prince is bound by the grave command of the eternal Majesty to remove this sin also from the commonwealth, and that unless he attempts this and inquires into ways and means, he cannot be saved, because the blood of all the souls is required from his hand. Indeed, he offends most gravely if his court is filled with vomit and filth.

Fourth. The obligation of all consuls, senators, and others who are in power is the same. For they ought to resist evil.

Fifth. Magistrates in Germany can easily remove drunkenness without tumult, without protest, and without fear of a greater evil. Therefore those who permit it can use no excuse, especially since they are also bound by imperial law.

Sixth. A few laws will complete the whole matter.

The first law: Let the prince and senate be sober, as well as the ministers of princes.

The second: Let him who recommends a counsellor, courtier, satrap, or quaestor to a prince first consider this, lest that man be a drunkard.

The third: Let affairs not be entrusted to a drunkard at court; if he persists, let him be dismissed.

The fourth: Let drunkards not be admitted to the chapters of collegiate churches; let those already admitted be corrected by canonical penalties.

The fifth: Let the drunkenness of citizens be corrected by deprivation of honors and then by a fine, or even by deprivation of the power of giving testimony.

The sixth: Let the masters of taverns--that is, workshops of drunkenness--be punished by a great monetary penalty if they do not report a drunken man to the magistrate.

The seventh: Let the guests and bridegrooms pay for the drunkenness of weddings.

The eighth: Let sumptuary laws be seriously defended.

Those laws are most just, and no one except either a demon or an attendant of a demon can intercede against them. For intemperance takes away health, talent, peace, resources, and fame, and brings in a cohort of innumerable evils. Therefore, although a good man is sometimes captured by wine, no one except a man infamous for vinousness can patronize it. This is especially so since pagan and drunken Rome detested Marcus Antonius more because he wrote a volume in defense of drunkenness than because he utterly gave himself to pleasure. For they judged thus: a drunken man sins against himself alone, and even if he should also give offense by his example, that would pertain to a few years; but the shamelessness of a teaching by which so great an evil was taught would do harm to all ages.

§ 19. Wretched is the condition of Germany. A region fertile in wine kills more men with its own good than die by the sword; and I dare to say that it expends more wine upon the deaths of human beings than upon health and delight. How many crowds of poor people could be preserved and refreshed by that wine with which you kill your friends? When these things are done, do we marvel that vines perish by cold, their flower by rain, and that frost corrupts grapes already growing yellow? The insanity of drinkers and the fury of drunkards burns the shoots with bitter frost, strikes down the flower, and scatters the clusters with hail.

For why do most men ask an abundance of wine from God? Is it not that they may pour wine through their body and destroy themselves? Is it not more merciful not to give a sword to madmen or wine to drunkards? Therefore let us abandon the morals of the nations and follow Christian temperance. They acted in one manner; the Lord willed that we should act in another. Tertullian describes for us the fury of drunkards and the honorableness of temperance in Chapter XXXIX of the Apology:

“For you assail our modest suppers, besides as infamous for crime, also as prodigal. Doubtless Diogenes' saying concerning the Megarians was spoken of us: ‘The Megarians dine as though they were going to die the next day, but build as though they were never going to die.’ But who more easily sees a mote in another's eye than a beam in his own? The air grows sour with so many tribes, curiae, and decuries belching. When the Salii are to dine, a creditor will be necessary. An accountant will calculate the expense of the tithes offered to Hercules and of sacred banquets. Let selections of cooks be announced for the Apaturia, the Dionysia, and the Attic mysteries. At the smoke of the Serapic supper the firemen will be roused. It is only concerning the dining-room of the Christians that reconsideration is undertaken.

“Our supper shows the reason for itself by its name. For it is called ἀγάπη, that which among the Greeks is affection. By however great expenses it is established, it is gain to make an expense in the name of piety, since we also assist the poor with that refreshment--not in the manner in which among you parasites aspire to the glory of an enslaved freedom, hired by their belly to be fattened amid insults, but in the manner in which with God there is greater consideration of the lowly. If the cause of the banquet is honorable, estimate the remainder of its order from the cause of its discipline. Since it comes from a duty of religion, it admits nothing base, nothing immodest.

“Men do not recline before prayer to God is tasted first. As much is eaten as the hungry take; as much is drunk as is useful to the chaste. They are so satiated as men who remember that even through the night they must adore God; they converse as men who know that the Lord hears. After water for the hands and lights, each person, as he is able, is called forth into the midst to sing to God either from the Holy Scriptures or from his own talent. From this it is proved how he has drunk. Prayer likewise dissolves the banquet. From there they depart not into bands of slayings, nor into companies of roving, nor into outbreaks of wantonness, but to the same care of modesty and chastity, as men who have dined not so much upon a supper as upon discipline.”

CHAPTER XV

Anger Is Equally Harmful to Rulers and Subjects

§ 1. To have conquered pleasures is a great part of wisdom; to have bridled anger belongs to a strong and almost unconquered spirit. Therefore this moderation too is altogether necessary in the commonwealth, and its consideration is connected with those things which we have said concerning pleasures. For irascibility is born especially from wine and a soft education.

"It is difficult," says Seneca in Book II, Chapter XX of On Anger, "to change nature, nor is it permissible to alter the elements of things once commingled at birth. But the knowledge of this is useful, so that wine may be withdrawn from heated talents; Plato judges that it must be denied to children and forbids fire to be incited by fire. Nor indeed must they be filled with food, for their bodies will be distended and their minds will swell with the body."

The same things which lead children to good hope generate insolence and irascibility. Nothing makes men more irascible than a soft and indulgent education. Thus Seneca, Book II, Chapter XXI of On Anger: "Therefore," he says, "we shall not release them into idleness and leisure, and we shall keep them far from contact with delicacies. For from joy comes exultation; swelling and an excessive estimation of oneself follow exultation; thence comes irascibility, for it is an opinion that contempt or injury has been received." Those who are reared indulgently and amid delicacies interpret it as an injury if they are not treated most softly.

"Therefore," says the same Seneca, "the more indulgence is shown to only children and the more that wards are permitted, the more corrupt is their mind. He to whom nothing has ever been denied, whose tears an anxious mother has always wiped away, for whom satisfaction has been exacted from his tutor, will not withstand offenses. Do you not see that the greater each man's fortune is, the greater the anger which accompanies it? It appears especially in the rich, the noble, and magistrates, when a favorable breeze has raised up whatever was light and empty in their mind. Felicity nourishes irascibility where a crowd of flatterers has surrounded haughty ears."

And in Chapter XXV: "The boy is insufficiently quick, or the water for drinking is rather lukewarm, or his couch is disturbed, or the table is set out rather negligently. It is insanity to be incited by these things. He is sick and of unhappy health whom a light breeze has contracted; eyes are diseased which a white garment troubles; that man is dissolved by delicacies whose side aches from another's labor. They say that Mindyrides was a citizen of the Sybarites. When he had seen someone digging and raising the mattock rather high, he complained that he was becoming weary and forbade the man to do the work in his sight. The same man complained more frequently because he had lain upon doubled rose-leaves. When pleasures have corrupted mind and body together, nothing seems tolerable--not because the things are hard, but because those who suffer them are soft.

"For what reason is there that someone's cough, or a sneeze, or a fly driven away with insufficient care should drive you into madness? Or an overturned cup, or a key slipped from the hands of a negligent slave? Will that man bear with an even mind civic reproach and curses heaped upon him in an assembly or senate-house, whose ears the creaking of a bench dragged along offends? Will he endure hunger and the thirst of a summer campaign who is angry at a boy for diluting the snow badly?"

§ 2. Blandishments, therefore, make men irascible because they make them delicate, because they make them weak, and especially because they make them arrogant. I am accustomed to laugh at foolish parents and indulgent teachers when they speak concerning the contumacy of young men: "I offended him in no matter, I denied him nothing; no parent ever loved his sons in this manner. Now he is ungrateful; others, upon whom I bestowed less, return great thanks." On the contrary, he owes you no thanks because you corrupted him. One admonition has struck out the memory of all your blandishments.

But I shall treat these matters in the book concerning education. Now let us consider anger, the daughter of luxury. The daughter of luxury, I say, but the mother and servant of cruelty. For inhumanity is akin to delicacies. Nero was so soft that he seemed to possess nothing manly, so cruel that he seemed to possess nothing soft.

Anger, or ὀργή, is:

> ὄρεξις μετὰ λύπης τιμωρίας φαινομένης, διὰ φαινομένην τὴν ὀλιγωρίαν, τὴν εἰς αὐτόν, ἢ εἰς αὐτοῦ τινα, μὴ προσηκόντως.

1. Anger is a desire for vengeance; 2. with pain or sadness; 3. for apparent vengeance; 4. on account of apparent contempt for oneself or for one of one's own, unfittingly. Thus speaks the best master of defining in Book II, Chapter II of the Rhetoric.

He establishes three kinds of contempt. Καταφρόνησιν, disdain, when one values the thing and the person at nothing. Ἐπηρεασμὸν, spite, which is contempt when an impediment is placed in the way of another's wishes, not so that the man himself may obtain some advantage from the matter, but lest it accrue to the other. Ὕβριν, insult, when harm and vexation are inflicted upon another with dishonor to the sufferer, not so that something else may accrue to the agent, but so that he may take pleasure.

Seneca, in Book I, Chapter III of On Anger, cites the Aristotelian definition: anger is a desire to repay pain. But an irascible man differs from an angry man, as Seneca explains there in Chapter IV, as a drunkard differs from a drunk man, and one who is afraid from a timid man. Cicero says in Book IV of the Tusculan Disputations that they differ in the same manner as anxiety differs from anguish.

Seneca describes the variety of irascible men. I shall pass over the remaining things which, under several names among the Greeks, distinguish anger into species, because among us they do not have their own terms--even if we speak of a bitter man and a harsh one, and no less of a choleric, raging, clamorous, difficult, and rough man, all of which are differences of angers. Among these you may place the morose man, a delicate kind of irascibility. For there are some angers which subside within clamor; some are no less persistent than frequent; some are savage with the hand and more sparing in words; some pour themselves out in the bitterness of words and curses; some do not go beyond complaints and aversions; some are deep and grave and are turned inward. There are a thousand other species of this manifold evil.

The Greeks call them:

> πικρούς, μακρολύπους, ἀκροχόλους, χαλεπούς, κρυψιχόλους, δυσαρέστους, ὀργίλους, ὀξυχόλους, θυμοειδεῖς.

That is: bitter, long-grieving, readily choleric, difficult, concealing anger, hard to please, irascible, quick-tempered, and passionate. Enough has been said concerning the recognition of anger, which is more excellent than defining it.

§ 3. Anger is the greatest and a public evil, for it has afflicted the city more violently than any other thing. Homer too wished to indicate this when he calls the μῆνιν--the wrath--of Achilles οὐλομένην, destructive. Seneca says in Book III, Chapter II of On Anger: “Finally, the other vices seize individuals; this is the one affection which is sometimes conceived publicly. Never has a whole people burned with love for one woman, nor has an entire city placed its hope in money or profit. Ambition occupies individual men one by one; impotence is not a public evil. Often men have gone into anger in one column. Men, women, old men, children, princes, and the common people have agreed; and the whole multitude, incited by a very few words, has outstripped the inciter himself. Immediately there has been a running to arms and fires, and wars have been declared upon neighbors or waged with fellow-citizens. Whole houses have been burned with their entire stock; and a man held a short while ago in favor because of his eloquence, amid the height of honor, has borne the anger of his own assembly; legions have turned their javelins against their commander.

“The whole plebs has dissented from the fathers; the public council, the senate, without waiting for levies and without naming a commander, has chosen sudden leaders for its anger; and, pursuing noble men through the houses of the city, has taken punishment with its own hand. It has violated embassies, the law of nations having been broken, and unspeakable madness has carried off the state. No time was given in which the public swelling might subside, but fleets were immediately launched and loaded with a hastily gathered soldiery. Without custom, without auspices, the people, under the leadership of its own anger, attacked what chance offered and bore things snatched up as weapons; then with a great slaughter it paid for the rashness of its audacious anger.”

Saul suddenly slaughtered the priests and their city; Nebuchadnezzar condemned three leading men to the fire. I related the irascibility of Cambyses, joined with drunkenness, in the preceding chapter. But it especially befits kings to act without anger. Seneca speaks beautifully in Book III, Chapter XVI of On Anger: “But although restraint of their passions, and especially of this rabid and unbridled one, is useful to subjects, it is more useful to kings. All things perish where fortune permits as much as anger counsels, nor can a power which is exercised to the harm of many stand for long. For we are endangered when a common fear has joined those who groan separately. Therefore at one time individuals have slaughtered very many rulers, at another time all together, when public grief has compelled them to bring their angers together into one.”

Yet very many have exercised anger as though it were a royal insignia, as did Darius, who first, after the dominion was taken from the Magus, obtained the Persians and a great part of the East. For when he had declared war upon the Scythians, who surrounded the East, and was asked by Oeobazus, a noble old man, to leave one of his three sons as a consolation to his father and to use the service of two, he promised more than was asked and said that he would remit them all to him; then he cast them down, slain, in the sight of their parent--though he would have been cruel if he had led all of them away.

But how much more lenient was Xerxes? When Pythius, father of five sons, sought exemption for one, he permitted him to choose the one he wished; he then tore the chosen one into two parts, placed them on either side of the road, and purified his army with this victim. Therefore he had the end which he deserved. Defeated and routed far and wide, seeing everywhere his ruin laid flat, he walked amid the corpses of his men.

Was this ferocity in anger peculiar to barbarian kings whom no learning and no cultivation of letters had imbued? I shall give you from the bosom of Aristotle King Alexander, who at a banquet ran through with a weapon Clitus, a man most dear to him and reared together with him--and indeed with his own hand--because he flattered too little and passed reluctantly from a Macedonian and a free man into Persian servitude. For he cast Lysimachus, equally familiar to him, to a lion. Was this Lysimachus, then, after escaping the lion's teeth by a certain good fortune, milder on that account when he himself reigned? For he fed Telesphorus the Rhodian, his friend, for a long time in a cage as though he were some new and unusual animal, after he had cut him down on every side and cut off his ears and nose. When the deformity of the truncated and mutilated face had destroyed his human countenance, there were added hunger, squalor, and the filth of a body abandoned in its own dung; his knees and hands were calloused besides, for the narrowness of the place forced him to use them as feet, and his sides were ulcerated by rubbing. His appearance was no less foul than terrible to those who saw him; made a monster by his punishment, he had also lost compassion. Yet, although the man who suffered these things was most unlike a human being, the man who did them was more unlike one.

Would that this savagery had remained among foreign examples and that the barbarism of punishments and angers had not passed into Roman morals with other imported vices! Lucius Sulla ordered the legs of Marcus Marius--upon whom the people had set up statues street by street and to whom the Roman people made supplication with incense and wine--to be broken, his eyes torn out, and his hands cut off; and, as though he killed him as many times as he wounded him, he tore him apart gradually and limb by limb. Who was the minister of this command? Who but Catiline, already exercising his hands for every crime? He mangled him before the tomb of Quintus Catulus, a most grievous burden upon the ashes of a most gentle man; above them a popular man indeed of bad example, and loved not so undeservedly as excessively, gave his blood drop by drop. Marius was worthy to suffer those things, Sulla to order them, Catiline to perform them; but the commonwealth was unworthy to receive into its own body the swords of enemies and citizens alike.

Why do I pursue ancient things? Just now Gaius Caesar, on one day, cut down with scourges and tortured Sextus Papinius, whose father had been consul; Belienus Bassus, his quaestor and the son of his procurator; other senators; and Roman knights--not for the sake of an inquiry, but for the sake of his disposition. Then he was so impatient of deferring the pleasure which immense cruelty demanded without delay that, while walking in the promenade of his mother's gardens which separates the portico from the riverbank, he decapitated some of them by lamplight in the company of matrons and other senators. What was pressing? What private or public danger did a single night threaten? How small a thing was it to wait for daylight? Finally, was it necessary that, wearing slippers, he should kill senators of the Roman people?

§ 4. Shall I add to these monsters the emperor Severus, truly severe and truly worthy of his name? The world has scarcely experienced a man more irascible. For whom of all those whom chance and necessity had cast into the opposing camp did he ever spare? Nor was his anger satiated by the death of his enemies. “He ordered,” says Aelius Spartianus, “the corpses of the senators who had been slain in the war to be scattered. Then, when the body of Albinus, almost half-dead, was brought to him, he ordered the head to be cut off and carried to Rome, and accompanied it with a letter. Albinus was defeated on the eleventh day before the Kalends of March. He ordered the rest of his body to be exposed before his own house and divided. Moreover, sitting upon a horse himself, he drove it over Albinus's corpse and admonished it, when it took fright, to trample it boldly with the bridle loosened.”

Others add that he ordered the same corpse to be cast into the Rhône together with those of his wife and children. After innumerable men of Albinus's party had been killed, among whom were many leading men of the state and many illustrious women, the goods of them all were confiscated and increased the treasury; then many nobles of the Spaniards and Gauls were killed. Finally, he gave the soldiers as much pay as no prince had given. He also left his sons as much from this proscription as none of the emperors had left, since he had already made a great part of the gold throughout the Gauls, Spains, and Italy imperial property; and then for the first time the administration of the private estates was established. Many, indeed, who preserved their loyalty to Albinus after his death were defeated in war by Severus.

§ 5. What movements does that beast excite in the commonwealth, with what swift desire for vengeance, with what blind rush to injure--and does it not spare itself? Valerius says in Book IX, Chapter III: When Livius Salinator was leaving the city to wage war against Hasdrubal, Fabius Maximus admonished him not to descend into battle before he had learned the strength and spirit of the enemy. He replied that he would not omit the first opportunity of fighting. When asked by the same man why he wished to join battle so hastily, he said, “That I may as quickly as possible take either glory from the defeated enemy or joy from my prostrate fellow-citizens.” Anger and courage then divided his speech between them: the former mindful of his unjust condemnation, the latter intent upon the glory of a triumph. But I do not know whether saying this and conquering in this way belonged to the same man.

No less blindly did Roman legions, to the great advantage of the enemy, satiate their resentment and anger. When Fabius was consul, the entire infantry was sent to destroy the enemy's forces. Although it could destroy them, it refused, retaining in its mind fixed anger over the agrarian law which he had obstructed. Under Appius as leader, although it could conquer, it preferred to turn its back upon the enemy, lest the commander, whose father it knew had assailed its advantages, should triumph in the manner of victors.

§ 6. Quintus Metellus, through hatred of Quintus Pompeius, who was being sent as his successor, almost betrayed conquered Spain. For he dismissed all who had only wished that their military service should be ended. He gave provisions to those requesting them without examining their grounds and without appointing a time. After removing the guards, he offered the granaries ready for plunder. He ordered the bows and arrows of the Cretans to be broken and cast into a river. He forbade food to be given to the elephants. As by these deeds he indulged his desire, so he corrupted the glory of things magnificently conducted; and, a stronger conqueror of enemies than of anger, he lost the merited honor of a triumph.

What is more disgraceful than Julian, who, when administering justice and repeatedly blazing up, not only uttered indecorous reproaches and gestures, but, rushing in the manner of a buffoon upon countrymen disputing at law, struck them with his fists? For anger drives out all sense of shame. It is the more destructive because every angry person judges his own indignation just. For he who has been able to condemn it has already conquered it.

§ 7. If we look at the causes of angers and disturbances in the city and the household, we shall discover that most are doubtful, light, to be pardoned in view of the persons, or unjust; and when vengeance appears just, it nevertheless frequently exceeds measure.

Doubtful causes have entangled kings and cities in most certain destructions. “Therefore,” says Seneca in Book II, Chapter XXII of On Anger, “we ought to fight against the first causes. The cause of irascibility is an opinion of injury, to which credence must not readily be given; nor indeed must one immediately accede even to open and manifest appearances. For some false things bear the appearance of truth. Time must always be given; a day reveals the truth. Let ears not be receptive to accusers; let this vice of human nature be suspected and known to us--that we willingly believe things which we hear unwillingly, and become angry before we judge. What of the fact that we are impelled not only by accusations but by suspicions, and, interpreting worse things from another's face and laugh, become angry at innocent men? Therefore the absent man's case must be pleaded against oneself, and anger must be held in suspense. For a delayed penalty can be exacted; an exacted one cannot be recalled.”

That tyrannicide is well known who, seized before his work was completed and tortured by Hippias so that he might disclose his accomplices, named the friends of the tyrant who he knew held the tyrant's safety most dear. When Hippias had ordered each to be killed as he was named, he asked, “Does anyone remain?” “You alone,” he said, “for I have left no one else to whom you were dear.” Anger brought it about that the tyrant lent his hands to the tyrannicide and cut down his own defenses with his own sword.

With how great a spirit did Alexander act? When he had read his mother's letter, in which he was admonished to beware the poison of Philip the physician, he drank the potion he had received without being deterred. He trusted his friend more than himself. He was worthy to have an innocent friend, worthy to make him one. I praise this all the more in Alexander because no one was so liable to anger. But the rarer moderation is in kings, the more it must be praised.

There was the greatest affection between Aristobulus and his brother, but Aristobulus, credulous and hasty, destroyed his brother Antigonus and his only friend. Josephus relates the matter thus in Book XIII, Chapter XIX of the Antiquities. When Antigonus once returned magnificently from a war, at the time when the people celebrated the solemn feast of Tabernacles, it happened that Aristobulus lay sick. His brother, however, splendidly adorned because he was to participate in the sacred rites, ascended into the temple with an armed retinue, especially in order to make vows for the king's health. Then those whose purpose was to excite discord between the brothers, having obtained an opportunity from Antigonus's successful deeds and the procession which he had prepared, came to the king and exaggerated everything. They said that these things were now above the condition of a private man and were manifest indications that he was seeking the kingdom. They said that he would shortly come with a strong band of armed men to kill the king, because he judged it foolish to be content with a share of the honor when he could possess the royal throne.

Although Aristobulus did not entirely believe them, nevertheless, so that he might both take precautions and avoid suspicion and might consult his own security, he stationed guards in a certain dark and underground place--for he lay in the tower which afterward, its name having been changed, was called Antonia. He commanded that, if his brother came without arms, no one should touch him, but, if he approached armed, that he should be slain. Yet first he sent to him one who was to ask that he come unarmed. But the queen and the remaining plotters persuaded the messenger to say the contrary: that his brother had heard that he had procured remarkable armor for himself and wished to behold him thus armed. Antigonus, suspecting nothing evil and relying upon his brother's benevolence, came just as he was, in all his armor, to Aristobulus, intending to offer himself for inspection. When he arrived at the tower of Straton, where the passage was very dark, he was slain by the guards. This misfortune easily shows how much envy and false accusation can do and how effective they are at overthrowing even natural benevolence. And at the same time these events teach that judgment should be deferred in a doubtful case.

What made Constantine's court Neronian and took the young Crispus from the empire, except hasty irascibility arising from credulity? What drove Herod into a fury against his own blood and affections, except that he believed doubtful and fabricated accusations as though true? Therefore, when you think that you have received an injury, restrain your spirit until you learn something certain. Let anger not rage before reason judges.

If others report something, doubt for a little while. “We ought not,” says Seneca in Book II, Chapter XXIX, “quickly to believe things which have been narrated. Many lie in order to deceive; many because they have been deceived. One man seeks favor by an accusation and feigns an injury in order that he may seem to have grieved at its commission. There is some malicious man who wishes to tear apart close friendships; there is a suspicious man, and one who desires to watch games so that from far away and in safety he may look upon those whom he has brought into collision. If you were to judge concerning a very small sum, the matter would not be proved to you without a witness; a witness would have no force without swearing an oath. You would give both parties an advocate, you would give time, and you would not hear them at the same time; for truth shines forth the more, the more frequently it comes to hand.”

This counsel is altogether golden. If princes and senators were willing to use it, wretched human beings would have avoided half their evils, and they would torment neither themselves with anxiety nor others with hatred.

§ 8. It is most grievous when supreme power has incited itself against an innocent man, because it admits no defense; it does not even permit innocence to be indicated, because it judges this to be a reproach against its unjust fury. Princes are therefore more inflamed by the remedy itself, since integrity itself, as though a witness of their unjust blazing-up, is rendered hateful to them. In turn, however, those princes are rendered most hateful who not only give ear to rash accusers but also believe them, deny access to men justly defending themselves, and moreover grow angry. And, what is the worst vice of the human disposition, because they think that those men have injured them, they hate them. They hate them for this reason: because they judge those men ill-disposed toward them and because they fear them.

For although they know them to be weak, they nevertheless know that there is danger even from an invalid, especially if an adversary, of whatever sort, has been exasperated. For:

> Anger assists hands however weak.

Therefore those who, with anger as leader, proceed to an accusation of princes or the commonwealth, and who declare hostility against more powerful men when they are permitted to be silent, dangerously indulge their own spirit. Let that most familiar saying of the man who grew old in attendance upon kings remain fixed in every mind. When someone asked how he had attained the rarest thing at court, old age, he said, “By receiving injuries and returning thanks.” You stand on sufficiently slippery ground if you preside over a commonwealth or serve a prince; there is no need for you to drive yourself onward.

What did the Roman knights attain when they grieved so greatly that the praetorship had been conferred upon Gnaeus Flavius that they took off their rings and horse-trappings? So great was the impotence of their passions, but it was empty and ridiculous to the more powerful people. For first the people judged that they had thus placed their votes well; for they had ordered Flavius, a man of the lowest condition, to be praetor in order that they might brand proud nobility with grief, and their disgrace would have been lost had the equestrian order not thus grown angry. Next, they alienated the people still more. For, since very many were equal to Gnaeus Flavius and very many inferior to him, all judged that they were despised in him as poor and low. Finally, they showed the people the part by which they lay open to a wound.

§ 9. It happens much more frequently that the cause for raging is light. And the smaller the cause, the more wicked the fury is. If hot water is not properly supplied, they drench the servant with boiling water. If a glass has been broken, a boy is dragged to the moray eels. If a shoe has been spattered with mud, the man who could not guard against it is beaten. If a toga has been disturbed, a day in court is appointed for the man who met it by chance. If a hare is insufficiently suited to the palate, the cook is cut apart by scourges. If one hair is arranged without order, a little maidservant is mangled. What sort of insanity is this? Anger is assuredly blind, or κελαινώπις, dark-eyed, and with its obscure eye it casts one down from the mind. Children dissolve into tears over lost nuts; arthritic men cry out at the suspicion of a touch; every breeze suddenly casts down weak bodies.

It is shameful to say how small a matter compels the most powerful kings into wars; but the same cause entangles private persons in quarrels and lawsuits. Their wars are not milder, nor their angers more civilized; their power is merely less. Wretched is the spirit which is so easily offended: it must be perpetually in grief, because small offenses are never lacking, and often immense ones also remain. The Greeks call μικρολύπους, “small-grievers,” those whom every loss and every adversity afflicts, who boil over at trifles, fashion tragedies out of minute things, and always swell as though in ferment.

Let them instead imitate Cotys. When pottery fashioned with costly workmanship but fragile had been given to him, he broke all of it, lest, if it should be shattered by servants handling it carelessly, it should furnish him an occasion for raging. Who would call Nero sane? He blazed up at the smallest things to such a degree that he ordered many men to be killed because they had praised the divine voice of the prince coldly or had disparaged the pleasures of the prince. He repudiated Octavia and struck out Poppaea's unborn child. While Gaius reigned and conducted many things foolishly, it was a capital crime for nobles to have laughed. In the presence of Tiberius, to have named a goat was a crime of treason, because, bloodthirsty as he was, beneath those broad jaws he wore a beard not unlike one. To have looked down from a higher place and noticed his baldness was punished by no lesser a penalty than if someone had cast stones at him as he passed. Therefore these men must be agitated by perpetual provocations of irascibility.

What of Mindyrides, the most ruined not merely of men but of Sybarites--or rather his name is Smindyrides--concerning whom Herodotus speaks in Book VII and Aelian in Book IX, Chapter XXIV? He boasts that for twenty years he had seen neither the sun rising nor setting. As Athenaeus relates in Book VI, Chapter XII, when he set out for Sicyon, he drew bird-catchers, fishermen, and a thousand cooks along that journey. With how great a care must we suppose him to have lived, how often angry, if there was a danger that he might see the rising or setting of the sun? He trembled at the light of dawn as though at the head of Medusa.

“When he saw someone digging,” says Seneca in Book II, Chapter XXV of On Anger, “and raising the mattock rather high, he complained that he was becoming weary and forbade the man to do the work in his sight. The same man complained more frequently because he had lain upon doubled rose-leaves.” The reading of another book in Justus Lipsius is more astonishing: “The same man complained more frequently that he had bile because he had lain upon doubled rose-leaves.” If things so small, so utterly nothing, aroused not merely anger but so great an anger, what may we think concerning the rest? For if his shoe pressed him, could he not have killed someone?

Even if the causes are neither doubtful nor light, they are nevertheless frequently of such a kind that they must be pardoned in view of the persons, or certainly not imputed. Nabal had inflicted a grave injury upon David, an innocent prince; but when David hastened to avenge himself and his men, he pardoned it at the entreaty of Nabal's wife and in consideration of his stupidity. If the man who injured you is an enemy, it is nothing new; if a friend, charge it to his former good deeds. Let the age of this man, the dignity of that one, and the imprudence of another excuse him. Among equitable judges imprudence is held for innocence. Here the kindness and humanity of Christ the Savior is an example to us, as upon the cross he entreated for those who did not know what they were doing.

§ 10. Finally, if the cause is unjust, anger inflicts the greatest disasters and fills everything with plots and machinations: if a man grows angry because another either was unwilling or unable to drink as much as he ordered; if he refused to be the servant of tyrannical cruelty or lust; if he did not learn to flatter with sufficient abasement. Those dominions were never safe which pressed heavily and angrily upon virtues. But the treatment of these evils pertains to the books concerning war and sedition. Now we transmit those things which are fit for extinguishing so great and destructive a flame; both the things which have been said and those which I am about to say will contribute very greatly to this.

The recollection of oneself has drawn back many who were swift to vengeance and has put the brake upon armed anger. Christians and pagans counsel this alike. Gregory, Morals, Book V, Chapter XXXII: “The second manner of preserving forbearance is that, when we behold the excesses of others, we should consider our own offenses in which we have exceeded against others. For our own infirmity, when considered, excuses the evils of others to us. He patiently tolerates an injury inflicted upon him who piously remembers that perhaps he still possesses something in which he himself ought to be tolerated. And anger is extinguished as though by water when, as fury rises in the mind, each man's own fault is recalled to mind, because he blushes not to spare sins in another when he recollects that he himself has often committed things which need to be pardoned either by God or by his neighbor.”

And Seneca says in Book II, Chapter XXVIII: “But we cannot show ourselves according even to that strictest formula of innocence. We have done some things, thought others, wished others, favored others; in certain things we are innocent because we did not succeed. Thinking of this, let us be more equitable toward offenders; let us yield to those who reproach us; in any case let us not be angry with ourselves--with whom, indeed, shall we not be angry if we are angry even with ourselves?--and least of all with the gods. For we suffer whatever inconvenience befalls us not by their fault but by the law of mortality.”

And again: “Whoever refers to himself how often he has fallen into a false suspicion, how many of his services fortune has clothed with the appearance of injury, and how many men he began to love after hatred, will be able not to grow angry immediately--especially if, silently to himself, at every individual thing by which he is offended, he says, ‘I too have committed this.’ But where will you find so equitable a judge? The man who desires every other man's wife and considers it a sufficiently just cause for loving her that she belongs to another does not wish his own wife to be looked upon; the most severe exactor of fidelity is faithless; the man who pursues lies is himself perjured; the false accuser bears it most ill that a lawsuit is brought against him. He who has not spared his own chastity does not wish that of his little slaves to be assailed.”

We have the faults of others before our eyes; our own are behind our back. Judah acknowledged his sin while, forgetful of his own fornication, he condemned his daughter-in-law to cruel flames. So great is the depravity of the human disposition that men most gravely prosecute offenses to which they themselves are especially liable. Pirates punish the thefts of their comrades with death; men who expend nations upon their own anger pronounce judgment concerning the lawsuits of citizens. “Pardon others much, yourself nothing,” was said to the ancient nations. I fear that this is too difficult for Christians. I shall therefore soften it; perhaps I shall obtain something: pardon something in others, you who pardon everything in yourself. The foolish love of the man who says this is worthy of notice:

> I myself forgive myself.

But if nevertheless this self-love is too tenacious to be struck out, pardon others also. But if you are unwilling to pardon, you will be driven from the state of your mind more quickly than you will correct others by becoming angry. Gregory Nazianzen teaches that anger, when vehemently inflamed, casts and drives a man from the state of his mind.

Solomon too teaches thus, Proverbs 27:3: “A stone is heavy, and sand burdensome, but the anger of a fool is heavier than both.” And Saint Gregory, Morals, Book V, Chapter XXXI: “The heart kindled by the goads of anger throbs, the body trembles, the tongue entangles itself, the face grows fiery, the eyes become fierce, and acquaintances are not recognized at all. The tongue indeed forms an outcry, but the understanding does not know what it speaks. How far, then, is that man from one possessed, who is not conscious of his own action?”

And Seneca, Book II, Chapter XXXVI of On Anger: “This should be considered more: how many men anger has harmed by itself. Some have burst their veins through excessive heat; shouting raised beyond their strength has brought forth blood, and humor driven more violently into the eyes has flooded the sight of their eyes, and the sick have relapsed into diseases. No road to insanity is swifter. Many, therefore, have continued the fury of anger and never recovered the mind which they had driven out.

“Fury drove Ajax to death, anger into fury. Men pray for death for their children, want for themselves, and ruin for their house; and, no less than the insane deny that they are insane, these furious men deny that they are angry. Enemies to their dearest friends, to be avoided by those most dear to them, forgetful of laws except where laws injure, moved by the smallest things, they are accessible neither to speech, duty, nor approach. They conduct everything by force, prepared both to fight with swords and to fall upon them. For the greatest evil has seized them, one surpassing all vices.”

How great is this evil, which even invokes evil upon itself, when the other passions flee evil?

§ 11. It is a delight to see the angers of men behaving insanely and almost furiously. Plutarch's little book Περὶ ἀοργησίας, On Freedom from Anger, is golden. He relates concerning a certain pancratiast that he was so liable to anger that he kicked back against a mule which kicked him. See examples of foolish anger in kings; the first is--and would that it were the last:

> The madness of Cyrus--the Gyndes.

“Cyrus,” says Seneca in Book III, Chapter XXI of On Anger, “was angry with a river. For when he was hastening to war in order to attack Babylon--a war whose greatest moments lie in opportunities--he attempted to cross by a ford the river Gyndes, which spread widely. This is scarcely safe even when it has felt the summer and been reduced to its lowest point. There one of the white horses which were accustomed to draw the royal chariot was swept away and vehemently moved the king. He therefore swore that he would reduce that river, which had taken passage away from royal horses, to such a condition that it could be crossed and even trodden upon by women. He then transferred the whole apparatus of war to this place and remained at the work until, the channel having been divided by one hundred and eighty trenches, he dispersed it into three hundred and sixty streams and left it dry as the waters flowed in diverse directions.

“Therefore time perished, with great loss in vain matters; the ardor of the soldiers, which useless labor broke, perished; and the opportunity of attacking men unprepared perished while he, after declaring war upon the enemy, waged it against the river.” Xerxes was more foolish, for he inflicted three hundred lashes upon the sea. Sapor, king of the Persians, was impious and foolish; when about to depart from Nisibis after his siege had been rendered vain by divine power, he discharged a missile into the air as though about to injure God. Many have turned their angers upon themselves, and this is assuredly the final thing, for every madness consumes itself; and the scorpion, when it has despaired of life, falls upon its own tail with a just wound.

All vices indeed produce anger: avarice, if you cut off profits or bring losses; lust, if you impede loves; and so the remaining vices, whenever the things sought are denied to desire, call angers to their aid. But nothing exasperates anger more than pride, for anger is therefore an opinion of contempt. Hence there are always quarrels among the proud. Hence among nobles, whose ancient vice is pride, there are so many contests, single combats, and plots, because they very easily judge that they have received an injury. Hence in cities which cultivate aristocracy there are very many dissensions. Hence there are destructive laws, dangerous when war approaches, which indulge the anger of the powerful against subjects. Such are either the laws or customs of the Sarmatians by which the life of farmers is held cheap.

§ 12. Nevertheless, patrons of anger are not lacking--indeed, neither are its eulogists. They say that it is useful to the commonwealth and that without it authority is despised. In Plutarch anger is said to be the whetstone of courage, οἷον βαφὴν τὸν θυμόν, ἢ στόμωμα. They say that anger supplies courage with what dye supplies to cloth, which renders it conspicuous, and what steel supplies to iron, to which, when hardened, it imparts firmness and the power of cutting. They say that this appears in all wild animals, and that both for them and for human beings it is a σύμφυτον ὅπλον, "an inborn weapon." The Latins too call it the whetstone of courage.

They say that not to grow angry belongs to sluggishness, and that anger befits brave men: ἔχειν κότον ὅφρα τελέσῃ; and that each man is then truly brave: ὅταν κότον ἔθετο θυμῷ. They say that one must possess anger which is not ineffectual, and that the spirit is then beautifully fortified when anger has been set upon it as a fearsome defense.

Nature herself stands constantly against them and cries out with her inborn voice: namely, that courage was given to her for the defense and preservation of herself; that anger is hostile to her and casts courage itself headlong. "Whether anger is according to nature," says Seneca in Book I, Chapter V of On Anger, "will be plain if we examine the human being. What is gentler than he while his mind's disposition is right? But what is more cruel than anger? What is more loving of others than a human being? What is more hostile than anger? The human being has been born for mutual assistance; anger for destruction. The one wishes to be gathered together, the other to depart; the one to benefit, the other to injure; the one to succor even strangers, the other to assail even the dearest; the one is prepared even to expend itself for the advantages of others, anger to descend into danger provided that it drags another down.

"Who, therefore, is more ignorant of the nature of things than the man who assigns this savage and destructive vice to nature's best and most highly commended work? Anger, as we have said, is greedy for punishment. That desire should be present in the most peaceful breast of a human being is least of all according to his nature. For human life consists in benefits and concord, and is bound into a covenant and common assistance not by terror but by mutual love. What then? Is chastisement not sometimes necessary? Why not? But let it be sincere and accompanied by reason; for it does not injure but heals under the appearance of injuring."

Aristotle, in Book VII, Chapter VII of the Nicomachean Ethics, says that anger is according to nature and numbers it among the ὀρέξεις φυσικὰς, "natural desires"; he says that it is more such than the other desires and therefore worthy of pardon.

But all passions have their origin from nature and ought to be tempered by reason; those which wander beyond the path now destroy nature.

§ 13. Next, courage, unless it rests upon reason and wisdom, is rashness and audacity. Anger is destructive to prudence and hostile to counsel. Nazianzen says prudently:

> Οὐδεὶς μετ' ὀργῆς ἀσφαλῶς βουλεύεται,
>
> Τὰ γὰρ μετ' ὀργῆς οὐδέπω βουλὴν ἔχει.
>
> No one deliberates safely through anger,

> For things done through anger never give place to counsel.

Therefore, not even in the conflicts themselves and in the arena, where there is both a school and a stripping-room for anger, must anger be joined to courage. Pyrrhus, a noble trainer of gladiators, ordered his pupils to lay aside anger. "Anger," he said, "disturbs art." But if anger casts headlong the art which the common people think proper to it, how much more the art of gentleness and prudence, according to which the state is ruled--the art whose business it is to gather many into one and bind them together by mutual charity and friendship?

By no other reason did a few Romans conquer the Cimbri and other nations infinite in number and excelling in courage than because the Romans proceeded into battle with reason, art, and counsel, while those nations, rushing with impetus, ferocity, and unconsidered anger, offered themselves to be slaughtered by barbarians. Therefore not an angry commander but a prudent and brave one must be chosen, one who brings against the enemy not fury but counsel. Anger, therefore, is not the companion of courage. For although a brave and angry man runs forward more swiftly and strikes more violently, nevertheless he acts less bravely because less prudently. He acts incautiously; he can strike but cannot defend himself. Every anger has this characteristic: it is prodigal of itself and attends to what may injure another, not to what may profit itself. Courage is strengthened by time and grows powerful because it uses counsel; anger languishes through delay. Give fury space; it subsides of its own accord.

So far am I from judging that this disease befits brave men that I judge irascible men least brave. The angers of children and women are sharper rather than weightier. Old men, the sick, the thirsty, and the hungry readily become angry. Plutarch certainly attributes anger to weakness in Περὶ ἀοργησίας:

> Ὡς γὰρ οἴδημα μεγάλης ἐστὶν ἐν σαρκὶ πληγῆς πάθος, οὕτως ἡ ταῖς μαλακωτάταις ψυχαῖς ἡ πρὸς τὸ λυπηρὸν ἔνδοσις ἐκφέρει μείζονα θυμὸν ἀπὸ μείζονος ἀσθενείας. Διὸ καὶ γυναῖκες ἀνδρῶν ὀργιλώτεραι, καὶ νοσοῦντες ὑγιαινόντων, καὶ γέροντες ἀκμαζόντων, καὶ δυστυχεῖς πράττοντες εὐτυχούντων.

For as an ulcer or swelling is the affection of some great blow inflicted upon the flesh, so in the softest minds the yielding toward grief expresses and brings forth greater anger from greater weakness. Therefore women are more irascible than men, the sick than the healthy, old men than those in their prime, and the unfortunate than the fortunate.

The teacher of nature speaks no differently in Book II, Chapter II of the Rhetoric: "It is already apparent from these things in what dispositions men themselves grow angry, with whom, and on account of what. Men themselves grow angry when they grieve, for the grieving man desires something. Therefore, whether someone directly obstructs him--as, for example, a thirsty man from drinking--or not directly, he seems in like manner to accomplish the same thing; and if someone resists him, or does not assist him, or disturbs him in any other matter while he is in this disposition, he grows angry at all. For this reason the sick, those laboring under poverty, lovers, the thirsty--in general, those desiring something and not acting rightly--are irascible and fit to be incited.

"They are so especially against those who despise their present condition: the sick in matters which pertain to illness, the man laboring under poverty in matters which pertain to poverty, the warrior in matters which pertain to war, the lover in matters which pertain to love. It is similar also in the other cases; for each person is prepared for his own particular anger by the passion adhering to him."

Anger is therefore a most feeble thing and comes from infirmity. "It is womanish," says Seneca, "to rage in anger." Scripture certainly testifies that there is no anger above the anger of a woman. Thus too the satirist sings in Satire VI:

> Whenever anger makes this sex guilty,

>

> And they are borne along, with rage inflaming the liver,

>

Headlong, like rocks torn from mountain ridges,

>

From which the mountain withdraws and the side recedes down the hanging slope.

Moreover, a woman is more irascible than herself when she bears a child or is heavy with age; thus the Conciliator teaches in Book X of the Problems, Chapter XXXV. Menander says best:

Πολὺ χεῖρόν ἐστιν ἐρετίσαι γραῦν, ἢ κύνα.

It is worse to provoke an old woman than a dog.

§ 14. But that opinion inflicts injury not only upon the most holy martyrs, heroes truly and properly so called, but upon the bravest of all the brave, Christ the Lord, who, for the joy set before him, endured the cross and despised its shame. The highest courage is to stand immovable against pains, death, and torments; the gentlest of human beings have displayed this. Do you judge that Christ was angry when, hanging amid his torments, he said, “Father, forgive them”? Or Stephen, when he repeated the same words amid the blows of those stoning him? Courage, therefore, is most placid. Anger must never be admitted, although it has sometimes been useful by occasion of diverse causes. But in the same way drunkenness too was sometimes useful, because it put tyrants to sleep and freed innocent men. We inquire what is good, not what sometimes obtains good outcomes.

§ 15. How, then, will the rulers of peoples restrain so many desires of the wicked and avenge so many crimes unless they grow angry and terrify by anger?

The answer is ready. Let the wicked fear your justice, prudence, and strength, not your fury. Whatever is feared apart from these is hated; and it is not only hated but dangerous and exposed to contempt. For nothing is more accustomed to be laughed at than irascibility making a commotion in vain. Therefore a prince ought not to be angry at crimes, because, since all things are full of vices, he will never be able to lay aside anger if he thinks that he must be angry at them all. If you wish to be as angry as the unworthiness of crimes demands, you must not become angry but insane. The multitude of offenders removes the prince's anger, for he ought to be angry neither at all together nor at individuals. Let him be not a hater but a corrector of offenders; when punishment is required, let him decree the penalty without passion, in the manner of laws which do not know how to grow angry. Let him punish not so much because sin has been committed, but lest it be committed. A judge's anger renders even the most just sentence suspect. He torments more by his countenance than by death when, in the likeness of a Fury, he carries before him the dreadful face of a dreadful passion.

“Nevertheless, nothing has profited equally,” says Seneca in Book II, Chapter XXXV of On Anger, “with first looking upon the deformity of the thing, and then its danger. The face of no passion is more disturbed. It has made the most beautiful countenances foul and rendered savage faces out of the most tranquil. All grace abandons the angry; and even if a man's clothing has been arranged according to rule, he will drag his garment and pour out every care of himself. If the natural or artificial arrangement of his lying hair is not unshapely, it bristles together with his mind. The veins swell; the breast is shaken by frequent breath; a rabid eruption of the voice distends the neck. Then the limbs tremble, the hands are restless, the whole body fluctuates. What sort of mind do you suppose to be within when its image without is so foul? How much more terrible is the countenance within its breast, how much sharper the breath, how much more intense the impetus, which will burst itself unless it breaks forth? As are the appearances of enemies or wild beasts drenched in slaughter or going to slaughter; as the poets fashioned infernal monsters, girded with serpents and fiery breath; as the foulest Furies go forth to excite wars, divide discord among peoples, and tear apart peace--such let us picture anger to ourselves: its eyes burning with flame; resounding with hissing, bellowing, groaning, and shrieking, and with whatever voice is more hateful than these; shaking weapons in both hands, for it has no care to hide itself; savage and bloody, scarred and livid from its own blows; of the gait of a madman; covered with much darkness; rushing upon, laying waste, and putting to flight; laboring under the hatred of all, especially of itself; desiring, if it cannot injure otherwise, that lands, seas, and heaven should fall; equally hostile and hated. Or, if it seems better, let it be such as it is among our poets:

> Bellona shaking a bloody scourge in her right hand,
>
> >
> Or Discord goes rejoicing in her torn mantle.

A judge incurs the hatred of all when he attributes to his own passions what is owed to public utility. Everyone pities a defendant, although he deserves the utmost punishment, if they perceive that his judge is angry with him. A physician looks upon so many sick persons without indignation; a surgeon, when he cuts, burns, and, more gravely than a torturer, tears away flesh, does not grow angry. Therefore let every magistrate who belongs to the Christian profession imitate the gentleness of Christ, the holy martyrs, and the bishops. Let him strive with every effort to remove the angers, insults, and hostilities of citizens. Let him order those whose angers and contentions he knows to be incurable to go into exile. If they have dared crimes, let him visit them with deserved punishment. Let him never permit the anger of the more powerful to determine the punishment of a weaker man.

Unless he diligently takes care of this, immense difficulties will arise not only when advantage is displayed and the profit of crime set before men, but also when an insatiable zeal for conquering has occupied their spirits. The ardor of contention has exasperated many lawsuits which were light at the beginning. Contention from contention, anger from anger, as an image from an image when mirrors are placed opposite one another, is born, and evils are multiplied by their mutual reflections.

Look at the Roman commonwealth in Nero's age and you will not marvel that it fell. Seneca says in Book II of On Anger: “One man accuses the judgments of his father, which it would have been preferable to deserve; another stands in litigation with his mother; another comes as informer of a crime of which he is a manifest defendant; and a judge is chosen who is to condemn things which he himself has done; and the surrounding crowd is corrupted in favor of a bad case by the good voice of its advocate. Why do I pursue individual things? When you see the forum filled with a multitude, the enclosures full with the concourse of every class, and that circle in which the people displays the greatest part of itself, know this: there are as many vices there as human beings.

“Among those whom you see wearing the toga there is no peace. One is led to another's destruction for a slight profit. No one gains except from another's loss. They hate the fortunate and despise the unfortunate. They are burdened by a greater man and burdensome to a lesser. They are goaded by diverse desires. They desire that all things be destroyed for a slight pleasure and plunder. Life is no different from a gladiatorial school, since men live and fight with the same persons. It is an assembly of wild beasts, except that wild beasts are placid among themselves and abstain from biting their own kind, while these men are satiated by mutual laceration. In this one respect they differ from speechless animals: the latter become tame toward those who use them; the madness of the former devours the very men by whom it is nourished.”

§ 16. I wish the prince to be tireless, diligent, effective, and active; I forbid him to be irascible. Clemency agrees well with grave punishment; anger never does. Saint Cyprian says in his book On the Lapsed: “He is an unskilled physician who handles the swelling recesses of wounds with a sparing hand and, by preserving the poison enclosed in the deep recesses of the entrails, increases it. The wound must be opened and cut, and, after the putrid parts have been amputated, treated with a stronger remedy. Let the impatient sick man shout and cry out and complain through pain; afterward he will give thanks when he has perceived health.”

Often in the commonwealth safety is sought by severity, which is certainly necessary in military service. A distinguished commander, according to Tacitus in Book XIII, contained his army by severity. A soldier was noted who, carrying a bundle of wood, had his hands frozen so rigidly that, adhering to the burden, they fell away from the truncated arms. The commander himself, lightly clothed and with his head uncovered, was frequently present in the marching column and in labors, displaying praise to the vigorous, comfort to the weak, and an example to all. Then, because many refused and deserted on account of the harshness of the climate and military service, a remedy was sought by severity. For, unlike in other armies, a first and second offense was not pursued with pardon; rather, one who had abandoned the standards immediately paid the penalty with his head. This appeared wholesome in practice and better than mercy, for fewer deserted that camp than those in which pardon was given.

§ 17. The same thing often occurs in a kingdom. But just as discipline ought not to be dissolved by leniency, so harshness ought altogether to be absent. How dreadful and wicked was Piso's argument, which put justice forward as a pretext for the most unjust fury! Seneca relates it in Book I, Chapter XVI of On Anger:

“Gnaeus Piso was in our memory a man free from many vices, but depraved and one to whom rigor was pleasing in place of constancy. In anger he had ordered that man to be led away who had returned from leave without his fellow-soldier, as though he had killed the man whom he did not produce. When the soldier asked for some time to search, Piso did not give it. Condemned, he was led outside the rampart and was already extending his neck when suddenly that fellow-soldier who was thought to have been killed appeared. Then the centurion set over the execution ordered the executioner to sheath his sword and led the condemned man back to Piso, intending to return innocence to Piso, for fortune had returned the soldier. Amid an immense concourse the fellow-soldiers were led in, embracing one another, with great joy in the camp.

“Piso, raging, ascended the tribunal and ordered both to be led away: both the soldier who had not killed and the one who had not perished. What could be more unworthy than this? Because one innocent man had appeared, two were perishing. Piso added a third, for he ordered the very centurion who had led the condemned man back to be led away. Three men were stationed in that same place to perish on account of one man's innocence. O how ingenious irascibility is at fashioning causes of fury! ‘I order you,’ he said, ‘to be led away because you were condemned; you, because you were the cause of your fellow-soldier's condemnation; you, because, though ordered to kill, you did not obey your commander.’ He contrived how he might make three crimes because he had found none.”

This anger destroys everything, and the world deservedly attributes to angers its destructions, which rage by turns everywhere and always make devastation in some place. The same Seneca--whom I produce more frequently in this place because among all pagans he wrote most effectively concerning anger--says in Book I, Chapter II: “Now, if you wish to look upon its effects and harms, no plague has cost the human race more. You will see slaughter and poisonings, the mutual filth of defendants, the disasters of cities, the destructions of whole nations, the heads of princes put up for sale beneath the public spear, torches placed beneath roofs, and fires not confined within walls but immense expanses of regions shining with hostile flame.

“Look upon the foundations of the noblest cities, scarcely discernible: anger cast them down. Look upon the solitudes deserted without habitation for many thousands of miles: anger exhausted them. Look upon so many commanders delivered to memory as examples of an evil fate: anger stabbed one in his bed; struck another amid the sacred rites of the table; tore another apart amid the laws and the crowded spectacle of the forum; ordered another to give his blood to the parricide of a son; another to open a royal throat by a servile hand; another to divide his limbs upon crosses. And thus far I relate the punishments of individuals.

“What if it should please you, leaving those against whom anger blazed individually, to look upon assemblies cut down by the sword, a plebs slaughtered after soldiers were sent in, and entire peoples condemned to capital punishment for indiscriminate destruction, as though they had abandoned our care or despised our authority?”

§ 18. I have spoken concerning the moderation of anger and am about to pass to other matters. I give the admonition which others gave long ago: namely, the greatest remedy for anger is delay. Do not initially ask anger to pardon, but to judge. It will cease if it waits. Do not attempt to remove the whole of it at once; its first impulses are grave. It is wholly conquered while it is plucked away in parts.

Athenodorus, now an old man--I think he was the man who was the teacher of Dionysius the Areopagite--when he had obtained his discharge from Augustus, left this final command to the emperor while saying farewell: “When you are angry, say or do nothing before you have recited to yourself the names of the twenty-four Greek letters.” Delighted by this saying, Augustus took hold of his right hand and said, “I still need you present,” and kept him with himself for a whole year.

But if you will listen to me for a little while, O prince, when you are angry, do nothing and say nothing unless you have first said the Lord's Prayer in your heart. Or, if this is too much, at least run through these words: “And forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors.” But if a mind twisted by anger cannot be directed toward prayer, merely recite some sentence, for example Matthew 6:14: “For if you forgive human beings their sins, your heavenly Father will also forgive your offenses. But if you do not forgive human beings, neither will your Father forgive your offenses.”

Or Chapter 5:22: “But I say to you that everyone who is angry with his brother will be liable to judgment. But he who says to his brother, ‘Raca,’ will be liable to the council. But he who says, ‘Fool,’ will be liable to the Gehenna of fire.”

Or Job 28: “An irascible man kindles a quarrel, and a sinful man will trouble friends and cast enmity into the midst of those possessing peace.”

Or Proverbs 15:1: “A soft answer breaks anger; a hard word arouses fury.”

Or Job 36:18: “Therefore let anger not overcome you, so that you oppress someone.”

Or Ecclesiastes 11:10: “Remove anger from your heart.”

Or Ephesians 4:31: “Let all bitterness and anger and indignation and clamor and blasphemy be taken away from us, with all malice.”

But if he does not admit even sacred counsels, let him take some pagan as counsellor and say:

> He who will not moderate his anger
>
> Will wish undone what grief and mind have counselled,
>
> While he hastens by force to exact penalties for unavenged hatred.
>
> Anger is a brief madness. Rule your spirit, which, unless it obeys,
>
> Commands. Restrain it with bridles, restrain it with a chain.

An angry man understands his error after the deed.

If you are angry, you are mad.

Trust no angry man--not even your own spirit.

The irascibility of a good man quickly dies.

CHAPTER XVI

Clemency Must Be Cultivated in Every Commonwealth

§ 1. Gentleness and clemency are twin virtues. They almost always advance with equal step and conspire toward one effect of human actions. Gentleness is the moderator of anger according to right reason; clemency, of punishments. Saint Thomas refers both, by a certain likeness, to temperance in Summa theologiae II-II, Question 157, Article 3. For just as temperance restrains pleasures within the circuit of reason and does not permit them to pass beyond the limits of honor, so gentleness mitigates that most ferocious beast, anger, confined with chains and in prison, and renders it tame, so that it not only does no injury but even contains itself within the lawful and prescribed bounds of justice.

Thus clemency is not that which abstains from raging through force and injustice, but that which inflicts milder punishments than the rigor of law. Clemency is the temperance of the mind in the power of taking vengeance; or the lenity of a superior toward an inferior in establishing punishments; or an inclination of the mind toward lenity in exacting punishment; or the virtue which remits something of a merited and owed punishment. These definitions are Seneca's, from Book II, Chapter III of On Clemency. Clearer, and one which removes objections, is the definition of Lipsius in Book II, Chapter XII: “Clemency is the virtue which, with judgment, inclines the mind away from punishment or vengeance toward lenity.”

§ 2. Although they are the most excellent virtues and strengthen the throne of a kingdom, as is said in Proverbs 20:28, nevertheless a controversy concerning the status of both is raised by men who teach how to dispute rather than how to live. “Gentleness,” they say, “diminishes anger, and clemency punishments; but virtue consists in the mean. These virtues, however, supply less than what is due; therefore they stand short of the right and of those boundaries which the norm of virtue has fixed.”

But we must hold the teaching not only of the Sacred Scriptures but also of the more moderate philosophers and political writers: that gentleness and clemency are distinguished virtues, and indeed so honorable that the other virtues sometimes defer to them. Gentleness diminishes anger because, since an appetite for vengeance is innate in all and taking vengeance is sweet to an angry man, and since no one readily judges injuries inflicted upon himself to be small, a most noble virtue is engaged in a great contest.

Clemency indeed remits the punishment which legal justice demands according to the common law, yet is not unjust but benign. For according to right reason it remits the punishment owed, or a part of the punishment. It does this on account of certain particular circumstances, the consideration of which causes a departure from severity in punishing to be right. Therefore clemency is contrary neither to severity nor to justice, for no virtue is opposed to another virtue. Severity according to right reason exacts punishments when, from whom, and of what magnitude they are to be exacted. Clemency, led by the same reason, remits them in the proper place and time.

Thus ἐπιείκεια, equity, which benignly interprets the words of a rigid law according to the legislator's intention and judges according to it, does not overthrow justice, but recalls the highest law--which is often the highest injustice--to equity, indeed, if we wish to confess the truth, to justice. “But if justice,” they say, “demands punishment, clemency cannot remit it unless it oppresses justice.” On the contrary, the common law demands punishment and gives the power of exacting it. Nevertheless, it does not prohibit pity, pardon, or mitigation for certain causes. Nor is any legislator, or ought any legislator to be, so tenacious of his laws that he does not sometimes leave a place for prayers and humanity.

Cruelty is opposed to clemency; it is atrocity of mind in exacting punishments. Seneca, Book II, Chapter IV of On Anger: “What, then, is opposed to clemency? Cruelty, which is nothing other than atrocity of mind in exacting punishments. But some do not exact punishments and nevertheless are cruel--as those who kill unknown persons whom they meet, not for profit but for the sake of killing. Not content to kill, they rage, as did Sinis and Procrustes and the pirates who scourge captives and place them alive upon the fire.

“This indeed is cruelty; but because it does not follow vengeance--for it was not injured--and does not grow angry at any sin--for no crime preceded it--it falls outside our definition, which contained intemperance of mind in exacting punishments. We can say that this is not cruelty but ferocity, whose pleasure is savagery; we can call it insanity, for its kinds are various, and none is more certain than that which arrives at the slaughter and mangling of human beings. Therefore I shall call cruel those who possess a cause for punishing but possess no measure.”

Cruelty therefore exasperates punishments. Sometimes it rages without cause, from the pleasure of another's pain alone, by which many violate justice, charity, mercy, clemency, and every divine and human law. They are not human beings but savage beasts which bite more than they hunger.

§ 3. I shall treat three things in this chapter. First, I shall show that in very many kings anger has ruled in place of gentleness and cruelty in place of clemency. Second, I shall teach how necessary clemency is to the commonwealth and how harmful cruelty is. Third, I shall explain what the measure of clemency is, lest discipline and the force of laws be weakened.

§ 4. Among the other vices of the nations, the Apostle Paul enumerates in Romans 1:31 that they are ἀνελεήμονας, unmerciful, murderous, and therefore cruel. Stoic ἀπάθεια, apathy, inflamed those vices when the Stoics denied that pity and pardon belonged to a wise man. But Seneca errs with the Stoics. For mercy is a pain of the will, or displeasure, conceived according to right reason concerning another's misery; there is no need for passion or grief which pour themselves out into lamentation and wailing. But that movement of the lower appetite--whether fellow-suffering or emotion--is not only not a vice if it is governed by right reason, but even serves true mercy, which resides in the will and is a virtue. The Apostle must be heard: “Weep with those who weep.”

That movement of the mind serves reason when mercy is supplied in such a way that justice is preserved, whether something is given to the needy or pardon to the penitent. Nevertheless, that movement of the appetitive power is not necessary to mercy, for the will alone, aided by reason, can have mercy. Augustine therefore clearly refutes the Stoics in Book I, Chapter XXVII of On the Morals of the Catholic Church:

“Therefore all those who courteously and humanely supply the things by which evils or disadvantages of this kind are resisted are called merciful, even if they are wise to such a degree that they are now disturbed by no pain of mind. For who does not know that mercy is so named because it makes the heart miserable by fellow-suffering with another's evil? And who would not concede that the wise man ought to be free from every misery when he assists the needy, supplies food to the hungry and drink to the thirsty, clothes the naked, receives the stranger beneath a roof, frees the oppressed, and finally extends his humanity as far as the burial of the dead? Even if he does this with a tranquil mind, goaded by no stings of pain but led by the duty of goodness, he must nevertheless be called merciful. For the name does him no harm when misery is absent.

“But fools, when they avoid mercy as though a vice, because they cannot be sufficiently moved by duty if they are not also moved by a disturbance, are frozen rather by the cold of inhumanity than made serene by the tranquility of reason. Therefore God himself is said much more prudently to be merciful. How he is so called remains for those to understand who have made themselves fit by religion and study, lest, when we ineptly use the words of the learned, we make the souls of the unlearned grow hard by avoiding mercy before we make them grow gentle by seeking benignity. And, as mercy commands us to drive these disadvantages away from a human being, so innocence prohibits us from inflicting them.”

Therefore I altogether prefer a mercy which even makes the heart miserable and sorrowful, which burns when someone is scandalized, which cries out with David, “Absalom, my son, my son Absalom,” which with Christ lifts its eyes over Jerusalem and weeps, to that harsh philosophy which hardens minds to every inhumanity and inflames cruelty.

§ 5. Therefore all the dominions of the ancient nations fell into the highest cruelty just as into other vices. And properly that passion which Aristotle describes in Book VII, Chapter I of the Nicomachean Ethics is called θηριότης, bestiality. Thus, if--as they say--men become gods on account of the excellence and preeminence of virtue, that disposition of mind which is opposed to this bestial disposition will assuredly be such a disposition. For just as neither vice nor virtue belongs to a wild beast, so neither belongs to gods; but the divine disposition is something more excellent and honorable than virtue, while the other is another kind distinct from vice.

But since it very rarely happens that a divine man exists--as the Pavones are accustomed to call and salute a man divine whom they greatly admire, saying, "O divine man"--so among human beings someone resembling wild beasts in nature is rarely found. Certain inhumanities of this kind, however, are produced by diseases and debilities of the limbs. And we call those human beings who excel others in vice savage and inhuman by a foul and infamous name. But something will have to be said later by us concerning this passion of mind.

And in Chapter VI: "But since some things are pleasant by nature, and of these some are pleasant simply and absolutely, others to diverse classes of living creatures and human beings; while other things are not pleasant by nature but become pleasant partly on account of debilities of bodies, partly on account of habit, and partly on account of vicious natures, it is possible in each of these to observe similar dispositions. I call inhuman and bestial dispositions such as that of the woman who, they say, was accustomed to cut open pregnant women who had reached full term and devour the children; or such things as certain savage peoples around Pontus are reported to delight in--some in raw flesh, others in human flesh, others in giving their children to one another for feasts; or such as that which is commonly said concerning Phalaris. These, then, are bestial dispositions.

"Others arise in some men on account of diseases and madnesses, such as the man who sacrificed and ate his mother and the man who ate the liver of his fellow-slave. Other diseased dispositions proceed from habit, such as pulling out hair, gnawing nails, and eating charcoal and earth; in addition, sexual intercourse with males. For these desires are natural to some and arise in others from habit, as in those who were accustomed to them from boyhood. And no one would call any of those for whom nature supplies the cause incontinent, just as no one calls women incontinent because in sexual intercourse they do not act but are acted upon. By the same reasoning, neither do we call those incontinent who have contracted by habit a vice similar to disease.

"To be tempted by each of these evils of the mind is to pass beyond the limits and boundaries of vice, just as by ferocity it is to approach very near the nature of beasts. But to be superior or inferior when tempted and affected by these things is not simple continence or incontinence, but is so by resemblance; just as we ought not to call that man incontinent in respect of this disturbance who is so affected in anger that he is conquered by it.

"For every viciousness exceeding measure--madness, timidity, intemperance, and savagery--is either bestial or diseased."

Aristotle speaks rightly in the remaining things, but altogether badly in this: that he recognizes few men, and only among the barbarians, as θηριώδεις, bestial and inhuman. I must demonstrate the contrary, so that from this part at least it may appear what Christian piety has conferred upon the world.

§ 6. The most ancient vice of the human race is to rage against the associates of one's own kind. While his brother was alive, the world seemed narrow to Cain. The giants before the flood were avaricious, cruel, and lustful. Scarcely had the world been restored when Nimrod seized tyranny; and while Abraham was alive, and Noah, Shem, and others were still mourning, kings prepared distant wars, Genesis 13. Moses shows in many places that the custom of lusting and raging existed when he writes that Abraham asked Sarah to say that she was his sister, lest perhaps she should be seized and, after her husband had been killed, an empty marriage-bed should be allotted to the ravisher. They judged homicide a lesser evil than adultery. So cheap was human blood to a human being while the world was still empty.

Nor was Pharaoh gentler toward the infants of the Jews; nor was the utmost cruelty absent from the most ancient wars of the Emim, Horites, Zamzummim, and Cappadocians, when entire nations were destroyed. What happened in Palestine? Did not seventy kings, the extremities of their hands and feet having been amputated, gather crumbs beneath the table of Adoni-bezek? But most cruelties of very ancient times lie hidden because men were lacking who might transmit them to posterity.

Let us look upon the cruelty of the four most celebrated monarchies, for in them we shall find the human race raging. The first is called either Assyrian or Chaldaean, for they are customarily joined. Habakkuk describes the Chaldaeans for us, Chapter 1:6: “For behold, I shall raise up the Chaldaeans, a bitter and swift nation, walking over the breadth of the earth to possess dwellings not its own. It is horrible and terrible; from itself its judgment and burden shall go forth. Its horses are lighter than leopards and swifter than evening wolves, and its horsemen shall be spread abroad; for its horsemen shall come from far away; they shall fly like an eagle hastening to eat. All shall come for plunder; their faces are a burning wind, and it shall gather captivity like sand. It shall triumph over kings, and tyrants shall be its mockery. It shall laugh at every fortification, heap up an embankment, and take it.”

And Isaiah 14:5: “He has broken the staff of the wicked, the rod of rulers, which struck peoples in indignation with an incurable wound, which subjected nations in fury, which pursued cruelly.” And verse 12: “Have you fallen to the earth, you who wounded the nations?” And verse 17: “Is this the man who disturbed the earth, who shook kingdoms, who made the world a desert and destroyed its cities, who did not open the prison to his captives?” And verse 20: “For you have destroyed your land; you have killed your people. The seed of the wicked shall not be named forever. Prepare his sons for slaughter.” Daniel too says that he killed those whom he wished.

The administration of that kingdom was therefore grievous and tyrannical. Daniel 7:4 compares it to a lioness: “The first was like a lioness and had wings like an eagle.” Jerome says that it is called a lioness, לאיבל, on account of luxury and cruelty, for the female is more savage than the male. Those who have written concerning the natures of beasts say that lionesses are more ferocious, especially if they nourish cubs, and always eager for intercourse. Cruelty and womanishness are perpetually connected.

Moreover, the lioness is swift with an eagle's wings, as Habakkuk too describes it. The hunger of a lion is more savage because it never returns to the remains of prey but always threatens warm blood. The tyranny of eagles too is celebrated, for Olaus says in Book XIX, Chapter VII that one pair requires a broad territory for plundering. He then relates how much profit northern farmers make from two chicks which they compel to hunger, while their anxious parents carry every kind of game into the nests. Therefore the Chaldaean monarchy is a γρυπαετὸς ἀγκυλοχείλης, a crooked-beaked griffin-eagle; and I judge that the tale concerning the griffin-eagle arose from Daniel and that report. Thus that eagle in Jeremiah 48:40 brings extreme calamity upon the Moabites: “Behold, like an eagle he shall fly and extend his hands against Moab.” And Lamentations 4:19: “Our persecutors were swifter than the eagles of heaven, and they pursued us over the mountains.” This, therefore, was the cruelty of the Chaldaeans and Assyrians.

§ 7. But that of the Medes and Persians was much greater. Daniel speaks thus concerning the second monarchy, Chapter 7, verse 5: “And behold another beast like a bear; it stood upon one part, and there were three rows in its order and in its teeth, and thus they said to it: ‘Arise, eat very much flesh.’” The bear is a beast of foul and ignoble savagery:

> Do not, though ruined by its rabid mouth,
>
> Try the nose of a bear steaming with wine;
>

Though it be placid and lick your fingers and hands,

>

If pain and bile, if just anger should compel it,

>

It will be a bear.

It is an omnivorous and faithless animal. It surpasses all beasts in ferocity, as Philostratus says. But the most rabid of bears are in Persia. “Persian bears rage beyond all madness,” says Marcellinus. The three rows of teeth indicate this, and so does that incitement: “Arise, eat very much flesh.” They devoured very many kingdoms; and among them Babylon first experienced their ferocity and raw hunger. Whoever reads its most wretched destruction will recognize the work of the Medes and Persians. Isaiah 13:17: “Behold, I shall raise up against them the Medes, who do not seek silver nor desire gold; but with arrows they shall kill little children, shall not pity the wombs of nursing mothers, and their eye shall not spare sons.”

Ammianus says in Book XXX that the Persian nation always exercised a cruel variety of punishments. Hence the flaying of the living, in the same author's Book XXXIII; hence the deaths of relatives in Xenophon, Book III of the Ἀνάβασις, Anabasis; hence the burying of living persons in Herodotus, Books VIII and IV; burning men alive in Ctesias's fragments. See also Heliodorus, Book VIII of the Aethiopian History, Socrates, Book I, Chapter XXII, and Procopius, Book I of the Persian War, witnesses of the utmost and savage inhumanity.

Cyrus himself, greedy for blood, paid the penalty for cruelty with blood. What Darius did against the seven nobles is related both by others and briefly by Valerius in Book VI. But Ochus, who was afterward called Darius, was bound by the oath most sacred among the Persians not to kill by poison, sword, any violence, or deprivation of food any of the conspirators who had overthrown the seven Magi with him. He devised a crueller manner of death by which he might remove those burdensome to him without breaking the bond of religion. He enclosed a place with high walls and filled it with ashes, and, after setting up a projecting beam, placed upon it men benignly received with food and drink; when overcome by sleep, they fell from it into that treacherous heap.

Concerning the other Ochus: the cruelty of another Ochus, surnamed Artaxerxes, was more open and more loathsome. He buried alive Ocha, his sister and at the same time his mother-in-law; and he fixed his paternal uncle, together with more than one hundred sons and grandsons, with javelins in an empty, abandoned enclosure. He had been provoked by no injury, but saw that among the Persians the greatest praise for probity and courage consisted in these things.

Among their cruel punishments was σκαφισμός, scaphism, by which Mithridates died in Plutarch's Artaxerxes; it lasted seventeen days, while his body was almost devoured by worms. Memnon--in Book II of Xenophon's Ἀνάβασις--was tortured ἐπὶ δὲ ἐνιαυτόν, for an entire year. Nor is this novel: a royal woman tortured her sister's physician in this way.

But what sort were they toward enemies? Justin relates in Book X that eight hundred men met Alexander after suffering servitude with part of the body truncated. Were so many mutilated together in one place? Things not dissimilar are found in Curtius, Book III. Diodorus Siculus speaks concerning the same men in Book XVIII:

Ἠκρωτηριασμένοι ὄντες πάντες, οἱ μὲν χεῖρας, οἱ δὲ πόδας, οἱ δὲ ὦτα καὶ ῥῖνας.

All had their extremities mutilated: some their hands, others their feet, others their ears and noses. Let the deeds of Cambyses in Egypt be seen in Herodotus, Book III. The calamity of the Rhinocolura came from a Persian king according to Seneca, Book III, Chapter XX of On Anger. Diodorus in Book I, Chapter II of the Library and Strabo in Book XVI attribute it to the king of the Ethiopians.

Plutarch, in his book Which Animals Are More Clever, recalls how they hunted human beings; Herodotus explains the method in Book VI:

> Ὁ δὲ ναυτικὸς στρατὸς, ὑστερέων χειμερινὰς περὶ Μίλητον τῷ δευτέρῳ ἔτει, ὡς ἀνέπλωσε, αἱρέει ἐπιθέων τὰς νήσους, τὰς πρὸς τῇ ἠπείρῳ κειμένας, Χίον, καὶ Λέσβον, καὶ Τένεδον, δίκην σαγήνης. Τῶν νήσων, ὡς ἑκάστην αἱρέοιτο οἱ βάρβαροι, ἐσαγήνευον τοὺς ἀνθρώπους· σαγηνεύουσι δὲ τὸν τρόπον, ἀνὴρ ἀνδρὸς ἀψάμενος τῆς χερὸς ἐκ θαλάσσης τῆς βορέης ἐπὶ τὴν νοτίην διήκουσι, καὶ ἔπειτα διὰ πάσης τῆς νήσου διέρχονται, ἐκθηρεύοντες τοὺς ἀνθρώπους. Αἱρέοντο δὲ καὶ τὰς ἐν ἠπείρῳ πόλιας, τὰς Ἰάδας, κατὰ ταὐτὰ, πλὴν οὐκ ἐσαγήνευον τοὺς ἀνθρώπους, οὐ γὰρ οἷά τε ἦν.

The Persian naval army, after wintering around Miletus in the second year, when it sailed up, quickly occupied the islands situated near the mainland: Chios, Lesbos, and Tenedos. After the barbarians occupied each of the islands, they caught the human beings with a dragnet. They caught them with a dragnet in this manner: man grasping man's hand, they advanced from the northern shore to the southern and hunted the human beings. They also took the Ionian cities on the mainland, but did not enclose the human beings in a dragnet, for it could not be done.

§ 8. Lest you hope for milder things, the leopard avenges the cruelty of the bear. The kingdom of Greece chastises Persian savagery with another barbarity. For thus Daniel 7:6 says: “After this I looked, and behold another beast like a leopard; and it had four wings like a bird upon itself, and four heads were upon the beast, and power was given to it.” Four wings, that it may surpass the lion; four heads, that it may tear apart the bear. It is the swiftest animal and overtakes wild beasts by three or four bounds. Pollux says that the leopard's body is ὑγρὸν, εὔελικτον, πηδητικόν, ἁλτικόν, εὔπαλες: moist, flexible, fit for leaps, springing, and pugnacious.

Alexander cast down the bear in the course of a few victories; afterward he himself died, the leading men who had lived with him were quickly removed, and the rest languished. But the leopard's ferocity must be discussed. Alexander, after overthrowing Thebes and oppressing Greece, inaugurated the Persian War with the slaughter of brothers and relatives. He sent an entire nation as funeral victims to Hephaestion. He himself--which is an indication of great cruelty--was more desirous of wine than all mortals and therefore in this part too was a leopard, for leopards also are devoted to wine and were generally captured through drunkenness, as Oppian relates.

Cruelty is the companion of drunkenness, as Seneca truly says in Epistle LXXXIII: “This thing rendered him an enemy of the commonwealth, this rendered him unequal to his enemies, this rendered him cruel: when the heads of the leading men of the state were brought to him while he dined; when, amid the most elaborate feasts and royal luxury, he identified the faces and hands of proscribed men; when, heavy with wine, he nevertheless thirsted for blood. What he did when drunk was intolerable even if he had done it when sober; how much more intolerable that he did these things amid drunkenness itself? Cruelty generally follows vinousness, for the sanity of the mind is violated and exasperated. Just as lingering diseases render eyes difficult even at the smallest offense of a sunbeam, so continual bouts of drunkenness render minds savage. For since they are frequently not in possession of themselves, vices hardened by the habit of insanity and conceived in wine have force even without it.”

Certainly Alexander's drunkenness destroyed more friends than the many battles which he entered. The leopard's peculiar characteristic, however, is malicious and raw deceit. For if its attack is cheated of its prey, it turns against the hunter. Therefore those who use it in hunting always keep sheep, lambs, and other things at hand with which they appease the fury from which the greater beast escaped. Nothing is more like the cruelty of the Greek monarchy. Alexander's fellow-soldiers first, and then his successors, turned their arms against one another. Nowhere were there more or more atrocious crimes and slaughters than among the Seleucids, Ptolemies, and Macedonians. For there were perpetual butcheries of nations in Greece, Egypt, Syria, and Asia, and the outcomes of royal families were horrible and mournful.

§ 9. While the third beast rages, a fourth grows for its destruction, namely the Roman Empire, which Daniel describes thus: “After this I looked in a vision of the night, and behold a fourth beast, terrible and wondrous and exceedingly strong. It had great iron teeth, eating and breaking in pieces and trampling the remainder with its feet.”

First, he calls it terrible, which properly belongs to inhumanity; for animals are feared not on account of their size, however vast they may be, but because they are cruel and bloodthirsty. The Hebrew names it דחלית, dechila, a word used of great terror; thus זלחד, dechalan. Among the Chaldaeans demons are so called because they are greatly feared. Second, it is wondrous; the Septuagint names it ἔκθαμβον, because it renders men astonished with terror. Third, it is strong in treasury and cities. Fourth, its iron teeth are strong emperors, armies, and fleets. Fifth, it eats and breaks in pieces the forces of enemies and the spoils of provinces. For it was not enough to enrich one king: so many patricians, proconsuls, and governors had to be filled from the wretched provinces; new colonies had to be received; land had to be yielded.

How great was Rome itself? Lipsius, in Books I, Chapters II and III of On Roman Greatness, says that in the time of Augustus there were more than 320,000 poorer citizens who lived from the public treasury--that is, from the sweat and blood of the provinces. And not only they: from the same plunder the rich, the equestrian order, and senators lived luxuriously. Add to these wives, children, and little slaves, and you will make an entire nation. It was customary to draw along great armies of slaves. Crassus maintained five hundred craftsmen in his household; others maintained more. The number of slaves at Rome was immense. When it was once discussed in the senate that slaves should use one kind of clothing and free persons another, it was understood how dangerous it would be if slaves began to count the free, as Seneca teaches. The same man in the Consolation to Helvia indicates that the crowd of foreigners at Rome was greater than that of citizens. The courts of the Caesars contained up to one hundred thousand. Now weigh the distributions, games, public banquets, and other insanities, and you will understand that so voracious a beast could not exist without the blood of many animals.

These things, therefore, are cruel; but the Holy Spirit indicates in those words a distinguished inhumanity not used so furiously by the other monarchies: “And trampling the remainder with its feet.” A ferocious and bloodthirsty beast for which it is too little to feed, grow fat, and be distended upon the deaths of the weak unless, through savagery and most arrogant contempt, it also insults the perishing.

There were two things grievous to the whole world. The first was the Roman games: Circensian, theatrical, and others. The preparations for trifles were immense. In the Agamemnon there were six hundred mules. A theater was covered with gold by Nero for one day. Caesar at his father's funeral made the equipment of the stage silver, and he was not yet Caesar, had not yet plundered Gaul or the city. In Pliny's time silver stages existed everywhere in colonies and municipalities. I have spoken above concerning Heliogabalus, who exhibited naval Circensian games in canals full of wine. These had to be long and broad so that ships might run in them; I judge that scarcely one year's wine was enough for so great a madness.

Add not only the preparation and sails floating over the full theater, but also the things cast among the people--namely, that at Rome the Arabs were drenched by their own rains. Tiraquellus in Octavius: “Things of every kind were scattered and cast among the people: on every day, each day a thousand birds; a manifold store of every kind; vouchers for grain, clothing, gold, silver, gems, pearls, painted panels, beasts of burden, and even tame wild beasts; finally ships, islands, and estates.”

But the chief point of cruelty was in the amphitheater, where human beings died solely for the pleasure of the spectators. Let the reader consult the Saturnalia of the most learned Justus if this matter is his concern. In individual years the arena consumed two hundred thousand--or rather three hundred thousand--human beings in the most cruel pleasures. Caesar presented hunts for five days, and finally a battle was joined on each side with five hundred infantrymen, twenty elephants, and thirty horsemen. Tranquillus, Julius, Chapter XXXIX. The same man brought forward biremes, triremes, and quadriremes in a naval battle with a great number of fighters. Tranquillus speaks concerning Augustus in Chapter XLIII and Claudius in Chapter XXI, who joined twelve triremes on each side; one part was called the Sicilian fleet, the other the Rhodian. This was the pleasure of one day, upon which many thousands were expended.

Hadrian consumed several thousands over three days; Gordian over an entire year. Titus consumed gladiators, hunts, and naval battles over one hundred days. Trajan consumed ten thousand over one hundred and twenty-three days. These things happened at Rome and belonged to the Caesars; but there were more spectacles. Consuls, praetors, aediles, and priests gave games. Emperors made immense expenditures. At the adoption of Commodus Hadrian said, “We have lost four thousand times one hundred thousand sesterces”--that is, ten millions. You truly lost them upon trifles; you truly lost them most cruelly upon the deaths of wretched human beings and pleasures more wretched than deaths.

Magistrates at Rome and in the provinces did the same things. Augustus gave games twenty-four times in his own name, and twenty-three times in the names of others who were absent or unable. Herod, in the Holy Land itself, established theaters in almost every town and joined seven hundred pairs at once. This custom also existed at funerals, for we read that heirs, if they had not thus provided for one hundred condemned pairs of gladiators, were prosecuted. The banquets themselves and the feasts themselves were sprinkled with cruel blood. All funerals of magnates were rendered more deadly by gladiatorial funeral offerings; all weddings and banquets of nobles were loathsome with barbaric cruelty.

§ 10. The preparation itself cost no less blood. Pompey presented more than four hundred lions, as did others. Gordian presented one hundred Libyan wild beasts in one day and one thousand bears in one day. Under Augustus a show completed three thousand five hundred wild beasts in a single set of games, as the Ancyran stone, a witness of immense cruelty, confesses. Vopiscus says in his Probus that he presented one thousand ostriches, one thousand stags, and one thousand boars. And lest you think these few, Statilius Taurus built a stone theater in the Campus Martius for hunts. But Severus, despising it, discovered new kinds of cruelty lest he should ever be capable of being satiated; for from a collapsible ship he released four hundred lions in one moment. Carinus introduced the sea and swimming monsters. It is wearisome to relate the remaining things which trustworthy histories transmit concerning Nero and others.

Let us consider this beast, the subduer of all beasts. First, so many gladiators are matched against one another in amphitheaters, at funerals, and at banquets throughout all the provinces. Then they are cast to wild beasts. For how many little human beings could be equal to four hundred lions? But cruelty does not stop here. There is greater cruelty in the hunting of wild beasts. See entire provinces in Africa, Asia, and Mesopotamia occupied with hunting beasts at danger to life. Scarcely one lion is captured without wounds; here four hundred are to perish in one day. How much labor is needed to capture them?

If they were captured so that forests might be safe for gentle animals and so that they would not infest the fields, this could seem a recompense for danger and labor. But now they are captured, and care is taken that they be captured alive, so that, brought to Rome over tracts of lands and seas and fed at great expense, they may mangle a human being. This is most inhuman: for a human being to favor a beast against a human being. Then, that they should mangle a human being for a human being's pleasure is now beyond every madness of savagery. For few beasts rage except for the sake of food; the human being casts a human being to beasts because he seeks the pain of a human being and a variety of delight from a variety of punishment. Not one or another man does these things, but the whole empire--indeed, almost the whole more cultivated world--does, praises, commands, and demands them. These things surpass every crime of inhumanity.

As much was expended upon lions, tigers, bears, and devourers of human beings as upon whole armies. There were other public and cruel customs: to kill monstrous offspring without penalty; to expose the weak and maimed; to sell rejected slaves to the gladiatorial school, the beasts, and the mines; to exercise the savage right of masters over slaves.

§ 11. After that public cruelty of the whole people, what can be said concerning the inhumanity and savagery of individuals is a small thing. It is established concerning Augustus that, when his cruelty was now weary, he laid aside the sword. Tiberius did nothing other than exhibit a slaughterhouse. Dio speaks thus concerning Caligula: "Since Gaius could not be filled with blood, he took care that as many as possible should fight one another and sometimes ordered them to engage in pairs, at other times crowded together as in a battle-line, so that twenty-six knights were slain in one day. For so great was his cruelty that, when those condemned to the beasts had run out, he ordered certain men from that crowd which sat upon the benches to be seized and cast to the beasts, and ordered their tongues cut out so that they could not speak or accuse anyone."

Seneca is graver than Dio in Book III, Chapter XIX of On Anger: "Just now Gaius Caesar, on one day, cut down with scourges and tortured Sextus Papinius, whose father had been consul; Bassus, his quaestor and the son of his procurator; other senators; and Roman knights--not for the sake of an inquiry, but for the sake of his disposition. Then he was so impatient of deferring the pleasure which immense cruelty demanded without delay that, while walking in the promenade of his mother's gardens which separates the portico from the riverbank, he decapitated some of them by lamplight in the company of matrons and other senators. What was pressing? What private or public danger did a single night threaten? How small a thing was it to wait for daylight? Finally, was it necessary that, wearing slippers, he should kill senators of the Roman people?

"It pertains to the matter to know how arrogant his cruelty was, although we may seem to wander elsewhere and go astray. But this very thing will be part of anger raging beyond its accustomed measure. He had beaten senators with scourges; he himself brought it about that it could be said, 'It commonly happens.' He had tortured them by all the things which are most grievous in the nature of things: cords, plates, the rack, fire, and his own countenance. At this point the answer will be: 'A great matter, if he divided three senators, like worthless slaves, among blows and flames!'--a man who considered slaughtering the entire senate and wished that the Roman people had one neck, so that he might gather his crimes, drawn out over so many places and times, into one blow and one day."

Claudius was more savage without inspecting the charges. Nero too, amid the softest beginnings of his reign, prepared poison for Britannicus, impatient of a slow crime. Tacitus, Book XIII. Afterward he was equally savage against his mother, his teacher, the Apostles, and everyone. Severus Antoninus contrived his father's death through physicians, but, because they had insufficiently obeyed him, after his parent was dead he slaughtered them all, together with his father's friends, not leaving even one. Thus before him the elder Severus had slaughtered all the friends of Niger.

What sort of portent was it, and whence did these things proceed? Gallienus wrote to Verianus: "You will not satisfy me if you kill only armed men whom the chance of war too could have killed. Every person of the male sex must be destroyed--if old men and the immature could also be killed without our censure. Whoever has spoken badly against me, against the son of Valerian, against the father and brother of so many princes, must be killed. Ingenuus has been made emperor. Tear apart, kill, cut down. You can understand my spirit. Be angry with my mind, you who know that I have written these things with my own hand." Thus Trebellius in the Thirty Tyrants.

Maximinus, in addition to the cruelty exercised against Christians, was proclaimed emperor from the post of prefect of recruits and, at the very beginning, slaughtered four thousand of Alexander's friends. Julius Capitolinus describes his cruelty: "But amid these virtues he was so cruel that some called him Cyclops, others Busiris, others Sciron, some Phalaris, many Typhon or Gyges. The senate feared him so much that prayers were made publicly and privately in the temples--even by women with their children--that he might never see the city of Rome. For they heard that some were raised upon the cross, others enclosed in recently slaughtered animals, others cast to wild beasts, and others crushed with clubs; and all these things without regard to dignity, since he seemed to wish to govern military discipline, by whose example he wished also to correct civil affairs. This does not befit a prince who wishes to be loved. For he was persuaded that dominion could not be held except by cruelty."

Trebellius Pollio agrees with Capitolinus: "He was, however, of excessive cruelty toward the soldiers, for he killed three thousand and four thousand soldiers on individual days."

Macrinus was a grave and just avenger of crimes--if he had not himself been the most criminal man. He drove soldiers onto crosses, enclosed them in oxen for fornication, killed a tribune because he had permitted the watches to be abandoned, and represented the punishments of Mezentius.

Aurelian, coming to Rome, avenged a sedition with so much blood that he almost filled the city with funerals.

§ 12. Now let us turn our eyes and mind toward our commonwealth, to which, before all things, clemency and rarity and sparingness of punishments are fitting. It altogether befits a prince to be clement. Human beings have entrusted life and fortunes to you; it befits you not to betray the trust of so many faithful persons. It was said by an ancient sage: "Spare another's blood as your own." Judge that this was said to you, O prince: spare another's blood as Christ's. For if they are your fellow-servants and members of Christ, the blood of his members cannot be foreign to Christ. It befits all who have been appointed to preserve human beings to be benevolent toward all and to confer benefits upon those upon whom they can. Even the man conscious in himself of no fault should judge nothing more beautiful for himself than to grant pardon for many things and seek it for none. But the man who himself possesses something which ought to be pardoned cannot, without the highest disgrace, be cruel toward others.

In this matter imitate God, who is beneficent toward all. Saint Cyprian says in On the Good of Patience: "We see that, with the inseparable equality of patience, at God's command the seasons obey the guilty and the innocent, the religious and impious, the grateful and ungrateful; the elements serve; the winds blow; springs flow; the abundance of crops grows; the fruits of vineyards ripen; orchards overflow with fruit; groves grow leafy; meadows flower. And although God is exasperated by frequent--indeed, continual--offenses, he tempers his indignation and patiently awaits the day of retribution once appointed. And although vengeance is in his power, he prefers to preserve patience for a long time, bearing clemently and deferring, so that, if it can be, prolonged malice may at some time be changed, and a human being wallowing in the contagion of errors and crimes may even late be converted to the Lord, as he himself admonishes and says: 'I do not desire the death of the dying, only that he return and live.'"

§ 13. Thus a human being was born for the assistance of human beings, and, in addition to nature, the very office of a prince requires this. Seneca speaks with the same mind in Book I, Chapter V of On Clemency: "A great spirit befits great fortune. Unless it has raised itself to that fortune and stands higher, it also draws that fortune beneath the earth. But it is proper to a great spirit to be placid and tranquil and to look down from above upon injuries and offenses. It is womanish to rage in anger; it belongs to wild beasts--and not even noble ones--to bite and press those cast down. Elephants and lions pass by what they have struck down; persistence belongs to an ignoble beast.

"Savage and inexorable anger does not befit a king, for he rises little above the man with whom he makes himself equal by growing angry. But if he gives life, if he gives dignity to those in danger and deserving to lose it, he does what is permitted to none except one who possesses mastery of affairs. For life is taken away even from a superior; it is never given except to an inferior. To preserve is proper to exalted fortune, which ought never to be more admired than when it happens to possess the same power as the gods, by whose beneficence we are brought forth into the light, the good and evil alike."

§ 14. Just as Christian princes are accustomed to celebrate the day of the Resurrection and the other feasts of the most holy religion by a release of condemned persons, so that, although they dwell in filth and darkness, they may nevertheless rejoice in some light and fruit of redemption, so Constantine the Great wished there to be many places of refuge for the afflicted in holy churches. Nor will good princes celebrate their birthday bloodily with slaughter in the amphitheater; for why should so many die on the day on which you were born? Rather, by beneficence they will make it lovable and awaited by the peoples. Constantine pardoned all on account of the birth of Crispus and on account of Helena's delivery, except poisoners, murderers, and adulterers. With this disposition in a prince, how many prayers, we may suppose, will be offered for the safety of his children?

Moreover, clemency is of correspondingly greater importance in the commonwealth and its magistrates the more widely it extends and the greater the material it has upon which to act. Seneca too, the best teacher of clemency but the master of most cruel pupils, teaches this in Book I, Chapter V: "Accordingly, even citizens who are to be condemned must be spared, no differently from diseased limbs; and if at any time there is need to let blood, one must refrain from cutting beyond what is necessary. Therefore, as I was saying, clemency is indeed in accordance with nature for all human beings, but is most becoming to commanders, inasmuch as it has more to preserve among them and appears upon a greater field. For how very little harm private cruelty does! The savagery of princes is war. Although, moreover, there is concord among the virtues, and no one of them is better or more honorable than another, nevertheless a certain virtue is more suited to certain persons. Magnanimity becomes every mortal, even him beneath whom there is nothing. For what is greater or braver than to beat back evil fortune? Yet this magnanimity has a wider place in good fortune and is seen better upon a tribunal than upon level ground. Into whatever house clemency comes, it will render it happy and tranquil; but in a royal house, the rarer it is, the more marvelous. For what is more marvelous than that he whose anger nothing obstructs, to whose graver sentence even those who perish assent, whom no one will question--indeed, if he has flared up more violently, whom no one will even entreat--should himself lay a hand upon himself and employ his power for what is better and milder?" But this is rare; for although one person is sometimes spared, unjust death is nevertheless inflicted upon many thousands.

Alas, how often has that gentle piety of the Christians lamented these things? Cyprian, Epistle II: "Observe the roads closed by robbers, the seas beset by pirates, and wars everywhere divided by the bloody horror of camps. The world is wet with mutual blood; and when individuals commit homicide, it is a crime, but it is called a virtue when it is done publicly. Not the consideration of innocence, but the magnitude of savagery, obtains impunity for crimes. Now turn your eyes and countenance toward the cities themselves: you will encounter a crowded spectacle more mournful than every solitude. A gladiatorial game is prepared so that blood may delight the lust of cruel eyes. The body is filled with richer foods for nourishment, and the robust mass of limbs grows fat with layers of grease, so that, fattened for punishment, it may perish at a dearer price. A human being is killed for a human being's pleasure; and that anyone should be able to kill is expertise, practice, and art. The crime is not only committed but also taught. What more inhuman, what more bitter can be spoken? It is a discipline that a man should be able to destroy, and a glory that he does destroy. I ask you, what kind of thing is that, when they cast to wild beasts men whom no one has condemned? In the fullness of youth, with sufficiently honorable appearance and costly clothing, living young men are adorned for a voluntary funeral; the wretched glory in their own evils. They fight against beasts not because of a crime but because of madness. Fathers watch their sons; a brother is in the arena, and his sister is present."

Tertullian, however, pursues these matters in Chapter XXI of On the Spectacles: "And he who shudders at the corpse of a human being who has died by the common law of nature, this same man in the amphitheater bends down from above with most enduring eyes over bodies torn apart and scattered and fouled in their own blood. Indeed, he who comes to the spectacle to approve the punishment of a murderer, this same man with scourges and rods drives an unwilling gladiator to murder. And he who demands the lion for some more notorious murderer, this same man seeks the release-rod for an atrocious gladiator and bestows the cap as a reward. But he also calls back the man already finished for the spectacle of his pleasure, more gladly recognizing close at hand the man whom he wished to kill from afar--so much the harder if he did not wish it."

How can those who live in this way accuse the cruelty of their own princes--how can they accuse that of tyrants? You shudder at Gaius's saying when he wishes that the Roman people had one neck. You are all citizens worthy of Gaius; nothing is cheaper to you than a human being, in whose blood alone a spectacle is sought. A human being kills a human being--not angry, not afraid, not hoping, seeking nothing, but merely in order to watch. Nor is a single death discharged by one blow; pain is not deceived by a sword which kills before it is felt, but mutilation, disembowelment, and the throbbing of the dying man are the spectators' delights. Even those who raved condemned those spectacles. Seneca, Epistle XCV: "We rage not only privately but publicly. We restrain homicides and individual killings; but what of wars and the glorious crime of slaughtered nations? Neither avarice nor cruelty knows a limit; and so long as those things are done furtively and by individuals, they are less harmful and less monstrous. Crimes are practiced by decrees of the senate and resolutions of the people, and what is forbidden privately is publicly commanded. Certain deeds would be expiated with one's head if committed privately; the same deeds, because men wearing military cloaks have done them, we praise. Human beings, the gentlest race, are not ashamed to rejoice in one another's blood, to wage wars, and to hand wars down to their children, although peace exists even among dumb and savage beasts. Against so powerful and widely unfolded a madness philosophy has become more laborious, and it has assumed as much strength for itself as has accrued to the things against which it was being prepared. It was an easy matter to rebuke men indulging in wine and seeking more delicate food; a mind which had departed only a little from frugality did not have to be brought back by great force."

§ 15. Very well, O Seneca: you rage publicly. For that cruelty was public, and it was entrusted to magistrates not only in the amphitheater but by law, by custom, or by an eagerness to please. You accuse Tiberius, Gaius, Nero, Claudius, Domitian, Severus, and Commodus as savage toward certain senators and knights out of fear, hatred, or mere inclination. But what will those accusers of another's cruelty determine concerning themselves, who lavished so much blood of innocent men upon their own pleasures? What is more just than that those who ordered so many thousands of contracted gladiators to die by the turning of a thumb should be cast before the savagery of bloodthirsty princes? What wonder is it, while God's avenging eye keeps watch, that those men die in such a way as to feel themselves dying, who so often repeated that savage cry: "Again!" Blind paganism was not ignorant of its own bloodthirsty inhumanity, but loved it. Thus all were filled with homicide, stripped of the human being, clothed in a bestial mind, not commonly savage but conquerors of every savagery. For beasts abstain from their own kind and rarely bite more than they eat. These men, however, rejoiced in homicide, in the slaughter not of another species, and without any advantage to themselves. And so they experienced men of the same kind not only as enemies but also as their emperors.

§ 16. But to you, O commonwealth, I commend mercy, gentleness, and clemency. If anyone delights in human miseries, command him to be miserable. We are commanded to be merciful as our heavenly Father is merciful. God threatens that those who have not shown mercy to their neighbor will not obtain it. Mercy is preferred to all sacrifices. That it must be shown to one's neighbor is taught in Psalm 112:5, 9; Proverbs 11:17; 14:21; 15:27; 24:21, 31; 19:7; 25:21; 29:7; Hosea 6:11; Micah 6:8; Zechariah 7:9; Matthew 5:7; 19:13; 10:33; 25:41; and Galatians 6:12. Thus not only is the steadfast will to bring aid, to relieve human miseries, to redeem captives, and to enrich the poorer most praiseworthy and, as Cicero says, characteristic of a great and weighty man; but even that most tender softness of mind by which we are affected by the evils of others, if it is governed by right reason, is an excellent instrument of beneficence and a solace for human evils enclosed by the most merciful God within the breasts of his children. For we see that the miserable also derive consolation from the affections of those who grieve with them. Therefore:

> Nature confesses that she gave the softest hearts

To the human race, for she gave tears; this is the best part

Of our feeling. Therefore she commands us to weep at the cause pleaded by a friend,

At the squalor of a defendant, at an orphan summoning to law

His defrauder, whose face, streaming with weeping,

His girlish hair renders uncertain.

At nature's command we groan when the funeral of a marriageable

Maiden meets us, or an infant is enclosed by the earth,

Younger than the fire of the pyre, what good man, or man worthy of the torch

Of the mysteries, such as Ceres wishes her priest to be,

Believes any evils of another foreign to himself? This separates us

From the herd of dumb creatures; and therefore we alone received

A venerable nature, capable of divine things

And fit for practicing and receiving the arts;

We drew down feeling from the citadel of heaven.

The beasts that gaze bent toward the earth lack it.

At the beginning the common Creator enclosed in them

Souls only, but in us a mind as well, so that mutual

Affection might command us to seek and to furnish aid,

To draw the scattered into a people, to migrate from the ancient

Grove, and to leave the forests inhabited by our forefathers;

To build houses, to join another roof to our household gods,

So that confidence, united by a neighbor's light, might grant safe sleep;

To protect with arms a fallen citizen or one reeling from a great wound;

To give the signals by a common trumpet, to be defended by the same

Towers, and to be held by the single key of the gates.

But now concord among serpents is greater: a beast with like markings

Spares its kin. When did a stronger lion ever take

The life of a lion? In what forest did a boar ever expire

By the tusks of a larger boar? The Indian tiger maintains Perpetual peace with a raging tiger; savage bears agree among themselves.

But for the human being it is too little to have produced deadly iron

On an accursed anvil, although the first smiths, accustomed only

To forge rakes and hoes and wearied by mattocks and ploughshares,

Did not know how to hammer out swords.

The cause of the humanity implanted in us is that no animal is by nature more loving toward its own kind than the human being. The στοργή of beasts, and their affection toward their offspring, fades when the offspring is grown, nor is there any regard for kinship. Next, because most human beings require pardon, the human being ought to be kindly toward his own nature. In Book I, Chapter VI of On Clemency, Seneca exhorts Nero to clemency for this reason: "We have all sinned: some grievously, some more lightly, some deliberately, others perhaps driven by impulse or carried away by another's wickedness; others have stood insufficiently bravely in good counsels and have lost innocence unwillingly and while resisting. Nor do we offend only once, but we shall offend to the very end of life. Even if someone has so thoroughly purified his mind that nothing can disturb or deceive him any longer, nevertheless he has reached innocence through sinning."

For this reason Titus readily pardoned even grave offenses. "Two men of patrician family," says Tranquillus in Chapter IX, "convicted of aspiring to the empire, he did nothing more than admonish to desist, saying that the principate is given by fate; if they desired anything besides it, he promised that he would grant it."

§ 17. But the chief consideration by which all must very greatly be incited to clemency is that through it love is born, and security from love. From cruelty arise hatred and fear; from hatred, plots; from fear, flight and, when it hopes for victory, seditions and wars.

With one voice the whole human race proclaims how much love the clemency of princes and of the commonwealth conciliates. Seneca demonstrates this to his prince in Book I, Chapter III of On Clemency: "The greatness of that man alone is stable and founded whom all know to be as much for them as above them; whose care for the safety of individuals and of all together they experience keeping watch every day; at whose approach they do not scatter as though some evil or harmful animal had leapt from its lair, but fly eagerly toward him as toward a bright and beneficent star, most ready to cast themselves before the blades of plotters for him and to lay their bodies beneath him if a road to safety must be constructed for him through human slaughter. They protect his sleep with nightly watches; placed before and poured around him, they defend his sides; they oppose themselves to dangers rushing in. This agreement of peoples and cities in thus protecting and arming kings, and in casting themselves and their possessions wherever the safety of their commander desires, is not without reason."

And in Chapter XIII: "On the other hand, he who has care of all things, although he guards some more and others less, nourishes every part of the commonwealth as though it were part of himself, inclined toward milder measures; even if it is expedient to punish, he shows how unwillingly he lays hands upon a harsh remedy. In his mind there is nothing hostile, nothing savage. He exercises his power placidly and beneficially, desiring that his commands be approved by the citizens; he considers himself abundantly happy if he has made his fortune public; affable in speech and easy of access, lovable in countenance--which above all wins over peoples--favorably disposed toward just desires and stern toward unjust ones, he is loved, defended, and revered by the whole city."

§ 18. Cruelty, however, is more powerful for producing hatred than clemency is for producing love. Ancient Rome saw scarcely two clement princes, Germanicus, whom it did not fear to have as Caesar, and Titus, whom it could not retain for long. Tacitus speaks thus of the most clement Germanicus in Book II of the Annals: "Not long afterward he died, to the immense grief of the province and the surrounding peoples. Foreign nations and kings grieved: such was his courtesy toward allies and gentleness toward enemies; equally venerable in sight and hearing, while he retained the grandeur and gravity of the highest fortune, he had escaped envy and arrogance. His funeral, without ancestral images and procession, was renowned through praises and the memory of his virtues. And there were those who equated his appearance, age, kind of death, and also the nearness of the places in which he perished with the fate of Alexander the Great. For both were of handsome body and distinguished lineage, had passed scarcely beyond thirty years, and died through the plots of their own people among foreign nations. But this man had been gentle toward friends, moderate in pleasures, had lived in one marriage with legitimate children, and was no less a warrior, even if rashness was absent and he was hindered from pressing into servitude the Germanies shattered by so many victories. But if he had been the sole arbiter of affairs, if he had possessed royal right and title, he would have attained military glory the more readily in proportion as he excelled in clemency, temperance, and the other good arts."

Of Titus, Suetonius, Chapter XII: "He died in the same villa as his father, on the Ides of September, after two years, two months, and nine days from the time he succeeded his father, in the forty-second year of his age. When this became public, all mourned publicly no differently than in a domestic bereavement; before it was summoned by edict, the senate ran to the senate-house and, while the doors were still barred and afterward opened, rendered the dead man such thanks and heaped upon him such praises as it never heaped upon him even when alive and present."

You may compare with these the deaths of others. The case of Titus is more marvelous because at the beginning of his rule he had been secretly cruel, but thereby conciliated greater hatred. For Suetonius, Chapter VI, says: "And he acted somewhat less civilly and more violently. Indeed, he unhesitatingly crushed everyone most suspected by him, sending men through theaters and camps to demand their punishment as though by common consent. Among these was Aulus Caecina, a man of consular rank, whom, after inviting him to dinner and when he had scarcely departed from the dining room, he ordered to be stabbed--admittedly because danger was urgent, since even a document in Caecina's handwriting concerning a conspiracy prepared among the soldiers had been discovered. By these actions, just as he made sufficient provision for his future security, so for the present he contracted the greatest unpopularity, such that scarcely anyone passed to the principate with so adverse a report and with all men more unwilling."

But afterward he corrected this and left behind a great longing for himself. It was not so at the death of Tiberius. "The people rejoiced so much at his death," says Suetonius, Chapter LXXV, "that at the first report they ran about, some crying that Tiberius should be dragged into the Tiber, some praying Mother Earth and the infernal gods that they would give the dead man no abode except among the impious, while others threatened his corpse with the hook and the Gemonian stairs, exasperated not only by the memory of his former cruelty but also by a recent atrocity."

So great was the public joy at Nero's death that the common people ran throughout the whole city wearing caps. Suetonius, Chapter LVII. Vitellius, with his hands bound behind his back and his garment torn, was led as a foul spectacle, with many reviling and no one weeping; the deformity of his end had removed pity. Amid great mockeries of deeds and words he was led through the whole length of the Sacred Way, his hair drawn back from his head as condemned men are accustomed, and even the point of a sword placed beneath his chin so that he would present his face to be seen and not lower it; some assailed him with dung and mud, others shouted "incendiary" and "glutton," and part of the crowd even reproached the defects of his body. For he possessed an enormous height, a face generally red from drunkenness, a swollen belly, and one thigh somewhat weak from the impact of a chariot long before, when he attended Gaius as he drove. Finally, at the Gemonian stairs, he was lacerated and killed by the smallest blows and thereafter dragged by a hook into the Tiber.

The senate rejoiced so much at the killing of Domitian, according to Suetonius, Chapter XXIII, that when the senate-house had been filled in eager rivalry, it did not refrain from mangling the dead man with the most insulting and bitter kind of acclamations. It even ordered ladders to be brought in, his shields and images to be pulled down before their eyes and dashed against the ground in that very place, and finally decreed that his inscriptions everywhere be erased and all memory of him abolished.

I say nothing of the Maximini, Commodus, and others; they too experienced many mockeries after death. How are those men safe or secure whom all pursue with so much hatred?

§ 19. Although some have reached such madness that they have upon their lips, "Let them hate, provided that they fear," they nevertheless obtain no security through the slaughter of many. Machiavelli, the worst adviser of princes, teaches thus in Chapter XVII of his Prince: "Passing now to the other qualities which we enumerated above, it would be desirable for every prince to be held clement, not cruel; nevertheless, caution must be employed lest he abuse this clemency. Valentino was considered inhuman; yet his inhumanity restored all Romagna to soundness, united it into one, and brought it back to peace and fidelity. If this is duly considered, he will be found more merciful than the Florentine people, who, in order to escape the name of cruelty, permitted the city of Pistoia to be destroyed. Therefore, let a prince care little for the name of savagery by which he may keep his people united in fidelity. For with a very few examples he will be more clement than those who, through excessive mildness, permit disturbances of affairs to follow, whence killings or plunder arise."

In general he thinks it better to be feared than loved. But he is very greatly mistaken, for the fear that arises from cruelty always has hatred joined to it; the fear of the wicked which arises from a prince's justice, and the reverence of the good, is not pernicious because it is without hatred. There is no security for a prince amid the fear and hatred of the good. He provokes the hatred of all if he rages against a few. While Augustus raged, he suffered many conspiracies, for he did not lack even a conspiracy by men whom one would be ashamed to know had dared so great a deed. But when he turned himself to clemency, he lived secure. This was Livia's counsel, whose speech is found in Dio, and its abridgment in Seneca, Book I, Chapter IX of On Clemency: "Admit," she says, "a woman's counsel. Do what physicians are accustomed to do: when customary remedies do not succeed, they try their opposites. You have accomplished nothing thus far by severity. Salvidienus was followed by Lepidus, Lepidus by Murena, Murena by Caepio, Caepio by Egnatius--to be silent about others whose audacity one is at last ashamed of. Now try how clemency may turn out for you."

He pardoned Cinna, gave him the consulship, and possessed him as his most faithful friend. And Ovid, the luxurious knight of a most luxurious Caesar, sings truly:

> I have seen many also increased in riches and honors
> Who had borne arms against your head.

"Clemency," says Seneca in Book I, Chapter X of On Clemency, "brought him to safety and security; it rendered him pleasing and favored, although he had laid his hand upon the neck of a commonwealth not yet subdued. This today still grants him a reputation which scarcely serves living princes. We believe him to be a god, not as though we had been ordered. We confess that Augustus was a good prince and that the name of father suited him well."

§ 20. What clemency, then, truly befits a prince? That which Seneca perceived he had falsely attributed to his Nero in Chapter XI: "This, Caesar, is true clemency, which you display, which did not begin from repentance for savagery: to possess no stain, never to have shed civil blood. This, amid the greatest power, is the truest temperance of mind and an incomprehensible love of the human race: not to be inflamed by some desire or rashness, nor, corrupted by the examples of former princes, to test by experiment how much is permitted against one's citizens, but to blunt the edge of one's command. You have furnished, Caesar, a bloodless city; and this of which you have gloried with a great spirit--that you have not shed a single drop of human blood in the whole world--is the greater and more marvelous because the sword was never entrusted to anyone more quickly. Clemency, therefore, not only renders princes more honorable but also safer, and it is an ornament of empires and at the same time their most certain safety. Kings have grown old and handed kingdoms to their children and grandchildren; the power of tyrants is execrable and brief. What difference is there between a tyrant and a king? For the outward appearance of their fortune and their license are equal, except that tyrants rage from pleasure, kings only from cause and necessity."

This praise was altogether false, and Seneca's lie was not hidden. At the beginning, poison was given to Silanus the proconsul amid a banquet. There would have been a progression to further slaughter if Afranius

Burrus and Annaeus Seneca had not stood in the way. Certainly the poison administered to Britannicus amid the banquet, his sudden funeral, and other things proved cruelty. A pious and humane prince has arms as a protection of peace--or rather as an ornament. Mamertinus in his Panegyric of Julian: "Therefore arms and young men with swords and javelins are not guards of your body, but a certain solemn ornament of imperial majesty. For what need is there of them when you are surrounded by the strongest wall of civic love?"

A tyrant, on the contrary, looks securely upon no arms. Experience speaks thus in Thyestes:

> While I stood aloft,
>
> I never ceased to fear, and to fear the very sword at my side.

He will never restrain great hatreds by the sword; he turns his guards against himself:

> He fears the man who fears him; fear returns upon its author.

Plutarch speaks excellently to all princes:

> τῷ γὰρ ὄντι δεδίασιν οἱ βασιλεῖς ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀρχομένων, οἱ δὲ τύραννοι τοὺς ἀρχομένους· διὸ τῇ δυνάμει τὸ δέος συναύξει· πλειόνων γὰρ ἄρχοντες, πλείονας φοβοῦνται.

Kings truly fear on behalf of their subjects; tyrants fear their subjects. If their power increases, their fear also increases. And when they command more people, they fear more people.

"For he errs," says Seneca in Book I, Chapter XIX of On Clemency, "if anyone thinks that a king is safe where nothing is safe from the king. Security must be purchased by mutual security. There is no need to build citadels raised aloft, nor to fortify hills difficult of ascent, nor to cut away the sides of mountains, nor to enclose oneself with manifold walls and towers. Clemency will furnish a king safety in the open. There is one impregnable fortification: the love of the citizens. What is more beautiful than to live while all desire it and offer their prayers without a guard? If his health has faltered a little, that not the hope of men but their fear should be aroused? That nothing should be so precious to anyone that he would not wish it exchanged for the safety of his protector? That he should reckon whatever happens to him as happening also to himself? In this he has proved by continual arguments of goodness that the commonwealth is not his, but that he belongs to the commonwealth."

And in Chapter XXVI: "Even the hands of slaves have avenged the cruelty of private men under certain danger of the cross; whole nations and peoples have attempted to cut off tyrants--both those whose evil it was and those whom it threatened. Sometimes their own guards have risen against them and practiced upon them the perfidy, impiety, ferocity, and whatever else they had learned from them. For what can anyone hope from a man whom he has taught to be evil? Wickedness does not obey for long, nor does it sin only so far as it is commanded."

Let no one deceive himself. The experiences of all kingdoms have taught that the most faithful guard of the commonwealth is the clemency of the prince.

The reason is that all willingly submit themselves to a ruler who is gentle, kindly, and loving toward the citizens, and entrust all their possessions to him; all turn away from a cruel ruler. All subjects flee a prince's cruelty as a public pestilence and an incurable disease; they indignantly endure standing beneath the blow. They are all detained as though in a free prison and judge their prince to be a jailer and executioner. When the first hope appears, they vindicate themselves into liberty. Nor is security prepared by the slaughter of enemies, although many fall. For those who survive hate more actively, since they judge themselves safe through hiding and obscurity. Furthermore, scarcely any human being is so solitary that he has no relatives, connections, or friends. A cruel prince incites all of these to hatred of himself, and therefore increases the number of his enemies by raging. It was rightly objected to a tyrant who boasted that he had killed all his enemies: "But their children have not also been killed; they survive as avengers." No one has ever killed his own successor, no one his avenger. He lies hidden among thousands of flatterers. For this is remarkable: most men who commanded cruelly were slaughtered by those whom they judged most faithful. When this happens all marvel. Brutus killed Caesar, Macro Tiberius, and Chaerea Gaius. Yet it is necessary that it happen so: all hate them; the suspected are removed from their midst; friends alone can be avengers.

§ 21. Now the measure of clemency must also be discussed, for it must be tempered with salutary severity. For you would not praise a physician who binds up with sweet potions and soft fomentations those evils which demand the iron and fire. Let him use the scalpel and cautery when necessity requires, provided that the remedy does not rage beyond the disease. Wounds are often treated more painfully than they are. A Hippocratic slaughterhouse is crueler than brigandage when

> The remedy has exceeded its measure.

It belongs to a clement magistrate to disregard private injuries. That saying is worthy of immortality: "The King of France does not avenge the injuries of the Duke of Orléans." A great spirit is needed for this, lest the man who, as an equal, was troublesome in like measure be crushed when the other becomes more powerful. And indeed, most men, when they are elevated to great and unexpected honors, hate those by whom they understand that they were known as humble and abject. Vitellius, now emperor, defrauded all his creditors and compelled them to return the records of their contracts, for he boasted that he returned life in place of money--with an altogether brigand-like spirit, as though inflicting death upon creditors were part of justice. When this saying of his was spread among the common people, immense hatred was aroused among all, in which he soon burned away. Retirement embittered Tiberius, and he was more cruel because many had despised him as a private man. For this reason he also furnished material for witticisms:

> He who comes from exile to command
> Will reign with much blood.

§ 22. The clemency which is mild in pardoning injuries against the prince is more illustrious than that which forgives or dissembles crimes committed against the commonwealth. Yet the contrary frequently occurs. Many men become less angry at enemies gnawing away the extremities of provinces, at avaricious governors, and at authors of dissension than at a light jest or an act of neglect. When Severus entered Rome in ovation, he put forty men of consular rank and fit for command to death upon fabricated and most trifling charges. Many were killed because they had jested about his name, because they had called him truly Severus, truly an emperor bearing his own name, and the Punic Sulla. Thus Spartianus: "He thereafter set out for the Parthian war, after presenting a gladiatorial show and giving a largesse to the people. Amid these things he killed many upon either true or fabricated charges. Many, moreover, were condemned because they had jested, others because they had been silent, others because they had spoken many things figuratively: that he was truly an emperor of his name, truly Pertinax, truly Severus."

But what will you do to the man who ordered three hundred lashes to be laid upon a slave because he had brought the hot water rather late? Who killed with clubs a wretched man who, when bitten during the hunt, released a Spartan hound before the proper time? How much more clement was Augustus, who despised insults cast against himself and his house? How much better did Theodosius, Arcadius, and Honorius, Augustuses, decree that if anyone, forgetful of modesty, had cursed the emperor, he should not be subjected to punishment?

§ 23. Clemency toward the public must be exercised with great judgment, lest, if impunity is displayed to criminals without judgment and reason, weaker persons be rendered liable to injuries,

the audacity of criminals be nourished, and the commonwealth suffer loss for that reason. For he who spares an incurably evil thing does as much harm as he who cuts away sound things. Therefore a wise prince will not imitate the Indian king whose kingdom is said to have been filled with robbers because of the slowness of judgments. The Treasury of Indian Affairs, Tome III, Book II, Chapter XXVII, explains it thus: "The king of Bisnagar is rather too lenient toward criminals and forbids them to be punished. Hence there is everywhere throughout the whole kingdom a marvelous and unbridled license even among those insolent against the royal majesty. The Great Mughal had recently sent ambassadors to him, and at the same time several most excellent horses and other costly gifts. When these, together with the noblest horse, had secretly been taken by one of his subjects along the road, he imposed no punishment for the insolent deed; he merely ordered the horse to be returned and gave it to the ambassador." Nor was Nero's saying clement but a foolish veiling of inhumanity. For when his signature upon the sentences of condemned men was sought, he said, "How I wish I did not know letters!" Would that you had not known poisons and truculent words. Nevertheless, even this was an ill-considered saying. The punishments of guilty men and the gentleness of a prince do not conflict. With a better spirit, but one more flattering than correct, Antoninus the Philosopher bound himself to clemency in a speech: "Far be it that, while I hold the principate, any one of you should be condemned to death by my decree and yours." Excessive indulgence and excessive impunity introduce great crimes and finally compel the prince suddenly to become cruel.

§ 24. Let him not add mockeries to the slain. For these instill horror, as though he had not been content with death. Severus affixed the head of Albinus to a gibbet. Barbarians enclosed the skull of an enemy in gold, brought it to banquets, and used it as a cup. Nor was that savagery always absent from Christians. German soldiers played ball with the heads of the Cremonese; the Cremonese cut Germans limb from limb. There are innumerable examples. But such things are committed with great infamy. Insult against a dying man is more bitter than death itself.

§ 25. Even to have uttered a cruel saying is imputed as a crime, because such sayings indicate a bestial mind. Of this kind are: "Strike in such a way that he may feel himself dying." "I have not yet returned to favor with you." "An antidote against Caesar?" "Why does he not die willingly?" "Again!" "Would that you all had one neck." "Would that my brother were alive." "From the bald man to the bald man." For these sayings are spread in such a way that they arouse the most dangerous hatred, since human beings by their own nature abhor cruelty. For even historians who have passed over the deaths of many most illustrious persons nevertheless commit those signs of inhumanity to writing. Julius was not ignorant of this. For when, after the fatherland had been crushed, he plundered its patrimony--that is, the treasury--he threatened death to the quaestor who resisted. When the man marveled, Caesar said that it was easier for him to do this than to say it. By a nod, while absent and as though unaware, he could do it without the reputation for cruelty which, while the opposing party still stood, was destructive; by voice he could not command it. A horrible saying certainly rendered Octavius detestable. Tranquillus reports it thus: "When Perusia had been captured, he punished very many, meeting those who attempted to beg pardon or excuse themselves with one answer: 'You must die.'"

§ 26. Above all, let him take care that treachery or mockery is not joined to savagery. The prefect Maximinus, after promising that he would destroy no one by fire or iron, ordered them to be crushed with lead, mocking the credulity of simple men. He increased hatred by a double evil and brought it about that no one trusted him.

§ 27. When reason dictates, let the prince himself mitigate the severity of the laws. This will always find a place when the words admit moderation. The laws themselves command this. Through interpretation of the laws, punishments must be softened rather than made harsher. Julius gave an example of clemency. Captured as a boy by pirates, in jest he threatened them with the cross, and confirmed it with an oath; after they were captured, he first killed them and thereafter placed them upon crosses. He interpreted the obligation of his oath courteously. Certainly by this deed he obtained reputation and the affection of the Roman people. The contrary was done by Valentinian, a most severe and sometimes cruel enforcer of laws. He is also reproached because, when reviewing the prisons, he never subscribed a milder judgment for any condemned person. For it was customary that a prince subscribe to the penalties of condemned men and, out of gentleness and clemency, sometimes mitigate the punishments of the laws. Hence it was also established that those condemned by the word of the prince or the sentence of judges should not be led away before the tenth day. Afterward Theodosius added twenty days, upon the admonition of Saint Ambrose, bishop of Milan, for this reason: lest anyone fall through the sudden anger of the prince, but that delay might disclose the truth and calm indignation.

§ 28. Let him spare his eyes: let him not be present at punishments, lest he appear to have wished not so much to obey the laws because moved by justice as to exhibit a spectacle to himself. Gaius tortured innocent men with various kinds of torments and with his own countenance. All these considerations have place especially when the prince himself has been injured. For he ought to be moved less by his own injuries than by those of others. But to wish parents or other loved ones to be present at punishments is altogether tyrannical. Caligula had this as a custom. Dio reports: "Furthermore, he ordered Cassius Melinus to be killed and compelled Capito, his father, a good man accused of no offense, to be present at his son's punishment. When Capito asked Gaius that he be permitted to close his eyes, he was ordered to be killed along with him."

§ 29. When the commonwealth requires severity, clemency is content with the punishments established by law. To be ingenious in devising new tortures is the surest sign of savagery. All new and unusual things not only bring infamy; but because they are eagerly narrated and heard like prodigies, they carry infamy very far. Although the bitterness of punishments may remain within the measure prescribed by law, nevertheless, if it is novel, it reveals a cruel mind.

§ 30. Those punishments must also be avoided which contain some singular, long-premeditated, laborious, and shameful malice. Of this kind was the inhumanity of Elagabalus. "He is said," says Aelius Lampridius, "to have collected serpents through the priests of the Marsian nation and suddenly released them before dawn, at the time when the people are accustomed to assemble for celebrated games, so that many were afflicted by bites and in the flight."

The Marsian nation, victorious over asps and snakes, had been given for the safety of peoples against the most hostile beasts; it collected serpents for medicine or in order to destroy them. But that monster, more harmful than an asp or basilisk, turned the gift and labor of that nation to the destruction of his own people. It belongs to barbarians to delight in devising punishments. They killed the Christian of Arethusa with the writing-styles of boys after exquisite tortures. In the Thebaid, after drawing down and releasing the branches of trees, they tore many apart; they killed women in the foulest and altogether pitiable manner, bound by one foot while the other was drawn by machines. They burned Christians smeared with pitch, tow, and resin for use as nocturnal lamps; covered with the skins of beasts, they cast them to dogs. They buried Chrysanthus and Daria alive in the earth. They cut open the bellies of virgins and, after filling them with barley, fed pigs from them. That barbarity held the empire while it harassed Christians with various punishments. This occurred by God's permission, so that even in this way posterity might recognize that such foul slaughterhouses belong to savagery, not justice. The Huguenots in France surpassed them in many ways by novelty, bitterness, and foulness, as the Theater of Calvinist Cruelty shows.

§ 31. The punishments of many persons, whether taken at one time or at different times, must be avoided. For where the slaughter of many lies, something must be taken away from severity so that more may be added to charity. Let the commonwealth imitate physicians, who use gentle fomentations when they can heal without the iron. When much blood is shed, even guilty blood, the commonwealth is weakened; and just as, when a vein is opened, sound blood and the power of the natural spirits escape together with harmful blood, so among many condemned persons some are always believed innocent or capable of being healed by a milder hand. There is a great difference among defendants condemned by one law. Cruelty is never greater or more unjust than when kinds of human beings, not crimes, are punished, which frequently occurs when a multitude of offenders is presumed. Hence so many thousands of Christians formerly perished, because their name and profession were judged impiety. Hence at Caesarea, under the emperor Maximinus, when the corpses of martyrs were scattered everywhere, the forum, the streets, and the columns wept. Eusebius, Book VIII, Chapter XIX. Not only within the city but also against an enemy already conquered there must be moderation in killings. You shed hostile blood, but human blood, blood of your own kind. No animal except the sparrowhawk (nisus) and the human being rages against its own kind. Certainly God, when the ram has struck the wall, when the trumpets have sounded, and when war has been imbued with blood, nevertheless requires clemency even in the now-victorious battle-line. 2 Chronicles 28:6: "Pekah the son of Remaliah killed one hundred and twenty thousand of Judah in one day, all fighting men, because they had forsaken the God of their fathers. And the children of Israel captured from their brothers two hundred thousand women, boys, and girls and boundless spoil, and carried it to Samaria. At that time a prophet of the Lord named Oded was there. Going out to meet the army coming to Samaria, he said to them: 'Behold, the Lord God of your fathers, angry against Judah, delivered them into your hands, and you killed them atrociously, so that your cruelty reached to heaven.

"'Moreover, you wish to subject the children of Judah and Jerusalem to yourselves as male and female slaves, which ought by no means to be done; for in this too you have sinned against the Lord your God. But hear my counsel and lead back the captives whom you have brought from your brothers, because the great wrath of the Lord threatens you.' Therefore, men from among the princes of the children of Ephraim--Azariah the son of Johanan, Berechiah the son of Zellum, and Amasa the son of Hadlai--stood against those who were coming from battle and said to them: 'You shall not bring the captives here, lest we sin against the Lord. Why do you wish to add these things upon our sins and heap them upon our former offenses? For the sin is great, and the anger of the Lord's wrath threatens Israel.'"

§ 32. Therefore, let every commonwealth which desires to be long-lasting avoid all cruelty and even the suspicion of cruelty. Let it educate children with simple food and clothing that is not costly; from their tender nails let even the children of princes learn to endure someone as though an equal, lest when grown they judge it a crime of majesty if anyone thinks contrary to them.

Commodus was held the cruelest of all the ancients; nature and education made him so. When he was twelve years old--at an age when the sight of blood is a horror to children--he commanded that a bath attendant who had heated the bath more than was right be cast into the furnace; nor did his cruelty grow quiet until, exulting with joy, he perceived the smell of the skins which his tutor, deceiving his madness, had thrown in place of the bath attendant. It is no marvel that he inflicted so much slaughter, when so much was permitted him in childhood. It harmed him to have had evil attendants, for from them he himself learned that by which he afterward made others evil.

Therefore, O princes, embrace clemency, which nature herself teaches you and your dignity demands; flee cruelty. Do not forget humanity and gentleness even when the law is at issue. The impregnable citadel of your security is clemency; cruelty makes all things uncertain and renders even its own ministers unfaithful. Nor should you alone cultivate clemency yourselves; require it from counselors, governors, and praetors. Command them to govern subjects not as governors but as bishops. The clemency of one king accomplishes little if, through the cruelty of petty tyrants, subjects are prevented from enjoying it. Let him be angry here; let him avenge his insults here, so that he may provide for his subjects. Cruelty is never honorable; in one outcome alone it is pleasing--if it is exercised against cruel ministers.

No spectacle is more desirable to a people than to see cruelty perish by its own examples. This alone is praised in Phalaris: that he enclosed the inventor in his own bull. Fix most deeply within your breasts that which reason dictates, which all wise men have taught, which the examples of all kingdoms have demonstrated, which eternal Truth, reigning most clemently for eternity, proclaimed: BLESSED ARE THE MEEK, FOR THEY SHALL INHERIT THE EARTH.

In truth, harsh medicine is more dangerous than the disease itself. For it brings it about that no one dares to counsel right things if to have counseled is a danger. Confidence is the mother of that ferocity which has overturned very many kingdoms and has either destroyed very many of the Turks or troubled them with sedition. Indeed, their commanders pay even for accidental events. But the times are often such that no crime lacks its defense. Boccalini, Book II, Chapter XXXIII of Parnassus, even excuses Tiberian cruelty. From this arises the oppression of subjects, which crushes the whole commonwealth.

CHAPTER XVII

All Persons in the Commonwealth Must Be Trained in Fortitude

§ 1. At this point, indeed, I have the pseudo-politicians in agreement, for all teach that the strength and constancy of the inhabitants are the support of the city. Next, although they thrust forward hypocrisy in place of piety, cunning in place of prudence, and simulation in place of temperance, they nevertheless require true and genuine fortitude, which undertakes and repels dangers with reason. It was formerly said that the sons of the rich rightly learned two things: the art of throwing the javelin and of riding; flattery bestowed the rest upon them through blandishments. But if they wandered from the target or did not know how to cling to the horse, they could not flatter even themselves. So also now it is fortitude that is not accustomed to being counterfeited; or if at some time a cowardly ass puts on the skin of a lion, if Patroclus in Achilles' armor terrifies the Trojans for a time, soon

he pays for the simulation with his blood. Fortitude is held in great honor. Aristotle asks in Problems, Section XXVII.5:

> Διὰ τί μάλιστα τὴν ἀνδρείαν τιμῶσιν αἱ πόλεις, οὐ βελτίστην οὖσαν τῶν ἀρετῶν, ἢ ὅτι διατελοῦσιν ἢ πολεμοῦντες ἢ πολεμούμενοι; αὕτη δὲ ἀμφοῖν χρησιμωτάτη ἐστίν. Τιμῶσι δ' οὐ τὰ βέλτιστα, ἀλλ' αὐτοῖς τὰ βέλτιστα.

Why do cities honor fortitude most, although it is not the most excellent of the virtues? Is it because they are always either making war or being warred upon, and this virtue is most useful in either time? They honor not the things that are best, but the things that are best for themselves. And so in free cities and among kings, the greatest honors are decreed for those who have perished in war. Therefore, the fatherland requires not glass-like fortitude but true and solid fortitude.

§ 2. Fortitude is

> μεσότης περὶ φόβους καὶ θάρρη,

a mean concerning fears and confidence, as Aristotle says in Book IV, Chapter IX of the Morals. Augustine, in Eighty-Three Questions: "Fortitude is the considered undertaking of dangers and the endurance of labors." This is that very constancy concerning which the noble disputation of Justus Lipsius is in everyone's hands. For it is an upright and immovable strength of mind, neither elevated by fortuitous things nor cast down. I also include patience, the voluntary endurance, without complaint, of all adversities which befall. These things concern fortitude taken strictly.

For just as in every virtue wisdom holds the helm as though its moderator, so fortitude binds and fortifies them all like a firm anchor in this stormy sea of life, for every virtue without constancy is widowed. Fear casts out counsels wisely established; take away Lucretia's constancy, and fear, not lust, will make her an adulteress. Strike fear into a commander, and he will make a shameful treaty at the Caudine Forks. Therefore fortitude is the guardian of all virtues.

There are also other virtues which have the appearance of fortitude. Thus soldiers act bravely in battle through fear of cowardice and desire for glory. Here shame, flight from disgrace, and appetite for praise make a man brave.

Frequently even a greater fear compels one to be brave amid lesser pain. Mucius places his hand upon the brazier. If he did it from desire for what is honorable, it belonged to a brave man to provide an enemy king with a spectacle from himself so that the king might consider it most dangerous to wage war with brave men. If he did it from fear of death--for after the deed what else could he expect but to perish by a lingering death, tortured by the most exquisite torments?--not even thus does it cease to be fortitude. For it belonged to a brave mind to avert extreme punishments by a lesser danger. Indeed, that contracted gladiator who, ordered to represent Mucius on the stage with the present

"troublesome tunic," did not dare say, "I will not do it," possessed a wretched and calamitous fortitude. For if a soldier fighting bravely in the battle-line prefers to meet a beautiful death through wounds rather than be led in an arrogant triumph, why should the wretched man whom the countenance of the threatening tyrant and the ardor of citizens cruelly commanding have seized not prefer to give his hand to be burned rather than blaze with his whole body in the flames? For here there is a measured endurance of pain according to right reason. Those who are driven into battle through fear of their commanders, although they are not brave, nevertheless, if they prefer to contend under an uncertain Mars rather than be surrendered to certain destruction with disgrace, have begun certain rudiments of fortitude. But because they do honorable things altogether unwillingly, they are distant from perfect virtue.

They also call those whom anger has made furious brave:

ἰτητικώτατον γὰρ ὁ θυμὸς πρὸς τοὺς κινδύνους.

For anger rushes in and casts itself headlong into dangers.

σθένος ἔμβαλε θυμῷ,

it casts strength into the spirit;

μένος καὶ θυμὸν ἔγειρε, ἔζεσεν αἷμα.

It aroused rage and anger; the blood boiled. Anger indeed assists an impulse, but it does not increase virtue when it diminishes reason.

Nor are those brave who trust in strength and, because they have often conquered, presume altogether the best. But the foolish and drunken hope most of all; yet when the matter turns out otherwise, they immediately flee and withdraw themselves from danger. Thus, when the Argives thought they were going with great boldness against the soft and timid Sicyonians, but had fallen upon Spartans, in a disorderly flight they furnished laughter to their enemies.

Therefore fortitude endures pains and troubles when it is honorable to endure them, and because it is honorable--or when not to endure them is shameful.

The dignity of fortitude lies in the fact that it is difficult and arduous to tolerate tortures, troubles, and death. This is more difficult than to resist pleasure. Nevertheless, we perceive the bravest men to be those who at the same time resisted both pleasures and fears.

§ 3. Fortitude renders the spirits of individuals unconquered, and consequently the whole commonwealth. Nothing is impregnable to the brave; nothing is fortified against the spirited. Ambrose speaks excellently in Book II of On Duties: "Fortitude is no ordinary strength of mind. It alone defends the ornaments of all the virtues and guards justice; it contends in inexpiable battle against all vices, unconquered by labors, brave amid dangers, sterner against pleasures, so as to flee avarice like a certain stain which effeminates virtue." And Cicero in the Rhetoric: "Fortitude is a glorious brilliance of mind, immovable amid adversities, administering arduous affairs beautifully, which is neither broken by adversities when they assail nor raised up by prosperities when they flatter."

Nor does it collapse through another's malice. It stands above its own punishment. "Fortitude is useful," says Seneca in Book IV, Chapter XXII of On Benefits, "both upon the rack and in the fire, which may be applied to individual limbs and gradually make its way around a living body. Although the very body full of good conscience should drip away, the fire through which good faith will shine shall please him."

Therefore fortitude is a despiser of things to be feared. It despises, challenges, and breaks terrible things and those that place our liberty beneath the yoke.

§ 4. Fortitude renders the commonwealth safe because it terrifies enemies by reputation alone. Recently, four Spanish ships afflicted two hundred ships of the barbarians; thirty thousand human beings fell. At the voice of the lion all animals tremble; the grim brow of bulls, although tame, is feared. Boldness against the brave is not safe. On the contrary, nothing is safe for the fearful. If enemies are lacking, they will fear their own shadow. Therefore they are attacked by all. The hare is the prey of all; the lion of none.

ἀλλὰ γὰρ ἀθυμοῦντες ἄνδρες οὔπω τρόπαιον ἔστησαν.

But men weak in spirit have never erected a trophy.

Therefore those helmeted hares invite the enemy; they do not terrify him, and though present they are absent. Let no king count bodies, but spirits.

δειλοὶ γὰρ ἄνδρες οὐκ ἔχουσιν ἐν μάχῃ ἀριθμόν, ἀλλ' ἄπεισι, κἂν παρῶσιν ὁμῶς.

Fearful men are of no account in the battle-line, for they are absent although they are present together.

I do not wish to produce as an example Pisander, who is said to have been terrified lest, when dead, he should see his own shadow; nor Antemon, above whose head two little slaves always held a bronze shield lest he be injured by the fall of anything. The commonwealth has no need of so prodigious a fear that it should possess arms against itself and preserve resources for the enemy.

Unless it possesses fearless spirits within its ramparts and walls, all things fall as prey to the enemy. If men obtain the name and reputation of the brave, many seek their alliance; no one dares inflict injury, any more than pluck a lion's beard. By the reputation of fortitude alone David cast off danger and escaped the parricidal hands of his son.

2 Samuel 17:8: "You know your father and the men who are with him to be most brave and of armed spirit, like a bear raging in the forest when her cubs have been taken; moreover, your father is a warrior and will not remain with the people. Perhaps he now lies hidden in pits or in whatever place he has chosen; and when any one man has fallen at the beginning, whoever hears it will hear and say: 'A slaughter has been made among the people who followed Absalom.' Then even the bravest man, whose heart is like that of a lion, will be dissolved by fear; for all the people of Israel know that your father is brave and that all who are with him are strong."

Most things in war are accomplished by reputation and fear; few by the hand. But these matters must be treated more fully when military fortitude, which is a distinguished part of fortitude, is to be discussed.

§ 5. The reason fortitude is always unconquered, and contempt of death conquers all things, is that it is a natural fortification, the armor of nature, not taken from elsewhere. For he who has despised all terrible things is most free, is loved by all, and is feared even by the evil. Seneca, Epistle CXIII: "Teach me not whether fortitude is an animal, but that no animal is happy without fortitude unless it has grown strong against fortuitous things and subdued all accidents by meditation before receiving them. What is fortitude? An impregnable fortification of human weakness; the man who has surrounded himself with it endures secure in this siege of life. For he uses his own strength and his own weapons. At this point I wish to report to you the opinion of our Posidonius: 'There is no reason for you ever to think yourself safe with the weapons of fortune. Fight against fortune with your own. Fortuitous things do not arm us; therefore men are equipped against enemies but unarmed against fortune herself.'"

And in Chapter VIII of On Firmness: "If we receive with an equal and placid spirit that greatest thing, beyond which angry laws or the most savage masters have nothing to threaten, in which fortune consumes her power, and if we know that death is not an evil and therefore not even an injury, we shall much more easily tolerate other things: losses, pains, disgraces, changes of place, bereavements, and dissensions, which do not submerge a wise man even if they surround him all at once, much less does he grieve at their individual impacts. And if he bears the injuries of fortune moderately, how much more those of powerful human beings, whom he knows to be the hands of fortune?"

Fortitude furnishes all these things by despising just dangers, or through knowledge and the spirit for repelling, receiving, and challenging dangers.

§ 6. Nothing protects and strengthens the commonwealth so much as good counsels; but when dangers surround it, those counsels generally arise from fortitude alone. Fear first disturbs the counsels themselves; next, even if the senate has resolved bravely and the people has commanded, fear will nevertheless impede the action to be performed. It is decreed that war must be waged in Spain, but no one among the chiefs of the Quirites whose spirit was equal to so great a danger can be found. Had Scipio been absent, Rome would not have recovered Spain; moreover, it would have lost Italy. Valerius, Book III, Chapter VI: "After Publius and Gnaeus Scipio in Spain, together with the greater part of the army, had been crushed by the Punic battle-line, and all the nations of that province had followed the friendship of the Carthaginians, none of our commanders daring to set out there to correct the matter, Publius Scipio, then in his twenty-fourth year, promised that he would go. That confidence indeed gave the Roman people hope of safety and victory, and he employed the same confidence in Spain itself. For when he was besieging the town of Badia, he ordered those approaching his tribunal to enter recognizances for the next day in the temple which was within the enemy's walls. Having immediately gained possession of the city, at the time and place which he had foretold, he placed his curule chair and administered justice to them. Nothing was more noble than this confidence, nothing truer than the prediction, nothing more effective than the speed, and nothing more worthy even than the dignity."

Counsels are so certain for fortitude that at times they do not fear to disclose them to enemies, so that the enemies may be rendered more fearful. Scipio Africanus, after scouts of Hannibal were detected in his camp, took care that they be led most diligently through all the maniples; thereafter, having received them at dinner and asked whether they had sufficiently considered the things for which they had been ordered to come, he sent them away unharmed. By this confidence he crushed the spirits of the enemy. Weak and very small commonwealths frequently regulate their military counsels from necessity, suspicion, and fear. And therefore fortitude is the most diligent guardian of itself, because it employs not only undisturbed counsel but also deed and hand. Two gladiators were once present with eyes closed, and thereby unconquered; and no army was ever conquered unless some fear was in it. For the three hundred Lacedaemonians, and any who were like them, were wearied by conquering and lay down upon their own trophies.

§ 7. The endurance of injuries and insults pertains to fortitude. It is altogether necessary to accustom the spirits of citizens to this. No one was superior to Augustus in this matter, if we look among the unbelievers. Cato indeed plainly appeared ἀπαθής, impassible, but falsely. When someone had spat into Socrates' face while he was in bonds, Socrates said that the man should be admonished by the magistrate not to yawn so disgracefully. Yet the ancients judged Socrates to have surpassed three hundred Catos. I judge this virtue to be the bond of peace and charity in the commonwealth. The reason is taken from experience itself. Their own ages did not value the best men, the pillars of their own commonwealth, the fathers of the fatherland. They repelled Cato from the praetorship, afflicted him with insults, and defiled him with spittle; they envied the Scipios, their liberators, as I explained in the chapter on gratitude. And if we consider our own examples, they agitated Moses with seditions, rejected Samuel, and attacked David. In the commonwealth there are many adversaries, slanderers, and rivals, against whom there is one shield: patience. The man who is weak in spirit is rendered liable to all of them. If he can suffer and keep silent, he will conquer. The invulnerable man is not he who is not struck, but he who is not injured. So many evils strike and beat from every side; the brave and patient man alone is greater than injury and repels the things that come against him with solid strength. History has taught that the causes of civil wars are generally tender spirits, impatient of the most trifling things.

But in what manner shall the commonwealth train its citizens in fortitude? Those who judge this question superfluous because boldness cannot be handed over to the timid through discipline, but this good is a gift of nature, wander far from the truth and do not sufficiently distinguish a human being from beasts. The lion is fearless by nature, the tiger wrathful, the horse high-spirited, the doe timid, the sheep placid, and the ape servile. Those dispositions belong to their natures, which training nevertheless often changes and corrects. In the human being, reason, the mistress of all things, and virtue can do all these things. And thus both boys and tender girls, to whom fear is peculiar and who are accustomed to cry out even at masks and frightful objects, have laughed at the threats and torments of tyrants. Sacred history teaches this concerning the Maccabees; the Christian Church glories in thousands of martyrs. Therefore true fortitude consists in an unconquered, persevering, and unchangeable purpose of mind. The mind of the most timid virgin can be so strengthened and made solid that it bears all blows of fortuitous things and all torments with inviolable hardness.

§ 8. Therefore, God is the foundation of fortitude and constancy. This seemed true even to the ancient idolaters, to such an extent that they ranked conquerors of tortures and death among the gods. Therefore those who forsake God are wrongly brave, as Saint Augustine admonishes: "He alone is brave who is brave not in himself but in the Lord." Sermon III to the Brothers in the Desert: "O my brothers and the joy of my heart, consider how great fortitude was in the martyrs, who, as though incapable of suffering, despise torments, crush tyrants, and despise all things that belong to the world; who, although flayed, although burned, although afflicted in all their limbs, although cast down in the whole body, nevertheless we do not read that they were changed in mind. But you ought to know, my brothers, that fortitude is spoken of in many ways: namely, that of hypocrites, philosophers, and good faithful persons. In short, the hypocrite sustains many things, bears many things, and appears brave in all things."

And: "O fortitude! You empty out all cruelty, reject prison, do not fear the cross, embrace the rack, desire chains, and always run spontaneously to death. O monk, your course for the prize is worth nothing, your work is worth nothing unless it is strengthened by the column of fortitude; the edifice of a good work is worth nothing unless you embrace the column of fortitude. But if the column of fortitude is taken away, the whole edifice of good works falls."

And Cyprian, To Quirinus, Book III: "One must glory in nothing, since nothing is ours; in the Gospel κατὰ John: 'No one can receive anything unless it has been given him from heaven.' Likewise in the First Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians: 'For what do you have that you have not received? But if you have received it, why do you glory as though you had not received it?' Likewise in First Βασιλειῶν: 'Do not glory, nor speak lofty things, and let boastful speech not proceed from your mouth, because God is the Lord of knowledge.' Likewise: 'The bow of the powerful has been weakened, and the weak have been girded with strength.' Concerning this very thing in Maccabees: 'It is just to be subject to God and for a mortal not to think himself equal to God.' Likewise there: 'And do not fear the words of a sinful man, because his glory shall be in dung and worms. Today he shall be exalted, and tomorrow he shall not be found, because he has been turned into his earth and his thought has perished.'"

This, therefore, is the fortitude of the martyrs, to which nothing is equal or second. It made the cross desirable to Peter; it strengthened Andrew so that, standing upon the nails themselves, fixed and clinging, he feared to be released. In God, Julius, Martinianus, and Processus, while their faces were being crushed with stones, cried: "Glory to God in the highest." A public voice sounding from heaven showed that it was the gift of God. For when Saint Polycarp entered the stadium, it was said by an angel: "Be brave, Polycarp, and conduct the matter with a lofty spirit."

When the torturers had determined to fasten him with nails so that he might be burned alive, he said: "There is no need of nails; I shall sustain the fire willingly." The flame itself revered so great a constancy and surrounded the unconquered martyr in the manner of an arch; for God wished to erect for his servant a triumphal arch of fire and to show the instrument through which he conquered. There was equal fortitude in an unequal age. Live coals and incense were placed in the hand of Justus, a young man, and he was ordered to extend it above the altar, so that if, conquered by pain, he shook off the fire and incense, he might appear to have sacrificed. But lest he leave anything even for calumny, he preferred his limbs to be burned rather than shake off the fire without sin. Cyrilla, a woman of heroic spirit, accomplished the same thing. What similar thing could Mucius, or anyone among the ancients, do here? Mucius endured the brazier of the altar, but he was deservedly brave, so that by the wonder of his endurance he might stupefy the king whom he could not kill. Here no fear of a greater torment instilled patience under a lighter pain. If Justus had shaken off the coals and pain by a slight movement of his right hand, he could then have hoped for praise and honors.

How great was the perseverance in Theodore, a young man, who, after passing the whole day in most bitter torments as though among roses, when the judge urged him to provide for his own safety, answered with a joyful and brave voice: “Let all who adore graven images be confounded, and those who glory in their idols.” But in these very years the constancy of a Japanese boy was incredible and beyond the human. He was thirteen years old, not yet his own master, but a precocious herald of the divine majesty. He was bound with others to a stake so that he might be burned alive for Christ. When he felt that the slow flame had loosened the tow bonds and, released, approached his mother burning at another stake as her exhorter and consoler, she said to him: “Is it thus, my son, that you desert your station?” Struck by this saying, although he had by no means departed as a deserter, he returned to his place. Without any bond he endured and conquered the fires raging within his entrails. Constancy was in place of ropes and chains. Fearless, this recruit of Christ looked upon his half-burned limbs and enjoyed his own torments as though delights. Japanese letters and the Indian Histories report many more deeds according to this manner and pattern, emulating the primitive Church.

But how great was the spirit of James the Anchorite! When demons attacked him in the appearance of Isaurians, as though they were robbers, he, fearless before death because he judged them robbers, immediately gathered up the hair flowing over his neck and shoulders so that he might present a bare neck prepared for the sword; and in this posture throughout the whole night he awaited the coming blow. With a great spirit he challenged death. These things are divine, and they are fortifications of the spirit from heaven, with which the history of the Christians is full.

§ 9. Therefore, those defenses must be sought from God and drawn from the divine sacraments. Cyprian, Epistle LIV, shows that the arms of our fortitude must be sought from God: “But now peace is necessary not for the weak but for the brave, and communion must be given by us not to the dying but to the living, so that we may not leave unarmed and naked those whom we arouse and exhort to battle, but fortify them with the protection of the blood and body of Christ. And since the Eucharist is made for this purpose, that it may be a protection for those who receive it, let us arm with the fortification of the Lord’s abundance those whom we wish to be safe against the adversary. For how do we teach or provoke them to shed their blood in confession of the name if we deny the blood of Christ to those about to fight? Or how do we make them fit for the cup of martyrdom if we do not first admit them by right of communion to drink the cup of the Lord in the Church?”

And a little afterward: “First, he cannot be fit for martyrdom who is not armed by the Church for battle; and the mind which the received Eucharist does not raise up and kindle fails. For the Lord says in his Gospel: ‘But when they deliver you up, do not consider what you shall speak; for it shall be given to you in that hour what you shall speak. For it is not you who speak, but the Spirit of your Father who speaks in you.’”

§ 10. Perhaps the politician will say that commonwealths have no need of this fortitude, but rather of that other fortitude which expends blood in defense of the fatherland, which runs amid flying javelins secure from death, which plunges into the enemy battle-line and seeks a beautiful death through wounds. As though it were not one and the same virtue which despises the swords and javelins of enemies and the racks and devices of executioners. A man prepared to die, if justice and the public safety command him to fight, will be unconquered through contempt of death. For the sole cause why men fight languidly is fear of death. Tertullian once terrified the pagans by this argument and showed that Christians could do all things and reduce the Gentiles themselves beneath their dominion, being so many and so prepared to die. When the imperial prefect Arius raged inhumanly, nevertheless the eagerness of the Christians to endure torments and death was greater. Therefore, they eagerly professed themselves Christians and offered themselves to slaughter in so great a number that the governor, weary with cruelty, said:

ὦ δειλοί, εἰ θέλετε ἀποθνῄσκειν, κρημνοὺς καὶ βρόχους ἔχετε.

"O wretched men, if you wish to die, you have precipices and nooses." Thus indeed the bloody slave of a tyrant interpreted the Christian fortitude which he was torturing more criminally than before. Nevertheless, it is incumbent upon us to weigh how great a defense such men could be to their commonwealth if they were lawfully led against an enemy by a legitimate magistrate. No one would draw back his foot; no one would desert the ranks through fear; all would strive to protect a fellow soldier by their own death. With great effort, individuals would ascend the enemy's wall and rampart at a swift rush, not from an empty desire for donatives but from hope of eternal remuneration. Therefore our fortitude is in God and from God. Zion is the city of our fortitude; its wall and bulwark is the Creator himself. "I have hoped in God," says David in Psalm 55:5; "what shall flesh do to me?" "The Lord is the protector of my life; before whom shall I tremble? If camps stand together against me, my heart shall not fear." "The Lord is my strength and my praise, and he has become my salvation." And thus in 1 Maccabees 5:61, those priests whom the Lord had not chosen to liberate Israel fell in battle while they considered themselves to be acting bravely. Therefore, the highest fortitude is to have hope fixed in God. A beautiful exhortation occurs in Sozomen, Book II, Chapter VIII, addressed to Ananias the old man as he trembled at the atrocious deaths of his fellow martyrs, by which the prefect of the royal craftsmen encouraged him to constancy: "For a little while, O old man, close your eyes and be of good spirit, for immediately you shall see the light of God."

§ 11. The second thing which renders citizens brave is zeal for sobriety and temperance. For delights enervate and effeminate spirits; indeed, the luxurious man and the brave man are entirely opposed. Truculent, bitter, and terrifying things are conquered by fortitude; fortitude is armed against pains and death itself; luxury pursues sweetnesses. Therefore, since delights flee every labor, they cannot behold fortitude, which enjoins hard things, even from afar. Next, softer education, which dissolves spirits into luxury, violently inflames the desire to preserve life which is naturally implanted in all; and therefore they are terrified at the smallest suspicion of danger. For the delights that accompany life, which is already exceedingly dear, render it still dearer. Thus, when those whose whole life has been passed in shade and banquets are summoned to arduous things, they tremble as though they must die twice. For when delights are denied they grieve as though at death, and they fear death as cowards. The Laconians held command for a long time through hardness of life. The Greeks, broken by delights, became slaves. The Egyptians, accustomed to delights, were the slaves of all kings. Camps themselves have experienced delights as poison. They broke Hannibal at Capua. Nor did the poets invent Hercules drawing wool under a woman's command for any other reason than to show that the brave cannot exist amid delights. I shall say more concerning these matters when military discipline is to be treated.

§ 12. Practice in dangers and the examples of others also sharpen fortitude marvelously. All unforeseen things seem greater, especially amid dangers. A man inexperienced in sailing cries out at the first blow of the storm, but a prudent helmsman does not pale even at the tenth wave. In undertaking dangers the first step is the most difficult; when examples have gone before, many follow willingly. Seneca in On Tranquility of Mind: "Unless you regard whatever can happen as something that will happen, you give adverse things strength against you--a strength which anyone who has first seen them has broken, but much more anyone who has experienced them." And Saint Ambrose, Book I, Chapter XXXVIII of On Duties: "This, therefore, belongs to diligence, that a man prepare himself in this way; that belongs to natural ability, if anyone can foresee by vigor of mind the things which will happen and place them, as it were, before his eyes; determine what can occur and what he ought to do if it occurs; sometimes turn two or three possibilities together in his mind which he conjectures can occur either individually or conjointly, and arrange actions for either the individual or conjoined events which he understands will be advantageous. Therefore, it belongs to a brave man not to dissemble when something threatens but to anticipate it and, as though from a certain watchtower of the mind, explore it, and to meet future events with provident thought, lest perhaps he afterward say: 'I fell into these things because I did not think they could happen.' In short, unless they are quickly forestalled, just as in war an unforeseen enemy is scarcely sustained and, if he finds men unprepared, easily crushes them, so unexplored evils break the mind more greatly."

§ 13. Let great rewards be proposed for fortitude, not so that men may act rightly from hope of advantage and honors--although this too pertains to government--but so that the magnitude of the rewards may show the excellence of virtue to tender spirits. Therefore, those who have persisted with a brave spirit in sudden and grave crises and have repelled enemies must be treated with great honor. For in these cases fortitude especially shines forth. Aristotle, Book III, Chapter VI of the Ethics: "That man is properly called brave who is fearless concerning an honorable death and all those things which occur suddenly and bring it."

And Cicero, Book I of On Duties: "It belongs to a brave and steadfast spirit not to be disturbed in harsh circumstances nor, as is said, to be cast from its position while in tumult, but to employ the counsel of a present mind and not depart from reason. Although this belongs to a great spirit, that also belongs to a great natural ability: to anticipate future things in thought, determine beforehand what can happen on either side and what must be done when anything has happened, and not to commit anything such that at some time it must be said, 'I had not thought it.'"

Therefore, virtue of this kind has always been cultivated with the highest honor. Thus Mattathias killed the royal prefect who compelled men to adore idols and the apostate who was sacrificing. Eleazar went beneath the beast, killed it after piercing its belly, and was thus buried in his own triumph. Another Eleazar, the Ahohite, one of David's mighty men, by no means gave himself as a companion to the fleeing; rather, after all the others had scattered in immense terror, he alone persisted and struck the Philistines until his hand stiffened with the sword. The Lord wrought a great salvation on that day, and the people who had fled returned to strip the spoil from the slain. 2 Samuel 23:11. And Shammah the son of Agee protected the fleeing people and struck the Philistines. Behold the spirit: in a sudden event the whole army flees, and one soldier defends it as it flees; and, what is more marvelous, one man delays and puts to flight the victors as they rush forward. And in verse 18, Abishai raised his spear against three hundred and killed them.

Finally, "love is strong as death, jealousy hard as hell." Love of God renders citizens brave. Song of Songs 8:6. "For who shall separate us from the charity of Christ? Tribulation, or distress, or famine, or nakedness, or danger, or persecution?" Augustine, Chapter XLVII of On True Religion: "That man is most truly and certainly unconquered who clings to God, not so that he may merit some good external to him from God, but because for him nothing is good except to cling to God himself. As long as this man is in this life, he uses a friend to repay a kindness; he uses an enemy for patience; he uses those whom he can for beneficence; he uses all for benevolence." And a little afterward: "But amid all dutiful labors he is not broken in his expectation of future rest. For what will harm him who can make good use even of an enemy? By the defense and fortification of him by whose precept and gift he loves his enemies, he will not fear enmities. For this man it is too little not to be saddened amid tribulations unless he even rejoices, knowing that tribulation works patience, patience trial, trial hope, and hope does not confound, because the charity of God has been poured forth in our hearts through the Holy Spirit who was given to us."

Therefore, let the commonwealth train its citizens in the true and constant love of God. For if the love of creatures renders men furious and contemptuous of all dangers, why should not love of the divinity, resting upon the highest reason, render them unconquered?

Fortitude Is Not Acquired by Bloody Spectacles

§ 1. Against bloody spectacles, much was said by me in the chapter on avoiding cruelty. Yet there have not been lacking those who judged that they should be recalled, so that youth, accustomed to wounds and blood, might not shudder in war at things it had often watched in peace, as though they were unfamiliar. They therefore judge that men are rendered brave and warlike by watching the combats of gladiators, and for this reason they praise the Romans. Those counsels contrive cruelty and destruction for the human race. Even now, are not cruel spirits seen to delight in cheap blood and the degenerate common people? How great is the concourse to watch the punishment of one wretched little man? Neglecting their own affairs, they purchase the spectacle of a dying man, and would purchase it even at a price if that were required. And lest you marvel that such cruel spectacles are demanded again by those who make a profession of the Christian religion, weigh in your mind the things which experience teaches us to occur. Many teach in cities the art of fighting with the sword, spear, and other weapons. They challenge one another in mutual rivalry. With how much zeal do men press themselves forward and purchase a place for watching at a price? Nor are there lacking those who, by sending gifts, because they cannot do so by command, attempt to incite them to fiercer combat. Sometimes they exhibit these spectacles for themselves at weddings, and not rarely they are gravely wounded or fall. But if some men, as indeed happens wickedly and against the laws, decide life by a challenge, how great a multitude of spectators runs together? How few out of so many exhort them to peace. Some even possess such savagery that they eagerly attend the tortures of those subjected to judicial examination. The desire of human beings is depraved and malicious; they delight in a human being's violent death. But against cruelty, expense, and the other evils, the fruit of fortitude, courage, and military glory is alleged: that by so dreadful and deadly a spectacle spirits are strengthened against wounds and iron. I judge the contrary to be true: that by gladiatorial spectacles, the mangling of wild beasts, and acts of cruelty an immense terror is instilled, every virtue avoided, and lofty spirits cast down and effeminated, in no way raised or strengthened.

§ 2. In the first place, I shall employ examples, which have very great force in a political matter. Gaius Caesar delighted in bloody spectacles above all, as all authorities transmit, and he was most cruel. After Gaius came Claudius, concerning whom Dio says: "He frequently exhibited gladiatorial games, in which he delighted greatly. Among other things, he willingly watched at lunchtime those who were torn apart in the middle of the theater; although he killed a lion trained to eat human beings and pleasing to the common people for that reason, because it was not fitting for the Roman people to see spectacles of this sort."

But Claudius was always fearful to a marvelous degree, and fearful when he came to power. Tiberius too was devoted to that cruelty, for he gave a most magnificent show, even recalling certain discharged gladiators, as Suetonius is the authority, with a fee of one hundred thousand sesterces. But he went mad in this way when already an old man; Nero, immediately from the beginning. Hadrian too, on his birthday, killed one hundred lions and one hundred lionesses. Martial's servile flattery made Domitian's arena celebrated; all these things show that he was devoted to the savagery of the amphitheater to the point of complete insanity. Nevertheless, no one was more fearful than he, who expected death at every hour, who covered a wall with phengite stone lest someone unexpectedly attack him from behind while he was walking. The madness of all was surpassed by the frenzy of Commodus. He himself was gladiator, charioteer, and trainer; he lived more in the school than in the palace. Gladiators and hunts were exhibited while he dined. He himself fought seven hundred and thirty-five times. Amid applause he was called "Paulus, first of the secutores" six hundred and twenty times; he preferred so to be called rather than "first of the emperors." He killed or conquered one thousand gladiators--for who would test his strength against Caesar? He killed many thousands of wild beasts with his own right hand; and lest you think it was without skill, he killed one hundred lions with one hundred blows. It is marvelous that so portentous a man had so certain a hand. These things are from Lampridius. Nor amid these savage games did he forget his majesty, for he cast to wild beasts those by whom he was mocked. Gallus, the nephew of Constantius, according to Marcellinus, Book XIV, delighted in bloody games and in boxers falling beneath one another.

These men, certainly cowardly or altogether averse to war, rendered the empire liable to barbarians. Tiberius, after obtaining the empire, oppressed the city and thereafter defiled Capri; nor did he administer anything in military affairs, except to separate brave commanders from distinguished legions and to pretend that he would go into provinces and wars--in which matter, according to Tacitus, he deceived the senate for a long time, the armies longer, and the provinces longest. Gaius, although educated in war and called Caligula in a military jest, was nevertheless not a brave commander. He assembled a great army in which there were two hundred and fifty thousand soldiers, and destroyed a great part of them; for he killed them individually and sometimes even in crowds. Concerning his German expedition, Suetonius, after many things most foolishly done, relates the following in Chapter XLVI: “Finally, as though about to accomplish a war, after drawing up his battle-line upon the shore of the Ocean and placing ballistae and engines, while no one knew or imagined what he was about to undertake, he suddenly commanded them to gather shells and fill their helmets and folds of clothing, calling them the spoils of the Ocean owed to the Capitol and palace. As a memorial of victory he raised a very high tower, from which, as from a lighthouse, fires would shine at night to direct the courses of ships; and after proclaiming to the soldiers a donative of one hundred denarii per man, as though he had surpassed every example of liberality, he said: ‘Go away happy; go away rich.’”

Claudius, bloody in spectacles, did not permit military command even to brave men. When Corbulo’s virtue became known, he revoked his command. Corbulo deservedly exclaimed: “The ancient commanders were fortunate, for they were permitted to be brave without danger; but I am prevented from it by Caesar’s envy.” Nero, so savage in spectacles, set out for Greece. Dio relates the matter in Chapter XIV: “For Rome was not sufficient for him, nor the theater of Pompey, nor the Circus Maximus; but there was need of an expedition, so that he might become, as he said, περιοδονίκης.” He brought with him so great a multitude, not only of the Augustales but also of other human beings, as though an army of enemies were present or he had captured the Parthians or other nations. But those were, of course, Neronian soldiers, and in place of arms they carried lyres, plectra, masks, and tragic shoes. Therefore he brought back a victory worthy of such an army and conquered Terpnus, Diodorus, and Pammenes in place of Philip, Perseus, and Antiochus.

And lest you think that cruelty was left behind at Rome, Dio adds: “Even if these things alone, as I said a little before, had been done, nevertheless the affair would have been exceedingly carefree, marked with disgrace, and held in mockery. But now, as though he had truly come to wage war, he plundered Greece although he left it free, committed infinite killings, confiscated the goods of certain persons still living, and took away innumerable offerings which had been deposited even in the temples at Rome.”

Dio describes Domitian’s costly and cruel spectacles and his timid and unwarlike spirit in this manner: “But Domitian, after leading an army against them--the Dacians--although he himself took no part in the war, for he was not only incapable of enduring bodily labor but also timid and unwarlike in spirit, wanton and lustful not only toward women but also toward boys, nevertheless, after sending commanders to wage the war and shamefully losing a great part of the soldiers, sent letters to Rome as victor. For this reason so many and so great decrees were made for him that throughout almost the whole world which was beneath his dominion golden and silver statues were erected. He presented a costly spectacle, from which we have learned nothing worthy of history except that virgins competed in a race. After these things he celebrated festival days, namely triumphal days. He frequently exhibited contests, with battles of infantry and thereafter cavalry joined in the circus, and also a naval battle in a certain new place, in which not only did almost all who fought die, but also many spectators, because, when a very great rain and violent storm suddenly arose, he permitted no one to depart from the spectacle; and although he himself changed his cloak, he allowed the others to change nothing. As a result, not a few fell into grave illnesses and died. And so he gave the people a nocturnal banquet for the sake of consoling them. For he often exhibited contests at night and introduced nuns and women into them."

Commodus fled most shamefully from war and purchased peace from the barbarians. "So that by money," says Herodian, "in which he especially abounded, he might purchase security, he denied them nothing they requested." This was the man who nevertheless had determined to go out not from the palace clothed in purple but armed from the gladiatorial school; yet the death inflicted upon him that same night averted this disgrace from the Roman Empire.

The matter itself therefore sufficiently teaches that by such inhuman and foul spectacles not commanders and soldiers but cruel men are made brave. If we consider Rome herself, when she was formerly rustic her soldier was braver without a spectacle of domestic slaughter. Thereafter the most cowardly common people attended daily killings. A few soldiers restrained so many hundreds of thousands through fear and, when they pleased, cut them down. When gladiatorial spectacles were frequent, genuine virtue languished, and selections of the bravest began to be obtained from Gaul, Batavia, and Thrace.

§ 3. But what becomes clear to one who consults history, I am confident that I shall also prove by a reason sought from the nature of things. I shall employ a true sorites approved by philosophers. He who rejoices in bloody spectacles, as Drusus and others did, is cruel; he who is cruel is also lustful; he who is such is also timid and unwarlike; therefore he who rejoices in human blood is unwarlike.

Next, cruelty--savagery seen and practiced--is rendered more incited and inhuman, just as lust by pleasures, avarice by plunder, pride by flatteries, and ambition by honors. Thus fear and the evils connected with it are also increased.

Human beings, like the other animals, are moved by the perception and imagination of things that are pleasing and pleasurable and flee things that are sorrowful and atrocious. But it matters very greatly how forcefully and vividly custom or perception has impressed anything upon the mind. For if the mind remains fixed in attentive thought upon those things which flood the senses with pleasure, desires are incited and carried beyond bounds. If it sees a human being burned, cut, and tortured, and conceives in the mind from his voice, movement, and countenance the goads of pain, the whole body must necessarily be shaken by horror of such things. Those, therefore, who are not accustomed to them grow pale, shudder, and have their hair stand upright. For there is a certain sympathy of nature which, at another's evil, excites pain in another. There are some who fall down at the sight of another's pain, as Aristotle also explains in Problems, Section XXVII. Hence it follows that those who have known with their eyes, thought, and countenance the bitterness of grave torments in others more violently shudder at things whose magnitude they have accurately weighed. Thus they judge those persons most wretched and the evils intolerable. From this it necessarily happens that the things concerning which fortitude is exercised appear more terrible to those who have employed experience in others. For just as, when the enticements of another's pleasure have been seen, the affection is incited to enjoy them, so also, when the bitterness of another's torture is cast before the eyes, nature, the preserver of itself, recoils with great impulse and is afraid. Therefore, just as those who serve pimps and brothels are rendered more desirous of pleasures and thus more intemperate, so each person, by a raw spectacle of inhumanity, becomes more disposed to flee pains. Hence executioners and their household--a crowd ingenious in punishments--are said to be most weak if they undergo judicial tortures by their own example, as they sometimes deserve. For the whole heap of evil has already forced itself upon their vivid meditation and shaken the mind with fear before pain burns the body. They therefore suffer so great an evil twice.

§ 4. Added to the sum of the evil is the end and object which the spectators of gladiators have set before themselves. It does not tend toward making them fearless in receiving wounds, but toward their enjoying a cruel, inhuman, bestial pleasure. But the enjoyment of pleasures blunts fortitude's edge. The pagans themselves called those spectacles consolations of the eyes, not incitements to fortitude; for every most loathsome person, useless in war, sat at them.

Caelius, to be sure, the intimate of Tullius, did not dare to watch the chariot-fighters in Britain, although, says Cicero, we could not have cheated him even of an andabata. Women themselves--the Vestal Virgins--rise at the blows and say that it is their delight when they see breasts broken open by a turned thumb.

Therefore, just as those who gaze upon the filth, hunger, and calamities of the needy press more ardently upon riches and seek them through the dangers of seas, lands, and treasures deposited among the dead, so also those who most willingly watch pains in others fear the pains they have watched all the more. For they desire not the exercise of skill, not the strength of bodies, but butchery. Thus Seneca writes concerning the midday spectacles in his Letters: "Now, trifles having been set aside, they are sheer homicides. They have nothing with which they may be covered. Exposed to a blow with their whole bodies, they never direct the hand in vain. Most prefer this to the ordinary pairs and the fighters demanded in addition. Why should they not prefer it? The sword is repelled by neither helmet nor shield. To what end are defenses? To what end the arts of the sword? All those things are delays of death. In the morning human beings are cast to lions and bears; at midday they are cast to their spectators. They command those who have killed to be exposed to those who will kill them, and they reserve the victor for another slaughter. The conclusion for the fighters is death; the business is conducted with sword and fire. These things take place while the arena is unoccupied. But someone has committed robbery. What, then, did he deserve? That he be hanged. He killed a human being: because he killed, he deserved to suffer this. But you, wretched man, what have you deserved, that you should watch these things? 'Kill, burn, scourge! Why does he rush upon the sword so timidly? Why does he kill with too little boldness? Why does he die with too little willingness?' By blows they are driven into wounds, and with breasts bare and exposed they receive mutual strokes. Has the spectacle been interrupted? Meanwhile human beings have their throats cut, lest nothing be done."

§ 5. He who often gazes upon wounds and blood does not tremble before them. So indeed--if he himself is outside the danger. Not even an executioner grows pale amid his daily offices of torture, unless perhaps he himself is summoned to the rack; nor is he therefore brave, but, if he does not pity those whom he torments, savage.

The gladiators themselves, indeed, exhibited an example of constancy. "What ordinary gladiator," says Cicero, "has groaned? Who has ever changed his countenance? Who has not stood, and even lain down, honorably? Who, when he had lain down and was ordered to receive the sword, drew in his neck? So great is the power of training, meditation, and custom."

Yet gladiators are not brave, because they undergo dangers not by reason but by miserable necessity or avarice. Training, meditation, custom--indeed necessity--drive them toward imitations of virtue, if they do not wish to fight with the spectators hostile to them, if they do not wish to be burned and cut, if they prefer to be dispatched by one wound rather than by repeated blows. But the dangers of others do not strengthen the spectators. Otherwise, how were the Romans so brave for four hundred and ninety years? For in the year 490 of the city Marcus and Decimus Brutus first presented three pairs at their father's funeral, and thereafter the thing was rare, until, when morals had been corrupted, it grew beyond measure; for this crime long remained within a limit. In the five hundred and eightieth year of the city, some other small gladiatorial shows were given, says Livy in Book XLI. One was distinguished above the rest, in that seventy-four human beings fought over the course of three days.

The homeland of luxury and softness itself teaches that these spectacles were joined with luxury and timidity. Campanian luxury is celebrated in history, and its cruelty is well known. See Silius, Book II; Lipsius, Saturnalia, Book I, Chapter VI. For at every more sumptuous banquet it was customary to exhibit several pairs of gladiators for combat in the dining room. The custom seems to have arisen among the Campanians, concerning whom Silius writes in Book II of the Punic Wars:

> Indeed, it was their ancient custom to enliven men's banquets with slaughter,

> And to mingle with feasts the dreadful spectacles
>
> Of men contending with the sword and often falling over the very cups,
>
> The tables spattered with no sparing blood.

And Strabo writes concerning the same people in Book V:

> ἐπὶ τοσοῦτον γὰρ ἐξετρύφησαν ὥστ᾽ ἐπὶ δεῖπνον ἐκάλουν πρὸς ζεύγη μονομάχων, ὁρίζοντες ἀριθμὸν κατὰ τὴν τῶν συνδείπνων ἀξίαν.

That is: "To such a point were they carried by luxury that they invited guests to pairs of gladiators, whose number they increased or diminished according to the dignity of each banquet."

So savage a pleasure therefore belongs to soft and servile dispositions, and to those whom delights have subjected to the commands of others. Thus it truly is: cruelty makes men timid; and, as I have said, the timid are cruel.

But the frequent practice of cruelty makes men more timid in the face of dangers. For those who pursue pleasure recoil from serious things, and much more from dangerous things. Hence they were accustomed also to say proverbially, "Tomorrow we shall attend to serious matters"--a saying which brought destruction to several cities. The nature of animals also shows cruelty to belong to fear; for in every kind the females are more cruel than the males, and more timid. Aristotle rightly says--or someone else is the author--in Chapter V of the Physiognomy:

"Female animals appear to me to be more malicious than males, more wanton, less liberal, and weaker. The females among those animals which are raised around us are therefore very evident examples; as for those in the forest, all shepherds and hunters acknowledge that they are such as has been stated.

"But this too is evident: among individuals in each kind the female has a smaller head than the male, a narrower face and a more slender neck; they have weaker breasts and smaller sides, but thighs fleshier than the males'; they have soft knees and slender legs. Their feet are more beautiful, and the form of the whole body softer rather than stronger. They have fewer sinews, are softer, and are furnished with moister flesh. Males, having the contrary of all these things, are by nature of a stronger and more just kind, but the female is by nature more timid and unjust. Since these things are so, the lion appears to be the most perfect of all animals in assuming the form of the male."

Those spectacles, therefore, belong neither to a brave man nor to a wise one, but to an evildoer; animals themselves are cruel through fear. When a stag has conquered, it cruelly tramples its adversary beneath its feet. Fear chills; it likewise causes torpor to be excited and inclines one toward the enticements of pleasures. Those whose blood is diluted are timid, for fear chills, and the same persons are cruel. Great cruelty formerly belonged to the Carthaginians, and even now belongs to the Ethiopians and those who inhabit the torrid zone. But they are colder by nature, as Aristotle teaches in Problems, Section XIV, Problem VIII:

> διὰ τί οἱ μὲν ἐν τοῖς εὐπνόοις τόποις βραδέως γηράσκουσιν, οἱ δὲ ἐν τοῖς κοίλοις καὶ ἑλώδεσι ταχέως; ἢ τὸ γῆρας σηπεδών τις ἐστί. σήπεται δὲ τὸ ἠρεμοῦν, τὸ δὲ ἐν κινήσει ὂν ἢ ὅλως ἄσηπές, ἢ ἧττον τοῦτο πάσχει, οἷον τὸ ὕδωρ. ἐν μὲν οὖν τοῖς ὑψηλοῖς, διὰ τὴν εὐπνοίαν, ὁ ἀὴρ ἐν κινήσει ἐστίν· ἐν δὲ τοῖς κοίλοις μένει. ἐπὶ δὲ ἐκεῖ μὲν διὰ τὴν κίνησιν ἀεὶ καθαρὸς ὁ ἀὴρ καὶ ἕτερος γίνεται· ἐν δὲ τοῖς ἑλώδεσι μένει.

"Why do those who inhabit elevated and open places grow old more slowly, while those who inhabit hollow and marshy places do so more quickly? Is it because old age is a kind of putrefaction? But that which is at rest putrefies; that which is moved is in no way affected thus, or is less affected, as flowing and enclosed water show. Therefore, just as in elevated places the air is stirred by breath blowing upon it from every side, so in hollow places it remains unmoved. In addition, in open places the air is continually kept pure and varied because of the agitation; in marshy places it is impure, and the same air always grows stale."

The signs of a timid man in Chapter III of the Physiognomy are soft hair, an inclination of the body, a posture not erect, the belly drawn upward, a yellowish color, weak and blinking eyes--broken, lean, and mobile--weak extremities of the body, small legs, long and slender hands, and small and weak loins. The body is σύντονον in its movements; likewise the timid man is not vehement, but supine; he is easily stupefied by terror, is readily moved in countenance and head, is anxious, looks downward, has a wrinkled face, and the face itself is small. You will find most of these things in the cruel--that is, in those who are such by nature; for some, although gentle by nature, have nevertheless degenerated into cruelty by custom and habit. Since, therefore, those spectacles do not change bodily affections but make them worse, and do not confer strength upon the mind either, they in no way make men brave. Consequently, in order to excuse butchery and blood poured out in peace through a most loathsome pleasure, some have said that these things are not the rudiments of fortitude but certain sacrifices for appeasing Nemesis, so that she, appeased through domestic slaughters, might favor the killing of enemies.

§ 6. But if they judged gladiatorial shows useful in war, why did they not send the gladiators themselves into dangers? Why did they wish them to be infamous? For they ought to have been the bravest of nations; yet this was done rarely and only in the utmost necessity. Nor did they arrange matches in camps before battle and, by watching a wound, animate themselves for death. For they judged it foolish to display in another's body the lot which each man was now to expect for himself. Fortitude consists in the meditation upon and love of surpassing dignity and moral worth, on account of which it despises dangers and pains; it does not consist in delights derived from another's torment. It weighs by right reason the causes which may raise up and strengthen the mind for acting and suffering bravely; it does not say that the blood of a worthless, hired scoundrel is the food of its spirit.

Tiberius exhibited cruel games, imitating Augustus. "There lay," says Tacitus, "an immense slaughter: every sex, every age, the illustrious and the obscure, scattered or gathered together." He whom that heap delights will never be brave. He holds so tenaciously to his own pleasure that he procures it by so many deadly things. That man, of course, will fight for his fatherland for whose pleasures you will give a show only when you have killed all the citizens--and a show most pleasing of all shows. He is afraid to die who demands the deaths of others, not for his own safety or for the defense of the fatherland, but for his own delights. A brave man lays down his life for a friend, and even for an unknown person; he judges it shameful to purchase life by the vicarious death of another. This man judges it a great fruit of life to gaze upon the deaths of human beings.

How far have those pursuits of more recent men departed from the ancient integrity of Christians? By the great care and severity of bishops Christians were kept away from that savagery. What did the pagans infer from this? This, of course: that the pleasures of spectacles were avoided by Christians so that, having renounced the enticements of life, they might more easily abandon life. Thus Tertullian writes in Chapter I of On the Spectacles: "There are those who suppose that the Christian kind, ready for death, is trained for this obstinacy by the renunciation of pleasures, so that they may more easily despise life when, as though its restraining ties had been cut away, they do not desire that which they have already rendered superfluous to themselves; so that it may be thought to have been determined by this policy and by human foresight rather than prescribed by a divine command. It would, of course, be irksome, even while persevering amid such pleasures, to die for God. Although, even if it were so, obedience was owed to so suitable a policy and to the discipline of so great an obstinacy."

The Romans, therefore, were so far from thinking that they were strengthened by those spectacles to undergo death and the dangers of death courageously that they said the spectacles were avoided by Christians for precisely this reason: lest, by pursuing the pleasures of life, they should refuse to leave life itself when virtue demanded it. Tertullian continues in Chapter II: "In short, you would find more men whom the danger of pleasure than the danger of life calls away from this sect. For even a fool does not dread death as something owed; even a wise man does not despise pleasure as so great a thing, since there is no other charm of life both for the fool and for the wise except pleasure."

The nations therefore sought not fortitude but pleasure from the amphitheater. Among such things Tertullian reckons the circus, the lion, bodily strength, and the charms of the voice. He names the lion when he censures all the bloodiest spectacles, for in these was the height of madness. Scaevola presented many lions; Sulla, when praetor, presented one hundred maned lions; Pompey the Great, Sulla's pupil, six hundred, among which were three hundred and fifteen maned lions. For it was fitting that the teacher, who did not know letters, should be surpassed by his pupil. But Julius surpassed Pompey even in this disgrace, for he brought forth eight hundred. Besides these they also presented panthers, after, through wickedness, an ancient decree of the senate had been abrogated by command of the people. Scaurus, in his aedileship, presented one hundred and fifty of various kinds; Pompey the Great, four hundred and ten; Augustus bestowed four hundred and twenty. These were the things because of which the nations feared to die.

Moreover, Tertullian teaches in Chapter XV of On the Spectacles that the spirit is shaken by spectacles: "No one comes to pleasure without emotion; no one experiences emotion without its own accidents. The accidents themselves are incitements of emotion. But if emotion ceases, there is no pleasure; and the man who goes to the place where he obtains nothing is guilty of so much vanity. I think, moreover, that vanity too is foreign to us. What of the fact that he also judges himself when placed among those whose like he does not wish to be, and surely confesses himself their detester? It is not enough for us if we ourselves do no such thing, unless we also are not joined with those who do such things. 'If you saw a thief,' he says, 'you ran together with him.' Would that we did not even dwell in the world together with them; nevertheless, we are separated from them in worldly things, because the world is God's, but worldly things are the devil's."

If those men are brave, why are their souls held cheap and infamous? Tertullian writes in Chapter XXII of On the Spectacles: "For the very authors and administrators of the spectacles--the charioteers, actors, athletes of the exercise-ground, and those most beloved men of the arena--to whom women subject their cheap souls or those men even their bodies, for whose sake they commit the things they censure: from the same quarter from which it magnifies them, society casts them down and diminishes them; indeed, it manifestly condemns them by ignominy and diminution of civil status, keeping them from the curia, the rostra, the senate, the equestrian order, and all other honors and ornaments together. How great is their perversity! They love those whom they punish; they depreciate those whom they approve. They magnify the art and stigmatize the artist. What sort of judgment is it, that someone should be disgraced by the things through which he merits favor? Indeed, how great a confession of an evil thing it is that its authors, although most acceptable, are not without a mark of disgrace."

I finish, and give this one admonition: if for constancy you desire blood, you have Christ's. Tertullian, On the Spectacles, Chapter XXIX.

CHAPTER XIX

A Commonwealth, However Powerful and Rich, Ought to Hold Most Tenaciously to Modesty

§ 1. For the unconquered strength of a city, for the powers of a kingdom, nothing is so impregnable as modesty and what Christians call humility. Do you judge it right that those placed on high should be humble? Do you call to self-contempt those whose whole life is worn away by a most laborious and anxious ambition? Christ teaches that it must be done altogether so, and the safety of the commonwealth teaches it too--that safety which is nothing without Christ; but I shall now discuss it politically.

Yet do not recoil from discourse about humility, O prince; I shall add to it majesty, magnanimity, and care for fame and glory, for I shall discuss these things in order.

§ 2. Humility is, from a full knowledge of oneself, a true estimation of one's own goods and evils, and a contempt for preeminence. It is a great virtue, and plainly one belonging to a heroic spirit, by which those things which appear great but are small are appraised at their own prices. Its destruction and plague is pride: an appetite for dignity and preeminence contrary to right reason. Nothing is more monstrous than that vice, nothing more hateful to God, nothing more pernicious to the commonwealth. Let all, therefore--prince, nobles, citizens, farmers--be trained in modesty and submission. All, I say; for pride can belong to the poor, and humility to princes. The crime is not in the things but in their use. In the magnificence of princes there is often a spirit that despises riches and honors; in the will of the most abject there is a most arrogant vanity.

Let the most holy wife of the proudest king, Esther, be an example. Esther 14:16: "You know my necessity: that I abominate the sign of my pride which is upon my head on the day of my display; and that I detest it as the rag of a menstruous woman and do not wear it on the days of my silence; and that I have not eaten at Haman's table, nor has the king's banquet pleased me, nor have I drunk the wine of libations; and your handmaid has never rejoiced from the time when I was brought here until the present day, except in you, O Lord God of Abraham."

Haman has exhibited for us an example of raging arrogance; he gravely shook both himself and the commonwealth.

The second foundation of the commonwealth, therefore, is humility. The breath of vainglory, striving upward, overthrows it as though by an earthquake. "A proud human being is a great misery," says Augustine; but a proud commonwealth is a great and manifold misery.

§ 3. First, indeed, humility is pleasing to God, because it distrusts itself and relies upon God. It has God as protector; pride has him as destroyer. Psalm 17:28: "For you will save the humble people, and will humble the eyes of the proud." Deservedly, therefore, does a proud commonwealth experience God as an enemy, since it does not acknowledge him as the author of its felicity. He "regards the humble things in heaven and on earth." So truly, as Augustine testifies in Book III, Chapter XXIII of On Christian Doctrine, "There is scarcely a page of the holy books in which it does not resound that God resists the proud but gives grace to the humble."

Pride brought about the ruin of the whole world, for it was the beginning of sin. Pride dragged Pharaoh into the depth of the Red Sea as though he were a stone. "Who is the Lord, that I should hear his voice and let Israel go? I do not know the Lord, and I will not let Israel go." Sennacherib, in 4 Kings 18 and 19, terrifies Hezekiah with enormous pride; but, after his army is slain, he himself is butchered by his sons in the sight of his idol. "Since, therefore, the power of God is not in multitude, nor his will in the strength of horses, nor have the proud pleased him from the beginning, but the prayer of the humble and meek has always pleased him," Judith 9:16. A city which raises itself up against majesty cannot stand, for the Lord detests lofty eyes. Proverbs 9:17. All the great men whom power has puffed up have experienced what Solomon threatens in Proverbs 15:25: “The Lord will demolish the house of the proud, and will make firm the boundaries of the widow.”

§ 4. A few sin at the peril of all; indeed, the wantonness of women is sufficient for destruction, as Isaiah 3:16 bears witness. No riches, no confidence exempts the proud. How strong in calamity were the Israelites? Isaiah 9:9: “And all the people of Ephraim shall know, and the inhabitants of Samaria, saying in pride and greatness of heart: ‘The bricks have fallen, but we shall build with hewn stones; they have cut down the sycamores, but we shall put cedars in their place.’ And the Lord will raise up the enemies of Rezin over him and turn his enemies into a tumult--Syria from the East and the Philistines from the West--and they shall devour Israel with the whole mouth.”

How magnificently Assyria boasts in the same prophet, Chapter 10:12: “In the strength of my hand I have done it, and in my wisdom I have understood; and I have removed the boundaries of peoples, plundered their princes, and, like a mighty man, pulled down those seated on high.” What does the prophet, from God’s secret counsel, foretell to so great a monarch? Verse 16: “For this reason the ruler, the Lord of hosts, will send leanness among his fat ones, and beneath his glory a burning shall blaze like the burning of fire.”

Scarcely can a pride greater than Babylon’s be conceived; Isaiah speaks of it in Chapters 13 and 14. Yet it was drawn down to the lower regions. “And that Babylon, glorious among kingdoms, renowned in the pride of the Chaldeans, shall be as when the Lord overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah.” The Lord says to her in Isaiah 47:8: “And now hear these things, you delicate woman who dwells confidently, who say in your heart: ‘I am, and there is none besides me any longer; I shall not sit as a widow, and I shall not know barrenness.’ These two things shall suddenly come upon you in one day, barrenness and widowhood; all things have come upon you because of the multitude of your evil deeds and because of the exceedingly great hardness of your enchanters.”

Moab has the same pride, but with less power. Jeremiah 48:29: “We have heard the pride of Moab; he is exceedingly proud--his loftiness, his arrogance, his pride, and the elevation of his heart. I know,” says the Lord, “his boasting, and that his strength is not proportionate to it, nor has he attempted to do according to what he was able. Therefore I shall wail over Moab and cry out to all Moab, lamenting to the men of the earthen wall.”

This vice, therefore, is hateful to God and always precedes the destruction of commonwealths, for it contains an express contempt for the divinity. This argument from divine judgment and oracles is abundant for a pious prince. Writers ignorant of our affairs have likewise taught that the punishment of pride is most grave. Orpheus, Plato, and Libanius, in chastising that vice, coined the proper name Νεμέσεως. We think that the other vices are punished more gently, but that pride is crushed. They called her the maiden Adrastia and Rhamnusia. But let us turn our mind to political reasons.

§ 5. The second evil of pride is that it overturns the commonwealth by hatred of itself. The other vices--imprudence, timidity, drunkenness--admit allies and partnerships. Neither a modest man nor a proud man can endure a proud man. All desire to rise above, all to command, none to be subjected. Since all are borne toward the same point, it is necessary that all collide. “Among the proud there are always quarrels.” Proverbs 13:10. Pride makes princes, and especially nobles, hateful. They called Tarquin--headlong in lust, blind with avarice, mad with fury--“the Proud,” and thought the reproach sufficient. Nor does it render merely the prince, but even the prince’s virtues, hateful.

> Pride joined to distinguished conduct pollutes it.
>
> Indeed, pride itself withdrew far away--
>
> A vice customary in prosperous circumstances,
>
> And an unwelcome companion of virtues.

No other cause has afflicted great men more than pride arising from deeds well done, because it produces envy and hatred; but against the hatreds of many no resources can prevail. Benefits themselves, when given proudly, are thankless; when cast up as reproaches, they are turned into injuries. But if Camillus, if Marius, if the Scipios act arrogantly, they make unwelcome the safety they brought to the fatherland.

Seneca writes in Book II, Chapter XI of On Benefits: "If you wish to have grateful men whom you bind by obligation, you ought not only to give benefits but to love. Above all, as I have said, let us spare their ears: admonition produces weariness; reproach, hatred. Nothing must be avoided equally in giving a benefit as pride. What need is there for arrogance of countenance? What need for swelling words? The thing itself exalts you. Empty boasting must be removed; the deeds will speak while we are silent. A benefit proudly given is not merely unwelcome but hateful.

"Caesar gave life to Pompeius Pennus--if he gives who does not take it away. Then, after Pennus had been acquitted and was giving thanks, Caesar extended his left foot to be kissed. Those who excuse him and deny that this was done for the sake of insolence say that he wished to display his gilded slipper--indeed, his golden one, adorned with pearls. Precisely so: what is insulting here, if a man of consular rank kissed gold and pearls, and if he would otherwise have chosen no part upon Caesar's body which he could kiss more cleanly? A man born for this purpose, that he might exchange the customs of a free state for Persian servitude, judged it too little if an old senator who had enjoyed the highest honors had lain suppliant before him in the sight of the foremost men in the manner in which conquered enemies have lain before conquerors. He found something below the knees to which he might thrust liberty down. Is this not to trample the commonwealth--and, someone will say (for it can pertain to the matter), with the left foot? For that man, shamefully, madly insolent, who heard petitions concerning the life of a consular man while wearing his slippers, had not been insolent enough unless the emperor had thrust his feet into the senator's face."

What, then, inflicted twenty-three wounds upon Caesar? Not only injured majesty, not the slaughter of so many citizens, not the pillaged treasury and seized fasces, but the fact that he did not rise before the senate and that he forced his feet upon a senator's kiss. And so those through whom he conquered and to whom he had given life rose up against him.

But by contrast behold the dispositions toward Alexander, the Roman emperor. Herodian narrates thus: "When the appointed day arrived, after he had performed the customary sacred rites for his departure, he left Rome, with the senate and the whole people conducting him, looking back repeatedly and weeping. Nor was there anyone among the people who looked upon him departing with dry eyes, since he had the whole multitude desirous of him, having been raised by them and having administered the empire most modestly for so many years."

The principal cause, therefore, is hatred. For all exult with joy at the punishment of a proud human being. And God himself in a certain manner taunts him.

For τὸ νεμεσητικόν, indignation, is implanted in all human beings; Aristotle in Book II of the Ethics calls it ἐπαινετόν, praiseworthy, and places it in the middle in relation to ἐπιχαιρεκακίαν, malicious joy. For indignation bears it ill that prosperity has been conferred upon an unworthy person; but whoever grows insolent in prosperity appears unworthy of felicity. Whoever vaunts himself from a lofty place is judged worthy to fall from it.

§ 6. The third evil of arrogance is the subtlety of the vice. For in a marvelous manner, while it is avoided, it is sought. And so it insinuates itself into all the virtues and attempts to withdraw their foundation so that the whole structure may fall. Thus humility is also the remedy of all the vices. By this means, however, the commonwealth is overturned under the appearance of the good and honorable. For when the proud perform certain great things and things useful in appearance, because ambition and desire for glory, not reason, draw them, they thereafter turn these things against their friends. Those bodies of the commonwealth are not great but swollen, destined to fall by their own bulk and to burst. Pride is the head of the vices: it presses upon all and commands all. And what is done is called virtue until the whole pus erupts.

§ 7. The commonwealth is sustained and ruled by wisdom. Nothing is more closely joined to wisdom than humility, nothing more opposed to it than ambition, which, among all the passions, has this property: it makes men the most foolish. For it is a certain drunkenness of the arrogant which does not leave them even when sober. For the Spirit of God, the spirit of wisdom, descends into a humble soul--beautiful in its own eyes and in God's eyes; he despises one that is exalted. "Where pride has been, there shall also be insult; but where humility is, there shall also be wisdom." Proverbs 11:2. Pride therefore turns kings away from wisdom. And they sin especially in this, that they consider themselves wise. "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools."

Not only princes but philosophers, the instructors of princes, have been blinded by pride. For concerning them too this saying was bandied about: τῶν φιλοσόφων οὐδὲν ἀφιλοσοφώτερον--nothing is more foreign to philosophy than the philosophers themselves. Anaxippus spoke more gently: philosophers are indeed wise in words, but in reality are ἀνοήτους, senseless. And so many expelled the philosophers: Lysimachus and Antiochus from the whole kingdom; the Romans expelled Alcius and Philiscus, "Epicurean pigs," and at one time all sophists, as the Messenians and others also did. And what one would especially marvel at: from Attica herself, Sophocles by his own ψηφίσματι, decree, removed the same men.

Saint Chrysostom explains the cause of their folly on Romans 1:22:

> μέγα τι περὶ ἑαυτῶν φαντασθέντες, καὶ οὐκ ἀνασχόμενοι ταύτην ἐλθεῖν, ἣν ὁ Θεὸς ἐκέλευσεν αὐτοῖς, ἐβαπτίσθησαν τοῖς τῆς ἀνοίας λογισμοῖς.

"Having imagined some great thing about themselves and not enduring to enter by that way by which God commanded them to enter, they were immersed in thoughts of madness."

But that mad wisdom is especially censured by which they were led to infect the world with superstitions. For although they did not believe in the divinities, they bewitched wretched nations with fear of them, and boasted that they were doing this wisely, as though for keeping peoples in their duty. Thus speaks one of their wise men, Cicero, in Book I of On the Nature of the Gods: "Who was ever so blind in contemplating things that he did not see that these human forms were transferred to the gods either by some design of wise men, so that they might more easily turn the minds of the unskilled from depravity of life to the worship of the gods, or by superstition, so that there might be images which, by venerating them, they might believe themselves to approach the gods themselves?"

But in this wisdom their folly most manifestly betrayed itself. For by that way they taught impunity for every crime. Since it was easy for anyone to despise gods of wood and clay, they then fashioned gods made according to their own judgment and steeped in their own vices, so that they might sin more freely by the authority and exhortation of the divinities and, consecrating to them the shameful acts of their own crimes, might judge themselves made holy by impurity itself.

Princes and magistrates outstripped this unwisdom of the philosophers by the most insane and ambitious rashness and folly, as though with white horses. For when they saw that the right of making gods had been given to the commonwealth, they especially bestowed this benefit upon themselves. "Should I doubt that there are gods," says Gaius, "when I make gods?" By this pride they destroyed themselves and the commonwealth. From this it also followed that they admitted no counsels and that no one dared to put forward truths. But without counsel no city can be ruled.

§ 8. Humility is magnanimous; pride belongs to a small mind and, if we wish to judge rightly, is childish. It is a great thing to be small in one's own mind. There is no need of arguments for this: children, when praised, are transported by joy and do not conceal that passion; they even boast of their affairs of their own accord, and in this matter the simplicity of an innocent age delights us. But if adults or old men do the same things, we judge them not indeed children, yet nevertheless childish. Never is greater laughter aroused on the stage than when some Pyrgopolinices trumpets his battles, because an altogether ridiculous thing is seen: so childish a spirit in so vast a body and in such an array of arms.

The ancients very wittily laughed at Menecrates, who required no other payment from those whom he had healed--whose number was enormous--than that they should call him Jupiter. A childish deed: for all, in return for the benefit conferred upon themselves, were compelled to laugh at the wretched man. How mad and childish was the pursuit of Psaphon the African, who trained talking birds bought at a great price to say, "Psaphon is a god." That most wretched man did not see that the affair could not remain hidden; next, that the birds would fly away even to the pathless places of the forests and would proclaim their master's commendation among mountains and woods with vain zeal, or, in their new liberty, would shake off the old song.

A child defeated in a sportive contest wails; the victor exults, because a little matter either depresses a small spirit or raises it on high. In the arrogant--that is, in the grand and therefore ridiculous--there is no other childish prudence or magnanimity: all are occupied with little things. If you suddenly catch a young man curling his hair, arranging anklets, or attending to other καλλωπίσματα, adornments, he blushes because he understands that it is contrary to decorum, and because μικρόψυχον τῶν περὶ τὸ μικρὸν ἐπιμέλειαν--the care expended upon small matters--is a sign of a small and degenerate spirit.

§ 9. The greatest praise, therefore, is not to act for the sake of praise. It is the childish error of those who think that love of praise is a virtue. For he sees more soundly, says Augustine in Book V, Chapter XIII of The City of God, who recognizes that love of praise is also a vice. This did not escape the poet Horace, who says:

> You swell with love of praise; there are sure expiations
>
> Which, if you read the little book purely three times, will be able to restore you.

And in a lyric poem, to repress the lust for ruling, he sang thus:

> You shall rule more widely by subduing an avid
>
> Spirit than if you join Libya to distant
>
> Gades and each Carthaginian serves one man.

Nevertheless, those who do not restrain their more shameful lusts by the faith of piety, by obtaining the Holy Spirit, and by love of intelligible beauty, are at least better when restrained by desire for human praise and glory--although they are not yet holy, they are less shameful. Even Tullius could not dissemble this in the same books which he wrote On the Republic, where he speaks about forming the prince of the city, whom he says must be nourished upon glory, and consequently recalls that his ancestors did many marvelous and glorious things through desire for glory.

§ 10. But how great a danger is approached while that most powerful passion is nourished--which passion does it flee? From this it comes about that all seek the fame of virtue, few seek virtue itself, and sometimes no one does. Although desire for glory sometimes has a good outcome, although it restrains enormous vices, although it is to the profit of the commonwealth, it is nevertheless dangerous and does not cease to be an evil. Otherwise drunkenness, lust, avarice, and envy itself would also have to be praised. For the drunken, through lack of judgment, cast themselves into dangers from which the sober cannot emerge. Lovers, the envious, and the avaricious, agitated by the furies of their vices, have often rendered great services to the commonwealth. The folly of the lowest common people is profitable to many; those vices must not therefore be tolerated. For although pride sometimes subdues other passions, more often it arouses them.

Calamitous was the pride of Sesostris, king of Egypt, who > Drove Pharian chariots with the necks of kings.

Who drove Xerxes into so cruel a war? Who, before him, Cyrus? And after Cyrus, Alexander? What but desire for glory drove others? So that they might be praised by a few, they destroyed entire nations by extermination.

There is a difference, as Saint Augustine admonishes in Book V, Chapter XIX of The City of God, "between desire for human glory and desire for domination. For although it is easy for him who delights too much in human glory also willingly to affect domination, nevertheless those who desire the true praise, albeit of human affairs, take pains not to displease those who judge rightly. For there are many good things in morals concerning which many judge rightly, although many do not possess them; and through those goods of morals they strive toward glory, command, and domination. Concerning them Sallust says, 'But that man strives by the true way.' But whoever, without desire for glory, by which a human being fears to displease those who judge rightly, desires to dominate and command, for the most part seeks to obtain what he loves even through the most manifest crimes. Accordingly, he who desires glory either strives by the true way or certainly contends by deceits and fallacies, wishing to appear good when he is not. And therefore, for one who possesses virtues, it is a great virtue to despise glory, because his contempt for it is in the sight of God but is not disclosed to human judgment."

§ 11. Joined, therefore, to that danger is the fact that they think there is a good in the vice. For he who, from love of praise, has cut down an enemy and borne wounds in front will also, lest he be compelled to yield to citizens, not shudder at a butchery of citizens; indeed, for his own triumph he will force all into dangers. All history teaches that most wars began from desire for glory and the lust for ruling, and that civic contests arose from ambition.

§ 12. I have demonstrated that anger is deadly to a city and at the same time have shown that it generally arises from pride. Those whom praises inflate and make swollen, censure casts down if they cannot avenge themselves, and drives into rage if power to avenge an insult has been granted. Wretched is the lot of a human being who is raised up by the flattery of those who praise him, contracted in spirit and made to totter by the rashness of those who censure him.

Clidemus the Athenian, victor in a sportive contest, while being crowned by his companions, died submerged in the sweetness of glory. I think it a disgrace that he was an actor and the victor in an actor's contest; but he valued the victory so greatly that through its sweetness he expelled his soul. Chilon the Spartan, while embracing his son who had won at Olympia, breathed out his soul through joy. Tertullian, On the Soul, Chapter LII. So great was the force of joy in Sophocles and the tyrant Dionysius that, upon receiving the token of victory in tragedy, they ceased to live. Pliny, Book VII, Chapter LIII.

Place so great a love of praise in a prince, in a senate. What crimes will not be committed for the sake of obtaining it? Add admonitions, censures, refusals, insults: will not those for whom a foolish little glory was dearer than life judge these annoyances more grievous than death? Hence come those disasters of cities, when a little utterance of another's malignity casts those greedy for praise down from the state of virtue and impels them to destroy the commonwealth. Golden is Augustine's sentence: "Just as humility profits those who serve, so pride harms those who rule." The City of God, Book V, Chapter XV.

§ 13. The virtue of humility is pleasing and beautiful in all; in kings and pontiffs it is divine. For one placed on high not to think high things is difficult; not to look down upon inferiors from on high is a miracle. To few does that felicity fall, that they should not be destroyed by the appearance and opinion of felicity. Amid so many acts of obedience and blandishments, mortality--of itself inclined toward self-flattery--is rarely sufficiently cautious. A prince has no cause, but many occasions, for pride.

Gaius at the beginning conducted many things modestly, so that the conscript fathers ordered them to be read every year. No training is so firm that desire for command will not tear it away. Alexander had, says Valerius in Book VIII, Chapter XV, "a breast insatiable for praise." When Anaxarchus, his companion, reported on the authority of his teacher Democritus that there were innumerable worlds, Alexander said: "Alas, wretched me, that I have not yet obtained even one!" The possession of glory which suffices for the dwelling-place of all the gods was narrow for a human being.

But that praise belongs properly to Christian princes; for those examples which are brought forward from pagans do not exhibit constant virtue. Sardanapalus placed upon his tomb an ἀποκρότημα, that is, two fingers making a snapping sound as though by striking one another, by which he might show that all things, even the greatest, were not worth an as, but were a sound flying past. Porus, when defeated, renounced the royal name, but retained pride and ferocity. Nor was it great humility in Croesus that, when placed upon the pyre, he confessed that he could fall from felicity. Nor was Gilimer the Arian more modest, who, when led in triumph, said more than he felt: "Vanity of vanities, and all is vanity." Catholic princes pronounce this when they approach kingdoms. For it does not belong to great prudence, when you have fallen, to confess that you had not stood with a stable step.

Humility, therefore, belongs properly to Christians, just as the use of the name in that signification belongs properly to them. Augustine on Psalm 31 says: "This water of the confession of sins, this water of humiliation of heart, this water of a salutary life which casts itself down, presumes nothing concerning itself, and proudly attributes nothing to its own power--this water is in none of the books of foreigners: not in the Epicureans, not in the Stoics, not in the Manichees, not in the Platonists. Wherever even the best precepts of morals and discipline are found, nevertheless this humility is not found. The way of this humility flows from no other source; it comes from Christ. This way is from him who, although he was high, came humble. For what else did he teach by humbling himself, having become obedient unto death, even the death of the cross? What else did he teach by paying what he did not owe, so that he might free us from debt? What else did he teach when baptized, who committed no sin; when crucified, who had no guilt? What else did he teach but this humility? Not undeservedly does he say: 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life.'"

§ 14. There are indeed very many things in which the modesty, submission, and obedience of Catholics--which is the mother of humility--is shown. For kings and nations obey their pontiffs and sacred councils. Prostrate upon the ground, they confess their sins, undergo the punishment imposed, and submit their conscience to another's judgment. How arduous this is both the heretics teach, who cast off this part of Christianity, and the magistrates in China, who, because they judge this unworthy of their majesty, come with greater difficulty to the Christian religion.

But the marvelous humility of Christian princes has often appeared. Philip the Arab, who seized the empire by cruelty and parricide, an art then customary, and did not reign without blood, was excluded from the communion of the pious by Fabian; covered with dirt and squalor, he stood as a suppliant to the priest in the order of penitents. He sought entrance into the Church not by strength or gifts but by tears. Eusebius, Book VI, Chapter XXVII.

The great Theodosius--as Theodoret, Book V, Chapter XXVII; Augustine, The City of God, Book V; Sozomen, Book VII, Chapter XXIV; and the letters of Ambrose are authorities--avenged an injury inflicted by the Thessalonians with an unjust slaughter when he ordered certain persons to be killed indiscriminately. Ambrose barred him from entrance to the temple, and the emperor obeyed; falling at the pontiff's knees, he offered himself for any satisfaction whatsoever. Thereafter, admitted to the society of Christians, without royal adornment and prostrate with his whole body upon the ground, he wept--a true and magnanimous imitator of David.

Nor was the submission of Otto less, who, because Crescentius had been killed by hanging contrary to the faith pledged him, at the command of Abbot Romuald exacted from himself the punishments for the violated covenant. For he traveled barefoot from Rome to Mount Garganus in Apulia, afflicted his body throughout Lent by the roughness of haircloth, and lay upon mats. Thus Peter Damian in the Life of Romuald.

Henry II, king of England, according to the testimony of Neubrigensis, received blows publicly with his shoulders bared. Notable is his declaration: "I do not flee Christian discipline. Decree what you please; I shall devoutly embrace and execute the decree." He did no otherwise than he said: casting off his royal garment, he stood in the order of public penitents and submitted himself naked to ecclesiastical discipline.

I judged it worthwhile to relate these public examples; there are more private ones among all Christian magnates. For all both accuse themselves of their sins and not only hear the admonitions of their priests but also cheerfully undergo those punishments which the priests impose for the expiation of offenses. This one thing is the most effective remedy against the deceitful and sweet poisons of flatterers--a remedy which is always ready at hand from humility. Otherwise, just as the healthiest bodies most easily drink in the corruption of poison, so the pestilential breath of flattery most swiftly infects the spirits of kings.

Behold for yourself Justinian, more a founder of laws than a cultivator of justice, whom Tribonian, a despiser of every religion, filled with so great a vanity that he hoped he would be immortal, as Suidas reports.

§ 15. The mind of Canute was different; concerning him see Lipsius, Monita Politica, number VIII. There is a notable lesson in modesty from the king of the English. When he was besieged by flatterers--that is, courtly ravens--and they extolled his lot and said that all things served him and were turned at his nod and countenance (these are the words of the Annals), he suppressed the foul flattery thus. While they watched, he placed the royal seat on the seashore in the very approach and flow of the sea. Then he said: "You, sea, are under my dominion, and the land on which I sit is mine. I command you and declare that you must not rise upon my land or drench the limbs or garment of your lord with moisture." He had spoken; the sea maintained its course, came forward, washed over him, and then withdrew. "Behold," he said, "how I command all things! Let all who inhabit the earth know that the power of kings is vain and false, and that one alone is worthy of that name who truly possesses command over heaven, earth, and sea." Nor did this modesty remain within words. In every action he displayed himself such, and thereafter he did not admit the crown upon his head.

There remain very many examples of Christian humility. For many great princes, laying aside the diadem, returned not only to private life but even to one that was poor and despised by the world. Such, says Bozius in Book XI, Chapter IX of On the Signs of the Church, were Emperor Lothair, son of Louis the Pious, in the year 855; Hugh, king of Provence; Ratchis of the Lombards, in 750; Sigismund of Burgundy, in 413; Bamba of Spain; Vermundus of Castile; Rammirus of Aragon; Sigisbert of Northumbria; Sebbi of England; Eltheredus and Chemeredus of Mercia; Alfridus and Afridus of Northumbria; Offa and Iua of England; Ceolulfus and Egbertus of Northumbria; Henry IV of Denmark; Carolomannus of Alemannia; Trebellius of Bulgaria; and Casimir of Poland, who thereafter, at the command of the Roman pontiff and overcome by the entreaties of his subjects, received the governance of the kingdom again.

Here we omit innumerable princes who daily do this: casting aside the highest honors among mortals, they do not disdain, among humble communities of religious, to subject themselves to the obedience of otherwise obscure superiors, compelled by no terror of enemies nor cast down by stupor and inertia of mind. Among the Greeks this was done by the emperors Anastasius II, Theodosius III, Michael Rangabe, Michael IV, Isaac Comnenus, and Manuel Palaeologus; and among our own by the kings Svatopluk of Moravia and Solomon of Hungary. How great a spirit did they show in resigning their principate, and how far did they differ from the boastful and most frivolous dispositions of pagan kings, who, from eagerness for triumph and for the sake of fruitless leaves, brought the safety of their citizens into peril. Even now, many sons of kings, princes, nobles, and powerful men live in the most laborious and poorest religious orders and in the most abject offices, more humbly than they formerly lived among the pagans in power and honor.

§ 16. Many things can induce all men, and especially leading men, to moderation and submission of spirit. First, indeed, because they are human beings. Philip the Macedonian judged that sufficient for subduing pride. For every morning, before he undertook anything, he ordered a boy to announce: ἄνθρωπος εἶ--"You are a human being." Would that he had wished to persuade his son Alexander of this; after conquering the Persians, Alexander disowned his father and preferred to be called the son of Jupiter. But the human being is an animal both most wretched and most proud. They rule human beings, but are human beings. When dead, they will be trampled by many. Before their judge, without a bodyguard, without a diadem, they will tremble.

Timoleon, the avenger and preserver of Sicily, when after the expulsion of the tyrants he was held in great honor and even love, adorned such distinguished achievements with modesty and protected them. Probus writes in his life: "Nothing insolent or vainglorious ever issued from his mouth. Indeed, when he heard his praises publicly proclaimed, he never said anything other than that in this matter he especially gave and rendered thanks to the gods: that when they had determined to restore Sicily, they had wished him above all to be the commander."

§ 17. Next, he ought to beware excessive and ceremonious honors. Those things belong to barbarous and proud nations, concerning whom Tacitus writes in Book XIV: "To one accustomed, of course, to foreign pride there was no knowledge of us, among whom the right of command has force while empty things are passed over." Both others and, most accurately, Nicolas Trigault describe the arrogance of Chinese magistrates and of the others who live by the examples of princes, and their many empty cares over salutations and duties; they pass almost all their time in empty things. Hence come many errors, enmities, contempts, and contentions, while in ceremonious civility they are more fastidious than is right and judge it an inexpiable offense to have erred in trifles. The Christian commonwealth labors not a little in these matters, while spirits are puffed up by splendid titles, retinues, and precedence in seating, and are easily driven to rivalry and hatreds.

Let it come into the mind of all how glassy and fragile felicity is. He who just now, as Priam, appeared fortunate in barbaric gold and fifty sons soon > Lies a vast trunk upon the shore.

§ 18. Nor are the fates of cities gentler. Human felicity is trusted badly: when it is at its best, it falls. That which befell the old man Democrates befalls them. When, out of breath, he climbed the citadel, he said that he breathed much but had little strength. Frequent, noisy, and laborious breathing is a sign of a departing life; nor should any commonwealth promise itself long duration in which impulses greater than the powers of nature shake the afflicted body.

§ 19. Finally, let those whose authority is greater undertake certain things which in appearance are abject and unworthy of magnates. That action has great force for bringing inferiors back to modesty. Nothing is more effective. The Lord and Savior taught that neither divinity nor humanity subsisting in a divine hypostasis is defiled by humble birth and offices. "So great," says Augustine in Tractate LV on John, "is the usefulness of human humility that even divine sublimity commended it by its own example, because a proud human being would perish forever unless a humble God found him. For the Son of Man came to seek and to save that which had perished."

Before the Lord, the prophet and king David, a type of the Lord, also made a profession of humility. 2 Kings 6:21: "'As the Lord lives,' he says, 'I shall play before the Lord, who chose me rather than your father and rather than all his house, and commanded me that I should be leader over the Lord's people in Israel. And I shall play, and I shall become more abject than I have become, and shall be humble in my own eyes; and with the maidservants of whom you have spoken, I shall appear more glorious.' Therefore no son was born to Michal, the daughter of Saul, to the day of her death."

"Behold," says Gregory in Book XXVII of the Moralia, "he whom the Lord singularly preferred to all despises himself by submitting himself to the Lord, equating himself with the least, and displaying abject things. He does not call the power of the kingdom back to mind; he does not fear to become cheap in the eyes of his subjects by dancing; he does not recognize himself as preferred in honor to others before the ark of him who had given the honor. Before God he did cheap things, even the lowest, so that by humility he might make firm those brave things which he had done before human beings. I do not know what others think of his deeds; I marvel more at David dancing than fighting. For by fighting he subjected his enemies, but by dancing before the Lord he conquered himself."

Nothing is more pleasing among the common people than honor shown to the wretched with modesty. Alfonso, king of Aragon and likewise of Sicily and Naples, at that time most powerful, saw a muleteer imploring aid, whose ass laden with flour was stuck in the mud. He dismounted from his horse and, exerting himself with all the strength of his body, pulled out the beast of burden. This deed was so pleasing to the peoples of Campania that many cities joined themselves to him and preferred to admit the government of a modest, civil, and humble prince rather than to claim a proud liberty. Nor is there in truth any danger that majesty will be depressed by true humility: love compensates for all things. Nothing is more pleasing to the common people than that their labors be valued by magnates. If a magnate is insulting toward anyone, he is loved by no one.

§ 20. The last point is that those who are in dignity should have modest, affable, and truly humble ministers. It is an intolerable servitude for brave and noble men when a prince must be approached through the disdain of flatterers; when a minister intercepts or detains the benefit which they have received from the prince; when another must be petitioned after the prince. But this matter must be discussed specifically. For out of one hundred ministers of princes who are greatly in favor, you will scarcely find ten whom either pride or avarice has not shaken out of the court, after they have first made the prince hated.

CHAPTER XX

Magnanimity Ought to Be Commended to the Commonwealth, and Especially to Magistrates

§ 1. I have said that humility is the virtue of a great spirit, while pride belongs to a small and childish one. The magnanimous man holds nothing to be great unless it is truly great. Humility, by a true estimation, disdains all things that swell with a false and human greatness. Pride judges rashly concerning greatness and ardently desires the things which have appeared great. Thus children leap for joy at the splendor of a new garment, at anklets, and at a little feather; they esteem highly houses of clay, a reed horse, a little cart drawn by mice, and their rattles. The magnanimous man judges to be playthings whatever pride pursues with great zeal. We must therefore speak about this virtue and the things connected with it and accompanying it. For that consideration contributes very greatly to the safety of the commonwealth, and I do not know whether in any other kind vices so quickly deceive us beneath the appearance of virtue.

§ 2. Magnanimity is a virtue which is concerned with great things, a virtue of the spirit inclining it toward great and heroic works. Aristotle's definition in Book IV, Chapter III of the Ethics is customarily suspect to Christians:

δοκεῖ δὴ μεγαλόψυχος εἶναι ὁ μεγάλων αὑτὸν ἀξιῶν, ἄξιος ὤν.

"He appears to be magnanimous who considers himself worthy of great things and is worthy." For he who falsely judges himself to deserve great things is foolish. But however the Philosopher understood it, his definition can nevertheless be understood so that he may not appear to force pride upon us under the name of magnanimity.

Certainly Saint Thomas, Summa Theologiae II-II, Question 129, Article 3, replies to the fourth objection: "It must be said that in a human being there is found something great which he possesses from the gift of God, and some defect which belongs to him from the weakness of nature. Magnanimity therefore causes a human being to judge himself worthy of great things according to consideration of the gifts which he possesses from God; thus, if he has great virtue of spirit, magnanimity causes him to tend toward perfect works of virtue. The same must be said concerning the use of any other good, for example knowledge or external fortune. Humility, however, causes a human being to reckon himself of little worth according to consideration of his own defect. Likewise, magnanimity also despises those who are high insofar as they fall short of the gifts of God. For it does not esteem those who are high so greatly that it does anything indecent for their sake. But humility honors others and esteems superiors insofar as it beholds something of God's goods in them. Hence it is said of the just man in Psalm 14: 'The malignant man has been brought to nothing in his sight,' which pertains to the contempt of the magnanimous man; 'but he glorifies those who fear the Lord,' which pertains to the honor of the humble man. And thus it is clear that magnanimity and humility are not contrary, although they appear to tend toward contraries, because they proceed according to different considerations."

It is therefore easy for a Christian prince to join humility and magnanimity. For when contempt extends to an insult against God, it must be avenged. Elijah was contemptuously summoned to the tyrant in 4 Kings 1:9. "Man of God, the king has commanded that you come down," said the captain of fifty, undoubtedly prepared to inflict force upon him if he refused. But Elijah, a magnanimous judge of his own dignity, in which the glory of the divine majesty was concerned, answered and said to the captain of fifty: "'If I am a man of God, let fire come down from heaven and devour you and your fifty.' Fire therefore came down from heaven and devoured him and the fifty who were with him.

"And again he sent to him another captain of fifty and his fifty. He spoke to him: 'Man of God, thus says the king: "Make haste; come down."' Elijah answered: 'If I am a man of God, let fire come down from heaven and devour you and your fifty.' Fire therefore came down from heaven and devoured him and his fifty. Again he sent a third captain of fifty and the fifty who were with him. When he had come, he bent his knees before Elijah, prayed to him, and said: 'Man of God, do not despise my soul and the souls of your servants who are with me. Behold, fire came down from heaven and devoured the first two captains of fifty and the fifties who were with them; but now I beseech you to have mercy upon my soul.' But the angel of the Lord spoke to Elijah, saying: 'Go down with him; do not fear.' He therefore arose and went down with him to the king."

Elijah judged himself worthy of honor, and divine justice approved his judgment. If Aristotle understood this, he spoke with truth itself; but if not, he was led away by the common error of the philosophers.

The force of magnanimity is therefore discerned in every virtue, yet it is distinguished from every virtue. Each virtue is perfect in its own kind. Justice is the constant will to render to each his own, and this in great and small things. It will despoil no one of a denarius or of a talent; it will restore a cottage and a kingdom with the same equity. Religion is the guardian and exhorter of heroic poverty, obedience, and chastity. But these and the other virtues have a special moral worth and beauty from their own objects and circumstances, toward which they constantly impel the spirits in which they have settled.

It is the office of magnanimity to be occupied within the kind of all the virtues and to regard the formal objects of them all, yet in such a way that it makes them material for itself, as they are accustomed to say. Heroic was the chastity of that young man who, bound softly upon a bed of roses, bit off his tongue, spat it into the face of the wanton harlot, and drove her away by a miracle of chastity. But heroic chastity was moved by the beauty of temperance as by the formal character of its object. Magnanimity, however, was also an impelling cause toward so noble a deed, because it regarded it as great and arduous, and because it judged this fitting for a Christian spirit, a spirit nurtured by heavenly grace and a candidate for martyrdom. The formal object of magnanimity, therefore, is the greatness of the works itself. Aristotle rightly says:

μεγαλοψυχία οὖν κόσμος τις εἶναι τῶν ἀρετῶν.

"Magnanimity therefore appears to be a certain ornament of the virtues." Consequently, no one can be magnanimous without the other virtues.

§ 3. Magnanimity moderates the appetite for honor. First, it prevents men from doing the greatest works, most worthy of honor, out of regard for human glory, and from ceasing to cultivate virtue if there is no hope of honor. For the magnanimous man will save a human being even in darkness and will not desire that deeds worthy of praise be put into the public records, but will desire virtue itself to be his reward. The magnanimous man will not be moved even by disgrace. "There is no surer proof of greatness than that nothing can occur by which you may be provoked." Seneca, On Anger, Chapter VI.

Yet for the sake of a great honor he will undertake the greatest works--for the honor of which it was said:

> Your friends are exceedingly honored;
>
> [Printed page 194]
> Their principality is exceedingly exalted.

The magnanimous man values divine honors highly: not with the sacrilegious ambition with which the pagans raved, and in our age the kings of Japan, but those which God alone has determined to confer, with an immense weight of glory, upon those by whom he is loved. But if it is pleasing to recognize and approve a magnanimous commonwealth, prince, or senate, you will consult Aristotle in Book IV, Chapters VII and VIII of the Ethics.

First: μεγάλων ἑαυτὸν ἀξιοῖ, ἄξιος ὤν. He considers himself worthy of great things, being plainly worthy; for he who is worthy of middling things measures himself by his own foot and is modest, not magnanimous. This has been said truly concerning honor. If you consider the thing itself, all ought to emulate the most excellent greatness and degree of virtue. Next, if all are willing to consider the state and condition by which they are Christians, they can judge themselves worthy of honor, because right deeds and successes--κατορθώματα--are gifts of God, not of human strength. Therefore humility, which despises one's own vileness, and magnanimity, the candid and grateful recollector of divine benefits, do not conflict.

Second: he rejoices moderately and according to right reason in great honors offered with reason by good men. He despises small honors and those bestowed by the common people. He will not rejoice in honor or praise because it is a vain and fragile thing; and just as a vine is not rendered more fruitful by praise, neither is the spirit of the man praised. For he labored for virtue, not for glory; accordingly, he does not desire his deeds to be published. Nevertheless, he rejoices because it is useful to the public that the deeds of the virtues be celebrated: it calls many weak men back from vices, stimulates the imperfect toward virtue, and indeed gives many a source from which to seek examples. The Apostle Paul rejoiced in the desire, weeping, and emulation of the Corinthians, 2 Corinthians 7:7, and in Chapters XI and XII he deservedly and rightfully boasts. He neglects the honors of the common people because they are not given by judgment and customarily are poured more profusely upon the vicious. He knows that those who praise are the worst kind of enemies. He knows that flatteries are more artfully contrived amid great hatreds and contempt. Cato, rejected from the praetorship, played ball in public on the same day. Others, when they heard themselves praised by the people, feared that they had perhaps unwittingly admitted something evil.

Third: οὔτε εὐτυχῶν περιχαρής ἐστιν, οὔτε ἀτυχῶν περίλυπος. He is neither raised up by felicity nor excessively saddened by adversities. Because he is not driven by a light impulse, a great tree is not overturned even by a whirlwind; a reed trembles at every breath. This is that

> Virtue ignorant of a sordid refusal,
>
> Which shines with honors unstained,
>
> And neither takes up nor lays down the axes
>
> At the judgment of the people's breath.

He is greater than calamity and greater even than prosperous circumstances. The Romans presented some appearance of magnanimity; for, defeated in the battle of Cannae, when Hannibal approached the city, they could not endure any mention of peace. And certainly in a conquered people it was a great proof of virtue that they publicly thanked the consul by whose rashness the disaster had occurred because he had not despaired of the commonwealth. Urban VI was remarkably magnanimous. When seditious Romans broke into his palace with arms, he put on the vestments of his dignity and presented himself with great authority to the sight of the enemy; by asking, "Whom do you seek?" he not only dispelled the danger but brought the rioters back to concord and obedience.

Fourth: οὐκ ἔστι μικροκίνδυνος. He does not deign to enter danger for small things. He will not seek riches across the sea, will not be hired into the battle-line for pay, nor give his soul for sale for a little money. Those whom a small thing calls into dangers have small spirits. As easily as children weep from slight sadness, so easily do they fight amid slight danger. That μικροκινδύνευσις, risking danger for trifles, removed a great part of the nobility of Europe, especially of France, while beneath the appearance of high birth it incites the frenzies of challenges and duels.

Fifth: neither is he φιλοκίνδυνος, a lover of danger. He does not love danger. Those whom martial trumpets, horns, and shouting carry off into death imitate the magnanimous man, as do those who without reason expose themselves to dangers. This was formerly censured in many who, from desire for martyrdom, offered themselves to the torments and savagery of the pagans. It belongs to brave men to despise death more than to hate life. He who goes to meet danger and does not first consider what sort it is is more like a beast than a human being. He is courageous who, after the cause and difficulty have been considered, encounters dangers either for a just and honorable reason or certainly from necessity. Such ought both princes and citizens to be. For those who are borne into dangers by impulse and rashness alone, unless they conquer in the first heat and charge, grow faint with delay and are turned into headlong flight. But those who undertake the matter with deliberation are brave precisely because they experience nothing unexpected in the work itself, nor do they repent of their counsels.

Sixth: μεγαλοκίνδυνος δὲ, καὶ ὅταν κινδυνεύῃ, ἀφειδὴς τῷ βίῳ, οὐκ ἄξιον ὂν πάντως ζῆν. "He offers himself to great dangers and in the midst of danger is prodigal of life, as though it were not worthy to live in every manner." I prefer to render it thus rather than with the interpreter: "As though it were altogether unworthy for him to live." For the magnanimous man does not judge himself unworthy of life, but judges it unworthy to live in every manner. David avoids a fraternal contest in the camp but advances undaunted against Goliath.

Here the fortitude and great spirit of all the martyrs is described. It shines forth even in this: not only did they endure those things, which belongs properly to fortitude, but they did not even pour forth prayers, did not pray for postponement of punishment or acceleration of death, and held groans and cries within their power. For they thought that the nobility of martyrs ought not merely to be brave and tolerant of pain, but also magnanimous, free amid torments, and taunting tyrants. Hence those sayings, "Turn me and eat," and innumerable others, by which σεμνοπρέπεια, the majesty of magnanimity, was expressed.

Traces of that virtue are discerned also among the nations. Anaxarchus cried that they should pound the sack of Anaxarchus in a mortar, by this saying more illustrious than by his whole life. Pompey, when he was being killed, covered his head lest he contaminate his triumphs by an indecorous groan or cry. Amid so many wounds Caesar took care εὐσχημόνως πεσεῖν, to fall becomingly. Aristotle therefore said most beautifully that magnanimity is the ornament of all the virtues, for it most powerfully adorns even the supreme act of fortitude itself. Common sense teaches us how great this is. We are moved by the last words of the dying more than by the recollection of death itself; for if they are courageous, we grieve at the so unworthy ends of such men.

Seventh: he is accustomed to confer a benefit and blushes to receive one, because the latter belongs to an inferior, the former to a superior, while a great spirit refuses to be under obligation.

Eighth: hence he also forgets benefits, not because he is ungrateful, but because he compensates for them with greater ones. And he ought not remember a benefit he has given.

Ninth: he does not readily ask others for anything, both because it diminishes liberty and because, since he esteems human affairs little, he needs few things. Diogenes, when the option of asking was given and freely pressed upon him, asked Alexander not to stand in the way of his sunning himself: with a proud contempt for the king, not a magnanimous one. For the Cynic himself could have moved out of the king's shadow if he loved the sun's rays so immoderately. And so I hold the contrary opinion: a magnanimous man will ask for great things, and he will not count it among evils to be bound to another by the bond of gratitude. If, however, he judges the diminution of liberty an evil, let him reckon it among evils to be despised.

It was no less glorious for Dio Chrysostom and the hermits to intercede for the Antiochenes than for Theodosius to mitigate the punishments. With great spirit Saint Gregory placed himself before Attila raging against Italy and did not fear that he might owe a benefit to a most cruel tyrant; rather, he wished provision to be made for the safety of so many peoples. He will therefore seek great things when reason seeks them; he will by no means seek small things to another's contempt, as Diogenes did like a buffoon.

Tenth: πρὸς τοὺς μὲν ἐν ἀξιώματι καὶ εὐτυχίᾳ μέγαν εἶναι. He conducts himself greatly among those who are in dignity or whose circumstances are very prosperous, but moderately among those of middling station. Aristotle gives the reason: because it is difficult to rise above the powerful and σεμνόν, magnificent, but easy to surpass those of middling station. Therefore to conduct oneself magnificently and boast among the former is not ignoble; among inferiors it is troublesome and hateful.

That rule, not rightly perceived, brought death to Antisthenes, Aristotle's high-born disciple, as his teacher had foretold him. Nothing is more dangerous than σεμνύνεσθαι, conducting oneself splendidly, among magistrates and nobles in a city. For it arouses enmities and envy, and among princes contempt and frequently hatred. As it belongs to a prudent man to avoid these things, so it belongs to a magnanimous man to despise external splendor. Let him maintain this alone: that he not consent to the vices of the powerful, not flatter, and not lose liberty in stating his opinion. I shall say more about boasting, that false imitator of magnanimity, when I have instructed courtiers and counselors.

Eleventh: this especially belongs to a great spirit, as the same Aristotle admonishes: ὑπηρετεῖν προθύμως--to serve others with a ready spirit. Charity does this toward a brother, humility toward a lord, magnanimity because it is arduous and difficult, but honorable, to be for the advantage of all. For a courageous man is a public good. Francis Xavier thought in a dream that he carried an Ethiopian upon his shoulders, and afterward he did no otherwise, embracing all India, Japan, and China in his spirit. His bed in the hospital was beside the man who was sick most dangerously.

Twelfth: he is slow to act unless a great matter requires speed. For he makes little of small things, does not leap at losses, and does not hurry counsels, but rules and orders. The highest things are not agitated by winds; the stars always hold the same course and do not tremble when it thunders. The majesty of a well-constituted commonwealth hears of dangers without commotion--indeed sees and undertakes them.

Thirteenth: the remaining traits are more guarded: to be φανερόφιλον and φανερόμισον, to have love and hatred in the open; not to live according to another's judgment; to conceal one's affairs from the people; not to marvel; to forget injuries; not to speak eagerly about human beings; not to dwell upon praises; not to be querulous; to prefer to possess honorable rather than profitable things. These things are in a great spirit and joined with heroic fortitude.

Magnanimity and fortitude are nevertheless not the same. Fortitude moderates fear and boldness by reason and steels one against death and torments. Magnanimity readily undertakes in every virtue whatever is proposed as great, noble, lofty, and difficult.

Confidence, or trust, is the companion of magnanimity; supported by firm hope, it provides a ready spirit in great affairs short of the danger of death. It is not broken by any difficulties. It surmounts thirst, hunger, labors, and the angers of the powerful made harsh against splendid undertakings. Patience fights against sadnesses arising from difficulties. Security excludes fears. Constancy, perseverance, and longanimity, when hope is deferred and the difficulties of labors, exiles, and prisons endure, maintain the purpose. No less do they strengthen the spirit against miseries, blandishments, and the prayers of relatives, children, and spouses, so that it may not be drawn down from its greatness by any force.

§ 4. The foremost enemy of magnanimity is μικροψυχία, pusillanimity: when someone imagines that the things which right reason counsels ought to be undertaken or done are too great, and his own powers unequal to so great a mass; when he flees as though from some great thing the honor of which he is worthy and which he ought to undertake. It is a grave vice and the ape of humility, from which it departs very far. For humility esteems honor and glory lightly; pusillanimity judges most badly in two matters: it both distrusts its own faculties and gifts and does not place hope in God, and it esteems those things which are not great far too greatly. When this occurs in a grave matter which imposes an obligation, the crime is manifest.

Holy men fled honors; very many bishops were created against their will--to such a degree that someone said: "Certainly he is unworthy of the priesthood unless he has been ordained unwilling; necessity alone excuses him and votes in his favor." But one thing is flight from honors through contempt for them, which humility effects; another is when they are esteemed excessively lofty, which pusillanimity effects. We see that those same men who, unwilling, were drawn to episcopates by the holy violence of the Church most fiercely defended in those episcopates their right and dignity even at the peril of life, as Cyprian, Athanasius, Chrysostom, Ambrose, and others did.

But pusillanimity belongs to few. Presumption, ambition, and the appetite for vain glory oppose magnanimity just as they oppose humility. They have overturned very many commonwealths and, unless I am mistaken, will overturn very many in the future.

I call that presumption by which a proud man, through harmful ignorance of his own faculties, undertakes works greater than his powers. They seek lofty things, they seek things that will harm them, and with Phaethon they fall from great attempts. Trajan, after he had carried his arms through the East almost to India and had undertaken an ambitious voyage, striving to equal Hercules and Liber, again lost provinces acquired by many labors and much blood. God is accustomed to cast down that arrogance by an unexpected destruction. Isaiah 16:6: "We have heard the pride of Moab; he is exceedingly proud. His pride, his arrogance, and his indignation are greater than his strength. Therefore Moab shall wail to Moab; all of it shall wail."

Ambition arises from pride, yet it is vainer than the very elation from which it is born. For pride fervently desires excellence itself contrary to the prescription of right reason. Ambition, a most wretched thing, burns with desire for honors; but honors are testimonies of excellence. All history teaches how many seek honors greater than their due, or seek them on account of false goods or evils, or seek them with crime; and the world overthrown in turn teaches it. This matter was treated in the chapter on humility.

Vain glory arises from the same root and does not differ greatly from ambition. We are treating the appetite for excellence, not the opinion of excellence itself and the praise in which fame also consists, but κενοδοξία, or the implanted desire of the soul by which glory is sought. He who is κενόδοξος, vainglorious, is also ambitious. For he who has placed felicity in the proclamation of another's voice and desires himself to be esteemed from that, not from conscience, also judges it right that he be honored by the bestowal of magistracies, the conferral of dignities, genuflection, and ceremonies. How much evil vanity has introduced I have already shown above. For first it assails others and then its own authors.

> Ἀλαζονείας οὔτις ἐξέφυγε δίκας.
> No one escapes the punishments of boasting.

It is no less a disgrace for virtue to serve glory than to serve pleasure. Next, this very thing belongs to a small spirit: to seek glory, that is, the most uncertain and fragile thing of all. It is a delicate thing. Most people report what they do not know; they nevertheless cause the lover of glory, while he himself knows that they err, to believe those who do not know--or to rejoice as though he believed them.

CHAPTER XXI

Charity, the Queen of All the Virtues, Ought to Be Esteemed Most Highly in the Commonwealth

§ 1. I have now led forth the chorus of the virtues; the whole company descends into the orchestra of the commonwealth, to be imbibed by minds, not by eyes. If those precepts of the virtues seem to you either long or too numerous, love the commonwealth, love the citizens: you have now fulfilled them all. There is no surer art of ruling than to love one's subjects. If, therefore, there is no leisure to unfold all the pages of Scripture, hold fast to charity, and in it you will find all knowledge. Augustine, Sermon 39 On Time: "For the fullness of the law is charity." It is the supreme mystery of faith and the treasure of the Christian faith. It is the highest worship of God; it contains all things; it is the principal good of man and the token of the Christian, the foundation of peace, the bond of unity, without which not even the virtues themselves are pleasing; more excellent than all the gifts of God, at once the pillar and summit of holiness, the death of crimes, the life of virtues. If it is present, no great art is needed. Whoever has loved the commonwealth and its citizens as sacred things is sufficiently versed in politics. Charity is ingenious in devising benefits; by its own nature it is suited to governing men.

At first nations lived without laws and without a judge; they entrusted themselves to the charity of one man, not to his power. There were not so many precautions of ruling; rather, children were as though in the power of parents: under the leadership of charity men commanded and obeyed. From this, flattery devised a form of address of the highest honor, so that it might call princes fathers of the fatherland. For they judged a name of love greater than a name of majesty.

Society cannot remain safe except by love and the preservation of its parts. Seneca, Book 2 On Anger, chapter 31: if the members disagree, if the neighboring member snatches away the nourishment of another and, after the other has been crushed, grows beyond due measure, a monster is born from a beautiful body. The safety of his fellow citizens ought to be as dear to each man as his own. Wherever a battle line is discordant, it is open to the enemy. A commonwealth is very like a triumphal arch suspended in a lofty vaulting: that mass cannot be bound together by iron or mortar; its parts sustain one another by mutual agreement. Stone holds stone; the prince rises above them like the crown of the vault and is supported by them all; unless all are joined to him, they fall. Love, therefore, and love alone, holds together and strengthens a polity. Gifts cannot do this; blandishments cannot do it. If you have enticed any men by gifts, when hope has ceased, love will be dissolved; if someone's greed has wrung out harsh words, the fruit of blandishments will end in anger. Let mutual love remain as the cement of a great building, and let that which the pagan said remain: "May God love you just as you love us." Pliny, in the Panegyric. Let the prince certainly persuade himself that all his subjects are making this prayer. Let him live and reign in such a way that, with a tranquil and secure mind, he can utter that prayer in the sight of God. Girt with weapons and an executioner, he can terrify; he cannot compel men to love.

§ 2. The effect of charity is to fear for one's subjects, not to fear one's subjects; and happy is the commonwealth in which, without ceremony and with the mind as witness, the citizens pray for life for their magistrate--not because they fear a worse one, but because they desire no better one. This truly follows upon charity, because it commands all the virtues, disposes the services of all, indeed animates the virtues themselves. It is the expeller of all vices and the reconciler of the virtues. "Charity is patient," 1 Corinthians 13:4; "it is kind. Charity does not envy, does not act perversely, is not puffed up, is not ambitious, does not seek the things that are its own, is not provoked, thinks no evil, does not rejoice over iniquity, but rejoices together with the truth; it bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things."

Behold: what is scattered among many virtues, charity alone has gathered into a narrow compass, embracing within itself the worth of them all and the majesty of the virtues. Saint Gregory explained these things in Book 10 of the Moralia, chapter 6: "Love of one's neighbor is derived from two precepts, since it is said both through a certain righteous man: 'See that you do not do to another what you hate to have done to you by another'; and Truth says through himself: 'The things that you wish men to do to you, do you also to them.' By these two commandments, namely, of each Testament, malice is restrained by one and kindness is bestowed by the other, so that each man, by not doing the evil that he does not wish to suffer, may cease from the work of harming; and again, by bestowing the good which he desires to have done to himself, may exercise himself out of kindness for the benefit of his neighbor. But assuredly, while these two are considered with solicitous attention, the heart is stretched toward innumerable services of the virtues, lest either the restless mind burn with desires to inflict the things which it ought not, or, relaxed by idleness, become sluggish in rendering the things which it ought.

"For when it guards against doing to another what it is in no way willing itself to endure from another, it looks around itself with solicitous attention: lest pride raise it up and exalt the mind by casting it down even to contempt of its neighbor; lest ambition tear thought apart and, while expanding it toward seeking the possessions of others, constrict it; lest lust pollute the heart and corrupt it, subjected to desires, through unlawful things; lest anger exasperate it and inflame it even to the utterance of insult; lest envy gnaw it and, emulous of the good fortunes of others, consume it with its own flame. Again, when it considers that it should do to another those things which it expects to be done to itself by another, it assuredly weighs how good things may answer evil things, and better things answer good things; how it may show the meekness of long-suffering toward the insolent; how it may bestow the grace of kindness upon those languishing under the plague of malice; how it may unite the discordant by peace and gird the concordant for the desire of true peace; how it may distribute necessities to the needy; how it may show the way of rectitude to those who err; how it may soothe the afflicted by word and compassion; how it may restrain by rebuke those inflamed with desires for this world; how it may mitigate the threats of the powerful by reasoned argument; how, by whatever aid it has strength to supply, it may lighten the distresses of the oppressed; how it may oppose patience to those who resist without; how it may show discipline together with patience to those who grow proud within; how, toward the faults of subjects, meekness may so temper zeal that it does not enervate it from the pursuit of justice; how zeal may so burn for punishment that, nevertheless, in burning it does not cross the boundary of piety; how it may provoke the ungrateful to love by benefits; how it may preserve all who are grateful in love by services; how, when it cannot correct the evils of neighbors, it may be silent; how, concerning those things which can be corrected by speaking, it may fear that silence is consent; how it may so endure the things about which it is silent that it nevertheless does not conceal the poison of grief in the mind; how it may so extend hands of kindness to the malevolent that it nevertheless does not depart from the law of rectitude through favor; how it may bestow upon its neighbors all that it has strength to bestow, but, in bestowing these things, not be puffed up; how it may so fear the precipice of swelling pride in the good things which it shows that it nevertheless does not become sluggish in the exercise of good; how it may so distribute what it possesses that it attends to how great the liberality of the one who rewards is, lest, when it gives earthly things, it fear its own poverty more than is necessary and, in the offering of a gift, sadness obscure the light of cheerfulness."

§ 3. Charity does not merely govern the actions of the other virtues; it especially sharpens and strengthens fortitude. Charity for fatherland and citizens brought it about that Gideon, with three hundred men, attacked innumerable forces of enemies, preferable to Leonidas not only in faith and piety but also in the good fortune of victory. Judges 7. Thus Samson alone fought against the Philistines, Judges 15. Thus Jonathan, with his armor-bearer alone, routed the camp of the enemy. David struck down Goliath. "For who is he," he says, "who is this uncircumcised Philistine, who has dared to curse the army of the living God?"

Why should I recount Mattathias and Judas and his brothers? 1 Maccabees 2. "Woe is me," says Mattathias, "that I was born to see the destruction of my people. To what purpose, then, do we still live?" And he rent his garments, and so forth. Indeed, this was the opinion of all nations: that one ought to die for the fatherland. Nor are distinguished memorials of the Horatii, the Mucii, the Decii, and the Torquati lacking, although they are not without the errors of those times, which God despised.

The Spartans had cast the envoys of the Persians into wells, contrary to the law of nations, so that they might receive at the same time the earth and water which they demanded as the two signs of acknowledgment of royal servitude. When a pestilence afterward arose, the soothsayers reported that Talthybius, Agamemnon's herald, who was worshiped as a god at Sparta, had been offended, and that the shades of the Persians had to be appeased by the blood of citizens. They therefore proclaimed that, if anyone wished to die for the fatherland, he should report this to the ephors. Sperthias and Bulis at once presented themselves; having gone to Xerxes, they offered themselves as victims for the fatherland. But he, with great spirit, granted both pardon to the city and life to them, and even tried to retain them with him by immense promises. They answered him: "What thing, O king, do you judge to be of such value among us that it does not separate us from our fatherland, since, led by charity for it, we undertook so long a journey in order to die? And so may it be permitted to us through you to enjoy its sweetness, for which we have determined to expend our life." Great was their love of fatherland, firm not by impulse but by judgment, although an erring judgment; induced by it, they traversed a journey so great as others would scarcely undertake for the sake of life.

More bravely, Attilius returned for reverence for his oath; for charity toward his fatherland he took severe counsel against his own life. The mother of Cleomenes, the Spartan king, also acted with a manly spirit--if only perjury had been absent. When she saw that she, as a hostage, was obstructing a salutary peace, she informed her son that he should not omit an honorable thing beneficial to the fatherland on account of the body of an old woman. Nor did that mother love the fatherland less who killed her cowardly son: antiquity judged her ἀστοργίαν, her want of natural affection, worthy not merely of no punishment but even of praise, and commemorated the deed in verse:

Τὸν παραβάντα νόμους Δαμάτριον ἔκτανε μήτηρ,

Ἃ Λακεδαιμονία, οὐ Λακεδαιμόνιον.

His mother killed Demetrius for transgressing the laws--a Spartan woman, not a Spartan man.

Another struck down with a roof-tile a son who was returning and reporting the fate of his fellow soldiers. Eristhenes, after he had fought badly, was killed by starvation by his mother. Ovid, in the Ibis:

And, bound at the threshold of a dwelling, may you suffer hunger, as he to whom his own parent gave the law of punishment.

Those things were barbarous; yet they loved their barbarous fatherland so much that they judged it right for it to be preserved by acts of parricide. Nevertheless, they judged this rightly:

Οὐδὲν γὰρ ἐπαναγκαιότερον πατρίδος.

Nothing is more closely bound than the fatherland. Cicero, Book 1 of On Duties: the fatherland is the common parent of all, the most ancient and most sacred, which alone has embraced all the affections of all men. And in Book 1 of On Ends: the fatherland is dearer to us than we ourselves. It seemed to Plato, in Book 15 of On Laws, that the fatherland is mistress and goddess and must be consoled more than one's mother herself. And in the Crito: "Are you so wise," he says, "that you do not know that far greater honor must be paid to the fatherland than to parents, and that reverence for it ought to be more sacred, both among the heavenly ones and among mortals who are participants in any understanding at all; and that it must be obeyed and complied with, though harsh and morose, and whatever it commands must be done promptly and quietly, even if it commands that we be beaten, that we be bound with chains, that we be involved in war, and that we suffer wounds and death itself? Resistance must in no way be made, nor must the ranks be deserted: thus justice requires."

For this reason Codrus, Lucius Tubero, and innumerable others cast away their lives. Others restored the fatherland with great spirit. When, at the battle of Cannae, the Roman state had been brought to the utmost extremity and noble young men, under the leadership of Metellus, were deliberating about deserting Italy, Scipio, by fear of death, compelled them to swear according to his words that they would never desert the fatherland. Deservedly, indeed: for charity casts fear outside, as Saint Ambrose says on Psalm 118: “In general, indeed, charity excludes fear: thus the soldier who loves the emperor does not fear wars undertaken for the emperor; thus the servant who loves his lord, although he is sent through uncertain and precipitous places, nevertheless despises all dangers through love of his lord, and, if anyone attacks his lord, he does not hesitate to offer himself; thus he who desires to see his children situated across the sea does not fear shipwrecks, enters the waves of the sea through charity for his children, and undergoes the uncertainties of a voyage, but his desires for his children lighten the fear of danger. How beautifully this is also said concerning the martyrs, who truly serve as soldiers for Christ, who, not fearing persecutions, claws, swords, and fires, offered themselves to hostile kings.”

Nor does that city fear an enemy--and, what very rarely is possible, not even a citizen--where charity guides the reins and makes the enactments of the laws salutary by equity and clemency. One bears the burdens of another and is not weighed down by the burdens.

Charity must also be shown to enemies, and especially in the same commonwealth, in which no one is an enemy to another except through private rivalry.

The love of citizens for one another and toward the prince is preserved best by equality of laws, by a sharing of calamities when they must be undergone, by fellowship in honors, by modesty, and by gentle manners. Finally--and this is the chief point--if the prince wishes to be loved, let him love, and let him so love that the commonwealth feels that it is loved. For charity is reciprocal and returns the exchange to one who loves. Moschus says well:

Στέργετε τοὺς φιλεῦντας, ἵν᾽ ἢν φιλεῖτε, φιληθῆτε.

Love those who love you, so that, when you love, you may be loved.

If the people feel that they are loved by the prince, the senate, and the nobility, there is nothing so arduous that they will not do it for their sake; if the prince understands the fatherland’s love toward him, he will strive with every force of his resources to benefit those who love him. And above all, he will not place trust in flatterers, informers, and swindlers, the bloodsuckers of the people. Rather, he will treat them as a father treats his children, and they in turn will obey him as children obey a parent, and they will not listen to seditious tribunes. For a father does not readily offer an ear to calumnies against his children, nor can accusers of a parent be heard by children without crime. Hence also the minds of subjects are joined more closely to one another, as though under one father. Their dissensions in the city are what wounds and convulsions are in the body; unless these are healed, they not only deform all beauty but also take away health and life.

§ 4. Nor will it be difficult for a Christian prince to love his subjects if he considers that they are loved by God, redeemed by the price of most sacred blood, and destined to be endowed with the heavenly city. If he also considers this: whatever benefit he has given to one of the least, Christ regards as received by himself; it is entered into the heavenly accounts. How many thousands can a prince benefit, and in each one merit favor from God? Charity has been commanded to all, but princes have immense material for it: great resources, supreme authority, and myriads who need their aid and protection.

§ 5. Charity for the fatherland must indeed be commended to all; but frequently private advantages are sought under that color and pretext. The Constancy of Lipsius exposes that disguise of many men--or the theatrical performance of a great part of them--in Book 1, chapters 8, 9, and 10. Nevertheless, the safety of the fatherland, that is, that condition of the commonwealth, ought to be the concern of every single person, and it is sweet to die for the fatherland. In one body the several members care for the whole, for the safety of each is derived from the whole. Exiles teach how great that obligation truly is. Euripides, in the Phoenician Women:

Τί τὸ στέρεσθαι πατρίδος; Ἦ κακὸν μέγα;

Μέγιστον· ἔργῳ δ᾽ ἐστὶ μεῖζον ἢ λόγῳ.

"Is it a great evil to be deprived of one's fatherland?" "It is the greatest; in fact it is greater than in speech."

Yet almost more men pass their lives outside their fatherland than within it; many things draw many men away from their fatherland either perpetually or at fixed intervals of time. Nevertheless, affection toward the fatherland remains, and certainly ought to remain, even in those far away. These are the words of Sinon, that is, of the little fox:

I am bound by no laws of the fatherland.

But he truly loves the fatherland who labors without advantage to himself, when in the common calamity his own threshold is not touched; who judges every region of the world to be a fatherland to the brave man, but judges that to be the fatherland to which we are all called, that is, heaven. Every land is exile; nevertheless, the laws of exile must be observed, so that the return to the fatherland may be easier. But enough of these things. The prince must be admonished of this again and again: that he should not wish his fatherland to grow with injury to others. That is not charity, but madness. It enjoys a moderate good more quietly; many deaths are expended upon great empires. Let this rather be done: that the inhabitants of every city may migrate to the true fatherland. If it alone surpasses the affection of a parent, let love be expended in seeking the highest good and felicity.

I end this chapter with Augustine's letter to Bishop Nectarius, who was seeking intercession for his fatherland, that is, the colony of Calama, in which idolaters had killed some Christians and despoiled many. He answers thus in Letter 202: "That, with your limbs now growing cold in old age, your spirit glows with charity for your fatherland, I not only do not wonder at but praise; and I receive not unwillingly--indeed, even gladly--the fact that you not only retain in memory but also demonstrate by life and conduct that, for good men, there is no measure or end to consulting the welfare of their fatherland. Hence we would wish to have you yourself as such a citizen also of a certain fatherland above, in whose sacred love, according to our measure, we undergo danger and labor among those whom we counsel to obtain it: so that you would judge that there is no measure or end to consulting the welfare of that little portion of it which sojourns on this earth; becoming so much the better as you would first render the duties owed to a better commonwealth; destined to find no end to rejoicing in its eternal peace, since you would set for yourself no end to consulting its welfare amid its labors for a time."

And a little afterward: "However near your age is to its end, you desire to leave your fatherland safe and flourishing. Let all those vain and insane things now be taken away; let men be converted to the true worship of God and to chaste and pious conduct. Then you will see your fatherland flourishing, not in the opinion of fools but in the truth of the wise, when this fatherland of your carnal generation shall have become a portion of that fatherland for which we are born not in body but in faith, where all the saints and faithful of God, after the wintry labors, as it were, of this life, shall flourish in unending eternity. It is therefore our concern neither to lose Christian gentleness nor to leave in that city an example of imitation pernicious to others. How we may do this, God will be present to aid, if he is not so gravely indignant with them. Otherwise, both the gentleness which we desire to preserve and the discipline which we strive to employ with moderation can be hindered, if something else pleases God in his hidden counsel--whether, in judging, he wills so great an evil to be punished with a severer scourge; or, being even more vehemently angry, he wills it to be unpunished for a time, if they are not corrected and converted to him."

Therefore, just as provision is made for children and grandchildren so that the license by which they may perish is denied them, so also provision must be made for the fatherland, that it may flourish by virtue, piety, and justice; that it may not oppress other fatherlands by an unjust war or by fraud and separate itself from the true fatherland. For safety is imperiled as much by doing injury as by receiving it.

CHAPTER I

The Supreme Necessity of Educating Youth

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. Crates once wished to ascend the highest place in the city and to cry out with the utmost exertion of mind and voice:

> Ὦ ἄνθρωποι, ποῖ φέρεσθε, οἱ τῆς μὲν χρηματικῆς κτήσεως πέρι πᾶσαν ποιεῖσθε σπουδήν· τῶν δ’ υἱῶν, οἷς ταῦτα καταλείψετε, μικρὰ φροντίζετε;

For Plutarch reports that these were his words in the book Περὶ παίδων ἀγωγῆς. “Whither are you rushing, O mortals, who apply yourselves with great zeal to acquiring wealth, but take little care for the sons to whom you will leave it?” Plutarch declares that he himself would add: Fathers of this sort do the same thing as those for whom the shoe is an object of care, but the foot of neglect. Now this is so frequently impressed upon foolish parents that they grow deaf to salutary admonitions, like inhabitants beside the Nile to the sound of the Cataracts. So far are they from being moved by words that they do not become wise even through losses. Nor is it worth the effort to gape against a furnace, as they say, and oppose oneself to a powerful error. That caution belongs to kings and magistrates: so great an evil can be corrected only by the highest authority. Parents neglect discipline; many do not even permit their sons to be rightly educated. They favor vices against pedagogues and masters; many also corrupt those ready to learn wickedness by their own example.

From this arise great evils for the state, for from the education of youth comes its one salvation.

> Συνελὼν τοίνυν ἐγὼ φαίην μᾶλλον, ἢ παραινῶν δόξαιμι ἂν εἰκότως, ὅτι ἐν πρώτῳ, ἐν μέσῳ, καὶ τελευταῖον ἐν τούτοις κεφάλαιον, ἀγωγὴ σπουδαία καὶ παιδεία νόμιμός ἐστι.

Embracing the whole, therefore, I say--and I might seem to utter oracles rather than to exhort--that the first, middle, and last thing is careful education and lawful instruction. For nature is blind, and unless it is led as if by another’s hand, and at times dragged, it goes astray. And so it is the consensus of all nations that a state cannot be safe without the right and lawful education of the first age. Among the Greeks Lacedaemon, long an emulator of good morals, excelled in prudence in this matter; for it appointed παιδονόμους from among the leading men and frequently summoned the youth to an examination of life and virtue. The Persians also, before ill-fated prosperity overwhelmed their good laws, took great care that youth should be rightly formed. For they appointed twelve leading men to educate the boys. Xenophon, in the Education of Cyrus. The Egyptians and Chaldaeans were taught philosophy and the laws by their own parents, as Diodorus Siculus testifies, book 2, chapter 8. For in this seed lay the hope of the future harvest. Greater still, and belonging almost to barbarian simplicity, was the solicitude of the Indian Brahmans, who appointed a master for a newly born infant, as Alexander ab Alexandro relates, book 2, chapter 25. And indeed daily experience teaches us how great the necessity of this matter is. For just as an untamed horse that has learned neither to endure the bridle nor to bear a rider is of no use, so also the state has no need of a citizen who has not become accustomed to obey his country’s laws. It is an oracle of Plato, book 6 of the Laws:

> Ὁ ἄνθρωπος παιδείας μὲν ὀρθῆς τυχὼν, θειότατον, ἡμερώτατόν τε ζῷον γίγνεσθαι φιλεῖ· μὴ ἱκανῶς δ’, ἢ μὴ καλῶς τραφεὶς, ἀγριώτατον μὲν ὁπόσα φύει γῆ.

A human being who has obtained right education is accustomed to become the most divine and gentlest animal; but if he is educated either insufficiently or not well, he becomes the fiercest of all that the earth has produced.

§ 2. Therefore, unless the state has determined to nourish ἑρπετά, creeping things, serpents, and beasts that will rage within their mother's entrails, let it itself undertake that care. This is the counsel of Aristotle, book 8, chapter 1 of the Politics, whom the shrewdest of kings gave as a master to his son. No one, therefore, will call it into controversy that the lawgiver must labor especially over the discipline of the young. For when this is neglected in cities, it brings great disadvantages to the forms of administering the state: the city must be administered in a manner suited to each kind of administration of the state. For the peculiar disposition--and, so to speak, peculiar genius--of each form of administration both preserves that form and establishes it from the beginning. For example, the disposition suited to democracy establishes and preserves democracy, and that suited to oligarchy, oligarchy. And always, as each disposition is better, so it produces a better form of administering the state. Moreover, in all faculties and arts certain things must be taught beforehand and one must first become accustomed to certain things in order to perform the works and duties of each. Therefore, it is clear that antecedent studies and exercises are also needed to bring forth acts of virtue. Since one end is proposed to every city, it is clear also that one and the same discipline must necessarily belong to all, and that its administration must be public, not private--as now each person has care of his own sons privately and hands down to his sons whatever private discipline he sees fit to teach. But the exercise of common things must also be made common. At the same time, no citizen should think that he belongs to himself, but that all belong to the city; for every citizen is a little part of the city. The care of each part is naturally accustomed to look to the care of the whole. And someone may also praise the Lacedaemonians in this: they bestow very great zeal upon boys, and do so communally and publicly. It is therefore evident that laws must be written concerning the discipline and education of boys, and that this education must be common and public.

These things apply among private persons; but the bad education of princes costs peoples dearly.

§ 3. An administrator is appointed over the household estate, a cultivator is set over the vineyards, and beasts of burden are under a keeper; the age of sons is neglected. Magistrates are placed over walls, roads, bridges, and armories; the morals of youth are counted among abandoned matters. But this is the parents' duty. It belongs altogether to parents: the law of nature and divine oracles impose upon parents the honorable education of their sons. But many fail in their duty; some are unable; others even break and utterly corrupt the minds of their sons by a wicked example and by precepts. For although every age learns, the tender age especially does so, and it retains for a very long time what it has received. Hence it happens that they are imbued before their time by the examples or vices of their parents. Newly poured plaster easily follows the guidance of a skilled hand and receives the form in which, however, it hardens. Aristotle speaks excellently in book 7 of the Politics, chapter 7: "Perhaps Theodorus the tragic actor did not speak badly when he said something of this kind. For he never permitted any actor, not even a contemptible one, to come forth upon the stage before him, because he thought that the ears of the spectators were seized and occupied by what they first heard. The same thing happens in meetings with human beings and in the handling of affairs. For all things first presented to us are most approved by us. Therefore all bad and vicious things ought to be as unknown to the young as though foreign, but especially those in which there is either baseness or offense to the mind."

It is plainly so: great is the authority of the things we first learn. And so Eteocles, with great prudence, refused Antipater when he sought young boys as hostages, but permitted adults. He gave as the reason that the tender ought not to be torn from parents and from a well-ordered state, lest among foreigners they should lack a good education.

§ 4. Some object to us the morals of the Scythians, to whom, they say, nature gave what the Greeks could not attain by long exercise and the precepts of philosophy. For the morals of a barbarous nation were more honorable than those of the most cultivated cities in Greece. Thus Trogus, book 2. And thus Quintilian too rightly said, "I think morals are born."

I indeed judge that nature contributes very much to virtue, and that the disposition of some is more inclined to good than that of others; but it must be strengthened by zeal, teaching, and examples. Nature gave to all the foundations and seed of virtue; we are all born for all those things. When one who arouses it approaches, then those goods of the mind are awakened as though asleep. The impulse is from nature, but must be perfected and ruled by education, habit, and exercise. Plato denied that virtue could be taught, for he held it to be implanted θείᾳ μοίρᾳ ἄνευ νοῦ, by divine allotment without the movement of the mind. You may say this rightly of the beginning--for Plato indeed dreamed of those gifts of the saints--but there is nevertheless need of one who arouses it. Seneca, Epistle 95: "For no one can, unless he has been formed from the beginning and composed by an entire system, fulfill all the measures, so that he knows when one ought to act, to what extent, with whom, in what manner. Therefore he cannot strive after honorable things with his whole mind, not even consistently or willingly; but he will look back, he will hesitate."

Why, therefore, were the morals of the Scythians without philosophy better than the morals of the Greeks? History teaches us that there were two principal causes. The first is that the Scythians lacked wine, delicacies, and luxuries--the seeds and incitements of great vices--and therefore lived more incorruptly both by necessity and by ignorance of vices. All were educated for warfare, hunting, and labors, at the command of a severe mother. The other cause lay within Greece itself; for examples of living men contrary to philosophy thrust themselves before everyone's eyes. Indeed, philosophy itself, now a betrayer of an honorable cause, not only yielded to vices but consented to them. And many philosophers were more wicked than the rest, as is clear from Laertius and others. "Ancient wisdom prescribed nothing other than what was to be done and avoided, and then men were far better; after learned men appeared, good men are lacking" (Seneca, Epistle 95). Thus lesser remedies could resist the lesser evils of barbarians. Greek philosophy, which taught men to dispute rather than to live, was dragged captive by the greatest evils.

How great the force of education is Plutarch teaches best, in Περὶ παίδων ἀγωγῆς. "How concise and powerful diligence and labor are you will know if you consider many things. For drops of water hollow stones, and iron and bronze are worn down by the light handling of hands. Moreover, the wheels of vehicles, bent by force, can by no means be straightened again; and the curved staffs of actors can in no way be corrected, but the form which they received by labor, contrary to nature, became stronger than the natural form. Do these things alone now demonstrate the force of industry? No, but countless others. The soil is naturally productive of good, but it lies foul when neglected; and the more excellent it is by disposition, the more it grows old through inactivity when deprived of cultivation. But if some ground is more savage and rough than is proper, cultivation nevertheless immediately makes it yield excellent fruits. What else make neglected trees crooked and barren? But if they have received a good training, they turn out happy and abundantly fruitful. What bodily strength is not blunted and withered by sloth, luxury, and idleness? What nature, by contrast, is so soft that it has not grown to the greatest strength when subdued by exercises and labor? What horses, rightly broken, have not shown themselves obedient to riders? What horses, by contrast, that have remained unbroken have not turned out unmanageable and fierce? And why should you marvel at the rest, when we see that even the fiercest beasts are for the most part tamed and made gentle by industry? A Thessalian, when asked which of the Thessalians were the gentlest, also rightly answered, 'Those who have finished with war.' But what need is there to recall common things? Habit is the work of many years, and he who says that moral virtues are induced by habit does not seem to me to offend. When I have added one further example, I shall not linger longer upon this argument. Lycurgus, lawgiver of the Lacedaemonians, took two puppies of the same parents, which he did not educate in the same manner, but rendered one voracious and gluttonous, the other keen and skilled at hunting. He then summoned an assembly of the Lacedaemonians. 'Lacedaemonians,' he said, 'habit, teaching, education, and the discipline of life are certainly no slight influence upon the production of virtue; I shall make this plain to you by an example.' He immediately released those puppies after setting a pot and a hare opposite them. One ran toward the hare, the other sought the pot. When the Lacedaemonians were not yet able to conjecture what this signified or with what purpose he had shown them the puppies, he said, 'These are both of the same parents; but because they were given different discipline, this one turned out a glutton, the other a hunter.'"

Aristotle demonstrates in book 5 of the Politics, chapter 9, that these things pertain to the safety and overthrow of the state: "Of all the things that have been stated, the greatest for the duration and stability of states is what all now neglect: that the education and instruction of boys be accommodated to the form of administering the state. For even the most useful laws, approved by all who live in the state, are of no use unless the citizens have become accustomed to them and have been educated for them in the state's administration: popularly, if the laws are popular; oligarchically, if they are suited to oligarchy. For if there is incontinence in one person, there is also in the city. But to be educated for the form of administering the state does not mean doing those things in which the few who hold power delight, or those to whom democracy is dear, but learning and being able to do those things by which the former will be able to maintain oligarchy and the latter to live in a democracy. But now, in oligarchies, the sons of those who govern the state overflow with delights and luxury, while the sons of the needy are exercised and accustomed to labors. And so they both have a greater will to make revolutions and are more able to do so. In democracies which retain the power of the people in an exquisite and exact manner, the contrary to what benefits the state has been established. The cause of this is that they define liberty badly. For there are two things by which democracy seems to be defined: one, that the power of the state rests with the greater part of the people; the other, liberty. For what is just seems to be equal; and what is equal, that whatever has seemed good to the multitude be ratified. But what is free and equal is that each person do whatever he wishes. Thus in democracies of this kind each lives as he wishes and 'where desire leads him,' as Euripides says. But this is evil and vicious. For one ought not to think that to live in a manner accommodated to the form of administering the state is slavery, but safety."

§ 5. The chief care for the sons of the nobility, therefore, belongs to the highest princes. In their education public authority sins most grievously, and peoples pay for that fault with their destruction. The sons of princes are fields from which sustenance is supplied to the multitude. And the greater care is necessary because it is more difficult to find a man of such resolute spirit that he dares offend a future prince. Most prefer to be in favor with the prince than to make the prince good. Their reasoning departs as far from duty as that of physicians who, by indulging a sick man lest they displease him, kill him. Few parents do not wish their sons to be good men; most also demand that they be better than themselves. Yet there have been some who preferred them wicked. Heliogabalus wished for a son like himself and strove with supreme authority to corrupt Alexander Caesar into his own morals. Herodian narrates the matter thus in Elagabalus: after Alexander was called Caesar, Antoninus wished immediately to imbue him with those institutions of his, so that he would take part in choral dances and dancing, share in the priesthood, and use the same dress and arts. Yet his mother Mammaea delivered him from all that foulness, secretly sending teachers of every discipline, teaching him modesty, accustoming him to the wrestling school and manly exercises, and instructing him alike in Greek and Latin literature. Antoninus was exceedingly indignant at these things and now regretted the adoption and the sharing of imperial power. Therefore he drove all Alexander's teachers from the court, afflicting some of the more distinguished partly with death and partly with exile, and alleging the ridiculous reason that they were corrupting his son and did not allow him to take part in dances and Bacchic frenzy, but composed him toward modesty and taught him manly duties.

I think there are scarcely any who wish their own sons to be taught such things. Many nevertheless permit them. They dissolve infancy with delights; they approve with laughter the base sayings of boys who do not yet understand their meaning, certain that they themselves will become the authors of all the evils the boys will commit. Those who allow and accustom them to sin teach them to sin. Quintilian censures this most gravely among his Romans and judges thus, in On the Orator: "In former times, first of all, each son born of a chaste parent was brought up not in the chamber of a purchased nurse, but in the lap and bosom of his mother, whose chief praise was to guard the house and serve her children. Moreover, some elder kinswoman of approved and tested morals was chosen, to whom the offspring of every household was entrusted; in her presence it was unlawful either to say what seemed shameful to be said or to do what seemed dishonorable to be done. And she regulated not only the studies and cares, but also the relaxations and games of boys, with a certain holiness and modesty. Thus, we have learned, Cornelia presided over the education of the Gracchi, Aurelia over that of Caesar, and Attia, the mother of Augustus, over his, and raised princely children. That discipline and severity tended to this end: that the nature of each, pure and entire and distorted by no vices, might immediately seize upon honorable arts with its whole breast, and, whether it inclined toward military affairs, knowledge of law, or the study of eloquence, might do that alone and drink it in completely. But now the newborn infant is handed over to some little Greek serving-woman, to whom is joined one or another from among all the slaves, generally the vilest and fitted for no serious service. By their tales and errors tender and unformed minds are immediately imbued. Nor does anyone in the whole house take thought for what he says or does in the infant's presence, since the parents themselves accustom the little ones neither to goodness nor modesty, but to wantonness and license, through which shamelessness and contempt for self and others creep in little by little. Indeed, the peculiar and distinctive vices of this city seem to me to be conceived almost in the mother's womb."

Now too they sin with even greater disgrace for the most part: among many a stable-boy is held in greater honor than a pedagogue.

Let no one excuse himself because he is a Christian. He incurs the guilt of the one who does a thing if he neglects to correct what he can.

The first praise of education lies in ignorance of vices--Tacitus, Germania; Justin, book 2--then in knowledge of virtues, and finally in daily exercise. Among the Spartans the magistrate supplied the educators.

Cyrus, though best educated, had harmful sons because he permitted them to be educated by women. It makes no difference whether wicked women educate the children of princes, or flatterers who teach them the empty forms of ceremonies while religion and prudence are neglected. Those actors will not make fathers of the fatherland.

CHAPTER II

Precepts Necessary for the Education of Youth, Given to All

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. I have many things to say to fathers and mothers on behalf of their sons, against a useless love harmful to the state. But I fear that they will not receive them; therefore I shall refer the cause to the magistrates, for it is their duty to watch lest a criminal citizen be educated for the state. For if he turns out a drunkard, spendthrift, adulterer, turbulent man, robber, or slanderer, he will also be a traitor to his fatherland, if he is able. I propose certain things generally, not as though unknown, but because I desire that they be brought into practice; for they have now long been neglected.

§ 2. The first precept is necessary and difficult: that the life of father and mother, brothers and kinsmen, be the discipline of the new Roman citizen. He will truly learn what he has seen in his father. He thinks first of all that what he sees his father doing is permissible. It is a welcome thing that you have given a citizen to the fatherland and the people, if you make him fit for the fatherland. You will not do so if by your example you show him how to follow vices. The force of example is great toward all, but it is entire in teaching the tender: they cannot judge; what they see, they follow. The eagle leads its young out to hunt; the younger dog learns from the older to watch for the beast; the young bull submits its neck to the yoke after first accompanying an ox. Thus the son thinks that the occupation in which he sees his father engaged is a dignity, not a labor. O happy young man, who have above all a man to imitate whom nature willed you to resemble most closely! Pliny, book 8, Epistle 13. A son's great happiness is not a rich or powerful father, but a good one. Sometimes Absalom is born from David, Manasseh from Hezekiah, Jehoahaz from Josiah; and conversely bad sons are born from good men, and the sons of heroes are banes. But as it is easy for descendants to degenerate from paternal virtue, so it is exceedingly rare for those who have had the first lessons of their fathers' crimes to turn out upright. Such men you may rightly call sons of God, because by virtue they have overcome nature.

§ 3. The second precept tends to the same end: that the parent have an honorable, pious, and chaste household. A wicked household is a great and widely spreading evil; it has deceived the holiest men and overthrown royal houses. Do you marvel that in the court of the holiest king and prophet Amnon commits incest and Absalom, stained with his brother's murder, seeks his father's throat? Cease to marvel: Joab, the slayer of two princes, held power. Ahithophel's counsel was regarded as though it were the counsel of God--the counsel of the man who inflamed the son against his father's bed and blood. A criminal little servant harms a son's morals as much as a bad father does. For in the presence of any father whatsoever reverence and nature produce some shame at sin. Wicked Pseudoluses and Sosias, while they ennoble the sons of households with crimes, pursue their own advantage. As Theodosius was dying, nothing was higher among his wishes than to assign good ministers to his sons Arcadius and Honorius. You turn away a pestilential, leprous, or epileptic servant, for he would bring death and infamy upon the house and distribute contagion among his companions. Yet, softened by a friend's recommendation or by compliance, you tolerate wicked ministers who will infect your sons with a foul plague. And what is most wretched, they will make them your enemies.

§ 4. Imitate the institution of the Persians: remove your sons from the sight of the household and the marketplace, even from your own and their mother's sight if you must act amid the crowd. Harden yourself bravely here; conquer your affections; let the wisdom of a manly spirit overcome the tenderness of love. Persian sons lived apart from the household; Romans kept boyhood guarded at home and passed youth in war. Young men were immediately imbued with military service, so that by obeying they might become accustomed to command, and by following, to act as leaders. Pliny, book 8, Epistle 14, gives the reason. Tacitus, Annals 2: city youths overflowing with luxury are better kept in camps. The Persians did not admit sons into their sight before the fourth year; the Gauls, not until adulthood. But let him send the boy where he may advance in virtue, lest in his absence he encounter seducers, for corruptions are everywhere.

§ 5. Nevertheless, let him observe moderation in sending the boy away. Let him not send younger boys far away to travel or for a long time, but entrust them to nearby teachers, so that he may be able to learn of his son's progress and may not receive him back corrupted by the morals of a foreign nation, forgetful of his paternal tongue, and contemptuous of the laws and customs of his own people. For a tender age drinks in all those things, but evils more quickly. A boy is educated more indulgently abroad when he is far away and absent for a long time, unless the greatest care is applied, and precisely the kind that a prudent father would apply. Furthermore, the travels of boys are useless, for they cannot observe the situation of towns, the advantages of rivers, the suitability of harbors, much less the morals, institutions, and laws of nations. Therefore that wandering does not serve prudence but harms talent and studies; from it most have brought back foreign vices, having forgotten the virtue of their fatherland.

§ 6. Let the parent imitate the Laconians: let education be severe and mixed with labors and adversities. Let the little boy have someone whom he reveres; let him have something whose denial pains him. Let him also at times be compelled to yield. For unless he is restrained by many bridles, since he lacks prudence he must necessarily be driven by very great and various desires, so that if you give him the reins, he turns out most wanton and obstinate. Indeed, he will put on a nature which no later discipline will shake off. Therefore let delights be taken away; let him feel reverence and fear. A father who indulges his son is a tyrant. Part of the cruelty of tyrants was to corrupt by luxury the sons of men whom they wished destroyed. Dionysius, tyrant of Sicily, when he could harm Dion in no other way, commanded his wife to marry another and his son to be so educated that before the years of puberty he was overwhelmed with wine, feasts, and prostitutes, to such a degree that he was allowed to be sober at no time. When the tyrant had been expelled, the father returned home; but when he attempted, by placing guards over him, to bring his son back to good conduct, he understood to his great grief how much force the first rudiments of education possessed. For the son, indignant that his accustomed pleasures were withdrawn, hurled himself from the highest part of the house and ended his life together with his delights. A prudent father will therefore preoccupy every path, and the whole state will apply itself to this end: that there be no access to vices. For after their poisons have poured themselves into the vital parts, either medicine is late or a dangerous medicine must be applied, because mild remedies yield to great evils. Hence disinheritances, prisons, custody, and at times hidden executions. The cause of these evils is often indulgence in education. What Aristotle pronounced in book 1 of the Ethics is most true:

> Οὐ μικρὸν οὕτως ἢ οὕτως εὐθὺς ἐκ νέων ἐθίζεσθαι διαφέρει, ἀλλὰ πάμπολυ, μᾶλλον δὲ τὸ πᾶν.

It is not a small matter to become accustomed from tender years in this or that manner, but an exceedingly great one; indeed, the whole depends upon it. Therefore appear more austere and stern toward the son whom you especially love.

> Those whom you shall establish to raise up the hope of your race,
> Bestow especial labor upon them even now, from tender years.

§ 7. Let discipline be seasoned with sweetness: let gentleness be joined to constant and even gravity, severity, and command, a gentleness that may make labors and exercises seem honorable and pleasing. I do not wish a father to be so severe that his son performs the labors of studies or other duties through fear alone. For the harshness of the one commanding renders odious things otherwise pleasing and suited to the disposition of young men. Therefore let severity be employed so that he is drawn back from vices, idleness, and expense; gentleness, so that he is led civilly and sweetly to honorable things. Let him always hope for the rewards of good deeds, and experience pardon and impunity for offenses as most difficult to obtain.

§ 8. Let the educator recognize the disposition of each. So great is the variety of different talents that, when one comes to particulars, diverse and almost contrary arts must be employed. Some are led to duty by threats; others, indignant, cast away the things upon which they had set their affection; others, stunned, take flight. A good disposition rises through praise; light talents swell; the proud become obstinate. Praise has harmed many.

But amid this variety of talents, many deceive many. Therefore the things I have said are entirely general. No disposition is so well born and so upright that the examples of parents and household do not corrupt it; none is such that it must not be constrained by severity and fostered by gentleness, because all have received seeds of the virtues implanted in their minds. In order that these may grow into fruits, they need not only seasonable sun and rain, but also winds and cold, so that they may be strengthened and put forth roots. Other matters concerning sobriety and the choosing of masters require their own treatment; for the present it is sufficient to have given these admonitions generally.

CHAPTER III

Care of Infants Also Belongs to the State

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. Human beings need the greatest care and nurture because they are the tenderest animals, and the greatest restraint because they are impetuous and light. Let us therefore treat their education from their very birth and beginnings.

First, it is in the interest of those who are born that there be prudence in their parents' entering marriage. It is advisable that epileptics, lepers, and those suffering from cancer or another disease abstain from marriage, lest by contagion they transmit a dreadful inheritance to posterity. For a city could be filled with such families. For if the horror and danger of those diseases is so great that, although the marriage bond remains altogether indissoluble, cohabitation and the use of marriage are nevertheless removed, who could doubt that those marriages are contracted imprudently whose separation is prudently established on account of the danger of contagion? Those are private injuries, but they overflow into the state. Our most learned and diligent Thomas Sanchez, book 9 On Matrimony, disputation 24, numbers 15, 16, 17, and 18, teaches that the obligation consisting in cohabitation and the use of marriage ceases if one spouse labors under a horrible and contagious disease. The third opinion, to which I wholly adhere, teaches that the healthy spouse is by no means bound to render the debt when, in the judgment of physicians, a notable danger of infection threatens. Nor does the text in chapter 2, On Leprous Spouses, stand in the way; for it is understood of a case in which that rendering does not result in notable injury to the one rendering. And thus St. Thomas and the other Doctors cited at number 15 for the first opinion are understood, as is clear from the reason by which they prove it: namely, that from so brief a union no danger of infection threatens. Therefore they plainly judge that, when such danger threatens, the obligation of rendering ceases. Nor does the reason for the second opinion, brought forward at the preceding number, stand in the way. For no one by contracting marriage obligates himself to render except with the safety of the individual preserved, as we proved at number 2. And the reasons adduced there plainly prove this opinion.

Among theologians it is defended by Durandus, book 4, distinction 32, question 1, number 8, where he argues against Major's first argument to the third conclusion; Paludanus, question 1, article 2, number 7; Almain, sole question; Soto, sole question, article 1, reply 2; Ouandus, sole question after proposition 2; Celaia, question 1, argument 2; Palacios, disputation 1, solution 704; D. Antonius, part 3, title 1, chapter 20, §10 to the end, in the fourth case; Cajetan, Summa, word matrimonium, final chapter, concerning sins in the use of marriage, verse "The first is"; Victoria, Summa on Matrimony, number 275; Medina, chapter On Restitution, question 19, final section; Petrus de Soto, lecture 16 On Matrimony, § "There are also besides these"; Ledesma, part 2, question 4, question 66, article 1, folio 524, column 3; Angles, Flowers, part 1 On Matrimony, question 6, On the Obligation of Rendering the Debt, article 1, difficulty 1; Pedraza, Summa, precept 6, §18; Enriquez, book 11 On Matrimony, chapter 15, number 7; Manuel, volume 1 of the Summa, second edition, chapter 243, number 2; Bartholomaeus a Ledesma, doubt 71 On Matrimony, conclusion 1; Petrus de Ledesma, On Matrimony, question 64, article 1, doubt 2, conclusion 1; Ludovicus Lopez, part 1 of the Instruction, chapter 83, § "But concerning a leprous husband," and part 2 On Matrimony, chapter 56, immediately at the beginning; Graffis, part 1 of the Decisions, book 2, chapter 83, number 6; Cannedo, Summa of the Sacraments, On Matrimony, chapter 8, number 72; Emmanuel Sa, Summa, word conjugal debt, verse "excuses from rendering"; Vega, volume 1 of the Summa, chapter 78, case 3; and, among jurists, Rosella, word leper, number 2, where Angelus, number 2; Sylvester, word debt, question 1, verse "the second is," and word leprosy, question 3; Tabiena, word matrimony, question 3, §6, §7 at the end; Armilla, word debt, number 3, word leprosy, number 3, and word matrimony, number 69; Turrecremata, chapter Sciatis, cause 33, question 4, article 1, number 2, case 3; Navarrus, Summa, chapter 16, Spanish number 24, Latin number 25; Gregorius Lopez, law 7, word suadendo, title 2, part 4; Gaetanus, repetition on chapter Ad limina 30, question 1, §4, number 175.

It must nevertheless be observed that if infection is feared from frequent intercourse, but not from one or another act, the spouse is bound to render once or twice, but not frequently. For the entire reason for the cessation of the precept of rendering is fear of infection, and therefore it will cease only to the extent that such fear exists. Thus Palacios, book 4, distinction 32, disputation 1, solution 705.

Exactly the same must be said if one spouse suffers from the French disease; for the healthy spouse is not bound to discharge the debt at the danger of notable infection to himself, because the reason is the same as with leprosy. Thus Victoria, On Matrimony, number 275; Soto, book 4, distinction 32, sole question, article 1, reply 2, verse "indeed"; where Celaia, question 1, argument 2; Palacios, disputation 1, folio 705, verse "But it still torments"; Enriquez, book 11 On Matrimony, chapter 35, number 7; Petrus de Ledesma, On Matrimony, question 64, article 1, doubt 2. Indeed, the same must be said of any contagious disease, for the same reason. Medina, chapter On Restitution, question 19, final section; Ledesma, part 2, question 4, question 66, article 1, folio 524, column 3; Bartholomaeus a Ledesma, doubt 72 On Matrimony, conclusion 1; Armilla, word debt, number 3, and word matrimony, number 96.

Since among the Hebrews, Persians, and other states lepers are separated from the city, it is not fitting for them to establish a new state and produce so miserable a posterity, which will also draw the sound part into its condition.

Other things must no less be avoided. Namely, when a fever attacks either spouse, let them sleep apart by mutual consent, for the offspring will be born sickly and βραχύβιος, short-lived, and even stupid if the fever is more ardent. Next, abundance and crudity of food, and especially drunkenness in the begetters, is the cause of various diseases in those born, renders them dull, and makes them altogether unfit for learning. Far more so does the intemperance of overheated lust. For it renders the body ἀραιότερον, ψυχρότερον, ξηρότερον, καὶ ἀσθενέστερον, rarer, colder, drier, and weaker, as Paulus Aegineta teaches in book 1, with the others agreeing. Rareness, coldness, dryness, weakness, premature old age, and untimely death follow from it. A citizen born from this turns out weak in body and slow in mind; and, what is the greatest evil for a weak and stupid boy, while still immature he carries his parent to the grave, becoming either captive to the negligence of guardians or prey to their rapacity. Let these remarks concerning the begetting of offspring suffice; let us treat of their upbringing.

§ 2. Therefore, when a human being has been born into the light--a sacred and divine thing, an image of his creator--let not only the mother, released from the pains of childbirth, but the whole household give thanks to God with its whole mind. For children are the pledges of marriage and rewards of pains, but a new care for those bringing them up. Let them offer the infant to God, so that, as he was formed in the womb, he may be re-formed in the laver. And what is chief, let the mother herself be nurse and bearer; let the infant be nourished in the bosom of her from whose entrails he issued. No nourishment is healthier for the newborn than maternal milk. It is the work of nature to provide nourishment for the newborn, Aristotle, book 1 of the Politics, chapter 10. Varro wished nurses and mothers to be the same persons. Every prudent person marvels and is indignant that a mother's love should vanish so suddenly: how does she so quickly forget the child borne in the womb with so much labor and brought into the light with so much pain?

> Πρόβατον οὐκ ἀπολείπει τὸ αὐτῆς ἔκγονον, οὐδὲ λύκος· ἄνθρωπος δὲ ἀπολείπει.

Neither sheep nor wolf abandons its own offspring, but the human being abandons his. Arrian, book 1, Epistle 23. Women who dry up the spring of milk owed to their sons gravely offend God; for nature does not wish its gifts to be intercepted, and does not wish what God has already prepared for the preservation of the human race to be corrupted by luxuries. For by idleness and ἀστοργίᾳ, lack of natural affection, they alter nature, and they act so as to withdraw nourishment from the offspring even through pains, applying cupping glasses to the back which perhaps ought not to be tried even for increasing milk. From this arise χονδριώσεις of the breasts, or θρομβώσεις of the milk, when through the spongy tissue of the breasts the nourishment denied to the child thickens into clots and lumps. Deservedly it torments the mother with punishment; or when, through great abundance, milk distends the κόλπους, that is, the hollows of the breasts, they fall into various diseases.

Thus among all animals there is affection toward offspring: lions and tigers, their ferocity pacified, caress their young and offer their teats. It is the voice of nature that the offspring must be nourished and fought for. The love of offspring sharpens the ferocity of all beasts when they nourish their young. They fear neither wounds nor blows on behalf of their offspring:

> Τόσον ἀρτιγόνοιο γενέθλης
> φίλτρον ἐνὶ καρδίῃ στάζει θεός.

God instilled so great a love of recent offspring into the heart.

Sweet pledges are dearer than one's own breath. For powerful nature binds parents and children with a firm bond. But foolish mothers entrust a great part of that bond to nurses, and bring it about that grown children love nurses equally with parents, and sometimes more ardently, remembering that their tender age was despised by their mother and taken up by nurses standing in for mothers. Alexander the Great's love and reverence for his nurse was certainly remarkable, and I do not know whether it was not greater than for his mother Olympias. Curtius, book 8; Justin, book 12.

§ 3. Hence by divine vengeance another punishment is imposed upon delicate women: after they have entrusted their little children, as though strangers and unworthy of their care, to another's fidelity, they find them disobedient and insolent when they have become stronger. She who did not deem her son worthy of her breasts cannot reproach him for ingratitude by showing them. What remains, therefore, except that she await abandonment in old age by the child whom, while he wailed, she cast from her house, or certainly from her bosom? She will not find in the robust man the constancy of devotion and love whose elements she herself effaced and abolished in the cradle.

§ 4. She also harms her son in many ways. Since he lived in the maternal womb from his mother's blood, no nourishment is more accommodated to his nature and constitution than that same mother's milk, for milk is whitened blood. Moreover, a change of nourishment and air is dangerous to so great a tenderness of the offspring. For the sucking of another's milk conduces neither to health nor growth. Each thing is nourished by what is similar, injured by what is contrary, and cast down by change.

§ 5. Nurses harm the morals of the offspring no less than their life. What if you have obtained a nurse who is drunken, irascible, or lustful? The tender pupil will drink the poisons of a wicked woman in the very milk. And he will hear:

> No goddess was your parent, nor Dardanus founder of your race,
>
> Faithless one; but the Caucasus, bristling with hard rocks,
>
> Begot you, and Hyrcanian tigers put their udders to you.

And: "You were born from rocks, nourished with the milk of beasts." How can you persuade yourself that an adopted mother will be better for your son, when you have given him two stepmothers? For by deserting him you made yourself a stepmother, and made her one by summoning her. But what sort of woman is she? If she is an old woman, you have sinned against the most ancient precept of medicine. Physicians hold that milk is the foam of blood, for which reason Varro warns that a nurse ought to be young, since in old women, as the blood is worse, so is the milk. Why, therefore, will you offer your son, as true nourishment, a purulent humor scarcely thickened from cold blood? If you provide a young woman, take care lest she corrupt morals and the household. Indeed, take care lest she fail to abstain from intercourse; for if she becomes pregnant, she will give a slow poison to the pupil. Pliny, book 28, chapter 9, says it is deadly for nurses to conceive; and Galen, On the Preservation of Health. Nothing is more harmful to an infant still nursing than for his nurse to conceive in her womb. For what is best and most vital is consumed by that fetus; blood of smaller quantity and less purity remains, and there is either no milk or little, as Aristotle warns, On the Generation of Animals, book 4, chapter 8. But even if we concede that none of the things which frequently happen has occurred, nevertheless a mother's love is natural and a nursemaid's mercenary; and so they are led by one payment to one place, by another elsewhere. For when the mind has once given itself to profit, it thinks duty lies where the greatest payment lies. Nor should you think that a nurse will love another's child when you, his mother, do not love your own.

§ 6. What, finally, would the infant say, if he could speak, when he saw himself banished immediately from the womb and exiled without any fault of his own--unless it was a fault to have been born? He is silent in sound, but cries out in affection; he is tender; he is pitiable because he cannot ask; he must be loved because he does not yet understand his calamity. If he understood, he would surely say: "Mother, you preserve your finery, jewels, and bracelets under many locks; perhaps you foster a puppy and monkey in your bosom; you entrust authority over your strongbox to no one; the whole day is spent arranging your adornment. But me, a part of you, who received my life from your entrails and have scarcely been torn from you, you commit to another's fidelity and perhaps perfidy. And although you can hope that I shall be brought up with gentle obedience, you certainly know that I shall not be handled by a mother's hand. If, when you were someday an infirm old woman in need of aid, I were to exclude you from my house or my affection, I would surely be worthy that the deepest earth open beneath me. If I allowed another to appear kinder toward you than I, would you recognize me as your son? To whom do you delegate care of me? Whom do you command me to love as a second mother?"

§ 7. That mother, though a rich and illustrious matron, will not do such things. She will always sustain her son with natural milk, not purchased milk. For maternal milk and spirit always increase the disposition and the growth of the body far more. Columella, book 7, chapter 12. It is not food alone, but spirit also; for with great affection a mother offers her breasts to her son and therefore, together with warm and spirited milk, infuses a salutary abundance with a certain life of the spirits. All the nourishment of a loving mother is more vigorous and brings to the children not only strength of body but also likeness of disposition.

§ 8. Finally, no one can fail to see what danger is incurred by that most perverse fastidiousness of women and contempt for their own blood. How easy would it be for a nursemaid to be corrupted by the price of a huge payment, so that she substitutes a peasant child for a noble offspring and inserts servile filth into the most distinguished families? This indeed happened to Artabanus the Macedonian, whose unfaithful nurse exchanged his son, and afterward, when both he and the substituted son were adults, disclosed her theft more criminally than she had committed it. For the two met with great slaughter of the kingdom and perished on one day. Cautious custody must be applied not only to little children but much more to adults, for with the age and strength of sons the solicitude of a good parent--never too great--increases. Nurses have great authority over their pupils, often greater than mothers, and there have not been lacking those who loved them more than their mothers. Certainly many have laid impious hands upon their mothers, few upon their nurses. Hence many children of princes have been led into fraud by them, and no royal woman has been carried off without a nurse's knowledge. Mothers are the cause, because they join to their children another woman as though another mother--one who possesses a mother's authority and has stolen a mother's love, but nevertheless possesses a servile disposition for sale at a price. In former times the wickedness of nurses was restrained by many laws, among which that law of Constantine issued in the year 320 is severe: "And since the vigilance of parents is often mocked by the tales and depraved persuasions of nurses, let punishment first threaten those whose detestable service we have shown, and whose purchased discourses have been detected. Let the passages of the mouth and throat that put forth wicked incitements be closed by the pouring-in of molten lead." Let them therefore follow the precepts of the ancients and nourish their sons with their own milk, so that maternal affection may promote a freeborn disposition. For if, as Justin relates in book 43, Hogis, king of the Curetes, was of extraordinary swiftness because, after he was exposed, he had a doe as nurse, how great a force shall we say there is in other cases?

Let them therefore rather imitate the diligence of Cato's wife, who not only nourished with her own milk the son born from her, but also at times put the infants of her serving-women to her breasts. By this means she attached to her son his household slaves, through their parents, both for the present and the future.

What, therefore, must a prince establish in this matter? I shall say it in one word: a public law must be enacted, that a mother nourish with her own milk the sons whom she has borne, and that neither wealth nor nobility exempt any woman. But if on account of illness she cannot, let the magistrate and husband determine the matter after hearing physicians. Let her who acts otherwise be branded with disgrace.

§ 9. Deservedly so. For unless there is strong love between parents and children, there will be none among strangers and therefore no concord in the state. Many parents have wished for a vicarious death in place of their sons; some have undergone it; more have been unwilling to survive them. Israel mourns Joseph inconsolably. David, moved only by danger, puts aside the signs of grief, but fixes and buries grief more deeply. And let us understand that love not only as devotion but as nature and humanity. Aegeus, king of the Athenians, when from the sight of mourning sails he supposed Theseus slain, cast himself headlong into the sea. A similar error extinguished the mother of Ulysses. Jocasta followed shortly after Eteocles and Polynices had fallen by mutual wounds. Mopsus the Cretan, hearing at Saguntum that his sons had perished, fell from a tower and knowingly and deliberately dashed himself to pieces. Orodes, king of the Parthians, conceived such grief in his mind at the death of his son Pacorus that, as had once happened to Hecuba for the same cause, it turned into madness. Grief for his murdered son also overwhelmed and extinguished Emperor Gordian. When Octavius Balbus thought that his son was being killed on his account, he offered himself to the executioners of those proscribing him. The same love was contested between Quintus Cicero and his son: by no tortures could the son be brought to betray his father; the father gave himself from his hiding place into their sight, that he might deliver his son from slaughter. Theirs was the same love as that of those concerning whom Livy says: "Many falsely believed to have perished in the Second Punic War at Trasimene and Cannae, and whose lives had already been rashly mourned by some, were suddenly presented to their mothers; and they poured so great a mass of joy upon their mothers' minds that, crushed as though by a sudden ruin, the mothers expired amid kisses and embraces." Since the bond of natural love between parents and children is so great, its connection ought not to be dissolved or loosened immediately from the first birth by the luxuries of mothers.

CHAPTER IV

Infants Also Need Education, and What It Is

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. Just as it is free to take a wife, so it is necessary to bring up and educate offspring brought into the light, and one must take complete care that they not be deprived of resources and aid.

Therefore those who introduce into the state a savage and ἄστοργον, unnaturally unloving, law do injury to nature. Such was that law of Romulus: "Let monstrous offspring be killed without penalty." Cruel too was the paternal power that usurped a right of life and death over children, because the unconsidered anger of fathers destroyed many and domestic slanders still more. Disinheritance, by which one was denied to be a son, was harsh, but nevertheless established by law and statutes. Yet gravest of all is the cruelty of parents who expose children ignorant of their condition and deserving nothing, either in deserted places or in places from which they can be taken and brought up. The law of the Thebans concerning this was just and full of humanity: it decreed capital punishment if anyone exposed an infant in solitude, for it was not only homicide but the slaughter of an innocent. Aelian, book 2 of Various History. But if anyone could not nourish a newborn, he carried it with its swaddling bands to the magistrate, by whom it was sold into slavery for a small price. Best and most merciful is the law of Christians, who indeed impose punishment upon those who expose children: they both remove the children from paternal power and afflict the parents with other punishments--lighter than they deserve--because they consult the safety of newborns, lest the parents prefer to kill and conceal them rather than expose them. The edict of the Caesars Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian is: "Let each nourish his own offspring; but if he thinks it should be exposed, he will be subject to the penalty that has been established."

§ 2. What care, therefore, must be applied to a son or daughter during the first five years, or lustrum?

Since at that age the mind is weak and cannot be instructed, care will be taken of the little body alone, but in such a way that those things are observed which conduce to the integrity and vigor both of the external and internal senses. "For what," says St. Jerome, Epistle 17, "would you exhort to continence the child who desires cakes, who babbles with chattering voice in her mother's bosom, to whom honey is sweeter than words? Should she hear the deep things of the Apostle, when she delights more in old women's tales? Should she perceive the enigmas of the Prophets, when the sterner face of her nursemaid disturbs her? Should she understand the majesty of the Gospel, at whose thunderbolts every mortal sense is blunted? Should I exhort her to be subject to her parent, when with a tender hand she strikes her laughing mother?"

There are nevertheless things which I may prescribe to the father and mother concerning such little children. Good education needs preparation.

§ 3. The first is that before the fifth year those things be done which are the rudiments of future hope. Plato commanded nurses and boys to assemble in the crossroads, both so that they might enjoy a freer air and so that the morals of the nurses might be observed in public.

Next, even at this little age, let there be a diligent, careful, and fastidious selection of nursemaids, serving-women, and little servants who guard and care for the little son. Let them be of honorable morals, for children reproduce the morals of those whom they first behold. Care must be taken that by old women's tales they do not thrust depraved and absurd opinions upon them:

In the beginning, the infancy of boys

Drinks in error together with milk.

But I have given warning concerning these things above.

§ 4. Those who deal with the tender pupil will also lay the foundations of speech and will not imitate his babbling through blandishments and jokes, because children thus learn to speak perversely. A prudent father will devote the greatest effort to forming speech.

What greater thing could a sweet nursemaid wish for her pupil

Than that he be wise and able to speak what he thinks?

Since sounds, the articulation of sounds, sibilants, and accents depend upon habit, persons should be chosen who use clear, sweet, and native pronunciation. Thus it will happen that from those from whom the little child receives signs of things he may also imbibe the habit of corrected pronunciation. The Gracchi learned eloquence in their mother's bosom. The practice of nations also admonishes us of this: for what person of a foreign nation so sounds a language that he does not at the same time breathe forth his fatherland? Even when Dorians spoke Attic there was πλατυστομία, breadth of mouth, for they drew out words with a broad mouth. We also can distinguish by nation those speaking Latin from the sound of the voice. But whence is it that they never unlearn the manner of pronunciation which they imbibed in their first years? Because what we first learn clings most closely to the mind, as though a second nature. Why did the tribe of Ephraim retain its national defect, so that they could not say Shibboleth but Sibboleth, with a softer sound? It came from a mother, nursemaid, or some serving-girl who formed the infancy either of Ephraim himself or of his sons. Therefore, just as care is applied lest tender legs or little arms grow crookedly, so also the tongue must be formed--not by commands, of which that age is not yet capable, but by articulate and pure utterance. For he will learn to speak rightly if he hears no one pronounce badly.

§ 5. So tender an age will also be able to learn some things, if it has a suitable master; but it will learn by playing, not by laboring. This care is not childish, although it is exercised upon a child. Certainly Jerome, a man of great talent and holiness, did not think it beneath either his office or his age to teach a child amid his sublime studies of sacred literature. The present Church admires the ancient tongue which he heard, and which heresies feared like the sharp weapon of a thunderbolt; yet he was ready to form the words of a tender virgin. In Epistle 7 he speaks thus: "If you send Paula, I myself promise to be both her master and her fosterer. I shall carry her upon my shoulders; an old man, I shall form her babbling words, far more glorious than the philosopher of the world, since I shall educate not a king of the Macedonians destined to perish by Babylonian poison, but a serving-woman and bride of CHRIST to be offered to the heavenly kingdoms."

Therefore some unfairly criticize our Society: because it lowers itself to schools for boys, they believe it serves God less religiously and would prefer it to be occupied in theology alone. I shall dispute against them when necessary. For now I wish them to consider this one thing: that most human beings, before they are rendered fit for those studies, need very much and very exact discipline.

The prudently humble man did not remain silent about what he thought should be learned. Epistle 12: "Therefore let our Pacatula, who will later read this little letter, for the present merely recognize the elements of letters; let her join syllables, learn names, connect words. And so that she may meditate upon them in her little piping voice, let little cakes, honeyed drink, rewards, and whatever is sweet to the taste, whatever blooms in flowers, whatever glitters in gems, whatever delights among dolls, be offered to her, so that she hastens to receive them. Meanwhile let her try to draw threads with her tender thumb; let her often break the strands, that she may someday not break them. After labor let her rejoice in games; let her hang upon her mother's neck; let her snatch kisses from her relatives; let her sing psalms for a reward. Let her love what she is compelled to learn, so that it may be not work but delight, not necessity but will."

He gives almost the same precepts at greater length, but they possess ancient wisdom, Epistle 7: "The soul which is to be a temple of God must be educated thus: let it learn to hear nothing and to speak nothing except what pertains to the fear of God. Let her not understand base words; let her be ignorant of the songs of the world; while still tender, let her tongue be imbued with sweet psalms. Let the wanton age of boys be far away; let the girls and female attendants themselves be barred from worldly company, lest they teach worse what they have learned badly. Let letters be made for her, whether of boxwood or ivory, and let them be called by their names. Let her play with them, so that the play itself may also be instruction; and let her not only retain the order of the letters, so that the memory of the names passes into a song, but let their order among themselves frequently be disturbed, the last mixed with the middle and the middle with the first, so that she may know them not only by sound but also by sight. But when she begins to draw the stylus in wax with a trembling hand, or to hold it while another's hand is placed over hers, let her fingers be guided; or let the elements be carved upon a tablet, so that her traces may be drawn through the same furrows, enclosed by margins, and may not be able to wander outside. Let her join syllables for a reward and be invited by little gifts by which that age can be won over. Let her have companions in learning whom she may envy and by whose praises she may be stung. She must not be rebuked if she is slower, but her talent must be aroused by praise, so that she may rejoice at having conquered and grieve at having been conquered. Above all, care must be taken lest she hate studies and lest the bitterness of them, perceived in infancy, pass beyond the unformed years. The very names through which she gradually becomes accustomed to connect words should not be accidental, but fixed and deliberately accumulated--namely those of the Prophets and Apostles; and let the entire series of the Patriarchs from Adam descend from Matthew and Luke, so that while she does one thing she may be prepared for future memory."

§ 6. Let the father of the household preside over these exercises of his sons, even if he is a king and prince, and let him regard it as a far more glorious function than that once performed by the judges of contests at Greek spectacles or Roman ones. There the destruction of morals and deaths are carried out; here the beginnings of virtues.

§ 7. I shall finish when I have given some precepts concerning the care of the body. They were accustomed to govern bodies with instruments so that they would not be distorted; thus Aristotle, book 7, chapter 17 of the Politics.

He warns of another thing which is in no way in use, yet could be recalled:

> Συμφέρει δὲ εὐθὺς, ὡς πρὸς τὰ ψύχη, συνεθίζειν μικρῶν παίδων.

It is advantageous immediately from childhood to accustom them to cold. For this is most useful both for health and for military affairs; therefore the barbarians do it, and it can indeed be done, since on account of native heat boys can easily endure cold. The Celts hardened their newborns at rivers; Olaus Magnus attributes the same to his Goths. The Thracians too educated their own to endurance of cold. Sidonius, poem 2:

> Here ice receives the newborn, and snow from a stream other than the mother's
>
> Hardens the soft limbs of the infants, their fellow citizens.

The ancient Britons, as Caesar has it in book 5 of The Gallic War, hid themselves most swiftly in marshes amid dangers, being most tolerant of cold.

He also prudently warns that during those years children are to be applied neither to labor nor discipline, lest these impede growth. It is agreed that they will attain this by play, but the playful exercises themselves ought to be certain imitations of future occupations. Nor is it fitting to inhibit tears and wailings, for they take the place of exercise: they dilate and strengthen the veins and arteries and, as Aristotle teaches, assist growth, for they are γυμνάσια τοῖς σώμασιν, exercises for the bodies. There is no other reason why in the earliest years the offspring of peasants is rather strong and that of the rich weaker, than that the latter is deprived of natural exercise, while the former enjoys it abundantly, their busy mothers being turned to other things and neglecting their crying and wailing.

CHAPTER V

The Education of Boys Who Are Now More Grown, the Matters in Which It Is Occupied, and Morals

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. From the fifth to the seventh year Aristotle wishes them to be spectators of the arts which they are to embrace. You will understand this in such a way that they nevertheless retain the exercises of a more tender age and are moved by some care for serious things. The things to be learned pertain partly to the mind, partly to external things. To the mind belongs the study of the virtues and liberal arts; to external things, exercises in all the arts which they call βαναυσικάς, mechanical. The duties of all these are necessary to the state, and I must treat of them in this place.

§ 2. As for the studies of piety and the virtues, these were treated at length in the second and first books, for this is the greatest and proper good of the human being. All arts, however despised, serve virtue, and all are made freeborn and liberal by so honorable a servitude. For such is the force of virtue that it makes servitude a kingdom, since to serve God is to reign. Behold PAUL the Apostle, the chosen vessel, teacher of kings and of the world, descending from the third heaven and sewing tents from skins, so that he may offer the Gospel without expense, so that those hands may supply nourishment, lest he burden the churches, lest he give occasion to slanderers, as though he sought not the salvation of peoples but his own advantage.

But piety and virtue have been discussed before. The state must take especial care that the worship of God flourish. Formerly this was difficult, when the gilded Capitol glittered and demons poured forth oracles from every temple. Now a people flooding to the churches and cities poured forth into piety commend piety to all and in a certain manner extort it. Let a prince be ashamed, in the midst of the Christian world, to take little or no account of piety when he reads that the trophies of the cross have been erected throughout the Indies, that barbarous peoples, devourers of human flesh, having put aside ferocity, suffer martyrdom and are inserted into heaven; that Cambayans, Japanese, and Chinese come from the east, Ethiopians from the south, Brazilians, Mexicans, and Floridians from the west, and sit with Christ in the kingdom of God, while the sons of the kingdom, whose ancestral possession is religion, are cast into outer darkness. Matthew 8.

§ 3. The cause of so great an evil is the neglected education of the tender age. Frost burns tender trees and the first shoots of leaves; youth is easily corrupted unless raised up by sacred teaching. Let the infant be taught the most holy faith and morals from tender years. Let the tender infant pray at his father’s table, and let the trembling little girl babble the laborious words of the creed. Let the entire affection of the parents be joined to the half-sounding words of their children. Let the sweet utterances of divinity be inscribed upon those pure tablets, stained by no uncleanness and gleaming from the spiritual laver.

Let them recognize their Father in heaven; let them learn that this mortal life is a road to the heavenly life; let them understand that they are candidates for the eternal kingdom. Let them dread vices more than specters and demons, and let them not be ignorant that they contend daily for life. Jerome, whom I cited, explains these things, Epistle 7: “Let her immediately learn what other grandmother and what aunt she has; for what Emperor and what army the little recruit is being nourished; let her long for them and threaten you that she will depart to them. Let her very habit and dress teach her to whom she has been promised. Take care not to pierce her ears; do not paint a face consecrated to Christ with white lead and rouge; do not press her neck with gold and pearls; do not load her head with gems; do not redden her hair and thus augur something of the fires of Gehenna for her. Let her have other pearls, by selling which she will afterward purchase the pearl of greatest price. Praetextata, once a most noble woman, at the command of her husband Hymettius, who was the paternal uncle of the virgin Eustochium, altered her habit and adornment and dressed her neglected hair in a worldly manner, desiring to overcome both the virgin's resolution and the mother's desire. And behold, that same night she saw in a dream an angel come to her, threatening punishments in a terrible voice and thundering these words: 'Have you dared to prefer a husband's command to Christ? Have you dared to handle the head of God's virgin with your sacrilegious hands? They shall wither even now, so that, tortured, you may understand what you have done; and when the fifth month is ended, you shall be led to hell. But if you persevere in the crime, you shall at the same time be deprived of husband and children.' All things were fulfilled in order, and a swift death sealed the wretched woman's late repentance. Thus Christ avenges violators of his temple; thus he defends gems and precious ornaments."

§ 4. Let every foul thing in images and words be absent. Let anyone who can harm also be absent. The law of the Athenians' schools for boys was: "Let teachers not open the school before the sun has shone forth, nor close it before the sun has set; and while the boys are in school, let no one who has passed the age of boyhood be permitted to enter unless he is the teacher, the teacher's son, or the husband of his daughter.

But if anyone enters contrary to that prohibition, let him be punished with death. Let the gymnasiarchs also not permit any one of those who are older to be mingled in sitting with the boys in any manner; but if they admit him and do not drive him from the gymnasium, let the gymnasiarch be guilty of corrupting the freeborn."

Juvenal indeed rightly consults the chastity of others, but his books should also have been kept from an honorable threshold by the same law. Satire 14:

> Let nothing foul to say or see touch these thresholds,
>
> Within which there is a boy. Far hence, far hence be the girl
>
> Of pimps and the songs of the parasite who revels through the night.
>
> The greatest reverence is owed to a boy.

Because what Jerome writes to parents is not dear to very many parents, I write it to the state. Epistle 7. Eli the priest offended God on account of the vices of his children. A man who has luxurious, unsubmissive sons cannot be made a bishop. But conversely it is written of a woman that she will be saved through the generation of children if they continue in faith, charity, sanctification, and chastity. If a perfect age, under its own right, is imputed to parents, how much more a nursing and fragile age, which according to the Lord's sentence does not know right hand from left--that is, the difference between good and evil? If with solicitude you provide that your daughter not be struck by a viper, why do you not provide with the same care that she not be struck by the hammer of the whole earth, that she not drink from the golden cup of Babylon, that she not go out with Dinah and wish to see the daughters of a foreign region, that she not play with her feet or trail tunics? Poisons are not given unless wrapped in honey, and vices do not deceive except under the appearance and shadow of virtues. "And how," you will say, "are the sins of fathers not repaid to children, nor those of children to parents, but the soul that has sinned shall itself die?" This is said of those who can understand, concerning whom it is written in the Gospel: "He is of age; let him speak for himself." But he who is a little child and understands as a little child--until he comes to the years of wisdom and the letter Y of Pythagoras leads him to the fork--both his good and his evil are imputed to his parents.

§ 5. I am reluctant to depart from the best teacher of piety. He says in Epistle 2: "Let the female sex be joined to its own sex. Let her not know--indeed, let her fear--to play with boys. Let her know no immodest word; and if by chance amid the tumult of the household running about she hears something, let her not understand it. Let her regard her mother's nod in place of words and admonitions, and in place of command. Let her love her as a parent, be subject to her as mistress, fear her as teacher. But when the seventh year has overtaken the little girl, unformed and toothless, and she has begun to blush, to know what she should keep silent, and to hesitate about what she should say, let her learn the Psalter by memory; and until the years of puberty let her make the books of Solomon, the Gospels, the Apostles, and the Prophets the treasure of her heart. Let her not go forth too freely in public, nor always seek the crowds of the churches; let her have all her delights in her chamber. Let her never see young men, never men with curled hair. Let sweetnesses of voice that wound the soul through the ear and the wantonness of girls be repelled; the more freely these approach, the more difficult they are to avoid, and what they have learned they teach in secret, and by the talk of the crowd they violate Danaë though she is enclosed."

Remarkable is the perversity of human talent: it does not always obey an adviser; the harshness of some is equally obstinate against blandishments, reasons, and threats. No care of instructors and masters could correct Alexander's deed or Achilles' drunkenness. Seneca educated Nero in vain, for Nero, offended by his innocence, compelled him to die after falsely accusing him. Heliogabalus closed off the cares of all his masters by his wickedness. How much did David do that Absalom might not turn out wicked? How many excellent parents have obstinate sons? I confess it is so, and that a vicious and savage nature is restrained with great labor and becomes fiercer when it has passed into its own power and independent disposition. Yet education must not for that reason be withdrawn from a good or middling disposition; indeed, not even from the worst and most depraved. While there is life, there is hope of better fruit; and if not all, nevertheless some part of impiety is avoided.

§ 6. What remedy, therefore, is there for hard, malicious, and obstinate dispositions? The Brahmans of India applied a cruel medicine: after inspecting the offspring at two months, if they disapproved its disposition, they either exposed it in the forests or killed it openly. The Lacedaemonians displayed the same savagery in exposing children, for they sent them away to the chasm of Taygetus. It was plainly barbarous, cruel, and indeed foolish, for the course of a future life cannot be gathered from the inclinations of little children. Physiognomy is an investigator of affections, but it must be practiced only by the judgment of the most skilled, whose highest prudence must nevertheless consist in this: that from those traces and promptings of nature they do not pass judgment concerning the will. Natural human appetites which twist minds toward vices are strong in some, milder in others, and present in some degree in all. Education and habit, however, bring it about that serious affections and temptations are resisted; zeal, shame, and before all things divine grace correct corrupted nature.

And indeed many are brought by education not only to civil and tolerable morals but even to remarkable and holy ones. Pericles advanced through familiarity with the Clazomenian. By the instruction of Socrates, Alcibiades, although he did not put aside his enormous vices, nevertheless restrained them a little so that he might not harm his fatherland still more. Philostratus was brought to good conduct by one speech of Polemon. How great were the vices when the Apostles brought in the Gospel? Read Romans 1:28: "And as they did not approve of having God in their knowledge, God delivered them to a reprobate sense, so that they do the things that are not fitting: filled with all iniquity, malice, fornication, avarice, wickedness; full of envy, murder, contention, deceit, malignity; whisperers, detractors, hateful to God, insulting, proud, haughty, inventors of evils, disobedient to parents, foolish, disorderly, without affection, without covenant, without mercy."

And 1 Corinthians 6:9: "Do you not know that the unjust shall not possess the kingdom of God? Do not err: neither fornicators, nor servants of idols, nor adulterers, nor the effeminate, nor those who lie with males, nor thieves, nor the avaricious, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor robbers shall possess the kingdom of God. And such indeed you were; but you have been washed, but you have been sanctified, but you have been justified in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God."

Therefore let the state press on and not despair of the success of a work which God especially favors. And it was wisely said by Fabius, book 1, chapter 16: "Whatever can be done is shamefully despaired of." I do not listen to those voices: "The labor is futile when nature struggles against it." The human mind comprehends and accomplishes such remarkable and difficult things in the arts, learns so many languages, and through knowledge traverses the entire world. How, therefore, could it not learn good morals, toward which nature has an inclination? Virtue is the proper good of our mind, and nature is capable of its own good.

The work therefore requires the greatest force: let the prince take care that the morals of boys be formed. They easily learn good things; with the greatest difficulty they unlearn bad ones. Yet I confess that it is difficult to preserve right morals. It is easier to conquer provinces than to guard them after conquest. Victory comes by one assault; it must be preserved by manifold art. But in morals a return is difficult. An evil at its birth must be restrained, otherwise it grows to immense magnitude:

> Τὸ πολυχρόνιον ἦθος ἀμήχανον μεταθέσθαι.

A habit of long duration is most difficult to remove. What has become inveterate is more easily dissolved than restored.

> Extinguish the flame at its birth,
>
> Lest late remedies return after the dangers have grown.

Horse-breakers correct obstinacy, rearing, winking, and jolting in young horses; and will you neglect the vices of youth? Especially when the single vice of a single person can afflict the state with great injury? In sick bodies physicians leave nothing that may harm. You must cure diseases of minds.

CHAPTER VI

Upright and Learned Masters Must Be Placed over Youth

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. In his seventh year the boy shall be led to a master; for by then he will attend to serious things, yet things suited to his age. For twenty-one months he has heard and formed an image of the words of his mother and nurses; then his sound broke forth into words. Meanwhile, up to his seventh year, it will have been useful for him to hear not only the vernacular language but Latin also, which perhaps he will learn in large part through habituation. I wonder why magnates and princes, if they do not wish within the first seven years to burden their children's talents with the care of learning, do not assign some attendants who always speak Latin, question one another, and express the same things now in German and now in Latin; who sometimes consult the little child and ask from him things which it is established that he knows, so that by praise they may arouse him to learn. In former times they certainly learned the Latin language without grammar.

But now we must treat of preceptors and masters, to whom Aristotle, Plutarch, and others judge boys should be brought in their seventh year. So too the Golden Bull of Charles IV, title 26: "Since the Highness of the Holy Roman Empire possesses the laws and moderates the governments of diverse nations distinguished in customs, life, and idiom, it is fitting--and is judged expedient by the opinion of all wise men--that the Prince Electors, the columns and sides of that Empire, be instructed in the differences of diverse idioms and languages, so that they may understand more persons and be understood by more, since they assist the Imperial Highness in relieving the needs of very many and have been established to share its solicitude. We therefore decree that the sons, heirs, and successors of the illustrious Princes--namely, the King of Bohemia, the Count Palatine, the Duke of Saxony, and the Margrave of Brandenburg, Electors--since they may presumably know the German idiom naturally implanted in them and have learned it from infancy, shall, beginning with the seventh year of their age, be instructed in the German, Italian, and Slavic languages, so that by the fourteenth year of their age they may be learned in such things according to the grace given them by God. For this is held not only useful but, for the reasons stated above, supremely necessary, because those languages have generally been customarily employed for the use and advantage of the Holy Empire, and in them the weighty affairs of that Empire are debated.

"We have established that the following manner of advancement should be observed in the foregoing matters: it shall be left to the choice of the parents whether they send their sons, if they have any, or those near of kin whom they believe likely to succeed them in the principalities, to places in which they can be instructed in languages of this kind; or whether in their own homes they associate with them pedagogues, instructors, and boy companions skilled in these languages, by whose conversation and teaching alike they may be instructed in those languages."

§ 2. Therefore let the first care of the state be that suitable masters and preceptors be chosen not only to educate the sons of princes and magnates, but also to instruct the offspring of private persons. Nor do I speak only of literary studies, but of every kind of art. For although the danger is not equal everywhere, it is nevertheless great if one errs here. I judge that state most fortunate to which good preceptors have fallen. For it is far more excellent to be well educated than to be fortunately born. The dispositions of adolescents generally pass over into the morals of their masters. It is of great importance to whose fidelity, skill, and diligence a man entrusts himself who seeks the Indies through the vast windings of the ocean. Nor is it enough that the ship be strong and furnished with provisions and armaments; the shipmaster must also not be ignorant of the region and its dangers. Much greater care at home is necessary for all, lest the turnings of an improvident age strike against their limits.

I therefore take "masters" generically, whether they are so called from admonishing, or from showing, or rather because they owe care to those over whom they preside. The jurists call the preceptors of all disciplines masters. Law 57, On the Signification of Words, "Those to Whom the Chief." Thus there are masters of societies, colleges, districts, augurs, offices, sacred bureaus, the people, the horsemen, and morals. We speak of masters of arts and morals, for they ought to be teachers of learning and virtues. Great was the dignity of the censors and their jurisdiction without appeal: to assess property, brand a citizen with ignominy, expel him from the senate, take away his horse, and preside over discipline. This last duty especially belongs to masters of the liberal arts, except that they preside only over youth; in the meantime they equip Quirites so that they may be able to endure the censorship.

§ 3. Therefore the magistracy must first of all provide suitable professors of the sciences and liberal arts. Reason teaches that this is the duty of the magistracy itself. For since youth is the seed-bed of the state, since from them in a few years will come citizens, senators, and princes, care must be applied lest, when they are corrupted, the whole state suffer harm. Then examples teach this same thing. Teachers of the law were appointed by Moses, Aaron, Jehoshaphat, and others. There was always greater care in the Church of Christ for the appointment of masters. For princes and the Supreme Pontiff, as though the head of the whole of religion, established schools. Charlemagne, book 2 of the Capitularies, chapter 5: "Let schools for instructing or teaching sons and ministers, just as you promised us at Attigny in time past and as we enjoined upon you, not be neglected by you, but be established in suitable places where this has not yet been completed, for the utility and advancement of many."

And lest the cunning of certain men impose upon princes or the people, the Council of Trent, session 5, chapter 1, On Reform, wished bishops to be censors and approvers of teachers. "In public academies also," it says, "where so honorable a lectureship, and one most necessary of all others, namely theology, has not hitherto been established, let it be established by the piety and charity of the most religious princes and states, for the defense and increase of the Catholic faith and the preservation and propagation of sound doctrine; and where it has been established but is neglected, let it be restored.

"And lest impiety be disseminated under the appearance of piety, the same holy Synod decreed that no one should be admitted to the office of such a lectureship, either publicly or privately, unless he had first been examined and approved by the bishop of the place concerning his life, morals, and knowledge; this, however, is not to be understood of lecturers in cloisters."

Thus the Ecumenical Synod made this matter of such importance that it entrusted to bishops the care of examining professors. For the safety of the city depends altogether upon the education of youth.

§ 4. The Elamites, or ancient Persians, were not ignorant of this; and so they placed the princes themselves over youth. Xenophon, book 1 of the Education of Cyrus, narrates it thus: "The first care under these laws seems to take its beginning from the public good. For they do not begin as very many other cities do, which, permitting parents to educate their sons according to their pleasure and those more advanced in age to lead their lives according to their judgment, command them not to steal, not to plunder, not to enter another's house by force, not to strike anyone unjustly, not to commit adultery, not to refuse the prince's command, and the rest of that kind in like manner. And if anyone transgresses any of these things, they have established a punishment against him. But the laws of the Persians, anticipating such acts, take the greatest care that citizens not be of such a kind at the outset as to be seized by desire for either wickedness or baseness. They take care of this in the following manner.

"They have a marketplace which is called free, where both the royal and the other palaces are. Merchandise, petty traders, their cries, and their follies are removed from here to another place, lest the crowd of these be mingled with the ordered morals of those who have received education. The marketplace around the palaces is divided into four parts, one of which is for boys, the second for youths, the third for men who are already of mature age, and the fourth for those who are discharged from service. By law each of these groups is present in its own place: the boys as soon as day has dawned, and mature men likewise; but the elders when leisure permits each one, except on appointed days, on which they must be present. The youths also sleep in the palaces with their gymnastic arms, except married men, who are not even required to do so unless they have previously been commanded to be present; yet neither is it regarded as honorable to be absent too often.

"Twelve princes preside over each of these divisions, for the Persians are divided into twelve tribes. Those preside over the boys who, chosen from the elders, appear likely to render them as excellent as possible. Over the youths preside those chosen from the mature men who are thought likely to make them as excellent as possible. Over the mature men themselves are appointed those by whose education they are thought most likely to perform what has been established and commanded by the highest magistrate. Presidents of the elders also are chosen, who preside so that these too may discharge their duty. We shall relate what each age is commanded to do, so that it may become clearer whether they apply diligence that the citizens may be as excellent as possible. The boys, therefore, coming regularly to the schools, devote their labor to learning justice; and they say that they study this matter just as among us those who go to learn letters. Their masters consume a great part of the day in judging their disputes. For the boys too, just like men, have accusations among themselves concerning theft, plunder, violence, fraud, reviling, and other crimes, as is proper."

§ 5. They were called masters of justice, to whose houses anyone was free to send his children. The system among the Lacedaemonians was not dissimilar, but they meditated upon almost one thing alone: namely, that they should make them warlike. Now that the world has been cultivated, masters of all the arts must be maintained. What sort of masters, then, must be appointed? I answer: learned and upright. Under learning I include not only knowledge but also skill in teaching and interpreting. Therefore let a teacher of the liberal arts be a learned, skillful, eloquent man, an artisan of disputation, of honorable life, sober, rather severe, courteous, a hater of vices and lover of another's salvation, and finally one who willingly uses another's counsel.

The Theodosian and Valentinian laws require these things in those whom the assemblies dignify, Code 12, title 15: "If grammarians, both Greek and Latin, sophists, and jurists practicing their profession in this royal city and numbered among those appointed have shown that there is in them a praiseworthy life of upright morals; if they have made manifest that they possess skill in teaching, eloquence in speaking, subtlety in interpreting, and abundance in disputing; and if, in the judgment of the most august assembly, they have been deemed worthy--when by continuous observance and the diligent labor of teaching they have reached twenty years--it has been resolved that they be honored and numbered among those who possess the rank of vicar."

§ 6. Therefore, first, it requires that they demonstrate in themselves a praiseworthy life of upright morals. This was most difficult in former times. Antoninus selected fourteen teachers from the entire Roman world for his Commodus; from these he soon removed five at the beginning, offended by their levity of morals. He retained nine, yet not without grief to himself. But if we look upon the noble preceptors of kings, it will scarcely be possible to see one who was not most wicked. Pytharchus is said to have been Cyrus's master, from whom he imbibed ferocity. I omit the crimes of Heraclitus, Menander, Xenocrates, Aristotle, Chilon, Palaemon, and others who were masters of great princes, as also those of others whose wicked and lustful life Laertius describes for us. Seneca confesses that philosophers did not live according to virtue, but spoke about it.

Plutarch himself hesitates to condemn the foulest crimes when he considers Socrates, Plato, Xenophon, Aeschines, Cebes, and that whole chorus of those men, οἳ τοὺς ἄρρενας ἐδοκίμασαν ἔρωτας καὶ τὰ μειράκια προήγαγον ἐπί τε παιδείαν καὶ δημαγωγίαν καὶ τὴν ἀρετὴν τῶν τρόπων--"who approved loves between males and led the young onward to education, public leadership, and virtue of character." Thus they gave authority to the gravest and most shameful sins. But let us look at later times. The school of Plotinus flourished in Christian times and had many very acute and very skillful men as disciples. But some of them were depraved by curiosity concerning the magic arts. Augustine, Epistle 56. Plotinus himself and Olympius himself were devoted to magic, as is clear from Porphyry, who recounts their deeds and was himself a sorcerer. If we examine most cases, histories will teach that nearly all the philosophers--that is, the teachers of the ancient world--were magicians.

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 7. I too judge that, when humane letters began to flourish again in Italy, France, and Germany in the preceding age, an immense ruin of morals threatened the Christian world. For when men had devoted themselves wholly to letters, antiquity, the poets, and the knowledge of virtues and vices, they slipped into grave crimes--to such a degree that they were swept even into atheism and deeds of a reprobate mind.

Youth saw Dolet, Politian, and the other monsters; then followed Beza and that whole death-bearing battle line, who, by lust, shattered the minds of adolescents already weakened and drove them into heresies. They had a reputation for learning and eloquence, but made themselves infamous through vices. For they lectured upon the ancient authors as they stood, impure, and corrupted youth with dishonorable little verses.

Therefore, as Plutarch rightly admonishes, masters must be sought for children whose life is both blameless and whose morals are not liable to just reproach, and who possess skill by no means ordinary. For upright education is the fountain and root of virtue and of honorable life. And just as farmers place props beside young plants, so upright masters support adolescents with exact precepts and admonitions, so that right morals may spring from them. But now one may even spit in contempt of certain parents who, before they have made any trial of a future master, deceived sometimes by ignorance or even by inexperience, entrust their sons to obscure persons, and indeed even to men of evil repute.

Theodosius acted excellently when he gave Arsenius as preceptor to his sons. He said that, if the sons were to show themselves such as to conform their morals and life to discipline and the laws of God, he would readily entrust the empire to their hands, adapted to the advantage and utility of citizens and subjects; but if otherwise, he said that it would be more advantageous for them to pass their lives as private men than to rule without learning and with danger.

In my judgment, however, those men therefore fail in educating youth because they do not keep before their eyes the end for which the young were to be educated: the salvation of their disciples and, arising from that salvation, the glory of GOD.

§ 8. The SOCIETY OF JESUS has, by its institute, undertaken the care of schools and of youth with great endeavor and, as the world bears witness, with immense fruit. God assists its sincere endeavor, because it undertakes so difficult a province for the glory of God alone.

Its Constitutions, part 4, chapter 12, show the endeavor: “Since the end of the Society and of its studies is to assist our neighbors toward the knowledge and love of God and the salvation of their souls, and since the faculty of Theology is the more proper means to that end, the Society’s universities will principally devote themselves to it; and through thoroughly suitable preceptors they will diligently treat those matters which pertain to scholastic doctrine and Sacred Scripture, and also positive theology insofar as it accords with this end fixed before us--without, however, touching that part of the canons which serves the contentious forum. And because both the doctrine of Theology and its use require--especially in these times--a knowledge of humane letters and of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, suitable professors of these also, and indeed in a proper number, shall be appointed. Moreover, teachers could be appointed for other languages, such as Chaldaic, Arabic, and Indian, where they might appear necessary or useful for the said end, account being taken of the different regions and of the reasons which prompt their teaching.

“Likewise, since the Arts or natural Sciences dispose talents for Theology, serve the perfect knowledge and use of it, and of themselves assist toward the same end, let them be treated with proper diligence and through learned preceptors, sincerely seeking in all things the honor and glory of God.

"The study of Medicine and Laws, as more remote from our Institute, shall either not be treated in the Society's universities, or at least the Society itself will not undertake this burden by itself."

The same is contained in rule 1 of the Provincial concerning the plan of studies, and in the first rule of the Rector: "Since the Society embraces colleges and universities for this reason, that in them our members may conveniently be instructed both in learning and in the other things which contribute to assisting souls, and may communicate to their neighbors what they themselves have learned, after the care for religious and solid virtues, which must be principal, let him devote himself especially to this: that, with God's help, the Society may attain that end which it proposed to itself in admitting schools."

§ 9. Finally, rule 1 of all the preceptors: "Let the preceptor's particular intention be directed, both in the lectures when occasion offers itself and outside them, toward moving his pupils to the service and love of God and to the virtues by which they ought to please him, and toward having them refer all their studies to this end."

It is not my task to prove at greater length whether it has attained this end. This I know: in every place very many men of distinguished piety have flourished, and even now flourish, in the civil order, the Church, and monasteries, who owe their advancement in virtue and learning to the Society. Nor must we listen to those whom either ignorance of our affairs or a hostile disposition sweeps, without consideration, into accusation of useful labors. We have testimony from the opposing camp. The ministers of sects of every kind hate no class of men more bitterly than those who live in the Society, because they bear with the greatest indignation that through them youth--and consequently the state--is instructed and confirmed in the true religion.

When I contemplate the course of the world and compare old things with new, I judge the Society of Jesus to be one of the greatest benefits which God has conferred in this time upon a world growing old and raving. Let no one maliciously interpret my words: with gratitude I recount the benefits of God; I ascribe the whole to him. I speak of the good of adolescents. For if that method of teaching letters which men of a wanton page and a still more wanton mind had followed had persevered in the Christian world, they would long ago have corrupted youth. Whatever was scurrilous in Plautus, slippery in Terence, obscene in Martial, tender in Ovid, broken in Tibullus, fiery in Propertius--the eloquent masters of vices instilled it into innocent minds, even before their years and before they had any perception of wickedness. So far had the darkness of errors depressed the wretches even below the vices of the gentiles, although even Aristotle, book 7, chapter 17 of the Politics, wishes every obscene word to be far from the ears of boys, and all images and painted tablets which teach love to be removed.

But now in the schools of our Society such regard is paid to purity that not even a single verse is expounded from any author if it carries poison into the mind; and there is no one who judges the unhappiness of Latin eloquence to be so great that it can be taught only through lusts. Saint Augustine relates that he learned useful words, but words which could be spoken about matters that were not vain.

How pernicious that custom is, he explains thus in book 1 of the Confessions, chapter 16: "But woe to you, river of human custom! Who will resist you? How long will it be before you are dried up? How long will you roll the children of Eve into the great and fearsome sea, which scarcely those who have climbed upon the wood cross? Did I not read both of Jupiter thundering and of Jupiter committing adultery? And certainly he could not do both; but it was contrived so that real adultery would possess authority for imitation, with false thunder acting as its pander. But which of the cloaked masters hears with sober ear a man from the same dust crying out and saying, 'Homer fabricated these things and transferred human things to the gods; I would rather that he had transferred divine things to us'? But it is more truly said that he indeed fabricated these things, but by attributing divine status to wicked men, so that crimes might not be thought crimes, and so that whoever committed them might appear to imitate not ruined men but heavenly gods.

"And yet, O infernal river, the sons of men are cast into you with fees so that they may learn these things; and a great affair is conducted when this is conducted publicly in the forum, in the sight of laws decreeing salaries in addition to fees. And you strike your rocks and resound, saying: 'From here words are learned; from here eloquence, most necessary for persuading in affairs and explaining thoughts, is acquired.' As though, indeed, we could not know the words golden shower, lap, deceit, and temples of heaven, and the other words written in that passage, unless Terence introduced a wicked young man who sets Jupiter before himself as an example of rape while looking upon a certain tablet painted on a wall, where there was a picture of Jupiter and by what means they say he sent a golden shower into Danaë's lap, making a deceit for a woman. And see how he arouses himself to lust as though by heavenly instruction: 'But what god?' he says. 'He who shakes the temples of heaven with his supreme thunder. Should I, a little man, not do it? Indeed, I did it, and gladly.' Not at all are those words more conveniently learned through this baseness; rather, through those words that baseness is more confidently perpetrated. I do not accuse the words, as though they were choice and precious vessels, but the wine of error which was offered to us in them by drunken teachers; and unless we drank, we were beaten, nor was it permitted to appeal to any sober judge. And yet, my God, in whose sight my recollection is now secure, I gladly learned these things and delighted in them, wretched as I was; and on this account I was called a boy of good promise."

§ 10. Behold, Augustine: in our time, happier than your years, the Society has resisted that river. God has dried up the river through a humble and very small religious order--not through racks, long exiles, and swords avenging chastity, but through unarmed professors of grammar whom the world holds in contempt. It no longer rolls the children of Eve into the great and fearsome sea. Eloquence may now be chaste; the good arts are no longer handmaids of pimps. In three hundred colleges and three thousand classes, instruction is publicly handed down chastely by the Society, and by many who, in imitation of the Society, preserve the virgin Muses chastely and modestly, and by others who, in imitation of the Society, hand down eloquence without mention of crimes.

In former times there were not lacking those who accused that most wise care of the Society; but these same men, with unabashed brow, could watch the Floralia--far worse than that man who departed from the theater amid the applause of a most vicious people, a people nevertheless applauding virtue. For how much difference is there whether an infamous actor sings the play, or the counterfeit majesty of a barbarous master not only illustrates those obscenities with commentary and inculcates them by repetition, but also compels them to be learned by abuse and blows? Cicero saw this, and Plato before him. Cicero indeed does not conceal so great evils in Tusculan Disputations 3: "But do you see what evil the poets bring? They introduce the bravest men lamenting; they soften our minds; then they are so sweet that they are not only read but even learned by heart. Thus when poets too are added to bad domestic discipline and a life passed in shade and luxury, they destroy all the sinews of virtue. Rightly, therefore, are they led out of that city which Plato fashioned when he sought the best morals and the best condition of the state. But we, learned of course by Greece, read and learned these things from boyhood; this we regard as liberal education and learning."

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 11. Therefore let the state place over youth those governors whose mind, tongue, and style are as far removed as possible from baseness. For this reason I would altogether advise that so great a matter be entrusted to religious and consecrated men. For since they have vowed chastity to God, and since they have recognized that it is among the parts of their office both to consult their own salvation and to make others good, they will avoid not only buffoonery and obscenity of words, but also every appearance of evil. Thus the sons of princes are also generally entrusted for education to bishops, or else to some grave prelate of proven virtue. To this zeal for such great purity I also attribute the fruit which the Society receives from its schools. Certainly it so instructs its preceptors that they display honorable conduct by example and words. Rule 28 in the Summary thus commands: "The things which pertain to the vow of chastity require no interpretation, since it is established how perfectly it must be observed: namely, by striving to imitate angelic purity and the cleanness of our body and mind."

And rule 29: “Let all take the most diligent care to guard the gates of their senses--especially the eyes, ears, and tongue--from every disorder; to preserve themselves in peace and true humility within; and to exhibit that humility in silence when silence must be observed, but, when one must speak, in circumspection and the edification of words, and in modesty of countenance and maturity of gait and of all movements, without any sign of impatience or pride; procuring and desiring in all things to yield the preferable parts to others; regarding all in their minds as superior to themselves; and outwardly displaying with simplicity and religious moderation the honor and reverence which the status of each requires. And let this be done so that, mutually considering one another, they may grow in devotion and praise God our Lord, whom each should endeavor to recognize in another as in his image.”

§ 12. And certainly the Society urges the zeal and love of chastity in all things no less energetically than it prescribes it. I have lived in it now for twenty-four years and have heard no foul speech in any college. But if anyone should wish to sprinkle a stain upon so precious and shining a veil, it punishes him gravely and cuts him away from its body. Indeed, with regard to its conscience and vowed chastity, it punishes even those light excesses in the world concerning which people are not usually even challenged, so that by removal it may consult more rightly the security of its own members, the salvation of their neighbors, and its reputation.

If, therefore, the safety of the state is dear; if Plato, book 6 of the Laws, and Aristotle, book 7, chapter 6 of the Politics, rightly require at least twenty-five years in men for marriage and twenty in virgins, and yet lust--against which the struggle is difficult--occupies the inward parts much more quickly like poison, how great is the madness of teaching by the public authority of a profession those things by which a growing age, to which destructive Venus is present, is inflamed? Woe to the world because of scandals! Adolescents go toward vice by nature; the preceptors, who ought to resist with every weight and endeavor, lead them down. An improvident age rushes by its own weight, and the master pushes it. They act so that it may not grow up without vice. The mind of the young is corrupted through lusts, and the lecture of a lascivious master assists it; nor does he merely increase the evil:

> As a flame is accustomed to grow when a pyre is added, but from a master of morals he becomes a shameful teacher of adultery:

> It becomes an art when crime is learned from the earliest years.

And since this kind of struggle requires flight rather than assault, as Saint Cyprian most excellently admonishes, filthy books drive death-bearing stings into those who flee and harm cities no less than brothels. I shall close with the judgment of Antonio de Guevara, book 2 of the Dial of Princes, chapter 39: “The masters of princes must be free of every mark of wantonness. For adolescents, since by both the weakness of their age and the depravity of nature they are inclined toward lust, have neither sufficient virtue to be chaste nor prudence to be cautious and not permit themselves to be deceived. Therefore it is necessary that their masters be most holy. For a disciple will never be chaste when he sees that his master is vicious.”

Not only the masters of princes, but the masters of all. For in every class of persons what Valerius says, book 2, chapter 1, is true: “The passage from virtue to luxury is easier than that from luxury to virtue.” In every body there is a spark which, unless it is suppressed, will mingle fires. Yet it is too little that a master be of good reputation if he expounds books branded with disgrace and incapable of bearing witness. No one will believe him chaste who so teaches things that have been eloquently expressed that the boys at the same time learn things that are dishonorable. He acts wickedly who stains the purple-edged toga of a modest age with Sotadean verses and makes it eloquent at the cost of modesty. Let what Ambrose teaches us on Psalm 118 remain stored high in the mind: “Life must be sought before learning; for a good life without learning possesses grace, but learning without life does not possess integrity.” Let that salutary law of chastity remain in the Society’s dwellings and schools, a standard of innocence and a cause of great advancement: that no one not only explain but even possess obscene books; indeed, that he knock from the hands of disciples books whose handling can corrupt freeborn minds. In former times those who inscribed their own sins upon the gods did nothing other than remove from men the shame of sinning, if they believed that the gods were such. Thus the Ion of Euripides accuses Apollo's lusts in order to excuse human beings:

> Οὐκ ἔτ' ἀνθρώπους κακῶς
>
> Λέγειν δίκαιον, εἰ τὰ τῶν θεῶν κακὰ
>
> Μιμούμεθ', ἀλλὰ τοὺς διδάσκοντας τάδε.

One ought no longer to speak ill of human beings if we imitate the evils of the gods, but rather of those who teach such things.

The madness of preceptors who nourish the vices of adolescence is manifest. For how will a severe father rebuke a son who recounts what a preceptor--more learned, wiser, and more chaste than his father--has dictated from the tripod? What mother will endure her little son singing on the master's authority things she has never heard? Therefore schools, unless administered with the greatest diligence, will carry into households the vices from which virtue was being sought. Against all the father's admonitions will be set the authority of scholastic custom, the academy, and the masters, just as in former times crimes were defended among the gentiles by the deeds of the gods. Hence too, says Seneca in On the Shortness of Life, chapter 16, comes "the madness of poets nourishing human errors with fables, in whose eyes Jupiter, enticed by the pleasure of intercourse, doubled the night. What else is it to set vices ablaze than to inscribe the gods as their authors and to give the disease an excused license through the example of divinity?"

The disciples will imitate and surpass the preceptor, for vices never stop where they began.

§ 13. Learning necessary for teaching knowledge must therefore be joined to these morals. This matter, indeed, requires no proof. To wish to teach another what you do not know is madness. Learned parents will instruct their sons excellently in private, but they flee this task, either distracted by occupations or from weariness with the laborious charge. The Chaldaeans and Egyptians instructed their own at home, Diodorus Siculus, book 2, chapter 8, and book 1, chapter 6. Hence Agesicles the Spartan also said: "I wish to be the disciple of those whose son I am." Let masters be learned and possess a reputation for learning. The road to erudition is difficult even for the most talented, even for the most industrious, even for those most free from the care of other matters. Many lay down their lives while they are midway in the attempt; and not a few, standing at the foot of the mountain, become feeble after they have advanced a little. By far the greatest part consists of those who console themselves with a most pleasant opinion and enjoy the greatest peace as though they were learned.

Great learning is a great praise if it serves virtue and salvation, for immense glory is promised to them: "But those who have been learned shall shine like the brightness of the firmament; and those who instruct many unto justice, like stars unto perpetual eternities." The Seventy Interpreters render συνιέντες, "those who understand"; for the Hebrew מיליכשמ, maskilim, signifies teachers themselves, although it also signifies those who understand, Jeremiah 10:21, Psalm 64:10, 1 Kings 18:14, Daniel 4. But "those who instruct unto justice," or מיברה יקידצמ, matsdiqe rabbim: "those who justify many shall shine like the stars." I do not doubt that our times--and in them the knowledge of very many bishops, priests, jurists, and philosophers--are designated by the words that follow: "But you, Daniel, close the words and seal the book until the appointed time; very many shall pass through it, and knowledge shall be manifold." Before the appointed time, and with the writings sealed, knowledge will be multiplied; for against the sloth, frauds, and sophisms of many, manifold knowledge will be given--not from a variety of opinions, but from the unity of the divine Spirit. Today in the Catholic Church, amid so many hundreds of thousands of learned men, there is great concord and varied knowledge, so that in this part also God renders his Church unconquered.

§ 14. Our Society has embraced this part also with remarkable care. I shall speak in its proper place about the method which it uses. Now I would dare affirm this also: that by divine goodness as much has been bestowed upon it in this part as it had never hoped. Thus in every kind of knowledge, but especially in Philosophy and Theology, it has many men comparable to any of the most learned. Nor do the heretics deny these things; rather, they calumniate us, and, being envious, detract from us in such a way that they nevertheless confess it. For toward what end do the accusations of certain persons tend, who say that if the Society plants its foot in their territory or is permitted to teach publicly, the crown of disciples--which is the glory of a master--will turn toward the Society? A steady abundance of hearers is proof of a good orator. The workshops and libraries will speak about the books published by fathers of the Society; entire armies bear witness throughout Europe and India concerning the learning of its disciples.

Now I appeal to the conscience of those who are older. Let them traverse in mind or with their eyes those places in which studies now flourish most richly. They will understand that in former times, in those same places, young men of mature age struggled amid grammatical dust over the things in which little adolescents or boys are now taught Rhetoric and Philosophy. It is a sign of remarkable advancement to have rapidly traversed the cycle of the sciences. He is a diligent master whose disciples advance beyond their age. I remember an old man saying, when at Mainz he saw a distinguished cohort of adolescents marked with the doctorate of arts and philosophy, the cheeks of most of whom age had not yet marked with their first down:

“The world is turning around. In my time we handled boyish studies when we were bearded; now boys are skilled in the sciences of men.”

§ 15. Uprightness and learning alone, however, are not sufficient for forming youth; there is need of a method and of skill in teaching. Those who, strong in talent, labor, and resources, strive after erudition abuse the good talents of adolescents and envelop them in great darkness unless they hand down the sciences in a fixed order and by an exact method. Although you run with great strength and rapid effort, unless you keep to the right road you will reach the goal late. Nothing must be learned with such art as the arts themselves. Not only do the liberal arts, such as painting, sculpture, and typography, possess their own shortcuts, but the ruder arts do so as well. For craftsmen and all artisans excel in almost this one thing: that with the most skillful speed they accomplish things which are achieved by the ignorant with great expense and long, troublesome labor.

Our Society, therefore, long and deeply labored upon that method. When some years earlier it had proposed the method that appeared best, after a number of years it recalled it to the anvil, having heard the judgments of the individual provinces, and only then perfected it, so that I strongly doubt whether anything more perfect exists in that kind; I am certain that I myself have never seen anything more perfect. Since our professors use this standard, the result cannot fail to be the best. I recently replied on this matter to Louis the Jurist, in my little book On the Secrets of the Society, at the place where he disputed about our cunning. First, the outcome of our affairs is generally fortunate. The one and only cause of it is the grace of God, who, since he wished us to be consecrated to himself for these labors, also bestowed for the safety of his Church and for the consolation of the Society the result which anyone grateful to God will acknowledge. From the same grace remarkable means flow forth: first, the things which I have said--prayer, meditation, and others; then the fact that no one in any office, even the least which he conducts, rests upon his own prudence or judgment, but executes his duty according to the rules. But the rules were made by most prudent and experienced men, and now have been examined, approved, corrected, augmented, and explained by long use. It is not permitted to depart from them; and whatever is done according to their standard, although it sometimes does not obtain the outcome, has nevertheless been done orderly and wisely.

I shall make the matter clear by an example. Some prudent and learned man governs and instructs the youth entrusted to him; he expounds the prescribed lectures and exacts the assigned task. But because he uses only his own judgment, he must often err in many things; and no one who trusts his own judgment thinks and does all things so prudently that another person would not do many things more prudently in the same field. He therefore brings the prudence of one man into the academy. But a professor of the Society uses both his own prudence and talent and, relying upon the aid of all the rules and instructions, undertakes his charge. For he carries with him into the school everything which has been handed down by many most learned men of different nations, and he polishes youth according to most excellent institutes.

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 16. The fourth thing which I require in all professors, great and small, is that they use another's counsel in governing and teaching youth. For the counsels and talents of many possess greater power. It belongs to a prudent man not to trust too greatly in his own prudence. It is difficult for grave and experienced men to understand that they do not know what they do not know; for the habit of φιλαυτία, self-love, leads them to such misery that they think even their own vices and their errors in teaching ought to be approved. And just as they are not understood by adolescents, or are tolerated once understood, so too they judge it fitting that these things be overlooked by others.

There are certain statutes of academies which, through the fault of men and times, have produced great abuses. Nevertheless, some defend them--not as though they are not done badly, but because they were done in former times, as though a custom of error were not the worse the longer it endures. I shall bring forward one example from many. Consider deposition, which many defend tooth and nail. What utility is there in this? Boys are harassed, mocked, beaten, hear buffooneries, and are injured; and in Germany, where that histrionic farce alone is retained, the comedy passes over into revelry. So many have been wounded, and many even killed by those savage games. They judge it right to remove these things; but, clinging to statutes, they prefer to retain evils rather than abandon antiquities. It is altogether difficult to give counsel to a wise man; but the wiser each man is, the more keenly he sees that he needs another's opinion and counsel. If you found those things in another academy, you would not tolerate them; in your own, you praise them.

They think a man is tested by that rite. Thus Middendorp, On Academies, chapter 5, number 4, and Heinrich von Montagu, The Devil's Farce, chapter 8. Some refer to this the labors and insults by which those who wished to be initiated into the mysteries of Mithras were harassed; they were vexed in many ways, as the Suda bears witness. But others may judge it excusable for Christian academies to take examples from the worship of a most shameful idol and from ceremonies by which men were consecrated to enormous crimes; I certainly do not judge it praiseworthy. Indeed, that stain now clings to few academies.

Therefore I judge that no one should be admitted to teach in any faculty who does not promise that he will accept with a willing mind the investigations and visitations of his superiors. Let the prince require this altogether and maintain it against all. Let there be frequent inspection, which neither displays hope of impunity nor leaves room for sins. Let there be an exacting overseer of labors and a remunerator of work. What farmer entrusts a matter to an agricultural laborer or vine-dresser in such a way that he does not frequently inspect him digging, trenching, and pruning? And shall the state not care whether youth is rightly educated? He who fears witnesses and examination comes little short of doing badly. This one thing has caused the most beautiful and flourishing academies to perish: gradually they began to teach seldom, then badly, and finally nothing at all, content with their stipends; and while the magistrate was occupied with other things, they indulged one another and their leisure.

It has been most prudently provided that this should never happen to the Society's academies. First, as I said, all use that common method of teaching; and not only in this manner, but also constantly, because a diligent account of their industry is exacted. The Rector's rule 3: "Let him so distribute and regulate his other business that he may foster and enlarge all literary exercises. Let him visit the schools from time to time, even the lower ones; let him frequently attend the disputations of theologians and philosophers, both private and public; and let him observe whether, and for what causes, the fruit of this exercise is impeded."

A Prefect is joined to the Rector, whose duty is to visit all things very frequently, according to rule 2 of the Provincial: "Therefore let him not only commend this very greatly to the Rector in the Lord, but also associate with him a Prefect of Studies, or Chancellor, a man excellently versed in letters, who possesses both good zeal and judgment for the matters to be committed to him. His office shall be to serve as the Rector's general instrument for arranging studies well. All professors and scholastics--both those in the same college and any who perhaps live in seminaries for boarders and alumni--as well as the Prefects of Studies themselves in the seminaries, shall obey him with the humility that is fitting in matters pertaining to studies.

"3. But if, because of the size of the academy and the variety of its schools, it does not appear that the needs of all the schools have been sufficiently provided for through one Prefect of Studies, let him appoint another, who, according to the prescription of the General Prefect, shall govern the lower studies. Indeed, if the matter so requires, let a third be added, who shall preside over the school hall."

Indeed, a grave law is proposed for observance even to the Prefect of Higher Studies, lest there be departure from the established method. His rule 3 thus states: "Let him change nothing of those things contained in the Order of Studies, nor grant dispensation; but where there is need, let him refer the matter to the Superior."

And rule 4: "Let him have the book concerning the plan of studies at hand, and let him diligently take care that the rules be observed by all authors and professors; above all, those which prescribe the doctrine of Saint Thomas for theologians and the selection of opinions for philosophers. Let him be especially vigilant in this when conclusions are to be defended, and most especially when they are to be printed."

And rule 27: "Let him prescribe through the masters, for our members, alumni, and externs alike, not only the method of studying, reviewing, and disputing, but let him also so distribute all their time that they may use well the hours of private study."

And rule 17: "Let him sometimes hear the preceptors, at least once a month; from time to time let him also read the notes taken down by the disciples. If either he himself observes anything worthy of correction or hears it from others, when he has ascertained it with certainty, let him admonish the preceptor as kindly and courteously as possible; and if necessary, let him refer the entire matter to the Rector."

The same system is prescribed for the Prefect of Lower Studies. His rule 2: "In matters which pertain to the discipline of morals in our schools, let him consult the Rector alone; but in matters which pertain to studies, the General Prefect of Studies. Let him not depart from their prescription; let him abolish no custom or received practice, nor introduce a new one."

And rule 3: "Let him take care that whatever will be declaimed publicly, at home or abroad, by the students of Rhetoric and the lower faculties is delivered to this same Prefect for examination. But let the emblems and poems which are posted publicly on certain very celebrated days be read in their entirety by two persons designated by the Rector, and let the best be selected."

And rule 4: "Let him possess the rules of the masters of the lower schools and of the hearers, and diligently take care that they be observed just as his own. Let him assist and direct the masters themselves, and take the greatest care that nothing be done among others--especially among their disciples--to detract from their reputation and authority."

And rule 5: "Let him take very great care that new preceptors diligently retain their predecessors' manner of teaching and other customs, provided they are not foreign to our system."

And rule 6: "At least every fifteenth day let him hear each teacher. Let him observe whether they give Christian doctrine its due time and labor; whether they advance sufficiently both in completing and in reviewing their assigned task; and finally whether they conduct themselves becomingly and praiseworthily with their disciples in all things."

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 17. Nor can an origin of suspicions, distrust, and complaints arise from this matter, nor those words which have corrupted many academies: “If you hold us to be good or diligent, why do you observe the actions and words of those who teach? If bad, substitute better men. If you appoint a guardian, you show that you doubt us. It is harsh and insulting that inquiry should be made every day into our life, doctrine, and individual words.” Those murmurs neither exist nor can exist in the Society; or if they resound in someone’s thought, he is already in danger of not belonging to the Society, since by private judgment he struggles against the institute of the whole Society. These inquiries are conducted by law; all have now voluntarily bound themselves to that standard. No one teaches under another condition; no teacher regards the office of the visitor as a demand arising from sinister suspicion, but as a debt owed to the laws.

§ 18. But there are six things especially which make them not only capable of, but even lovers of, observation, admonition, and even correction--and not only the younger and beginners, but veterans too, and indeed even those who have acted as prefects, rectors, and provincials. This is frequent and customary among us and is a support of discipline.

The first is that from their very novitiate they are instructed toward humility and obedience. They learn what is the head of prudence: in treating sciences, talents, and morals, nothing is safer than to employ common counsel; and the Greeks rightly say, βαδίζειν τῇ λεωφόρῳ, “to walk by the royal road.” Therefore, from the heart, they greatly desire to be directed by the rules, by the guardians of the rules, and by their superiors. The second is consideration of the great advantage which thereby comes to themselves and their disciples. For he who so teaches and governs disciples that he has not only young men as hearers and readers of his dictations, but learned men also as spectators and judges--truly, he will not easily approach teaching unprepared or rashly. He who fears error will not easily err. Even he who teaches little boys the small and first rudiments knows that he must do so in such a way that his method of teaching, exercising, and examining may be approved by prudent men. Daily experience, through the evil of too many, teaches us how greatly it harms a tender little age to be allotted masters who cling to their own judgment and despise the counsel of others.

The third is that this inspection, the expeller of indolence and awakener of industry and alacrity, is both common to all and gravely enjoined upon superiors. No one casts suspicion upon the fidelity or diligence of others when he discharges his office. Not my suspicion, not your negligence, but the nature of the office requires inspection. I would desire that, in all academies, censors and judges of lecturers be appointed according to this example, just as lecturers are; and that this charge be entrusted to men of proven learning and integrity, even to magistrates and nobles. For if magistrates are placed with authority and dignity over roads, bridges, and aqueducts, why not over the education of youth?

The fourth is that they rejoice in the witness of a good conscience. Either the disciples are assiduous, industrious, modest, and advance toward learning; or at least by negligence and wickedness they render the preceptor’s labor fruitless. In either outcome the preceptor not only retains a quiet conscience, because another’s wickedness rendered vain the result of his counsels and labors--he himself nowhere failed in his duty, and those who should have received the benefits were lacking, not the one who gave them, so that both fault and loss remain with the same persons--but also, since he has lived in the sight of his Prefects and Rector, he is supported by their testimony. Antonio de Guevara, book 2, chapter 43, advised his prince to employ this method of examining, visiting, inspecting, and admonishing the instructors of his sons. In his account Seleucus speaks thus about his inspection, by which he daily inquired into his son’s governors: “I have ascertained, my friends, that no friend is found today upon earth who will put his dignity and reputation at risk for the sake of a friend. But if even rustic men do not do this, how much less must wise men do it? For what is there for whose sake men labor more in this life than to have and leave behind an excellent reputation concerning themselves? Since you are both wise men and the masters of my son, and moreover counselors of my household, it is not right that you should be offended by anyone. For in the courts of princes, by the best right, only that man should be received among the greatest intimates and necessary persons who dares to give true counsel to the Prince.

"The command which I gave to Parthenius neither renders your fidelity suspect nor creates danger to your authority; and if you weigh the matter itself in an equal balance, it is both good for us and in no way harmful to me. The reason is ready at hand. For you are either good or evil. If good, it is fitting that you rejoice that your services are reported to me daily. For in the ears of Princes a recollection of services recalled from time to time cannot fail to be fruitful on some day. But if you are evil and not very solicitous and assiduous concerning the education of my son, it is right that I be admonished, lest, if the father is deceived, negligence in education be destructive to the son; indeed, lest your counsel bring stain and disaster even upon me and my kingdom. For it is not fitting for a good Prince openly to have wicked men numbered among his counselors.

"If my son Antiochus--may the gods avert it!--should turn out wicked, the loss flows back upon me, since my kingdom will both go to ruin, my reputation will be diminished, and he himself will not enjoy his inheritance. If all these things happen thus, it will be of very little consequence to you, since you will say that you are free of fault because the adolescent refused to receive your teaching. Therefore it does not appear to me a bad counsel that I should observe you just as you observe him. For it is my task to take care that you are good; yours to strive that your disciples are not evil."

Formerly Plutarch entrusted this to parents, and it must altogether be observed in household masters and pedagogues: "Parents must now be rebuked who, after entrusting their children to pedagogues and preceptors, are themselves altogether neither spectators nor hearers of their instruction. In this they depart especially far from their duty. For they themselves ought, with only a few days intervening, to take a sample of their children's progress, and not place all their hope in the disposition of a salaried master. For those men will have more care for the boys when they always expect to render accounts." And here the statement of a certain groom is surely witty: "Nothing fattens a horse so much as the eye of the king."

This practice, therefore, must be introduced everywhere into morals: that directors and censors of teachers be sought at greater expense than the teachers themselves. Such is the weakness of human beings that they readily incline toward idleness. Even the best gladiators sometimes seek a whetstone, for practice itself makes one blunt; and he who is often diligent at times permits himself something and relaxes. How many stipends belonging formerly to teachers in academies do we now see remain with those who neither wish nor are able to teach? How many benefices formerly assigned to theological and juridical lectureships are now possessed without the labor of teaching? Whence came that custom? Because gradually the teaching was conducted negligently and then nothing at all began to be taught.

The fifth thing which I require in a preceptor is a paternal love toward his disciples. Masters stand in the place of parents to their disciples. Nature implanted a great love toward their sons in parents because the great trouble and patience needed for rearing them cannot remain constant without great charity. The difficulty in instructing is greater, and therefore greater and more divine charity is needed in the secondary and external parent, so that he may consult his disciples, not himself. He whom hunger and the fee alone entice will never accomplish this with sufficiently sincere fidelity; the man whom his own advantages incite to labor is a hireling. If anyone is applied to so great a matter through another's recommendation or favor rather than his own merit, he will discharge his office only so long as he can do so without loss. The harshness, ferocity, pride, and ingratitude of many must be tolerated. Just as the care of physicians does not forsake madmen who revile and threaten death, so too let the master's charity not be diminished by injuries. That law of charity will make teachers not only industrious and laborious but also talented and skillful.

The sixth is that they be courteous and affable, that they not conceal vices, that they be courageous so as not to fear giving offense for the salvation of their subjects, furnished with civil manners, and tranquil in mind. There is no need to pursue these matters at greater length, since it was abundantly accomplished in the third book. For if these virtues are deservedly commended to all citizens, how much more to the teachers of citizens, who are certain public mirrors, at the sight of whom the city is accustomed to conform its morals? Their evil morals and vices are spread abroad as from a public place into the whole state.

CHAPTER VII

Pupils Must Be Admitted to the Study of the Liberal Arts and Sciences with Great Care in Selection

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. We everywhere see it happen to the great detriment of the state that, without selection or judgment, those are admitted to the liberal arts whom the outcome itself proves to apply themselves to studies against Minerva's will and to sacrifice while the Muses are turned away. What sort of pupils of the liberal arts, therefore, will be fitting? I require two things in them. The first is a gift of nature: talent and natural disposition. The other is what they themselves can furnish: namely, zeal for virtue, diligence, and reverence toward their preceptors.

§ 2. We must therefore speak about talents. Aristotle, ἐν τοῖς φυσιογνωμονικοῖς, in the Physiognomics, describes the talented person thus:

εὐφυοῦς σημεῖα· σὰρξ ὑγροτέρα καὶ ἁπαλωτέρα, οὐκ εὐεκτικὴ οὐδὲ πιμελώδης σφόδρα· τὰ περὶ τὰς ὠμοπλάτας καὶ τράχηλον ἰσχνότερα, καὶ τὰ περὶ τὸ πρόσωπον, καὶ σύνδετα τὰ περὶ τὰς ὠμοπλάτας, καὶ τὰ κάτω ἀφειμένα· εὔλυτα τὰ περὶ τὰς πλευράς· καὶ τὸν νῶτον ἀσαρκότερον· τὸ σῶμα λευκέρυθρον καὶ καθαρόν· τὸ δερμάτιον λεπτόν· τριχωμάτιον μὴ λίαν σκληρὸν μηδὲ λίαν μέλαν· ὄμμα χαροπόν, ὑγρόν.

The signs of talent are flesh that is moister and softer, not of the best bodily condition, nor, as it were, packed together after the manner of boxers, nor very fatty; the parts around the shoulder muscles and the neck are more slender, as are also those around the face. The parts around the shoulder blades are well joined, and those below are relaxed; those around the ribs are looser.

The back is not fleshy, the body is a pure mixture of white and red, the skin is thin, and the hair is neither excessively stiff nor very black. The eye, or look, is χαροπός, bright, and moist. Χαροποί eyes are tawny, blue-gray, pleasing, and joyful; Theocritus calls them ὄμματα χαροπώτερα πολλὸν Ἀθάνας: he says that they have eyes far brighter than Minerva herself has.

The same author asserts that those have a better memory, μνήμονας, who have the upper parts smaller, rounded, and not fleshy: οἱ τὰ ἄνω ἐλάττονα ἔχοντες καὶ γλαφυρὰ καὶ σαρκωδέστερα. But in chapter 2 he says that hard flesh of the best bodily condition signifies an insensible or stupid man; soft flesh signifies a talented man, but one who is ἀβέβαιον, unstable, unless it is in a strong body having large extremities.

Next, in chapter 3 he gives the signs of an insensible man, ἀναισθήτου: the parts around the neck and legs are fleshy and compact; the socket of the hip is round; the muscles of the shoulders are spread upward; the forehead is large, circular, and fleshy; the eye is saffron-colored; the legs around the ankle are thick, fleshy, and round; the jaws are large and fleshy; the loins are fleshy; the legs are long; the neck is thick; and the face is fleshy and rather long. He takes movement, shape, and the character that appears in the face according to resemblances.

And in chapter 6: those who have thick lips, with the upper lip projecting, are foolish. And οἱ τὸ μέτωπον μικρὸν ἔχοντες ἀμαθεῖς: those who have a small forehead are unteachable. And those who have eyebrows extending toward the temples are foolish.

§ 3. The affections of the mind are indicated by such lineaments of bodies; nevertheless, if you look to experience, the reasoning often fails, nor are those signs of any moment unless they all agree in one subject.

Accordingly, that estimation of talents is uncertain and frequently injurious. Many possess καλαὶ κεφαλαί, ἀλλὰ ἐγκέφαλον οὐκ ἔχουσι: pretty heads, but without a little brain. Symmetry of limbs, pleasantness of complexion, softness of flesh, and the firm swelling of muscles do not always accompany talents. In the body of Aesop and of Galba an excellent talent dwelt very badly.

Solomon indeed acknowledges, Wisdom 8:19--20: Παῖς δὲ ἦμην εὐφυής, ψυχῆς τε ἔλαχον ἀγαθῆς· μᾶλλον δὲ ἀγαθὸς ὢν ἦλθον εἰς σῶμα ἀμίαντον. "I was indeed a talented boy and obtained a good soul; and since I was yet more good, I came into an undefiled body." He joins the constitution of the body with the goodness of the soul because they are generally joined. Yet he acknowledges that the head and source of wisdom is placed in divine goodness. And therefore in chapter 9, verse 4, he prays thus: "Give me wisdom, the attendant of your seats, and do not reject me from among your children."

Therefore, he who is to judge the talent of adolescents will indeed use these signs, but in such a way that he considers neither nothing nor everything to be placed in them. He will therefore employ other signs. He will test the memory; consider the manner of acting and the industry; and ask whether the youth quickly grasps what is said, reasons, and pays attention. Many things are observed in domestic practice, even in play and recreation: whether he smiles at unexpected and pointed sayings; whether he admires and asks about things artfully made and new; and whether he readily imitates the things he sees.

The best estimator of talents, Seneca, teaches in Epistle 66 that neither just any knowledge of physiognomy nor an inspection of τὰ τεκμήρια, the evidential signs, is sufficient: "I saw Claranus, my fellow pupil, after many years. I do not suppose that you expect me to add, 'an old man,' but, by Hercules, vigorous in mind and flourishing, and struggling with his little body. For nature conducted herself unjustly and placed such a mind badly--or perhaps she wished to show us this very thing: that a most courageous and most blessed talent can lie hidden beneath any skin. Nevertheless, he conquered every impediment, and from contempt for himself he came to contempt for all other things. The man who said this seems to me to have erred:

> Virtue coming from a beautiful body is more pleasing.

"For it needs no embellishment: it is itself its own great adornment, and it consecrates its body. Certainly I began to look closely at our Claranus. He appears beautiful to me and as upright in body as he is in mind. A great man can come forth from a cottage; and from a deformed and humble little body can come a beautiful and great mind. Therefore nature seems to me to produce certain men of this kind in order to prove that virtue is born in every place. If she had been able to produce souls naked by themselves, she would have done so; now she does what is greater: for she produces some impeded by bodies, but nevertheless breaking through the obstacles. Claranus seems to me to have been produced as an example, so that we might know that the soul is not disfigured by the deformity of the body, but the body is adorned by the beauty of the soul."

Rhodiginus agrees with Seneca, book 3 of the Ancient Readings, chapter 12: "As for what we have noted concerning the affections of the four humors, one ought to know that these things do not appear altogether constant. For there are occasions when, beneath a maidenly and gentle face, a barbarous, savage, and wholly brutal cruelty lies hidden. But beneath a contemptible countenance threatening blood there sometimes lies a lovable clemency worthy of kisses. Those whose brow is charming, laughing, and radiant often seethe with griefs and struggle with themselves. Again, you may find some so mournful in appearance, with so wretched a face and clouded a brow, like the defeated Marsyas, that they plainly appear to be slaves of Saturn. But when you address them--good God!--how serene they are in mind, how witty, with what affability they dissolve everything in laughter."

§ 4. Scarcely anyone, therefore, should be repelled from letters without a trial; but those whom it is established are unsuitable should, I judge, be removed in good time. For there are certain talents so brutish and uncultivated, having something intermediate between the common nature of human beings and stupidity, such as those of the Thracians, who could count only to four or five. For who could endure teaching letters to a Margites, or to the breasts of the Abderite populace, which are bodies without minds even if they are τρισκαιδεκάπηχεα, thirteen cubits tall?

Cicero, in On the Orator, praises Apollonius of Alabanda because, although he taught for a fee, he nevertheless did not permit those whom he did not think capable of becoming orators to waste their labor under him; he dismissed them and exhorted them toward other arts for which he judged them suitable. Our Society too follows this method, all the more sincerely because, since it teaches without charge, it is not induced by payment to retain men unsuitable for letters.

The ninth rule for the Prefect of Lower Studies is this: "So far as this can be done, he should enroll no one among the number of pupils who is not brought by parents or by others who have charge of him; or whom he himself does not know; or concerning whom he cannot readily be informed by others already known to him. But he should exclude no one because he is of low birth or poor."

And rule 25: "If anyone appears in no way suitable for advancement to the next grade, no place should be given to entreaty. If anyone is barely suitable, but nevertheless appears deserving of promotion because of his age, the time spent in the same class, or some other reason, let it be done--unless something opposes it--on this condition: that if he does not sufficiently prove his industry to his master, he is to be sent back to the lower school and no account of him is to be taken in its register. Finally, if any are so rude that it is neither fitting to promote them nor possible to hope for any fruit in their present class, the matter should be taken up with the Rector, so that, after their parents or guardians have been most courteously admonished, they may not occupy a place."

The reason why I judge that this must be done is that labor is expended in vain. "If you pound a fool in a mortar, as barley is struck with a pestle from above, his folly will not be taken away from him." I am not unaware that Solomon said this of morals, Proverbs 27:22; yet it is not badly understood also of hardness of talent. Ἂν ἀπωλέσῃς τοὺς ὤμους ὕδωρ πτίσσων, ὁμοίως ὕδωρ μένει: "If in pounding water you destroy your shoulders, the water nevertheless remains." He who washes an Ethiopian, he who washes a black flint, does nothing except make its blackness more conspicuous:

> If you persist in wishing to teach an unteachable talent,

>

> Unhappy man, you will waste your labor--as if someone should teach

>

> A donkey in an open field to run obedient to the bridle.

>

> Although, after the manner of four-footed horses, he may appear

>

> Able to lift his head and gather up proud steps,

>

> Yet, if you press him with either bridles or spurs,

>

> The donkey of stubborn mind lowers his little ears

>

Toward the earth and kicks with his hind feet. Therefore

>

Desist, for art will never conquer nature; and a noble horse

>

Will never be made from a degenerate donkey,

>

And from a fool a man judicious in an art will never be made.

Thus speaks a poet more prudent than elegant; and against hard talents there is no need of elegance.

§ 5. There is therefore immense labor without any fruit--indeed, with immense torment for the man who is so miserably tortured. When Quintilian the proconsul was stretching a guilty man upon the rack and deliberating about the punishment of one who had confessed, Polemon, an adolescent at once foolish and wanton, said, "Order him to learn the ancient authors by heart." His stupidity, alienated from learning, judged this to be the greatest torment.

From this it also follows that, since they do not grasp wisdom, they give themselves over to leisure and vices; and scarcely any are worse than those whom academies have long cultivated in vain. For they commonly turn the liberty and privileges of students into license of living, and harm the reputation of studies and arts more than talented and industrious men can benefit it. They hate the sciences which they could not grasp, and prefer to appear to have despised them rather than to have been unable to attain them. Accordingly, they scorn both learned men and learning and draw many away from it.

I see almost all Europe erring in this direction. And I freely assert--as one who is himself a lover and pupil of studies--that there appear to be too many students, and that the Prince and the state ought to take care that the public good is not harmed for this reason. But lest this perhaps be received by harsh ears, let them hear a counselor on literary affairs, the most learned man of our age. For after Lipsius had said, in book 2 of the Politics, chapter 17, "Learning must be promoted somewhat by the prince," he added these words in his notes: "I rightly admonish him, for, as Symmachus says, we know that the good arts are nourished by honor, and that this is a mark of a flourishing state: that abundant rewards are paid to professors of disciplines. Yet I deliberately added the little word 'somewhat,' because, just as it is harmful to abolish them, so it is harmful to promote them too ardently."

Of Justinian, Zonaras writes: τὰς τυπωθείσας ἀνέκαθεν ἐν ἑκάστῃ τῶν πόλεων δίδοσθαι σιτήσεις τοῖς ἐν αὐταῖς διδασκάλοις τῶν λογικῶν τεχνῶν καὶ ἐπιστημῶν, ὑποθήκαις τοῦ ἐπάρχου, ἐξέκοψε· καὶ οὕτως τῶν ἐν ταῖς πόλεσι διδασκαλείων ἐσχολακότων ἀγροικία τῶν ἐν αὐταῖς κατεκράτησε. "He abolished, on the advice of his Prefect, the provisions established from antiquity to be given in every town to professors of the good arts and sciences; and thus, as the schools throughout the towns grew cold, rusticity and barbarism took possession of the inhabitants." These evils the Thracian Emperor brought in with his axe; but those too are covertly harmful who have promoted them too lavishly.

For it must altogether be confessed that idleness and softness can creep into minds by no means more easily or more honorably than by this path of letters. Yet strength and virtue do not exist where those things are. As puppies unfit for hunting when trained to dance and to delights of that sort, so citizens too highly cultivated are little suited to manly exercises. We extol to heaven Francis I and Leo X, who so keenly revived letters. If we regard their purpose, deservedly; if the end and outcome, I am doubtful, because in truth the one rendered his France, and the other Italy, more cultivated and pleasant, but at the same time softer. What good hope remains where women too are everywhere engaged in books and letters? Yet it has come to this.

Those honest Spartans please me, who said: γράμματα μὲν ἕνεκα τῆς χρείας ἐμάνθανον· ἡ δ' ἄλλη παιδεία πρὸς τὸ ἄρχεσθαι καλῶς ἐγίνετο, καὶ καρτερεῖν πονοῦντα, καὶ νικᾶν μαχόμενον. "They learned letters at least for use; all their remaining training was directed toward obeying well, enduring labors, and conquering in battle." I would strongly advise my Prince to see that this is observed in his citizens. Let not too many, nor all, apply themselves to studies, but let the nobility do so especially, because the patricians ought to be strong in counsel; for the people, cleverness is superfluous.

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 6. Although I dissent somewhat from Lipsius and would judge that learning must be promoted in every way, I nevertheless approve this: that he institutes a selection of students and judges that erudition, unless it is rightly handled, does very great harm to the state. The sight of the schools teaches us that very great error is committed in this matter. In an academy that produces scarcely thirty bachelors and twenty masters of arts in each year, and scarcely one doctor of medicine, law, or theology in a five-year period, a thousand adolescents are taught.

A great part turn their minds elsewhere after the schools of grammar. Accustomed to literary leisure, they are suitable neither for the guilds of craftsmen nor for military service. Hence comes an immense supply of idlers, vagabonds, musicians, and petty poets; hence men perniciously unlearned creep into the clergy and monasteries. Would it not have been better at the beginning to remove from studies boys still capable of any art than, after expenditures of labor and money, to abandon those studies with disgrace?

Look at the masters and doctors themselves: some unlearned, some merely bearing academic bulls, few excellent. The cause of so great an evil is the confused multitude of learners, among whom each man, although deficient in talent, strives to struggle up to the summit of erudition. But since strength deserts most of them, many must fall at the very starting-barriers, others in the middle, and others at the end close to the very goal.

§ 7. How great a talent, then, do you require in a pupil? I look up with admiration to one that is best and plainly divine, such as there was in Origen, Augustine, and Aristotle. There was a greater one in Didymus, who, though blind from birth, attempted the more hidden matters of the sciences with a lofty spirit and attained them most successfully, as Jerome relates. And, what you may wonder at still more, he grasped geometrical theorems, angles, points, and sections. Where this is absent, I desire a great and good talent; thirdly, a moderate one, if God and nature have denied a good one.

Epicurus describes for us three kinds of talents. Seneca, Epistle 52: "Epicurus says that some men strive toward truth without anyone's assistance, and that of these he himself made a path for himself. He praises these most, men whose impetus came from themselves and who brought themselves forward. Some need another's help: they would not go if no one preceded them, but would follow well. Of these he says Metrodorus is one. This too is an excellent talent, but of the second rank. We are not of that first class; it goes well with us if we are received into this second. Nor would you despise the man who can be saved by another's kindness; and it is already much to be willing to be saved.

"Besides these you will find yet another kind of human beings, itself not to be disdained: those who can be driven and compelled toward the right, who need not only a leader but a helper and, so to speak, a coercer. This is the third color. If you seek an example of this, Epicurus says that Hermarchus was such a man. Accordingly, he congratulates the one more, but admires the other more. For although both arrived at the same end, the praise is greater for having effected the same thing in more difficult material.

"For suppose that two buildings have been raised, both equal, equally lofty, equally magnificent. One received hard ground: there the work immediately grew. The foundations of the other sank, having been laid upon soft and shifting earth; and much labor was consumed until solid ground was reached. In the one, whatever was done is visible; in the other, a great and more difficult part lies hidden. Some talents are easy and unencumbered; some must be fashioned by hand, as they say, and labored upon in their foundations. Accordingly, I would call the man who had no trouble with himself the happier; but the man who conquered the perversity of his nature and did not lead himself to wisdom but dragged himself to it has deserved better of himself. You may know that this hard and laborious talent has been given to us: we go through obstacles. Let us therefore fight; let us call upon the aid of some persons."

The rest is correct, but it was truly the boastfulness of a madman in Epicurus that he gloried in having had no master, as Cicero also reports in book 1 of On the Nature of the Gods. But we must treat of talents.

§ 8. I admire and fear the greatest and most excellent talents; I approve moderate ones. A measured natural disposition, a mind that reaches with labor the point toward which it strives, is most useful to studies and the state, because it is accustomed to use studies rightly.

The greatest talents are no less to be feared than admired. For those who excel in keen talent are generally irascible. Plato, in his book On Knowledge, thinks it arduous and difficult to find a talented man who is not irascible and immoderate; I speak of the propensity of nature, not of his life. They are agile and teachable, and are moved by the vivacity of subtle and brilliant spirits. But just as material full of rich, airy substance is easily kindled and is wholly dissolved into flame, so the mind of such men also catches flame like asphalt.

Next, those talents are not without some admixture of folly. Seneca says, in his book On Tranquillity of Mind, that according to Aristotle there was no great talent without an admixture of madness. He gives the reason: "A mind cannot say anything grand and above others unless it has been moved. When it has despised common and customary things and has risen higher under a sacred impulse, then at last it has sung something grander than a mortal mouth. It cannot attain anything sublime and situated on a height so long as it is in its ordinary state. It must depart from the customary, be borne aloft, bite the reins, carry off its driver, and bear him to the place to which by himself he would have feared to ascend."

§ 9. But how can a talented man be foolish? He certainly can--not indeed altogether alienated in mind, but nevertheless wandering astray in matters of the greatest importance. For since it is one thing to store a matter in a swift memory and apprehend it at first sight, and another to judge concerning things to be done, we shall not find all these in the same person.

Aristotle discussed the matter in Problems, section 30. First, he relates that those who became distinguished either in talent, in the studies of philosophy, in administering public affairs, in composing poetry, or in practicing the arts were melancholics--even to the point that they were assailed by the maladies of black bile, as is related of Hercules among the heroes. For he is thought to have been of this very nature; and the ancients named the falling sickness "sacred" from him, and "Herculean." The disturbance of mind in children also explains this very thing, as does the eruption of sores which sometimes precedes death. For in most persons black bile settles in this way. And in Lysander the Lacedaemonian, shortly before his death, this kind of sores broke out. Add Ajax and Bellerophon, of whom the one burst forth utterly into insanity, while the other sought out deserted places. Hence that passage of Homer:

Αὐτὰρ ἐπεὶ καὶ κεῖνος ἀπήχθετο πᾶσι θεοῖσιν,

ἤτοι ὃ κὰπ πεδίον τὸ Ἀλήϊον οἶος ἀλᾶτο,

>

ὃν θυμὸν κατέδων, πάτον ἀνθρώπων ἀλεείνων.

>

But when even that man had become hated by all the gods,

>

he wandered alone over the Aleian plain, eating out his heart and shunning the paths of men.

Indeed, it has been discovered that most of the other heroes suffered from the same malady. In later years we know that Empedocles, Socrates, Plato, and many other distinguished men were of this constitution, and even the greater part of the order of poets. For diseases also afflict many persons of this kind because of such a constitution of body, and some by their own nature plainly incline toward those very affections; yet almost all, as has already been said, were by nature of this kind.

Therefore he refers the cause to bile: ὅσοις δὴ λίαν πολλὴ καὶ θερμὴ, μανικοὶ καὶ εὐφυεῖς καὶ ἐρωτικοὶ καὶ εὐκίνητοι πρὸς τοὺς θυμοὺς καὶ τὰς ἐπιθυμίας. "Those in whom there is very much hot bile are manic, talented, amorous, and prone to anger and desires." Nor does Plato, Aristotle's master, speak otherwise when he says that those excel in talent who are accustomed to be seized and aroused by frenzy. Democritus too judged that all the most talented men were accustomed to be seized by frenzy. But if you have a mind to learn the cause more precisely, consult Caelius, book 17 of the Various Readings, chapter 5.

This too must be added: the greatest talents are often fitful, flighty, always in motion, and quickly disgusted with present things. This levity and inconstancy not only impedes progress in the disciplines but sometimes disturbs the state. Accordingly, those who are talented should be formed to virtue with immense care. If they enter public affairs, that saying which a prudent preceptor uttered about his Themistocles will rightly apply to them: "Son, you will be nothing mediocre, but either a great light of your fatherland or a great pest." Accordingly, I prefer an even, constant, good talent, which labor may advance and sharpen, to one that is excessively swift, versatile, acute, and ready. Greatness of talent, if virtue is absent, produces great errors.

§ 10. Finally, the greatest talents are also accustomed to be precocious; but those that are such are brief and fleeting. At eighteen years of age Hermogenes composed a Rhetoric which was read by everyone with admiration and held in great honor, as a prodigy of premature erudition and eloquence. But in his twenty-fourth year, having lost his mind, he became a laughingstock. He was assailed even with jokes. Some said that Homer had rightly called words λόγους πτερόεντας, "winged words," because Hermogenes had cast them away like wings. Others said: ὁ Ἑρμογένης ἐν παισὶ γέρων, ἐν γέρουσι παῖς: "Hermogenes was an old man among boys, but a boy among old men."

Seneca excellently describes those precocious fruits in Consolation to Marcia, chapter 23: "When you saw in a young man the prudence of an old man, a spirit victorious over all pleasures, corrected and free of vice, seeking riches without avarice, honors without ambition, and pleasures without luxury, did you, Marcia, think that he could long fall to your lot in safety? Whatever has reached the summit hastens toward its end. Perfected virtue snatches itself away and removes itself from our eyes; things which matured at the beginning do not await the final time. The brighter a fire has shone, the more quickly it is extinguished. The fire that, committed to slow and difficult material and submerged in smoke, shines from foul fuel is more enduring; for the same cause that feeds it scantily also holds it back. Thus, the more brilliant talents are, the shorter they are. For where there is no room for increase, decline is near.

"Fabianus says that a boy, whom our own parents also saw, lived at Rome with the stature of an enormous man; but he quickly died, and every prudent person said that he would die soon, for he could not attain the age which he had anticipated. Thus maturity is an indication of impending destruction, and the end approaches when growth has been exhausted."

What we discern happening in the body must also be said of talent, which depends upon the body's constitution and temperament, as the losses of many have taught.

CHAPTER VIII

Certain Rules of Conduct Must Be Prescribed for Students

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. The academies throughout Europe have been founded and fortified by the best laws and institutes; and for all their particular schools, as for a certain part of the state, their own statutes and rules are read. The Society certainly appears to me to have embraced the duty of a Christian and studious adolescent in those laws which it has prescribed for its hearers. They are set forth in this order.

"Those who attend a school of the Society of Jesus for the sake of learning should understand that, with God's help, care will be taken with no less effort that they be imbued with piety and the other virtues than with the liberal arts."

There is a twofold end in attending a school: the first and best is virtue and piety; the secondary is erudition. Deservedly so, for letters without virtue make a man cunning rather than good. They burden the state; they do not assist it. Seneca judged it shameful to come with writing tablets to a philosopher in order to take down words, not things. Teacher and learner ought to have the same end and the same purpose: the teacher wishes to benefit, the pupil to advance; the one to infuse virtue, the other to receive it. Thus the Common Rules for Teachers of the Lower Studies state: "1. Let the master so instruct the adolescents who have been entrusted to the discipline of the Society that, together with letters, they may above all imbibe conduct worthy also of Christians."

The following rules prescribe the means by which they may attain this:

1. "Let his particular intention, both in lectures when an occasion offers itself and outside them, be directed toward preparing the tender minds of the adolescents for obedience and love toward God and toward the virtues by which they ought to please him; but let him especially observe the things that follow.

2. "Before school begins, let someone recite the brief prayer appointed for this purpose, which the preceptor and all the pupils shall hear attentively with heads uncovered and knees bent. But before the lecture begins, let the preceptor himself, with his head uncovered, fortify himself with the sign of the cross and begin.

3. "Let him take care that all attend Mass and the sermon: Mass daily, but the sermon on feast days. In Lent, moreover, let him send them to it at least twice each week, or even lead them according to the custom of the region.

4. "Let Christian doctrine be learned and recited from memory on Friday or Saturday, especially in the grammar classes, or in others if there is need--unless perhaps in some place it should appear that it must be recited still more frequently, even by new pupils.

5. "Likewise on Friday or Saturday let him give a pious exhortation or explanation of doctrine for half an hour. Above all, let him exhort them to pray to God daily, and especially to recite the rosary of the Blessed Virgin or the Office each day; to examine their conscience in the evening; to receive frequently and rightly the sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist; to avoid harmful associations; to detest vices; and, finally, to cultivate virtues worthy of a Christian man.

6. "Even in private conversations he shall inculcate the same things that pertain to piety, yet in such a way that he does not appear to entice anyone toward our religious order. But if he learns of anything of this kind, let him refer it to the confessor.

7. “On Saturday toward evening, let him order the Litany of the Most Blessed Virgin to be recited in his class; or, if it is customary, let him lead them into the church to hear it with the others. Let him also diligently commend to the pupils devotion toward that same Virgin and toward their guardian angel.

8. “Let him earnestly commend spiritual reading, especially concerning the lives of the saints. Conversely, let him not only himself refrain from reading to the young impure writers, and writers generally in whom there is anything capable of harming good morals, but also deter the pupils as much as he can from reading the same writers outside school.

9. “Let him ensure that no one omits monthly confession. He shall order them to give the confessors their given name, surname, and class written on a slip, so that, on afterwards examining the slips, he may understand who were absent.

10. “Let him often pray to God for his pupils and edify them by the example of his religious life.”

Nor ought anyone to wonder that piety and virtue are of such great concern to us, since it ought to be proposed to all that they know how to live rather than how to dispute. It is shameful that some have sat for many years in the sanctuary of the virtues without having acquired even their color. Seneca formerly rebuked this, Epistle 10: “Why should I not know them? They are indeed most persistent and assiduous; yet I call them not pupils of philosophers but tenants. Some come to hear, not to learn, just as we are drawn into the theater for the sake of pleasure, to delight our ears with speech, voice, or stories. You will see that this is a great part of the hearers, for whom the philosopher’s school is a lodging-house of leisure. They do not aim to lay aside some vices there, or to receive some rule of life against which they may measure their conduct, but to enjoy the delight of their ears. Some nevertheless come even with writing tablets, not to take down things but words, which they learn without benefit to another just as they hear them without benefit to themselves.

“Some are aroused by magnificent utterances and pass over into the emotion of those who speak, eager in countenance and spirit. They are stirred no otherwise than those Phrygian half-men who are accustomed to rage at command at the sound of the flute. The beauty of the things, not the sound of empty words, carries them away and incites them. If anything has been said sharply against death, if anything defiantly against fortune, it immediately pleases them to do what they hear. They are affected and would become such as they are ordered to be, if that form remained in their mind--if the multitude, the dissuader from what is honorable, did not immediately intercept the remarkable impulse. Few have been able to carry home the mind which they had conceived. It is easy to arouse a hearer to desire what is right. For nature has given to all the foundations and seed of the virtues; we are all born for all these things. When an inciter approaches, then those goods of the mind, as though asleep, are awakened.”

If, therefore, pagan philosophers took care that they imbued adolescents with virtues, or at least with the color of virtues, this will pertain much more to Christian professors. The sanctity of religion, the obligation of their office, and the fidelity owed to parents ought to impel them to regard the rule of living as their first concern.

§ 2. “Let each person attend the class which has been assigned to him by the Prefect after examination.”

By the best right and deservedly so. For he who commits himself to a preceptor in order to receive from him the ornaments and laurel of the most beautiful sciences cannot prescribe to him by what method he must teach. One ignorant of the road ought not to be the guide of a man who knows all the signs and all the Mercurial heaps. It is a great error, sometimes of hearers and more frequently of parents, to wish to prescribe to the master and sometimes even to academies. He who prescribes to the master the order in which the disciplines are to be handed down, although by professing himself a learner he admits himself less learned, nevertheless professes himself wiser in teaching. That swelling of mind greatly obstructs the disciplines. While each person strives to ascend to a higher grade of the schools before his years and knowledge allow, he does not learn the foundations and therefore does not understand the higher matters. “I do not understand this preceptor,” they say; “I do not grasp these trifles." Each person scarcely judges himself without corruption, especially concerning his talent, an immense morbid desire of loving and proclaiming which has been implanted in everyone.

Alexander once devoted himself to geometrical ἀναλύσεσι, analyses, and demonstrations. Since, as happens in the most abstruse matters, the greatest difficulties required the greatest attention and subtlety, with royal haughtiness he commanded the teacher to express them more clearly. The latter answered truly and rightly that all these things were equally difficult for all, for fortune does not furnish talent but more frequently veils it with haughtiness. Let him therefore have a preceptor who teaches what is necessary and lays foundations: if these fail, the man who has raised the edifice of learning higher constructs a ruin. Those make the best progress who behold the works of their first labor more slowly. A man who pours wine copiously into a jar with a narrow neck loses the greater part. Things proportioned to the measure of a talent assist it; talents are sharpened by moderate labor and collapse beneath a greater burden. Haste has harmed very many, while they measure progress by a change of classes, as though an unlearned man could not penetrate to the same place.

§ 3. "At least every month let all confess their sins; and at the appointed hour each day let them becomingly attend the sacrifice of the Mass, and on feast days the sermon."

That law contains three things: the precept of monthly sacred confession, daily sacred Mass, and the sacred sermon on feast days. Thus the Constitutions, part 4, chapter 16: "Let diligent care be taken that those who betake themselves to the universities of the Society for the sake of learning letters learn at the same time with them good conduct worthy of Christians. It will greatly assist toward this if all approach the sacrament of confession at least once each month; if they hear Mass daily and the sermon on every feast day when it is delivered. Let each of the preceptors take care that his pupils perform this."

The declaration of the Constitutions adds that if anyone does not perform these things and is furthermore dissolute and a stumbling block to others, he must be expelled from the schools.

I am not unaware that these things are mocked by heretics, devoted to curses, despised by politicians, and negligently performed by the frivolous. But in this matter the Society has many illustrious authorities. First, confession was in use from the primitive Church: Clement, Epistle 1 to James; Dionysius to Demophilus; Origen on Psalm 32; Eusebius, book 5, chapter 27, and book 6, chapter 27; Cyprian, On the Lapsed: "God sees the hearts and breasts of individuals and is to judge not only our deeds but also our words and thoughts. He beholds the minds and the intentions of all while they are yet conceived in the hidden places of the closed breast. Finally, how much greater in faith and better in fear are those who, although bound by no crime of sacrifice or certificate, nevertheless, because they have so much as thought about it, confess this very thing sorrowfully and simply before the priests of God, make confession of their conscience, expose the burden of their mind, and seek saving medicine even for small and slight wounds, knowing that it is written: 'God is not mocked.'"

§ 4. But it is not my purpose now to touch upon controversies of religion; nor indeed is it necessary. For the mockers of Catholic confession themselves, in this year in which they imagine the jubilee of their opinion, prescribe confession in a program posted on the thirtieth day of October.

Confession is therefore necessary for the remission of sins, as Augustine truly says, homily 49 of book 50: "Let no one say to himself: 'I act in secret; I act before God. God who pardons me knows that I act in my heart.' Was it therefore said without cause, 'Whatever you shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven'? Were the keys therefore given to the Church of God without cause? Do we frustrate the Gospel of God? Do we frustrate the words of Christ?"

§ 5. When, however, we require monthly confession, we do this so that they may serve God with greater purity, flee offenses, and be armed against the temptations of the Devil and the assaults of the world. Another's presence is a great bridle upon one about to sin; so too is his knowing that there will sometime be an accuser and witness of the sin. It is certainly established that very many are drawn back from sins by that remedy, when they know that there is no secret belonging to any crime. It therefore ought to seem burdensome neither to the bad nor to the good. Not to the bad, because nothing is more useful to them than immediately to leave contumacy, be freed from disease, feel that God is appeased, and cast off the dominion of the Devil.

Not to the good--that is, those who sin little or lightly, for no one does not sin--because it is easy to be absolved from light and daily sins. Saint Chrysostom, Jerome, and others advise that when anyone has committed a sin, he should submit himself to the care of priests at the first opportunity. For if a serpent strikes you with a venomous tongue, you wait neither years nor months, nor even days or hours, but seek remedies while the venom has not yet spread to the vital parts. But will you neglect a wound fixed by the Tartarean tooth of the ancient serpent in the innermost recesses of the soul, raging with the danger of eternal death?

§ 6. The second requirement is that they attend the sacrifice of the Mass daily. "I would prefer that time to be expended on good letters," the Politician objects. On the contrary, the time is expended upon the highest good, from whom come both letters and the mind capable of letters. How much is it that, out of twenty-four hours, half an hour is consecrated to the worship of the divine power? If it is just to return tithes of goods to God, why does it seem excessive to you to dedicate one forty-eighth part of time to him in whom we live and have our being, who extends for us the spans of time, who makes his sun rise over the just and unjust? Moreover, the most powerful kind of prayer occurs when vows are poured forth in God's presence at the time of the oblation.

Saint Chrysostom reckoned this among his reasons, homily 24 on 1 Corinthians: "Let us therefore approach him with fervor and ardent charity, lest we undergo punishment. For the greater the benefits with which we have been affected, the more shall we be punished when we are found unworthy of the benefit. The Magi revered this body even when it lay in the manger; and impious men, barbarians, left fatherland and home, completed a long road, and, when they had come, adored with much fear and trembling. Let us, citizens of heaven, imitate even the barbarians. For although they saw him in a manger and a hut and saw none of the things such as you now see, they approached with great reverence. But you see him not in a manger but upon an altar; not a woman holding him, but a priest standing by, and the Spirit flying over the things set forth with great abundance. You do not merely see this same body as they did, but know both its power and its dispensation, and are ignorant of none of the things accomplished through it, since you have been exactly and carefully initiated in all the mysteries. Let us therefore arouse ourselves, let us fear, and let us display a far greater reverence than those barbarians did, lest, if we approach rashly and without consideration, we heap fire upon our head."

And in book 6 of On the Priesthood: "At that time angels sit beside the priest, and the whole order of the heavenly powers raises cries; and the place near the altar is full of choirs of angels in honor of him who is sacrificed. This may be sufficiently believed even from the great sacrifice which is then performed. I myself heard someone recalling that a certain old man, an admirable man to whom many mysteries of revelations had been divinely disclosed, had told him that he had once been judged worthy by God of such a vision; and that at that time he had suddenly seen a multitude of angels, so far as human sight could bear it, clothed in shining garments and surrounding the altar itself; finally, with heads so bowed as if one were to see soldiers standing in the presence of a king."

What wonder is it, therefore, if we lead our pupils daily to Christ, who is daily offered and received in an unbloody sacrifice? We present them to him; with them and for them we pray. Formerly many refreshed their souls every day with the Eucharist, even secretly at home. Let us at least thus far imitate our ancestors, that we join our prayers to the public liturgy.

§ 7. The third requirement is that they attend the sacred sermon on feast days. For that divine fire kindles minds and breasts; it is oil for charity as it gradually grows cold. Ambrose, sermon 18, on the words "Your utterance is exceedingly fiery": "First kindle this fire in your minds, so that the light of Christ may shine forth for you. With this fire the bush burned and was not consumed. For the divine word burns in order to correct the sinner's conscience; it does not consume in order to destroy. This fire has been accustomed to blunt, this fire to extinguish, the savage conflagrations of material flames. Finally, the Hebrews, kindled by this fire, could neither fear nor feel the heat of the burning furnace. Deservedly, therefore, the good servant loves the fiery utterance of the Lord, by which charity, which excludes fear, is put on. He beautifully added 'exceedingly,' because every teacher indeed inflames the affection of the hearer, but above all is the word of God, penetrating the divisions of joints and the inmost marrow. Therefore describe the fiery utterance of God for yourself in three ways: as that which cleanses, that which kindles, or that which illuminates its hearers."

The Council of Trent invites not only students but absolutely all the faithful to sacred sermons: "Because the preaching of the Gospel is no less necessary to the Christian state than its reading, and this is the principal office of bishops, the same holy Synod has established and decreed that all bishops, archbishops, primates, and all other prelates of churches are bound personally to preach the holy Gospel of Jesus Christ, unless they are legitimately impeded. But if it should happen that bishops and the others aforesaid are detained by a legitimate impediment, according to the form of the General Council they shall be bound to assume suitable men for salutarily executing this office of preaching."

§ 8. "Let all attend the explanation of the Catechism each week and learn its compendium by heart as the masters have appointed."

The fourth rule for preceptors likewise prescribes this. Both preceptor and hearer will frequently revolve in his mind that those who long ago received the mark of the Lord and the token of their commander must be instructed in Christian doctrine with greater care than those who aspire to the Church from among Jews or pagans. For recruits who have already sworn the oath and have been enrolled in the legions of the Church must be instructed and strengthened for daily battle; for they do not offend against the laws of their commander without common danger to the camp. Those who are already brethren require a brotherly mind in their teacher. Augustine wrote a book On Catechizing the Uninstructed, in which he both teaches the method of catechizing and arms catechists against weariness in always repeating the same things.

Every master who instructs little ones in the sacred faith will avoid with the greatest effort the weariness which causes him neither to speak eloquently--that is, suitably to the capacity of little ones--while his discourse creeps languidly, producing yawning rather than eagerness in his hearers. There is a distinguished lesson in Augustine, On Catechizing the Uninstructed, chapter 12: "Now if we grow weary of frequently repeating things customary and suited to little ones, let us conform ourselves to them through brotherly, fatherly, and motherly love; and, once joined to their heart, those things will appear new even to us. For the affection of a sympathizing mind possesses such power that, when they are affected as we speak and we as they learn, we dwell mutually in one another; and thus what they hear is as though they speak in us, while we in a certain manner learn with them the things we teach.

"Does this not customarily happen when we show to those who had never seen them before certain spacious and beautiful places, whether of cities or fields, which we ourselves had often passed without any pleasure, so that our delight is renewed in their delight at the novelty? And it happens the more, the dearer they are, because through the bond of love, to the extent that we are in them, to that extent things which were old become new also to us. But if we have made some progress in contemplating things, we no longer wish those whom we love merely to rejoice and marvel when they behold works of human hands; rather, we wish to raise them up to the very citadel and counsel of their maker, and thence to rise into admiration and praise of God, maker of all things, where lies the most fruitful end of love. How much more, therefore, ought we to delight when human beings approach now to learn the Lord himself, for whose sake all things that must be learned are to be learned, and to be renewed in their novelty, so that if our preaching is colder than usual, it may grow warm through their unaccustomed hearing."

§ 9. I see some adolescents diligent in the oratorical faculty, laborious in composing verses, victorious even over difficulties in learning the Greek language, diligent in the thickets of Dialectic, the depths of Physics, the secrets of Metaphysics, and the mathematical sciences, but immediately wearied in sacred doctrine. For either they devise reasons for not coming at all, or, when they have come, turn their minds elsewhere and by looking about and yawning show that they wish to depart or are present unwillingly. They show themselves either entangled in great vices or so gaping after the perishable honors of the sciences that they bear pagan minds in a Christian profession.

For what will you answer to your God? You turn over Cicero or Demosthenes for whole days; you eagerly drink the fables of the poets, with the sweetness of their song and very frequently with muddy poison; you grow pale over Aristotle and Euclid, destined to gain this, that the more things you learn, the more things you doubt. And do you despise the utterances of the Lord--chaste utterances, sweeter than honey, more excellent than a precious stone? He labors under a grave disease for whom the best food produces nausea. What happens to travelers is accustomed to happen to them: those who apply themselves to describing the manners of various peoples, rivers, and towns are ignorant of the bounds of their own patrimony and the limits of their fields. Hence they can neither govern their conscience, nor render an account of the faith, nor answer a Jew or heretic, nor even an unlearned man. This is the more serious for the reason that they possess the authority of orators and philosophers and the title of masters, but the ignorance of boys in the Christian faith. Hence they pay great penalties for so great a contempt, sometimes by shipwreck of religion, displaying their ignorance to the world.

Accordingly, I judge this counsel salutary for all schools and academies: that they admit no one to a higher school who has neglected to learn the things handed down in religion by the lower class. Let there be an examination not only of secular erudition, which puffs up, but also of sacred erudition, which edifies. Let no one be distinguished with academic honors and titles unless he has also exercised himself in Christian doctrine as much as is fitting. For it is shameful for a Christian if an academy produces him as a disciple of Plato or Aristotle rather than of Christ. For to what end is it useful to bring into public affairs men swollen with sciences and unstable in opinions, but ignorant of Christian truth?

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 10. “Let none of our pupils enter the school with weapons, small swords, knives, or other things of that kind which have been forbidden according to places or times.”

Let no one wonder that weapons are removed from schools, because we instruct neither a soldier nor a boxer. And weapons are carried without cause into a place where fighting is not permitted. Pompey lowered the fasces, together with their axes, before a philosopher, although he was already great in deed and even in name. How much less must adolescents be permitted to display small swords or daggers in the sanctuary of wisdom? Yet this is rare and is done not by those who study military affairs, but by those whom empty ostentation has bound to iron.

I have seen a man who considered this law contrary to his dignity and walked about the courtyard armed with a sword. “Will you ungird me? My nobility no more permits my weapons to be torn away than my limbs.” You err, adolescent: weapons are honorably laid aside when they are laid aside by law. It is proud insolence for you to be armed among so many unarmed men. Look at the ancient laws: weapons were taken away from private persons; forums, crossroads, streets, and suburbs were trodden by unarmed nobility; they took up arms against the enemy.

Justinian, Novella 17, chapter 17: “For these things, when preserved by you, make the belt longer-lasting and more glorious for you, provided that, above other things, you permit no one who is not serving in the military to use weapons. The designation ‘weapons’ certainly signifies not only shields, swords, and helmets, but also clubs and stones.”

But since a great authority, the legislator himself, explains to us the ancient custom which endures even today in many places--and does so concerning the whole state, although we now by no means follow it--I shall show that adolescents studying humane letters, philosophy, theology, or even law and medicine cannot complain if they approach unarmed professors and the altar of prudence without weapons, the instruments of madness and slaughter. Novella 85 therefore states:

"Always invoking our great God and Savior Jesus Christ and his aid, we strive to preserve all our subjects, whose government God has entrusted to us, unharmed and free of injury, and to restrain the wars which they undertake against one another by their own deliberation and by which they cause suffering, thereby bringing a double punishment upon themselves: both that which they inflict upon themselves and that which they suffer from the laws that punish their madness."

"Wishing, therefore, to free human beings from deaths of this kind, we have provided that no private person perform the work of weapons manufacture, but that only those make weapons who are assigned to the public arms factories, or who are called fabricenses. Let those who work upon weapons sell them to no private person. Nor do we permit those arms-makers who are enrolled in the military units, who are also called deputati and receive provisions from the fisc, either to manufacture or to sell weapons to anyone; but only to have care of the weapons of the soldiers enrolled in the unit in which they serve. But if they make anything new, let it be offered by them and brought into our sacred armory, to be added there to the public weapons already deposited."

"We wish those who are in the orders of ballista-makers, whom we have established in various cities by enrolling them and decreeing that they make weapons, to observe this also: that they repair and renew only the public weapons stored in the public armories of each city. But if any one of them has constructed any single weapon, let them likewise furnish it among the public weapons and sell it to absolutely no one else. Let those assigned to the ballista factories also observe this, at the risk of the fathers of the cities under whom we have placed those same ballista-makers and established the care and custody of the public armories. Thus, if either the deputati or the fabricenses are seen selling weapons, let the judges in the localities take care to subject them to punishments and, furthermore, to take the weapons without payment from those who buy them and claim them for the public."

"With God governing us in this thought, we have decreed by the present law that in no city or province of our state shall private persons or anyone else have license to make, sell, or acquire weapons in any manner, but that only those numbered among the fabricenses shall construct them and deliver them to our sacred armory. And we decree that this be observed by your Highness and by those who after you receive the belt.

"We assign some of the chartularii who are placed under your Highness in the bureau of the fabricenses, at the risk of the five senior men among them, men possessing a good reputation and suitable for the task. Seeking out those who make weapons in this most fortunate city and in the other cities of our state, they shall prohibit private persons, or any others apart from those assigned among the fabricenses, from undertaking the business of weapons manufacture; and in whatever places they find private persons daring this, they shall take these things away and attach them to the armory of the fisc.

"But if among private craftsmen they have been able to find artisans suitable for the task, they may, if they wish, place them in the service, enter their names in the register, and send us the register of the artisans, so that by our sacred rescript they may be established in those places in which the public factories are situated, and thus may both manufacture weapons and receive provisions from the fisc. For when this has been done and carefully observed by the persons aforesaid, license will be granted to absolutely no one--neither private inhabitants of the cities nor rustics dwelling in villages--to use arms against one another, to presume upon killings, and thereby to cause very many human beings to be slain and public services to perish, while cultivators of the earth, fearing the loss of life, resort to flight because of fear.

"Therefore those who are dispatched by your Highness from the aforesaid bureau of the fabricenses to prohibit private makers of weapons must also receive an acknowledgment in the localities from the judges, the offices subject to them, and the defenders and fathers of the cities, that henceforth they will have no power to do any of the things prohibited by us, but will observe the things decreed by the present law, fearing punishment both in their property and upon their very head. For we decree that a negligent judge of great Alexandria shall pay a penalty of twenty pounds of gold and lose his belt; and that his office shall likewise pay a penalty of twenty pounds of gold and undergo capital punishment. But the judges of the other provinces shall sustain a loss of ten pounds of gold and shall themselves likewise be subject to loss of the belt, as shall their offices. The defenders and fathers of cities shall be fined a penalty of three pounds of gold and shall undergo danger to their head if, after discovering that any such thing has been done, they do not punish it or report it to those capable of taking action, but permit it to remain hidden."

"In order that the things which we have prohibited from being made by private persons and certain others, apart from those numbered among our sacred fabricenses, or from being sold to private persons may be made manifest, we have taken care to signify this also by the present law. For we prohibit private persons from manufacturing or buying bows, arrows, spathae, and the swords which they customarily call semispathia; those called zabae, or coats of mail; pikes; lances made in any manner or shape; those which among the Isaurians are named monocopia; and the so-called sitinni, or missiles. Furthermore, we prohibit oval shields, shields, helmets, or headpieces. For we permit no one other than those assigned among our sacred fabricenses to construct these things. We permit only smaller knives, which no one uses in battles, to be made and sold by private persons and to private persons. Therefore let your Highness publish the present general law in this royal city and also throughout the other cities of our state, so that all, knowing the things which have pleased us, may observe them."

"We give notice to the chartularii from the aforesaid bureau of the fabricenses who shall in future preside over this custody that, for negligence, they shall not only sustain monetary penalties but also suffer corporal punishments and lose their service. Furthermore, we shall not permit that same bureau thereafter to be involved in a concern of this kind, but shall commit the care of the fabricenses to others."

Such were the ancients. But I marvel that in certain academies students walk armed, quarrel, challenge, fight, and even run about armed at night--things Nero and the most wicked men did--haughtily address, attack, and strike those they meet, which is the practice of urban robbers. Thus license in bearing weapons has summoned disgrace, dangers, and robberies out of woods and dens into cities and the schools of the most civilized men. For we are not unaware that there are cities in which the pupils of Justice herself and sacred Themis cut one another to pieces with mutual wounds and criminally assault citizens and residents. What interpreters of justice or presidents over laws will the state someday hope for in men who maraud as though they were being trained for robberies?

What, then, do you advise? What else? Let the Prince impose military laws upon these martial chicks, since through their little ferocious boastfulness they turn away from academic gentleness. The laws of German military service must be brought back from the camps to the academies. At Speyer in the year 1570, the following was decreed concerning cavalrymen.

Law 66. "Moreover, during expeditions, watches, a march under full standards, or the very station of the guard, let no one attack another with armed hand or challenge him to single combat. Whoever does this shall be bound by the prefects present and brought before the tribune of cavalry or the court."

Law 67. "Let no one discharge a firearm against another, whether within or outside the camp; nor attack with weapons anyone standing with his back turned or his face averted; nor challenge another to an equestrian contest; nor in any manner insolently inflict violence upon anyone, under a penalty to be determined according to equestrian law."

Law 68. "Let no one insolently burst into the tents or pavilions of others, either by day or by night, nor inflict violence, under a most grave penalty and a declaration of equestrian law."

Law 73. "During the expedition, let no one renew inveterate enmities and discords, whether in the camp or in the garrisons, nor attempt deliberately to avenge them. Instead, let all either suppress affairs of this kind, permit them to be settled by the tribune of cavalry and his prefects, or use the ordinary course of law. Whoever acts otherwise shall be fined the lawful penalty."

Law 74. "Whoever has either personally beheld two or more men disagreeing with one another or even drawing weapons against one another, or has learned of it while absent through the report of others, shall establish peace between the disagreeing parties. After the matter has been settled, let the factious parties observe without any contradiction the peace established between them for the duration of the expedition."

The laws speak thus concerning the infantry. Law 29:

"Let all and each abstain from rash duels under penalty of death, but diligently pursue familiar association, peace, and union of minds."

30. "Let them not use firearms, spears, or similar weapons in duels, under their military oath; but let swords be permitted to each for the defense of his life, both by cutting and by thrusting."

31. "Let no one renew in any military expedition an old hatred or rancor lying hidden deep in his breast, nor in any manner avenge himself, whether by word or deed, except by the course of law. But whoever transgresses this constitution or contravenes it shall be brought before the judge and, after the case has been examined, punished with loss of honor or life."

32. "Let no one stir up factions between different parties. But if quarrels and enmities arise between any persons, let each of the nearest men faithfully and without any regard for persons constitute themselves mediators for a first, second, and third time. If anyone afterwards does not acquiesce in this settlement, the man who kills him will have inflicted the penalty due to him. But whoever attacks a mediator or an unarmed man shall be brought before the court and, after sufficient investigation of the matter, punished with death."

33. "But whoever should still assail another with a sword or cast it against him, whether before or after the quarrel has been broken up, shall be punished with death."

34. "In order that grave disadvantages and dangers may be forestalled, if quarrels have arisen between two or more persons, or if they have even come to arms, let no one present himself as a partisan of one party rather than the other, but as a separator of the combat. Transgressors of this law shall be punished at the discretion of the commander."

To such a point have evils advanced that studious adolescents devoted to all the arts and virtues cannot be governed even by military discipline! "But when liberty has been taken away, youth will run riot." It is better to depart well than to remain badly. Yet not all will be driven away: only the rash, braggarts, the unskilled, and those who use the privileges of students for wickedness will change their soil. More will arrive, for discipline attracts and dissolution puts to flight.

"Let them altogether abstain from swearing, insults, injuries, detractions, lies, forbidden games, places that are harmful or prohibited by the Prefect of Schools, and, finally, from all things opposed to uprightness of conduct."

Concerning these things it is necessary to admonish nothing else than that students must especially avoid those vices. Certainly, the more learned each person is, the more need there is for him to be better. But enough has been said about these vices in the third book.

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 11. Let them understand that, in matters which concern morals and the study of the good arts, when precepts or admonitions are of less avail, the masters will not fail in their duty to punish them. Let those who refuse punishments, who show no hope of amendment, or who are troublesome to the rest and harmful through their example know that they are to be dismissed from our schools.

I have already shown above that what Plato judged is true: namely, that all are made worse by indulgence. Plato's words are:

> ἡ μὲν τρυφὴ δύσκολα καὶ ἀκράχολα καὶ σφόδρα ἀπὸ σμικρῶν κινούμενα τὰ τῶν νέων ἤθη ἀπεργάζεται, τὸ δὲ τούτων ἐναντίον, ἥ τε σφοδρὰ καὶ ἀγρία δούλωσις, ταπεινοὺς καὶ ἀνελευθέρους καὶ μισανθρώπους ποιοῦσα, ἀνεπιτηδείους συνοίκους ἀποτελεῖ.

That is: indulgence renders the characters of children difficult, peevish, irascible, and such as are violently disturbed by slight occasions; excessive and savage servitude, on the contrary, renders their characters abject, illiberal, and averse to the intercourse of human society, and consequently makes them such as are altogether unfit for every association and familiarity.

§ 12. But another question is now at issue: whether adolescents ought to be governed by fear of punishments. Because this question is rather long and demands a separate place, I reserve it for another time. I admonish only this: it is just that those who neither offer hope of amendment nor cease to be a scandal to others should be banished from academies. I was pleased that this law of schools had also been approved by a military decree of the Senate issued by the German princes. For concerning cavalrymen, Law 45 ordains as follows:

"Likewise, on Sundays, and whenever the signal is given for divine offices or sermons, let masters and nobles, as well as their servants, diligently apply themselves to hearing the word of God and the sacred office of the Mass. Whoever in the meantime is found in drinking-parties, taverns, or other places devoted to scandals and frivolities shall be punished, account being taken of the offense. If he is a servant, he shall be confined in bonds and prison. But if he is a master or noble, he shall be sharply rebuked in words by the master of cavalry or any other prefect. If, however, he shows no amendment and has previously been arraigned before the military tribune, then, according to the laws of the cavalry, notice shall at last be given to him that, for this reason also, if he does not altogether cease from public scandal and an impious manner of life, he will, by a public declaration of law, be dishonorably discharged as an example to others."

Impiety has long brought infamy upon camps:

> There is no faith or piety in men who follow camps;
>
> Their souls are for sale: right is where the greatest payment is.

Yet the assemblies of the most august council in Germany prosecute even the impiety of nobles with punishment and dishonorable discharge. But if the leading men judge that camps must be purged of offenses and evil examples, although in camps there are few who are not an evil example, what must be done among youth most tender in years, whose innocence is both weak and unwary? I would wish the entire city in which an academy is to be established to be like a temple; but because there has been a departure from that purity, the greatest care must be taken concerning those who, under the name of students, smear upon others the vices by which they themselves perish. But those for whom it is more gratifying and profitable to count many hearers rather than disciples do not do this.

§ 13. Let all obey their respective masters; and let them observe as diligently as possible the method of study prescribed by those masters, both in the schools and at home.

I shall speak of obedience--an account of which all must render to God, the state, and their parents--when I have explained with what honor pupils are bound to attend upon their teacher. Method is a thing as necessary as the labor of studying itself. A great part of the best minds, having entered an unknown road, have wandered away from the goal.

§ 14. Let them apply their mind to their studies seriously and constantly; let them be assiduous in attending the schools early, and diligent in hearing and reviewing lectures and in performing the other exercises. But if they comprehend anything imperfectly or have any doubt, let them consult the master.

What assails studious youth with the greatest danger to their studies and morals is the sweetness of idleness. It is a great evil because, by doing nothing, it overthrows everything; and it not only deprives the idle of fruit but also enervates the very powers of memory, intellect, and judgment.

Therefore let them seek diligent, industrious, and energetic adolescents, for whom Stimula may shake off idleness, whom Agenoria may bring forward upon the benches, and to whom Strenua may give strength and perseverance. Let their age, flourishing through learned and honorable labor, dispel both the vices of idleness and those of adolescence; by this one means above all it will flee the enticements of sloth. A certain Thessalian was asked which of his fellow countrymen were the most wicked. He answered: those who had respite from war. I answer freely--and if I am mistaken, I am surely mistaken in very few cases--that I trust no adolescent unless I see industry, diligence, and labor in him. However composed for probity their faces may appear, although their words and gestures display holiness and they wear away the thresholds of all the churches, I do not believe that religion, virtue, and chastity are dear to them if they delight in idleness. Piety is not idle, nor is it languid, any more than it is proud. That affectation is devoid of life, because it fails in its duty and therefore soon dissolves into corruption. Are you a student? Practice virtue; learn letters and sciences. The first part of piety is to obey one's calling and comply with the will of one's parents. The body itself grows feeble in idleness and is overwhelmed by cold diseases, if we believe Galen. The mind, however, becomes altogether brutish. I place among the highest objects of praise the exercises of the Gymnosophists and their education of youth, proposed also for our imitation. For, after summoning the adolescents to table, before the dishes were set down, they asked what they had done up to that hour, so that shame at having to answer might burden those who had passed the day idly, while praise might arouse others whose industry had been conspicuous in some work.

§ 15. Let them hear of diligence greater than human, and follow it so far as they can. Pliny the Younger writes thus concerning the elder Pliny:

"His intellect was keen, his zeal incredible, his wakefulness supreme. He began to work by lamplight from the festival of Vulcan onward, not for the sake of an auspicious beginning, but for study, while much of the night still remained; in winter, however, from the seventh hour, or, at the latest, the eighth, often the sixth. He was certainly most ready for sleep, which sometimes came upon him and left him even amid his very studies. Before dawn he went to the emperor Vespasian, for he too used the nights, and from there to the duty delegated to him. Having returned home, he gave whatever time remained to his studies. After taking food--which during the day he often took lightly and simply, according to the custom of the ancients--if there was any leisure in summer, he lay in the sun; a book was read, and he made notes and excerpts. For he never read anything from which he did not make excerpts. He also used to say that no book was so bad that it could not in some part be useful. After the sun he generally bathed in cold water. Then he took a light meal and slept very briefly. Soon, as though it were another day, he studied until dinnertime. Over dinner a book was read and annotated, and indeed rapidly. I remember that one of his friends, when the reader had pronounced certain things incorrectly, called him back and compelled him to repeat them. My uncle said to him, 'You understood, surely?' When he nodded assent, my uncle said, 'Why, then, did you call him back? By this interruption of yours we have lost more than ten verses.' So great was his economy of time. In summer he rose from dinner while it was light; in winter, within the first hour of night, but as though compelled by some law. These things he did amid his labors and the din of the city. In retirement only the time of the bath was withdrawn from study. When I say the bath, I mean its inner parts; for while he was scraped and dried, he heard something or dictated. On a journey, as though released from other cares, he devoted himself to this alone. At his side was a secretary with a book and writing tablets, whose hands in winter were protected by sleeves, so that not even the harshness of the weather might snatch away any time from study. For this reason he was also carried in a chair at Rome. I recall being reproved by him when I was walking. 'You could,' he said, 'have avoided losing these hours.' For he considered all time lost which was not spent upon studies. By this concentration he completed all those volumes and left me one hundred and sixty notebooks of selected passages, written, indeed, on both sides and in a very minute hand, by which method this number is multiplied. He himself used to relate that, when he was procurator in Spain, he could have sold these notebooks to Largius Licinus for four hundred thousand sesterces, and at that time there were somewhat fewer of them. When you recall how much he read and how much he wrote, does he not seem to you never to have held any offices nor to have enjoyed the friendship of princes? Again, when you hear how much labor he spent upon studies, does he not seem to have written too little and read too little? For what is there that either those occupations could not have hindered or this persistence could not have accomplished? And so I am accustomed to laugh when certain men call me studious, for, if I am compared with him, I am most idle. And am I so only, I whom duties partly public and partly owed to friends distract? Who among those who sit at letters their whole life, when compared with him, would not blush as though devoted to sleep and indolence? I have prolonged the letter, although I had resolved to write only that which you asked, namely, what books he had left. Yet I trust that these things too will be no less pleasing to you than the books themselves, since they can excite you by the spurs of emulation not only to read them but also to work out something similar."

Seneca's diligence was no less. In Epistle 8 he says: "You bid me avoid the crowd, withdraw, and be content with conscience. Where are those precepts of yours which command a man to die in action? What? Do I meanwhile seem to you to be sitting idle? I have hidden myself away and closed my doors for this purpose, that I may be of use to more people. No day passes for me in leisure; I reclaim part of the nights for study. I have no leisure for sleep, but succumb to it, and I keep my eyes, wearied by wakefulness and falling shut, upon their work."

This is to apply the mind seriously to studies. I do not admonish you to declaim with Demosthenes against the roar of falling rivers, or, with pebbles placed in your mouth, to wrench the canine letter from your tongue; nor, in the manner of Carneades, to let an ecstasy of speculation withdraw your hands from food even at table; much less to tear out your eyes with Democritus lest they turn the mind's concentration elsewhere. Those deeds of Carneades and Democritus are monstrosities. I require living and vigorous diligence, which does not withdraw minds from human affairs but adapts them to them. Let both their labor and their industrious leisure be useful to the state.

§ 16. In the lectures themselves I require the greatest attention together with modesty. Strabo relates in Book 15 of his Geography that among the Brahmans, the philosophers of India, it was not lawful to speak, sneeze, or spit. But if carelessness or nature had wrung anything of this kind from anyone, the punishment was to be excluded from the lecture hall for one day. Their censure reproved yawning as though it were vomiting, for they thought that it signified the mind's wandering freedom from care and its very slight attention to present matters. Gellius also records, in Book 5, chapter 20, that in the Attic Academy not even laughter was permitted at first. It is therefore fitting to listen with the greatest care, lest the teacher seem, in the presence of so many people, to be speaking to the walls.

Masters must also be consulted in doubtful matters and without foolish shame; for many make no progress because they do not dare profess their ignorance. The lectures must therefore be reviewed and ruminated upon, and if any difficulty occurs, its resolution must be learned from the master. Thus our Constitutions admonish, Part 4, chapter 3, §3.

And Common Rule 11 states: "After the lecture let him remain in the school, or near the school, for at least a quarter of an hour, so that the hearers may be able to approach him to ask questions; and from time to time let him require an account of the lectures and take care that they be repeated."

Attalus showed himself such a man to his pupils, whom Seneca, a grateful pupil, praises in Epistle 108: “I remember Attalus instructing us in these things, when we besieged his school, arrived first, and departed last. Even while he was walking we called him forth to certain discussions. He was not only prepared for learners, but met them halfway.”

§ 17. In the schools let them not wander this way and that, but let each remain modestly and silently beneath his own bench and in his own place, intent upon himself and his affairs. Let them not leave the school unless the master has granted permission to leave. Let them not disfigure or mark the benches, the chair, the seats, the walls, the doors, the windows, or anything else by painting, writing, a small knife, or any other means.

I do not linger over explaining this law, because it is manifest of itself and from the dictate of Themis; nor is it transgressed except by boys or by those who are childish.

§ 18. Let them flee the depraved or even suspect company of others; let them associate only with those by whose example and company they may make progress in the study of letters and of virtues.

I consider it an error in the state that no action lies for a depraved friendship and association. For how great a protection would it be if a day could be appointed for such a man to appear in court, and if the praetor granted an action against one who associated with a wicked man? The society of depraved men is, and always will be, a great evil to the state and to schools; for diseases, plague, and madness spread themselves by contagion, whereas health is not transmitted to a companion. Let all, therefore, choose the best men with whom to associate--those in whose company they would not blush to be seen and from whom they may gather fruit, not disgrace. Some evil always comes from an evil neighbor; all evils are never absent from academies, and often very many are present. In every academy there are ὁμωρόφοι χελιδόνες, swallows under the same roof, which are troublesome by their chattering and filth. Pythagoras gave excellent admonition:

γαμψώνυχα μὴ τρέφειν, not to nourish things with curved claws. Yet, with their weapons drawn in, they too insinuate themselves, and they are not revealed until after they have done harm.

Σκυμνὸν λέοντος πᾶσα μὲν πόλις τρέφει.

Every city indeed nourishes a lion’s cub; but it does not know that its nature is a lion’s, and when it has become a lion, the city will understand this to its own loss. Every likeness is efficacious for conciliating love, but likeness of studies most of all. That saying is elegant:

Γέρων γέροντι γλῶτταν ἡδίστην ἔχει,

Παῖς παιδί, καὶ γυναικὶ πρόσφορον γυνή,

Νοσῶν τ’ ἀνὴρ νοσοῦντι, καὶ δυσπραξίᾳ

Ληφθείς, ἔποδός ἐστι τῷ πεπραγμένῳ.

An old man has a most pleasant tongue for an old man, a boy for a boy, and a woman for a woman; a sick man for a sick man, and one who is beset by misfortune for one who has experienced the same.

One must be cautious even in the very school of virtues. It has been said severely but truly: you dwell with scorpions. Scorpions are those whose society is pestiferous, who strike swiftly with an arched tail, and with the same weapon with which they open the wound also pour in poison, for they bear a hollow sting. Wicked companions likewise insinuate themselves into familiarity by art and destroy by that same art. A scorpion’s tail is always ready for a blow, and at no moment does it cease to prepare, lest it fail to seize an opportunity. It strikes with an oblique and curved stroke. Because it is not possible to distinguish all these men, those who have recognized them are commanded by law to flee them. But if anyone associates familiarly with publicly infamous men, he is deservedly driven from the company of the more honorable; for by such impious association he has already proscribed his own reputation.

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 19. Let them altogether abstain from reading pernicious and useless books.

All rectors of academies must attend to this seriously, so that they may cast out bad books. Certainly Rule 8 for our professors requires it: "Let him earnestly commend spiritual reading, especially the lives of the saints. On the other hand, not only is he himself to abstain from reading to the young impure writers and, in general, those in whom there is anything capable of harming good morals, but he is also to deter his pupils as much as he can from reading those same writers outside the school."

The Constitution, Part 4, chapter 5, and its Declaration proceed in the same spirit: "In pagan books of humane letters, let nothing opposed to decency be read in lecture. The Society will be able to use the rest as the spoils of Egypt. Although the works of Christians might be good, if the author is nevertheless bad, they are not to be read, lest some become attached to the author. And it is fitting, descending to particulars, to determine which books are to be read in lecture, both in humane letters and in the other disciplines, and which cannot be read in lecture."

And chapter 14 states: "In general, those books shall be read in lecture which are held to contain the more solid and secure teaching in each faculty. Nor are those to be touched whose teaching or authors are suspect. These, however, are to be named individually in each university. In theology, the Old and New Testaments and the scholastic doctrine of St. Thomas shall be read; and in that theology which they call positive, those authors shall be selected who seem more suitable for our purpose.

"As regards Latin or Greek books of humane letters, in universities as well as in colleges, so far as this can be done, let there be abstention from reading to the young those in which there is anything capable of harming good morals, unless they have first been purged of dishonorable matters and words."

And the Declaration states: "Although a book is free of suspicion of bad doctrine, nevertheless, when its author is suspect, it is not fitting that the book be read. For a work is accustomed to cause its reader to become attached to its author, and the authority which the author possesses with him in matters in which he speaks well may afterwards persuade him of something among those matters in which he speaks badly. It is also rare for no poison to be mixed into things which issue from a heart full of poison."

And concerning books of humane literature it ordains thus: "If any cannot be altogether purged, as Terence cannot, let them rather not be read, lest the nature of their subject matter offend purity of mind."

§ 20. No one can rightly complain here. If it is disgraceful to speak about obscene matters, why should you desire eloquence in expounding them? Certainly today books contain very many incitements to vice, and evil books are read more eagerly. This concerns the state: a polity which maintains severe laws concerning the striking of coinage must also make laws concerning books, for it is more serious that minds be corrupted than the credit of commerce.

I prefer that the counsels which our most learned Delrio offers on this matter in his Sacred Adages be read in his own words. On Ecclesiastes 12: "But if you dispute diverse and discordant things, and with excessive curiosity lead your mind this way and that, even in one book there are many books. Whence it has been said, 'From much speaking you will not escape sin.' There is therefore no end to such books. For goodness and truth are bounded by a definite end, but wickedness and falsehood are without end; and the more they are sought, the greater the sequence of them that is born." Alcuin, Lyra, Arboreus, and others agree, except that these direct the passage chiefly against the writers themselves, for:

--the insatiable itch of writing possesses many.

This certainly ought to be restrained by still stricter laws, so that nothing not reviewed by censors may be published, and, if anything has been published by an evil hand, it may be expurgated. This is the wish of a Catholic heart. But the saying of Joseph Scaliger in his Elenchus is: "To have expurgatory indexes belongs to Marranos"--a maxim worthy of a heretic and an apostate from the right faith.

Others also judge this teaching of Solomon useful to readers, and deservedly so. John Terus says prudently: "He who departs from that one book of Sacred Scripture and turns to those many books, that is, to the various inventions of men, will never arrive at the true end, which is God; or he will never arrive at true knowledge. As Paul says, they are 'always learning and never attaining to the knowledge of the truth,' since they are moved by every wind of doctrine. Therefore, just as we do not rashly admit any foods whatever to the palate without discrimination unless beforehand we are certain in every respect, so too--and indeed much more diligently--care must be taken that you not dignify the trifles of any men whatever with your reading. For in the former matter only the body is endangered; in the latter, however, the soul."

Thus speaks that author. Olympiodorus the Elder enumerates the kinds of volumes from which Solomon restrains us: namely, first, the volumes and monuments of the gentiles, who overturn and attack one another's opinions and always wage a most grievous war among themselves; second, the books of heretics who disagree with one another; third, the recent and secondary volumes of the Jews--that is, the Deuterotic works of the Talmudists--which are almost infinite and filled with fables. For while they strive to interpret the Scriptures by certain novel figures, they have been turned aside into ridiculous fables and genealogies and have produced traditions wandering far from the meaning of the writer. Concerning these last, the reader will be able to consult our Nicolaus Serarius's commentary On the Rabbis. Concerning heretics, the matter is known and settled and has likewise been approved by the judgment of the Church. Concerning the books of the gentiles, moderation and selection are advised, not complete flight from them. I spoke at length in the preface to my Tragic Syntagma, dedicated to Laevinus Torrentius, worthy of eternal remembrance and at that time bishop of my native land.

I add only the opinion of a learned and pious Father. This is Isidore of Pelusium, Book 2, Epistle 3, to Timothy. Arousing him to the study of Sacred Scripture, and having recalled its dignity, usefulness, and sweetness, he concludes that from the external learning of secular wisdom we must gather, like a little bee, only as much as conduces to our philosophy, and must bid the rest farewell:

> ὅσον μὲν οὖν χρήσιμον εἰς τὴν καθ' ἡμᾶς φιλοσοφίαν ἐκ τῆς ἔξωθεν παιδεύσεως, ὥσπερ ἡ μέλιττα, δρεψάμενος, τὸ λοιπὸν ἅπαν χαίρειν ἔα.

I end with Quintilian's admonition in Book 10, chapter 1, of the Institutes of Oratory: "One must become accustomed to the best, and the mind is to be formed, and its color imparted, by reading much rather than by reading many authors."

§ 21. Let them not go to public spectacles, comedies, games, or the executions of condemned persons; nor let them act any character upon the stages of outsiders unless permission has first been given by the master or by the prefect of the school.

I spoke about spectacles in the third book. Anyone who wishes to read what was said there will approve this law with his own vote.

§ 22. Let them strive to preserve a sincere and pure mind and to obey the divine laws with the greatest diligence. Let them very frequently and from the heart commend themselves to God, to the most holy Virgin Mother of God, and to the other saints. Let them continually implore the aid of the angels, and especially of their guardian angel. Let them always observe modesty elsewhere, but most particularly in church and in school.

§ 23. Finally, in all matters and actions let them so conduct themselves that anyone may easily understand that they are no less devoted to virtue and integrity of life than to letters and learning.

They will therefore attend to these things with great zeal, taking thought not only for their own salvation but also for the honor of the schools and academies. I have already treated piety and the pursuit of virtue in two books; nevertheless, I commend them especially to students of letters, as the nobler members of Christian youth.

CHAPTER IX

Professors of the Sciences Must Be Held in Honor

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. The precept concerning the honoring of parents is the first accompanied by a promise; the reward of that observance is longevity. Those who form minds, the sources of learning and wisdom and the most illustrious authors of virtues, come into the place of parents; therefore they too deserve the honor due to parents. Alexander both acknowledged and declared in a royal utterance that he owed no less to Aristotle than to Philip--indeed, more--because from Philip he had received the means to live, but from Aristotle the means to live well. The whole matter can be defined by these few words.

§ 2. Professors ought to consecrate the immense labors which they sustain to the public good and to divine glory, and not seek the enticements of a soft and quiet life or the vanities of honors. For although this is disgraceful in every office, in a candidate for wisdom it is certainly most disgraceful. For who could endure that the most laborious knowledge of the most beautiful and hidden things, and the very teaching of virtue, should serve the foulest and emptiest things? Those who lead others to the end and the highest good ought not themselves to fall away from the end and the highest good.

§ 3. Teachers ought to be honored not only by their pupils, but also by the pupils' parents and by the state. By the parents, indeed, because they have chosen them for their children as other parents. They are no less compelled to render an account to God for the instruction of their pupils than parents are for their upbringing. The souls entrusted to them therefore reside with them, and they keep watch, destined to render an account for others.

In this matter the ingratitude of certain parents is proud and insulting toward masters, since they hold either the domestic tutors or the public professors of their sons in contempt. For they also teach their sons to rise against their teachers, and imbue them with a pernicious opinion. At length the calamity of the wretched household comes to this: after the son has accused his master, the father has believed him, and the mother has condemned the master, by that example the parents themselves are attacked in turn. For he who rushes against his master with an injurious foot does not honor his parents; nor is a father worthy of an obedient son when he has taught him to be ungrateful toward his master. Of all those who have set themselves against their masters and against discipline as men of contempt, I know not one over whom his mother has not wept.

An outstanding example of honoring a master is set before us in the most excellent emperor Theodosius. Concerning him Nicephorus writes in Book 17, chapter 23: "About the same time, the emperor, wishing to appoint a master of virtue over his children, found that Arsenius whose glory had traversed every land beneath the sun, and entrusted them to him. Having received them, Arsenius took the place both of a teacher in every discipline and of a father in a liberal education. For the emperor had admonished him not to conceive any fear from their imperial elevation, but rather to treat them as servants. Yet so far was Arsenius from doing this that, with remarkable modesty and moderation, he did rather the contrary. And when Theodosius once came upon them suddenly, he found the boys sitting in magnificent splendor, but Arsenius standing beside them as he taught.

"For this reason the emperor, angered, both stripped them of the insignia of princes and uttered that saying worthy of everlasting memory and truly imperial: if they were going to show themselves such that they would conform their morals and life to discipline and to the laws of God, he too would be ready to deliver the empire into their hands, adapted to the advantage and benefit of the citizens and subjects; but if not, he said that it was more advantageous for them to pass their life as private persons than to rule without learning and with danger."

The prince and the state are also bound to attend them with public honor, for God himself wished them to be honored: "Those who have been learned shall shine like the brightness of the firmament, and those who instruct many unto justice like stars unto perpetual eternities." Moreover, they are engaged in an honorable and splendid function: teaching the liberal arts, philosophy, medicine, jurisprudence, and theology. If, therefore, they teach the most illustrious, useful, and altogether necessary things, and if they instruct kings themselves and governors themselves, the state cannot permit them to remain without honor unless it is itself either ignorant or contemptuous of what is right and honorable. Isocrates, in his letter to the prince of Mytilene, places learned professors in an exalted--that is, in their proper--place. He says first that good and just governors of states must be held in high esteem, and that the next place in dignity must be granted to learned men who can be an ornament and an aid to cities.

§ 4. By this law even princes and magnates, and even kings, are privately bound. For no majesty of a kingdom brings it about that honor is not to be rendered to parents and masters. It is a law of nature, and one inculcated again in the Mosaic tablets, that parents be honored; and under the name of parents are understood magistrates and teachers also, not only those who begot us. The barbarous nations teach that the matter is so, for they venerate teachers beyond what can be expressed. Nicolaus Trigautius says in Book 1, chapter 8: "The Chinese venerate masters altogether more religiously than our people do; and although one man has subjected himself to another as a pupil for a single day in any science or art, throughout the whole of his life thereafter he calls him master and honors him as a master. For in every gathering he sits only at his side and honors him with magisterial titles and rites."

The prince, therefore, will also honor teachers by hearing them, granting easy access, assenting to equitable requests, and pardoning an accused person at their request whenever this can be done without injury to the public peace.

Certainly, the greater the solicitude of the man who instructs a prince than of him who instructs a private person, the greater the gratitude which the prince owes to a faithful master. For although the teacher's trouble is equal in either case, nevertheless the pride of powerful children burdens the former with greater disdain. He who teaches his own lord undergoes great labors at great peril.

§ 5. Those who hold a lesser magistracy in the state ought not to wonder if they observe public teachers sometimes placed before them. For although those magistrates have been endowed with power, nevertheless greater honor is frequently bestowed upon virtue and learning than upon a magistracy, because their excellence is greater than that of a power which governs under another's auspices according to a fixed law. Moreover, they derive from masters and teachers the very ability to administer their part of public affairs rightly; nor should those who teach the science of governing be placed lower than those who use it. Third, in the end the acts of satraps and praetors are examined by the learned, and men abide by their judgment. Those learned men are therefore judges of judges; for either the judges themselves ought to be learned, or they ought to judge according to the opinion of learned men.

Formerly men were not readily admitted to magistracies, to the interpretation of laws, or to tribunals unless they brought testimonials of learning and certificates from academies. For judging is a royal function, which kings cannot entrust to the unskilled without committing a crime. For if the man whom they put in charge of affairs and command to end controversies needs another to preside over him, and if he is compelled to receive the wording of his sentence from another judge, is it not fitting that he should honor his author? That he should honor the man without whom he cannot maintain his own place, the man whom he has as the support of his dignity?

§ 6. States and kings formerly attended teachers of the disciplines with various and great honors.

The rewards which were customarily paid to professors of the arts are these.

The first and most common is that a salary be established from public funds, lest those who are, as it were, fathers of the fatherland--men from whom all derive the means to think well and live well--should be in need. It is the mark of a flourishing state that ample rewards are paid to professors of the disciplines. These are of three kinds. Some privately hire masters for themselves, as is now common in the courts of magnates; and such is the care taken over tutors. It is necessary that this be done among the Chinese, whose letters and characters are of such a kind that scarcely more than one person can be taught by one man at the same time, as Nicolaus Trigautius relates in Book 1.

Other payments are those which individuals contribute to a public professor. This custom existed at Rome in Augustine's time; for he himself detests the fraud of pupils by which they cheated teachers of the agreed payment. Yet the fraud was not new, but already customary of old. The satirist cries:

> All wish to know; no one wishes to pay the fee.

The third kind is the most honorable, and that ordinarily decreed in a well-ordered state: that professors be paid from the treasury. For in this way the studies of the poor are best provided for, and the freedom of the teacher is greater, since his fortunes do not depend upon the fraud of his pupils. For that saying of the sage Prodicus, who taught no one without payment, > χεὶρ χεῖρα νίπτει, δίδου τι, ἀπόλαβε,

"hand washes hand; give something and receive," was as burdensome to the poor as it was disgraceful to wisdom, since greed was thereby censured. Yet the civil laws command that a guardian pay on behalf of his ward fees not as small as he can contrive, but in proportion to the means of the estate and the dignity of the ward's birth. Certainly the senate of the Apostles rightly lives from the Gospel, and priests from the altar; why should not the liberal arts also support their own initiate?

The state, therefore, must provide for the pursuits of wisdom. For Philostratus does not rightly defend Protagoras on the ground that he taught for payment so that learning given without cost might not be considered cheap, and so that easy access to the greatest things might not lie open to contempt. For if public expenditure forestalls private expenses, greater authority is won for the teacher, since the studies of all are honored and sustained not only by expenditure but also by the approval of the magistrate.

Augustus therefore acted rightly. Although he had forbidden a salary to be granted from the treasury without his permission, he nevertheless permitted it on account of a liberal art. For he did not wish to incur guilt against wisdom, since he himself had cultivated those arts earnestly from boyhood and had exercised himself in camp every day by declaiming and reading. Vespasian established salaries of one hundred thousand sesterces for rhetoricians, and Antoninus ten thousand drachmas. Justinian most wickedly abolished them; for he abolished the stipends of the liberal arts in every city and, when the schools ceased, introduced rusticity and barbarism, as Zonaras teaches. Nor can he be defended on the ground that he enacted laws favorable to the liberal arts, since he altered them so many times and twisted them to his own advantage.

Far more nobly did a barbarian king, who was by then lord of Rome, write to the Senate. Cassiodorus in Book 9 relates that Athalaric wrote as follows: "We recognize that we have rightly referred the concerns of sons to the persons of fathers, so that they themselves ought to take thought for the advancement of those whose interest it is to perfect Roman studies. For it is not to be believed that you can be less solicitous about a source from which both adornment increases for your race and counsel comes to your assembly through continual reading. Recently, since our care for you is solicitous, we learned through the whispering of certain persons that the teachers of Roman eloquence do not possess the appointed rewards of their labor, and that by the huckstering of certain men it comes about that the sum assigned to the masters of schools appears to be diminished. Therefore, since it is manifest that reward nourishes the arts, we have judged it a crime that anything should be taken away from the teachers of adolescents, who ought rather to be summoned to glorious studies by an increase of their advantages."

§ 7. Those stipends are never excessive. Knowledge of philosophy, medicine, law, and theology can never be requited by an equal remuneration, even if their professors are adorned with kingdoms and provinces. Nero voluntarily heaped immense wealth upon his master. Nero himself says in Tacitus, Annals 14: “You have given me immeasurable gratitude and countless wealth, so that very often I turn the thought over within myself: where is that spirit content with modest things? Does such a spirit lay out gardens like these, walk through these suburban estates, and abound in such expanses of lands and such extensive interest?”

So great were the riches accumulated by the munificence of a prodigal prince that they could not fail to arouse envy and disparagement. “Slanderers,” says the same Tacitus, “assail Seneca with various accusations, alleging that he was still increasing wealth already immense and raised beyond the measure of a private person; that he was turning the pursuits of the citizens toward himself; and that in the charm of his gardens and the magnificence of his villas he was, as it were, surpassing the prince.”

But how much had Nero given Seneca? Tacitus, Book 13: “By what wisdom, by what precepts of the philosophers, had he amassed three hundred million sesterces within four years of royal friendship? At Rome wills and childless men were caught, as it were, by his hunting-net; Italy and the provinces were drained by his immense interest.”

I would not wish for this luxury, nor do I excuse Seneca; yet neither do I marvel at it, since actors and stage-players possessed greater wealth, and since Narcissus, Felix, and monsters of that kind acquired royal riches through disgraceful services. In our own times too we remember learned men enticed by great stipends.

Even the Persians, a martial race, practiced that munificence: they paid the prefect of the Magi four pounds of gold each month, according to Abdias of Babylon, Book 6. How royal is Artaxerxes’ letter to Hystanes, prefect of the Hellespont! “The fame of the art of Hippocrates the physician, descended from Aesculapius, has reached me. See to it, therefore, that you give him as much gold as he wishes, and other things which he needs, and send him to me; for he will be equal in honor to the highest men in Persia. And if there is any illustrious man in Europe, make him a friend of our house, sparing no money; for men, although powerful, do not readily find what they honorably desire. Farewell.”

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 8. The second kind of honor was that princes were accustomed either to visit and hear them themselves or to summon them with a great manifestation of honor and kindness. There survive in Laertius, Book 9, letters from Darius to Heraclitus more courteous than might be expected from barbarian pride: “King Darius desires to be your hearer and to become a participant in Greek learning. Come, therefore, at once into my presence and royal house. For with me every honor and every private privilege will be available to you, together with solicitous daily observance, pleasing conversation, and a manner of life agreeable to your character.”

Dionysius, a savage and proud tyrant, summoned Plato in a ship adorned with fillets and received him upon the shore as he arrived in a chariot drawn by four white horses. He did this not from esteem for learning or virtue, but because he desired to win reputation from familiarity with the philosopher and to offer his subjects hope of a milder reign.

Pompey the Great, although not made more illustrious by that courtesy, was certainly praised more for it than for his three triumphs from as many parts of the world.

For, passing through Rhodes from Asia, he heard all the professors of the good arts; and when they had satisfied him most fully, he offered each of them a talent of gold. He also wished to visit Posidonius, the most noble philosopher. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 2: “When he had seen and greeted him and attended him with honorable words, he said that he was grieved that he could not hear him. But Posidonius said, ‘Indeed you can, nor shall I allow pain of the body to cause so great a man to have come to me in vain.’ And so Pompey used to relate that Posidonius, while lying down, discoursed gravely and copiously on this very proposition: that nothing is good except what is honorable.”

Not only did Pompey visit him, but he lowered before him the laurelled fasces and the victorious insignia, and would not permit the door of a learned man, as though more sacred than his own command, to be struck by a lictor. You may marvel at this in Pompey: that he submitted himself to a philosopher, when his country could not reduce him to private station except by death. Without doubt Pompey perceived that there was something good in Posidonius more venerable than his own majesty, and the multitude of those who praised him agreed. Antigonus expressed this in words in a letter to Zeno, as found in Laertius, Book 7: “I think that in fortune and glory I surpass your life; but in the disciplines, liberal studies, and perfect happiness which you possess, I perceive that I am far surpassed by you. I have therefore determined to entreat you to come to me, persuading myself that you will by no means allow my prayers to be in vain. Do you therefore strive by every means that we may enjoy your companionship, knowing certainly that you will be the teacher not only of me but of all the Macedonians. For it is certain that he who educates the king of Macedonia also instructs his subjects in fortitude and probity. For whatever the leader has been like, such for the most part must the subjects become.”

§ 9. In the third place, it is customary for this honor to be bestowed upon masters and professors: those who are established in public functions not only desire to associate them with themselves, but are also bound to do so by the laws. Governors are commanded to incite with honor and the hope of rewards those whose prudence they consider necessary to themselves. They cannot despise those whose wisdom they see to be necessary to them. For in reality nature has so arranged matters that he who is strong in intellect and prudence, commands, while he who is inferior obeys. The ancients esteemed this so highly that Cicero judges Caelius the jurist to have been so proud that he preferred to be consulted by Caesar rather than gilded by him. For he who consults another acknowledges the other’s excellence; he who gilds him reproaches him with servile greed. Hence it also came about that the kings of the Persians were either themselves learned or were governed by learned men whom they called Magi.

§ 10. In favor of public teachers, many immunities were also granted to peoples and cities, or offenses were pardoned. Ptolemy, most courteously inviting and receiving the seventy translators and astonished at the miracle of their concordant translations, bestowed immense benefactions upon the Jews. Sulla spared Athens on account of the dead; for he judged it unworthy of a human being to destroy the dwelling-place of humanity. Alexander rebuilt for Aristotle his Stagira, which had been leveled to the ground. He granted Lampsacus to Anaximenes. For when he was besieging it and saw Anaximenes come forth, knowing that he would act as an intercessor, Alexander asserted on oath that he would not grant what Anaximenes sought. But Anaximenes said, “I ask that you destroy Lampsacus.” In this I do not know which I should admire more: the ingenuity of Anaximenes, who compelled the king to swear contrary to his own desire, or the spirit of Alexander, who thought that the prayers of a learned man could be repulsed only by putting an oath in their way, and who feared the prayers of one philosopher more than the walls and arms of his enemies. Augustus imitated Alexander, for he pardoned the Alexandrians on account of Areus, his teacher in philosophy. How different from him was the man who killed Seneca because Seneca was troublesome to his vices!

§ 11. It is established by the judgment of princes that many were adorned with civil honors, solely by the prerogative of learning. Pharaoh raised up Joseph, Darius Daniel, Gratian Ausonius, and Antoninus Proculus; and, if ancient examples are pleasing, Achilles raised up his teacher Phoenix and judged him worthy to reign with him:

ἶσον ἐμοὶ βασίλευε καὶ ἥμισυ μείρεο τιμῆς.

Reign with equal right together with me, and receive half of the honor.

That was the private affection of magnates toward their own teachers; other emperors, in order to arouse studies, were munificent toward all. Theodosius and Valentinian numbered masters whose work had been approved among those who possessed the rank of vicar. The dignity of vicars was equal to that of counts and dukes; the laws permit them also the same rank of count. St. Basil applied himself greatly to this: that the sons of the Cappadocians should be instructed in the good arts and in morals, and when they had advanced in learning, he earnestly took care that they should be raised to great honors. Constantine likewise aroused minds by liberality and marks of honor.

§ 12. Antiquity also erected statues and columns, and sometimes even altars, to learning. The Romans placed a statue for Prohaeresius--"the queen of cities to the king of eloquence," as Eunapius relates--but certainly with excessive ambition. The same Romans acted better when they made a statue for Pythagoras as for the wisest man in accordance with an oracle, as Plutarch relates in his Numa. For in doing the same for Alcibiades as though he were the bravest, they erred grievously. Mithridates, king of Pontus, did this for Plato with better right. But the honor of statues was afterwards communicated to more men, since Orbilius Pupillus was presented with one of marble, as Suetonius is our authority. Alexander had consecrated statues of Cicero and Virgil in his household shrine, as Lampridius relates. All Greece placed a golden statue of Gorgias of Leontini in the temple of Apollo at Delphi, while the rest were honored only with gilded statues. Valerius, Book 8, chapter 16.

The Crotoniates attended Pythagoras with great honors; after he died, they consecrated his house as a temple of Ceres, because they thought it unworthy that men unlike so wise a man should dwell beneath that roof. I marvel more that the Macedonians erected a monument to Euripides, since they were less cultivated in letters. The Spartans too acted contrary to their custom--for they were enemies of poetry and philosophy--when, after Thebes had been captured, they inscribed upon Pindar's house:

> Πινδάρου τοῦ μουσοποιοῦ τὴν στέγην μὴ καίετε.

Do not burn the poet's house.

Alfonso, the great and learned king of Aragon, judged that even Cicero's villa ought to be spared. For during the siege of Gaeta he prohibited stones and timber from being sought from it for artillery and engines, and declared that he preferred never to use artillery rather than violate the estate of so great an orator. The reason why so great an honor is rendered to such men is known, and Sigismund also gave it to certain men. For when some were indignant that he seemed to promote learned men too high, he answered that he rightly loved those whom nature had willed to excel.

Therefore, just as princes act foolishly when they readily dismiss prudent and energetic counselors or compel them to depart through the meagerness of their stipend--because they are soon eagerly summoned by greater princes--so they also sin in neglecting learned men, whom they understand for the first time to have departed with dishonor to their own province when it is reported to them that those men have come into esteem among others. For if, in the honorable arts--as Juvenal admonishes in Satire 3--

> There is no place in the city, no recompense for labors;
>
> My property is less today than it was yesterday, and tomorrow
>
> The same will wear away something from the little that remains. We propose to go
>
> There where Daedalus put off his wearied wings.

For in truth, as he had recognized and inculcates in Satire 7:

> Many have repented of a vain and barren chair,
>
> As the fate of Thrasymachus proves, and that of Secundus
>
> Carrinas; and him too you saw destitute, Athens,
>
> You who dared to confer nothing but cold hemlock.

The prince, therefore, the state, parents, and above all pupils owe honor to their teachers. Although they render it in great measure, they will never give as much as the teachers' merits deserve. A greater sum of debts will remain in the account-books, a sum which will never be crossed out except by acknowledgment and love.

Gratian, son of Valentinian, is my witness. He wrote to Ausonius his teacher in these words: "When I alone was turning over with myself the question of the consuls to be created for the year--as you know me, as I ought to have done, and as I knew you wished--I referred my decision to God. Obeying his authority, I designated you consul, declared you consul, and named you first. I have sent you a palm-embroidered robe, in which the Divine Constantine our father is woven. I have paid what I owed, and I still owe what I have paid."

CHAPTER X

Youth Must Be Kept to Its Duty by Moderate Punishments and Blows

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. This care too is not foreign to the state. Elsewhere I have taught that a soft and delicate education is the mother of insolence, the root of wickedness, and the nourishment of pride and irascibility. I now discuss whether all punishment ought to be confined to sharpness of words, sobriety of life, and labors suitable to youthful age, or whether the impulses of improvident minds should be restrained by fear of beatings and whips.

That age, which cannot yet be mistress of itself, has great patrons of bodily immunity: among the Greeks, Plutarch; among the Latins, Quintilian. Plutarch, a man of tested wisdom, has the greater authority; for the insolence and dissoluteness of Quintilian's pupils refuted him, not without a mark of disgrace. Nevertheless, they are accustomed to advance arguments. First, they say, it is disgraceful for an adolescent to be beaten, because base dispositions and abandoned sloth are driven to duty by whips. A noble horse needs a bridle; the slowness of asses is urged into a run by neither spurs nor clubs. Blows applied to freeborn bodies are therefore insulting.

Let the eagerness of learners be nourished by kindness, praise, little gifts, honors, and the shadowy insignia of school magistracies. Let not solicitude and fear of a raging Orbilius oppress tender minds, lest they begin to hate the sciences before they can taste their sweetness. For since the roots of the arts are bitter and are seasoned with scarcely any pleasure, their sadness ought not to be increased by the austerity of a threatening countenance, a grim brow, and the bitterness of blows. It is better to restrain adolescents by shame and liberality than by fear.

Quintilian speaks beautifully: "I am not so unacquainted with the stages of life as to think that the tender must at once be pressed harshly and full exertion demanded from them. For this must especially be guarded against: that one who cannot yet love studies should hate them and, after once experiencing their bitterness, fear them even beyond his unformed years. Let this be play; let him be questioned and praised; sometimes let another be taught, though he himself is unwilling, so that he may envy him; let him compete from time to time and think himself victorious more often; let him be called forth by rewards which that age desires.

"I would also wish the verses set before him for imitation in writing to contain not idle sentiments, but something admonishing him of what is honorable. The memory of these things follows into old age, and what is impressed upon unformed minds will benefit their morals. It is also permissible for him to learn amid play the sayings of illustrious men and selected passages, chiefly from the poets, for acquaintance with them is more pleasing to the young."

For if dispositions are upright, tractable, obedient, and fond of studies and labor, it is madness to harass them with blows; if they are depraved, stubborn, and idle, they cannot be amended even by blows. The case has been pleaded; it remains for us to cry out: O Porcian laws and Sempronian laws! I could be popular if I approved these arguments. The Porcian law removed rods from the bodies of all Roman citizens. The Porcian law wrested the liberty of citizens from the lictor. Cicero, in his speech For Rabirius, and Livy say: "The Porcian law was enacted for the backs of citizens, because it established a grave penalty if anyone had beaten or killed a Roman citizen. For the Valerian law had added nothing beyond declaring that it was wickedly done." If those milder men introduce the Porcian law into the schools of the entire world, they will boast that they have brought in a new light of liberty and restored the freeborn to their former condition. But because it is of great importance to observe measure in this matter, since a master's severity has ruined many and his leniency more, I shall explain the matter briefly.

§ 2. First I determine that in this case the Porcian law does not have the force of law, and that anyone will act rightly if he corrects the errors of adolescence with blows. For he will do this by divine authority: "He who loves his son frequently applies the whip to him, that he may rejoice at his latter end and not grope for the doors of his neighbors." Ecclesiasticus 30:1. Indeed, those men bring it about by loving their sons that they hate them most ruinously through their love. "He who spares the rod hates his son, but he who loves him instructs him earnestly." Proverbs 13:24. For that age is capable of instruction. "Have you sons? Instruct them, and bend them from their childhood." Nor believe him so wise that he does not need that discipline. "Folly is bound up in the heart of a child, and the rod of discipline will drive it away." Proverbs 22:15. The Holy Spirit did not leave unspoken the fruit of so holy a severity: "Do not withhold discipline from a child; for if you strike him with a rod, he shall not die. You shall strike him with the rod and deliver his soul from hell."

Ecclesiasticus, chapter 30, verse 8, gives the cause and necessity: "An untamed horse becomes stubborn, and an indulged son becomes headstrong. Fondle a son, and he will make you afraid; play with him, and he will grieve you. Do not laugh with him, lest you suffer sorrow and at the last your teeth be set on edge. Give him no power in his youth, and do not disregard his thoughts. Bend his neck in youth and beat his sides while he is a child, lest perhaps he become hardened and not believe you, and he become the sorrow of your soul."

We would already have a fully pleaded case if the infinite truth of God, nowhere false and never deceiving, possessed as much weight with everyone as the moments of their private judgment. But because pseudo-politicians prefer the cleverness of their own reason to heavenly prudence, let us estimate the matter according to right reason.

§ 3. Since human desires and passions seethe most fiercely in adolescence, and since at that age there is less strength to endure and less prudence to avoid dangers, adolescents need the wisdom of another person as a stronger remedy. For adults, prisons, fetters, workhouses, evil lodgings, swords, cords of torture, crosses, and pyres are prepared, lest they dare to conceive and perpetrate crimes. A more tender age must also be restrained by its own terrors. Beginnings must be resisted; for a small error at the beginning grows beyond measure. Lines drawn from one center, almost parallel and separated by a scarcely perceptible distance, as they advance are separated from one another by an immense space.

The prince restrains drunkenness, thefts, murders, embezzlements, perjuries, and calumnies by the vigor of the laws. Far more necessary is it that their beginnings in children be restrained: sippings from cups, thefts of pens and little coins, fights and bites, plundering of gardens, little lies, and frauds. For through these lesser things they arrive at those greatest crimes.

§ 4. But let them learn to flee sins from love of virtue, not from fear of punishment. Indeed, let them love virtue and hate vices not only on account of their foulness, which they do not yet sufficiently recognize, but also on account of the company of punishments which renders the sweetness of vices bitter and horrible. Punishment causes them to interrupt their sins; interruption causes them at length to cease sinning; and cessation from sins is the beginning of virtue. That age is full of sins, as Augustine admonishes in Book 10 of The Literal Meaning of Genesis, chapter 12.

For we are not treating only of children somewhat advanced in years, to whom certain men are unwilling to attribute sin of their own until the juncture of their fourteenth year, when they begin to reach puberty. We would rightly believe this if there were no sins except those committed with the genital members. But who would dare affirm that thefts, lies, and perjuries are not sins, unless he wished to commit such things with impunity? Yet childhood is full of them, although they do not appear punishable in children in the same way as in older persons, because it is hoped that, as years are added and reason grows strong, they will be able to understand salutary precepts better and obey them more willingly. Nevertheless, if children commit these things with impunity, there is no hope that when older they will not dare what was permitted when they were small.

Certainly, who would deny that those sins must be punished except one who has endeavored to overthrow the whole state?

But blows, they say, are not fitting for great talents. Those talents, however, must be restrained especially and frequently, because they flee labor and pursue pleasant things rather than useful ones; they must be reproved even by fear and blows. I shall set down a passage of Augustine, than whom no one was greater in talent, who unfolds for us the history of his own time in Book 1 of the Confessions, chapters 9 and 10:

"O God, my God, what miseries and mockeries I experienced there, since as a boy this was set before me as the rule for living rightly: to obey those who admonished me, so that I might flourish in this world and excel in wordy arts which serve human honor and false riches. From there I was sent to school to learn letters, though, wretched as I was, I did not know what usefulness there was in them; and nevertheless, if I was slow in learning, I was beaten.

"For this was praised by our elders, and many who lived this life before us had built in advance the sorrowful roads through which we were compelled to pass, with toil and sorrow multiplied for the sons of Adam. But, Lord, we found men praying to you, and from them we learned, perceiving as best we could, that you were some great being who, even without appearing to our senses, could hear and assist us. For as a boy I began to pray to you, my aid and refuge, and in calling upon you I broke the knots of my tongue; and, though small, I prayed to you with no small affection that I might not be beaten at school. And when you did not hear me--which was not to my folly--adult men laughed at us, even our parents, who wished no evil to befall me, although my blows were then a great and grievous evil to me.

"Is there anyone, Lord, so great in spirit and cleaving to you with immense affection--is there, I say, anyone (for a certain stupidity also produces this)--is there therefore anyone who, by piously cleaving to you, is so grandly disposed that he esteems racks, iron claws, and various tortures of this kind so lightly, though throughout all lands men supplicate you with great fear to escape them, that he laughs at those who fear them most bitterly, just as our parents laughed at the torments with which we boys were afflicted by our masters? For we neither feared those torments less nor prayed to you less to escape them; and yet we sinned by writing, reading, or thinking about letters less than was required of us.

"For, Lord, we did not lack memory or talent, which you willed us to possess sufficiently for that age, but we delighted in play, and punishment was exacted from us by those who certainly did the same things. But the trifles of adults are called business, while the like trifles of children are punished by adults; and no one pities either the children, or those adults, or both. Unless, indeed, any good judge of affairs approves my being beaten because, as a boy, I played ball and by that game was hindered from learning letters as quickly as I should--letters with which, as an adult, I would play more shamefully.

"For the very man by whom I was beaten did nothing different: if he was defeated by a fellow teacher in some petty question, he was tormented more by anger and envy than I was when overcome by a fellow player in a contest of ball. And nevertheless I sinned, Lord God, ordainer and creator of all natural things, but ordainer only--not creator--of sins. O Lord my God, I sinned by acting against the precepts of my parents and of those masters. For afterwards I could make good use of the letters which they wished me to learn, whatever their intention toward me. I was disobedient not because I chose better things, but from love of play, loving proud victories in contests and loving to have my ears scratched by false tales so that they might itch more ardently with that same curiosity, which sparkled more and more perilously through my eyes toward the spectacles and games of adults.

"Yet those who produce these spectacles excel with such dignity that almost all wish it for their little children; and nevertheless they willingly allow those children to be beaten if they are hindered by such spectacles from the study through which their parents desire them to arrive at producing those very spectacles. Look mercifully upon these things, Lord, and deliver us who now call upon you; deliver also those who do not yet call upon you, that they may call upon you and that you may deliver them."

But what need is there of reasoning? For where can sins be unpunished without overflowing and growing beyond measure? It is the custom of all nations to instruct their sons by caresses and blows.

§ 5. But blows produce servile spirits. Rather, they produce amended spirits. Not only asses are driven by blows: the strength of horses is tamed for human uses by hard curb-bits and the rod, and whips teach the fiercest and most intelligent dogs. The son of Peleus himself, the bravest of the Danaans, was educated thus:

> The son of Philyra perfected the boy Achilles with the lyre,
>
> And subdued his fierce spirit by the gentle art.
>
> He who so often terrified his allies and so often his enemies
>
> Is believed to have feared the aged old man.
>
> At his master's demand, he offered to the blows
>
> The hands which Hector was destined to feel.

Nevertheless, a prudent master's clemency will employ moderation, so that he neither grants license to sloth and vices nor, by cruelty, makes himself and the most beautiful studies objects of hatred. These very few laws will suffice.

First: let him never punish when angry. For he himself will easily exceed the measure, and the accused will think that he is being punished by the master's anger, not by his own desert. For an angry man expends punishments for himself, not for the amendment of youth.

Second: let him be neither precipitate in punishing nor excessive in investigating. For he who punishes quickly is not far from punishing willingly.

Third: let him overlook whatever can be overlooked without public or private injury. For he punishes not because a sin has been committed, but lest sin be committed.

Fourth: let him abstain altogether from inflicting insult by word or deed. Let him employ only the reproof which a father also customarily uses.

Fifth: let him never call anyone by any name other than his own name or surname. For insulting nicknames offend grievously and produce hatred, not amendment. They cling even to adults.

Sixth: let punishment always remain within measure, and let chastisement at a tender age not be equal to the offense. For one who has deserved greater things, it is enough to beat him with a strap; for one who has deserved blows, it is often enough to have terrified him with threats.

Seventh: ordinarily let expulsion avenge graver offenses which demand punishments more atrocious than a father should inflict. For it does not befit a professor to rage, even against those who deserve it; an unaccustomed harshness of punishment brings infamy upon schools.

I am pleased to append here a judicial history, as Guevara, that most prudent counselor of kings, relates it in Book 2, chapter 37. Dicaearchus, the Greek historian, in his book of antiquities, and Sabellicus in his general history, say that a father came to Solon of Salamis to complain about his son, and the son about his father; and that the son, speaking first, instituted his accusation before the philosopher in this sense:

"I complain about my father because, although he is rich and I poor, although he is my father and I his only son, he has disowned me while living and made an adopted son his heir. My father neither ought nor was able to do this. For since I owe it to him that by nature I am so frail, it is equitable that he furnish me resources to sustain and support nature's weakness."

To this the father said: “I complain about my son because he has been to me not in the place of a son but of a mortal enemy. For in all matters, from his very cradle, he has always opposed me; and therefore I have disinherited him while living. Nothing would be more pleasant to me than if, just as I deprived him of an inheritance, so the gods deprived him of life. For the earth is most cruel which does not swallow alive an execrable son who has no reverence and obedience toward his father. As to his saying that I have adopted an entirely new son, I confess that this is true. But as to his saying that he has been deprived of an inheritance by me although begotten of my blood, I answer this: I am not disowning my son; I am disinheriting his luxury from the product of my labor. For nothing is more inequitable than that a flagitious adolescent son should be warmed and refreshed as though in baths by the sweat flowing drop by drop from the body of his aged father.”

The son responded thus to this speech of his father: “I do not deny that I have been troublesome to my father, and I confess that I have lived luxuriously and flagitiously. But if the truth must be spoken, the fact that I became luxurious and wicked was my father’s fault, because he did not form me while I was a boy; and if he disowns me for that reason, he inflicts the greatest injury upon me. For the father who does not educate and instruct his son well when young unjustly disowns him when old.”

The father, responding again, said: “It is true, son, that when you were very small you were treated by me with the greatest indulgence. But this too has not escaped you: when you were older, you were frequently both instructed and chastised by me. The reason you were not imbued with teaching in infancy was that at that tender little age you were not capable of discipline. But when I educated you by both teaching and good discipline, there were present both a mind capable of precepts, an age suitable for acting, and powers firm enough for exercise. For upon one who lacks both aptitude and strength, the labor of teaching is expended in vain.”

Here the son spoke again: “Because you are old and I am young; because you are my father and I your son; because you are white in beard and head and I am beardless; because you have more experience, as one who has seen more, while I have experienced fewer things, as one who in age is still a youth [the end of the parenthetical phrase is indistinct in the print]--it appears most equitable that you should be believed and I condemned. For it often happens in the common course of life that he who has less authority therefore departs defeated from a most just case.

“I confess, my father, that when I was a boy you took care that I should be imbued with letters. But you will not deny that, if I had committed some fault, you did not permit me to be chastised and punished. From this it came about that, because you allowed me to do what pleased me while I was a boy, I became disobedient to you after I grew older. Therefore I rightly add this: if I am accused of offense and fault in this matter, you are certainly not altogether free of responsibility for my fault. For it is not the duty of parents to teach their sons in tender years to dispute about what the virtues are, but to accustom them to the pursuit of virtue and invite them by rewards. For it is an immense good if, as adolescents, we arrive at that advanced age at which we begin to recognize evil already accustomed and instructed to act well thereafter.”

After hearing and carefully weighing the reasons of both parties, Solon of Salamis said: “I deliver this judgment: that this adolescent’s father, because he did not chastise him even when he was a boy, shall lack burial after he has died; and I command that this father’s son, because he did not believe and obey his father while he was an adolescent, shall lack the inheritance while his father lives, on this condition: that after the father has died, his son shall enter upon his inheritance. For it would be most unjust that the son’s innocence should pay the penalties of the father’s wickedness.

“I likewise command that all these goods be deposited with a man of good faith, who shall from them give support to the father as long as he lives and make a tomb for the son after he has died. I have not without cause delivered this judgment, which embraces both life and death. For the gods do not will there to be a double punishment for one crime, but will some to be punished in life by the loss of honor or possessions, and others in death by the removal of memory and burial."

CHAPTER XI

Learning Is Honorable and Necessary to the State

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. Under the name of learning I embrace knowledge of all the liberal arts and sciences, and even skill in sacred laws and theology. I shall now treat these generally, and then individually.

Someone has said incorrectly: "Many embrace evil things; no one accuses what is good." For many accuse knowledge, and philosophy certainly had its detractors of old. Licinius was so unlearned that he could not even sign his own name upon official documents. He burned with such hatred of letters that he called letters a pest and public calamity. He hated rhetoricians and philosophers most bitterly and said that they were the virus and poison of the state. But he, brought up by a rustic father among the barbarous Dacians, was equitable only toward them. Yet this vice is rare. For the splendor of letters and their dignity are so great that most princes even hunt after the reputation of learning and flee the reputation of ignorance. Nero was the first among those who gained supreme power to need another man's eloquence. Tacitus, Book 13: for he recited Seneca's speeches in order to commend himself to the Senate and people by the praise of eloquence.

How much the learning of many men, especially nobles and magnates, contributes to the state is easily understood in any private person. For learning brings it about, as that man used to say, that stone does not sit upon stone. As much as Socrates surpasses Batto, and Atticus Bambalio, so much does a state polished by letters surpass an unlearned one.

§ 2. For the pursuit of wisdom is contained chiefly in letters. But a state cannot subsist unless he who commands possesses and cultivates the pursuit of wisdom. The counsels of wise men must certainly be heard; otherwise all decrees of princes which are supported neither by law nor wisdom cannot be protected by the mere force of the ruler. Through either the reproach of subjects or the praise of a successor, responses given without counsel are abolished.

First, therefore, I require a learned prince, such as Solomon was. "God," he says in Wisdom 7:17, "gave me true knowledge of the things that are: that I might know the disposition of the globe of the earth and the powers of the elements, the beginning and ending and midst of times, the alterations of their courses and the changes of seasons, the mutations of customs and divisions of times, the courses of the year and arrangements of the stars, the natures of animals and the rages of beasts, the force of winds and the thoughts of men, the diversities of plants and the powers of roots; and all things that are hidden and unforeseen I learned, for wisdom, the artificer of all things, taught me."

How greatly it harms the state when most princes are governed and follow whatever anyone, induced by money, hatred, or favor, has whispered into their ear, all kingdoms have taught. Yet this is the second happiness and wisdom: to follow the wise. For the first part of wisdom is not to believe oneself wise; and he who wishes to be good will accomplish this in no easier way than by believing himself evil, so that through repentance he may become good.

> Προνοίας οὐδὲν ἀνθρώποις ἔφυ
> κέρδος λαβεῖν ἄμεινον, οὐδὲ νοῦ σοφοῦ.

For human beings there is no advantage greater or better than prudence and a wise mind.

Nor would I wish the Roman laws to be believed more on my authority than on that of the prince himself. "The imperial Majesty," he says, "ought not only to be adorned with arms but also armed with laws, so that either time, both of wars and of peace, may be rightly governed; and so that the Roman Prince may not only stand forth victorious in battles against enemies, but may also expel the iniquities of calumniators through lawful paths, and become both a most religious observer of law and a magnificent triumphator over vanquished enemies."

He will never be able to do this unless he himself knows the laws by which he commands, just as he will not wage war properly unless practiced in camps. Deservedly, therefore, the Authentic Concerning Judges ordains that they not be unlearned: “We, therefore, seeing the arrangement of judges altogether confused, have thought it necessary to determine by this law the things which may impose a becoming order upon a case. For we have not thought it necessary to have the names of certain judges, especially men unlearned in the laws and, moreover, lacking experience of cases. For our administrators are in every way accompanied by assessors, who explain matters of law and fulfill their duties; since many, detained by the cares which they have with us, deservedly discharge their part in judgments through the presence of their assessors. But those men, having neither a belt of office nor an administration entrusted by us, if they cannot by themselves know what is just but must beg from elsewhere for the honor of judging-- how will it not be the greatest defect of the state to entrust lawsuits not to those who know from themselves what must be done, but to permit them to seek others from whom they may learn what it befits them to pronounce in judging?”

§ 3. This too is a remarkable advantage of a learned prince: he alone possesses counselors of whom some are altogether incorrupt and others timidly wicked. Those who speak a most upright opinion without hope and fear are dead men; for princes read in them things which no one ventures to tell them. They would not endure being told by a friend the things which they delight to read in unknown men; they delight in reproaches being made against their errors when those authors threaten with a public voice. Since, therefore, even those who apply themselves to the disciplines with great zeal and devote themselves to governing the state frequently err, what must be thought of those whom ignorance and torpor, like golden rams, have given as prey to cunning men?

For although a prince may possess a great intellect and a grave and prudent nature, he nevertheless cannot administer the state with certainty and without fear. For he possesses nothing except opinion, which is accustomed both to deceive and to be deceived. And even when he has conceived some most illustrious measure, he must hand it over to jurists for examination, from whom he afterwards receives it as though dictated, and by his own authority publishes among the people what was conceived by another mind.

They enumerate for us as learned princes Solon, Epaminondas, Philip of Macedon, Alexander, Philopoemen, Romulus, Remus, Caesar, Octavian, Tiberius, Claudius, the Antonines, Constantine, the Theodosii, Charlemagne and Charles V, Robert king of Jerusalem, Emperor Sigismund, and Alfonso of Aragon. From ancient peoples they also name Mithridates and Chosroes. Lipsius treats them in his Monita, as do many others. They do not even exclude women: Zenobia, Amalasuntha, Isabella, and others. I value more highly the fact that all those learned rulers surrounded their sides with the most learned men and thus most excellently established very many things.

§ 4. For this reason alone, learned kings and a learned state find approval with me: I readily observe that it is a singular privilege of the Christian religion to excel in the liberal arts and sciences. For if we weigh history, we shall easily understand that the whole world yields the palm to Christians. Although the ancients lacked neither talents nor time, and although diligence even abounded, they nevertheless could in no way reach the summit of the sciences to which Christians ascended. Pythagoras, Democritus, and Plato traveled through Egypt, Asia, and India to acquire learning for themselves; Crates the Theban cast away his wealth; Cleanthes supported his studies by drawing water. Yet it will be evident that they accomplished little by so great an exertion if they are compared with Christians, so that it is like a prodigy that the philosophers of the gentiles, though so studious, remained fixed in so many and such great errors.

The Chinese also in our time, although many expend their entire life upon studies and although the fruit of study is very great, can nevertheless scarcely compare their most learned men with our adolescents. They first learned from Father Matteo Ricci that the earth is not square, and other matters. Father Nicolaus Trigautius narrates the affair in Book 4, chapter 5, of the expedition among the Chinese. By nothing else did Father Matteo equally lead the entire multitude of Chinese philosophers into astonishment as by the novelty of European sciences confirmed by the firmest reasons. For now, for the first time after so many ages, it was heard that the earth was round. They held as though for a first principle a certain old axiom: “Heaven is round, but the earth square.” No one knew that a center lay in its middle, either summoning all heavy bodies to itself or receiving them when they fall by their own inclination; that the whole surface around it is inhabited; or that antipodal human beings stand opposite human beings without falling--matters to which, although the intellect assents, the imaginative faculty of many does not yet acquiesce.

Until then it was unheard of that an eclipse of the moon results from the earth being placed between the sun and moon. In explaining it they devised absurdities more defective than the moon itself. Among these interpreters, some said that the moon, placed opposite the sun, lost its light from astonishment. Others perforated the sun itself in the middle and asserted that the moon, when opposite this opening of the sun, could not receive light from the sun. It was novel that the sun exceeds the whole globe of the earth in magnitude, although some more readily allowed themselves to be led to believe this because it was established that it had also been written in the monuments of books by the ancient mathematicians of their kingdom, who, after measuring the sun, had found it to exceed a thousand miles in their mathematical instruments. But that the stars themselves, which our eyes measure by so small a space, exceed the entire surface of the earth--this at last seemed a paradox. It had not yet been understood, nor even said, that the heavens consist of solid matter, that the stars remain fixed in it and do not wander irregularly, that ten celestial spheres are numbered, that one is enclosed by another, and that they are borne by different motions. From these things it is established that every commonplace matter was unknown to them.

§ 5. But in the Christian state, even apart from sacred theology, there is such great knowledge of foreign matters that heathendom has nowhere beheld anything equal to it, or even second to it. For if we retrace ancient things, the very beginnings of the Christian religion will supply Christian philosophers far more excellent than the pagans were. Dionysius the Areopagite, a man illustrious in knowledge and reputation and a disciple of Paul, then at last discovered true philosophy. In the times of Dionysius there was also Aristides of Athens, a most eloquent philosopher, as St. Jerome calls him. Quadratus followed, then Justin, Pantaenus, and Ammonius, whom Porphyry prefers to all.

Ammonius had many illustrious hearers, both Christian and gentile. Among the Christians was Origen, to whose learning Porphyry, an enemy of our piety, bore witness: “I saw Origen when I was still a very young boy, occupying the citadel of all learning, as is also proved by those things which he handed down to the memory of posterity. This is that Origen whose immense glory is held among their teachers. He had attained all the secrets of Plato; he had been instructed in the books of Numenius, Cronius, Apollophanes, Longinus, Moderatus, and Nicomachus; and in Pythagorean matters the commentaries of the highest men had not escaped him. He also touched upon the volumes of Chaeremon the Stoic and Cornutus.”

Jerome agrees: “I shall not leave unspoken this fact concerning his immortal intellect: that he also learned dialectic, geometry, arithmetic, music, grammar, rhetoric, and the sects of all the philosophers.” Origen’s pupils were many and weighty men, to whom most of the gentiles yielded. In the succeeding times there followed Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzen, Chrysostom, Augustine, Victorinus, Vegetius, and Albinus. And if we judge rightly, the Catholic world numbers so many thousands of bishops governing churches that, although the learning of them all is unequal, all heathendom nevertheless has not equaled the learning of one century either in number or in excellence. But this, though more marvelous, is nevertheless true: if the learned men who flourished in Greece and in the Roman state before the beginning of the Christian religion, and those who excelled in knowledge of matters in Christian times, are collected, they will yield to one city. They will not be able to equal in learning the Roman Church’s pontiffs alone who were distinguished in philosophy and secular letters.

Clement I--whether he was Actius Clemens, to whom Pliny wrote, or another man--was most devoted to philosophy and committed excellent monuments to writing. See Baronius at the year 102 and in the Martyrology at July 2; Franciscus Turrianus against the Centuriators; and Delrio in his Vindiciae against Scaliger. Linus and Cletus too were noble Romans illustrious in letters. Hyginus was the most celebrated philosopher of his time when he was chosen for the pontificate.

And although the secular learning of Alexander, Sixtus, Pius, Telesphorus, and Soter is less known, from the letters which survive we readily gather that they were most learned men. His own writings teach that Cornelius was certainly not unequal in learning to Cyprian and others, as do those of Stephen and his successors.

Felix I and Eutychianus held famous disputations against Sabellius, Paul of Samosata, and the Manichaeans.

Liberius and Felix were men even of excessive and calamitous learning: for Liberius, from fear, subscribed to the condemnation of St. Athanasius, and Felix succeeded to his see by no good example.

Among these Damasus, the oracle of the world, was eminent in wisdom, eloquence, skill in governing, and love of learned men.

Innocent, famous also for his defense of St. Chrysostom even after Chrysostom's death, was not greatly unequal to Damasus.

These learned centuries, agitated by heresies, possessed most learned pontiffs. Thus Innocent was succeeded by Zosimus, he by Boniface I, and Boniface by Celestine I, whom Augustine also consulted. At that time the hidden contagions of the Manichaeans and of other sects were creeping about, as were those of the Arians, Origenists, Pelagians, Nestorians, Acephali, Eutychians, Predestinarians, and Iconoclasts. They disturbed the Church not only by corrupting the Scriptures and ecclesiastical writers but also by vain philosophy. And so God, the supreme shepherd, gave the Church leaders who would meet the raging men on equal ground, armed in every part, and protect the Church by sacred and profane knowledge.

Leo the Great was then elected, who proved his teaching even to the succeeding world. Hilary, Simplicius, Felix III, Gelasius I, Symmachus I, Hormisdas, Vigilius, Gregory the Great, Leo II, John V, Gregory II, Stephen II, Paschal I, Eugenius II, Gregory IV, Nicholas the Great--who represented Gregory the Great in learning and virtues--John XVI, Eugenius III, Gregory XIII, Sixtus V, and Innocent IX also came into the number of the learned. Learning is therefore a peculiar dowry of the Church and is for that reason especially to be commended to the state. And if we also consider the present times and the lyceums of so many academies, no one can doubt that at this one time more learned men are living than all Greece possessed of old, from the age of Solon and the other sages down to the irruption of the Muslims, if you except the Christians.

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 6. Not wise men, but a certain factious and unlearned class of courtiers, are accustomed to advance two objections against learning. The first is that tyrants have proceeded from philosophers. The second is that letters are an impediment to civil and military prudence. For Phalaris was a philosopher, as were Tiberius and Julian. Sicily endured Cyclopes at first and then tyrants, most of whom, however, were educated in Greece.

Indeed, Rhodiginus, Book 22, chapter 21, judges that philosophers commanded more cruelly: "For as many as proceeded from the schools of philosophers and seized tyrannies are found to have exercised them more cruelly, avariciously, and savagely than men altogether ignorant of letters. With what ferocity, I beseech you, did Ariston, nurtured in the schools of the Epicureans, oppress the liberty of his Athenian fatherland? Before him, did not Critias also do so, together with those who were initiated with Critias into the mysteries of philosophy? What shall I say of Pythagoras? What of those very Seven Sages and the others who attempted to undertake the weight of the greatest affairs? Are they not found to have used command most cruelly?

"The excessive cruelty of Athenion among the Athenians during the Mithridatic War became known from Athenaeus. Nor is the tyranny of Lysias of Tarsus, issuing from the schools of the philosophers, unknown. When his fatherland had chosen him stephanephoros, that is, priest of Hercules, once he had seized command he did not lay it down but openly played the tyrant. Moved by the bloody savagery of these men, Democharesor perhaps it was Cratesis reported to have said wittily: 'Just as no one could fashion a spear from savory, so neither could one fashion a blameless soldier from Socrates.'"

I could certainly have wished so learned a man to speak more circumspectly. For he could have been moved by the reasons which he himself brought forward. Socrates, in Book 5 of Plato's Republic (On Justice), says: "Unless philosophers become masters of cities, or those who are now called kings and potentates philosophize legitimately and sufficiently, and unless civil power and philosophy meet in the same persons, while these are notas now happenshandled by different dispositions, there will be no rest from evils for the city or, as my opinion bears, for the human race; nor will this state which we have set forth in words arise according to its powers and behold the light of the sun before then."

And Tully writes to his brother Quintus: "Plato, the chief of intellect and learning, judged that this conjunction of power and wisdom could be the salvation of cities." Julius Capitolinus also relates that Antoninus the philosopher-emperor kept the same maxim upon his lips. These are Caelius's own words.

But the things which he himself advanced are weak. We do not admit Ariston the Epicurean to be a philosopher: he was ignorant of defining, dividing, and discoursing, a child in physics, and depraved in morals, since he did everything for his own sake alone. But that aim is diametrically opposed to the office of a prince, whose duty it is to prefer the public good to private advantage.

The other is Critias, one of the Thirty Tyrants and by far the cruelest and most avaricious of them. But I marvel greatly that Caelius, a man learned in many things, uses against learning that example by which learning itself is most clearly illustrated. For Xenophon relates in Book 1 of the sayings and deeds of Socrates that Socrates was accused on account of his pupils Critias and Alcibiades. I shall disclose Xenophon's words, though they are rather lengthy, because in the same manner this same lawsuit is brought against our Society and against many academies.

> πολυμαθῆ,

Xenophon's words are these: "Yet the accuser said that he had been the cause of the laws of the city being despised, by saying that it was foolish for magistrates in the city to be chosen by votes, since no one ever employs a helmsman, a craftsman, a flute-player, or any others like them appointed by lot, although mistakes in those occupations inflict much lighter injuries than those committed in a city by its rulers. He said that these discourses incited young men to despise the state and rendered them violent.

"But I judge that those who cultivate prudence and think that by admonition they can show their fellow citizens the things that are advantageous to them ought least of all to be violent, since they know that force is followed by enmities and dangers, whereas by persuasion the same things can be accomplished without danger and with friendship. For those who are compelled hate as though they had been despoiled; but those who have been persuaded love as though they had received something pleasing. It therefore by no means belongs to those who cultivate prudence to inflict violence upon anyone, but to those who possess power without reason. Moreover, he who dares to employ force needs no small number of helpers; but he who persuades needs none, for he thinks himself sufficient by himself to persuade. Furthermore, it least of all falls to such men to kill anyone. For who would wish to destroy someone rather than use him alive and persuaded as he wishes?

"But the adversaries also added this: that Critias and Alcibiades, after hearing Socrates, afflicted the city with many injuries. For Critias, when the constitution of the city had come into the hands of a few, became one of them and was by far the most avaricious and violent of all. Alcibiades, however, while the people still held command, was the most unjust and incontinent of all. If they brought any evil upon the city, I shall not answer for it; but I shall narrate how their association and familiarity with Socrates arose.

“These men were by nature by far the most ambitious of all Athenians. They desired all things to be conducted through themselves and desired to become as celebrated as possible. Since, therefore, they knew that Socrates lived abundantly upon very little money, was most abstinent from all pleasures, and used all who conversed with him as he wished by the power of his discourse, when they saw these things and possessed the character stated a little above, would anyone think that they desired Socrates’ company from a longing for his life and moderation, or because they supposed that, if they enjoyed his company, they would become most capable of saying and doing whatever they wished? For I judge that, if one of the gods had given them the choice either to live their whole life as they saw Socrates living or to die, they would rather have chosen death. This is clear from their deeds. For as soon as they judged themselves more eloquent than others in persuading, they immediately left Socrates and devoted themselves to governing the state, the principal reason for which they had desired to hear Socrates.

“But perhaps someone will say in reply that Socrates ought first to have handed down sobriety and moderation to his hearers, and only afterwards the science of governing the state. I do not contradict this. Yet I see that all who teach both show their pupils in their own persons how they do the things which they teach and introduce them by discourse. I also know that Socrates showed himself to his hearers as a good and honorable man and discoursed most excellently about virtue and all other human matters. I know too that those men were moderate and sober while they associated with Socrates--not because they feared suffering some injury or being beaten with blows by Socrates, but because at that time they judged this to be advantageous to themselves.

“Perhaps certain of those who call themselves philosophers will say that a just man can never become unjust, a moderate man insolent, or one learned in any matter in which teaching has been handed down unlearned in that which he learned. But I think differently about these matters. For I see that, just as bodily actions cannot be done well by those who do not exercise their bodies, so too those who do not exercise the mind are least able to perform the mind’s actions. For they can neither do the things which must be done nor abstain from those from which they must abstain.

“For this reason, even if fathers know their sons to be sober, they nevertheless prohibit them from conversation with depraved men, as though association with good men were an exercise of virtue and that of depraved men its destruction. The poet who says this also bears witness:

> You will indeed learn good things from good men;
>
> But if you mingle with the depraved, you will lose even your inborn understanding.

“And so does he who says:

> A good man is at one time strong, at another weak.

“I too assent to them. For I see that, just as those who do not employ continual practice readily forget songs, so those who neglect the discourses and admonitions of their teachers hand them over to oblivion. But when someone has forgotten those discourses, he also forgets those things by which his mind is moved to desire sobriety. Once this has happened, it is surely no marvel that he also hands sobriety itself over to oblivion.”

Thus Critias and Alcibiades were corrupted by vices before they approached Socrates. They approached familiarity with Socrates not for the sake of philosophizing but for hunting after fame and eloquence. Nevertheless, during that time they conducted themselves modestly. Finally, when they again lived with the wicked, each returned to his own disposition and held Socrates in hatred. Indeed, as tyrants were bound to do, they enacted a law that no one should speak about virtue, justice, or temperance unless he was thirty years old. They therefore touched philosophy too lightly to be able to dishonor it by their impure contact.

§ 7. I do not know of what Rhodiginus especially accuses Pythagoras, for by authority and persuasion he recalled the Crotoniates, who had been ruined by luxury, to frugality and the pursuit of justice. He then migrated to Metapontum and died there. He exercised no tyranny except against vices.

He even defames the seven men of Greece whom they call sages. This is done not only with injustice but with scarcely pardonable that is, folly. Solon certainly was not cruel, for he mitigated Draco's laws, written in blood, which punished every offense with death, even the fault of idleness and the theft of vegetables. At length, fleeing the tyranny of Pisistratus, he went to Egypt and then Cyprus. He also conferred very much upon Croesus, until at last in Cilicia Solon founded an Athenian colony, becoming in part a new father of his country.

I confess that Periander the Corinthian acted as a tyrant, but he was cruel through fear. For it was not safe for him to escape from the royal power handed down to him by his father Cypselus as though by hereditary right, lest he expose himself, his father's friends, and his whole family to the fury of a most corrupt populace. Nevertheless, he adorned the city, continually waged wars, held the kingdom for forty years, and, like Augustus, when wearied of cruelty at last admitted clemency. Aristotle certainly defends his cruel model in Book 3 of the Politics, chapter 12: when he answered Thrasybulus nothing, but leveled the crop by cutting off the taller ears. Pittacus administered the state of Mytilene with modesty of life and learning, without any suspicion of tyranny. Nor did Bias commit any other offense against Priene, his fatherland, than this--if it is an offense--that, fleeing when it was captured, he said, "I carry all my possessions with me."

Chilon the Lacedaemonian, who was one of the sages, employed no tyranny, unless these sayings of his which were consecrated at Delphi are held to be tyrannical: "Know yourself"; "Desire nothing excessively"; "Misery is the companion of debt and litigation." He died from the force of joy upon hearing that his son was victor at the Olympic games, and thus all Greece attended his funeral. It would never have done this for a tyrant, for the name of tyrant is hateful even when stripped of power.

Cleobulus, or Cleobolus, was far removed from tyranny. He said that good must be done to friends and enemies: to enemies in order that we may render them friends, to friends in order that we may render them still more friendly. Tyrants destroy enemies, distrust friends, and thereby make them enemies.

Thales of Miletus did not even hold command. He lived peaceably and died in extreme old age while watching the games in the fifty-eighth Olympiad.

Athenion, after releasing the prisoners in the workhouses and the volones, subdued Drepanum. He was a prudent and learned man, but the cause of the war is obscure. It has therefore in no way been proved that philosophy and learning are the cause of tyranny, just as a pottery does not fashion tyrants although Agathocles was the offspring of a potter. Learned men can nevertheless aspire to command more easily, since they cannot be ignorant of histories, passions, revolutions, deceits, and frauds, and know the entire art of ruling. If justice and piety are absent, it is no wonder that they readily occupy a tyranny and render it secure by political arts once occupied.

CHAPTER XII

The Study of Letters Does Not Obstruct Political Prudence, Whether Civil or Military

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. This was the second objection which the unskilled advance against us--and sometimes even learned men do so. Nor is the answer as obvious as it appears to many. For the errors of many compel us to censure certain kinds of study. Some remove mathematicians from the state because, being accustomed to ἀκριβολογίαις ἀποδεικτικαῖς, the most exact demonstrations, they preserve the same lines in the state, although that versatile wheel of cities demands equity, ἐπιείκειαν--equitable flexibility--dissimulation, and other things. They spurn grammarians as base, philosophers as skeptics, poets as madmen, rhetoricians as turbulent, jurists as sowers of lawsuits, and theologians as enemies of liberty. Among them only ἀμύμων καὶ ἄμωμος, ignorance, the rustic goddess, is without fault and reproach.

Indeed, I remember that pleasant stories in Greek concerning scholastics were once commonly circulated. For certain men indulge speculations to such a degree that they are altogether unfit for obtaining food and for human association. This is a vice not of the arts but of men. For they cut many matters too finely and conduct them to useless subtlety, and so lead the mind into bonds rather than raise and elevate it. What happens in letters happens in all matters: what is excessive is vicious; that is excessive which detains minds destined for useful things upon useless ones.

“For concerning those men,” says Seneca in chapter 13 of On the Brevity of Life, “no one will doubt that they laboriously do nothing, since they are detained in studies of useless letters; and among the Romans too there is now a great band of them. It was a sickness of the Greeks to inquire what number of rowers Ulysses had, whether the Iliad or the Odyssey was written first, whether they were by the same author, and then other questions of this stamp. If you keep these things to yourself, they do nothing to assist your silent conscience; if you publish them, you will appear not more learned but more troublesome.”

For the more effort such men expend, the more they impede themselves. And as in a labyrinth, the more anyone hastens toward the exit, the more he entangles himself and the farther he is from the door. Many did not find necessary things because they sought superfluous ones. “The quibbling of words,” says Seneca in Epistle 45, “and captious disputations which exercise an ineffectual acuteness have taken much time from them. We weave snares and attach an ambiguous signification to words, and then dissolve it. Have we so much leisure? Do we now know how to live and how to die? The whole mind must proceed to that place where provision must be made lest things, not words, deceive us. Why do you distinguish for me similarities of words by which no one has ever been caught except while disputing? Things deceive; distinguish them.”

The wretched diligence of Tiberius appeared thus to the learned. Suetonius, chapter 70: “He chiefly cultivated knowledge of fabulous history, even to foolishness and derision. For he also assailed grammarians, a class of men to which, as we have said, he was especially devoted, and generally tested them with questions of this kind: Who was Hecuba’s mother? What name had Achilles among the maidens? What were the Sirens accustomed to sing? And on the first day on which he entered the Senate after the death of Augustus, as though about to satisfy piety and religion together, following the example of Minos he made supplication with incense and wine, but without a flute-player, as Minos had formerly done upon the death of his son.”

No better was that archbishop concerning whom our Laelius Bisciola writes in Book 3, chapter 1, of his Leisure Hours: "When I was studying theology at Padua, I knew the archbishop of that most flourishing city in Italy, already advanced in age, a learned, talented, acute, and grave man. If you wished to confer with him about theology and divine wisdom, you would see him contract his brow, raise his eyebrow, and by manifest signs turn away from discourse of this kind. But if you intended to communicate something to him concerning modals, conversions, mixtures, maximum and minimum, proportions and degrees of action, passion, reaction, and repassion, he would brighten his countenance, exult, and triumph with joy.

"Nights and days this old and grave archbishop was wholly occupied in explaining the theory of modals. He wrote upon that argument, wrote in reply, conferred with this man and that, censured one man's explanation and commended another's, and never satisfied himself. Yet he did not rest even in that position if someone else appeared to him to have found something more probable, which he soon altered again. He also instituted a treatise concerning the cause and origin of laughter; and because in it, while refuting the opinions of all other ancient and recent philosophers, he seemed to himself to have touched the matter itself as with a needle, he so pleased himself that you might say he had joined the great emperor of the Turks to the faith and religion of Christ."

Bisciola himself judges rightly concerning him with the saying in Stobaeus, Sermon 8:

> ὁ ἑλλέβορος ὁλοσχερέστερος μὲν ληφθεὶς καθαίρει, εἰς δὲ πάνυ σμικρὰ τριφθεὶς πνίγει· οὕτω καὶ ἡ κατὰ φιλοσοφίαν λεπτολογία.

Hellebore purges when taken in rather large pieces; but when it is ground into the smallest particles, it suffocates. So too does empty and excessive subtlety in philosophy.

§ 2. For these reasons those arts also had a bad reputation of old. Zeno at the beginning > τῶν ἐγκυκλίων παιδείαν ἄχρηστον ἀποφαίνει, declares the encyclopedic, or liberal, arts useless. Yet the Stoics were excessive in subtleties, so that it is astonishing that Zeno, the chief of the Stoics, thought thus. It is true that many empty things are taught by those men. They inquire into the ages of Achilles and Patroclus and where Ulysses wandered. Concerning this Bion says rightly in Stobaeus, Sermon 8:

> Τοὺς γραμματικοὺς ζητοῦντας τὰς τοῦ Ὀδυσσέως πλάνας μὴ ἐξετάζειν τὴν ἰδίαν, μηδὲ καθορᾶν ὅτι ἐν αὐτῷ τούτῳ πλανῶνται, ἀσχολούμενοι περὶ τὰ μηδὲν χρήσιμα.

Grammarians who seek the wanderings of Ulysses do not seek their own, nor do they perceive that they err in this very thing: that they labor over useless matters.

Seneca describes and condemns this entire class in Epistle 88: "But, you say, knowledge of many arts delights me. Let us therefore retain from them only as much as is necessary. Or do you think a man is to be censured who procures useless things for himself and displays a pomp of precious objects in his house, but not one who is occupied with useless furniture of letters? To wish to know more than is sufficient is a kind of intemperance.

"What of the fact that this pursuit of the liberal arts makes men troublesome, verbose, unseasonable, and self-satisfied, and therefore not learners of necessary things because they have learned superfluous ones? Didymus the grammarian wrote four thousand books. He would be wretched if he had merely read so many superfluous things. In these books the fatherland of Homer is investigated; in these, who was the true mother of Aeneas; in these, whether Anacreon lived more lustfully or more drunkenly; in these, whether Sappho was a public prostitute; and other matters which, if you knew them, ought to be unlearned. Go now and deny that life is long!

"But when you come to our own men too, I shall show you many things to be cut away with axes. At a great expenditure of time and with great annoyance to the ears of others is this praise acquired: 'O learned man!' Let us be content with this more rustic title: 'O good man!' Is it so? Shall I unroll the annals of all nations and inquire who first wrote verses? Though I have no chronological tables, shall I calculate how much time lies between Orpheus and Homer? Shall I review the marks of Aristarchus with which he punctured another's verses and consume my life upon syllables? Shall I thus cling to the dust of geometry? Has that salutary precept so fallen from me: 'Spare time'? Shall I know these things in order that I may be ignorant of what?

"Appion the grammarian, who under Gaius Caesar was carried about through all Greece and adopted by all the cities into the name of Homer, used to say that Homer, after completing both subjects, the Odyssey and the Iliad, added a beginning to his work in which he embraced the Trojan War. As proof of this matter he advanced the fact that in the first verse Homer had deliberately placed two letters containing the number of his books. A man who wishes to know many things must know such things.

"Do you not wish to consider how much time ill health takes from you, how much public occupation, how much private occupation, how much daily occupation, how much sleep? Measure your life: it does not contain so many things. I am speaking about liberal studies; how much that is superfluous do philosophers possess, how much that departs from use? They too descended to distinctions of syllables and the properties of conjunctions and prepositions, and envied grammarians and geometers. Whatever was superfluous in the arts of those men, they transferred into their own. Thus it came about that they know more diligently how to speak than how to live.

"Hear how much evil excessive subtlety produces and how hostile it is to truth. Protagoras says that one can dispute on either side of every matter equally, even on this very question, whether every matter can be disputed on either side. Nausiphanes says that, among the things which appear to exist, nothing exists more than it does not exist. Parmenides says that, among the things which appear, nothing at all exists. Zeno of Elea has cast every affair out of affairs: he says that nothing exists. The Pyrrhonists, Megarians, Eretrians, and Academics dwell around almost the same points, for they have put on a new knowledge: to know nothing.

"Cast all these things into that superfluous herd of liberal studies. The former hand down to me knowledge which will not profit me; the latter snatch away hope of all knowledge. It is better to know superfluous things than nothing. The former do not carry before me a light by which my sight may be directed toward truth; the latter dig out my eyes. If I believe Protagoras, nothing in the nature of things is anything but doubtful. If I believe Nausiphanes, this alone is certain: that nothing is certain. If Parmenides, nothing exists except one. If Zeno, not even one. What, then, are we? What are these things which surround, nourish, and sustain us? The whole nature of things is a shadow, either empty or deceptive. I could not readily say whether I am more angry with those who wished us to know nothing or with those who did not leave us even this: to know that we know nothing."

The letters are M and H in the word MHNIN, and they make the number forty-eight. In Plutarch's Banquet, another man observes that the first verse of the Iliad and the first of the Odyssey consist of the same number of syllables, namely seventeen, and the last verses of the same books of sixteen. Who could endure subtlety hostile to truth? Who could endure thorny foolishness? That ostentation harms minds and introduces a new anxiety and care.

"You twist words for me," says Seneca in Epistle 48, "and arrange syllables. Evidently, unless I have constructed the most cunning interrogations and by a false conclusion have bound a lie arising from truth, I shall not be able to distinguish things to be sought from things to be avoided. I am ashamed: in so serious a matter we old men are playing. 'Mouse' is a syllable; but a syllable does not gnaw cheese; therefore a mouse does not gnaw cheese. O childish foolishness! For this have we drawn down our brows? For this have we let down our beards? Is this what we teach, sad and pale?"

§ 3. Men of sound judgment, men endowed with a great spirit, censure these things in letters, with the best right and deservedly. But that error belongs not to letters but to minds which use their good badly and decline from true things toward empty ones. The liberal studies retain both their dignity and usefulness, and likewise their limit and measure. In this class three things occur to me which must be said and in which the entire rationale of those studies is contained.

The first is that all those studies are preparations and, as Xenocrates used to say, > λαβὰς τῆς φιλοσοφίας, handles of true philosophy. Youth must therefore be exercised in them so that it may not halt in them but through them strive toward greater things.

The second: that this folly is not learned from letters, but is brought to the learning of them and, through learning, intensified and increased.

The third: that it is not useless to the state for certain men to pass their whole life in those trifles. All concede the first to me; the second is doubtful; the third a paradox.

Nevertheless, I shall establish each. Seneca acknowledges the first in Epistle 88: "You desire to know what I think concerning liberal studies. I admire none and number among good things none which ends at money. They are gainful arts, useful thus far if they prepare the intellect but do not detain it. For we must linger upon them only as long as the mind can do nothing greater. They are our rudiments, not our works. You see why they are called liberal studies: because they are worthy of a free man. But one study is truly liberal, that which makes a man free: the study of wisdom, sublime, brave, and magnanimous. The rest are petty and childish."

And again: "What, then? Do liberal studies contribute nothing to us? Much toward other things, nothing toward virtue. For even those base arts professedly consisting in work by hand contribute very much to the instruments of life, yet do not pertain to virtue. Why, then, do we educate our sons in liberal studies? Not because they can give virtue, but because they prepare the mind to receive virtue. Just as that first literacy, as the ancients called it, by which elements are handed down to children, does not teach the liberal arts but prepares a place for soon receiving them, so the liberal arts do not conduct the mind to virtue but equip it."

This alone, therefore, is the utility they possess: they exercise intellects, cultivate them, sharpen sagacity, and no one has a passage to perfect wisdom except through those arts. Philo says rightly in On the Preliminary Studies:

> ὥσπερ γὰρ ἐν οἰκίαις αὔλειοι πρόκεινται κλισιάδων, ἐν δὲ πόλεσι τὰ προάστεια, δι' ὧν εἴσω βαδίζειν ἔνεστιν, οὕτως καὶ ἀρετῆς πρόκειται τὰ ἐγκύκλια· ταῦτα γὰρ ὁδός ἐστιν εἰς ἐκείνην φέρουσα.

Houses certainly have their forecourts, and cities their suburbs, through which there is an entrance; so the liberal arts have the encyclopedic disciplines set before them and already prepare a road for virtue.

Those who therefore remain fixed in these matters do the same thing as men who, enticed by the pleasantness of inns, neglect the soil of their fatherland. The aim of our Society is to direct the other studies of those who live in it toward theology. Constitution, Part 4, chapter 12: "Since the aim of the Society and of its studies is to aid our neighbors toward knowledge and love of God and the salvation of their souls, and since the faculty of theology is the means more proper to that end, the universities of the Society shall chiefly apply themselves to it. Through very suitable teachers they shall diligently treat matters which pertain to scholastic doctrine and the Sacred Scriptures, as well as expository matters which agree with this end fixed for us."

And chapter 5: "Since the aim of the learning which is acquired in this Society is, with God's favor assisting, to profit one's own soul and the souls of one's neighbors, this shall be, both universally and in individual persons, the measure by which it is determined to which faculties our members ought to apply themselves and how far they ought to advance in them. And because, speaking generally, humane letters in various languages, logic, likewise natural and moral philosophy, metaphysics, and theology--both that which is called scholastic and that which is called positive--and Sacred Scripture aid toward this, those who are sent to colleges shall devote themselves to the study of these faculties. Indeed, they shall occupy themselves with greater diligence in those which, account being taken of time, place, and persons, and the rest, the supreme moderator of studies will judge in the Lord to agree more closely with the aforesaid end."

For some, medicine is proposed; for others, knowledge of the laws. Let each so learn the lesser things that he prepares himself for the great. Meanwhile, it is certain that without these things those who profess the greater sciences cannot be understood.

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 4. The second point is the one which I confessed to be doubtful to many: those who cling to these lesser minutiae of the sciences brought their error to them; they did not learn it from those sciences. For how can it happen that anyone, while tasting the first rudiments of letters, should judge that they have no use unless they are counted and compared with one another? What moderately prudent man can judge that clever subtleties were invented solely as instruments of torture for intellects? Are there not very many men of lofty and vigorous intellect, well versed in the greatest sciences, who are not ignorant of those trifles and sometimes play with them for recreation, and test the abilities of boys who answer anxiously? Since, therefore, the subtlety which they have learned sharpens the intellects of most men and does not blunt them, why would it so derange a few, if they had brought a mind to letters? For, as Philonides used to say, one must learn letters and bring a mind to the learning. And so, when you observe men sitting continually over these things, you will judge that they either cannot or do not wish to attain greater things, and that they could not have attained even these without letters. Thus two kinds of grammarians and philosophers immediately disclose themselves. The first is moderate, learned, polished, and prudent; it refers precepts to eloquence and to knowledge of historians, orators, and poets, and this knowledge to the higher sciences, the flight from vices, and the love of virtues. I have no fear of calling men of this kind, even though they occupy themselves with grammar, pillars of the state. The other kind is laboriously wretched, delighting in the hunting of syllables and the subtleties of feverish erudition--in a word, entangled in most laborious follies. This saying of Aristippus must frequently be impressed upon them: Those who eat or exercise the most are not in better health than those who take what is necessary; so those who read not the most things but useful things are to be judged learned.

> Γράμματα μαθεῖν, καὶ τὸν μαθόντα νοῦν ἔχειν.
