

THE FIRST HISTORICAL PART

Antoninus of Florence

Summary of the First Volume of the Historical Part of Lord Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence

First Title: On the First and Second Ages of the World

Chapter One

On the first parents, Adam and Eve, in the state of innocence, and on their fall, upon the words, “Man, when he was in honor,” etc. It begins, “Man, when he was in honor,” etc. Folio 1.

On the excellence of the first parents with respect to sanctifying grace. Folio 1.

On his honor or excellence with respect to general justice. Folio 1.

On his excellence with respect to his knowledge in knowing God, the angels, and the other creatures. Folio 1.

On their excellence with respect to the immortality of the body, namely, the inability to die. Folio 2.

On their excellence with respect to impassibility, and how passions existed in them. Folio 2.

On their manner of generation in such a state. Folio 2.

On the pleasantness of the place of paradise in which he was placed. Folio 2.

On his excellence with respect to dominion over creatures. Folio 2.

On the manner of meriting in that state. Folio 3.

On the conditions of those begotten in such a state of innocence. Folio 3.

On their state in sin, which is indicated there by “he did not understand,” and is expounded in many ways. Folio 3.

On the manifold misery that he incurred from sin, in the words, “he was compared to beasts.” Folio 4.

On earthly paradise, which signifies the Church; on the fourfold river of paradise; and on what the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil signify. Folio 4.

How, when the root of the human race--that is, the first parents--had been corrupted, original sin is transmitted to their descendants; and how at different times it is cleansed through different sacraments. Folio 5.

That the sleep of Adam in paradise signifies the Passion of Christ. Folio 5.

On the difference between the Hebrews and the seventy-two translators in the computation of the years of the first and second ages, and whence this arose. Folio 5.

That, according to the seventy-two translators, after five thousand one hundred and ninety-nine years from the creation of the world, on the same day--namely, Friday--and in the same month--namely, March--and at the same hour--namely, the sixth--at which the first man sinned, Christ was fixed to the cross, making satisfaction for that sin itself. Also on Cain and Abel, the first sons, and the killing of Abel by Cain. Folio 5.

On the descendants of Seth and Cain and their different occupations. Folio 6.

Chapter Two: On the Second Age of the World, Which Began with Noah

How God commanded Noah to build the ark; on its form and measurement, those to be brought into it, and the flood that covered the whole earth. It begins, “The second age.” Folio 6.

On the Lord's saying, “My spirit shall not remain in man, because he is flesh”; and that this is the difference between the society of the elect and that of the reprobate: the wicked live according to the flesh, that is, according to their own will not subjected to God, but the elect according to the spirit, that is, according to reason subjected to the law of God. Folio 6.

That the ark made by Noah signifies the Church with respect to its material, form, measurement, and the things contained in it, and also Christ its head. Folio 7.

On the monstrous races of men of which the histories of the gentiles tell. Folio 7.

On Noah's intoxication from wine, the mockery directed against him, and Ham, on account of which he was cursed; and what this signifies spiritually. Folio 7.

Chapter Three

On the descendants of Noah's sons, namely Shem, Ham, and Japheth; and that when they wished to build a tower reaching to heaven, God confounded their tongues, dividing the one tongue into seventy-two different languages. It begins, "From the descendants." Folio 8.

That the sons of Shem are said to have obtained Asia, the sons of Ham Africa, and the sons of Japheth Europe. Folio 8.

On Asia: whence it is so called; on its provinces and names; and whence they had their origin. Folio 8.

On the second part of the world, namely Europe; on its provinces and names and their derivations; and there also on Italy and its cities. Folio 8, at the end.

On the third part of the world, namely Africa, and on its provinces and names. Folio 9.

On the islands of the sea and their names. Folio 9.

On the genealogy of those descending from Shem, the son of Noah, down to the third age of the world, namely Abraham. Folio 9, at the end.

That under Reu the kingdom of the Scythians and the kingdom of the Egyptians arose; and that under Nahor two kingdoms arose, namely those of the Assyrians and the Sicyonians. Folio 10.

That idolatry had its origin from Ninus, king of Nineveh; that the first idol was called Belus, who was the father of Ninus; and that afterward different nations imposed different names upon their idols. Folio 10.

Second Title: On the Third Age of the World, Which Begins with Abraham

Chapter One

It begins, "Because in Abraham." Folio 10.

On the commendation of Abraham, who is called the father of the faithful; how and in what things the faithful ought to imitate him, which is figured in Abraham's own sacrifice of a three-year-old cow, goat, and ram, a turtledove, and a dove, concerning which see Genesis 14. Folio 10.

On Abraham's departure from his land at the Lord's command, his arrival in the land of Canaan, his descent into Egypt because of famine, his return to Canaan, and his separation from Lot. Folio 11.

That, when Abraham returned from the slaughter of the four kings, Melchizedek met him, offering bread and wine; and on the sacrifice Abraham made to God, namely a cow, a goat, and a ram, a turtledove, and a dove. Folio 11.

That Abraham had a son by Hagar, namely Ishmael, from whom the Saracens descended; and how it was permitted to him and the other ancient patriarchs to have several wives. Folio 11.

That Abraham was given the commandment concerning the circumcision of males descending from his stock; that he received three angels as guests for a meal, who announced to him that a son would be born and that Sodom would be overthrown; on the overthrow of Sodom with four other cities by fire and sulfur; and on the escape of Lot, who afterward had sons by his daughters. Folios 11 and 12.

On the birth of Isaac and Ishmael's play with Isaac, on account of which he was cast out of the house with his mother Hagar. Folio 12.

That at the Lord's command Abraham wished to sacrifice his son Isaac; and that Abraham bought a field from Ephron, in which there was a cave for burying his wife Sarah. Folio 12.

How Abraham sent his steward Eliezer to obtain a bride for his son Isaac; how he betrothed Rebecca to him; and on Abraham's own death. Folio 12.

On Rebecca's conceiving by Isaac, namely Esau and Jacob; on their birth; on the sale of the birthright, which Esau made to Jacob for a dish of lentils; on Isaac's own descent into Egypt, where he took his wife, whom he said was his sister; on the wells dug by him; and on Jacob's obtaining Isaac's blessing under the name of Esau. Folio 12.

Chapter Two: On the Deeds of Jacob

That, in order to avoid the anger of his brother Esau, Jacob went into Mesopotamia; and on that very journey, namely at Bethel, he saw in a dream a ladder reaching to heaven. It begins, “The deeds of Jacob.” Folio 13.

That when Jacob came into Mesopotamia, he took as his bride Rachel, Laban’s daughter, for whom he served Laban seven years in keeping the sheep, and another seven years for her sister Leah. From Leah he received four sons; then two others from Bilhah, Rachel’s maidservant; and likewise two others from Zilpah, Leah’s maidservant. Afterward, from Leah herself he had Issachar and Zebulun and one female, namely Dinah; and finally from Rachel he had Joseph. Folio 13.

That Jacob departed secretly from Laban with his wives and sons; Laban himself pursued him with his own people; Jacob encountered angels of God on the journey; and he sent messengers ahead with gifts to reconcile his brother Esau to himself, and finally, when they met one another, they were reconciled. Folio 13.

That Dinah, Jacob’s daughter, was violated by force by Shechem, lord of the city; in vengeance for this Jacob’s sons killed him together with all the circumcised males. At last they came to their father Isaac, and finding him dead, buried him. There also is an account of the generations descending from Esau. Folio 13, at the end.

Chapter Three: On the Deeds of Joseph, Son of Jacob

That, when Joseph told his dream to his brothers concerning the sheaves and the sun, moon, and stars adoring him, he was hated by his brothers; and when sent by his father to visit his brothers, he was sold by them to Midianites passing that way. He was finally sold in Egypt to Potiphar, master of Pharaoh’s soldiery. There also is the account of Judah, Jacob’s son, and how he had sons by his daughter-in-law Tamar, namely Perez and Zerah. It begins, “On the deeds.” Folio 14.

That Joseph was made steward by his master over all that he possessed; and because he refused to consent to his master’s wife in adultery, he was accused by her and imprisoned by his master. While held in prison, he interpreted the dreams of Pharaoh’s cupbearer and baker, foretelling what befell them. Folio 14.

On Pharaoh’s dream of the seven cattle and seven ears of grain, which Joseph interpreted as seven years of fertility followed by years of barrenness; and how he was commended and exalted and made, as it were, lord of Egypt. Folio 14.

That when the years of barrenness came, Joseph’s brothers were sent by their father to obtain grain in Egypt. He recognized them but was not recognized by them. Speaking rather harshly to them, he granted them grain on the condition that on another occasion they bring with them their youngest brother, whom they had said they had, namely Benjamin; meanwhile he retained Simeon as a captive. When the grain they had carried away was consumed, compelled by the necessity of famine they returned to Egypt with their brother Benjamin. Joseph feasted them courteously and magnificently, and sent them away with grain, his cup having been secretly placed in Benjamin’s sack. He then caused them to be pursued as they departed; and when the cup was sought and found as though stolen, he compelled them to return to Joseph. Folio 14.

That at last Joseph himself, with tears, revealed that he was the very man whom they had sold. He comforted them so that they would not fear, but would return to their father and announce his condition, and that he should descend into Egypt with his whole household to be supported by him, since five years of famine still remained. Folio 14, at the end and the following folio.

That Jacob rejoiced greatly when he heard of the glory of his son Joseph; and descending into Egypt with his whole household and being presented to Pharaoh, he said when asked that he was one hundred and thirty years old. He was settled in Goshen with his whole household and received provisions from Joseph. Also, while the famine continued, the Egyptians, in order to obtain wheat, offered all their money, then their cattle, and finally their lands, except the priestly land. Folio 15.

That when Jacob was sick, Joseph visited him; and Jacob adopted Joseph’s two sons, namely Manasseh and Ephraim, as his own sons and wished them to be heads of two tribes. Blessing them with his hands crossed, he placed his right hand upon the head of the younger and his left upon the other. Finally, when his twelve sons had gathered, Jacob blessed them and foretold to each what would befall them in the last times; there also is the notable prophecy concerning the coming of the Messiah. As he was dying he commanded that his body be buried in Hebron. Folio 15.

That after much mourning Joseph and his brothers carried him there, namely into Canaan, for burial. His brothers, fearing that Joseph might avenge upon them the injury of his sale, asked on their father’s behalf that he forgive them that offense. Receiving them kindly with tears and freely granting pardon, he reassured them. Finally, he died in the one hundred and twentieth year of his life. Folio 15.

That Joseph was prince of Egypt under five kings, and that after Joseph died under the fifth, that Pharaoh who was called Mephres began maliciously to afflict the Hebrews; then began the servitude of the people of Israel in Egypt. Also, how Pharaoh afflicted that people in many ways. Folio 15.

Chapter Four: On Moses and His Deeds, in Which the Book of Exodus Begins

That, after Pharaoh issued an edict for the drowning of the males in the river, Moses at his birth was exposed upon the river in a little basket; and when he was taken up by Pharaoh's daughter, he was adopted by her as a son. There also is the account of how, when he was received as an infant in Pharaoh's arms, he threw Pharaoh's crown to the ground. When he became a young man and leader of the army of the Egyptians, he defeated the Ethiopians and took as wife an Ethiopian woman, the king's daughter, whom he afterward dismissed. It begins, "Moses." Folio 15.

That Moses then went out to see the Hebrews in Goshen, and perceiving an Egyptian injuring a certain Hebrew, killed him. On another occasion, when he rebuked a Hebrew who was injuring another, that man complained, disclosing the homicide committed by Moses. For this reason Moses fled in fear into Midian, where he took as his wife Zipporah, daughter of Jethro the priest, by whom he had two sons, namely Gershom and Eliezer. While he was leading the flock of his father-in-law Jethro into the interior of the desert, he saw from afar a bush burning and not consumed. When he approached the place of the bush, the Lord spoke to him from there, signifying the liberation of Israel from Egypt; when the children of Israel departed from it, they carried away with them the vessels of gold and silver lent to them by the Egyptians. When Moses asked the name of the one sending him, He answered, "I am who am." He also gave a threefold sign so that the children of Israel might believe him: the rod changed into a serpent and back again; his hand made leprous and cleansed; and the water of the river changed into blood. When Moses excused himself because his tongue was rather impeded, He gave him his brother Aaron as companion, to speak for him. Therefore, as Moses went into Egypt with his wife and sons, an angel wished to kill him because of the uncircumcision of his sons; therefore he circumcised them. Folio 15.

Moses and Aaron entered before Pharaoh and commanded him on God's behalf to release the people of Israel so that they might sacrifice to Him. He did not listen to them, but burdened Israel still more, not giving them straw for baking bricks as before. Thereafter Moses with Aaron sought a sign before Pharaoh for the release of the people, namely his rod changed into a serpent; Pharaoh's magicians did similar things by incantations. He also changed the water into blood, which was likewise done by the magicians. Innumerable frogs then came down throughout all Egypt, ranging through houses and beds; and the like was done by the magicians.

When Pharaoh promised to release the people if the frogs were removed, his heart was hardened after they had been removed, and he refused to release them. Afterward, when the dust of the earth was struck with the rod, innumerable gnats arose, which the magicians were unable to do. Then God sent a plague of flies that filled Egypt; afterward hail with thunder and lightning; afterward locusts and bruchus insects; then palpable darkness; and finally the death of all the firstborn of Egypt. Folio 16.

On the passage of the children of Israel through the Red Sea, in which Pharaoh, pursuing them with his armies, was drowned; on account of this the people of Israel gave thanks to the Lord, singing the words, "Let us sing to the Lord," etc. Then they came to Marah, where they found bitter waters, which were sweetened when wood was cast into them. Folio 16.

Thereafter they came to Elim and murmured, desiring to eat meat; God gave them quail. Moreover, He rained manna for them from heaven for forty years. Advancing into the desert of Sin, they murmured because of the lack of water, but when the rock was struck by Moses's rod, waters flowed abundantly. When the Amalekites made war against them and Joshua, Moses's disciple, fought them, Moses defeated them by raising his hands to the Lord in prayer. Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, also visited him and brought his wife and sons to him; he was graciously received by them and advised Moses to appoint different officials to lighten his labor. At last they came to Mount Sinai, upon which, when the Lord descended, the mountain began to smoke, lightning to appear, and thunder to be heard. Moses ascended it to receive the Law. Folio 16.

How the Lord gave His people the Law on Mount Sinai through Moses, distinguished into three kinds of precepts--namely moral, judicial, and ceremonial--and in what they consist. Folio 16.

On the construction of the Ark of the Covenant and the tabernacle and its arrangement; on the altar of burnt offerings; on the garments of the priests and ministers of the tabernacle; on the sacrifices made in the consecration of Aaron and his sons; and on the altar of incense and the bronze basin in which the priests washed themselves. Folios 16 and 17.

That while Moses remained on the mountain to receive the Law, the people made a golden calf for themselves and adored it as God. On this account, when the Lord wished to destroy that people, He was appeased when Moses prayed for them. When Moses descended from the mountain to the people, he with the Levites killed twenty-three thousand of the idolaters. Also on the familiarity that Moses had with the Lord and the vision of Him. And because Moses, in anger arising from zeal, had broken the stone tablets on which God had engraved the Ten Commandments on the mountain, he made two other tablets, ascended the mountain, and again received the law of the Decalogue, remaining there forty days without food or drink. Folio 17.

That when the people offered gifts--gold and silver and whatever else--the tabernacle with all its appurtenances was constructed by Bezalel and Oholiab; and fire descended from heaven upon the prepared animal sacrifices to consume them, and it was never extinguished down to the time of the Maccabees. All the foregoing is in the Book of Exodus. Folio 16.

On the Ten Commandments, with a brief exposition of them according to what is contained in the Decrees. Folios 17 and 18.

Throughout the Book of Leviticus there is an account of the ceremonial precepts, especially the various animal sacrifices; the foods to be distinguished, from which they had to abstain as unclean; the sacrifice of a woman after childbirth; the manifold leprosy to be discerned by the priests; the sacrifice to be offered by one cleansed of leprosy; the sacrifice of the two goats and of the red heifer at the Feast of Atonement; the degrees of consanguinity and affinity in contracting marriage; the solemn observances to be kept by them, namely Passover, Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles; the observance of the jubilee; the obligation of vows and oaths; certain moral precepts; and the death of Nadab and Abihu, sons of Aaron, because they put strange fire--that is, fire not taken from the altar--into their censers. Folio 18 at the end and folio 19 at the beginning.

In the Book of Numbers it is related that the Lord caused all the males twenty years old and above who were fit for war to be numbered, and six hundred thousand five hundred and fifty were found, excluding the tribe of Levi, in which there were twenty-two thousand; and twelve princes of the tribes were designated. The Lord gave the order in which the Levites were to encamp all around the tabernacle, and then the people around the Levites, on every side--namely east, west, south, and north--and specified which of the Levites were to carry the furnishings of the tabernacle. It treats of the sacrifice of jealousy; the vow of the Nazirites; the offering made by the twelve princes of the tribes on the day the tabernacle was erected; the lamps of the lampstand; the two silver trumpets made for different uses; the seventy elders chosen to assist Moses; and the fire that descended from heaven and consumed many of those who murmured while desiring the foods of Egypt. It also relates that Miriam, Aaron's sister, murmured against Moses, was made leprous, and after eight days was cleansed by God. When they advanced from Paran into Kadesh-barnea, twelve spies--one from each tribe--were sent to examine the land of promise. Returning after forty days, they reported to the people that the land was excellent but impregnable and could not be obtained by them, except for two of those twelve spies, Caleb and Joshua, who comforted and encouraged the people to go and take it. At this the people murmured, as though it were impossible to obtain. On account of the fault of this murmuring, the Lord commanded that they wander through the desert for forty years before entering that land of promise, and that all who had been numbered above should die in the desert, except Caleb and Joshua. Folio 19.

On the sedition of Dathan and Abiram against the leadership of Moses, whom the earth swallowed; the murmuring of Korah with two hundred and fifty Levites against the priesthood of Aaron, whom fire going forth from the Lord consumed; and the murmuring of the people against Moses and Aaron because of the death of the foregoing, on account of which fire consumed many of the people. But when Aaron, holding a censer and offering incense among them, intervened, the plague ceased. To quiet the murmuring of the people, the twelve princes of the tribes brought their rods to Moses at the Lord's command. When these were placed with Aaron's rod in the tabernacle, Aaron's rod alone was found to have budded and produced flowers and fruit, as a sign of Aaron's legitimate priesthood. Folio 19.

On the tithes and first fruits to be given to the Levites; the portions they were to have from the sacrifices; and the tithe of the tithe to be given to the high priest. On the sacrifice of the red heifer that was to be burned, from whose ashes the water of expiation was made; the death of Miriam, Aaron's sister; the lack of water at Horeb and the murmuring of the people, on account of which Moses and Aaron, disturbed and made distrustful concerning the Lord's promise, were commanded to strike the rock with the rod so that water would come forth; and how both were punished for this by being deprived of entry into the land of promise. On Aaron's death, in whose place his son Eleazar was made high priest. On the victory won against Sihon, king of the Amorites, and Og, king of Bashan, who came against him in war to impede him. Moreover, on the murmuring of the people because of the labor and weariness of the journey, on account of which many wounded by serpents perished, but afterward those who were wounded were healed at the sight of the bronze serpent. Folio 19.

That when the people of Israel encamped on the plains of Moab, the king of the Moabites sent for Balaam the soothsayer to come to him and curse the people of Israel. While Balaam was traveling on the road, the she-ass upon which he sat spoke. When he came to the king of the Moabites and intended to curse the people of Israel, he instead blessed them, by the Lord's ordering. He did this three times in different places from which he could see the people of Israel; and among other things, he also prophesied more exaltedly concerning Christ. When the children of Israel fornicated with the Moabites and adored their idols, twenty-three thousand of Israel were killed, and the Lord commanded that the twelve princes of the tribes be hanged. Phinehas, in zeal, pierced through both an Israelite who was fornicating and the Midianite woman with him, and appeased the Lord's anger. Again the Lord commanded that all males from twenty years old and above be numbered, and six hundred and one thousand seven hundred and thirty were found who had not been numbered at the departure from Egypt, because all those former men had died in the desert, except Joshua and Caleb. When the five daughters of Zelophehad--who had been stoned because he had been found gathering wood on the Sabbath--sought their father's inheritance, the Lord commanded it to be given to them, establishing a rule for the order of succession to an inheritance when someone died without a male heir. On the death of Moses and the appointment of Joshua as leader in his place; the sacrifices to be offered and their observances; the daily burnt offerings and those at the kalends and their solemnities; the vows and oaths of men and women, whether they are in their parents' house, married, or widowed. That when they went out to war against the Midianites or Moabites, they killed everyone except the virgins, and with them Balaam the soothsayer. That the tribe of Reuben, the tribe of Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh asked to be given as a possession the lands acquired around the Jordan; Moses did this, yet on the condition that they go to war with the others until they possessed the land of promise. On the forty stations made in the desert over forty years; the boundaries of the land of promise that they were to possess and those who were to divide it; the cities, towns, and suburbs to be given to the Levites; the three cities of refuge; and marriage not to be contracted except with those who were of the same tribe. Folio 19.

[Running head: Third Title]

The Book of Deuteronomy, which is the fifth in the Pentateuch, is called the Second Law because it is a repetition of the foregoing law, but with many additions and explanations concerning the moral, judicial, and ceremonial precepts. It also contains Moses's ordinance that six of the tribes should ascend Mount Gerizim, where the Levites, crying aloud, should call down the many curses contained there upon transgressors of the Law; and, conversely, that the other six tribes should ascend Mount Ebal, where the Levites, crying aloud, should call down the many blessings contained there upon observers of the Law. There also is contained the canticle of Moses, "Hear, O heavens"; how Moses gave a blessing to each of the tribes; and how, when he ascended Mount Nebo and the land of promise had been shown to him, he was gathered to his fathers, and his tomb was not found. Folio 20.

On certain other deeds among other nations; that in the time of Moses there was the first Hercules; and that Deucalion began to reign, in whose time the second flood occurred in Thessaly. Folio 20.

Chapter Five: Deeds Among the People of Israel under the Leadership of Joshua and in the Time of the Judges, Together with Certain Other Matters Concerning Other Nations

First, how Joshua himself was appointed leader of the people and strengthened by the Lord to bring the people into the land of promise, and was exhorted to follow in Moses's footsteps. It begins in the Book of Joshua. Folio 20.

That Joshua sent spies to explore Jericho; Rahab received them in her house, hid them, and secretly sent them away. That the people of Israel crossed the Jordan, a way being miraculously made for them through it. That at Gilgal the circumcision was performed upon those who had been born in the desert; and after Passover was celebrated, they ate of the produce of the land and the manna ceased. That Joshua saw an angel with drawn sword coming to the aid of the people. That when they had gone around the city of Jericho for seven days with trumpets sounding, and seven times on the seventh day, the walls fell utterly; entering, they killed everyone except Rahab and her people. That when they went out to battle against Ai, they were put to flight and some were killed; this was because of Achan's theft, and when he was discovered he was stoned. That they took Ai through an ambush, pretending to flee. Folio 20.

On the Gibeonites: how they deceived Joshua and the other elders, pretending that they came from distant regions to enter a covenant of peace with them. When they had obtained this, confirmed by an oath, their pious deception was discovered--namely, that they had done it to escape death. Because of the oath made to them, the Israelites spared them, though they subjected them to a certain servitude. That five kings came against the Gibeonites because of the covenant made with Israel; when Joshua was summoned by those Gibeonites, he fought against those kings. When the sun was approaching its setting, at Joshua's prayer the sun was fixed in the sky until he hanged those captured kings upon something. Folio 20.

That Joshua captured many cities and killed their nations and kings in the land of Canaan promised to them, giving their places over to fire. That he fought and killed thirty-one kings who reigned there in different places, seizing their cities. That Joshua and Eleazar the high priest, with the twelve princes of the tribes, divided the land of promise among the nine tribes of Israel and the half-tribe of Manasseh, assigning to each its share of cities and places. That Achsah, Caleb's daughter, received from her father the upper and lower well-watered land. Then the cities of refuge were designated, to which someone who had killed another by accident and without guile could flee. Cities with their suburbs, but no other possessions, were assigned to the Levites, because they were to receive tithes, first fruits, and offerings from the people. That the two and a half tribes which had already received a possession from Moses beyond the Jordan were permitted by Joshua to return to their possession; they also made an altar of wondrous size beside the Jordan as a sign that they were of the people of Israel. That when Joshua had grown old, he gathered the people and encouraged them to observe the Law. After ruling the people for twenty-six years, he died. Folio 20.

That after the deaths of Moses and Joshua, leaders succeeded among the people of Israel who were called judges. They did not rule as lords, but in their tribulations the people made use of their counsel and prudence, as is evident throughout the Book of Judges, from which the matters that follow are taken. There also are accounts of certain singular men of other nations. Folio 20.

The first of the judges named in that book is Othniel, Caleb's brother. Before him, however, the story is told of King Adoni-bezek, who, when captured by the children of Israel and the extremities of his hands and feet had been cut off, said that this had been justly done to him, because he himself had held seventy captured kings beneath his table after cutting off the extremities of their hands and feet. That an angel appeared to the people of Israel, rebuked them for transgressing the Law, on account of which they were afflicted by neighboring nations, and brought them to weeping and penitence. That the aforesaid Othniel freed them from the hand of Cushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, whom they had served for eight years. That after they were delivered because of their sins into the hands of Eglon, king of the Moabites, and into the hands of the Ammonites for eighteen years, they cried to the Lord, who freed them by the hand of Ehud, who killed that king. That Shamgar, the third judge, killed six hundred of the Philistines. That when they returned to their former evils and were delivered into the hands of Jabin, king of Canaan, whose commander of the army was Sisera, God freed them by the hand of Barak and Deborah the prophetess, Sisera himself being killed while he slept by the woman Jael. There also is Deborah's canticle. Folio 20.

On Gideon the judge, who freed Israel from the hands of the Midianites, whom they had served for seven years while afflicted by them because of their sins; and on the marvelous victory he had with only three hundred men, with trumpets sounding, earthen vessels being broken against one another, and lamps being kindled, one hundred and twenty thousand of the enemy being killed by them. Also on Abimelech, Gideon's illegitimate son, who caused his seventy legitimate brothers to be killed by the men of Shechem so that he alone might rule them, and who at last was killed by a woman with a fragment of a millstone. Folio 21.

On Jephthah, the son of a harlot and a judge, who freed the people from the Ammonites and killed his virgin daughter as he had vowed in order to obtain victory; and on the contention and strife between Ephraim and the Gileadites, from which forty-two thousand Ephraimites were killed. Folio 21.

On Samson, judge of Israel, who freed them from the Philistines by causing their crops to be burned by foxes sent among them with fire at their tails; who also killed a thousand of them with an ass's jawbone; and who, after his head had been shaved and his strength thereby lost, was captured and blinded by the Philistines, yet in the ruin of the temple that he caused, while killing himself, he killed very many. Folio 21.

[Leaf 4]

On Micah, who made an idol at his mother's insistence and caused a Levite to serve it; at last, certain men from the tribe of Dan who lodged there took the idol away for themselves together with the Levite. Folio 21.

On the adultery perpetrated at Gibeah against a Levite's wife, on account of which the eleven tribes, gathered against the tribe of Benjamin to avenge the crime, were twice defeated in battle; finally, however, they destroyed the tribe of Benjamin, killing twenty-five thousand of them and burning their cities. Folio 21.

On Ruth the Moabitess and her mother-in-law Naomi; Boaz took Ruth as his wife, as is related throughout the Book of Ruth. Folio 21.

On the war of the Greeks against the Trojans and the destruction of Troy because of the abduction of Helen, wife of Menelaus, by Paris, son of Priam, in the time of the judge Jephthah discussed above; on the companions of Ulysses changed into beasts by magic art; and on those reigning among the Latins. Folios 21 and 22.

Chapter Six: On the History of the Book of Kings

First, on Elkanah, who had two wives, one of whom, namely Hannah, was barren. Conceiving a son, Samuel, by reason of a vow, she offered him in the temple to serve there and made the canticle, "My heart has rejoiced," etc. Also on the sons of Eli, given over to gluttony and wantonness; on the rebuke made to Eli by a prophet and afterward by Samuel because of his negligence in correcting his sons. It begins, "Returning to sacred history." Folio 22.

On the war begun by the Philistines against Israel, in which, after Eli's sons were killed and the people of Israel defeated, the Ark of the Lord was captured by the Philistines; and how, wherever it was brought among their cities, it brought upon them a plague of ulcers in their buttocks, on account of which they sent it back to Israel. Folio 22.

On the victory won by the people of Israel against the Philistines through the prayer of Samuel, who was the last of Israel's judges. When he had grown old, he appointed his sons to judge in his place, but because they judged perversely through avarice, the people asked Samuel to appoint a king for them. Folio 22.

On Saul, to whom, while he was searching for his father's asses, Samuel foretold that he would be king, giving him several signs of this. This also came to pass, although Saul hid himself to avoid it. Afterward he went to war against the Ammonites and defeated them. Folio 22.

On Samuel the prophet, who declared to the people his innocence in judging and rebuked them for having made a king for themselves; and who thereafter rebuked King Saul because he had not obeyed his ordinance, on account of which he would be deprived of the kingdom. Also on the victory won by Jonathan, Saul's son, against the Philistines. Folio 22, near the end.

On Saul's going at God's command against the Amalekites to destroy them together with their king. Because he did not fulfill this entirely, Samuel rebuked him and announced that his kingdom was given to another. Also on Samuel's being sent by the Lord to anoint David as king, which he did. Folio 23.

On the killing of the giant Goliath by the young David with a stone cast into his forehead; and on the celebration held for this victory, when choirs of maidens came to meet him singing, "Saul has struck down a thousand, and David ten thousand," etc. Provoked to envy by this praise, Saul sought David's death, and for this reason gave him his daughter Michal as wife. Also how many times and in different ways he sought to capture and kill him, but Jonathan, Saul's son, who loved David greatly, disclosed his father's malice to him. Folio 23.

On David, who asked for and received the bread of the Presence to eat from Ahimelech the priest, together with Goliath's sword; and who pretended to be a fool before the king of Gath. Also on Saul, who caused Ahimelech to be killed with eighty-five priests because he had given bread to David; and on Saul himself, who went with many men first into Keilah, then into the desert of Maon, and thereafter into Engedi, so as to capture and kill David. Folio 23.

On Samuel's death and on Abigail, Nabal's wife, who by her words and gifts reconciled David, when he was ready to kill Nabal because of the insult offered to his men. Also on David himself entering Saul's tent with a companion while Saul slept: he took Saul's spear and cup but did him no injury at all, although Saul himself had gone out to kill him. On David's going to dwell with Achish, king of Gath, and also making slaughters among the Philistines. Folio 23.

On the war begun by the Philistines against Israel; and on Saul's consulting a pythoness so that she might raise Samuel. In this battle, because David was with the Philistines and they did not trust him, he was sent back to his own place. Returning to Ziklag and finding that the Amalekites had taken his wives and sons, those of his companions, and their property, he went against them, defeated them, and recovered everything. In the battle with the Philistines itself, Saul was wounded and killed himself; his sons also were killed, and his army was defeated by the Philistines. Folio 23.

On the poet Homer, who flourished in those times; and on two kingdoms that had their beginning, namely those of the Lacedaemonians and the Corinthians. Folio 23.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World, Which Begins with David

It begins, "The fourth age." Beyond those matters concerning David that were related from the First Book of Kings, the entire Second Book treats of his deeds. First, that upon hearing of Saul's death he mourned and fasted with his men, and caused the messenger who had finished killing Saul to be put to death. That thereafter, ascending to Hebron, he was anointed king over the tribe of Judah, while Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, reigned over the eleven tribes; and on the war between David's people, whose commander was Joab, and Ish-bosheth's army, whose commander was Abner. Folio 23, at the end.

On the long contest between the house of Saul and the house of David; the treacherous killing of Abner; and King Ish-bosheth's own killing as he slept by two men who reported the deed to David and were themselves put to death by him. Folio 24.

On David's third anointing as king over all Israel; his capture of Jerusalem; his wives and sons; and the victory won against the Philistines. On his bringing the Ark back into Jerusalem with great solemnity, when Uzzah was struck and died while holding the Ark as it tilted because the oxen stumbled. And that David's wife Michal, seeing him dance before the Ark, despised him. Also on the order David gave to the Levites in serving the tabernacle in the divine praises. When he wished to build a temple, the Lord forbade him through Nathan the prophet, declaring that his son would do so, and confirming his kingdom. Folio 24.

On David's going out to battle: he defeated the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, and made Syria tributary, while administering justice to all. He also made Mephibosheth, Jonathan's lame son, his table-companion and caused Saul's possessions to be restored to him. Folio 24.

That David sent ambassadors to Hanun, king of the Ammonites, to console him upon the death of his father, David's friend. Because Hanun dishonored them by cutting their garments up to the buttocks, David made war against him. Also on the adultery David perpetrated with Bathsheba; he sent Uriah to be killed while Joab, commander of his army, was besieging the city of the Ammonites. Rebuked by Nathan concerning this under a parable, David confessed his sin and received pardon, but the son conceived through the adultery died. Finally, when the city of the Ammonites was captured, very many were killed. Folio 24.

On Amnon, David's firstborn, who violated his sister Tamar, on account of which her brother Absalom killed him at a banquet. For this Absalom was sent into exile by his father, but through Joab's entreaties and the speech of the woman of Tekoa, David reconciled him to himself. Folio 24.

On Absalom, David's son, most beautiful in body but most ambitious: after making a conspiracy against his father David, he took away his kingdom and sought his death by Ahithophel's counsel. Finally, when David's army engaged Absalom's army in battle, Absalom's army was put to flight. As Absalom himself fled, he remained hanging by his hair in the branches of an oak and was killed by Joab. David mourned this deed most bitterly. Folio 24.

On David himself being restored to the kingdom and forgiving injuries. Amasa, however, who had been commander of Absalom's army, was treacherously killed by Joab against David's will. When a contention arose between the tribe of Judah and the other tribes, and a most wicked man named Sheba caused Israel to separate from Judah, he fled into Abel, where he was beheaded, and the sedition was quieted. Folio 24.

On the famine that arose in Israel for three years because Saul had caused the Gibeonites to be killed contrary to the oath given to them by Joshua. It could not cease unless satisfaction were made for the injury done them, and this was accomplished by delivering descendants of Saul into the hands of the Gibeonites, who crucified them, Mephibosheth excepted. Folio 24.

On the thirty-seven mightiest men at arms who were with David; and on the pestilence infecting the people, from which seventy thousand died, because the people had been numbered at David's command so that he might glory in their multitude. Also on David's preparation of material for the construction of the temple and on the ordering of the singers and the other ministers of the temple. Folio 24.

Chapter Two: On the Deeds of Solomon

First, how at the exhortation of Bathsheba and Nathan the prophet, Solomon was declared by David to be king over Israel and was anointed by Zadok, while his brother Adonijah, who sought to succeed to the kingdom, was rejected. It begins, "On the reign of Solomon." Folio 25.

On the admonitions David made to Solomon at the end of his life; the killing of Adonijah at Solomon's command because he asked that Abishag be given to him as wife; and the killing of Joab and also of Shimei. On the prayer Solomon made after many sacrifices, in which he asked for wisdom to rule the people; and on the first judgment he made between two harlots contending over a son. Folio 25.

On the glory of Solomon, his princes, the magnificent provision of his court, and his wisdom. Folio 25.

On the marvelous temple built by Solomon in Jerusalem and the parts of the building itself. Folio 25.

On the bringing of the Ark into the Holy of Holies in the completed temple; the dedication of the temple; and Solomon's prayer for those praying in it for different causes to be heard, concerning which it was revealed to him that he had been heard. Folio 26.

On the queen of Sheba, who came from the ends of the earth to hear Solomon's wisdom, was exceedingly astonished, and commended it wonderfully. Also on Solomon's ivory throne, the amount of his revenues, and the abundance of horses. Folio 26.

On his wantonness in having very many wives and concubines, including foreign women, on account of which God stirred up wars against him in his old age; and whether Solomon is saved or condemned. Folio 26.

Chapter Three: On the Other Kings Who Reigned after Solomon in Judah and Israel

When the kingdom over all Israel was received by Rehoboam, Solomon's son, because he answered more harshly when the people of Israel asked that his father's burdens be lightened, a schism resulted from the division of the one kingdom into two: Rehoboam reigned over Judah and Benjamin, and Jeroboam over the rest of Israel, that is, the ten tribes. It begins, "In the twelfth." Folio 26.

On a prophet sent by God from Judah into Samaria to rebuke Jeroboam, king of Israel, because he had made golden calves for the people to adore. After rebuking Jeroboam, because that prophet ate there contrary to the Lord's command, he was strangled by a lion on the road. Also on Rehoboam, Solomon's son, who because of idolatry was attacked by the king of Egypt, who carried away the treasures of the temple and of his house. Folio 26.

On Abijah, Rehoboam's son, who succeeded him in the kingdom after his death. Jeroboam, king of Israel, came against him; although Abijah was wicked, because he devoutly commended himself to the Lord, Jeroboam was defeated, fifty thousand of his army being slain. Folio 26.

On Asa, Abijah's son, who succeeded him in the kingdom and removed idolatry from the land; and on Nadab, Jeroboam's son, who reigned over Israel after him. Asa, king of Judah, won a victory against the Ethiopians who came against him.

[Running head: Title XVII]

On another occasion, when Baasha, king of Israel, came to war against him, he was freed with the aid of the king of Syria. Folio 26.

When Baasha died, his son Elah reigned in Israel; after him Zimri reigned seven days, and when besieged by Omri in Tirzah he burned himself together with the palace. Omri then reigned, and after him his son Ahab, a most wicked idolater together with his wife Jezebel. Folio 26.

On Jehoshaphat, king of Judah and son of Asa, an excellent man, against whom the Philistines and Arabs came in war; one million one hundred and sixty thousand were defeated. Folio 26.

On Elijah the prophet, who by prayer obtained that no rain should fall upon the earth for three and a half years. He was fed by a raven at the brook and thereafter by the widow of Zarephath from a handful of flour that did not fail; he raised her son. In the presence of the people of Israel gathered on Mount Carmel, he caused fire to descend from heaven upon the sacrifice. Because the four hundred priests of the idols could not do this, he caused them to be killed; and because Jezebel threatened him with death on that account, he went into the desert. While he slept there beneath a juniper tree, an angel appeared, roused him to eat bread baked under the ashes that had been brought to him, and exhorted him to eat. In the strength of this food, he walked fasting for forty days as far as Mount Horeb. Folio 26.

On Ahab, king of Israel, who twice won victory against Ben-hadad, king of Syria, when he came against him in war with thirty-two kings, just as a certain prophet had foretold to him. Also on Naboth, falsely accused of blasphemy and stoned because he refused to sell his vineyard to King Ahab; on account of this Ahab, rebuked by Elijah, humbled himself. And on the war planned against Ramoth, a city taken away by the king of Syria, to which Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, also went with Ahab. The prophets of Baal foretold victory for him, but Micaiah, the Lord's prophet, foretold his death and defeat, just as it happened. Folio 26.

On Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, rebuked by a prophet for the aid given to Ahab; on his great diligence in bringing the people to observance of the Law, sending priests everywhere to instruct them; and on the very great victory he won against many nations that came against him in war, and this by prayers and fasts. Folio 27.

On the Fourth Book of Kings, and first on Ahaziah, who reigned in Israel in place of his father Ahab, killed in battle. When Ahaziah was sick, Elijah the prophet foretold his death. Ahaziah first sent three captains of fifty to summon Elijah; the first two, with their men, were consumed by fire at Elijah's prayer. Also on Elijah's assumption or translation into heaven in a fiery chariot. Folio 27.

On Elisha, Elijah's disciple, who, after receiving the spirit of prophecy, divided the waters of the Jordan by the touch of Elijah's cloak; made the waters drinkable at Jericho; and cursed the boys who mocked him, whereupon they were devoured by bears. When the kings of Israel, Judah, and Edom gathered together against Moab and lacked water, Elisha prophesied when a psalter was played and provided them water from God. Folio 27.

The same Elisha multiplied oil for a widow to pay her debt and raised the dead son of the Shunammite woman whom he had obtained for her by prayer. He sweetened extremely bitter and poisoned food by putting flour upon it. He multiplied bread. He cleansed Naaman the Syrian of leprosy when he washed in the Jordan. He condemned his disciple Gehazi to leprosy because, without Elisha's knowledge, he asked for gifts from those men. He caused iron that had flown from its handle and sunk into the water to return to that handle. When the same Elisha, who was revealing the ambushes of the king of Syria to the king of Israel, was approached by an army of Syria coming to capture him, he struck them with blindness and led them into the midst of their enemies, yet commanded the king of Israel not to harm them at all. When a severe famine invaded Samaria because the king of Syria besieged it, Elisha foretold abundance to the king of Israel on the following day. This came to pass when the Syrian king's army fled and left everything there. To Hazael, who came to ask whether the sick Ben-hadad, king of Syria, would recover, Elisha foretold that Hazael would be king of Syria and would do many evils. The same Elisha commanded one of the sons of the prophets to go and anoint Jehu king of Israel so that he might destroy all Ahab's seed, which was done. Jehu himself, anointed king, killed Joram, king of Israel and son of Ahab; caused the wounded Ahaziah, king of Judah, to be killed; caused Jezebel, mother of the said Joram, to be thrown from the window of her house; caused the seventy sons of Ahab to be beheaded by the Samaritans; and killed all the prophets of Baal gathered under the pretext that he would worship him. Yet Jehu himself turned aside to idolatry. Folio 27.

On Athaliah, mother of Ahaziah, who, when she heard that her son was killed, caused all the royal seed to be killed so that she herself might reign. Yet one, namely Joash, was hidden. When he was seven years old he was revealed and declared king over Judah, Athaliah being killed; all this was procured by Jehoiada the high priest. King Joash caused Zechariah the prophet, son of the aforesaid Jehoiada, to be stoned beside the temple when Zechariah rebuked him for his vices. On account of this, after Joash himself was defeated by the king of Syria and great spoil was taken, he was killed by his own men. Folio 27, at the end.

On the kingdom of Israel, in which, after Jehu, his son Jehoahaz reigned, and after him his son Joash. When Joash visited Elisha in his final illness, Elisha foretold that he would strike Syria three times. A certain dead man, cast upon the bones of the already dead Elisha, was raised. In the kingdom of Judah, Amaziah reigned in place of his father Joash. When Amaziah went to war against Edom, he won victory; becoming proud because of it, he went to war against Joash, king of Israel, was captured by him, and was led into Jerusalem after the treasures of the temple and royal house had been taken. When Joash, king of Israel, died, his son Jeroboam reigned, and after him his son Azariah. Folio 28.

On Uzziah, who reigned in Judah after his father Amaziah was killed by his own men. He did many good things, magnified the city in riches, and obtained many victories against different nations. At last, lifted up in pride because he entered the temple to offer incense before the Lord, he contracted leprosy, in which he remained until death, while his son Jotham governed the kingdom. In Israel, however, Azariah reigned; Shallum killed him and reigned in his place; Menahem killed Shallum and assumed the kingdom; when he died, his son Pekahiah reigned; another Pekah, son of Remaliah, killed him and reigned in his place. In his time Tiglath-pileser, king of the Assyrians, came against Israel, took a great part captive, and transferred them among the Assyrians. Hoshea killed the aforesaid Pekah and reigned in Israel.

[Running head: Second Title]

In Judah, after Uzziah, his son Jotham reigned; he also made the Ammonites tributary. Folio 28.

On Ahaz, who reigned in Judah after the death of his father Jotham. He was most wicked and given to idolatry. Pekah the king came against him in battle and on one day killed one hundred and twenty thousand fighting men of Judah; they led away two hundred thousand boys, girls, and women captive. Yet, at a prophet's counsel, they refreshed and released them. In his time Rome was founded. Folio 28.

On his son Hezekiah, who reigned in Judah and was an excellent man, bringing the people back to the worship of God. In his time the kingdom of Israel--that is, of the ten tribes--failed, when they were transferred by Shalmaneser, king of the Assyrians. In Hezekiah's time, when Sennacherib, king of the Assyrians, came against Hezekiah and his kingdom and besieged Jerusalem, in one night an angel of the Lord, through Hezekiah's and Isaiah's prayers and humiliations, killed one hundred and eighty-five thousand of Sennacherib's army; thus he was delivered. Hezekiah himself, however, whether because of pride or ingratitude, became sick unto death, but, repenting, he was healed; as a sign, the sun returned through ten lines. He showed all his treasures to the ambassadors of Babylon, and Isaiah foretold to him that everything would be carried away by the Babylonians. He also caused Passover to be celebrated most solemnly by the people. Folio 28.

On Manasseh, Hezekiah's son, who after him reigned in Judah for fifty-five years. He was most wicked, given to idolatry and auguries, and killed the prophets, especially Isaiah, whom he caused to be cut with a wooden saw. Yet when he was led captive into Babylon, he repented and, greatly humbled in that captivity, obtained pardon and was restored to his kingdom. His son Amon succeeded him, imitating his father in vices but not in repentance; he also was killed by his own men. Folio 28.

On his son Josiah, who received the kingdom when he was eight years old. He ruled excellently, persecuted idolaters, brought the priests to restore the temple, led the people back to observance of the Law and fear of God, and caused Passover to be solemnly celebrated. At last, because he went to fight the king of Egypt contrary to the Lord's will, he was gravely wounded, taken to Jerusalem, and passed to the Lord. Jeremiah composed laments upon his death. Folio 28, at the end.

On Necho, king of Egypt, who entered Jerusalem and led Jotham, Josiah's son whom the people had appointed king, bound into Egypt; he appointed Jotham's brother Jehoiakim king in his place. The king of Babylon came against Jehoiakim and made him tributary. When he rebelled, the king of Babylon came again and killed him. Fearing that Jehoiakim's son Jehoiachin would rebel, he led him captive into Babylon with many of the more eminent men, especially Daniel, Hananiah, Azariah, Mishael, Ezekiel, and Mordecai. The king of Babylon appointed Zedekiah, Josiah's son and the aforesaid Jehoiachin's uncle, king of Judah. When Zedekiah rebelled, Nebuchadnezzar came, captured the city of Jerusalem, killed the king's sons in his presence, deprived him of his eyes, and led him bound into Babylon, carrying away the vessels of the temple and all precious things, burning the city, and transferring many thousands of Jews into Babylon. He left a certain man named Gedaliah as governor over those who remained, but Ishmael and his men killed him. At last Johanan, with those of the people who remained in Judea, descended into Egypt for fear of the Chaldeans. In that time Jeremiah prophesied. He had earlier foretold Jerusalem's future captivity so as to bring them to repentance; finally, taken with them into Egypt, he was stoned there by them. Folio 19 throughout.

Chapter Four: On the Prophets Whose Prophecies Are Contained in the Old Testament

Of these, Moses was greatest without qualification, but David in a certain respect, namely with respect to the mysteries of Christ. It begins, "Although of the saints." Folio 29.

On David's prophecy in the Psalms concerning all the articles of faith. Folio 29, at the end.

On Solomon's prophecy and doctrine in his three books--namely Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs--and on the Book of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus. Folio 30.

Chapter Five: On the Prophet Isaiah

On his royal stock, his style in writing, and his cruel death, namely his being cut with a wooden saw. It begins, "Among the four prophets." Folio 30.

On his prophetic announcement concerning the destruction of the kingdoms of Israel, Judah, Syria, Moab, Egypt, Tyre, Edom, the Assyrians, and the Babylonians, which are called burdens. Folio 30.

On the prophecy of the Incarnation in the words, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive," etc. Folio 30.

On the prophecy of Christ's Nativity and divinity and the fruits of the Incarnation, in the words, "A little child is born to us." Folio 31.

On the most manifest prophecy of Christ's Passion. Folio 32.

On the prophecy of the Church to be gathered from the gentiles. Folio 33.

On the different mysteries of Christ. Folio 33.

On the prophecy of the Ascension and the angels' question. Folio 33.

Chapter Six: On Jeremiah the Prophet

On Jeremiah, a priest sanctified in the womb, and his death by stoning. It begins, “Jeremiah.” Folio 33.

On his prophecy with respect to the Incarnation and Passion. Folio 33, at the end.

On the prophecy of the Messiah promised in the Law and His divinity through the name Tetragrammaton. Folio 34.

On the evangelical law to be given to the people. Folio 35.

Chapter Seven: On the Prophet Ezekiel

He prophesied in Babylon and at last was killed there by the Jews. It begins, “Ezekiel.” Folio 35.

On his first vision, namely of the four living creatures, signifying the elect of the Church; the unity of the Church itself; and its one shepherd. Folio 35.

On the mystery of the final resurrection of bodies, shown to him through the bones restored to life. Folio 35.

On God’s immense mercy, which receives every penitent sinner to pardon, and His justice, which punishes a just man who turns aside to evil. Folio 35.

On Lucifer’s fall and his marvelous perfection in which he was created. Folio 36.

On Ezekiel’s final and most difficult vision, namely the marvelous city built upon a mountain and shown to him, and how it can be understood according to the letter. Folio 36.

On the mystical or moral exposition of that city, which signifies the Church militant with respect to all its states. Folio 37.

Chapter Eight: On the Prophet Daniel

To him was revealed the time of the future Incarnation in the seventy shortened weeks of which he speaks in chapter nine. It begins, “Although all.” Folio 37.

That Daniel himself, of the royal stock of Judah, was led captive in his youth into Babylon with Hananiah, Azariah, and Mishael. Nebuchadnezzar caused them to be taught the wisdom and learning of the Babylonians; because of their abstinence, since they did not use the foods of the gentiles but vegetables and water, God gave them understanding of all visions. Folio 38.

On Daniel’s ten visions in different chapters of his prophecy. Folio 38.

On Michael the archangel fighting for the people of God; the final resurrection; and the history of Susanna, Bel, and the dragon. Folio 38.

Chapter Nine: On the Twelve Minor Prophets

They prophesied at different times in Judah or Israel, and their manifold prophecy concerning different mysteries is treated successively in twelve sections. It begins, “Twelve.” Folios 30 and 38.

On Job the gentile, who prophesied more openly and cautiously than the other prophets concerning the final resurrection of bodies, in the words, “I know that my Redeemer lives,” etc. Who Job himself was, of what lineage, and who wrote his book are noted there. In that book it is proved in many ways that divine providence has care for human acts, as blessed Thomas explains. Folio 40.

On the history of Tobit, who was transferred to Nineveh by the king of the Assyrians with the others of the people of Israel; and there on his perfection and life, his almsgiving, his blindness and enlightenment, the angel Raphael leading him and bringing him back, and his prophecy concerning the Church. Folio 40, at the end.

On the Sibyls, prophetesses of the gentiles, whom the wise relate to have been ten; and that they prophesied marvelously concerning the mysteries of Christ, such as the Incarnation, His virgin mother and His name, His miracles, disciples, and teaching, His Passion and Resurrection, and the Last Judgment, in twenty-six verses. Folio 41.

On Lycurgus, who composed laws for the Lacedaemonians, and on his laws full of morality; and on Sardanapalus, the last king of the Assyrians, who, wholly effeminate and given to wantonness, after losing his kingdom burned himself with his riches. Folio 42.

On certain distinguished men, namely Gyges, Archilochus, Simonides, Seleucus, Phalaris, Zeno the philosopher, Arion the musician, Thales of Miletus, and Milo. Folio 42.

Fourth Title: On Deeds in the Fifth Age of the World

This age had its origin from the captivity or transmigration of the Jews into Babylon and extends to Christ's Nativity. It begins, "The fifth age." There also is an account of the kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar and his sons who reigned after him. Folio 42.

On Cyrus, king of the Persians, who, after overthrowing the kingdom of the Medes and also the kingdom of the Babylonians by killing its king Belshazzar, transferred the monarchy, which was previously among the Assyrians, to the Persians and Medes. It remained there for two hundred and six years through the succession of twelve Persian kings, down to Alexander the Great. This Cyrus was the nephew of Darius through his sister and came to the kingdom marvelously. In his time Aesop, who composed fables, flourished. Folio 43.

On the capture and siege of Babylon by Cyrus; the marvelous strength of the city; and how Cyrus entered it by way of the Euphrates River. Folio 43.

On the seven sages of the world who flourished in those times. Folio 43.

On the permission Cyrus gave the Jews to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple under Ezra's leadership, the vessels of the temple being returned. Folio 44.

On King Croesus, captured by Cyrus, and his riches. Folio 44.

On Cambyses, son of Cyrus, who succeeded him in the Persian monarchy, defeated Egypt, and added it to his empire. He was so severe that he caused a certain unjust judge to be flayed and made that judge's son sit in judgment upon a chair covered with his skin. In his time occurred what is read in the history of Judith, when he was called Nebuchadnezzar. Folio 44, at the end.

On Holofernes, commander of the army of the said Nebuchadnezzar, sent by him to subjugate all lands and destroy their gods so that he alone might be adored as God. Devastating with an innumerable army everything that met him, he finally came into Judea to destroy it, but was killed after being piously deceived by Judith the widow; and on how she may be excused in that dissimulation. Folio 45, at the beginning.

On Polycrates and certain others. Folio 45.

On Pythagoras the natural philosopher, who was renowned at that time and regarded as the head of the philosophers of Italy. He was the first to profess that he was a philosopher, that is, a lover of wisdom. He traversed many parts of the world to drink in wisdom; by his wisdom he led both men and women to modesty and a moral life. He also was the first among the Greeks to discover that souls are immortal, but in this he erred shamefully, saying that they pass from body to body. Folio 45.

On the two Magi who obtained the kingdom of the Persians after Cambyses; and on how, after them, Darius Hystaspes received the kingdom of the Persians in a marvelous manner. Folio 45, at the end.

On Darius himself, a friend of Zerubbabel, who also gave permission to restore the temple, which Cambyses had forbidden; and on the question proposed between Zerubbabel and the other chamberlains of Darius, namely concerning wine, the king, women, and truth. Zerubbabel proved that truth was stronger than all; when this had been approved by everyone, he obtained from Darius himself the rebuilding of the temple. Folio 46.

On the philosophers Democritus and Heraclitus, as well as Anaxagoras, Archelaus, and Aeschylus; and on Themistocles fighting manfully. Folio 46.

On Xerxes, son of Darius, who reigned in Persia after him. When a contention arose between him and his brothers concerning the kingdom, they remained at peace by their uncle's judgment. This Xerxes was very wanton and self-willed. Making war with an innumerable army and one thousand two hundred ships, he was defeated by Leonidas, king of the Spartans, with only four thousand men. Folio 46.

[Running head: Fourth Title]

On certain illustrious gentile men, namely Themistocles, Pindar, Sophocles, Euripides, and Herodotus the historian. Folio 47.

On Artabanus, who obtained the kingdom of the Persians in a marvelous manner; Artaxerxes succeeded him. Folio 47.

On Empedocles and Parmenides, who flourished in philosophy, and many other sages of the world. Folio 47.

On Nehemiah, cupbearer of the said King Artaxerxes, who in the twentieth year of his reign obtained permission to go to Jerusalem to rebuild the walls of the city with many others. When they arrived, they were attacked in many ways by neighboring nations. Also on Ezra teaching the people. Folio 47, at the end.

On Hippocrates the physician and Gorgias the rhetor, who were held in distinction at that time. Folio 48.

On Socrates the philosopher, who gave himself entirely to moral matters; his notable sayings; and his disciples Aristippus and Antisthenes. Folio 48.

On Xerxes, who reigned in Persia after Artaxerxes; after him Sogdianus reigned, and Darius surnamed Nothus succeeded him. In his time the philosopher Plato was born and Socrates perished by poison. Folio 48.

On Alcibiades, Socrates's disciple, who was unfortunate; and on Eudoxus the astrologer and Euripides. Folio 49.

On Artaxerxes, who succeeded Darius in Persia, namely his son who is called Ahasuerus in the Book of Esther. After repudiating Queen Vashti, he took as wife Queen Esther, from the stock of the Jews and Mordecai's niece. When Haman, first after the king, procured the extermination of the Jews, Queen Esther, after first offering prayer, obtained from Ahasuerus the death of Haman himself and of all the enemies of her people, and the revocation of his sentence against that people. Folio 49.

On Xenophon, Socrates's disciple; Diogenes, who was head of the sect of Cynic philosophers, his austere life and poverty; and Eusebius the philosopher. Folio 49.

On Dionysius, tyrant of Sicily. Folio 50.

On the philosopher Plato, who embraced both branches of philosophy, dividing it into moral, natural, and rational philosophy; and on how marvelously he spoke about God, and on his errors. Folio 50.

On Archytas of Tarentum and his sayings. Folio 51.

On the renowned orators Demosthenes and Aeschines. Folio 51 at the end and folio 52 at the beginning.

Chapter Two: On Alexander the Great

He was born while Ochus, king of the Persians, reigned, from Philip, king of the Macedonians, and his wife Olympias. Some, however, say that he was illegitimate, conceived by Olympias not from Philip but from Nectanebus the astrologer, who pretended to be the god Ammon. It begins, "In the year, therefore." Folio 52.

On Alexander the Great, his appearance, and his tutor Leonidas, whom he exposed to be devoured by lions; and how he cast his father Nectanebus into a pit, from which he died. Folio 52, near the end.

On Alexander himself, who at the age of fifteen defeated Nicolas, king of the Athenians; and on Philip's murder. Folio 52 at the end and folio 53 at the beginning.

On the character of Philip, king of Macedonia. Folio 53.

On Arsanius, son of Ochus, who succeeded him in the Persian monarchy, and whom his son Darius succeeded. Alexander fought many battles with Darius, finally defeated him, and transferred the Persian monarchy to the Greeks. Folio 53.

On the letters sent by Darius to Alexander and Alexander's replies. Folio 54.

On Alexander himself hastening to capture Jerusalem. When he saw Jaddua the high priest coming to meet him in pontifical dress, he descended from his horse and venerated him, as he had been admonished in a dream. Folio 54, in the last column.

On Darius, who wished to give Alexander a very great quantity of money, a portion of the kingdom, and his daughter in marriage so that Alexander would desist from the war undertaken against him; but Alexander did not acquiesce. Also on Alexander himself, who, with his appearance transformed, came to Darius's banquet without being recognized by him. Folio 55.

That after Darius was finally killed, Alexander obtained Babylon, yet caused Darius's killers to be crucified. Folio 55.

On Alexander's character, his pomp, his wantonness, and the fury by which he killed several of his dearest friends. Folio 56.

On Alexander himself: how he subjected different and many princes to himself, subjugated very many nations, and defeated Porus, a most powerful and wealthy king. Folio 56.

On Alexander himself: that in a certain battle he was wounded, yet did not withdraw from the battle until he killed the man who had wounded him; and that he made peace with Candace, a most wealthy queen. Folio 56.

On Alexander preparing for war against the Brahmins; the letter sent to him by them, in which their marvelous customs are described; and Alexander's notable reply to them. Folio 57, at the beginning.

On Alexander himself: after he had obtained many regions, and those he had not yet obtained had sent embassies offering themselves as subjects, he finally perished at Babylon by poison prepared by his physician Thessalus, in the thirtieth year of his life. Others, however, say that poison was prepared for him by his sister. Folio 57 at the end and folio 58 at the beginning.

Chapter Three: On the Sages of the World Who Flourished at That Time

First on Aristotle, greatest of the philosophers. It begins, "On the philosophers." Folio 58.

On the books Aristotle produced and certain of his moral sayings. Folio 58.

On the philosopher Apuleius and certain of his sayings. Folio 59.

On Hermes the philosopher, who is also called Mercury Trismegistus, and certain of his moral sayings concerning God. Folio 59.

On Plotinus the Platonic philosopher and his sayings; he posited four kinds of virtues, namely political virtues, purgative virtues, virtues of the purified soul, and exemplar virtues. Folio 59.

On Epicurus, a most wicked philosopher, and his errors. Folio 59, at the end.

Chapter Four

That after the death of Alexander the Great, the monarchy of the Greeks was divided into many parts, and chiefly among four kings: Ptolemy in Egypt, Philip the brother of Alexander in Macedonia, Lysimachus in Lydia, Thrace, and the Hellespont, and another who began to reign in Babylon after the death of Alexander. Folio 60.

On Menander and Philemon, comic poets, and Polemon the philosopher. Folio 60, in the last column.

On the kingdom of Syria, whose first king was Seleucus. Folio 61.

On Ptolemy Philadelphus, who reigned in Egypt. He caused the scriptures of the Old Testament to be translated from Hebrew into Greek by the seventy translators and gathered fifty thousand volumes of books in his library. Folio 61.

On the seventy-two translators skilled in the Greek and Hebrew languages and sent from among the Jews into Egypt to interpret the Hebrew scriptures; and on the different opinion among the doctors concerning that translation. This Ptolemy also composed canons of the stars and wrote several books. Folio 61, in the third column.

On Brennus, leader of the Gauls, who broke into Macedonia with a very great army, was defeated by Sosthenes with a small army, and afterward killed himself out of shame. Folio 62, at the beginning.

On the philosophers Arcesilaus and Crates, who flourished at that time; certain of their moral sayings; and certain other sages and their sayings. Folio 62.

On the opinions and doctrines of the Stoic philosophers. Folio 62, at the end.

On Erasistratus the physician and Antiochus reigning in Syria. Folio 63, in the second column.

On Ptolemy Euergetes, who reigned in Egypt after his brother Philadelphus; on Jesus son of Sirach, who composed the Book of Ecclesiasticus, which is placed in sacred scripture after the Book of Wisdom; and on several Ptolemies reigning successively in Egypt. In that time Ennius the philosopher and Statius Caecilius, a Gaul by nation, flourished; he produced the metrical books Achilleid and Thebaid. Folio 63.

On Antiochus the Great, who subjected Judea to himself. Because he attacked the neighboring regions, he was compelled by the Roman consuls Scipio Africanus and Scipio Nasica to cease from the said attack under oath, his son Seleucus being given as a hostage. This Antiochus was finally killed in Persia. Folio 63.

On Seleucus, son of Antiochus, who sent Heliodorus to despoil the temple, but Heliodorus was beaten by angels and scarcely escaped. This Antiochus was also called Epiphanes. Folio 64.

Under this Antiochus called Epiphanes began the deeds contained in the Books of Maccabees. Many perverse men from among the Jews went to this Antiochus and asked that observance of the Mosaic law be taken away from them and the rites of the gentiles introduced among the people. The deeds of the Maccabees themselves, from the First and Second Books, are contained in the several chapters indicated. Folio 64.

After those three noble Maccabean brothers, namely Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, who successively were leaders of the Jewish people and also had great victories over the various nations that were their enemies in the many wars they waged for the observance and defense of the divine laws and the recovery of their liberty taken away by the gentiles--of whom the first, Judas, died in battle, while Jonathan and Simon were treacherously captured and killed--after treaties of peace were entered with the Romans, who were then pagans, nothing more is contained in sacred scripture concerning either Jews or gentiles down to Christ. Folios 64 and 65.

On John Hyrcanus, son of the aforesaid Simon, who succeeded him in the leadership and high priesthood and is much commended by Josephus. He went to war against his kinsman Ptolemy, because Ptolemy had treacherously captured and killed his father, who was Ptolemy's father-in-law, and had captured his mother and brothers. But because the jubilee intervened, he ceased to pursue him. Folio 67.

When John died, because his five sons were of tender age, John himself placed his most eloquent wife over the people and his sons in government. But the firstborn, namely Aristobulus, impatient of this, bound his mother with his three younger brothers and finally killed his mother by starvation. Aristobulus himself received the kingdom, but, becoming ill, reigned for only one year. When by the deceit of his wife he heard that his brother Hyrcanus, second in birth, had been killed, he died of grief. Aristobulus's wife, having no sons, freed the other three brothers of Aristobulus from their chains and caused the eldest of them, namely Alexander, the elder by birth, to reign. He was called Jannaeus; he was most wicked and killed one of his brothers. Folio 67.

This Alexander killed fifty thousand of the people because they detested his vices. By his wife Alexandra he left two sons. Alexandra began to reign, but afterward declared Hyrcanus high priest and future king; she compelled her other son, namely Aristobulus, to live as a private man. Folio 67.

Afterward there was a great contest between the brothers Hyrcanus and Aristobulus concerning the kingdom, and they fought many battles. Pompey, consul of the Romans, intervened between them. Having declared Hyrcanus high priest, he took Aristobulus bound with his two sons, namely Alexander and Antigonus, with him to Rome. After a long contest concerning the kingdom of Judea among Hyrcanus, Aristobulus's sons Alexander and Antigonus, and many battles, Hyrcanus finally gave his granddaughter Mariamne as wife to the first Herod, namely the Ascalonite, who was a gentile from Idumea. After Herod was circumcised, the kingdom of the Jews was transferred to foreigners, namely to Herod, under whom Christ was born. Herod was made king of Judea by Octavian. Folios 67, 68, and 69.

Chapter Five: On the Monarchy of the Romans

The Romans first governed themselves through kings beginning with Romulus, who built Rome. This manner of governing began in the time of Hezekiah, king of Judah, and ended with Tarquin the Proud, seven kings succeeding one another. Afterward they were governed by two consuls changed annually, and finally by emperors down to the present time, of whom Julius Caesar was the first. It begins, "After the manner." Folio 69.

On Romulus, who founded Rome, was conceived in rape, and was nourished by a she-wolf; he caused his brother Remus to be killed so that he alone might reign. Folio 54, almost at the end.

[Running head: Fourth Title]

After Romulus constructed the city, he built a temple, promising impunity to everyone who fled to it. Hence Rome was filled with robbers and fugitives. Also how the Romans took wives from among the Sabine women whom they abducted when they came to a festival; on account of this a hard war was waged between the Sabines and the Romans. And on the unknown death of Romulus, who was translated by them into a god. Folio 69 at the end and folio 70.

On Numa Pompilius, who succeeded Romulus in the kingdom. Having made peace with the neighboring peoples, he established a temple to the god Janus, which remained closed in time of peace and open in time of war; he devoted himself wholly to framing laws and instituting sacred rites. Folio 70, in the third column.

On Tullus Hostilius, third king of the Romans. He was devoted to military affairs, and therefore caused the temple of Janus to be opened, disdaining peace. He subjected the neighboring city of the Albans to himself and was struck and consumed by lightning. Folio 70, in the last column.

On Ancus Marcius, fourth king of the Romans, who founded Ostia; Tarquin the Elder, fifth king; Servius Tullius, sixth; and Tarquin the Proud, seventh king. Folio 71.

On the adultery perpetrated against Lucretia, a most noble Roman woman, by Tarquin, son of King Tarquin, on account of which the kingdom was taken from him and he was driven from the city. Folio 71.

On the first two consuls created, namely Brutus and Collatinus, kinsman of Lucretia. Brutus killed his own sons because of a conspiracy made to bring Tarquin back into the city; when Tarquin made war against them, both fell dead from many wounds. Folio 71.

On the commendation Sallust makes of the Roman republic in the time of the earlier consuls, which Augustine refutes with manifold reasoning. Folio 72, at the beginning.

On Tarquin the Proud, who was driven from the kingdom and the city. Betaking himself to Porsenna, king of the city of Clusium, he received aid from him. Porsenna with his strong army and that of the Etruscans afflicted the city with a long siege. Also on Mucius Scaevola, who went as far as Porsenna's royal seat and killed the scribe sitting beside him. When captured, he said that he had come there to kill the king, reporting that three hundred men had conspired together to kill him. Therefore the king, considering their boldness and his own danger, made peace with the Romans. Folio 72.

On the contention and sedition that arose between the fathers and the Roman plebeians, when the plebs complained of the very harsh oppression of the nobles; to quiet it, the office of tribunes was created. Folio 72.

On another dissension that arose between the consuls and the tribunes of the plebs. To settle it they sent ambassadors into Greece to receive laws; and on the laws and ten tables of the Athenians brought to the city. Folio 72.

On the most severe famine that greatly afflicted the city; and on a certain Lucius Aemilius, who brought into the city a great quantity of grain bought with his own money and distributed it to the plebs. Because of this benefit the consulship was promised to him, but when he also sought royal dignity with great effort because of the people's favor, he was killed. Folio 72, in the last column.

On the death of many of the nobles from a similar disease, which by the disclosure of a certain maidservant was found to have come from poisons treacherously prepared by matrons. Folio 72, at the end.

On the Veientes defeated by the Romans; and on the Senonian Gauls who captured and burned the city. When they began to ascend the Capitol by night, the guards were awakened by the cry of a goose that was there and drove them back; therefore the Romans worshiped the goose as a god. Folio 73, at the beginning.

On the affliction of the city by a great plague; and on the chasm or opening made in the midst of the earth, which was closed when Curtius cast himself into it armed. Folio 73.

On the two Decii, father and son, consuls, who devoted themselves for the obtaining of victory and exposed themselves to death. Folio 73.

On the war of the Romans with the Samnites, who are between Picenum and Campania. In it the Romans were defeated with great disgrace and compelled to pass under the yoke, that is, beneath the forks. But the Romans did not keep the pact made with them, and by again making war against them defeated the Samnites, killed twenty-four thousand of them and their king, and utterly overthrew their city. Folio 73.

On the Tarentines attacking the fleet of the Romans as it passed upon the sea. They dragged the ships to their port and killed all who were fit for war. Aemilius the consul went against them with a multitude of Romans, came there, and devastated with fire and sword everything he occupied. Pyrrhus, king of the Epirotes, who are Greeks, came to aid the Tarentines with a great army. In the first battle the Romans succumbed. In the second battle the Romans prevailed, although many were killed on both sides. In the third battle Pyrrhus was put to flight; having returned to Greece, he was killed. Folio 74.

On the very great plague that invaded Rome and continued for three years. When the Sibylline books were consulted to remove it, it was found as a remedy that Aesculapius, who is called the god of medicine, had to be brought to Rome from Epidaurus, namely a certain city. This Aesculapius was a certain serpent that by the devil's work was marvelously conducted to Rome. Also on another marvelous work wrought by the art of demons. Folio 74.

On Manlius Torquatus, consul of the Romans. When he was at war against the Latins, he issued an edict that no one should fight outside the order. His son, provoked by the insults of one of the adversaries, joined battle with him in single combat and killed him. Returning to his father with victory, he was killed by his father because he had violated the edict. Folio 74.

On the battles of the Romans with the Carthaginians. In the first war, which lasted twenty-two years, Hannibal the Elder, commander of the Carthaginians, devastated the maritime coast of Italy with a fleet of seventy ships. The Romans, with one hundred and thirty ships newly made in a short time, prevailed in a naval battle, capturing thirty-one of Hannibal's ships and sinking thirteen. Thereafter in other wars, with four hundred and thirty ships, the Romans obtained Sicily, which belonged to the Carthaginians. Afterward, when they went into Africa, they had a notable victory in a land battle under the consul Marcus Regulus. In the following battle, however, Marcus Regulus was captured by the Carthaginians. The Carthaginians sent him as an ambassador to the Senate to persuade it to make an exchange of Carthaginian captives for Regulus himself. He urged the contrary; therefore, returning as he had promised by oath, he was killed by a cruel death. Folios 74 and 75.

On the Second Punic War, which brought the greatest destruction to both sides. It lasted eighteen years, and in it Hannibal the Younger, commander of the Carthaginians and the Romans' greatest enemy, sought to pass from Africa into Italy. In Spain he besieged Saguntum, a city allied with the Romans, seeking from this an occasion to fight the Romans without seeming to violate the peace made with them. The Saguntines, however, were so faithful to the Romans that all of them exposed themselves and their riches to fire and were consumed rather than surrender themselves to Hannibal. Folio 75.

On the battle fought at Cannae in Apulia after Hannibal entered Italy with the greatest difficulty. So great a slaughter of the Romans was made in that battle that Hannibal sent to Carthage three modii of gold rings taken from the slain Romans. After the slaughter, as Hannibal advanced to capture the city, he was hindered by exceedingly heavy rain and hail. Folio 75, at the end.

On the several Scipios who were renowned at Rome, and especially in commendation of Scipio Africanus. When the Romans who had survived the great slaughter deliberated about abandoning the city and transferring themselves elsewhere, this Scipio encouraged them all to remain. Taking what army he could gather, he crossed into Africa and besieged Carthage; because of this Hannibal was recalled to defend the city and left Italy. Folio 76.

On the Third Punic War, in which the Carthaginians were defeated and their city captured, entirely burned, and destroyed. Folio 76.

On the First Macedonian War against Philip, king of Macedonia; the second war against Perseus, Philip's son; the Syrian War against Antiochus, king of Syria; and other wars in which the Romans were victorious. Folio 76, at the end.

On the two Gracchi brothers, who were tribunes and were killed in a popular tumult, an event from which great discord arose in the city. Folio 77, at the beginning.

On the great sedition that arose in the city upon the killing of Saturninus. On the Romans' three wars called the Servile Wars: the first was at Capua, the second in Macedonia, and the third in Sicily. Folio 77.

On the war of the Romans against Philip, king of Macedonia, and his son. Folio 77, at the end and on the following folio.

On another war, called the Social War, which the Romans waged against the Latins, who were not Roman citizens but allies.

On Terence, writer of comedies, and certain of his moral sayings. Folio 78.

On the envoys sent by Judas Maccabeus to the Senate to obtain peace and friendship with the Romans, where he is greatly commended. Folio 78.

On the war against King Jugurtha. Folio 78.

On the Mithridatic War against the Romans, which was exceedingly harsh. Folio 78, in the last column.

On the Romans' civil wars, the first of which was between Marius and Sulla; and on the ambition of Marius, from which followed many killings of his rivals. Folio 79.

On Sulla, the adversary of Marius, and his cruelty. Returning from Asia to the city, he fought against the party of Marius and killed innumerable people. Folio 80.

On the civil wars of Sertorius and Catiline, of whom Sertorius belonged to the Marian party and Catiline to the Sullan. Folio 80.

On Catiline and his most wicked character. Folio 81.

On the battles between Pompey, who belonged to the Sullan party, and Julius Caesar, who belonged to the Marian party. Pompey was Julius Caesar's son-in-law. Folio 81.

On Cato, who supported Pompey's party and, hearing that Pompey had been defeated and beheaded while Julius Caesar prospered in everything, killed himself; and on several others called by the name Cato. Folio 81.

On Julius Caesar, his character, his glorious battles, and his assassination. Folio 82, at the beginning.

On the origin of the city of Florence, by whom it was built, and at what time. Folio 82, in the last column and on the following folio.

Chapter Six: On Emperor Octavian and the Sages Who Flourished Then

First, on the five wars he waged: the first against Mark Antony; the second against Brutus and Cassius; the third against the consul Lucius Antony; the fourth against Sextus, son of Pompey the Great; and the fifth against the same Mark Antony. Antony had repudiated Octavian's sister, whom he had as his wife, and taken Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, as wife in her place. Octavian defeated them in naval and land warfare, and they killed themselves, namely Antony and Cleopatra. It begins, "Although." Folio 83, in the third column.

On Octavian's exceedingly handsome appearance and his character. Folio 84.

On his liberality and humility. Folio 84.

On his piety and fairness toward his subjects. Folio 84.

On his frugality and eloquence. Folio 84.

On the vices and wantonness of Octavian himself. Folio 84.

On the sages who flourished at that time, and first on Marcus Varro, who proposed three kinds of theology; and on his moral sayings. Folio 84.

On Valerius Maximus, who produced a book on virtues and vices; and on his notable sayings. Folio 85.

On Marcus Tullius Cicero, the most eloquent of the Latins, who was killed at Gaeta; and on his moral sayings in various books. Folio 85, in the last column and on the following folio.

On Sallust, a Roman citizen, and certain of his sayings from the Jugurthine War and the Catilinarian War, as well as his invectives against Cicero and Cicero's against him. Folio 87.

On Virgil, a most noble poet, and his books, namely the Bucolics, Georgics, and Aeneid; on notable sayings from those books; and on his errors and wantonness. Folio 87.

On the poet Ovid and certain notable sayings from his books. Folio 88.

On the poet Horace and his notable sayings. Folio 88.

That in the time of Octavian, namely in the forty-second year of his rule, Christ was born. Octavian survived Him by twelve years, and on the day of the Nativity the Sibyl showed Octavian the child Jesus, born in His mother's lap within the sphere of the sun. Folio 89, at the beginning.

On the birth of Christ's mother and how Christ descends from the Levitical and royal tribes. Folio 89.

[Running head: Fifth Title]

On the genealogy of the Virgin and her Son, which Matthew describes through forty-two generations beginning from Abraham, but Luke through seventy-seven beginning from Adam. Folio 89.

On the life of Anne and Joachim, the Virgin's parents. Folio 90.

Very briefly, on the life and character of the Virgin. Folio 90.

Fifth Title: On Christ Jesus Our Savior

In it the sixth age of the world begins. It has extended to the present time for one thousand four hundred and seventy-three years and, according to some, lasts until Antichrist, but according to others until the end of the world. It begins from Christ's baptism according to some, and from His Passion according to others; but according to the computation commonly observed, from the Incarnation or Nativity. First, on certain authorities of scripture and the doctors. It begins, "The sixth age of the world." Folio 90.

On the foretelling of the conception of John the Baptist. Folio 91.

On the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary, her Visitation to Elizabeth, the birth of John the Baptist, and the apparition of the angel to Joseph revealing to him the mystery of the Incarnation. Folio 91.

On the birth and circumcision of Christ. Folio 91.

On the adoration of the Magi and the offering of Christ in the temple. Folio 92.

On Herod's slaughter of the Innocents. Folio 92.

On Christ's remaining in the temple when He was twelve years old. Folio 92.

On the preaching of John the Baptist. Folio 92.

On the baptism received by Christ. Folio 92.

On the threefold calling of the apostles by Christ. Folio 93.

On the Lord's sermon on the mountain delivered to the apostles, which Matthew relates in three chapters. Folio 93.

On His healing of a leper, the cure of the centurion's paralyzed servant, and certain other healings by Him. Folio 94.

On the first expulsion He made of those who were selling in the temple; and on Nicodemus's question and Christ's answer to him. Folio 94.

On the conversion of the Samaritan woman, the healing from fever of the ruler's son, and the invalid who remained at the pool. Folio 94.

On the sending of the apostles to preach with certain rules. Folio 95.

On the bread and fishes multiplied twice. Folio 95.

On His walking upon the waters and the calming of the storm. Folio 96.

On the commendation of grace and the necessity of receiving the Eucharist. Folio 96.

On the disciples whom the imprisoned John sent to Christ, Christ's commendation of John, and John's beheading. Folio 97.

On Christ's institution of the Church's sacraments. Folio 96.

On miracles Christ worked by expelling demons from the possessed, namely from the one who had a legion of demons, from the daughter of the Canaanite woman, and from the lunatic. Folio 97.

On a mute and deaf demoniac healed by Christ and the exposition of that Gospel passage. Folio 98.

On a mute and deaf man, but one who was not a demoniac, healed by Christ. Folio 98.

On the blind Bartimaeus, who cried out on the road and was given sight by Him. Folio 99.

On the man blind from birth who was given sight. Folio 99.

On the daughter of the ruler of the synagogue raised by Christ. Folio 100.

On the widow's son raised from the dead. Folio 100.

On Lazarus raised from the dead. Folio 100, at the end and on the following folio.

On several other miracles worked by Him, such as the cleansing of the ten lepers, the straightening of the bent woman, the withering of the fig tree, the stater found in the fish's mouth, and the changing of water into wine at the wedding. Folio 101 and the following folio.

Chapter Two: On Christ's Teaching through Parables

First, on seed cast upon stony and thorny ground, beside the road, and upon good ground, and its exposition. It begins, "On Christ's teaching." Folio 102.

On the parable of the good seed and the tares, and its exposition. Folio 102.

On the parable of seed cast that produces first the blade, then the ear, and then the full grain; and on the mustard seed. Folio 103.

On the parable of the vineyard to which many were called to work at different hours. Folio 104.

On the parable of the vineyard planted, surrounded with a hedge, and leased to tenants, and its exposition. Folio 105.

On two other parables concerning a vineyard. Folio 105, at the end.

On three other parables in which the kingdom of heaven is likened to a treasure, a pearl, and a net. Folio 106.

On the parables in which Christ shows God's mercy in receiving converted sinners, as in the one sheep lost from a hundred and the drachma lost by a woman. Folio 106.

On the parable of the prodigal received into pardon by his father, and its lengthy exposition. Folio 107.

On the parable of a king making a wedding feast for his son, with its lengthy exposition. Folio 108, at the end and on the following folio.

On the parable of the talents granted by a lord to his servants, namely five to one, two to another, and one to another, and its lengthy exposition. Folio 110.

On the parable of the ten wise and foolish virgins. Folio 111, at the end and on the following folio.

On the vigilance to be maintained in expectation of the Lord. Folio 113.

On the debtor of ten thousand talents. Folio 113, in the third column.

On the conversion of Mary Magdalene. Folio 114.

On Zacchaeus, who received Christ in his house. Folio 115, at the end.

On having one's loins girded and lamps burning. Folio 116.

On the rich banqueter and Lazarus the beggar, and its exposition. Folio 116, in the last column.

On the parable of the steward brought into disrepute and his squandering of his lord's goods. Folio 118.

On Christ's temptation in the desert and its lengthy exposition. Folio 119 and the following two folios.

Chapter Three: On Christ's Teaching in Rebuking the Various Vices of Men

It begins, "On teaching." Folio 121.

On His teaching concerning the virtues necessary for salvation. Folio 122.

On His teaching concerning the counsels. Folio 123.

On Christ's answers to questions the Jews asked in order to tempt Him. Folio 123.

On Christ's answer to a question concerning the adulteress; whether it is lawful to put away one's wife; the tribute to be paid to Caesar; and the woman with seven husbands. Folio 124, at the end and on the following folio.

On the answer made to the young man seeking the way of perfection; and on the answer made to the Jews' question whether He was the Christ. Folio 126.

On Christ's teaching concerning the answers made to Jews who were insulting Him in word and deed. Folio 126.

On His teaching in which He shows Himself to be God. Folio 127 and the following folio.

On Christ's exhortation to perseverance and His harsh rebuke of the Jews for their faithlessness. Folio 129.

On the persecutions and plots of the Jews against Christ in order to capture Him. Folio 130 throughout.

Chapter Four: On Christ's Teaching in His Answers to the Pious Questions of His Disciples

First, on Peter's question, "Behold, we have left all things." It begins, "On Jesus's teaching." Folio 131.

On the answer made to Peter when he asked, "How often shall my brother sin against me," etc. Folio 131.

On the answer made to the disciples when they asked, "Who, do you think, is greatest in the kingdom of heaven?" Folio 132, at the beginning.

On the answer made to James and John when their mother said, "Command that these two sons of mine may sit," etc. Folio 132.

On the explanation of certain sayings of Christ in the discourse at the Last Supper that are very obscure. Folio 132 and the following two folios.

On the exposition of the Lord's Prayer, which Christ gave. Folio 134, in the last column and on the following folio.

On matters pertaining to the Last Judgment and its signs. Folio 135.

Chapter Five: On the Keys of the Church Conferred by Christ upon Peter

Folio 136.

On the governance of the Church conferred upon Peter. Folio 137.

On the hardness and rejection of the Jews and the conversion of the gentiles that was to follow. Folio 138.

On Christ's Transfiguration on Mount Tabor. Folio 139 throughout.

On the counsel taken by the Jews concerning Christ's death. Folio 140.

On the supper made for Christ in Bethany and the ointment poured out by Mary Magdalene. Folio 140.

On Christ's entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday with great glory. Folio 141.

On His entry into the temple and the expulsion of those selling there. Folio 142.

On the gentiles who wished to speak with Christ and the voice made from heaven, "I have glorified," etc. Folio 142, in the last column.

Chapter Six: On Christ's Passion and How It Was Prophesied

It begins, "The Passion." Folio 143.

On the counsel of the Jews concerning Christ's death and Judas's receipt of money for betraying Him. Folio 143.

On the Last Supper and the disclosure of the betrayer. Folio 144 and the following folio.

On Christ's capture and the prayer He first made in the garden. Folio 145 and the following folio.

On Christ's being led before the different judges, namely Annas, Caiaphas, Herod, and Pilate. Folio 146 and the following folio.

On the examination of His case before Pilate and the sentence of death. Folio 147 and the following folio.

On His crucifixion upon the cross. Folio 148 and the following folio.

On the seven words Christ spoke upon the cross. Folio 149.

On His death upon the cross. Folio 150.

Chapter Seven: On the Lord's Resurrection and Its Prefiguration

And why He rose on the third day. It begins, "On the Resurrection." Folio 151.

On the hour at which He rose and how "in the evening of the Sabbath," etc., is to be understood. Folio 151.

On His first apparition, made to Magdalene, but earlier to His mother. Folio 152.

On the second apparition, made to the women when they held His feet; the third apparition, made to Peter; and the apparition made to James the Less. Folio 152.

On the fourth apparition, namely to the two going to Emmaus. Folio 152.

On the men who rose with Christ and whether they ascended with Him. Folio 153.

On the fifth apparition, made to ten disciples enclosed in the upper room. Folio 153, at the end.

On the apparition made eight days later to Thomas with the others. Folio 154.

On another apparition made at the Sea of Tiberias, and on the disciples' fishing. Folio 151.

On the eighth apparition, made to the disciples in Galilee. Folio 156, at the beginning.

On the ninth apparition and the tenth, made on the day of the Ascension. Folio 156.

On the necessity of Christ's Passion and the several senses in which He rose. Folio 157, in the third column.

On the testimony that Josephus, historian of the Jews, gives. Folio 158.

On the letter that either Pilate or another person wrote to Emperor Tiberius and the Senate concerning Christ; the Sibyl's testimony concerning His death and Resurrection; and Christ's image. Folio 158.

Chapter Eight: On the Exposition of That Gospel of John Which Is Said Daily at the End of Mass

Namely, "In the beginning was the Word." It treats Christ's threefold nativity: the divine from the Father, the spiritual in the mind of a creature, and the temporal from His mother. It begins, "That disciple." Folio 158.

On the explanation of the term "Word." Folio 159.

On the explanation of the word "was." Folio 159.

On the explanation of the words "In the beginning." Folio 160.

On the clause "And the Word was with God." Folio 160.

On the clause "And the Word was God." Folio 160, at the end.

On the clause "The same was in the beginning with God." Folio 160.

On the clause "All things were made by Him." Folio 161.

[Running head: Sixth Title]

On the clause "Without Him was made nothing." Folio 162.

On the clause "What was made in Him was life." Folio 162.

On the words "And the life was the light of men." Folio 163.

On the second nativity of Christ, namely that by which He is born through grace in the mind of a person, upon the words "The light shines in darkness." Folio 163.

On the preparation of a person for this nativity through grace, in the words “There was a man sent.” Folio 164.

On grace itself, which is born in the mind and has its diffusion among the elect, in the words “He was the true light.” Folio 165.

On ingratitude and the rejection of grace among the wicked, in the words “He was in the world,” etc. Folio 165.

On Christ’s third nativity, namely the temporal from the Virgin; and first, the truth of our humanity in Him is noted in the words “He came unto His own.” Folio 165.

Second, the fruitfulness of His nativity is noted in the words “But as many as.” Folio 165.

Third, His dwelling among us is noted in the words “The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us.” Folio 166.

Fourth, the perfect happiness attained in us is noted in the words “And we saw His glory.” Folio 167.

On the manifold vision of God. Folio 167 and the following folio.

Sixth Title: On the Church, Which Is the Mystical Body of Christ, and Its First Pastors and Preachers, Namely the Apostles

It begins, “Christ Himself.” Folio 168.

It should be known that the condition of the Church in its course and development under different times, from the age of the primitive Church to the end of the world, was revealed to John the Evangelist, exiled on the island of Patmos on a certain Lord’s Day, through imaginary visions. He relates these throughout his Book of the Apocalypse, but very obscurely, whence different people have expounded them in different ways. Here the exposition according to Nicholas of Lyra is given. First, in John’s salutation at the beginning on behalf of God and the seven spirits who are before His throne, the seven offices of the angels that they exercise toward us are signified. Folio 168, at the end and on the following folio.

In the one whom John saw in the midst of the seven candlesticks, like the Son of Man, seven qualities are described that signify the seven virtues that were in Christ and are in every saint. Folio 169.

Then, in the throne in heaven that John saw and the one sitting upon it, is signified the majesty of the most holy Trinity governing the Church. Folio 170, at the beginning.

Then, in the book sealed with seven seals, is signified knowledge then hidden from men concerning seven ministries, namely the seven successive persecutions of the Church under gentile emperors down to Constantine. Folio 170 and the following folio.

Then, in the seven angels sounding trumpets, are signified seven other persecutions succeeding those already mentioned, especially those of the heretics. Folio 172.

On the consolation given to the Church in its persecutions and the fruit of devotion arising from it. Folio 173.

In the woman who appeared in heaven clothed with the sun and with the moon beneath her feet is signified the deliverance of the Church by Emperor Heraclius against certain persons. In Michael’s fight against the dragon is signified Michael’s aid to the Church against the devil and his persecutors, while the dragon’s seven heads are the seven capital vices. Folio 174.

In the beast ascending from the earth is signified the persecution under Muhammad. Folio 175.

In the seven angels having seven plagues are signified seven other tribulations of the Church at different times, in the time of Charlemagne and other successors. Folio 176.

In the angel holding the key of the abyss and seizing the dragon is signified Pope Innocent III, under whom the mendicant orders arose. Folio 178.

Afterward, and also earlier in different places, are signified the persecution of Antichrist, the punishments of the reprobate, and the glory of the blessed. Folio 178.

Chapter Two: On the Primitive Church from the Matters Contained in the Acts of the Apostles, Principally Concerning Peter and Paul

First, on the election of Matthias in Judas’s place. It begins, “Jerome in the prologue.” Folio 178.

On the sending of the Holy Spirit upon the disciples on the day of Pentecost, and Peter’s preaching, through which three thousand were baptized. Folio 179, at the beginning.

On the lame man remaining at the gate of the temple, healed by Peter; Peter’s subsequent preaching, through which five thousand were converted; and the threats made by magistrates and priests that the apostles should not preach. Folio 179.

On Ananias and Sapphira committing fraud concerning the price of their sold field and their punishment; the apostles' arrest for preaching and their scourging; the counsel taken by the Pharisees concerning what they should do to the apostles; and Gamaliel's speech on their behalf. Folio 179.

On the murmur that arose between the Greek and Hebrew converts, on account of which seven deacons were appointed, the first of whom was Stephen, who was stoned after disputing against the Jews. Folio 179, at the end.

On Simon Magus, who after being baptized offered Peter money to obtain the grace of conferring the Holy Spirit; and on the eunuch reading Isaiah on the road, converted by Philip the deacon. Folio 180.

On Paul's persecution of the Church and his conversion; the healing of the paralytic Aeneas by Peter; and the raising of Tabitha by him. Folio 180.

On the centurion Cornelius, baptized by Peter with his household; the future famine throughout the whole world foretold by the prophet Agabus; the beheading of the apostle James; and Peter's imprisonment by Herod, who at last was struck by an angel and died. Folio 180, at the end and on the following folio.

On Paul and Barnabas being commissioned by the apostles, at the Holy Spirit's command, to preach to the gentiles; their expulsion from the city because of their preaching at the instigation of the Jews; and the healing of a lame man by Paul, on account of which the bystanders adored Paul and Barnabas as gods, which they refused. Folio 181.

On the question that arose among converts from Judaism concerning whether circumcision must be observed as necessary, Paul and Barnabas contradicting them. To settle it, the apostles gathered at Jerusalem and determined and commanded that circumcision should not be imposed upon the gentiles. This was the first council. Folio 181.

On the separation between Paul and Barnabas over the reception of Mark, Barnabas's cousin; and on Paul afterward taking Timothy, whom he also circumcised to remove scandal. On the deliverance from the devil of a girl who had a divining spirit; because her masters lost their profit and her divination ceased, they seized Paul and Silas and caused them to be beaten and imprisoned. When they heard that Paul and Silas were Roman citizens, they permitted them to depart free. Folio 182, at the beginning.

On the persecution stirred up against Paul while he preached at Thessalonica; and afterward on his preaching or disputation at Athens with Epicurean and Stoic philosophers, and Paul's inquiry at the Areopagus upon the altar of the unknown God, through which Dionysius the Areopagite was converted. Folio 181.

On Paul's journey through different places to preach, the persecution of the Jews against him, and Apollos, who, having been baptized only with John's baptism, was afterward baptized with Christ's baptism. Folio 182.

On certain disciples baptized only with John's baptism who, after being baptized with Christ's baptism, visibly received the Holy Spirit; on the many miracles worked by Paul; on the sons of a priest, exorcists who adjured those possessed by demons in Paul's name and were attacked by them; on Demetrius the silversmith, who stirred up a sedition against Paul because the worship of Diana was being brought to nothing; and on the raising of Eutychus, who fell from the window of the upper room while listening to Paul's preaching. Folio 182.

On Paul, concerning whom Agabus bound himself with a belt and prophesied that Paul would be bound in the same way. Paul nevertheless did not, at the urging of the faithful, withdraw from going to Jerusalem. There, at the counsel of James the Less and others, he entered the temple as if to fulfill a vow, and because of this a great tumult of Jews arose against him, crying out for his death. When a very great crowd had gathered and he related his conversion, the sedition against him increased still more, on account of which the tribune caused him to be led into his headquarters and scourged; but when Paul declared that he was a Roman citizen, the tribune ceased to scourge him. Led on the following day before the council of the Jews, Paul defended himself, but, when he was not heard, cried out that he was a Pharisee. This produced a division among those present, with the Pharisees defending him as innocent and the others accusing him. When Paul had been returned to the barracks, certain men vowed not to eat unless they first killed him. Paul's nephew heard this and revealed it to Paul and then to the tribune, whereupon the tribune sent Paul under armed escort to the governor Felix. Folio 183.

The Jews came to Caesarea before Felix, to whom Paul had been sent, and accused him of many things as a pestilent man. Paul, answering each charge, showed their falsehood; hence he was neither absolved nor condemned. After Governor Festus came to Caesarea, the Jews accused Paul before him and asked that Paul be sent to Jerusalem to be judged there, intending to kill him on the road. When Festus attempted this and asked whether Paul would consent, Paul perceived the danger and appealed to Caesar. Later, when Agrippa came to Caesarea to visit Festus, Paul was summoned and examined before them. He spoke so excellently in his own defense that Agrippa said he could have been released if he had not appealed. Folio 183, at the end.

On Paul being sent by sea to Caesar, to whom he had appealed; his voyage; and the shipwreck from which all escaped through Paul's merits. After they had disembarked, the broken ship was submerged. On the island of Mytilene they gathered wood and made a fire. When Paul placed a bundle upon the fire, a viper came out of the wood and bit him; when it did him no harm, the crowd standing by worshiped him as a god. There also Paul healed the father of Publius, the leading man of that island, from fevers and dysentery, and healed many others. At last they arrived at Rome. Having summoned the Jews, Paul cleared himself of the charges and explained the reason for his arrival; afterward he preached publicly at Rome. Folio 184.

Here ends the Acts of the Apostles.

Chapter Three: On the Blessed Virgin Mary and Her Life after Christ's Ascension

It begins, "If it is asked." Folio 184.

On her passing, or Assumption. Folio 185.

Chapter Four: On the Apostle Peter

But first, on Peter and Paul together. It begins, "Afterward." Folio 185.

On Peter's calling and the period in which he remained at Jerusalem, afterward sat at Antioch, and finally at Rome for twenty-five years; and on his daughter Petronilla. Folio 185, at the end and on the following folio.

On the long contest Peter had against Simon Magus to expose his magical works. At last, when Simon attempted to ascend into heaven, he fell at Peter's prayer and was shattered; because of this Peter was arrested by Nero. Folio 186.

That Peter, foreknowing his martyrdom, designated Clement as pope in the presence of the faithful; and on his epistles. Folio 186, in the last column.

On Peter's martyrdom upon the cross. Folio 187.

Chapter Five: On the Blessed Apostle Paul

On his name, whence it is derived; his activity; and his wisdom. It begins, "Paul, although." Folio 187.

On the raising of Patroclus, Nero's cupbearer; the sentence given against Paul; his beheading; and the praises of Paul by John Chrysostom. Folio 187.

On the teaching of Paul's epistles, and especially the Epistle to the Romans. At its beginning, because the converts from Judaism preferred themselves to the converts from the gentiles, the apostle humbles both by different arguments, showing that all have sinned and need the grace of God, since good works are not sufficient for salvation without grace. Folio 188.

That original sin is transmitted from Adam to all, from which arises the battle in us between sensuality and reason, a battle not conquered except through grace. Folio 188.

On foreknowledge and predestination in chapter eight; the rejection of the Jews; and the election of the gentiles, the reason for which is known to God alone, just as is the foreknowledge or predestination of any person, down to chapter twelve. Folio 188, at the end.

Thereafter he exhorts them to virtuous works, to serve one another through the gifts bestowed upon them, and to show obedience to superiors; and he treats things offered to idols. Folio 189.

On the epistles he sent to the Corinthians. At the beginning he praises them magnificently, namely with respect to those among them who were perfect. Then he rebukes the contentions they created concerning those who baptized them, as though they understood the effect of baptism to come from the baptizer and not from Christ. Folio 189.

On the foundation of the spiritual building, which is living faith in Christ; the different kinds of building upon it; the ministers of sacred things, who are to be regarded not as their authors but as stewards; and not judging others. Folio 189.

On the incestuous man whom Paul excommunicated for abusing his stepmother; and on avoiding the excommunicated, but not other unbelievers or wicked Christians. Folio 190, at the beginning.

On avoiding fornication and other carnal vices; the marriage of believers and unbelievers; and the mutual service of spouses. Folio 190.

On abstinence from things offered to idols; and how temporal things may be received from laypeople by those who sow spiritual things. The apostle himself, however, abstained from these and sought his livelihood through the labor of his hands. Folio 190.

On the sacraments of the New Law prefigured in the old; and his admonition to abstain from several vices for whose perpetration certain people in the Old Testament were gravely punished. Folio 190.

On the distribution of graces, which are given differently to different persons, and the different offices in the Church through which some serve others after the example of the members of the human body. Folio 190.

On the marvelous commendation of charity, how in many respects it surpasses all the virtues; and that the gift of prophecy is greater than that of tongues. Folio 190.

On the final resurrection of bodies, which is proved from Christ's Resurrection; the four endowments of the glorified body; and the collections to be made, namely alms for those who were in Jerusalem. Folio 190, at the end.

He wrote one epistle to the Hebrews, in which he shows Christ's dignity above the angels and also above Moses, the lawgiver of the Old Law, showing that Jesus was truly the great pontiff and a priest according to the order of Melchizedek. Folio 191.

He then shows that the law of the Gospel and the New Testament succeed the Old Law; that the things promised through the prophets, the tabernacle, and afterward Solomon's temple were figures of the Church; and that the ancient sacrifices of animals and other ceremonies cease through Christ's Passion. Folio 191.

On the definition of faith and its manifold commendation, showing that from Abel down to that time all great deeds were done through faith. Folio 191.

He exhorts to patience from the knowledge of Christ's Passion and to other virtues. Folio 191.

Chapter Six: On John the Apostle and Evangelist

That for three reasons he was a beloved intimate of Christ; and there, whether he or Peter loved Christ more. It begins, "John, the brother." Folio 191, at the end.

On certain of his moral deeds. Folio 192.

On his miracles and the raising of the dead. Folio 192.

On John's body and the several opinions concerning where it is. Folio 192.

Chapter Seven: On James the Greater

That, going to Spain to preach, he converted only two persons, or according to others nine. Returning from there to Jerusalem, he preached and confirmed his teaching with miracles. He converted Philetus, who had been sent by Hermogenes to refute his teaching, and at last also Hermogenes himself, who was bound by demons and led before James; and on James's martyrdom. It begins, "James." Folio 192.

On his burial, the devotion of the faithful in visiting his shrine, and a certain miracle. Folio 193.

Chapter Eight: On James the Less

Because of his exceptional holiness he was made archbishop at Jerusalem to govern the primitive Church gathered there; why he is called the brother of the Lord; and why he was called the Just because of his exceeding holiness. Christ also appeared to him in a singular manner after rising. It begins, "James the Less." Folio 193, at the end.

On his preaching concerning Christ and his martyrdom. Folio 194.

Chapter Nine: On the Apostle Andrew

On his preaching in Achaia, his disputation with the unbelieving proconsul Aegeas, and his martyrdom upon a cross. Folio 194.

On his miracles in life; and how after death he freed a certain most devout bishop from peril to his soul. Folio 194.

Chapter Ten: On the Apostle Thomas

When he had raised from the dead the brother of the king who had imprisoned him to be burned, through that brother he disclosed a marvelous palace constructed in heaven from the treasure of the king himself that had been distributed to the poor. It begins, "Thomas." Folio 195.

On his martyrdom, because he was pierced by a lance. Folio 195.

Chapter Eleven: On the Blessed Apostle Philip

After raising the dead, he was at last fastened to a cross. It begins, "Philip." Folio 195.

Chapter Twelve: On the Holy Apostle Bartholomew

Through the idol Berith the devil gave several signs by which Bartholomew might be recognized among others; and Bartholomew baptized King Polemius with his wife and children. Folio 195.

On the martyrdom inflicted upon him by King Astyages, brother of the said Polemius: he was flayed and afterward crucified or beheaded, according to different opinions. Folio 196.

Chapter Thirteen: On the Blessed Apostle and Evangelist Matthew

Going to Ethiopia, he exposed the deceit of the magicians Zaroës and Arphaxat and caused them to be expelled from there; and he converted Egippus, king of those peoples, with his entire household to the faith. It begins, "Matthew." Folio 196.

On his martyrdom by King Hirtacus, successor of Egippus, because Matthew publicly rebuked him for seeking to have as wife Iphigenia, the daughter of King Egippus, who had been dedicated to God with the sacred veil. Folio 196.

Chapter Fourteen: On the Apostles Simon and Jude, or Thaddeus

At last they went together into Persia and preached that the war being prepared against the Indians would end through the reconciliation of the two peoples, as happened. The magicians Zaroës and Arphaxat were confounded, and the apostles were held in great veneration. It begins, "Simon." Folio 196, at the end.

On their martyrdom and the deliverance of a certain deacon from an accusation of fornication made against him, through the speech of an infant born that day. Folio 197.

Chapter Fifteen: On the Apostle Matthias

Elected in Judas's place, he was struck in the head with an axe. It begins, "Matthias." Folio 197.

Chapter Sixteen: On Mark the Evangelist

He was Peter's disciple and journeyed with him to Rome. At Rome he wrote for the faithful a Gospel from the things Peter preached. It begins, "After those twelve." Folio 197.

On his martyrdom: a rope was placed around his neck, and he was dragged through the city of Alexandria and torn apart. Folio 198.

Chapter Seventeen: On Luke the Evangelist

He was a disciple of the apostles and Paul's inseparable companion in his travels, and he remained a virgin. He died in Bithynia in the eighty-third year of his life. It begins, "Luke." Folio 198.

Chapter Eighteen: On the Apostle Barnabas

He was given to Paul as a companion in preaching to the gentiles, and he was excellently governed with respect to himself, God, and his neighbor. It begins, "Barnabas." Folio 198.

On his martyrdom by fire. Folio 198.

Chapter Nineteen: On Blessed Mary Magdalene, Martha, and Lazarus

It begins, "Among Christ's." Folio 198, at the end.

On Mary Magdalene's arrival at Marseille with several others and her later raising of the duke's wife, who had died in childbirth aboard ship. Folio 199.

On her penitence and passing. Folio 199.

Chapter Twenty: On Martha, Her Sister, and the Austerity of Her Life

It begins, "Martha." Folio 199.

On her passing. Frontonius, summoned by Christ to her burial, buried her with the Lord Himself. Folio 199.

Chapter Twenty-One: On the Roman Emperors of Those Times

It begins, "After the foundation." Folio 199, at the end and on the following folio.

On Emperor Tiberius, who succeeded Octavian Augustus, and his praiseworthy character. Folio 200.

On his vices, especially gluttony and drunkenness. Folio 200.

On the famous deception of Paulina carried out in the temple of Isis at Rome. Folio 200.

On Herod, who was imprisoned by Tiberius because he wished for Tiberius's death so that Gaius might succeed him in the empire. Folio 201.

On Gaius being made emperor by Tiberius and the elevation of Herod Agrippa. Folio 201.

On the most wicked character of the aforesaid Gaius, although he was educated in the liberal disciplines. Folio 201.

On Philo the historian. Folio 202.

Chapter Twenty-Two

After the death of Gaius, who was killed, Claudius received the empire. Folio 202.

On Claudius's wicked character and his death, and on Herod's death. Folio 203, at the beginning.

Chapter Twenty-Three: On Emperor Nero

He was the husband of Octavia, daughter of Emperor Claudius, and through the persuasions of Agrippina, Claudius's wife, he was designated emperor by Claudius in place of Claudius's own son. For five years he was very modest and, while almost still a boy, acquired nearly all the liberal disciplines; but afterward he was most wicked and was greatly devoted to music. When the apostle Paul had appealed and been brought to Rome, Nero had already ruled for two years. Disdaining the contention between the Jews and Christians concerning the Law, he permitted Paul to move freely through the city with only one guard. Folio 203.

On his most wicked character, wantonness, pomp, and cruelty. Folio 203, at the end.

On his death. Folio 204.

Chapter Twenty-Four: On the Sages of the World Who Flourished at That Time

First, on Seneca. It begins, "In these times." Folio 204.

On his notable sayings from different books. Folio 204.

On moral maxims from his epistles to Lucilius. Folio 204, at the end and throughout the following three folios.

On Seneca's death and his error concerning the worship of idols. Folio 206.

On choice passages from Persius, the satirical poet. Folio 206.

On choice passages from the poet Juvenal. Folio 206.

On choice passages from Quintilian. Folio 206, at the end.

On his choice passages in the Book of Causes. Folio 208.

Chapter Twenty-Five: On Those Who Suffered Martyrdom under Nero

First, on Vitalis, his wife Valeria, and their sons Gervasius and Protasius. Folio 207.

On Martial, kinsman of blessed Stephen. Folio 208.

On Savinianus and two others from the number of Christ's seventy-two disciples. Folio 208, at the end.

On four saints under the name Saint Julian. Folio 209.

On three saints named Saturninus. Folio 209.

On the first seven deacons and Lazarus, bishop of Marseille. Folio 209.

On Longinus, who pierced Christ's side. Folio 209, at the end.

Chapter Twenty-Six: On the Disciples of the Apostle Peter

First, on Clement, who was the paternal uncle of Saint Clement the pope. It begins, “Concerning certain.” Folio 210, at the beginning.

[Running head: Seventh Title]

On Fronton, first bishop of the city of Périgueux, who gathered several disciples and led a religious life with them in the desert. Folio 210.

On Saint Apollinaris, first bishop of Ravenna. Folio 210.

On Saint Lucian and his great abstinence. Folio 210.

On Saint Romulus, first bishop of Fiesole. Folio 211, at the beginning.

Chapter Twenty-Seven: On Saint Nazarius

He was the son of blessed Perpetua; and on his martyrdom. Blessed Ambrose found his body. Folio 210.

On Saint Mennius, bishop of the city of Châlons. Folio 211.

Chapter Twenty-Eight: On the Disciples of Paul

The foremost of them was Dionysius the Areopagite, the first doctor of the Church. Folio 211, at the end.

On his conversion to the faith when he was a philosopher, and his martyrdom. Folio 212, at the beginning.

On the companions of Dionysius, namely Sanctinus, Antoninus, Caureanus, Regulus, and Ionius. Folio 212.

On Saint Eutropius, fellow companion of Dionysius, whose passion Dionysius himself wrote; and on his companions Eugenius and Taurinus. Folio 212.

On Saint Thecla, disciple of Paul. Folio 213.

On several other disciples of Paul, such as Timothy, bishop of the Ephesians, Trophimus, Titus, and the virgins Potentiana and Praxedes, as well as others. Folio 214.

Seventh Title

It begins with the reign of Vespasian, who was made emperor while he was at the siege of Jerusalem. Folio 213, in the last column.

On the destruction of Jerusalem accomplished by his son Titus, who had fought there on the Romans’ behalf. Folio 214.

On the most bitter famine that oppressed those under siege. Folio 214.

On the widow who ate her son because of the famine during that siege. Folio 214.

On the capture of the city and the extermination that occurred on account of Christ’s death. Folio 215.

On Josephus, the Jewish historian. Folio 215.

On the reign of Titus, who succeeded his father Vespasian, and his excellent character. Folio 215.

On Domitian, brother of Titus, who succeeded him in the empire, and his most wicked character. Folio 215.

On the second persecution of the Church, stirred up by Domitian himself. He exiled John the Evangelist to Patmos, and under him Nereus and Achilleus, chamberlains of the virgin Domitilla, Domitian’s niece, suffered martyrdom, as did Domitilla herself. Folio 216.

On Domitian’s assassination; he had also commanded that descendants of the family of David be killed. Folio 216.

On Nerva, who succeeded Domitian in the empire. Under him certain people suffered martyrdom, and he governed well enough for one year and three months. Folio 216.

On Trajan, the tenth emperor, whom Nerva had adopted as a son. He subdued many nations and subjected them to the Roman Empire, governing excellently and caring for the republic. Folio 216.

On the philosopher Plutarch, Trajan’s teacher, and the letters sent to Trajan to instruct him. Folio 216.

On blessed Ignatius the martyr, his epistle to the glorious Virgin, and his martyrdom under Trajan. Folio 217, at the beginning.

Chapter Two: On the Supreme Pontiffs from Peter to the Time of Trajan

The first of them was Linus, the second Cletus, the third Clement, and the fourth Anacletus. It begins, “Because.” Folio 217.

On Pope Clement and the marvelous rediscovery of his father, mother, and brothers. Folio 217.

On his exile and martyrdom. After Anacletus, Pope Evaristus succeeded him. Folio 218.

Chapter Three: On Phocas, Bishop and Martyr

He suffered under Trajan. It begins, “Under Trajan.” Folio 218 and the following folio.

On the atrocity of the persecution against Christians and Pliny the Younger, who wrote a letter to Trajan in praise of the Christians. Folio 219.

On notable sayings of Pliny excerpted from his Natural History and his epistles. Folio 219.

On Trajan’s death; because of his excellent rule, he was elevated among the gods by the Romans. Folio 219.

Chapter Four: On Emperor Hadrian, the Twelfth Emperor

He was very learned and rebuilt Jerusalem, calling it Aelia from his own name, for he was called Aelius. In his time Aquila flourished, the second translator of the Old Law after the Seventy. It begins, “Hadrian.” Folio 219, at the end.

On the philosopher Secundus, who kept silence at all times because he had been the cause of his mother’s death; and how this happened, as may be seen there. Folio 220.

On the notable maxims of this philosopher Secundus, given in writing as answers to Emperor Hadrian’s questions. Not even threats of death could bend him to speak. Folio 220.

On Quadratus, a bishop who suffered martyrdom, and Aristides. Each presented Hadrian with a book written in defense of the Christian religion. Folio 220.

Chapter Five: On Pope Alexander

He succeeded Evaristus and converted many illustrious Romans, especially Hermes and Quirinus; and on their martyrdom. It begins, “Alexander.” Folio 220, at the end.

On Saint Sixtus I, who succeeded Alexander and was the seventh after Peter; and on the martyrs Peregrinus and Taurinus. Folio 221.

On Eustace, commander of the soldiers, and how he marvelously found again his lost wife Theospita and his sons Agapitus and Theospitus, all of whom were crowned with martyrdom. Folio 221.

On the ten thousand crucified upon Mount Ararat and their marvelous conversion. Folio 222.

On Saint Sophia and her three daughters Faith, Hope, and Charity, who were crowned with martyrdom. Folio 222.

On the virgin Serapia; Sabina, a most noble Roman widow; Mary; Faustinus; and Jobitta, who suffered under Emperor Hadrian. Folio 223.

Chapter Six: On the Supreme Pontiffs Who Governed the Church in Those Times

Namely Telesphorus, who succeeded Sixtus; after him Hyginus; Pius succeeding Hyginus; then Anicetus; after him Soter; and after Soter, Eleutherius. It begins, “In the papacy.” Folio 223.

On Polycarp, bishop and martyr, bishop of the Smyrnaeans in the time of Emperor Antoninus. Folio 222.

On Papias, bishop in Asia and heresiarch of the millenarians. Irenaeus, Apollinaris, Tertullian, Victorinus, and Lactantius followed that heresy; all of them were crowned with martyrdom, and how they may be excused from that error is treated. Folio 223, at the end.

On Justin the philosopher and historian, who produced several books in defense of the faith. A book on the Christian religion that he produced rendered Antoninus Pius benevolent to the Christians. Justin was crowned with martyrdom. Folio 224.

On several martyrs, namely Bishop Photinus, the woman Blandina, and Saint Sanctus the deacon, and their marvelous endurance. Folio 224.

On Saint Felicity, who suffered with her seven sons under Emperor Antoninus. Folio 224, at the end.

On Antoninus Pius, who succeeded Hadrian in the empire as his adopted son through marriage. Under him flourished Apollonius, Basilides, the philosopher Taurus, the physician Galen, and the astrologer Ptolemy. Folio 225.

On Marcus Antoninus Verus and Lucius Aurelius Commodus, the two sons of Antoninus who succeeded him in the empire. Folio 225.

On the martyrs Victor, the woman Corona, Concordius, Marcellus, and Valerius. Folio 225.

On Hegesippus, who wrote histories of ecclesiastical deeds; and on Dionysius, Theophilus, and Apollinaris, most learned men. Folio 226, at the beginning.

On the deaths of the emperors Aurelius and Marcus. Under them flourished Theodotion, the second translator of the Old Testament after the Seventy, the philosopher Atticus, and the orator Fronto. Folio 226.

On the marvelous history of the most noble virgin Eugenia. Learned in the liberal arts and pretending to be male, she took up the monastic habit with Protus and Hyacinthus. On Melantia's false accusation against her before Eugenia's father Philip, then governor of Alexandria; the exposure of Melantia's falsehood; Eugenia's recognition by her father and brothers; their conversion to the faith; their return to the city; and their martyrdom. Folio 226 and the following folio.

On the senator Julius, Antoninus, and Vincent, martyred under Emperor Commodus. Folio 227.

On Helvius Pertinax, who succeeded in the empire. After Helvius, the jurist Julian, Helvius's killer, succeeded and usurped the empire for himself; but Severus killed Julian and received the empire. Severus ruled well and was succeeded by his most wicked son Antoninus Caracalla. Folio 227.

On Narcissus, bishop of Jerusalem. Three men who falsely accused him were most gravely punished through their own perjury. Folio 228.

On Saint Cecilia and Valerian, her husband, and Tiburtius, his kinsman, who were converted by her and crowned with martyrdom. Folio 228 throughout.

On the marvelous martyrdom of the virgin Martina. Folio 229.

On Pope Callistus and his martyrdom under Alexander. Folio 229.

On Pope Urban and his martyrdom under the prefect Almachius. Folio 230.

On the martyrs Quirinus and his mother Julitta; and on the jurist Ulpian. Folio 230.

On Ulpian's origin, austere life, eloquence, many errors, and the different opinions concerning him. Folio 230.

On his notable sayings. Folio 230.

Chapter Seven: On the Emperors after Emperor Alexander

Emperor Alexander was killed through the treachery of Maximinus, who then seized the Roman Empire. Maximinus himself was killed by Pupienus. Pupienus and Balbinus then seized the Roman Empire; after they were immediately killed, Gordian succeeded. Many matters concerning them are treated there. It begins, "To the history." Folio 231.

On Emperor Gordian and his son Gordian, who governed excellently; he subjected many nations rebelling against the empire; and on his death and Pope Pontian. Folio 232.

On Emperor Philip, who reigned after procuring Gordian's death and made his son Philip a partner in the empire. Folio 233.

On Emperor Decius, who killed Philip and usurped the empire for himself. He held it for one year and three months; in his time Saint Agatha was martyred in Sicily by the prefect Quintian. Folio 233.

On the Seven Sleepers enclosed in a cave at Ephesus. Folio 234.

On the martyrs Peter, Dionysia, and Tryphon. Folio 234.

On Saint Reparata the martyr; Abdon and Sennen under the rulers; Permenius and Secundianus; and the brothers Pergentinus and Laurentinus at the city of Arezzo. Folio 234.

On Gallus Hostilianus and his son Volusian ruling after the death of Decius; and the question that arose concerning the rebaptism of heretics. Folio 235.

On the supreme pontiffs: Pope Fabian, who succeeded Pontian, and Cornelius, who succeeded Fabian. In Cornelius's time a schism arose between him and the antipope Novatian, who became a heresiarch. Concerning this schism there are epistles of Cyprian to Cornelius and of Dionysius of Alexandria to Novatian. On Pope Lucius after Cornelius; after Lucius was crowned with martyrdom, Stephen ascended Peter's chair and was himself a martyr; Sixtus II followed him in the papacy. Folio 235, at the end and on the following folio.

Chapter Eight: On Valerian and His Son Gallienus

They ruled after the killing of Gallus and Volusian. Valerian was at first benevolent to Christians, but afterward became a persecutor. It begins, "After the killing." Folio 236.

On the aforesaid Gallienus, son of Valerian, who according to some was called Decius. Under him Sixtus and Lawrence suffered. Valerian, however, was captured by the king of the Persians and held in shameful servitude. Folio 237.

[Running head: Eighth Title]

On Macrinus receiving the empire and advancing against Gallienus; Odaenathus reigning in the East, whose wife Zenobia stirred up many battles against the Romans; Maximus being made emperor in Gaul; and the great fragmentation of the empire. Folio 237.

On those crowned with martyrdom under Valerian and Gallienus; and on Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, crowned with martyrdom. Folio 238.

On his short works and certain notable sayings from his books. Folio 238.

On Dionysius, bishop and martyr of Alexandria, who also wrote many works. Folio 238.

On Gregory, bishop of Neocaesarea, who was greatly feared by demons. Folio 238.

On the martyrdom of Sixtus and Lawrence. Folio 239.

On the martyrs Hippolytus, Concordia, Tryphonia, and Cyrillus. Folio 239.

On the great veneration of blessed Lawrence and his miracles. Folio 239, at the end and on the following folio.

On the many martyrs under the most cruel persecution of Decius, especially Julian the martyr, the virgin Apollonia, Marinus, Minias at Florence, and certain others. Folio 240.

On Emperor Claudius fighting and defeating Aureolus, who had usurped the empire for himself; and on Claudius's brother Quintillus, who succeeded him and was killed after a few days. Folio 240.

On Emperor Aurelian, who defeated the nation of the Goths in hard battles, crushed the Franks, and checked other nations in their insolence. Folio 241.

On the hard war Aurelian waged against Zenobia, who ruled in the East with great armies and riches. Aurelian captured her and, while triumphing at Rome, compelled her to walk before him. Folio 241 and the following folio.

On Emperor Tacitus, created after Aurelian. When Tacitus was killed, his brother Florian succeeded him and was himself killed by the soldiers. Folio 242.

On Probus, who received the empire after Florian as if compelled. He governed excellently and brought under the empire many regions that had rebelled against it. When he was killed, Carus succeeded in the empire; Carus was succeeded by his son Numerian; after Numerian was killed, Carinus received the empire. Folio 242 throughout.

On the supreme pontiffs who held Peter's chair from the time of Valerian and Gallienus to the time of Diocletian. Sixtus II was succeeded by Felix I; when Felix completed his martyrdom, Eutychian received Peter's chair; after Eutychian's martyrdom, Gaius governed the Church; after Gaius was martyred, Pope Marcellinus succeeded. Although Marcellinus erred for a time by offering incense to idols, he exposed his error in a council, repented, and offered himself to martyrdom. After him Marcellus was created supreme pontiff; when Marcellus was martyred, he left the Church to Eusebius; when Eusebius was removed from their midst through martyrdom, Melchiades was created pope. Folio 243.

Chapter Nine: On the Many Who Suffered in Different Places in the Time of the Aforesaid Emperors

First, on Marius and Martha with their two sons. It begins, "On the martyrs." Folio 243.

On Caesarius and Julian, who suffered at Terracina, and Leontius. Folio 243.

On the martyr Favinus; the brothers Speusippus, Eleusippus, and Meleusippus; and the martyrs Jonilla, Leonilla, and Benignus. Folio 244.

On the martyr Symphorian, Andochius, and the others. Folio 244.

On the martyr Agapitus and certain others. Folio 244.

On the martyr Maurus and Saint Babylas with three boys. Folio 244, at the end.

On Chrysanthus and Daria, concerning whom beautiful things are related. Folio 245 throughout.

On Saint Pelagia, a prostitute converted by the prayers of a bishop; and on Mani the heresiarch. Folio 246.

Eighth Title: On the Persecution of Diocletian and Maximian against the Church

Diocletian commanded that he be adored as a god and was the first to order gems set into his garments. He made Maximian Herculus Caesar, sent him into Gaul, and afterward made him Augustus. It begins, "Therefore, of the Romans." Folio 246.

On Mauritius and his six thousand six hundred and sixty-six companions, crowned with martyrdom by Maximian. Folio 246, at the end.

On the greatest cruelty against Christians and the edict issued by Diocletian that churches should be razed to their foundations and sacred scriptures burned with fire. Folio 247.

On Saint Victor the martyr. Folio 247.

On the Four Crowned Martyrs. Folio 247.

On Saints Sebastian, Mark, and Marcellian; Chromatius, prefect of the city; and his son Tiburtius. Folio 247, at the end and on the following folio.

On Saint Erasmus, bishop and martyr. Folio 249.

On Saint Boniface the martyr, who formerly persisted in adultery with Aglae, a noble Roman woman. Folio 249.

On Saint Juliana the martyr. Folio 250.

On Saints Cosmas and Damian. Folio 250.

On Saint Blaise, bishop and martyr. Folio 250.

On Saint Dorothy. Folio 251.

On Saints Agricola and Vitalis at Bologna. Folio 251.

On Sabinus, bishop and martyr, and Januarius, bishop and martyr at Naples. Folio 251.

On the martyrs Saints Anastasia and Chrysogonus and the letters sent between them; and on Agape, Chionia, and Irene, servants of Anastasia. Folio 251, at the end and on the following folio.

On Saint Barbara, a martyr at Nicomedia; and on the martyrs Saint Eulalia and Saint Euphemia. Folio 252.

On Saint Christina the martyr. Folio 253.

On Bishop Narcissus, who entered the house of a famous prostitute named Afra and converted her. Folio 253.

On Genesius, a martyr in the city. Folio 254.

On Julian and Basilissa. Folio 254.

On Celsus, son of the governor. Folio 255.

On the seven sons of Carinus. Folio 255.

On the completion of the martyrdom of the aforesaid Julian. Folio 255.

On Saint Cyprian, formerly a magician, and the virgin Justina, who converted him. Folio 256.

On blessed Vincent the martyr under Dacian at the city of Caesaraugusta. Folio 256.

On blessed George the martyr. Folio 257.

On Faith, a woman, virgin, and martyr; and on the martyrs Caprasius, Felix, Justus, and Pastor. Folio 257.

On the blessed martyrs Theodore and Pantaleon the physician. Folio 258.

On the martyrs Cucuphas, Donatian, Novatian, and Pancratius. Folio 258 and the following folio.

On Saint Adrian the martyr and his wife Natalia. Folio 259.

On Saints Cyriacus, Largus, and Smaragdus. Folio 259, at the end.

On the martyrs Saints Marcellinus, Peter, Artemius, Sergius, and Bacchus. Folio 260.

On Saints Primus and Felicianus, and Vitus, Modestus, and Crescentia. Folio 259, in the last column and on the following folio.

On the martyrs Dorotheus and Gorgonius. Folio 261.

On many martyrs who suffered together at Nicomedia. Folio 261.

On Saint Lucy, a martyr who suffered at Syracuse in Sicily. Folio 261, at the end.

On Saints Lucy the widow and Geminian, and on Lucia, virgin and martyr. Folio 262.

On Saint Catherine, virgin and martyr, who suffered at Alexandria under Maxentius, son of Maximian. Folio 262.

On Saint Agnes, virgin and martyr, in the city of Rome. Folio 263.

On blessed Margaret of Antioch, virgin and martyr, who suffered under Olybrius. Folio 273.

On blessed Christopher the martyr and Nicetas and Aquilina, converted by him. Folio 264.

On Saint Antoninus the martyr. Folio 265.

On Saint Romanus the martyr. Folio 265.

On Saint Marinus, boy and martyr. Folio 265.

On Saint Lucian the martyr and a certain matron with two daughters, who immersed themselves in water to avoid rape. Folio 265.

On Peter, bishop and martyr of the city of Alexandria, to whom the schism of the Church caused by the heresiarch Arius was revealed; he excommunicated Arius. Folio 266.

On the forty martyrs sent into a most frigid pond. One of them, failing in faith, withdrew; but in his place the jailer immersed himself in the water and became a martyr. Folio 266.

Chapter Two: On the Cruelty of the Emperors Diocletian and Maximian

At last they were compelled to relinquish the empire while still living; and on Galerius Maximinus and Constantius, father of Constantine, who were made Caesars; and on Licinius, a kinsman of Constantine. It begins, "After the narrative." Folio 266.

On the tyranny of Maxentius, son of Maximian. Constantine the Great went to war against him when he usurped the empire, defeated him, and killed him. Folio 266.

On the most cruel Galerius Maximinus, wholly given to lust. When God corrected him with a horrible disease and intolerable stench, and he was told that this had happened to him because of the persecution he had inflicted upon the Christians, he began to behave more mildly toward them; but a little later he returned to the frenzy of persecution. Folio 267.

On the impious edicts of the aforesaid Galerius Maximinus against the Christians; and on the piety and mercy of the Christians toward their persecutors when those persecutors were afflicted by want and sickness. Folio 267.

On Constantine's victory against Emperor Maxentius, promised to him in the sign of the cross that was shown to him. Folio 268.

On Licinius's victory against Maximinus. Folio 268.

On Licinius's envy of Constantine's glory, on account of which Licinius also stirred up a persecution against the Christians. Although he was Constantine's kinsman, friend, and partner in the empire, Licinius made war against Constantine, but was defeated and killed by him. Folio 268.

On the contradictions or doubts that appear concerning Constantine's deeds, namely whether he was faithful or a heretic. Folio 269.

On doubts concerning the finding of the Holy Cross and the donation Constantine made to the Church. Folio 269.

On Pamphilus, presbyter and martyr of Caesarea, who wrote many works; and on Eusebius of Caesarea. In addition to producing several books, Eusebius wrote a chronicle from the time of Abraham down to the three-hundredth year of the Lord, which Jerome translated from Greek into Latin. He also composed an ecclesiastical history, which Rufinus translated from Greek into Latin. On Lactantius Firmianus, who flourished around that time and produced several books. At that time there was also Porphyry, an exceptional philosopher but the Christians' greatest enemy, who became a Christian from being a gentile and afterward apostatized. Folio 269, at the end.

The end. Praise be to God.

Prologue

The First Historical Part of Brother Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, of the Order of Preachers. The prologue begins.

“I will speak propositions from the beginning. The things that we have heard and known, and that our fathers have declared to us, recounting the praises of the Lord, His powers, and His wondrous works that He has done; so that they might place their hope in God, not forget the works of the Lord, and seek His commandments.” Psalm 77.

As Augustine says upon the Psalm, propositions, which in Greek are called problemata, are questions containing something that must be resolved through disputation. Although historical assertions do not contain the difficulties and subtleties found in speculative questions, they nevertheless are not without doubts and superficial contradictions, especially those contained in the Law of Moses, the prophets and Psalms, the Gospels, and the opinions of both Catholic and gentile doctors. Histories themselves also vary, at least in their chronology, and a reader must be diligent in bringing them into agreement.

As I am about to treat historical propositions, I shall speak from the beginning--not only from the time when God chose that Jewish people for Himself from among all nations and led them out of Egypt, but from the beginning when God founded and created the earth and placed the first man, Adam, upon it so that through obedience he might pass from earth to heaven. Through the fall of his disobedience, however, heaven was closed to him and all his posterity. Filled here with countless miseries of soul and body, one who departed was received by hell, until the second Adam, heavenly and from heaven, redeemed him by the price of His blood and led him back to possess heaven in sanctification from the punishment of the first transgression. From that transgression follow all the evils in the world. “Adam,” says the prophet, “is my example from my youth.”

I shall speak propositions concerning as many and as great things as we have heard from God inspiring and the incarnate Word preaching; as many things as we have heard from His angels revealing them to the prophets, as to Moses on Mount Sinai and visibly to John the Evangelist on the island of Patmos, and to others in many portions and many ways; as many things as we have heard from the apostles and the doctors of the Church, whose sayings were approved by her as founded upon truth; and as many moral teachings as we have heard even from gentile philosophers and poets. Although they did not possess the Holy Spirit unto grace, they were not therefore wholly without Him, namely with respect to knowing and intimating certain truths. For, according to Ambrose, truth, by whomever it is spoken, is from the Holy Spirit.

Hence Paul himself, the vessel of election and doctor of the gentiles, uses the words of poets in his epistles, such as that saying of Epimenides to Titus: “The Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, slothful bellies”; and what I think is Terence’s saying: “Evil communications corrupt good manners.” Preaching in the Acts of the Apostles, he also introduces that saying of the philosopher Aratus: “For we are the offspring of God; in Him we live, move, and have our being.” As Augustine says in the Decrees, distinction 37, whatever truth the Sibyl, Orpheus, the other seers of the gentiles, or their philosophers said concerning God is indeed useful for refuting the vanity of the pagans.

Jerome also says in the same distinction, chapter “Who from the table”: “If we are sometimes compelled to recall secular literature and say something from it, it is not by our will but, so to speak, from the gravest necessity, so that we may prove that the things foretold by the holy prophets many ages before are contained in the writings of the Greeks, the Latins, and other nations.” Thus far Jerome. What is more powerful in a contest of refutation than the testimony of enemies? We have heard many and great things, if not from their mouths, then from their writings, from generation to generation.

“And we have known them.” Augustine expounds this as “we have seen.” There is a twofold knowledge or vision, namely sensory and intellectual. Because sight is preeminent among the external senses, making known more differences and properties of things, it sometimes gives its name to all the other sensations. Certainly, many historical events were seen and touched by many people of those times. Although all our knowledge is judged to have its origin in sense, knowledge of the things of faith, which cannot be demonstrated by natural reason, does not begin from the external senses but from divine illumination. We know these hidden things by faith, a knowledge that possesses greater firmness and certainty than natural knowledge because it rests upon divine revelation, which cannot be deceived; human judgment concerning things both deceives and is deceived.

Thus even philosophers who possessed great knowledge of natural things fell away from the truth in many matters, especially concerning divine things and those pertaining to human salvation, as will become evident. Catholic doctors, however, knew the truth in those things that pertain to faith and are necessary for salvation, and did not err in them. Although they sometimes appear to contradict not only others but themselves, if the matter is diligently investigated they walk together in agreement in the house of God, that is, the Church, thinking the same thing among themselves.

“Our fathers have declared to us.” The fathers of the faithful in the Old Testament were the patriarchs and prophets. Hence the apostle says to the Corinthians, “All our fathers were under the cloud,” etc. They announced to us the things that were to come in the New Testament. For, as Augustine says, not only the words of those fathers but all their deeds were a certain prophecy of the state of the New Testament. Therefore the apostle says to the Corinthians, “All things happened to them in a figure, but they were done for our sake.”

The first fathers of the New Testament were the apostles and evangelists, as Augustine says in treating the words, “In place of your fathers, sons are born to you”—that is, to you, the Church—their successors being bishops and prelates. These announced to us that the things foretold in the Old Testament had been fulfilled, and that the things remaining concerning the varied state of the Church, the end of the world, the glory of the good, and the punishment of the reprobate are to be fulfilled in the next life, most especially as told by John in the Apocalypse.

According to Gregory in distinction 96, chapter “Who doubts,” the doctors and prelates of the Church are called fathers of the faithful because by their teaching and example they begot many in the spirit. “For in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the Gospel,” says the apostle. They announced to us the things that were obscure in sacred oracles, expanded moral teachings, and set down in their books those things that conduce to eternal life.

What they announced he explains by adding after one verse: “Recounting the praises of the Lord, His powers, and His wondrous works that He has done.” The aforesaid fathers recount the praises of the Lord, that is, the things for which God is praised. Nothing is worthy of praise except the good, which all things desire; and the greater the good, the more worthy it is of praise. Because God is supremely good, the highest good, and the source of every good, He is therefore supremely to be praised. Hence the wise man in Ecclesiasticus says, “Exalt God as much as you can, for He is greater than all praise.” If every creature praises God in its own manner—the heavens, the earth, the seas, and the things within them—much more must man, for whose sake all these things were made, praise Him.

God does not seek praise from man so that something may thereby be added to Him who lacks nothing, but for the benefit of the one praising. “The sacrifice of praise,” He says through the Psalmist, “shall glorify Me, and there is the way by which I shall show him the salvation of God,” that is, God the Savior. For if you truly praise God as good and the highest good, you love Him above all things and with intense affection. This is that more excellent way which the apostle shows to the faithful, the way that leads to heaven: charity itself. Therefore the fathers recount the praises of God.

The fathers also recount His powers—not one, but several. First, they recount the power of God in the creation of things, by which they relate that He created all things from nothing, an act of infinite power. They recount His power in giving, taking away, and transferring dominions and kingdoms, so that all may know that the Most High rules in the kingdom of men, gives it to whomever He wills, and sets the lowliest man over it, as is said in Daniel 4; and that by His own power He has trodden upon the necks of the proud and exalted, as will be shown when governments in different periods and their terrible wars are treated.

They also recount the power of His might in giving the martyrs marvelous constancy to endure every kind of torment for His name, and in giving patience to all the elect in every prolonged adversity. As Augustine says, that we endure evils with equanimity belongs to God and is not our own patience. For the Psalmist says, “You are my strength, O Lord, and my patience,” namely by causing it. They also recount the power of His might to punish the wicked here or in the future.

The fathers recount the power of God’s wisdom in governing the world by an everlasting plan. For God’s wisdom disposes all things sweetly, giving to each what is fitting, establishing and ordering all things by weight, measure, and number so that every single thing holds its proper place. The fathers recount the powers of His wisdom, which transfers itself into holy souls and establishes friends of God and prophets. It opened the mouths of the mute and made the tongues of infants eloquent in the apostles, illuminating by wisdom not only Catholic doctors but gentiles as well to teach peoples; certain sayings of theirs will be included. “For all wisdom is from the Lord God,” Ecclesiasticus 1.

They recount His wisdom accompanying the Church. Just as Moses’s serpent made from a rod devoured the serpents of the magicians, so the wisdom of the Church swallowed up all the errors of philosophers, magicians, astrologers, rhetoricians, and heretics by refuting them, and reduced them to nothing by converting or confounding them—and rightly, because wisdom conquers malice.

The fathers recount the power of God’s goodness and clemency: He deigned to put on our form of a servant and endure the shameful death of the cross to rescue us from the yoke of diabolical servitude. “Above all,” says Bernard, “the cup Jesus drank for us renders Him lovable to us.” The fathers also recount the power of His clemency in waiting long for sinners to repent, and sometimes restoring to those converted, even if late, their first robe, namely the grace and virtues they had lost. “God’s moderation and loving-kindness seek only our return, and by His long goodness He desires us to be saved,” says Jerome.

They also recount the power of His goodness, because according to Augustine He is so good and powerful that He would permit no evil to exist in His works unless He were so powerful that He could draw a greater good from every evil. He makes even the falls of the elect turn to their good so that they rise more cautious, more fervent, and more humble, and instill fear in others so that they may beware.

The fathers recount the virtues He bestowed upon His saints: great faith, most firm hope, most ardent charity, most discerning prudence in action, most constant endurance in adversity, most upright justice in exchanging or distributing things, the most sparing sobriety in food and clothing, most uncorrupted chastity, and most profound humility. These virtues shone especially in the holy anchorites, cenobites or monks, and other religious, as will become evident. “All our works,” that is, our good works, “You have worked in us, O Lord,” says Isaiah. For it is He who works in us both to will and to accomplish according to His good will, according to the apostle, since we are not sufficient to think anything from ourselves as if from ourselves. From these saints let us take examples for living.

The fathers also recount His wondrous works, in which His glory and magnificence are shown, according to the words, “God is glorious in His saints,” that is, He is shown from their works to be wondrous in majesty, working marvels. Certain of these wondrous things are merely from nature, but are nevertheless called wondrous because they are rare and unusual, such as earthquakes, pestilences, famines, monstrous births, the greatest bodily strength, and the like. Certain wondrous things are not done by men but are enacted or procured by demons, such as things done by magicians and answers given through idols. The third kind of wondrous things are those done by saints through divine power above the power of nature, so that the entire power of nature could not do them of itself, such as giving sight to a blind person, raising a dead person, and the like.

Although mention is made in these histories of every one of these three kinds of wondrous things—for they treat earthquakes, plagues, monstrous people, answers of demons foretelling the future, and healings through demons—the principal intention is nevertheless to recount the true miracles worked by saints in both Testaments through divine power, and incomparably more abundantly in the New. By these true miracles, as by probable judgments while God worked, the world, turned away from God through idolatry and various vices, was converted.

Indeed, the Church is said to have begun with righteous Abel, whose righteousness the Lord showed by setting fire to his sacrifice offered from animals, sending fire from heaven to kindle it. Then miracles began to be worked, and they have never ceased in the Church, although at times interrupted. They were performed most abundantly in the primitive Church to spread and confirm the faith of Christ. Hence it is said in the final chapter of Matthew concerning Christ’s disciples after His Ascension: “But they went forth and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them and confirming the word by the signs that followed,” that is, miracles.

Just as a tree whose root is well established and expanded is no longer watered once it has grown enough not to be cast down by winds or withered by the sun’s ray, but remains unshaken and produces fruit, so after faith had been established by miracles, spread abroad, strengthened by the sufferings of the martyrs, and watered by the teachings of holy doctors, it was no longer necessary for miracles to be worked so frequently, so that the merit of faith might grow stronger. Yet the most loving God has never left the Church without true miracles, even in modern times, for the consolation of the faithful. The countless miracles worked by God through His saints will appear in their proper places. Concerning these true miracles the Psalmist says, “You are the God who works wonders.” Although they occur through the saints, they occur only by God’s power. These are what our fathers recount.

For what purpose these things were done—so that the fathers, announcing them to their sons, should recount His praises, powers, and wondrous works—the Psalmist himself assigns the reason, saying, “That they might place their hope in God,” not presuming upon their own strength and virtue, for He humbles those who glory in themselves and their own virtue, but placing hope in God, from whom comes every best gift and every perfect gift.

They are not to place their hope in men, for “Cursed is the man who trusts in man and makes flesh,” that is, man, “his arm.” Rather, they are to place their hope in God in their actions, awaiting aid and counsel from Him, and in distress and necessity awaiting from Him such relief as will be expedient for salvation. “Consider the generations of men, children, and see that no one has hoped in the Lord and been forsaken, remained in His commandments and been confounded.” Ecclesiasticus 2.

In repenting of sins, they are to place their hope in God and not in their own tears and penances to obtain pardon. In rewards and glory they are to place their hope in God, because the Lord alone, not the world or another, will give grace and glory. But lest they hope in vain, or rather presume, people are not to forget the Lord’s works, which He has done in benefiting them, lest they be found ungrateful. For, as Seneca says, the most ungrateful person is the one who has forgotten a benefit. Ingratitude is a wind that dries up the fountain of divine loving-kindness, the streams of grace, and the dew of mercy, says Bernard. According to Augustine, what God gave freely He took away from the ungrateful.

They are not only to refrain from forgetting, but also to repay Him through good works performed for God’s honor. This is what follows: “And let them seek His commandments,” so that they may know and observe them. “If you know these things,” Christ says to His disciples, “you will be blessed if you do them,” not if you merely know them. From this arises true hope of attaining heavenly beatitude, not only from grace as its principal cause but also, consequently, from the merits of good works. This is the entire intention of this work: that from the things recounted in histories, people may learn through knowledge to live well in the world, so that they may hope in the Lord and attain beatitude.

The fathers who recount these writings are Moses in the Pentateuch, who by prophecy and foretelling related the creation of the world and the first two ages—things hidden from men but revealed to him—as well as many other things done in his own time; and all the canonical scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, so authoritatively confirmed by the Church that it is not lawful to doubt even one iota. After these are the many deeds and sayings of the supreme pontiffs excerpted from the Decrees by Gratian.

Other fathers who announced these things to us in books are Eusebius of Caesarea in the Ecclesiastical History, which Rufinus translated from Greek into Latin and to which he added two books; the same Eusebius in his Chronicles, which Jerome translated into Latin, adding the deeds done afterward down to his own time; Paul Orosius in his book On the Misery of the World; Justin Martyr, epitomizer of Trogius Pompeius; Suetonius in his book On the Twelve Caesars; Augustine in The City of God, with the explanation of Master Thomas the Englishman; Helinand in his compilation of histories; Eutropius; Master Peter Comestor in the Scholastic History; Josephus in the books of Antiquities; Sigebert in his Chronicles; the Tripartite History; Leonardo of Arezzo in the History of Florence; Gregory in the Dialogues; Vincent in the Historical Mirror; and John of Colonna, both brothers of the Order of Preachers; as well as many legends of the saints.

There are also the moral sayings of philosophers and poets, such as Socrates, Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, Tully, Seneca, Virgil, Ovid, and several others. Their writings and sayings are related here, with little or nothing of my own. Because of its length, the work is divided into three parts. The first extends to Emperor Constantine the Great and Pope Sylvester; the second to the times of Emperor Henry VI and Pope Innocent IV; the third from there to such time as life shall accompany me.

First Title: On the First Age of the World

Chapter One

How Adam and Eve were exalted in the state of innocence, corrupted after the fall, and finally condemned to death, according to the words of the Psalm: “Man, when he was in honor, did not understand; he was compared to senseless beasts and became like them,” under its own sections.

Chapter Two

On the second age of the world, which begins in the time of Noah; the construction of the ark; the flood; the monstrous races of men; the drunkenness of Noah; and the curse of Ham, under their own sections.

Chapter Three

On the sons of Noah who wished to build a tower, how after their languages were confounded they ceased, and how they were dispersed into Asia, Africa, and Europe under different languages, under their own sections.

Second Title: On the Third Age of the World

Chapter One

On the deeds of Abraham.

Chapter Two

On the deeds of Jacob.

Chapter Three

On the deeds of Joseph.

Chapter Four

On the deeds of Moses and his books.

Chapter Five

On the deeds of Joshua and the other judges of the children of Israel.

Chapter Six

On the deeds of Eli, Samuel, and Saul according to the sequence of the First Book of Kings.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter One

On the deeds of David according to the sequence of the Second Book of Kings.

Chapter Two

On the deeds of Solomon and his glory shown to the queen of Sheba.

Chapter Three

On the kings who followed, according to the sequence of the Books of Kings and Chronicles.

Chapter Four

On the prophecies of David and Solomon.

Chapter Five

On the prophecy of Isaiah.

Chapter Six

On the prophecy of Jeremiah.

Chapter Seven

On the prophecy of Ezekiel.

Chapter Eight

On the prophecy of Daniel.

Chapter Nine

On the twelve minor prophets and their sayings.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter One

On the kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus king of the Persians, and the others who followed.

Chapter Two

On Alexander the Great.

Chapter Three

On the sages of those times, namely Aristotle and others.

Chapter Four

On the division of the Greek monarchy into several parts.

Chapter Five

On the monarchy of the Romans: Romulus, Numa Pompilius, etc.; and the Punic, Macedonian, Social, and Civil Wars.

Chapter Six

On Octavian and his wars; the sages who flourished in those times, namely Virgil, Ovid, etc.; and the genealogy of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One

On Christ's Incarnation, life, and miracles.

Chapter Two

On Christ's teaching through parables.

Chapter Three

On Christ's teaching in rebuking the various vices of men.

Chapter Four

On Christ's answer to questions asked for the sake of knowing the truth.

Chapter Five

On the keys of the Church conferred by Christ upon Peter: "Whatsoever you shall bind," etc.

Chapter Six

On the Lord's Passion.

Chapter Seven

On Christ's Resurrection and Ascension and the testimony of the gentiles.

Chapter Eight

On the beginning of John's Gospel: "In the beginning was the Word."

Sixth Title: On the Church Militant

Chapter One

On the mystical body of Christ insofar as Christ is the head of the Church and Christians are the members, according to blessed John's representation in the Apocalypse.

Chapter Two

On the primitive Church and its deeds, as gathered from the Acts of the Apostles.

Chapter Three

On the life of the Blessed Virgin Mary after Christ's Ascension.

Chapter Four

On the life and martyrdom of the blessed apostle Peter.

Chapter Five

On the life and martyrdom of the blessed apostle Paul.

Chapter Six

On the life and martyrdom of the blessed apostle and evangelist John.

Chapter Seven

On the life and martyrdom of blessed James the Greater.

Chapter Eight

On the life and martyrdom of blessed James the Less, the Lord's brother.

Chapter Nine

On the life and martyrdom of the blessed apostle Andrew.

Chapter Ten

On the life and martyrdom of the blessed apostle Thomas.

Chapter Eleven

On the life and martyrdom of the blessed apostle Philip.

Chapter Twelve

On the life and martyrdom of the blessed apostle Bartholomew.

Chapter Thirteen

On the life and martyrdom of the blessed evangelist Matthew.

Chapter Fourteen

On the life and martyrdom of blessed Simon and Jude.

Chapter Fifteen

On the life and martyrdom of the blessed apostle Matthias.

Chapter Sixteen

On the life and martyrdom of the blessed evangelist Mark.

Chapter Seventeen

On the life and martyrdom of the blessed evangelist Luke.

Chapter Eighteen

On the life and martyrdom of the blessed apostle Barnabas.

Chapter Nineteen

On the life of blessed Mary Magdalene.

Chapter Twenty

On the life of blessed Martha.

Chapter Twenty-One

On the emperors reigning in Christ's time, namely Octavian and Tiberius.

Chapter Twenty-Two

On Claudius, emperor of the Romans.

Chapter Twenty-Three

On Emperor Nero and his wicked deeds.

Chapter Twenty-Four

On the sages of that time, namely Seneca, Juvenal, Persius, and Quintilian, and their writings.

Chapter Twenty-Five

On certain saints who suffered martyrdom under Nero, namely Vitalis, Martial, Savianus, Julian, Saturninus, Lazarus, and the first seven deacons.

Chapter Twenty-Six

On various disciples of blessed Peter who suffered under Nero, namely Fronton, Apollinaris, Lucian, and Romulus.

Chapter Twenty-Seven

On the martyrdom of blessed Nazarius, son of blessed Perpetua, and Saint Menno.

Chapter Twenty-Eight

On the disciples of blessed Paul, namely Dionysius the Areopagite and his companions, Saint Thecla, Timothy, Titus, Praxedes, and Potentiana.

Seventh Title: On the Reign of Vespasian

Chapter One

When and how he obtained the Roman Empire; the destruction of Jerusalem; the reign of his son Titus; Domitian's persecution; and the benevolence of Emperor Nerva.

Chapter Two

On the supreme pontiffs of those times, namely Linus, Cletus, and Clement.

Chapter Three

On Trajan's persecution and death, and the sayings of Pliny.

Chapter Four

On Emperor Hadrian Aelius and the philosopher Secundus and his sayings.

Chapter Five

On Pope Alexander, Sixtus, and the martyrs who suffered in that time, namely Eustace, the ten thousand crucified, Saint Sophia and her daughters, the virgin Serapia, the widow Sabina, and others who suffered under Hadrian.

Chapter Six

On Pope Telesphorus, Hyginus, and his successor Pius; the martyrs who then suffered, Polycarp, Justin, Photinus, Felicity with her sons; the marvelous history of the virgin Eugenia; Cecilia; Martina; Quirinus; Popes Callistus and Urban; and the writings of Origen.

Chapter Seven

On Maximinus's treachery, through which, after Alexander was killed, he seized the Roman Empire; Emperor Philip; the tyrant Decius; and certain martyrs who suffered under him, namely the Seven Sleepers, etc.

Chapter Eight

On Valerian obtaining the Roman Empire with his son Gallienus; Cyprian's martyrdom and writings; Sixtus; Lawrence; Hippolytus; Apollonia; and Popes Felix, Eutychian, Gaius, Marcellinus, and Marcellus following blessed Sixtus.

Chapter Nine

On the martyrs who suffered under Claudius and Nuerian, namely Caesarius, Julian, Savinus, Speusippus, Jonilla, Agapitus, Babylas, Chrysanthus, Daria, Pelagia the prostitute; and on Mani the heretic.

Eighth Title: On the Persecution of Diocletian and Maximian

Chapter One

On the martyrdom of Mauritius with his companions, Victor, the Four Crowned Martyrs, Sebastian, Erasmus, Boniface, Juliana, Cosmas and Damian, Blaise, Dorothy, Januarius, Anastasia, Barbara, Euphemia, Christina, Afra, Julian, Celsus, Cyprian the magician, Vincent, George, Theodore, Cyriacus, Marcellinus, Lucy, Catherine, Agnes, Margaret, Christopher, and others.

Chapter Two

On the cruelty of Galerius and Maximinus and the divine vengeance inflicted upon them for the strengthening of our faith through the triumph of Constantine the Great; and on the historians Pamphilus, Eusebius, and Rufinus, and on Lactantius.

First Title: On the First Age of the World

Chapter One: On Adam and Eve in the State of Innocence and Their Fall

How Adam and Eve were in the state of innocence and on their fall, according to the words of the Psalm: “Man, when he was in honor, did not understand; he was compared to senseless beasts and became like them.”

Folio 1.

“Man, when he was in honor, did not understand; he was compared to senseless beasts and became like them.” Psalm 48. This prophetic word is most fittingly expounded above all concerning the first transgressor, namely Adam, although it is also most truly understood concerning every sinner who turns himself away from God. Three things are noted in these words. First, the excellence by which he was exalted: “Man, when he was in honor,” etc. Second, his failure by which he was corrupted: “did not understand.” Third, his misery to which he was condemned: “he was compared to beasts.”

§ I

As to the first, the excellence with which Adam was honored in the state of innocence is evident in three respects: first with regard to his soul, second with regard to his body, and third with regard to dominion over things.

His soul was exalted in great grace, wondrous justice, and exceptional knowledge. God bestowed sanctifying grace, through which a person merits, upon both parents, namely Adam and Eve. Augustine likewise says in Book XII of The City of God, concerning the angels, that God was at once creating nature in them and bestowing grace.

There is, however, a difference of opinion on this point, according to Thomas in the First Part, question 95, article 1. Some say that the first man was not created in grace, but that grace was afterward bestowed upon him before he sinned. Others say that he was created with grace, for Ecclesiastes 7 says, “God made man upright.” It appears to pertain to the uprightness of the first state in which God made man that reason was subject to God, the lower powers to reason, and the body to the soul. The first subjection was the cause of the second and the third. For as long as reason remained subject to God, the lower things were subject to it, as Augustine says.

It is evident, however, that the subjection of the body to the soul and of the lower powers to reason was not natural; otherwise it would have remained after sin. It is thus evident that the subjection by which reason was subordinated to God was not according to nature alone, but according to the gift of supernatural grace. Hence Augustine says in Book XIII of The City of God that after the commandment was transgressed, as soon as divine grace abandoned them they were ashamed of the nakedness of their bodies. They felt the movement of their disobedient flesh as though it were the reciprocal punishment of their disobedience.

With respect to justice, insofar as justice is a general virtue, the first man was exalted by the honor of every virtue. Hence Augustine also says in a certain homily, as is contained in On Penance, distinction 2, that when the prince of vices, namely the devil, saw Adam made from the slime of the earth in the image of God, adorned with chastity, composed by temperance, and splendid with charity, he envied all these things and stripped Adam of all those goods.

To explain this, Thomas says in the First Part, question 95, article 3, that the uprightness of the first human state required that man possess all the virtues in some manner. Yet it must be considered that certain virtues by their nature imply no imperfection, such as charity and justice. Virtues of this kind were in the state of innocence without qualification, both as habit and as act.

Others, however, imply imperfection by their nature, either on the part of their act or on the part of their matter. If such imperfection does not conflict with the perfection of the first state, virtues of this kind could nevertheless exist in the state of innocence. Examples are faith, which concerns things not seen, and hope, which concerns things not possessed. The perfection of the first state did not extend so far that man saw God in His essence or possessed God through final enjoyment; thus faith and hope could be present in the first state both as act and as habit.

If, however, a perfection belonging to the nature of a virtue conflicts with the perfection of the first state, such a virtue could be present there as a habit but not as an act. This is evident concerning penance, which is sorrow for a sin committed, and mercy, which is sorrow for another’s misery. Both sorrow and guilt or misery conflict with the perfection of the first state. Therefore virtues of this kind were in the first man as habits, but not as acts. The first man was so disposed that, if sin had occurred, he would have grieved, and if he had seen misery in another, he would have relieved it as far as he could.

With respect to knowledge, man was exalted in honor by knowing God, the angels, and the other creatures. According to Thomas in the First Part, question 94, article 1, the first man did not see God in His essence, unless perhaps it is said that he saw Him in rapture when God sent sleep upon Adam, as is said in Genesis 2. The reason he did not see God in His essence is that no one who sees God in His essence can turn away from God by an act of will, which is to sin. All who see God in His essence, while they see Him in this way, are so established in the love of God that they cannot fail to love Him, since He is the highest good; hence they cannot sin.

Since Adam sinned, therefore, it is evident that he did not see God in His essence. Nevertheless, he saw or knew God by a clearer knowledge than we now possess, and thus his knowledge was in a certain manner intermediate between the knowledge of the present state and the knowledge of the heavenly homeland. For the higher and more like God a creature is, the more clearly God is seen through it, just as a person is seen more perfectly through a mirror in which his image is reflected more distinctly. Hence God is seen far more eminently through intelligible effects than through sensible and bodily ones.

In the present state, however, a person is hindered from the full and lucid consideration of intelligible effects because he is distracted and occupied by sensible things. But Ecclesiastes 7 says, “God made man upright.” This divinely established uprightness consisted in lower things being subject to higher, and higher things not being hindered by lower. Hence the first man was not hindered by external things from the clear and firm contemplation of intelligible effects, which arose from the irradiation of the first truth perceived by him either through his natural condition or through grace.

When Damascene says that the first man, dwelling in paradise, possessed a blessed life, and Augustine in Book XIV of The City of God says that the first human beings were blessed in that memorable place of beatitude, namely paradise, this must not be understood of the perfect beatitude that consists in the vision of the divine essence. Rather, they possessed a blessed life according to a certain natural mode.

Likewise, when the Master of the Sentences says in Book IV, distinction 1, that in the state of innocence man saw God without a medium, this is understood of a medium through whose knowledge we arrive at something unknown, such as the middle term of a demonstration. The first man did not need to reach knowledge of God through a demonstration taken from some effect, as is necessary for us. Instead, in the effects themselves--especially intelligible effects--he knew God in his own manner. Yet he saw God through a certain medium that was seen at the same time; this is called seeing through a medium, as when a person is seen through a mirror and is seen simultaneously with the mirror.

The first man’s soul likewise could not see the angels in their essence, but it nevertheless possessed a more excellent knowledge of them than we do, because its knowledge of interior intelligible things was more certain and fixed than ours. On account of such eminence of knowledge, Gregory says in Book IV of the Dialogues that man in paradise was accustomed to enjoy the words of God and, through loftiness of vision, to be present with the spirits of the blessed angels.

The first man also possessed knowledge of all things that can be known naturally; hence he gave names to the animals, as Genesis 2 says, and names ought to agree with the natures of things. To explain this, Thomas says in the First Part, question 94, article 3, that things were originally established by God not only to exist in themselves but also to be principles of other things. They were therefore produced in a perfect state in which they could be principles of others.

A man can be the principle of another not only through bodily generation but also through instruction and governance. Therefore, just as the first man was established perfect in body so that he could generate, he was also established perfect in soul so that he could instruct and govern others. No one can instruct unless he possesses knowledge; therefore the first man was so established by God that he possessed knowledge of everything in which a human being is naturally fitted to be instructed. These are all the things virtually contained in self-evident first principles, namely whatever human beings can know naturally.

For governing his own life and the lives of others, however, there is required not only knowledge of things that can be known naturally, but also knowledge of things surpassing natural knowledge, because man is ordered toward a certain supernatural end. In the same way, knowledge of the things of faith is necessary for us in governing our lives. Hence the first man received from God as much knowledge of these supernatural things as was necessary for governing human life according to that state.

The first man did not know other things that cannot be known by natural study and are not necessary for governing human life, such as people’s thoughts, future contingencies, and certain particular facts, such as that pebbles lie in a river, and the like. In the science of naturally knowable things, Adam would not have advanced with respect to the number of things known, but with respect to the manner of knowing, because things he first knew intellectually he would afterward have known experimentally. With respect to supernatural knowledge, however, he would also have advanced in the number of things known through new revelations, just as angels advance through new illuminations.

The first man possessed knowledge of all things and species of things infused into his mind by God. This was granted only to the first man, for others who would have proceeded from him in the state of innocence would not have possessed such knowledge through infused species, but through the instruction of others and their own investigation.

With respect to the body, man in the state of innocence was exalted in honor as to immortality, impassibility, and the pleasantness of his place. Before sin, man was in a certain way immortal, because he would not have incurred death if he had not sinned. Hence the apostle says in Romans 5, “Through one man,” namely Adam, “sin entered into the world, and through sin death.” The opinion of those who say that even if man had not sinned it would still have been necessary for him to die is rejected and anathematized, as is evident in On Consecration, distinction 5, chapter “It pleased.”

For fuller explanation of this matter, it should be known, according to Thomas in the First Part, question 97, article 1, that something may be called incorruptible in three ways. In one way, from the side of matter: either because it has no matter, as an angel has none, or because it has matter that is in potency to only one form, as a heavenly body does. This is called incorruptible according to nature.

In another way, something is called incorruptible from the side of form, because some disposition inheres in a thing naturally corruptible and wholly prevents corruption. This is called incorruptible according to glory. As Augustine says in his epistle to Dioscorus, God made the soul of such powerful nature that from its beatitude the fullness of health and the vigor of incorruption overflow into the body.

In a third way, something is called incorruptible from the side of its efficient cause. In this way man in the state of innocence would have been incorruptible and immortal. As Augustine says in the book Questions of the Old and New Testament, God made man so that for as long as he did not sin he would flourish in immortality, and thus would himself be the author either of life or of death. His body was not indissoluble through some vigor of immortality existing within it. Instead, there was in the soul a certain power supernaturally given by God through which it could preserve the body from all corruption for as long as the soul itself remained subject to God.

Man was also aided in maintaining this immortality by eating from the tree of life, which stood in the middle of paradise. To explain this, Thomas says in the First Part, question 97, article 4, that man possessed two remedies in the state of innocence for preserving life against two defects.

The first defect in man is the loss of moisture through the action of natural heat, which is the soul's instrument. Against this defect man was aided by eating from the other trees of paradise, just as we are now aided by the foods we consume. The second defect arises because, as the Philosopher says in On Generation, what is generated from foreign nourishment and joined to the preexisting moisture diminishes the species' active power. Thus water added to wine is indeed converted to the flavor of wine, but as more and more is added, it diminishes the wine's strength, until at last the wine becomes watery.

Accordingly, we see that at first the species' active power is strong enough to convert from nourishment not only what is sufficient to restore what has been lost, but also what suffices for growth. Afterward, what is generated no longer suffices for growth, but only for restoring what has been lost. At last, in old age, it does not suffice even for this, whereupon diminution and finally the natural dissolution of the body follow.

Against this defect man was aided by the tree of life, for it possessed a power to strengthen the active power of the species against the weakness arising from the admixture of what is foreign. Hence Augustine says in Book XIV of The City of God that food was present for man lest he hunger, drink lest he thirst, and the tree of life lest old age dissolve him.

Because the power of every body is finite, the power of the tree of life could not extend so far as to give the body the power to endure for an infinite time, but only for a determinate time. Hence, once consumed, the said tree preserved from corruption for a time determined by God. When that time had ended, man would either have been translated to the spiritual life of glory or would have needed to eat again from the tree of life. Thus the tree of life caused immortality not without qualification, but in a certain manner.

Man in that state also possessed impassibility in a certain manner. For "passion" is spoken of in two ways. In one way, properly, and in this sense something is said to suffer when it is removed from its natural disposition. Among natural things, contraries act and suffer upon one another, one removing the other from its natural disposition.

In this way, in the state of innocence, man was impassible both in soul and in body, for he could have prevented passion just as he could have prevented death, if he had remained without sin. Hence he would not have felt the pain of heat or cold, nor would he have been subject to any illness.

In another way, "passion" is taken generally for any change, even if that change pertains to the perfection of nature. Thus understanding or sensing is said to be a kind of undergoing. In this second way man in the state of innocence was passible and underwent change both in soul and in body. For he understood and sensed by seeing, hearing, and the like; and he slept, because sleeping does not remove a man from his natural disposition but is ordered toward the good of nature. Yet the first man did not undergo suffering when the rib from which Eve was formed was separated from Adam. Nor would women have suffered pain in giving birth, for that pain followed in them from sin. Thomas, First Part, question 97, article 2.

There would also have been certain passions of the soul in man in the state of innocence. To explain this, Thomas says in the First Part, question 95, article 2, that of all the passions of the soul--that is, those which are in the sensitive appetite--some are ordered toward good, such as love, joy, and desire, while others are ordered toward evil, such as fear and sorrow. In the first state no evil was present or imminent, and no good was absent which a good will might desire to possess at that time, as is evident from Augustine in Book XIV of The City of God. Therefore none of the passions that regard evil, such as fear, sorrow, and the like, were in Adam. Likewise, neither were those passions which regard a good not possessed but still to be obtained, such as burning covetousness.

Those passions, however, which can concern a present good, such as joy and love, or a future good to be possessed in its own time, such as desire and hope that does not afflict, existed in the state of innocence, though otherwise than in us. For in us the sensitive appetite, in which the passions reside, is not wholly subject to reason. Hence passions in us sometimes precede and impede the judgment of reason, while at other times they follow the judgment of reason insofar as the sensitive appetite obeys reason. In the state of innocence, however, appetite was wholly subject to reason. Therefore no passions of the soul were in man except those that followed from reason or the judgment of reason. Thus the flesh did not then lust against the spirit as it does now.

In eating the fruits of the trees of paradise, of which Genesis 2 says, “Eat of every tree that is in paradise,” man—who would then have needed food for his sustenance—would have experienced greater delight than he does now. For sensible delight is the greater, the purer the nature and the more sensitive the body. Yet the concupiscible appetite would not have raised itself inordinately over that delight, because it was regulated by reason. In the same way, a sober man feels no less delight in food he has taken than a glutton does, but his concupiscible appetite rests less upon delight of this kind. Thomas, First Part, question 98, article 2.

Folio 2.

As to the act of generation in the state of innocence: although certain ancient doctors, considering the foulness of concupiscence found in carnal union in the present state, held that there would have been no generation through carnal union in the state of innocence, Gregory Nazianzen says that the human race would have multiplied in paradise as the angels were multiplied, without intercourse, by the operation of divine power. He says that before sin God made male and female with regard to the mode of generation that would exist after sin, which He foreknew.

But Thomas, in the First Part, question 98, article 2, rejects this with the argument he gives there, determining that generation in that state of innocence would have taken place through union. Hence Genesis 2 says that woman was made as a help for man, namely for generation. Yet, as Thomas says, two things must be considered in carnal union according to the present state. One belongs to nature, namely the conjunction of male and female for generation. In every generation an active and a passive power are required. Therefore, since in all things in which there is distinction of sex the active power is in the male and the passive power in the female, the order of nature requires that male and female come together in union for generation.

The other thing that may be considered is a certain deformity of immoderate concupiscence, which would not have existed in the state of innocence, when the lower powers were wholly subject to reason. Hence Augustine says in Book XIV of The City of God: Far be it from us to suspect that offspring would not have been produced in that state without the disease of lust. Rather, those members would have been moved by a command of the will, as the others are, and without heat or an enticing sting, with tranquility of soul and body.

Nor would continence then have been praiseworthy as it is now. For at the present time continence is praised not because fertility is defective but because disordered lust is removed; then, however, there would have been fertility without lust. And as Augustine says in Book XIV of The City of God, in that state a husband would have entered the womb of his wife without any corruption of her integrity. For the male seed could have been introduced while the integrity of the female organ remained unharmed.

There would have been no suffering or anxiety from hunger or thirst. At the proper time, when it was fitting for nature, man would have eaten and drunk before hunger or thirst afflicted him. He would have slept without any disquiet or disturbance from terrifying dreams. Because of the most temperate air, he would have been without the pain of heat or cold, and he would have been burdened by no illness.

As to the pleasantness of his place, man was exalted in honor because, although he was made bodily from the slime of the earth in the region of Damascus, he was nevertheless transferred into the earthly paradise. To explain this paradise, it should be known, according to Augustine in Book VIII of On the Literal Meaning of Genesis, that there are three general opinions concerning paradise. One is held by those who wish paradise to be understood only bodily; another by those who understand it only spiritually, that is, as the Church; and a third by those who take paradise in both ways. Augustine himself, in Book XIII of The City of God, admits that this third opinion pleases him. And this is reasonable, for in everything handed down by Scripture the truth of the history must be held as the foundation, and spiritual expositions must be built upon it, according to Thomas in the Second Part, question 103, article 1.

Paradise, therefore, as Isidore says in the book Etymologies, is a place situated in the eastern regions, whose name is translated from Greek into Latin as “garden.” It is fittingly said to be situated in the east, for it must be believed to have been established in the noblest place of the whole earth. Since the east is the right side of heaven, according to the Philosopher in Book II of On Heaven and the World, and the right is nobler than the left, it was fitting that paradise be established in the eastern region.

What Bede says, that paradise reaches as far as the circle of the moon, is not true if it is understood simply with respect to position. It can nevertheless be expounded as meaning that it rises as far as the place of the lunar globe, not through eminence of position but through likeness, because there is a perpetual temperateness of the air there, as Isidore says. In this it is likened to the heavenly bodies, which are without contrariety.

Augustine also says in Book VIII of On the Literal Meaning of Genesis that the place of paradise must be believed to be exceedingly remote from human knowledge. The sources of the four rivers said in Genesis 2 to arise there are said to have been found somewhere else, although, after running underground through long tracts of country, they broke out in other places above ground. For who does not know that some waters commonly do this? And because that place is shut off from our habitation by barriers of mountains or seas, or by some torrid region that cannot be crossed, writers on places make no mention of it.

The tree of life which stood in the middle was a certain material tree, so called because its fruit had the power of preserving life, as was said above. Spiritually, however, it signified Christ, who is the Wisdom of God the Father and the tree of life in Proverbs 3. Or it signified the sacrament of the Eucharist or the good of obedience.

The tree of the knowledge of good and evil was likewise a material tree, so named because of the future event: after eating from it, man learned by experiencing punishment what difference there was between the good of obedience and the evil of disobedience. Spiritually it may signify free choice. The aforesaid and the other trees were produced actually on the third day.

As Damascene says, paradise was a divine royal dwelling and a worthy abode for the one who was made according to the image of God. It shone round about with temperate, exceedingly fine and pure air, and was adorned with ever-flowering plants. The same author says that no irrational animals dwelt in paradise, although by a certain dispensation animals were brought there to Adam when he gave them names, and the serpent came there through the operation of the devil; according to Bede, it had a maiden's face. Now no one dwells there except Enoch and Elijah, as is said.

Third, Adam was exalted by the honor of dominion. Hence the Lord said in Genesis 1, "Let us make man," and so forth, "that he may rule over the fish of the sea, the birds of heaven, and the beasts of the earth." To explain this, Thomas says in the First Part, question 96, article 1, that in the state of innocence, before disobedience, nothing resisted man which naturally ought to be subject to him. All animals, however, are naturally subject to man, as is evident from three things.

First, it is evident from the course of nature itself in the generation and use of natural things. In generation one proceeds from the imperfect to the perfect, as in the generation of a human being; and likewise in the use of natural things, the more imperfect things yield to the use of the more perfect. Plants use the earth for their nourishment, animals use plants, and human beings use plants and animals. Hence man naturally rules over animals.

Second, this is evident from the order of divine providence, which governs lower things through higher ones. Since man is above the other animals because he was made in the image of God, the other animals are fittingly subjected to his governance.

Third, this is evident from a property of man and of the other animals. In other animals there is found, according to natural estimation, a certain participation in prudence with respect to certain particular acts. In man, however, there is found universal prudence, which is reason concerning all things that can be done. Everything that exists by participation is subject to that which exists essentially and universally. Thus it is evident that animals are naturally subject to man.

Folio 3.

The disobedience toward human beings which is now evident in animals followed as a punishment for man's guilty disobedience, because he himself was disobedient to God. There would nevertheless have been natural discord among the brute animals themselves, but they all would have been subject to man's dominion, just as some are now domesticated by him.

It should also be known, according to Thomas in the same question, article 2, that when Genesis 1 speaks of man as presiding over every creature, this is understood of the creature which is not made in the image of God. For man did not rule over the angels. But in the state of innocence the soul ruled by command over its sensitive powers--namely, the irascible and concupiscible powers, which in some degree obey reason--and in the same way over the brute animals. Man ruled over the natural powers and over the body itself not by commanding them but by using them. Thus in the state of innocence he ruled over plants and inanimate things not by commanding or changing them, as by changing one species into another or changing the course of the heavenly bodies, but by using their aid without impediment.

Even in the state of innocence there would have been inequality among human beings, not only with respect to sex and age but also with respect to the soul, as regards justice and knowledge. For man did not act from necessity but through free choice, by which he has the capacity to apply his mind more or less to acting or knowing something. Hence some would have advanced more in justice and knowledge than others.

There could also have been inequality on the part of the body. According to the diverse disposition of the air and the diverse position of the stars, some would have been stronger in body, more beautiful, taller, of better temperament, and better begotten than others. Nevertheless, in those who were surpassed there would have been no defect or sin of either soul or body.

There would also have been dominion of one human being over others in the state of innocence. For that state was not more exalted than the condition of the angels; yet among the angels some rule over others, whence there is one order called the Dominations. For a fuller explanation of this matter, it should be known, according to Thomas in the First Part, question 96, article 4, that dominion is taken in two ways.

In one way it is taken as opposed to servitude. In this sense someone to whom another is subjected as a slave is called a lord, and there would have been no dominion of this kind in the state of innocence. For a person rules over another as a slave when he refers the one whom he rules to his own utility, that is, the utility of the ruler. Such dominion cannot exist without punishment to the subjects, which would not have existed in the state of innocence. In this sense Augustine says in Book XIX of The City of God that God did not will rational man, made in His image, to rule over anything except the irrational--not man over man, but man over cattle.

In a second way dominion is taken as referring generally to one who is subject in any manner whatsoever. In this sense even one who has the office of governing and directing free persons can be called a lord. For someone rules over another as a free person when he directs him toward the proper good of the one directed or toward the common good. Such dominion of one human being over another would have existed in the state of innocence, for two reasons.

First, man is naturally a social animal. Hence human beings in the state of innocence would have lived socially. But the social life of many cannot exist unless someone presides who intends the common good.

Second, if one human being had possessed greater knowledge and justice than another, it would have been unfitting unless this resulted in the benefit of others. Hence Augustine says in Book XIX of The City of God that the just rule not from a desire to dominate but from the duty of taking counsel for others. The order of nature prescribes this, and thus God made man.

God did not create man in paradise, but formed him from the slime of the earth, with a newly created soul infused into that body, when, as it is said, He breathed into his face the breath of life. But God took him and placed him in paradise, as is said in Genesis 2, so that this too would be attributed to the grace of God and not to human nature. For paradise was a place suited to human habitation with respect to the incorruption of the first state. That incorruption did not belong to man according to nature, but is said to have come from a supernatural gift.

He would have dwelt there with his posterity until, after the human race had multiplied from generation to generation to the number of the elect appointed beforehand by God, all would have been transferred together, in soul and body, into the heavenly paradise or empyrean heaven, there clearly to see the essence of God.

Man was placed in paradise to work it and keep it, as is said in Genesis 2. Augustine, in Book VIII of On the Literal Meaning of Genesis, expounds this in two ways. In one way it is referred to God: that God would work in man by justifying him. If God's operation ceases in man, he is immediately darkened, just as the air is if the influx of light ceases. God would also keep him, namely from every corruption and evil.

In another way it may be understood as referring to man: that man would work and keep paradise. Yet that work would not have been laborious as it was after sin, but delightful because of the experience of the power of nature. Nor would that keeping have been against invaders; rather, man was to keep paradise for himself, lest by sinning he should lose it.

The works of the first man would have been more efficacious for meriting than our works. To explain this it should be known, according to Thomas in the First Part, that the quantity of merit may be considered from two sources. In one way, it may be considered from the root of charity and grace. Such quantity of merit corresponds to the essential reward, which consists in the enjoyment of God. For whoever does something from greater charity will enjoy God more perfectly.

In another way, the quantity of merit may be considered from the quantity of the work, which is twofold: absolute and proportional. The widow who put two small bronze coins into the treasury did a smaller work in absolute quantity than those who placed great gifts there. But in proportional quantity the widow did more, according to the judgment of the Lord in Luke 11, because her gift exceeded her means to a greater degree.

Nevertheless, each quantity of merit which is considered with respect to the work or labor corresponds to the accidental reward, which is joy in a created good. Therefore, if the quantity of merit is considered on the part of grace, the works of the first man would have been more efficacious for meriting in the state of innocence than after sin, because grace would have been more abundant, with no obstacle to grace found in human nature.

Likewise, if the absolute quantity of the work is considered, his works would have been more efficacious for meriting, because, since man would have possessed greater power, he would have performed greater works. But if proportional quantity is considered, a greater account of merit is found after sin because of man's weakness. For a small work exceeds the capacity of one who performs it with difficulty more than a great work exceeds the capacity of one who performs it without difficulty.

Although the first man before sin needed grace in order to merit eternal life just as he did afterward, after sin he needed grace for more things than before, both for the remission of sin and for the sustaining of weakness.

On the condition of offspring in the state of innocence, it should first be known that not only males but also females would have been generated in that state. For nature would have proceeded in generation as God instituted it. God instituted male and female in human nature, as is stated in Genesis 1 and 2; therefore, and so forth.

To explain this, Thomas says in the First Part, question 99, article 2, that nothing pertaining to the completion of human nature would have been lacking in the state of innocence. Just as diverse grades of things pertain to the perfection of the universe, so diversity of sex pertains to the perfection of universal human nature. Therefore both sexes would have been produced through generation in the state of innocence. And it appears, as Thomas says, that as many females as males would have been generated.

Nor is it an objection that every agent generates something like itself unless it is impeded by a defect of power or an indisposition of matter. In generation the active power is in the male. Thus, where there would have been no defect of power on the part of the male and no indisposition of matter on the part of the female, it seems that males ought always to have been generated.

Thomas replies that the generation of a female occurs not only from a defect of active power and an indisposition of matter, as the objection maintains, but sometimes from some extrinsic accident. Thus the Philosopher says in the book On Animals that the north wind assists the generation of males, but the south wind the generation of females. Sometimes it occurs from a disposition of the soul, by which the body is readily changed. This could especially have occurred in the state of innocence, when the body was more subject to the soul, so that the sex of the offspring would be distinguished according to the will of the one generating. Thus there would be as many females as males, so that each woman would have one man of her own and each man one wife.

Those born in the state of innocence would not immediately have possessed perfect strength and movement of their limbs. For according to Thomas in the place cited above, everything generated is imperfect before it is perfected. Children in the state of innocence would have been produced through generation. Therefore they would at first have been imperfect in bodily size and strength. Hence newborns would not immediately have possessed sufficient power to move their limbs for every kind of act, but only for acts fitting to childhood, such as sucking the breast by themselves and other things of this kind.

Would children have been born with justice? Some say that they would not have been born with gratuitous justice, which is the principle of meriting and is called sanctifying grace, but with original justice. For this was a certain gift divinely given to the whole of human nature. This appears to be so because original sin, which is opposed to that justice, is said to be a sin of nature. Hence it is transmitted from parent to posterity just as original justice would have been transmitted.

But as Thomas says in the First Part, question 100, article 1, since the root of original justice, in whose rectitude man was made, consists in the supernatural subjection of reason to God--a subjection effected by sanctifying grace--it must be said that if children had been born in original justice, they would also have been born with sanctifying grace. The same has been said of the first man, namely that he was created with grace.

Yet grace would not for this reason have been natural, because it would not have been transmitted by the power of the seed. Rather, it would have been bestowed upon a human being as soon as he possessed a rational soul. Likewise, as soon as the body is disposed, the rational soul is infused by God, although the soul is not derived by propagation.

Likewise, newborn children would not have possessed the perfect use of reason. The reason, according to Thomas in the First Part, question 101, article 2, is that the use of reason depends in some manner upon the use of the sensitive powers. Hence, when the senses and the interior sensitive powers are bound, a person does not possess the perfect use of reason, as is evident in those who sleep and those who are frenzied.

The sensitive powers are certain powers of bodily organs. Therefore, when their organs are impeded, their acts must be impeded and, consequently, so must the use of reason. In children the impediment to these sensitive powers comes from the excessive moisture of the brain. Hence they do not possess the perfect use of reason, just as they do not possess the perfect use of their other members.

Therefore, in the state of innocence children would not have possessed the perfect use of reason that they were to have at a mature age. Yet they would have possessed a more perfect use than they now do with respect to those things that pertained to them according to that state.

Likewise, children would not in that state have possessed perfection of knowledge, but would have acquired it in the course of time without difficulty, either by discovery or by learning. It is natural for man to acquire knowledge through the senses. Nevertheless, those children would have possessed sufficient knowledge to direct them in the works of justice in which human beings are directed, and they would naturally have possessed the universal principles of law much more fully than we possess them now.

Those born in the state of innocence would not have been confirmed in justice. Thomas explains this in the First Part, question 100, article 2. It is evident that children in their natural condition would not have possessed more perfection than their parents in the state of generation. But for as long as the parents generated, they would not have been confirmed in justice.

For a rational creature is confirmed in justice by being made blessed through the open vision of God. One who possesses this vision cannot fail to adhere to God, since God is the very essence of goodness, from which no one can turn away, because nothing is desired except under the aspect of good. Hence the little children would not have been born confirmed in justice.

Therefore, if Adam had not sinned, the children born from him would not indeed have contracted original sin, which is the cause of hell. Nevertheless, those generated from him could in another way become children of hell, namely by sinning through free choice. Thus he would not have transmitted to his posterity a necessity of not sinning such that they would have been altogether unable to sin.

§ II

As to the second principal point noted above, namely the efficacy of the sin by which man, exalted by such honor, was deprived of it, the words say, “he did not understand.” Indeed Adam and Eve did not understand--that is, they neither considered nor acknowledged the great dignity bestowed upon them among God’s benefits. Instead they adhered to His adversary, the devil, and withdrew from their Lord and benefactor, transgressing the command He had given them, namely to abstain from eating the fruit of the tree of good and evil.

The tree whose fruit the Lord forbade him was not evil in itself, but the command was given so that man, well created, might exercise himself in the virtue of obedience and thereby seek to acquire merit, as Gregory says in the final book of the Moralia, and in cause 11, question 3, “What, therefore?”

Folio 4.

For the virtue of obedience appears more clearly when one observes a prohibition concerning something which is not evil in itself except because it is prohibited than it would if something evil in itself were prohibited.

Eve indeed did not understand the deception of the ancient serpent when he said, “On whatever day you eat from it, you will be like gods, knowing good and evil.” She thought that he said this to her with the intention of counseling, not deceiving her, so as to make her condition more excellent--as though God had begrudged them the knowledge of good and evil and had therefore forbidden them to eat that fruit. Hence the apostle also says that the woman was seduced.

And as Augustine says, although this seduction of the woman preceded the sin of the deed, namely the sin of gluttony in taking the fruit, the sin of pride preceded the seduction itself. Thus Augustine says in On Genesis that the woman would not have believed the serpent’s words unless there were already in her mind a love of her own power and a certain proud presumption concerning herself.

While that innocence remained, the seduction could not have occurred, because just as truth is the good of the intellect, so falsehood is its evil. Therefore her intellect could not assent to any false estimation as though it were true. But once innocence had been lost through that pride, a false estimation entered beneath it, so that she believed what the devil was persuading her was true, according to Thomas in the First Part, question 95, article 4.

Adam did not understand how grave a sin the thing forbidden him by the Lord was. For although he did not believe the serpent’s words were true, as the woman did, he was nevertheless overcome by Eve’s persuasion--not indeed by a love of concupiscence, which did not yet exist, but by a love of a certain benevolence by which a friend is sometimes overcome so as to serve a friend in evil. Thus Adam ate from the tree lest he make his companion sorrowful, thinking that what was very grave was venial, that is, easily remitted.

Neither understood the evil that was to follow from their transgression, namely the death of soul and body in themselves and in the whole human race. Therefore the Lord had said, “Dying, you shall die,” referring to each death.

For just as, by remaining in their innocence, observing the command, and generating children, they would have poured into them the original justice which they themselves possessed, as was said above, so by transgressing that command of the Lord they transmitted original sin to all who descended from them by carnal propagation. Hence it was not transmitted to Christ, because although He descended from them according to bodily substance, He did not descend by carnal propagation as all others do.

Original sin, insofar as it is the cause of both deaths, is contracted from conception by the soul when it is infused into the body, and no one can be freed from it except through the grace of the Mediator. Hence Augustine, speaking of actual and original sin, says: Therefore, since a human being has been made another person from the one who begot him, he is not held liable for another’s sin without his own consent. Immediately afterward, concerning original sin, he adds: Man therefore drew guilt, namely the guilt of original sin, because he was one with him and in him--that is, in Adam--according to seminal power when what Adam committed was done. Cause 1, question 4, “And so now.”

The same Augustine says in On Consecration, distinction 4: Hold most firmly and in no way doubt that every human being conceived through the intercourse of male and female is born with original sin, and for this reason is born a child of wrath and liable to death unless freed through the grace of the Mediator.

It should also be known that if the woman alone had sinned and not Adam, she alone would have been condemned unless she had repented. The human race would not thereby have been infected with original sin, as it was when Adam sinned, for the active principle of human generation was in him.

Neither understood when, after their fault, they were called by God with the words, “Adam, where are you?” They were being sought so that they might confess their sin and be cleansed by repentance. But because they did not do this and instead excused themselves, turning the cause of their fault back upon another--upon God or upon the serpent--they were therefore cast out of paradise, where they were compared to senseless beasts, and so forth.

§ III

As to the third point, by which is noted the misery to which man was condemned when it is said, “he was compared to beasts,” and so forth: that God compared human beings to beasts after sin is evident from what is said in Genesis 3, that God made them coats of skins. And, as though mocking them, He said through an angel, “Behold, Adam has become like one of us,” as though He were saying: He wished to be God and has become like a beast; therefore I make for him a beastly coat.

He became like the beasts in the first place because, as Ecclesiastes 3 says, “The destruction of man and of beasts is one, and the condition of each is equal,” since each is subject to bodily death.

Second, just as beasts are ruled by the passions of the concupiscible and irascible powers and do not restrain them by reason, which they lack, so human beings are like beasts when they follow the passions of the vices and do not regulate them by the reason they possess. Hence they are of a worse condition.

Third, beasts wage war against one another. So too sinners fight one another over the things, wills, or possessions they covet, according to James 4: “Whence are wars and quarrels among you, if not from your desires?” and so forth, as will appear below.

Fourth, just as beasts delight to live in unclean places, so human beings delight to live amid uncleanness and to remain in it, according to the words of Joel: “They have rotted like beasts in their own dung.”

Fifth, just as beasts are subjected to many labors, to hunger and thirst, and to other miseries, so too are human beings, according to the words of Ecclesiastes: “All his days are full of labor and misery, nor does he rest by night.” And to the first man it was said in Genesis 3, “In the sweat of your face you shall eat your bread.”

It should be noted that man is said to have been made like not only beasts, but senseless beasts. Although all beasts lack wisdom, some of them nevertheless possess a certain skill or a certain prudential instinct, as the horse does in comparison with the ass. Hence asinus is said to derive from a, meaning “without,” and sensus, meaning “sense”--as though without sense. Man after sin appears to have been made like such a beast.

The ass is a sluggish animal for labor; so too man is sluggish in doing good. The ass commonly walks along dangerous and bad roads, and is not turned or led away by shouts or gestures unless it is harshly beaten. Sometimes not even by this is it brought onto the right road, as happened with Balaam’s ass when it was pressed by his spurs. Thus man after sin walks along difficult roads that lead to death; he is not turned from them by the cries of admonition and is scarcely corrected by scourges.

The ass walks slowly, and if it sometimes runs, its course endures only a little while. So too a sinner, even if he sometimes fervently begins some good works, does not persevere in them. Concerning the punishment and pride of our first parents, see the titles on Pride in the second part of our Summa.

Yet because the Psalm says, “I was made as a beast before You, and I am always with You,” a sinner who morally puts aside the evil qualities of the ass and takes on the good ones--namely that it is a patient and simple animal and a friend of peace--will be with God. As a figure of this, the Son of God, having become man, sat upon the ass and its colt, which signified those converted from the Jews and the gentiles, and entered Jerusalem, which is called the vision of peace.

According to Augustine in The City of God, the earthly paradise figures the Church militant. Just as all who remained in innocence in that place would, when the number of the elect begotten from time to time was complete, finally have been transferred to the heavenly paradise to see and enjoy the essence of God, immediately glorified in soul and body, so those who live in the Church militant and depart with innocence or perfect repentance, every debt of punishment having been discharged, pass to the glory above in their souls. The bodies of all the elect, however, will rise together at the end to be glorified--excepting Christ, who, rising from the dead, now dies no more, together with His mother, as is handed down by the saints, already glorified in body.

In paradise itself each sex was present. For although woman is said to be an occasioned male and was made as a help for man, the end of each is nevertheless the blessed life. Indeed, lest she be despised as more imperfect, she was formed in the nobler place, namely paradise, although Adam was made in the region of Damascus and transferred there, as Ambrose notes in distinction 40, "That."

Moreover, two persons, namely Adam and Eve, were not made from the beginning. Rather, first the man was made from slime and then the woman from his rib with respect to the body; with respect to their souls, both were created from nothing. According to Ambrose, God did this because, wishing to establish one nature of human beings and beginning it from a single principle, He removed from nature the possibility of many and diverse origins. Cause 33, question 5, final chapter.

Or, according to Augustine, one man, namely Adam, was made, from whom the others would arise, having authority from God as though His vicar. Cause 33, question 5, "This image." Or one was made in order to commend the mystery of unity and peace which human beings ought to preserve with one another.

The fourfold river of paradise is sacred doctrine, by which the Church militant is watered so that it may be made fruitful and produce abundant and sweet fruits of virtue. It is fourfold either because sacred Scripture is divided into four parts: the legal or Mosaic part; the prophetic and evangelical part, for which the Apocalypse stands in the New Testament; the historical part, such as the books of Kings and others, and Acts of the Apostles in the New Testament; and the sapiential part, as in the books of Solomon and others, and in the epistles of the apostles in the New Testament.

Or the river is fourfold because of the fourfold sense of Scripture: literal, allegorical, moral, and anagogical. Or, according to Isidore, it signifies the sound doctrine of the first four universal councils, distinction 15, chapter 1.

The tree of life in the middle of paradise, which gives vigor and preserves from corruption, is obedience and the soul's total subjection to God. The tree of the knowledge of good and evil is one's own will rebelling against God; eating from it is the execution of that will, which leads to the death of the soul. The other trees of paradise are the other kinds of virtues in which human beings would also have exercised themselves.

In each person there is found a certain spiritual marriage, according to the Master in Book II of the Sentences. Sensuality is in that person as Eve; the spirit, or rational appetite, is as Adam. Just as woman ought to be subject to man, cause 33, question 5, final chapter, so sensuality ought to be subject to reason, and then the human being is well governed.

The manner of the common, daily spiritual fall was sufficiently signified in the fall of our first parents, as Gregory notes in distinction 6, "Testament." With God's permission the ancient serpent approaches to tempt, and he first attacks the woman--that is, sensuality--as the weaker. He proposes or suggests to sensuality something to be done which God has prohibited, under the appearance of a useful and delightful good: this is the apple.

If reason does not immediately resist and repel it, but neglects to do so and permits sensuality to converse with the suggestion, then, even if conscience feels remorse over the prohibition of what is suggested, it nevertheless wavers under the suggestion and takes from the apple, as if thereby to obtain some great good. Not content with this, sensuality suggests it to Adam--that is, to reason--so that reason too may assent with it: namely, that it not only take sensual pleasure, but that reason also consent against God's prohibition. When reason has been overcome by passion in this way, it falls into the death of the soul.

For in sensible delight or complacency alone there is only a venial sin, according to Thomas; but in the consent of reason to a thing prohibited by command there is mortal sin, whether reason expressly consents or whether it is negligent and does not reject the danger contrary to the command.

Through any mortal sin a person is stripped of all virtues. As a figure of this, it is said that they knew they were naked, On Penance, distinction 2, "The wise man." Ashamed of this--for sin induces shame because of its foulness--and because of the stirrings of the flesh rising within them, they sewed fig leaves together to cover their shame, making aprons for themselves in place of lower garments. This occurs spiritually when, after sin, a person fashions vain and useless thoughts for himself in order to excuse his excesses in sins.

The sinner, placed by number, though not by merit, in the paradise of the Church, is called by God through inspiration so that he may confess his sin and receive pardon. But if he does not humbly confess his sin, and instead excuses himself and assigns the occasion to another, as our first parents did, God does not pardon him, as Gregory shows in the Moralia and Gratian in On Penance, distinction 1, § "From these."

Indeed, one who perseveres in evil when it is notorious is cast out of the paradise of the Church: by sentence he is excluded from it also in number, so that he cannot take from the tree of life, that is, participate in the sacrament of the Eucharist, as Gratian notes in cause 11, question 3, § "And so evidently."

From this it is also evident that while someone is occupied with God and himself, he does not sin; but when he associates with others, especially evil people, or entangles himself in these lower things, he easily falls.

Hence Ambrose says: "When Adam was alone, he did not transgress, because his mind adhered to God," On Penance, distinction 2.

Yet neither holiness of place, nor solitude, nor greatness of condition can make a person secure. Hence Gregory says: “No hidden places whatsoever can save a soul without grace, as we see in the erring inhabitants of those very places. For what is more delightful than paradise? And yet man fell from paradise by sinning,” distinction 40.

And he was fittingly cast out of paradise, according to Ambrose: “He who cast the nobility of God out of himself is deprived of the nobility of the place,” distinction 40, “Adam.”

Man possessed the nobility of God because he was made in the image and likeness of God, as is said in Genesis 1, for he possessed within himself the grace of the virtues and the gleaming splendor of piety, in which is the brightness of glory and the image of the Father’s substance, says Ambrose in On Penance, distinction 2, “That soul.”

Or, according to the Master of the Sentences in Book I, distinction 3, man is said to have been made in the image of God with respect to his natural endowments, insofar as in the one soul there are three powers--memory, understanding, and will--which are really distinct and yet are one soul. So in the most holy Trinity there are three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and yet one essence.

He is said to have been made in the likeness of God with respect to the gratuitous gifts added above nature. Hence Ambrose says, “To be like God is to possess justice and wisdom and to be perfect in virtue.”

When the root of the human race--that is, our first parents--was corrupted by sin, all their posterity, which was then in them according to seminal reason, was infected with original sin and made liable to perdition. But because Christ descended from Adam according to bodily substance, not according to carnal propagation through the commingling of man and woman, but from a virgin alone, He alone escaped original sin. Nor can anyone be saved and rescued from damnation except through grace, according to Augustine in On Consecration, distinction 4, “Hold most firmly.”

And because man offended through sensible things, he is restored to grace through sensible things. Because contraries are cured by contraries, just as by proudly and disobediently using a sensible apple he was depraved and incurred damnation, so by taking the sensible sacraments, to which he subjects himself for God’s sake, he is justified.

The sacraments of the New Law so signify grace itself or its effect that they also cause grace. The sacraments of the Old Testament, however, only signified it and did not confer it, according to Thomas in Book IV, distinction 1.

Various remedies and medicines against original sin are therefore given. In the New Testament, after the Gospel was promulgated, there is only one common to every nation: baptism with water conferred in the form of the Church. Matthew, final chapter: “He who believes and is baptized will be saved,” namely by preserving baptismal grace or restoring it through penance.

For adults, when baptism with water cannot be had, the baptism of the Spirit--that is, the intention to receive it together with faith--is sufficient, and much more is the baptism of blood, that is, martyrdom. On Consecration, distinction 4, “In place of baptism.” Those lacking the use of reason can be assisted toward salvation only through baptism with water, unless they are killed for Christ.

In the Old Testament, with respect to those possessing the use of reason, personal faith in Christ, held implicitly, cleansed from original sin one who was not yet purified. That faith was nevertheless professed by some sacrifice, offering, express invocation of God, or the like.

With respect to the little boys descended from Abraham until the Passion of Christ, circumcision cleansed them from original sin--that is, the faith of their parents, whose profession was circumcision itself, so that circumcision was not the cause by which remission occurred but a cause without which it did not occur.

For the females of Abraham’s race there was the same mode of healing that existed among other nations, namely the faith of the parents, not merely habitual but actually directed toward the salvation of the child. Its profession was some sacrifice, vocal prayer, or outward invocation of God, which functioned as a sacrament. In this way the authority of Gregory in On Consecration, distinction 4, “What formerly,” is to be understood.

Actual sins added to original sin, especially mortal ones, were never erased except through interior penance, that is, contrition. Hence Augustine says, “Do not suppose that anyone can pass from error to truth, or from any great or small sin to correction, without penance,” On Penance, distinction 1, “No one,” and the chapter “There are three.”

And our first parents, as Augustine says in On Penance, distinction 1, just as they are believed to have been the first placed in the world, are also believed to have greatly repented of their transgression; hence they were saved by the Passion of Christ.

But in the New Testament, especially after the Church’s command concerning confession was promulgated, in On Penance and Remission, “Every,” contrition does not suffice for salvation unless vocal confession duly made to a priest is added when the opportunity is present. In this way is understood what Ambrose says in the book On Paradise: “No one can be justified from sin unless he has first confessed his sin,” On Penance, distinction 1--namely, at least in intention; but afterward, in its own time, he must confess it in act, otherwise he would incur damnation.

Baptism and the other sacraments do not profit except in the holy Church, and hence they do not profit heretics or those who remain in mortal sin. For, as Jerome says, “One who is polluted by any stain of sin cannot be said to belong to the Church or to be subject to Christ,” On Penance, distinction 1, “Ecclesiastical.”

Hence Augustine also says: “The Church compared to paradise shows us that her baptism can indeed be received by people even outside her, but that no one outside her can either receive or retain the salvation of blessedness. For the happiness of the life commemorated in paradise is not in Mesopotamia or Egypt, to which those rivers came. Thus the baptism of the Church can exist outside the Church, but the gift of a good life is found only within the Church,” On Consecration, distinction 4, “The Church.”

Because the glorious God foreknew the fall of the human race, He arranged that the first man should from the beginning prophetically foreannounce the reparation accomplished through the Incarnation and Passion, from which the Church’s sacraments have their power--not insofar as man errs, with respect to redemption, because man did not foreknow his own fall, according to the Master in Book II, but with respect to the dignity and exaltation of human nature.

Adam’s sleep signifies the sleep of Christ’s death upon the cross. Then a wife was formed from a rib in his side, because from there the Church, the bride of Christ, is formed in spiritual being through the sacraments, chiefly baptism and the Eucharist, the greatest in efficacy and in being. These were figured by the water and blood flowing from His side when it was pierced by the lance.

Eve was made from the bone of Adam’s rib, while the place in him was filled with flesh in its stead, because that from which the Church was strengthened and formed--namely, the Incarnation of the Son of God--was the source from which the Son of God was, as it were, weakened by assuming passible flesh.

Adam, awakening, prophetically announced this when he said, “A man shall leave father and mother.” For the Son of God according to His divinity has no mother; hence “to leave” means not to have. According to His humanity He has no father, because He was conceived and born from a virgin. “And he shall cleave to his wife,” namely the Church, by an indissoluble bond; “and the two”--namely the human and divine natures--“shall be in one flesh,” that is, in one person.

In detestation of the vice of gluttony and commendation of abstinence, Ambrose says: “That we may know fasting is no novelty: God first established a law in paradise. The law of fasting began from the Lord God; transgression of the law began from the devil. The serpent counseled gluttony; the Lord decreed fasting. Thus gluttony expelled the one reigning in paradise, while abstinence recalled the one wandering.” Thus far Ambrose, distinction 35, “On the sixth day.”

Morally, complacency in one’s own will [expelled the human race], and conversely the obedience of Christ brought the human race back to heaven.

§ IV

It should be noted that in calculating the duration of the years of the first and second ages there is a great difference between the reckoning of years given by the Hebrews, which is in Jerome’s translation now used by the Church, and the reckoning of the Septuagint translators.

According to the Hebrews, the first age, namely from Adam to the Flood, lasted 1,656 years. The second age, from Noah after the Flood to Abraham, contains 292 years. But according to the Septuagint, the first age completes 2,242 years. The second age, namely from Noah after the Flood to Abraham, has 940 years. Thus, taking the first and second ages together, the second computation--that is, the Septuagint’s, which Bede and many others follow--exceeds the first, that of the Hebrews, which Vincent follows in the Historical Mirror, by 1,234 years.

The reason for this difference is that in the case of many of those fathers the Septuagint translation assigns one hundred years more at the time they begot children than the Hebrews do, as though in each of those fathers.

Adam begot Seth in the 130th year of his life, but according to the Septuagint in his 230th year. Seth begot Enos in the 105th year of his life, but according to the Septuagint in the 205th. Enos begot Cainan in his 90th year, but according to the Septuagint in his 190th. Cainan begot Mahalaleel in his 70th year, but according to the Septuagint in his 170th. Mahalaleel begot Jared in his 65th year, but according to the Septuagint in his 145th. Jared begot Enoch in his 162nd year, but according to the Septuagint in his 172nd.

Enoch begot Methuselah in his 70th year, but according to the Septuagint in his 165th; and he was translated into the earthly paradise in the sixteenth year. Methuselah begot Lamech in his 187th year, but according to the Septuagint in his 167th. Lamech begot Noah in his 182nd year, but according to the Septuagint in his 188th.

Noah begot Shem, Ham, and Japheth; in the 500th year of his life he began to build the ark, and in his 600th year, when he entered the ark with his sons and their wives, eight persons in all, the Flood came.

In the second age, namely after the Flood, Shem, from whom the race of the Jews proceeded, begot Arphaxad in the second year according to both opinions. Arphaxad begot Salah in the 35th year of his life, but according to the Septuagint in his 135th. Salah begot Eber in his 30th year, but according to the Septuagint in his 130th. Eber begot Peleg in his 34th year, but according to the Septuagint in his 134th. Peleg begot Reu in his 30th year, but according to the Septuagint in his 130th; in Peleg's time the earth was divided into various languages.

Reu begot Serug in his 30th year, but according to the Septuagint in his 130th. Serug begot Nahor in his 30th year, but according to the Septuagint in his 130th. Nahor begot Terah in his 29th year, but according to the Septuagint in his 79th. Terah, in his 70th year, begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran, and the Septuagint gives the same. The third age begins with Abraham.

No sufficient reason can be assigned for this disagreement between the Hebrews and the Septuagint translators in calculating the years of the first and second ages. Its determination must therefore be left to the Holy Spirit, who arranged it in this way not without mystery, for the greater merit of faith and our humiliation.

Augustine, however, says in The City of God that this proceeded from an error of the first copyists working from the seventy-two translators, who did not carefully attend to the number of the years. Although the Hebrew computation is judged more true, the computation of the Septuagint is nevertheless more commonly held.

Because human beings lived for so long in the first age, some said that their years were not of so great a span--that is, twelve months--as ours, but that their year was thirty-six days, so that one of our years comprised ten of theirs. But Augustine in The City of God rejects this opinion by what is said in the seventh chapter concerning the tenth month and the fifteenth day of that month. There it is shown that their years were like ours in number of days.

As to why such persons are read to have begotten children so late, although they were occupied with marriage rather than virginal continence, Augustine assigns two reasons. Either, just as they lived for so long, they also became fit for generation late; or those of whom Scripture speaks were not their firstborn. They could have begotten many others earlier, just as they did afterward, but those persons were named first because, although born after others, they were preferred to them in dignity or in presiding over others, and because from them the genealogy of Christ was to be woven, since Christ descended from them and not from the others they had begotten.

Thus the evangelist Matthew, describing Christ's genealogy, said, "Jacob begot Judah and his brothers," although Judah was not the firstborn but the fourth. He placed Judah, omitting the others, because Christ descended from him according to the flesh.

Adam and Eve, therefore, as is believed, transgressed in the earthly paradise on the very day of their creation--that is, the sixth day of the world--around noon, and a little afterward, around the ninth hour, they were cast out. Hence the new man, Christ, on the same weekday after the revolutions of many years--after 5,199 years from the creation of the world according to the Septuagint translators--on the sixth day of the week, the eighth day before the Kalends of April, was crucified at the sixth hour, paying the debt of that same sin; and, expiring around the ninth hour, He opened the entrance of paradise to the thief.

Our first parents, cast into exile, hastened to human consolation. For they left paradise as virgins; afterward Adam knew his wife Eve.

Accordingly, in the fifteenth year of Adam's life Cain and his sister Calmana were born. Fifteen years afterward Abel and his sister Delbora were born, as Vincent says in Book II of the Historical Mirror.

It is believed that Adam taught his sons to offer God tithes and first fruits in spirit, or sacrifices. Cain, a farmer and miser, offered God gnawed ears of grain. Abel, a simple and good shepherd of sheep, offered from the fattest of his flock. Because Abel's life and intention pleased God, his offering was pleasing to God, but Cain's was not. This is evident because, as is said in another translation, God kindled fire upon Abel's sacrifice but not upon Cain's--that is, fire descended from heaven to ignite the sacrifice offered by Abel, but not that offered by Cain.

Seeing this, Cain, envying the goodness of his brother, treacherously killed him in a field near Damascus, as is stated in Genesis 4. When Cain himself was questioned by the Lord about his brother, so that in this way he might acknowledge his sin by confessing it, he excused himself, saying that he did not know. And when the Lord rebuked him for the fratricide, he did not perform penance, but added the evil of despair. As a wanderer and fugitive he went out from the face of God, who had appeared in a subject creature--that is, through an angel in human form--to speak to him.

As a citizen of the earth, Cain was the first to build a city, gathering riches by robbery and violence, inviting his people to acts of brigandage, changing human simplicity through the invention of measures, and leading it into craftiness and corruption. He was the first to set boundaries to land and walled a city because he feared those whom he harmed. On account of his severity, he gathered his people into the city.

In these two first sons of Adam, Cain and Abel, the two cities had their beginning, according to Augustine in The City of God. One is the city of the good, which sojourns on earth and awaits its dwelling in heaven: the heavenly Jerusalem, spiritually built as a city beginning from love of God and advancing, through true humility, even to contempt of self.

The other is the city of the reprobate, which is established in earthly things and descends to the land of darkness. Love of self builds it, advancing through pride even to contempt of God. It is called Babylon, interpreted as confusion, just as Jerusalem is called the vision of peace.

The Church of the saints is therefore said to have begun from righteous Abel, not from Adam, lest it appear to have been interrupted by Adam's fall and lest it appear to have begun from a sinner. Just as wicked Cain persecuted innocent Abel even to death, so, as the apostle says, all who wish to live devoutly in Christ must suffer persecution from wicked believers or unbelievers, or at least the persecution of their evil examples. In this way the soul's patience is exercised.

Gregory says: "He refuses to be Abel whom Cain's malice does not exercise. For the iron of our mind cannot arrive at the edge of truth unless another's file of depravity has scraped it," cause 7, question 1, § "There is also another." This pertains to the gift of knowledge: to conduct oneself well among the wicked, and to shine through patience like lights in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, without being extinguished by their wicked works.

In Abel was also figured the Passion of Christ, the innocent one killed from envy by his brother--that is, by the Jews, who were of his race. Hence that whole posterity became obstinate and reprobate.

Because there were no other women in the world, the first sons had to take their sisters as wives in order to propagate the human race, as Augustine says in cause 35, question 1, chapter 1. To the same father were born wicked Cain and good Abel, to intimate that the whole mass of the human race was justly condemned in Adam and that anyone from it becoming a vessel unto honor proceeds not from nature but from God's mercy.

The pursuits of Cain's sons plainly indicate to which of the aforesaid cities they belong, namely the city of heaven or of hell. Lamech was the first to introduce bigamy contrary to nature and custom, having two wives at once, Genesis 5 [read: Genesis 4]. If Jacob, David, and others had several wives, they did so instructed by the Holy Spirit in order to enlarge the worship of God reserved among that people, as is said in On Divorce, "We rejoice"; but Lamech did so from lust alone.

His descendants also invented certain mechanical arts and curiosities. Jabal invented the portable tents of shepherds, as is stated in Genesis 4; Jubal invented skill in musical sounds or harmonies; Tubalcain invented the smith's art and the carving of metals; and their sister Naamah invented the art of varied weaving.

Nearly all the secular arts or sciences, whether mechanical, liberal, or philosophical, serving human curiosity, necessity, or even exercise, are read to have been invented by the children of this world. For those arts which did not pertain to their salvation had to be discovered by the study and labor of those who were not children of eternal salvation. Such labor was therefore owed to such people, while the fruit was reserved for these. Thus the Egyptians are despoiled by the Hebrews, so that the words spoken by the Lord fittingly apply to the true Hebrews, that is, the faithful: "Others have labored, and you have entered into their labors."

Concerning this Lamech, the Master in the Historia and Nicholas of Lyra say that he was a hunter--not for the sake of meat, which was not yet used, as is said in distinction 35, "From the beginning," but for the skins of animals, so that he might make clothes for himself.

Because he was going blind, he led with him a boy who directed the arrow of his bow toward the beast. When the youth saw the decrepit Cain remaining among the thickets and thought him a beast, he signaled Lamech to shoot an arrow at him as though at a beast. Having done so, Lamech killed Cain with the wound, as he realized from Cain's cry. Or, according to another account, in anger he also killed the boy. Thus he killed Cain by a wound and the youth by the livid bruise of a wound. Therefore, whereas Cain's sin was punished sevenfold, Lamech's was punished seventy-sevenfold, because seventy-seven souls who had gone forth from Lamech perished in the Flood.

Chapter Two: On the Second Age of the World, Which Begins in the Time of Noah; on the Construction of the Ark; on the Flood; on Monstrous Kinds of Human Beings; on the Drunkenness of Lot; and on the Curse of Ham

The second age of the world began from Noah after the Flood, which was universal throughout the whole world. It occurred in the 600th year of Noah's life and, from the beginning of the world, in the 1,656th year according to the Hebrews, but according to the Septuagint translators, whom Bede and Isidore approve, in the 2,242nd year. It lasts until Abraham for 292 years according to the Hebrews, but for 842 years according to the Septuagint translators.

One hundred years before the Flood the Lord appeared to Noah--that is, in the 500th year of Noah's life--and when he had already begotten his sons Shem, Ham, and Japheth, He commanded him to build an ark. In it Noah was to be saved from the waters of the Flood with his aforesaid sons and their wives, together with some of every kind of living creature of the earth and of the birds, male and female.

Thus one hundred years were granted to human beings as a period for returning to pardon, during which Noah, obedient to God, built the ark, preaching penance to human beings by deed and word so that they might escape God's sentence.

Indeed, when God said, "Their days shall be 120 years," Jerome, in On Penance, distinction 1, expounds it by saying that this time was first given to the human race for returning to penance. But because human beings did not reform themselves by these things but became worse, God took twenty years away from the promised time and sent the Flood at the end of one hundred years.

For all flesh had corrupted its way. The sons of Cain, as Vincent says in the Historical Mirror, abused the wives of their brothers in excessive fornications, and women, turned to madness, shamefully went beyond the men. Finally, burning for one another, men coupled with one another. And the sons of Seth--that is, those descended from him, who had once been religious and good--contrary to the prohibition of their father Adam, were overcome by concupiscence and joined themselves to the daughters of Cain. Hence they begot giants: human beings immense in body, proud in strength, and uncultivated in morals.

By God's command the ark was made three hundred cubits long, fifty wide, and thirty high, from smoothed timbers coated with pitch. "You shall make a window in the ark," and its summit was completed within a cubit. There was also a window in its side and, below near the earth, a door through which the animals had entered.

Where our text says, "You shall make inner chambers in it," another text has more clearly, "Thus you shall make it with double chambers and triple chambers." It therefore had certain divisions or chambers which Augustine says were there in addition to the bilge. For he says that above the bilge deck it was double-chambered, and there were lateral chambers: one for dung and another a storeroom, where food was placed for all the animals to eat.

Above this dwelling was another, likewise triple-chambered. In one of these chambers lived fierce animals, in another tame ones, and in the middle human beings. Others arrange all these vertically--that is, by stories--as Josephus does, who says there were four stories, not including the bilge. This is in Genesis, chapter 6.

When Noah had entered the ark according to the Lord's command, with his wife, his three sons, and every kind of animal--two and two of the unclean, male and female, but seven of the clean--the Flood poured forth for forty days and forty nights, with an immense rain falling continuously.

The water rose fifteen cubits higher than every mountain in order to wash away the filth of the air, just as it is also said that the fire of the final judgment will ascend to so great a height. All the animals of the earth and the birds perished in the Flood except those in the ark, which by themselves, through God's operation, came to the ark and entered before the Flood and were fed from the foods stored there.

The waters held the earth for 150 days; afterward they began to diminish. The ark rested upon the mountains of Armenia in the seventh month, on the twenty-sixth day of that month. Noah sent a raven from the ark to see whether the waters had yet ceased, but it did not return to the ark.

He then sent out a dove. Finding nowhere for its foot to rest, namely no clean place, it returned to the ark and was brought inside. After waiting seven days, he sent it out again, and it brought back to the ark a small branch of green olive in its mouth, as a sign of God's mercy.

Thus, when a year had revolved, Noah left the ark on the same calendar day on which he had entered it, at the command of the Lord, with his sons and their wives and all the living creatures preserved there. Having built an altar, he offered sacrifice to God, as though for peace and thanksgiving, and God accepted the sacrifice, as is stated in Genesis 8, and blessed them.

This blessing consisted in three things: the multiplication of offspring, the subjection of the other living creatures, and the granting of foods. These were enlarged both because of human weakness and because of the earth's lack of fertility. Hence the use of meat was granted, which did not exist in the first age, as Jerome says in distinction 35, "From the beginning." Flesh was nevertheless permitted without blood, under which homicide is prohibited.

Because the Flood was still feared, the Lord made with them a covenant of security and placed the rainbow in the clouds. Although it is said to have six or four colors, it nevertheless has two principal ones, as a sign of the two judgments: the exterior color, namely blue, which is also watery, as a sign that the past judgment by water is no longer to be feared; and the interior color, red, as a sign that the future judgment by fire is to be expected.

Thus in the Flood the first age ended and, like infancy, was handed over to oblivion; and the second age began.

In what the Lord said to Noah in Genesis 6, "My spirit shall not remain in man forever, because he is flesh," the spirit of God may here be understood as the Holy Spirit dwelling in man through grace, or as the will of God, with which one who lives rightly agrees and which he follows. "Flesh," however, means a human being who lives according to the flesh.

When this is the case, it is at present impossible for him to live according to the spirit, that is, according to the will of God. Thus the spirit of grace, or the fulfilled will of God, is not in him. Hence the apostle also says to the Galatians, "If you live according to the flesh, you shall die," namely spiritually and eternally. "But if by the spirit"--that is, according to the reason of God, or by the spirit, that is, by a will regulated by Him--"you mortify the deeds of the flesh, you shall live," namely in grace and afterward in glory.

Folio 7.

Augustine, at the beginning of Book XIV of The City of God, gives this as the difference between the city or society of the elect and that of the reprobate: the wicked live according to the flesh, while the good live according to the spirit.

Explaining each at length, he says that to live according to the flesh is not only to live according to carnal pleasures in sexual acts, food, drink, and the like, in which the Epicureans placed the highest good. He proves this because, when the apostle had said to the Galatians, "The works of the flesh are manifest," in explaining them he names not only adulteries, fornications, uncleannesses, revelries, and drunkenness, but also numbers among them idolatry, enmities, envies, wrath, heresies, and the like. These vices are certainly not accomplished through the flesh and are found in the devil, who is incorporeal, as are envy, enmity, and the like.

Nor is living according to the spirit the same as living according to acquired human virtue, in which the Stoics placed the highest good. Rather, this too is living according to the flesh: to live according to man, that is, according to oneself, or, to speak more plainly, according to one's own will when it is not subject to God's will but rebellious against it. To live according to the spirit is to live according to God, or, more plainly, according to the will of God.

And because sin is nothing other than a word, deed, or desire contrary to the law and will of God, every sin can therefore not unfittingly be called a lie. For, as Augustine says, sin is committed only with the will by which we wish things to go well for us or do not wish them to go badly. It is therefore a lie that, when sin is committed so that things may go well for us, things instead turn out badly for us; or when it is committed so that things may go better for us, they instead become worse.

Whence does this come, except that a person can fare well from God--namely by living according to His will, whom he abandons by sinning--but not from himself, that is, from his own will, according to which he lives when he sins? Hence, when the devil willed to live according to himself by taking complacency in his own pride, Christ said of him, "He did not stand in the truth." And concerning man, because every human being is a sinner, the Psalm says, "Every man is a liar."

It therefore matters what kind of will a person has. If it is perverse--which is to live according to man or according to one's own will--he will have perverse movements of the passions: desire, joy, sorrow, fear, and the others reducible to them. But if the will is upright, these movements of the passions will be not only blameless but even praiseworthy. An upright will is to live according to God's will in all the passions.

For what are desire and gladness but the will consenting to the things we will? And what is sorrow but the will dissenting from the things we do not will? According to the variety of things sought or avoided, therefore, as a person's will is attracted or offended, so it changes and turns into these or those affections.

These passions are found in the good and the wicked, including sorrow or grief, which the Stoics asserted was not found in the mind of a wise person. "Among us," Augustine says in chapter 9 of the aforesaid book, "according to the holy Scriptures, the citizens of the holy city of God who live according to God during the pilgrimage of this life fear, desire, grieve, and rejoice. And because their love, which is the principle of the passions, is upright, they have all these affections uprightly."

They fear eternal punishment and desire eternal life. They grieve in reality because they still groan within themselves, awaiting adoption, the redemption of their bodies. They rejoice in hope because the saying that is written will come to pass: "Death has been swallowed up in victory." Likewise, they fear to sin, desire to persevere, grieve over sins, and rejoice in good works. Augustine adds there the authorities of Scripture by which the saints are moved to these things. He also gives the apostle Paul as an example, affirming of himself that he rightly used these passions.

Indeed, even Christ, as is evident in the Gospel, began to fear and to be sorrowful; with desire He desired to eat the Passover with His disciples; and He rejoiced when He heard of Lazarus's death. But we experience these things according to passion, whereas Christ experienced them according to propassion, in such a way that the act or light of reason was obscured in no respect, which does not occur in us.

The end of the carnal is destruction in the flood of desires which war against the soul, or of carnal concupiscence which lusts against the spirit. The end of the spiritual, or of those living according to the spirit, is salvation, figured in the few saved in the ark.

Here one must also attend to and guard against familiarity with the wicked. For the spiritual--namely, the descendants of Seth, Adam's son--after they mingled with the carnal, namely the women descended from Cain, themselves became people living according to the flesh. The descendants of Seth are called sons of God, and, according to another text, angels of God, because of adoption and their former purity. The descendants of Cain are called sons of men, that is, persons living according to man or the flesh.

It must not be believed, as some have said, that the angels of God were incubus demons who, mixing themselves with women, generated giants. Augustine rejects this in Book XV of The City of God.

§ I: On the Ark

Concerning the ark made by Noah--its material and form and the things contained in it--Augustine says at the end of Book XV of The City of God: "It must be believed and wisely kept in memory that these things were both committed to writing and done literally, and that they signify something, and that this something pertains to prefiguring the Church."

First, as Gregory says in the Moralia, just as all who were found outside the ark perished, so all who are outside the Church perish eternally in the flood of vices.

The material of the ark is squared timbers, smoothed and coated with pitch, signifying the faithful of the Church, steadfast in good, the roughness and inequality of vices removed from them, united by conformity of morals.

As to its dimensions, its length was three hundred cubits. This number is formed from three and one hundred, while one hundred results from ten multiplied ten times. The continuance or duration of the Church is from the beginning of the world to its end, possessing in all the elect the three virtues of faith, hope, and charity, together with the perfect and complete observance of the Ten Commandments.

The breadth signifies the Church's breadth and her extension everywhere upon the earth. In her alone is found the full remission of sins, from the breadth of charity which covers all offenses, as is said in Proverbs 10. The breadth of the ark was fifty cubits, which is the number of the jubilee in which there was full remission.

Its height was thirty cubits. The Church's height is the sublime knowledge of truth, reaching even to the mystery of the Trinity of divine persons, the perfect knowledge of which is the term and end of all our desires. The number thirty consists of three and ten, while ten is the first boundary or limit of numbers.

These cubits, however, with respect to the material ark itself, are not to be understood as our cubits but as geometrical cubits, one of which contains six of ours, as Origen says, an opinion that pleases Augustine in The City of God.

Where our translation says, "You shall make upper rooms and three stories in it," another says, "You shall make it double-chambered and triple-chambered." The double chambering signifies the distinction of the faithful people into circumcision and foreskin, that is, Jews and gentiles. The triple chambering signifies the Church's three states: virgins, the continent, and the married.

The quadrupeds existing there signify active persons who dwell upon earthly things. The birds moving through the airy heaven signify contemplative persons. Those who maintain a life mixed from both especially signify the prelates who govern the ark of the Church.

Clean and unclean animals were there because, as to number, the good are mingled with the wicked in the Church. The unclean were in the number two, which is the first number to depart from unity, because the wicked are separated from the unity of love. The clean were there in the number seven, because the elect are enriched by the sevenfold grace of the Holy Spirit.

Four men with their wives were preserved from the Flood because males and females who possess the four cardinal virtues are saved in the Church. And just as the waters multiplied from heaven lifted the ark on high, so multiplied tribulations--which indeed are sent from heaven--raise the mind or the Church to the height of contemplation and perfection.

Divine providence rather than human prudence governed the floating ark so that it did not anywhere undergo shipwreck, as Augustine says there; in the same way Christ governs the Church.

The ark itself also figures the mediator of God and human beings, the head of the Church, the Lord Jesus Christ, who through His Passion on the wood of the cross saves us from the flood of perdition. The measurements themselves of length, breadth, and height signify the human body, in the truth of which He was announced beforehand to human beings as coming, and came.

For the length of a human body from the crown of the head to the soles of the feet is only six times its breadth, which extends from one side to the other, and ten times its height, whose measure is from the back to the belly. Thus, if you measure a person lying supine or prone, he is six times as long from head to feet as he is broad from right to left or from left to right, and ten times as long as he is high from the ground.

Hence the ark was made in this figure, three hundred cubits in length, fifty in breadth, and thirty in height. And the door which the ark received in its side is certainly the wound made when the side of the Crucified was pierced by the lance. Those coming to Him enter through this, because from it flowed the sacraments--figuratively and virtually--by which believers are initiated.

§ II: On Monstrous Kinds of Human Beings Recounted in the Histories of the Nations

It is reported that certain persons have one eye in the middle of the forehead; that some have the soles of their feet turned backward behind their legs; that some naturally possess both sexes, with the right breast male and the left female, and, by alternately coupling with one another, both beget and give birth; that others have no mouths and take breath only through their nostrils; and that others are a cubit in stature, whom the Greeks call pygmies from the cubit.

It is reported elsewhere that women conceive before their fifth year and do not pass beyond the eighth year of life. Likewise, it is said that there are peoples whose members have only one leg, who do not bend the big toe and are of marvelous speed. Some are called Sciapods: during the heat they lie supine on the ground and protect themselves with the shadow of their feet. Some have no neck and have their eyes in their shoulders. What shall I say of the Cynocephali, whose dog-like heads and very barking confess them to be beasts rather than human beings?

But it is not necessary to believe in all the kinds of human beings said to exist. Nevertheless, let none of the faithful doubt that whoever is born anywhere and dies as a human being--that is, as a rational mortal animal--derives his origin from that one first-formed man and, through him, from Noah after the Flood, however unusual the shape, color, motion, sound, power, member, or natural quality of his body may appear to our senses.

The same account given for persons among us who are monstrous in some bodily parts can be given for certain monstrous nations. For God is the creator of all, and He Himself knows where and when each thing ought or ought to have been created, knowing the beauty of the universe, of whose parts He Himself wove both likeness and diversity. But one who cannot inspect the whole is offended, as though by the deformity of a part, because he does not know with what it agrees or to what it is referred.

Augustine gives examples of certain monstrous persons of his own time and country: one having crescent-shaped soles with only two toes on them and two fingers on his hands; and a man born double in his upper members but single in his lower ones, having two heads, two chests, four hands, one belly, and two feet.

What if God therefore willed to create some nations in this way, lest from those monsters which must be born among us from human beings we should think that His wisdom, by which human nature is fashioned, had erred like the art of some less perfect craftsman?

But there is no reason to believe that antipodes exist, as some tell in fables--that is, human beings on the opposite side of the earth, where the sun rises when it sets for us, who press their footprints against ours with feet pointing the other way. Thus Augustine in Book XVI of The City of God, chapter 8.

§ III

Noah, a husbandman, afterward became drunk from the fruit of a vine he had planted. While he lay with his private parts uncovered, Ham mocked him; but when Shem and Japheth heard, they covered him. Hence Ham was cursed in his son, and the other two were blessed by Noah.

Morally, this signifies subjects who mockingly and irreverently disclose the vices of their spiritual fathers and thereby incur the curse of damnation. Good subjects, however, reverence their fathers and cover the defects of prelates--not by assenting to or committing those defects with them, but by not divulging them where doing so is not useful. This is found in distinction 96, "In the Scriptures."

Concerning Noah's drunkenness literally, Ambrose says: "In the beginning of the human race wine was unknown. Noah was the first to plant a vineyard; he knew its nature but did not know its power. Thus wine did not spare even its own author. But his drunkenness commends sobriety." And below: "The envy of fraternal betrayal had already crept in, but reverence for paternal piety still remained. Piety is injured when drunkenness is mocked. Liberty remained unshaken for all: no one knew how to exact the service of servitude from a brother. There would be no servitude today if there had been no drunkenness." Thus Ambrose, distinction 35, "Sixth."

For as punishment for the mockery, Noah assigned Canaan, the son of Ham, to the servitude of his brothers.

Ham himself was not cursed, but his son, to intimate, according to the Master of the Sentences in Book II, that no one is reprobated because of the first movements of sins, but because of those movements proper to him which are mortal sins.

Nevertheless, Noah did not sin mortally in this drunkenness, because he did not know the power of wine. It is also intimated that excessive drinking leads to the uncovering of members in lust, because a belly heated with wine easily foams forth into lust. Jerome, distinction 42.

Noah, the governor of the ark, who transplanted a wild vine and made it cultivated, became drunk from its wine and therefore lay naked, and so forth. He signifies Christ, governor of the Church, who so cultivated the vine of human nature or of the synagogue, created by God but producing wild fruits of fear, by His evangelical teaching confirmed with miracles and examples, that it produced the sweet wine of love.

As though drunk from the sweetness of that love, Christ drank the inebriating cup of the Passion and, put to sleep by death upon the cross, remained naked. Seeing this, the Jewish people, figured in Ham--or also, according to Augustine, the company of heretics or wicked Christians--reports the Passion aloud by announcing it to others, but dishonors it by mocking or acting wickedly. Therefore it is cursed not in itself but in its son, that is, in its work. Hence Canaan is interpreted as "their movement," by which their work is signified.

Shem and Japheth, however, are as circumcision and foreskin--that is, the Jews and gentiles who were called and justified through faith. Having learned of the nakedness of their father, that is, the Passion of the Savior, they cover his nakedness by venerating the Passion, with the garment placed upon their backs--that is, with the sacrament of the Passion in memory of past things--and with their faces turned away, that is, by turning from or detesting the crime of the Jews.

The reprobate announce Christ's Passion outside, that is, only in the sound of the voice; the upright possess and honor so great a mystery within the house, that is, within the inner person, inwardly in the heart.

After Noah's two sons had thus been blessed and the third cursed, there is thereafter, until Abraham, silence for more than a thousand years concerning any of the just who believed in and worshiped God. I would not believe there were none, but if all were commemorated it would become excessively long and would be historical diligence rather than prophetic providence.

The writer of these sacred letters--or rather, the Spirit of God through him--pursues those matters by which not only past events are narrated but future events are also announced, provided that they pertain to the city of God. Whatever is said here even of persons who are not its citizens is said so that by comparison with its contrary that city may either advance or stand out.

Certainly not everything narrated as done is to be thought also to signify something; rather, other events are woven in because of those which signify something. The earth is cleft by the plowshare alone, but in order that this may be done, the other members of the plow are also necessary. Thus Augustine in Book XVI of The City of God.

Chapter Three: On the Descendants of Noah's Sons--Shem, Ham, and Japheth

Augustine says in The City of God that it is not clearly held which descendants of Noah's sons belonged to the city of God and which to the city of the devil. It is nevertheless more credible that among the sons of the two blessed by Noah, Shem and Japheth, before Babylon began to be founded, there were some despisers of God; and that among the sons of the cursed Ham there were some worshipers of God. It must be believed that each kind of human being has never been lacking from the earth.

For when the Psalm says, "All have turned aside; there is none who does good," it speaks there of the sons of men who live according to the flesh.

This distinction between the two cities or societies of the good and the wicked appeared more clearly in the time of Eber, the fourth great-grandson after Shem. Until then the whole earth--that is, all human beings--had been of one language and the same speech, namely the Hebrew idiom.

Very many persons descended from the aforesaid fathers, living according to the flesh, gathered together. Their chief was the giant Nimrod, who descended from Ham and is called a mighty hunter--not of wild beasts, but an oppressor and destroyer of human beings. Distinction 6, final section.

They began to build a city with towers reaching to heaven, raising themselves against God from their great pride. When they did not cease, their languages were confounded there through the ministry of angels. To the angels is referred the saying, "Come, and let us go down," and so forth. For they come to God in their thoughts by consulting immutable truth, and descend here below by working according to God's will.

And because the authority of a commander is in his tongue, Augustine says there, pride was condemned so that the person commanding a human being was not understood, since the human being had been unwilling to understand so as to obey God when He commanded.

Thus that conspiracy was dissolved. For just as the greatly multiplied families or nations descending from Noah's three sons were seventy-two, so they were divided into seventy-two different languages and were thence scattered throughout the world. The city, though incomplete, was called Babylon, which is interpreted as confusion. Nimrod reigned there. It was afterward enlarged and magnified by others, but later was subjugated by Ninus, king of the Assyrians, who descended from Shem, Noah's eldest son.

The Hebrew idiom remained in the family of Eber--not indeed in all those begotten from him, but only in that line which extends to Abraham. Nor did it remain in all those begotten from Abraham, for it was not among the Ishmaelites or the Edomites born from Esau, but only among those descending from him through Jacob, namely the people of Israel.

Hence, according to Augustine, it is more commonly said that the Hebrews as a nation were so named from this Eber, with whom the Hebrew idiom remained, as though Hebers with the letter e removed, although some say they were so called from Abraham as though Abraics.

Eber called the son born to him when this division of languages occurred Peleg, which is interpreted as division, from the event that had then just occurred. In the aforesaid house of Eber, the worship of God remained among those belonging to the city of God and living according to the spirit.

According to Vincent, the sons of Shem obtained Asia, the sons of Ham Africa, and the sons of Japheth Europe. Isidore asserts in Book XIV of the Etymologies that the world was divided into three parts, but not equally. Asia reaches from the south through the east to the north. Europe extends from the north to the west, and thence Africa reaches to the south. Thus Asia occupies one half of the world, and Europe and Africa the other half. These were made two because the great sea enters from the Ocean between them and separates them.

§ I: On the Province of Asia

Asia, according to Vincent, is named from a certain woman who held rule in the East among the ancients. This part contains many provinces and regions.

The earthly paradise is a place in the eastern regions, whose name is translated from Greek into Latin as "garden." In Hebrew it is called Eden, which in Latin is interpreted as delights; joined together, the name therefore yields "garden of delights." It is planted with every kind of wood and fruit-bearing tree, and also has the tree of life in the middle. There is neither cold nor heat there, but perpetual temperateness of air. A spring bursting forth from its middle waters the entire grove. It is divided into four rivers, as appears in Genesis 2. After sin, access to this place was barred.

India, which is in Asia, is named from the River Indus, which encloses it on its western side. It stretches directly from the southern sea to the rising of the sun, and from the north to Mount Caucasus. It has many peoples and towns. It also has the island of Taprobane, filled with gems and elephants; Chryse and Argyre, fertile in gold and silver; and Tile, which never lacks the leaves of trees. It has the rivers Ganges, Indus, and Hypanis, which make the Indians illustrious.

The land of India is exceedingly healthful from the breath of the west wind. It harvests crops twice a year. In place of winter it receives the Etesian winds. It produces human beings of a dark color, immense elephants, the beast called the monoceros, that is, the unicorn, the parrot, ebony wood, cinnamon, pepper, and aromatic reed.

It also sends ivory and precious stones: beryls, chrysoprases, adamants, carbuncles, ligures, pearls, and choice pearls, for which the ambition of noble women burns. There are also golden mountains there which it is impossible to approach because of dragons, griffins, and monsters of immense human beings.

Solinus says that India was long believed to be a third part of the earth. Liber Pater entered it, since he was the first of all to triumph after the Indians had been subdued.

There are many other provinces and regions in Asia: Parthia, Assyria, Media, Persia, Mesopotamia, and Babylon. Babylon is the name of the region in which stands the city Babylon, from which so noble a city was named that Chaldea, Assyria, and Mesopotamia sometimes passed under its name.

The province of Arabia is so called, that is, interpreted as sacred, because it possesses incense-bearing fragrances. Myrrh and cinnamon are found there, and the phoenix is born there. It is also called Saba.

Syria contains several provinces: Commagene, Phoenicia, and Palestine, of which Judea is a part, apart from the Saracens and Nabuchaeans. In Phoenicia is Tyre, to which Isaiah speaks.

Judea is named from Judah, namely because it had kings from that tribe who reigned there. It is a region of Palestine which was formerly called Canaan from Ham's son or from the peoples of the Canaanites. When these had been expelled, the Jews possessed it by the Lord's grant. In the middle of Judea is the city Jerusalem. The land is rich in various resources, fertile in crops, illustrious for its waters, and abundant in balsams.

Samaria is a region of Palestine in which the principal city is also called Samaria, where the kings of Israel commonly maintained the seat of the kingdom, as the kings of Judah did in Jerusalem. It lies between the province of Judea and the province of Galilee, and is like the land of Judea in goodness.

Galilee is also a province of Palestine and is twofold: upper and lower. Pentapolis is a region on the border of Arabia and Palestine containing five cities, Sodom and the others, which were consumed by heavenly fire. Nabataea, named from a son of Ishmael, lies between Judea and Arabia.

Egypt, which was formerly called Esseia, afterward received its name from Egyptus, the brother of Danaus, when he reigned there. It is a region unaccustomed to rain from heaven and ignorant of showers. The Nile alone, flowing around it, irrigates it and makes it so abundantly fruitful in its inundation that it fills the world with necessary wares.

Scythia, as also Gothia, is said to have been surnamed from Magog, the son of Japheth. Hyrcania is named from the Hyrcanian forest which lies beneath Scythia. Albania is so named from the color of its people, because human beings there are born with white hair. Armenia is called from Armenus, a companion of Jason the Thessalian, who took Armenia. Iberia is a region of Asia near the Armenian Pontus; plants useful for dyeing grow there. Cappadocia named its own city, which is situated at the head of Syria.

Asia Minor is bounded by Cappadocia on the east and surrounded by sea on its other sides. It has these provinces: Bithynia, Phrygia, Galatia, Lydia, Caria, Pamphylia, Isauria, Lycia, and Cilicia.

Bithynia, at the beginning of Pontus, is named from King Bithynius; it and Greater Phrygia form one region. Nicomedia is a city in it, where Hannibal, while fleeing, breathed out his life after drinking poison. Galatia is named from the ancient peoples of the Gauls by whom it was occupied.

Phrygia is named from Phrygia, daughter of Europa. It is also called Dardania from Dardanus, son of Jupiter. In this region is Troy, which Tros, king of the Trojans, named from himself. There are two Phrygias, greater and lesser. Greater Phrygia contains Smyrna; Lesser Phrygia contains Ilium and Lycaonia.

Pamphylia is joined to Cilicia. Isauria is said to have received its name from the position of the place, because it lies open on every side to the blasts of the winds. Its metropolitan city is Seleucia. Cilicia took its name from a certain Cilix and has Tarsus as the mother of its cities.

Lycia is so named because it is joined to Cilicia on the east. There is that marvelous Mount Chimaera, which exhales fire in nocturnal heats, just as Etna does in Sicily, and Czwikaw in Alemannia.

§ II: On the Other Third Part of the World, Which Is Called Europe

Europe received its name from Europa, daughter of Agenor, king of Libya. Jupiter carried her off from Africa and brought her to Crete, and named the third part of the world from her. Europe begins from the River Tanais, descending westward along the northern Ocean as far as the borders of Spain. Its eastern and southern part rises from Pontus, is joined throughout to the sea, and ends in the islands of Gades.

The first region of Europe is Lower Scythia, which, beginning from the Maeotian marshes, extends between the Danube and the northern Ocean as far as Germany. Because of the barbarous peoples by whom it is inhabited, this land is generally called Barbaria. Its first part is Alania; after it comes Dacia, where Gothia is also found; then Germany, where the Suebi inhabited the greater part.

Germany, after Lower Scythia, is enclosed and bounded by the Danube, the River Rhine, and the Ocean. It is a land rich in men and in numerous and immense peoples; hence, from its fertility in generating peoples, it is called Germany. It sends forth the gems crystal and amber. There are two Germanies: the upper near the northern Ocean, and the lower around the Rhine.

The provinces which the Danube encloses from the barbarian region to the Mediterranean Sea are these. First is Moesia, named from the yield of harvests because of its abundance. After Moesia is Pannonia, after which comes Rhaetia, fertile in crops. It receives Belgian Gaul, and then Thrace.

Tiras, a son of Japheth, is said to have given his name to Thrace. Others have said Thrace was named from the savagery of its inhabitants. Constantinople lies opposite it on the east, and Macedonia adjoins it on the west. The peoples of various nations once inhabited this region: Moesi, Getae, Sarmatians, Scythians, and other nations.

Greece is named from King Graecus, who inhabited that entire region. The provinces of Greece, beginning from the west, are Dalmatia, then Epirus, then Hellas, then Thessaly, then Macedonia, then Achaia, and two in the sea, Crete and the Cyclades. Illyricum broadly comprises all Greece, and Dalmatia is said to be named from Delmis, the greatest city of that province.

Epirus is said to be named from Pyrrhus, son of Achilles. A part of it is Chaonia, which was formerly called Molossia from Molossus, the son whom Pyrrhus had by Andromache.

Hellas is named from King Hellen, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, from whom the Greeks were first called Hellenes. It is also Attica; it is true Greece, where stood Athens, the mother of letters and nurse of philosophers, than which Greece had nothing more illustrious or noble.

There are two provinces of Hellas. The first is Boeotia, so called from an ox. There Thebes was built, in which civil wars once raged, and where Apollo and that elder Theban Hercules were born. The Peloponnese, the second part of Hellas, was named from Pelops, king of Attica.

Thessaly is named from King Thessalus. There are many rivers and towns in Thessaly, among which Thessalonica is chief. There is also Mount Parnassus, once consecrated to Apollo. In Thessaly, which was also the homeland of Achilles, gold solidi were first made, and the practice of taming horses was first invented.

Macedonia received its name from Macedon, a grandson of Deucalion through his mother, after he acquired rule there. It was formerly called Emathia. It borders Moesia to the north, was the homeland of Alexander the Great, and is a region exceedingly rich in veins of gold and silver. Mount Olympus is there and is so high that neither winds nor clouds are felt at its summit.

Both the city and the province of Achaia are named from King Achaëus. It is almost an island, and its capital is Corinth, the glory of Greece. Arcadia is a gulf of Achaia. It is also Sicyonia, named from King Sicyon, from whom the kingdom of the Sicyonians is named. It possesses the stone asbestos, which, once kindled, is never extinguished.

Pannonia is named from the Apennine Alps, by which it is separated from Italy; it is a strong region, favored in soil. Histria was named by the River Hister, which flows into that land. The Hister is the Danube, and it has Pannonia to its north.

Italy, once occupied by Greek peoples, was called Magna Graecia. Then from the name of King Saturn it was called Saturnia and soon Latium, because Saturn, driven from his seat by Jupiter, lay hidden there. Finally it was named from Italus, king of the Sicilians, who reigned there. It is a land most beautiful and fertile in all things, most pleasing for the abundance of pasture.

It has the lakes Venatus, Alumnus, and Lucernus; the rivers Eridanus and Tiber; and Baiae, warm with springs. It produces the gems Sericum, coral, and ligure, and also the serpent called the boa.

Italy and Spain are called Hesperiae because people sail by the evening star, called hesperus in Greek, both to Italy and to Spain. They are distinguished in this way: if you say Hesperia alone, you signify Italy; if you add "farthest," you signify Spain, which lies at the boundary of the west.

Tuscia is a part of Italy, and Umbria a part of Tuscia. Umbria, as the histories relate, is so called because it survived the rains at the time of the watery destruction. It is situated in the ridges of the Apennine mountain in the part of Italy toward the south.

Etruria is a part of Italy, so called because its boundaries extended to the banks of the Tiber. The boundaries of all Rome once occupied only one bank of the Tiber, while Tuscia occupied the other. Tuscia is named from the frequency of sacrifice and incense. They also say that haruspicy was invented there.

Apulia is where Brundisium stands, which the Aetolians who followed Diomedes as leader founded. Campania, a province of Italy, has lands that bloom in every winter and summer. The sun there is mild, the temperature pleasant, and the air pure and gentle.

Gaul is named from the whiteness of its people, for gala in Greek is called milk in Latin. The mountains and severity of the sky exclude the heat of the sun from that region, with the result that the whiteness of the people is not colored. The ridges of the Alps guard it on the east; the Ocean encloses it on the west; the steep Pyrenees on the south; and the waters of the Rhine and Germany on the north. Its beginning is Belgica and its end Aquitania.

The region is rich in soil and pasture, suited to the life of animals. It is watered by rivers and springs and drenched by two great rivers, the Rhine and the Rhône. Belgae is a city of Gaul from which the province Belgica is named. Cisalpine means this side of the Alps, and Transalpine beyond the Alps. Reatina is so called because it is near the Rhine. Aquitania is named from the slanting waters of the River Loire.

Spain was first called Iberia from the River Iberus and afterward Hispania from Hispanus. It is also the true Hesperia, named from the western star Hesperus. It lies between Gaul and Africa, bounded by the Pyrenees Mountains to the north and enclosed by sea on every other side. With an equable and healthful climate, it is fertile in every kind of crop and exceedingly rich in gems and metals. The great rivers Baetis, Mineus, Iberus, and Tagus flow through it.

It has six provinces: Tarraconensis, Carthaginensis, Bastitania, Galicia, Baetica, and, across the straits in the region of Africa, Tingitana. There are two Spains, nearer and farther.

§ III: On Africa, the Other Third Part of the World

Some think that Africa is so named as though a frigore, "without cold," because it is suited to the climate of the sun and lacks the horror of cold. Others say that Africa is named from Afer, one of Abraham's descendants born from Keturah.

It begins from the borders of Egypt and, proceeding near the south through Ethiopia, reaches Mount Atlas. On its northern side it is enclosed continuously by the Mediterranean Sea. It has the provinces Libya, Cyrenaica, Pentapolis, Tripolis, Byzacium, Carthage, Numidia, Mauretania, Tingitana, and, around the sun's heat, Ethiopia.

Libya Cyrenaica is the first part of Africa and is named from the metropolitan city Cyrene, which lies within its borders. Pentapolis is so called from the five great cities existing there, among which are Ptolemais and Berenice, so named from their rulers. Getulia is a part of inland Africa.

Mauretania is named from mauros, which is a Greek word sounding "black" in Latin; hence it is named from the dark color of the people who inhabit it. Tingitana is named from Tingis, the metropolitan city of that province. This region produces wild beasts, apes, dragons, ostriches, and formerly elephants; now India alone brings them forth.

The Garamantes are named from the town Garama situated there. There is a spring there which is cold in the heat of day and warm in the cold of night.

Ethiopia is named from the color of the peoples whom proximity to the sun scorches. There is perpetual heat there, for whatever is there lies under the southern cardinal point. It has very many peoples of diverse countenance and monstrous appearance, and is filled with a multitude of horrible wild beasts and serpents. The rhinoceros and camelopard are there, as are the basilisk and immense dragons, from whose brains gems are extracted. Hyacinths and chrysoprases are found there, and cinnamon is gathered.

There are two Ethiopias: one around the rising of the sun, the other around its setting in Mauretania.

Outside the three parts of the world there is a fourth part across the inner Ocean, unknown to us because of the sun's heat. At its boundaries antipodes are fabulously said to dwell.

§ IV: On Islands

Islands are so called because they are situated in salo, that is, in the sea. The most famous and largest of them should be set forth.

Britain is an island of the Ocean surrounded by the sea spread throughout the whole world. It is surnamed from the name of its people. It lies opposite the region of Gaul and within sight of Spain. Its circuit is forty-eight times seventy-five thousand. There are many great rivers in it, hot springs, and a large and varied abundance of metals. Jet stone and very many pearls are there. It is also called and known as England.

Thanatos is an island of the Ocean in the Gallic strait, separated from Britain by a channel of varying width. Thule is the farthest island of the Ocean.

Tylos is an island of India, according to Solinus. It bears palms, olives, and vines. It surpasses all lands in this one marvel: every tree on it never lacks leaves. Mount Caucasus is there, penetrating the greatest part of the world with continuous ridges, and pepper trees there grow in the likeness of juniper.

The Orkney Islands, situated in the Ocean near Britain, number twenty-three [read: thirty-three], of which twenty are deserted and thirteen inhabited. Scotia, the same as Hibernia, is an island near Britain, narrower in extent of lands but more fruitful in position. It stretches from Africa toward the north. There is no snake there, no bee, and a bird is rare.

Gades is an island situated at the end of the province of Baetica, which separates Europe from Africa and contains the Pillars of Hercules.

The Fortunate Islands signify by this name that they bear every good, as though they were happy and blessed in abundance of fruits. Hence the error of the gentiles and the worldly songs of poets, because of the fertility of the soil, thought them paradise. The first of these is Membriona, the second Minona, the third Capraria, the fourth Teode, and another Vinaria. They lie in the Ocean opposite Mauretania.

The Gorgades are islands of the Ocean. Likewise the Hesperides, Chryse, Argyre, and Taprobane are islands; all these are islands of the Ocean.

There are also other islands situated in the great sea from the Hellespont to the Gorgades. First is Cyprus, an island which received its name from the cyprum found there. It is also Paphos, consecrated to Venus and once famous for wealth, chiefly of bronze. For the first discovery and use of this metal occurred there.

Crete, a part of Greece, is a great island opposite the Peloponnese. Jupiter was hidden and reared there. It was once noble for a hundred cities and hence was called Centopolis. It first became famous for oars and arrows, first established laws in writing, first taught cavalry formations, and the study of music with spondees and dactyls began there.

It abounds in goats but lacks deer, and nowhere produces wolves, foxes, or other harmful wild beasts. There is no serpent and no owl, and if one is found, it immediately dies. It is abundant in vines and trees. The herb dittany grows there. It produces venomous spiders.

Abydos is an island of Europe situated upon the Hellespont. Cos is an island adjoining the province of Attica, where the physician Hippocrates was born. As Varro bears witness, it was the first to become famous for the craft of wool-working for the adornment of women.

Some Greeks think the Cyclades islands are so called because, although cast at rather long distances from Delos in a circle, they are nevertheless situated around Delos; for the Greeks call a circle cyclos. Others think they are called Cyclades not because they are arranged in a circle but because of the reefs surrounding them.

They are situated in the Hellespont between the Aegean and Malean seas and are also surrounded by the Myrtoan Sea. They are fifty-three in all. Their metropolis is Rhodes.

Delos is an island situated in the middle of the Cyclades. It is reported to be called Delos because, after the Flood in the times of Ogyges, when continuous night had overshadowed the world for many months, before all other lands it was illuminated by the rays of the sun. It received its name because it was the first made manifest to sight, for the Greeks call the manifest delon.

It is also Ortygia, where the birds called quails were first seen, which the Greeks call ortygias. On this island Latona gave birth to Apollo and Diana. Both the city and the island are called Delos.

Rhodes is the chief of the Cyclades. Carpathos is another of the Cyclades. Cythera is another, where Venus arose. Icaria is another.

The island Chios is named in the Syrian language because mastic is produced there. Samos is an island in the Aegean Sea, where Juno was born. From it came the Samian Sibyl and Pythagoras of Samos, by whom the name of philosophy was invented. Earthen vessels are said to have been first discovered on this island.

Sicily was called Sicania from King Sicanus, then Sicily from Siculus, the brother of Italus. It was formerly called Trinacria because of its three capes or promontories: Pelorus, Pachynum, and Lilybaeum. It is separated from Italy by a narrow strait and looks toward the African Sea. It is fruitful in lands and full of winds and sulfur; hence there the fires of Mount Etna stand forth.

In its strait are Scylla and Charybdis, by which ships are either swallowed or dashed to pieces. It was once the homeland of the Cyclopes and afterward the nurse of tyrants. Syracuse is the chief of its cities. Comedy was first invented on this island. Its sea produces coral, and the River Achates gives the stone agate. Its whole circuit is enclosed by three thousand stadia.

The Aeolian Islands of Sicily are named from Aeolus, son of Hippotes, whom the poets imagined to have been king of the winds. But, as Varro says, he was ruler of those islands, and because from their clouds and smoke he predicted future blasts of wind, he appeared to the unskilled to have restrained the winds by his own power. The same islands are also called Vulcanian because they burn like Etna itself. There are nine, possessing their own names, of which the first is Lipari, the second Thrasia, and so forth.

Sardus, son of Hercules, set out from Libya with a great multitude, occupied Sardinia, and gave the island its name from his own. It lies in the African Sea, one hundred thousand in length and forty thousand in breadth. Neither serpent nor wolf is born there. Sardinia has hot springs that provide healing for the sick but blindness for thieves if, after an oath has been given, they touch its waters.

The island Corsica was founded by Ligurian inhabitants, who named it from the name of their leader. It is divided from Sardinia by a strait twenty thousand wide and lies within sight of Italy.

Ebusus is an island of Spain. The Balearic Islands are also two islands of Spain. Among them the use of slings by which stones are cast was first invented. There are many other islands, because the inhabited ones are not numbered here.

§ V: Returning to the Genealogy of Shem, Son of Noah, Down to the Third Age of the World, Which Begins with Abraham

Shem begot Arphaxad two years after the Flood, when he himself was one hundred years old. Arphaxad, when he was thirty-five years old, begot Salah. Salah, in the thirtieth year of his age, begot Eber. Eber, in the thirty-fourth year of his life, begot Peleg. Peleg, in his thirtieth year, begot Reu. Reu, after thirty-two years from his birth, begot Serug. Serug, in the thirtieth year of his life, begot Nahor. Nahor, in the twenty-ninth year of his life, begot Terah. Terah, after seventy years, begot Abram, Nahor, and Haran.

These ten successively named men lived for many years after the generation of the aforesaid persons, from whom the genealogy of Christ is woven because He descended from them. They begot many other sons, from whom descended diverse peoples and nations spread throughout the world.

From Haran, son of Terah and brother of Abraham and Nahor, were born Lot and the women Iscah and Milcah.

Nahor married his niece Milcah, and Abram married his niece Iscah, who was also called Sarah. At that time, indeed, it was lawful to take such blood relations as wives. Haran, their father, died in Ur of the Chaldeans while his own father Terah was still alive. All this is in Genesis 11, where it is also said that Terah took Abram, his brother's son Lot, and Sarah, and they departed from Chaldea and came to dwell in Haran, which is in Mesopotamia of Syria. There Terah, Abram's father, died when Terah himself was 205 years old.

The Hebrews say that Haran's death happened in this way. Since the peoples of Chaldea worshiped fire as a god, while Terah and his sons worshiped the true God and asserted that fire was not God, those people cast them into the fire to test the power of their god--namely, fire--so that they might be burned. But they passed through the fire and escaped unharmed. Haran, however, because he failed in faith when he was cast into the fire with the others, was burned by it. This is found in Cause 35, question 1, Cum igitur, in the following section and in the gloss there.

Under the aforesaid Reu, also called Ragau, the kingdom of the Scythians arose. Although it is most ancient, it is nevertheless not counted among the four principal kingdoms of the world about which Daniel prophesied, because it belonged to barbarians. As Justin says in Book II, the men of the Scythians held the kingdoms of the Parthians and Bactrians, while their women held the kingdoms of the Amazons. For a long time there was a dispute between the Scythians and the Egyptians concerning the antiquity of their race, but the Scythians were judged the more ancient.

The same author relates that certain peoples came in a great multitude into the region of Cappadocia and were killed there by treachery. When their husbands had been killed, the wives who remained gathered together and formed an army. Having intercourse with neighboring peoples, they killed the males who were born but preserved the female children. They accustomed these girls not to wool-working but to arms, horses, and hunting, cauterizing the right breasts of the infants so that the discharge of arrows would not be impeded. They had two queens, Margesita and Lampedo, who defended their borders by turns; after subduing the greater part of Europe, they occupied Asia.

Under Reu, or Ragau, the kingdom of Egypt also arose, and it endured until Octavian, according to the chronicles of Eusebius. From the time of Abraham's birth the Thebans reigned over the Egyptians for 190 years. Then the shepherds, who are the Pharaohs, reigned for 103 years. Afterward, in the eighteenth Diospolitan dynasty, its first king, who was called Amosis, reigned for twenty-five years, and Joseph's leadership began in the ninety-second year. Then other dynasts succeeded them; Eusebius gives their names and the lengths of their reigns down to the eighteenth. After them the Egyptians began to employ their own emperors and had five such rulers in succession. Then the Diopolitan dynasts ruled over them for 177 years. There were twenty-seven who reigned successively, whose names and lengths of reign Eusebius likewise gives. When these were completed, Cambyzes, who is also called Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Persians, obtained the kingdom. Thus the kingdom of the Egyptians ended until the time of Artaxerxes, who is also Ahasuerus.

§ VI

Under Nahor, son of Serug, two kingdoms arose: that of the Assyrians and that of the Sicyonians. Belus reigned in the former and Aegialeus in the latter, as Bede says in his chronicle.

According to Eusebius, the first king of the Assyrians was Ninus, son of Belus, who reigned for fifty-two years; Abraham was born in the forty-second year of his reign. After him Semiramis, the wife of Ninus, reigned for forty-two years. After her, Zames, son of Ninus and Semiramis, reigned for thirty-eight years. Then others reigned successively, whose names and lengths of reign Eusebius describes, down to the thirty-sixth, who was called Sardanapalus. He was wholly given over to wantonness and was effeminate. Then Arbaces the Mede destroyed the kingdom of the Assyrians and transferred the realm to the Medes, namely in the fourth year of Azariah, king of Judah. All the years of the Assyrian kingdom, from the first year of Ninus to this last king, are reckoned as 1,240.

The kingdom of the Sicyonians, which likewise began under Nahor, endured, according to Helinand, until the twenty-ninth year of Eli the priest. There were twenty-six kings in it, from the first, called Aegialeus, to the last, Zeuxippus. Helinand gives the names of those who reigned successively and the lengths of their reigns. All their years collected together make 942. After them were appointed the priests of Carni, who presided over the offering of flesh for thirty-three years.

§ VII: Returning to Ninus

Belus, the father of Ninus and a Nimrodite king of Babylon, entered Assyria, as the Master says in the Scholastic History, but obtained little of it. After his death his son Ninus obtained all Assyria and enlarged the city in which the capital of the kingdom stood until it was a journey of three days in extent. From his own name he called it Nineveh. Hence some histories say that the kingdom of the Assyrians began with Belus and others with Ninus. The first is true with respect to the kingdom's beginning, the second with respect to its enlargement.

This Ninus is said to have defeated Ham, the son of Noah, who was still alive and was reigning in Bathera. He was called Zoroaster, the inventor of the art of magic, and he also invented the seven liberal arts. He wrote them on fourteen columns, seven of bronze and seven of brick, against both kinds of flood, namely those of fire and water. But Ninus burned his books.

Many things are said about this Zoroaster. Augustine says in Book XXI of The City of God that it is reported of Zoroaster that he alone laughed when born, although all others weep. That monstrous laughter portended nothing good, for although he was the inventor of the magical arts, he was defeated by Ninus, king of the Assyrians, when Ninus fought against the Bactrians.

Clement says in the Itinerary that Zoroaster wished to appear a god and, directing himself intently toward the stars, produced what seemed to be sparks from them so that he might draw the ignorant into astonishment at the marvel. At length he was consumed by the very demon whom he importunately frequented. They built him a tomb as though he had been a friend of God carried up to heaven in the vehicle of a thunderbolt. Hence after death he also obtained this name, Zoroaster, as though "living star." Aristotle writes that twenty times one hundred verses [read: twenty times one hundred thousand verses] were composed by Zoroaster. As Helinand relates, Helinand himself wonders how Aristotle saw his books when Ninus had burned them.

It must also be noted that idols and idolatry arose from this Ninus in the following manner. When Belus died, Ninus wished an image of his father to be sculpted as a consolation for his grief. He showed it such great reverence that he pardoned any guilty persons who fled to it, whatever crime they had committed. For this reason the people of that kingdom began to render divine honors to the image, by veneration of which they were delivered from punishment. Following his example, very many dedicated images to their deceased loved ones. Thus, just as the other idols drew their origin from the idol of Belus, so the general name for idols came from his name. Just as that idol was called Belus by the Assyrians, so other nations named their idols according to their own language. Hence some called them Bel, others Balaim, others Baal, others Belphegor, and others Beelzebub. This is found in the Scholastic Histories.

As Isidore writes in Book VIII of the Etymologies, those whom the pagans assert to be gods are shown to have once been human beings. In accordance with the life and deeds of each, they began to be worshiped among their own peoples after death: Isis among the Egyptians, Jupiter among the Cretans, Juba among the Moors, Faunus among the Latins, and Quirinus among the Romans. In the same manner Minerva was worshiped at Athens, Juno at Samos, Venus at Paphos, Vulcan at Leunos, Liber at Naxos, and Apollo at Delos. Poets also contributed to their praises and, in poems they composed, raised them into heaven. Thus Isidore.

Generally, these gods who were worshiped were people either powerful in dominion or industrious in discovering sciences or arts. As is found in the Book of Wisdom, three things provoked people to such worship of images: excessive affection toward the dead; fear and flattery toward kings; and the diligence of craftsmen in sculpting and painting images. But "let him who glories glory truly in this: to understand and know me," says the Lord through Jeremiah. Solomon also says in the Book of Wisdom, "Vain are all people in whom there is no knowledge of God," that is, no true knowledge.

After Ninus died, his wife Semiramis, a most arrogant and immodest woman, reigned. As Valerius Maximus relates, while she was occupied with arranging her hair, word was brought to her that Babylon, over which she ruled, had revolted. With one side of her hair still loose, she hurried to conquer it, and did not restore the beauty of her hair to order until she had brought so great a city back under her power. Her statue was erected there in that very posture.

Orosius says of her in Book I: Semiramis, burning with lust and thirsting for blood, killed all those with whom she had delighted in intercourse. At last, after a son conceived in shame had been impiously exposed and the incest became known, she covered private disgrace with public crime. She commanded that, with no reverence for nature observed between parents and children in seeking marriages, whatever pleased anyone should be made lawful. According to Justin, when she sought intercourse with her son, she was killed by him.

This second age began at the Flood and ends with Abraham. Orosius says thus in the preface to his book On the Misery of the World: From Adam to King Ninus, when Abraham was born, there are 3,184 years, which have either been omitted or ignored by all historians. From Ninus to the birth of Christ under Augustus, namely Octavian, there are 2,015 years, in which writers and historians have worn away all their leisure upon affairs among themselves.

There are, however, different opinions about how long this second age endured. According to the text of Genesis that follows Jerome's translation, 292 years elapsed from the Flood to the birth of Abraham. The Hebrews and Eusebius hold this. But according to the seventy interpreters, 940 years elapsed. Bede follows this opinion, and Orosius also seems to follow it.

Second Title: On the Third Age of the World

Chapter One

Since the third age begins with Abraham, who is called the father of the faithful living spiritually according to the spirit, just as he was the father of the carnal Jews, something must first be said generally in his commendation for imitation before we descend to his particular deeds.

Obedience was commended to our first parents in the commandment, as Augustine says in Book XIV of The City of God, chapters 12 and 13. This virtue is in a certain way the mother of all virtues in a rational creature and their guardian, for it was said to him, "You shall not eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil." They would not have arrived at transgression and disobedience to this command unless a hidden pride had first preceded it.

In the same way, so that Abraham might advance in virtue and his perfection might become known to the whole world for imitation, a hard obedience was commanded of him, not an easy one such as was commanded to the first-formed man, who experienced no inclination toward evil. Thus all posterity might receive an example in Abraham: namely, that he should sacrifice his son, circumcise himself at one hundred years of age, and, before these things, depart from his own land when already old and wander as a pilgrim. He obeyed in everything, grounded in humility. Hence, speaking to the Lord, he said, "I shall speak to my Lord, although I am dust and ashes." Those who live according to the spirit, obeying God, imitate Abraham; those who live according to the flesh--that is, viciously--imitate the disobedient Adam.

Augustine says there: No nature could be depraved by vice unless it were made from nothing. That it is a nature it has from the fact that it was made by God; but that it falls away from what it comes from the fact that it was made from nothing. Man did not so fall away that he became altogether nothing, but, inclined toward himself, he became less than he was when he adhered to Him who supremely is. Therefore, to abandon God and to exist in oneself--that is, to please oneself--is not yet to be nothing, but to approach nothing. Hence the proud, according to the Holy Scriptures, are called by another name, "self-pleasers."

It is good to have the heart lifted up, yet not toward oneself, which is pride, but toward God, which is obedience and cannot belong to any but the humble. There is therefore something in humility, in a marvelous manner, that raises the heart; and there is something in pride that lowers the heart. This seems contradictory, as though elevation were downward and humility upward. But devout humility makes one subject to a superior. Nothing is higher than God; therefore humility, which makes one nearest to God, exalts. Pride, however, which is a vice, rejects subjection by that very fact and falls away from Him than whom nothing can be higher. Consequently it will be lower, and what is written comes to pass: "You cast them down while they were lifted up." For to be raised up in oneself is to be cast down.

For this reason humility is now especially commended in the City of God and to the City of God while it journeys in this world, and it is most especially preached in its king, who is Christ. The sacred writings teach that the vice of pride, contrary to this virtue, belongs to His adversary, who is the devil. Thus Augustine there.

Pride is found in the devil's members, who sometimes are even humbled here, as is evident in Pharaoh. But if the elect at times grow proud for an hour and do not perceive it, they are permitted to fall into some manifest defect so that they may recognize themselves and return. Hence Augustine says in the same Book XIV, chapter 13: "I dare to say that it is useful for the proud to fall into some open and manifest sin, by which they may become displeasing to themselves, since by pleasing themselves they had already fallen." Peter was more healthfully displeasing to himself when he wept than pleasing to himself when he presumed. Thus Augustine.

Therefore, those who conduct themselves according to the spirit--that is, according to the will of God--imitate Abraham by spiritually departing from their own land, that is, from disordered affection for earthly things; from their kindred, that is, from the concupiscence of the flesh and the practice of the passions; and from the house of their father, the devil, which is the pride of life. For the first father whom we have when born into the world is the devil, since we are born children of wrath.

They come into the promised land through hope, into eternal or heavenly blessedness, and there are blessed by God through grace and multiplied in good works. They withdraw from the wicked by dissent, that is, by not following them in evil. But the reprobate, who live according to the flesh and do not belong to the city of Jerusalem but to the confusion of Babylon, remain in Chaldea worshiping fire--that is, holding concupiscence and covetousness as the highest good. Babylon is at last laid waste, because the world will perish, and its concupiscence with it.

When the Lord promised Abraham that not his servant Eliezer but a son to be born to him would be his heir and that his seed would possess that land, he said to the Lord, "How shall I know this?" and so forth. This statement did not proceed from a defect of faith or from doubt, since it is written there, "Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him as justice"; rather, he asked that some likeness be added to the thing he believed by which he might recognize its manner, says Augustine in Book XVI of The City of God, chapter 24.

Augustine also expounds figuratively the likeness of the things shown to Abraham. The heifer signifies that Jewish people placed under the yoke of the law. The goat signifies the same people destined to become sinful, and the ram that same people destined also to reign. These animals are therefore said to be three years old because there are three notable divisions of time: from Adam to Noah, from Noah to Abraham, and from Abraham to David, who, after Saul had been rejected, was the first established by the Lord's will in the kingdom of the Israelite people. In this third order, extending from Abraham to David and constituting the third age, that people grew to maturity.

Just as the carnal members of that people are signified by the three animals, so the turtledove and dove signify the spiritual persons within that people. Hence it is said, "But he did not divide the birds," because carnal people are divided among themselves, whereas spiritual people are in no way divided--whether they withdraw from busy occupations, like the turtledove, or dwell among them, like the dove. Yet each bird is simple and harmless. This signifies that even among that Israelite people, to whom the land was to be given, there would be undivided children of the promise and heirs of the kingdom who would remain in eternal felicity.

The birds descending upon the divided bodies signify not something good but the spirits of the air, seeking a certain food of their own from the divisions of carnal people. Abraham's driving them away signifies that even amid those divisions of the carnal, true believers will persevere to the end.

The terror that fell upon Abraham around sunset, together with a great and darksome fear, signifies that near the end of this world a great disturbance and tribulation will come upon the faithful. Of this the Lord says in the Gospel, namely Matthew 14: "There shall then be a great tribulation, such as has not been from the beginning of the world." When it is said below that, as the sun was now setting, a flame appeared, together with a smoking furnace and lamps of fire that passed through the midst of those divided pieces, it signifies that at the end of the world carnal people are to be judged by fire.

Just as the affliction of the City of God, such as has never been before, which is expected under Antichrist, is signified by Abraham's darksome fear around sunset, with the end of the world already approaching, so at sunset--that is, at the very end of the world--the day of judgment is signified by this fire. It will separate carnal people, some to be saved through fire and some to be damned in fire.

As for what was said to Abraham, "Know beforehand that your seed shall be a stranger in a land not its own, and they shall reduce it to servitude and afflict it for four hundred years," this was prophesied concerning the people of Israel, who were to serve in Egypt. It does not mean that the people would remain in servitude under the afflicting Egyptians for four hundred years, since they were afflicted in Egypt for not even two hundred years. Rather, within those four hundred years what was to happen was foretold.

Similarly, it is written of Terah, Abraham's father, "The days of Terah in Haran were 205 years," not because all those years were spent there, but because they were completed there after the greater part had already passed in Ur of the Chaldeans. So too they are said to be afflicted in Egypt for four hundred years, not because that entire number of four hundred was spent in Egypt, but because it was completed there. This number of four hundred begins to be counted either from the birth of Isaac, on account of Abraham's seed, or from the beginning of this vision, which could have occurred some few years before.

§ I

The third age, therefore, begins with the birth of Abraham and lasts until David: 292 years according to the Hebrews, but 1,242 according to the seventy interpreters.

Abraham, having been led by his father Terah out of Ur of the Chaldeans, came to Haran. While he was dwelling there the Lord commanded him, saying, "Go forth from your land and from your kindred and from the house of your father, and come into the land that I shall show you," and so forth. Obedient to the Lord, he departed from Haran with his household and his nephew Lot when he was seventy-five years old, and entered the land of Canaan. The Lord appeared to him, saying, "To your seed I shall give this land," and Abraham built an altar there to the Lord.

Clement says of him in Book I: While all others were in error, Abraham, since he was an astrologer by art, was able from the reason and order of the stars to recognize the Creator; he understood that all things were governed by His providence. Hence an angel appeared to him in a vision and instructed him more fully concerning those things that he had begun to perceive. Thus Clement.

When a famine arose, Abraham went down into Egypt. Lest the Egyptians kill him so that after his death they could take Sarah as a wife because of her beauty, Abraham said that Sarah was his sister. Hence she was presented to Pharaoh so that he might take her as a wife. But the Lord struck Pharaoh with plagues, and when the cause was revealed to him he restored Sarah untouched to Abraham, as Genesis 12 relates.

In this deed Abraham did not tell a lie but reasonably concealed the truth by saying that she was his sister. At that time nieces were also customarily called sisters. In this matter Abraham gave us instruction that no one should presume to tempt his God. While one has something that one can do for oneself by wholesome counsel, one should not expect a miraculous result from God. He did what he could, says Augustine, namely by concealing the truth; what he could not do, he entrusted to God, namely by committing his wife's chastity to Him. Neither faith nor hope failed him. This is in Cause 22, question 2, Quaeritur.

Abraham departed from Egypt with his household and Lot and returned to dwell where he had stayed before, namely between Bethel and Ai. Since Abraham and Lot had so much wealth and so many flocks that the land could not contain them, their shepherds--that is, those of Abraham and Lot--quarreled with one another, according to Genesis 13. To avoid quarrels and disputes between them thereafter, Abraham and Lot separated from one another. Abraham gave Lot the choice of selecting whatever place of habitation pleased him, while Abraham himself would take the other place. Lot went to dwell in Sodom, but Abraham dwelt in the land of Canaan. There the Lord appeared to him again, promising that land to his seed and that He would multiply his seed like the dust of the earth.

Augustine says in Book XVI, chapter 2 of The City of God, that when a quarrel arose between the shepherds of the two men, they wished to avoid the fighting discord of their households. Because such are human affairs, some quarrel could thereby have arisen even between Abraham and Lot themselves. Abraham, although the elder, gave Lot the choice of selecting one of the two places proposed. Perhaps from this arose the peaceful custom among people that, when something earthly is to be divided, the elder divides and the younger chooses.

§ II

Abraham returned from the slaughter of the four kings who had fought against five kings--namely, the kings of Sodom and of the other four cities that were afterward consumed by fire and sulfur. Having defeated them, the four kings had carried away much spoil and the people of those cities, including Lot, who dwelt in Sodom, as Genesis 14 relates.

When the spoil had been wrested from them and Lot freed, Melchizedek, king of Salem and priest of the Most High God, met Abraham. Melchizedek himself offered Abraham bread and wine and blessed him, while Abraham gave him tithes from everything. When the king of Sodom came to meet Abraham and offered him everything that had been recovered except the persons, Abraham was willing to accept nothing except the shares belonging to those who had aided him in the war. Here instruction or teaching is given that it is lawful to assist one's own people when they are unjustly oppressed in war, as stated in Cause 23, question 3, section 2.

Ambrose says that, although the spoil had come under the victor's power, Abraham teaches military discipline by preserving everything for the king. He nevertheless affirms that those who had been with him as auxiliaries should receive shares of the profit as a reward for their labor. Because Abraham himself did not seek a reward for himself from man, he received one from God, as is evident from the promise God made to him after this, in Cause 23, question 5, Dicat. Here also is a figure of Christ, the high priest, instituting the sacrament under the species of bread and wine and offering it to the one who has victory over his enemies.

§ III

The word of the Lord came to Abraham in a vision, promising him that his steward Eliezer would not be his heir, as Abraham was piously complaining, but that his own son would be. The Lord also promised that He would multiply Abraham's seed like the innumerable stars of heaven, and Abraham believed.

When Abraham asked how he could know that his seed would possess that promised land, the Lord commanded him to take a three-year-old heifer, a three-year-old goat, a ram of three years, a turtledove, and a dove, and from these to make a sacrifice to God. When the sun was setting and Abraham had fallen asleep, it was said to him in a vision that his seed would be a stranger in a land not its own and would be subjected to servitude for four hundred years; but in the fourth generation they would return to the place where Abraham then was and would possess that land, in which there were nine peoples. This is an obscure and marvelous teaching about the mystery of the Incarnation, but it is not to be explained here.

When Sarah was barren, she gave Abraham permission to go in to the maidservant Hagar so that at least from her he might have children. When this had been done, Hagar, seeing that she had conceived, despised her mistress Sarah. When Sarah afflicted her for her pride, Hagar took flight into the desert, as Genesis 16 relates. An angel appeared to her, commanding her to return and submit to her mistress. He signified that she would bear a son whom she should call Ishmael, who would be a wild man: his hand would be against all, and the hands of all against him. Ishmael was therefore born from Hagar when Abraham was eighty-six years old, as is evident in Genesis 16. From Hagar descended the Saracens, or Hagarenes.

Here it must be noted that Abraham knew the maidservant Hagar not fornicatorily but with marital affection, that is, as a wife. At this point a distinction must be made concerning the plurality of wives whom Abraham, Jacob, and certain others had in the Old Testament. There are two ways of excusing them.

One is easy and expedient: it was never lawful for anyone to have several wives at the same time except by a special revelation or dispensation of the Holy Spirit. This is touched upon in the title On Divorce, Gaudemus. Because these patriarchs, and likewise certain others, are believed to have been dispensed by God in this matter, they did not sin.

The dispensation was granted them for two reasons. The first was so that the people of God, among whom was the worship of the true God, might be multiplied the more. For when all other nations had declined into idolatry, true knowledge of God remained only in the household of Abraham and the patriarchs who followed. Thus the worship of God was multiplied through carnal propagation.

The other reason was figurative. Hence Augustine says that not only the speech but also the life of those men was prophetic, and that the whole great kingdom of the Hebrews was a prophet, because it was the prophet of a certain great reality. Abraham's having two wives signified that Christ would join to Himself through faith both the Gentile and the Jewish nation. Jacob's having four wives signified that Christ would unite to Himself through love the nations converted from east and west, north and south. Or it signified that through the ministers of baptism are born good people from evil, evil from good, good from good, and evil from evil, as Augustine notes in Cause 32, question 4, Recurrat.

The other way of speaking is more difficult: before the law it was not prohibited by any divine, natural, or customary law to take several wives, provided this was done for the sake of multiplying offspring and not for satisfying lust. Because the patriarchs did so with this intention, namely to propagate offspring, they did not sin. Hence Augustine says: "Jacob is reproached for his four wives. When it was the custom"--that is, an accepted and lawful act--"it was not a crime," in Cause 22, question 4, Obiciuntur. Lamech, however, is not excused from adultery, because he is said to have had two wives out of lust. This matter is treated more fully below in the third part, in the title on the sacraments, in the chapter on marriage.

§ IV: Returning to the Deeds of Abraham

The Lord appeared to Abraham when he was ninety-nine years old and promised him that in that year a son would be born to him from Sarah, whom he should call Isaac. He promised to multiply his seed, so that kings would also arise from him. He gave him the name Abraham, meaning "father of many nations," whereas before he had been called Abram; and He commanded that his wife, previously called Sarai, be called Sarah. He also promised to multiply his son Ishmael, so that twelve leaders would come forth from him.

The Lord commanded that every male in Abraham's household be circumcised as a covenant between Himself and Abraham, and that an infant of eight days be circumcised, that is, on the eighth day of his birth. Abraham promptly obeyed Him by circumcising himself, Ishmael, who was thirteen years old, and all the males of his household.

Circumcision had its beginning here. It was given as a remedy for original sin, binding only the males descended from Abraham and proselytes. Why circumcision was instituted in that member, together with its rite and signification, is treated in the first part, in the title on the Mosaic law, and in the third part, in the title on the sacraments.

Afterward, while Abraham stood in the valley of Mamre at the entrance of his tent, three men--that is, three angels in human appearance--appeared to him, as Genesis 18 relates. Running to meet them and adoring, he invited them to receive hospitality. When they consented, he prepared a meal for them, first washing their feet and setting before them three measures of fine flour cooked, a calf, and milk. When the meal had been prepared, Sarah was called and a son to be born from her was promised to her.

Sarah herself remained behind the entrance of the tent and laughed at this word. The angel rebuked her for her unbelief, which she also falsely excused out of fear. When the angels departed from there toward Sodom, they foretold the judgment and destruction that would come upon those places.

When Abraham asked that the place be spared if fifty just people should be found in Sodom, pardon for the place was promised if fifty were found. Then Abraham descended to the number forty-five so that mercy might be granted for them; next he spoke of forty, afterward of thirty, after this of twenty, and finally he stopped at the number ten. It was promised him that the whole region would be spared on account of ten just people found there.

Here it should be known that Abraham's hospitality and generosity are marked out for imitation. Abraham showed himself hospitable toward everyone. If he had been a scrutinizer of those who took refuge with him, he would never have received angels as guests. Perhaps he would not have judged them to be angels, but would have repelled them with the others. But because he received everyone, he also received angels. Thus Chrysostom, in Distinction 42, Quiescamus. Here note the figure of the Trinity, which is to be venerated, and the mercy of God in granting pardon, which is to be marveled at.

§ V

When the two angels came toward Sodom, Lot was staying at the gates of the city, namely in order to invite the poor. On seeing them, he ran to meet them, asking and urging them to accept hospitality with him, since it was evening.

When they had entered his house, all the people of Sodom surrounded Lot's house and demanded that he bring out those young men to them, intending to abuse them. Lot offered them his two virgin daughters for them to use rather than have them inflict such an injury upon the young men received as his guests. They were unwilling to listen and were, as it were, breaking down the door. The angels brought Lot into the house and struck all those people with blindness so that they could not find the door.

The angels foretold that Sodom would be overthrown. When Lot announced this to his sons-in-law, they despised his warning. At last the angels led Lot, his wife, and his two daughters out of the city, commanding them to save themselves on the mountain and not to look back. As they proceeded, his wife looked back and was changed into a statue of salt. Fire and sulfur rained down from above upon Sodom, Gomorrah, and three other cities. They were overthrown, and the Dead Sea came into being there.

After Lot ascended the mountain and remained there, his daughters made their father drunk. The elder, lying with him while he was drunk, conceived by him and bore a son, Moab. The younger did the same, conceived by him, and bore a son whom she called Ammon.

From the punishment itself, know how detestable the sodomitical vice is; this is treated in the second part, in the title on lust. Know also that Lot, who lived chastely among the very worst people, was delivered because of his generosity and his kinship with Abraham. Yet he offered his daughters to the Sodomites imprudently and unreasonably so that they would not commit a more grievous sin, as Augustine says in Distinction 14, Quod ait.

Augustine says there: Whether a balancing of shameful acts, or of any sins whatever, is to be admitted, so that we commit lesser ones lest another person sin more gravely, such a balancing is to be admitted only with the greatest danger. Hence Lot's act is attributed not to counsel--that is, determinate reason--but rather to human agitation moved by so great an evil. He is therefore not to be imitated in this.

By punishing the failure of perseverance signified in Lot's wife, it is shown that remote places do not of themselves suffice to preserve anyone from sins, since Lot was just in the city but sinned on the mountain, as in Distinction 40, Quaelibet. That great crimes follow from drunkenness is suggested by Lot's incest, in Distinction 35, Sexto. His daughters are not excused from sin, although its gravity is diminished because they did this not from lust but lest the human race should fail, since they thought everyone had perished as had the people of Sodom.

Augustine says that Lot is to be blamed not to the extent merited by that incest, but to the extent merited by his drunkenness, in Cause 15, question 1, Inebriaverunt. Notice also that it is not safe even for a father to sleep with his daughters.

Abraham sojourned in Gerar and, when asked about Sarah, said that she was his sister, according to Genesis 20. Hence Abimelech, king of Gerar, had her brought to him so that he might take her as a wife. But in a dream the Lord threatened Abimelech that he would die because of this. Abimelech excused himself, saying that he did not know she had a husband and had therefore accepted her. At the Lord's command he restored her to Abraham. When he asked why Abraham had said that she was his sister rather than his wife, Abraham answered that it was to avoid danger of death. Abimelech gave gifts to Abraham, and when Abraham prayed for him, Abimelech, his wife, and his maidservants were healed.

§ VI

In the hundredth year of Abraham, Sarah bore him a son whom he called Isaac, and he circumcised him on the eighth day, according to Genesis 21. On the day of his weaning Abraham made a feast for him.

One day, when Sarah saw Ishmael playing with Isaac, she bore it with such distress that she said to Abraham, "Cast out the maidservant and her son, for he shall not be an heir with him." Although this seemed hard to Abraham, he was nevertheless admonished by God to acquiesce in Sarah's request. He sent Hagar out of the house with her son Ishmael, giving them loaves and a skin of water.

As Hagar wandered through the desert, their water failed, and the boy nearly succumbed to thirst. She left him under one of the trees lest she see him die. But the Lord heard the weeping boy. An angel commanded Hagar to take him up again and showed her a well of water, by which they were refreshed. Ishmael dwelt with his mother in the desert and became an archer. He took a wife from the land of Egypt. Abimelech entered into a covenant of peace with Abraham and their descendants, an oath having been sworn.

Different people expound in various ways Ishmael's playing with Isaac. Some say that he induced Isaac to adore images that he made, as though committing idolatry. Others say that he wished to lead him into wantonness. Others say that he struck him in play. From this know that the wicked persecute the good, and that the sensual appetite plays and thus persecutes the spiritual or rational appetite. Familiarity of this kind must therefore be avoided. Nevertheless, God does not abandon the wicked in their necessities.

Augustine says: In order that Ishmael might be separated from the people of God, his mother's servile condition did not harm him, but fraternal discord did. Nor did the free condition of the wife whose son he more truly was benefit him, because by her conjugal right he had been begotten in the maidservant and received from the maidservant. This is in Distinction 56.

Jerome likewise says: "He who was born according to the flesh"--that is, Ishmael--"persecuted him who was born according to the spirit," namely Isaac. The spiritual person, however, never persecutes the carnal, but spares him as a rustic brother, for he knows that he can advance in time. And if ever he sees the son of the Egyptian woman growing angry, he will remember that father who created both oxen and gnats, and that in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver but also of wood and earthenware. This is in Cause 23, question 4, Qui secundum.

§ VII

God tested Abraham, according to Genesis 22, not so that He Himself might learn Abraham's ready obedience and faith, which He did not fail to know, but so that through this trial He might make them known to the world. The Lord called him and commanded him to take with him his only-begotten son Isaac and go to the place He would show him, where he was to sacrifice that son.

Rising at once, Abraham began the journey with his son, his servants, and a donkey. They traveled continually for three days. On the third day the place, namely a certain mountain, was shown to him. He told his servants to wait with the donkey at the foot of the mountain. Abraham himself, carrying the fire and sword, ascended alone with his son, who bore the wood upon his shoulders.

There Abraham arranged the pile of wood and placed Isaac upon it. Isaac, who was already grown, bore this patiently. Abraham stretched out the sword to kill his son, but an angel called to him and prevented him. In Isaac's place he sacrificed a ram that he saw caught from behind by its horns in the thorns. The Lord swore to him that because of this obedience He would multiply his seed like the stars of heaven and the sand of the sea, and that in his seed all nations would be blessed, according to Genesis 22.

Here know that the Passion of Christ is most beautifully prefigured. Nor did Abraham tell a lie when he said, "Wait until we return to you," because, as Ambrose says, he prophesied what he did not know. He himself intended to return alone after sacrificing his son. Or, better, his faith was so great that he believed his son would be raised by God even after being slain and burned.

When Sarah died in the city of Hebron, Abraham mourned her. He bought from Ephron his field, in which there was a double cave, for four hundred shekels of silver, so that he might bury Sarah there, as Genesis 23 relates. In this deed Ephron is said to have committed simony because he sold the cave's burial place, where Adam and Eve were already said to have been buried, as in Cause 13, question 2, Ratione illius sepulchri. He had indeed offered it freely, but not from his heart.

Abraham, however, did not commit simony because he paid that price for the field and not for the burial place. In the same way, a person would not sin who bought an estate on which a church stood, provided he did not pay more on account of the church; and a right of patronage passes with the sale of the village in which such a right exists. This is in Cause 13, question 2, Postquam. Jerome says there that the man who was first called Ephron was afterward called Ephran, the letter o having been changed, to indicate that one who could sell the memorial of the dead, or their burial place, was not of consummate virtue.

§ VIII: How Isaac Took a Wife

When Abraham was already very old, he called the chief steward of his household, namely Eliezer, according to Genesis 24. He told him to place his hand under Abraham's thigh and swear--namely, by Christ, whom Abraham believed would be born from his thigh--that he would not take a wife for his son Isaac from the daughters of Canaan. Instead, he was to go into Mesopotamia, where Abraham's brother Nahor dwelt with his household, and take a wife for his son from among them. Eliezer swore to do this, provided that the woman whom he betrothed to Isaac was willing to come.

Then, taking camels and other necessities, he went to Mesopotamia and arrived at a certain spring. Rebecca, daughter of Bethuel and sister of Laban, came to draw water. Eliezer asked her for a drink of the water drawn in her vessel, and she immediately offered it to him and also to his camels, in accordance with the sign he had conceived. When he understood that she was Bethuel's daughter and therefore Isaac's blood relation, being the daughter of his cousin, he offered her certain ornaments.

Entering Bethuel's house, Eliezer disclosed to him the abundance of Abraham's goods, told him of Isaac, the son Abraham had by Sarah, and explained that he had been sent into those parts to procure a wife for Isaac. He asked whether they were willing for Rebecca to be betrothed to him. When they and Rebecca consented, the steward came with Rebecca to her husband Isaac. When she saw him meditating in the field from afar and understood that he was her husband, she covered herself with a cloak. Thus Isaac brought her into his house.

This betrothal signifies the betrothal between the Son of God and human nature through Gabriel, who was sent by Abraham--that is, by the Father Most High--to the Virgin. For He did not assume the angels who stand with the Father, but the seed of Abraham in a land far distant from the Father. The Virgin, found beside the waters of devotion and of the Scriptures, gave her consent after the angel spoke, and then human nature was joined to God.

The Gentile people, also figured in Rebecca, came to Christ and was made His bride through faith. Modest when shown the man, that is Christ, she descended from the camel, that is, from vices, and covered herself with garments of virtues. He loved her so greatly that He seems, as it were, to have forgotten the sorrow for His dead mother, the synagogue, which died through unbelief.

After Sarah died Abraham took another wife, Keturah, according to Genesis 25. Some say that she was Hagar. By her he had several sons. Abraham afterward distinguished Isaac from his other sons and left his inheritance to him, but gave gifts to the sons of the concubines. They are called concubines because, although they were known with marital affection, they did not have governance of the household as Sarah and others like her did. Finally, when Abraham died in the 175th year of his life, his sons Isaac and Ishmael buried him in the double cave at Hebron.

§ IX

The generations of Ishmael are described next. When Isaac at forty years old had taken Rebecca as his wife and she was barren, he prayed for her. When he was now sixty years old, the Lord granted her conception of two twins at once. When the little ones struck one another in her womb, she was saddened at this and prayed. It was revealed to her that two peoples would proceed from the twins she had conceived; they would fight, and one would overcome the other.

When the time of birth came, the first to emerge was ruddy and altogether shaggy, that is, hairy, for which reason he was called Esau. The other, coming forth, held the sole of his brother's foot as though wishing to emerge first, for which reason he was called Jacob.

Esau was a hunter loved by his father, because his father frequently ate from his hunting. Jacob, who remained quietly at home, was loved more by his mother. One day Esau returned weary from the field when Jacob had cooked a dish of lentils. Esau asked him for some of that red food. Jacob answered that Esau should sell him his birthright in exchange for such a dish, which Esau did, holding his birthright of little account.

Because the right of primogeniture was spiritual, Esau committed simony by selling it, but Jacob did not commit simony by giving the food, because he redeemed himself from harassment when that right had been given him by God. Esau was overcome more by the vice of gluttony than by necessity. It is also shown that one predestined by God is aided in all things, as in Cause 13, question 4, Obtineri.

Abraham took a wife when decrepit, as Augustine says. From this it is shown that after one's wife has died it is lawful to marry another even if one is old, as in Cause 32, question 4, chapter 1. It also signifies that, when the synagogue was dead, God betrothed the Gentile people to Himself.

When a famine arose, Isaac went down to Gerar. The Lord commanded him not to go down into Egypt and confirmed the promises He had made to his father Abraham concerning the possession of that land by his seed, the multiplication of his seed, and the blessing of all nations in him.

Isaac had said that Rebecca was his sister. One day, when Abimelech, king of Gerar, saw through a window Isaac playing with Rebecca, he understood that she was his wife. He complained to Isaac and commanded that no one should touch her under penalty of death.

Afterward Isaac had wells dug to obtain water, but the Philistines stopped them up several times. When he came to Beersheba, the Lord appeared to him there and confirmed the promises made to his father. Isaac erected an altar to the Lord and dwelt there. Abimelech made a covenant of peace with him.

Digging wells to find living water signifies holy men using their senses and deeds as servants to remove earthly desires from themselves so that they may reach the increasing waters of grace. Or it signifies searching beneath the surface of the letter of the Scriptures for the water of wisdom contained in the divine mysteries. Philistines impede both works through various temptations: demons, heretics, and depraved people.

But the just ought not to abandon good works already begun because of temptations or human persecutions. By continuing, they find what they desire. At last the quarrels of demons or people cease, and sometimes the human attackers themselves are brought back to friendship with the Church and the good. This is in Distinction 43, Scimus.

When Isaac had grown old and his eyes had become dim, according to Genesis 27, he told Esau to bring him food from the hunt so that Isaac might give him his final blessing. When Esau had gone to hunt, Rebecca instructed Jacob to pretend that he was Esau by wrapping his hands and neck in the skins of kids. She told him to bring his father cooked food, namely the kids, so that he might receive the blessing in Esau's place.

Jacob did so. Bringing Isaac the cooked food and saying that he was Esau, his firstborn, he gave it to him to eat; and when Isaac had eaten, he gave Jacob his blessing. Afterward Esau came with the game prepared and discovered the deception his brother had practiced upon him. Isaac, however, perceived the pious deception and that this had been done by God as a sign. He was not disturbed but confirmed what he had done. Yet when Esau sought a blessing with much weeping, Isaac blessed him also. Because of this Esau threatened to kill his brother Jacob, and Rebecca therefore persuaded Jacob to depart.

Many mysteries and moral teachings must be noted here. First, Jacob did not tell a lie by saying that he was Esau, according to the doctors, because he was Esau not in person but by the right of primogeniture. In the same way John was called Elijah by Christ, not in person but through similarity of conduct, as in Cause 22, question 2, § Item opponitur.

This right of primogeniture was spiritual, because such persons, namely the firstborn, were regarded as priests. This right consisted of six things: the priestly garment; the offering of sacrifices; receiving the father's final blessing; the blessing by which the firstborn blessed others at solemnities and banquets; receiving a double portion; and being lord over the others.

Jacob did not sin by using such a deception, because the right was owed to him. Nor did Rebecca sin by inducing him to it, because she is believed to have been inspired by God to do this. It signified that the Gentile people, as the younger son of God, would obtain the blessing of eternal salvation rather than the Jewish people, the elder son.

At this time the kingdom of the Argives arose under Inachus, its first king. It endured through fourteen kings until the time of the judges of Israel, Barak and Deborah. Then Perseus, fearing because he had killed Acrisius unintentionally, left Argos and transferred the kingdom to Mycenae. Afterward Eurystheus, Atreus, and others reigned there.

In these times, according to the Master of the Scholastic History, Phoroneus, son of Inachus and Niobe, first gave laws to Greece. He established that cases should be conducted before a judge, and from his own name they called the place designated for the judge phorus.

His sister Isis sailed to Egypt and gave its people certain characters of letters. She also taught them many things about agriculture. Although she was called Io, she was called Isis by them, a word that in their language signifies earth. For this reason she was received among the number of the gods in Egypt after her death. A son of Phoroneus called Apis also sailed to Egypt at that time. They indeed relate that this Apis, son of Phoroneus, was the husband of Isis. He was similarly deified by the Egyptians.

At that time also, beside Lake Tritonis, there appeared a virgin whom the Greeks called Minerva. She invented many arts, especially wool-working. She was also called Pallas, either from Pallene, an island of Thrace where she was reared, or from the giant Pallas whom she killed. At that time what is said in Hosea could deservedly have been spoken: "There is no knowledge in the land," since almost all nations except the household of Abraham were ignorant of the true God.

Chapter Two: The Deeds of Jacob

At his mother's request Jacob departed to avoid the wrath of his brother Esau, lest his brother kill him. His father also commanded him to go into Mesopotamia of Syria and take a wife there from the household of Bethuel, Rebecca's brother. Having received his father's blessing, he began the journey.

When Esau saw that it displeased his parents that he had taken wives from the daughters of Canaan, he took another wife, namely a daughter of Ishmael, son of Abraham. Jacob, proceeding into Mesopotamia, lay down to sleep at Bethel when evening came, placing a stone under his head.

In a dream he saw a ladder reaching to heaven and the Lord leaning upon its top. From there the Lord spoke to him, promising that land to his seed and that in his seed all the tribes of the earth would be blessed. He also saw angels ascending and descending by that ladder. Awakened and amazed at the vision, he said, "Truly this place is holy," and so forth. He anointed that stone and erected it as a monument, calling that place Luz; and he vowed a vow to the Lord that he would give tithes if he returned prosperously to his home.

The ladder Jacob saw, upon the top of which God leaned, signifies the humanity of Christ, to which the divinity was united as to something preeminent. Its two sides are soul and body. Its steps are the works of Christ: His teaching, miracles, virtuous conduct, and Passion. By imitating them we ascend to God.

The angels ascend by carrying up our vows, that is, by consulting the divine will concerning the things to be done among us. They descend by bringing us assistance and gifts according as they have received them from God. The fathers understood this and still understand it.

Morally, the ladder is penance. Its sides are fear and hope. Its steps are the parts of penance: contrition, confession, satisfaction--namely prayer, fasting, almsgiving, restitution, and the like. By this ladder one ascends to heaven. God stands at the summit to help, strengthen, and encourage one toward it. The angels, who are preachers, ascend by showing its usefulness, and so forth.

Jacob afterward came to Haran, or Mesopotamia, beside a certain well. Shepherds gathered there would remove the stone that closed it and water their flocks. When Jacob inquired, they told him that Laban was well and that his daughter Rachel was coming to the well with the flock. Seeing her, Jacob kissed her with tears, declared himself to be Rebecca's son, removed the stone from the well, and watered her flock.

Rachel hurried to announce him to her father. Laban went out to meet Jacob, brought him into his house, and, after the reasons for his journey had been related, retained him in the house to feed his flock. Jacob served him by guarding the flocks for seven years so that Laban would give him Rachel as his wife, for she was beautiful-eyed.

When the seven years were completed and Jacob asked that Rachel be given to him, Laban celebrated the wedding but brought Leah to him. When Jacob perceived this in the morning and complained, Laban answered that it was the custom of that country for elder daughters to be given in marriage first. Nevertheless, after the week he would also give Rachel to him as a wife in return for another seven years of service. This was done.

Leah was blear-eyed, and so Jacob preferred the love of Rachel to her. Yet Leah successively conceived four sons by him--Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah--while Rachel remained barren.

Rachel, seeing herself infertile and envying her sister, according to Genesis 30, gave Jacob her maidservant named Bilhah so that he might go in to her. By knowing her he had two sons, Dan and Naphtali. Leah, seeing that she had ceased to conceive further, likewise gave Jacob her maidservant Zilpah so that he might go in to her. By her he had two sons, Gad and Asher.

Reuben found mandrakes in the field and brought them to his mother Leah. Leah gave them to Rachel when she asked for them, under this agreement: that Jacob should sleep with Leah the following night. Hence Leah successively bore him two other sons, Issachar and Zebulun. She then bore one female whom she called Dinah. At last Rachel conceived and bore Joseph, whom Jacob loved above all.

After Joseph's birth Jacob sought permission from his father-in-law Laban to return to his father's house. Laban asked him to remain with him, naming his wages. Jacob consented on this agreement: he himself would pasture only the flocks of one color, whether white or black, and whatever spotted or vari-colored offspring they bore would be his wages, while the offspring of one color would belong to Laban. This was done.

By his industry Jacob discovered a new means for his flocks of one color to conceive vari-colored and spotted offspring. He took green rods of poplar and almond, partly stripped of bark so that they were of varied colors--white and black or gray--and placed them in the watering troughs. Thus when the sheep looked at the rods of varied color in the troughs while conceiving from the rams, they bore sheep of varied color. In this way Jacob became very rich.

According to Origen, Jacob's leaving his parents, homeland, and wealth and finding the most beautiful bride Rachel beside the waters signifies that the man who supplants vices, after abandoning worldly things, takes wisdom as his bride by devoting himself to the teachings of the Scriptures. According to Gregory in Book VI of the Moralia, Jacob's having two wives after laboring sufficiently for them signifies that the perfect man associates with himself the twofold kind of life.

The contemplative life is signified by Rachel, who was beautiful-eyed but barren of children, because the contemplative life beholds God more subtly and clearly but does not bear fruit in one's neighbors. Leah, who was fruitful with seven children, signifies the active life, which devotes itself to the seven works of mercy and thus bears fruit in one's neighbors, but contemplates God less. Hence Leah was blear-eyed.

Although Jacob first sought Rachel, he nevertheless had Leah first, because no one can exercise himself well in the contemplative life unless he has first devoted himself to the active life by mortifying the passions of the vices. How Jacob is excused for having four wives is treated in Cause 32, question 4, Obiciuntur and Recurrat, and was stated above concerning Abraham.

Concerning the belief that mandrakes possess the power to make women conceive, Augustine says that it is not true. Nicholas of Lyra says that they are certain fragrant fruits.

Jacob did not sin by using that device of placing peeled rods in the troughs so that the flock would conceive varied offspring. Laban had burdened and injured him in many things and had altered their agreements, and so Jacob justly did this in compensation for them.

The Master says that it is not marvelous for offspring to be made similar to an image seen at the climax of pleasure, since this very thing is said to happen among herds of horses in Spain. Jerome and Quintilian likewise defended a matron accused because she had borne an Ethiopian child by arguing that this had occurred because of an image she saw. In the books of Hippocrates it is found that a woman was to be punished because she had borne a most beautiful child unlike either parent and their entire family, until Hippocrates advised them to ask whether by chance such an image was in the bedchamber.

Jacob as a shepherd of sheep signifies prelates and doctors, who ought diligently to watch over the flocks entrusted to them. So that the sheep--that is, their subjects--may bear offspring of varied color, namely works of diverse virtues, they ought to place rods in the waters of teaching: that is, the sayings and examples of the fathers, partly stripped of bark and partly green. This means partly according to the letter and partly, with the surface of the letter removed, according to the spiritual sense. Thus the subjects conceive when these things are proposed and afterward, by working, bear diverse works of virtue.

§ I

When Jacob had become rich in this way, he perceived that Laban and his sons were indignant against him and murmured about the increase of his substance, according to Genesis 31. He called his wives into the field and explained his intention to return to his parents, both because Laban had treated him badly and because God had commanded it in a dream.

When they consented, Jacob secretly departed with his wives, children, and all his substance while Laban was ignorant of it. When Laban heard this on the third day, he pursued them with his people. He found Jacob on Mount Gilead and complained about the flight, and especially about his idols, which Rachel had stolen without Jacob's knowledge. Jacob answered by giving as his reason that Laban might otherwise have retained his household and property. He denied the theft and permitted Laban to search. Laban searched the tents, but did not find the idols because Rachel sat upon the saddle beneath which they were hidden. At last, after entering into a covenant with Jacob, Laban returned home and Jacob continued his journey.

Laban and his people pursuing Jacob with his wives and children so that they might seize them and bring them back signifies the persecution of the faithful by unbelievers because they have withdrawn from the rites of their fathers; the unbelievers seek to bring them back to their former ways. After many things God so terrified them that they could not prevail. Instead, they became benevolent, whether through conversion or at least through peaceful relations with Jews and pagans after idolatry had been taken away from the Gentile people.

On the journey Jacob encountered angels of God and said, "These are the camps of God." He sent messengers to his brother Esau to announce his return, according to Genesis 32. When the messengers returned and reported that Esau was approaching him with four hundred men, Jacob was greatly afraid and prayed that God would deliver him from Esau's hands.

He sent gifts ahead to Esau to appease his anger: flocks of sheep with rams, goats with he-goats, cows with bulls, camels, and asses, by several messengers. When he had caused all these to precede him, he remained alone. Behold, a man wrestled with him, that is, an angel in human form. When Jacob prevailed, the angel struck the sinew of his thigh, which immediately became numb so that Jacob afterward limped. The angel called his name Israel and blessed him. Jacob said, "I have seen the Lord face to face, and my soul has been saved."

Jacob's saying that he saw the Lord face to face is not to be understood of the face-to-face vision of the heavenly homeland. Rather, in a creature serving as subject, namely the angel, he knew God by a knowledge clearer than the ordinary knowledge that comes through faith. This wrestling also signifies the mystery of the Incarnation, in which the two natures are joined as wrestlers. At one time one seemed to prevail--that is, to be manifested more than the other--as did the human nature in the necessities of the body. At another time the divine nature was more manifest, as in the miracles. Finally the human nature prevailed in the Passion, where even God was seen to suffer.

As Jacob continued on his way, he raised his eyes and saw Esau coming with his people, according to Genesis 33. He made three companies from his household: in the first place he put the maidservants with their children; in the second Leah with her children; in the third Rachel with Joseph. Going before them, Jacob bowed prone to the earth seven times. At last the brothers embraced and kissed one another.

When Esau asked whose all that company was, Jacob answered that it was his. Jacob urged him to accept the gifts he had sent. Although Esau refused, Jacob said that he had seen him as the face of God. When Esau wished Jacob to travel with him, Jacob declined, excusing himself because of the little children and the sheep. Jacob therefore came with his household to dwell near Shechem and invoked the Lord there.

Dinah, Jacob's daughter, went out to see the women of the region. She was loved by Shechem, son of Hamor, seized, and violated by force, according to Genesis 34. Afterward Shechem asked Jacob and his sons to give her to him as a wife. They answered deceitfully that they could not do this unless all the males of that city were circumcised, after which they could contract marriages with one another.

When the men consented and every male had been circumcised, on the third day, when the pain of the wounds was most severe, Jacob's sons Simeon and Levi took their swords and killed all the men of that city. They also killed Shechem and his father and plundered everything in revenge for the rape. Jacob bore this with distress.

Dinah's going out from the house to see the women of the region and being violated shows the danger that follows from people's wandering and curiosity, as in the title on penance, Distinction 5, chapter 1. Morally, she signifies the soul that wanders outside the house of its own conscience toward created things. Because of this it is seized by the devil and held by him through delight and the excuse of sin. It is not freed unless the sons of Jacob--that is, the virile effects of the soul--wrest it from his hand by a certain violence, killing him with his household, that is, expelling sin through penance.

After this, Jacob admonished his household to cast away their idols and be cleansed.

Departing from there, Jacob came to Bethel, according to Genesis 35. The Lord cast fear upon all the inhabitants of those regions so that no one dared inflict any injury upon him. The Lord appeared to him there and confirmed the promises made to his fathers concerning the multiplication of his seed and the grant of that land. Jacob also made an altar there.

Coming from there to Ephrath, Rachel died in the birth of her second son. She called him Benoni, but his father called him Benjamin. Reuben went in to his father's concubine Bilhah, which his father afterward learned. At last Jacob came to his father Isaac at Hebron, where he dwelt. When Isaac died at the age of 180, his sons Esau and Jacob buried him in the double cave.

At that time Prometheus, brother of Atlas, is said to have been the first to make human beings, as the Master says. This is because he made learned people out of the ignorant, and also because he is read to have made certain images that he caused to walk by a certain art. He also invented the first iron ring and enclosed a gem in it. He taught that it should be worn as an ornament on the fourth finger, which they call the medical finger, saying that this finger was worthier than the others because a vein reaches from it to the heart.

Triptolemus is also said to have come into Greece and enlarged agriculture, while Ceres invented implements for plowing and measuring grain. Then the Telchines, defeated and exiled, founded Rhodes.

Genesis 36 contains the generations of Esau that descended from him, and the leaders and kings who continued for many ages. It says that Esau departed from Jacob in Canaan because that land could not contain them on account of the multitude of both men's flocks. He went to dwell with his household on Mount Seir. It also says that a certain descendant of his called Onan discovered hot waters in the desert--that is, baths--while pasturing his father's asses.

Chapter Three: The Deeds of Joseph, Son of Jacob

When Joseph was sixteen years old, he pastured the flock with his brothers and accused them before their father of a most wicked crime. Some say this was bestiality or sodomy, but Nicholas of Lyra says it was discord and quarreling among the brothers, especially because the others despised the sons of the concubines.

Jacob loved Joseph above all because he had begotten him in old age and because Joseph was better than the others. For this reason he made him a many-colored tunic reaching to the ankles. His brothers hated him. When he told them his dream about their sheaves adoring his, and on another day about the sun, moon, and eleven stars adoring him, this increased the hatred among his brothers still more.

One day Jacob sent him to visit his brothers at Shechem and see whether they were well. Obeying promptly, Joseph went there. When he did not find them and was told that they had gone to Dothan, he sought them there. But when his brothers saw him from afar, they thought of killing him from hatred, saying, "Behold, the dreamer comes," and so forth, according to Genesis 37.

At Reuben's persuasion, who intended to deliver him from their hands, they stripped Joseph of his tunic and cast him into a dry cistern. When Ishmaelites passed by, the brothers drew him from the cistern and sold him for thirty pieces of silver to the Ishmaelite merchants passing there, while Reuben was absent and Judah urged them on.

This signifies the mystery of Christ. Begotten--that is, created--by the Father according to His humanity in old age, that is, in the sixth age of the world, He was loved by the Father above all others and adorned with a special habit of every virtue as with a garment. He lived among His brothers, the Jews, whose crimes He reproved. By His words He showed them that He would have a certain dominion over them, so that at the name of Jesus every knee should bend. They envied and hated Him and sought to kill Him.

Yet certain men, such as Nicodemus and Joseph, contradicted their deeds; these are signified in Reuben. Finally they sold Him for thirty pieces of silver through the agency of Judah, His brother--that is, His apostle. He was afterward delivered to a false accusation by the synagogue signified in the woman, because He would not consent to her false traditions, as though He had wished to violate her in her laws and subject her to Himself.

The Gentile ruler, who was as the husband of that synagogue--that is, one ruling over her--or the chief of the priests, became angry against Him and delivered Him into prison, that is, into death. From death His soul descended to the prison of limbo. There He manifested that one guilty person would be freed and restored before Pharaoh--namely the fathers delivered from limbo--and the other would be condemned more harshly, namely those assigned to the place of the damned, who at the future judgment are to be tormented in soul and body. This came to pass.

Then Joseph's head was shorn and his garments changed. This signifies Christ with the defects of mortality removed and clothed in the new garment of His body's glory at the Resurrection. His wisdom was shown through the preaching of the apostles, and He was declared and proclaimed Savior of the world by the king of Egypt--that is, by God, the Lord of the world. He distributed the grain of teaching to those who desired truth. Finally, at the end of the world, His brothers, namely the Jews, will themselves come, recognize Him, and adore Him.

To conceal their crime, Joseph's brothers sent their father Jacob Joseph's tunic dyed in the blood of a kid so that he might see whether it was Joseph's tunic. Recognizing it and thinking Joseph had been devoured by a wild beast, Jacob wept much and for a long time.

Joseph was sold to Potiphar, a eunuch and master of Pharaoh's army. Potiphar is not called a eunuch because he had been castrated in infancy, as were the eunuchs of lords, since he had a wife and children. Rather, the Hebrews say that he bought the beautiful and graceful Joseph for an immoral use, for which reason the Lord chilled him so that he could not have intercourse, as though he were a eunuch. He afterward became priest of Heliopolis.

Augustine says in Cause 1, question 1: "As the man who bought Joseph was a eunuch, so one who buys grace has no living seed, for his generative parts are dried up." He means that because Joseph is interpreted as "increase," signifying grace, in which there is an increase of merits, one who buys sacred things in which grace exists commits simony, which is mortal. He therefore cannot beget children of good works, since the root of grace has dried up.

Judah, Jacob's son, took as wife Sue, daughter of Hirah, a Canaanite man, according to Genesis 38. By her he had three sons: Er, Onan, and Shelah. Judah gave his firstborn son Er a wife named Tamar. Because Er was wicked, he was killed by the Lord. Judah then gave Tamar as wife to Onan so that he might raise up seed for his brother, who had died without children. Because Onan was most wicked and spilled his seed upon the ground, he too was killed by the Lord.

Judah delayed giving Tamar as wife to Shelah, fearing that he too might die. When Judah's wife Sue had died and Tamar heard that her father-in-law was going to his flocks, she placed herself upon the road by which he would pass, pretending to be a prostitute. Judah knew her, not knowing that she was his daughter-in-law. Tamar conceived by him and bore Perez and Zerah.

When, after some months, it became known that Tamar was pregnant, Judah commanded that she be brought forth and burned as a fornicator. But by signs--the ring and bracelets he had left with her--she showed that she had conceived by him. Judah therefore held her excused because he had delayed giving Shelah to her as a husband, and he knew her no further.

§ I

When Joseph had been sold into Egypt, Potiphar made him steward and governor of everything he possessed, for Joseph had his favor and provided for everything rightly; because of him the Lord prospered all Potiphar's affairs, according to Genesis 39.

Since Joseph was beautiful, his mistress fell in love with him and invited him several times to adultery, which he refused. One day, when Joseph alone was doing something in the house, she seized him by his cloak so that he would sleep with her. Refusing, he fled from the house. That most wicked woman retained the cloak, called the servants, and said that Joseph had wished to violate her by force. When her husband returned home and she falsely accused Joseph of this, Potiphar became angry and sent him to prison. The Lord gave Joseph favor before the chief of the prison, who entrusted the care of the prisoners to him.

Note that in the Book of the Twelve Patriarchs there are many devices by which that woman tried to draw Joseph to the unspeakable deed: spells; promises to take him as a husband and to kill her husband; threats to kill herself; and other means.

While Joseph was held in prison, according to Genesis 40, two eunuchs of King Pharaoh--the king's cupbearer and baker--were imprisoned because of a certain offense. One night each had a different dream. The cupbearer saw a vine from which three branches came forth bearing fruit, and he seemed to press grapes into a cup and offer it to Pharaoh. The baker saw three baskets full of things made by the baker's art, which birds seemed to eat. Joseph explained that after three days the cupbearer would be restored to his office and the baker would be hanged. All this was fulfilled.

After this Pharaoh saw in a dream seven fat cattle emerge from the river of Egypt and feed in the marshes, and afterward seven other lean cattle that devoured the first, according to Genesis 41. Again he saw another dream: seven beautiful ears of grain upon one stalk, and afterward seven other deformed ears blasted by scorching wind.

In the morning Pharaoh called the wise men of Egypt to interpret these dreams, but they did not know how. At last the cupbearer, whose dream Joseph had truly interpreted in prison, remembered him and made him known to Pharaoh. At Pharaoh's command Joseph was brought from prison, shorn, and adorned, and Pharaoh asked him for the interpretation of the dreams.

Joseph explained that each signified one effect: seven coming years of great fertility and afterward seven others of greatest scarcity. He advised the king to appoint an industrious man over this matter who, during the time of fertility, would place one-fifth of the grain each year into the king's granaries so that provision could be made when the time of famine came.

Pharaoh accepted this counsel and appointed Joseph over the matter. He gave him a ring upon his hand, a linen robe, and a collar around his neck. He caused him to travel throughout Egypt with a herald going before him and crying out that everyone should bend the knee before him. Pharaoh called his name Savior of the World. He gave him as wife Asenath, daughter of Potiphar, priest of Heliopolis, by whom he had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim. When the seven years of fertility had passed and the years of famine had begun, Joseph began to sell the abundant grain he had gathered.

Vincent places here in the Historical Mirror a beautiful story, drawn from I know not where, about how Asenath was most beautiful and honorable but proud, despising every man. At first she did not want Joseph, but afterward she most greatly desired to have him as her husband because of his beauty, wisdom, and modesty. He would not consent unless she first abandoned the idols she worshiped. Saddened at this, she was instructed by an angel and became faithful.

When Jacob heard that grain was being sold in Egypt, he sent ten of his sons to buy it, retaining Benjamin with him, according to Genesis 42. They entered the land of Egypt and appeared before Joseph. He recognized them, but they did not recognize him. He began to speak harshly to them and accused them of having come to spy out the land.

Speaking among themselves, they said that this tribulation had befallen them because of what they had done in selling their brother. At last Joseph required one of them, Simeon, to remain a captive until they returned with Benjamin. When they returned home, they told their father everything that had happened to them. They explained how Joseph had questioned them and how they had answered each matter, especially concerning their father and their young brother who had remained with him, and that they were required to bring Benjamin with them when they returned.

When the grain brought from Egypt had been consumed and Jacob commanded his sons to go into Egypt again to buy more, according to Genesis 43, they refused unless he sent Benjamin with them. Jacob feared that some misfortune might happen to him on the journey, but Judah took upon himself the obligation of bringing him back.

At Jacob's command they took certain gifts from the best fruits of the land to offer Joseph. All of them went, including Benjamin, and presented themselves before Joseph. He had them brought into the house and a banquet prepared. They feared that he might bring an accusation against them because of the money returned in their sacks, and so they disclosed that it had been returned and brought other money. But they were reassured and told not to fear.

When Joseph entered the place where they were waiting, they offered the gifts and adored him. Asked about their father, they answered that he was well and that Benjamin, the young boy of whom they had spoken, was present. Joseph then ate with them and gave Benjamin a portion five times larger, according to Genesis 44.

When the banquet was finished, Joseph ordered that each man's sack be filled with grain and that the money they had brought be placed in the mouths of the sacks. He ordered his own silver cup to be secretly placed in Benjamin's sack. When this had been done and they had departed, Joseph soon sent his steward after them. On finding them, the steward rebuked them for stealing his cup.

When he had done this and they excused themselves, denying the deed, they freely offered that the one with whom it was found should be killed and that they themselves should become servants. A search was therefore made. When all the sacks had been opened, it was found in Benjamin's sack. Grieving greatly, they all returned together to Joseph's presence.

Joseph rebuked them for taking away the cup in which he practiced divination. According to Augustine, he said this not deceitfully but in jest, or according to the opinion of the common people. Judah, who had undertaken to bring Benjamin back, spoke many things in that cause. He asked Joseph to let Benjamin go free, lest their father die of grief when he did not return, and to allow Judah himself to remain Joseph's servant in his place.

At last Joseph could contain himself no longer. After excluding the others, with many tears he revealed, according to Genesis 45, that he was Joseph whom they had sold. When he asked about his father, they could not answer because of their great fear. But he comforted them, saying, "Do not be afraid, and let it not seem hard to you that you sold me into Egypt. For the Lord sent me before you into Egypt for your salvation, that you might be preserved and not perish from famine."

"For there are still five years to come in which the famine will endure. Return, therefore, and announce my glory to my father Jacob. Say to him on my behalf that he should come into Egypt with his whole household, and I shall feed you."

When Pharaoh heard that Joseph's brothers had come, he rejoiced with his whole household and told Joseph to send for them as he pleased. Joseph therefore sent wagons and many pack animals by which their possessions and the provisions for the household might be brought. He gave them robes, and gave more to Benjamin. When they returned and announced this to Jacob, he could scarcely believe, like one waking from sleep. He said, "I shall go and see my son before I die," according to Genesis 46.

Jacob therefore departed from Canaan with his entire household. When he came to the Well of the Oath, he offered a sacrifice to God. In a dream Isaac called him and comforted him so that he would not fear to descend into Egypt, because there he was to be multiplied into a great nation.

Those begotten from Jacob and his sons who descended into Egypt are also described. They were seventy in all, apart from the women: twelve were Jacob's own sons, while the others were his sons' sons, and the names of each are given. Jacob sent Judah ahead to announce his arrival so that Joseph might meet him in Goshen. When they met, Jacob embraced Joseph, wept over him, and said, "Now I shall die joyful, because I have seen your face."

Joseph made his brothers cautious so that, when he announced their arrival to Pharaoh, if they were asked about their work or occupation, they should say that they were shepherds. In this way they could dwell in the land of Goshen.

Joseph therefore informed Pharaoh of the arrival of his father and brothers, according to Genesis 47, and brought them all before him. When Pharaoh asked about their occupation, they said that they were shepherds and asked that he permit them to dwell in the land of Goshen. Pharaoh told Joseph to cause them to dwell there. When Jacob was asked by Pharaoh about his age, he said that he was 130 years old. Thus they were settled in Goshen.

As the famine continued throughout the world, and especially in Egypt and Canaan, the Egyptians first expended all their money as the price of wheat in order to obtain it. Afterward Joseph accepted their livestock as the price of wheat. Then they gave their lands and received wheat for seed, but on this condition: thereafter, each year and perpetually, they would give a fifth part of the fruits of all the lands of Egypt. The land of the priests was excepted and remained free, although they too were provided for from Pharaoh's grain.

When Jacob fell ill, Joseph visited him, taking with him his two sons born of Asenath, according to Genesis 48. Jacob told Joseph that when the Lord appeared to him at Luz, He had promised to multiply his seed and give him the land of Canaan as a possession. He said that Joseph's two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, should be counted among Jacob's sons, so that they would form tribes and receive their portion in the promised land like Jacob's other sons. He also told Joseph that Jacob's wife and Joseph's mother had died and been buried near Ephrath, or Bethlehem.

When Jacob wished to bless Joseph's sons and could no longer see, Joseph placed Manasseh, as the elder, at Jacob's right, and the younger Ephraim at his left. But Jacob crossed his hands, placing the right upon the younger's head and the left upon the other. When Joseph wished to change his hands, thinking this had happened by mistake, Jacob prevented him, saying that he knew what he was doing, and blessed them. He left Joseph one portion above his other sons, which he had taken from the hand of the Amorite.

At last Jacob assembled his twelve sons and foretold what would happen to them in the last times, according to Genesis 49, speaking particular things to each son. Especially when he blessed Judah, from whose tribe Christ was born, he foretold the time of the Messiah's--that is, Christ's--coming in the words, "The scepter shall not be taken away from Judah," and so forth. Finally, he commanded them to bury his body at Hebron in the double cave where Abraham and Isaac were buried. Thus he died.

§ II

After mourning the death of his father Jacob, Joseph had his body embalmed with spices by the physicians. With Pharaoh's permission, he and his brothers carried it into Canaan to be buried in the double sepulcher.

After this, Joseph's brothers feared that he might wish to avenge himself for the injury they had inflicted upon him, namely by selling him. Adoring him, they asked on their father's behalf that he forgive them that offense. Receiving them kindly with tears, Joseph reassured them. He said that this had happened by the Lord's will in order to preserve them and many peoples from famine, and that God had converted their evil into good.

Finally Joseph died after completing 120 years of his life, commanding that his body be carried into Canaan when they departed from Egypt. These things are in Genesis 50.

According to Vincent in the Historical Mirror, Joseph died in the eightieth year of his leadership in Egypt, for he was thirty years old when he was made governor in Egypt, first after Pharaoh. It was the 287th year from the first promise made to Abraham in Mesopotamia; the 361st year from Abraham's birth, at which the third age begins; and the year 2,209 from the beginning of the world according to the reckoning of our translation. According to the seventy interpreters, however, there are three thousand years and more.

According to Josephus, all Joseph's brothers likewise commanded that they be buried in the land of Canaan, and there they were buried. Vincent places in his history the testaments of the twelve patriarchs.

Joseph was prince of Egypt under five kings. The first, who exalted him, is called simply Pharaoh, although the Master calls him Nephrem. The second was called Amosis; the third, Chebron; the fourth, Amenophes; and the fifth, Mephres. Joseph died in the ninth year of this Mephres.

After Joseph's death Mephres became hostile toward the Hebrews and began to afflict them. Then began their hard servitude in Egypt, which was prolonged for 144 years until the giving of the law, so that the number of 430 years from the first promise made to Abraham might be fulfilled. The Lord had then said to him, "Go forth from your land," and so forth. To this is referred what the Apostle says in Galatians 4, namely that the law was given after 430 years.

Mephres, therefore, forgetful of Joseph's benefits, together with his Egyptian people began to afflict the Hebrews in many ways. First they oppressed them with hard works of mud and brick: they had to remove mud from the streets and roads in cleansing the city, bake bricks and build a city of tabernacles, and divide the river through many channels.

They burdened the Hebrews so that, broken by their labors, they would not know their wives and beget children, for the Egyptians envied their multiplication, wealth, and industry. But by God's working the Hebrews multiplied more every day.

For this reason another kind of wickedness was introduced for their extermination. Mephres commanded the Hebrew midwives, Shiphrah and Puah, to kill the males in the performance of their office but preserve the females. Led by piety, they did not do this, although they excused themselves falsely before Pharaoh.

He added another most cruel invention. Under penalty of death, he commanded that when Hebrew women bore males they should cast them into the river, while preserving the females, lest that people, fit for war, be multiplied. These things are in Exodus 1.

Because many little children were drowned in the river on account of that decree, the Master says it is believed that, for this crime, Egypt fell into the error of worshiping Apis as a god. Apis was, as Pliny says he himself saw, a certain bull that unexpectedly emerged from that river, bearing upon his right shoulder a white mark in the likeness of a horned moon. When it appeared, either once a year or, according to others, once in ten years, all the Egyptians assembled with diverse kinds of music and adored it. On that same day it vanished.

Augustine says in The City of God that Apis was the son of Phoroneus, king of the Argives. Coming by ship into Egypt, he took the kingdom for himself. After his death they venerated him as a god, a public edict having been issued that anyone who said he had been a human being should be killed. In his honor they reared and venerated an ox. The Egyptians worshiped this Apis as their greatest god and also called him Serapis.

Chapter Four: Moses

Moses was born in Egypt 424 years after the birth of Abraham, where the third age begins. He was of the tribe of Levi, born of his father Amram and his mother Jochebed, while Amenophis, the eighth Pharaoh after the one who exalted Joseph, reigned in Egypt. This Amenophis had issued the decree that newborn males should be drowned in the river, according to Exodus 1.

Because of that decree, Josephus says that Amram abstained from marriage lest he beget offspring whom he would have to kill. But it was revealed to him that he should not do this, for he would beget a male who would humble the Egyptians. He therefore knew his wife, and she bore Moses, who was of graceful form. After hiding him for three months, she placed him in a little basket and exposed him upon the river, while his sister Miriam watched what would happen to him.

Pharaoh's daughter came out to the river, had the basket she saw brought to her, and adopted the little child found in it as her son. She gave him to his own mother, that is, the child's mother, to be nursed, according to Exodus 2.

Vincent relates in Book III of the Historical Mirror that one day King Pharaoh held Moses in his lap or arms and placed upon the infant's head the crown he wore upon his own. The little child Moses cast it to the ground, and it broke. Certain people interpreted this as an evil omen, namely as a sign that the child would one day take away or destroy Pharaoh's kingdom, and wished to kill him.

But others attributed the deed to the ignorance of infancy. So that the truth of the matter might become more apparent, they had burning coals brought before the child in a vessel. He took one live coal, put it into his mouth, and spat it out. Hence Moses is said to have become speechless or somewhat stammering. Attributing the earlier deed to childhood for this reason, they did not kill him.

Josephus says that Moses was of such beauty that no one was so severe that he did not become gentle at the sight of him, and that people left their work to look at him as he passed.

Vincent's history also relates of Moses that, after becoming a young man and commander of the Egyptian army, he went to war against the Ethiopians, who had caused great devastation in Egypt. Being warlike and most skilled in arms, he defeated them and enclosed those who fled in their royal city Saba.

Tharbis, daughter of the king of the Ethiopians, saw Moses' beauty and fell in love with him. She offered to give him the city if he would take her as his wife. He did so, because the city was impregnable. She is said to be the Ethiopian woman on whose account Miriam and Aaron murmured against Moses.

At last, when Moses wished to return to Egypt and she would not consent, he made a golden ring enclosing a gem with an image that had the power to induce forgetfulness, and gave it to her. When she had forgotten him, he returned to Egypt. For Moses was skilled in the stars.

Moses afterward went out to see the Hebrews in the land of Goshen. Seeing a certain Egyptian injuring a Hebrew and observing that no one was watching, he killed the Egyptian. Concerning this deed Augustine seems to say that Moses acted from zeal but not according to knowledge, and so sinned, as did Saul when he persecuted the Church and Peter when he cut off the ear of one of the Jewish ministers. Others say that he did not sin but acted from inspiration of the Holy Spirit, as one already appointed by God as leader of the people for this purpose, as in Acts 6.

On another occasion, when Moses reproved one Hebrew who was injuring another, the man complained against him as though Moses wished to kill him as he had killed the Egyptian. Seeing that this had become public and that Pharaoh sought to kill him, Moses withdrew into the land of Midian.

There he defended the seven daughters of Jethro the priest when they wished to water their flocks and shepherds hindered them. At last he took one of them, named Zipporah, as his wife. Dwelling with his father-in-law Jethro, he pastured his flocks in the desert. By Zipporah he had two sons, Gershom and Eliezer. These things are in Exodus 2.

§ I

When Moses had driven the flock of his father-in-law Jethro into the interior of the desert, according to Exodus 3, he saw a bush burning and not being consumed. When Moses approached to look at it more closely, the Lord spoke to him from the burning bush and commanded him to remove the shoes from his feet.

The Lord then said that He had seen the affliction of His people in Egypt. Having compassion on them, He would deliver them from Egypt and lead them into the land promised to their fathers. He commanded Moses to go with the elders of the Hebrews to Pharaoh on His behalf and order him to release His people to sacrifice in the desert.

He declared to Moses that Pharaoh would not release them except through plagues. Therefore, around the time of their departure, they should ask the Egyptians to lend them vessels of gold and silver and, when departing, carry these with them. When Moses asked about the name of the one sending him, in case he should be questioned about it, the Lord answered, "I am who am," this being His name.

When Moses told the Lord that people would not believe him, the Lord gave him three things as signs. First, Moses' staff, when cast down, was changed into a serpent, and when the serpent was taken up, it was changed back into a staff. Second, when he placed his hand into his bosom it became leprous, as he saw when he drew it out; and when he put it back into his bosom, it was cleansed.

Third, he was to take water from the river of Egypt and pour it out, whereupon it would be changed into blood, according to Exodus 4.

When Moses still excused himself because his speech was impeded and slow, the Lord encouraged him, saying that He would be with his mouth. When Moses continued to refuse and begged that He send the one whom He was going to send, the Lord became angry and told him that his brother Aaron, an eloquent man, would be his companion and would speak for him.

Moses therefore asked permission from his father-in-law Jethro to visit his brothers in Egypt. He took his wife and sons with him. At a lodging place, however, an angel wished to kill him because his sons were uncircumcised. He therefore circumcised his sons with a very sharp stone, and Zipporah left him and returned to her father with the sons.

Aaron, obeying God's command, met Moses and kissed him. Moses announced the Lord's words to him, and when they together announced them to the children of Israel, the people fell prostrate and gave thanks to God.

§ II

Moses and Aaron entered Pharaoh's presence and on God's behalf told him to let His people Israel go to sacrifice, according to Exodus 5. Pharaoh did not listen to them. Instead, he commanded those who supervised the labor of the children of Israel no longer to give them the straw previously supplied for baking bricks, but to make them go and gather it. Because they had leisure, he said, they were crying out to go sacrifice.

Because they could not render the customary number of bricks, since they had to spend time gathering straw, Pharaoh's ministers scourged them. They complained about this before Pharaoh, but he despised them; they also complained before Moses and Aaron.

When Moses reported to the Lord the people's affliction and complaint because of the burden Pharaoh had added after Moses and Aaron spoke to him, according to Exodus 6, the Lord told him to signify to the people that He would lead them out of that servitude. Oppressed by their labors, they did not listen to him.

The genealogy of certain persons, especially those descended from Levi, is then given. Among them were Aaron, Moses, and Miriam, the children of Amram. Aaron had four sons--Eleazar, Ithamar, Nadab, and Abihu--by a wife named Elisabeth, daughter of Aminadab, of the tribe of Judah.

When Moses excused himself before God, who was sending him to Pharaoh, saying that he was uncircumcised in lips, according to Exodus 7, the Lord said to him, "Behold, I have appointed you the god of Pharaoh, and your brother Aaron shall be your prophet. He shall speak for you." He commanded them to go together to Pharaoh and, when he was unwilling to release the people, to perform signs before him.

They did this, first performing the sign of the staff changed into a serpent. Pharaoh's magicians did similar things; although Moses' staff devoured those of the magicians, Pharaoh's heart was hardened. Second, they performed another sign, namely changing the river's water into blood, on account of which the fish also died. When the magicians performed similar things, Pharaoh was hardened. These things are in chapter 7.

Moses therefore told Pharaoh to release the people. When he did not consent, Moses stretched out his hand over the river, and innumerable frogs came up throughout Egypt, filling houses, beds, and other places, according to Exodus 8. The magicians did the same through incantation.

At Pharaoh's request Moses and Aaron prayed for the frogs to be removed. When they did so, the frogs died, but Pharaoh's heart was hardened. Then Moses struck the dust of the earth with the staff, and innumerable gnats arose. Unable to do this, the magicians said, "This is the finger of God."

The Lord afterward sent the plague of flies, which filled all Egypt, but there were none in the land of Goshen where the Hebrews dwelt. Moses prayed at the request of Pharaoh, who promised to release the people, and the flies ceased. But Pharaoh was hardened and refused to release them. After this the Lord sent pestilence among the pack animals, yet Pharaoh still did not release the people; afterward He sent ulcers upon people and animals.

When Pharaoh was warned again to release the people and was unwilling to listen, according to Exodus 9, hail descended with thunder and lightning. It destroyed all the trees and fruits and killed the people and animals upon which it fell. There was no hail in the land of Goshen. The hail ceased at Moses' prayer when Pharaoh promised to release the people, but he did nothing.

Through Moses the Lord threatened Pharaoh that locusts would be sent into Egypt if he did not release the people, and that He would harden his heart, according to Exodus 10. When the Egyptians urged Pharaoh to release the people lest they suffer worse things, he wished to release the men alone and not the others. Because of this came locusts and caterpillars without number, which devoured every green thing.

When this plague ceased at Moses' prayer, Pharaoh was unwilling to release them with all their possessions as he had promised, but wished to retain the sheep and pack animals. Moses stretched out his hands toward heaven, and a palpable darkness appeared. People could not see one another for three days and did not move from their places. There was light in Goshen. Not even because of this did Pharaoh release the people; instead, he threatened Moses and Aaron with death if they came before him again.

The Lord foretold to Moses that after the plague that was to follow, namely the death of Egypt's firstborn, Pharaoh would release them and compel them to depart, according to Exodus 11. Therefore, the children of Israel should borrow vessels of gold and silver from the Egyptians and carry them away when they departed from Egypt, as compensation for their losses.

The Lord told Moses that every household of Israel should sacrifice a lamb or kid toward evening on the fourteenth day of that month, which was the first month of the year, according to Exodus 12. They were to smear its blood upon both doorposts of the house. The lamb was to be a year old and without blemish. They were to eat it roasted with fire, observing certain rites.

When this had been done, at midnight an angel passed through Egypt and killed all the firstborn of people and pack animals. Wherever blood was upon the doorposts, he did nothing. Because of this, Pharaoh and all Egypt compelled the people of Israel to depart from Egypt, fearing that everyone would die. They carried with them the vessels of gold and silver and the garments borrowed from the Egyptians.

They departed in a number of six hundred thousand men, apart from the children and women, with all their possessions and pack animals. From Rameses they came to Succoth, according to Exodus 13.

The Lord commanded Moses that all the firstborn should be His, because when the firstborn of the Egyptians died, their own firstborn remained unharmed by the devastating angel. From that time onward, every male first born of man or beast was offered to the Lord as His own. The firstborn of men who were not of the tribe of Levi were redeemed for five shekels.

The Lord also commanded the solemnity of Passover to be observed for seven days with unleavened bread. Its rite is expressed more fully in the preceding chapter. There it is also said that they were in Egypt for 440 years. This reckoning begins from the first promise made to Abraham in Mesopotamia.

They proceeded through the desert toward the Red Sea, with an angel going before them by day in a pillar of cloud and by night in a pillar of fire.

When Pharaoh heard of this, he regretted that he had released the people, according to Exodus 14. Gathering his armies and chariots, he pursued them to bring them back to Egypt. When the children of Israel saw him approaching, they began to murmur against Moses because he had led them out of Egypt.

Moses prayed and, at the Lord's command, stretched his staff over the Red Sea. The waters were divided, making roads in the midst of the sea through which the children of Israel freely walked. Pharaoh pursued them with his armies along those roads. But after all the Hebrew people had departed, Moses stretched his staff over the sea; the waters returned as before, overthrowing Pharaoh and his people in the midst of the waves.

Moses therefore sang this song to the Lord with the people, while his sister Miriam the prophetess sang with the women who played tambourines: "Let us sing to the Lord gloriously," and so forth, according to Exodus 15.

From there they came to Marah, where the waters were bitter so that they could not drink them. At God's command Moses put wood into them, and they were made sweet. They then proceeded to Elim, where they found twelve springs and seventy palm trees.

From Elim they came into the desert of Sin. When the people murmured against Moses and Aaron because of the lack of meat and other foods of Egypt, according to Exodus 16, the wind blew and sent them quails, and behold, manna rained upon them like dew.

The Lord commanded each person to gather a gomor, which was a certain measure, and no more, and not to reserve it for another day except on the sixth day. On that day they were to gather two gomors, one for that day and the other for the Sabbath. Those who gathered more found no more than a gomor, and those who reserved it for another day found it putrefied. The Hebrews were nourished by this food in the desert for forty years.

From the desert of Sin they proceeded to Rephidim. When they murmured there because of the lack of water, Moses at the Lord's command struck the rock of Horeb with the staff. Waters flowed in abundance so that they and their animals could drink, according to Exodus 17.

When the Amalekites made war upon them to hinder their journey, Moses sent Joshua with many men to fight them. Moses himself remained on the summit of the mountain, holding his staff with hands raised toward heaven, while Aaron and Hur supported his arms. Whenever he lowered them, his people were defeated; whenever he kept them raised, the people prevailed. Thus Amalek was defeated.

Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, came to visit him, bringing his wife and their sons Gershom and Eliezer, according to Exodus 18. When they had been received with thanks and God's wonders related, Jethro saw Moses' great labor in hearing the cases of individuals from morning until evening. He advised him to appoint different officers--tribunes, centurions, rulers of fifty, and rulers of ten--who would hear the people's cases, while Moses reserved the more difficult matters for himself. Moses did this.

§ III

From Rephidim they came to Mount Sinai and its foot. There the Lord commanded them through Moses to sanctify themselves and wash their garments for two days, and that on the third day Moses should ascend the mountain. No one else, nor even an animal, was to approach or touch the mountain, lest they die.

On the third day the mountain began to smoke. Thunder and the sound of a trumpet were heard, lightning was seen, and a very dense cloud covered the mountain. Moses entered it to receive the law. When these things had been completed, in the third month after the departure from Egypt the Lord gave His people the law upon Mount Sinai.

This law is divided into three kinds of precepts: moral, judicial, and ceremonial. The moral precepts are the Ten Commandments found in Exodus 20. Certain other moral precepts are scattered in different places of the Pentateuch, and especially in Deuteronomy, but they are reduced to the Decalogue. All nations have always been and will always be bound to observe them.

The first three commandments, carved upon one stone tablet, order us toward God; the other seven order us toward our neighbor.

The judicial commandments were ordained for preserving the peaceful life of that people together and maintaining good civil society. Like civic statutes, they bound that people alone until Christ's Passion. Now they bind no one unless the Church or some city chooses to assume any of those precepts as its own statutes. They would then bind not because they were written in the Mosaic law, but because they were established in the city. They are found in the two chapters 21 and 22, partly in chapter 23, and also scattered elsewhere, especially in Deuteronomy.

The ceremonial precepts were ordained for the worship of God among that people, principally prefiguring Christ and the customs of the Christian people. They bound that people alone. They are said to have been given to the perfect as a sign, so that through them they might be exercised in faith in the things those rites prefigured; to the imperfect and ignorant as a pedagogue, so that they might be held in devotion under them; and to the unruly and hard as a scourge, so that, burdened by them, no access to Gentile rites would be open.

Because all those ceremonial things happened as a figure and were fulfilled when Christ came and the Christian people came into being, they are now abolished. Whoever observed them in that manner would Judaize and sin mortally.

These ceremonial precepts are divided into sacred objects, sacrifices, sacraments, and observances. Sacred objects are those things that pertain to the tabernacle and were ordained around it.

In Exodus 24 it is said that Moses made an altar at the foot of Mount Sinai. When victims had been sacrificed there and the book of the law that he had written first read, he sprinkled the people with their blood, while they promised to fulfill all the Lord's commandments.

Afterward Moses and Aaron, with Aaron's sons and seventy elders of the people, proceeded toward the Lord. Moses admonished the people to await his descent from the mountain. If any question should arise, they were to refer it to Aaron and Hur. He ascended the mountain, and a cloud covered it for seven days. On the seventh day Moses entered the cloud and remained there forty days and nights, fasting and speaking with the Lord.

§ IV

The Lord therefore commanded Moses to make an ark of shittim wood, which is incorruptible. Its length was to be two and a half cubits, its width one and a half, and likewise its height. It was entirely covered within and without with plates of gold and had a golden crown above.

He was also to make a golden mercy seat that was like a covering of the ark, but stood upright above and rose over the ark like the lid of a chest when it is completely open, or like panels erected above altars. He was to make two cherubim, one on one side of the ark and the other on the other. These were kept in the Holy of Holies. In the ark were placed Aaron's rod, a golden vessel full of manna, and the two tablets of the Decalogue.

He likewise commanded a wooden table to be made of shittim wood and covered with golden plates, with a crown above it. Twelve loaves were continually kept upon it and changed every Sabbath. He also commanded a golden lampstand with seven lamps, and a golden altar upon which incense was offered, together with a censer. These three were in the Holy Place.

In addition, he was to make many golden vessels and censers, cups, bowls, mortars, forks, and other things of this kind. These things are contained in chapter 25.

Second Title

Chapter Four: The Deeds of Moses

And in chapter 26 He commanded that the tabernacle be made from boards covered with golden plates. Its length was to be thirty cubits, its width ten, and likewise its height, with silver bases. Across the middle of the tabernacle, along its width, He commanded a beautiful veil to be made, suspended upon four columns, which divided the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies. The space of the Holy of Holies was ten cubits in length, while the space of the Holy Place was twenty cubits.

The tabernacle had a fourfold covering. The first was of curtains woven in various colors; the second, of cloths made from goats' hair; the third, of reddened skins; and the fourth, of hyacinth-colored skins. There was also a hanging at the entrance. The entrance was on the eastern side, just as, conversely, the entrance of churches is now on the western side.

In chapter 27 of Deuteronomy [read: chapter 27 of Exodus], it is contained that the Lord commanded an altar of holocausts to be made before the entrance of the tabernacle. It was to be five cubits long and likewise five cubits wide, but three cubits high, made from shittim wood covered with bronze. Sacrifices were burned there. He also caused a court to be made around the tabernacle, surrounded with curtains. Its length was one hundred cubits and its width fifty.

In chapter 27 there is an account of the vestments to be made for the priests. When all the ordinary priests ministered, they had four garments: breeches, a linen garment, a belt, and a tiara. But when the high priest entered the Holy of Holies--which occurred once a year, namely in the month of September, on the feast of propitiation, that is, on the tenth day--he put on the following garments in addition to those already named. There was a hyacinth-colored tunic, which was close fitting like a little tunic; on its lower edge were bells and woven pomegranates. Then there was the ephod; afterward, on his breast, the breastpiece, which was square; behind, upon his shoulders, the superhumeral; and on his forehead a plate shaped like the moon.

In chapter 29 mention is made of the sacrifices performed at the consecration or anointing of the priest Aaron and his sons. In chapter 30 He commands that an altar of incense be made, as well as a bronze laver in which the priests washed their hands and feet when they were to minister. It was placed between the entrance of the tabernacle and the altar of holocausts. He also commands that incense be compounded in the manner of an ointment from myrrh, cinnamon, cassia, aromatic cane, and oil. With this preparation all the things in the tabernacle were anointed, and the priests themselves were consecrated through this anointing.

In chapter 31 it is related that God gave wisdom to Bezalel, of the tribe of Judah, and Oholiab, of the tribe of Dan, to make all the things just mentioned. These matters belong to all the sacred objects. The solemnities of the Jews also belong here; three of them last for a week, namely Passover, Pentecost, and the Feast of Booths or Tabernacles.

The sacrifices made from animals, the offerings made from dry things such as bread and the like, and the libations made from liquids are treated especially in the book of Leviticus, although some are also set down occasionally elsewhere. The sacraments of the Jews were circumcision, begun in Abraham; the eating of the paschal lamb, which is discussed in Exodus 12; the anointings of priests; the sprinkled ashes of the heifer; and certain sacrifices. Observances are the distinctions between clean and unclean things, which are treated in Leviticus. All these belong to the ceremonial precepts of the Jews, which have now ceased; hence they are now observed to one's damnation.

§ V

Returning to the history: while Moses remained upon the mountain with the Lord, the people rose up and told Aaron to make golden gods for them to worship. Because Hur resisted and opposed them, he was suffocated by their spittle, as the Hebrews hand down, although this is not contained in the text. Aaron told them to bring the golden earrings of their wives. When they had done so, they melted the gold, made a calf from it, and adored the calf as a god.

The Lord told Moses to descend from the mountain because His people had sinned by committing idolatry. He said that He wished to destroy them from the earth because they were stiff-necked. But Moses prayed and appeased the Lord's anger. He descended from the mountain with stone tablets written by the finger of God. When, at the foot of the mountain, he saw the people worshipping the calf, he was moved to wrath through zeal and broke the tablets.

After he had rebuked Aaron for making the calf and Aaron had offered his excuse, Moses broke the calf. He commanded the Levites to take up swords with him and kill all who had committed idolatry, sparing no one, not even their parents. The Hebrews say that a golden hair appeared in the beards of the idolaters. Thus they were distinguished from the others, and twenty-three thousand men were killed because of this.

Moses then returned to the Lord upon the mountain and asked Him either to forgive the people that fault or to blot Moses himself out of the book of life. The Lord answered that He would blot out the one who offended Him, and that Moses should lead that people to the place He had named and His angel should go before him. All these things are in chapter 32.

After this Moses returned to the camp and pitched the tabernacle outside the camp. Whoever had some matter of inquiry went to him there. Entering the tabernacle, Moses consulted the Lord, and a cloud appeared before it in the form of a column. Moses spoke with the Lord, as is said in the text, face to face, just as a friend speaks with his friend. Nevertheless, it was an angel who represented the Lord.

When Moses asked the Lord to show him His face and His glory, He answered that a living man could not see His face. Moses was instead to place himself in the rock and, as He passed by, would see His hinder parts. He also said to him, "I shall show you every good." This takes place in the vision of the divine essence. Hence both Thomas and Augustine say that Moses saw God by His essence in the present life. This is in chapter 23.

Afterward, at God's command, Moses made two stone tablets and ascended Mount Sinai with them. The Ten Commandments were carved upon them by God's work. God promised to lead the people into the land promised to their fathers, but commanded that they should neither worship the gods of that land nor contract marriages with its inhabitants. Their firstborn were to be offered to Him, and three times each year they were to approach the place of His name, that is, the place where the temple would be.

Moses remained on Mount Sinai for a second period of forty days, neither eating nor drinking. When he descended from the mountain, he told the people what the Lord had commanded. Because of the rays issuing from Moses' face, he appeared to have horns. Moses therefore veiled his face when he spoke to the people. These things are in chapter 34.

Moses admonished the people to offer as gifts whatever gold, silver, or other things they freely wished to give toward the construction of the tabernacle. They did so, as is contained in chapter 25. The four following chapters relate in detail how Bezalel and Oholiab, with their assistants, made the tabernacle and the other things that the Lord had commanded Moses to have made.

When these things had been completed, the Lord commanded Moses to erect the tabernacle itself, to place everything belonging to it as He had ordained, to consecrate Aaron and his sons, and to offer the appointed sacrifices. When this had been fulfilled and everything arranged, on the first day of the first month of the second year after the departure from Egypt, at the foot of Mount Sinai, a cloud filled the tabernacle. Because the glory of the Lord flashed forth, Moses could not enter the tabernacle.

Fire also descended from heaven and set the prepared sacrifices alight. This fire never failed until the Babylonian captivity of that people, although at God's command the priests fed it morning and evening by placing wood upon it. The erection of the tabernacle is treated in the fortieth and final chapter of Exodus.

§ VI

Because the Decalogue contains a brief summary of God's commandments, every person has always been and still is bound to observe it among all nations, since its commandments belong to natural law. Nor could an adult be saved otherwise than by observing them, according to Christ's words in Matthew 19 when He explains some of them: "If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments."

As for the observance of the Sabbath, it was ceremonial with respect to the determination of that particular day. Nevertheless, insofar as it required a person to devote some time to God and to his own salvation, it was moral and belonged to the dictate of natural reason. Therefore, a very brief exposition of the commandments will be set down from what is contained in the Decrees.

In the expression of the Decalogue itself God says: "I am the Lord your God, mighty and jealous, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation of those who hate Me, and showing mercy to thousands among those who love Me and keep My commandments." This is expounded in three ways.

First, the severity of divine justice is shown, for God visits--that is, punishes--sins committed not only in their first authors but also in the children of the fathers, or those who imitate their parents' wickedness. Hence He adds, "of those who hate Me." Because people do not ordinarily live so long that more than a fourth generation descends from them, and because it commonly happens that children imitate the evil conduct of the parents whom they have seen, He therefore says, "to the third and fourth generation."

Second, it is expounded as indicating God's clemency and long expectation of them for penance. He visits them by healing and curing the sins of their fathers, waiting for them as long as they are able to live, which extends to the third or fourth generation descended from them; if they are converted, He is ready to forgive them, as is contained in Cause 1, question 4, in the section Contra.

Third, it is expounded morally, as the gloss there notes, and well. For there is a fourfold process of sin, as though a fourfold generation. The first generation consists of the first movements of sin, which are themselves sometimes sins. The second generation is sensual complacency in the sin suggested, but short of the assent of reason. The third is the heart's consent to sin, which is mortal. The fourth generation is the deed. Therefore, God does not punish the first and second generations eternally, but He does punish the third and fourth, because mortal sin is there. Hence He adds, "of those who hate Me."

The first commandment, therefore, is this, as is contained in Exodus 20: "You shall have no foreign gods before Me." As though explaining this more fully, He adds: "You shall not make for yourself a carved image, nor any likeness of those things that are in heaven, on earth, or in the waters. You shall not adore them with the veneration of latría, nor worship them with interior worship." By these words all idolatry and superstition are prohibited.

Augustine says in his book On Christian Doctrine: "Anything instituted by human beings that pertains to making and worshiping idols, or to worshiping a creature or any part of a creature as God, is superstitious. The same is true of consultations and certain covenanted or agreed compacts of signs with demons, such as the volumes of magical arts, which poets customarily mention rather than teach. To the same class, though one of seemingly more permissible vanity, belong the books of augurs and haruspices."

He continues: "To this class also belong all bindings and remedies that the discipline of physicians condemns, whether they consist of incantations, certain marks called characters, or any objects hung or tied upon a person." This is in Cause 26, question 2, Illud quod est. Augustine concludes that a Christian must flee all these things.

In the same Cause, question 5, chapter Episcopi, it is also said that bishops must expel from their parishes those devoted to magical arts and sorcery, together with those wicked women who say that they travel at night upon beasts and whom some call streges. It declares that this is not true, but that everything occurs through the illusion of demons, and that those women falsely think that what happens in the phantasms of dreams is really happening to them.

It adds that everyone must be publicly told that whoever believes such things, and things like them, loses the faith. At the end of the chapter it says: "Whoever, therefore, believes that any creature can be changed for the better or the worse, or transformed into another species or another likeness, except by the Creator Himself who made it, is without doubt an unbeliever and worse than an unbeliever." Thus it is written there.

Augustine likewise says in Cause 26, question 7: "Do not observe the days that are called Egyptian, nor the Kalends of January," and so forth. After enumerating many superstitions and observances--of auguries, fates, divinations, and inquiries through Pythagorean necromancy into someone's life or death, or into adverse or prosperous things to come; through books of dreams falsely entitled to Daniel; through lots called the Lots of the Apostles; through speaking superstitious charms while gathering herbs; or through placing little written tablets for any illness upon people or animals--he concludes there that those who believe or do these things, or go to the houses of people who do them, have denied the Christian faith and baptism.

The second commandment is: "You shall not take the name of your God in vain." To this is referred what is said more openly elsewhere: "You shall not swear falsely in My name," in Leviticus 19.

On this passage one must note what Jerome says upon Jeremiah when treating the words, “They shall swear in My name in judgment, justice, and truth”: “One must observe that an oath has these companions: truth, judgment, and justice. If they are absent, it will not be an oath but perjury.” This is in Cause 22, question 2, Animadvertendum.

In the following section it is said: “Since all who speak a lie are to be destroyed”—that is, damned--according to the Psalm, “You will destroy all who speak a lie,” those who are found to swear falsely while lying are much more deserving of damnation, because they take God’s name in vain.

Likewise, in Cause 22, question 4, it is said: “A person who swears badly must perform a fitting penance, because against the Lord’s commandment he has taken His name in vain.” Perjury therefore occurs when someone knowingly swears to something false; truth is then absent. According to Thomas in the Second Part of the Second Part, it is always a mortal sin.

Second, perjury occurs when someone swears that he will do something unlawful. Justice is then absent. This also appears to be a mortal sin when someone does it knowingly, since he is bound to do the contrary. Hence it is said in Cause 22, question 4, You Shall Not Commit Perjury: “The evil that someone has vowed he will do, he must by no means do, because foolish vows must be broken altogether.”

The conclusion of that whole fourth question is that unlawful oaths and promises are not to be kept and do not bind. Nevertheless, there is sin in making that unlawful promise, oath, or vow. This is proved by many chapters.

Third, the word “perjury” is used broadly when someone swears to something that is true and lawful, but without any urgent cause. Judgment--that is, discretion--is then absent. Such a person swears in vain, that is, uselessly, and this appears to be a venial sin.

It is also prohibited to swear by God’s members, His head or hair, and other expressions that sound of blasphemy, in Cause 22, question 1, Si quis per capillum.

Second Title

Chapter Four: The Deeds of Moses

The third commandment is: “Remember that you sanctify the Sabbath day,” that is, set it apart for the worship of God by abstaining from manual works and also from criminal works.

Here note that the Sabbath day was changed by the Church to the Lord’s Day. Hence it is said in On Consecration, distinction 3, Pronunciandum: “Every Lord’s Day, from evening until evening”—that is, until late, lest people be taken by Judaism--“must be kept as a holy day.” The Sabbath was changed to Sunday out of reverence for the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, who rose from the dead on that day; on that day the blessed life, even as regards the body, was begun in human nature. He was also born on that day, sent the Holy Spirit on that day, and began the world on that day.

As is also said in On Consecration, distinction 3, Ieiunia: “On the Lord’s Day nothing else is to be done except to be at leisure for God. No manual work is to be performed on that holy day, but the day is to be passed only with hymns, psalms, and spiritual songs.” The Church has also added a commandment binding under mortal sin, namely that Mass be heard by everyone on Sundays, according to On Consecration, distinction 2, Missas. This commandment appears to extend also to the other days that the Church has made holy days--that is, which the Church has commanded to be celebrated by cessation from work. These are treated in On Consecration, distinction 3, Pronunciandum, and in the Extra, On Parishes, That on Sundays and Feast Days.

The fourth commandment is: “Honor your father and your mother.” According to the doctors’ exposition, this is understood of the honor of reverence and obedience. Under this commandment is understood to be included all spiritual or temporal assistance that a person is bound to furnish to his neighbor, as in the matters of fraternal correction, the giving of alms, the instruction of one’s neighbor, prayer for others, and the like. But the first among the number of our neighbors whom we are bound to help first and more fully are our parents.

Ambrose says: “That liberality is to be approved by which you do not despise those nearest of your seed if you know them to be in need. For it is better that you yourself assist your own relatives, whom shame prevents from asking or seeking the aid of their need from others. This does not mean, however, that they should wish to be made richer from what you are able to bestow upon the needy.” This is in distinction 86, Non satis.

The same author says in the following chapter: “Moreover, it is God’s tradition that you first feed your parents. For if, according to the divine oracle, an insult to a parent is paid for with death, how much more is hunger, which is much more grievous?” Thus he speaks.

Everyone must also obey his parents, but only in lawful things and in the things to which he is bound, namely those that pertain to the ordering of the household. For a person is free with respect to assuming a state, such as marriage, the clerical state, or the religious life. In matters of this kind he is not bound to obey his parents—for example, an order that he not enter religious life or that he contract marriage with a certain person. In other things that are not contrary to the Lord, he must obey.

Hence Jerome says upon the Epistle to the Ephesians: “If a master commands things that are not opposed to the Holy Scriptures, let the servant be subject to the master. If he commands contrary things, let the spirit obey rather than the master of the body.” He says the same concerning servants in relation to masters, wives in relation to husbands, and children in relation to parents: in those things alone are they to be subject to masters, husbands, and parents which are not contrary to God’s commandments. Thus Jerome speaks in Cause 11, question 3, If a Master.

Under this commandment is also included the care and providence that carnal parents—and much more spiritual parents, such as prelates and rulers of cities—must exercise over those subject to them, both with respect to good conduct and with respect to sustenance. For the Apostle says to Timothy: “He who has no care for his own, and especially for the members of his household, has denied the faith”—that is, natural fidelity—and is worse than an unbeliever.” Hence it is also said in distinction 30: “If anyone abandons his own children and does not nourish them or provide what piety requires, but thinks that they should be neglected under the pretext of continence, let him be anathema.”

Not only Eli, who did not harshly rebuke his delinquent sons, is censured, but David also. Although he was intent upon divine governance, he permitted his sons to use excessive freedom and vanity. He was punished in them, as is evident in Amnon and Absalom. Gratian notes this in distinction 47, § Necesse, and in Cause 23, question 4, Duo ista.

The fifth commandment is: “You shall not kill.” Augustine expounds this in Book I of The City of God as meaning, “neither yourself nor another.” For someone who kills himself kills no one other than a human being. Apart from those whom either a just law commands generally to be killed or the very fountain of justice, God, commands particularly to be killed, whoever kills a human being, whether himself or another, is held guilty of homicide. This is in Cause 23, question 5, Si non licet.

Homicide is sometimes committed in the heart alone. Hence Jerome says: “Although you do not kill with a sword, nevertheless you kill by your will.” This is in On Penance, distinction 1, Omnis. Those who bear hatred toward their neighbor are also called murderers in the distinction On Murderers. Augustine says in On Penance, distinction 1, Homicidium, that every wicked movement—namely, every deliberate movement—to harm one’s neighbor appears to be counted in the class of homicide.

Homicide is sometimes committed by the mouth. Hence Augustine says: “Those who think that only people who kill a human being with their hands are murderers dangerously deceive themselves. Rather, those through whose counsel, fraud, or exhortation human beings are destroyed are also murderers.” This is in On Penance, distinction 1, The Same. When you persuade your brother to evil, namely to commit a mortal sin, you kill him spiritually.

Sometimes homicide is committed by deed, and this occurs in many ways. Hence Augustine says: “When a human being is killed by another human being, it makes a great difference whether this is done from a desire to harm or to take something unjustly, as by an enemy or a robber; in the order of vengeance or obedience, as by a judge or an executioner; or from the necessity of escaping or bringing aid, as when a robber is killed by a traveler or an enemy by a soldier.

“Sometimes the one who was the cause of the death is more at fault than the one who kills. An example is a person who deceives his surety, and the latter lawfully pays the penalty for him. Nevertheless, not everyone who is the cause of another’s death is guilty. For example, suppose that someone solicits another for fornication and, if he does not obtain it, kills himself; or that a son, fearing his father’s pious blows, dies by throwing himself from a height; or that another person inflicts death upon himself because a man has been freed or so that someone else will not be freed, and so forth. When these things occur, we ought to grieve for them with human sorrow, but we must not repress the will of those who act rightly merely to keep such things from happening.” Thus Augustine speaks in Cause 23, question 5, When a Human Being Is Killed by a Human Being.

The sixth commandment is: “You shall not commit adultery.” Isidore says upon Exodus that this means no one should unite with other women outside the covenants of marriage in order to satisfy lust. This is in Cause 32, question 6, You Shall Not Commit Adultery.

Augustine says in his book On the Ten Chords: “‘You shall not commit adultery’ means: you shall not go to any woman other than your wife. You demand this from your wife and are unwilling to render it to her. Although you ought to precede your wife in virtue, since chastity is a virtue, you fall under a single assault of lust. You wish your wife to be victorious while you lie conquered. Although you are the head of your wife, she whose head you are precedes you toward God.” Thus Augustine speaks in Cause 32, question 6, You Shall Not Commit Adultery.

Augustine expounds this commandment more completely in his book Questions on Deuteronomy, where he says: “The Lord prohibits there being prostitutes and going to prostitutes, whose shame is publicly for sale.” The gloss there says that this is contained in the Lord’s words, “There shall be no prostitute among the daughters of Israel, nor any male prostitute.”

The text continues: “In the Decalogue, however, the Lord does not appear to have openly prohibited this under the name of adultery, because adultery is ordinarily understood to mean only violation of marriage.” And below: “But just as under the name of theft every unlawful usurpation of another’s property is understood to be prohibited, the whole being understood from a part, so also under the name of adultery every unlawful act of intercourse and every illegitimate use of those members must certainly be understood to be prohibited.” Thus Augustine speaks in Cause 32, question 4, Meretrices.

Jerome also says against Jovinian, in Cause 32, question 7: “Natural use is lawful, as in marriage; it is unlawful, as in adultery; but what is against nature is always unlawful and without doubt more shameful and disgraceful.” The Apostle censured this both in males and in females, namely in Romans 1.

The seventh commandment is: “You shall not steal.” Augustine says in his book Questions on Exodus: “It is punishable to take something secretly; to seize it openly is deserving of a much greater penalty. Therefore, taking something from an unwilling person, whether secretly or openly, has its own commandment, for under the name of theft every unlawful usurpation of another’s property is understood. He who prohibited theft did not permit robbery; he wished robbery also to be understood. For by a part he signified the whole: whatever of one’s neighbor’s possessions is taken unlawfully.” This is in Cause 14, question 5, Penale.

Jerome also says: “Let everyone learn that it is a sin resembling robbery if someone does not return things he has found.” This is in Cause 14, question 5, Multi. Ambrose says: “If anyone accepts usury, he commits robbery; he does not live the life”--namely, the life of grace. This is in Cause 14, question 4.

Augustine likewise says: “We judge that the things taken contrary to the law of human society by thefts, robberies, calumnies, oppressions, and invasions are to be returned rather than given”--namely, to the poor--“following the example of Zacchaeus, who said, ‘If I have defrauded anyone,’ and so forth, ‘I restore it.’” This is in Cause 14, question 5, Non sane. As the same Augustine says in question 6, If Property: “The sin is not forgiven unless what was taken is restored, if it can be restored.”

The eighth commandment is: “You shall not speak false testimony against your neighbor.” Augustine says in The City of God: “Because everyone receives from himself the rule for loving his neighbor, when it is said, ‘You shall love your neighbor as yourself,’ a person who falsely confesses against himself is no less guilty of false testimony than if he did this against his neighbor.” This is in Cause 22, question 5, Si non licet.

This commandment prohibits not only false testimony in court but also false testimony outside court in common speech, as when someone detracts from his neighbor. As Pope Adrian says in Cause 6, question 1: “Those who corrupt the life and conduct of good people”--namely, by detraction--“are worse than those who plunder the substance and estates of others.”

Not only detraction but also lying is prohibited, as the Master sets down near the end of Book III of the Sentences, because a word is the testimony of what is in the heart. Nevertheless, not every lie is a mortal sin. It is mortal when it is contrary to God’s honor and to things pertaining to the faith and the good conduct necessary for salvation, or when one’s neighbor is harmed notably in soul, reputation, or substance. Augustine sets down eight kinds of lies in Cause 22, question 2, Primum.

The ninth commandment concerns the will: “You shall not covet your neighbor’s wife.” From Christ’s saying, “Whoever looks at a woman in order to lust after her has already committed adultery in his heart,” Augustine shows openly that adultery is committed by sight alone when an unmarried woman is shamefully desired. This is in Cause 32, question 5, Whoever Looks.

In On Penance, distinction 1, Si cui, Augustine also says that if someone has the will to know another man’s wife but does not act because of impediments, he is no less guilty than if he were caught in the deed. This is true before God and with respect to the kind of sin--that is, each is mortal--although the unfulfilled will is not equally grave.

The same must be said of the tenth commandment, namely that a deliberate desire to take another person’s possessions in any unlawful manner is mortal just as the deed is, although it is not equally grave. This is the meaning of the chapter Si propterea in On Penance, distinction 1: the intention is reckoned as the deed.

Thus, in the tenth commandment an unlawful desire for another person’s property is prohibited, just as the ninth prohibits an unlawful desire for any carnal vice. In this they are distinguished from the sixth and seventh commandments, which prohibit the external acts. A deliberate desire contrary to any of the other commandments, such as the desire for homicide or perjury, is also mortal, and the prohibition of that desire is included under the commandment itself. But in these two matters--namely, the concupiscence of the flesh and of temporal possessions--the desire itself was specifically prohibited in addition to the external deed because the mind takes more delight in desires of this kind than in other things.

All these commandments are treated at length in the First Part, in the title on the Mosaic law, and still more fully in the Second Part, under different titles and chapters according to the subject matter of the vices.

The things that follow in the text, namely the construction of the tabernacle and the things belonging to it--its boards, curtains, vessels, and other things--are all full of mysteries. They signify the Church and the different states and conditions of the faithful. Some exposition of these matters, as regards the tabernacle, is contained in the First Part, in the title on the Mosaic law. That these things were figures of things to come is found in On Consecration, distinction 1, at the beginning.

The tabernacle that God commanded to be made through Moses, as will be said below, signifies the Church Militant, or the synagogue in which the Church existed under the Old Testament. For just as that tabernacle was portable and was transferred from place to place, so the Church Militant is transferred by the doctors, through the teaching of the faith, from one region to another when people are converted to the faith. At last it is brought to a fixed place, namely the Church Triumphant, just as that tabernacle or ark was brought to Jerusalem with great solemnity.

The synagogue was also changed into the Church converted from the Gentiles. This was signified by Solomon's temple, built by Jews and Gentiles--namely, with the aid of Hiram, king of Tyre--through Christ. The sacraments of the Old Law signified the sacraments of the New Law. Aaron's priesthood signified Christ's true priesthood of the New Testament. The other ceremonial precepts signified the good conduct of Christians; the Jews' feasts signified the solemnities of Christians; and all that Jewish worship signified the just and holy life of the faithful. These matters are fully treated in the First Part, in the title on the Mosaic law; they may be seen there.

§ VII: On Leviticus

Jerome says that Leviticus has as many mysteries as it has words, for almost the whole book treats the ceremonial precepts, especially sacrifices. These signified Christ's Passion and the mortification of vices among the Christian people.

Thus the first nine chapters treat the different kinds of sacrifices and their modes, or the ceremonies to be observed in them. Chapter 10 relates that Nadab and Abihu, two priestly sons of Aaron, took their censers and put into them fire not from the altar but another fire that had been procured. When they presumed to offer incense before the Lord, they were miraculously consumed by fire sent by the Lord. After they had died, they were carried out of the tabernacle and buried, while Aaron and his other sons continued their sacrifices.

Chapter 11 treats the observances concerning foods. It explains which foods they could eat as clean and from which they were required to abstain as unclean.

Second Title

Chapter Four: The Deeds of Moses

Chapter 12 of Leviticus treats the sacrifice of a woman after childbirth and the requirement that, after giving birth to a male child, she abstain for forty days from approaching the tabernacle.

Chapter 13 treats the many kinds of leprosy, namely of the flesh, hair, garment, and house. It explains how the priest was to conduct himself in judging it, by what signs he was to judge, and what was to be done with lepers, namely that they were to be separated from others.

Chapter 14 sets down the sacrifice to be offered by a leper when he happened to be cleansed from leprosy. Chapter 15 treats how a person suffering a flow of seed was to conduct himself and the sacrifice to be offered when he was healed. It also treats how a woman menstruating either naturally or continuously was unclean.

Chapter 16 treats the solemn sacrifice to be offered on the feast of propitiation, namely two goats, of which one was sent into the desert and the other offered, together with a red heifer from which the ashes of sprinkling were made. On that day alone, once each year, the high priest entered the Holy of Holies.

Chapter 17 prohibits the eating of any blood or of anything that died by itself. Chapter 18 sets down the degrees of consanguinity and affinity within which, according to the law, people were required to abstain from contracting marriage with one another.

Chapter 19 sets down certain moral precepts that are reduced to the Decalogue and certain ceremonial observances. Chapter 20 prohibits certain vices under pain of death, especially those pertaining to lust and superstitions.

Chapter 21 treats certain observances to be kept by priests in contracting marriage and in other matters, and requires them to be free from certain bodily defects. Chapter 22 prohibits the people from eating things sanctified to the Lord and declares that animals offered in sacrifice had to be free from certain blemishes and defects.

Chapter 23 treats the solemnities to be celebrated, especially Passover or the feast of Unleavened Bread, Pentecost or the Feast of Weeks, the Feast of Booths or Tabernacles, and also the Feast of Propitiation, together with the sacrifices and other observances to be kept in them.

Chapter 24 treats the oil to be procured for lighting lamps in the temple, the changing of the twelve loaves of proposition, and the blasphemer who, when discovered, was stoned by the people at God's command.

Chapter 25 treats the observance of the Jubilee, namely the fiftieth year. In that year the lands were not to be cultivated, slaves became free, things that had been sold returned to their possessors, and many other matters of this kind were observed.

In chapter 26 the Lord promises many temporal goods--peace, victory, and abundance--to those who observe the law, but many great scourges if they transgress it. Chapter 27, the last, treats vows, the redemption of vows, and the obligation of vows and also of oaths.

§ VIII: On the Book of Numbers

In chapter 1 the Lord caused all males twenty years old and above who were fit for war to be numbered. From all the tribes of Israel six hundred thousand five hundred and fifty were found, excluding the tribe of Levi. The twelve princes of the tribes were also designated. The Levites, however, were twenty-two thousand.

In chapter 2 the Lord commanded that, when they encamped and settled in another place, they should arrange themselves around the tabernacle in such a way that three tribes encamped on the east, the first of which was the tribe of Judah; three on the west; three on the south; and three on the north, with their princes.

In chapter 3 He commanded that the Levites should likewise encamp all around the tabernacle, in the middle between the people and the tabernacle: one part on the east, one part on the west, one part on the south, and one part on the north.

Chapter 4 explains how, when they departed from one place for another, Aaron and his sons were to cover everything in the tabernacle with hyacinth-colored skins or other materials, and to assign different things to different men to be carried.

Chapter 5 treats the expulsion of lepers from the camp and the sacrifice of jealousy. Chapter 6 treats the vow of the Nazirites, the things they were to observe, their sacrifice when the vow had been completed, and the form of blessing to be given to the people by the priests.

Chapter 7 explains how, on the day the tabernacle was erected, the twelve princes of the tribes offered sacrifices, one on each successive day. Chapter 8 treats the arrangement of the lamps of the lampstand in the tabernacle, the application of the Levites to the worship of the temple in place of the firstborn of Israel, and their sanctification.

In chapter 9 the Lord commanded that whoever had not celebrated Passover at its proper time because of some impediment--namely on the fourteenth day of the first month--should make good the omission on the fourteenth day of the second month. It also relates that a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night remained over the tabernacle. While it remained fixed, the people stayed there, arranged as described above; when it moved, they too departed from the place and followed it.

In chapter 10 Moses, at God's command, caused two silver trumpets to be made. They had four uses: to summon the multitude, to call the princes of the tribes, for war, and at the Kalends and solemnities. When the cloud over the tabernacle moved, they departed from Sinai into the desert of Paran. As the trumpets sounded, the tribe of Judah was the first to set out on the journey, and the other tribes followed successively.

In chapter 11 the people murmured and burned with desire for meat. Remembering the foods of Egypt, they grew weary of manna. Because of this, Moses, wearied, asked for helpers to govern the people. Seventy elders were appointed to assist his government. Two of them, Eldad and Medab, did not present themselves before Moses out of humility, but prophesied among the people in the camp.

The Lord sent quails. But, as the Psalm says, "While their food was still in their mouths, the anger of God rose upon them," and fire sent from heaven burned up those gluttons.

Chapter 12 describes the murmuring of the prophetess Miriam and Aaron against Moses because of his Ethiopian wife, Miriam's punishment with leprosy for eight days, and her cleansing.

In chapter 13 they proceeded from Paran to Kadesh-barnea. From there Moses, by the Lord's command, sent twelve scouts, one from each tribe, to examine the Promised Land so that they might report its quality to the people and bring back some of its fruits. They went and traversed the whole land. After forty days they returned, praising the land but saying that they could not obtain it because of the strength of those peoples and their impregnable cities.

In chapter 14, when the people heard this, they began to lament and murmur against Moses and Aaron for having led them out of Egypt, and they considered returning to Egypt. Caleb and Joshua alone, from among those twelve scouts, contradicted the other ten. They comforted and encouraged the people to go into that land because the Lord would give it to them. The people, angered against those two, therefore wished as though to stone them.

The Lord in His anger wished to kill the people with pestilence, but when Moses prayed for them, the Lord was appeased. Nevertheless, He said that none of those twenty years old and above who had been numbered at the departure from Egypt would enter the Promised Land except Caleb and Joshua. The other ten scouts, who had caused the murmuring, died. The Lord therefore commanded them to return through the desert.

When the people wished to proceed toward the Promised Land contrary to Moses' ordinance, the Amalekites and Canaanites rose against them, defeated them, and compelled them to return.

Chapter 15 treats certain sacrifices to be made and their manner, the offering of the first fruits, the wearing of hyacinth-colored fringes upon garments, and a man who gathered wood on the Sabbath, whom the Lord commanded to be stoned.

Chapter 16 relates that Dathan, Abiram, and Korah, with two hundred and fifty Levites, began to murmur against Moses and Aaron because, they said, Moses and Aaron had usurped the leadership of the people and the high priesthood for themselves. When Moses summoned Dathan and Abiram and they excused themselves from coming at his word, the earth opened and swallowed them.

Korah and his two hundred and fifty followers offered incense in their censers with Aaron in the tabernacle. Fire came forth from the Lord and burned Korah with his followers. When the people murmured against Moses and Aaron because they had killed those men, fire devoured many of the people. But Aaron stood among them offering incense with a censer, and the plague ceased.

Chapter 17 relates that Moses commanded the twelve princes of the tribes to bring rods. Moses placed all the rods, together with Aaron's rod, in the tabernacle. Aaron's rod alone was found to have budded, produced flowers, and borne almonds. By this sign it was shown to the people that Aaron possessed the priesthood by the Lord's will.

In chapter 18 the Lord established that Aaron and all qualified Levites should serve in the tabernacle. They were to be content with the tithes, first fruits, and portions of the sacrifices that fell to them, so that they would otherwise have no possessions among the children of Israel. The Levites themselves were to give a tithe of the tithe to the high priest.

Chapter 19 treats the sacrifice of the red heifer that was to be burned. From its ashes was made the water of expiation, and the chapter explains from which impurities people were purified by those ashes.

Chapter 20 relates how Miriam died and how, when the people murmured because they lacked water, the Lord commanded Moses to strike the rock with his staff before the multitude. Because Moses and Aaron failed through unbelief, the rock produced no water when it was struck the first time, but did so the second time. On account of this unbelief, the Lord told Moses and Aaron that they would not enter the Promised Land.

Moses also sent messengers to the king of Edom, asking him to allow them to pass through his land. He refused and came against them in war, so they turned away from him. When they came to Mount Hor, Aaron died and was buried there. His son Eleazar was made high priest in his place.

Chapter 21 contains the victory the Israelites gained over the king of the Canaanites, Sihon king of the Amorites, and Og king of Bashan. These kings were unwilling to permit them passage and instead came to battle against them.

Moreover, when many of the people murmured because they had become weary from the labor of the journey, the Lord sent serpents among them whose bites killed them. But at the Lord's command a bronze serpent was made and placed on high; anyone who had been bitten and looked upon it was healed.

Chapter 22 says that, when the people of Israel came into the plains of Moab, Balak, king of the Moabites, sent messengers to the soothsayer Balaam, asking him to come curse God's people. At first Balaam was unwilling to go because he had been forbidden in dreams. But when the messengers returned a second time, he undertook the journey. On the way, as he urged the ass to proceed along the straight road, the ass upon which he sat spoke; afterward Balaam saw an angel with a drawn sword.

Chapters 23 and 24 relate that Balaam, after offering sacrifices to demons--for he was a soothsayer--began to speak in praise of the people of Israel and to bless them. He did this three times in different places from which he could see the people of Israel. Among other things he prophesied, "A star shall arise from Jacob," and so forth. After leaving Balak, he gave him evil counsel, namely how to induce Israel to commit fornication.

Chapter 25 relates that the children of Israel fornicated with the Midianite women and adored their idols. Because of this, the Lord commanded that the twelve princes of the tribes be hanged. Phinehas, son of Eleazar, struck and killed one of the children of Israel while he was fornicating with a Midianite woman, and thereby appeased the Lord's anger. Twenty-three thousand Israelites fell because of this evil.

In chapter 26 the Lord again commanded that all males twenty years old and above be numbered by their individual tribes. In all, six hundred and one thousand seven hundred and thirty were found. They had not been numbered at the departure from Egypt, because all those previously numbered had died in the desert except Joshua and Caleb. The Lord declared that possession of the land should be given to the aforesaid tribes according to the lots that fell to them.

In chapter 27 the five daughters of Zelophehad asked for an inheritance. The Lord commanded that they be given the portion that would have fallen to their father and handed down a rule for the order of succession to an inheritance when someone died without male children.

Afterward He commanded Moses to ascend Mount Abarim and from there to look upon the land promised to the fathers, which he would not enter because of his unbelief at the Waters of Contradiction. He also commanded that Moses appoint Joshua as leader of the people in his place; in matters to be done, Joshua was to consult Eleazar the high priest. Moses died there.

Chapters 28 and 29 mention the sacrifices to be offered and their observances or modes. First they treat the daily holocaust, namely two lambs to be offered on the altar, one in the morning and the other in the evening; then the sacrifice to be made at the Kalends; and then the sacrifices to be made at the solemnities of Passover, Pentecost, Tabernacles, and the Feast of Propitiation.

Chapter 30 treats vows and oaths made by women while they are in their parents' house, married, or widowed, and explains how or when they can be made void by parents or husbands.

In chapter 31 many thousands from Israel were sent at the Lord's command to wage war against the Midianites. They defeated and killed all of them except the virgin women, captured the cities, took exceedingly great plunder, and divided it among everyone. With the others they also killed Balaam the soothsayer.

In chapter 32 the tribe of Reuben, the tribe of Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh asked to be given possessions and dwelling places there, on this side of the Jordan. After rebuking them, Moses granted the request on the condition that they cross the Jordan to fight with the others until they obtained the Promised Land.

Chapter 33 treats the forty stopping places made in the desert over forty years and gives their names. Chapter 34 treats the boundaries of the Promised Land they were to possess and names those who were to divide the land among the tribes.

Chapter 35 treats the cities, towns, and suburbs that they were to give to the Levites, and the cities of refuge, three on this side of the Jordan and three beyond the Jordan. Chapter 36, the last, commands that men and women contract marriage only within their own tribe, lest an inheritance pass from tribe to tribe and the tribes thereby be confused and intermingled.

Second Title

Chapter Four: The Deeds of Moses

§ IX: On the Book of Deuteronomy

The book of Deuteronomy is called the "second law" because it is, as it were, a recapitulation of the law, but with many additions and explanations of the moral, judicial, and ceremonial precepts.

In chapter 27 Moses ordained that six of the tribes should ascend Mount Gerizim and that the Levites there, crying aloud, should invoke against transgressors of the law the many curses written in that place. Conversely, six other tribes were to ascend Mount Ebal, and the Levites, crying aloud, were to invoke the many blessings concerning temporal things that are narrated in chapter 28 upon those who observe the law.

Chapter 31 contains the song "Hear, O heavens." Chapter 33 contains the blessings that Moses gave to the individual tribes before his death. The final chapter relates how Moses, ascending Mount Nebo at God's command, was shown the Promised Land by the Lord. He was gathered to his fathers, and his grave was not found. All Israel mourned him for thirty days, and Joshua assumed the leadership of the people. Jerome, commenting on Amos, says that Moses was taken up into paradise with Enoch.

§ X: In the Time of Moses

Helinand says that Abderas reigned in Crete. He founded a city and called it Abderas after his own name. The philosopher Democritus came from that city.

In Crete a certain most ancient king named Gargaris was the first to discover the practice of gathering honey. When his daughter had conceived a son through incest, out of shame for the crime she commanded that he first be exposed to various wild beasts so that he would be killed, and afterward to the waves of the sea. But the waves cast him onto the shore, and deer nourished him. At last he was caught in a snare with the deer among which he lived and was brought to the king. The king recognized and pitied him, appointed him as his successor, and gave him the name Avidis. He established laws for the people, taught them to tame oxen for the plow, and taught them to seek grain from the furrow.

In the thirty-fifth year of Moses, Cecrops reigned in Attica. From him until the capture of Troy were 375 years. From that time--that is, after the aforesaid year--is marked the beginning of the Athenian kingdom. While Cecrops reigned, Minerva was born, and from Minerva's name, which in Greek is called Athena, those regions were called Athens.

Seventeen kings succeeded Cecrops, one after another over many years. The last of them was Codrus, who was killed in the Peloponnesian War, something he himself arranged. For when an answer had been received from the gods that the army whose king was killed in battle would have the victory, Codrus wished his own army to have victory. He changed his appearance so that he would not be recognized, approached the enemy army, fought with one man, and was killed by him. When the victory had been obtained, the rule of the Cecropidae, which had lasted 437 years, was destroyed. After Codrus there were successively thirteen other kings at Athens; afterward there were princes and magistrates, and finally nine princes who were changed annually.

In the time of Moses, the first Hercules is reputed to have defeated Antaeus in a wrestling contest. Cecrops was the first who, when sacrificing an ox, called upon Jupiter. Deucalion began to reign among them and dwelt near Parnassus. In those days occurred the flood in Thessaly under Deucalion, the conflagration caused by Phaethon in Ethiopia, and many local pestilences, as Plato records. A temple to Apollo at Delphi was built by Cecrops.

Chapter Five

The book of Joshua contains the things done under his leadership over the people of Israel.

Chapter 1 relates that Joshua, appointed by the Lord as leader of the people after Moses, was encouraged by Him not to fear, because He would assist him in leading the people into the Promised Land. The Lord commanded him to observe God's law and imitate Moses' footsteps. All the people declared that they wished to obey him.

In chapter 2 Joshua sent scouts to explore Jericho. Rahab the prostitute received and concealed them in her house. They promised immunity to her, her household, and her family if she placed a scarlet sign in the window. She secretly let them depart.

Chapter 3 relates that they crossed the Jordan after a way had been made miraculously, with the Levites carrying the ark in front. Chapter 4 relates that after they had left the Jordan, Joshua caused twelve stones to be taken from the river and placed at Gilgal, and twelve others to be placed in the middle of the Jordan, as a memorial of the deed.

In chapter 5 circumcision was performed at Gilgal, because those born in the desert had not yet been circumcised. They celebrated Passover on the fourteenth day of the first month. They ate from the fruits of the land, and the manna by which they had been fed for forty years ceased.

Joshua saw an angel with a drawn sword, who told him that he had come to assist him. At God's command the fighting men circled the closed city of Jericho, sounding trumpets: once on each of six days, and seven times on the seventh. Jericho's walls fell entirely. Entering, they killed everyone and consigned the possessions to fire, except for Rahab's house and those with her.

Chapter 7 relates that when they proceeded to battle against Ai, they were put to flight and some were killed. When Joshua prayed because of this, it was revealed that something from what had been put under the ban at Jericho had been taken. When the culprit was sought by lots, Achor was found. He confessed the theft and was stoned by the people.

Chapter 8 relates that they obtained Ai through an ambush, pretending to flee so that they might lead everyone out of the city. When all had been killed, they captured the city and hanged its king.

Chapter 9 relates that the Gibeonites, pretending that they came from distant regions, entered into a covenant of peace with the Israelites and confirmed it with an oath. When the pious deception was uncovered, the Israelites preserved them because of the oath, although they subjected them to a certain servitude.

Chapter 10 relates that five kings came to besiege the Gibeonites because they had entered into a covenant with Israel. When the Gibeonites asked Joshua for aid, Joshua proceeded with his men against the five kings and defeated them. While he pursued them in flight and the sun approached its setting, at his prayer and request the sun and moon remained fixed in heaven for a great space of time. Finally, Joshua caused those five kings to be brought out from a cave in which they had hidden and hanged upon wood.

Chapter 11 relates that he captured many cities, killed the peoples and their kings, and subjected many places to fire and sword. Chapter 12 relates that he defeated and killed thirty-one kings who reigned in various cities in the Promised Land and captured their cities.

From chapter 13 through chapter 20 it is contained how Joshua and Eleazar the high priest, with the twelve princes of the tribes, divided the Promised Land among nine tribes and half the tribe of Manasseh, assigning to each its portion of cities and places. The land beyond the Jordan had already been given by Moses to the other two tribes--Reuben and Gad--and half of Manasseh.

Chapter 15 relates that Achsah, daughter of Caleb and betrothed to Othniel, at her own sighing and request received from her father the upper and lower watered ground. Chapter 20 designates the cities of refuge to which a person who had killed someone by accident could flee and remain safe until the death of the high priest.

In chapter 21 cities with suburbs but no other territory are assigned to the Levites, because in place of territory they were to have tithes, first fruits, and offerings.

In chapter 22 Joshua gave the two and a half tribes permission to return to the land granted to them beyond the Jordan. Near the Jordan they made an altar of immense size. Because of this, Joshua and the others suspected them of idolatry and sent messengers. When they learned from them that they had made the altar not for sacrificing, but as a memorial that they belonged to the people of Israel, they were pacified.

In chapters 23 and 24 Joshua, now old, gathered the people and encouraged them to observe the law and worship the true God, recalling the benefits God had bestowed upon them. They pledged themselves to obey God. Joshua then died at the age of 110 years. According to Vincent's History, he held the leadership of the people and governed them for twenty-six years. Cariatha, or Thana-saxa, was given to him as a possession, and according to Josephus, Shechem also. Joseph's bones, which the children of Israel had brought with them from Egypt, were placed in Shechem.

From the foregoing it appears that the rights of the firstborn consisted principally of three things: the firstborn possessed the kingdom, the priesthood, and the right to divide the inheritance.

The first, namely the kingdom, was given to the tribe of Judah. This appeared most fully in David, and much more in Christ, who reigns over all things. Judah merited this at the Red Sea, because when the others hesitated, Judah was the first tribe to enter the sea after Moses. The second, namely the priesthood, was given to the tribe of Levi. The third, namely the right to divide, was given to the tribe of Ephraim, because Joshua, who divided the land, belonged to the tribe of Ephraim.

§ I: After Moses and Joshua

The judges succeeded as leaders among the people. They possessed no regular jurisdiction over them and did not rule as Moses and Joshua had done. Rather, in their tribulations the people employed the judges' counsel and prudence.

It should be known that in the chronology of the Judges, a period of Jewish affliction is often placed between two judges. According to the Hebrews, the durations of these afflictions are added to the years of the later judges so that one may obtain precisely the number of 480 years from the departure from Egypt until the building of the temple, which is counted in the Third Book of Kings.

Thus, after Joshua's death foreigners held the Jews in subjection for eight years. According to the Hebrews, those years are joined to the time of Othniel, the first judge. Again, eighteen years of servitude are read between Othniel and Ehud, and according to them these are counted within Ehud's time. Similarly there are twenty years after Ehud, seven after Deborah, eighteen after Jair, and forty after Abdon. All these years counted together make 111.

Finally, if they are numbered separately from the years of the judges and together with them, there are 601 years from the departure from Egypt until the foundation of the temple. This count includes the ten years of Abialon, which are not contained in the Septuagint. We, however, following Eusebius the chronographer and in part the Hebrews, will number the years of the judges so as to obtain precisely the smaller number read in the Third Book of Kings. Thus Vincent's History.

Josephus says that the history of Micah's idol and of the Levite's violated wife, on account of which war followed and the tribe of Benjamin was almost destroyed, is narrated at the end of the book of Judges, but that these things happened after Joshua's death and before Othniel.

In the time of Joshua, Jupiter--who was regarded as a god among the pagans--shamefully united with Europa, daughter of the Phoenician king of Tyre and Sidon.

In Othniel's time Cadmus reigned at Thebes. From his daughter Semele was born Dionysius, Father Liber, under whom Linus the Theban was a musician. The things told of Demeter, whom they say was Isis, and of Danae, from whom Perseus was born, also happened in these times.

In the time of the judge Ehud, Erechtheus reigned at Athens as its sixth king. Boreas the Thracian carried away his daughter Orithyia; the fable invents that Boreas was a wind. The fable of Proserpina also belongs to this time.

In the time of the judge Deborah, Midas reigned in Phrygia. Ilium was founded by Ilus. The kingdom of the Argives came to an end and was transferred to Mycenae, where Perseus first reigned in the time of Gideon, judge of Israel.

Orpheus the Thracian was famous; his disciple was Musaeus. Linus also, the teacher of Hercules, became known to everyone. Hercules completed his contests, killed Antaeus, and laid Ilium waste. Varro, in Book IV of Divine Things, thinks that Hercules is called "victor" because he conquered every kind of animal.

But Hercules, the son of Jupiter, who was unconquered by other men, was subjected to the woman Omphale, who made him spin wool and perform women's tasks. Albert says of the same man that, after defeating Geryon and coming to Italy, Hercules was received by Evander, who was then king. When Hercules said that he was Jupiter's son and proved his valor by the death of Cacus, he was regarded as a divinity and earned the altar called the Great Altar, which was given to him. The Delphic Apollo had foretold that this would be his in Italy.

At last Hercules fell into a pestilential disease and, to remedy his pain, cast himself into the flames and so died. Hence Seneca, in his final tragedy, calls Hercules “Oetaean,” from Mount Oeta, upon which he was burned. Behold what kind of god the Gentiles had: effeminate and utterly unable to endure suffering.

The fabulous poets also hand down that this Hercules killed the serpent Hydra, which had nine heads and possessed the property that, when one was cut off, seven arose. Hence Hercules burned it. But the truth of the matter is that Hydra was a place that discharged waters and laid waste a neighboring city. When one channel was closed, many other channels broke out. Seeing this, Hercules burned those places and thus closed the channels of the water. For Hydra is named from water. According to Ambrose, it signifies heresy. Hercules lived until or about the time of Jephthah, judge of Israel. Thus Vincent’s History.

§ II: The Judges after Joshua

The first judge was Othniel, Caleb’s brother. But before his time, chapter 1 of the book of Judges relates that the tribe of Judah and the tribe of Simeon went up together into battle against the Canaanites and defeated them. They captured King Adoni-bezek and cut off the extremities of his hands and feet. He said that the Lord had justly done this, because he himself had held seventy captured kings, with the extremities of their hands and feet cut off, beneath his table.

Achsah, Othniel’s wife, received from her father Caleb the upper and lower watered ground, as she had requested. It is also related there that the children of Israel did not entirely destroy those peoples in the Promised Land, but made many of them tributaries. The Lord permitted them not to be wholly destroyed so that He might train Israel through them.

Chapter 2 relates that an angel of the Lord appeared, rebuked them for transgressing the law, reproached them with the benefits bestowed upon them by the Lord, and moved them to weeping. There it is related generally how they repeatedly withdrew from God and for this reason were handed over in servitude to various tyrants; when they repented, they were freed by different judges, but after their deliverance they often relapsed into evil.

The first judge who freed them from the hand of Chushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, whom Israel had served for eight years, was Othniel. The land rested for forty years.

When they returned to evil, they were handed over for eighteen years into the hands of Eglon, king of the Moabites, and also into the hands of the Ammonites and Amalekites. But when they cried out to the Lord, they were freed by Ehud. Pretending that he wished to speak to King Eglon in a private chamber, Ehud killed him with a sword. Escaping through a rear door, he gathered an army and killed very many Moabites. The land rested for eighty years.

In chapter 4 Shamgar, the third judge, killed six hundred Philistines who wished to enter their territory, using a plowshare.

Second Title

Chapter Five

§ II: The Judges after Joshua

After this, when the children of Israel did evil, they were handed over into the hands of Jabin, king of Canaan, whose commander of the army was Sisera. Barak engaged him in battle at the persuasion of the prophetess Deborah and with her accompanying him. The Lord terrified Sisera’s army. Sisera fled from the battle and hid in the house of Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite. While he slept, Jael drove a nail through his temples. Chapter 5 contains Deborah’s song, which she made in thanksgiving to the Lord for the victory of His people.

In chapter 6, when they returned to their former iniquities, they were handed over for seven years into the hands of the Midianites, whose princes were Oreb, Zeb, Zebah, and Zalmunna. But they were freed through Gideon, the fifth judge.

An angel appeared to Gideon while he was threshing wheat and foretold the deliverance that would be accomplished through him. The angel touched with his staff the meat, broth, and unleavened bread Gideon had placed upon a rock, and kindled a fire that consumed them. After this, as a sign of the future victory, Gideon asked that a fleece placed on the threshing floor be filled with dew while the floor remained dry, and then, in turn, that the opposite occur. All this was done.

Chapter 7 relates that, from the army gathered with Gideon, twenty-two thousand first withdrew because they were fearful. Second, the ten thousand who remained with him were led to the river to drink. Only those who did not kneel but brought water to their mouths with their hands while drinking were chosen. These were only three hundred, and with them Gideon waged war against the Midianites.

He was strengthened by a dream that he heard recounted in the enemy camp, namely that someone had seen a hearth-baked loaf strike the camp of Midian. When those three hundred sounded their trumpets, broke their earthen vessels against one another, and revealed the lighted lamps, the Midianites awoke from sleep and fled, killing one another in mutual slaughter.

Chapter 8 relates that the Israelites pursued them in flight. The men of the tribe of Ephraim quarreled with Gideon because he had not called them to the battle, but he placated them with humble and courteous words.

After 120,000 Midianites, together with Oreb and Zeb, had been killed, the five thousand who had escaped with Zebah and Zalmunna were resting as though secure. The Israelites killed these also. After plunder had been taken from the spoils, Gideon made an ephod from the golden rings given to him, and in it the people fornicated away from God. Gideon judged for forty years.

Chapter 9 relates that Abimelech, Gideon's illegitimate son, persuaded the men of Shechem to kill his seventy brothers, Gideon's legitimate sons, so that he alone might rule. They did so, beheading them upon a single stone, except for the youngest, named Jotham, who hid.

Jotham told the Shechemites a parable about the trees that went to the vine, the fig tree, the olive tree, and finally the bramble--that is, a thorn--to make one of them their king. Later, when Abimelech entered into conflict with the Shechemites, he set fire beneath the tower of Shechem, causing a thousand people to die. Finally, while Abimelech himself was besieging Thebez, a woman threw a fragment of a millstone from the wall and struck him on the head. So that he would not appear to have been killed by a woman, he caused his armor-bearer to kill him completely.

In chapter 10 the sixth judge was Tola, of the tribe of Issachar, who judged Israel for twenty-three years. After him the seventh was Jair, who judged for twenty-three years. He had thirty sons who rode upon asses and were princes of thirty cities, to whom he gave wives. After them the Israelites sinned against the Lord and were afflicted in many ways by the Ammonites and Midianites.

In chapter 11 Jephthah, an illegitimate man and a leader of robbers, was made commander of the army by the Gileadites so that he might fight against the Ammonites. Jephthah first sent messengers to the king of Ammon, showing by reason that they unjustly wished to usurp the lands the Lord had granted to Israel. When the king was unwilling to listen to him, Jephthah vowed to offer whatever first came from his house to meet him upon his victorious return. He then advanced against the Ammonites and defeated them.

As Jephthah returned, his virgin daughter came to meet him with a tambourine. To keep his vow, he sacrificed her: foolish in vowing, impious in fulfilling.

In chapter 12 a sedition arose between Ephraim and the Gileadites because Jephthah had not called the Ephraimites to battle against Ammon. Quarreling, they fought one another. The Gileadites occupied the fords of the Jordan. When scattered fugitives from the tribe of Ephraim wished to cross, the Gileadites, in order to learn whether they were Ephraimites, made them say "Shibboleth." When they could not pronounce it but said "Sibboleth," they killed them. Forty-two thousand Ephraimites were killed.

Jephthah, the seventh judge, judged Israel for six years. After him Ibzan of Bethlehem, the eighth judge, judged for seven years and had thirty sons and the same number of daughters. After him Elon the Zebulunite, the ninth, judged for ten years. After Elon, Abdon, the tenth judge, who had forty sons, judged for eight years.

Adding evils to evils, the children of Israel were handed over into the hands of the Philistines for forty years, but they were aided by Samson, the eleventh judge, from the tribe of Dan.

Chapter 13 relates that an angel of the Lord first appeared to Manoah's barren wife and afterward to Manoah himself, signifying to them that they would have a son who would be a Nazirite and would begin to free the people from the hand of the Philistines. When they offered the angel a cooked kid, a fire was kindled and the angel cast himself into the flame and disappeared. Manoah was terrified by this, but his wife comforted him.

Chapter 14 relates that when Samson had grown up, he took a wife from among the Philistines. As he went with his parents to see the Philistine city from which he took his wife, he turned away from his parents and killed a lion. On another occasion he found honey made by bees in the mouth of its corpse.

When the wedding was celebrated, he proposed a riddle to the seven companions who had been given to him. They did not know how to solve it, but Samson's wife importunately extorted its explanation from him. Through their entreaties and threats, the companions induced her to teach it to them.

Chapter 15 contains the account that Samson's father-in-law had given Samson's wife to another man. Because of this, Samson took three hundred foxes, tied them together in pairs by their tails, placed burning torches there, and sent them through the Philistines' fields. They burned all the crops.

Because of this the Israelites bound Samson and handed him over into the Philistines' hands. The Spirit of God suddenly broke his bonds. Taking up an ass's jawbone from the ground, Samson killed a thousand Philistines with it. When he became extremely thirsty from his labor, water came forth from that same jawbone after it had been thrown to the ground, and he drank from it.

Chapter 16 relates that Samson was shut within Gaza, the city to which he had gone down at night. Around midnight he arose, carried away the gates of the city with their bars upon his shoulders, and bore them up a mountain.

Afterward he loved a woman named Delilah in Sorek. At the Philistines' request and promise of money, she investigated through him the source of his great strength. At first he said that it lay in seven fresh sinews if he were bound with them; afterward, in new ropes; and after this, in the seven locks of his head woven into a web and fastened with a pin fixed into the ground. When all these things were tried, he suddenly broke them all.

At last, worn down by her importunity, he revealed that his strength lay in the hair of his head. When it was shaved while he slept in her lap, he was captured and blinded by the Philistines, who kept him in prison.

When a feast arrived in the temple of Dagon, the god of the Philistines, they brought Samson before the people to dance. By then the hair of his head had grown again. Touching the temple's columns, he first prayed and then said, "Let my soul die with the Philistines." The temple collapsed, killing him and a great many Philistines. Samson judged Israel for twenty years.

Chapter 17 relates that a certain man named Micah, from Mount Ephraim, restored to his mother the eleven hundred pieces of silver that she had given him for safekeeping. From them she caused a carved image and certain priestly ornaments to be made, together with a little shrine or chapel in her house.

In chapter 18 the children of Dan, wishing to enlarge their borders, sent messengers or scouts to investigate places more suitable for them. When they turned aside for lodging into Micah's house, the priest explained to them how he came to be staying there. When they returned on another occasion, they took that priest with them and carried away Micah's idol and the other objects. Coming with an army to Laish, they captured its inhabitants, who lived securely and had no alliance with anyone.

Chapter 19 tells of a certain Levite who went to his father-in-law in order to reconcile to himself his wife, who had left him in anger. He was received amicably and departed kindly from him with his reconciled wife. When evening came, they turned aside for lodging at the city of Gibeah.

After a certain man brought him into his house, the city's most wicked men pounded upon the house and demanded that the man be brought out to them so that they might abuse him. When they would not yield to the host who prohibited this with entreaties, the Levite finally sent out to them his concubine--that is, his wife. She is called a concubine because perhaps she had not been taken with the lawful solemnity. They abused her for the entire night, and in the morning she fell dead before the door of the house.

The Levite placed her upon an ass and returned home. He divided her corpse into twelve parts and sent one part to each tribe.

Chapter 20 relates that, abhorring so great a crime, all the tribes gathered and sent messengers to the men of the tribe of Benjamin, demanding that they hand over the men of Gibeah to be punished. The Benjaminites refused and instead gathered to help them, so all the other tribes made war against them.

In the first engagement, the men of Benjamin killed twenty-two thousand of the remaining Israelites. In the second battle the Benjaminites again killed eighteen thousand Israelites; this happened because the Israelites trusted in their multitude. In the third battle, after prayer and humiliation, the Israelites deliberated and killed twenty-five thousand from the tribe of Benjamin. They burned the city of Gibeah and Benjamin's other cities.

Chapter 21, the last, contains the account that the children of Israel gathered at Shiloh and made lamentation for the destruction and extermination of the tribe of Benjamin. Only six hundred men had remained and escaped from them; these had fled into the desert.

When it was discovered that the men of Jabesh-gilead had not obeyed the edict commanding everyone to assemble, but had remained within their own territory, the Israelites sent fighting men against them. They put them to the sword, preserving only the virgins, who numbered four hundred. They gave these as wives to four hundred Benjaminites. They provided for the other two hundred men by allowing them, at a certain solemnity attended by many people, including virgin girls, to take wives for themselves from among those girls. This was done.

But this history of the Levite and the preceding history of Micah are said to have happened between Joshua's time and Othniel's time, in the intervening period.

After the book of Judges comes the book of Ruth, containing seven chapters. It contains the history of an event that occurred in the time of one of the judges, namely Eli the priest, who will be treated below.

Elimelech of Bethlehem in Judah, because of a famine or scarcity, sojourned in the land of the Moabites with his wife Naomi and his two sons, Mahlon and Chilion. Elimelech died there, and his sons married Moabite wives, one named Orpah and the other Ruth.

When those sons, Mahlon and Chilion, had died, Naomi wished to return to Bethlehem. She told her daughters-in-law to return to their parents' homes. Although both wished to follow her, Orpah finally left her. Ruth, however, with a steadfast heart, said that she would never depart from Naomi wherever she went.

Ruth therefore returned with her to Bethlehem. Because they were poor, Ruth went during harvest time into Boaz's field, following the reapers in order to gather the ears that remained. When Boaz learned of her goodness, in the evening he gave her some of the grain that had been gathered.

Finally, because Ruth's former husband had no closer kinsman than Boaz, he freely acknowledged before witnesses that he wished to have her as his wife. The custom then observed in such a matter was kept, namely that the man who yielded his right took off his shoe. Boaz contracted marriage with Ruth the Moabitess, and Obed was born to them. Obed begot Jesse, or Ishai, the father of David.

§ III: On the War of the Greeks against the Trojans, the Destruction of Troy, and Its Cause

According to Book III, chapter 62 of Vincent's History, and according to Helinand, Alexander--who was also called Paris, son of Priam--abducted Helen, wife of Menelaus, in the year in which Jephthah and Hercules died. On account of this a ten-year war arose.

From that year until the fourth year of Ahaz, king of Judah, which is the first year of the City--that is, of the founding of Rome--438 years are found in the chronicles. Nevertheless, according to Augustine, some wrote that Rome was founded under Hezekiah, the son of Ahaz.

Orosius says that 430 years before the City was founded, the Greeks formed a confederacy because of the abduction of Helen, assembled a thousand ships, and afterward conducted a ten-year siege. Dares the Phrygian, who wrote this history, says that there were forty-seven Greek leaders against Troy and that they brought 1,202 ships. Thirty-three leaders came to the aid of Priam, king of Troy.

The summary of the Trojan War from the history of Dares, which Cornelius translated, is as follows. When Castor and Pollux heard that their sister Helen, the most beautiful wife of Menelaus, brother of Agamemnon, had been abducted by Alexander or Paris, they boarded a ship and followed her. When they put out from the Lesbian shore, a very great storm arose, and they were never seen again. The Lesbians searched for them as far as Troy. When they did not find them, they believed that they had been made immortal gods.

The forty-seven Greek leaders therefore assembled at Athens with 1,202 ships. Diomedes and Ulysses were first sent as ambassadors to Priam so that satisfaction might be made for the injury. When the mission produced no result, they fought one another. In the first battle Hector, Priam's son, killed Protesilaus.

In the second battle Hector would have killed Patroclus, Minon, and Ajax the Telamonian, had he not recognized Ajax as being of his own blood. For Ajax was born of Hesione, Priam's sister. The first truce was granted at the Greeks' request for two years.

Second Title

Chapter Five

§ III: On the War of the Greeks against the Trojans, the Destruction of Troy, and Its Cause

In the third battle Hector killed the leaders Boecheus, Archilochus, and Prothenor. In the fourth battle Alexander pierced Menelaus's thigh with an arrow. In the fifth battle Hector killed seven very strong leaders, Aeneas two, Achilles four, and Diomedes two.

In the sixth war they fought for eighty continuous days. The Greeks asked for a second truce of three years. When it was completed, the fighting began again. In the first line of battle Hector killed four very strong leaders. Achilles, who was on the Greek side, killed two men from the Trojan side. They fought for thirty days.

Priam requested a third truce of six months. Agamemnon, who was on the Greek side, then requested a fourth truce of thirty days.

In the ninth war Andromache, Hector's wife, wished to keep Hector back because she had seen in dreams that it was not expedient for him to go out to battle. When she could not do this, she placed their son Astyanax at his feet. But even in this way she did not restrain him.

Hector therefore went out to battle, killed three very strong leaders, and wounded two and a third, Achilles, by whom he was finally killed. The Greeks requested a fifth truce of two months. After the tenth war the Greeks requested a sixth truce for one year.

In the eleventh war Palamedes, who had been made king through an uprising, was killed. In the twelfth war Troilus killed many. In the thirteenth battle they fought for seven continuous days. Agamemnon requested a seventh truce of thirty days.

In the eighteenth war Troilus wounded Achilles, and they fought for seven continuous days. In the nineteenth war Troilus fell from his horse and was killed by Achilles. In the twentieth war Memnon, leader of the Persians, fell. Priam requested a tenth truce of thirty days.

In the twenty-first war Alexander killed Achilles in Apollo's shrine, where he had called him to a conference while feigning a reconciliation. The Greeks therefore requested an eleventh truce. In the twenty-second battle Alexander wounded Ajax; Ajax wounded and killed Alexander, and immediately died from his own wound.

In the twenty-third and twenty-fourth wars Penthesilea, queen of the Amazons, manfully wounded Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, by whom she was finally killed. Antenor, Polydamas, and Aeneas told Priam to make peace. When he refused, they betrayed their homeland.

After Troy had therefore been captured, Agamemnon divided all the booty equally. Thus the fighting at Troy lasted ten years, eight months, and twelve days. As Dares the Phrygian reports, 870,000 Greeks fell. Among the Trojans, 676,000 men fell before the city was betrayed; after it was betrayed, 276,000 Trojans were killed.

Aeneas was carried away in twenty-two ships, the same number with which Alexander had gone to Greece. A company of 3,400 Trojan men followed him. Two thousand five hundred followed Antenor. Helenus, with Cassandra, Andromache, and Hecuba, Priam's wife, sought Crimusium with 1,700 persons.

Homer says that after Troy was captured, Menelaus and his wife Helen turned aside to Thecur, king of Egypt, whom he calls Polybus.

Augustine says as follows about Diomedes and Ulysses with their companions in Book XVIII of The City of God: "When the victorious Greeks left Troy destroyed, they were torn and crushed by various and terrible disasters, and nevertheless they increased the number of their gods from among themselves. For they made even Diomedes a god, though it is reported that, by a punishment divinely inflicted, he did not return to his own people and that his companions were changed into birds. This is confirmed not by a fabulous and poetic lie but by historical attestation. Yet neither he himself, though made a god as they suppose, was able to restore their human nature, nor did he, as a new inhabitant of heaven, obtain this from his king Jupiter." Thus Augustine.

A little later Augustine adds: "In order to establish this, Varro recalls other things no less incredible about that great and most famous Circe, who changed Ulysses' companions into beasts, and about Arcadians who, after being chosen by lot, entered a certain lake and were there changed into wolves. They lived with similar wild beasts in the wildernesses of that region. If they did not feed on human flesh, after nine years they returned to the same lake and were restored to human beings," and so forth.

"When we were in Italy, we heard similar things about a certain region in those parts. They said that innkeeping women imbued with these evil arts customarily gave such cheese to whichever travelers they wished or could affect. The travelers were immediately changed into pack animals, carried whatever loads were necessary, and, after the work had been completed, returned to themselves again. Their minds, however, did not become bestial; their rational and human minds were preserved.

"Demons certainly do not create natures if they do any such thing. Rather, Circe changed Ulysses' companions in appearance, that is, according to what appeared. In this way it seems to me that it could have occurred, if it occurred at all." Augustine thus concludes that these transformations were produced by the work of demons according to an appearance presented to the senses, not according to the truth of the thing. This is confirmed in Cause 26, question 5, Nec mirum and chapter Episcopi.

After Troy's destruction, which occurred in the third year of Abdon, judge of Israel, Aeneas was the first to reign among the Latins. Before him Janus, Saturn, Picus, Faunus, and Latinus had reigned for about 150 years. Aeneas reigned for three years, or, as some hold, for eight years, beginning three years after the captivity of Troy.

His son Ascanius reigned second for thirty-two years. After him thirteen others reigned successively, the last of whom was called Amulius. The period of the reigns of all these rulers from Aeneas to Amulius was about 423 years.

In the time of this King Amulius, Remus and Romulus were born from Mars and Ilia. They founded Rome. When it had been founded, the Latins were called Romans. Romulus was the first to reign over these Romans, after killing his brother Remus. He began to reign in the sixth year of Ahaz, king of Judah, and reigned for thirty-eight years.

After him six other kings reigned successively: Numa Pompilius, Tullus Hostilius, Ancus Marcius, Tarquinius Priscus, Servius, and Tarquinius Superbus. These seven kings ruled for 240 years, or thereabouts.

When royal dominion among the Romans had ended, consuls began with Brutus. Afterward tribunes of the plebs and dictators, and again consuls, governed the republic for almost 464 years, until Julius Caesar, who was the first to seize sole command for himself and from whom later emperors were called Caesars.

Vincent's History reports from a history of the Franks that Troy was built in the time of Ehud, judge of Israel, and, after standing for 185 years, was captured and destroyed in the time of Abdon, judge of Israel. After its overthrow a great multitude fled and divided itself into two peoples.

As regards those descended from Priam, one group followed Francus, grandson of King Priam and son of Hector; the other followed Turcus, son of Troilus, who was the son of King Priam. Some therefore hand down that the two peoples descended from these men were named the Franks and the Turks. Ascanius, son of Aeneas, founded Alba near Rome, but it was afterward destroyed by the Romans.

Chapter Six

Returning to sacred history, after Samson, Eli judged the people. He was also a priest and is named a priest rather than a judge from the more dignified office. When the priesthood was transferred from the sons of Eleazar, Eli was the first of the sons of Ithamar to seize it. Perhaps, when he himself had become judge, he transferred the priesthood to himself.

He began to judge in the 356th year after the departure from Egypt, in the 761st year of the Third Age--that is, from Abraham--and in the 2,709th year of the world. He judged for forty years. In his time occurred the history of Ruth treated above. Under him the prophet Samuel was born, as is contained in the First Book of Kings. We therefore proceed with Samuel's history from that book.

The first book relates that Elkanah had two wives, Hannah and Peninnah. Hannah was barren but was more loved by her husband. Peninnah was fruitful and reproached Hannah for her barrenness. Greatly saddened by this, Hannah approached the temple, prayed, and made a vow in order to obtain a son. When Eli the priest rebuked her for praying as though drunk, she humbly excused herself and disclosed her affliction.

The Lord heard Hannah's prayer and gave her a male child, the prophet Samuel. When he had been weaned, she offered him to the Lord at God's tabernacle and left him there to serve in it.

Chapter 2 gives the song "My heart has rejoiced," and so forth, which Hannah composed while giving thanks to God. It then relates that Eli's two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, who ministered in the tabernacle, were gluttons. Through their servants they caused their own portion to be taken from animals offered in sacrifice before the animals were burned, contrary to the law. They also slept with women in the tabernacle, that is, in its courts. When Eli heard this, he rebuked them, but far too mildly.

In chapter 3 a certain prophet reproved Eli for his negligence in correcting his sons and foretold that they would be killed on account of their crimes. It also relates how Samuel, called three times in his sleep by the Lord, thought Eli was calling him and went to him. The third time, Eli taught him that if he were called again, he should say, "Speak, Lord, for Your servant hears." When Samuel observed this, the Lord spoke to him about Eli's failure and that of his sons and their future punishment. When Eli questioned him, Samuel related everything.

In chapter 4 the Philistines proceeded to battle against Israel, put them to flight, and killed four thousand Israelites. Because of this, the Israelites caused the Lord's ark to be carried into their camp to assist them. When the people of Israel rejoiced over it, the Philistines were saddened, saying, "Woe to you," and so forth. Nevertheless, they encouraged one another, entered battle against Israel, and defeated them. The ark was captured and Eli's sons were killed. When their father heard this, he fell backward and died.

In chapter 5 the Philistines carried God's ark to Ashdod and placed it in the temple of their idol Dagon. Twice they found Dagon cast down upon the ground before the ark. The Philistines were also struck with ulcers on their buttocks. Wherever they carried the ark, that plague followed, while mice arising from the earth gnawed them in their hinder parts.

In chapter 6 the Philistines, after taking counsel, sent the ark back with five golden buttocks and mice, according to the number of their five cities. They placed it upon a wagon drawn by two milk cows whose calves had been shut away from them. Lowing as they went, the cows carried the ark by a straight road to Beth-shemesh, which is in Israel. Fifty thousand of the Beth-shemites who saw the Lord's ark died.

In chapter 7 the ark was transferred from Beth-shemesh to Kiriath-jearim. Samuel admonished the people to cast aside their idols and return to the Lord by serving Him. They did this, celebrating a fast and performing penance. When the Philistines went against them in battle, Samuel prayed and offered a lamb for Israel. The Lord terrified the Philistines, and they were defeated. Samuel judged the people, traveling each year through different places to direct them.

In chapter 8 Samuel, now old, appointed his two sons in his place to judge the people at Beersheba. They turned aside into avarice and perverted judgment for gifts. Scandalized by this, the people asked Samuel to appoint a king over them. Samuel took this badly and consulted the Lord about it. The Lord answered that he should hear them, but should declare the king's right to them, namely that they would suffer many burdens from him. When Samuel had done this, they nevertheless asked that a king be given to them, just as the other nations had.

In chapter 9 Saul, of the tribe of Benjamin, taller than the others from his shoulders upward and a man better than whom there was none in Israel, went at the command of his father Kish to search for his father's lost asses. He came to Samuel with a quarter of a silver stater to inquire about the asses from him as one who knew hidden things. The Lord revealed to Samuel that this man was to be made king. Samuel therefore kept Saul with him to eat and placed before him the shoulder of a cooked animal.

In chapter 10 Samuel anointed Saul as king when they were alone. He foretold three things that would happen to him on the way as a sign of what the Lord had ordained. The third sign was that Saul would find a company of prophets--that is, persons like religious--who were prophesying with musicians, and that he would prophesy with them. This was fulfilled.

Finally, when all the tribes were gathered at Mizpah and lots were cast, the lot fell upon Saul. When he was not present there, the Lord revealed that he was hidden at home, namely out of humility. He was therefore brought forward and declared by Samuel to be king of Israel. When certain men despised him, he pretended not to hear them.

In chapter 11, after a month, Nahash, king of the Ammonites, proceeded to war against the men of Jabesh-gilead. When they sought terms from him and offered to serve him, he answered that he would make this covenant with them only if he tore out the right eyes of them all. The men of Jabesh therefore came to Saul for aid. Saul gathered a very great army of Israel, defeated Nahash, and freed them. Because of this victory the people renewed Saul's kingship at Gilgal.

In chapter 12 Samuel declared to the people the innocence of his conduct among them: in judging he had neither falsely accused anyone nor extorted anything from anyone. He then recalled the benefits God had bestowed upon that people and their deliverance from servitude to tyrants through the hands of the judges. Although they now had the king they had requested, if they withdrew from God's commandments, they would perish together with their king.

To show, however, that they had done wrong in asking for a king, Samuel caused rain to descend, thunder to roar, and lightning to appear while the air was clear. When he prayed for them, these things ceased.

In chapter 13 the Philistines gathered in a very great multitude to wage war against Israel. King Saul likewise gathered an army to resist them and waited seven days for Samuel at Gilgal. When Samuel had not come, Saul himself offered the sacrifice. Samuel afterward came and rebuked him for this, saying that his kingdom would not continue farther, but that the Lord had provided another king for Himself.

Second Title

Chapter Six

Chapter 14 relates that Jonathan, Saul's son, without his father's knowledge, approached a Philistine outpost with his armor-bearer by a very difficult path. He killed twenty Philistines with a bow in a small space. Because of this the Philistine camp was thrown into confusion, its men killing one another, and many Israelites who had fled returned to assist them.

As Saul pursued the Philistines, he issued an edict under pain of death that no one in the army should eat until evening. Jonathan did not know this. Finding a honeycomb from a beehive on the way, he tasted it with his staff and took a little honey. A great slaughter was then inflicted upon the Philistines.

After the army had rested, Saul consulted the Lord as to whether he should pursue the Philistines farther. When the Lord did not answer, Saul suspected that a sin had been committed. He therefore sought by lots to learn who was responsible. The lot fell upon Jonathan, who disclosed that he had eaten honey contrary to the prohibition. Saul wished to kill him, but the people did not permit this, because the victory had proceeded from him. Saul had many other victories against the Philistines.

In chapter 15 the Lord commanded Saul through Samuel to go against the Amalekites and put everyone and the pack animals to the sword, sparing no one. Saul defeated Amalek but preserved King Agag and certain better pack animals. When Saul returned from the battle, Samuel rebuked him on the Lord's behalf for his disobedience. When Saul excused himself, Samuel answered that obedience pleases God more than sacrifices.

When Samuel wished to depart from him, Saul held him by his cloak. When it was torn, Samuel told Saul that the Lord had torn his kingdom away and given it to a better man. Nevertheless, at his request Samuel accompanied him and killed Agag, king of Amalek.

In chapter 16 the Lord commanded Samuel no longer to mourn Saul, because He had cast him away, but to go to Bethlehem to anoint one of Jesse's sons as king of Israel. Samuel therefore went to Bethlehem as though to offer a sacrifice. When seven of Jesse's sons had been brought before Samuel at his request, the Lord revealed that he should anoint none of them, but the youngest of all, David, who was in the pastures. When David was finally brought, Samuel anointed him.

An evil spirit troubled Saul. When he heard that David, Jesse's son, played the harp well and was handsome, warlike, and prudent, he caused David to come to him so that the evil spirit's vexation would cease or be diminished through his playing of the harp. This occurred, and David was made his armor-bearer.

Chapter 17 relates that, when the Philistines gathered to battle against Israel, the giant Goliath came out from the Philistine army against Israel and challenged it to single combat. While David was in the pastures, his father sent him to visit his brothers, who were in the army with Saul. Seeing the giant run about, David asked about the matter and heard that whoever defeated him would become the king's son-in-law and possess great riches. David offered himself for the combat.

When he was presented before Saul, he told how he had killed both a bear and a lion in the pastures. Finally, casting aside the armor in which he had been clothed, he went against the Philistine for combat. David cast a stone from his sling and struck Goliath in the forehead. When Goliath fell to the ground, David cut off his head with Goliath's own sword and carried it to Saul. His army then advanced against the Philistines and laid them low.

In chapter 18, when David presented himself to Saul, Jonathan, Saul's son, who was present there, formed so great a friendship with him that he caused David to be clothed with all his own garments. When Saul and David ascended with the people into Jerusalem in victory, choirs of girls came to meet them, singing with musical instruments, "Saul has struck down a thousand and David ten thousand." Saul was saddened through envy and feared that the kingdom would pass to David.

One day, while David played the harp before him, Saul sought to pierce him with a spear. Afterward he made David a commander over the armed peoples. Saul promised to give his daughter Michal to David as a wife if David brought him one hundred foreskins of Philistines. By this he intended that the Philistines would bring about David's death. David agreed and brought two hundred foreskins, having killed the men in a just war because they were enemies of the people of Israel.

In chapter 19 Jonathan, who loved David greatly, reconciled him by his words to his father Saul, who sought to kill him. After David inflicted a great slaughter upon the Philistines in battle, Saul again sought to transfix him with a spear while he played the harp before him, but David avoided the blow.

When David fled to his house, Saul sent attendants to capture and kill him. His wife Michal warned him and lowered him through a window. When Saul was told that David was at Naioth with Samuel, he sent several different groups of officials three times to capture him. On arriving, they found men prophesying with Samuel and David, and they too prophesied with them, praising God. Finally Saul himself came, and he too prophesied with them, stripping himself naked.

In chapter 20 Jonathan promised David, at David's request, that he would disclose Saul's disposition toward him, whether good or evil. David was to hide in a field on a certain day. Jonathan would signify Saul's disposition by means of three arrows he shot and by the way he spoke to the boy sent to gather them. If he said that the arrows were beyond the boy, this would be a sign of Saul's evil intention toward David; if he said that the arrows were this side of him, it would be a sign of reconciliation.

Jonathan did this and indicated that Saul was ill-disposed toward David. Finally, after swearing to show mercy to one another in themselves and in their offspring, they departed from one another after much weeping.

In chapter 21 David came to the priest Ahimelech. When David asked for something to eat, Ahimelech, having nothing else at hand, gave him and his companions the loaves of proposition, and also Goliath's sword. David then went to Gath. When the king learned of this and commanded that he be seized, David pretended to be a fool and thus escaped.

In chapter 22 Saul heard that Ahimelech had consulted the Lord for David and had given him the loaves and sword. He sent for Ahimelech and caused him to be killed with eighty-five other priests. He subjected their city, Nob, to sword and fire.

In chapter 23 David inflicted a great slaughter upon the Philistines who were besieging Keilah and liberated it. The Lord revealed that Saul was coming to capture him, so David withdrew. When Saul was told that David was in the desert of Maon, he came with an army to capture David and his companions. When he was on the point of capturing him, news came that the Philistines had come against Israel. Saul turned back and abandoned the siege and capture of David.

In chapter 24 Saul heard that David and his men were at En-gedi and came there with three thousand men to capture him. On the way Saul entered a certain cave to attend to the needs of nature. David was in the inner part of it with some companions. They urged him to kill Saul, but he refused and secretly cut off only the edge of his cloak.

When Saul left the cave and continued his journey, David called after him. He explained how he could have killed him and complained of Saul's unjust persecution. Hearing this, Saul confessed with tears that he had done wrong.

In chapter 25, when Samuel died, all Israel mourned him. David heard that Nabal was holding a great banquet on Mount Carmel while shearing his many flocks of sheep. He sent messengers to ask Nabal to send some of the feast to him and his men. Nabal refused and spoke harsh and insulting words to them. Angered by his words, David arranged to go with his men to kill him.

Abigail, Nabal's very beautiful and prudent wife, perceived her husband's hardness. She went to David with asses laden with food, met him on the way, offered him everything, and begged him to spare her husband for that inhumanity. Pacified by her words, David did so. When she returned and told her husband of the danger, he died from fear. David afterward took Abigail as his wife.

In chapter 26, when the Ziphites told Saul that David was in the desert of Ziph, Saul came with an army to capture him. While everyone slept at night, David secretly entered Saul's tent with Abishai. Although Abishai urged him to kill Saul when he was able, David refused. Taking the spear and cup that were beside Saul's head, they withdrew without anyone noticing.

From a distance David called to Abner, reproaching them for their negligence in guarding their lord. He told how he had entered Saul's tent and could have killed him. Hearing this, Saul groaned, accusing himself and praising David.

In chapter 27 David, lest he fall into the hands of Saul who pursued him, went with his men to Achish, king of Gath, and asked for a dwelling in one of his cities. Achish gave him Ziklag. Although David frequently carried out slaughters and raids against the Philistines, he told King Achish that he had done them against the people of Israel.

In chapter 28 the Philistines gathered for battle against Israel, and Saul came with his men to Gilboa. Fearing the Philistine camp and unable to receive an answer concerning the battle's outcome either through prophets or through priests, Saul approached a female diviner in a changed disguise. By her art he caused Samuel, already dead, to be raised. Samuel foretold that Saul and his sons would be killed in battle and Israel defeated. Whether it was the true Samuel who appeared or the devil in his form is treated in Cause 26, question 5, Nec mirum.

In chapter 29 the Philistines gathered with their satraps, among whom was Achish, king of Gath. When the satraps saw David and his Hebrews with Achish, they complained, thinking that he would not act faithfully but fraudulently against them. They therefore commanded Achish to send him back and not allow him to be with them in battle. Achish immediately did so.

In chapter 30 David returned to Ziklag and found it burned by the Amalekites, who had captured it and carried away its possessions, David's wives and sons, and those of the others. The troubled army wished to stone David. But strengthened by the Lord and given God's answer that he would overtake the Amalekites, David proceeded against them.

On the way he found an Egyptian servant of one of the Amalekites who had taken the plunder. Because he was weak, his master had abandoned him, and he was in danger from hunger. After the man had been refreshed, he showed David the Amalekites' way. David fell upon them with him, defeated them, and recovered everything that had been taken. He gave a share of the plunder to the two hundred men who had stopped when exhausted in order to guard the baggage.

In chapter 31 Saul and his three sons, Jonathan, Aminadab, and Melchishua, were killed by the Philistines in battle on Mount Gilboa. Saul, wounded by them, fell upon his own sword to kill himself. Because he was not entirely dead, he commanded a certain Amalekite servant standing near him to kill him completely. The servant did so, and all Israel was put to flight and defeated.

§ I: On the Second Book of Kings

Chapter 1 of the Second Book of Kings relates that the young Amalekite who, at Saul's request, had completed his killing came to David and reported it as though it were good news. Grieving on account of this, David caused him to be killed. David and his men wept over the deaths of Saul, Jonathan, and the others among the people of Israel; they tore their garments and fasted.

The era of the kings therefore began with Saul, and the era of the prophets so called began with Samuel. While Samuel lived, Saul reigned for seventeen years, and after Samuel's death for two years. The Third Age, containing nine hundred years, ends at Saul's death.

Homer is thought to have lived at this time. Among the Athenians he was held to be insane because he said that the gods had waged war against one another. As they say, he was unable to explain some slight question sailors proposed to him. When they mocked him more shamelessly and at greater length, this man of modest disposition was as though pierced to death by the poisoned dart of confusion and breathed out his spirit, as Valerius reports.

Flavianus asserts this of Plato in his book On the Footsteps of the Philosophers, saying that it was fabricated by Xenophontines against Plato's glory. There were those who thought that Homer was a synonym for Plato.

In these times two kingdoms began, namely those of the Lacedaemonians and the Corinthians. According to Eusebius in the Chronicles, in the fifteenth year of Saul's reign Eurystheus was the first to reign at Lacedaemon. Eight men reigned successively after him. The last was called Thalchamenes, under whom that kingdom failed in the forty-ninth year of the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah.

At the same time, namely in the fifteenth year of Saul's reign, Alethes was the first to reign at Corinth. Ten kings reigned successively after him. The last of them was called Telestes, under whom the kings of the Corinthians failed in the forty-second year of the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter One

The Fourth Age begins with David and lasts until the Transmigration for 484 years according to the Hebrews, and one year longer according to the seventy interpreters. David, the first from the tribe of Judah to reign among the Hebrews, reigned forty years: seven in Hebron over the tribe of Judah and thirty-three over all Israel.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter One

The Fourth Age begins with David, not because he was the first of the kings, but because he was the first of the kings from the tribe of Judah. For an express promise was made to him concerning Christ, who was to be born from the tribe of Judah. His deeds are contained throughout the Second Book of Kings and will be placed here very briefly in summary.

Thus chapter 1 of the Second Book of Kings relates that when David heard of Saul's death, he mourned with his men, fasted, and composed a song of lamentation.

In chapter 2 David, by the Lord's counsel, ascended with his men to Hebron. There he was anointed king over the tribe of Judah alone. Through the work of his uncle Abner, Saul's son Ish-bosheth was made king over the other eleven tribes of Israel and reigned for two years.

The armies of David, under Joab, the commander of his army, and of Ish-bosheth, under Abner, the commander of his army, assembled. By common agreement twelve men from one side and twelve from the other wrestled with one another, and each killed his opponent with a single blow. When those who were with Abner fled, Asahel, Joab's brother, pursued Abner and refused at his entreaties to cease pursuing him. Finally Abner struck Asahel in the groin with the reversed end of his spear, and he died.

Chapter 3 relates that a long contest arose between Saul's house and David's house. David advanced and always became stronger in himself, while Saul's house diminished daily. David's sons born at Hebron were Amnon the firstborn, Chileab the second, Absalom the third, Adonijah the fourth, and others by his several wives.

Abner, who governed Ish-bosheth's house, was reproved by him because he had known Saul's concubine. Angered against him, Abner approached David and promised to bring all the people of Israel under David's subjection. When he was arranging this, after David's wife Michal had been restored to him, Joab treacherously killed Abner in vengeance for his brother Asahel. This displeased David. He caused Abner to be honorably buried, accompanying the corpse with his men, mourning and fasting on account of his death.

In chapter 4, while Ish-bosheth lay in his house, two leaders of robbers, Rechab and Baanah, secretly entered it while the doorkeeper of the house slept and killed him. They carried his head to David at Hebron, but David caused them to be hanged.

In chapter 5 all the tribes of Israel anointed David king over all Israel. He and his men captured Jerusalem, which was occupied by the Jebusites. Joab was the first to ascend into the fortress of Zion, for which reason he was made commander of the army. David built his dwelling in Zion after Hiram, king of Tyre, sent him craftsmen and timber.

Eleven sons were born to him at Jerusalem, for he took several wives, among them Bathsheba, by whom he had Solomon. This is understood to have occurred by God's dispensation concerning the plurality of wives. David twice waged war against the Philistines, defeated them, and put them to flight.

In chapter 6 David caused the Lord's ark to be brought back to Jerusalem with great solemnity. But because Uzzah was struck by the Lord for rashly holding the ark when it tilted as the oxen kicked, David placed it in the house of Obed-edom. After three months he again arranged that it be brought back to Jerusalem. He did so with very many sacrificial animals on the road and with musical instruments. David danced before it with the people and, while naked, played instruments. His wife Michal saw him through a window and despised him. When he entered his house and she reproached him for this, he answered by scorning her words.

Chapters 15 and 16 of the First Book of Chronicles relate that David caused the Levites to place the ark in the tabernacle he had prepared for it. He appointed Levites to serve in the tabernacle before the ark by offering sacrifices and praising God, playing different kinds of musical instruments, such as trumpets, organs, and cymbals. Thus David first invented the practice of chanting the divine offices in the Church.

In chapter 7 David consulted the prophet Nathan about building a temple to the Lord. Nathan answered that he should do so, because this would be pleasing to God. But the Lord spoke to Nathan, telling him to signify to David on His behalf that David himself would not build Him a house, that is, a temple. Rather, his son Solomon would do so. God would be a father to Solomon and Solomon would be His son, and He would establish Solomon's kingdom forever. If Solomon sinned, He would correct him, but He would not take His mercy from him. David gave magnificent thanks to God for this.

In chapter 8 David defeated the Philistines, to whom Israel had been made tributary. He also struck the Moabites and Hadadezer, king of Zobah, and made Syria, the Ammonites, and the Edomites tributary. He reserved the plunder of gold, silver, and bronze for the construction of the temple and administered justice to all the people.

In chapter 9 David heard that Mephibosheth, son of Jonathan, Saul's son, survived and was lame in both feet. He made him his table companion and caused all Saul's possessions to be restored to him. He commanded Ziba, Saul's servant, to serve Mephibosheth with his sons.

In chapter 10 David heard of the death of his friend Nahash, king of the Ammonites, and sent envoys to console his son Hanun over the death. On the counsel of others who said that they had been sent not to console him but to spy upon him, Hanun dishonored the envoys by shaving half their beards and cutting their garments up to the buttocks. When David heard this, he gathered an army and sent Joab to battle against the Ammonites.

Chapter 11 treats the adultery David committed with Bathsheba, wife of Uriah, and her conception. Wishing to conceal it, David sent for Uriah, who was fighting faithfully with Joab against the Ammonites. When he could not persuade Uriah to go home and know his wife, David sent letters by Uriah to Joab ordering him to place Uriah in a dangerous position in battle so that he would be killed. This was done. After Uriah had been killed, David took Bathsheba as his wife, and she bore him a son.

In chapter 12 the prophet Nathan, sent by the Lord, reproved David for the adultery and Uriah's death. He spoke under the parable of a rich man who killed a poor man's ewe in order to prepare a banquet for a guest. When David humbly confessed his sin, Nathan said, "The Lord has taken away your sin." Nevertheless, because of this the Lord would raise up evil for him from his own house. This was Absalom's persecution and conspiracy against him.

David prayed and fasted so that his newborn and sick child might be healed, but upon hearing of its death, he arose to eat. Afterward Solomon was born to him from Bathsheba. David then came with an army to capture Rabbah, the principal city of the Ammonites, and very many were killed.

In chapter 13 David's firstborn, Amnon, was captured by love and grew ill from his love for his sister Tamar. When she visited him on their father's behalf, he overpowered her. Because of this, Absalom concealed his grievance. Two years later, when he had his flocks sheared, he invited all his brothers to a banquet and caused his servants to kill Amnon there. He then fled to the king of Geshur.

In chapter 14 Joab sent a widow from Tekoa to David. She pretended that she had a case of this kind: one of her sons had been killed by the other, who was therefore sought for death, and she asked David for mercy so that he would not be killed. She applied the case to Absalom so that David might spare him. Understanding that this had proceeded from Joab, David commanded Absalom to be recalled from exile.

But after Absalom returned to Jerusalem, David did not send for him to see his face. Absalom caused Joab to come to him by burning the crops in Joab's field, and made him a mediator in reconciling his father David so that he might see him. He obtained this.

In chapter 15 Absalom drew Israel's goodwill to himself by various flatteries. After making a conspiracy against his father, he told him that he was going to Hebron to fulfill a vow. Gathering a very great multitude of Israel with Ahithophel, he was made king at Hebron.

When David heard this, he fled from Jerusalem with his men. He sent back to Jerusalem the priests who followed him with the Lord's ark. He likewise sent his friend Hushai so that he might destroy Ahithophel's counsel.

In chapter 16 Absalom entered Jerusalem and, on Ahithophel's counsel, went in to his father's concubines before the people. As David fled with his men through the mountains, Ziba, Saul's servant, met him with pack animals laden with food and offered it to refresh them. Ziba falsely accused Mephibosheth of having refused to meet David, because of which David gave all Mephibosheth's goods to Ziba.

Shimei also met David, cursed him, and threw a stone against him. When Abishai wished to go kill him, David did not permit it, but patiently bore the injury so that he might appease the Lord.

In chapter 17 Absalom sought counsel about what should be done. He rejected Ahithophel's counsel to lead an army against his father and capture him. He followed Hushai's contrary counsel, which was presented under the appearance that they would be able to capture David better after some time. Both plans were communicated to David through the sons of the priests Abiathar and Zadok. Ahithophel hanged himself. Barzillai the Gileadite and certain others refreshed David and his weary men.

In chapter 18 David arranged the battle and divided his army into three parts. When he wished to go with them into battle, they did not permit it. David commanded them to preserve Absalom. But when Absalom's army had been defeated and he fled riding a mule, he remained suspended by his hair in the branches of an oak. When someone reported this to Joab, Joab threw three spears into him and killed him. When Cushai went to report it to David, David lamented Absalom's death most bitterly.

In chapter 19, while David mourned his son, Joab entered and rebuked him, admonishing him to arrange for the people's return to him, lest no one remain with him. David did this through Abiathar and Zadok as regards the tribe of Judah. He promised Amasa, who had been commander of Absalom's army, that he would make him his commander in Joab's place, so that Amasa would restore Israel to obedience to him.

David also spared Shimei when he met him and asked forgiveness for the injury he had inflicted. When Mephibosheth came to him and excused himself because he had been unable to go with David, David established that he should divide his possessions with Ziba by halves. In restoring David as king and recognizing his dominion, the tribe of Judah and the other tribes of Israel contended with one another.

In chapter 20 a certain most wicked man named Sheba sounded a trumpet and said, "We have no share in the house of David." He caused a schism and separated Israel from Judah. Joab and Abishai pursued Sheba with their armies as he ran through the cities to induce them to follow him. At last they besieged him in the city of Abel. The citizens cut off Sheba's head and threw it over the walls to Joab, who abandoned the siege. Earlier on the way, however, Joab had treacherously killed Amasa, who was to be appointed commander of the army in Joab's place.

In chapter 21 a famine arose in Israel and lasted for three years. When David consulted the Lord about it, He revealed that it had occurred because Saul had killed Gibeonites contrary to the oath Joshua had given them. Therefore, at the Gibeonites' request, David delivered into their hands two sons of Saul by a concubine and five sons of Saul's daughter. They crucified them. When this had been done, the Lord was again propitious to Israel. David spared Mephibosheth because of the oath given to his father Jonathan.

There follows an account of three wars waged against certain Philistine giants, and of a fourth in which, when one of them struck David, Abishai defended him. Afterward they did not permit David to go to battle, lest he be killed.

Chapter 22 contains the song David made when he was freed from Saul's hand. It is Psalm 17: "I will love You, O Lord, my strength." Chapter 23 treats the thirty-seven strongest men in war who were with David. Three stood above the others. When David desired water from the cistern at Bethlehem, where the Philistines were, these three passed through the midst of the enemy, drew water from that cistern, and brought it to David, who refused to drink it.

In chapter 24, the last, David caused Joab to number the people subject to him out of pride. On account of this sin an angel was sent by the Lord to give him the choice of one of three things: seven years of famine in Israel, three months of persecution and flight from enemies, or three days of pestilence among the people. David chose the last, and within three days seventy thousand died from the pestilence.

When David saw the angel extending his hand to strike Jerusalem, he asked that the angel strike instead his own household and himself, who had sinned. The Lord was appeased and prohibited the angel from striking. At God's command through Nathan, David bought a property from Araunah the Jebusite at the threshing floor where he had seen the angel. There he built an altar to the Lord, where the temple was afterward built.

Chapters 22 and the following chapters through chapter 29, the final chapter of the First Book of Chronicles, relate that David told his young son Solomon how he himself had planned to build a temple to the Lord. The Lord had prohibited him because he had shed much blood in wars, but his son Solomon, reigning in peace, would build a temple for Him.

For this reason David had prepared exceedingly great expenses in gold, silver, bronze, and iron. He admonished Solomon to execute the work and explained the building's arrangement to him. David also appointed singers in the temple and players of organs and other musical instruments under Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun.

He divided the priests from among the Levites into twenty-four families. One person who was first in each family was chosen by lot to minister in the temple with his assistants during his own week. David also encouraged the barons and princes of the tribes to assist Solomon in the work of the temple and ordained their offices in which they would serve Solomon.

Chapter Two

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

On Solomon's reign, with which the Third Book of Kings begins. Chapter 1 says that when David, because of old age, could not be warmed by clothing, an exceedingly beautiful girl was sought for him: Abishag the Shunammite, a virgin who would sleep with the king and warm him. Nevertheless, he did not know her.

Adonijah, David's son, made chariots and horsemen for himself, seeking to take the kingdom for himself. He had with him Joab, commander of the army, and Abiathar the priest. When a great banquet had been prepared, he invited all his brothers except Solomon. On hearing this, Bathsheba, Solomon's mother, entered David's presence on the advice of the prophet Nathan and disclosed how Adonijah had taken the kingdom for himself without David's knowledge. David swore to her that Solomon would reign after him. He therefore commanded his servants to place Solomon upon his mule and Zadok and Nathan to anoint him king. This was done, with all the people acclaiming, "Long live King Solomon!"

When Adonijah heard this, he feared Solomon and fled to the temple. But after security had been given to him, he too approached and honored Solomon as king.

Chapter 2 relates that, when David had been brought to the end of his life, he exhorted Solomon to observe the law. He reminded him of the evils Joab had done, the injuries inflicted by Shimei, and Barzillai's benefits.

After David's death, Adonijah asked Bathsheba to intercede with her son Solomon so that Solomon would give him Abishag as a wife. When she did this, he did not hear her request, but caused Adonijah and likewise Joab to be killed. He sent Abiathar into exile. Under pain of death he commanded Shimei not to leave Jerusalem. When Shimei departed after some years to recover servants who had fled, Solomon had him killed.

In chapter 3 Solomon took the daughter of the king of Egypt as his wife and, according to the Hebrews, had a son by her in the eleventh year of his age. He ascended to Gibeon, where Moses' tabernacle and bronze altar were, though the ark of God was not there. After a thousand victims had been sacrificed there, the Lord appeared to him in a dream and told him to ask of Him whatever he wished. Solomon asked for wisdom to govern his people. The Lord told him that, because he had not asked for riches, glory, the death of his enemies, or a long life, but for wisdom, his request had been heard. Nevertheless, the Lord would also give him riches and glory above all men, provided that he observed the law.

The first judgment in which his wisdom was shown concerned two prostitutes who had sons. When one son had been smothered by his mother during the night, they disputed about which of them possessed the surviving child. Solomon pronounced sentence that the child be divided into two parts. The true mother then begged that the whole living child instead be given to the other woman. From this Solomon judged her to be the true mother and ordered the child to be given to her.

In chapter 4 his officials and his glory are set forth. He had twelve prefects who provided him with provisions, each one for a single month. The extent of his dominion is described, as is the daily food of his court: thirty cors of fine meal, sixty cors of flour, ten fattened oxen, twenty oxen from the pastures, and one hundred rams, apart from hunted deer, roe deer, and fattened birds. He had forty thousand chariot horses and ten thousand cavalry horses.

Solomon's wisdom surpassed the wisdom of all the peoples of the East and the Egyptians, and he was wiser than all men. He discoursed about trees, from the cedar of Lebanon down to the hyssop. He discussed beasts, birds, reptiles, and fish, and he spoke three thousand parables and five thousand songs. He had peace round about, and people streamed from everywhere to hear his wisdom.

In chapter 5 Solomon sent Hiram to the king of Tyre and Sidon so that the king, through his men, might have cedar and fir timber cut for Solomon from Mount Lebanon, in order that he might build the Lord's house from it. This was done.

Solomon began to build the Lord's temple in the fourth year of his reign, which was the four hundred and eightieth year after Israel's departure from Egypt, the nine hundred and eighty-fourth year from Abraham's birth, and the two thousand nine hundred and thirty-third year from the beginning of the world. This is according to the computation of the Hebrews and certain of our own writers. According to Bede's computation, however, which the Church commonly follows, the number exceeds the one just stated by one thousand and thirty-six.

He completed the work of the temple in seven and a half years. Afterward he built his own house in thirteen years, as well as the House of the Forest. Chapters 6 and 7 treat buildings of this kind. The following is a brief summary of the temple's construction, according to Vincent's Historical Mirror, book 3.

This temple was built at Jerusalem on Mount Moriah, where Abraham wished to sacrifice his son, Jacob saw in a dream a ladder extending from heaven to earth, and David saw the angel at Ornan's threshing floor cease to strike the people with the sword of pestilence.

It was built of white marble called Parian marble. The windows were beveled in the temple's walls: narrow on the outside and widened within, of the sort commonly called arrow slits. Its length was sixty cubits, its width twenty, and its height one hundred and twenty.

It had this arrangement: from the pavement next to the ground up to the first floor was a height of thirty cubits; from the first floor or story to the second was a height of thirty cubits; and from this second story to the third, which was the temple's roof, was a height of sixty cubits. It therefore had two stories between the pavement and roof. On each story and upon the roof was a walkway round about on the outside. This walkway is called in the Gospel the pinnacle upon which Christ was placed when tempted by the devil. It projected outward by five cubits, and there were railings there so that those walking upon it would not fall.

The lowest part, or first chamber, was covered throughout on the inside with cedar or fir boards, upon which gold plates were fastened with golden nails. The pavement also was so covered. This chamber was divided into two parts: the Holy Place, which was the first place entered upon coming into the temple from the east and was forty cubits long, and the Holy of Holies, which was twenty cubits long.

In the middle, between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies, was a wall made of cedar boards and afterward covered with gold plates. It was twenty cubits high. Before it hung a delicate and exceedingly beautiful woven veil, which was torn from top to bottom at the time of the Passion.

Within the Holy of Holies was the Lord's ark made by Moses. It stood in the middle between two cherubim carved from olive wood and covered with gold. They stood upright and extended two wings above the mercy seat. This mercy seat was like the lid of a chest raised upright above it when it is open, just as the painted panels of altars are arranged. Their wings were extended so that one wing of one cherub touched a wing of the other, while the other extremities of the wings touched the temple wall. Each of them was ten cubits long. The tablets of the Decalogue were in the ark.

Only the high priest entered the Holy of Holies, once a year at the Feast of Atonement, with great solemnity and in the most ornate vestments, as is clear above. Priests alone entered the Holy Place around the veil frequently during certain sacrifices and to light the lamps. There, on the south side, stood the golden lampstand made by Moses with seven lamps, and on the north side the golden table for the loaves of proposition. In the middle was the golden altar made by Moses.

Solomon, however, added ten other golden lampstands of the same design but greater size, five on the right and five on the left. He similarly added ten larger golden tables. Amid them stood an altar of incense made from stones, covered with cedar boards and afterward with gold. Incense of aromatic spices was offered upon it. Perhaps the small golden altar made by Moses was in the Holy of Holies, because, according to the Apostle in Hebrews, the golden censer was there.

On the temple's inner walls were exceedingly beautiful carvings of cherubim, palms, and other things. Above the temple roof, round about, was a golden nerva as tall as a man, so that from afar it appeared like a golden forest. Along the outer edge round about were golden vines with golden grapes and vine leaves.

At that summit next to the roof, when the temple was completed, was placed that stone rejected by the builders, which joined the two walls at the corners. How the two chambers or stories above the first one described were arranged, or what they contained, is not recorded. One ascended to those places by stairs made within the temple wall in the manner of a snail's shell.

The temple doors, made from fir wood, covered with gold plates, and carved with cherubim and palms, were on the east. At the temple's front was a portico, called in the Gospel the temple vestibule, which had bronze columns. Among them were two more wondrous than the others, with exceedingly beautiful carving in their middle. The one on the right was called Jachin, and the one on the left Boaz.

This portico was twenty cubits long, corresponding to the measure of the temple's width, and ten cubits wide before the temple's facade. One ascended into this vestibule or portico from the priests' court by twelve steps, though according to others by seven.

Beyond the vestibule Solomon built thirty small chambers which, joined to one another, surrounded the whole space of the temple externally. Each chamber was five cubits long, five wide, and fifteen high. He arranged their entrances so that one passed from one to another with some interval between them. Above these another set was built, equal in dimensions and number, so that the temple's three sides were covered round about by these chambers up to the first external floor. The remaining upper part of the temple could be freely seen. These rooms were sleeping chambers and dining rooms for those serving by weekly turns, as well as treasuries for vessels and priestly vestments.

There were several courts around the temple. The first was the court of the priests, and this first court is mentioned in the Book of Kings. It was a broad, spacious plaza extending in a square around the temple on every side. It extended farthest before the temple doors on the east because the bronze altar stood there, where the priests sacrificed--that is, burned--animals as sacrifices. This altar was twenty cubits long, equally wide, and thus square, and ten cubits high. It was hollow and had a grating on top, through which the ashes fell below and were removed through a door beneath it. The bronze sea and the lavers were also there.

Along the temple's two broad sides, namely north and south, the plaza was not so broad; on the west it was narrower still. The pavement of this plaza was laid everywhere with varied marble and figured with different images. A low wall three cubits high, covered round about with cedar boards, enclosed this court so as to prevent the others from entering among the ministers. The singers leaned upon this wall, and, facing the people, spoke while inclined over it. The circuit of this wall was therefore called by the proper name Gyon.

It had only one entrance, on the east, opposite the temple gate, with an opening twenty-five cubits wide. Men and women carrying their offerings to the ministers who met them ascended to this entrance by fourteen steps. Within this court, as has been said, there was not only a bronze altar much larger than the one Moses made; that earlier altar was also preserved in another part of the court.

There was also the bronze sea, made like a cauldron and measuring ten cubits from one rim to the rim opposite. It was round, and its circumference was thirty cubits. Solomon placed it on the right side of the temple upon twelve bronze lion cubs. There the priests washed their hands and feet before ministering. He also made ten bronze lavers--that is, basins--five on the right and five on the left, where the flesh of the animals that they burned upon the bronze altar was washed. The outsides of the animals, however, were first washed in the Sheep Pool at Jerusalem.

Beyond this, beneath the first court, was another and much larger court on every side. It surrounded the temple on every side and contained the first court within it. Its enclosing wall was twenty-five cubits high. On the temple's western side it had no gate but was entirely closed. On the south side it had four gates, and likewise four on the north. On the east, before the temple's facade, in the middle was the gate called Beautiful, while at the corners of this side were two small gates.

On these three sides--north, south, and east--were porticoes, where men remained during rain. When the weather was clear, they remained in the open air to pray. Only clean men were permitted to remain in this court. This court of the laity is called in the Gospel the temple in which Christ often preached. On the eastern side of this court remained the money changers and those selling animals to be offered, whom Christ is said to have cast out of the temple, that is, out of this court.

In the porticoes and around the gates of this court were various chests for offerings. One was called Musach, where the offerings of kings and of others, even those made on feast days, were received. Another was called Corban, where priestly and votive offerings were placed. Concerning this they said of the thirty pieces of silver, "It is not lawful to put them into the corban." A third, which was properly called the treasury, received the offerings of the poor and daily offerings, or those intended for the use of the poor.

On the sides of this court--namely, the southern and meridional sides--were pastophoria in the porticoes: suitable places in which clean laypeople ate the portions of the animal sacrifices that fell to them. In those porticoes were also three kinds of seats. The first were called chairs, where teachers sat in the school. The second were called synedrae, where listeners sat in the consistory. The third were called exedrae, where assessors sat with a judge to discuss some matter secretly, according to Isidore.

Beneath this court was another, or third, court on the lower part of the mountain. It likewise had a greater circumference, for it contained the second court, but it was not so beautiful. It had the same construction as the second but was not so ornate. There only clean women prayed and remained.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

Beneath this was also a fourth court, whose wall ran round about on the outside at the foot of this hill. It ascended four hundred cubits to the summit of the hill where the temple was situated. Thus this wall did not prevent a view of the temple or of those ministering in the inner court. Here unclean men and women and gentiles who came to worship in the temple prayed.

The first court is set forth in chapters 6 and 7 of the Third Book of Kings. Josephus sets forth the second. Vincent sets forth the other two in the Historical Mirror, as has been said.

Solomon also had many vessels made for the temple's use, some golden, some silver, and some bronze or made of brass. It is also said in chapter 6 of the Third Book of Kings that, during the temple's construction, neither hammer nor axe nor any other iron tool was heard, for they fashioned everything beforehand. There were also many carvings of cherubim and palms in the temple's walls, bronze columns, and various places. These are omitted for the sake of brevity.

Concerning the house he made for himself and his wife, Pharaoh's daughter, and concerning the House of the Forest: aromatic substances and pigments for the temple's use were kept in the lower part of the House of the Forest. In the upper part, or story, were weapons not only for fighting but also for display and ornament. Two hundred golden shields and three hundred golden bucklers, like small round shields, were kept there. Solomon's pages carried these before him on horseback when he left the house in his chariot. Around this House of the Forest was an exceedingly beautiful pleasure garden.

When the temple had been completed, Solomon caused the Levites to carry the Lord's ark into the Holy of Holies, with all the people assembled amid the greatest solemnity and innumerable sacrificial animals. He conducted the temple's dedication for seven days. A cloud filled the temple, and fire descended from heaven to consume the burnt offerings. The priest kept this fire alive by placing wood upon it morning and evening. This fire was extinguished when Jason lost the high priesthood, as is said in Cause 1, question 1, Sicut.

This temple signified the holy Church built by Christ, the peace-making King, as Rabanus explains point by point on the Book of Kings. Solomon prayed to the Lord that He would hear those praying in the temple, or toward the temple if they were far away, in their various needs: whether because of wars, enemies persecuting them, pestilence, famine, drought, or other tribulations, provided that, returning to penitence, they acknowledged their sin, as is clear in chapter 8 of the Third Book of Kings.

Chapter 9 relates that the Lord appeared to Solomon in a dream, saying that He had heard him, provided that Solomon himself and the people walked in His commandments. Otherwise, if they turned aside to foreign gods, He would destroy them and cast away the temple made for His name.

Solomon gave Hiram, king of Tyre, who through his men had labored greatly on Solomon's buildings, twenty towns in the land of Galilee as recompense. He made all the Canaanite peoples tributary to himself. He wished no one among the children of Israel to serve him, but appointed them his soldiers, ministers, and leaders. He also sent a fleet with the servants of Hiram, king of Tyre, to Ophir, bringing much gold from there.

Chapter 10 says that the Queen of Sheba, having heard Solomon's fame, came from the ends of the earth to hear his wisdom. He satisfied her concerning everything about which she questioned him. Seeing the order of his house and household and hearing his wisdom, she praised him greatly. They gave one another great gifts.

Solomon also made an ivory throne approached by six steps. The quantity of his revenues and the magnificence of his equestrian retinue are also set forth. All people from every land desired to see his face.

Chapter 11 records his wantonness and punishment. He took very many foreign wives, contrary to God's command. He had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines, to whom he clung with exceedingly ardent love, so that to please them he worshiped their gods. Because of this, God was angered and, near the end of Solomon's life, stirred up various wars against him from the neighboring peoples.

Jeroboam, whom Solomon had placed over the tribe of Joseph, met the prophet Abijah. Tearing his new cloak into twelve pieces, the prophet gave ten to Jeroboam, saying that the Lord had given him the kingdom of the ten tribes of Israel but had reserved the tribe of Judah for David's stock. When Solomon heard this, he sought to kill Jeroboam, but Jeroboam fled into Egypt.

There are differing opinions about whether Solomon was saved. Some say he was not. Others, such as Jerome, Ambrose, and Chrysostom, say that he was, because before death he did penance for his wantonness and sins. For this reason the Hebrews also entitle his book Ecclesiastes "On Solomon's Penance."

Chapter Three

Chapter 12 relates that, after Solomon died, having reigned forty years, his son Rehoboam took up the kingdom. From this it is apparent that what Josephus says in the Antiquities is false--namely, that Solomon reigned eighty years and lived ninety-four--since the Third Book of Kings and the Second Book of Chronicles say that he reigned forty years.

The people of Israel assembled before Rehoboam and asked him to lighten his father's yoke, that is, the levies. After three days, he rejected the advice of the elders who had been with his father, which was to answer the people kindly. Following the young men's advice about the response to make, he answered harshly, saying that he would burden the people still more. Because of this a schism followed in Israel. The ten tribes afterward called Israel made Jeroboam their king, while the tribe of Judah together with Benjamin remained with Rehoboam. When Rehoboam prepared to wage war against Israel with his army, the Lord prohibited it through a prophet.

Jeroboam, reigning over Israel, feared that if the people of Israel went to the temple in Jerusalem according to the Law's command, they would withdraw from his lordship and return to Rehoboam. He therefore made two golden calves, placing one at Dan and the other at Beersheba on Israel's borders, and commanded that they be worshiped as gods.

In chapter 13 a certain prophet from Judah, sent by God, came into Samaria. He reproved King Jeroboam as he stood at the altar to sacrifice to idols and foretold that a king named Josiah would be born from Judah, who would burn the bones of the idolatrous priests upon that altar. When the king extended his hand, signaling that the prophet should be seized, his hand withered. It was healed when the prophet prayed for him.

Because this prophet ate in that place contrary to the Lord's command given to him about this, although invited by another man falsely prophesying on the Lord's behalf that he should eat with him, a lion met him on the road and strangled him for the disobedience just mentioned.

In chapter 14, when Jeroboam's son became ill, the boy's mother and Jeroboam's wife approached the prophet Ahijah in disguise. Because of old age he could not see, but in spirit he recognized her, revealed who she was, announced the boy's death to her, and reproved her husband for idolatry.

Rehoboam, Solomon's son, reigned over Judah for seventeen years and committed idolatry with his people. Because of this the king of Egypt came to Jerusalem and plundered all the treasures of the temple and the royal house. Rehoboam also always had war with Jeroboam.

In chapter 15, after Rehoboam's death, his son Abijah reigned over Judah for three years and did evil in the Lord's sight with his people. Jeroboam, king of Israel, launched war against him with eighty thousand fighting men in his army, while Abijah had forty thousand. When Jeroboam's army fought against Abijah both from the front and from behind in ambushes, Abijah commended himself to the Lord and placed his trust in Him. The Lord terrified Jeroboam's army, and fifty thousand of them were slain, as is related in chapter 13 of the Second Book of Chronicles.

After Abijah's death, his son Asa reigned over Judah for forty-one years. He removed the effeminate men from the land, together with the idols, and deposed his mother Hacha from authority so that she would not be chief in the rites of Priapus.

After Jeroboam died, having reigned over Israel for twenty-two years, his son Nadab reigned for two years. Baasha killed him together with all his offspring and reigned over Israel for twenty-four years.

While Asa reigned and conducted himself well according to the Lord's law, Zerah the Ethiopian went out against him with his army of one million men and three hundred chariots. Asa went to meet him with his army and called upon the Lord, who terrified the Ethiopians and turned them to flight, as is related in chapter 14 of the Second Book of Chronicles. The prophet Azariah met Asa as he returned victorious from battle, strengthened him, and prophesied about the time near the world's end, as is related in chapter 15 of the Second Book of Chronicles.

In the thirty-sixth year of Asa's reign, Baasha, king of Israel, ascended into Moab and sought to surround Ramah with walls, thereby enclosing Judah so that no one could enter or leave it. Terrified by this, Asa took a great quantity of gold and silver from the temple treasures and called Ben-hadad, king of Syria, to his aid against Baasha. When Ben-hadad came and invaded Israel's cities, Baasha was compelled to abandon the building he had begun so that he could resist the king of Syria. Meanwhile Asa built Geba and Mizpah for himself from the materials prepared there, as is related in chapter 13 of the Third Book of Kings.

Chapter 16 of the Second Book of Chronicles adds that the prophet Hanani reproved Asa on the Lord's behalf because he had placed greater trust in a man than in the Lord. Angered by this, Asa put the prophet in the stocks. When Asa became ill with an exceedingly severe pain in his feet for a year and longer, he did not seek the Lord in his illness but instead placed greater trust in the physicians' art. After he died and was buried with great pomp, his son Jehoshaphat reigned over Judah.

After Baasha died, as is related in chapter 6 of the Third Book of Kings, his son Elah reigned in Israel for two years. Zimri, commander of a part of Elah's army, killed him when he became drunk and destroyed his entire house. Zimri reigned for seven days. When Omri, commander of Israel's army, besieged him in Tirzah, Zimri saw that the city was being captured and burned himself with his palace.

The people of Israel divided into two parties, one of which followed Tibni to make him king, while the other followed the aforesaid Omri. But the party following Omri prevailed, and he was made king of Israel. He reigned twelve years. After he died in wickedness, his son Ahab began to reign in the thirty-eighth year of King Asa's reign and reigned for twenty-two years. Ahab's wife was Jezebel, daughter of the king of the Sidonians, a most wicked woman devoted with her husband Ahab to the idolatry of Baal.

In the third year of his reign, Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, sent priests and Levites throughout the kingdom of Judah to teach the people the Lord's law. All the surrounding peoples feared him, including the Philistines and Arabs. He had one million one hundred and sixty thousand men in his armies.

Chapters 17 through 23 relate the deeds of Elijah, concerning whom nothing appears in Chronicles. Elijah the Tishbite foretold, at the Lord's command, that it would not rain in Israel. He hid in the torrent Cherith, where a raven carried him bread and meat morning and evening. When the torrent's water failed, he was sent to Zarephath of the Sidonians, to a widow who fed him during the famine. Her handful of flour and little oil did not fail but sufficed for herself, her son, and Elijah, because she first fed Elijah from that little amount.

The widow's son became ill and died, but Elijah raised him. This boy is said to have been the prophet Jonah.

In chapter 18 Ahab, king of Israel, sent the prophet Obadiah, steward of his house, to seek grass for the horses. Elijah met him and told him to report this to Ahab. This Obadiah had fed one hundred men who worshiped God and hidden them from Jezebel when she commanded the Lord's prophets to be killed.

When Ahab came to Elijah, Elijah commanded him to assemble all four hundred and fifty-one prophets of Baal, four hundred priests of the sacred groves, and all the people of Israel on Mount Carmel. When this was done, Elijah gave the people a choice. If the prophets of Baal could cause fire to descend from heaven through their invocations to burn their sacrifice, namely one ox, the people would worship Baal. But if they could not do this and Elijah did, they would worship his God.

The priests of Baal invoked him for a long time but accomplished nothing. Elijah, however, by a brief prayer caused fire to descend, which consumed the sacrifice. At this all the people worshiped and confessed Elijah's God. When this had been done, Elijah killed all those prophets of Baal at the torrent Kishon. Then by his prayer he caused a great rain to come after the three and a half years in which no rain had fallen upon the earth. Ahab returned home with Elijah going before him.

In chapter 19 Jezebel, having heard of the killing of her prophets, sent a messenger to Elijah, threatening him with death on the following day. Fearing this, Elijah went into the desert. When he fell asleep beneath a juniper tree, an angel awakened him and exhorted him to eat bread baked beneath the ashes and sent to him by God. In that food's strength he walked as far as Horeb, the mountain of God, where he had a wondrous vision. He was commanded to depart from there and anoint Elisha as prophet in his own place. He did this when he found Elisha with twelve plowmen, and Elisha followed him.

In chapter 20 Ben-hadad, king of Syria, gathered his army together with thirty-two kings assisting him and came against Ahab, king of Israel, in battle. Through a prophet the Lord foretold Ahab's victory, which occurred when the Syrians were put to flight.

Within a year the king of Syria restored his army and came again to wage war against Israel in the valleys. The Syrians said that Israel's gods were gods of the mountains and that this was why they had previously been defeated. But the Syrian army was vanquished, and one hundred thousand of them were killed. The seventeen thousand who remained fled into a city, where the city wall collapsed and crushed them. Ben-hadad, king of Syria, went into hiding and sent messengers clothed in sackcloth, with ashes sprinkled upon their heads, asking for mercy. Ahab granted it and released him.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Three (continued)

A certain prophet reproved Ahab for this while in disguise. Through a parable about someone entrusted to another's custody under pain of death, he concluded that because Ahab had released Ben-hadad, who was worthy of death, Ahab himself and his people Israel would perish in his place.

In chapter 21 Naboth the Jezreelite had a vineyard near the house of King Ahab. Ahab wanted it and asked Naboth to sell him the vineyard so that he might make a garden. When Naboth refused to consent, Ahab was saddened. On hearing this, his wife Jezebel consoled him and arranged for false witnesses to accuse Naboth of blasphemy against God. When this had been done, the innocent man was stoned. When Ahab went to take Naboth's vineyard, the Lord sent Elijah to him to foretell the destruction of Ahab and his house because of so great a crime.

In chapter 22, after Ahab outwardly humbled himself at Elijah's reproof, the Lord said that the sentence would be deferred. Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, had become Ahab's son-in-law and went to visit him in Samaria. Ahab wished to recover Ramoth-gilead, which the king of Syria had taken from him, and asked Jehoshaphat to go with him into battle. Jehoshaphat consented, but admonished Ahab first to consult the Lord about it.

Four hundred prophets of Baal were summoned. They advised him to go and said that the Lord would deliver that land to him. But when Jehoshaphat asked for counsel from a prophet of the Lord, the prophet Micaiah was brought to answer about the matter. When adjured to speak the truth, he foretold that Ahab would be killed there in battle, setting forth a vision of the manner in which Ahab would be deceived through the false prophets.

Because of this, Zedekiah the false prophet struck Micaiah on the jaw. At the king's command Micaiah was sent to prison with bread and water. When the king of Judah and Ahab, king of Israel, went together to war against the Syrians, Ahab was wounded in battle and died from it.

Chapter 19 of the Second Book of Chronicles adds that, when Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem, the prophet Jehu reproved him for the friendship he had contracted and the assistance he had given to the impious Ahab, king of Israel. For this he had merited the Lord's anger, had his good works not appeased the Lord. His great diligence in directing the people to observe the law is also set forth there: he placed judges throughout the cities and admonished them to do justice to everyone.

Chapter 17 says that he sent priests throughout the cities with the Book of the Law to instruct the people. Because of this he was held in great veneration and fear by everyone, even the neighboring nations, and possessed riches and great glory.

Chapter 20 of the Second Book of Chronicles relates that innumerable peoples of the Ammonites, Moabites, and Syrians came to battle against Jehoshaphat. He proclaimed a fast to the people and stirred them to pray to God. When the people assembled at Jerusalem to pray and he exhorted them to trust in God's aid, a certain prophet, namely Jahaziel, foretold victory over their enemies to them on God's behalf.

Strengthened by this, they went against their enemies singing with trumpets and praising the Lord, saying, "Give thanks to the Lord," and so forth. Their enemies fought and killed one another. After all of them had been slain, the whole people spent three continuous days stripping away the spoils while praising God.

§ I. On the Fourth Book of Kings

Chapter 1 of the Fourth Book relates that after Ahab's death his son Ahaziah reigned in his place over Israel. He reigned two years and conducted himself wickedly like his father. When he became ill, he sent to consult Beelzebub about whether he would recover from his illness.

Elijah the prophet met the messengers on their way and told them on God's behalf to return to their lord, signifying that Ahaziah would not be healed because he had sent to consult Beelzebub and not the true God. When they reported this, Ahaziah recognized from certain signs that it was Elijah and sent for him a captain of fifty with fifty men. When the captain approached to summon him, he and his men were consumed by fire descending from heaven at Elijah's prayer. When a second captain with his men was sent, the same happened to them. A third was sent and humbly commended himself to Elijah so that what had happened to the others would not happen to him. Admonished by an angel, Elijah went with him to the king and declared that he would die. This occurred, and Ahaziah's brother Joram reigned in his place.

While Joram reigned, as is related in chapter 2, Elijah journeyed with his disciple Elisha. When they came to the Jordan River, Elijah struck the waters with his cloak, a path opened, and they passed through the middle. After they crossed, Elijah told Elisha to ask what he wished before Elijah was taken from him. Elisha asked for a double portion of his spirit, that is, in working wonders and prophesying. Elijah answered that he would receive this if he saw him when he was taken away.

As they spoke together, a fiery chariot with fiery horses appeared. Elijah ascended into it and was taken into heaven, that is, into the earthly paradise, where he remains alive with Enoch until the time of Antichrist, against whom he will descend to preach. Elisha saw this and cried, "My father," and so forth. He took up Elijah's cloak, which had fallen from him. Returning to the Jordan and touching the waters with the cloak, he divided them a second time.

When Elisha came to live at Jericho, at the inhabitants' request he healed the very bad waters of that place by casting into them a new earthenware vessel containing salt. Afterward, as he ascended to Bethel, boys mocked him and said, "Go up, bald head!" He cursed them, after which two bears came out of the forest and tore forty-two of those boys.

Joram, Ahab's son, as is related in chapter 3, reigned together with Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, and the king of Edom. He launched war against the king of Moab because that king had ceased paying him the customary tribute. As they advanced with their armies, they ran out of water and approached Elisha to consult him. When a psaltery was brought before him and played, Elisha prophesied, telling them to dig in the torrent there and that they would find water. This was done.

When the Moabites prepared for battle, early in the morning they saw the waters red like blood. Thinking that those kings and their men had fought and killed one another, they approached the camp to carry away plunder. The king of Israel and his men fought against them and defeated them, devastating and capturing everything as far as the destruction of the city of Moab.

In chapter 4 a widow commended herself to Elisha because of her husband's debt. He commanded her to borrow empty vessels into which she was to pour the little oil she possessed. As this was done through her son, the vessels were suddenly filled by a miracle. From the price of the oil she sold she paid the debt to the creditors and lived with her son upon what remained.

Afterward, he obtained a son for a barren Shunammite woman who received him in her house with great devotion and generosity whenever he passed through Shunem, and he foretold this to her. The child was born and after some time died. But when his mother went to Elisha, explained what had happened, and prayed, he came to her house and raised him.

Later, when the sons of the prophets ate cooked herbs mixed with bitter colocynth and perceived the bitterness, Elisha ordered flour to be cast into the pot, and the stew became sweet. Afterward he multiplied loaves offered to him so that one hundred men ate from them and some of the loaves remained.

In chapter 5 Naaman, commander of the Syrian king's army, became a leper and approached the king of Israel with letters of recommendation so that he might be cured of leprosy. When he arrived at Elisha's house, Elisha commanded him to wash seven times in the Jordan and be cleansed. Although Naaman was at first indignant and would not consent, at last, persuaded by his servants, he went to the Jordan, washed, and was cleansed of leprosy.

He returned to Elisha and offered him many things, but Elisha would accept nothing. After Naaman departed, however, Gehazi, Elisha's disciple, secretly approached him and, claiming to act on Elisha's behalf, asked certain things from him and carried them to his house. Elisha exposed this crime, and Gehazi was therefore struck with leprosy.

In chapter 6, when the sons of the prophets went with Elisha to cut wood beside the Jordan so that they could make cells for themselves, the iron head of one man's axe flew from its handle and sank in the water. Elisha cast a piece of wood into the water, and the iron floated so that the man recovered it.

When the king of Syria fought against the king of Israel and laid ambushes to capture him, Elisha revealed the ambushes to the king of Israel. On hearing this, the king of Syria sent an army to capture Elisha. When Gehazi saw them besieging Elisha's house and grieved, Elisha's prayer caused him to see the mountain near the house filled with fiery horses and chariots. The Syrian army was struck with blindness.

In chapter 5 Elisha himself led that Syrian army into Samaria before its king, and their eyes were opened. He nevertheless commanded the king not to strike them, but to feed them and dismiss them to return to their own people.

When Ben-hadad, king of Syria, besieged Samaria, a severe famine arose. One woman agreed with another that they would eat her son and afterward the other's son together. When one son had been eaten and the other woman refused to give hers, the first laid her complaint before the king of Samaria. On hearing this, the king angrily sent a messenger to behead Elisha, which Elisha foretold to his companions.

When the king came to him, Elisha foretold that there would be a very great abundance on the following day. This occurred. For the Lord sent into the Syrian camp a sound like that of many peoples coming against them. Fearing this, they all fled and left all their possessions behind. Four lepers perceived this and reported it in the city of Samaria. The inhabitants investigated lest this had been done as an ambush, but when the truth was discovered, everyone went out to take the spoils. Thus a very great abundance of provisions followed. One of the commanders, who had not believed, was trampled by the multitude at the city gate and died.

In chapter 8 Elisha commanded the woman whose son he had raised to sojourn abroad during that famine. When she returned, the king ordered her lands restored to her after hearing from Gehazi how Elisha had raised her son.

Afterward, when Ben-hadad, king of Syria, became ill, he sent Hazael to Elisha to inquire whether he would recover. Elisha foretold to Hazael that he would reign in Syria and inflict many evils upon Israel. Hazael returned and said that the king would recover, but on the following day he smothered him and reigned in his place.

Edom withdrew from Judah and appointed a king for itself in the time of Joram, king of Judah. Joram reigned eight years, and his wife was Athaliah, daughter of Ahab, king of Israel. He also killed all his brothers, the sons of Jehoshaphat, as is said in chapter 21 of the Second Book of Chronicles. Because of his sins, God raised the Philistines and Arabs against him. They devastated the land of Judah, plundered the king's property, and captured his sons and wives. He himself was stricken by an incurable plague and over the course of two years gradually discharged his entrails. After his death, his son Ahaziah reigned in his place.

In chapter 9 Elisha commanded one of the sons of the prophets to go to Ramoth-gilead, which Jehu, commander of the army of Joram, king of Judah, was besieging, and to announce Jehu as king of Israel, who by God's command was to destroy all Ahab's seed. He did so. When Jehu reported this to the army, they all accepted him as king.

Jehu and his army entered Israel, where King Joram lay sick from a wound received at Ramoth from the Syrians against whom he had fought. Ahaziah, king of Judah, had come there to visit him. When Joram heard that Jehu was coming to Jezreel, he and Ahaziah went out to meet him. Jehu struck Joram with an arrow and killed him, and caused the fleeing king of Judah to be pursued and killed. When Jehu entered the city of Jezreel, he caused Joram's mother Jezebel, who rebuked him from a house window, to be thrown down by her servants.

In chapter 10, at Jehu's request, the men of the city of Samaria killed Ahab's seventy sons who were in Samaria and sent their heads to him in baskets. Going from there to Samaria, Jehu met forty-two brothers of Ahaziah, king of Judah, on the road and caused them all to be killed.

Afterward Jehu pretended that he wished to worship and honor Baal more than Ahab had done. He therefore caused the prophets and priests of Baal to assemble to offer Baal a solemn sacrifice. He had garments given to them so that they might be clearly distinguished from the others. When the burnt offering was completed, he caused all the priests of Baal to be killed, destroyed Baal's temple, and made it into latrines.

Jehu reigned over Israel for twenty-eight years. Nevertheless, he followed the idolatry and sins of Jeroboam. Because of this zeal exercised for God's honor, however, the continuation of the kingship in Israel to the fourth generation was promised to him.

In chapter 11 Athaliah, Ahaziah's mother, on hearing that her son had been killed, slew all the royal seed so that she herself might reign over Judah--that is, the sons of Ahaziah, who had reigned only one year in Judah.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Three (continued)

But while Ahaziah's sons were being killed, Jehosheba, Ahaziah's sister and the wife of the high priest Jehoiada, stole one of Ahaziah's sons and hid him for the seven years during which Athaliah reigned in Judah. His name was Joash.

In the seventh year of Joash's age, Jehoiada revealed the king's son to certain men and gave instructions for Athaliah's death. This followed, and Joash was accepted as king by all the people. All the people of the land entered the temple of Baal and destroyed it. They forcefully shattered its altars and images and killed Mattan the priest before the altar. All the people of the land rejoiced, and the city rested. Athaliah was killed by the sword in the king's house. Joash was seven years old when he began to reign.

In chapter 12 Joash reigned over Judah for forty years and conducted himself rightly all the days in which Jehoiada the priest taught him. He also caused the Lord's house and its vessels to be repaired, rebuking the priests for their negligence in this matter.

After Jehoiada died at the age of one hundred and thirty, Joash was softened by the compliant services and flatteries of the princes and departed from God's way. Because of this, when the prophet Zechariah, son of the aforesaid Jehoiada, reproved him and the people for their transgressions, he was stoned in the temple court at King Joash's command, as chapter 24 of the Second Book of Chronicles adds.

It is further related there that, after a year had passed, the king of Syria came against Joash with few men, although Joash had a very great army. After taking great plunder, killing many, and treating King Joash disgracefully, the king departed. Joash's servants killed him after he had been left suffering from illnesses.

In Israel, after Jehu's death, as chapter 13 says, his son Jehoahaz reigned in his place for seventeen years and followed the sins of Jeroboam, Israel's first king. After his death his son Joash reigned in his place for sixteen years and did evil in the Lord's sight.

When Elisha became mortally ill, King Joash visited him, grieving over his death. Elisha told him to strike the ground with an arrow shot from a bow. When he did this three times and no more, Elisha was angry and said, "If you had struck five or six times, you would have destroyed Syria completely; now, however, you will strike it three times."

Elisha died and was buried. When men were carrying a dead man to burial, they saw raiders coming against them from Moab and cast the corpse into Elisha's tomb. That dead man immediately arose.

In the kingdom of Judah, after Joash's death, as chapter 14 of the Fourth Book of Kings relates, his son Amaziah reigned in his place for nineteen years. He gathered thirty thousand fighting men from Judah and one hundred thousand from Israel so that he might advance to war against Edom. But a prophet told him on God's behalf not to take with him those hired from Israel, because he would be defeated. Although he had already given the hired men wages of one hundred talents of silver, the Lord was able to repay him.

He obeyed and went against the Edomites, gaining victory and killing twenty thousand of them. On returning to Jerusalem, however, he adopted as his gods the idols of the Edomites whom he had conquered. When a prophet reproved him for this, he did not listen but threatened him with death, as is said in chapter 25 of the Second Book of Chronicles.

Amaziah sent to Joash, king of Israel, proposing that they meet at a certain place to see one another. Joash answered that Amaziah should remain in his own place and not be puffed up with pride because of his victory over the Edomites. Amaziah refused to consent but came to Beth-shemesh, where Joash, king of Israel, struck Judah and led the captured King Amaziah to Jerusalem. He destroyed four hundred cubits of its walls, took away the treasures of the temple and royal house, accepted hostages, and returned to Samaria. Amaziah was afterward killed when his own men conspired against him at Lachish.

After Joash, king of Israel, died, his son Jeroboam reigned in his place for forty-one years and did evil like his predecessors. After Jeroboam's death, his son Azariah reigned in his place for fifty-two years.

In chapter 15, after Amaziah's death, his son Uzziah, who is also called Azariah, reigned in his place in Judah for fifty-two years. As chapter 26 of the Second Book of Chronicles says, he did many good things and had frequent victories against the Philistines, Arabs, and Ammonites. He had three hundred and seven thousand five hundred fighting men in his army. He greatly enlarged the city and increased its wealth.

But at last, elevated in pride, he entered the temple to offer incense before the Lord and threatened the priest Azariah when he reproved him. Because of this, Uzziah suddenly became a leper. He lived separately throughout the whole remainder of his life, and his son Jotham reigned in place of his leprous father.

In Israel Azariah reigned for six months. Shallum conspired against him and killed him. Shallum reigned for one month in Samaria, but Menahem killed him and reigned in his place for ten years. After Menahem's death his son Pekahiah reigned in his place for two years. Pekah, son of Remaliah, conspired against him, killed him, and reigned in his place.

In Pekah's time Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, came against Israel and captured Galilee, all the land of Naphtali, and many cities of Israel. He transferred those people into Assyria. Hoshea conspired against Pekah, killed him, and reigned in his place.

In Judah, after Uzziah's death, his son Jotham reigned in his place for sixteen years. He did what was right before the Lord, built many cities and fortresses, and fought the Ammonites, making them tributary, as chapter 27 of the Second Book of Chronicles adds.

In chapter 16 of the Fourth Book of Kings, after Jotham was taken from this life, his son Ahaz reigned in his place in Judah. He gave himself to idolatry and consecrated his son by passing him through fire.

When Pekah, son of Remaliah and king of Israel, went up against him in battle, as is related in chapter 28 of the Second Book of Chronicles, he killed one hundred and twenty thousand fighting men of Judah in a single day. They took limitless plunder and led two hundred thousand boys, girls, and women captive to Samaria. A certain prophet reproved them for such great cruelty, especially concerning the captives they had taken, advising them to release the captives lest the Lord be angered against them. They did so, feeding and clothing them and leading them to their own people at Jericho.

The king of Syria likewise came against Judah and took great plunder, as did the Philistines and Edomites. Again Pekah, king of Israel, and Rezin, king of Syria, came against Ahab in battle. Ahab stripped the Lord's temple and his own house and sent very great gifts to Tiglath-pileser, king of the Assyrians, so that he would come to his aid against the king of Syria. Tiglath-pileser came, captured Damascus, Syria's royal city, and killed its king Rezin.

Ahab went to visit Tiglath-pileser and congratulate him on his victory. Seeing the altar of the gods of Damascus, Ahab commanded the priest Uriah to have a similar altar constructed in the Lord's house. Sacrifices were offered there, while God's altar was abandoned. This was done for idolatry, as is related in chapter 16 of the Fourth Book of Kings.

Under this King Ahas, Rome was founded by the twins Romulus and Remulus on the Aventine Hill, as will be said below.

After the death of the most wicked Ahas, as chapter 17 relates, his excellent son Hezekiah reigned in Judah. In his time Hoshea reigned over Israel after Pekah and planned to rebel against Shalmaneser, king of the Assyrians, to whom Hoshea was tributary. Shalmaneser came against him. In the ninth year of Hoshea's reign he captured Samaria and transferred Hoshea and all the people of Israel into Assyria and Media, leaving only the tribe of Judah with Benjamin.

It is there explained at length that the cause of this captivity was their sin and obstinacy, especially their idolatry. The king of the Assyrians sent people of the Babylonians and other nations to live in Samaria and those regions. Because they did not observe the Law's ceremonies, the Lord sent lions that tore them apart. The king of the Assyrians therefore sent there some of the Israelite priests who had been transferred into captivity so that they would teach the worship of God according to the Law. When they did this, the plague ceased. Nevertheless, together with this worship they adored various idols.

In chapter 18 Hezekiah began to reign in Judah in the third year of Hoshea, king of Israel. He reigned twenty-nine years and did exceedingly well. He destroyed the high places, shattered the statues, cut down the sacred groves, and broke the bronze serpent Moses had made in the desert, all of which had come to pertain to idolatry. Among all the kings of Judah none was like him.

He rebelled against the king of the Assyrians. Sennacherib, king of the Assyrians, came up against him, but Hezekiah asked him to withdraw in return for whatever burden he wished to impose. He sent Sennacherib the three hundred talents of silver and thirty of gold that had been demanded, taking the gold and silver in the Lord's temple and the king's house.

Not content with these things, Sennacherib sent his spokesmen to Jerusalem to persuade Hezekiah and the people to surrender to the king of the Assyrians. They said that their God could not free them from the Assyrians' hand, just as the gods of the other nations Sennacherib had subjugated had been unable to prevent him from subjecting those nations to himself. They spoke many other things in blasphemy against God.

In chapter 19, when Hezekiah heard this, he tore his garments, put on sackcloth, and entered the temple to pray to God. He sent messengers to the prophet Isaiah so that he would pray for the people placed in so great a danger. Isaiah strengthened them, saying that they should not fear the king of the Assyrians because he would not capture the city but would depart in confusion.

This happened. In one night an angel of the Lord killed one hundred and eighty-five thousand men of Sennacherib's army. Seeing this in the morning, Sennacherib returned in confusion to Nineveh. While worshiping in the temple of his god, he was killed by his sons.

In chapter 20 Hezekiah became mortally ill. This is said to have happened because of his pride over so great a victory, as is stated in chapter 33 of the Second Book of Chronicles, or because of his ingratitude, according to Josephus. He was told by Isaiah on God's behalf that he would die. As he wept most bitterly, Isaiah announced on the Lord's behalf that pardon had been obtained and that he would not die then but would survive for fifteen years.

As a sign of his healing, the sun moved backward ten degrees in the sky. This was fulfilled. After he was healed, he composed that canticle, "I said in the midst of my days," and so forth, which is found in Isaiah 38.

At that time Merodach-baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters and gifts to Hezekiah to rejoice with him over his recovery. Hezekiah showed his envoys all his treasures and precious things. Isaiah came to him and foretold on God's behalf that in the future everything the king of Babylon's envoys had seen, as well as Hezekiah's sons, would be carried away into Babylon.

But at the beginning of his reign, as is related in chapter 29 of the Second Book of Chronicles, Hezekiah stirred the people to worship the true God and the priests diligently to fulfill their office in praising God and offering solemn sacrifices.

Chapter 30 says that he sent messengers throughout all Israel's borders from Dan to Beersheba, telling everyone to come celebrate the Passover of the Lord in Jerusalem and urging them to return to penance so that God might forgive them. Many people from the different tribes came to celebrate the Passover. Hezekiah prayed for those who celebrated it without having been sanctified as the Law commanded.

People came not only from Judah but also from the other tribes to overthrow the idols, as chapter 31 of the Second Book of Chronicles says. He carefully ordered the provision of the Levites in sacrifices and first fruits.

At last Hezekiah slept with his fathers, as chapter 21 relates, and his son Manasseh reigned in his place when he was twelve years old. He reigned in Jerusalem for fifty-five years and committed innumerable evils. He rebuilt the high places his father had destroyed, constructed altars to Baal, worshiped the entire host of heaven, made his son pass through fire, practiced soothsaying, observed auguries, consulted mediums, and filled Jerusalem with innocent blood. The people followed him in all things so as to transgress God's law.

Chapter 33 of the Second Book of Chronicles adds that when the Lord spoke through prophets to Manasseh and the people so that they would return, they refused to listen. Indeed, Manasseh commanded that the prophet Isaiah be cut apart with a wooden saw for greater torment, Jerome says. Because of this the Lord brought the Assyrians' princes against him. They captured him, led him bound into Babylon, and kept him in fetters.

When Manasseh was greatly distressed in that prison, he prayed to the Lord and performed great penance before God. His humble prayer is found at the end of the Second Book of Chronicles. God therefore had mercy on him, brought him out of that captivity, and restored him to Jerusalem and his kingdom. After returning, he removed everything pertaining to idolatry and amended his life for the better.

After Manasseh's death his son Amon reigned in his place for two years in Jerusalem and did evil in the Lord's sight. He sacrificed and rendered service to all the idols his father Manasseh had fashioned. He did not revere the Lord's face as his father Manasseh had, namely by returning to penance. Perhaps he promised himself the vain hope of returning to penance in old age as his father had done, but this hope deceived him, for his servants conspired against him and killed him in his house.

The rest of the people killed Amon's murderers and appointed his son Josiah in his place, as is related in chapter 22. Josiah was eight years old when he began to reign and reigned exceedingly well for thirty-one years. At the beginning he caused the damaged roofs of the temple, that is, its ruins, to be restored.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Three (continued)

Hilkiah the high priest sent to King Josiah the book he had found in the Lord's house, namely Deuteronomy. When Josiah had it read and heard from it the Lord's threats against transgressors of the law, he tore his garments, greatly fearing the Lord's judgments. He commanded Hilkiah to consult the Lord concerning himself and the people, considering the Lord's anger that was to descend upon them.

They approached the prophetess Huldah, wife of Shallum. She answered them on God's behalf that all the evils they had read in the Book of the Law would come upon that place and its inhabitants because of their crimes. But because King Josiah had feared and humbled himself before God upon hearing the book, he would die in peace so that he would not see those evils.

Josiah therefore, as is related in chapter 23 of the Fourth Book of Kings, caused all the people to assemble and had the book read to them. He and the people with him entered a covenant before the Lord to observe the Lord's commandments. He purged the temple of every impurity of idolatry and destroyed the soothsayers and those who burned incense to Baal, the sun, the moon, the twelve signs of heaven, and the entire host of heaven.

He also destroyed the small house of the effeminate men that was in the Lord's house, together with other places devoted to idolatry. Moreover, he went to Bethel, where Jeroboam had made an altar for idols, and destroyed it. He commanded that the tomb of the prophet who had gone from Judah to rebuke Jeroboam for idolatry, had been strangled by a lion on the road, and had also prophesied Josiah's name and this deed to be done by him, should be left undisturbed. He acted likewise in the cities of Samaria.

He also commanded the Passover to be celebrated according to the Law. No such Passover had been celebrated since the days of the judges who judged Israel or in the days of all the kings of Israel and Judah. Josiah did this in the eighteenth year of his reign.

After this, as chapter 35 of the Second Book of Chronicles says, Necho, king of Egypt, went up to fight at Carchemish. Josiah went against him in battle. The king of Egypt sent messengers to him saying that he was not coming against Josiah, but that the Lord had urgently sent him against another people, namely the king of the Assyrians. Josiah should therefore cease hindering him lest he be killed.

Josiah refused to hear Necho's words from God's mouth. Going against him to battle in the field of Megiddo, he was wounded by archers. On perceiving this, he told his servants to lead him from the battle because he had been gravely wounded. Transferred from one chariot to another, he died in Jerusalem. All Judah and Jerusalem mourned him, and Jeremiah above all, whose lamentation over Josiah all the male and female singers repeat down to the present day, as is stated there.

After Josiah had been killed, Necho, king of Egypt, as is related in chapter 24 of the Fourth Book of Kings, entered Jerusalem and led Josiah's son Jotham, whom the people had appointed king in his father's place, bound into Egypt. He imposed upon the land a tribute of one hundred talents of silver and one of gold.

He appointed Eliakim king in Jerusalem, called him Joachim, and identified him as that ruler's brother and a son of Josiah. This Joachim was evil and reigned for eleven years. The king of Babylon came against him and made him tributary, but when he rebelled against the king of Babylon after three years, that king came against him at Jerusalem.

In the fourth year of this Joachim's reign, while Jeremiah was confined, he commanded Baruch, son of Neriah, to write everything Jeremiah told him on the Lord's behalf and to read it before all the people. The message of the writing was that the people should return to penance so that they might escape the evils the Lord had threatened against them.

After this was done, when the book was later read before King Joachim, the king tore it apart, had it burned upon a brazier filled with coals, and caused Jeremiah and Baruch to be sought for capture. Because of this Jeremiah prophesied against him that the king of Babylon would come and that Joachim's slain corpse would be cast out into heat and frost. The Lord again caused the same words and many others to be written, as is related in Jeremiah 37.

The king of Babylon made Joachim's son, also called Joachim, king in his place. But after departing, he reflected and feared that the son might perhaps rebel in vengeance for his father's death, and so he returned to Jerusalem. Joachim, afraid, went out to meet him on Jeremiah's advice, together with his mother and many others. The king of Babylon led Joachim captive to Babylon together with one thousand craftsmen and smiths, strong fighting men, Daniel, Hananiah, Azariah, Mishael, the prophet Ezekiel, and also Mordecai.

He appointed another of Josiah's sons king in Jerusalem, a man called Mattaniah, whom he named Zedekiah. He reigned eleven years in Jerusalem, did evil in God's sight, and rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar, to whom he had promised fidelity.

In chapter 25, in the ninth year and tenth month of Zedekiah's reign, Nebuchadnezzar came up against him and surrounded the city of Jerusalem. As famine prevailed within, the city was captured in the eleventh year. The Chaldeans pursued the fleeing King Zedekiah, captured him, and brought him to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah. Nebuchadnezzar caused Zedekiah's sons to be killed before him, then blinded him, bound him, and led him into Babylon.

Nebuzaradan, commander of the Chaldean army, burned the Lord's temple after its vessels and ornaments had been carried away. He burned the royal house and the whole city and destroyed its walls. The king of Babylon placed Gedaliah, son of Ahikam, over those who remained.

When some of the nobles who had escaped--namely Ishmael, son of Nathaniah, and others--came to Gedaliah, he promised them security. Johanan, son of Kareah, advised Gedaliah to beware of Ishmael because Ishmael sought his death. Gedaliah did not believe him, but this nevertheless occurred. Ishmael treacherously killed Gedaliah and the Jews and Chaldeans whom he found with him.

On the following day, when this was not yet known, eighty men from Shechem and Samaria came with shaven beards and torn garments to offer in the Lord's house. Ishmael met them weeping and said that he would accompany them to Gedaliah. In the middle of the city he killed them, apart from ten who promised to reveal to him treasures in fields of wheat, barley, honey, and oil. For this reason he did not kill them.

Ishmael led the remaining people with him as captives toward the land of Ammon. When Johanan, son of Kareah, heard this, he advanced against him with many fighting men. Seeing this, Ishmael abandoned the remnant and fled, while Johanan led the remnant back into the city.

Because they feared the Chaldeans on account of Gedaliah's death, they asked Jeremiah to pray for them and consult the Lord about whether they should remain or go into Egypt. He answered them on God's behalf that they should remain. They refused to consent and said that he had invented a falsehood from himself and had not received the answer from God, as is related in Jeremiah 41 and the two following chapters.

Thus Judah was transferred from its land to Babylon. After many of the principal men had been killed, four thousand six hundred souls were transported to Babylon together with the blinded and imprisoned King Zedekiah, as is related in Jeremiah 52.

Jeremiah himself, when King Joachim was first transferred to Babylon, foretold, as is clear in Jeremiah 25, that this Babylonian captivity must last seventy years, after which they would be led back to Jerusalem. Hence many false prophets in Jerusalem seduced the people and King Zedekiah by falsely saying on God's behalf that those already taken captive with Joachim would be freed.

Thus a certain false prophet named Hananiah publicly said on God's behalf in Zedekiah's fourth year that after two more years the people would be led back from Babylon together with King Joachim. He broke the wooden chains Jeremiah wore around his neck to signify the yoke of servitude that would endure under Nebuchadnezzar. The Lord therefore told Jeremiah that he would make iron chains in their place as a sign of servitude under Nebuchadnezzar. Because Hananiah had prophesied without being sent by God, Jeremiah foretold that he would die that year. This was fulfilled, as is related in Jeremiah 28.

While Zedekiah reigned, Jeremiah also wrote to those already transferred to Babylon with Joachim, telling them to build houses, plant gardens, take wives in Babylon, seek Babylon's peace, and pray for it. They were not to believe prophets who foretold their swift liberation, because it would not occur until the seventy years were completed.

He also foretold that two false prophets in Babylon who announced to the Jews living there that they would soon be freed would be delivered into Nebuchadnezzar's hands and publicly killed. They were called Zedekiah and Ahab. As Jeremiah 29 relates, they are said to have been those two wicked old men who accused Susanna of adultery. They were first stoned by the people and afterward fried in oil by Nebuchadnezzar.

Because Jeremiah preached that the city would be captured by the Chaldeans, they wished several times to kill him, but he escaped in various ways. On one occasion, at the people's leaders' request, King Zedekiah consented that he should be put in prison. He was cast into a cistern where there was no water but mud so that he would die there.

Ebed-melech, an Ethiopian man and the king's eunuch, reported this to the king and denounced their wickedness before him. The king caused Jeremiah to be drawn out. Speaking with Zedekiah secretly when the king questioned him, Jeremiah advised him to offer himself voluntarily to the king of Babylon. In this way he would not die and the city would not be exposed to fire; if he did not do so, he would not escape. Jeremiah remained in prison until the city was captured.

Then Nebuchadnezzar commanded him to be freed, treated humanely, and left at liberty to go to Babylon or remain if he wished, as is related in Jeremiah 38. The prophets Ezekiel and Daniel were led to Babylon with King Joachim. Hananiah, Azariah, and Mishael likewise prophesied there, as is clear in Ezekiel 1 and Daniel 1.

In the thirty-seventh year after King Joachim's transfer, Evil-merodach, reigning in Babylon after Nebuchadnezzar, elevated Joachim, brought him out of prison, and set his throne above the thrones of the kings in Babylon. Joachim ate with him, as is related in Jeremiah 52.

Moreover, Jeremiah prophesied Babylon's destruction, as is clear in Jeremiah 50 and 51. This was fulfilled in the time of Belshazzar, Babylon's last king, when the city was captured by Cyrus and Belshazzar was killed by him, as is related in Daniel 5.

At the transfer of the Hebrews to Babylon with Zedekiah, the last king, the Fourth Age, which had begun with David, ended. It contained twenty-one kings of Judah beginning with David. According to the Book of Kings, the reign lasted not quite five hundred years, but according to Josephus five hundred and twenty-three years, six months, and ten days. From the departure out of Egypt there were one thousand and sixty-two years, six months, and ten days.

There were fifteen high priests in succession from Zadok, whom Solomon appointed, to Seraiah, father of Jehozadak, whom Nebuchadnezzar killed.

Earlier, when Pekah, son of Remaliah, reigned in Israel--which was the second year of Uzziah, king of Judah--Tiglath-pileser, king of the Assyrians, came into Israel. He led captive the two and a half tribes who lived across the Jordan. Devastating Galilee as well, he transferred many people from Zebulun and Naphtali to Nineveh. Tobit was among the other captives taken.

Then, in the ninth year of Hoshea, who reigned after Pekah, son of Remaliah, and was the last of Israel's kings, Shalmaneser, king of the Assyrians, discovered that Hoshea, whom he had previously made tributary, planned to rebel against him. He came against Hoshea, captured him and Samaria in Hezekiah's sixth year, and transferred into Assyria the seven tribes of Israel who remained. The other three had already been transferred. Thus the tribe of Judah remained with Benjamin. They too were afterward transferred to Babylon, as was said above.

Because certain apparent contradictions arise in the Books of Kings when the years of the kings of Judah and Israel are computed and compared, Peter Comestor says in the Scholastic History that wherever no determination or reconciliation of such a contradiction is found, we believe it arose from a copyists' error, for they often make mistakes in proper names and numbers.

Some other apparent contradictions can be determined and reconciled either through synecdoche, because certain kings reigned jointly with their fathers before they reigned there alone, or because those kingdoms were sometimes without a king. In this way Comestor reconciles several contradictions at the end of the Book of Kings, as is clear there.

Chapter Four

Although the lives of the holy fathers of the Old Testament were, as it were, prophetic, some among them nevertheless shone through the prophetic spirit, announcing and leaving in writing many mysteries of Christ and the Church and matters pertaining to good morals.

After Moses, who existed before the time of the judges and was simply the greatest of the prophets according to Thomas in the Summa, the prophets shone forth most especially and abundantly in the age of the kings. The first, and in a certain respect the greatest, namely with regard to the mysteries of Christ, was David, king of Israel. His Psalter is the sum of theology concerning the mysteries of faith and moral teaching.

According to Augustine, David composed all one hundred and fifty psalms, although Nicholas of Lyra and certain others assert that not all were composed by him but some by others according to their titles. Some verses from the Psalms that express the articles of faith quite openly will be set forth here.

Concerning the article of Christ's humanity with respect to His Incarnation and Nativity, David says in Psalm 71, "He shall descend like rain upon the fleece," and so forth. Here he seems to touch upon what was given to Gideon as a sign of victory: dew descended from heaven upon a fleece placed on the threshing floor while the floor remained dry, and a basin was filled from the dew wrung out of the fleece. This signified that the dew of the divine Word, descending into the Virgin's womb and joining itself to the fleece of our mortality, left the ark of the virginal body immaculate.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Four (continued)

When this fleece, namely His body, was compressed upon the cross, the Church's basin was filled from the dew of His grace. In the following verses of that Psalm, David shows Christ's universal dominion, namely over all who are converted to the faith. The first of these were the Magi, kings of Tarshish, who came from the East and offered gifts to Him at His birth.

Concerning the article of His Passion, who speaks more openly than David himself when, in the person of Christ upon the cross, he says in Psalm 21, "God, my God, look upon me. Why have You forsaken me, far from my salvation, the words of my offenses?" He calls the sins of the human race, for which He suffered and which made Him far from bodily salvation, His own offenses. And below: "They have pierced my hands and my feet," namely with nails upon the cross, where, when His limbs were violently stretched, men numbered all His bones, something not read of anyone else.

Concerning His descent into hell he says in Psalm 15, "My flesh shall rest in hope," namely of the Resurrection, "because You will not leave my soul in hell," namely the soul descending there, "nor will You allow Your holy one," namely My body, "to see corruption."

Concerning the Resurrection, according to Augustine in The City of God, he says in Christ's person in Psalm 3, "I slept," namely by taking the sleep of death upon the cross, when, inclining His head like one sleeping, He gave up His spirit. "And I was in a deep sleep," namely by undergoing the great sleep of forty hours, during which He remained dead. "And I arose," not indeed through the proper power of the humanity that had fallen in death, but through the power of His divinity. He expresses this by adding, "Because the Lord received me."

Concerning the Ascension he speaks to Christ Himself, saying in Psalm 77, "You have ascended on high," namely to the highest heaven. "You have taken captivity," namely the multitude of fathers who were held captive by the devil in limbo. "You have given gifts to men," according to another translation, namely by abundantly pouring the gifts of the Holy Spirit into the disciples.

Concerning His coming to judgment, in Psalm 109, after indicating Christ's sitting at the Father's right hand by saying, "The Lord," namely the Father, "said to my Lord," namely Christ, "Sit at My right hand," he intimates Christ's eternal generation from the Father when he says, "With You is the beginning," and so forth; "from the womb," namely the mind of the Father hidden from us, "I begot You." He also describes Christ's priesthood, by which He offers us to God, when he says, "You are a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek."

At last he indicates Christ's future judgment, saying, "He shall judge among the nations." Christ Himself will fill the ruins of all the angels from among His elect, to whom He will say, "Come, blessed of My Father; receive the kingdom," and so forth. "He shall crush the heads," that is, the minds and bodies of the wicked, namely the reprobate, to whom He will say, "Go, accursed, into eternal fire." He will do this "in the land," namely the infernal land.

As for the articles of the divinity, concerning the unity of the divine essence the Lord says in Psalm 80, "If you hear Me, there shall be no new god in you, nor shall you worship a foreign god. For I am the Lord your God," namely the one God.

Concerning the Trinity of Persons in the unity of essence, he says in Psalm 66, "May God," namely the Father, "bless us; our God," namely the Son, who is ours through the humanity He assumed, "may He bless us," namely the Holy Spirit. He would not have named God three times without purpose unless he wished to signify the Trinity of Persons. Lest anyone believe from each divine Person's being called God that three gods exist, he therefore adds in the singular, to show the unity of divinity and essence, "and may all the ends of the earth fear Him," not them. God's blessing is the conferral of good upon both body and soul, and therefore he asks twice for a blessing.

Concerning the Persons' own names, with respect to the Father he says of Christ in Psalm 88, "He shall call upon Me: You are My Father." With respect to the Son, in Psalm 2 he says, "The Lord," namely the Father, "said to Me: You are My Son; today," that is, eternally, "I have begotten You," for in eternity all things are present. With respect to the Holy Spirit, Psalm 103 says, "Send forth Your Spirit, and they shall be created."

Concerning the article of the creation of things, Psalm 101 says, "In the beginning, O Lord, You founded the earth, and the heavens are the works of Your hands. They shall perish," not indeed with respect to their substance, but with respect to their present form. "But You remain," namely immutable.

With respect to the article of the conferral of grace by which the Church is justified, he says in Psalm 84, "God, turning," namely toward us, "You will give us life," namely through Your grace. Hence another translation reads, "You will justify us, and Your people," namely the Church, "will rejoice in You." Psalm 28 also indicates the Church's seven sacraments, through which the Church is justified by grace, in the seven voices noted there. He sang of the Word's Incarnation and the gathering of the Church from various peoples in Psalm 44, as Augustine explains in The City of God. Finally, concerning the conferral of final glory, he says in Psalm 83, "The Lord will give grace and glory."

After David, his son Solomon shone with the prophetic spirit in three books undoubtedly produced by him: Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs. They belong to the canon of Scripture and are therefore authentic even according to the Hebrews. Although their teaching is especially moral, it nevertheless belongs to prophecy because it was revealed by the Holy Spirit, not discovered or acquired.

The first of them, Proverbs, pertains to the formation of morals and the eradication of vices and is therefore adapted to beginners. The second, Ecclesiastes, leads to contempt for the world and shows vanity in all lower things; it is suited to those making progress. The third looks more to the perfect, because it treats the fervent love of God for the soul and conversely.

Nevertheless, mysteries pertaining to Christ and the Church are also indicated in them. In particular, the final chapter of Proverbs, describing the strong woman and her qualities, signifies the Church and Christ, her husband or bridegroom. Chapter 9 of Ecclesiastes signifies Christ's Incarnation in the poor wise man who frees a city besieged by a great king, namely the devil. The whole Song of Songs is expounded concerning Christ and the Church.

Although some say that the book entitled Wisdom was also produced by Solomon, others deny this. Hence, according to Jerome, it is not among the Hebrews' authentic books. The Jews themselves affirm that it was composed by a certain Greek named Solon. It contains many moral teachings and speaks with considerable eloquence. From chapter 6 through chapter 8 inclusive it wonderfully exalts Wisdom and describes her virtues or effects, which are understood either of the Son of God, who is the Wisdom of God the Father, or of the wisdom infused into us through saving grace.

Chapter 2 especially treats the counsel the Jews formed to kill Christ, where they conclude by saying, "Let us condemn Him to a most shameful death." Augustine notes this in The City of God.

The book called Ecclesiasticus, as everyone holds, was produced by a certain man named Jesus son of Sirach, who lived in the time of Simeon, son of Onias, after the Jewish people's return from Babylon. Although it is full of moral wisdom and therefore received by the Church for reading, it is nevertheless not authentic for proving matters that enter into disputes about the faith. Hence its first chapter says, "The fountain of wisdom is the Word of God on high."

Chapter Five

Among the four prophets called major because their prophecies are manifold and contain much writing, the first is Isaiah. He describes the mysteries of Christ's Incarnation and Passion so openly that, according to Jerome, he appears to compose the Gospel's history rather than prophetically announce future things. As he was noble by birth because he came from royal seed, so he maintained urbane eloquence in his prophetic discourse without any rusticity mixed into it.

He had a wife and sons and prophesied at Jerusalem in the times of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, and Manasseh, kings of Judah. Because he rebuked the idolatry and other crimes of the last of these, although Manasseh was his kinsman, Manasseh cut him into two parts with a wooden saw so that he would suffer more greatly, according to Jerome. As is said in the Scholastic History, when Isaiah, thirsty from the distress of his punishment, asked for water to refresh his mouth, the exceedingly cruel Jews refused to grant it to him, but God sent water from heaven into his mouth.

From chapter 13 through chapter 23 Isaiah prophetically describes the burdens of the Jews, that is, the judgments and future destructions of the nations near them, which he names: Babylon, Moab, Damascus, Egypt, the desert of the sea, the valley of vision, Tyre, and others.

§ I

Isaiah also prophesied about the destruction and scourging God carried out against many cities through Nebuchadnezzar as the instrument of His justice. For this reason the Lord said, "Assur is the rod of My wrath," because through him, the king of the Assyrians, He scourged many people. He adds, "But he," namely Assur, "did not know Me," because he attributed that power and victory not to God but to his own strength. He did these things not as a minister and executor of the divine will, but to satisfy his ambition and greed.

At last he himself was scourged by God when, according to his own and others' imagination, he was turned into a beast. Of him it is also said in Isaiah 14, "How have you fallen from heaven, O Lucifer," and so forth. These words have a twofold literal sense. One concerns the devil falling through pride and is thus a prophecy about the past. The other concerns the proud Nebuchadnezzar, and from these words he appears to be damned in hell.

But since Augustine says in Cause 23, question 4, that Nebuchadnezzar merited fruitful penance, and Gratian says the same in On Penance, distinction 1, it is necessary to say that this is understood of his grandson Belshazzar. Or, if it is understood of the great Nebuchadnezzar, it must be said that he afterward relapsed into sins of idolatry or other sins.

§ II

The Lord spoke to Ahaz, saying, "Ask a sign for yourself from the Lord your God," and so forth. To explain this, it should be known that this Ahaz, king of Judah, was impious and idolatrous. The Lord therefore delivered him into the hands of the king of Syria and the king of Samaria the first time they came against him in battle, for they captured a large part of his army, as is related in the Fourth Book of Kings.

When the aforesaid two kings came against Ahaz a second time to depose him from the kingdom, the Lord consoled Ahaz, who feared them, by promising his deliverance from them. Because he did not firmly believe, Isaiah said to him on God's behalf, "The Lord spoke: Ask a sign for yourself." That is: If you do not believe my words, to confirm the truth I have told you--namely, that you will be delivered--ask whatever sign you wish so that you may be compelled to believe.

"Into the depth of hell," that is, let the earth be split and hell's mouth open, as the earth opened and swallowed Dathan, or let Samuel be recalled from below at Saul's request. "Or into the height above," that is, from heaven, as Hezekiah asked and obtained a sign in the sun, which moved backward ten lines.

But Ahaz, as an evil man, answered, "I will not ask," namely for a sign from God. As if excusing himself under the appearance of piety, he added, "I will not tempt the Lord," as though to say that asking would be to tempt God, which is not lawful.

He did not refuse to ask for this reason, however, but in truth because he was evil, turned away from God, and given to idolatry. He did not wish to ask for a sign because he feared that God would be glorified in it and his idols, in which he trusted, would be debased. Hence another text reads, "Nor will I exalt the Lord." Or it was because he trusted in his kingdom, his own power, or the king of the Assyrians and not in God, and thus cared nothing for God's aid.

Isaiah said to him, "Hear, therefore, O house of David." He did not say, "Hear, Ahaz," but "house of David," either because everyone of his house consented to him in his wickedness or because Christ had been promised to David, and Christ was therefore given to the house of David as a sign.

"Is it a small thing for you," so as to merit divine anger, "to be troublesome to men," whom you have despoiled, or to the prophets, whom you have not believed? "For you are also troublesome to my God" by abandoning Him and serving idols. "Therefore the Lord Himself will give you a sign” of your coming deliverance. That is: Even if because of your wickedness you do not wish to ask for a sign lest God be exalted through it, He Himself will nevertheless give one.

He will give the greatest sign: the universal deliverance of the world from sin and the devil. Through this greater deliverance you can perceive that He can also accomplish the lesser, namely deliver us from the temporal power and wickedness of those two kings. This sign is: “Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son,” and so forth.

Here it should be known that the Jews, obstinate in their unbelief, raise many objections about this prophecy to deny or obscure the mystery of the Incarnation contained in it.

Their first objection is this: the Lord intended to give a sign of Ahaz’s deliverance from the hands of those two kings, as was said, but Christ’s Incarnation has no correspondence with that deliverance. It must be answered that the Incarnation signifies that deliverance through an argument from the greater: if God will give His Son for the salvation of the whole world, He will much more be able to save them from that particular and temporal affliction.

Second, they object that the sign given concerning the virgin who would give birth was given to people then present, but the Incarnation did not occur in their time, and thus it appears to be no sign. The response is that although the Incarnation did not occur while the people of that time were present, it nevertheless occurred while the house of David remained. Hence the prophet pointedly says, “Hear, therefore, O house of David.”

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

Third, they object that the Hebrew text does not have “virgin” but almah, which among them signifies a young woman. But even if “young woman,” which among them signifies a virgin, is read, it is not necessary that she conceived while remaining a virgin; she could first have been a virgin and afterward conceived from Joseph’s seed. Yet let the unbelieving Jew who says that Christ was born from Joseph’s seed blush. If this were so, it would have been no sign or wonder, because it happens naturally, whereas the Lord wished to signify something great when He said, “Ask a sign for yourself.”

Fourth, they object by saying that the prophet speaks of Hezekiah. But this cannot stand, because, as is clear in chapter 18 of the Fourth Book of Kings, when Ahaz began to reign Hezekiah was already nine years old. He had therefore already been born when Isaiah said this to Ahaz.

Moreover, how can the other things said below about this child to be born be verified of Hezekiah? Chapter 8 says, “Before the child knows how to call upon father and mother, the strength of Damascus and the spoils of Samaria will be taken away.” But Hezekiah was thirty-one years old when Samaria and Damascus were devastated by the king of the Assyrians.

In a certain sermon Augustine shows that this was spiritually fulfilled in the Virgin’s Son when He was worshiped by the Magi, who were powerful kings but unbelievers. Through the faith they had in the child Christ, who then appeared not to know how to call upon His putative father Joseph and His true mother the Virgin, although He knew all things, the souls of those strong, unbelieving gentile Magi were taken from the devil’s power, offered to Christ, and stripped of vices.

Fifth, others say it is understood of Isaiah’s son, because chapter 8 says that Isaiah approached the prophetess, namely his wife, and she bore a son. But that would not have been a sign, because it was natural for Isaiah to have a son by his wife. Nor can the things said there be verified in any manner of Isaiah’s son.

Isaiah’s approach to the prophetess is instead wonderfully expounded of the Virgin, who possessed the spirit of prophecy and every kind of holiness. Isaiah approached her through the faith and understanding of the mystery given to him by God. This Virgin conceived Jesus from the Holy Spirit, and the name of the child to be born was called, “Hasten to take the spoils,” namely human beings; “quickly seize them,” namely by drawing them away from the devil; “hurry to plunder,” namely hell. All these effects of the Incarnation are included in the name Jesus imposed upon Him.

Chapter 8 says that for this Isaiah took two faithful witnesses, namely Uriah the high priest and Zechariah, son of Barachiah. This does not seem capable of being understood well according to the surface of the letter, because that Uriah was not a faithful witness and Zechariah had long been dead. Likewise, it appears absurd that these two were introduced as witnesses of Isaiah’s carnal approach to his wife, as though he had known his wife in their sight.

Rather, by those two witnesses the prophet intended to bring forward the law and the prophets as testimony to that mystery, namely Christ conceived and born of the Virgin prophetess. The law is designated by the priest Uriah, for it pertained to priests to explain the law to the people, while prophecy is designated by Barachiah. Each frequently renders testimony concerning Him.

It should be known that, as was said, the Hebrew does not have “virgin” but almah. According to the Hebrew language this word has a twofold meaning. In one manner it means the same as “young woman,” and perverse Jews so understand it. According to another meaning, almah is the same as apocrypha, that is, hidden, closed, or concealed, which is principal among virgins. Hence the Blessed Virgin was enclosed and hidden in a private room when the angel came to her. In the Punic language as well, the word almah signifies a virgin, while in Latin it sounds like “holy.” The Jews use nearly all languages.

A certain learned Jew once said that here in Isaiah almah is written with a closed letter mem, by which almah, that is, a virgin, is indicated. It is therefore expounded according to Catholic teachers: “Behold, a virgin,” remaining a virgin, “shall conceive,” which is a miraculous work and a wondrous sign, “and shall bear,” remaining a virgin, which is miraculous.

“And His name shall be called Emmanuel.” Matthew the Evangelist interprets this name when he introduces this authority of Isaiah and says, “God with us,” that is, God in human nature, so as to signify the divinity in the Virgin’s Son. “He shall eat butter and honey,” that is, He will be fed with infants’ food, with the sweet milk from the Virgin’s breast filled from heaven, so as to signify true humanity.

Or it may be understood thus: from human nature He will not take the whole, namely penalty and guilt, but He will take butter, which is the flower of milk, namely innocence from guilt. He will nevertheless take every penalty by which our sins may be purged, because butter is purgative. He will also take the sweet honey of benignity, according to the Apostle’s words to Titus, “The benignity and humanity of God our Savior appeared.”

Hence, as if explaining, Isaiah adds, “That He may know how to reject evil,” namely the evil of guilt, by not assuming it or by making Himself immune from it, “and to choose the good” of grace and punishment, through which He may make satisfaction for us. That punishment is therefore good.

§ III

In chapter 9 there is a singular prophecy concerning Christ’s Nativity, His divinity, and the fruits of the Incarnation, when it is said, “A child is born to us, and a son is given to us,” and so forth. A little before these words Isaiah says, “The people who walked in darkness have seen a great light,” and so forth. Matthew the Evangelist introduces this prophecy in chapter 4, showing it fulfilled when Christ, after His Baptism and temptation in the desert, began to preach and become renowned in the regions of Galilee through doctrine, miracles, and holiness of life.

But because the literal sense is sometimes twofold, as was said elsewhere, beyond the preceding sense it may also be said that from the beginning of chapter 9, where Isaiah says, “At the first time,” and so forth, down to the place “A child is born,” he first denotes the captivity of three tribes from Israel, and after it, under Shalmaneser, king of the Assyrians, the captivity of the other seven tribes.

Second, he denotes the great tribulation of the kingdom of Judah under Hezekiah from Sennacherib’s siege of Jerusalem. This affliction is called darkness and the shadow of death because of the very great danger that the city would be captured, when no human means could resist the power of a man who had one hundred and eighty-five thousand fighting men in his army.

In that darkness a great light is said to have arisen for them because a luminous angel of the Lord appeared in one night and killed that entire army of Sennacherib, who returned to his own country in confusion. The people were enriched and gladdened by the plunder their enemies left behind.

The prophet touches very briefly and obscurely upon this history of things truly done so that it might be a figure of the thing to be accomplished: the liberation of Jerusalem, that is, the Church and the faithful, from the hands of Satan and his armies of demons, who besieged the human race and sought to subject it entirely to themselves.

We were virtually freed from this oppression through the Nativity of Christ, who is called the Angel of Great Counsel. An angel appeared on the night of His Nativity amid a great light and announced to the shepherds the world’s salvation through the child who had been born, singing with the other angels of peace to men. Hence, after narrating the aforesaid history, the prophet adds, “For a child is born to us,” as though to say: I relate these things because they signify the liberation to be accomplished through Christ who was to be born.

The prophet uses a verb of past time for the future according to the prophets’ custom. Because of the certainty of the things they announce, since they see them in the book of God’s foreknowledge, which is infallible, they speak of the future with verbs of past time. Thus the Psalm says, “They have pierced my hands and my feet,” that is, they will pierce them, for Christ’s Passion was then still a thousand years or a little less in the future.

Thus, “A child is born to us” means that a child will be born, small in body but greatest in holiness, power, and wisdom. He was born temporally from the Virgin Mary. Hence Isaiah himself says in his final chapter, “Before the time of her delivery came,” that is, the opening and breaking of the virginal seal, “she bore a male,” Jesus, wholly virile. For the Lord entered through the closed gate of the virginal womb, taking flesh from her, and went forth through it closed when He was born.

Because Jesus' birth from the Virgin is beyond nature, Ambrose says in On Consecration, distinction 2, that just as He truly went forth from the tomb when it was closed after He rose, so Isaiah adds, "Who has ever heard such things?" as though to say: no one.

"He is born to us," that is, for our benefit, so that "a son," namely the Son of God by excellence, "is shown. A son is given to us," namely by grace alone and not by our merits. Because this person is God and man, He must therefore be exalted. Hence the prophet indicates that very exaltation which appeared shameful, namely upon the cross, but was nevertheless glorious in power, adding, "And the government was placed upon His shoulder," that is, the cross upon which He principally triumphed.

Because of the cross the Lord exalted Him and gave Him the name above every name, for upon the cross He conquered the world and the devil, and through the preaching of the cross the apostles subjected the whole world to Christ. It was "upon His shoulder" because He carried the cross itself upon His shoulders and was stretched upon it.

"And His name shall be called," and so forth. Through the following six names His divinity, humanity, and magnificence are indicated. The first name indicates His wondrous divine wisdom. For it is wondrous and most worthy of all wonder that God became man. Maximus says in a sermon: "Our venerable fathers saw God's great and innumerable wondrous works, but it was granted to none of them to see this: that the Only-begotten of the Most High, whom the powers of the archangels receive with trembling, should receive humanity and present Himself to human beings.

The second name is "Counselor," in which His human wisdom is shown in His teaching. He adds most useful counsels to the commandments and does not compel people, because the counsels are more difficult.

The third name is "God," expressing divine power, because He is the Creator of all. It belongs to God alone to make something from nothing. Hence Genesis 1 says, "In the beginning God created heaven and earth," and John 1 says, "All things were made through Him," the Word whom he had called God.

The fourth name expresses human endurance, because He is "Strong." Through this strength in His humanity He endured so many reproaches and afflictions so manfully. The Psalm says, "The Lord is strong" in enduring "and mighty" in conquering "in battle," namely the battle He waged against the devil upon the cross. Augustine says, "With an unarmed hand fastened to the cross He defeated the powers of the air."

The fifth name, "Father of the Future Age," contains the abundance of goodness with respect to the divine nature, because the Lord alone begets children for heavenly felicity.

Sixth, He is named "Prince of Peace," expressing the abundance of goodness with respect to human nature, insofar as He is the mediator of God and men and our peace, because He made both one.

The seventy translators did not dare to say of this child that He was to be called God. In place of these six names they therefore put one: "Angel of Great Counsel." They did this lest Ptolemy, at whose request they translated the Old Testament from Hebrew into Greek, believe that the Scripture posited several gods, and lest they give what is holy to dogs, namely unbelievers, if they disclosed the mystery of the Incarnation so openly. According to this translation, the Church places this authority in the entrance chant of the Mass of the Lord's Nativity.

"His empire shall be multiplied," for all nations and kings will serve Him. Through the preaching of the apostles and their successors, the faithful subject to His empire were multiplied in merit and number. "And there shall be no end of His peace" in this world, namely of interior peace, because the Church will never fail and the good, namely the faithful, always possess interior peace. Although external wars sometimes exist and rise against her, the peace of Christ that is in His servants always remains. Or His peace will have no end with respect to the peace of the heavenly homeland that the truly faithful will possess.

"He shall sit upon the throne of David and over his kingdom." The nobility of the kingdom is expressed in this, because He shall rest and reign over the congregation from David's people and from the gentiles, which congregation, the Church, is signified in David's house. Because the promise was made to Abraham that Christ descends from the house of David, it appears that when the kingdom is treated it ought to be referred to David. If all nations come and worship Him, then those nations are blessed in Abraham's seed and consequently He ought to reign over them.

"That He may confirm it" for restoring it against unbelievers and heretics until the end, "and strengthen it" by fighting against demons and vices, "in judgment and in justice," that is, through judgment, so that He may give to everyone according to merits or demerits, "from now and forever," from the time of the Incarnation into eternity.

Finally, the prophet sets forth God's motive for giving us His Son to become man, saying, "The zeal of the Lord of hosts will do this," that is, God's most intense love. Hence in Jeremiah 31 God says, "I have loved you with an everlasting charity; therefore, taking pity, I have drawn you." John 3 says, "God so loved the world that He gave His only-begotten Son." And the Apostle says, "Because of the exceedingly great charity with which He loved us, God sent His Son."

Here it should also be carefully noted that where our translation reads, “His empire shall be multiplied,” the Hebrew has lemenbre, which in Latin means “for multiplying.” This letter mem, as Jerome says, is shaped or formed differently when placed at the beginning or middle of a word and when placed at the end. At the beginning it is formed open, but at the end it is formed closed.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

In this place, however, in lemenbre, mem is placed in the middle of the word and is nevertheless written closed. This is contrary to the nature of the letter and the Hebrew manner of writing, so as to indicate that the Christ of whom the prophet speaks was to be born from a closed, that is, unviolated, virgin and contrary to the manner of nature, and that the mystery of the Incarnation itself was closed and secret.

For just as poets signify something to subtle readers through grammatical figures, so prophets sometimes designated hidden mysteries through such an unusual manner of writing. Thus Moses, to designate the mystery of the divine Persons in the unity of essence, joined the word Elohim, which is plural in number from Eli, to a singular verb, saying, “In the beginning Elohim created,” that is, the gods, meaning the divine Persons, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, “heaven and earth,” and so forth.

Modern Jews, however, corrupt the letter of Scripture. In place of what was said, “His name shall be called Wonderful,” and so forth, they have in their books, “And he”--namely, He who is the Wonderful Counselor, God, and so forth--“shall call his name,” namely the name of that child who was born, “Prince of Peace.” For in place of our nominative “Prince of Peace,” they have the accusative “a prince of peace.”

They say that these things spoken of this child are understood of Hezekiah, king of Judah, whom God called a prince of peace because under him He gave peace to the people when Sennacherib's army was destroyed. Or, if they understand these things of Christ, they say that His divinity is not apparent from them. This is one of their errors, for they do not concede that the Christ whom they still mistakenly await is God.

Because, as has been said, the Hebrews corrupt the text, recourse must be had to the translations of others. According to the translation of the Seventy made into Greek, the text does not say “he shall call,” as the Hebrews have, but “he shall be called,” as we have. In place of our six names, however, they put “Angel of Great Counsel” for the reason already given. This signifies implicitly and in a veiled manner the same thing that those names expressing the divinity signify explicitly and manifestly, because before it was fulfilled the mystery of the divine Incarnation was the greatest secret and divine counsel. It therefore cannot be understood of Hezekiah.

That they put “Prince of Peace” in the accusative ought instead to be in the nominative. The following words also show such an exposition concerning Hezekiah to be false, when it is said, “His empire shall be multiplied, and there shall be no end of peace,” for the peace under Hezekiah lasted only a short time.

The falsity of the Hebrew Scripture as corrupted by them is also evident from the Chaldean translation, which is authentic among them. For it says there, “His name shall be called,” not “he shall call the child's name,” “Wonderful Counselor, mighty God, enduring forever, the Messiah, in whose days peace shall be multiplied.”

§ IV

In chapter 53 Isaiah speaks so openly of Christ's Passion that he appears more an evangelist recounting the history of something accomplished than a prophet announcing the future. Because in the beginning few believed this mystery, namely a crucified Christ who is God and man, Isaiah begins the chapter thus: “Lord, who has believed?” that is, who believes “our report,” meaning the things we have heard from You or those the Jews hear from us? As though to say: few. He adds what those few believe, namely matters concerning Christ's Incarnation and Passion.

“And to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed?” The Son of God is called the Lord's arm because all things were made through Him and God sustains all things by His Word, just as one works and holds things with an arm. Just as a man embraces another with his arm and draws him close, so through the Son we have been embraced by the Lord, reconciled, made like the Son, and united through grace.

He leads us in this arm like sheep. Isaiah 40 says, “In His arm He will gather the lambs.” In this arm God made such an anointing with blood that He healed the Church's whole body. “To whom has it been revealed?” As though to say: this arm was covered with assumed flesh and therefore must be revealed. Isaiah wishes to indicate that faith comes from revelation, not acquisition. Hence in the preceding chapter he says, “The Lord has prepared His holy arm in the eyes of all nations, and all flesh shall see the salvation of our God,” which the gloss expounds of the Son of God revealed to the gentiles.

First Isaiah treats Christ's Incarnation, saying, "He ascended like a shoot before Him." The place and manner of His conception are indicated here. The place is indicated because He was conceived at Nazareth, which is interpreted "shoot" or also "flower," and because He was conceived in March, when flowers begin.

The manner is indicated because He was conceived and born of a virgin without human work, just as a shoot springs from the earth without human work. "Before Him," that is, before God, because He was born of the Virgin to fulfill the Father's will.

"And like a root." A root is hidden from sight but shows its power in its effect. Thus Christ's divinity lay hidden in His flesh. Isaiah 45 says, "Truly You are a hidden God." But when He supplies the moisture of grace to His branches, that is, His members, and displays the fruit of glory, He shows His power.

Just as a root is the more despised part of a tree but nevertheless sustains the tree, so Christ is called the last of men by reason of His shameful Passion and yet is the foundation of the Church. From this root every tree, that is, every human being, receives fruit. This root ascended "from a thirsty land," that is, from the Blessed Virgin, whose womb was not moistened by male seed; or from a thirsty land, that is, from the Blessed Virgin thirsting and hungering for the salvation of the human race.

After the prophet has set forth Christ's Nativity, he immediately descends to the Passion. Gregory says, "His being born would have profited us nothing had His dying not profited us." "There is neither form nor comeliness in Him," namely in the Passion. Hence few among the Jews believe what we preach, namely Christ the Son of God, because there was no form or visible comeliness showing divinity in Christ as a man so dishonored and dead.

"And we saw Him, and there was no sight," namely of the divinity in Him when He was so treated with contempt. During the Passion He especially concealed the power of His divinity. Hence the Jews said in mockery, "If He is the Son of God, let Him come down from the cross," while He remained fixed upon it as though powerless.

Because the prophet by the light of grace saw that shameful Passion would free the world, he adds, "And we desired Him, despised," and so forth--not by rejoicing in or desiring His afflictions, but by attending to the fruit of the Passion. "And His face was as though hidden," that is, the manifestation of His divinity. He says "as though," not simply, because even during the Passion His face did not lie entirely hidden, as appeared in the darkening of the sun, the prostration of the betrayer, and other signs. "Hence we did not esteem Him," namely to be God. He says this in the person of the unbelieving Jews.

The prophet further shows that Christ suffered these things not for His own sins but ours, adding, "Truly He took our infirmities," that is, removed from us our inveterate sins, for an infirmity means an inveterate sickness, "and He carried our sorrows," that is, carried them away. Thus "infirmity" may be referred to original sins and "sorrow" to actual sins.

Or, "He took our infirmities and carried our sorrows" insofar as He bore all our sins in His body upon the wood of the cross, as Peter says in his canonical epistle. That is, He endured in Himself the punishment owed to us for sins. He did this truly, not in appearance.

"And we esteemed Him as though a leper and struck by God." The prophet says this in the person of unbelieving Jews, who considered Him a leper, that is, a sinner struck by God for His own sins. Hence they said, "If this man were not an evildoer, we would not have delivered Him to you." Thus they cast Him outside the camp, that is, the city, as though a leper.

Or the prophet can be said to speak in the person of those who first judged Him condemned in this way because of His own sins, but afterward, converted by the signs, said: We thought thus, but now we know that He suffered this not because of His own sins but because of ours.

Hence it follows, "He was wounded for our iniquities," namely by the lance and nails, and "He was bruised" by scourges and blows "for our crimes," namely that they might be purged. "Iniquities" are referred to lesser offenses and "crimes" to greater ones.

"The discipline of our peace was upon Him." War existed between God and human beings because of the sins of those human beings rebelling against God, according to Isaiah's words, "Our sins have divided," that is, made a division, "between us and our God." This peace could not be made except through divine justice, which is called "discipline" in the text.

To establish this peace, therefore, God disciplined the incarnate Son, who held the place of the entire human race because He is our head. By this peace was made. Hence He is called "our peace, who made both one." From this it followed that "by His bruise we are healed."

We are healed in three ways. First, by way of provocation to charity, which is the cause of the remission of sins, because by enduring the Passion for us He provokes us to love Him above all things. Second, by way of redemption. Because Jesus is our head, through His Passion, which He endured from charity and obedience, He freed us as His members from sins, as though by the price of His blood.

Third, we are healed through Christ's Passion by way of efficiency or instrumentality. Insofar as Christ endured the Passion, it is the instrument of the divinity. Thus all His sufferings and actions operate by divine power to expel sin.

This discipline of the Passion was necessary for everyone so that all might be led back from the way in which they walked, namely transgressions, into the way of salvation and the virtues. Hence he adds, “All we like sheep have gone astray,” for all sinned in Adam as in the first sheep. “Each one turned aside into his own way” of his proper will and sensuality. “And the Lord laid upon Him the iniquity of us all,” namely when the shepherd seeking the sheep that had strayed found it and placed it upon His shoulders, that is, by sustaining the burden of its sins, namely their punishment.

Modern Jews falsely say that those who lived rightly in the Old Testament went directly to glory. But since it is said here that “all we have gone astray,” namely by sinning, and since no one can go to glory with such an error before this common error is purged--a purgation accomplished only through Christ's Passion--no one went to glory before the Passion.

For even if sins were removed through animal sacrifices ex opere operante, that is, by the devotion and compunction of those offering, they were nevertheless not removed fully. Vitiating nature still remained to be purged completely through the true sacrifice, Christ, the immaculate sheep and lamb figured in those sacrifices.

He voluntarily endured this immolation, that is, the Passion. This is what follows: “He was offered because He Himself willed it.” He willed to suffer for our liberation, but He did not will the evil intention of the Jews who killed Him. That He appeared voluntarily is evident in His patience during the Passion, which he shows by saying, “He shall be led like a sheep to slaughter and like a lamb,” and so forth, neither defending Himself nor murmuring, but permitting everything.

“From distress,” namely the Passion, “and from judgment,” namely Pilate's unjust judgment against Him, “He was taken away,” namely in the Resurrection.

The prophet next sets forth His greatness, saying, “Who shall recount His generation?” Christ's generation can be spoken of in three ways. The first is eternal, by which the Word is eternally begotten from the Father. The second is temporal, by which the Word became flesh temporally from His mother. Not only is the first indescribable and incomprehensible to us, but so also is the second: how that union of the Word with flesh occurred and how He was conceived and born of the Virgin.

The third is active generation, by which He begets adopted sons from faith. Who will recount even this generation--how many faithful sons of His were multiplied from the Passion, and how this generation occurs in the human mind? As though to say: no one.

This was accomplished through the Passion, as the prophet shows by adding, “Because He was cut off from the land of the living,” namely removed through His death from the society of human beings. Because this generation of spiritual children cannot occur unless their sins have been purged, a purgation virtually accomplished through the Passion, he adds, “For the crime of My people I struck Him,” speaking in the Father's person. I, the Father, struck Him, that is, permitted Him, My incarnate Son, to be struck by Jews and others for the crime of the people, namely that it might be erased.

Because God did not permit the wickedness of those striking Christ to go unpunished, the prophet adds, “He shall give the impious for His burial.” Christ will give the impious Jews to the Romans under Titus and Vespasian “for His burial,” that is, because they persecuted Christ even to the death from which He was buried. He will give them captive and afflicted. They persecuted Him even after death by fortifying the stone of the tomb with guards.

“And the rich for His death,” that is, He will give to death the scribes, Pharisees, and chief priests who gloried in the ways of the law's teaching, because they delivered Him to death. The reason they unjustly delivered Him to death is assigned: “because He committed no iniquity, nor was deceit found in His mouth.” This can be said of no one else, because no one is clean from stain, at least original stain.

Because the prophet said above, “All we like sheep have gone astray,” while Christ was without sin, he sufficiently shows from this that Christ is not a mere man but God and man, by reason of which union He is without sin. Yet although He was without guilt, “the Lord willed to bruise Him in infirmity,” that is, permitted Him to be bruised in that part in which He was weak, namely in the flesh He assumed.

“If He shall lay down His soul for sin,” that is, if He voluntarily gives His life to death to erase human sin, “He shall see a long-lived seed,” that is, His spiritual sons, the faithful, down to the end of the world; or He shall see His seed, that is, the Gospel or the Gospel's teaching, remain until the end.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

Hence the Jews argue that these things cannot be understood of Christ the Nazarene, since He had no sons but remained a virgin. Yet because they savor and understand the Scriptures carnally, they therefore take this as referring to carnal sons, although the prophet speaks of spiritual sons and spiritual seed.

“And the will of the Lord”--namely, that will by which He wills all men to be saved--“shall be directed in His hand,” that is, it shall be fulfilled in His work, namely His Passion, because, as regards merit, that Passion is sufficient to save all. The reason for this is “because His soul has labored.” Behold the fruit of His labor: “He shall see,” namely Christ Himself, that for which He labored--the Church gathered and converted from the Gentiles throughout the whole world. He hungered and thirsted for this conversion of men, and therefore “He shall be satisfied” by their conversion, delighted by it.

And because the just man lives by faith, Christ therefore justifies men by it. Hence it follows: “In His knowledge shall My just servant justify many.” In the knowledge of His teaching and in the faith infused into men--which knowledge is from God--He shall justify, that is, He shall make the unjust just. It says that the just one shall justify because God alone is He who justifies; therefore our Christ is God. The Son of God is called the servant of God because He assumed the form of a servant. It says “many,” not all, because many are called but few are chosen, owing to a defect in men.

“And He shall bear their iniquities,” namely those of the persons to be justified: as regards the efficient action of cleansing, He shall bear the penalty by making satisfaction for them. Divine justice required this, for Christ, as head of human nature, made Himself a debtor to God by reason of the union and on account of the defects of human nature; and for it He willed to sustain in Himself the penalty that divine justice required. In this way He appeased divine justice and consequently justified many by bearing the penalty of their sins--not all, but those who are joined to Him through the sacraments devoutly received, in which their power has remained.

And because Isaiah had said that the Father had given the Jews to the Romans as spoil and unto death, he consequently shows how God the Father will compensate Him among the Gentiles, saying, “I will distribute to Him very many.” These are the words of God the Father speaking of Christ, as if to say: If the Jews are negligent and do not come through faith to Christ, in place of those Jews “I will distribute,” that is, I will compensate for the ruin of the Jews with the multitude of Gentiles coming to the faith of Christ. “And I shall divide the spoils of the strong,” that is, of the demons: the human race, which the devil had seized for himself by deceiving it, shall be snatched from the devil and entrusted to the apostles and their followers as a dominion, for the apostles were the first to preside over the converted Gentiles.

This shall happen “because He has delivered His soul,” that is, His life, “unto death, and was reputed with the wicked,” namely with the thieves by the Jews; “and He has borne the sins of many,” that is, He has taken them away, or sustained their penalty. “And He prayed for the transgressors,” saying, as is found in Luke 22, “Father, forgive them.” At this utterance, according to the Gospel of the Nazarenes, many of the Jews were converted.

From this prophecy Isaiah clearly shows that Christ was and is true God and true man, contrary to the Jews who refuse to assent that Christ ought to suffer, whom they still await as one to come in their error. Rather, they say that He ought temporally to possess great power in the world as a great temporal lord. They also deny that He is true God and say that He is a mere man.

§ V

How God would bear witness to Christ through the fruit of His Passion, after the Jews had been abandoned because of their faithlessness, by means of the conversion of the Gentiles, Isaiah declares in the following chapter, namely chapter 54, saying: “Praise, O barren one who bears not; sing praise, you who did not travail, because the children of the deserted woman are more numerous than those of her who has a husband.”

For an explanation of this, it must be known that according to the prophets and in Scripture mention is made of two congregations or peoples, namely the Israelite and the Gentile, and each people took its origin from Noah. At that time Gentility, instructed by Noah in his sons, adored the one God, Creator of all, and this nation was the bride of the one true God, to whom it was joined through faith.

At the time of the building of Babel, however, the Gentility whom the Lord had espoused to Himself in Noah and his sons, as though fornicating in her youth, withdrew from God and adhered to the devil through idolatry. She was deserted by her bridegroom, God, until the Incarnation; and the Jewish people alone were chosen as though as a bride by God when men were dispersed through the various regions of the world and through various rites of idolatry, while true faith in the one God and His worship remained in the house of Heber alone, afterward in the family of Abraham, and finally in the house of Jacob and those descending from his twelve sons.

Thus Gentility became as a widow by withdrawing from God, whence neither could she bear spiritual children for God, which is done through faith. The Jewish people, on the other hand, were as though married to God through true faith and bore for God spiritual children who were to be saved in faith in the Christ to come, and this continued until the time of Christ.

But after Christ's Passion, through the preaching of the apostles, Gentility was converted to the faith and espoused to God through faith, and she generated very many children, namely all those converted from her to the faith. Jewry also generated some, but only those who believed in Christ. And because these were few in comparison with those converted from Gentility, Isaiah therefore says: "Praise, O barren one," that is, you, Gentility, who formerly were barren after deserting God your bridegroom; "and deserted," that is, abandoned by God because you had abandoned God--praise God. For many children have been born spiritually through faith, that is, far more than to "her who has a husband": the congregation of the Jews, who had God as husband or bridegroom until the time of Christ, and afterward insofar as concerns those converted from Judaism, who nevertheless were fewer than the converted Gentiles.

§ VI

Concerning the luminous advent of Christ through His teaching, miracles, and holiness of life--an advent by which the Jews were darkened by the shadows of errors and faithlessness and covered by the gloom of vices, but the Gentiles were illuminated, whose firstfruits were the holy Magi who came from distant parts to adore the newborn Christ and venerate Him with gifts, which sufficiently openly signified the true faith they had concerning Him--Isaiah speaks in chapter 60, where he says: "Arise and be illuminated, Jerusalem, because your light has come," and so forth.

Concerning the fullness of sevenfold grace bestowed upon Christ insofar as He is man, the prophet Isaiah speaks in chapter 11: "A rod shall come forth from the root of Jesse," that is, the Virgin Mary from the lineage of Jesse, who was David's father; for he was called by two names, Jesse and Isai. "And a flower from his root," that is, Christ, descending according to corporeal substance from that lineage, not propagated carnally, but conceived and born without human operation like a flower from a rod, that is, from the Virgin Mary.

"And the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon Him." It says that He shall rest because He will find in Him no restlessness or goad of sin, something that occurs in no one else, at least as regards original sin: "the Spirit of wisdom and understanding, the Spirit of counsel and fortitude, the Spirit of knowledge and piety; and the Spirit of the fear of the Lord has filled Him."

Concerning His preaching it is said in chapter 61: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me, because He has anointed Me; He has sent Me to announce to the meek, to heal the contrite of heart, and to preach release to captives," and so forth. The prophet speaks in the person of Christ, who insofar as He is man was anointed with the anointing of grace by the Holy Spirit and sent to preach. Hence, as is read in Luke 4, when Christ once entered the synagogue of the Jews at Nazareth and the book of the prophet Isaiah was handed to Him, He began to read what first met His eye in it. It was this: "The Spirit of the Lord," and so forth, as was said. When He had read it, He said, "Today this Scripture is fulfilled in your ears."

Concerning His miracles Isaiah says in chapter 35: "The Lord shall come and save us. Then shall the eyes of the blind be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the mute shall be opened," and so forth. We do not read that anyone in the Old Testament worked all these miracles, but the Lord Jesus Christ did them all.

§ VII

Concerning the angels' wonder and their inquiry at Christ's Ascension, it is said in chapter 63: "Who is this who comes from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah?" The lower angels, seeing Christ ascend in such glory, ask in wonder. Edom is interpreted "earthly" or "bloody" and signifies the world. Bozrah is interpreted "fortified" or "firm" and signifies hell, which was so firm that no one could escape. As though seeing Christ ascend by His own power and with the souls of the saints, the angels therefore said in wonder: "Who is this who comes from the world, because He is man, and from hell so fortified, with beatified souls?"

For although all the angels, from the beginning of their creation or glorification, knew in the Word the mystery of the Incarnation, nevertheless not all knew all the particulars concerning that mystery; rather, they knew them as they were fulfilled. Thus the higher angels, as being enlightened in greater detail concerning a mystery of this kind, answer: "This beautiful one in His robe," that is, in the habit of humanity, "walking in the multitude of His strength," that is, coming to heaven by the way of the cross, where He exercised His strength in conquering the devil.

Or it can be said that this entire speech belongs to the lower angels, and Christ Himself answers them, saying: "I, who speak justice," that is, I who, as justice requires, render to each one according to his works. I redeemed the human race by justice, not by power, sustaining the penalty for the sin of men so that satisfaction might be made for the offense against God. It was also just that the devil, who tyrannically possessed deceived man and incited the Jews to inflict death upon Him who was not liable to death, should lose men who were liable to death. "And I am a defender," that is, one fighting against the devil and the world, conquering on behalf of men "to save," namely, them.

Either the angels or Isaiah himself asks, “Why then is Your garment red?” that is, whence do You have the signs of the Passion by which Your garment, that is, Your body, was made red in blood? He answers them: “I have trodden the winepress alone,” that is, I sustained the cross. He was alone because no one among the Jews, the disciples, the friends, or the angels helped Him. “I have trodden” the demons by subjugating them, and the world “in My fury,” that is, being greatly angered against vices and demons, and finally against the Jews, and so forth.

Concerning the apostles and those sent to preach, chapter 63 says: “I will send of those who have been saved,” namely, disciples and others converted to the faith, “going to the sea, to Africa, to Libdia, bearing arrows,” namely the words of God, “to Italy and Greece and to the distant islands,” such as Sicily and England, “who have not heard of Me,” namely through the prophets, “and have not seen My glory; and they shall announce My glory to the Gentiles.” Libdia is in Asia; Italy and Greece are in Europe.

Chapter Six

Jeremiah the prophet was from the priests of Anathoth, sanctified in the womb, as is evident in the first chapter, and sent or appointed by God to preach from his childhood. He foretold the captivity of that people by Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Chaldeans; the capture and burning of the city by him; the destruction of the temple; and the leading of Zedekiah, king of Judah, with many others into Babylon. He reproved the people’s sins and exhorted them to repentance. Because they did not correct themselves, he saw with his own eyes all the evils he had prophesied come upon them.

After the city had been captured, Jeremiah was honored by King Nebuchadnezzar himself and remained with the common people who were left in burned and desolate Jerusalem. But afterward, when Gedaliah, whom the king of Babylon had placed over those left there, had been killed, Jeremiah comforted those who feared the king’s vengeance because of Gedaliah’s killing, counseling them on God’s behalf not to descend into Egypt but to remain safely there. They did not believe or acquiesce in his words, but went on into Egypt, taking Jeremiah himself with them; and finally, when he reproved them, they stoned him in Egypt.

By his virginity Jeremiah dedicated an evangelical man of Christ and the Church. He seems more rustic than certain other prophets, as Jerome says in the prologue, but he is their equal in meaning, since indeed he prophesied by the same Spirit. The simplicity of his speech came to him from the place in which he was born, for he was from Anathoth, a little village three miles distant from Jerusalem. He also laments Jerusalem’s ruins with a fourfold alphabet, namely in the Threni or Lamentations, signifying the ruin of the Church in wicked Christians.

In addition to the prophecy of the scourges of the Jewish people and many other matters, he also prophesied many mysteries of Christ. For concerning His Incarnation he says in chapter 31, “The Lord has created a new thing upon the earth.” Here it must be noted that Christ’s conception and Nativity are called a creation. It was new that a virgin conceived and that a virgin gave birth. It was new that there should be a living man without sin. It was new that God should be born having become man.

“A woman shall encompass a man,” that is, the Virgin Mary, without the seed of a man, shall have Christ, the Son of God, within the enclosure of her womb. She will not create or generate Him by a human operation but by a divine one. She shall encompass in her womb the Son of God as a “man,” that is, one perfect in knowledge and virtue.

Concerning Christ’s Passion he says in chapter 11: “But You have shown me, and I have known; You showed me their pursuits. And I was like a meek lamb that is carried to the sacrifice. And I did not know that they had devised counsels against me, saying: Let us put wood into His bread, and let us root Him out of the land of the living, and let His name be remembered no more.”

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Six (continued)

The Jews and our Judaizers, as is said in the Gloss, expound these words of Jeremiah. For when he reproved the sins of the people and threatened them with evils to come, many planned to kill him because of such things, using various plots and methods, as is evident in Jeremiah 38. Hence the princes also sought and obtained from King Zedekiah that he be cast into a cistern or pit in which there was mud, not water, so that he might die. But Abdemelech, the Ethiopian eunuch of the king, petitioned the king on his behalf that he might be drawn out, which was done. At first the prophet did not know these malicious plans of theirs, but afterward they were revealed to him by God. Among other things, some sought a hidden means of killing him, such as by poison. This is what they mean when they say, “Let us put wood,” that is, something secretly poisoned, “into his bread,” namely, his food or drink.

But according to the holy doctors, it is better expounded of Christ. Hence both before and after these words the prophet foretells the destruction of the Jews by the Romans in punishment for so great a crime of theirs. The prophet therefore speaks in the person of Christ to the Father, saying, “Lord”--namely, Father--“You have shown me.” For all knowledge of truth is from God as the first teacher. “Their pursuits,” that is, the plots and machinations of the Jews against Me.

“And I was like a meek lamb that is carried to the sacrifice”: I did not resist or complain, but conducted Myself meekly and patiently in My capture. “And I did not know,” that is, I dissembled and kept silent as though I did not know their plots, although this was not actually so. “They devised counsels against Me,” for the chief priests and Pharisees gathered a council, saying, “What shall we do?” and so forth; and from that hour they planned to kill Him. They also said, “Not on the feast day,” and so forth, lest He escape.

They say, “Let us put wood into His bread”: the wood, namely, of the cross, into His bread, that is, into His life, because He had once said, “I am the living bread.” That is: let us take His life from Him through death on the wood of the cross. Or let us contradict and resist His teaching, which is spiritual bread, and place a stumbling block in His teaching, namely, the ignominy of the cross. For by killing Him with so ignominious a death, no one will believe in Him as Messiah or as the true God He names Himself to be, since one dead upon the wood of the cross is called accursed in the law, namely with the curse of infamy.

“And let us root Him out of the land of the living,” that is, let us remove Him entirely from this world, so that, just as what is uprooted is wholly abolished, His teaching and name may no longer be in the memory of men. Hence it is added, “And let His name be remembered no more.” But the very contrary of their malicious thought and intention occurred, for Christ, who before the Passion was known only in Judea, became known, glorious, and exalted throughout the whole world.

§ I. That Christ, the Messiah Promised in the Law, Is True God

That Christ, the Messiah promised in the law--whom the Jews, because of their faithlessness, await as still to come, and in whose place they will receive Antichrist as Messiah, as Christ foretold to them in John 5--is true God, which the Jews themselves deny, is shown in Jeremiah 23, where it is said: “Behold, the days come, says the Lord, and I will raise up for David a just shoot; and a king shall reign and shall be wise, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth,” and so forth.

The Jews expound these words of Zerubbabel, because he was that leader who brought the people out of the Babylonian captivity; Judah was saved, as were those few from Israel who were in that captivity, and, upon returning to those regions, they dwelt confidently in the land of promise. They therefore say that Zerubbabel's name was called “the Lord our Just One,” because the Jews in this manner imposed the name of God upon their sons, as in Emmanuel, Deodatus, and the like.

But since Zerubbabel was not a king either before or after the return from that captivity, this exposition must be rejected as false and another, true one set down. “Behold, the days come,” that is, the time of the Incarnation. “And I will raise up for David a just shoot”: David, that is, Christ, who was made from David's seed, that is, lineage, not by male seed but by the operation of the Holy Spirit. Hence in the Psalm: “The Lord swore to David,” and so forth; “Of the fruit of your womb I shall set upon your throne,” namely to reign.

It says “of the fruit” pointedly, because in the conception of children seed descends from the father's loins, but the matter of conception is derived from the mother's womb. Because, therefore, there was no seed of a man in Christ's conception, but matter prepared from the Virgin Mother, it said “of the fruit of the womb,” not “of the fruit of the loins.” It is as though to say: the fruit of Mary, who descends from David--which fruit is Christ Jesus, without a father on earth--will sit upon David's kingdom in the spiritual kingdom of the Church.

All the other kings of Judah died and ceased to be kings. But Christ, descending from David, from the time He began to reign, namely when He was incarnate, never ceased to be king; rather, His kingdom always endures, because He rules the Church militant and triumphant. He also possessed and possesses temporal power and dominion as Lord of all, but He used it [read: but He did not use it], namely by living with a royal court and exercising royal power. He is therefore properly said to have been raised up.

Christ is properly called the just shoot because Christ alone was just in the shoot, that is, in His conception. This can be said of no one else, since according to the common opinion of the doctors all are conceived in sin. Hence another reading has “the just Orient.” Ezekiel 34 says, “I shall raise up the shoot of justice who is named.”

“And a king shall reign and shall be wise.” He is indeed a true temporal king as regards dominion, although not as regards its use; a spiritual king governing the Church; and an eternal king ruling over and satisfying the blessed. He shall be wise with every kind of divine and human wisdom--blessed, acquired in life, and experiential--governing all things most excellently and conducting each to its appointed end.

“And He shall execute judgment and justice in the earth.” This shall be manifest in the Second Advent, when, judging the world, He shall render to each according to his works, as justice requires. He also executed judgment in the First Advent between the devil and man, whom the devil held captive, and justice by making satisfaction for the sin of the human race and thus paying Adam's debt. Hence Christ said as the Passion drew near, “Now is the judgment of the world,” and so forth, in John 12.

“And in those days,” namely those of this First Advent, “Judah shall be saved,” that is, some from the kingdom of Judah, “and Israel,” that is, some from the people of Israel, “shall dwell confidently,” trusting in God, Christ Jesus. If the words “He shall execute judgment,” and so forth, are referred to the Second Advent, namely to the Final Judgment, then “in those days”--that is, near the Final Judgment--Judah and Israel shall be saved, because when Antichrist, whom they held to be the Messiah, is dead, the Jews shall be converted, as the Psalm says, “at evening,” namely at the end of the world, believing in Christ; and they shall dwell confidently in the Church.

“And this is the name by which they shall call Him”--namely, the people of Judah and Israel converted at the First Advent or near the Second--“the Lord our Just One.” By this it is shown that this David, that is, Christ who is raised up, shall be Lord of all and consequently God. Thus, because He is Lord, He is to be revered and feared through true faith; because He is just, He is to be awaited with confidence, since He will render very good things to the good; and because He is ours, He is to be embraced and loved through true charity.

From this prophecy it is shown that Christ, the Messiah promised through the prophets, is true God and man, because all the Hebrews commonly hold that this prophecy was spoken of the Messiah. Just as true humanity is intimated by the words already cited, “I will raise up for David a just shoot,” so His divinity is shown by what is said here: “This is the name by which they shall call Him, the Lord our Just One.”

This is confirmed by the Hebrew text, because where we have “the Lord our Just One,” in Hebrew there is the Lord’s name, the Tetragrammaton. This name is the most proper among the divine names, and on this account is said of none but the true God. Rabbi Moses, the greatest doctor of the Hebrews, declares the same in the Guide for the Perplexed, saying that all the divine names are derived from divine works except the Lord’s name, the Tetragrammaton, which is appropriated to the Most High Creator because, according to him, it signifies the divine essence with its intrinsic properties.

The other divine names are imposed from divine works, as is evident from the names Eloy and Adonay, which among the others appear more proper. Nevertheless, the name Eloy is imposed to signify God from general providence, and for this reason the name is communicated to others. For judges and wise men are also sometimes called Eloy in Scripture. Hence in the Psalm, where the Latin says, “I have said: You are gods,” the Hebrew has, “You are Eloy.” Similarly, the name Adonay is imposed from universal presidency, and therefore this too is communicated to others, so that the powerful and rulers are called Adonay.

It is not so with the name Tetragrammaton, which signifies the naked and pure divine essence without reference to anything external. Thus this name cannot be communicated to another, as the aforesaid Rabbi Moses says. From this it is concluded that, since Christ the Messiah is called by this name, He is true God.

But certain Jews object against the foregoing that even the name Tetragrammaton is said not only of God but also of other things. For in the final chapter of Ezekiel it is said of the city described there, “And the name of the city, the Lord,” where in Hebrew there is the Lord’s name, the Tetragrammaton. And in Genesis 22, where we have, “And Abraham called the name of that place, The Lord sees,” the Lord’s name, the Tetragrammaton, is in the Hebrew. And in the Book of Judges, where we have, “And Gideon called the name of the altar that he had built, The peace of the Lord,” the Hebrew says, “The Lord, peace,” and the Lord’s name, the Tetragrammaton, is used there. From these passages it seems that Tetragrammaton is said not only of the true God but also of a city, a place, and an altar.

The response is that this is of no force, for none of the foregoing is named simply and absolutely by God’s proper name, the Tetragrammaton; each is named with an addition from some effect of Him who is the true God. This is not incongruous, just as if a man were called Deodatus or God-given because some effect of God had then appeared, on account of which he is said to have been given by God. But no one is called “God” absolutely, for that would be impious.

So too in the matter at hand. When it is said in Ezekiel, “The name of the city, the Lord,” and the Lord’s name, the Tetragrammaton, is in the Hebrew, this is not said absolutely but with the addition “the Lord is there”; or the Lord’s name, the Tetragrammaton, is there in the Hebrew to indicate that the city ought thus to be named from the Lord’s dwelling in it. This is evident from the Chaldean translation, which thus expounds the name of the city: “From the day on which the Lord made His divinity descend.”

So also in Genesis it does not say absolutely, “Abraham called the name of that place the Lord,” but with the addition “sees,” saying, “The Lord sees”: the Lord saw Isaac’s affliction and humiliation and delivered him from death by preparing the ram; or it was because Abraham saw in spirit that Solomon’s temple would be built there, in which the Lord would look upon the prayers and offerings of the people. This is expressly found in the Chaldean translation, and likewise in the other cases.

Other Jews, seeing themselves hemmed in by these arguments, expound the prophecy differently, corrupting the text and saying that the Hebrew is not as Jerome translated it, but, “This is his name by which the Lord our Just One shall call him.” Thus the Lord’s name, the Tetragrammaton, would refer not to the Messiah as another God, but to the true God, who will call that Messiah to liberate the Jewish people from servitude when it pleases Him.

No argument can be made against this exposition except that they corrupt that text in order to deny Christ's divinity. Yet certain learned Christians have confirmed under oath that they themselves saw it in ancient Hebrew Bibles just as Jerome translated it. Nor should it be believed that so great a man as Jerome translated otherwise than the Hebrew truth stood, since he published that translation in the presence of so many learned Jews and Catholics.

Moreover, to convict them of falsification, recourse must be had to other translations that they cannot reasonably deny, from which that falsity can be detected. First, the translation of the Seventy, made from Hebrew into Greek by Jews of the greatest learning, has the text just as in our translation made by Jerome from Hebrew into Latin. This is evident from the office of the Church, taken from that translation of the Seventy. For it says there, "And they shall call Him," not "the Lord shall call Him," "our Just One"--namely, those converted from Judaism. Thus "Lord," in place of which Tetragrammaton stands in Hebrew, is referred to the Messiah Himself.

Since the Seventy could not put the Lord's name, the Tetragrammaton, in Greek with its proper signification--either because they found no name that corresponded so properly, or, if they did find one, because they wished to conceal from Ptolemy the mystery of divinity in the Messiah lest he, being incapable of so great a mystery, take scandal--they therefore did not set it down properly, as also happened in several other places. In its place they wrote, "They shall call Him Kyrios," which Greek word signifies "lord" in Latin. That is a common name and can be said both of God and of any great prince.

Jerome translated from Hebrew into Latin in the same manner. Because he did not have in Latin a proper name corresponding to the Hebrew name Tetragrammaton, he put "Lord" in Latin. Since that name is commonly said both of God and of the princes of the world, Christ the Messiah's divinity could not be proved from our text itself according to Jerome's translation, but it can be proved from the uncorrupted Hebrew text.

The falsity of the Jews is also evident from the Chaldean translation, which is authoritative among them. For it is said there: "Behold, the days shall come, and I shall establish for David the just Messiah."

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Six (continued)

Hence it is evident that this prophecy speaks of the Messiah, Christ. And it follows: "And this is the name by which they shall call Him, the Lord our Just One." Where the Lord's name, the Tetragrammaton, is placed in Hebrew, "Lord" is placed in Chaldean. Nor does it say there, "He shall call Him," but "they shall call" or "they shall name Him." Thus the Tetragrammaton is referred to the Messiah Himself.

It must also be considered that Sacred Scripture has been written in several ways. In one way it was written in pure Hebrew, as the Old Testament was first delivered, namely in the Hebrew language and Hebrew letters. In another way it was written in Hebrew, but not purely so: in the Chaldean language but with Hebrew letters. Hebrew and Chaldean are closely related idioms having the same number of letters. Although those letters differ in shape, nevertheless they agree in sound and force, as Jerome says, and therefore one idiom can more easily be written with the letters of the other.

Many therefore wrote the Old Testament in this manner, and especially Jonathan son of Uzziel, whose writing is so authoritative among the Jews that no one dares contradict it. For this reason, in notable books of the Hebrews pure Hebrew is placed in one column and the Chaldean written by this Jonathan in another column in Hebrew letters; and the Jews use the Chaldean as an exposition, because some things that are very obscure in pure Hebrew are put more clearly and as though expounded in that Chaldean.

That translation is therefore of much value for a matter of this kind. For they were most learned in both languages, as Josephus relates in Book 12 of the Antiquities. Yet they did not always translate word for word, but sometimes and often sense for sense, changing or deliberately concealing some things that could have been a cause of error to Ptolemy, king of Egypt.

When the Jews are convicted through the translations of the Seventy and the Chaldean that the Messiah is God, some of them seek another subterfuge, saying that although the Messiah is named God, He will nevertheless not be God but a mere man, though He be most holy and greater than Moses. But this is impossible, because if He permitted Himself to be called by the Lord's name, the Tetragrammaton, and were not such in reality--that is, true God--but only in name, He would incur the sin of blasphemy. Hence He would not be most holy but wicked.

§ II. On the Evangelical Law to Be Given

Concerning the evangelical law to be given, Jeremiah 31 says: “After those days I will put My law in their inward parts, and I will write it in their heart; and I will be their God, and they shall be My people.” Immediately before these words the Lord says: “I will make with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah”—that is, with those converted to the faith from those nations--“a covenant, not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers on the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt, a covenant that they made void. This shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel.” Then follows what was placed above: “After those days,” and so forth.

The Apostle adduces this authority of Jeremiah in Hebrews 8 to show that the New Testament succeeds the Old and that the law of the letter was changed into the law of the Spirit, so that those legal or ceremonial observances might be fulfilled spiritually, not literally. The prophet therefore makes mention of two covenants or pacts that the Lord made with men: the first He made with the ancient people of Israel, the second with the Christian people.

Here it must be known that foedus, “covenant,” is said to come from foeda porca, “a foul sow,” because, as is evident in the pacts of the ancients, an animal was slaughtered in the midst of those making a pact with one another, and as its blood was poured out it was said: “So may the blood of him who violates this pact be poured out.” Moses did this when he made a covenant or pact with the Israelite people after their departure from Egypt. For after the law had been read, he took the blood of calves killed in sacrifice and sprinkled it over the people, saying: “This is the blood of the covenant that the Lord has made with you concerning all these words,” as is found in chapter 44 [read: chapter 24]. The veil before the tabernacle, which concealed what was within, such as the ark and the like, was also sprinkled with that blood.

They therefore made this pact with God to observe that law insofar as it lay beneath a figure, but they kept that pact neither in the figure nor in the thing figured. For it was figured that they would receive the blood of Christ, prefigured in the calf and the lamb, yet they remained in the figured veil alone and did not penetrate to the enclosed mysteries within.

This blood of Christ, truly poured out when He was slaughtered in the midst of the world, is the covenant between us and our God, so that we may fear Him and keep His commandments. If we transgress this pact confirmed by Christ through His blood, the transgressor's blood shall be poured out in the same way, because we shall be slain eternally.

If, therefore, the Lord ought to make a new pact with men, as Jeremiah says here, God Himself must remove the old pact that men made void so that the new may arise with greater force in men. That pact of the old law was written upon hard stones because it was given to the hard nature of the Jews; but this covenant of the new law was written in hearts of flesh, not with ink or a visible pen, but by the Holy Spirit, according to the words of Ezekiel: “I shall take away from you the stony heart and give you a heart of flesh.”

Hence the prophet adds, “After those days”—namely those of the old law, or of the Incarnation, Passion, Resurrection, and Ascension--“I will put My law,” namely that of the Holy Spirit, which was first given in the upper room to the apostles on the day of Pentecost, “in their inward parts,” not on stones but in their innermost recesses, “and I will write it in their heart.”

Here note that this law is said to be written in the inward parts and in the heart because this evangelical law has to illuminate and move man. It is therefore rightly said to be in the inward parts, that is, in the affections, and in the heart, that is, in the reason. These are the two tablets upon which the new law is written in the inner man, so that we may believe with the heart and love with the affection.

Hence those who believe and love, receiving the law of the Holy Spirit in the heart, are those who truly fear and honor God. On this account there follows what is added afterward: “I will be their God, and they shall be My people,” namely a peculiar people who have God drawing near to them.

Because this evangelical law is confirmed and established, and no other law in the world succeeds it, as certain heretics have said, Jeremiah therefore adds: “If these laws fail before Me, then also shall the seed of Israel fail, so that it is not a nation before Me.” Yet Christ says, “This generation shall not pass away until all things are accomplished,” in Luke 21, namely the things that must occur before the Final Judgment.

That God changes His sentence concerning threatened scourges or promised prosperity according as man is changed from good to evil or conversely is shown when the Lord says in Jeremiah 18: “I will suddenly speak against a nation and against a kingdom, that I may uproot, pull down, and destroy it. If that nation repents of its evil, I also will repent of the evil that I thought to do to it. And I will suddenly speak concerning a nation and a kingdom, that I may build and plant it. If it does evil in My eyes and does not hear My voice, I also will repent of the good that I thought to do to it.”

Here Jerome says: “For God is angry not with men but with vices; if these are changed, there will be nothing with which God may be angry,” in On Penance, distinction 1, Wherefore.

Chapter Seven

Ezekiel the prophet, as Jerome says in the prologue upon him, was taken captive to Babylon with Joachim, king of Judah, and there he prophesied among those who had been led captive from Judea. In the thirtieth year of his age and the fifth of the captivity, he began to speak to his fellow captives. At the same time, although Ezekiel was later, Ezekiel prophesied in Chaldea and Jeremiah in Judea.

His style is neither sufficiently eloquent nor exceedingly rustic, but tempered in a middle manner from both. He too was a priest, like Jeremiah, and his beginning and end are wrapped in great obscurities. Hence the Hebrews do not read them before the thirtieth year of one's age. Finally, he was killed by the Jews themselves in those regions.

In the first vision, which is found in the first chapter, the state of the Church militant and the Lord presiding over her are designated, as Gregory expounds upon Ezekiel.

Concerning the unity of the Church and her one king and shepherd, the Lord Jesus Christ, he prophesied. Hence in chapter 34 the Lord says through him: "I shall raise up over them," namely My sheep, "one shepherd who shall feed them, My servant David. He shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd. But I, the Lord, shall be their God, and My servant David a prince in their midst. And I shall make with them a covenant of peace; and they shall no longer be delivered as spoil to the nations."

Some expound these things of Zerubbabel, who led the Jewish people back from the Babylonian captivity into their own land and was a good leader and shepherd to them. Yet certain things in this prophecy cannot be understood of Zerubbabel, especially what is said at the end, for they were delivered as spoil to many nations: to Antiochus, Pompey, Titus, and Vespasian.

The true exposition, therefore, concerns Christ, whom Ezekiel calls David because He descended from David's lineage according to the flesh, and because He is strong in might against the devil and beautiful in the aspect of divinity and humanity. For "David" is interpreted "strong" or "beautiful." "I shall raise up," because not from male seed but by divine operation the Word of God was made flesh. "One shepherd," in the singular: "I am the good shepherd," says Christ in John 10; and, "There shall be one fold and one shepherd," in the same place.

And because He humbled Himself even to death on the cross, God exalted Him, placing Him as shepherd and head of the Church, who is the leader of the sheep, that is, of the Church. Through His humanity He leads to knowledge of the divinity; and each of the faithful, as though a sheep under Him, enters into the clear contemplation of the Godhead and goes out to the beholding of the humanity, and shall find pastures of enjoyment.

Thus the servant David, that is, Christ, wholly subject to God in the form of a servant, is the prince in the midst of the sheep, toward whom all points of the circumference look and have regard. Then a covenant of peace was made both between human nature and God--on account of the union and also on account of the Passion by which He made satisfaction to God for us--and between Jews and Gentiles converted to the faith in fraternal love.

"And they shall no longer be spoil to the nations," that is, to demons or unbelievers: namely Christ's sheep, with whom He is until the consummation of the age. Hence He Himself says in John 10: "No one shall snatch them from My hand." But note carefully that through this prophet the Lord severely rebukes bad shepherds, that is, prelates, saying: "Woe to the shepherds who fed themselves. You ate the milk and were clothed with the wool," namely that of the sheep, "but you did not feed My flock; and that which was fat you killed; that which was weak you did not strengthen," and so forth.

§ I. The Mystery of the General Resurrection

The mystery of the general resurrection of bodies was shown to Ezekiel when in an imaginary vision he was led into a field full of the bones of the dead. At the prophet's voice speaking to them on the Lord's behalf, a great commotion arose from them: bone was joined to bone, flesh and sinews came upon them, and skin was stretched over them. Finally, at the prophet's voice spirit entered those dead bodies, and they arose and stood alive upon their feet, as is found in Ezekiel 37.

Afterward the Lord adds, saying: "Behold, I shall open your tombs, and bring you out of your sepulchers, My people, and lead you into the land of Israel," and so forth. According to the letter, through these things it was foretold to those in the Babylonian captivity that they would depart from it, concerning which they had as though despaired. But both the truth and the possibility of the future resurrection were also shown here.

§ II. On God's Mercy, Justice, and Equity

No one speaks more clearly than Ezekiel throughout chapter 18 concerning the immense mercy of God, receiving every repentant sinner to pardon; His justice in punishing anyone who, even if holy and just for a time, nevertheless declines to evil and does not return to penance; and His equity in not punishing the father for the son's fault or conversely.

For he says: “The soul that sins, the same shall die,” namely the spiritual death that is the privation of grace, from which eternal death follows. “The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, nor the father the iniquity of the son.” This is true of punishment in the other life, namely that of hell or purgatory, for in this life one is rightly punished with temporal punishment for another. This matter is treated beautifully and diffusely in Cause 1, question 4, Now therefore, and in the section Against the Lord, with what follows.

There are several. “If the wicked man does penance for all his sins that he has committed, and keeps all My precepts, and executes judgment and justice, he shall live with life and shall not die. I shall not remember any of his iniquities.” Note each individual word: “If he does penance.” Augustine says: “You should not think that anyone can pass from any sin, great or small, to correction without penance,” in On Penance, distinction 1.

This is understood of that interior penance defined by Gregory and Ambrose in On Penance, distinction 3: “Penance is to lament past evils and not to commit again the things to be lamented,” that is, to resolve not to commit them.

It says, “for all his sins.” Augustine says: “Christ healed the whole man on the Sabbath, because He healed the body from infirmity and the soul from every contagion, indicating that a penitent must likewise grieve over every crime committed in soul and body. For he who reserves one crime will not find pardon for another,” in On Penance, distinction 3.

“And keeps all My precepts”: in resolve, when he truly repents, and afterward in execution. For, as is said in James 3, “Whoever keeps the whole law, but offends in one”—namely, of the precepts—“has become guilty of all.” For, as is said in On Penance, distinction 5, Brethren: “Just as if he were entangled in all sins, so if he remains in only one, he shall not enter the gate of eternal life.”

“And executes judgment,” namely by diligently examining his conscience concerning the things committed and by having recourse through confession to penitential judgment, as Augustine says in On Penance, distinction 1: “Let a man judge himself while he can and change his ways for the better, and then let him come to the prelates of the Church,” and so forth.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Seven (continued)

“And justice,” through fitting satisfaction for sins. For penance, according to Augustine in On Penance, distinction 3, is a certain vengeance of one who is angry, punishing in himself what he grieves to have committed. Vengeance or punishment pertains to justice.

“He shall live with life,” the life of grace and afterward of glory, “and shall not die” eternal death. “I shall not remember any of his iniquities,” namely for punishment, if he has made perfect satisfaction.

But “if the just man turns himself away from his justice and commits iniquity, all his justices shall not be remembered,” that is, no good work done by him, even in grace, will be pleasing to God or meritorious of eternal life. Hence Gregory says upon this authority in On Penance, distinction 4: “We must consider that in the perpetration of evils we ought to place no confidence in past goods,” namely as regards obtaining eternal life.

The same things are set forth more fully in chapter 33, where the danger and perdition that threaten prelates and preachers if they do not announce and correct the sins of the peoples are also premised, because they are damned with them. For he says: “Son of man, I have made you a watchman for the house of Israel. If, when I say to the wicked, ‘You shall die the death,’ you do not announce it, he shall die in his iniquity, and I will require his blood at your hand. But if you announce it and he does not amend himself, you have delivered your soul,” and so forth.

§ III. Against the Prince and King of Tyre

Likewise, in chapter 28 he speaks against the prince of Tyre, which was a certain very wealthy and strong city devoted to commerce near Galilee, and foretells his killing and the city's destruction because of its pride. He then adds concerning the king of Tyre: “You, the seal of resemblance, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty, were in the delights of the paradise of God. Every precious stone was your covering: sardius, topaz, jasper, chrysolite, onyx, and beryl,” and so forth; “sapphire, carbuncle, and emerald,” and so forth.

Beyond the literal sense concerning that king of Tyre, whose excellence he expresses through the likeness of these things and afterward whose casting down he describes, the passage is also expounded literally as spoken of Lucifer, as Gregory notes at length in the Moralia, and as is found in On Penance, distinction 2, The beginning.

There, to show his excellence, Gregory says: “What good did he not have?” namely the first angel, first in the dignity of perfection, called Behemoth or Lucifer and cherub. He was the seal of God's likeness when it is said, “You, the seal,” and so forth. For although man was created in the likeness of God, nevertheless, as though bestowing something greater upon the angel, Scripture says not that he was made in the likeness of God but that he was the very seal of God's likeness, so that the subtler he is in nature, the more fully the likeness of God may be believed to have been expressed in him.

Hence, further intimating the power of his primacy, Scripture adds, "Every precious stone was your garment," and so forth. It named nine kinds of stones because there are indeed nine orders of angels named through the sacred writings: angels, archangels, thrones, dominations, virtues, principalities, powers, cherubim, and seraphim. This cherub is said to have been covered with these precious stones because he had them as though for a garment for his adornment. Since he surpassed their brightness, he was the brighter by comparison with them.

And it follows: "Your holes were prepared on the day when you were created." Holes are made in precious stones so that, bound with gold, they may be joined in the composition of an ornament. This stone therefore had holes, but through the vice of pride they were not filled with the gold of charity.

These words of Gregory do not seem to be understood as though there had been no gold of charity in him, since it is said below that this cherub walked amid the fiery stones--that is, he stood glorious among the hearts of the angels kindled by the fire of charity. Rather, he did not have that gold of the most perfect and inamissible charity of the blessed by which the good angels were bound, that is, confirmed. Holes were therefore made in him, that is, an aptitude was given him for such unfailing charity, of which through pride he deprived himself.

After a lengthy exposition of this prophecy, Gregory concludes: "Therefore Scripture intimates these marvelous things in which he was and which he lost, so that it may show man what he himself will suffer through the guilt of his proud self-display, if God did not will to spare by striking him whom, by creating him, He raised to the glory of so great a brightness." Thus Gregory there, in On Penance, distinction 2.

§ IV. Ezekiel's Final Vision

Ezekiel's final and very obscure vision, which is set down from chapter 40 to the end--namely concerning the marvelous city built upon a mountain and shown to him in spirit--Gregory, upon Ezekiel, expounds morally of the Church. He says that it cannot be understood literally because it would contain an absurdity and contradiction, namely that what is contained would be larger in dimension than that which contains it.

Jerome likewise says that building is to be understood spiritually of Christ and the Church, her sacraments and morals. Gregory, however, expounded only chapter 40. Richard of Saint Victor expounded the whole vision concerning a material building. The ancient Hebrews said that this building was shown to Ezekiel in an imaginary vision and was fulfilled in the rebuilding carried out after the return from Babylon by Zerubbabel and Nehemiah.

But Nicholas of Lyra disproves this with effective reasons: neither the rebuilt temple nor the city was of so great a size as those described here, nor were the waters there. Modern Hebrews say that such a building has not yet been made but will be made materially by the Messiah, whom they await as one still to come and as a mere man who will nevertheless reign temporally with great pomp.

Nicholas also disproves this in many ways, showing from the Scriptures their errors: that the Messiah is a mere man, that He will bestow temporal things upon them, and that He has not yet come. Nicholas himself gives a literal exposition and, by understanding and expounding the text differently, removes the absurdity and contradiction expressed by Gregory.

But if it is said that the Jewish people were never given or possessed such a city as is promised to them in the vision, and that the prophet is therefore untruthful because God's promise was not fulfilled, the response is that it is not incongruous that such a city was not given to them. For many promises concerning prosperity and adversity made by God are conditional, as is evident in Jeremiah 18.

Jerome, upon Amos, says in On Penance, distinction 1: "If we do penance, He too will repent of His sentence; again, according to the prophet, He promises prosperity if we do penance. But if we become lax through negligence, He will repent of His pledge and change what He promised. We can have an example of this in Samaria and Jerusalem: some of their inhabitants were freed from the punishments threatening them, while others lost what had been promised to their fathers."

And in cause 22, question 4, it is said: "The supreme nature of God, immutable and remaining the same forever, is often read in Sacred Scripture to have changed His promises." Such a glorious city was therefore promised to them conditionally: if, after returning to Jerusalem, they kept God's precepts. Because they did not do this but added worse things to evils, not only was that city not granted, but the one that had been rebuilt was destroyed down to its foundations.

Nicholas therefore first expounds that material building according to the letter and, so that it may be better understood, places there in his work upon Ezekiel figures depicting such a building. Then at the end he gives a brief moral exposition concerning Christ and the Church, and her states and morals.

Because these things have been collected here and there to show the progress of the Church in the Old and New Testaments, I set down here his brief exposition, which comprises almost everything in that vision pertaining to the Church's states and morals, omitting the scriptural authorities that he adduces to prove the fittingness of the exposition.

In the Church, therefore, which is the congregation of the faithful, there is a twofold government. One concerns spiritual matters, and this is designated by the temple building. The other concerns temporal matters, and this is designated by the division of the land and the building of the city. Nevertheless, both governments are from God, distinction 10, Since the same.

By the mountain upon which the prophet says in chapter 40 that he was placed, and upon which the city was built, Christ is therefore signified, according to Gregory. Upon Him the Church is built as regards both governments, namely the spiritual and the temporal. First we must consider the temple building, which signifies the spiritual state.

Around the temple building a threefold wall is described, surrounding it on every side: exterior, middle, and interior. By the exterior wall that surrounds all the buildings is signified the divine protection and guardianship embracing all things. By the middle wall is understood angelic protection or guardianship. By the inner wall, which has a smaller circumference, is understood the guardianship and protection exercised by the Church's prelates and ministers, which is indeed less effective than the angelic.

Through these walls an entrance to the temple lies on three sides. By those sides are understood the three parts of the habitable earth: Asia, Africa, and Europe. From these parts many--indeed innumerable persons--have entered the Church through baptism and reception of the faith, and they enter at present and will enter in the future.

On each side--eastern, southern, and northern--there were three gates in the circuit of the walls, facing one another opposite. By them are designated the three states or degrees of those coming to the faith: beginners, designated by the first, exterior gate; the progressing, signified by the second, middle gate; and the perfect, signified by the third gate in the inner wall.

At the gates of the exterior wall there are no large buildings, but certain little houses built above them. By this is designated that the state of beginners is still notably imperfect. At the middle gates there are beautiful buildings, and much more so at the gates of the inner wall, to designate that the progressing have more of the perfection of the virtues than beginners, and the perfect more than the progressing. Hence the ascent to the middle gates was by seven steps, and to the interior gates by eight.

Each of the six gates has a vestibule, a portico, two fronts, and six chambers. By the vestibule preceding the portico is understood prevenient grace, and by the portico subsequent grace. Or by these two are understood good will and holy operation.

By the two fronts made for the beauty and strength of the gates, in the manner of two turtledoves on either side of each gate, are understood patience in adversities, lest one be broken, and moderation in prosperity, lest one be lifted up.

By the chambers in which men sleep and rest is understood peace. Peace is twofold, internal and fraternal. To signify this, the chambers are said to be here and there on either side of the gate. There are three on one side because three things make internal peace: a clean conscience, divine friendship, and modest sufficiency. On the other side there are likewise three chambers because three things constitute fraternal peace: the first is true humility, the second just equity, and the third due taciturnity. For fraternal peace is frequently taken away by immoderate and incautious speech.

After the exposition of the gates, the treasury chambers said to be around the pavement must be considered. They are said to be thirty, by which is designated the fulfillment of the Ten Commandments, necessary in three times: the time of the law of nature, the Mosaic law, and grace or the evangelical law. For the number ten multiplied by three rises to thirty. They are called gazophylacia, from gaza, which means riches, and phylaxe, which means to keep, because the riches of the virtues are preserved through fulfillment of the commandments.

After the treasury chambers comes the account of the tables, which are said to be eight. By them are designated the four parts of Sacred Scripture in the Old Testament--the legal, prophetic, historical, and sapiential writings--to which correspond in the New the evangelical law, the epistles, the Acts of the Apostles, and the Apocalypse. From these Scriptures, as from spiritual tables, the whole Christian people are refreshed, because man does not live by bread alone, and so forth.

After the tables comes the account of the inner court. There, according to the Hebrews, were four things: the altar of holocausts; the treasury chambers of the priests, namely those serving by the week; the treasury chambers of the singers serving by the week in the temple; and the passage of the waters from the right side of the altar.

By the altar of holocausts, where the sacrifices were burned, is signified the sacrament of the Eucharist, in which Christ's Passion is represented and which fulfills all those sacrifices that were figures of it. By the treasury chambers of the priests and singers that were within beside the altar are signified the merits in the Church of those who minister and of the ministers themselves. By the waters flowing from the side is understood baptism, cleansing the filth of vices.

These two are the chief sacraments of the Church: the first is greater in being and the second greater in effect. Christ instituted the latter Himself as regards its matter and form and received it in Himself; and the other sacraments are included under these.

Now the temple itself must be considered. For the building of the Church consists not only in morals, the teaching of Scripture, and the sacraments, but also in the articles of faith, which are designated here in the temple.

The temple is divided into three parts: the porch, the holy place, and the holy of holies. Through the porch there is an entrance to the other parts of the temple. Hence it signifies the article of the unity of the divine essence and of divine providence as regards the rewarding of good and punishment of evil. For it has always been necessary to believe that there is one God and that He is the rewarder of the good and punisher of the evil. Through this article lies the way to the others.

By the holy of holies, where the things within it were hidden--namely, the ark with its contents--the article of the Trinity is signified. The ark was incorruptible and gilded, signifying perpetuity and the preciousness of perfection. Within it was the rod, signifying divine justice; the manna, mercy; the tablets, wisdom; the mercy seat, omnipotence, which is manifested most greatly in showing mercy; and the cherubim, the glory of the blessed.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Seven (continued)

In the holy place, which signifies Christ, there was a lampstand, signifying the perfection of sevenfold grace by its seven lamps; a table of loaves, signifying every kind of doctrine and knowledge; and an altar of incense, signifying the highest devotion.

By the holy of holies, the article of the Trinity is understood through the three chambers existing there, with passage from one into another. Although there is no superiority or inferiority there, nevertheless the Son properly proceeds from the Father, and the Holy Spirit from both.

By the part of the temple called the holy place is understood the article of the Incarnation, through which three natures are united in the supposit of the Son: the divinity, Christ's soul, and His flesh. These are signified by the three chambers existing there, one above another, for the divinity is superior to the soul and the soul superior to the flesh.

By the temple treasury chambers are understood the miracles that confirm the faith. By the winding stairs through which one ascends upward are understood the kinds of knowledge of creatures through which one ascends to knowledge of the Creator. By the appendage around the temple are understood all other matters pertaining to faith that are reduced to the foregoing articles.

The building around the temple on the southern side, whence a warm wind blows, is the fervor of charity in the faithful. The building on the northern side is filial fear. By the four little courts within the walls in different places may be understood the four cardinal virtues. By the ovens or kitchens may be understood the doctors who cook the food of Scripture by their meditations so that it may be savory to the peoples. This takes place in the little courts because the doctors themselves must first have been exercised in the cardinal virtues.

After the exposition of the temple and the buildings around it, it must be said what is signified by the priests ministering in it. Five things are described concerning them: their lineage, clothing, manner, sustenance, and activity.

Concerning the first it is said that they are the sons of Zadok, which is interpreted "just." By this is intimated that the ministers of the Church ought through spiritual imitation to be sons of Christ, who by excellence is called just, according to Isaiah 45: "Let the clouds rain down the Just One."

They had linen garments, which signify purity of mind and body, as well as linen breeches to cover their shame. This signifies that nothing shameful or immodest ought to appear in the conduct, gesture, deed, or example of the Church's ministers.

It is also said that they ought to be in different garments in the temple from those worn when they associate with others among the people. This is observed literally by clerics in the New Testament, and morally because, in the exercise of ministry, nothing worldly or secular ought to appear in them, but the whole conduct of their mind ought then to be in heaven.

Likewise it is said that they are not to grow their hair long, which is also now observed literally; but morally it signifies that they ought not multiply temporal goods for themselves, but distribute their surplus to the poor, cause 12, question 2, Glory.

Likewise, they are not to eat what is caught by a beast or what has died, that is, they are not to live from the property of another or from any illicit dealing or occupation. They are not to drink wine when about to enter the temple, that is, they are to be sober from wine and from passions. They are to celebrate the divine office, teach the people, and determine what must be done in doubtful matters. By these things are designated the devotion they must possess and their knowledge of the Scriptures, which ought to be the greater insofar as their grade is higher.

After the clerical state has been described, the secular state or its government is next treated. Three things are set down concerning it: the division of the land to be inhabited by them, the condition of the prince, and the quality of the city to be built.

As regards the first, it is manifest that no community can subsist well without the observance of justice. Justice is twofold: commutative and distributive. Commutative justice properly exists among the people in buying, selling, and other just exchanges, and concerns movable and immovable goods.

This is intimated when it is said that the land promised to them is to be divided equally among the twelve tribes, because the Christian people ought to employ commutative justice, whose mean is considered according to equality of quantity, as is said in Book 5 of the Ethics. This is done concerning immovable goods when each is content with his own inheritance and does not take from another's possessions by violence or fraud. Concerning movable goods it says: "Let the balance be just, and the ephah just," and so forth.

Concerning princes it is said that they are to be content within the boundaries of their possession. By this is understood that Christian princes ought to be content with their own revenues, not burden their subjects with undue exactions, and not usurp the kingdoms and dominions of others, either in whole or in part.

Distributive justice properly pertains to superiors, who are those who impose honors and burdens upon their subjects. Its mean is considered not according to equality of quantity but of proportion: so that each is honored more or less according to his merit, is punished more or less for evil, and is burdened with impositions according to his condition. Hence it is said that princes ought to execute justice and judgment.

As regards the third, namely the building of the city, it is said that it ought to be square. Because a city is called a unity of citizens, and this unity ought to exist in the Church in faith, charity, and the sacraments, the city is therefore designated as square, because its citizens ought to exercise themselves in the four cardinal virtues.

"And the name of the city, the Lord is there"; thus the community of the Christian people is denominated from Christ. The measurements and numbers of reeds and cubits that signify the quantity of merits are known to God alone.

Chapter Eight

Although all the prophets bear witness to Christ as one who was to come into the world, nevertheless none so determined the time when He would come as did Daniel in chapter 9, where he says:

"Seventy weeks are shortened upon your people and upon your holy city, that transgression may be consummated and sin receive an end; that iniquity may be blotted out and everlasting justice brought in; that vision and prophecy may be fulfilled and the Holy of Holies anointed.

"Know therefore and take heed: from the going forth of the word that Jerusalem be built again unto Christ the leader, there shall be seven weeks and sixty-two weeks. And the street and the walls shall be built again in straitness of times.

"And after sixty-two weeks Christ shall be slain, and the people who will deny Him shall not be His. And a people with a leader who is to come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and its end shall be devastation, and after the end of the war the appointed desolation.

"But He shall confirm the covenant with many in one week, and in the middle of the week victim and sacrifice shall fail. And in the temple there shall be the abomination of desolation; and until the consummation and the end, desolation shall continue." This is in the text.

Although many say evil and various things concerning this prophecy, nevertheless all expound it of Christ who was to come in the flesh. Bede and Africanus begin to enumerate these years from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, who gave Nehemiah permission to return to Jerusalem and construct its walls, and they extend them to Christ's Passion.

It is true that they take these weeks—which are not weeks of days but of years, each containing seven years—as lunar years. A lunar year consists of twelve lunations and hence is shorter by eleven days than a solar year, which contains twelve months. Seventy weeks of years are 490 years. If these are taken as lunar years, they amount to 475 solar years.

But Nicholas of Lyra, upon Daniel, rejects this interpretation of Bede, namely that it is understood of lunar years. Bede took it from the words "seventy weeks are shortened," so that this shortening would refer to the lunar year, which is eleven days shorter than the solar year, as was said.

Yet, as Nicholas himself says, in the Hebrew, where we have "shortened," the text has "precisely," as if it said: that time is determined and fixed by God. Thus the shortening signifies not a diminution of time but a determination. Hence the Jewish expositors make no mention here of lunar years, but of solar years. Nor elsewhere in the Old Testament is a computation made by lunar years. Therefore these are weeks of solar years, that is, 490 solar years.

To make this evident, this computation by years must be taken according to Josephus, whose history is more authoritative among Jews and Catholics. We cannot compute through the biblical text, because from the return from the Babylonian captivity to Christ's conception no certain reckoning of time is found in Sacred Scripture. Recourse must therefore be had to Josephus.

He says that, after the seventy years of the Babylonian captivity, the returning people were governed by priests until Antiochus the emperor, and that principate lasted 414 years. From then the Maccabees, whom Josephus calls Asmoneans, assumed the principate. That principate lasted 127 years, until Herod the foreigner under whom Christ was born, as is evident in Matthew 2. Thus Josephus says in Book 20 of the Antiquities.

After the death of Antigonus--who was the last of the Maccabees to hold the principate--Herod ruled twenty-eight years until Christ's Nativity. It is no objection that some histories say Christ was born in Herod's thirty-second year. Those histories reckon Herod's kingdom from the time when the kingdom was granted to him by the Romans, which was four years before Antigonus's death, as is evident in the Scholastic History and in Josephus. Thus it is true that Herod ruled twenty-eight years after Antigonus's death.

From Christ's Nativity until His baptism by John there were twenty-nine complete years, as is found in Luke 3. From Christ's baptism until four years after Christ's Passion, seven years elapsed. Therefore the foregoing years from the return from the Babylonian captivity until the fourth year after Christ's Passion are found to total 605 years, as is evident by joining the aforesaid parts.

It must further be considered that the reckoning of the seventy weeks ought to begin from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, when permission was given to Nehemiah to rebuild Jerusalem, as is found in 2 Esdras. This is expressly said in the text: "Know and take heed, from the going forth of the word that Jerusalem be built again." Then the angel begins to reckon the weeks, for then the word concerning the rebuilding of Jerusalem went forth. Cyrus had earlier given permission to rebuild the temple only.

It is therefore evident from the foregoing that, from the 605 years just mentioned, when the time that elapsed from the return from the Babylonian captivity to the twentieth year of Artaxerxes is removed, only 490 solar years remain, which make seventy weeks of years.

It remains now to prove what has been assumed: namely that, after subtracting the time that elapsed from the return from the Babylonian captivity to Artaxerxes's twentieth year, precisely 490 years remain. This is proved as follows. In Cyrus's first year permission was given to return and rebuild the temple. He reigned thirty years. After him his son Cambyzes reigned eight years. After him two brother Magi reigned seven months, which are reckoned as one year because they constitute the greater part of a year.

Afterward Darius Hystaspes reigned thirty-six years. Under him Zerubbabel came again to Jerusalem in the second year of his reign to complete the work of rebuilding the temple begun under Cyrus but prohibited from being continued. After Darius Hystaspes, his son Xerxes reigned twenty years. Afterward Artabanus reigned seven months, which are reckoned as one year for the reason given above. Afterward Artaxerxes reigned nineteen full years up to the permission given to Nehemiah concerning the rebuilding of Jerusalem, namely in the twentieth year of his reign.

Note that the times of these kings up to Artaxerxes can be proved partly, but not completely, through the biblical text. Recourse must therefore be had to Josephus and the Scholastic History, which set down the times of these kings as stated and took them from the histories of the Persians and Medes.

If the foregoing years from Cyrus's first year to Artaxerxes's twentieth are added together, they are found to be 115 years; and Bede and Africanus assign just so many years in a computation of this kind. Therefore, if 115 years are subtracted from the aforesaid 605 years, it is evident that only 490 solar years remain. These are the seventy weeks "shortened," that is, precisely--neither more nor less.

Approaching the exposition of the text, it must be noted that Daniel was praying for the deliverance of his people from the Babylonian captivity, considering that the end of the seventy years of that captivity, which Jeremiah had prophesied, was drawing near.

As Jerome says upon Daniel, he did this not as though doubting God's sentence foretold through Jeremiah, but because it makes him more solicitous lest security engender negligence, and negligence offense, whence they would deserve that their deliverance be deferred, in On Penance, distinction 1, He had foretold.

But the angel Gabriel, for his consolation and that of others, revealed not only deliverance from that temporal captivity, but the deliverance of the whole human race from the spiritual captivity of the devil and sin to which the world was held subject. This came through Christ's Passion, which the angel foretold.

He divided the determined time in which this would be fulfilled, namely those seventy weeks, into three parts: seven, sixty-two, and one. This was because special works were done for the Jewish people in these parts of the number. In the first seven, the people rebuilt the city with great labor and held it against the surrounding nations that harassed them, because with one hand they did the work and with the other held a sword to defend themselves against their enemies, as is evident in Nehemiah 4.

In the other weeks, namely sixty-two, the people sometimes had prosperity and sometimes adversity, especially in the time of the Maccabees. In the one final week, which begins with Christ's baptism and ends in the fourth year after Christ's Passion, the mysteries or works of our salvation that are expressed here are fulfilled.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Eight (continued)

Coming therefore to the exposition, the angel says: "Know therefore, Daniel, and take heed," that is, attend diligently to how these things are to be understood.

These seventy weeks are "from the going forth of the word that Jerusalem be built again," namely from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, who sent Nehemiah to rebuild Jerusalem, "unto Christ the leader," that is, unto the manifestation of the anointing of the Holy of Holies, who is truly Christ--interpreted "anointed"--and the leader of the faithful.

There shall be seven weeks in which the people laboriously built and held the newly rebuilt city, and sixty-two weeks in which the people would now sustain prosperity, now adversity. These seven and sixty-two weeks, set down separately here but joined together, make 483 years. Just so many years elapsed from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes's reign to Christ's baptism, at which His anointing was declared through the fullness of the grace of the Holy Spirit appearing above Him in the form of a dove, and through the Father's testimony from heaven, "This is My beloved Son," Matthew 3.

"And Jerusalem shall be rebuilt." This refers to the time of those seven weeks. "And its street and walls in straitness." He says this because during those seven weeks of years they labored greatly and built the city, its walls, and its houses. Afterward they dwelt in it for sixty-two weeks, namely until Christ's baptism received from John the Baptist followed.

From then, namely at the baptism, began the final week of the seventy, in which Christ preached and suffered. This is what the text says: "After sixty-two weeks"--namely beyond the seven previously named--and in the final week, in the third year and three months, "Christ shall be slain," because after He had preached for three years and a part of a fourth, He suffered.

"And the people who will deny Him shall not be His," because from then the Jews who denied Him before Pilate were not Christ's people, but Christians are His people. "And a people," namely the Roman people, "with a leader who is to come," namely Titus, "shall destroy the city," namely Jerusalem, "and the sanctuary," that is, the temple.

This was not fulfilled then immediately after Christ's death, but forty years later. Nevertheless, it is placed here immediately after Christ's death, not to designate that it would happen then, but because it was in punishment for so great a crime perpetrated by them. "And its end shall be devastation," and so forth, because it was totally destroyed.

After the city's destruction in punishment for Christ's death has been foretold, the prophet returns to speak of what else will occur in the final week, saying: "But He shall confirm the covenant with many in one week." The new law, that is, the evangelical law, was given and preached by Christ during that final week, namely for three years and three months, and through His death and miracles the evangelical law was confirmed.

It is called a covenant here because, after the Passion, when the Holy Spirit had been sent upon the apostles, they were strengthened and publicly preached that law without fear, whence many were converted. Thus in the three years and three months in which Christ preached, and in the other three years and three months in which the apostles preached after the Passion, the evangelical law was confirmed and sufficiently spread in the hearts of the faithful.

That the evangelical law is called a covenant is found in Jeremiah 31. It is called a covenant because God appears to make a pact with man that He will give eternal life to the one who observes it and damnation to the one who transgresses it.

"And in the middle of the week victim shall fail," because when Christ suffered, which was in the middle of the final week, then all legal observances and sacrifices became dead and useless for salvation.

"And in the temple there shall be the abomination." This is said because of the image of Caesar that Pilate placed in the temple to be venerated; the Jews called an idol an abomination. Or it is because Gaius was sent there so that his image might be adored. Or because at a later time a statue of Hadrian was placed where the ark of the Lord had formerly been. "And until the end and consummation," namely of the world, "desolation shall continue."

But the Jews, in order to evade this ray of truth that convicts them of their error in still awaiting the Messiah, give another exposition, which belongs to Rabbi Solomon, their doctor. He says that these seventy weeks of years comprise the time from Nebuchadnezzar's destruction of the city and temple to its second destruction by Titus, which he says is precisely a period of seventy weeks of years, that is, 490 years.

Within this time they sometimes had prosperity and sometimes adversity. But at the second destruction, namely that wrought by Titus, they entered a perfect captivity. In this captivity, as this Rabbi Solomon says, the Lord leaves them so that they may be corrected and punished for their iniquities, and may thereby merit that the visions and prophecies concerning the Messiah be fulfilled. They vehemently believe that through Him they are to be freed and that the Jewish people are to be exalted over others temporally and spiritually; but He whom they will receive as Christ will be Antichrist.

Nicholas of Lyra and others show by many reasons that this exposition is false and distorted; these are omitted for the sake of brevity. Among other things, when the text says "unto Christ the leader," this Rabbi Solomon expounds it of Cyrus, king of the Persians. And afterward, when it says "Christ shall be slain," he calls King Agrippa Christ.

Nicholas of Lyra, upon Daniel, says that he had followed the aforesaid common exposition of the doctors, beginning to enumerate the weeks from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, who sent Nehemiah to rebuild the city walls, as was said in a certain exposition upon Daniel. But afterward, when he undertook to expound the whole Bible and came to Daniel, he began and ended the reckoning of these seventy weeks differently.

For he says that it must begin not from Artaxerxes's twentieth year but from the fifth year of Zedekiah, king of Judah, who was led captive to Babylon. When the people of Jerusalem, induced by the preaching of false prophets, had been led to hope for the return of King Joachim with the other captives from Babylon to Jerusalem and for deliverance from Nebuchadnezzar's hand, Jeremiah asserted the contrary. Hence he wrote letters to the captive Jews in Babylon that they should not believe the words of the false prophets, because they were to remain in that Babylonian captivity for seventy years.

Jeremiah then adds in chapter 29, speaking on the Lord's behalf: "When seventy years begin to be fulfilled in Babylon, I shall visit you and raise up My good word over you, and I shall lead you back to this place," and so forth.

Nicholas says that the weeks must therefore be enumerated from this time because the angel said, "From the going forth of the word that Jerusalem be built again," that is, from the first word proceeding from the Lord's revelation concerning Jerusalem's rebuilding. This first occurred when it was revealed to Jeremiah and spoken by him on God's behalf.

He ends these seventy weeks at Christ's Passion and, according to the history of the Hebrews, reckons precisely seventy weeks of years, that is, 490, within that time. From this it follows that the first exposition--in which the reckoning of the weeks begins from Artaxerxes's twentieth year according to the more common computation of the Latin historiographers, which Nicholas also held earlier--seems more worthy of being held than this latter one, which follows the computation of the Hebrews.

§ I. Daniel and His Visions

Daniel, therefore, of the royal stock of Judah, was led captive to Babylon in his youth with Hananiah, Azariah, and Mishael. By the king's ordinance they were instructed in all the learning of the Chaldeans.

As Jerome says: "Those who refused to eat from the king's table and drink his wine lest they be polluted certainly would never have consented to learn what was unlawful for them, if they had known the wisdom and teaching of the Babylonians to be sin. But they learn, not to follow, but to judge and convict. They therefore learn Chaldean doctrine with the same intention with which Moses learned all the wisdom of the Egyptians," distinction 37, Those who from the table.

Because of their continence and abstinence, and also their obedience to the divine law--for they refused to use the foods of the Gentiles with which the king had ordered them fed from his table, but used vegetables and water--they were found in a short time wiser and more beautiful than the others. God gave to Daniel especially the understanding of all visions and dreams.

Ten visions are set down in the book. The first, in chapter 2, concerns the statue that Nebuchadnezzar saw. Its head was gold; its breast with the arms, silver; its belly and thighs, bronze; its shins, iron; and its feet mixed with earth. He saw a stone cut from the mountain strike the statue on its feet and reduce it to ashes. This signified the four successive monarchies of the world: those of the Assyrians; the Persians and Medes; the Greeks; and the Romans. The stone, that is, Christ, subjected these to His empire through faith.

The second vision, in chapter 3, concerns the fourth one like the Son of Man, whom Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, saw with the three who had been cast into the furnace--Hananiah, Azariah, and Mishael--because they refused to adore the statue he had made.

The third vision, in chapter 4, concerns the very tall tree Nebuchadnezzar saw cut down, signifying his transformation into a beast.

The fourth according to the order of the book concerns the writing that Belshazzar, son of Rodath, son of Nebuchadnezzar, saw formed on the wall by three fingers of a hand: "Mane, Thecel, Phares."

The fifth vision, in chapter 5, occurred when Darius, king of the Medes and Persians, saw Daniel remain unharmed among the lions by the power of his God after Daniel had been cast into the lions' den because he daily adored his God contrary to the statute made by Darius at the insistence of Daniel's rivals.

The sixth, in chapter 6, occurred when Daniel saw four beasts come out of the sea one after another: the first like a lioness; the second like a bear; the third like a leopard; and the fourth terrible, having iron teeth and ten horns, among which a little horn arose. The four beasts signify the four aforesaid monarchies. In the fourth, which is that of the Romans, the ten horns signify ten divisions of the empire. The little horn signifies Antichrist, whose deeds are treated there.

The seventh, in chapter 7, is that in which Daniel first saw a ram and afterward a he-goat killing it. When the he-goat's horn had been broken, four arose from it, and from one of them another little horn, which signifies Antichrist, whose deeds are set down there. The ram signifies the empire of the Medes and Persians, and the he-goat Alexander the Great, whose empire was divided into four after his death.

The eighth, in chapter 8, is that in which he saw Gabriel revealing, while Daniel persisted in prayer and fasting for his people's deliverance, both their coming deliverance from captivity and, moreover, the deliverance of the human race through Christ after seventy weeks of years from the day permission would be given by Cyrus for the rebuilding of Jerusalem.

The ninth, in chapter 9, is that in which he saw an angel clothed in linen whose form is described. At his appearance Daniel fell, but, comforted by him, recovered his strength. This angel was attending to the people's deliverance, but the prince of the Persians, namely an angel, resisted him for twenty-one days. Michael helped him; the prince of the Greeks, namely an angel, had also encountered him.

Daniel's tenth vision, in chapter 10, concerns the kingdom of the Medes and Persians, which then flourished, and Alexander, king of the Greeks, and how he would subject it to himself; afterward it concerns the king of the south and the king of the north fighting one another. There are many obscure things there, where Antichrist is foretold.

Chapter 12 concerns Michael, the great prince, and the final resurrection and the time after Antichrist, though obscurely. Afterward come the stories of Susanna, Bel, and the dragon. The story of Susanna is not found among the Hebrews, but the Church nevertheless receives it.

Daniel, judging the elders who unjustly accused Susanna, figures Christ in the Judgment condemning the scribes and Pharisees, who accuse the Church of spiritual adultery, namely because she believes in Christ. This is found in cause 2, question 7, in the section When Balaam.

Chapter Nine

The twelve Minor Prophets are contained among the Hebrews in one volume. They prophesied at different times in Judah or Israel. The first among them is Hosea, under the kings under whom Isaiah had prophesied. He foretold the rejection of the Jews and the election of the Gentiles, as is evident in chapters 1 and 2.

"Go," the Lord said to Hosea, "take to yourself a wife of fornications," and so forth. Jerome says that Hosea is not to be blamed if he converted the harlot whom he took in marriage to chastity; rather, he is to be praised, because he made a good woman from a bad one, cause 32, question 1, final chapter.

"And I shall espouse you to Me forever; and I shall espouse you to Me in judgment and justice and mercy; and I shall espouse you to Me in faith." The first espousal was in the Incarnation. The second was in the Passion, in which He made Himself justice by satisfying God, bestowed mercy upon us, and inflicted upon the devil the judgment of expulsion. The third is the particular espousal of the elect through conversion to the faith.

Hence he says: "Woe to them, because they have withdrawn from Me," and so forth; and below: "They shall fall by the sword," and so forth. Gratian, in On Penance, distinction 4, section To the children also, with the following chapter, declares that they are to fall, to be severely punished, and to be exterminated, not because of their parents' sins but because of their own sins.

"Out of Egypt I called My Son." Matthew the Evangelist adduces this testimony in chapter 2 concerning the return of the child Jesus from Egypt.

And below: "How shall I make you as Adama? I shall set you as Seboim. My heart is turned within Me; My repentance is troubled. I shall not do," and so forth. Augustine says: "Does it not appear in Hosea that the Lord Jesus is therefore indignant with us when we sin, so that He may convert us by the terror of His indignation? For His indignation is not the execution of vengeance but rather the operation of absolution," in On Penance, distinction 1.

But immediately afterward he speaks in chapter 6 concerning our final resurrection, begun in the risen Christ, the exemplar of our resurrection, saying: "He shall revive us after two days, and on the third day He shall raise us up."

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Nine (continued)

§ I. Joel

The second among the Minor Prophets is Joel. He prophesied at that time the devastation of the Jewish people to be wrought by four successive monarchies, signified by the four things he places at the beginning: “What the caterpillar left, the locust ate; what the locust left, the bruchus ate; and what the bruchus left, the rust ate.” The caterpillar signifies the Assyrians; the locust, the Medes and Persians; the bruchus, the Greeks down to Antiochus; and the rust, the Romans.

“Awake, you drunkards, and weep,” and so forth. He invites them to penance, saying: “Turn to Me with your whole heart, in fasting and weeping,” and so forth. What conversion is and what rending is found in On Penance, distinction 1, section Rend, and what follows, namely, “Turn.”

He announces the abundant sending of the Holy Spirit upon the disciples, saying: “Upon My servants and My handmaids I shall pour out My Spirit,” and so forth.

“In that time, when I shall turn the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem, I shall gather all nations and lead them into the valley of Josaphat, and there I shall dispute with them concerning My people.” This is understood of the Final Judgment. The vice that will be especially reproved is then added: “because they placed a boy in a brothel and sold a girl for wine.”

§ II. Amos

Amos, a shepherd and rustic, prophesied in the time of Hosea, king of Judah, saying: “For three crimes of Damascus, and for four, I shall not turn it back.” He adds the same concerning seven other nations: Gaza, Tyre, Edom, Ammon, Moab, Judah, and Israel, assigning the causes of their failure to be converted.

See the moral exposition concerning the four degrees in sin in On Penance, distinction 1, For three. This can be adapted to pride with the seven capital vices. Jerome, declaring those four degrees there, says: the first is to have thought things that are evil; the second, to have consented to perverse thoughts; the third, to fulfill in deed what one has resolved in the mind; the fourth, not to do penance but to take pleasure in one's own offense. Thus Jerome.

This fourth is that of which the Lord says, “I shall not turn it back,” namely by infusing grace, while in the other three He intimates conversion and pardon.

There it is also written: “Behold, the days come, says the Lord, and I shall send a famine into the land--not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the word of God.” This was fulfilled in the preaching of the apostles.

Amos 4 says: “I rained upon one city; upon another city I did not rain. One part was rained upon, and the part upon which I did not rain withered.” What is said of the part rained upon and not rained upon is understood as regards the detestation of some sins, in On Penance, distinction 3, section 1.

§ III. Obadiah

Obadiah is placed fourth. The Hebrews say that he was the man who, under Ahab and the most impious Jezebel, fed one hundred prophets hidden in caves. Treating here of Christ's Passion, he says: “The men of your covenant mocked you and prevailed against you; the men of your peace, who eat with you, shall place snares beneath you, and there is no prudence in them.” This is understood of the Jews and Judas the traitor.

“And upon Mount Zion there shall be salvation, and it shall be holy.” This is understood of Christ and the Holy Spirit sent forth.

§ IV. Jonah

Jonah is found in the fifth place. The Jews say that he was the son of the widow of Zarephath whom Elijah raised from the dead. He lived in the time of Jeroboam, king of Israel.

When he was sent by God to preach the destruction of the Ninevites, he boarded a ship bound for Tarshish so that he would not go there, suffering something human: he feared that, if God changed His sentence in response to their penance, he would be judged a liar. Or he feared that, if the Gentiles were elected to divine worship, the Jewish people would be rejected.

When a tempest arose because of this, he was cast into the sea and swallowed by a great fish. Praising God there, he was vomited out alive by it on the third day, and he proceeded to preach. At his word the Ninevites were converted to penance, on account of which God granted pardon.

When Jonah, having left Nineveh, made a shelter for a house, the Lord caused ivy to climb over it, in whose shade Jonah greatly rejoiced. But in one night a worm gnawed the root of the ivy. When it withered, Jonah was distressed by the heat, for which the Lord reproved him.

He signifies Christ's Passion and Resurrection, as Christ Himself expounded in Matthew 12, and the conversion of Gentility to penance after the synagogue had been rejected.

Jerome says upon Jonah: "As Herodotus, a certain historian, says, Nineveh was overthrown by the king of the Medes while Josiah reigned among the Jews." Hence it is evident that at Jonah's preaching Nineveh merited pardon through penance. But because afterward it returned to its vomit, entangling itself in graver crimes, it was overthrown by God's wrath, in On Penance, distinction 3, section The Ninevites also.

§ V. Micah

Micah is placed sixth. He lived in the times of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and foretold the captivity and destruction of Judah and Israel because of idols, avarice, and other evils. Hence among other things he says: "Its leaders judged for gifts, its priests answered for hire, and its prophets divined for money," and so forth.

Jerome says: "Let no one doubt that Jerusalem was overthrown because of the crimes set down here," cause 1, question 1, Judges.

Prophesying of Christ's Resurrection and Ascension, Micah says: "He shall ascend, opening the way before them. They shall divide and pass through the gate, and shall go out through it; and their king shall pass before them, and the Lord at their head."

Concerning Christ's Incarnation, preaching, and the conversion to the faith, he says: "In the last days the mountain of the Lord's house shall be prepared," and so forth.

Concerning Christ's temporal birth in Bethlehem and His eternal birth, he says: "You, Bethlehem, land of Judah," and so forth. The chief priests and scribes told Herod that these words were spoken of Christ, as is evident in Matthew 2.

Concerning the Passion he says: "With a rod they shall strike the cheek of the judge," and so forth. The Lord complains of His people's ingratitude, saying: "My people, what have I done to you, or in what have I troubled you? Answer Me," and so forth.

And below: "I shall show you, O man, what is good and what the Lord requires of you: indeed, to execute judgment"--as regards oneself, namely through examination of conscience and penance--"and to love mercy," namely as regards one's neighbor through the virtue of almsgiving, in On Penance, distinction 1, Medicine; "and to walk solicitously with your God," as regards the Lord, in On Consecration, distinction 1, When.

§ VI. Nahum

Nahum is placed seventh. The Hebrews say that he prophesied before the deportation of Israel to the Assyrians. He foretells the future destruction of Nineveh.

When the Ninevites had done penance at Jonah's preaching, on account of which God revoked His sentence, they became ungrateful for the benefit and entangled themselves in graver crimes. Therefore the prophet, announcing God's judgment against them, says at the beginning: "The Lord is a jealous and avenging God, having fury, and the Lord takes vengeance upon His enemies," and so forth.

"The Lord will not judge twice the same thing in tribulation; a double tribulation shall not arise." Upon this Jerome says: "Therefore those who have been punished here shall not afterward be punished," namely in the future.

Gratian understands this, and rightly, of those who, being contrite amid the scourges themselves, return to God, in On Penance, distinction 3, section The authority of Nahum, and when the punishment inflicted here by God or man is such that it makes satisfaction for the faults committed. Otherwise, what was lacking would be punished in the other world.

Hence Jerome says in cause 23, question 5, What therefore, and below: "To this we shall reply that God, as He knows all things, knows the measure of punishments in such a way as neither to anticipate the sentence of the Judge nor henceforth take from Him the power to exercise punishment against the sinner, and that a great sin is washed away by great and long-lasting torments, while a light fault is compensated by present punishment?"

He gives the example of the man who was stoned by the people because he had gathered wood on the Sabbath. This is understood as stated when he repents and bears it patiently.

According to Jerome, Nineveh is interpreted “beautiful,” signifying the world. Hence whatever is said of Nineveh is figuratively foretold of the world, which is finally to be judged. This prophecy is therefore woven for the consolation of the saints, so that whatever they see in this world they may despise as passing and perishable, and prepare themselves for the day of Judgment, when the avenger will come against the Assyrians, that is, the wicked.

Concerning evangelical preaching Nahum says, among other things: “Behold upon the mountains the feet of him who evangelizes and announces peace.”

§ VII. Habakkuk

Habakkuk is placed eighth. “No one,” Jerome says, “has dared with so bold a voice to summon the Lord to a disputation about justice, asking why so great an iniquity of affairs prevails in human matters and in this world. Let no one who sees the wicked prosper here be disturbed. Here there is no full repayment of vice or virtue, but only a certain foretaste, so that those who do not believe in the resurrection may be instructed by such examples,” and so forth. Chrysostom, in On Penance, distinction 3, What therefore.

At the beginning of his volume Habakkuk describes the devil with his members. At the end he announces the advent and Passion of the Savior. For of what other thing than Christ’s future advent is this understood: “It shall appear at the end and shall not lie. If it delays, wait for it, because the one who comes shall come and shall not tarry”?

Concerning the Passion, the cross, and the name of Jesus, he says in the Canticle: “O Lord, I have heard Your report,” and so forth; “Horns are in His hands”; and also: “I shall exult in God my Jesus.”

§ VIII. Zephaniah

The ninth is Zephaniah, whom the Hebrews hand down to have been the son of a prophet, prophesying under Josiah, king of Judah. He shows the day of Judgment to be exceedingly terrible, saying: “The great day of the Lord is near; it is near and exceedingly swift. The voice of the day of the Lord is bitter, and there the strong man shall be afflicted. A day of wrath,” and so forth.

Concerning the resurrection he says: “Wait for Me on the day of My resurrection in the future, because My judgment is that I gather the nations and assemble the kingdoms,” and so forth.

§ IX. Haggai

After the foregoing follows Haggai, the tenth, who prophesied in Jerusalem after the return of the people of Judah from Babylon.

According to Jerome, when the seventy years of Babylon had been foretold by Jeremiah, in the sixty-second year of that captivity the kingdom of the Chaldeans was overthrown by Darius, king of the Medes and Persians, as is evident in Daniel 5. After Darius died and Cyrus of the Persians succeeded to the kingdom, the seventy years were completed. Cyrus gave permission to return to Jerusalem, as is evident at the very end of 2 Chronicles.

When another Darius afterward succeeded the said Cyrus, and the Jews were hindered by their neighbors from rebuilding the city, the prophet Haggai was sent by the Lord to encourage Zerubbabel, who was of the royal seed of Judah, and Jesus son of Josedech, the high priest, to rebuild the city, and to assure them that the years of captivity had been completed.

“Those who gathered wages put them into a bag with holes.” Gregory says of the bag with holes: “What is put in through one place goes out through another, because undiscerning minds do not perceive how they lose through an evil work the rewards acquired from a good work,” in On Penance, distinction 4--not simply, but as regards the eternal reward.

Among other things Haggai foretold Christ’s Advent, saying: “Yet one little while, and I shall move heaven and earth and the dry land; and I shall move all nations, and the Desired of all nations shall come, and I shall fill this house with glory.” Augustine says in The City of God that this was fulfilled in Christ’s Nativity, in the Purification of the Virgin, and in Christ’s preaching in the temple.

§ X. Zechariah

The eleventh in order is Zechariah, who prophesied at the same time as Haggai, namely in the second year of Darius after Cyrus, exhorting the people with Haggai to rebuild the temple, which was done.

Jerome says in distinction 50: “Thus Jesus son of Josedech, the high priest, although he preceded as a type of the Savior who bore our sins and joined to Himself a foreign Church from the Gentiles, nevertheless according to the letter is introduced as stained after the priesthood, while the devil stands at his right hand; and afterward white garments are restored to him.”

According to Jerome, the prophecy is manifold. For Zechariah saw Jesus the priest stripped of filthy garments and afterward clothed in white; a lamp of seven eyes and a golden lampstand with lamps, that is, Christ with sevenfold grace; and two olive trees, one at the lamp's left and one at its right. He also saw black, red, variegated, and white horses, and scattered chariots.

He also foretold: "Behold, your king comes to you, meek, sitting upon the colt of one under the yoke," Zechariah 5.

Likewise he saw a flying scroll, whose length was twenty cubits and width ten. Likewise he saw a vessel and a woman sitting in the middle of the vessel and bearing a talent of lead, and so forth.

Likewise he spoke of the thirty pieces of silver that were cast into the sanctuary and were the price at which Christ was valued.

He also says there: "I shall pour out upon the house of David and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem the Spirit of grace and of prayers; and they shall look upon Me whom they pierced, and they shall mourn for Him as for an only-begotten son," and so forth.

And below: "On that day there shall be a fountain open to the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem for the washing of the sinner and the menstruous woman." And below: "What are those wounds in the midst of Your hands? And He shall say: With these I was wounded in the house of those who loved Me. Strike the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered."

§ XI. Malachi

Malachi is the twelfth in the order of the prophets and was the last to prophesy in Babylon. The Hebrews say that he was Ezra the scribe.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Nine (continued)

Malachi rebukes the priests concerning improper sacrifices and because they scandalize the peoples through their evil works, whence they became contemptible. Hence he says: "O priests, you despise My name."

Jerome says upon Malachi, distinction 5: "Priests despise the Lord's name and, insofar as lies with them, offer polluted bread when they approach the altar unworthily, and when they presume upon the priesthood after a gift has been given. He also pollutes the bread who badly distributes the Lord's teaching among the people, who honors the powerful and despises the poor.

"If you offer a blind animal, is it not evil?" He offers a blind animal who ordains an unlearned man in place of a learned one and makes a master of one who could scarcely have been a disciple. He offers a lame animal who appoints one seeking earthly gains, as though placing his feet in different directions, one in divine things and the other in carnal things. He offers a sick animal who regards a vicious man as religious, and also one who regards a slow and lazy man as patient.

"Return to Me, and I shall return to you," and so forth. And below: "And you have said: In what have we pierced You? And He says: In tithes and firstfruits," namely because you do not give them, "and in scarcity you are accursed."

Jerome says: "If at any time famine, scarcity, and want of all things oppress the world, let us know that this descends from God's wrath. He says that He is defrauded in the poor of His alms if they do not receive them, and of His own possession," cause 16, question 1, Return.

"Behold, I send My angel, and he shall prepare the way before My face," and so forth. And at the end: "Behold, I shall send Elijah the Tishbite before the great and terrible day of the Lord comes, and he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the sons."

There were also several other prophets in the Old Testament. Either they did not write books of their prophecies, or, if they wrote them, those books were not received into the canon, although many of their prophetic sayings are contained in various books, as in the Books of Kings. The chief among them, who also shone through miracles, were Elijah and Elisha among the people of Israel. They were discussed above in Third and Fourth Kings.

It must also be noted, according to Augustine, that not only the words of the fathers of the Old Testament in which they foretold some future things were prophetic; the deeds of that people were also a certain prophecy of the life of the Christian people.

Hence the Hebrews number among the prophets all the historical books placed above, namely Joshua, Judges, and Kings. They exclude from the books of the prophets Job, Chronicles, Daniel, the Psalter, and the books of Solomon, calling these the Hagiographa, as will be said more fully in the following section.

§ XII. Job and the Hebrew Division of the Old Testament

Although Job was a Gentile and said many things prophetically in his book—especially concerning the final resurrection of bodies, more openly than all others according to Jerome: “I know,” he says, “that my Redeemer lives”; and whence a redeemer except through the Passion? “And on the last day I shall rise from the earth,” and so forth—and although he spoke of many other mysteries of Christ and the Church, as Gregory shows in the books of the Moralia, nevertheless the Hebrews place him not among the prophets but among the Hagiographa.

For the Hebrews divide the Old Testament into four parts. They call the first the Law, namely the five books of Moses. They call the second the Prophets, comprising under it the Book of Joshua as the first; the Book of Judges as the second, together with the history of Ruth; First and Second Kings, entitled Samuel, as the third; Third and Fourth Kings as the fourth; Isaiah as the fifth; Jeremiah as the sixth; Ezekiel as the seventh; and the volume of the Twelve Minor Prophets as the eighth.

They call the third part of the Old Testament the Hagiographa, that is, sacred writings, which they hold to be authoritative. They are nine: Job; the Psalter of David; the Proverbs of Solomon; his Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs; Daniel; First and Second Chronicles; Esdras, containing two books; and Esther. Thus in all they assign twenty-two authoritative books.

They call the fourth part the Apocrypha: the Book of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Tobit, Judith, and First and Second Maccabees. Yet the holy Church also receives the Apocrypha as true, as is found in distinction 15, The holy Roman Church, and venerates them as useful and moral, although in disputes over matters of faith they are not compelling for argument.

Returning to Job, it must first be known that some wrongly said Job did not exist in the nature of things, but that this history was a constructed parable serving as the theme for a disputation concerning divine providence. But blessed Thomas, in his exposition upon Job, disproves this because Job is numbered with others who existed in the world. For it is said in Ezekiel 14: “If Noah, Job, and Daniel, these three men, were in its midst, they would deliver their souls by their justice.” And James 5 says: “You have heard of Job’s patience,” and so forth. Job’s patience would be proposed to us in vain as an example if he had not existed in the nature of things. Therefore this must not be doubted.

Second, it is asked who this Job was and of what race. Some say that he descended from Esau, asserting that he was the one of whom it is said in 1 Chronicles 1: “Balath died, and Jobab son of Zare from Bozrah reigned in his place.” Isidore held this opinion in the book On the Birth and Death of the Saints, where he says: “Job son of Zare from Bozrah, king of the Idumeans, the fourth successor after Esau, succeeded Balath son of Beor in the kingdom.” The Policraticus says the same.

Jerome, however, in the Hebrew Questions seems to say that Job descended from Nahor, Abraham’s brother, through Nahor’s wife Milcah. For it is said that a son named Huz was born of Nahor, from whose stock Job descended. Hence it is said at the beginning of this book: “There was a man in the land of Huz.” Isidore therefore also says that Job was contemporary with Moses, that is, he lived at approximately the same time as Moses.

Third, it is asked who composed the Book of Job. To this some say it was Moses, recounting the deeds of that holy man. Others say one of the prophets, without determining which; others Solomon or Job’s friends; and others Job himself. This last is the more common opinion, which our Gregory the pope follows, saying: “We can more truly judge that the same Job who endured the contests of spiritual warfare also narrated the deeds of his completed victory.”

But Gregory also says at the beginning of the Moralia: “Who wrote these things is sought very superfluously, since the Holy Spirit is faithfully believed to be the author of this book; just as, if one knew certain letters to be a king’s, one would vainly ask with what pen they had been written.” Thus the principal efficient cause, namely God, and the secondary cause, namely Job, are apparent.

According to Thomas at the beginning of his work upon Job, the final cause is to show how human affairs are governed by divine providence. The opinion contrary to this is exceedingly harmful to the human race, for if divine providence is taken away, no reverence or fear of God together with virtue will remain among men.

According to Lactantius in the book of the Institutes, Epicurus followed this most wicked opinion; and many who appear wise to themselves follow it, saying that all things among men happen by chance, except insofar as they are governed by human providence and counsel, or by the necessity of fate, that is, by the constellations of heaven.

Hence it was the principal study of those who attained wisdom through the divine Spirit to remove this false opinion from men’s hearts. This is done in the Book of Job, for it is shown by probable reasons that human affairs are governed by divine providence.

The thing that seems especially to argue against human affairs being governed by divine providence is the affliction of the just. For although the occurrence of good things to the wicked may at first sight appear unreasonable and contrary to providence, it can nevertheless have some excuse, namely from divine compassion. But that the just are afflicted without cause seems wholly to undermine the foundation of providence.

Therefore, as a kind of theme for the intended question, the manifold and grave affliction of the most holy Job is proposed. Job’s friends who visited him believed in divine providence concerning human affairs, but they erred greatly in this: they thought that the whole repayment for deeds done well or badly was received or conferred by God here, not in another life, and consequently that men sustained afflictions only because of guilt and obtained prosperity from good deeds.

Thus they argued that Job had been wicked and a hypocrite and had been afflicted in this way because of his sins. Their statements are set forth twice by each of them. Job answered and refuted them, showing that there is another repayment for works than the one in the present life and that he had not been scourged because of guilt.

When Job's friends, as men convicted, were no longer able to answer his arguments, another man present there, Elihu, younger than the others, spoke. He reproved Job's three friends because they could no longer argue against him, and Job himself because it seemed to Elihu from Job's speech that God had judged and scourged him unjustly, although Job had not done this.

Finally, the Lord determined the disputation. He reproved Elihu for his opinion because he had unjustly condemned Job as thinking badly of God's justice; and He rebuked Job because he had spoken in such a way as to give them occasion to judge that he thought badly of God's justice, as if God had scourged him unjustly. Yet Job had not spoken with this intention, but only wished to show that he had been scourged not for his own faults but for the exercise of virtue, as was the case.

The Lord was angry with Job's friends because they thought wrongly about the cause of afflictions. Hence they also called Job a dissembler and wicked. He commanded them, in satisfaction, to offer a certain sacrifice, as is evident at the end.

Because human wisdom is not sufficient to comprehend the truth of divine providence, it was therefore necessary that the said disputation concerning divine providence be ended by authority. This begins to occur in chapter 38, where it is said: "The Lord, answering from the whirlwind," and so forth.

In that chapter the Lord questions Job concerning divine effects, saying: "Where were you when I laid the foundations of the earth?" and so forth. These effects are exposed to the human senses. Since He shows man to be ignorant of them, it is much more conclusively demonstrated that man does not possess knowledge of higher things, such as God's providence. He questions him concerning the elements, the heavens, and the creatures in them.

Then the Lord argues against Job by showing God's excellence above men, in comparison with whose justice and goodness all human justice appears injustice. His excellence is manifested in the effects He works in good and wicked men and in the devil, concerning whom He speaks at length under the attributes of Behemoth, that is, the elephant, and Leviathan, that is, the great fish, as in Job 40.

The material cause, therefore, is the history in which first is narrated Job's prosperity in substance, family, and power; then the adversity arising from the loss of all the foregoing, the death of his children, and the loss of health at one time; the reproach of his wife; and afterward the visit of his friends to console him. In all these things Job did not sin.

For when he cursed his day, he spoke not according to the deliberation of reason but according to the movement of sensuality, which abhorred such affliction and detested the things from which he had come into it, namely birth and conception. Because these occur by day or night, those times are called evil--not by reason of the time, but by reason of the event within it--just as the Apostle says, "The days are evil."

It is also as though a wise man, tasting a bitter medicine that was nevertheless healing, were to call it evil and accursed according to the sensual appetite because of the bitterness he sensed in it, although according to reason he judged it good.

Nor did Job sin by recounting his good works, as is evident in chapters 30 and 31, because he did so not for boasting but to restore his confidence in God lest he fall into despair amid so many adversities.

Finally, the restoration of Job's prosperity is set down: double as regards substance, but not as regards his children in number, though in power, because afterward he had seven sons and three most beautiful daughters, as he had before; and when he had been healed, vigor was added to him. Hence he lived another 140 years.

This intimates that, although divine providence permits the good to be afflicted here even without fault of their own, it afterward rewards them abundantly in the other life, which endures forever.

The history of this Gentile Job is placed among the deeds of the holy fathers of the Old and New Testaments as an example of every kind of patience and, especially, of wisdom concerning God's providence and of every perfection of justice, and as a figure of Christ and the Church. Gregory makes this clear by expounding the whole work allegorically or morally, while Thomas expounds it literally and marvelously.

This is first to intimate that there is no acceptance of persons with God, but that in every nation the one who fears God is acceptable to Him, as Peter said in Acts 10. Second, it is for the confusion of wicked believers and to sharpen the goad of the just in doing good. For if a Gentile, bound only by the natural law, lived so perfectly, how much more ought every believer to do this, assisted by the Mosaic and evangelical laws? Third, because Christ was to come to save all, Jews and Gentiles, He decreed to be foretold and figured by every race of Jews and Gentiles.

The formal cause of the book is its manner of treatment, which is narrative and disputative. As Jerome says: "It begins in prose, slips into verse"--namely from the place "Let the day perish" to "I reprehend myself" in chapter 40--"and afterward ends in prose." Eusebius, Origen, and others assert that verse is found in the books of the Hebrews, as in the Psalter, Job, and Lamentations. But in the translation made by Jerome from Hebrew or Chaldean into Latin, the meters could not be preserved in the same way, and everything was reduced to prose, as is evident.

§ XIII. Tobit

Because the history of Tobit occurred before the captivity and deportation of Judah to Babylon, in the time of Ahaz and Hezekiah, we shall therefore recapitulate it briefly.

This Tobit was of the tribe of Naphtali and dwelt in Galilee. Almost alone in Israel, he observed God's law. Led captive to Nineveh with many others by Shalmaneser, king of the Assyrians, he there exercised himself in manifold works of mercy and provided burial for the dead.

One day, while he rested leaning against a wall, droppings of swallows falling from above blinded his eyes. Yet he was not saddened by this.

Tobit, after being reproached by his wife, and Anna daughter of Raguel, after being insulted by one of the maids whom she had reproved, concerning the killing of her seven husbands, were saddened and prayed to the Lord. Their prayers were heard, and Raphael was sent to heal them both.

Tobit, believing that he had been heard so that he might die, instructed his son, likewise named Tobias, concerning the vices to be avoided and especially the works of almsgiving to be done.

The angel Raphael, appearing in the form of a traveler, was brought to Tobit the father. Asked his name, he said that he was Azariah, offering to lead his son to Rages of the Medes, to Gabelus, and bring him back.

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Nine (continued)

While they were on the way, when Tobias stopped to wash his feet beside the River Tigris, a fish came out to devour him. But at Raphael's command he drew it out and killed it. He roasted its flesh to eat on the journey, but reserved its heart, gall, and liver as medicines.

The angel advised them to lodge with their kinsman Raguel and for Tobias to take his daughter Sarah as his wife. Raguel received them joyfully. After he recognized Tobias when the angel revealed who he was, Tobias at length sought Raguel's daughter in marriage. Raguel was afraid, yet at the angel's counsel he gave her to him.

When the wedding had been celebrated and Tobias entered the bridal chamber, Tobias placed some of the fish's liver upon coals, and Raphael bound the demon named Asmodeus in the desert. The demon had strangled the seven husbands whom Sarah had previously had. Tobias and Sarah remained in prayer for three nights. On the fourth he consummated the marriage, and the devil could not harm him.

Tobias sent Raphael to Gabelus at Rages to recover the money that had been lent. Once the debt had been repaid, the angel brought Gabelus to Tobias's wedding.

When they delayed in returning, Tobias's mother Anna wept inconsolably, while the blind Tobit comforted her. At length the younger Tobias, having taken leave of Raguel, set out with his wife Sarah and Raphael. Tobias, going more quickly than the others with the angel, arrived home first.

His blind father came out to meet him. Tobias took some of the fish's gall and placed it upon his father's eyes, restoring his sight. When the others arrived, they blessed God and feasted together.

The younger Tobias, recalling Raphael's services to his father, advised his father to offer him half of all their goods, for they thought him a man. But the angel then revealed himself, instructed them to give thanks, and disappeared while they blessed God.

The prophecy of Tobit is then given, in which he foretold many things concerning the Church. Last, it is stated that he lived 102 years. He was forty-six years old when he became blind and sixty when his sight was restored. He foretold that Nineveh's destruction was imminent and that they should not remain there.

§ XIV. The Sibyls

To continue the histories of the kings of Judah and Israel after omitting the deeds of the Gentiles, we shall now resume very briefly the notable deeds that occurred among the Gentiles at various times.

First, concerning the Sibyls, Isidore says in book 8 of the Etymologies, chapter 8: In Greek, all prophetic women are generally called Sibyls. For in the Aeolic language sios means God, and the Greeks call the mind boule. Hence Sibyl means, as it were, the mind of God. Therefore, because they were accustomed to interpret the divine will to human beings, they were named Sibyls. For just as every man who prophesies is called a seer or prophet, so every woman who prophesies is called a Sibyl. The name comes from an office, not from the proper meaning of the word.

The most learned authors hand down that there were ten Sibyls.

The first was the Persian. The second was the Libyan. The third was the Delphic, born at the temple of Delphic Apollo; she prophesied before the Trojan War, and Homer inserted very many of her verses into his own work. The fourth was the Cimmerian in Italy.

The fifth was the Erythraean, named Herophila, born in Babylon. She prophesied to the Greeks who were going to Ilium that Troy would perish and that Homer would write falsehoods. She was called Erythraean because her poems were found on the island of that name.

The sixth was the Samian, who was called Semonoë and surnamed from the island of Samos, whence she came. The seventh was the Cumaean, named Amalthea, who brought nine books to Tarquinius Priscus in which the Roman decrees were written. She is also the Cumaean of whom Virgil says, "Now comes the final age of the Cumaean song." She was called Cumaean from the city of Cumae in Campania. Her tomb still remains in Sicily.

The eighth was the Hellespontine, born in the Trojan territory, who is said to have lived in the time of Solon and Cyrus. The ninth was the Phrygian, who prophesied at Ancyra. The tenth was the Tiburtine, named Albunea.

The poems of all these women are circulated. In them it is most manifestly demonstrated that they wrote much about God, Christ, and the Gentiles. The Erythraean, however, is considered more celebrated and renowned than the others. Some say that she prophesied when Rome was founded, when Ahaz was king in Judah--or, as others reckon, his son Hezekiah.

Jerome says to the same effect in Against Jovinian: "Why should I recount the Erythraean and Cumaean Sibyls and the other eight, whose distinguishing mark is virginity, and the reward of virginity, divination?"

Lactantius also mentions them in the books of the Divine Institutes and sets down many of their sayings in Greek and Latin. Augustine gathers and reports them in book 18 of The City of God, chapter 23. There express mention is made of worshiping the one God, Creator of all, and of God Himself incarnate, His Passion, death, and resurrection.

There are also set down twenty-six verses of this Sibyl that most openly express the Last Judgment. If the first letters of the verses are taken and joined together, they yield these words: "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior." The verses begin as follows:

*The sign of judgment: earth shall be wet with sweat.
From heaven shall come the King, destined to endure through all ages,
Present, namely, in the flesh, that He may judge the world.
Hence unbeliever and believer alike shall behold God,
Exalted with the saints, at the very end of the age.
Thus souls shall be present with the flesh, whom He Himself judges,
While the world lies uncultivated amid dense thorns.
Men shall cast away their idols and all their treasure too.
Fire shall burn the lands, the sea, and the sky,
Searching, and shall break open the gates of foul Avernus.
For free light shall be given to all the flesh of the saints;
The guilty shall be delivered up, and eternal flame shall burn them.
Then each shall speak, revealing hidden deeds,
And God shall expose secret hearts to the light.
Then there shall also be mourning; all shall gnash their teeth.
The radiance of the sun is taken away, and the choir of stars perishes.*

*Heaven shall be rolled up; the moon's splendor shall pass away.
 He shall cast down the hills and raise the valleys from the depths.
 Nothing lofty or high shall remain among human things.
 Now mountains are leveled with plains, and the blue waters of the sea likewise.
 All things shall cease; the shattered earth shall perish.
 Springs and rivers alike shall be scorched by fire.
 But then the trumpet shall send down a mournful sound from on high,
 Groaning over the world's wretched crime and its many toils.
 The gaping earth shall reveal Tartarean chaos,
 And here all kings together shall be set before the Lord.
 From heaven shall fall a river of fire and sulfur.*

In these Latin verses, translated as best they could be from Greek, the meaning formed by joining the letters at their beginnings could not be reproduced. Wherever the letter y occurred in Greek, Latin words that both began with the same letter and suited the sense could not be found. These are three verses: the fifth, eighteenth, and nineteenth.

Accordingly, if in joining the letters at the beginning of every verse we do not read the letters written at the beginnings of those three verses, but remember the letter y as though it had been placed in those same locations, five words are expressed in them: "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior," as stated above--but in Greek, not Latin.

This Sibyl, whether Erythraean or, as some more readily believe, Cumaean, has nothing at all in her entire poem--of which this is but a small portion--that pertains to the worship of false or fabricated gods. Indeed, she speaks against them and their worshipers, so that she seems to deserve to be counted among those who belong to the City of God.

Lactantius also inserts into his work certain Sibylline prophecies concerning Christ. Although he does not identify which Sibyl spoke them and sets them down individually, I have thought that they should be placed together here as though they were one continuous passage, because he recalled several short sayings:

*Afterward He will come into the hands of unbelievers. They will strike God with their defiled hands and spit venomous spittle from an impure mouth. But He will simply give His holy back to the lash, and, receiving blows, He will remain silent, lest anyone recognize what Word He is or whence He came, so that He may speak to those below and be crowned with a crown of thorns.
 For food they will give gall, and for thirst vinegar; they will display this table of inhospitality. For you, foolish nation, did not understand your God. Though He played among the minds of mortals, you crowned Him with thorns and mixed dreadful gall.
 The veil of the temple will be torn, and at midday the night will be exceedingly dark for three hours. He will die a death, having taken three days of sleep, and then, returning from below, He will come to the light, the first to reveal the principle of resurrection by being called back.*

Lactantius employed those Sibylline testimonies piecemeal at intervals in his disputation, as the points he intended to prove seemed to require them. Without inserting anything, I have placed them together in a single sequence, taking care to distinguish them only by headings--provided that later copyists do not neglect to preserve them. Some have written that the Erythraean Sibyl lived not in Romulus's time but in the time of the Trojan War. Augustine says all these things in book 18 of The City of God, chapter 23.

There one should also note what Augustine says in his book Against the Manichaeans: "If the Sibyl or Orpheus or any other seers or philosophers of the Gentiles are said to have foretold anything true about God, it is indeed useful for refuting the vanity of the pagans, but not for embracing their truth. For the distance between the preaching of angels and the confession of demons concerning Christ's coming is as great as that between the authority of the prophets and the curiosity of sacrilegious writings," distinction 37, If Anything.

Jerome likewise says in the same distinction, Those Who from the Table: "If at times we are compelled to recall secular literature and say some of the things from it that we formerly omitted, this is not by our own will but, so to speak, by the gravest necessity, so that we may prove that the things foretold by the holy prophets many centuries beforehand are also contained in the books of the Greeks, the Latins, and other nations." Thus Jerome.

It is also related in the chronicles, as Blessed Thomas reports in the Second Part of the Second Part, that in the time of Emperor Constantine--not the first Constantine, but the one who ruled with his mother Irene--the following inscription was discovered upon a tablet at the head of a certain Gentile who had died before Christ's Incarnation: "Christ will be born of the Virgin Mary, and I believe in Him. O sun, you will see me again in the time of Constantine and Irene."

Augustine also says in book 22 of The City of God, chapter 27: “Plato and Porphyry each said certain things which, if they could have shared with one another, might perhaps have made them Christians. Plato said that souls cannot exist eternally without bodies. He therefore said that even the souls of the wise, after however long a time, would nevertheless return to bodies.” Virgil, taking this also from Plato, says: “Again they begin to desire to return to bodies.”

Porphyry said: “When the most purified soul has returned to the Father, it will never return to the evils of this world.” Therefore, if Plato had granted to Porphyry the truth that he himself saw, namely that the most purified souls of the just and wise would return to human bodies; and, in turn, if Porphyry had granted to Plato the truth that he saw, namely that holy souls would never return to the miseries of corruptible bodies--so that they would not each say one of these things separately, but both would each say both--I think they would now have seen it to follow that souls would return to bodies and receive bodies of such a kind that in them they would live blessedly and immortally.” Thus Augustine.

I have also found other sayings of a certain Sibyl whose name I have not found, testifying about Christ as follows:

A woman will arise from the stock of the Hebrews, named Mary, who has a spouse named Joseph. From her, without union with a man and by the Holy Spirit, will be born the Son of God, named Jesus. She will be a virgin before giving birth and a virgin after giving birth. He who is born of her will be true God and true man. He will fulfill the law of the Jews and add His own law to it, and His kingdom will remain forever and ever.

A voice will come over Him, saying, “This is My beloved Son; hear Him.” There will be a resurrection of the dead, and the lame will run most swiftly; the deaf will hear, the blind will see, and those who did not speak will speak. From five loaves and two fish many thousands of people will be fed. He will restrain the winds by a word and calm the raging sea. Walking upon the sea, He will tread upon the waves, curing human weakness and driving away many pains.

Likewise another Sibyl, who is said to have been the Erythraean, says: “In the final age God will humble Himself; the divine offspring will become human. Divinity will be joined to humanity. The Lamb will lie in the hay, and God and man will be reared by a maiden’s service. He will choose for Himself the number twelve from fishermen and the rejected.” Thus she.

Augustine says in book 10 of The City of God, chapter 2: “Often and insistently the philosopher Plotinus, explaining Plato’s meaning, asserts that even the soul which they believe to be the soul of the universe is blessed from no other source than our own soul is. That source is a light which the soul itself is not, but by which it was created and, through intelligible illumination, shines intelligibly.”

Thus that great Platonist says that the rational or intellectual soul--from which class he understands the souls of the immortal and blessed beings whom he does not doubt inhabit the heavenly abodes, namely the angels--has no nature above it except God, who fashioned the world and by whom it too was made. Nor are blessed life and the light of the understanding of truth supplied to those heavenly beings from any other source than that from which they are supplied to us. Hence, he thinks that they, and therefore we as well, become blessed by the presentation of a certain intelligible light, which is God, just as he thinks the moon is illuminated by the presentation of the sun.

Again Augustine says in the same book, chapter 29, concerning the Gentile Porphyry, whom he calls the noblest of the philosophers but the fiercest enemy of Christians: “You proclaim the Father and His Son, whom you call the Father’s intellect or mind, and a being between them whom we think you mean by the Holy Spirit. Yet you are unwilling to acknowledge the Incarnation of the unchangeable Son of God, by which we are saved. You somehow see, though from afar, the homeland in which one must dwell, but you do not hold the way by which one must go. You confess grace, since you say that it has been granted to few to reach God through the power of the intellect.”

Third Title: On the Fourth Age of the World

Chapter Nine (continued)

For undoubtedly, when you say that it was granted, you confess God’s grace, not human sufficiency. Following Plato’s opinion, you yourself do not doubt that a human being can in no way attain the perfection of wisdom in this life, but that, after this life, everything lacking to those who live according to the intellect can be supplied by God’s providence and grace.

Augustine likewise says in chapter 27 concerning Porphyry: “Your own oracles, as you write, have confessed Christ to be holy and immortal.” Concerning Him the most noble poet, namely Virgil, also spoke poetically, because under the shadowed figure of another person, but nevertheless truthfully if you refer it to Christ: “Under your leadership, the remaining traces of our crime shall be void and shall free the lands with perpetual fortitude.”

§ XV. In the Time of Joash, King of Judah

In the 182nd year, and the year 3030 from the beginning of the world according to the shorter computation, Lycurgus was held in renown, according to Eusebius. He established laws for the Lacedaemonians.

As Justin relates in book 3, Lycurgus could, had he wished, have succeeded his brother Polybites, king of the Spartans, and reigned. But when Charillus, his brother's posthumously born son, reached adulthood, Lycurgus restored the kingdom to him with the greatest fidelity, so that all might know how much more the claims of filial duty prevail among good people than riches do.

In the meantime, while the child grew strong, Lycurgus instituted laws. But he sanctioned no law for others of which he himself did not first give an example. He abolished the use of gold and silver as the material of every crime. He permitted the people the power to elect the senate or to create whatever magistrates they wished. He divided all the lands equally among everyone, so that equal patrimonies would make no one superior to another.

He ordered everyone to dine publicly, lest anyone's riches or luxury be hidden. He permitted the young to use no more than one garment throughout the whole year, and allowed no one to go out more elegantly dressed than another or to feast more lavishly. He ordered everything to be purchased not with money but by an exchange of goods.

He commanded that boys who had reached puberty be led not into the forum but into the countryside, so that they would spend their earliest years not in luxury but in work and labor. He decreed that they should spread no bed beneath themselves for sleep, live without relishes, and not return to the city until they had become men.

He ordered virgins to marry without a dowry, so that wives would be chosen not for the sake of money and husbands would govern their marriages more strictly, since they would be held by no restraints imposed by a dowry. He judged that the greatest honor belonged not to the rich and powerful but to the elderly. For this reason old age held a more honored place there than anywhere else in the world.

Because these and similar measures seemed harsh to people whose customs had previously been unrestrained, he pretended that Delphic Apollo was their author and that he had brought the laws from there. Then, to give permanence to his laws, he bound the city by oath to change nothing in them before he returned to his homeland. He said that he wished to consult Apollo again about what appeared to require addition to or subtraction from these laws.

He departed for Crete, where he spent the rest of his life in voluntary exile. Even when dying he ordered his bones to be placed in a leaden casket and cast into the sea, lest, if they were by chance brought back to Lacedaemon, the Lacedaemonians think themselves released from their oath. Thus Justin.

The same author says that Sardanapalus was the last of the Assyrian kings, a man more ornamented than a woman. Arbaces, governor of the Medes, discovered him among companies of prostitutes, dressed as a woman and spinning purple wool. In bodily softness and the wantonness of his eyes, he surpassed every woman while dividing the wool among them. Arbaces, indignant that so many men were subject to such a woman, stirred up war against him. Sardanapalus fled and withdrew into the palace. There, after a pyre had been constructed and set alight, he burned himself and his riches, imitating a man in this one respect alone.

Cicero says of him in the Tusculan Disputations: Sardanapalus ordered this inscription to be placed upon his tomb: "I possess these things which I ate and whatever fully satisfied lust consumed; but those many and splendid things lie abandoned."

Therefore, when Sardanapalus--who burned himself, as has been said--had been defeated by Arbaces the Mede, Arbaces transferred the monarchy from the Assyrians to the Medes, according to Vincent. This occurred in the time of Uzziah, king of Judah.

Nevertheless, powerful Assyrian kings continued afterward, though without the monarchy, until Nineveh was destroyed, apparently by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. His kingdom failed entirely in his grandson or great-grandson Belshazzar, who was killed by Cyrus and Darius. At that time the monarchy of the Medes and Persians was exalted and, in this sense, is said to have begun then--namely, in its greatest power.

§ XVI. In the Thirteenth Year of Manasseh, King of Judah

Gyges reigned in Lydia. Tully says of him in book 3 of On Duties that, when he was a royal shepherd and a deluge of rain occurred, he descended into a certain opening in the earth. There he found a dead man sitting upon a bronze horse. On the man's finger he found a ring through which he became invisible. He violated the queen and, with her assistance, killed the king, his lord.

Helinand agrees with Justin and Tully concerning the murder of his lord, but I have found the discovery of the ring written nowhere else except in Ambrose's On Duties, which treats the same matter from Cicero.

In the fifth year of this Gyges, Midas, or Mides, while reigning among the Phrygians, died after drinking bull's blood. At that time Archilochus, Simonides, and the musician Aristoxenus were held in renown.

Valerius says in book 6 that the Lacedaemonians ordered the books of the poet Archilochus to be carried out of the city because they considered their reading insufficiently chaste. For they did not wish the minds of their children to be steeped in them, lest they harm their morals more than they benefited their abilities. Thus they punished even this great poet with exile because he had torn apart a household hateful to him with the obscene abuse of his poems.

The same poet Simonides boasts that, at eighty years of age, he both taught poetry and entered a contest in it. When he had brought a ship to shore and buried an unburied body that lay there, the dead man warned him not to sail the following day. Simonides therefore remained behind. Those who began to sail were overwhelmed by waves and storms.

In the fifty-first year of Manasseh, Zaleucus the lawgiver was celebrated among the Locrians with frequent praises. As Valerius relates in book 6, when Zaleucus's son had been condemned for adultery and was required to lose both eyes, the entire city resisted for some time out of respect for his father. At last Zaleucus yielded only so far as to prevent his law from being violated: first gouging out one of his own eyes and then one of his son's, he left each of them the use of sight. Thus, by an admirable moderation of equity, he divided himself between the merciful father and the just lawgiver.

§ XVII. In the Reign of Amon, Son of Manasseh, in Judah

Phalaris the Sicilian, having seized the tyranny, ravaged the Agrigentines. Cruel in mind and still crueler in his torments, he did everything wickedly against the innocent, yet sometimes, though himself unjust, found someone whom he punished justly.

For a certain Perillus, a worker in bronze, sought the tyrant's friendship. Thinking that he had found a gift suited to Phalaris's cruelty, he made him a bronze bull. He fashioned a door in the side of the work as an entrance through which condemned persons could be thrust inside. When a person enclosed there was roasted by fires placed beneath, the capacity of the hollow bronze would amplify the sound of his tortured voice and emit, with a deathly resonance suited to the image, a bellowing murmur. Thus, in that wicked spectacle, it would seem to be the lowing of a beast, not the groaning of a human being.

But Phalaris embraced the work while cursing its maker, and furnished material both for vengeance and for cruelty. For he punished the artisan himself by means of his own invention. Orosius says this in book 1.

At that time the philosopher Zeno flourished. Leaving his own country, where he could enjoy secure freedom, he went to Agrigentum, which was oppressed by miserable slavery. He relied upon such confidence in his ability and character that he hoped the ferocity of both the tyrant and Phalaris's mind could be tamed by him.

When at last he perceived that with Phalaris the long habit of domination had more force than wholesome counsel, he inflamed the noblest young men of his city with the desire to liberate their homeland. When knowledge of the affair reached the tyrant, Phalaris summoned the people to the forum and began to torture Zeno with various torments so that he would betray his fellow conspirators.

Without naming anyone, Zeno began to rebuke the people who had gathered for the spectacle, asking why they had tolerated Phalaris's tyranny for so long. By his words he so incited them against the tyrant that they stoned him.

Valerius, however, relates the matter differently in book 3. When Zeno was tortured by a certain tyrant so that he would name the man who had plotted the tyrant's death, Zeno said that he wished to speak to him privately. Released from the rack, he seized the tyrant's ear with his teeth and did not let go before he himself lost his life and the tyrant lost that part of his body.

Under Josiah, king of Judah, Arion, the Lesbian lyre-player, was sailing with abundant wealth. The sailors wished to kill him in order to obtain his property, and even when it was offered to them, it could not appease them. He asked that they at least permit him, dressed in his garments, to sing for a little while a song about his misfortune as a consolation to himself.

When this was permitted, he sang with the lyre in a very high voice and threw himself into the sea. A dolphin of great size appeared among the waves, received the falling Arion upon its back, and carried him unharmed, still arrayed in his clothing, all the way to shore.

When he came to Corinth, he presented himself to Periander just as he had been carried by the dolphin and narrated the event as it had happened, but the king was reluctant to believe him. When the sailors were questioned about Arion, they answered that he was safe, flourishing in wealth, and fortunate. During their words Arion showed himself, still arrayed and bearing his lyre. At that time Thales of Miletus, the first natural philosopher, was renowned.

In the year of Zedekiah, king of Judah, according to Justin in book 43, Massilia was founded by the Phocaeen Greeks near the mouths of the River Rhône, in a remote inlet like a corner of the sea. From them the Gauls learned the practice of a more cultivated life, the cultivation of fields, and the enclosing of cities with walls. Their barbarity was tamed, and they learned to live by laws rather than arms and devoted themselves to planting vines and grafting olive trees.

Valerius also says of Massilia in book 3: Since the founding of Massilia, there has been a sword there with which criminals are beheaded. Although consumed by rust, it is kept as a memorial of antiquity. Prepared hemlock poison is also kept there and is given to the person who has made public the counsels of the senate. No one enters their city bearing a weapon.

The city of the Massilians, a most severe guardian of discipline, gives mimes no admission to a banquet, because their plots consist for the greater part of enacted sexual offenses, lest a custom of seeing and hearing such things also assume the license to imitate them.

Around those times Milo of Croton is found to have lived. Solinus says of him that in the Olympic contest he carried an ox upon his shoulders through the stadium, killed the same ox with a blow of his hand and made it a sacrificial victim, and on that day ate the whole animal without being burdened. He died the victor of every contest.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter One

The Fifth Age had its beginning with the captivity of the Jews in Babylon and extends for 690 years, to the Nativity of Christ.

In this age are found the four monarchies of the world: those of the Assyrians, the Persians and Medes, the Greeks, and the Romans. They were prefigured and shown to Daniel in the four beasts coming out of the sea and in the four parts, made from different materials, of the statue he saw.

This age comprehends the second and third monarchies in their entirety, but touches only the beginning of the fourth, namely that of the Romans. For this Fifth Age ends at Christ's Nativity, which occurred in the time of the empire of Octavian, whereas the monarchy of the Romans began under his predecessor Julius Caesar.

It contains the end of the first monarchy, namely that of the Assyrians. For although the dominion of the Assyrians was diminished under Sardanapalus so that it ceased to be a monarchy when the Medes withdrew from their rule, a kingdom nevertheless still remained. Afterward, according to Jerome, Nineveh was devastated by the king of the Medes in the time of Josiah.

In the fifth year after the overthrow of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar descended into lower Syria and obtained it. He subjected the Moabites and Ammonites to himself and finally entered Egypt. He subdued it, killed the king who was in it, appointed another there, and led the Jews in Egypt into captivity once again, as the Master of the Scholastic History says.

The Master also says that, when Nebuchadnezzar the Great died, his son, namely Nabuther, reigned in his place, and thus the kingdom of the Babylonians was magnified. Nevertheless, that kingdom appears to be included in the Assyrian monarchy.

When Nabuther died, Evilmerodach reigned in his place. In the thirty-seventh year of the transmigration he raised the captive King Joachim from prison.

There is no contradiction, as there might appear to be, between the statement that Evilmerodach raised Joachim from prison in the thirty-seventh year of the transmigration and the statement below that Belshazzar, the son or grandson of Evilmerodach, was killed by Cyrus and Darius and Babylon captured in the thirtieth year of the Jewish captivity. For this Joachim was carried away to Babylon eleven years before the final captivity, in which Zedekiah, who had last reigned eleven years in Jerusalem, was carried away.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

Certain writers hand down that this Evilmerodach, the brother of the younger Nabuchodonosor, committed many impious deeds during the period of his father's banishment, when the latter was changed into a beast. After his father was restored to his homeland and to his former condition following seven years, Evilmerodach was accused before him. His father sent him to the prison where Joachim was, and there he remained until his brother's death.

When he began to reign, he raised up Joachim, whom he had had as a companion in prison. Fearing that his father, who had previously returned from a beast into a man, might rise again, he consulted Joachim. At Joachim's persuasion he dug up his father's body, divided it into 300 parts, and gave them to 300 vultures. Joachim said: "Your father will not rise unless the vultures come together again as one."

According to Josephus, Evilmerodach was succeeded by a son named Neglisar, after whom Belshazzar reigned. Eusebius, however, says that Belshazzar succeeded Evilmerodach, saying nothing about Neglisar.

When this Belshazzar was killed by Darius, king of the Medes and maternal uncle of Cyrus, king of the Persians, and by Cyrus the Persian--whom, because of the two kingdoms, he calls the driver of a two-horse chariot, namely of a camel and an ass--the kingdom of the Babylonians was destroyed, as Xenophon, Pompeius, and others note.

It is not recorded how long each of those four successors of Nebuchadnezzar the Great--namely Nabuther, Evilmerodach, Neglisar, and Belshazzar--reigned. But it appears that those four reigned only twenty-one years. For only that much time extends from the ninth year of the Jewish captivity, in which Eusebius places the death of the first Nebuchadnezzar, to the first year of Cyrus, in which the last of those four was killed.

In this Fifth Age many philosophers and poets were renowned, as will be evident. Many excellent deeds of the Gentiles are narrated: of the kings of the Persians and Medes, of the kingdom of Alexander the Great, and of the wars of the Romans.

Concerning the people of the Jews, only those matters are narrated which pertain to their return from Babylon to Jerusalem and to the rebuilding of the city and temple, and afterward to their government through Judas Maccabeus, Jonathan, and Simon, brothers who were at once priests and leaders of the people, as is contained in the Book of Maccabees.

§ I. Cyrus

Therefore, in the year 3404 from the beginning of the world according to Jerome and Eusebius--but 4046 according to others--and in the thirtieth year from the captivity of the Jews, and hence of the Fifth Age, Cyrus, king of the Persians, overthrew the kingdom of the Medes and King Astyages, as well as the kingdom of the Babylonians and King Belshazzar. He transferred the kingdom or monarchy to the Persians.

The Persian monarchy endured for 206 years through the succession of twelve Persian kings, until Alexander the Great destroyed their monarchy after Darius, the last king of the Persians, had been killed, as Vincent says at the beginning of book 4 of the Historical Mirror. Cyrus reigned thirty years.

One should know that Isaiah prophesied about this Cyrus 210 years before he reigned, when he said: "Thus says the Lord God to My anointed Cyrus, whose right hand I have grasped, that I may subject nations to him and turn the backs of kings," and so forth, Isaiah 45. According to Josephus, this was therefore in the fourth year of the reign of Jotham, king of Judah.

According to the Scholastic History, this Cyrus was the nephew of Darius through his sister and the grandson of Astyages through his daughter. Astyages had an only daughter and saw in a dream that a vine arose from his daughter's genitals and occupied all Asia. He learned from the interpreters of dreams that he would have a grandson by his daughter who would become lord of Asia and drive him from the kingdom.

Fearing this, he gave his daughter as wife to a common soldier so that no noble and powerful son would be born from her. Thereafter, he summoned his pregnant daughter, and when a son was born from her, Astyages gave the child to a certain prince of the Arcanians to be killed. That prince, believing that the kingdom would pass to the daughter, feared to kill her son and gave him to one of the king's shepherds to be exposed in a wood.

When the shepherd had exposed him and reported this to his wife, who had given birth in those days, the woman begged him to bring the little boy to her to be reared and to expose her own child in his place. When the shepherd returned to the boy, he found a female dog offering him her teats and defending him from wild beasts and birds.

When he brought the boy to his wife, the child played with her as though he had known her for a long time. She called the boy Spartacus, that is, "little dog," for spartos in Persian means a dog.

When he had grown somewhat older, the other boys made him their king while they were playing, and he severely punished those who were obstinate and disobedient to him. Their fathers bore this bitterly and brought a complaint about the shepherd's son before the king.

When the king summoned him and reproved him for striking the boys, the child answered fearlessly that he had done so as their king. The king marveled and, perceiving in him certain signs of his own lineage, summoned the shepherd and learned the truth of the matter more privately.

Nevertheless, his fear concerning his grandson was assuaged, because he thought that the interpreters' word about the boy's kingdom had been fulfilled. He entrusted the boy to be reared by the same man to whom he had formerly entrusted him to be killed, but did not reveal that he was anyone other than the shepherd's son.

Because that secretary had not obeyed his command, Astyages secretly gave the secretary's own son to him to eat and afterward revealed to him what he had done.

It later happened that Astyages entrusted his army to that secretary to fight his enemies, namely the Persians, while Astyages himself remained in the province of Media. The secretary, not unmindful of the king's crime, persuaded the army to choose Spartacus as king of the Persians and surnamed him Cyrus, which is interpreted "heir," as though to say: "Although Astyages resists, this man will nevertheless be the heir."

When this had been done, Astyages became afraid. He adopted his cousin Darius as his son, gathered an army, and joined battle against Cyrus. The Persians fled, but their wives and mothers went out to meet them and, exposing their buttocks, said to them: "Do you wish to enter your mothers' wombs and be born again?" Stirred by this shame, the Persians returned against the enemy, and Astyages was defeated.

Cyrus showed himself to Astyages more as a grandson than as a conqueror, for he gave him the kingdom of the Hyrcanians. To Darius, as to his mother's brother, he entrusted the kingdom of the Medes, though with the firm expectation that it would return to Cyrus himself.

In the first year of Cyrus's reign, Aesop was killed by the Delphians, according to Eusebius. Aesop's elegant and famous fables survive. A certain Romulus translated them from Greek into Latin and addressed them to his son Tiberinus, writing as follows: "A certain Aesop, a Greek and ingenious man from the city of Attica, teaches his servants what human beings ought to observe; and to show human life and conduct, he introduces trees, birds, and beasts speaking."

"If you read them, you will find well-composed jests that mingle laughter for you and sharpen your understanding sufficiently." Whether this was the Aesop killed by the Delphians or another is not known, says Vincent in the Historical Mirror.

§ II. The Capture and Destruction of Babylon

Orosius says in book 2, chapter 11: After Cyrus had subdued everyone against whom he had marched, he attacked the Assyrians and Babylon, a nation and city richer than all others. But the force of the River Ganges, second only to the Euphrates in magnitude, interrupted him.

For one of the royal horsemen, distinguished in his whiteness and beauty, was persuaded by confidence that he could cross because the crests of the current rose where the rushing Alpheus met a ford. The waters seized, hurled down, and drowned him.

The king, angered, determined to take vengeance upon the river. He declared that the river which had then devoured his magnificent soldier must be left passable with its water scarcely wetting women's knees. Nor was he sluggish in accomplishing this. With all his forces distributed along the Ganges, he cut the river into great ditches and reduced it to 460 channels.

After the trenches had been extended, Cyrus diverted the immensely strong Euphrates, which flowed through the middle of Babylon. Thus he made a route through the parts of its bed that were now fordable, even dry and open, and captured the city.

Among mortals it had been almost equally incredible either that the city could have been constructed by human labor or that it could be destroyed by human power. In short, captured Babylon confirms that everything made by labor or human hands slips away and is consumed by age. Just as its empire had been the first and most powerful, so it was also the first to yield.

Jerome, commenting on Isaiah in book 5 and expressing its nobility and magnificence more particularly, says that Babylon was extremely powerful and situated as a square upon level ground. He reports, as do Herodotus and many others who wrote Greek histories, that its walls extended sixteen thousand paces from corner to corner--that is, sixty-four miles around the entire circuit, if a mile is a thousand paces, as is said.

The citadel, that is, the capitol of that city, is the tower built after the Flood. It is said to extend three thousand paces in height, gradually narrowing as it rises so that the broader lower parts might more easily support the immense weight. They describe marble temples there, golden statues, streets gleaming with gold and precious stones, and many other things that seem almost incredible.

We have narrated all this to show that, before God's wrath, every power is dust and is compared to ashes and cinders. If one were permitted to enter the barbarous nations and see the final traces of so great a city, one would see a possession of hedgehogs and marshes of water, and that what Isaiah's voice sings concerning it has truly been fulfilled: "I shall sweep it with a broom, wearing it away." Except for the baked-brick walls, which were restored over many years to confine wild beasts, the entire space within is a wasteland. Thus Jerome.

Cyrus therefore divided the Euphrates into several streams far from the city so that he might make the channel flowing into the city fordable. As the Scholastic History says, the enemies entered the city through that channel beneath the wall, and Belshazzar was killed.

Darius, who was forty-two years old, succeeded him in the kingdom. Cyrus deferred to him in everything as to his elder. Daniel, who was there in Babylon and had foretold the city's destruction, was brought by Darius into the midst of the kings and was one of the satraps who presided over 120 others. When Darius intended to place him over the whole realm, the others envied him, accused him, and had him sent into the lions' den. But he was delivered by God's power, as has been said, and so forth.

§ III. The Seven Sages

Around those times of the Babylonian captivity lived those called the Seven Sages of the world. According to Helinand, their names are these: Thales of Miletus, Solon the Athenian, Pittacus of Mytilene, Chilon the Lacedaemonian, Cleobolus the Lydian, Periander the Corinthian, and Bias of Priene.

Concerning Thales of Miletus, Augustine says in book 8 of The City of God, chapter 2: Two kinds of philosophers are handed down, one Italic, from that part of Italy once called Magna Graecia, and the other Ionic, in those lands where even now Greece is named.

The Italic kind had Pythagoras of Samos as its founder. The chief of the Ionic kind was Thales of Miletus, one of those seven who were called sages.

The other six were distinguished by their manner of life and by certain precepts suited to living well. But Thales shone because, in order to produce successors, he investigated the nature of things and committed his disputations to writing. He was especially admired because, after comprehending the calculations of astrology, he could even predict eclipses of the sun and moon.

Nevertheless, he thought water to be the principle of things and held that from it arose all the elements of the world, the world itself, and the things generated in it. Yet he attributed nothing to a divine mind in this work which, when we contemplate the world, we behold to be so marvelous.

Thales was succeeded by his pupil Anaximander, who changed his opinion concerning the nature of things. He thought that things of every kind arose not from one thing, as Thales of Miletus thought they arose from moisture, but from their own proper principles. He believed the principles of individual things to be infinite and to generate innumerable worlds and whatever arises in them. He thought that those worlds were now dissolved and now generated again, for however long each could remain in its own age. Like Thales, he too attributed nothing in these works to a divine mind.

Concerning Solon, Vincent relates the following in book 3 of the Historical Mirror, chapter 20. Solon used to say that, if everyone brought their evils together into one place, the result would be that each would prefer to carry his own evils home rather than bear his portion from the common heap of miseries. From this he concluded that we ought not judge the things we suffer by chance to be especially intolerably bitter.

He also said that he grew old while learning something every day. When he was dying, his friends sat beside him and discussed a certain matter among themselves, and he raised his head. When asked why he had done so, he answered: "So that, when I have understood this matter which you are discussing--whatever it may be--I may die."

This elegant saying is read as Solon's: "The final day is the judge of happiness, and the funeral pyre confirms the wise man in the honor of that name." Tully reports in On Old Age that, when the tyrant Pisistratus asked Solon what support made him resist so boldly, he answered: "Old age."

Concerning Pittacus, Valerius says in book 4: Pittacus possessed a heart furnished with moderation. The poet Alcaeus had employed the bitterness of his hatred and the powers of his talent most persistently against him. Yet when Pittacus had attained the tyranny offered to him by the citizens, he merely warned Alcaeus of what he had the power to do in crushing him.

Concerning Cleobolus, he says: "We ought to beware the envy of friends more than the snares of enemies. The latter evil is open; the former is concealed, and the deceit used to cause injury is more powerful where it is not expected."

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

Concerning Bias, Valerius says: When enemies had almost invaded the homeland of Bias of Priene and everyone fled burdened with the weight of precious possessions, he was asked why he carried none of his goods with him. He answered: "I certainly carry all my goods with me." For he carried them in his heart, not upon his shoulders. They were not to be seen by the eyes but valued by the mind. Enclosed within the dwelling of the mind, they cannot be weakened by mortal hands; just as they are available to those who remain, so they do not abandon those who flee.

The same Bias of Priene used to say that people ought to conduct themselves in the practice of friendship while remembering that it could be turned into bitter enmity.

But, as Augustine says in The City of God, the world was exceedingly poor and naked in wisdom when only seven men out of the whole world were named. Yet even these sages of the world became fools, for because they did not possess wisdom--that is, true knowledge of God--they perished through their foolishness.

§ IV. The Permission Given to the Jews to Return to Jerusalem

In the first year of Darius, according to Vincent in book 4 of the Historical Mirror, chapter 13, Daniel prayed to the Lord that Darius and Cyrus would free the people of the Jews from captivity. A decree was given that permission to return should be granted, and Gabriel announced to Daniel that it had gone forth from the Lord. Darius arranged to give this permission, but, overtaken by death, did not fulfill it.

After the death of Darius, Cyrus held the monarchy of the East. He established its seat among the Persians, although the kingdom of the Medes was greater and more honorable, because the Persians had elevated him as king.

Therefore, when the entire kingdom of the Medes and Persians had devolved upon him, in the first year of this kingdom the Lord stirred his spirit so that Jeremiah's word might be fulfilled. Cyrus gave liberty to all the Jews who were in his kingdom and permission to return to Judea and rebuild the house of the Lord.

He was stirred by the words of Isaiah, who 210 years earlier had written that the Lord said of him: "Thus says the Lord to My anointed Cyrus, whose right hand I have grasped," Isaiah 45.

Hence at the beginning of the First Book of Ezra it is said: "In the first year of Cyrus, king of the Persians, so that the word of the Lord from the mouth of Jeremiah might be fulfilled, the Lord stirred up the spirit of the king of the Persians. He caused a proclamation to pass throughout his entire kingdom, also in writing, saying: 'Thus says Cyrus, king of the Persians: The Lord God of heaven has given me all the kingdoms of the earth, and He has commanded me to build Him a house in Jerusalem, which is in Judea.

"Who among you is of all His people? May God be with him. Let him ascend to Jerusalem, which is in Judea, and build the house of the Lord God of Israel. He is the God who is in Jerusalem. Wherever all the rest dwell, let them assist him from their place with gold, silver, and substance."

The chiefs of the fathers of Judah and Benjamin arose, together with the priests, Levites, and all whose spirit God had stirred to ascend and build the Lord's temple that was in Jerusalem.

King Cyrus also brought out the vessels of the temple that Nebuchadnezzar had carried to Babylon and placed in the temple of his god. Through the hand of Mithridates he counted them out to Salabazar, prince of Judah. Altogether there were 5,400 gold and silver vessels of various forms, which were carried to Jerusalem by those who returned there.

In the second chapter of Ezra, the chiefs of the families are set down with the number of their families. In all they were 42,360, apart from their male and female servants, who numbered 7,337. They ascended from Babylon to Jerusalem with many mules, horses, asses, and camels.

Because almost all had been born in Babylonia and possessed property there, however, they chose to remain in the land of their birth. Those who intended to ascend were sluggish and delayed until the third year of Cyrus.

Seeing this, Daniel was still more afflicted with grief and prayed that God, who had given the kings the will to liberate, would also give the people the will to return. Then, while he prayed, the angel appeared to him and told him of the prince of the Persians and the prince of the Greeks who resisted him. These were either evil angels according to Jerome or good angels according to Gregory. They impeded the people's liberation, while Michael assisted in liberating them, as is contained in Daniel 10.

In the third year of Cyrus, king of the Persians, the prophet Zechariah, who was then in Chaldea, exhorted them to return. Under the leadership of Zerubbabel and Joshua the high priest, they left Babylon and arrived at Jerusalem.

In the seventh month, when everyone had assembled in Jerusalem, they erected an altar as best they could, offered sacrifices according to the law, as is contained in 1 Ezra 3, and celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles.

This third year of Cyrus was the seventieth year in which the captivity foretold by Jeremiah was to be released. Jerome says that Cyrus's first year was the seventh year of the final decade. Hence the third year of Cyrus was the seventieth year in which the release was to occur. Josephus agrees with this, and this opinion is more certain and most firmly sanctioned by authorities, says Vincent in the Historical Mirror.

One should note that, according to this computation, the seventy years of captivity foretold by Jeremiah must begin to be counted from the thirteenth year of Josiah, under whom Jeremiah began to prophesy, and end in the first year of Cyrus. They are computed as follows.

First are the eighteen years for which Josiah reigned after the aforesaid thirteenth year. Second are the eleven years for which Joachim reigned before he was led to Babylon. Third are the eleven years for which his brother Zedekiah reigned. Fourth are the nine years for which Nebuchadnezzar the Great reigned after the final captivity and the destruction of Jerusalem. Fifth are the twenty-one years for which his sons and Belshazzar, whom Cyrus killed, reigned. In that first year, after capturing Babylon and becoming monarch, Cyrus gave the Jews permission to return to Jerusalem.

If these numbers are added together, they make seventy years up to Cyrus's first year--or his third year, according to Jerome.

Some others begin to count the years of the Babylonian captivity from the third year of Eliakim, that is, Joachim, and end it in the twentieth year of King Cyrus. The seventy years of the temple's desolation are then completed at the restoration of the temple under Darius son of Hystaspes. But the first opinion is more commonly followed.

In the second month of the second year after the return to Jerusalem, they laid the foundations of the temple. But the Samaritans, who were like neighbors, became indignant and hindered their work. When they could not impede it by themselves, they gave gifts to the king's officials. Corrupted by money and acting without Cyrus's knowledge, these officials obstructed them to such a degree that, during the thirty years in which Cyrus reigned, they did not raise the temple walls beyond the level of a parapet.

How long Daniel survived after the people's return to Judea is not known. When he died, he was buried in a royal cave.

In the thirteenth year of Cyrus, Croesus was captured by Cyrus, according to Eusebius in the Chronicle, and Croesus's kingdom of the Lydians, which had stood for 231 years, was destroyed. This was Croesus's final capture, for elsewhere he is read to have been captured by Cyrus both once and again.

Hence Boethius says: "Did you not know Croesus, king of the Lydians, who shortly before was formidable to Cyrus and was soon afterward pitifully delivered to the flames, but defended by rain sent from heaven?" This must be understood of his second capture. For Justin and Orosius relate that Cyrus captured him the first time but gave him his life and patrimony. Justin then says that he rebelled.

Orosius says that, when Cyrus attacked Babylon and Croesus, king of the Lydians, had come at that time with his famous riches to assist Babylon, Croesus was defeated and anxiously fled back to his kingdom. After Cyrus invaded Babylon as an enemy, overthrew it as a conqueror, and arranged it as a king, he transferred the war to Lydia. There, without difficulty, he routed the army already broken by the previous battle. He captured Croesus but granted the captive his life and patrimony.

Eusebius writes in the Chronicle that Croesus made war against Cyrus in Cyrus's eighth year. This is understood of the war in which, after the capture of Babylon, Croesus--who had already been captured by Cyrus and granted his life and patrimony--later rebelled.

Justin says that Cyrus's clemency toward Croesus was no less useful to the conqueror than to the conquered. For, when it became known throughout Greece that war had been inflicted upon Croesus, aid flowed together as though to extinguish a common conflagration. So great was the love of Croesus in every city that Cyrus would have suffered a grievous war if he had taken some harsher measure against Croesus.

Other historians relate that, in his second capture, Cyrus ordered Croesus to be placed upon a pyre and roasted. Suddenly such great rain fell that the immensity of it extinguished the fire, and thus Croesus found an opportunity to escape.

When he afterward gloried that these things had turned out prosperously for him and boasted excessively of his abundance of wealth, a certain very wise man named Salomon told him that no one ought to glory in riches and prosperity.

That same night he saw in a dream that Jupiter drenched him with water and the sun dried him. When he told this to his daughter in the morning, she prudently explained the matter as it was: he would be fastened to a cross, drenched with water, and dried by the sun. This finally occurred, for when captured by Cyrus he was crucified.

Solinus says: "When the victorious Cyrus entered Sardis, where Croesus was then hiding, Achis, the son of Croesus, who had been mute until that time, is said to have cried out: 'Spare my father, Cyrus, and at least learn from our misfortunes that you are a man.'"

At that time Pisistratus reigned at Athens for the second time. Justin says of him in book 2: Pisistratus, as though he had conquered for himself and not for his homeland, seized the tyranny through deceit. After causing himself to be beaten voluntarily at home, he went out in public with his body torn. He summoned an assembly, displayed his wounds to the people, and complained of the cruelty of the leading men, by whom he pretended to have suffered these things.

Tears were added to his words, and the credulous multitude came over because of his hateful speech. Because of the people's love, he feigned himself to the senate and obtained the assistance of guards to protect his body. Through them he seized the tyranny and reigned for thirty-three years.

Valerius says of the same man in book 8 that Pisistratus is said to have possessed such power in speaking that the Athenians, captivated by his oratory, entrusted him with royal authority, especially although Solon, the most devoted lover of his homeland, strove on the opposite side.

The same Valerius says: When a certain young man, inflamed with love for the daughter of Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens, encountered her in public and kissed her, Pisistratus's wife urged him to inflict capital punishment upon the young man. He answered: "If we kill those who love us, what shall we do to those who hate us?" This utterance flowed from the mouth of a tyrant out of humanity. In this manner, therefore, he bore the injury to his daughter--and bore his own still more commendably.

During a banquet his friend Thrasippus assailed him with abuse. Pisistratus so restrained both his spirit and his voice from anger that one would have thought it was a bodyguard being reviled by a tyrant. At last Thrasippus rose under the impulse of excited drunkenness and spattered Pisistratus's face with spittle, yet could not inflame him to take vengeance. Pisistratus even restrained his sons when, because their father's majesty had been violated, they wished to come to his aid.

But on the final day, when Thrasypus wished to exact punishment from himself by voluntary death, the tyrant came to him, gave him his pledge, and remained with him in the same degree of friendship.

In the time of Cyrus, Anaximenes the natural philosopher was known, Simonides was held to be a famous poet, Chilon was one of the Seven Sages, and Thales of Miletus died, according to Eusebius.

After Cyrus had diverted the course of the river, he cunningly reduced the most warlike nation of the Lydians to indolence. He handed over festivals and games to them and commanded them to devote themselves to amusements, banquets, and embraces, as though showing them kindness. In this way he enervated them and conquered through lust those whom he could not conquer by war.

Afterward, however, having crossed the river, he was defeated and killed by Tamari, queen of the Massagetae. Cutting off his head and throwing it into a skin filled with human blood, she said: "Sate yourself with the blood for which you thirsted."

§ V. Cambyzes

Cyrus was succeeded in the Persian monarchy by his son Cambyzes in the sixty-first year of the Fifth Age. This was the year 3434 from the beginning of the world according to the shorter computation that Jerome places in the translation we use and Eusebius also follows. According to the other, longer computation set down by the Septuagint and Bede and commonly accepted, there were 4,670 years from the beginning of the world to Cambyzes. According to the chronicles, Cambyzes reigned eight years.

Helinand says in book 15 that this is the Cambyzes who added Egypt to his father's empire. Offended by the Egyptians' superstitions, however, he ordered the temples of Apis and the other gods to be destroyed. He also sent an army to attack the most renowned temple of Amun, but it perished, overwhelmed by storms and masses of sand.

Cambyzes was so severe that he caused a certain unjust judge to be flayed and made that judge's son sit upon a chair covered with his father's skin. Thus he would fear to judge unjustly, lest he suffer a similar judgment.

Cambyzes is read to have been furious from birth and to have sought the source of the Nile throughout the whole expanse of lands. When his provisions failed, he was compelled to eat the flesh of his companions.

According to the Scholastic History, this Cambyzes was Cyrus's son and successor in the kingdom. In Ezra he is called Artaxerxes or Ahasuerus, while in the history of Judith he is called Nebuchadnezzar.

During his time, therefore, the rulers of the lands neighboring Judea who hindered the Jews who had returned from Babylon from rebuilding--namely Rehun Beelteem, whom Josephus calls the recorder of everything that occurred, and others who governed Syria and Phoenicia--wrote to Cambyzes that the Jews were rebuilding Jerusalem, a most wicked and rebellious city, which, if completed, would refuse tribute to kings, and so forth, as is contained in 1 Ezra 3.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

Artaxerxes, who is also called Cambyzes here, answered them that they should prohibit the Jews from continuing the building they had begun. This was done, and the said work was thus interrupted until the second year of Darius, as will be stated below.

§ VI. Judith

According to the Scholastic History and Vincent in the Historical Mirror, that which is written in the history of Judith is said to have occurred at this time. Yet in that book this Cambyzes is called Nebuchadnezzar.

After King Cyrus died, a certain Arphat the Mede rose up at Ecbatana, repaired it, and fortified it so impregably--winning certain parts of Media to himself--that he might at length rule all Media. But Nabucher, king of the Assyrians, who reigned in Nineveh, conquered it in the twelfth year of his reign.

This Nabucher is Cambyzes, to whom his father, while still living, granted Nineveh--although it had previously been defeated and weakened, as was said above--and the kingdom of the Assyrians, and named him Nebuchadnezzar. When his father died, he was in the twelfth year of that reign, for he reigned only eight years in the monarchical kingdom.

After he became monarch, his heart was exalted. He sent to all who inhabited Cilicia, Damascus, Galilee, and Samaria as far as Jerusalem, demanding heavier tribute than his fathers had. They all opposed him with one accord.

Therefore, in the thirteenth year of his reign, he sent Holofernes, commander of his armies, with an innumerable multitude, so that he might subject to his dominion all the cities he could and destroy all gods, that Nabucher alone might be worshiped as God.

When Holofernes went out to war against everyone, no one could resist his power. The Jews prepared to resist, blocking the approaches through the mountains so that he could not reach them.

When Holofernes heard this, he inquired about the condition of that nation. Achior, commander of the Ammonites, spoke at length about it in its praise and explained that its God handed its people into the hands of enemies because of their sins whenever they behaved wickedly, and so forth.

Hearing this, Holofernes became indignant with Achior and ordered him carried to the enemy nation. The messengers accompanied him, but when they perceived some of the enemy ranging about, they left him tied to a tree. The Jews came to that place, found him, and led him into the city. When asked the reason for his bonds, he explained the entire sequence of events.

The Jews commended themselves to God, devoting themselves to fasting and prayer while the priests exhorted them to do so. Holofernes took away their water, and it failed in the city. When the cisterns had dried up, water was given to the people by measure, and they began to complain against their leaders for not having surrendered to Holofernes.

But Uzziah, one of the leading men of Bethulia, comforted them, promising that he would surrender the city if God did not deliver them within five days.

When Judith heard this--she was a holy widow, a most beautiful woman devoted to fasting and prayer--she left her house, addressed the people, and rebuked the priests for the smallness of their confidence in divine aid.

Then she returned home, prayed with great devotion, adorned herself with the greatest care, and left the city with one maidservant. She told no one what she intended to do, but only asked them to persevere in prayer.

When she reached the enemy camp, she was found by them and asked why she had come. She said that she wished to speak to Holofernes. She did so, speaking many things to him: she knew that the city was to be handed into his hands, and she had therefore come out to him to teach him a way to capture it more quickly.

Holofernes was captivated by love for her and commanded his servants to permit her to go wherever she wished. When a banquet was held, Judith accepted the invitation, though she ate the foods she had brought with her.

When the meal ended and Holofernes and his men had become drunk, they quickly fell asleep. Judith prayed, entered Holofernes's pavilion, and cut off his head while he slept. She placed it in a basket and gave it to her maidservant.

Returning to the city, she entered by night. She summoned all the people and Achior, showed everyone the head of Holofernes, disclosed what she had done, and admonished them to advance against the enemy at earliest morning.

When they did so, the chamber servants wished to awaken their commander but found him beheaded. When they made this known, all the enemy took flight. The Jews, although few, pursued them, killed many, and carried off an immense quantity of plunder from their camp.

Joachim the high priest came from Jerusalem to Bethulia to see Judith and praised her wondrously. She gave thanks to the Lord for so great a benefit and composed a canticle.

It is called into doubt, however, that she told Holofernes he would capture the city and other things of this kind, which seem to be lies. But there are several ways of speaking about this.

One is that she did indeed tell lies and is praised not for this, but for her character and her great kindness and beneficence toward her people, for whose liberation she exposed herself to death.

Another, more pious way is that she did not tell a lie through those words but spoke prophetically, predicting that the Jews were to be handed under the power of a Gentile people--namely, under Titus and Vespasian--because of the sins they committed against Christ and the apostles.

A third way is that what she said about the people of Israel being captured is to be understood according to that people's deserts, because their sins required that they be handed over, just as Judith explained; or according to their own inertia, because they had now been abandoned by God and made so fainthearted that they wished to surrender themselves voluntarily.

Alternatively, all her words are to be understood conditionally: the city would be taken unless God delivered them. Therefore she did not lie in speaking such things, although her hearers understood them otherwise, namely as though she spoke simply and assertorically. Thus Vincent in the Historical Mirror.

Concerning the fact that she seems voluntarily and knowingly to have given an occasion for Holofernes's ruin, it can be said that, in adorning herself in this way, she did not intend to scandalize him or to lay a snare or obstacle tending toward his ruin. She intended, first, the liberation of her people and, second, the benefit of Holofernes, so that, while captivated by her for a time, he might sin less.

For, having many concubines and married women--and perhaps male concubines--he sinned in many ways, even against nature, because the Gentiles abounded in these impurities. Hence, while suspended in love for her, he sinned less.

In the time of this Cambyses, as Justin says in book 2, after Pisistratus, his son Diodes forcibly violated a virgin and was killed by the girl's brother.

Hippias, the brother of Diodes, holding his paternal power at Athens through tyranny, ordered the man who killed his brother to be seized and compelled him to name all his accomplices in the killing. Deliberately, the man named all the tyrant's friends. When all of them had been killed, he was asked whether anyone among his accomplices survived. He answered that there was no one left whom he wanted to die except the tyrant himself. By this declaration he showed himself victorious over the tyrant after avenging his sister's chastity. Admonished by his courage, the city expelled Hippias from the kingdom and drove him into exile.

Helinand says that the conspicuous splendor of the life of Polycrates, tyrant of the Samians, advanced even to envy because of his exceedingly abundant goods--and not without reason. Every undertaking of his was received on a smooth course, and hope grasped the fruit of the thing he desired. He changed countenance only once because of the obstacle of one brief sadness.

He deliberately cast a ring especially dear to him into deep water so that he would not be entirely free of every misfortune. Nevertheless, he immediately recovered it when a fish that had swallowed it was caught.

Yet this man, whose prosperity had always held its favorable course with full sails, was fastened to a cross by Orontes, prefect of King Darius, upon the loftiest summit of Mount Mycale. From there Samos, which had long been oppressed by bitter servitude, beheld with free and joyful eyes his rotting limbs and members dripping with putrid blood.

In the sixth year of this Cambyses, according to Eusebius in the Chronicle, the twenty-eighth dynasty, by which the Persians had obtained Egypt, came to an end. Thus the kingdom of that region ceased for a time. Cambyses and his successors held Egypt until Darius son of Xerxes, for 111 years. This Cambyses built a Babylon in Egypt.

§ VII. Pythagoras

In the eighth year of Cambyses, the philosopher Pythagoras was held in renown, according to Eusebius in the Chronicle. Augustine says of him in The City of God: The Italic school of philosophers in that part of Italy once called Magna Graecia had Pythagoras of Samos as its founder. From him, they say, the very name of philosophy arose.

For previously those who seemed to surpass others in a certain praiseworthy manner of life were called sages. When Pythagoras was asked what he professed to be, he answered that he was a philosopher, that is, one zealous for or a lover of wisdom, because he judged it exceedingly arrogant to profess himself a sage.

Justin says of him: Pythagoras of Samos, born to Demaratus, a wealthy merchant, was formed by great advances in wisdom. He was far richer than his father in that the merchant father could not acquire as many things as the son preferred to despise rather than possess.

He first went to Egypt and then to Babylon to learn the movements of the stars and observe the origin of the world, and he attained the highest knowledge. Returning from there, he went to Crete and Lacedaemon to learn the laws of Minos, that is, Lycurgus.

Instructed in all these things, he came to Croton and, by his authority, recalled the people, who had fallen into luxury, to the practice of frugality. Every day he praised virtue and enumerated the vices of luxury and the downfall of cities destroyed by this plague. He stirred the multitude to such zeal for learning frugality that it seemed incredible that any of them had ever lived luxuriously.

He frequently taught matrons separately from their husbands and children separately from their parents. He taught the women chastity and obedience to their husbands and the children modesty and the study of letters. Amid all this he instilled frugality into everyone as the mother of the virtues.

After continuing his disputations assiduously, he urged the matrons to lay aside their gilded garments and the other ornaments of their rank as instruments of luxury, carry them all to Juno's temple, and consecrate them to the goddess herself, asserting that chastity, not clothing, is the true ornament of matrons.

After he had spent twenty years at Croton, he moved to Metapontum and died there. So great was their admiration for him that they made a temple from his house and worshiped him as a god.

Valerius says of him in book 5: Pythagoras's hearers accorded him such reverence that they considered it impious to draw into dispute the things they had received from him. Indeed, when pressed to give a reason, they answered only this: "Pythagoras said it."

Seeking Egypt, he learned their sciences; then, going to the Persians, he learned the art of magic.

Tully says of him that, when Pythagoras heard a young man of Tauromenium, burning with lust, raging at the door of his courtesan friend, he ordered three lyres to play in the spondaic mode and thus recalled him to a sound mind.

Jerome says in Against Jovinian that Pythagoras's virgin daughter presided over a choir of virgins and instructed them in teachings of chastity.

The same Jerome says upon Ecclesiastes: The discipline of the Pythagoreans is to remain silent for five years and afterward to speak when learned. It is useless frequently to see that by which you have been captured and to entrust yourself to the experience of things that you can scarcely do without. Hence the Pythagoreans, avoiding frequent encounters of this kind, lived in solitude and deserted places.

He also says, rightly, that philosophy is a meditation upon death, striving every day to lead the soul from the prison of the body into freedom.

According to Vincent in the Historical Mirror, Pythagoras was the first among the Greeks to discover that souls are immortal and pass from some bodies into others. Hence he says that he was first Euphorbus, second Talides, third Hermonius, fourth Pyrrhus, and finally Pythagoras; and that, after certain cycles of time, the things that had existed came to be again, that nothing new came to be in the world, and that learning was recollection.

In these things he erred greatly, for they are contrary to the Catholic faith. From them is perceived how true is Solomon's statement in the Book of Wisdom: "Vain are all human beings in whom knowledge of God is not found," a true judgment concerning all things to be believed and done.

§ VIII. The Two Magi after Cambyses

After Cambyses, two of the seven Magi--that is, wise men--who governed the Persian kingdom in the following way obtained it.

When Cambyses saw in a dream his brother named Mergus, as though about to reign, seated upon a golden throne, he awoke terrified and had him killed. To accomplish this, he chose one of the seven Magi as his agent. After the crime was committed, Cambyses repented, cried out that he was a fratricide, and pierced himself with the same sword with which he had killed his brother.

After Cambyses died, as the Scholastic History relates, this Magus married Panthea, the daughter of Cambyses, and assumed the kingdom. He pretended that he did not wish to reign himself, but to preserve the kingdom for Mergus, Cambyses's brother, because Mergus--whom he knew to have been killed--was still a boy and supposedly alive. This Magus was called Erineides.

When he died after seven months of his reign, he substituted for himself his brother, a young man distinguished in beauty and strength, saying that this man was Mergus, son of Cyrus and brother of Cambyses. He was indeed very like Mergus, and among the Persians the king's person is concealed under the appearance of majesty so that he is rarely seen.

But one of the Seven Magi, suspecting that he was not Mergus, asked his daughter, who was one of the king's concubines, whether he was Cyrus's son or the brother of Erineides. When she said that she did not know, he taught her a way to discover it: while she slept with him at night, she was to draw his head into her lap and examine whether he had ears.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

For that Magus, the girl's father, knew that the brother of Erineides--whom he suspected this man to be--had no ears, because Cambyses, while still living, had caused them to be cut off for a certain reason. The daughter carried out the test and informed her father that the man had no ears. He then formed a conspiracy with the other Magi, and they killed the impostor. Thus those two brothers, the Magi, did not reign among the Persians for a full year.

Valerius relates in book 2 that the Persians do not look upon their children before they have completed seven years, so that they may bear the loss of little children with an undisturbed spirit.

After the Magi were killed, says Justin in book 1, the princes gained great glory for recovering the kingdom, but still greater glory because, when they disputed about the kingship, they could not agree among themselves. They were so equal in courage and nobility that their equality made the people's choice among them difficult.

They therefore found a way to entrust judgment concerning themselves to religion and fortune. They agreed among themselves that, on the appointed day, all would lead their horses before the royal palace at first light. The man whose horse first gave a neigh before sunrise would be king. For the Persians believe the sun to be the one God and say that horses are consecrated to that god.

Among the conspirators was Darius son of Hystaspes. When he was anxious about the kingship, the keeper of his horse said that, if victory depended upon this matter, there was no difficulty. The groom arranged during the night for Darius's horse to mate with a mare in the place where they were to gather, thinking that the result would follow from the pleasure of intercourse, as indeed happened.

The next day, when everyone had assembled at the appointed time and place, Darius's horse recognized the place and immediately neighed from desire for the mare. While the other horses remained sluggish, it was the first to send forth the fortunate omen for its master.

The others showed such moderation that, when they heard the omen, they immediately dismounted from their horses and saluted Darius as king. The kinship of Darius was then joined to the former kings, for at the very beginning of his reign he took Cyrus's daughter in marriage.

§ IX. Darius Son of Hystaspes

Therefore, after the two Magi, Darius son of Hystaspes, one of the Seven Magi and the fourth ruler from Cyrus, received the monarchy of the Persians, according to Vincent in the Historical Mirror. This was the sixty-ninth year of the Fifth Age and the year 3442 of the world according to our translation, but the year 4679 according to the Septuagint and Bede. He reigned thirty-six years.

Zerubbabel son of Salathiel, of the lineage of Joachim and the tribe of Judah, was a familiar companion of this Darius. When Cambyses had forbidden the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem, Zerubbabel went to him and, through Darius's intervention, attempted to change the king's mind, but he could not.

Zerubbabel then secretly persuaded Darius to vow to the God of Israel that, if He made him king, Darius would restore that temple and send back to Jerusalem all the vessels of the Lord's house still kept by the kings of the Persians. Darius made this vow. Hence, when Zerubbabel heard that Darius had received the kingdom, he approached him confidently to obtain this thing.

The prophets of the Lord, Zechariah and Haggai, exhorted the people to rebuild the temple. The Persian rulers who were their neighbors prohibited them, yet they did not on that account abandon the work. They informed Darius of this so that his will in the matter would be made known to them. Zerubbabel went to Darius with the said messengers and was received honorably by him.

Darius held a great banquet for all the rulers of the provinces. A question was raised, or a problem proposed, among three of Darius's chamber servants who guarded his body, one of whom was Zerubbabel: what thing was stronger than all others?

The first said wine; the second, the king; and the third, who was Zerubbabel, said a woman, but added that truth was still stronger than all things. Darius promised great rewards to the one who solved the question most perfectly.

The problem was therefore discussed before Darius and the sages, with each man assigning a reason for his statement. By the judgment of everyone, what Zerubbabel had said was determined to be true: truth is stronger than all things and remains forever, as is fully contained in 2 Ezra.

When Darius then offered to grant whatever Zerubbabel asked of him, Zerubbabel requested the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem and the return of its vessels. King Darius, remembering that he had vowed this, willingly agreed.

He entrusted the temple vessels to Zerubbabel and sent through him letters ordering the rulers of the nations neighboring Judea--who had obtained from Cambyses the prohibition against continuing the building already begun--not to impede it any further, but to assist it at the king's expense. He decreed that whoever acted against this edict should have timber taken from his house upon which he would be hanged, and that his goods should be confiscated.

Thus, in the second year of Darius Hystaspes, work on the Lord's temple was resumed, and in the seventh year of the same king's reign it was completed. From the first permission given by Cyrus, when the work was begun, until the seventh year of Darius, forty-six years elapsed, as is evident from the things said above.

According to this interrupted construction of the temple, they said to Christ: "This temple was built in forty-six years, and will You--" and so forth. In the twelfth month they dedicated it and afterward celebrated Passover at the proper time.

What happened to the Ark of the Covenant is uncertain. It is nevertheless believed that the Hebrews made another in the likeness of the former one. For among the spoils that the Romans carried away from Judea were an ark, a table, and a lampstand.

§ X. Democritus, Heraclitus, Anaxagoras, and Aeschylus

At this time the philosophers Democritus, Heraclitus the Obscure, and Anaxagoras, and Aeschylus, the writer of tragedies, were held in renown, as Eusebius says in the Chronicle.

Aulus Gellius relates in the Attic Nights that Democritus was exceedingly rich but, leaving his entire patrimony to his fellow citizens, went to Athens and there tore out his own eyes so that he might have more vigorous thoughts.

Liberius, however, says that he did this so that he would not see that things were going well for wicked citizens. Tertullian assigns another cause: he could not look upon women without concupiscence.

He deservedly tore out his eyes, moreover, because he brought the darkness of magic upon human eyes. Isidore says that Democritus enlarged the art of magic many centuries after Zoroaster, when Hippocrates's discipline of medicine flourished.

According to Augustine, Heraclitus said that all gods consist of fire, just as Pythagoras said they consist of numbers and Epicurus of atoms. As Macrobius reports, Heraclitus said that the soul is a spark of stellar essence.

Macrobius testifies that there were two men named Heraclitus: one was called the natural philosopher and surnamed Heraclitus the Obscure, while the other was the Pontic Heraclitus, who said that the soul is light.

§ XI. Anaxagoras

Anaxagoras was a pupil of Anaximenes. According to Augustine in The City of God, he held that the divine mind was the maker of all the things we see. He said that they were made from infinite matter composed of particles of all things similar to one another, each individual thing coming from its own proper particles, but with the divine mind as their maker.

It may deservedly be said of these men: They did not know divine things or understand the human things that ought to be done, and therefore they dwell in the darkness of hell, although they did or said some good things.

This Anaxagoras said that the human being is the measure of all things. As Valerius says in book 8, after a long journey undertaken in the pursuit of wisdom, he returned to his homeland. When he saw his estates deserted, he said: "I would not have been saved unless those things had perished."

When he heard of his son's death, he answered the man who announced it: "You tell me nothing new, for I knew that the one born from me was mortal." If anyone effectively receives this statement in his mind, says Valerius, he will understand that children are to be begotten while remembering that they will die. Just as no one dies who has not lived, so no one can live who is not going to die.

Boethius says that poison was given to Anaxagoras as to a man guilty of death because he said that the sun was not a god but a burning stone, whereas the Athenians worshiped the sun as a god.

Augustine, however, says in book 18 of The City of God: "I wonder why Anaxagoras was made guilty of death at Athens because he said that the sun was a burning stone, plainly denying that the sun was a god, when in the same city Epicurus flourished in glory and lived securely. Epicurus not only did not believe the sun or any star to be a god, but contended that neither Jupiter nor any of the gods at all dwelt in the world so as to be reached by human prayers and supplications."

As Augustine says, Anaxagoras had Archelaus as his successor, who was Socrates's teacher. Archelaus thought all things were composed of particles similar to one another, from which each individual thing was made, in such a way that mind was also within them. This mind did all things by joining and dispersing the eternal bodies, that is, those particles.

Aeschylus, the writer of tragedies, was once in Sicily outdoors with his bald head uncovered. An eagle flying above with a tortoise thought that head was a stone suited for breaking the tortoise and dashed it upon him so that, when the hardness had been broken, it could eat the flesh inside. By that wound the founder of the more powerful tragedy was killed, says Valerius.

§ XII. Darius's War against the Scythians and the Battle of Marathon

In the nineteenth year of Darius Hystaspes, as Justin relates in book 2, King Darius of the Persians made war upon Iancitus, king of the Scythians, after he had sought but not obtained marriage to his daughter.

He entered Scythia with 700,000 armed men. The Scythians did not offer him an opportunity for battle. Fearing that the bridge over the Ister might be broken and his return cut off, he fled back in alarm after losing 800,000 men. Because his multitude was so abundant, the loss was not counted among his disasters.

He then subdued Asia and Macedonia and defeated the Ionians in a naval battle. When he learned that the Athenians had assisted the Ionians against him, he directed the entire force of the war against them.

Hearing this, the Athenians sought help from the Lacedaemonians. In the meantime, when they saw that the Persians were being held by a four-day religious observance, they seized the opportunity. Without waiting for the Lacedaemonians, they drew up ten thousand citizens and one thousand assisting auxiliaries and went out to battle against 600,000 enemies on the plains of Marathon.

Miltiades was the commander of the war and the advocate of not waiting for the assistance. He displayed such confidence that he placed greater protection in speed than in allies. So great was the eagerness of those going into battle that, when there were a thousand paces between the two lines, they reached the enemy at a rapid run before the discharge of arrows.

The outcome did not fail their daring. They fought with such valor that one would have thought there were men on one side and beasts on the other.

The defeated Persians fled to their ships, many of which were sunk and many captured. In that battle the glory of the young Themistocles and of the Athenian soldier Cynaegirus shone forth.

After countless slaughters in the battle, Cynaegirus drove the fleeing enemies to their ships and held a laden vessel with his right hand, not releasing it until he lost that hand. When it was lost, he also held the ship with his left. When he had lost that hand too, he finally held the vessel with his teeth. Thus, neither wearied by the slaughter nor conquered by the loss of both hands, he fought to the end with his mutilated limbs like a rabid beast. Two hundred thousand Persians died in that battle apart from those lost by shipwreck.

In the twenty-ninth year of Darius, Aristides was expelled in disgrace from his city, according to Eusebius in the Chronicle. Vincent adds in the Historical Mirror that he is read to have been expelled because he was just beyond measure.

§ XIII. The Death of Darius and the Accession of Xerxes

Darius at length died, leaving many sons begotten both before and during his reign. Of these, Artamenes, the eldest, claimed the kingdom for himself by the privilege of age, while Xerxes claimed it by the good fortune of his birth. For Artamenes had been born to Darius when Darius was a private man, but Xerxes when he was already king.

Xerxes therefore said that the patrimony Darius possessed when still a private man was owed by right to the brothers born before the reign, but the kingdom was owed to him. At length, by harmonious agreement, they chose their uncle Ariophernes as judge.

The brothers' contest was so fraternal that neither the victor exulted nor the defeated man grieved. Even during the lawsuit they sent one another gifts and enjoyed among themselves not only pleasant consolations but also trusting banquets. The judgment itself was conducted without arbiters or witnesses. With as much greater moderation did brothers then divide the greatest kingdoms among themselves as men now divide very small patrimonies. Thus Justin in book 2.

Xerxes son of Darius, therefore, the fifth king of the Persians, began to reign in the 116th year of the Fifth Age and the year 3489 of the world according to the shorter computation. He reigned twenty years.

As Valerius says in book 9, Xerxes was so luxurious that by an edict he offered a reward to anyone who invented a new kind of pleasure.

Valerius says of him in book 1 that, while Xerxes was considering a plan to invade Lacedaemon, wine poured into a cup was changed into blood not once but twice. He was thereby warned to desist from the undertaking.

The same author says in book 9 that, when Xerxes was about to bring war upon Greece and had summoned the princes of Asia, he said: "Lest I seem to have used only my own counsel, I have gathered you. But remember that it is more your duty to obey than to advise."

Seneca says in book 6 of On Benefits: When Xerxes declared war upon Greece, there was no one who did not urge on his swollen spirit, forgetful of how much it trusted in transitory things. While many uncertain assertions were being cast about, Demaratus the Lacedaemonian alone said that the very multitude in which Xerxes delighted--disordered and burdensome--was to be feared by its commander. It had not strength but weight. Nothing immense can ever be governed, and that which cannot be governed does not endure long.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

Orosius says: Xerxes had 700,000 armed men from his kingdom and 300,000 auxiliaries, 1,200 beaked warships, and 3,000 transport ships.

Against so great an army, Leonidas, king of the Spartans, stood with only 4,000 armed men in the narrow pass of Thermopylae. For three continuous days there was not a battle between two peoples but the slaughter of one.

On the fourth day, when Leonidas saw the enemy surrounding him on every side, he urged his allies to preserve themselves for better times. With only 600 men, he broke into the camp of 600,000. The Persians themselves assisted the Spartans through their mutual slaughter, and the battle, with the Persians killing one another, was drawn out from the beginning of the night until the greater part of the day. At last the Spartans, weary from conquering, fell dead among the dead.

That most renowned commander of the Lacedaemonians, Leonidas, had first uttered to his men these celebrated words of encouragement: "Eat breakfast as though you are to dine in the lower regions."

Justin says in book 2 that Xerxes meanwhile sent 4,000 armed men to Delphi to despoil the temple, but all were destroyed by rains and thunderbolts. At the beginning of the war, moreover, when the Spartans consulted Delphic Apollo, the response had been that either the king of the Spartans or the city must fall.

Xerxes, having received two wounds in battle, determined to attempt a naval contest. As Xerxes approached and the Athenians consulted the Delphic oracle, the response was that they should at least defend themselves with wooden walls. Themistocles, commander of the ships, interpreted this as protection by a fleet and persuaded the Athenians and the allied cities to build ships.

When the plan was approved, they abandoned the city and entrusted their wives, children, and most precious possessions to nearby islands. Xerxes therefore burned Thespieae, Plataea, and Athens after they had been emptied of people. Because he could not rage against human beings with the sword, he raged against buildings with fire.

When the naval battle was joined, Xerxes remained on the shore as a spectator. Artemisia, queen of Halicarnassus, who had come to assist Xerxes, fought most fiercely among the foremost commanders.

Because the battle remained doubtful, the Ionians, according to Themistocles's instruction, began gradually to withdraw themselves from the contest. Their defection also broke the spirits of the others and persuaded the Persians, who had long been looking around for a means of flight, to flee openly. During that flight many ships were sunk and many captured, while still more men, fearing the king's savagery, slipped away to their homes.

Mardonius approached the king, who was anxious from so many disasters, and persuaded him to return to his kingdom before the adverse report stirred rebellion at home. If the remaining forces were entrusted to Mardonius, he would take vengeance upon the enemy and drive away the domestic disgrace; but if adverse fortune persisted, he would yield to the enemy without disgrace to the king.

The plan was approved, and the army was entrusted to Mardonius. The king, eager to return, went to the place where he had constructed a bridge from ships as though he were conqueror of the sea. Finding it broken apart by winter storms, he crossed anxiously to his kingdom in a fishing boat.

Such was the flight of the king whose arrival had been so terrifying. His flight had been beautifully signified by the monstrous offspring of a mare in his army, which had given birth to a fox.

According to Orosius, the ground forces entrusted to the commanders wasted away from labor, hunger, and fear. As disease became more severe, such pestilence and such foulness arose among the dying that the roads were filled with corpses. Hence dreadful birds and shameless beasts, enticed by food, followed the dying army.

§ XIV. Themistocles

When the war had ended and the city deliberated about the prize, says Justin in book 2, valor was preferred above everything else by the judgment of all the Athenians. Among the commanders, Themistocles also was judged chief by the testimony of the cities and increased the glory of his homeland.

Yet the youth of this Themistocles was initially subject to so many vices that his father disowned him and his mother ended her life by hanging because of him.

This is the Themistocles whom a certain man consulted concerning his daughter, asking whether he should give her as wife to a poor but honorable man or to a rich man of little probity. Themistocles answered: "I prefer a man who lacks money to money that lacks a man."

When he was going to the theater and was asked whose voice would be most pleasing for him to hear, he answered: "The voice of the one by whom my achievements are sung best." From this, according to Vincent's History, it is understood that he was exceedingly desirous of glory.

At length Themistocles, while in exile, was received by Xerxes, king of the Persians. When he saw Xerxes bringing war upon the Athenians, he died at Magnesia after drinking bull's blood, lest he either abandon one who had treated him well or attack his own homeland.

Tully likewise says of him in the book On Friendship: "Who in Greece was more renowned than Themistocles? Who more powerful? As commander in the Persian War he freed Greece from slavery. Because of this he was driven into exile in India [read: through envy], and he did not endure the injury of his ungrateful homeland as he ought. Rather, he did what Coriolanus had done among us twenty years earlier: no one was joined to these men as a helper against the fatherland. Thus each brought death upon himself."

These men are praised by the pagans but condemned by Catholics, as is evident in cause 23, question 5, If It Is Not Permitted.

§ XV. Pindar, Sophocles, and Euripides

In these times Pindar, Sophocles, and Euripides were renowned, according to Eusebius in the Chronicle.

Pindar was called away from a banquet by Castor and Pollux while the other guests watched. As soon as he had left, the dining room collapsed upon those who remained. According to Valerius, when he had placed his head in a gymnasium upon the lap of a boy in whom he took singular delight and given himself to rest, he met a peaceful end.

Sophocles composed tragedies into extreme old age, as Valerius testifies. When someone asked the aged man whether he still engaged in sexual matters, he answered: "Speak of better things, for I have gladly fled from them as from some furious master."

When Sophocles, already an old man, had submitted a tragedy to a contest and waited anxiously for the judgment of the uncertain competition, he heard that he had won by a single vote and expired from excessive joy.

Boethius says in the book On Consolation: "I approve the saying of Euripides, who called the man free from the misfortune of lust happy."

When Euripides was returning home from the supper of King Archelaus, he was torn apart by dogs. "A cruelty of fate undeserved by so great a talent," says Valerius. King Archelaus loved Euripides so much that he entrusted him with the highest place in his counsels. When he heard of his death, he cut off his hair, although Seneca says that he did this from fear of a sudden eclipse of the sun.

At that time Herodotus, the writer of histories, was known. In Rome, Symia, a Vestal virgin, was discovered in sexual misconduct and buried alive, as Eusebius says in the Chronicle.

Justin says in book 3: Xerxes, formerly the terror of nations, began to be despised even by his own people after conducting the war in Greece unsuccessfully. As the king's majesty diminished daily, Artabanus, his prefect, was led to hope for the kingdom.

In the evening Artabanus entered the king's palace with his seven very strong sons. It always stood open to him by right of friendship. After killing the king, he treacherously approached his sons. He told the young Artaxerxes that the king had been killed by his brother Darius, and thus impelled him to kill his innocent brother. Darius was found asleep and killed as though he were pretending to sleep.

When Artabanus saw that Artaxerxes alone survived among the king's sons and feared a contest with the princes over the kingdom, he took Bacabacus into partnership in his counsel. Bacabacus, content with the present state, revealed to Artaxerxes how his father and brother had been killed.

Learning this and fearing the number of Artabanus's sons, Artaxerxes ordered the army to be prepared for the next day, as though he intended to inspect both the number of the soldiers and each one's skill in arms.

When Artabanus himself stood armed among the others, the king pretended that he had a cuirass that was too short and ordered Artabanus to exchange with him. As Artabanus took off his armor and stood exposed, Artaxerxes pierced him with a sword and ordered his sons seized. Thus the excellent young man both avenged his father's murder and freed himself from the plot.

This Artabanus, the sixth king of the Persians, reigned seven months.

§ XVI. Artaxerxes Longimanus

He was succeeded by the seventh king, Artaxerxes, who was surnamed Longimanus. In his time Pericles and Sophocles, the writer of tragedies, were chosen at Athens as commanders against the Thebans and Lacedaemonians.

When the Lacedaemonians devastated the lands of the Athenians, they left Pericles's fields untouched, hoping either to win him for themselves or to expose him to danger from envy or to disgrace from suspicion of betrayal. Pericles foresaw this and had predicted to the people that it would occur. To avoid the force of envy, he gave those fields as a gift to the republic. Thus Justin.

Pericles, instructed with the greatest zeal under his teacher Anaxagoras, governed Athens and turned it according to his own judgment, as Valerius says in book 8. Even when he spoke against the people's will, his voice was nevertheless pleasing and popular. What difference was there between Pisistratus and Pericles except that the former exercised tyranny armed and the latter without arms?

As Tully says in On Duties, when Pericles and Sophocles sat down together to discuss public consultations and a beautiful young man happened to pass, Sophocles said: "O Pericles, look at the beautiful boy." Pericles answered: "A magistrate ought to keep not only his hands and tongue under restraint, but also his eyes."

At that time, says the Chronicler in the Scholastic History, Socrates was born, and a stone having the form of a goat fell from heaven into the Aegean Sea.

§ XVII. Ezra

At that same time Ezra the Aaronite restored the law burned by the Chaldeans. He also devised new letter forms that were easier to write and pronounce, and for this reason he was called a swift scribe. He added certain things of his own, such as the titles of the Psalms and many things read in the Pentateuch.

Some also hand down that he taught the Hebrews the manner of writing from right to left, whereas they had previously written in the manner of those plowing. Hence writing is customarily called exaratio, "plowing." For they wrote from the left edge toward the right and then from the right toward the left.

Ezra found favor in the eyes of Artaxerxes and asked permission from him to return to Jerusalem so that he might instruct the people in the Lord's law, which he had restored. The king gave him permission, together with letters to the rulers neighboring Judea and the guardians of the public treasury so that they would deliver the necessities to him.

He freed the ministers of the temple from every toll, tribute, and provision. He also gave Ezra power to advance and appoint judges and governors beyond the river and to punish the disobedient.

Seventeen hundred people ascended with him. When they came to Jerusalem, they offered sacrifices in the Lord's house. Ezra then adjured the priests to send away the foreign wives they had married and the children born from them, which they did.

At that time, according to Eusebius in the Chronicle, the philosophers Empedocles and Parmenides were also renowned.

Boethius testifies in the prologue to On the Art of Music that, when a certain furious man attacked the host of Empedocles with a sword because the host had condemned the attacker's father by an accusation, Empedocles is said to have altered the musical mode and thereby calmed the young man's anger.

Aristotle says of him in book 2 of the Metaphysics: Empedocles imagined that strife is the cause and principle of corruption. He thought that it generates all these things except one, and that all things except God were made by it. He imagined that from strife comes the generation of all things that have been, are, or will be. If strife did not exist in things, all would be one; but because strife exists in things, it disperses them and does not allow them to rest. He also imagined that friendship is the cause through which all things are one.

When someone asked Empedocles why he lived, he answered: "That I may look upon the stars. Take away the heavens and I shall be nothing." As Lactantius relates, he gave himself to the flames, inflicting death upon himself because he thought souls were eternal. Macrobius, however, says that he claimed the soul was blood. In this opinion, which is most false, he was a heretic.

Concerning Parmenides, Vincent says in the Historical Mirror that he is read to have discovered logic upon a rock of the Caucasus.

At that time Zeno and Heraclitus the Obscure were also known. Anaxagoras died. Aristarchus the tragedian was renowned. Cratinus and Plautus, writers of comedies, and Crates the comic poet and Bacchylides the lyric poet also flourished. But because none of these possessed wisdom and the knowledge of the saints, they perished through their foolishness.

§ XVIII. Nehemiah

In the twentieth year of this Artaxerxes, Nehemiah, one of the children of the Jewish captivity, was the king's cupbearer. While he was in the fortress of Susa, he heard travelers speaking Hebrew, as is said in the Scholastic History. He approached and asked them about the condition of Judea and Jerusalem. When he heard that the city was without walls and that the people in it were afflicted--for by day they sustained the attacks of enemies, while at night brigands entered and filled the streets with the corpses of the slain--Nehemiah wept and remained very sorrowful.

When the king perceived this, he asked the cause of his sorrow. He gave Nehemiah permission to go, appointing a time for his return, and granted him royal letters so that he might be held in honor by everyone and supplied with the expenses for rebuilding the city. Hence, passing through Babylon, he led back with him many of the children of the captivity. When they arrived, they completed the work--namely, the rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls--within two years and four months, despite many impediments.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

They also made gates. For neighboring nations attacked them with a strong hand. But Nehemiah stationed half of the people under arms outside the city to withstand the assaults of those attacking, while the other half built, placing stones with one hand and holding a sword with the other.

After this a second impediment arose. For when famine arose in the land, the people bound themselves under usury and were compelled by hunger to sell their fields, vineyards, beasts of burden, and finally their children. Afterward Nehemiah caused the rich to remit the interest and debts and to free the children from servitude.

The third impediment was that the princes beyond the river, who envied him and the work, corrupted certain elders of the Jews with gifts so that they might betray him to death. When he guarded against this, they devised other ways of hindering him. Sometimes they falsely said that he would be accused before the king because he wished to become king there; at other times they feigned friendship. Resisting all these things, he completed the work, erecting six gates by their names, as the same Comestor says, and each man building his own portion of the walls throughout.

Nehemiah commanded that the gates be closed before sunset and not opened in the morning before the sun grew warm. All these things occurred figuratively, so that one might possess knowledge for rebuilding the soul, which has been broken down by sin in the walls of the virtues.

When the seventh month, that is, September, arrived and everyone assembled in Jerusalem to offer sacrifice, they heard from the elders that during the captivity Jeremiah had hidden the pieces of wood and embers of the altar in a well beneath the earth in the Valley of Josaphat. They sent men to the place. Finding the wood and thick water in the well, they brought them back. When this water was poured upon the pile of wood and the sacrifices were placed upon the altar, fire burst forth and consumed the sacrifices.

That fire endured, nourished with wood laid upon it, until the time of the Maccabees, when the high priesthood was sold to Jason. It was then extinguished, to make known the excess of the vice of simony, as Augustine says in cause 1, question 1, Sicut.

Ezra, having brought forward the book of the law, stood upon a raised platform and read from morning until noon. The Levites kept silence among the people so that he might be heard well by everyone. They assembled eight times each day to hear the law: four times by day and four by night.

Because the city was almost empty of inhabitants, Nehemiah asked the leading men to dwell there. He also cast lots among the remaining multitude and determined that one in every ten should dwell there. When these things had been completed, Nehemiah returned to King Artaxerxes, and Ezra died in a good old age.

Some say that this Ezra was the prophet Malachi. Others assert that Malachi was another man, born in Judea after the return from captivity.

Besides the two books of Ezra regarded as authentic in both our canon and that of the Hebrews, three other books bearing his name are held to be apocryphal. Therefore, although the things placed in them may be good and prophetic, I omit them. Vincent nevertheless relates many things from them in book 4, chapter 49, of the Historical Mirror.

§ XIX. Hippocrates and Gorgias

In the thirty-fifth year of Artaxerxes, Hippocrates the physician and Gorgias the rhetorician were renowned.

Jerome says in the Hebrew Questions on Genesis that it is found written in the books of Hippocrates that a certain woman would have been punished on suspicion of adultery because she had borne a very beautiful son unlike either parent, had the aforesaid physician not resolved the question by advising them to ask whether perhaps such a picture was in the bedchamber. When it was found, the woman was freed from suspicion.

Vincent says in the Historical Mirror that this Gorgias mentioned above is not the Gorgias Epitota of whom Valerius relates in book 1 that, while his dead mother was being carried on a bier to the tomb, he fell from her womb and by an unexpected cry compelled the bearers to stop. Rather, he is Gorgias of Leontini, of whom the same author relates in book 7 that he was the wisest man of his time. In a public notice he proposed that he would answer every question. Hence even his ashes obtained the same honor as the Delphic oracle.

Tully also relates of him in On Old Age that he was Socrates's teacher, that he completed 107 years, and that he never ceased from his study. When he was asked why he wished to remain in life so long, he said, "Because I have nothing for which to accuse old age."

Jerome says concerning him: "Gorgias the rhetorician recited at Olympia a most beautiful book on concord to the disagreeing Greeks." His enemy Melanthius said to him: "This man teaches us about concord, though he could not bring three persons in one house--namely, his wife, himself, and his maidservant--into harmony." His wife was jealous of the maidservant's beauty and harassed her most chaste husband with daily quarrels.

§ XX. Socrates

In the fortieth year of Artaxerxes, Socrates was celebrated in much discourse. As Augustine says in book 8 of The City of God, he is reported to have been a disciple of Archelaus. He is remembered as the first to have directed all philosophy toward correcting and regulating conduct, whereas before him all philosophers had devoted their greatest effort more to the investigation of physical and natural matters.

"It does not seem to me that one can clearly determine whether Socrates did this because weariness with obscure and uncertain things directed his mind toward finding something manifest and certain which was necessary for the blessed life--the one cause for whose sake the industry of all philosophers appears to have kept watch and labored--or whether, as some more favorably suspect concerning him, he did not wish minds unclean with earthly desires to extend themselves toward divine things and attempt them.

"For he saw that they were investigating the causes of things, which he believed to be first and highest only in the will of the one true and supreme God. Hence he thought that they could not be comprehended except by a purified mind. He therefore judged that insistence must be placed upon purifying life through good morals, so that the soul, relieved of oppressive lusts, might raise itself by its natural vigor toward eternal things and might behold with purity of understanding the nature of incorporeal and immutable light, where the causes of all created natures live immovably.

"It is nevertheless agreed that, whether by his confessed ignorance or by knowledge concealed, he agitated and turned about with marvelous charm of discourse and most acute wit the foolishness of the ignorant who thought themselves to know something, even in those moral questions upon which his whole mind appeared to be intent. Hence, enemies having been stirred up, he was condemned on a slanderous charge and punished with death.

"In the debate over moral questions, however, the supreme good is discussed, without which a human being cannot be blessed. For the end of the good is that by which, when anyone has attained it, he is blessed. Because Socrates's disputations stir up and demolish almost everything, and because it did not clearly appear what pleased him, Socrates's successors took from them whatever pleased each. Aristippus said that pleasure was the supreme good; Antisthenes, virtue." Thus Augustine.

Hugh of Saint Victor also says of him: "Socrates was the inventor of ethics, concerning which he wrote twenty-four books according to positive justice."

Jerome likewise says in book 1 Against Jovinian: Socrates had two wives, Xanthippe and Myrto, the granddaughter of Aristides. When they frequently quarreled with each other, he was accustomed to laugh at them because they contended over him, a most ugly man with snub nostrils, a bald forehead, hairy shoulders, and bowed legs. At last they turned their assault upon him and long pursued him as he fled after beating him severely.

On one occasion, after he had withstood Xanthippe as she hurled endless abuse from a higher place, he was drenched with filthy water. Wiping his head, he answered nothing more than: "I knew that rain would follow thunder."

When Alcibiades asked him why he did not cast away so bitter a woman as Xanthippe, he answered: "While I endure her at home, I become accustomed and trained to bear more easily the pestilence and injury of others outside." He said that he knew nothing except this very thing: that he knew nothing. Thus Vincent in the Historical Mirror.

Seneca says of him that when Prince Archelaus invited him to come to him so that he might honor him, Socrates is reported to have answered that he did not wish to receive benefits from a man to whom he could not return equal ones.

John Cassian says in the book of Conferences: A certain physiognomist, looking at Socrates, said, "Your eyes are the eyes of a corrupter of boys." When the disciples rushed upon him and wished to punish the insult inflicted upon their teacher, Socrates restrained them with this saying: "Be still, companions, be still; for I am what he asserts. But I restrain myself."

Aulus Gellius says of the same man in book 1: Socrates is said to have been accustomed to stand in a fixed posture throughout both day and night, from the first rising of the light until the next sunrise, abstaining from food, motionless in the same footprints, with his face and eyes directed toward the same place, absorbed in thought as though he had made a certain withdrawal of mind and soul from the body.

It is also handed down that his temperance was so great that through almost every period of his life he lived with unimpaired health. Socrates likewise said that many people wished to live so that they might eat and drink, but that he ate and drank so that he might live.

Tertullian says concerning him: "A demon is said to have adhered to Socrates from boyhood. Philosophers regard demons as gods. Socrates's expression is, 'If the demon permits.' Even when he perceived something of the truth by denying the gods, at the very end he ordered a rooster for Aesculapius as a thank-offering. I believe this was in honor of Aesculapius's father, because Apollo proclaimed Socrates the wisest of all. O thoughtless testimony to wisdom by Apollo! He rendered it to a man who denied that the gods existed."

Jerome says: "We cannot always keep the same countenance, a thing concerning which the philosophers falsely glory in Socrates. How much more, just as the faces of human beings are many and varied, so too are their hearts diverse."

Seneca says to Lucilius: "Socrates used to say, 'Whoever wishes will do injury and insult to you; nevertheless, you will suffer nothing, if only virtue is with you.'" When a certain man asked why a change of places had not helped him cast off his vices, Socrates said: "Why do you wonder that travel has not helped you, when you carry yourself around?"

Vincent gives the following as his praiseworthy sayings in the Historical Mirror:

"It is better to beware than to be afraid.

"He who has power over many things ought first to purify his conscience, so that the one who corrects offenses does not commit them.

"It is foolish for someone to wish to command when he cannot command himself.

"Conduct another's business so that you do not forget your own.

"Benefit a friend in such a way that you do not harm yourself.

"Use what you have in such a way that you do not need what belongs to another.

"Take up a burden through your own labor rather than another's.

"One ought to observe moderation in acquiring and guarding money.

"Swift counsel is followed by repentance.

"The things most contrary to counsel are haste and anger.

"With friends one ought to have brief speeches and long friendships.

"He denies himself who seeks what is difficult.

"Do not make another's misfortune your joy.

"Speaking well is the beginning of friendship; speaking evil, the beginning of enmities.

"A friend is rarely acquired, quickly lost, and much more shamefully condemned.

"Impose upon no one what you yourself cannot endure.

"It is by no means fitting to praise someone in his presence.

"Let speech that you alone have heard be buried with you.

"If you conduct yourself well, you yourself will give authority to your character.

"He whom his offense does not shame doubles his sin.

"Things above us are nothing to us."

Valerius says of him in book 7: "Socrates, as though a certain earthly oracle of human wisdom, used to say that those who acted so as to be the sort of persons they wished to seem would reach glory by a shortcut."

§ XXI. Darius Nothus and Plato

After Artaxerxes, Eusebius says in the Chronicle, Xerxes, the eighth king of the Persians, reigned for two months. After him Sogdianus, the ninth, reigned for seven months. Darius, surnamed Nothus, succeeded him.

He began to reign in the 166th year of the Fifth Age and in the 3,439th year of the world; but according to the computation of Bede and the Seventy, in the year 4,676. He reigned for nineteen years.

This is the third Darius. The first was Darius the Mede, Cyrus's uncle; the second, Darius Hystaspes; and the third, this Darius Nothus.

As Orosius says in book 2, in these times Sicily was shaken by a very severe earthquake. In addition, as the mountains of Etna boiled over with fire and hot cinders, it was laid waste, with the loss of very many fields and villas. A pestilence also invaded the miserable remnants of the Athenians and ravaged them for a long time.

In the fourth year of this Darius, according to Eusebius in the Chronicle, Plato was born. Apuleius says of him in the book On His Life and Character that he was first named Aristocles. His father, Ariston, descended from the lineage of Neptune; his mother, Perictione, derived her origin from Solon, the wisest founder of the Attic laws.

As Jerome says in the book Against Jovinian, Speusippus, the son of Plato's sister, and Anaxilides say that Plato's mother Perictione was overpowered by an apparition of Apollo, and they imagine that the prince of wisdom was brought forth in no other manner than by a virgin birth.

Valerius says concerning him that while Plato slept in his cradle, bees placed honey upon the little child's lips, signifying the sweetness of his singular eloquence.

When Ariston, Plato's father, brought the child to Socrates to be instructed, Socrates had seen in a dream the preceding night that a young bird of extraordinary whiteness and melodious voice had flown from the altar of Cupid in the Academy into his lap, and that it then flew singing from his lap into heaven. When, therefore, he saw the boy Plato being brought to him by his father, Socrates at once said that the interpretation of his dream had been fulfilled. Thus Apuleius.

Plato was born in the forty-third year of the life of Socrates, his teacher. Socrates later died in the seventieth year of his life. Concerning him Orosius says: "That Socrates, the most renowned author among the philosophers, wrested away his own life with poison among the Athenians." From these words Vincent says in the Historical Mirror that Socrates did not wait for poison to be given to him by the executioner. Instead, deceived by the counsel of his familiar demon, whom Apuleius calls the god of Socrates, he brought death upon himself, either from love of popular glory or from fear of a greater punishment.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

Socrates had already been condemned by the Athenians because he destroyed the gods, as Tertullian says. Nevertheless, when the Athenians repented of their sentence, they afterward punished Socrates's accusers and placed a golden image in the temple. The rescinded condemnation rendered testimony to Socrates.

Valerius says concerning him: It is agreed that Socrates began to devote himself to playing the lyre when he was advanced in age. For he wished even the humblest element of musical theory to be added to the great riches of his learning. While he always believed himself poor in learning, he made himself most rich in teaching.

He says below: "The nature of things does not permit a human being to be capable of continuous labor." The wisest Socrates saw this. Therefore he was not ashamed when Alcibiades laughed at him for playing with his little sons with a reed placed between his legs.

Alcibiades was also a disciple of Socrates. Valerius and Augustine say of him that, although he thought himself blessed because he was rich, handsome, and eloquent, Socrates disputed with him and showed how wretched he was because he was foolish. He pressed him so greatly with his arguments that he compelled him to weep.

Boethius also relates in the book On Consolation that Aristotle said that if someone had lynx-like eyes with which he could look upon the interiors of the human body, he would see that the body of Alcibiades, which was most beautiful on the surface, was most ugly within.

Valerius says of him in book 6: "Alcibiades was allotted, as it were, between two fortunes. One assigned to him outstanding nobility, abundant riches, surpassing beauty, the eager favor of the citizens, the highest commands, exceptional strength, and a most ardent intellect. The other inflicted condemnation, exile, poverty, hatred of his homeland, and a violent death. Neither the one nor the other was entire, but each was variable and perplexed, like the sea and its tide."

According to Eusebius in the Chronicle, this Alcibiades fled through envy from the Athenians to the Lacedaemonians, who were enemies of the Athenians. But once again, among the Lacedaemonians, his virtue attracted more envy than favor. He fled to Barmathus, who, after receiving payment from Lysander, prince of the Lacedaemonians, ordered him killed, as Jerome says in the book Against Jovinian. He sent Alcibiades's head to Lysander as proof of the killing.

While the rest of his body lay unburied, his concubine rendered the rites of the funeral pyre to him, prepared to die for love of him. Others, however, say that he burned himself. Still others, such as Justin and Orosius, assert that when he fled to the Persians, the Thirty Tyrants of Athens sent men to kill him on the way. Because this could not be done openly by day, he was burned at night while he slept in his chamber.

At that time, namely in the ninth year of Darius, Eudoxus the astrologer was renowned, according to Eusebius in the Chronicle. He climbed to the summit of a lofty mountain to observe the movements of the stars and the heavens.

§ XXII. The Lacedaemonians and the Thirty Rulers

The Lacedaemonians destroyed Versatium and founded the city of Heraclea. As Helinand says in book 16, that marvelous theater which is placed fifth among the seven wonders of the world was there. For it was so carved out of a single marble mountain that all the cells, chambers, walls, and dens of beasts were made from one solid stone. The entire theater hung upon seven crabs carved from the same stone. No one could speak around it, however secretly, either alone or with another, without all who were round about hearing.

At that time Egypt revolted from the Persians, and a dynasty of the Egyptians arose again.

Jerome says in the Chronicle that Euripides, when prophesying about Jove on Crete, reportedly abstained not only from meat but even from cooked foods.

Helinand testifies in the place cited above that the thirty rulers who had been created to govern the Athenian republic turned to tyranny, having gathered to themselves 3,000 guards and 700 soldiers from the victorious army.

As Jerome relates Against Jovinian, when these thirty rulers had killed Phido at a banquet, they ordered his virgin daughters to come to them, to be stripped naked in the manner of prostitutes, and to play with immodest gestures upon the pavements stained with their father's blood. After concealing their grief for a little while, when they saw that the banqueters were drunk, they went out as though to satisfy the needs of nature, embraced one another, and hurled themselves into a well so that they might preserve their virginity by death.

§ XXIII. Artaxerxes Mnemon and Esther

After Darius, his son Artaxerxes, who was called Mnemon, reigned in Persia. In the Book of Esther he is called Ahasuerus, as the Hebrews say and the Scholastic History relates. Hence the history of Esther was written under him, a book that is authentic even according to the Hebrews.

He ruled over 127 provinces, from India as far as Ethiopia, and the throne of his kingdom was in the city of Susa. Justin and Pompeius Trogus say that this Artaxerxes had 115 sons by his concubines. This agrees very well with the Book of Esther, where it is said that after Queen Vashti's repudiation, beautiful virgin girls were sought throughout all the provinces on two occasions and brought to the city of Susa. The king knew them, and afterward chose Esther from among them all as his wife.

In the third year of his reign, this Ahasuerus held a great banquet for all his princes of the Medes and Persians and the prefects of the provinces for 180 days, and afterward for the people who were in Susa for seven days. The magnificence of its provision and its marvelous splendor are set forth there.

When the king sent for Queen Vashti, his very beautiful wife, who had herself held a banquet for the women, and she refused to come, he was indignant. Therefore, on the counsel of the wise men, he repudiated her and deprived her of the kingdom.

Beautiful virgins were sought from different places so that, after being adorned for a fixed time, they might afterward enter before the king on an appointed day. Among them all Esther, a Hebrew by race and the niece of Mordecai, who had adopted her as his son [read: as his daughter], was brought to him. She was the most beautiful and pleased him above all the others. He took her as his wife and made her queen in Vashti's place.

After this Mordecai, remaining at the palace gate, uncovered the treachery of the eunuchs who were plotting to kill the king.

King Ahasuerus exalted Haman, who was of the stock of Agag, above all his princes. Hence everyone worshiped him and bent the knee except Mordecai. When Haman perceived this, he was indignant and persuaded the king to procure letters commanding that on a fixed day all the Jews should be killed wherever they were found, as though they dissented from the customs and laws of others. In this way Mordecai, whom he knew to be of the Jewish race, would be killed with the others.

When Mordecai understood this, he caused word to be sent to Queen Esther so that by speaking with the king she might prevent their destruction. She said that he should lead the Jews to fasting and prayer.

After three days of fasting and prayer by herself and her people, Esther adorned herself and entered before the king unbidden. When the king saw her, at first he showed her a terrifying countenance. On account of this she turned pale from fear and almost collapsed. For the law was that anyone who entered before the king unbidden should be killed immediately unless the king extended over that person the golden rod he held in his hand.

God turned the king's spirit to gentleness. Leaping from his throne, he supported the queen and comforted her so that she would not be afraid. When she had kissed the rod, he extended it over her neck. After praising the king, she asked him to come with Haman to her banquet, which he promised to do.

Haman left the court and encountered Mordecai, who did not worship him. Angry against him, Haman returned home and conferred with his wife and friends about the favor of the king and queen and about his indignation against Mordecai, who refused to worship him. They advised him to prepare in his house a wooden gallows fifty cubits high and to have Mordecai hanged upon it. He arranged this.

During the night preceding the banquet, the king remained sleepless and had the histories of deeds in those times read to him. They came to the conspiracy against the king by the eunuchs, which Mordecai had uncovered. Finding that Mordecai had received no recompense for so great a benefit, the king asked Haman, whom he found in the court, what honor and procedure should be bestowed upon a man whom the king wished greatly to honor.

Thinking that the king meant him, Haman described a magnificent procedure. The king ordered all of it to be fulfilled for Mordecai. At the king's command Haman himself went before Mordecai through the city, crying and saying, "Thus shall the man whom the king wishes to honor be honored."

Returning to his house in the great sorrow of envy, he told his wife and household what had happened. They said that if this Mordecai was of the seed of the Jews, Haman would not be able to resist him, but Mordecai would prevail over him.

When Haman came at the summons to the banquet prepared by the queen with the king, the king asked her after the meal what she sought from him, prepared to give even half of the kingdom. She asked that her own life and that of her people be preserved, since they had been given over to death by Haman's ordinance. When the king heard this, he rose angrily from the banquet and went into the garden. He afterward ordered that Haman himself be hanged upon the cross prepared for Mordecai.

Then the king gave Mordecai the ring that he had ordered taken from Haman and exalted Mordecai in Haman's place when he heard that he was Queen Esther's uncle. Esther obtained from the king that letters should be sent to all the cities to the contrary: the first letters were to be annulled, and on the day established for killing the Jews, the Jews themselves were instead to be given permission to kill their enemies.

All this was done on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is called Adar. Thus the destruction and mourning of the Jews were turned from danger into joy and festival. On that thirteenth day, the Jews killed 500 of their enemies in Susa, and Haman's ten sons were hanged. In other cities and places 75,000 people were killed. Mordecai ordained by letters that this day should be celebrated as a feast by the Jews everywhere. They still observe it, calling that day Purim.

Afterward the dream that Mordecai had once seen is set forth: two dragons fighting against one another, at whose cry all the nations were stirred up. The nation of the just was troubled, fearing the evils prepared for it unto death, and they cried out to the Lord. As they shouted, a small spring grew into a great river and overflowed into very many waters; light and the sun arose, the humble were exalted, and they devoured the renowned dragons. That dragon was Haman, and Mordecai was the small spring, and so forth. These things, however, are in the Vulgate edition.

Likewise, the words of the letter sent by Artaxerxes Ahasuerus concerning the killing of the Jews, the reason for it, Mordecai's devout prayer, and Esther's prayer are in the Vulgate edition. A very beautiful letter of Artaxerxes is also placed there, addressed to all the provinces subject to his dominion and revoking the first letters. It declares that such a revocation did not proceed from fickleness but from weighty reason, and it declares Haman's malice and Mordecai's goodwill.

But since Esther was first known carnally by Artaxerxes not as a wife, because she was not yet his wife, I do not see how she can otherwise be excused from the mortal sin of lust unless it is said that she did this by the familiar counsel of the Holy Spirit, just as the prophet Hosea did in knowing a fornicating woman and Samson in knowing Delilah. For everywhere there are great mysteries between Christ and the Church.

Ahasuerus is also said to have been led to faith in the true God through Esther. Hence the gloss upon the Apostle's words in 1 Corinthians 7, "The unbelieving husband is saved through the faithful woman," adduces the example of Ahasuerus saved through Esther, his faithful wife.

§ XXIV. Xenophon and Diogenes

In the time of this Artaxerxes, Xenophon, a disciple of Socrates, was renowned. After Plato he attained the palm of eloquence among Socrates's disciples.

As Valerius relates in book 5, while Xenophon was sacrificing, he learned that the elder of his two sons had perished in battle. He did not therefore think that the worship of the gods should be abandoned, but was content only to remove his crown. When he asked in what manner his son had fallen and heard that he had died fighting with the greatest courage, he replaced the crown upon his head, calling the divinities to whom he was sacrificing as witnesses that he felt greater pleasure from his son's valor than bitterness from his death. Thus Valerius. From this example, let the faithful person know how calmly the death of loved ones should be borne.

As Jerome says Against Jovinian, Xenophon, describing the life of the Persians, testifies that they lived on porridge, cress, salt, and bread.

In the thirteenth year of Artaxerxes, Diogenes, head of the sect of Cynic philosophers, was held in renown. Tully, however, says that the Cynics first took their beginning from Aristippus, who thought virtue should be praised because it was productive of pleasure. But in these times Epicurus flourished, almost a supporter of the same sect and an advocate of its opinion.

Augustine says of them in book 14 of The City of God: "Those canine--that is, Cynic--philosophers put forward against human modesty a canine, that is, filthy and shameless, opinion: namely, that since what is done with a wife is just, one should not be ashamed to do it openly. Natural shame nevertheless defeated the opinion of this error. For although Diogenes is reported to have done this, the practice afterward ceased among the Cynics. Shame had greater power to make human beings blush before human beings than error had to make human beings affect similarity to dogs."

Macrobius relates concerning Diogenes in the Saturnalia that, when he had fallen from freedom into slavery and was being sold, Xeniades of Corinth wished to buy him and asked what skill he knew. Diogenes answered, "I know how to command free men." Marveling at the answer, Xeniades immediately manumitted him--that is, freed him--and entrusted his own sons to him, saying, "Receive my children, whom you may command."

This is a saying of Diogenes: "Conscience overcomes whatever evil the tongue may invent."

Valerius says of him in book 3: While Diogenes at Syracuse was washing vegetables, Aristippus said to him, "If you wished to flatter Dionysius, you would not eat those things." "Rather," Diogenes answered, "if you wished to eat those things, you would not flatter Dionysius."

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

Jerome says Against Jovinian: After Antisthenes had taught rhetoric with glory, he heard Socrates say to his disciples, "Go and seek a teacher for yourselves, for I am now withdrawing." Immediately selling what he possessed and distributing it publicly, Antisthenes reserved nothing for himself beyond a little cloak. Xenophon is a witness to his poverty and labor.

That most famous Diogenes was his follower, more powerful than King Alexander and a conqueror of human nature. For when Antisthenes received no disciples and could not drive away the persevering Diogenes, at last he threatened him with a club so that he would depart. Diogenes is said to have put his head beneath it and said, "No club will be hard enough to separate me from obedience to you."

Satyrus relates concerning this Diogenes that he used a cloak against the cold, had a bag for a pantry, and had a staff because of the frailty of his little body, with which he was accustomed to support his limbs when already old. He accepted from another what he begged. He dwelt in the vestibules of gates and in the porticoes of cities.

When he turned himself about in his jar, he joked that he had a movable house and that it changed with the seasons. In the time of cold he turned the mouth of the jar toward the south; in summer, toward the north. Wherever the sun inclined, Diogenes's chamber was turned at the same time.

Once, when he had a wooden cup for drinking, he saw a boy drink with a cupped hand. Diogenes is said to have dashed the cup to the ground, saying, "I did not know that nature also had a drinking vessel."

His death also indicates his virtue and continence. When, already an old man, he was going to the Olympic contest, which was celebrated by a great gathering of Greece, he is said to have been seized by a fever on the journey and to have lain down beside the road. When his friends wished to lift him either onto a beast of burden or into a vehicle, he did not consent. Instead, moving into the shade of a tree, he said to them: "Go, I beg you, and proceed to the spectacle. This night will prove me either victor or vanquished. If I conquer the fever, I shall come to the contest. If the fever conquers me, I shall descend to the lower regions." Passing the night there and crushing his throat, he said that he did not so much die as expel the fever by death. Learn from an unbeliever contempt for the world, abstinence, and patience, but detest his shamelessness.

At this time Speusippus, a distinguished philosopher and Plato's nephew through his sister, was also held in renown, according to Vincent's Historical Mirror. This is said to have been his saying, which he reportedly uttered to one praising him: "Flatterer, cease deceiving both of us. You accomplish nothing, since I understand you."

Justin relates in book 18 that, after the Carthaginians had long fought successfully in Sicily, the war was transferred to Sardinia. Having lost the greater part of their army, they were defeated in a severe war. On account of this they ordered their commander Malchus, under whose auspices they had subdued part of Sicily and performed great deeds against the Africans, to go into exile with the part of the army that remained.

Returning armed to the city, these men besieged it, saying that they had come not to storm the city but to recover their homeland, and that they would show their fellow citizens that in the former war fortune, not valor, had failed them. By cutting off provisions they brought the city to utmost desperation.

Meanwhile Carthalo, the son of the exiled commander Malchus, was returning past his father's camp from Tyre. The Carthaginians had sent him there to carry Hercules's tithe from the Sicilian booty that his father had captured. When summoned by his father, he answered that he would fulfill the duties of public religion before those of private affection. Although Malchus bore this indignantly, he nevertheless did not dare inflict violence upon public religion.

After several days Carthalo obtained safe conduct from the people and returned to his father adorned with purple and the priest's fillets. Drawing him aside privately, his father said: "Have you dared, most wicked head, to come adorned with purple and gold in the sight of so many wretched citizens? I shall establish an example in you, lest after this any son mock the miseries of an unfortunate father." Thus he ordered Carthalo, together with his ornaments, to be fastened upon a very high cross in the sight of the city.

Not long afterward Malchus captured Carthage. Having killed ten senators and punished the authors of his exile and that of his companions, he restored the city to its laws. Not long afterward he was accused of seeking the kingship and killed. Learn from this that one must have compassion for the wretched.

Mago succeeded Malchus as commander, as Justin relates. He was the first of all who, after establishing military discipline, strengthened the empire of the Carthaginians no less by the art of war than by valor. At his death he left two sons, Hasdrubal and Hamilcar.

Under these commanders war was brought upon Sardinia, where Hasdrubal fell after being gravely wounded. His brother Hamilcar succeeded in his place and was killed in the Sicilian war. While he was besieging Syracuse, he was told in a dream, as Valerius relates, that on the following day he would dine in the city. This indeed happened, for he entered not as conqueror but as captive.

In the time of this Hamilcar, as Justin says, envoys sent by Darius, king of the Persians, came to Carthage. They brought an edict forbidding the Carthaginians to sacrifice human victims and eat dogs' flesh, while also requesting aid against Greece, upon which Darius intended to bring war. The Carthaginians refused aid because of continual wars with their neighbors; nevertheless, lest they appear disobedient in everything, they eagerly obeyed the edict.

Hasdrubal left three sons: Hannibal, Hasdrubal, and Sappho. Hamilcar likewise left three sons: Himilco, Hanno, and Gisco. Hamilcar's son Himilco succeeded him as commander of the Sicilian war. Although he had waged successful battles by land and sea, he suddenly lost his army beneath a pestilential star. When he returned to Carthage with a few men, the loss of the army caused the greatest mourning among everyone. Himilco himself killed himself with a sword from grief.

Orosius says that this war was waged in the time of Darius but does not say which Darius; Jerome places it in the time of this Artaxerxes.

§ XXV. Dionysius

At this time Dionysius remained in his tyranny. As Justin says in book 20, after the Carthaginians had been driven from Sicily, he seized command of all Sicily and transported his forces into Italy. He first made war against the Greeks who occupied the shores nearest the Italian sea. When they had been defeated, he attacked all their neighbors, especially all who possessed Italy under a Greek name.

But the arrival of the Carthaginians recalled him from Italy. With increased strength they renewed the war they had abandoned, under Hanno as commander. Suniatus, the most powerful of the Carthaginians and Hanno's enemy, secretly foretold to the tyrant Dionysius in a private letter written in Greek the arrival of the army and the commander's sluggishness. When the letter was intercepted, he was condemned for treason. The senate therefore decreed that thereafter no Carthaginian should study either Greek letters or the Greek language, lest anyone be able to speak or write with the enemy without an interpreter.

Valerius says of Dionysius in book 6: Although he had received as an inheritance from his father the tyranny of the Syracusans and almost all Sicily and had been lord of the greatest resources, commander of armies, director of fleets, and powerful in cavalry, at last through poverty he taught little boys their letters at Corinth. At the same time, by so great a reversal, he warned those older in years that no one should trust fortune too greatly, for he had been mocked by fortune and transformed from a tyrant into a schoolmaster. Thus Valerius.

This happened to him as punishment for his tyranny and sacrileges. As the same Valerius says concerning him, he seasoned his sacrileges with jokes. After removing Jove's golden cloak--that is, garment--and putting a woolen one upon him, he joked that a golden cloak was heavy in summer and cold in winter, whereas a woolen one was suitable for both seasons.

When he removed crowns and bowls from the images of the gods upon which was written "Gifts of the gods," he said that he was not taking but accepting them. "It is foolish," he said, "to be unwilling to receive good things when those from whom we pray for them offer them." He also removed Aesculapius's golden beard, saying that it was unfitting for his father Apollo to be beardless while his son was bearded.

Although all the Syracusans desired this Dionysius's death, one woman of extreme old age alone prayed to the gods every morning that he might be kept safe and survive her. When Dionysius heard this, he marveled and asked the reason. She answered: "When I was a girl and had a harsh tyrant, I desired to be rid of him, and another succeeded him. When I desired to be rid of that one also, we began to have you, a third, more troublesome than the others. Fearing, therefore, that a worse man may succeed you, I devote my head for your safety." Dionysius was ashamed to punish so witty an audacity. Thus Valerius.

Plato was this Dionysius's teacher, as Tully relates. The tyrant received Plato so honorably that he went to meet him with a vast multitude and ships adorned with white sails.

Tully also writes of him that this tyrant was so suspicious and fearful, knowing that everyone hated him, that after removing his friends he substituted in their place the fiercest barbarians, to whom he might entrust his flanks. From fear of barbers, he taught his daughters to shave him. When they were grown, he did not dare entrust a blade to them, but arranged that they should singe his beard and hair with the glowing shells of walnuts.

He acted no more securely as a husband than as a father. For although bound simultaneously in marriages to two women, Aristomache and Doris, he never sought the embrace of either unless she had first been searched. He surrounded his bed like a camp with a broad ditch. He crossed into it by a wooden bridge and carefully barred the inner door.

§ XXVI. Plato

At this time Plato the philosopher was also renowned, namely in the seventeenth year of Artaxerxes. Augustine praises him above the other pagans in book 8 of The City of God.

Jerome says Against Jovinian: Although Plato was rich and had trampled the couches of Diogenes with muddy feet, so that he might be free for philosophy he chose the Academy, a villa far from the city, not merely deserted but also pestilential, so that the impulses of lust might be broken by anxiety over and continual experience of illnesses. Hence several of his disciples gouged out their own eyes. Thus Jerome. Let wretched Christians learn from this at least to gouge out from themselves the eyes of vain sight for the name of Christ, as they are admonished by his teaching.

Valerius says of him in book 4: When Plato had become violently enraged at the offense of a slave, he feared that he might exceed the measure of vengeance and entrusted the decision concerning punishment to his friend Speusippus.

Plato himself received accusations only with the greatest difficulty. Once he had heard that his disciple Xenocrates had spoken many impious things concerning him, but he rejected the accusation. The accuser persisted, asking why he was not believed. Plato added that it was not credible that the man whom he had loved for so long did not love him in return. When the accuser wished to proceed to an oath, Plato affirmed that Xenocrates would never have said these things unless he had judged it expedient for himself that they be said.

The same Valerius says in book 8 concerning Plato's devotion to study: "Plato received Athens as his homeland, Socrates as his teacher, a place and a man most fertile in learning. Although he was already held to be the wisest of all, and although young men devoted to study hastened to Athens in rivalry to seek Plato as their teacher, he himself, a disciple of the elders, traversed the Nile's inextricable banks, the most extensive plains, and the widespread barbarism of the Egyptians. From the priests of that nation he learned the manifold numbers of geometry and the observation of celestial principles. He also entered Italy to receive the precepts of Pythagoras from Archytas of Tarentum and Arion. So great an abundance of learning had to be gathered from every quarter so that in turn it might be dispersed and spread throughout the whole world."

As Jerome says of him: "That man found everywhere something to learn, and always made himself better."

Augustine says in book 8 of The City of God: "Although Plato surpassed his disciples in marvelous intellect, thinking himself insufficient for the reception of philosophy in the Socratic discipline, he traveled far and wide wherever the fame of some distinguished knowledge to be received carried him. Thus in Egypt and the regions of Italy, where the fame of the Pythagoreans was celebrated, he learned whatever the greater teachers there possessed and taught."

“Because the pursuit of wisdom is occupied with action and contemplation, one part of it can be called active and the other contemplative. The active pertains to conducting life and instructing morals; the contemplative, to beholding the causes of nature and the most sincere truth. Socrates is remembered as excelling in the active part, whereas Pythagoras devoted himself more to the contemplative with all the powers he possessed.

“Therefore Plato is praised for having perfected philosophy by joining both parts. He divided it into three parts: the moral, which is occupied with action; the natural, which is assigned to contemplation; and the rational, by which the true is distinguished from the false. Although the rational is necessary to both, contemplation nevertheless claims perfection for itself.

“Some think that when Plato went to Egypt he heard the prophet Jeremiah. But a diligent computation of the chronology according to the chronicle history indicates that Plato was born almost one hundred years after the time when Jeremiah prophesied. It could nevertheless be that, as a man of the keenest intellect learned the Egyptian writings, so he also learned the Hebrew writings through an interpreter.

“This may be thought because in Plato’s Timaeus, which he wrote concerning the constitution of the world, he says that God first joined earth and fire. This saying is very similar to that in the beginning of Genesis: ‘In the beginning God created heaven and earth,’ and so forth. Then what Plato says, that the philosopher is a lover of God, blazes nowhere in those writings as it does there. Most of all, that which especially leads me to assent fully that Plato was not without knowledge of those books is that Plato grasped most strongly and commended most diligently those words of the Lord to Moses: ‘I am who I am.’”

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

That tripartition of Plato, however, which divides philosophy into natural, moral, and rational, is not contrary to the distinction according to which the whole pursuit of wisdom is said to be occupied with action and contemplation.

The same Augustine says in the place cited above: “If the human being was so created that through that which excels in him he may attain to that which excels all things--that is, the one true and best God, without whom no nature subsists, no doctrine instructs, and no use is expedient, as Plato says--let Him be sought where all things are secure for us; let Him be perceived where all things are certain for us; let Him be loved where all things are right for us.

“Therefore, if Plato said that a wise person is the imitator, knower, and lover of Him through participation in whom he becomes blessed, what need is there to examine the others? None have come nearer to us than these men.”

The same Augustine says in book 9 that Apuleius asserts that Plato preached the supreme creator of all, whom we call the true God, in such a way that He alone, because of the poverty of human speech, cannot be comprehended by any discourse, even to a slight degree. His understanding scarcely flashes upon the wise inwardly--and this only at times, like a bright light from a most rapid flash amid the deepest darkness--when they have withdrawn themselves from the body by the vigor of the mind as far as permitted.

Helinand says concerning him: Plato was accustomed to title his books with the names of his teachers or of those who had taught his teachers, so that from their names his words and arguments might acquire greater authority. Hence his books were called Timaeus, Phaedo, Gorgias, and Pythagoras. Tully translated the first and the last of these.

In the dialogue Phaedo, after the disputation concerning the soul’s immortality, he distinguishes the places owed to those departing this life according to the law that each established for himself by living. Similarly, in the Gorgias, after completing the disputation, he spoke concerning the condition of souls after the body. He preserved these two matters in the books On the Republic: first he granted primacy to justice; afterward he discussed where the soul goes after the body and whence it comes into the body.

Macrobius says in book 1 of the Dream of Scipio: Plato defines in the Phaedo that a human being must not die by his own will. But in the same dialogue he says again that death should be desired by those who philosophize and that philosophy itself is a meditation upon dying. These statements appear contrary to each other, but they are not.

For Plato knew two deaths of the human being, one of which nature and the other the virtues bring about. A human being dies when the soul, released by the law of nature, leaves the body. One is also said to die when the soul, while still established in the body, at philosophy’s command despises the body’s allurements and burns away the sweet snares of desires and all the remaining passions. Plato says that this death should be desired by the wise, but he forbids the death which nature has appointed for everyone to be compelled, inflicted, or summoned.

The same Macrobius says in book 2: In Plato’s Phaedo, which Tully translated, the immortality of the soul is asserted by the strongest arguments. After all the reasonings it is reduced to the compendium of a single syllogism as follows: “The soul is moved from itself. What is moved from itself is the principle of motion. What is the principle of motion was not born; and what was not born is immortal. Therefore the soul is immortal.”

It is read that when Theobrotus had read Plato's book concerning the immortality of the soul, he hurled himself headlong from a wall out of desire for a better life. Although he acted foolishly and damnably, this is nevertheless introduced so that the soul's immortality may be known.

These also are Plato's words in the Phaedo: “As long as we have a body and our soul is mingled with so great an evil, we shall never sufficiently attain what we have long desired, that is, knowledge of the truth. For the body brings infinite occupations by which we are worn away on account of our daily sustenance.

“The body is also burdened by diseases, desires, fears, and innumerable appearances of various things and appetites, so that because of it we cannot even be wise in any matter. But the mind of the dead is free and released from the body.

“Therefore, during the time in which we live, we shall finally approach knowledge if we use the body not at all or as little as possible and do not lower the soul into fellowship with it except insofar as necessity requires. For thus we shall be filled as little as possible with the body's turbulent and vicious nature. Instead, pure from its contagion, departing incorrupt and sincere, we shall come to all incorrupt and sincere things.”

Vincent says in book 4, chapter 79, of the Historical Mirror that many excellent things are read as having been said by Plato, such as what Boethius relates him to have said: “Commonwealths will be blessed if either wise men govern them or their rulers study wisdom.”

There is also what Tully asserts that he said: “Pleasure is the bait of evils,” because human beings are caught by it just as fish by a hook.

Plato is likewise reported to have said:

“If the form of wisdom could be seen by the eyes, it would arouse everyone to the greatest love of itself.

“The form of justice cannot be comprehended unless the form of injustice is first examined.

“The soul is a self-moving essence.

“Not only knowledge that is removed from justice should be called cunning rather than wisdom; but even a spirit prepared for danger, if it is driven by its own desire and not by the advantage of all, has the name of recklessness rather than courage.

“That justice is most true which is observed toward inferiors.

“It is the triumph of innocence not to sin where one could.

“Cease to sin against the person over whom you have greater power.

“Death should be desired by those who philosophize, and philosophy itself is a meditation upon dying.

“Patience is the chief strength of philosophy.”

As Helinand relates, when this Plato saw Dionysius, tyrant of Sicily, surrounded by guards for the protection of his body, he said, “What so great an evil have you done that you must be guarded by so many?”

Vincent says that he asserted the existence of two worlds: an intelligible world in which truth itself dwelt, and this sensible world, which it is evident that we perceive by sight and touch. Accordingly, the former was true, while the latter, made in its image, was truthlike. Concerning the former, therefore, the things the soul knew could be polished, as it were, and truth could be reasoned out. Concerning the latter, not knowledge but opinion could be generated in the minds of fools.

As the same Vincent says in the place cited above, Plato erred in these matters because he said that the ideas are in the divine mind as the eternal exemplar of the things that are made. This is true, but he thought the ideas themselves were something other than the divine mind. This is false, since they are the same in reality.

He also erred greatly because he placed God in the division of existing things, although “to be” is said in one way of the creator and in another of the creature. For this name “being” is predicated not univocally of God and the other creatures, but analogically. Therefore God cannot be placed in the division of the things that are, as though He existed in some category; rather, He exceeds every being of the categories.

He also erred concerning the matter of providence, which he made threefold, as Thomas sets forth in the First Part. Plato said that there are three kinds of providence. The first provides for intellectual creatures and for the whole world with respect to genera and species; this he attributed to God. The second provides for individual animals and plants with respect to generation, corruption, and other natural changes; this he attributed to the gods who circle the heavens. The third provides for matters pertaining to human life, or human acts; this he attributed to demons.

But blessed Thomas refutes all these things there with arguments. For there is one providence of God by which all things together are most excellently provided for, according to Wisdom 6: "He has equal care for all." From these matters anyone can know that saying of Jeremiah: "Every human being has become foolish through his own knowledge," unless it is aided by the knowledge of God.

Plato died in the twenty-first year of Darius, the son of Artaxerxes who was also called Ochus. As Seneca says of him in letter 58, Plato died on his birthday and completed exactly eighty-one years, without any deduction. Therefore the magi who were then at Athens offered sacrifice to him after his death, judging that he had been of a lot higher than the human, because he had completed the most perfect number, which nine multiplied nine makes.

Augustine nevertheless says in book 11 of The City of God: "Labeo places Plato among the demigods, as he does Hercules and Romulus. He prefers demigods to human beings, but he places both among the divinities. We, however, do not compare Plato even to any Christian human being." Similarly, Jerome, upon Ecclesiastes, places Plato with other ancient pagan philosophers among the damned.

It is also evident from what has been said that Archytas of Tarentum flourished in these times, since Plato was his pupil. Tully says of him in On Old Age: Archytas of Tarentum, while Plato of Athens was present at his discourse, said that nature had given human beings no more deadly plague than bodily pleasure. Since God had given the human being nothing more excellent than the mind, nothing was so hostile to this divine gift as pleasure.

To make this more intelligible, he imagined in his mind someone stirred by as much bodily pleasure as could possibly be experienced. He judged that no one would doubt that for as long as that person enjoyed the pleasure, he could consider nothing with his mind, think nothing, and accomplish nothing by reason.

The same Tully says of him in On Friendship: "Nature loves nothing solitary. Hence what I heard our elders say was customarily spoken by Archytas of Tarentum is true, as I think: if someone had ascended into heaven and beheld the nature of the world and the beauty of the stars, his admiration would be unpleasant without a friend and companion, though it would be most delightful if he had someone to whom he could disclose it."

Valerius says of him in book 4: Archytas of Tarentum said to his steward, "I would have exacted punishment from you if I were not angry with you. For I preferred to leave you unpunished rather than punish you more severely than was just because of anger."

Aulus Gellius says of him in the book of Attic Nights: The philosopher Favorinus affirms that an image of a dove made from wood by a certain method and mechanical art flew to Archytas.

Vincent gives this as his opinion concerning the soul in book 4, chapter 8: "The soul was composed after the example of the one, and it thus rules without location in the body, just as one does among numbers." And: "There is, finally, no crime and no wicked deed which the desire for pleasure does not impel one to undertake."

§ XXVII. The Later Reign of Artaxerxes

Returning to the history of Artaxerxes, king of the Persians, who is also believed to be Ahasuerus as was said above: of the 115 sons he had, only three were received from a lawful marriage--Darius, Arabathus, and Ochus.

Contrary to the custom of the Persians, among whom the king is changed only at death, while he was still alive the indulgent father made Darius king, as Justin says in book 10. But in repayment for so great a benefit, Darius contemplated the crime of parricide against his father and took fifty brothers into partnership in the deed. The cause of the parricide was more criminal than the parricide itself.

King Artaxerxes had taken in marriage Astasia, the concubine of his brother Cyrus. Darius had demanded that his father yield her to him just as he had yielded the kingdom. Artaxerxes first promised this. Then, led by repentance so that he might honorably deny what he had rashly promised, he appointed her to the priesthood of the sun, by which perpetual chastity from all men was commanded for her.

Enraged by this, the young man conspired against his father. He was discovered and destroyed with his associates, and the wives and children of them all were killed. After this Artaxerxes died of an illness contracted from grief.

The inheritance of the kingdom was delivered to Ochus. Fearing a similar royal conspiracy, he filled the palace with the slaughter and killing of his relatives, moved by no mercy for blood, sex, or age. Then, as though the kingdom had been pacified, he brought war upon the Susians.

In that war a certain Codomanus advanced with every favor against a champion of the enemy. Having slain the enemy, he obtained victory for his people; on this account he was appointed prefect over the Armenians. Later, after the death of Ochus, in remembrance of his former valor, he was established as king by the people.

In the time of this Ochus, the orator Demosthenes was known. Valerius says of him in book 8: Although Demosthenes could not pronounce the first letter of the rhetorical art because of the thinness of his voice and a defect of his mouth, he attacked the defect with such effort that no one uttered what he wished more clearly. By continual exercise he brought his exceedingly weak voice to a sound pleasing to the ears.

To overcome the weakness of his side, he completed many verses in a single breath and pronounced them while rapidly climbing steep places. Standing upon shallow shores, he delivered declamations against the crashing obstacles of the waves. He was also accustomed to speak much and for a long time with pebbles inserted in his mouth, so that his speech would be readier and more fluent.

This is the Demosthenes who, playfully stroking the belly of Lais, the most famous courtesan, asked, "How much for this?" When she said, "A thousand denarii," he answered, "I do not buy repentance for so high a price."

Isidore says of him in book 1 of the Etymologies: The orator Demosthenes used a fable against Philip. When Philip demanded that the Athenians give him ten orators and that he would then depart, Demosthenes devised this fable to dissuade them. He said that wolves, wishing to deceive the diligence of shepherds, once persuaded them to enter into friendship, but on this condition: that they hand over the dogs against whom there was cause for quarrels as the pledge of security. The shepherds agreed and in hope of security gave up the dogs, whom they had as vigilant guardians of their sheep. Then, with every fear removed, the wolves tore apart the whole flock not only for satiety but even for lust. Thus Philip intended to act among the people once the orators had been taken away.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

Helinand says of the same man in book 11: When Demosthenes asked Aristodemus, a performer of plays, how much payment he had received to act, and Aristodemus answered, "A talent," Demosthenes said, "But I received more to keep silent." Thus the tongue of legal pleaders is harmful unless, as the saying goes, you bind it with silver cords. Among advocates, therefore, even silence itself is for sale.

The same Demosthenes was being sought by the Athenian senate as an advocate against Philip, king of the Macedonians. Feigning weakness, he lay down in bed, as they say, and answered those who came to him that he was suffering from a disease that passed judgment. One of the messengers replied most biting, "Surely you are suffering not from one that passes judgment, but from one that produces silver."

At that time Aeschines appears to have flourished. Valerius says of him in book 8: The ornaments of eloquence consist in suitable pronunciation and appropriate movement of the body. When someone has equipped himself with these, he approaches people in three ways: by penetrating their ears, charming their eyes, and invading their minds.

Therefore, when Aeschines had gone to Rhodes because of judicial disgrace and there, at the request of the city, had recited first his own most renowned speech against Ctesiphon and then that of Demosthenes on the same matter, everyone marveled at the eloquence of both, but somewhat more at that of Demosthenes. Aeschines said, "What if you had heard the man himself?" So great an orator admired the force of his enemy and the ardor of his speaking so much that he declared himself an inadequate reader of his writings.

For Aeschines had experienced the exceedingly sharp vigor of Demosthenes's eyes, the terrible weight of his countenance, the sound of his voice adapted to each word, and the most effective movements of his body. Thus, although nothing could be added to his work, a great part of Demosthenes is nevertheless absent when he is read rather than heard.

Seneca says of him in the book On Benefits: When the other disciples offered many things to Socrates, the poor Aeschines offered himself alone, saying that he offered whatever better thing he had, while the others, although they had given Socrates a few things, retained more and better things for themselves. Hence he said, "I beseech you to cultivate this little gift of my poverty and by your diligence and care render it better and more adorned." Socrates answered that he had received the greatest gift from him, unless Aeschines valued himself cheaply, and that he would gladly devote his effort to making him better.

Tully says of him in the book On the Republic: When Aeschines as a young man had composed an Attic tragedy, he held the commonwealth in check and turned and governed Athens at his judgment, so powerful was he in eloquence.

Orosius says that at that same time envoys were sent from Carthage to Rome and made a treaty with the Romans. The continuous fidelity of the histories, and the places and reputation where these things were done, testify that the entrance of the Carthaginians into Italy would be followed by a hailstorm of evils and the darkness of continual miseries.

Then night appeared to extend into most of the day, and a stony hail descending from the clouds beat the earth with actual stones for twenty-five days. During these days Alexander the Great, that flood of miseries and most savage tempest of the whole East, was also born.

Chapter Two

The Birth of Alexander

In the tenth year of Ochus, king of the Persians, says Vincent in book 5, chapter 1, of the Historical Mirror; the sixth year of Philip, king of the Macedonians; and the eleventh year of Nectanabus, king of Egypt--which was the 225th year of the Fifth Age and the 4,735th year of the world according to Bede and the Seventy Translators--Alexander, son of Philip, king of the Macedonians, and of his wife Olympias, was born.

This nevertheless appears not to agree at all with that common history which relates that he was begotten by Nectanabus after the latter had already been driven from his kingdom. For in the fourteenth year of Ochus's reign and the fifteenth of Nectanabus, as Eusebius writes, Ochus held Egypt after Nectanabus had been driven into Ethiopia.

As is gathered from the History of Alexander, Nectanabus is remembered as excelling among the wise men of Egypt. If the danger of war threatened him, he did not warn the army or engines of Mars. Instead, entering the inner rooms of the palace and the royal secrets, he carried in with him a basin and hid there alone. He filled the basin with the clearest spring water, fashioned the likeness of a ship from wax, and placed images of people there. All these seemed to move and live.

He also employed a wand of ebony wood and spoke through a hollow channel the words by which he summoned the gods above and below. Thus he labored to sink the little ship in the basin. From this it came about that, together with the sinking of that wax and the waxen images burned in it, all the enemies whose presence was announced would also be drowned at sea.

On one occasion he was told that many nations had risen against him with one conspiracy and the same will: the Indians, Arabs, Phoenicians, Parthians, and whatever barbarous nations inhabit the East. When he heard this, he clapped his hands and dissolved into great laughter. Resorting to the skill of his customary art, he understood that he would be conquered and captured by his enemies unless he took counsel for flight.

Soon afterward, after shaving his head and beard and gathering all his precious things, he reached Macedonia. Clothed there in a linen garment, he professed himself an astrologer and commended the power of his skill with great wonder. His reputation became so celebrated that it did not escape Queen Olympias, the wife of King Philip.

Philip was then away at war. The queen began to consult Nectanabus's skill. Marveling at the woman's beauty, he was captured by love of her. While he gazed more intently upon her face, she said, "Why are you so fixed in looking at me?" He answered: "I recall that oracle which I received from the gods in Egypt, because I must foretell true things to a queen. Consult me, therefore, concerning what you desire."

Immediately he brought out his tablets, which those learned in this art call a pinax. They were varied with gold and ivory and contained a horoscope of seven stars with their figures. There Jupiter was seen in an airy stone, that is, hyacinth; the Sun in crystal; the Moon in diamond; Mars in hematite; Mercury in emerald; Venus in sapphire; and Saturn in opHITE. The horoscope itself was in Lygdian stone.

Olympias then marveled at the variety of the stars. Standing nearer, she said, "Oh, look, I beg you, at the harmony between Philip and me. For there is a widespread report that if he returns from the enemy, he wishes to transfer himself to another woman."

After examining the constellation and the things she had asked, Nectanabus said: "That report is true, but I shall help you so that you need fear nothing from divorce. For according to what I have foreseen, it is fated that you will unite with a god and give birth to a son who will avenge anything Philip may dare against you."

She said, "To the bed of what god, then, am I destined?" He answered, "To Ammon, god of Libya. Therefore prepare yourself for his nuptials as befits a queen. You will see both a dream and, in that dream, the nuptials that will occur between you and the god."

To abbreviate the history, by magical arts this wicked Nectanabus caused her to dream that she was united with the god Ammon and made pregnant by him. When she had related this to Nectanabus himself, he said that it must soon be fulfilled. Hence she should prepare a bed for herself beside his own so that when this occurred, if anything were needed, he could help her.

He explained that Ammon would come to her in the form of a dragon with a ram's head and horns, in a white garment, and that she should then prepare herself for union with him. At night in her bedchamber, therefore, that wicked man caused Ammon to appear to her by magical illusions in the form prescribed. While she looked only upon that form, Nectanabus, who was nearby in the adjoining bed, knew her carnally, and Alexander was then conceived from her.

By his incantations Nectanabus also caused Philip, who was then at war, to dream this very thing: that his wife Olympias was united with the god Ammon. When he returned and heard that the queen was pregnant, at first he began almost to believe this. Then he strongly doubted whether she had been joined not to a god but to another man, and he rebuked her harshly.

Perceiving this, Nectanabus contrived by diabolical art that at a solemn banquet where Philip and Olympias were present, a dragon should appear in that form with such terrible sharpness of hissing that the foundations of the house seemed to shake. As it entered the place of the banquet and everyone was struck with fear, Olympias extended her hands to the dragon as she had been instructed. Becoming gentle, it rested its head in her lap and gave her a kiss. Then, withdrawing toward evening, it was changed into an eagle and flew away from their midst.

Deceived by this, Philip asserted that the matter was so--that she had conceived from a god--but that he did not know from which one: whether from Jove because of the eagle, or from Ammon because of the dragon's form, since he was worshiped in that form. She answered, "From the god Ammon."

At length, as Olympias gave birth, Nectanabus stood by, observing the courses and motions of the stars. When the woman groaned more violently, she brought forth the child. As soon as it fell to the ground, a movement of the earth immediately followed, together with the crash of thunder, the conflict of winds, and the flashing of lightning.

As Justin relates in book 12, on the day Alexander was born two eagles sat continuously throughout the entire day above the roof of his house, presenting an omen of his twofold empire over Europe and Asia.

Philip called him Alexander in memory of his son who had died from an earlier marriage. As Vincent writes in book 5, chapter 5, Alexander was very beautiful in form and countenance, beneath slightly curled and yellowish hair and a leonine mane, and of outstanding beauty. One of his eyes was almost black, but the left was gray and unlike it.

His nurse was called Alacronis. His tutor in letters was Leonides; Polinichus was his teacher of music; Alcippus of geometry; Anaximenes of oratory; and that Aristotle of Miletus of philosophy, as is read in the history. Jerome nevertheless relates that Aristotle showed Alexander the elements of letters for the use of books.

Jerome likewise says to Laeta: "Greek history relates that Alexander, the most powerful king, could not be free in conduct and gait from the faults of Leonides, his tutor, with which he had been infected while still a small child." As Seneca relates, Alexander later threw this same Leonides to the lions to be devoured.

When Alexander had reached the age of twelve, as is read in his history, he became his father's companion. He always trained himself to put on and use arms, rejoiced to be seen with armies, and, leaping upon horses, performed everything as a most prudent soldier.

When Philip went to a nearby Illyrian city, loving Olympias with an affection unlike that with which he had formerly loved her, Olympias immediately sought Nectanabus again and consulted him about Philip's secret plan. As he sat beside Alexander and spoke from that astral art, Alexander asked him to teach him the art, which he did.

When Alexander had made no small progress in that art, one night he came headlong to the edge of a previously known pit, where Nectanabus was accustomed to teach him. Alexander unexpectedly cast Nectanabus down. Afflicted in the neck by a fatal blow, Nectanabus complained and asked why he had done this to him.

Alexander answered: "You ought to complain about that art which you knew. For, ignorant of the things that were threatening you, you now lie stretched upon the ground while you scrutinize the heavens." The magician replied: "There is no escape for mortals from fate. Long ago through this knowledge I learned that I would be killed by my son."

Alexander said, "Am I your son?" Nectanabus then confessed everything: his flight from Egypt and the art by which he had possessed Olympias. Having said these things, he breathed out his soul.

Alexander then placed him upon his shoulders and carried him back to the palace. He erected a most elaborate and marvelous tomb for him and revealed everything to his mother. She marveled that for so many years she had been deceived by a magician and had committed a shameful act. Learn from this that curious persons are often shamefully deceived, as their curiosity deserves, and that deceivers are finally mocked by the devil.

§ I. Bucephalus

At the same time, as is gathered from the History of Alexander, King Philip of the Macedonians, anxious about the successor to his kingdom, sent to Delphi. He received this reply: "O Philip, whoever leaps upon the horse Bucephalus and rides through the middle of Pella shall at last obtain rule over your kingdom and the whole world."

Bucephalus was a horse remarkable in form, from the royal stock of the herd, with feet shaped according to the fable of Pegasus and of whatever horses of this kind are proclaimed to have belonged to Laomedon. He ate human beings like a beast and raged for food of this kind. Philip had ordered him kept behind iron-bound enclosures.

Alexander was then fourteen years old. One day, as he passed the place where Bucephalus was enclosed, he turned to his companions and said, "Does a neigh strike my ears, or some lion's roar?" Ptolemy, who afterward was called Soter, answered him: "Indeed, this is that Bucephalus whom your father ordered to remain enclosed until now because of the savagery of his teeth."

Alexander summoned the keepers, removed the barriers, and led out the horse. Grasping its left mane, he leapt upon the quadruped's back and led it here and there without a bridle. Since this caused wonder among those who saw it, someone ran and announced the dangerous deed to Philip.

Philip, recalling the oracle, ran to the boy and saluted him as lord of the whole world. When Alexander was fifteen years old, he asked permission to go to Pisa for the sake of competing with chariots. Philip ordered horses and the other necessities to be prepared for him.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

Having boarded a ship, Alexander was carried to his destination by a rather favorable storm. When he had entrusted the care of the horses to his servants there and himself went out to examine the condition of the place, he encountered Nicolaus, king of the Athenians and formerly his fellow student.

Nicolaus greeted Alexander first, but not without insult. "Greetings, boy," he said, and Alexander did not greet him in return. Nicolaus then spoke a second time: "And by whom do you think you have been greeted? Indeed, I am Nicolaus, king of the Athenians."

Alexander answered: "What benefit is that vain boasting to you? Abandon it, since you waver concerning tomorrow. I do not approve such arrogance." Nicolaus said, "I would like to know why you are present." Alexander acknowledged that he had come to the chariot races in pursuit of the crown.

Nicolaus, filled with the gall of excessive indignation, spat upon the youth and left him after assailing him with curses. But Alexander, who had learned to display restraint in every discipline, wiped the spittle from his face. Smiling at the injury he had received, he said: "I swear, Nicolaus, by the majesty of my father and mother that I shall defeat you even in the present contest."

Not long afterward, when the appointed day arrived, Alexander defeated Nicolaus and the others who had come to the contest. Crowned with the wreath, he returned to Macedonia.

He happened upon Philip, who, having spurned Olympias, was turning to marriage with Cleopatra. On the wedding day Alexander entered the king's dining room crowned. "Receive, father," he said, "this first fruit of my labor." He transferred the crown to Philip's head and said: "When I join my mother again in a royal marriage, I shall share in your banquet." Having said this, he reclined opposite Philip.

Among the royal entertainments was a certain Lysias, most witty at provoking laughter. Wishing to bite at the youth in order to please the king, he repeatedly attacked him with many kinds of verbal mockery. He was repeatedly warned to turn to someone else whom he knew his sport would please, but he did not obey. At last Alexander, angered, hurled the cup that was at hand and wounded Lysias.

But the king, boiling with anger, sprang at Alexander and fell forward with an injured leg. Alexander then seized a sword, drove away everyone who rushed upon him as though to apprehend him, and departed. Those who were present carried the gravely wounded Philip into a chamber and placed him upon a bed. After several days, when there was already hope of recovering his health, Alexander entered before Philip and reconciled his mother Olympias to him.

§ II. The Death of Philip

From the History of Alexander and Vincent, book 5: In these times it was reported that the city of Methona had withdrawn from obedience to the king. Although Philip was stirred in spirit, while the strength of his body was still failing he sent Alexander with an army against it. Alexander subdued it in a short time.

When he entered before his father to announce the victory, he saw in the royal house men clothed in barbarian dress. Asking about them, he learned that they were an embassy of King Darius. Those envoys had come for the tribute and tax of the land and water.

Marveling at the manner and title of the demand, Alexander said to the one who appeared to be foremost among them: "Do the Persians claim from mortals these elements, which God has bestowed in common upon all?" He therefore ordered commands from himself to be carried to Darius: that he should refrain from this custom of demanding. Otherwise, Darius should know that he would contest more fiercely in battle with Alexander. Having said this, he ordered the men to depart.

Again, while a neighboring city wavered in its obedience, the expedition was given to Alexander and he was ordered to go there.

Meanwhile a certain Pausanias, abounding in wealth and pleasures, fell in love with Olympias. When he attempted this through intermediaries and the woman consented--namely, that after Philip's death she would marry him--Pausanias judged the time opportune because Alexander, whose name was already excessively feared, happened then to be absent. He suddenly rushed upon Philip and anticipated him with a wound.

When Philip had been mortally struck, Pausanias immediately hastened to abduct Olympias. While the people were still in turmoil in the theater because the affair had perhaps been accomplished according to plan, Alexander arrived. He encountered the commotion and Philip's wounds. Rushing upon the queen, he apprehended Pausanias's violence.

When Alexander aimed a javelin at him but was held back by fear of wounding his mother, Olympias encouraged him: "Throw it, son; throw it. Do not hesitate." But when Alexander discovered that Philip was still breathing, he ordered Pausanias brought there and placed a sword in his father's right hand. By striking with Philip's hand, he killed Pausanias.

Philip, now dying, said: "There is nothing about the end of life or death that saddens me. For I gladly die having avenged myself upon the author of the injury." He added: "I remember, Alexander, that the god foretold to your pregnant mother that she would bear an avenging son."

§ III. Philip's Character

Justin says in book 9 concerning Philip's character: King Philip was more devoted to the equipment both of arms and of banquets. His greatest riches were the instruments of wars, and he was more skillful in acquiring wealth than in guarding it. Thus amid his daily plundering he was always in want.

Mercy and treachery were equally dear to him. In his eyes no method of conquering was shameful. He was equally flattering and treacherous in speech, promising more than he performed. He cultivated friendships for utility, not fidelity. It was his customary practice to feign favor amid hatred, to stir up hatred between those in harmony, and to seek favor with each side. Amid these traits his eloquence was distinguished and entirely full of acuteness and skill, so that neither did facility lack ornament nor ornament facility.

Valerius says concerning him: Philip rebuked Alexander in a letter for attempting to draw the goodwill of certain Macedonians to himself by gifts: "What reason, son, led you into this vain hope, that you judged those whom you bound to love of yourself by money would be faithful to you?"

The same Valerius says in book 1: Philip, father of Alexander, was admonished by the oracle of Apollo to guard his safety from the violence of a four-horse chariot. He caused every chariot throughout his kingdom to be taken apart. He also always avoided the place in Boeotia celebrated by the name Quadriga. But Pausanias had a four-horse chariot engraved upon the hilt of the sword with which he killed him.

In these times, while Philip was besieging the city of Methona, an arrow shot from the walls gouged out his right eye, says Justin. That wound made him neither more sluggish in war nor more angry toward the enemy. Indeed, when they sought peace several days later, he granted it and was not merely moderate but even gentle toward the conquered.

The Greek cities, however, while each desired to rule, all lost their rule. Thus Philip plotted against the liberty of them all from a kind of watchtower.

That Artaxerxes who is also called Ochus sent his prefect Nagosus to all the regions beyond the River Euphrates, as the Comestor says. At that time the high priest in Jerusalem was named John. His brother, called Jesus, aspired to the high priesthood and made the aforesaid Nagosus his intimate.

When Jesus quarreled with John in the temple, he was killed. Indignant at this, Nagosus went up to Jerusalem, entered the temple, and plundered it. When he was reproved, he answered that he was cleaner than those who had killed a man within it. He imposed tribute upon the ministers of the temple.

§ IV. The Successor of Ochus

After the death of Ochus, whom some also call Artaxerxes and who held the kingdom of the Persians for twenty-eight years, the historians speak variously about his successor.

For in the chronicles it is said that after Ochus his son Arges reigned in Persia for four years. Helinand says: "Justin does not number this man among the kings of the Persians but places Darius immediately after Ochus." Tertullian calls this Arges "Argus" and says that he reigned one year. Isidore calls him Xerxes and says that he reigned four years. Jerome upon Daniel calls him Arxes. Certain others call him Arsanius.

The Comestor says: "After King Ochus came his son Arsanius, and after Arsanius Darius reigned in Persia." This is the Darius with whom, as will be said below, Alexander waged the wars mentioned in 1 Maccabees 1:

"After Alexander the Macedonian, son of Philip, who first reigned in Greece, defeated Darius, king of the Persians and Medes, he fought many battles and captured all the fortifications. He killed the kings of the earth and passed through as far as the ends of the earth. He took the spoils of a multitude of nations, and the earth was silent in his sight. He gathered strength and an exceedingly powerful army. His heart was exalted and lifted up, and he obtained the regions of nations and tyrants, and they were made tributary to him." Thus there.

After Darius had been defeated, the monarchy was transferred from the Persians to the Greeks through Alexander.

§ V. Alexander's Accession

Therefore some matters must be considered to clarify the foregoing: his battles against Darius and his victory, his subjugation of other nations, and finally his death. Here it also appears sufficiently from the words of Scripture that he was Philip's son, not Nectanabus's as is read in his history and was stated above, because Scripture calls him "Alexander of Philip," that is, Philip's son.

Unless someone says that he is called Philip's son in the same way that Jesus is called Joseph's son--that is, his putative son--as Luke 3 says, "as it was supposed," namely, that Jesus was Joseph's son. Thus Alexander was supposed and said to be Philip's son.

In the first year of the 109th Olympiad, which was the 255th year of the Fifth Age and the 3,628th year from the beginning of the world, Darius, the fourteenth king of the Persians and son of Arsanius, reigned for six years. In the same year Alexander succeeded Philip in the kingdom and reigned twelve years, as is also contained in 1 Maccabees 1.

According to Justin, Alexander was greater than his father in both virtues and vices. Each had a different method of conquering. Alexander openly and Philip by stratagems conducted their different wars. Philip rejoiced when enemies were deceived; Alexander when they were openly routed. Philip was prudent in counsel; Alexander more magnificent in spirit.

The father for the most part concealed his anger and even overcame it; when Alexander became inflamed, there was neither delay nor measure to his vengeance. Both were excessively eager for wine, but their drunkenness was different. The father was accustomed even from the banquet to run against the enemy, join battle, and recklessly expose himself to dangers. Alexander raged not against the enemy but against his own people.

The father preferred to be loved; the son, feared. Their cultivation of letters was similar; the father was more skillful, the son of greater fidelity in word and speech. Philip was more moderate in affairs and in sparing the conquered; his son's spirit was readier and nobler. The father was more devoted to frugality; the son to luxury.

Alexander's first care was for his father's funeral rites. Before all else, he ordered those who were complicit in the killing to be killed at his father's tomb. He spared only Alexander of Lyncestis, preserving the omen of his own dignity, for he had been the first to greet him as king. He also ordered Caranus, his rival for the throne and his brother born of his stepmother, to be killed. Thus Justin in book 9.

§ VI. Alexander's Army and First Expeditions

From the History of Alexander: After arranging his father's burial, Alexander soon ascended his statue. Summoning the whole multitude of the people, he said: "Behold, it is time for whoever desires to serve with Alexander to hasten to enter a military compact with him. For it seems worthy to me that we first make war upon those who saddened us before and now desire to despoil us even of liberty."

Having heard these words, every soldier gave assent as though he had been called divinely. At the beginning of his reign, Justin says, Alexander gave the Macedonians immunity from all obligations except the summons to military service. By this deed he won so great a favor from everyone that they said he had changed the body of a man, not the valor of a king.

Then Alexander, according to his history, opened his father's treasuries and distributed arms and riches to everyone. After counting the soldiers whom he himself had newly enrolled, he assembled 15,000 Macedonian infantry and 8,000 troops of various auxiliaries. There were 2,007 native horsemen and 8,000 lightly armed Thracians. Hence, with this number joined to the veteran soldiery, he gathered about 70,704 fighting men.

As Justin in book 11 and Quintus Curtius say, he chose not robust young men flourishing in the prime of life but veterans, most of them even discharged soldiers who had served with his father and uncles, so that you would think not soldiers but masters of warfare had been chosen. No one younger than sixty led the ranks. If you had seen the front lines of the camp, you would have said that you were seeing the senate of some ancient commonwealth. Thus no one thought of flight in battle but of victory, and no one's hope was in his feet but in his arms.

According to the History of Alexander, Alexander took most abundant traveling money from Philip's treasuries. After preparing a fleet, he crossed into Thrace and from there into Lycaonia, to which the present age has newly given the name Lucania. Proceeding from there, he traversed all Libya.

When the army had been collected into one body, he hastened toward the interior of Egypt. The Egyptians judged him worthy of the royal garment and throne, saying that a second Sesonchosis had come to them.

Again, he added to his name all the cities of Syria through which he passed. At length he came to Tyre, but the Tyrians closed their gates and denied him entry. While he sought to plunder the city violently, many Macedonians were slain and he withdrew.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

After this destruction Alexander threatened the Tyrians. He sent messengers and ordered a letter of the following tenor to be delivered to them:

"I had judged it befitting imperial clemency and justice to spare your city. But because you were the first of all to oppose my commands with insolence, you shall provide a fearful example to others of the strength in Macedonian hands. Farewell, if you are wise; for you will not fare well if you persist in this course."

When this letter had been read, the leading Tyrians ordered the envoys seized. First they subjected them to tortures and then fastened them to crosses. Provoked by these insults and moved by grave indignation, Alexander attacked the city with greater violence. He destroyed it and laid it waste, killing persons of every sex and age. He appointed a satrap over Tyre.

It should be noted, however, according to Vincent, book 5, chapter 25, that Justin says Alexander came into Syria after his two victories over Darius. There many kings, together with their islands, came to meet him. According to the merit of each, he received some into alliance, but stripped others of their kingdoms and installed new kings in their places.

§ VII. Letters Exchanged by Darius and Alexander

As Alexander was marching against him, Darius sent him a letter saying:

"Darius, king of kings and kinsman of the gods, commands and declares this to Alexander, my servant: Return to your parents, who are my servants, and lie in your mother's lap to be instructed in manly duty. For that purpose I have sent you here a rein, a ball, and a little box containing gold. The ball is sent because play with it suits your tender age, not these undertakings upon which you have embarked after the manner of robbers. Even if you led the whole human race with you in an equal conspiracy, you could by no means terrify the Persian empire. I possess so great a multitude of armies that nothing can better be compared to it than the sands of the sea. Here too is such an abundance of gold and silver that, if I wished, I could cover the whole earth with it. I have therefore sent you gold coins so that, should you require funds for your return, you may buy what is necessary for yourself and your men. But if you delay in obeying our commands, I shall immediately send men to bind you, disgracefully scourge you, and bring you before our majesty."

These words greatly frightened Alexander's nobles. But Alexander said to them: "Why are you disturbed by barbarous speeches that bear witness to arrogance, not proof of confidence? It is the habit even of weaker dogs to indulge the more in barking the more strength they lack."

Having said this, he presented the Persian envoys with the gold that they had brought, sent them home, and gave them this letter:

"Alexander, king of kings and kinsman of the gods, greets Darius. It appears to me shameful and utterly absurd that so great a king, supported--as he boasts--by so many forces, should long and grievously serve under the dominion of contemptible little rhetoricians and, among them, of one abject little man and robber named Alexander. I ask, then, what intention led you to say that you overflowed with riches of gold and silver. Was it that, on learning this, we might burn with desire for the gold and fight you more stubbornly and boldly? You add that you sent me a rein, a ball, and little boxes of gold. However you may choose to explain them, I shall declare that by an auspicious sign everything has been granted to me by you. For I take the rein so that I may use it upon those subject to you. By its roundness, the ball likewise promises me dominion over the whole world. The third gift you added bears witness that I shall become lord of your wealth."

When Darius had read Alexander's letter, he was moved by its arrogance and wrote as follows to the satraps dwelling beyond Mount Taurus: "Philip's son, a young man, is said to be mad and to be raiding all Asia. It is therefore our pleasure that he be severely beaten with childish rods, then clothed in purple and handed over to us. But let the satraps sink the fleet with its sailors in the sea, and let all the soldiers be transported to the farther shores of the Red Sea."

When Darius again wrote arrogantly to Alexander, Alexander swore that the matter would henceforth be conducted not with words but with drawn swords.

As they fought and hope of the outcome wavered, a sudden rain at last arose. Saying that heaven itself was opposing them, they took flight, with Darius leading the way, his chariot abandoned and a swift horse mounted. In this first battle, which took place on the plains of Adrestis, the Persian army numbered seven hundred thousand soldiers, according to Justin, and a great slaughter was made of them. From Alexander's army, however, only nine infantrymen and one hundred and twenty horsemen fell. King Alexander buried them with great honor, gave them equestrian statues, and granted immunities to their relatives. After this victory, the greater part of Asia defected to him.

Only the History of Alexander speaks of this sudden rain as though sent from heaven. It says that after the victory Alexander sent to Scamander, commander of his regions, to dispatch reinforcements. Alexander himself traversed all Achaia and, after gaining many cities, gathered one hundred and seventy thousand armed men, whom he led across Taurus.

The same history says that he next directed his march through Thebes toward Darius, but the Thebans closed their gates against him. While he besieged the city, one of the Thebans took up his pipes, fell upon his knees before the ruler, and played a song of entreaty, saying: "O mightiest of kings, do not destroy this city, which the immortal gods, ancestors of your lineage, founded for you. Remember that Liber was born here and that this city nursed Hercules. Amphion and Zethus, who are a great part of your stock, built these walls."

Yet Alexander could not be induced to refrain from devastating it with fire and sword. Later, however, he had it proclaimed that rebuilding Thebes was permitted in honor of three gods: Hercules, Mercury, and Pollux.

After this Alexander proceeded to Athens. The Athenians, together with the Lacedaemonians, had defected from him to the Persians at the instigation of Demosthenes, who had been corrupted by the Persians with a great weight of gold. Demosthenes had suborned a man to report that the king of the Macedonians had perished among the Triballi with all his forces. Thus Alexander arrived unexpectedly. When he had suppressed these disturbances, Aeschines urged the Athenians to surrender to Alexander, while Demosthenes strove in opposition to make them rebel.

The excellent saying, "When a friend asks me for a loan, I lose both friend and money," is attributed to Demosthenes. Demades himself, when the Athenians wished to bestow divine honors upon Alexander, said, "Take care that while you guard heaven you do not lose the earth." When Demosthenes was consulted amid this difference of opinion between Aeschines and Demades, he answered that the advice of Aeschines should prevail. A golden crown was therefore sent to Alexander through Demosthenes himself. After defeating the Athenians, Alexander overcame the Lacedaemonians. Justin, however, says that Alexander did all these things before his first encounter with Darius, concerning which something was said above.

§ VIII. Alexander Crosses Taurus and Defeats Darius

Therefore, Justin says in book 11, Alexander feared the narrow passes and crossed Taurus with great speed, traversing five hundred stadia in a single day. When he came to Tarsus, he was captivated by the charm of the River Cydnus, which flowed through the middle of the city and which, according to the History of Alexander, was second to no river in either size or clarity. Covered with dust, he cast aside his weapons and threw himself into its exceedingly cold water. A chill suddenly seized his sinews.

The History of Alexander says that he threw himself from the bridge with his arms on and swam out. But because his body was hot when he entered the violent cold of the water, the chill so injured his sinews and brought him so near destruction that he appeared about to breathe his last. He received a prepared drink from his physician Philip and, according to Justin, recovered his health on the fourth day.

Then, according to Quintus Curtius, he led his army through Media, emerging from a most laborious passage through the desert. Darius's army was positioned beside the channel of the Tigris. According to Justin, it had four hundred thousand infantrymen and one hundred thousand horsemen.

Alexander exhorted his troops to despise that battle line gleaming with gold and silver, in which there was more booty than danger. After battle had begun and the fighting had become frequent, a Persian dressed in Macedonian arms struck Alexander from behind. The blow failed and glanced away because of the strength of the helmet. The man was seized and brought before the king. Asked the reason for his act, he said that Darius had promised him part of the kingdom together with his daughter if he could kill Alexander. Alexander praised the promise and the man's daring and allowed him to return to his own people.

Alexander then gathered an innumerable multitude and approached more closely. At first he disguised his arrival in this way: after collecting a countless number of cattle into one place, he ordered leafy branches fastened to their horns and tails. With the horns raised, they presented something like the appearance of a forest, while the dragging branches raised dust that, seen from afar, obscured recognition of the army.

When battle was joined, both kings were wounded. The contest long remained uncertain, until Darius fled. A great slaughter of Persians then followed. Sixty-one thousand infantrymen and ten thousand horsemen were killed, and forty thousand were captured. Of the Macedonians, one hundred and thirty infantrymen and one hundred and fifty horsemen fell.

When Alexander beheld Darius's resources and display of riches, he was seized with wonder at such great wealth. He then first began to pursue luxurious banquets and magnificence. He also began to love the captive Barsine for her beauty; the son he later had by her he named Heracles. Yet remembering that Darius still lived, he sent Parmenion to seize the Persian fleet and other friends to receive the cities of Asia. As soon as they heard the report of victory, those cities came into the victors' power, their own prefects of Darius surrendering them with a great weight of gold.

Then, as the Comestor says, Alexander began to aspire to the monarchy of the East. Entering Syria, he took Damascus; after occupying Sidon, he besieged Tyre. At that time Saraballa, whom Darius had made prefect of those regions, selected eight thousand of his men and went over to Alexander's aid. He said that he preferred to obey Alexander rather than Darius and would hand over the places subject to his authority. Alexander received him gratefully.

Saraballa further said that he had a son-in-law named Manasses, brother of the high priest of the Jewish nation, and that many others of that nation were present with him. They wished, he said, to build a temple under Alexander in the appointed place. He declared that this would benefit Alexander because Jewish power, divided into two, would not rebel. Once Alexander granted permission, Saraballa zealously built a temple and altar. It endured until the destruction wrought by the Romans, and he established Manasses there as high priest.

While Alexander was continuing the siege of Tyre, he wrote to the high priest in Jerusalem, inviting him to furnish aid, prepare provisions for sale to the army, and pay to Alexander the tribute that he had rendered to Darius. The high priest Jadus answered that he had sworn an oath to Darius and could not violate the agreement while Darius lived. Alexander then threatened the Jewish nation, saying that through him they would learn to whom they ought to keep their promises.

After raising siegeworks he made Tyre part of the mainland. Once it was devastated, he besieged Gaza, and Saraballa died. Having captured Gaza, Alexander hastened toward Jerusalem. The terrified Jews cried out to the Lord and offered sacrifices, while Jadus prayed for the Jewish nation. When he fell asleep after the sacrifice, God instructed him to be confident, to adorn the city with garlands, and to go out to meet Alexander clad in his pontifical vestments, with the other priests wearing their lawful robes. Rising from sleep, he made the oracle known to everyone.

Hearing that Alexander was not far from the city, Jadus proceeded with the priests and a multitude of citizens to a place from which Jerusalem and the temple could be seen. What happened was contrary to the expectation of all who followed the king. Alexander looked upon the high priest distinguished by his pontifical robe and upon the plate above his headdress, on which was written the four-letter name of God. He dismounted, approached alone, adored the Name, and venerated the high priest.

The commanders of his army were astonished and thought that the king had lost his senses. Parmenion alone asked why he had adored the high priest of the Jewish people. Alexander answered: "I did not adore this man but the God whose high priesthood he bears. For in a dream I saw God in just such a habit while I was still in the Macedonian city of Dium. As I deliberated whether I could obtain Asia, he ordered me to be confident, for he himself would lead my army and hand over to me the dominion of the Persians. Now I have seen his likeness in this priest, and I trust that what he promised me will come to pass. For this reason I adored God and venerated the man."

Alexander entered the city and sacrificed to God in the temple according to the priest's direction. They brought him the prophet Daniel, in whom it was written that one of the Greeks would destroy the power of the Persians. Believing that this had been written about him, he rejoiced. On the next day he summoned the people and ordered them to ask for whatever they wished. At their request he granted that the Jews everywhere might use their ancestral laws and that the seventh year should be free of tribute on account of the sabbath of the land. He then departed for other cities.

The Samaritans, seeing his generosity toward the Jews, declared that they were their kinsmen and of Jewish seed, tracing their origin from Ephraim and Manasseh. They asked him to honor their temple on Mount Gerizim, which he promised to do upon his return.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

When the Samaritans asked Alexander for remission in the seventh year, he asked who they were, and they said that they were Hebrews. When he further asked whether they were Jews, they denied that they were Jews. He replied to them, "I granted this privilege only to the Jews."

Augustine says in book 18 of The City of God: "Alexander indeed offered sacrifices in the temple of God, not because he had been converted to worship him with true piety, but because in impious vanity he supposed that God ought to be worshiped together with false gods."

Justin says in book 11 that Alexander then went to the oracle of Ammon, desiring both to acquire a divine origin and to free his mother from infamy. Through agents sent in advance, he instructed the priests what answer he wanted them to give him. As he entered the temple, they immediately greeted him as the son of Hammon. Delighted by this adoption, he ordered that Hammon be regarded as his father.

Orosius says in book 3: "Alexander revealed to us that in the case of deaf and mute gods it lies within the power of the priest to invent whatever he wishes, or within the pleasure of the inquirer to hear whatever he wishes."

Valerius says: "Alexander mounted three steps of insolence. In disdain for Philip, he adopted Jove and Ammon as his fathers. Weary of Macedonian culture, he assumed Persian dress and customs. Spurning mortal attire, he emulated the divine. Nor was he ashamed to dissemble being a son, a citizen, and a human being."

§ IX. The Fall and Death of Darius

When Darius had fled to Babylon, he begged Alexander by letter to permit him to ransom the captives from the nations, for which he promised a great sum. But Alexander demanded the entire kingdom as the price, not money. Darius again sent word that he would give a portion of his kingdom and his daughter in marriage. Alexander wrote back that Darius was offering him what was already his. He ordered Darius to come as a suppliant and to promise that the victor might dispose of the kingdom at will.

Then, as Justin says, Darius, having lost hope of peace, marched against Alexander with four hundred thousand infantrymen and one hundred thousand horsemen. On the journey he was informed that his wife had died from the shock of a miscarried birth. He heard that Alexander had followed her death with tears and had generously conducted her funeral rites, and that he had done this from humanity rather than love. For Alexander had seen her only once, although he frequently consoled her mother and little daughters.

Darius then judged that he was truly conquered, since after losing in battle he was also surpassed by his enemy in kindness. He was grateful that, if he could not conquer, he was conquered above all by such a man. He wrote a third letter thanking Alexander for doing nothing hostile to his family. He then offered the greater part of the kingdom as far as the Euphrates, another daughter as wife, and thirty thousand talents for the remaining captives.

Alexander replied that thanks from an enemy were needless. He had done nothing to flatter an enemy or to seek inducements to peace because the outcome of war was uncertain; rather, he had learned by greatness of spirit to contend against an enemy's strength, not his misfortunes. He promised that he would do these things for Darius if Darius wished to be regarded as second to him, but not his equal. The world, moreover, could not be ruled by two suns, nor could the globe possess two supreme kingdoms without imperiling the order of the earth. Therefore Darius should either surrender that day or prepare his battle line for the next.

Alexander encamped near the River Stranga. It seemed good to him that he should go to Darius himself as an intermediary. Accompanied only by Eumedes and a single attendant, he came to the Stranga, a river which the frequent cold usually bound so hard that it was passable even by the heaviest wagons. Ordering Eumedes to remain there, Alexander approached Darius's tents while Darius was away inspecting his army.

When Darius returned, Alexander met him and said: "Behold, I am here as Alexander's intermediary, bearing these instructions: I judge that the king who advances less promptly to battle thereby testifies to his own cowardice and mistrust. Answer, therefore, what time you have granted us for the contest."

Darius said, "Are you perhaps Alexander himself, who so resolutely and confidently declares war upon us?" Alexander denied that he was Alexander and professed that he was only his intermediary. Darius then took him by the hand and led Alexander with him into the royal pavilion for dinner, where Alexander was ordered to recline opposite Darius.

He happened to do something remarkable. Whatever drinking vessel he took up, after drinking the wine he hid the vessel in the fold of his garment. When this was reported to Darius by his servants and the angry king accused him of theft, Alexander answered that this custom was observed at Alexander's court and that he had supposed the same custom was observed there.

After the king had been pacified and silence restored, one of the diners, named Pasarges, who had once been received as Philip's guest, began to recognize Alexander. Perceiving this, Alexander suddenly leapt up and departed, carrying with him the cups hidden in his garment. Immediately outside the doors he ran through with his sword a Persian holding his horse, mounted, and fled. The Persians pursued him, but their pursuit was slower and Alexander's course more effective. Darius was overwhelmed with grief at the loss of the enemy who had escaped.

Returning to the river, Alexander came upon another place that was not frozen, and he and his horse plunged together into the depths. It was night, but he drove the horse forward and swam out. He found Eumedes, explained to him the whole order of events, and cheered his commanders with the same account. On the following day he positioned his battle line, arranged and equipped, beside the Stranga.

Meanwhile Darius, Justin says, approached with his men. Suddenly Alexander, exhausted by cares, was seized by sleep before battle. When only the king was absent from the battle, Parmenion awakened him with difficulty. Everyone asked why he slept amid dangers, although even in peace he always took less sleep than others. He answered that he had been freed from great anxiety and that sudden security had given him sleep. He had feared that if Darius divided his army, he would have to endure a long delay in the war; now he would fight all Darius's forces together.

Alexander ordered that none of his men cross the river and gave the Persians room to cross. When battle was joined, great slaughter was made on both sides. At length the Persians fled, Darius leading the way. When all of them rushed heedlessly into the river together, the Stranga ceased to perform its usual service: it swallowed and killed everyone who entered it. The pursuing Macedonians cut down the rest. As Justin says, rarely was so much blood shed in any battle.

When Darius saw his men being defeated, the History of Alexander says that he wished to die himself, but his companions compelled him to flee. Some then advised him to break down the bridge over the river and block the enemy's approach. He answered that he did not wish to consult his own safety in such a way that so many thousands of allies would be exposed to the enemy; the road to escape that had lain open for him ought also to lie open for others.

Alexander, Quintus Curtius says, undertook even the most perilous actions. Whenever he saw the enemy fighting in the densest ranks, he always plunged into the midst of them most fiercely and wished his dangers to be shared with very few.

Darius, abandoning every better hope, entered his palace, cast himself miserably upon the ground with loud wailing, and was exhausted by excessive lamentation. At last, after resting, he wrote to Alexander as follows:

"Darius greets my lord Alexander. You will act more fittingly if by mercy you conquer those whom fortune has subjected to you. I ask you, therefore, to remember my mother, wife, and daughters in a manner worthy of yourself and restore them to me. In return for your goodwill, I promise to hand over to you all the treasures that my royal ancestors and forefathers left buried in the earth. I also concede to you the kingdoms of Persia, Media, and other nations."

When Alexander said that he would not do this, Darius then wrote to King Porus, asking him to assist against Alexander and making many promises. This did not remain hidden from Alexander. He hastened to overtake Darius before he entered the Caspian Gates.

Thus by this battle, as Justin and Orosius say, Alexander seized imperial rule for himself in the fifth or sixth year of his reign. His success was so great that thereafter no one dared rebel. He traversed Persia in thirty-seven days. In the city of Susa he found sixty thousand talents. He also stormed Persepolis, capital of the Persian kingdom, a city illustrious through many years and filled with the spoils of the world that had until then lain open to Persian rule.

Amid these events, Justin says, eight hundred Greeks came to Alexander. Darius had held them captive and mutilated parts of their bodies. Although Alexander gave them permission to return home, they preferred to die there rather than carry home their disfigured appearance.

According to the History of Alexander, two satraps, Bessus and Ariobarzanes, were with Darius while he was planning his flight. Wishing to gain Alexander's favor, they found Darius alone, overpowered him, mortally wounded him, and fled until they could see which way events would turn.

Meanwhile Alexander discovered Darius bound by his own kinsmen with golden chains and fetters in a Parthian village named Tara, as Justin says. When Alexander came to where he lay, Darius stretched out his suppliant hands and, as best he could, grasped Alexander's knees. At last he addressed him:

"Even in this fortune I possess a great consolation in my death: I shall breathe out my spirit in your hands, O Alexander, bravest of kings. Therefore, I beg you, do not begrudge me a burial, which I ask your Macedonians to perform for me together with the Persians. I commend Dunem, my mother, and Cilitho, my wife, into your hands. My daughter Roxane I commend to you with this plea: deem her worthy to be your wife."

Having said this, he breathed out his spirit. Alexander shed many tears and ordered him buried with royal dignity according to the Persian rite.

Orosius reports in book 3 that in these three battles and as many years, one million five hundred thousand infantrymen and horsemen were destroyed, drawn from that kingdom and those peoples. Over not many more years, the number of those routed is reported as one million nine hundred thousand.

Justin says that while pursuing Darius Alexander buried his lost soldiers with great funeral expense and distributed thirteen thousand talents among his surviving allies. Most of the horses had been lost through heat, and those that survived were rendered useless. All the money, one hundred and ninety thousand talents, was gathered at Ecbatana, and Parmenion was placed over it.

Meanwhile Agis, king of the Lacedaemonians, rebelled in Greece and was crushed by Antipater. When Alexander heard this, Quintus Curtius says, he rejoiced that the enemies had been defeated but did not conceal his indignation that Antipater had won, considering anything achieved by another to have been taken from his own glory.

Therefore, according to Jerome, in the sixth year of his reign and the second year of the 112th Olympiad, Alexander captured Babylon after Darius was slain. The Persian kingdom was destroyed in Darius; it had endured for 231 years under fourteen kings, from the first Cyrus to the last Darius, son of Arsanius.

According to his history, Alexander wished to learn who had killed King Darius. He therefore said: "I rejoice that I have overcome my greatest enemy. Although I did not personally execute him, I have fitting gratitude to repay those who have shown me their goodwill toward me. I therefore exhort them to reveal themselves. I swear also by the majesty of my father and mother that I shall make them exalted and exceedingly well known."

On hearing this, Bessus and Ariobarzanes revealed themselves. Alexander had them crucified in the highest place, saying that he had fulfilled his oath and was not guilty of perjury, since he had made them exalted and known to everyone.

Justin says that another of Darius's friends who had been captured was brought to Alexander; he had not only betrayed Darius but had killed him. In vengeance for the treachery, Alexander handed him over to Darius's brother for torture. Alexander used to say, according to Quintus Curtius, that those who expected from him a reward for betrayal were mistaken: no one would be a harsher avenger and punisher of violated faith.

Then, so that he might leave his name in those lands, Alexander founded a tower called Alexandria above the River Chanaim. He also founded twelve cities in Bactria and Sogdiana and called them Alexandrias after his own name.

Afterward, Justin says, Alexander assumed the dress and diadem of the Persian kings, until then foreign to Macedonian kings, as though passing over into the laws of those he had conquered. So that these customs might not be conspicuous in himself alone, he ordered his friends also to wear long garments embroidered with gold and purple. From a flock of royal concubines, chosen for beauty and nobility, he assigned each her turn by night. To these things he added immense preparations for banquets, lest his luxury appear lean and impoverished, and he adorned the feast with games suited to royal magnificence. He entirely forgot that such riches were customarily lost, not acquired, through these practices.

He began to rage against his own people not with royal displeasure but with hostile hatred, indignant that he was criticized by those who said he had overthrown the customs of his father Philip and of his country. On account of these charges, the aged Parmenion, who stood nearest to royal rank, was killed together with his son Philotas.

One day, at a formal banquet, when Alexander's drunken friends began speaking of the deeds accomplished by Philip, Alexander began to prefer himself to his father and to exalt the greatness of his own deeds to heaven, while the greater part of the banqueters assented.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

But Cleitus, an old and wise man who held the chief place in the king's friendship, relied on that friendship and defended Philip's memory. Angered by this, the king snatched a weapon from an attendant and killed him at the banquet. Exulting in the slaughter, he reproached the dead man with his defense and praise of Philip.

Later, when he understood his crime, Alexander wished to kill himself. Weeping, he embraced Cleitus, touched his wounds, and confessed his madness to him as if he could hear. Alexander would have killed himself had his friends not intervened. He remembered that his nurse had been Cleitus's sister and that he had killed so many friends: Parmenion and Philotas, his cousin Amyntas, his stepmother and his brothers, as well as Attalus, Eurylochus, Pausanias, and other Macedonian nobles.

Justin says that Alexander ate nothing for four days; his fast continued throughout that four-day period until he was won over by the prayers of the whole army. The pleas of the philosopher Callisthenes were especially helpful to him. Callisthenes had studied with Alexander under Aristotle, was close to him, and had then been summoned by the king himself to commit his memorable deeds to writing.

§ X. Callisthenes, Lysimachus, and the Captive Tribes

Having therefore recalled his mind to war, Justin says, Alexander received the Carasmi and Dahae into submission. He then ordered that he be not merely greeted but adored. Callisthenes stood foremost among those who refused. Angered by this, Alexander falsely charged him with knowledge of a conspiracy prepared against him. With savage cruelty he mutilated every one of his limbs, cutting off his ears, nose, and lips, and rendered him a deformed and pitiable spectacle. In addition, he ordered him shut in a cage with a dog and carried about to frighten the others.

Seeing this, Lysimachus, a pupil of Callisthenes who was accustomed to receive instruction in virtue from him, pitied so great a man, who suffered punishment not for guilt but for freedom. He gave him poison as a remedy for his calamity. When Alexander heard of this, he ordered Lysimachus thrown to a lion. But when the roused lion charged at the sight of him, Lysimachus wrapped his hand in his cloak, thrust it into the lion's mouth, tore out its tongue, and killed the beast.

When this was reported to the king, his anger yielded to admiration, and he held Lysimachus dearer because of the constancy of such great courage. Lysimachus, too, bore the king's insult with a great spirit, as though it came from a parent. Alexander killed many Macedonian leaders who would not adore him under the pretense that they were conspiring against him. Nevertheless, the Macedonians retained their customary way of greeting the king and rejected adoration.

After this Alexander subdued the Dranti, Enargitae, Parimae, Papameni, Adaspai, and other peoples dwelling at the foot of the Caucasus.

When Alexander came to the Caspian Mountains, as the Scholastic History relates, the descendants of the ten captive tribes sent to him and asked permission to leave, for by decree they were forbidden to go out. When he inquired into the cause of their captivity, he learned that they had openly revolted from the God of Israel by sacrificing to golden calves and that the prophets had foretold they would not return from captivity.

Alexander answered that they deserved to be confined still more closely. When he sought to close the narrow passes with soft bituminous material and saw that human labor was unequal to the task, he prayed to the Lord God of Israel to complete the work. The mountain cliffs moved toward one another. From this it plainly appears that God's will is that they should not come out. Nevertheless, they will emerge near the end of the world and cause a great slaughter among humankind. Josephus adds here: "What will God do for the faithful, if he did so much for the faithless?"

§ XI. Alexander in India

After this Alexander sought India, which is the beginning of the East, whence Asia rises. Marcianus says that in India there are two summers every year and two harvests. It is believed to constitute a third part of the world.

When Alexander entered India, his history relates, envoys whom Porus had sent immediately met him with this letter:

"I advise you, who raid and harass these borders, to remember that you are a man and attempt nothing against the gods. You can learn who I am and that no fortune has power against us. Therefore I command you to return from here to your own Greece and be content. If your Greece were useful to us, it would long ago have been subjected to the Indians; but because it is useless and possesses nothing worthy of our wealth, it has neither been sought nor will be sought."

These words did not frighten Alexander at all. Entering India, Justin says in book 12, he covered the trappings of the horses and the arms of the soldiers with silver. From their silver shields he called his army the Argyraspids.

When he came to the city Nysa, a city of Liber, he ordered its inhabitants spared, although they did not resist because they trusted in the religion of Father Liber, by whom the city had been founded. He then led his army to view the sacred mountain. By nature's gifts it was clothed with vines and ivy as though cultivated and adorned by hand. When the army reached the mountain, its men suddenly began to rave and, amid the king's astonishment, immediately ran about uttering the cries of Liber. Alexander thereby understood that by sparing the townspeople he had consulted his own army's welfare more than theirs.

He next sought the kingdom of Queen Cleophis. When she surrendered herself to him, she received her kingdom back from Alexander, having redeemed it by sleeping with him and obtained by seduction what she could not obtain by force. She named the son born to her Alexander; he later reigned over the Indians. But the Indians thereafter called Queen Cleophis, who had cast aside her chastity, the "royal harlot."

Later, while Alexander was pursuing certain fleeing enemies in India and had been left behind by the speed of his attendants and crowd, Lysimachus alone accompanied him across the broad masses of sand. When Lysimachus's brother Philip had attempted the same thing, he died in his hands. But Alexander dismounted and wounded Lysimachus in the forehead with the point of his spear.

Because the flow of blood could be stopped only by binding it, the king removed his own diadem and placed it upon Lysimachus's head while tending the wound. For Lysimachus this was the first omen of his future royal dignity.

Porus prepared for war and ordered his army to attack the Macedonians, while challenging King Alexander to fight him alone. Alexander did not delay. In the first encounter Porus struck Alexander's horse Bucephalus with his right hand and killed him, as Alexander's history records. The Macedonians regarded this as more bitter than all the other misfortunes that could befall them in battle. Alexander was thrown from his horse and rescued by the rush of his attendants.

Abandoning every other concern of battle, Alexander grasped the dead horse by the tail and dragged it back toward his own side, fearing that the enemy would seize the corpse as a trophy, which would have been deeply shameful to him. Thus, when his own men had been recovered, both sides were granted ten days either to heal the wounded or to bury the dead.

During those days Alexander formed the plan of challenging Porus to single combat, saying that commanders could gain no glory from actions in which they exposed their subjects to danger. This pleased Porus, who considered Alexander's small body: Porus measured five cubits, while Alexander measured only three.

Meanwhile Alexander cast aside his royal dress, assumed the habit of a soldier, and came to Porus's camp as though intending to buy some meat and wine. Porus asked him what Alexander was doing and what his age was. Alexander answered, "Like an old man, our commander warms himself in his tent by the heat of the fire." Rejoicing that, while he was young and swollen with pride, he was about to fight a decrepit old man, Porus said, "Why, then, does he not consider his age?" Alexander said that he was a common Macedonian soldier and did not know what Alexander was doing.

Porus handed him a threatening letter, promising him many things if he delivered it to Alexander. Alexander swore that he would ensure the letter reached Alexander's hands.

When the day and place appointed for battle arrived, the royal combat began. It long remained uncertain, Alexander probing for a place to wound Porus and Porus avoiding him. At last Porus turned suddenly to see the cause of a commotion among his own men. Alexander immediately ran him through the groin with his sword and felled him.

At this sight the Indians at once began rising against Alexander. But Alexander raised his hand for silence, suppressed the tumult, and, after the situation had been explained by Porus, the whole strength of the Indians submitted to him. Thus the History of Alexander.

Justin, however, says that in the first battle, in which Alexander's horse was wounded, Porus was overwhelmed by many wounds and captured. He grieved so intensely at being taken that, although he received pardon from his enemy, he refused both food and the treatment of his wounds. Alexander obtained his consent to live only with difficulty, and in honor of his courage restored him unharmed to his kingdom.

Alexander founded two cities there, Nicaea and Bucephala. Besides the infantry forces, Porus's army contained fourteen thousand eight hundred chariots, all fitted with scythes. Four hundred elephants were captured there, bearing towers with performers stationed upon them.

Vincent records the ornaments and riches of gold and silver in Porus's household in book 5, chapter 50 of the Historical Mirror. When Alexander had brought all these things into his possession, he enclosed the entire column with sheets of gold and made golden standards and banners. So great was the mass of gold that the soldiers could scarcely carry it. A thousand elephants of immense size bore the gold. The mules, horses, and camels also had golden bridles, although in their many thousands they carried the soldiers' baggage and necessary provisions.

§ XII. Alexander's Further Conquests in India

After this Alexander, Justin says, subdued the Prasii and Gangaridae. When he came to Aphytes, where two hundred thousand enemies awaited him, the whole army wished to return home. Alexander calmed it by a speech.

He then proceeded to the River Agisines and was carried by it into the Ocean, where he received into submission the Byacennae and Silei, whom Hercules had founded. From there he sailed to the Mandri and Sicambri. Those peoples met him with eighty thousand armed infantrymen and sixty thousand horsemen. After defeating them, he led their army to a city deserted by its defenders.

Alexander was the first to leap down from its wall, without a single attendant, and alone sustained the attack of so many thousands of enemies until his whole army, learning of his danger, leapt down with him after the walls had been thrown down. In that battle an arrow pierced him beneath the breast, and as he was failing from loss of blood he nevertheless fought on one knee until he killed the man who had wounded him.

The treatment of his wound was more grievous than the wound itself. Seneca says that while tormented by its pain Alexander declared: "Everyone swears to me that I am the son of Jove, but this wound cries aloud that I am a man."

After arranging affairs, Justin says, he sent Polyperchon with the army to Babylon. Alexander himself boarded ships with a most select force and traversed the shores of the Ocean.

While he sailed along them, he captured Dionides, a certain arch-pirate. Alexander asked what it seemed to him that he was doing by making the sea unsafe. Dionides answered: "What does it seem to you that you are doing by making the whole world unsafe? But because I do it with a little ship, I am called a robber; because you do it with a great fleet, you are called an emperor."

Meanwhile Queen Candace heard of Alexander's fame. She sent one of her painters and ordered him to paint Alexander's likeness with the greatest care and bring it to her. Alexander had already sent her letters containing terms of friendship. She wrote back that above all things it pleased her to establish that alliance so that it might endure between them forever. As a token of friendship, the queen sent him great gifts, precious stones, and marvelous animals.

Alexander, disguised as though he were Antigonus, Alexander's own friend, came to Queen Candace's palace, where she showed him her riches. When the queen said that he was Alexander, not Antigonus, he denied it. She then showed him his own portrait. Gnashing his teeth, he complained that he did not have his sword with him.

The queen said to him: "Put aside this fear. For I shall always preserve for you the same faith that you preserved for my son." A little earlier, a petty king had carried off the wife of the queen's son; Alexander sent several of his army and caused her to be restored to him.

Another of Queen Candace's sons, named Charogarus, who had the daughter of Porus as his wife, wished to kill Alexander, but his mother did not permit it.

Vincent then relates in book 5, chapter 53 and the chapters following of the Historical Mirror the marvels that Alexander found as he passed through different places. Alexander says that he discovered them in India in his own letter. I omit that letter for brevity and because its truth is very doubtful.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

§ XIII. Alexander and the Brahmans

When Alexander, as is read, was traversing the farthest shore of the Ocean, he was preparing to attack the island of the Brahmans. They sent him this letter:

"Most unconquered king, we have heard of your battles and of the good fortune that has followed you everywhere. But what will satisfy a man for whom the world is not enough? We possess no riches through desire for which you ought to attack us. Everyone's goods are common to all. Food is our wealth; in place of adornment with gold and gems we have cheap and scant clothing. Our women do not strive to please, for they account the cultivation of ornaments a burden rather than an honor. They do not know how to seek any greater increase of beauty than that with which they were born.

"Caves serve us a double purpose: shelter in life and burial in death. We have a king not to administer justice but to preserve nobility. For what place has vengeance where no injustice is done?"

Moved by these words, Alexander left them in peace.

There also survive letters of Alexander to Dindimus, king of the Brahmans, and of Dindimus to Alexander. They are abbreviated here.

Alexander to Dindimus:

"It has often reached my ears by report that the manner of your life differs from the common practice of people everywhere. The matter is indeed marvelous in its novelty, yet appears incredible because of the freedom of rumor. I have therefore hastened, Dindimus, to consult you directly through this letter. If what we have heard is true and you do these things from philosophy, explain it without delay, so that when I have been made more certain I too, if it is possible, may become a follower of this discipline."

Dindimus answered:

"You were not wrong to reject the reports long ago brought to you about us, since rumor is untrustworthy; it commonly delights in inventions. Now, however, learn the truth of the matter from me without doubt.

“The race of Brahmins lives a pure and simple life. It is captivated by none of the enticements of things and desires nothing beyond what the law of nature demands. Our nourishment is readily obtained--not that which the cunning of luxury searches for throughout all the elements, but that which the earth, unviolated by iron, brings forth. We load our table with harmless foods. Hence we count neither kinds nor names of diseases but enjoy lasting health.

“We do not ask assistance from one another where life is lived among equals. No place is provided for envy where no one is superior. Equality in poverty makes everyone rich. We have no courts because we do nothing requiring correction. We observe no laws such as those that expose crimes among you. The one law of our nation is not to act contrary to the law of nature.

“We do not perform labor that nourishes avarice, yet we avoid shameful idleness. We do not surrender our limbs to lust so as to weaken them. We possess everything that we do not desire. We are warmed by the sun, moistened by dew, and quench our thirst from a stream. The earth supplies our bed. Anxiety does not interrupt sleep, nor does thought weary the mind.

“We do not exercise the rule of pride over people like ourselves and do not demand even the least servitude, except from the body, which alone we believe ought to serve the mind. In building houses we do not melt rocks with fire, because we dwell more effectively in caves dug into the earth and the hollow recesses of mountains. There we hear no roaring of winds and fear no tempestuous storm. A cave protects us from rain more safely than a roof.

“We possess no costly clothing. Our limbs are covered with a wrapping of papyrus--or, more truly, with modesty. Our women do not adorn themselves. For who can correct the work of nature? Whatever is attempted is either fruitless, because nature overcomes it, or culpable, because it is presumptuous. Lust does not summon us to intercourse, but love of offspring.

“We wage no wars but establish peace by our customs, not by force. Fortune is the only enemy against which we often fight and which we always conquer. No parent accompanies the funeral rites of a son. We erect no tombs for the dead in imitation of temples.

“You are the cause of every evil among mortals: you possess everything and command all who possess you. The wisdom of the Brahmins alone surpasses you by refusing to love such things. We Brahmins do not suffer plague, for we do not dishonor heaven by foul acts. Nature always maintains harmony with the seasons among us, and the unoffended elements preserve their proper courses.

“Frugality is our remedy of medicine. It can not only cure pains that have already fallen upon us but also ensure that they do not come. We delight in no games or spectacles, no horse races or obscenities of the stage. When we wish to watch a theater, however, we reread the memorials of your deeds; although they are exceedingly laughable, we lament them.

“The structure of the world provides us other spectacles and diverse pleasures. In it we see the beautifully formed heaven shining with the variety of its constellations and the radiance of its stars. We see the sea, graced with purple color, embracing its sister earth, while fishes of many forms leap through its waves. We delight also in the appearance of green fields, from which a most pleasing odor breathes forth flowers of sweetness and nourishes eye and mind together. The shade of groves and the charm of springs smile upon us; among them varied birds, sounding together in musical harmonies, compose a sweet melody. These are the spectacles of nature, which it is difficult to imitate and blameworthy to reject.

“We do not furrow the sea with fleets for the sake of commerce. No foreign beauty has ever inflamed us with desire by the ardor of its loveliness. We do not learn the arts of speaking well and do not seek the service of rhetorical eloquence and orators, whose office is to devise lies with falsified speeches and attach credibility to accusations against innocence. Among us eloquence is simple and common to all, instructing only that one must not lie.

“We rarely attend the schools of those whose discordant teaching defines nothing stable or certain, one party placing the good in honor and another in pleasure. For divine honor we do not slaughter innocent cattle, nor do we establish temples inlaid with silver metals, nor dedicate altars glittering with gold and gems. God does not accept sacred offerings of blood; he loves worship free from blood.

“May he be made favorable by the Word to those who pray, for that alone is shared by him and humankind, and he delights in his own likeness. For God is the Word. By it he created this world; by it he rules and nourishes all things. This Word we love, and from it we draw spirit. Since God himself is spirit and mind, he is appeased not by earthly riches or munificent largess but by works of religion and thanksgiving.

“Therefore we judge you exceedingly senseless and miserable, because you do not suspect that your origin is heavenly and that you have a great kinship with God, but obscure the splendor of your race with the vilest things. You foster, cultivate, and love that in which the greatest pleasure is found in the flesh, though its handling while alive is horrible and its contact when dead is unclean. The elements are harassed in serving its uses, and the world labors to render it obedience. O most unhappy people, whose religion is a crime and whose life a punishment!”

Alexander replied by letter to Dindimus:

“If these things are as you claim, the Brahmins alone are counted among human beings only insofar as their trust is in God. They alone are believed to be exempt from bodily substance. Those who are said to lack all vices because they do not use the pleasures granted by nature either profess themselves gods or begrudge God his work. In my judgment these things should be numbered under madness rather than philosophy.”

Dindimus to Alexander:

“We are not inhabitants of this world but strangers. We did not come into the world so that we might choose to remain in it, but to pass through. We hurry toward our ancestral home, burdened by no weight of sins and lingering in no lodging places of enticements.

“We do not say that we are gods, nor do we enviously detract from God’s work; rather, we assert that you misuse his goodness. We do not assert that everything is permitted to us, nor do we teach it. Instead, for the sake of honor we commonly refuse to admit those things that pleasure claims for itself.

“God, the creator of things, formed various kinds within the world because it could in no way subsist without their diversity. He permitted their use to be discerned by human judgment. Therefore whoever abandons the worse and pursues the better is certainly not himself a god, but is made a friend of God.”

Alexander to Dindimus:

“Now you call yourself blessed because nature placed your dwelling in a part of the world where neither entrance nor exit lies open to strangers nor departure to natives. Besieged by guards placed over the means of movement, you praise your homeland because you cannot change it, and boast that you have deserved by devotion of conscience what you suffer as a cause of condemnation.

“Yet there is no merit of virtue in obtaining what cannot be changed. What deserves praise is to have lived temperately not amid narrowness and poverty but amid abundance; otherwise blindness and poverty alone would acquire the glory of virtues--the blind man because he does not see what he might desire, the poor man because he does not have what he might seize.

“We, who are constrained by no law of fasting, are stirred by free choice to live well, so that voluntary continence may obtain a worthy reward. Nature has given us many allurements, which virtue commonly restrains.”

§ XIV. Alexander’s Return to Babylon

When Alexander was about to return to Babylon, Justin says, he sacrificed to the Ocean in the sea, praying for a prosperous return to his homeland. Valerius says that while he sacrificed, a certain noble boy assisting him took up the censer, and a burning coal fell upon his arm. Although it burned him so fiercely that the odor reached the bystanders, he kept his arm motionless lest he interrupt the sacrifice. Alexander allowed him to be burned for a long while, wishing to test the boy’s perseverance.

After this he made the Amazons tributary and at last hastened to Babylon. As he returned, Justin says, he was informed that embassies of the Carthaginians and other African cities, as well as of Spain, Sicily, Gaul, Sardinia, and certain cities of Italy, were awaiting his arrival in Babylon.

The frightened Carthaginians had earlier sent Avulchar, surnamed Rodonus, to investigate Alexander’s intentions. He was a man distinguished above others for cleverness and eloquence. Their fear was increased by the capture of Tyre, the city from which their people took their origin, and by the founding of Alexandria, Carthage’s rival, on the borders of Africa and Egypt.

Avulchar obtained access to the king through Parmenion. He pretended that he had fled to the king as though driven from his homeland and offered himself as a soldier for the expedition. Having thus discovered Alexander’s plans, he wrote everything for his fellow citizens on wooden tablets from which the wax above had been removed.

As Alexander hastened toward Babylon to hold what seemed like a gathering of the whole world, one of the Magi foretold that he should not enter the city, declaring that this entry would prove fatal to him. Alexander therefore withdrew from Babylon to the deserted city of Bursia beyond the Euphrates. There the philosopher Anaxarchus compelled him once again to scorn the Magi’s predictions as false and uncertain, because if they depend upon fate they are unknown to mortals, while if they are due to nature they are immutable.

Alexander therefore returned to Babylon. Quintus Curtius says that Cobares, distinguished more for his profession of magical art than for knowledge, was angered. Human nature may in this respect be called perverse and ill-disposed, since everyone is duller in his own business than in another’s.

When Alexander came to Babylon, Justin says, many conquered peoples accused their governors. Without regard for friendship, Alexander immediately ordered those governors killed in the envoys’ presence.

Afterward he took Roxane, daughter of Darius, in marriage and gave to the Macedonian nobles the choicest and noblest maidens selected from every nation. He then called the army to an assembly and promised to pay everyone's debts at his own expense: twenty thousand talents.

After dismissing the veterans, he replenished the army with younger men. Those who were grieved at the veterans' departure demanded their own discharge as well. They no longer acted with prayers but with abuse, saying that Alexander should wage wars alone with his father Ammon. When words accomplished nothing in restraining them, Alexander leapt unarmed from the tribunal into the assembly and, with no one preventing him, personally struck down eleven authors of the sedition.

§ XV. Alexander's Death

His mother had long before written to him about her quarrels with Antipater and her separation from his father, and had warned him to guard against their plots. Alexander therefore recalled Antipater from Macedonia. Angered, Antipater sent an exceedingly effective and powerful poison on the journey through a servant so that it might be given to the king to drink.

According to Quintus Curtius, after returning to Babylon Alexander passed many days in leisure, then solemnly renewed a banquet long interrupted. Entirely given over to pleasure, he spent the day and night awake. As he was already departing from the banquet, the physician Thessalus renewed the drinking party and invited both Alexander and his companions. Alexander accepted a cup, and in the middle of drinking groaned as though pierced by a weapon.

His friends spread the report that intemperate drunkenness had caused his illness, but in truth it was a plot. The power of his successors suppressed the infamy of it. Antipater had devised the plot. The poison had such force that it could be contained neither in bronze, iron, nor earthenware and could be carried only in a horse's hoof.

Alexander was therefore carried away from the banquet half-dead and tortured by pain, so that he asked for a sword as a remedy. He suffered at a person's touch as if his wounds were being aggravated.

Antipater had already instructed his son Cassander to seize the kingdom. Cassander, together with his brothers Philip and Iollas, customarily served the king. He had been warned to trust no one except Thessalus and his brothers. The banquet was therefore prepared and renewed in Thessalus's house. Philip and Iollas, who customarily tasted and tested the king's drink beforehand, kept the poison in cold water and poured it into the drink after tasting it. Valerius says that Alexander had long before seen in a dream that he would perish by Cassander's hand, although he did not yet know Cassander when he saw it.

On the fourth day, Justin says, the king perceived that his death was certain and said that he recognized the destiny of his own house and ancestors, for most of the Aeacidae had died before their thirtieth year. The soldiers then became disorderly, suspecting that the king was dying from a plot, but he himself calmed them. When he had been carried to the highest place in the city, he admitted them all to his presence and extended his right hand for them to kiss as they wept.

At last he ordered his body buried in the temple of Ammon. When his friends asked whom he made heir to the empire, he answered, "The most worthy." He did not name his son Heracles or his brother Aridaeus, although he also left behind his pregnant wife Roxane, as though it were a crime for anyone but a brave man to succeed a brave man, or for the resources of so great a kingdom to be left to any but proven men.

On the sixth day, after losing his voice, he breathed out his spirit. Alexander therefore died at the age of thirty years and one month. He had inspired such confidence in his soldiers that, while he was present, even when unarmed they feared the weapons of no enemy. He never engaged any enemy whom he did not defeat, besieged any city that he did not take, or approached any nation that he did not trample down. Yet in the end he was conquered, not by an enemy's courage but by the plot of his own men and the treachery of citizens. The Comestor says that poison was given him by his sister.

When he died in the flower of his age and victories, a mournful silence fell throughout all Babylon. Even the conquered nations did not believe the report, for they considered immortal the man whom they had so often seen snatched from the presence of death. But when his death was confirmed, they mourned him not as an enemy but as a father.

On hearing of his death, the mother of Darius took her own life. The Macedonians, however, rejoiced at his death as if an enemy had been lost. Jerome says against Jovinian that after her husband's death Rhodogune, daughter of Darius, is said to have killed the nurse who advised her to marry a second time.

Of Alexander's death and the length of his reign it is said in 1 Maccabees: "Alexander reigned twelve years, and he died." From all these things understand that all flesh is grass and all its glory like the flower of the field. The grass withers, the flower falls, and all its glory fades; therefore the world must be despised.

Chapter Three

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Three (continued)

On the Philosophers Who Flourished in or About the Time of Alexander the Great

Aristotle, Alexander's Teacher

First, concerning Aristotle, who was Alexander's teacher. As Eusebius says in the Chronicles, Aristotle became Plato's pupil at the age of eighteen. Augustine testifies in book 8 of The City of God: "This Aristotle, a disciple of Plato, was a man of excellent intellect. Although inferior to Plato in eloquence, he easily surpassed many others. He founded the Peripatetic school, so called because he was accustomed to dispute while walking. While his teacher was still alive, his eminent fame gathered very many disciples into his own school."

Seneca says of him in Letter 65: "Aristotle thinks that 'cause' is spoken of in three ways: matter, maker, and the form imposed upon each thing, that is, its idea. He adds a fourth cause, the purpose of the artisan--that which invited the artisan to make the work, such as money, glory, or religion."

Valerius says that Aristotle taught that a man ought to speak about himself on neither side, since to praise oneself belongs to the vain and to condemn oneself to the foolish.

Aristotle also said: "It is a most useful precept to consider pleasures as they are when departing, for it presents them to our minds exhausted and full of repentance, so that they may be sought again less eagerly."

According to Vincent, Aristotle also said that poverty suffered only one disadvantage: it could not come to the aid of the needy. When Alexander asked under whose teaching he professed himself learned, he answered, "Under the things themselves, which do not know how to lie."

These sayings also belong to him:

"We should never be more reverent than when the gods are under discussion."

"It belongs to a good man neither to know how to suffer an injury nor to commit one. An injury unjustly inflicted is the disgrace of the one who does it."

"If people had the eyes of lynxes, so that their sight penetrated obstructions, would not even the most beautiful body appear most ugly when its inward organs were inspected?"

To this saying Boethius adds in book 3 of The Consolation of Philosophy: "Therefore it is not your nature but the weakness of the beholders' eyes that makes you appear beautiful."

Likewise Aristotle said: "Victory against our enemies is to be sought within our own walls."

Valerius says concerning him: "Aristotle, scarcely preserving the last remains of life in aged and wrinkled limbs amid the most complete leisure of literary study, applied himself so vigorously to the preservation of his homeland that, while lying upon his bed in Athens, he snatched it from the hands of the Macedonians to whom it had been subjected, though hostile arms had leveled it to the ground. Thus the city is known not so much as the work of Alexander, by whom it was cast down and overturned, as of Aristotle, by whom it was restored."

Augustine says in book 9 of The City of God: "Some say that disturbances of the soul fall upon the wise, that is, the virtuous man, but are moderated and subjected to reason, so that the rule of the mind imposes laws upon them and reduces them to the necessary measure. This is the opinion of the Platonists or Aristotelians, that is, the Peripatetics. The Stoics, however, think that no disturbances at all fall upon the wise man."

Cicero says that in this matter the Stoics contend with the Peripatetics more in words than in substance. Hence Aulus Gellius says that he read in a book of Zeno and Chrysippus, the leaders of the Stoics, that the Stoics held the following opinion: impressions of the soul, which they call appearances, are not within our power as to whether or when they fall upon the mind. When they arise from terrible and fearsome things, they necessarily move even the wise man's mind, so that for a little while he either trembles or contracts through fear or sadness, as though those passions anticipated the office of mind and reason.

Nevertheless, an opinion that the thing is evil is not thereby formed in his mind; it is neither approved by him nor assented to. This, they maintain, is within his power. They wish the difference between the mind of the wise man and that of the fool to be this: the fool's mind yields to those passions and accommodates the mind's assent to them, whereas the wise man, although he suffers them by necessity, nevertheless preserves with an unshaken mind a true and stable judgment about what should rationally be sought or avoided. Thus Augustine.

These matters have been introduced at such length because Aristotle was the leader of the Peripatetic school.

Aristotle wrote a very great number of books in the art of logic, which are in common use: the Categories, On Interpretation, the Prior Analytics and Posterior Analytics, the Sophistical Refutations, and the Topics. In physics, that is, natural science, he published the books of the Physics, On Generation and Corruption, On the Soul, On Sense and What Is Sensed, On Memory and Recollection, On Sleep and Waking, On Death and Life, On Plants, and On Animals. According to some, he also wrote On the Four Elements, as well as the Meteorology and the Metaphysics. There also survives another book called Aristotle's Perspective, and his book of Rhetoric.

His books and teaching are used more than those of other philosophers because he wrote in a more orderly and concise fashion than the rest. He also appears to have erred less than others and to disagree less with matters of faith. Nevertheless, the ancient holy doctors were more deeply imbued with Platonic teachings.

He also wrote books on moral philosophy: the Ethics, Politics, and Economics. These do not disagree with the morals of Christian life, although they do not contain them fully. Nothing there treats the faith, hope, and charity of believers, or penance, or grace.

Some notable sayings from book 1 of his Ethics follow:

"The good is what all things seek, and every act of knowledge and every deliberate intention desires some good."

"We call that which is sought for its own sake more perfect than that which is chosen for the sake of something else. Happiness appears above all to be such a thing, for we choose it for itself and not for something else."

"Activities in accordance with virtue possess a certain pleasure within themselves."

Likewise: "Happiness is an activity of the soul in accordance with perfect virtue."

Likewise: "All honorable things accord with reason."

From book 2 of the Ethics:

"Virtues arise neither from nature nor contrary to nature. Rather, the capacity to receive them is innate in us, and we are perfected through habit."

"From similar acts similar acts [read: habits] arise, and differences in habits follow differences in acts."

Likewise: "Discourse concerning particulars does not possess certainty, for they fall under neither art nor rule. The things with which virtue is concerned are naturally corrupted by excess and deficiency. A person who takes every pleasure and withdraws from none is incontinent; one who flees every pleasure is insensible. Chastity and courage are therefore destroyed by excess and deficiency, but preserved by the mean."

"Pleasure or sadness in one's works ought to be taken as the sign of a habit. Whoever withdraws from bodily pleasures and rejoices in that very thing is chaste; but whoever is saddened by it is incontinent."

Likewise: "It is exceedingly difficult to repel the passion of pleasure, which, as Heraclitus says, is coeval with life. Art and virtue are always concerned with what is most difficult."

"In things done according to virtue, one must ask in what condition the agent acts. First, whether he acts knowingly; second, whether willingly; and third, whether firmly and immutably. For possessing the other arts, these things are not reckoned except knowledge. To possess the virtues, however, knowing profits little or nothing; for the other arts it profits not a little but everything."

Likewise: "There are three things in the soul: passions, powers, and habits. Virtue will be one of these. Passions are neither virtues nor vices, for we are not called good or evil according to our passions, nor are we praised or blamed according to them. But according to virtues or vices we are called good or evil and are praised or blamed. Passions such as anger and fear are involuntary, whereas virtues are voluntary or at least not without will.

"For the same reason, virtues are not powers. We are not called good or evil simply because we are capable of suffering passions, nor are we praised or blamed for that. We possess these powers by nature, but are not good by nature. It remains, therefore, that every virtue is a habit. Whatever possesses its virtue well is thereby perfected and renders its work good."

Likewise: "There are many ways to sin but one way to act rightly; therefore the former is easy and the latter difficult. It is easy to miss the mark but difficult to hit it. Vice therefore belongs to excess and deficiency, but virtue to the mean. The good is simple, but evil takes every form.

"Virtue, then, is a voluntary habit that consists immediately [read: in a mean] relative to us, determined by reason as the wise man would determine it. It is the mean between two vices, one through excess and the other through deficiency. For virtue concerns passions and actions in which excess is blamed and defect condemned, but the mean is praised and loved."

Likewise: "It is difficult to be good; indeed, to find the mean is difficult. For example, not everyone but only one who knows can find the center of a circle. In the same way anyone can become angry and give money, but not everyone can determine to whom, when, how much, for what reason, and in what manner. Nor is this easy. Yet this is good, rare, and praiseworthy.

"Therefore one who aims at the mean ought first to separate himself from the more contrary extreme and ought to pull in the opposite direction. By withdrawing far from sin we come to the mean, as those who straighten bent wood do. In everything, however, what is pleasing and pleasure itself must especially be guarded against."

In book 3: "The good man judges particulars correctly because he sees the truth in each. He exists as their rule and measure. Deception comes to the evil through pleasure."

Likewise, in the Topics: "What is more lasting or more certain is more eligible than what possesses these qualities less."

"What the prudent man, the good man, a right law, or those recognized as diligent in particular matters choose is more eligible, insofar as such persons seek the good."

"What is such for its own sake is more eligible than what is such for the sake of another. What is nearer the end is likewise more eligible, and in every case what pertains to the end of life is more desirable; the possible is more desirable than the impossible."

"That whose consequence is a greater good or a lesser evil is preferable, as are more goods to fewer. Where one thing is for the sake of the other, neither both together nor the one is thereby more eligible."

"Each thing is more eligible at the time when it has greater force--for example, prudence in old age. No one chooses youths as leaders, because it is not established that they are prudent. Temperance, however, is more eligible in youth, for youths are troubled by desires more than old men."

"What is nearer to the good is better and more eligible. What is more like the good and the better is also more eligible, provided that it resembles it in that which is better."

Likewise: "What is more difficult is more eligible, for when we possess it we love more what is not easily acquired."

"Sometimes even better things are not to be chosen. Philosophizing is better than becoming rich, but it is not more eligible for a needy person."

"What is useful for all things or for more things is more eligible than what is not."

§ I. The Philosopher Apuleius

According to Hugh of Fleury in his History, Apuleius succeeded Plato, and the Egyptian Hermes, whom they call Trismegistus, succeeded Apuleius.

In the book that he wrote On the God of Socrates, Apuleius says: "Among prudent men, judgment is commonly stricter concerning carefully wrought works, but pardon more generous concerning sudden things. Nothing can be both hastened and examined, nor is there anything that can possess both the praise of diligence and the favor of speed."

Describing human beings, he says: "Human beings rejoice in reason and are powerful in speech, but possess immortal souls and dying limbs, flighty and anxious minds, dull and vulnerable bodies, dissimilar customs and similar errors, obstinate boldness, persistent hope, fruitless labor, fleeting fortune; individually mortal, swift in time, slow in wisdom, and quick in death. Association breeds contempt, while silence wins admiration."

Concerning demons he says: "Demons are animals in kind, rational in intellect, subject to passions in soul, airy in body, and eternal in time. Certain of them creep through alleys and gather counsels not from their own heart but from the words of others. If I may say so, they think not with their mind but with their ears."

"Nothing is more pleasing and more like God than a man perfectly good in mind, who excels the rest. In certain people it is astonishing that they neglect to learn the very things they least wish to appear not to know. They disparage both the teaching and the ignorance of the same art."

"We commonly examine rich men in the same way that we purchase horses. In buying horses, we do not consider the trappings but the horse itself, naked and alone: whether it is comely in appearance, vigorous in running, and strong in carrying. So too in examining human beings, do not esteem those things that belong to another; consider the man himself. Look upon him as you would upon my poor Socrates. I call those things alien that parents beget and fortune bestows, such as lineage and riches that provoke envy." Thus Apuleius.

What he says about demons being animals with airy bodies is false, unless it is understood of those times when they appear in bodies formed from air and afterward dismiss them. By their nature they have no bodies.

§ II. The Philosopher Hermes Trismegistus, or Mercury

Hermes the philosopher, who is called Trismegistus and Mercury, wrote a book On the Perfect Word. Vincent extracted these passages from it in book 5 of the Historical Mirror:

“The Lord and maker of all things made a second Lord of the gods. He made this one first, only, true, and good; he appeared to him full of every good thing, and he rejoiced. This is the Son of the blessed God and of good will, whose name cannot be uttered by a human mouth. From the one God comes the Lord of all things, while God rules mortals. He whom no one can completely discover is above all. God loved this one as his only-begotten Son.” Thus Hermes.

Vincent adds: “These words of Mercury, who is also Hermes, appear in part to agree with our faith concerning the Father and Son. But they disagree in saying that God made God; he ought to have said ‘begot.’ This does not cause a great obstacle, however, because in Scripture also the Son of God is called ‘made,’ and this is explained as ‘begotten.’ Thus in John 1 the Baptist says of Christ, ‘After me comes one who was made before me,’ that is, begotten by the Father.

“His statement that the Son is second to the Father does not mean that the Son is later in time or dignity, but only that he is under the Father’s authority, since the Father is the source of the Son. That the Son is the source of the Holy Spirit and of all things, he possesses from the Father.”

Hermes also wrote two books on astrology, in which he attempts to affirm a fated configuration of the stars and to answer those who deny and reject it. According to Augustine in book 5 of The City of God, this must be understood as follows: it is not altogether absurd to say that certain sidereal influences have power only over differences of times. The wills of souls, however, are not subject to the positions of the stars.

Although the constellations under which a person is born can incline the sensitive faculty, which is attached to a bodily organ, toward vicious passions, the will always remains free to assent or dissent. Hence Ptolemy says: “A wise man will rule the stars.”

Another book of Mercury addressed to Asclepius also survives. Vincent extracted the following passages from it:

“If through understanding God you see him, your whole mind will be filled with every good, provided that goods are many and not one in which they all exist, for one is recognized as agreeing with another. That all things are one, or that the one is all things, is philosophy alone--frequent contemplation in knowing divinity and holy religion.

“To worship divinity with a simple mind, to venerate his works, and to give thanks to the will of God, which alone is the fullest goodness: this is philosophy, violated by no troublesome curiosity of the soul.

“Man alone among animals is twofold. One part of him is simple, which we call the form of divine likeness; his humanity is always mindful of its nature and origin and perseveres in imitation of divinity.

“Eternity is immovable, and within it the motion of all times takes its beginning. Whatever belongs to movable time is always called back into eternity, and thus eternity remains stable under a fixed law of motion.

“God is Lord of all; all things are from him, in him, and through him. We therefore worship him by giving thanks. These are the highest intentions of God: that thanks be rendered by mortal human beings in adoration, praise, and obedience. Heavenly beings delight in heaven. We ask with most pious prayers, if it pleases the Lord’s goodness, that he free us from worldly custody and restore us to the nature of the higher part.”

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Three (continued)

From this comes the reward for those who live piously with the world under God. Thus Hermes. Although this man was an unbeliever, he nevertheless spoke these things faithfully and truthfully, just as the Lord spoke true things through the ass of the diviner Balaam.

§ III. The Platonist Philosopher Plotinus

There was also another Platonist philosopher named Plotinus, according to Vincent in book 5, chapter 8 of the Historical Mirror. Augustine reports in The City of God that this notable saying was his: “We must flee to our most radiant homeland; there all things will lie open to you.”

Mercury says concerning him: “What parts of philosophy did Plotinus, that singular philosopher, not reach? The distinctions of his life followed his teaching, since he demonstrated what he taught by an example of virtue not another’s but his own.

“That man was composed for every ornament of the virtues and strengthened by zeal for every divine disputation: just, courageous, prudent, temperate, and one who believed that by reasoned foresight he could overcome the assaults of fortune. He therefore chose a place for a quiet abode so that, separated from every noise of human society, he might free himself from fortune’s envy. He would devote himself only to the distinctions of divine instruction and arm himself against every threat of fortune with virtue as an intact and uncorrupted defense.

“Raised up by this confidence of mind, he also undertook the care and preservation of his body. For the location of his pleasing residence he chose the soil of a city in Campania, where the air’s always tranquil moderation sustained all the inhabitants in wholesome vigor. There was neither the force of winter nor the burning of the sun, but a temperate climate composed and moderated from both. There also, for people laboring under some illness, health was restored by the wholesome comfort of immense hot springs and boiling waters.

“Once settled there, he first despised distinguished honors, thinking the true honors to be those that the divine governance of providence had conferred upon him. No desires for riches took possession of him; rather, he thought those the true riches with which an adorned mind could discover the authority of its own origin.

“In one part of his discourse he attacked the power of fatal necessity and severely chastised those who feared the decrees of fortune. He attributed nothing to the power of the stars, reserved nothing to the necessities of fate, but said that everything was placed within our power.

“At last, although he had been established in such secure confidence, the power of fate laid hold of him. First his limbs grew cold as the blood stiffened in his body, and the keenness of his eyes gradually lost the diminished splendor of its light. Afterward a plague nourished by fluids erupted throughout his skin, so that as his limbs failed, his putrid body wasted toward death through the corruption of his blood.” Thus Mercury.

Augustine says in The City of God: “If anyone calls divine providence ‘fate,’ let him preserve his meaning but correct his language.” This is understood as follows: if “fate” means divine providence, everything is infallibly subject to it. Nevertheless, the language should be corrected so that we do not use the word “fate,” because the gentiles took it otherwise and wrongly: namely, as the influence of the constellations or some other thing necessitating free will toward what it does. This is false.

Accordingly Gregory says: “Far be it from the hearts of the faithful that they should believe fate to be anything.”

Likewise, if that effect whose proximate cause is unknown is said to happen by fortune, it is not meant that some things happen by fortune. Thus someone digging the earth to cultivate a field may find a treasure. But if something is said to happen by fortune in the sense that it escapes divine providence, it is false that anything happens by fortune. Certain gentiles understood it in this way.

Plotinus perhaps erred in this respect, because he trusted too greatly in the power of his own will, thinking that by his own virtue he could remain healthy and good.

Macrobius says concerning him in his book On the Dream of Scipio: “Plotinus, who wrote on the virtues, said that there are four kinds of virtues.

“He calls the first political virtues. It belongs to their prudence to direct, according to the standard of reason, everything one thinks and does and to will or do nothing except what is right. It belongs to courage to raise the mind above fear of danger, to fear no shameful things [read: to fear nothing except shameful things], and bravely to endure adversity and prosperity. It belongs to temperance to seek nothing that must be regretted, never to exceed the law of moderation, and to tame desire beneath the yoke of reason. It belongs to justice to preserve for each person what is his. A man possessing such virtues is made first ruler of himself and then of the commonwealth.

“The second virtues, which he calls purgative, belong to a man capable of divine things and prepare his soul alone. He has resolved to cleanse himself from bodily contagion and, through a certain flight from human affairs, to insert himself into divine things alone. These are the virtues of those devoted to duty who separate themselves from the activities of commonwealths. What each of these virtues intends we expressed elsewhere when speaking of the virtues of philosophers, which they indeed considered the only virtues.

“The third virtues belong to the soul already purified and cleansed, thoroughly and purely wiped clean of every stain of this world. There it belongs to prudence not to prefer divine things as though choosing them, but to know them alone and to look upon this as though nothing else existed. It belongs to temperance not merely to repress earthly desires but entirely to forget them. It belongs to courage not to conquer the passions but to be ignorant of them, so that one does not know how to become angry and desires nothing. It belongs to justice to be so associated with the supreme and divine mind that by imitating it the soul maintains an everlasting covenant with it.

“The fourth virtues are those that exist in the divine mind itself, which are called nous. From their exemplar all the others flow down in order. If ideas of other things are believed to exist in the divine mind, much more must the ideas of the virtues be believed to exist there. There prudence is the divine mind itself. Temperance is that the mind is turned toward itself in perpetual intention.

Courage is that it is always the same and is never imitated [read: never changes]. Justice is that it does not bend from the everlasting law and perpetual continuation of its work.

“These four kinds, each containing four virtues, differ greatly in relation to the passions by which human beings fear and desire, grieve and rejoice. The first soften them; the second remove them; the third forget them; in the fourth it is impious even to name them.” Thus Macrobius.

Concerning these virtues and others, however, you have material above in the fourth part of the Summa, in the first title generally and afterward concerning each one specifically.

§ IV. Anaximenes and Epicurus

In those same times of Alexander the Great, Epicurus and Anaximenes were considered illustrious. Vincent says in book 5, chapter 39, that this Anaximenes was not the philosopher who was the disciple of Anaximander, but the orator who was Alexander the Great's teacher in the art of rhetoric. Some believe that he wrote the anonymous History of Alexander.

Valerius relates this story about him. When Alexander was moving violently to destroy the city of Lampsacus, his teacher Anaximenes advanced beyond the walls and met him. Knowing that Anaximenes would oppose his prayers to him, Alexander swore that he would not do anything that he requested. “I ask, then,” Anaximenes said, “that you destroy Lampsacus.” Thus the salvation of one city was obtained through the beneficial use of a shipwrecked oath.

Although Epicurus himself, as Jerome says, had not learned letters and, according to Boethius, did not know the art of disputation, many excellent sayings are nevertheless reported from him, as are other most evil errors, as will appear.

Tertullian says concerning him: “Epicurus despises every torment and pain, declaring a slight one contemptible and a great one not long-lasting.”

Jerome says against Jovinian concerning him: “Epicurus, the advocate of pleasure, although his disciple Metrodorus had Leontion as wife, nevertheless says that a wise man should rarely enter marriage, because many disadvantages are mingled with matrimony. Just as riches, honors, bodily health, and the other things that we call indifferent are neither good nor evil but, being placed as it were in the middle, become good or evil by use and outcome, so too wives stand on the border of good and evil. It is a serious thing for a wise man to enter into doubt whether he is going to marry a good or evil wife.”

The same Jerome says in book 2 against Jovinian that what is astonishing is that Epicurus, the advocate of pleasure, filled all his children with vegetables and fruits, saying that one should live on cheap foods. Meat and elaborate banquets, prepared with immense care and misery, have greater pain in their acquisition than pleasure in their consumption. Our bodies require only food and drink, such as water and bread and things similar to these, so that nature may be satisfied. Whatever exceeds these things pertains not to the necessity of life but to the vice of pleasure. Nor can we devote ourselves to wisdom if we think about abundance at table, which requires excessive labor and care.

Seneca also extracted the following from the more elegant sayings of Epicurus in his books:

“Cheerful poverty is an honorable thing; but if it is cheerful, it is not poverty.”

“We are a sufficiently great theater for one another.”

“No one departs from life except as though he had just entered it.”

“He to whom his possessions do not appear most abundant is nevertheless wretched, even if he is lord of the whole world.”

“We ought to choose some good man and keep him always before our eyes, so that we may live as though he were watching and do everything as though he saw it.”

“If you live according to nature, you will never be poor; if according to opinion, you will never be rich. Nature desires little; opinion, an immeasurable amount.”

“For many, the acquisition of riches was not the end of miseries but an imitation of them [read: a change of them].”

“We should consider with whom we eat and drink before considering what we eat and drink. For without a friend, feasting is the life of a lion or wolf.”

“If you wish to make someone rich, you must not add to his money but subtract from his desire.”

“It is ridiculous to run toward death from weariness of life.”

“Knowledge of sin is the beginning of salvation.”

“Meditate upon death.”

“Immoderate anger begets madness.”

“Neither eating together, drinking parties, intercourse with women, nor an abundance of fish and other things of this kind prepared for splendid use makes the life of a banquet pleasant, but sober conversation.”

“Those who do not seek banquet provisions immoderately use them with moderation, for many troubles arise from luxurious feasts.”

These are among the sayings of Epicurus.

But he erred in many things more than all other philosophers. Lactantius says in his Institutes that he thought and said there was no providence of God, for he believed that God did not care about human affairs but remained idle and did nothing. He said that pleasure was the highest good and that souls perished with bodies.

He had, and still has, many followers, because fools--whose number is infinite, as Ecclesiastes 1 says--are devoted to sensible things and are more inclined to follow the impulse of sensuality than the reason of intellect, and bodily delights more than those of the soul.

Speaking in their person, Solomon says that there is nothing better than to eat and drink and display the good things of one's life, and similar things. Such people say in Wisdom 2: “The time of our life is short and full of weariness, and no one is known to have returned from the lower regions. After this we shall be as though we had not been,” and so forth. “Let us therefore enjoy good things and swiftly use the creature in our youth. Let us crown ourselves with roses before they wither. Let there be no meadow through which our luxury does not pass,” and so forth.

But afterward it is added: “These things they thought, and they were mistaken, for their wickedness blinded them.” As it is written in the same place, when set in hell and groaning they say, “What has profited us?” and so forth.

Seneca answers Epicurus's first error in book 4 of On Benefits, especially where Epicurus denies that the world is ruled by divine providence. He says: “You, Epicurus, make God defenseless. You have stripped him of all weapons and every power and, so that he might be feared by no one, you have cast him beyond fear. Therefore you have no reason to fear this god, enclosed by a vast and impenetrable wall and separated from the contact and sight of mortals. There is no material there for either giving or harming. Abandoned in the middle interval between this heaven and another, without animal or human being, why do you worship him?

“‘Because,’ you say, ‘of his majesty and his excellent and singular nature.’ Granting this to you, you plainly do it induced by no price and no hope. Therefore there is something to be sought for its own sake, to which its own dignity leads you.” Thus Seneca.

Lactantius likewise answers in his book On the Workmanship of the Human Body. Cicero answers Epicurus's second error in On Duties. The same author answers the third in On the Republic and On Old Age, but Augustine does so much more fully and perfectly in The City of God, as does Thomas in the book Against the Gentiles.

From these thorny thickets of the gentiles, therefore, learn to pluck the rose of truth and leave the thorns of falsehood. Observe also what the Apostle says in 2 Corinthians 9, following Jeremiah: “Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, nor the mighty man in his might, nor the rich man in his riches. But let him who glories glory in this: to understand and know me.”

Neither broad dominion profited Alexander the Great, nor power and riches Darius, nor their wisdom the philosophers. They were destroyed and descended to the lower regions because, although they knew God, they did not glorify him as God but became foolish.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Four: The Kingdoms after Alexander

When Alexander the Great died at Babylon, as Eusebius reports in the Chronicles, different men reigned after him in many divisions of the empire. This is also evident from 1 Maccabees 1. From this arose the kingdom of the Alexandrians, which is Egypt, while different men reigned among the various nations that Alexander had possessed.

Ptolemy, son of Lagus, was the first to begin reigning in Egypt, in the 267th year of the Fifth Age and the 4,777th year of the world. He reigned forty years. Philip, also called Aridaeus, Alexander's brother, reigned in Macedonia for seven years. Lysimachus held Lydia, Thrace, and the Hellespont.

The Comestor says that when Alexander had returned to Babylon and, after taking poison from his sister, had lost the use of his tongue, he expressed his will in writing. He did not wish to transfer his monarchy to any one man, lest anyone be read by posterity as equal to him in power. Instead, he appointed as successors to the kingdom the twelve men whom he had had as companions from his youth.

This arrangement did not stand, for only four of them reigned after the others had been cast aside, as is contained in Daniel's fifth vision. The he-goat signifies Alexander striking the ram, that is, Darius. From that goat afterward arose four horns, namely, the four kings who succeeded immediately after Alexander's death and divided the monarchy among themselves.

Thus Ptolemy, king of Egypt, who was surnamed Soter, after adding Syria to his realm, sought also to add Judea. He therefore went up to Jerusalem on the sabbath, knowing that the Jews would not take up arms on that day under the pretext of sacrificing to God, and entered the city without anyone resisting. Hence, according to Josephus, Ovid mockingly called the Jews "Sabbath-keepers," because through excessive superstition they had suffered grave harm.

Ptolemy took many captives from Judea and Mount Gerizim and returned to Egypt, where he exposed them for sale. Merchants of the nations bought and dispersed them. Through this captivity, although it was not general, the Jews were dispersed still more widely among the nations. Hence it is read in Acts of the Apostles that Jews assembled in Jerusalem from every nation under heaven. Judas the high priest was succeeded by his son Simeon the Just.

The philosopher Theophrastus flourished at that time. Cicero says that he received his name from the divine quality of his speech. According to Vincent in book 6, chapter 2 of the Historical Mirror, he was Aristotle's disciple and successor.

Aulus Gellius says of him in the Attic Nights: When Aristotle was already exhausted by old age, sick in body, and possessing little hope of life, the whole company of his followers came to him and begged him to select the person whom they should follow as successor to his place and teaching. At that time the two foremost men in his school were Theophrastus of Lesbos and Menedemus of Rhodes.

Aristotle ordered Lesbian and Rhodian wine brought to him. He praised both sufficiently, but the Lesbian more. No one therefore doubted that by this remark he had gracefully and modestly selected his successor, not merely the wine. Accordingly, after Aristotle's death, the whole Academy flocked to Theophrastus.

The following approved sayings are attributed to Theophrastus:

"It is expedient to love friends already proven, not to prove those already loved."

"You have lost vengeance upon an enemy if he perceives you to be his enemy."

"You will deceive an adversary more effectively by making him feel secure."

Another opinion of his was: "The judgments of lovers are blind."

He also wrote a book on friendship, in which he places friendship before every form of affection, that is, love, but testifies that it is rare in human affairs. A book On Marriage is also said to be his, in which he asks whether a wise man should take a wife. You have material from that book in Part Three, Title One, Chapter One.

§ I. Menander, Philemon, Cassander, and Olympias

In the fifth year of Ptolemy, Eusebius says in the Chronicles, Menander the comic poet first won by producing a play surnamed Art. According to Jerome, the Apostle's saying to the Corinthians, "Evil communications corrupt good morals," belongs to this Menander.

Aulus Gellius reports that in contests of comedies this Menander was frequently defeated by Philemon, a writer in no way his equal. When by chance he encountered him, Menander said, "Tell me, Philemon, if you please: when you defeat me, are you not ashamed?"

Valerius says in book 9 that either this Philemon or another man called Polemon was carried off by the force of immoderate laughter. Once an ass ate some figs that had been prepared and placed within sight. Philemon called to a boy to drive it away. When the boy arrived only after all the figs had been eaten, Philemon said, "Since you were so slow, now give the ass unmixed wine." He immediately followed the wit of his remark with repeatedly gasping peals of laughter, until rough, constricted breath burdened his aged throat.

In Ptolemy's eighth year, according to Eusebius in the Chronicles, Cassander reigned among the Macedonians after Philip Aridaeus.

Justin relates that Olympias, Alexander's mother, came from Epirus accompanied by Aeacides, king of the Molossians, but was barred from the borders of Macedonia by Eurydice and Aridaeus. Moved by this, the Macedonians went over to Olympias. By her order Eurydice and the king were killed, after he had possessed the kingdom for six years following Alexander.

According to Orosius, this Eurydice had accomplished many things under her husband's name through Cassander. She had known him shamefully and had advanced him through every rank of honor to the highest summit. At the woman's desire, he afflicted many cities of Greece.

But Olympias too, Justin says, did not reign long. By indiscriminately massacring the leading men, in the manner of a woman rather than a king, she turned favor toward herself into hatred. When she heard of Cassander's approach, she distrusted the Macedonians and entered the city of Pydna with her daughter-in-law Roxane and her grandson Heracles. She was accompanied by Deidamia, daughter of King Aeacides, Thessalonica, Olympias's stepdaughter and Philip's daughter, and many other matrons--a company more splendid than useful.

Cassander soon besieged the city of Pydna. When he pressed Olympias with hunger and the sword, she wearied of the long siege, bargained for her safety, and surrendered to the victor. Cassander summoned the people and asked what they wished done with her. Without regard for her former majesty, they immediately decreed that she should be killed.

When Olympias saw resolute armed men coming toward her, she put on royal clothing, leaned upon two maidservants, and voluntarily advanced to meet them. At the sight of her the executioners were stunned by her former majesty and by the names of so many of their kings united in her, and they halted until other men were sent by Cassander. These men stabbed her as she neither fled from the sword and wounds nor cried out in womanly fashion, but submitted to death for the glory of her ancient lineage in the manner of brave men, so that even in his dying mother one could recognize Alexander. Moreover, as she expired, she composed herself so that nothing indecorous might be seen on her body.

Valerius says in book 6 concerning the philosopher Polemon, whom Helinand says succeeded Xenocrates: Polemon was a young man of abandoned luxury at Athens, rejoicing not only in enticements but in infamy itself. When he had risen from a banquet not after sunset but after sunrise and, returning home, saw the open door of the philosopher Xenocrates, he entered the school, which was filled with a crowd of learned men, heavily soaked with wine, perfumed, his head wreathed with garlands, and clothed in a translucent garment. Not content with so disgraceful an entrance, he sat down to make light of the most illustrious eloquence and wisest precepts by the wantonness of his drunkenness. Although, as was fitting, everyone became indignant, Xenocrates maintained the same expression and bearing. Setting aside the matter he had been discussing, he began to speak about modesty and temperance. Compelled by the weight of the discourse to look back upon himself, Polemon first tore the garland from his head and threw it away; shortly afterward he drew his arm back within his cloak. As time passed, he laid aside the convivial cheerfulness of his countenance; finally he cast off all luxury. Thus healed by the medicine of the discourse, from an infamous debauchee he became a very great philosopher. These are his words.

§ II. The Syrian Kingdom and the First Seleucids

In Ptolemy Soter's twelfth year the kingdom of Syria, Babylon, and the upper regions arose.

Seleucus Nicanor reigned first, for thirty-two years; second, Antiochus, also called Soter, for twenty years; then Antiochus called Theos, for fifteen; afterward Seleucus Gallinicus, for twenty; and after him Seleucus Gerannus, for three. Antiochus the Great then succeeded him and reigned thirty-six years. Seleucus Philopator succeeded him for twenty-two years; after him Antiochus Epiphanes reigned eleven; Antiochus Dupater after him, two years; and then Demetrius, three years. Next Antiochus Sedites reigned nine years, and Demetrius Soter twelve.

Alexander afterward reigned nine years and ten months. When he was killed by Arsaces the Parthian, his brother Demetrius reigned again for four years. Then Antiochus Gryphus, or Cyprus, reigned twelve years. Antiochus Cizethenus expelled Gryphus and held Syria, but Gryphus defeated Cizethenus and recovered it. Thus by turns they reigned and fought against each other for eighteen years. Philip then reigned two years; when Gabinius captured him, the kingdom of Syria came to an end.

Seleucus Nicanor, the first king of Syria, captured Babylon at the beginning of his reign. His strength increased by this victory, he conquered the Bactrians and then crossed into India. After Alexander's death India had cast the yoke of servitude, as it were, from its neck and killed his governors.

Sandrocottus had been the author of its liberty, but after victory he had turned the title of liberty to his own tyranny. After seizing the kingdom, he oppressed with servitude the very people whom he had freed from foreign dominion. King Vanandro once ordered him killed, but he sought safety in the speed of his feet. Exhausted by flight, he lay overcome by sleep. A lion of immense form approached the sleeper, wiped away the flowing sweat with its tongue, and gently left him when he awakened.

First stirred by this prodigy to hope for a kingdom, Sandrocottus gathered a band of robbers and incited the Indians to a change of rule. Later, when he made war upon Alexander's governors, a wild elephant of immeasurable size offered itself to him voluntarily and, with the gentleness of a tamed beast, received him upon its back. Thus it served as both commander in war and distinguished fighter. Seleucus made peace with him.

§ III. Simeon the Just and the Lighthouse of Alexandria

At that time Simeon, son of Onias and high priest of the Jews, was regarded as illustrious. His surname was “the Just” because of his devoted worship of God and his ready clemency toward his fellow citizens.

Seleucus transferred many Jews into the cities he had built, granting them civic rights and municipal rank with honor equal to that of the Greeks. Eleazar, Simeon's brother, assumed the ministry of the temple because Simeon's son Onias had been left still very young.

Among the Macedonians, Pyrrhus reigned and afterward Lysimachus. Valerius reports that when Theodorus of Cyrene rebuked King Lysimachus and Lysimachus consequently ordered him fastened to a cross, Theodorus said: “The cross is terrible to your courtiers in purple; to me it makes no difference whether I decay upon the ground or on high.”

According to Eusebius, in the fortieth year of this Ptolemy, Sostratus Chidius constructed the lighthouse at Alexandria, which is numbered among the seven wonders of the world. According to Vincent in the Historical Mirror, it was founded twenty paces into the sea upon four crabs of glass.

How were such great glass crabs cast? How were they transported into the sea without being broken? How could foundations of cement adhere upon them, and how could the cement remain beneath the water? How did the crabs not break, and how did the foundation above them not slip? It appears a great marvel and exceedingly difficult to understand.

Isidore says that a lighthouse is a very great tower built in a harbor for the service of giving light.

§ IV. Ptolemy Philadelphus and the Seventy Translators

After the first Ptolemy, son of Lagos, Ptolemy Philadelphus reigned in Egypt. He began to reign in the 307th year of the Fifth Age and, according to some, in the 3,680th year of the world; according to others, such as Bede and the Seventy interpreters, in the 4,000th year.

He ordered that the Jews in Egypt be free. He sent votive vessels to Eleazar, high priest of Jerusalem, and had the divine scriptures translated from the Hebrew language into Greek by seventy interpreters. He kept them in the library of Alexandria, which he had assembled for himself from every kind of literature, as is found in the Chronicles.

The Comestor explains this more fully. He says that this king, being exceedingly studious and desirous of books, placed Demetrius over his library. When he asked Demetrius about the number of books, he answered that twenty thousand were present but that the number could shortly reach fifty thousand.

Demetrius also said that he had been informed that the Jews possessed a law uttered by the Lord's own mouth and written by his finger. He said that every effort should be made to obtain it, so that once it was translated into Greek its utterance might be kept in the royal archives. For this was the law of God, whom the philosophers call Zena, that is, “the Living One,” since zen signifies life or to live; the common people call him Jove.

To demonstrate the sanctity of that law, he added that it could be translated only by worshipers of the living God. Josephus the historian also says that when a certain Theopompus wished to insert this law of God into the histories he was writing, he was turned to madness for thirty days. Another man named Theodectus became blind for the same reason, but both were healed when they repented. Theopompus also saw in a dream that this had happened to him because he had scrutinized divine matters and brought them before impure people.

Demetrius therefore advised the king to write to the high priest of the Jews, asking him to send Jews skilled in Hebrew and Greek with the law of God, sufficient to translate it. To obtain this, he judged that gifts should be sent with the letters.

Aristeas was present. Having long felt compassion for the Jews' affliction, he seized the opportunity to free them and said: “How will you obtain what you request while so many Jews serve in your kingdom? Free them, therefore, and nothing could be more pleasing to the high priest of the Jews. Do not suppose from what I say that I am related to the Jews, but understand that it is in your interest to honor God, the maker of all.”

The king freed one hundred and twenty thousand Jews, giving their masters one hundred and twenty thousand silver drachmas [read: one hundred and twenty silver drachmas] for each person. When the king said that this was a great sum, they answered: “It is indeed great, but not for a munificent king.”

The king then wrote to Eleazar the high priest in this manner:

“I have granted liberty to your nation that was among us, judging this to be pleasing to God. Some of them I have assigned to military service; others whose fidelity I have tested I have established in the palace. I have also decreed that your laws should be placed in the library. You will therefore do well by sending us elders who are able carefully to leave us a translation of them.

“I have just sent one hundred talents of silver for sacrifices and have set apart five hundred talents for making bowls and libation vessels, as well as gems without number for the work of craftsmen according to their choice. Command us what you wish to be made from these things, and we shall embrace it the more gladly.”

Eleazar sent him what he requested and wrote back:

“To interpret the law you request, I have sent elders, six from every tribe, carrying the law. It will be the duty of your piety and justice to return it carefully to us.”

According to Vincent in book 6, chapter 16 of the Historical Mirror, following the Comestor, these were the Seventy interpreters. Although there were seventy-two, they are nevertheless called seventy after the manner of Scripture, which often leaves unmentioned a small number exceeding a round total.

When they came to the king, they were received kindly but were not admitted to him until the fifth day. A triumphal solemnity was then imminent on account of a certain triumph that his ancestors had celebrated on that same day. On that day, therefore, he received those whom he had determined to honor before the whole body of the princes.

After their reception they remained with the king for twelve days. He questioned them about matters he had arranged in his heart, especially two: knowledge of God and the government of a kingdom. When they had instructed him concerning royal government, they disputed more fully about the worship of one God and that no creature was God. Hence, whenever in either their discussion or translation they encountered the mystery of the Trinity or of the Incarnation, they either passed over it in silence or translated it enigmatically, lest they appear to have taught that three gods should be worshiped or that a creature was God.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Four (continued)

Thus in Isaiah, after the prophet had said that a child would be born and had added his six names--“Wonderful, Counselor,” and the rest--in place of those six names the translators wrote “Angel of Great Counsel.”

They then showed the king the scroll that they had brought with them. He could not sufficiently marvel at the thinness of its sheets and at their joining, which the eyes could not perceive, although golden letters appeared legible upon the whiteness of the pages.

The translators were brought into the king's private house, which was reserved for deliberating upon affairs. Individual cells and everything that seemed opportune and convenient for translating were given to them. At dawn they went out to wish good things to the king. They then washed themselves in the sea according to the purification of the Jews and afterward translated until the ninth hour. From there they proceeded to take food and rest. They completed the work in seventy-two days.

For this reason it has seemed to some that at that time they translated only the Pentateuch; afterward--either before they returned home or when some of them came back to the king--they translated the Prophets and Psalms. Nevertheless, if the work was done so miraculously that, as Augustine relates, one and the same edition without disagreement was found at the end of that period, it could no less miraculously have happened that within the brief space of seventy-two days they translated both the Law and all the Prophets together with the Psalms.

Jerome, however, does not approve the opinion that without any comparison among themselves all seventy-two produced one edition without any disagreement, because neither Josephus nor the other ancient historians report this. Instead, he asserts that the work was done not miraculously but by human intelligence and diligence: on the sabbath they all compared together what each had translated during the six days of the week; whichever interpretation was judged more suitable was adopted by all, so that all agreed upon one version.

Jerome asserts that this is not marvelous, since Ezra corrected the Law that he had recovered through the Spirit after it had been burned by the Chaldeans by comparing it with the ancient text preserved among the Samaritans.

When the work had been completed, Demetrius, who was placed over the books, summoned all the Jews in Alexandria and the more learned men from the province. The translators' version was read before them and approved. When the interpreters asked the king to give it authority so that it might remain unchangeable, he promised to do so, provided that they corrected it so carefully that they would not afterward be compelled to nullify what had once been judged.

He sent them back laden with gifts. He also sent presents to Eleazar and dispatched to the temple golden vessels and a golden table distinguished by priceless gems.

Thus this most learned King Ptolemy assembled for himself, as was said, a library from every kind of literature. He placed over it Demetrius Valerius, at that time the most approved of grammarians, to whom among other things he had entrusted the prefecture.

This Ptolemy composed canons of the stars and wrote many books. He caused the earth to be described by the philosopher Eratosthenes and sent Dionysius into India to transmit its illustrious matters to memory.

§ V. Sosthenes, Brennus, and the Gauls at Delphi

In the fourth year of Philadelphus, Sosthenes, the tenth king of the Macedonians, reigned for two years.

Meanwhile, Justin says, Brennus, under whose command a portion of the Gauls had poured into Greece, heard of the victory of his people, who under their commander Belgius had defeated the Macedonians. He gathered 150,000 infantrymen and 15,000 horsemen and invaded Macedonia, laying waste fields and villas.

Sosthenes met him with his army in battle formation, but the few were easily defeated by the many, the fearful by the strong. Then Brennus, as though earthly spoils already seemed worthless to him, turned his mind toward the temples of the gods. He jested scurrilously that wealthy gods ought to give generously to human beings.

He immediately went to Delphi, preferring gold to religion and plunder to the offense of the gods. He affirmed that the gods needed no wealth, since they were accustomed to bestow it upon human beings.

The temple of Apollo at Delphi stands upon Mount Parnassus. Cliffs converging from every direction meet there upon a single rock. Thus not walls but precipices, not artificial but natural defenses, protect the temple and city. The center of the rock recedes in the form of a theater. For this reason the shouting of people, or any sound that arises there, is multiplied as the cliffs resound and answer one another; it commonly echoes more loudly than would be believed. The majesty of the place frequently brings greater terror to those ignorant of its nature and wonder to those who are amazed.

Within this winding rock, about halfway up the mountain, is a small plain. In it lies a deep opening in the earth used by the oracle. From it a fervid breath, expelled upward by a certain force as though by wind, turns the minds of seers to frenzy and compels them, when filled by the god, to give responses to inquirers. Many rich gifts of kings and peoples may be seen there.

When the multitude of Gauls first found the countryside filled with wine and other provisions, it rejoiced no less in the abundance than in the victory. It scattered through the fields, abandoned the standards, and wandered about to seize everything. The people of the countryside are said to have been warned by oracles at the first report of their approach not to carry their harvests and wines out of their villas.

Brennus's army contained seventy thousand selected infantrymen, while the Delphians and their allies had only four thousand soldiers. In the temple were many statues with four-horse chariots cast in solid gold. Greedy for this plunder, the Gauls rushed into battle without regard for danger.

From the summit of the mountain the Delphians overwhelmed the falling Gauls partly with rocks and partly with weapons. During this engagement, the soothsayers of all the temples and the prophet himself, with hair unbound and wearing their insignia and sacred fillets, suddenly ran terrified and frenzied into the front line of the fighters. They cried that the god had arrived and that they had seen him leap into the temple through an opening in its roof. They said that a youth of beauty distinguished beyond human measure and his companions, two armed maidens, had come from the neighboring temples of Diana and Minerva, and that they had heard the twang of a bow and the clamor of arms. They warned the others not to delay in slaughtering the enemy while the gods led the way.

Inflamed by these cries, all rushed eagerly into battle. An earthquake soon broke off part of the mountain and crushed the Gallic army. A storm followed, killing with hail and cold those already suffering from wounds. Brennus himself, unable to endure the pain of his wounds, ended his life with a dagger.

The other of the two commanders who were with him left Greece with ten thousand wounded men. As they fled in terror, they passed no night under shelter and no day without labor and danger. Continual rains, frost, hardened snow, hunger, looseness, and above all the great sleepless evil of the disastrous war wore away its survivors. Not one man from so great an army remained even to preserve the memory of the hidden disaster.

§ VI. Antigonus, the Gauls, and Pyrrhus

After Sosthenes, Antigonus reigned among the Macedonians, thirty-six years after Alexander and for eleven years, as Eusebius writes in the Chronicles.

When Brennus set out for Greece, Justin says, fifteen thousand infantrymen and three thousand horsemen had been left to protect the borders of the nation. After routing the forces of the Getae and Triballi, they threatened Macedonia. They sent envoys to King Antigonus to offer him peace for a price and at the same time to spy upon his camp.

When they were invited to dinner, a great weight of gold and silver was displayed, and elephants were shown to inspire terror. On their return, the envoys exaggerated everything and reported both the king's wealth and his negligence. The Gauls therefore attacked the royal camp at night.

But the king had given his men a signal the previous day that, after carrying away everything, they should hide in a nearby forest. The Gauls found everything empty and, long afraid to enter, finally took what they found and returned to the shore. While they heedlessly plundered the ships there, the rowers and the part of the army that had taken refuge there with their wives and children slaughtered them.

At that time the eastern kings waged no wars without a mercenary Gallic army and, when expelled, fled to no one but the Gauls. So great was the terror of the Gallic name and the unconquered success of their arms that those kings judged they could neither protect their majesty nor recover it after losing it except by Gallic courage. Thus the survivors were summoned to aid Eumenes, king of Bithynia. After gaining victory with him they divided the kingdom and named that region Gallograecia.

At that time, Alchimus reports, Pyrrhus returned to Epirus, invaded the borders of Macedonia, defeated Antigonus, and received Macedonia into submission. Just as Pyrrhus was regarded as unconquered in subduing kingdoms, so he quickly lost those he had subdued and acquired.

His first war was among the Spartans, where he was opposed with greater courage by the women than by the men. There he lost his son Ptolemy and the strongest part of his army. So great a multitude of women ran together to defend the city that Pyrrhus withdrew no more because he had been bravely defeated than because he had been shamed.

§ VII. Arcesilaus, Crates, Stilbo, and Aratus

At that same time, after the death of the philosopher Polemon, the philosophers Arcesilaus and Crates were regarded as illustrious. Arcesilaus was the man from whom, as Augustine says, the school of the New Academics began. They say that nothing can be known and that all things are uncertain. Seneca says that they take away all hope of knowledge; yet it is better to know superfluous things than nothing.

Augustine briefly refutes their opinion in book 11 of The City of God: "We exist, we know that we exist, and we love both our existence and this knowledge. In these truths we fear none of the arguments of the Academics, who say, 'What if you are deceived?' For if I am deceived, I exist. One who does not exist cannot be deceived; therefore I exist if I am deceived.

"Since I exist if I am deceived, how am I deceived in believing that I exist, when it is certain that I exist if I am deceived? Therefore, since I would exist if I were deceived, I am undoubtedly not deceived in knowing that I exist. Consequently I am also not deceived in knowing that I know I exist. Just as I know that I exist, so also I know this very fact: that I know it.

"When I love these two truths, I add to the things I know love itself as a third thing of no lesser value. Nor am I deceived that I love myself, since I am not deceived in those things that I love. Even if those things were false, it would still be true that I loved false things. For how would you rightly rebuke and forbid me from loving false things if it were false that I loved them? But since both those things are true and certain, who doubts that love of them is also true and certain?

"Moreover, no one exists who does not wish to exist, just as no one exists who does not wish to be happy. For how could one be happy if one were nothing?" Thus Augustine.

Seneca says of Arcesilaus in On Benefits: When Arcesilaus judged that he should secretly aid a poor friend who concealed his poverty, was sick, and would not even confess that he lacked money for necessities, he placed a purse beneath his pillow without his knowledge. Thus the man, uselessly modest, would find rather than receive what he desired.

Crates, whom the Chronicles places with Arcesilaus, is said to have been a Theban by nation. It is read of him that he threw a great weight of gold into the sea, saying: "Begone, most evil riches. I drown you lest I be drowned by you."

Seneca also reports of him in Letter 9: Crates, a pupil of Stilbo, saw a young man walking secretly and asked what he was doing there alone. "I am speaking with myself," the youth replied. Crates said, "Take care, I beg you, and consider diligently lest you speak with an evil man."

Stilbo was the teacher whom Epicurus's letter praises. When his homeland was captured and he lost his wife and children, Stilbo alone came out from the fire. Demetrius asked whether he had lost everything. "I carry all my goods with me," he answered, for he bore them in his breast, not upon his shoulders.

At that time, according to the Chronicles, Aratus flourished. This Aratus, together with Eudoxus, was an astrologer who, Augustine says in book 16 of The City of God, boasted that he had comprehended and recorded the entire number of the stars. Augustine says that the authority of the Lord's words to Abraham condemns them: "Look up to heaven and number the stars, if you can." For how can all be numbered when not all can be seen?

§ VIII. Zeno, Cleanthes, and Chrysippus

In the fourteenth year of Philadelphus, the Stoic Zeno died. After him Cleanthes flourished, according to Eusebius in the Chronicles.

According to Vincent in the Historical Mirror, this saying belonged to Zeno: “It belongs to the wise man to be incapable of disturbance, provided that his reason does not yield to depraved passions.” Seneca says that Zeno also used this syllogism: “No evil is glorious. Death is glorious. Therefore death is not an evil.” Hence, Lactantius says, Zeno inflicted death upon himself with his own hand so that he might live more happily after death.

Augustine says that Zeno and Chrysippus were leaders of the Stoics. Many excellent sayings and many wrong ones are attributed to Chrysippus.

Seneca says of him in Letter 9: “Chrysippus says that the wise man lacks nothing, and nevertheless has need of many things. By contrast, the fool has need of nothing--for he knows how to use nothing--but lacks everything.”

The same Seneca says in book 2 of On Benefits: “I wish to use the analogy of our Chrysippus about a game of ball. There is no doubt that the ball falls through the fault either of the thrower or of the catcher; it keeps its course only when it is suitably thrown and caught.”

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Four (continued)

A good player must throw the ball differently to a tall fellow player than to a short one. The same principle applies to a benefit: unless it is adapted to both persons, giver and recipient, it will neither leave the former nor reach the latter as it ought.

In the eightieth year of his age, Chrysippus left a begun volume of most exact subtlety. He had expended so much labor upon that work that a long life would be needed to understand thoroughly what he wrote, Valerius says concerning him. According to Solinus, he came from Heliopolis, an ancient town of Sicily. Cleanthes, however, was an Asian.

According to Vincent in book 6, chapter 26 of the Historical Mirror, Asia produced many illustrious persons: among poets, Homer, Anacreon, Minerum, Antimachus, Hipponax, Alcaeus, and the woman Sophon; among historians, Xanthus, Hecataeus, Herodotus, Ephorus, and Theopompus; among the Seven Sages, Bias, Thales, and Pittacus; and among philosophers, Cleanthes the Stoic, Anaxagoras the natural philosopher, Heraclitus the Obscure, and Xenophanes of Colophon.

Lactantius says that Chrysippus himself, believing that souls were eternal, laid hands upon himself as though about to migrate to heaven.

Jerome says against Jovinian that Diodorus the Socratic is read to have had five daughters, dialecticians of distinguished chastity. Philo, the teacher of Carneades, wrote a very full history about them.

Valerius says in book 8 concerning Carneades: “Carneades, a laborious and long-serving soldier of wisdom, made an end of living and philosophizing in his 110th year. When he sat at table absorbed in thought, he forgot to extend his hand toward the food. But Melissa, whom he regarded in place of a wife, moderated between the duties of interrupting his studies and relieving his hunger, and with her own right hand applied what he needed. When he was about to dispute with Chrysippus, he first purged himself with hellebore. Such draughts his diligence made desirable to those who covet solid praise.”

§ IX. Opinions of the Stoic Philosophers

Vincent speaks of the opinions of the Stoic philosophers in book 6, chapter 27 of the Historical Mirror. The opinion of the Stoics, whose leading figures are said to have been Zeno and Chrysippus, was, Jerome says, that every passion can be rooted out and extirpated from human minds. The Old Academics held the same opinion. The Peripatetics, however, say that these passions are to be broken, ruled, and moderated, and restrained with certain bits like unbridled horses. Cicero sets out their opinions in the Tusculan Disputations, as does Origen in the Stromata.

Cicero's book On Paradoxes is wholly composed of Stoic opinions. Some are true, but most are false. These are the six paradoxes set down there:

1. Only what is honorable is good.
2. The man who possesses virtue lacks nothing necessary for a blessed life.
3. Small and great faults are equal, as though there were no greater and lesser degrees among faults.

4. All fools are insane.
5. All wise men are free and all fools slaves.
6. Only the wise man is rich.

The following statements that Seneca gives in On Benefits also belong to the Stoics: “We deny that the wise man can receive an injury, yet one who strikes him with his fist will be condemned for assault. We deny that anything belongs to a fool, yet one who steals some property from a fool will be condemned for theft. We say that all are insane, yet we treat them all with hellebore. To these very people whom we call insane we entrust both the vote and jurisdiction.”

Seneca says in On Benefits: “The Stoics say that nothing useful can come to evil men--indeed, nothing that does not harm them. Whatever happens to them they turn to their own nature. Therefore they cannot give a benefit, since no one can give what he does not possess.”

Although this is so, an evil person can nevertheless receive certain things resembling benefits, for failure to return which he will be ungrateful. There are goods of the soul, goods of the body, and goods of fortune. The first are removed from the fool and evil man. The Peripatetics, however, who establish the limits of human happiness far and wide, say that small benefits can reach evil people and that one who does not return them is ungrateful. We do not regard as benefits things that will not make the soul better, although we do not deny that they are advantages and ought to be sought.

The same Seneca says in book 7 of On Benefits: “You Stoics say that all things belong to the wise man. How, then, can anyone give something to the wise man if all things are his? Yet nothing prevents a thing from belonging both to the wise man and to the person who possesses it. In the civil order all things belong to the king, yet those things whose universal possession pertains to the king are apportioned among individual owners. We can therefore give the king a gift, money, and a slave, yet we do not say that we give him something from his own. For authority over all belongs to the king, but properties belong to individuals.”

The same author says in the same book: “We Stoics command certain things beyond measure so that they may return to their proper truth. When we say, ‘The man who gives a benefit ought not to remember it,’ we wish this to be understood: he ought not proclaim or boast of it or be burdensome.

“Whenever you have too little confidence concerning things that you command, more than enough must be demanded so that enough may be performed. Every hyperbole is extended in this fashion, so that by falsehood it may arrive at truth. Hyperbole never hopes for as much as it dares, but urges incredible things so that it may reach things credible but great.” Thus Seneca.

It should nevertheless be noted that the Apostle says: “The Lord does not need our lie.” Augustine says first in Cause 22, Question 3: “No one should be led to eternal salvation with a lie as helper.”

Seneca also says: “If you promised to give someone a benefit and afterward learned that he was evil, will you give it or not? If you do, you know that you sin, for you give to one to whom you should not, namely, an evil man. If you refuse, you also sin in this way, for you promised.”

Here our conscience wavers, as it does at the Stoic promise that a wise man never regrets his decisions, never corrects what he has done, and never changes his plan. A wise man does not change his plan while all the circumstances that existed when he adopted it remain. Yet everything is undertaken with an exception: provided that nothing occurs to prevent it. This confidence--promising fortune to oneself--belongs to the imprudent; the wise man considers each of its two sides.

“I shall then break faith and hear the charge of inconstancy if, while all things remain the same as when I made the promise, I do not perform what was promised. For all things must be as they were when I promised before I am bound to perform it.”

Augustine also says in book 14 of The City of God: “The Stoics wished there to be three states in the wise man's soul corresponding to three disturbances. What the Greeks call eupatheiai, Cicero calls constantiae in Latin: in place of desire, pleasure; in place of delight, joy; in place of fear, caution. But corresponding to sickness or pain--which, to avoid ambiguity, we have preferred to call sadness--they denied that anything could exist in the wise man's soul.

“For will seeks the good, which the wise man does. Joy concerns a good obtained, which the wise man certainly obtains. Caution avoids evil, which the wise man ought to avoid. But sadness concerns an evil that has already occurred; since they think that no evil can happen to the wise man, they said that nothing corresponding to sadness could exist in his soul.

“Among us, however, the question is not so much whether a pious soul becomes angry as why it becomes angry; not whether it is sad, but why it is sad; not whether it fears, but why it fears.” Thus Augustine.

Vincent says in book 6, chapter 33 of the Historical Mirror that the following is also believed to be a Stoic opinion: “Whoever has one virtue has them all, and whoever lacks one has none.” They say similarly of vices that whoever has one has all. This is not true of vices, however, since vices sometimes oppose one another and contraries mutually expel each other. They cannot exist together at the same time in the same person, as avarice and prodigality, and similar vices.

§ X. Erasistratus and Antiochus Theos

In the fifteenth year of Philadelphus, the physician Erasistratus flourished. It is read that he recognized a lover by his pulse. Valerius reports that when Antiochus, son of Seleucus, had been seized by boundless love for his stepmother, he was cured by the physician Erasistratus. The physician perceived that his pulse became sometimes stronger and sometimes weaker according to the approach and withdrawal of his stepmother and disclosed the matter to his father. The father did not hesitate to yield his dearest wife to his son. Thus Valerius. But each man acted most wickedly.

In Philadelphus's twenty-ninth year, Antiochus, who was called Theos, reigned in Syria. He reigned fifteen years. Jerome says upon Daniel that he waged very many wars against Philadelphus and fought him with all the strength of Babylon and the East.

After many years Ptolemy Philadelphus wished to end the troublesome contest and gave his daughter Berenice to Antiochus as wife. Antiochus had two sons by his former wife Laodice: Seleucus, surnamed Callinicus, and another Antiochus. Philadelphus brought Berenice to Pelusium and received countless thousands of gold and silver in the name of a dowry.

Antiochus said that Berenice was his partner in the kingdom and that Laodice held the place of a concubine. After a long time, overcome by love for Laodice, he restored her with her children as queen. Fearing her husband's unstable mind and that he might restore Berenice, Laodice had her husband killed with poison by her servants. She handed Berenice and the son born to her by Antiochus over to Icadion and Gener, leaders of Antioch, to be killed. She established her elder son Seleucus Gallinicus as king in his father's place.

Valerius Maximus relates that the death of this Antiochus was concealed in the following manner. A certain Artemo, one of King Antiochus's equals and himself of royal stock, was exceedingly like him. After killing her husband, Laodice forcibly placed Artemo in the bed as though he were the sick king, in order to conceal her crime. He deceived all the people admitted to him by speech and countenance like the king's. They believed that the dying Antiochus was commending Laodice and his children to them.

Jerome says upon Daniel that this Philadelphus, king of Egypt, was regarded among the Greeks as an orator and philosopher. He is reported to have possessed so great a power that he surpassed his father Ptolemy.

The histories relate that he had two hundred thousand infantrymen, twenty thousand horsemen, two thousand chariots, and four hundred elephants, which he was the first to bring from Ethiopia. He had one thousand five hundred long ships, now called Liburnians, and another thousand for carrying the soldiers' provisions. He also possessed a great weight of gold and silver, so that from Egypt each year he received fourteen thousand and eighty talents of silver and five times a thousand times one hundred thousand artabas of grain, an artaba being a measure containing three modii and one third of a modius.

§ XI. Ptolemy Euergetes and His Successors

After Philadelphus, his brother Ptolemy Euergetes reigned, as the Comestor reports in the Scholastic History. The Egyptians called him Euergetes, which signifies "Bringer Back," because after laying waste Syria, Cilicia, and part of Asia, among the innumerable spoils he took he brought back the gods that Cambyzes had carried away to Persia.

At that time the high priest of the Jews was Onias, son of Simeon the Just. His son Simeon succeeded him. Under this Simeon, Jesus son of Sirach wrote the book of wisdom called Ecclesiasticus, which the Hebrews call Panarethon: from pan, meaning "all," and arethon, meaning "virtue," as though it were entirely about the virtues. Hence Jesus makes mention of Simeon in it. The Hebrews nevertheless place it among the apocrypha.

When Onias refused tribute to Euergetes out of zeal for the law--or rather out of avarice, as Josephus says--he provoked the king to anger. Even against Onias's will, the Jews sent to the king as their envoy Joseph, a noble man and son of Tobias and of Onias's sister. He not only restored peace but was sent back by the king as ruler of the Jews and neighboring regions.

At that time Empninus, a philosopher of Tarentum, was brought to Rome by Cato the quaestor. He was content with meager expenditure and the service of one maidservant.

After Euergetes his son Ptolemy Philopator reigned, and after him Ptolemy Epiphanes. This Epiphanes died in the twenty-fourth year of his reign, killed with poison by his commanders, as Jerome says upon Daniel. When someone asked how he would obtain money while undertaking such great things, he answered that his friends were his riches. When this was spread among the peoples, the commanders feared that he would take away the property of the impious and killed him by wicked arts.

After him Ptolemy Philometor reigned. Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, defeated him and subjected Judea to himself.

Arvis, king of the Lacedaemonians, sent envoys to Onias the Great, high priest of the Jews to renew the alliance that he had read existed between Abraham and his ancestors. Antiochus revoked from the Jews the tribute remission for the seventh year and for the ministers of the temple that Philadelphus had granted.

When Antiochus harassed the neighboring regions beyond measure, the matter was reported to the Romans. Scipio Africanus and Scipio Nasica were sent to him so that under the solemn obligation of an oath they might remove him from the aforesaid harassment. In addition, they took his son Seleucus as hostage. Wishing to receive Seleucus back from them, he delivered to them his younger son Antiochus--that is, Epiphanes--on the condition that he should be a perpetual hostage, never to return.

Because of the cruelty of this same Antiochus, Onias went down to Egypt to Ptolemy Epiphanes. Antiochus the Great himself was killed in Persia at the temple of Nanea: the priests tore him limb from limb and cast him out. They had deceitfully promised him treasures, led him with a few men into the hidden places, and killed him.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Four (continued)

§ XII. Seleucus and Antiochus Epiphanes

After Antiochus the Great, his elder son Seleucus, a very wicked but inactive man, reigned in Syria. Onias was high priest of the Jews; for when Onias passed into Egypt, as has been said, his son Simeon sat in his place, and Simeon was succeeded by his son Onias.

Under this Onias, Seleucus sent Heliodorus to Jerusalem to despoil the entire treasury of the temple. When he entered, a certain most terrible armed horseman appeared. His horse struck Heliodorus with its forefeet and cast him to the ground. Then two other attendants beat him most fiercely. Josephus says that they were angels. Some say that he was left dead, others half alive. But through Onias's prayer for him, he was restored to life or fully healed. He returned to the king and proclaimed the power of God that he had experienced in himself. This is contained in 2 Maccabees.

At that time Aristobulus, a Jew by nation and a Peripatetic philosopher, wrote commentaries explaining Moses for Ptolemy Philometor.

When Antiochus Epiphanes, who was a hostage at Rome in his father's place, heard that his father had died and knew his brother's inactivity, he presumed that he could possess the kingdom of Syria and secretly departed from Rome. Some nevertheless relate that he returned with the connivance of the senators. Having returned to Syria, he showed himself kindly and munificent in all things. He was energetic in action and fierce against enemies; hence he was surnamed Epiphanes by the people, a name that means "Illustrious."

After two years, as Justin says, he again assembled an army against Ptolemy. Antiochus made war upon the elder Ptolemy, his wife's son and king of Egypt, who was exceedingly sluggish and so enervated by daily luxury that he not only neglected the duties of royal majesty but through excessive fattening even lacked the sense of a human being. Driven from his kingdom, Ptolemy fled to Alexandria to his younger brother Ptolemy. After sharing the kingdom with him, they sent envoys to the Senate at Rome.

When the two Ptolemy brothers were therefore besieged at Alexandria by their uncle, Roman envoys came. One of them, Marcus Popilius, ordered Antiochus to depart from Egypt. When the king offered him a kiss--for among others he had cultivated Popilius while he was a hostage at Rome--Popilius told him to put aside private friendship for the present, since the commands of his country intervened.

He produced and delivered the Senate's decree. When he saw Antiochus hesitate and confer with his friends for counsel, Popilius, as Jerome also says upon Daniel, made a circle in the sand with the staff that he held in his hand. For he had found the king standing on the shore. Drawing a circle around him, he is said to have declared: "The Senate and Roman people command that you answer in this place what counsel you intend to follow." Terrified by these words, Antiochus said, "If this pleases the Senate and Roman people, I must withdraw," believing that not an envoy but the Senate itself had spoken before his eyes.

Two years after Antiochus had plundered the temple, he sent men to Jerusalem to exact tribute from the Jews, to change the worship of God, and to place an image of Olympian Jove and statues of Antiochus in the temple. At that time, according to Eusebius, Perses reigned among the Macedonians.

§ XIII. The Persecution under Antiochus

Under this Antiochus, who was called Epiphanes, that is, Illustrious, began the deeds narrated in the books of Maccabees. Although the Hebrews number these books among the apocrypha, the Church has nevertheless received them as representing useful doctrine, the spiritual battles of demons against the people of God, and the divisions and schisms that have arisen in the Church.

In the first chapter of the first book it is said that from those who reigned after Alexander the Great came forth a root of sin, Antiochus the Illustrious. He had been a hostage at Rome and was the son of King Antiochus the Great. He reigned in Syria after the death of his brother Seleucus, who had sent Heliodorus to despoil the temple; but Heliodorus, scourged by angels, departed empty-handed in the 137th year of the kingdom of the Greeks.

In those days wicked sons went out from Israel and persuaded many, saying, "Let us go and make a covenant with the nations." They did so, sending to Antiochus himself and asking his permission. For this purpose they offered a great sum of money so that they might establish a gymnasium in Jerusalem, that is, schools for teaching the rites of the gentiles, and an ephebia, that is, a brothel for males. They obtained and did all these things, abandoning circumcision and the other ceremonies of the Law.

Two priests, Jason and Menelaus, contended for the high priesthood. To please the king, they changed their proper names: Jason had been called Jesus, and Menelaus had been called John, but they took gentile names for themselves. Yet all things had been according to the order of the Law. The true high priest was a good man and Jason's brother, but Antiochus removed him and made Jason high priest in return for a great sum of money.

As Augustine says, the fire of the temple altar that had lived under the waters during the Babylonian captivity was then extinguished, as is said in Cause 1, Question 1, As a Eunuch, because of the priesthood purchased in the abomination of simony.

The king took dominion over the Jews, made a great slaughter in Judea, and plundered the temple, as was said above. He commanded all the Jews, under penalty of death, to assume the rites of the gentiles, placing an image of Jove in the temple so that sacrifice might be offered to it. He caused the books of God's Law to be burned and those in whose possession they were found to be killed, and likewise those who observed the legal ceremonies. For this reason many were killed because they observed the Law.

These matters are contained in the second book of Maccabees, in which certain things omitted from the first book are supplied, although they happened at that time. In the first and second chapters of this second book is placed a letter sent by those in Jerusalem to the Jews dispersed in Egypt. They recount the great tribulations they had previously suffered but from which God had delivered them, and they exhort the others to give thanks with them and celebrate the feast of the temple's purification. In the third chapter mention is made of Heliodorus, who was sent to despoil the temple but was scourged by angels during the plundering, as was said above.

It is then narrated that, after the death of Seleucus, his brother Antiochus Epiphanes, who had been a hostage at Rome but had returned from Rome to Syria after the death of his father Antiochus the Great, assumed the kingdom. Jason, brother of Onias the high priest, approached him and obtained the high priesthood by promising the king 360 talents of silver. He also promised another 150 talents for permission to construct a gymnasium and an ephebia in Jerusalem.

This most wicked Jason sent three hundred drachmas from Jerusalem to the king for sacrifices to Hercules, for the construction of triremes. Jason also sent Menelaus, brother of a certain Simon who had instigated Seleucus to send Heliodorus to plunder the temple as related above, to the king with much money. With it Menelaus diverted the high priesthood to himself, adding three hundred talents of silver to what Jason had offered in order to obtain it; and he obtained it from the king.

When Menelaus did not pay the money promised for obtaining the high priesthood, he was removed by the king, and his brother, called Lysimachus, was appointed in his place. When King Antiochus departed from Antioch and left there in his place one of his companions named Andronicus, Menelaus stole some vessels of the temple and gave them to Andronicus to gain his goodwill. Reproved for this by Onias, a holy man and priest, Menelaus became indignant and asked Andronicus to kill Onias, which he did.

When the king returned and heard of the unjust death of so great a man, he grieved and wept. The king caused Andronicus himself to be stripped of his purple and killed in the place where he had killed Onias. But after Lysimachus had committed many sacrileges in the temple at Menelaus's counsel and carried away gold from it, the report spread abroad and a multitude of the people rose against Lysimachus. In the resulting sedition between Lysimachus, accompanied by three thousand armed men, and the people, many were killed on either side. At last the sacrilegious Lysimachus himself was killed beside the treasury. Menelaus, however, because of the avarice of powerful men and his supporters, remained in power and increased in malice.

At that time Antiochus prepared a second expedition into Egypt in order to subdue it. For forty days horsemen were seen running through the air over the whole city of Jerusalem, wearing golden robes and carrying spears like armed cohorts. There were charges of horses, hurling of weapons, a multitude of helmeted men with drawn swords, and armor of every kind. All therefore prayed that the portents might be turned to good.

Meanwhile a false rumor arose concerning Antiochus's death. Jason joined a thousand men to himself, attacked the city, and caused Menelaus to flee into the citadel. Although a great slaughter was made, Jason did not obtain the principality he sought. Instead he became a fugitive, first fleeing into the land of the Ammonites and afterward into Egypt, going from city to city. Hateful to everyone as a deserter from the laws and accursed as an enemy of his country and fellow citizens, he died among the Lacedaemonians, unlamented and unburied.

After these things had happened, King Antiochus suspected that the Jews would desert the alliance. Departing from Egypt, he came to Jerusalem and commanded his men to spare no one, but to kill those whom they encountered and enter the houses for the same purpose. Hence it came about that in three days eighty thousand were killed, four hundred thousand were bound, and no fewer were sold.

With Menelaus as his guide--Menelaus who was a traitor to the laws and his country--Antiochus dared to enter the temple, handle and carry away the holy vessels with criminal hands, and remove eighteen hundred talents of silver from the temple. He then returned to Antioch. He left in Jerusalem Philip, a Phrygian by birth and more cruel than himself, to afflict the people, and Menelaus on Mount Gerizim.

He sent the hateful prince Apollonius with an army of twenty-two thousand. Arriving in Jerusalem and pretending peace, Apollonius ordered his men to take up arms on the sabbath, when the Jews were at rest, and slaughter everyone they encountered. Judas Maccabeus, however, had withdrawn into the wilderness with many others, where they ate hay for food, as will be said below.

Not long afterward the king sent a certain old man of Antioch to compel the Jews to transfer themselves from God's laws to the rites of the gentiles and to place an idol of Jove in the temple. Thus the temple was filled with luxury and banqueting. Under penalty of death they were compelled to offer sacrifices to idols, and at the suggestion of the Ptolemies the same edict applied in the neighboring cities.

Two women were accused of having circumcised their sons. With the infants hung at their breasts, they were led around the city and cast down from the walls. Eleazar, one of the chief scribes and an old man, was compelled to eat swine's flesh, which is contrary to the Law. When he refused, his friends urged him at least to pretend that he had done so in order to escape death. He refused to use such a fiction, lest others, following his example and hearing that he had done it, should be induced to eat such meats. He was therefore scourged to death, leaving an example of constancy.

Amid these events is placed the celebrated martyrdom at Antioch of a certain matron with her seven sons. With them she endured various torments of death inflicted by Antiochus rather than violate God's Law by eating pork contrary to that Law, which the king compelled them to do. Their mother watched and encouraged them to endure; as each was tortured, he uttered words attesting faith in the resurrection of bodies and rebuking the king. Hence, among all the saints of the Old Testament, the Latin Church celebrates a feast only for these, on the first day of August, because of the marvelous constancy they showed in observing the Law.

§ XIV. Mattathias and Judas Maccabeus

Returning to the things contained in the first book of Maccabees: when Antiochus first sent out an edict that the Jews should pass over to the rites of the gentiles, a certain Mattathias, from the priestly stock of the division of Joachim, had five sons energetic in arms: John, Simon, Judas Maccabeus, Eleazar, and Jonathan. Grieving vehemently from zeal for the Law over such a command of the king, he withdrew with his sons from Jerusalem, together with all who possessed zeal for the Law, and settled upon Mount Modin.

The king's messengers came to the city of Modin to induce people to obey the king in observing gentile rites and idolatry. They urged Mattathias, as the worthiest man, to act first so that he might gain the king's friendship and receive gifts and honors from him. He expressly contradicted them. In zeal for God he also killed a certain Jew who practiced idolatry in his sight, together with the king's messenger who commanded it.

Abandoning the city and all their goods, he fled with his sons and many others zealous for observance of the Law into deserted places, and many joined them. When those who supported the king in Jerusalem heard this, they went against them and made war on the sabbath. About a thousand of them, refusing to resist out of reverence for the sabbath, were slaughtered and died in their simplicity.

Mattathias and his companions, guided by better and more prudent counsel, decreed that if their enemies made war on the sabbaths they would resist and fight bravely against them, which they did. A company of men strong in might, everyone who freely willed to follow the Law, assembled to them and became a reinforcement for them. Mattathias and his men passed through the cities of Judea, destroying altars and performing circumcisions. He was their leader, and the work prospered in their hands.

At last, when brought to his final hour, Mattathias strengthened his sons in zeal and observance of the Law. He instructed them with many examples of Abraham, Joseph, Elijah, and others who had endured many adversities so that they might remain in virtue. He died and was mourned by all.

His son Judas Maccabeus then arose as leader of the army in his place, as Mattathias himself had appointed, and his brothers aided him. He became like a lion in his deeds, passed through the cities of Judah, destroyed the impious among them, and became renowned to the ends of the earth.

A certain prince named Apollonius arose with many men against him, but Judas defeated and killed him. Judas took away the sword of Apollonius and always fought with it. Then another man called Seron, leader of the Syrian army, gathered a very great multitude and prepared for battle against Judas. Judas strengthened and encouraged his own men, who were comparatively few, wearied by fasting, and therefore afraid. Advancing against Seron, he defeated and routed him, killing eight hundred from his army.

When Antiochus heard these things, he became very angry and resolved to exterminate Judea and its inhabitants. He gave his soldiers a year's pay. Fearing, however, that funds would fail him thereafter, he himself went into Persia and Ptolemais to obtain money. He gave half his army to Lysias, a man of royal stock, with whom he also left his son named Antiochus.

Lysias selected as leaders of the army Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias, powerful friends of the king, and sent them with forty thousand men and seven thousand horsemen to destroy Judea. Many merchants assembled to buy the Jews, all of whom they expected would be conquered and made slaves. When Judas Maccabeus and his men perceived this, they humbled themselves with fasting and prayer, in ashes and sackcloth, asking help from God.

One of Lysias's commanders, namely Gorgias, moved to battle with five thousand men and one thousand horsemen against Judas and his followers, who numbered three thousand and were unarmed. When they met in battle, Judas exhorted his men to pray to God, routed Gorgias, and killed three thousand from his army. They took much spoil and gave thanks to God.

In the following year Lysias again assembled an army of sixty thousand chosen men and five thousand horsemen and came to battle against Judas. After first praying to God, Judas, with only ten thousand men, obtained victory and killed five thousand from Lysias's army. When this was accomplished, Lysias saw the boldness of the Jews and returned to Antioch to rebuild his army.

Moreover, Nicanor, Bathis, and Timothy, leaders of the army, came against Judas, who had only seven thousand in his company, while the enemies were three times more numerous. Judas exhorted his men to confidence in divine aid. After prayer had been made, Judas and his followers fought and defeated them, killing twenty thousand of the enemies, while Nicanor escaped by flight, as is contained in 2 Maccabees 8.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Four (continued)

Meanwhile the people of Joppa, after receiving as friends the Jews who lived among them, deceitfully drowned two hundred of them in small boats. Judas came by night to avenge this deed, burned the harbor of Joppa and the boats, and killed the men. He acted similarly toward the Jamnites, who were also plotting such things against the Jews.

When Judas fought against Gorgias and his men, some of the Jews were killed. After victory in the battle, when Judas took care that the bodies of the slain should be buried, offerings to idols that they had taken in the battle against the Jamnites--things forbidden to them--were found beneath their tunics. For this reason Judas made a collection and sent ten thousand drachmas of silver to Jerusalem, to be offered there for the sins of those dead men.

Afterward Judas Maccabeus and his followers went to Jerusalem and cleansed from its impurities the temple profaned by Antiochus. They restored it to its former condition according to the Law and celebrated the solemn feast of dedication, decreeing that it should also be observed annually in the future.

When the nations surrounding Judea learned that the sanctuary had been restored as before, they assembled against the Jews to destroy them. Judas met them in battle and struck the Idumeans with a great blow; he then crushed the Ammonites together with their leader Timothy.

When very many nations made war against the Gileadites, while other nations attacked the inhabitants of Galilee, those who were afflicted by the enemies requested Judas's aid by letters. Judas sent his brother Simon with three thousand men to free their brethren who were in Galilee, while Judas himself, with his brother Jonathan and eight thousand men, went into Gilead to aid those who were there. Simon freed Galilee, killing three thousand enemies. Judas likewise obtained victory with Jonathan, killing eight thousand enemies and putting the rebellious cities to the sword, all their men and women.

After this, Timothy joined a multitude of nations to himself and added Arabs as auxiliaries. Judas and his men crushed them as they fled to Phanu and burned that place with them. He also captured the city of Ephron, which lay on his route and had refused him harmless passage, destroyed it, and killed all its people. They returned to Jerusalem blessing God.

Joseph and Azariah had been left as leaders of the people who remained at Jerusalem and had been warned not to make war against anyone. But they did not obey. Hearing of the victories of Judas and Simon and wishing to make a name for themselves before their return, they made war upon the neighboring nations. Gorgias routed and defeated them, killing two thousand of their men.

§ XV. The Death of Antiochus Epiphanes and the Reign of Eupator

Meanwhile King Antiochus traveled through the upper regions. When he heard that the city of Elymais in Persia was exceedingly rich, he sought to capture it and expose it to plunder, but he was put to flight. Greatly saddened, he returned to Babylon. There he heard of Judas's victories over Lysias and his men, and he became exceedingly angry, as is contained in 2 Maccabees 9, where the miserable death of Antiochus is more fully narrated.

While upon the road Antiochus ordered his chariot to be driven so that he might reach Jerusalem more quickly, promising that he would make it a heap for the burial of the Jews. But God suddenly struck him with an invisible plague of pain in his bowels. When, uplifted by pride and breathing fire in his mind against the Jews, he ordered the undertaking to be hastened, it happened that he fell from the chariot and was tormented by the severe bruising of his body. He became so infirm that worms swarmed from his body and so great a stench burdened his army that no one could endure it.

When his pains began to increase and he could not bear his own stench, he said: "It is just to be subject to God and for a mortal not to consider himself equal to God." The wicked man prayed to God but did not obtain mercy from him, because he did not truly repent. He promised to make Jerusalem free, establish the Jews as equals of the Athenians, and give many gifts to God's temple.

Moreover, he wrote the Jews a letter professing great kindness toward them. Although weakened, he still hoped for health and meanwhile exhorted them to preserve their fidelity toward himself and his son Antiochus. Thus he ended his life miserably.

Timothy, who had been defeated on another occasion, again gathered a very great army and came against Judas, who had few men with him. But after the Jews first offered prayer and humility, five men appeared from heaven to the adversaries during the battle itself, splendid upon horses with golden bridles and providing leadership to the Jews. Two of them enclosed Maccabeus with their weapons and preserved him unharmed, while they cast weapons and thunderbolts against the adversaries. Confused with blindness, they fell, and twenty thousand of them were killed. When Timothy fled into Gazara, Maccabeus pursued him, captured the city, and killed Timothy and his brother.

When Antiochus was dying, he had entrusted the care of the kingdom to a certain intimate companion named Philip, who was with him. He appointed Philip over the army so that he might rear his son Antiochus and gave him his ring, diadem, and robe to assign to his son. But Lysias, who then had Antiochus son of Antiochus with him, heard of the father's death and himself established Antiochus as king of Syria in his father's place, calling him Eupator. Lysias himself was commander of his army.

Meanwhile Judas sought to take the citadel of Zion, in which their enemies were. Many Jews and gentiles approached Antiochus Eupator and Lysias, requesting aid against Judas. When he heard them, the angry king assembled a very great army: one hundred thousand infantrymen, twenty thousand horsemen, and thirty-two elephants trained for battle. The elephants bore wooden towers, upon each of which were thirty-two strong fighting men; a thousand armed infantrymen and five hundred soldiers surrounded each beast in battle. They showed these animals the blood of grapes and mulberries to sharpen their spirit for battle. When the sun shone upon the golden shields, the mountains reflected their light like lamps of fire.

Judas and his army approached in battle and killed six hundred men from the king's army. A certain Eleazar, whom the Comestor calls Judas's brother, saw one of the beasts ornamented with royal trappings and taller than the rest. Thinking that the king was seated there, he passed through the midst of the enemy and approached it. Placing himself beneath its body, he wounded it with his sword, and when it fell dead it crushed him.

When Judas and his men saw the king's strength and the army's assault, they turned away from them. The king's forces advanced against them to Jerusalem. While they remained in the siege, Lysias heard that Philip, whom Antiochus had appointed over the affairs of the kingdom as he was dying, had come and taken dominion over Antioch. He advised the king to make peace with Judas and his companions and permit them to observe their lawful rites, because it was for this reason that they had rebelled against his father, and especially because they needed to take thought for the kingdom. This advice was followed.

Menelaus, of whom mention was made above, urged King Antiochus to make war against Judas under a pretense of piety, hoping that he himself might thereby be established in the principality. Lysias told the king that this man was the cause of all their evils. The angry king therefore ordered him killed and cast from a high tower into ashes, as is contained in 2 Maccabees 11.

Although peace had been made, the king himself immediately acted against the oath taken concerning it and ordered the wall around the citadel of Zion destroyed. Hastening back to Antioch, he found Philip ruling the city; but he fought against him and took the city by force.

§ XVI. Demetrius, Alcimus, and Nicanor

In the 151st year, Demetrius son of Seleucus departed from the city of Rome and landed with a few men in a maritime city. This Demetrius was first cousin to the last Antiochus: for Seleucus, father of this Demetrius, and Antiochus Epiphanes, father of this Antiochus Eupator, were brothers. But when Seleucus died, it was not his son Demetrius but Seleucus's brother Antiochus who usurped the kingdom of Syria for himself, and Demetrius went to Rome.

When Demetrius returned to his father's kingdom, the troops who were with Lysias and Antiochus son of Antiochus seized Lysias himself and Antiochus. At Demetrius's request, the army killed Lysias and Antiochus.

After Demetrius received the kingdom of Syria, a certain very wicked man of priestly stock named Alcimus approached him. As is said in 2 Maccabees 13, he had been high priest. He offered the king a golden crown and certain other things, claiming that he intended to serve the interests of the king and the Jewish people. He complained that the priesthood had been unjustly taken from him and accused Judas Maccabeus of many things.

The king then sent Bacchides with an army and established Alcimus as high priest. Alcimus pretended that he wished to make peace with Judas and his men, deceived them, and, together with Bacchides, killed many of the people. Alcimus exerted himself greatly for the sake of the supremacy of his priesthood. When he could not prevail against Judas, he returned to the king and accused him of many things.

Demetrius sent Nicanor with troops. He was the foremost of the king's commanders and was to capture Judas, disperse his men, and establish Alcimus as high priest. When Nicanor arrived and heard of the courage of Judas and his companions, he made peace with him, and they lived together in Jerusalem.

When Alcimus observed this and their affection for one another, he came to King Demetrius and reported it. In anger Demetrius wrote that he bore that friendship gravely and ordered Nicanor to send Judas to him in chains. Nicanor sought to capture him treacherously, but Judas perceived this and took precautions for himself. Nicanor then proceeded openly against him. When the priests showed him the sacrifices that they offered for the king, he mocked them, stretched out his hand against the temple, and declared that he himself would burn it unless they delivered Judas into his hands.

Nicanor heard that a certain venerable man named Razias lived in Jerusalem, who because of his affection was called the father of the Jews. He sent many men to his house to seize him. When Razias was on the point of being captured, he struck himself with his sword. Since he did not die from the wound, he cast himself from the wall into the crowd. Still breathing, he raised himself and stood upon a rock. Grasping in his hands the entrails that came out of his body, he threw them into the crowd, calling upon the Ruler of life and spirit to return them to him again in this manner. Thus he died.

When they finally prepared for battle, Nicanor, uplifted with pride, thought that he would crush Judas, trusting in his own strength and multitude. Judas, trusting in the Lord's aid, exhorted his companions to do the same. He armed them not with the defense of shield and spear but with the best words, recounting that in a dream he had seen Onias praying for the people and Jeremiah with him, giving Judas a golden sword and saying: "Receive this holy sword, a gift from God, with which you will cast down the adversaries."

Judas and his men therefore fought with their hands but prayed to God with their hearts. They struck down thirty-five thousand from Nicanor's army, and Nicanor himself was also killed. They cut off Nicanor's head and the hand he had extended against the temple and hung them up. They cut his tongue into small pieces and cast it to the birds. Thus they returned with a very great victory to Jerusalem, gave thanks to God, and decreed that a feast in honor of so great a victory should be celebrated annually. This is the end of the second book of Maccabees.

When Judas heard the name of the Romans--because they were mighty in strength, agreed to everything asked of them, and established friendships and battles with all who approached them--and learned also the good qualities attributed to them in chapter 8 of the first book, Judas and his followers, by their common counsel, chose Eupolemus son of John and Jason son of Eleazar as their envoys. They sent them to Rome to establish friendship and alliance with the Romans.

Arriving at the city, they entered the Senate and explained in the council the purpose of their embassy. The Romans agreed to enter peace and alliance with them. They therefore inscribed upon bronze tablets that the Romans and the Jews should in turn bring aid against those making war upon whichever of them war first assailed.

Meanwhile, when Demetrius heard of Nicanor's death, he again sent Bacchides, leader of the army, and Alcimus into Judea. They came and pitched camp against Judas. Many of Judas's army withdrew from him out of fear of the enemy's multitude, and he remained with only eight hundred. His companions advised him to avoid the contest and withdraw, but he refused. He proceeded to battle; his army was defeated and he himself was killed.

Here it should be noted that after making peace and an alliance with the Romans, he was defeated and killed in the first battle.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Four (continued)

The same thing happened to his brothers Jonathan and afterward Simon, perhaps because, abandoning confidence in divine aid, they trusted too much in the strength of men.

After Judas had died and been mourned and buried, they all chose his brother Jonathan as their leader and prince. The sons of Jambri seized and killed John, Jonathan's brother. When these sons of Jambri afterward celebrated a solemn wedding to which many people of consequence came, Jonathan and Simon laid an ambush. As the bridegroom and bride proceeded with a great company and with musicians, Jonathan and Simon rose against them and made a great slaughter in vengeance for the blood of their brother John.

Thereafter Bacchides came against Jonathan near the Jordan but was defeated by him, with many killed. When the most wicked Alcimus, who had sought to be restored to the high priesthood, ordered the walls of the temple destroyed, he was struck with paralysis. He could no longer speak and died in great torment.

Bacchides returned to King Demetrius. After two years, at the instigation of certain Jews, they summoned Bacchides back, seeking treacherously to capture Jonathan while he was living in peace and therefore more securely. But the treacheries were detected, and Jonathan protected himself by killing the traitors. Bacchides advanced against Jonathan in battle but was defeated. Indignant at those who had recalled him to Judea, he killed many of them. After making peace with Jonathan and returning the captives, Bacchides went back to his own region, no longer to molest him.

§ XVII. Jonathan under Alexander and Demetrius

In the 160th year, Alexander, son of the Antiochus who had been killed with Lysias by his own army at Demetrius's insistence, came to Ptolemais, captured it, and began to reign there. Hearing this, Demetrius assembled an army against him and sought to enter an alliance with Jonathan, leader of the Jews. He sent letters to seek Jonathan's friendship, ordering that the hostages in the citadel be returned to him, along with many other concessions.

When Alexander heard this, he too sought Jonathan's friendship by sending letters for that purpose. He appointed him high priest and gave him a golden crown, purple, and many other things. When Demetrius perceived this, he was saddened and again wrote to Jonathan, offering him much more than Alexander had offered so that he would give him aid. Jonathan did not consent to these proposals but allied himself with Alexander.

Alexander met King Demetrius and his army in battle, defeated and killed him, and routed his army. Afterward Alexander asked Ptolemy, king of Egypt, to give him his daughter Cleopatra as wife, which he did. Jonathan was invited to the wedding celebrated at Ptolemais. When he came, Alexander and Ptolemy honored him greatly. Although certain pestilential men brought complaints against Jonathan, Alexander did not listen to them. Rather, he caused Jonathan to be clothed in purple and led through the city by his princes, while a herald commanded that no one should bring any charge against Jonathan in any matter.

In the 165th year, Demetrius, son of the Demetrius killed by Alexander, came from Crete into the land of his fathers. He appointed Apollonius, governor of Coele-Syria, commander of his army. Apollonius wrote Jonathan and challenged him to battle. When they fought together, Jonathan prevailed against him, killing eight thousand adversaries and burning many of their cities.

Ptolemy, king of Egypt, assembled a very great army and deceitfully sought to obtain the kingdom of his son-in-law Alexander. As Ptolemy passed through many of Alexander's cities with his consent, Alexander being ignorant of his malice, Ptolemy took them for himself. After his enmity was discovered, he took his daughter Cleopatra away from Alexander and gave her to Demetrius son of Demetrius, pretending that he acted thus because Alexander had sought to kill him.

When battle was joined between Ptolemy and Alexander, Alexander was defeated and fled into Arabia to protect himself there. But the prince of Arabia cut off Alexander's head and sent it to Ptolemy. Three days after receiving it, Ptolemy died.

Demetrius son of Demetrius therefore reigned in Syria in the 167th year. When Jonathan was summoned to meet him, he came to Ptolemais and was received honorably. Demetrius established him in the supremacy of the priesthood, conferred many other things, and granted his requests.

A certain Tryphon, who had been the chief man of Alexander's party, saw that the whole army murmured against Demetrius. He went to the Arab Hemalcuel, who was raising Antiochus son of Alexander, so that Hemalcuel might deliver the boy to him to reign in his father's place. Demetrius saw his army leave him to join Tryphon and sent to Jonathan for auxiliaries. Jonathan sent him three thousand men at Antioch.

One hundred and twenty thousand men had assembled there against King Demetrius to kill him. The men sent by Jonathan ran through the city in the king's defense, killed one hundred thousand of them, and burned part of the city. Thus they delivered the king, while the remainder cast down their arms and sought peace from him. Glorified and renowned in the kingdom, the Jews returned to Jerusalem with much spoil.

But when Demetrius sat peacefully in his kingdom, he dealt falsely with Jonathan concerning what he had promised. Most ungratefully, he estranged himself from him and afflicted him severely.

Antiochus, together with Tryphon, assembled many nations, came to Antioch, captured it, and placed the diadem upon himself. He wrote Jonathan to establish friendship, at the same time appointing him to the priesthood. To make him the king's friend, he sent gifts of gold and silver vessels, gave him the right to drink from gold, to wear purple, and to bear a golden clasp, and made his brother Simon leader in certain places.

When Jonathan entered battle against foreigners, his army fled from him. But he recalled it to himself through prayer and prevailed against them, killing three thousand.

Afterward Jonathan sent envoys to renew friendship with the Spartans and Romans. Among other things it is said there: "Having as consolation the holy books that are in our hands, we nevertheless preferred to send to you to renew fraternity and friendship." They recounted the tribulations they had suffered, their deliverance through God's aid, and that they remembered the Spartans and Romans in their sacrifices and prayers. Demetrius arose against Jonathan with great forces to defeat him but could not prevail.

Tryphon, however, intending to take the kingdom of Asia for himself, planned to kill King Antiochus. But fearing that Jonathan might impede him, he sought to capture Jonathan. When Jonathan came to meet him with forty thousand chosen men, Tryphon said that it was unnecessary to trouble so great a multitude. Instead, Jonathan should retain a few men with him and go with Tryphon to Ptolemais, so that Tryphon might deliver the city to him.

Believing this, Jonathan dismissed the others and entered Ptolemais with only a thousand men. Once inside, he was captured and all his companions were killed. Tryphon also sent his army to destroy the other men whom Jonathan had sent into Galilee, but, warned by Jonathan's capture, they resisted them bravely.

§ XVIII. Simon, the Last of the Maccabees

When Jonathan's brother Simon heard that Tryphon intended to advance into Judea to destroy it because its people had lost their prince, he went up to Jerusalem and before all the people offered to expose himself to death for the people's defense, as his brothers had done. They accepted this most gratefully and appointed him their leader.

When Tryphon came into Judea, bringing the captive Jonathan with him, he learned that Simon had been made leader. He sent envoys to him, pretending that he had detained Jonathan because of a great sum of money owed to the king and promising that he would release him if Simon sent the money and two of Jonathan's sons as hostages. Simon perceived that he spoke deceitfully. Nevertheless, he sent the money demanded and Jonathan's sons, lest he make the people hateful toward him by giving them occasion to say that Jonathan had been killed because he had not sent the sons and the money. But Tryphon lied.

When Tryphon saw that he could not prevail against them because Simon resisted bravely, he killed Jonathan and his sons and returned to his own land. Simon took the bodies of Jonathan and his sons and buried them with their ancestors in the city of Modin, making great mourning over him. He built seven high pyramids above their grave: for his father and mother and his four brothers.

The aforesaid Tryphon, while making a journey with the young King Antiochus, treacherously killed him and reigned in his place. Simon sent to King Demetrius to obtain remission for his region. Demetrius granted it and wrote back to him as high priest, saying among other things: "We have received the crown that you sent. We are prepared to make a great peace with you. We remit to you the offenses and errors down to the present day, as well as the golden crown; and if anything else in Jerusalem was subject to tribute, let it now no longer be tributary."

Thus in the 170th year the yoke of the gentiles was removed from Israel, in the first year under Simon, high priest, leader, and prince of the Jews. He came to the city of Gaza and besieged it. When its people sought peace, he did not destroy it in battle but captured the city, cast out its inhabitants, and cleansed it of images. He then besieged the citadel of Jerusalem. When those within failed from hunger, they sought and received peace, surrendering the citadel. When Simon saw that his son John was a warlike and valiant man, he appointed him commander of the armies.

In the 172nd year, King Demetrius went into Media to obtain aid to defeat Tryphon. When Arsaces, king of Persia and Media, heard this, he sent one of his princes, who crushed Demetrius's army and brought him captive to Arsaces. The land of Judah was quiet throughout all the days of Simon, and peace and friendship between the Jews, Romans, and Spartans were renewed.

Simon therefore sent the envoy Numenius to Rome, bearing a golden shield weighing one thousand minas, in order to establish an alliance with them. The Romans accepted it and wrote friendly letters to the Jews in praise of Simon. King Demetrius also heard that the Jews had been called friends, allies, and brethren by the Romans, that they had received Simon's envoys gloriously, and that the Jews and their priests had agreed that Simon should be high priest and leader forever, until a faithful prophet should arise. He therefore also made Simon his friend and, so that this might be apparent, honored him with purple and a golden clasp.

After this, Antiochus son of Demetrius wrote to Simon as high priest and leader of the Jews to gain his friendship. He declared that he granted every remission made by the kings before him, permitted Simon to strike his own coinage in his land, declared Jerusalem holy and free, and allowed him to retain the fortifications he had erected. He remitted every debt to the king and promised still greater things for the future.

In the 174th year, Antiochus son of Demetrius went into the land of his fathers, and the whole army assembled to him, so that few remained with Tryphon, who had usurped the kingdom of Syria for himself. Antiochus pursued Tryphon with one hundred and twenty thousand warriors and eight thousand horsemen and besieged the city of Dora, also bringing ships against it by sea, for Tryphon had fled into that city.

Simon sent Antiochus two thousand chosen auxiliaries and great gifts. Antiochus nevertheless refused to receive them, broke everything he had covenanted, and estranged himself from Simon. Antiochus sent one of his friends, Athenobius, to Simon, demanding that he restore Joppa, Gazara, and the citadel of Jerusalem, which he had taken from Antiochus, together with their tribute--or in their place one thousand talents in all--otherwise he would come to battle against him.

When Athenobius arrived in Jerusalem and saw Simon's glory, he was astonished. In answer to the demand he presented from King Antiochus, Simon said that he possessed nothing belonging to the king, only what was his own. Indeed, he had obtained Joppa and Gazara by right of war because they had inflicted many evils upon the Jews. Athenobius returned to the king and reported these things, moving the king to anger.

Antiochus sent Cendebeus with forces to conquer Judea, while he himself pursued Tryphon, who fled by ship across the sea to Orthosaida.

John son of Simon reported this to his father. Simon, who was already old, encouraged his sons to fight against the adversaries of the people as he and his brothers had done, expecting aid from God. John therefore went out with his brother Judas to battle against Cendebeus. A river lay between the two armies, and when those with John feared to cross it, John crossed first and the others followed him. They met the enemy and routed Cendebeus and his men, killing two thousand of them, and John returned to Judea in peace.

A certain man named Ptolemy son of Abobus had been appointed commander in the plain of Jericho. He was the son-in-law of Simon the high priest and exceedingly rich. Desiring to make himself lord of that region, he plotted to kill Simon and his sons.

While Simon traveled through the cities of Judea with two of his sons, Judas and Mattathias, caring for his nation, he went down to Jericho. Ptolemy treacherously received them in a certain small fortress. After preparing a great banquet for them there, he caused Simon and his sons to be killed during it. He immediately sent word to the king to dispatch forces to him and promised to surrender the region and its cities. He also sent men to Gazara to kill John, Simon's son. But John had been forewarned of what had happened and killed the men who came to slay him. John himself then remained prince of the Jews and at the same time high priest, in the 176th year of the kingdom of the Greeks.

This, then, is the end of the book of Maccabees. From its deeds you may learn how great are the adversities that must be borne for the defense and observance of the evangelical law, since they suffered so many and such great things for the observance of the Mosaic law, which was a figure of it. From the frequent change of kings and princes, and from their deaths, it must also be observed that the life of every earthly power is brief and therefore to be despised.

§ XIX. John Hyrcanus

After the death of Simon, the last of the Maccabees, sacred Scripture contains nothing more concerning the matters that follow until Christ, of whom the Gospels speak. What follows is instead excerpted from the scholastic histories, whose author is said to be Peter Comestor.

John, called Hyrcanus after the Hyrcanians he defeated, succeeded in Judea to the leadership and pontificate. Josephus commends him for three things: diligence in the religion of the priesthood, energy in leadership, and the gift of prophecy.

After assuming rule, he pursued Ptolemy, who had treacherously killed his father and held his mother and two young brothers in chains. Ptolemy fled to a fortress beyond Jericho called Agon. John besieged the stronghold and pressed sharply to capture him. To make him cease the attack, however, Ptolemy caused John's mother and the children to be beaten upon the walls until they bled. Broken by filial devotion, John restrained himself, although his mother cried to John from the wall not to leave Ptolemy's crime unavenged on her account, for she judged her own death better than immortality.

The siege was consequently prolonged until the seventh year arrived, which was a holiday for the Jews. John withdrew from the siege of Ptolemy, who killed John's mother and brothers and fled to Zeno, tyrant of Philadelphia.

After this Antiochus, king of Syria, besieged Jerusalem. John Hyrcanus therefore opened two of the eight treasure chambers surrounding David's tomb and took from them more than three thousand talents. He gave Antiochus three hundred talents to withdraw from the siege. To quiet the people's murmuring over the opening of the tomb, he used the remaining money to establish a hospice in Jerusalem for the poor.

He captured Samaria and leveled it to the ground; afterward Herod rebuilt it and called it Sebaste. John died after administering affairs excellently for thirty-three years. He left five sons after him: Aristobulus the firstborn, Antigonus, and three younger sons. Because none of them was fit to govern the people, John placed his very eloquent wife over Judea and over his sons.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Four (continued)

Aristobulus, unable to endure his mother's rule, bound his mother and his three younger brothers in prison. He established Antigonus, the brother born next after himself, whom he loved, as second to him. He placed the diadem upon himself, and the kingdom of Judea was restored.

For 475 years and three months had elapsed from Zedekiah, king of Judah, under whom the kingdom had been interrupted, or from the return from the Babylonian captivity. Hence it is frequently read that the kingdom was interrupted until Aristobulus and Hyrcanus, that is, until Aristobulus son of Hyrcanus.

Aristobulus nevertheless reigned for only one year, because he had killed his mother by hunger in chains. While Aristobulus lay sick in the tower afterward called Antonia, Antigonus returned from Galilee, where he had done many illustrious deeds, clothed in new and becoming armor. As he entered Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles to honor his brother and to display the beauty of the armor to the people, he entered armed.

When his rivals saw this, and especially his brother's wife, who had cast her eyes upon him but to whom he did not give his consent, they accused him to Aristobulus, saying: "Your brother, hearing that you are ill, has entered with a strong and armed hand to kill you and reign. You can prove it in this way: command him to come to you. If he comes armed, be certain concerning the things we say."

At his wife's suggestion, Aristobulus therefore stationed armed men in an underground passage called Strato's Tower, through which Antigonus would pass, so that they might kill him if he came armed. Summoning his brother, Aristobulus instructed the messenger to tell him not to come to him armed. But the queen corrupted the messenger with gifts so that he would tell him to come armed, because the king desired to see him in the splendor of his armor.

When Hyrcanus therefore passed armed through Strato's Tower, he was killed by the armed men. Hearing of his brother's death, the king became so weakened by illness that he vomited blood from his lacerated entrails. One of the servants appointed to this task carried it outside and accidentally spilled it, where Antigonus had been killed, upon the stains of blood that still remained.

Seeing this, the people cried out and declared that, by God's will and in vengeance for the murdered brother, the killer's blood had been poured out as a libation--that is, spilled. When the king asked the cause of the outcry, no one dared tell him. At last, when he threatened punishment for their silence, they told him the truth.

Groaning, he said: "It was not right that my crimes should be hidden from the light of God. How long will this wicked body detain a soul condemned to my mother and brother? Would that I might pour out my blood to them not little by little, but that they might receive the whole draught at once." Having said these things, he expired.

After his death, because his wife had borne no offspring by him, she released her husband's brothers from chains and established the eldest, Alexander, as king. He was surnamed Jannaeus and also appeared to surpass the others in moderation. He killed the second brother because he appeared to aspire to the kingdom and compelled the third to live privately with him. He took as wife Salome, who was also called Alexandra.

This Jannaeus was so exceedingly wicked that within seven years he killed about fifty thousand elders because they detested his crimes. When he had offended the people, he fortified a palace for himself in the tower called Baris. Titus afterward marveled that the Jews had abandoned it, since it could be defended by two men against every living person.

He had so greatly offended the Jews that when he once asked them how he might pacify them, they answered, "If you were to die." On this account he hanged eight hundred married men in the streets of Jerusalem and killed their wives and children.

§ XX. Alexander Jannaeus and Queen Alexandra

In the 493rd year of the Fifth Age, the 3,866th year of the world--or according to the other computation of the greater number, the 5,103rd year--the ninth Ptolemy, also called Alexander, reigned in Egypt. He reigned nine years.

At that time Alexander Jannaeus reigned among the Jews, and he reigned twenty-seven years. In Syria Antiochus Citenus reigned for thirty-eight years; after him Philip reigned two years. Finally Antiochus, fleeing even the Parthians, surrendered himself to Pompey. Afterward Philip was captured by Gabinius. Thus the kingdom of Syria came to an end in the eighth year of the aforesaid Ptolemy, and Syria, until then possessed by kings, came under the dominion of the Romans.

When the aforesaid Alexander Jannaeus had rested from battles and was afflicted by quartan fevers, he thought that his sickness had arisen from idleness and gave himself to the untimely labors of military service. He died in the thirty-eighth year of his reign, leaving two sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus.

Knowing that his sons would be hated by the Jews on account of their father, he left the kingdom to his wife. During her husband's life she had won the goodwill of the people for herself by frequently resisting his tyranny and presenting a feigned religion in another guise. While she reigned, she declared Hyrcanus high priest, judging that he would become king because he was modest. But she compelled the younger son, Aristobulus, to live as a private person because he appeared to possess a fervent spirit.

At that time the sect of the Pharisees arose in Judea; in earlier times the sect of the Essenes had already arisen. Alexandra used the counsel of these Pharisees in everything, so that at their advice she either condemned all the leading men of the Jews to exile or killed them. Finally, she killed Diogenes, who had been Alexander's closest friend.

She had assembled two armies of foreigners so that she might rage against the Jews more safely. Consequently many fled to Aristobulus so that they might be protected by his patronage. In the ninth year of her reign Queen Alexandra fell ill. Aristobulus assembled a large band of men and declared that he would reign after his mother. On this account his mother, moved by Hyrcanus's complaints, confined Aristobulus's wife and children in custody and took them as hostages, lest Aristobulus usurp the kingdom for himself.

After their mother died, Aristobulus assembled an army and took up arms against his brother Hyrcanus. When the brothers went out upon the plains of Jericho, Hyrcanus was defeated and fled to Jerusalem. At last they returned to concord under this condition: Aristobulus would reign, while Hyrcanus would exercise whatever honors he wished under him. They also exchanged houses.

§ XXI. Pompey and the Contest between the Brothers

Antipater the Idumean was with Hyrcanus. Fearing Antipater's prudence and energy, Aristobulus brought calumnies against him. Antipater persuaded Hyrcanus to complain that he had been circumvented by treachery and to flee to Aretas, king of the Arabs, with whose aid he might return to the kingdom.

Departing by night, they came to the Arab king at a fortress called Petra, where his royal seat was. Aretas therefore assembled an army, came into Judea, and besieged Jerusalem. He would even have captured it had not Scaurus, the Roman commander, dissolved the siege.

Syria had already ceased to be a kingdom and become tributary to the Romans. Pompey had been sent by the Romans against Tigranes, king of Armenia, and Pompey had sent Scaurus as governor of Syria. When Scaurus heard of the brothers' dissension in Judea, he judged it an opportunity to place Judea under tribute and entered its borders with a strong hand.

Envoys sent by each brother came to Scaurus and sought his aid on either side. Scaurus was corrupted by three hundred talents sent by Aristobulus--which Josephus testifies is characteristic of the Romans--and sent envoys to the Arabs, threatening them with the name of the Romans and of Pompey unless Aretas withdrew from the siege.

Aretas therefore withdrew and placed Hyrcanus and Antipater at Philadelphia. Frustrated in their hope in the Arabs, they placed their hope in their adversaries. When Pompey came to Damascus, many came to him with gifts so that he might judge the violence of Aristobulus worthy of hatred and restore Hyrcanus to the kingdom. Yet Aristobulus too did not fail himself, relying upon the corruption of Scaurus.

When Pompey did not show Aristobulus royal honor, Aristobulus indignantly departed without greeting him and withdrew into the fortress of Alexandrium because of its impregnable defenses. Pompey the Great pursued him with an assembled army of Romans and Syrians and ordered him to descend from the fortress to him.

Because Aristobulus was called to submit to the disgrace of being under Roman rule, he had determined rather to hazard himself than obey. Nevertheless, on the advice of his men he descended from the fortress. Leaving guards there, he commanded them to obey his orders only when given in letters written in his own hand. He then went to Jerusalem.

Pompey the Great immediately pursued him, having been made eager near Jericho by news of the death of Mithridates. There lies the very fertile region of Idumea, which nourishes many palms and balsam. By cutting its wood with sharp stones, they collect the dripping tear, that is, the gum, from the wounds.

As Pompey hastened toward Jerusalem, the frightened Aristobulus met him, promising the money that was in the fortress of Alexandrium and declaring that he would henceforth obey Roman rule. But none of these things was done. Gabinius was sent to receive the money, but the guards did not even admit him into the fortress. Moved by this, Pompey placed Aristobulus in custody.

When Pompey besieged Jerusalem, dissension arose in the city. The supporters of Aristobulus contended that the city should be defended, while the supporters of Hyrcanus contended that it should be surrendered to the Romans. The defeated party of Aristobulus fled into the temple, while Pompey was received into the city and assaulted the temple.

As they filled the northern valley with earthworks, the work would have remained unfinished had Pompey not ordered the embankment to be constructed during the observance of the seventh days--that is, the sabbaths--on which it is not lawful for the Jews to work. In the third month the sanctuary was broken into. Faustus Cornelius, son of Sulla, was the first who dared enter, and the Romans rushed in and profaned the temple. Elsewhere it is read that they stabled horses in the porticoes.

For this reason it is related that Pompey, who until then had been most fortunate in war, never afterward fought a battle without being defeated. On the next day Pompey entered the temple. He marveled at its situation, adornment, and religion but took nothing from it, ordering the keepers of the sanctuary to cleanse the temple from filth.

After imposing tribute upon the Jerusalemites and declaring Hyrcanus high priest, he took Aristobulus captive with him to Rome, together with two of his sons and the same number of daughters. He proceeded through Sicily and entrusted the administration of Syria and Judea to Scaurus, leaving two cohorts with him.

Alexander son of Aristobulus escaped during the journey. With a great armed band he laid waste Judea and threatened Hyrcanus. He held the very strongly fortified places Alexandrium, Archanum, and Macheronta.

Gabinius was sent to Syria to succeed Scaurus, and Marcus Antonius also served under him. When Gabinius had besieged Alexandrium with a very great host, Alexander surrendered himself and the fortress of Alexandrium to him on his mother's advice. At the counsel of the same woman, Gabinius utterly destroyed the fortress so that it would not become a refuge for another war. The woman was indeed flattering Gabinius with services, fearing for her husband and the other captives who had been led to Rome.

After this, Gabinius entrusted the care of the temple to Hyrcanus and divided the nation of the Jews into five councils, breaking the pride of Judea as though by a pentarchy. At that time Antipater became a very close friend of Gabinius and Marcus Antonius. He grew so distinguished that a wife named Cyprus, niece of the king of the Arabs, was given to him.

By her he fathered four sons and a daughter. The firstborn was Phasaelus; the second, Herod, who was afterward called the Ascalonite; the third, Josippus; and the fourth, Pheroras. The daughter was called Salomia.

After this Aristobulus escaped from Rome by chance. Having assembled a great band of Jews, he was rebuilding the wall around Alexandrium. Antonius was sent by Gabinius to defeat him. Aristobulus and his sons were captured again and taken to Rome. The Senate confined Aristobulus in custody but sent the sons back to Judea, because Gabinius wrote that he had promised this to Aristobulus's wife in return for the surrender of the fortresses.

Afterward, while Gabinius was detained in Egypt, Alexander son of Aristobulus again led the Jews into dissension. But Gabinius returned, made peace, and confirmed Hyrcanus in the pontificate.

After Gabinius's death, Crassus was sent from Rome as governor of Syria to repel the Parthians, who were now threatening the Romans. For the expenses of the Parthian campaign, he took from the temple almost all the gold from which Pompey had abstained, two thousand talents. On account of this he fell with molten gold poured into his mouth, and it was said to him: "You thirsted for gold; drink gold." Cassius succeeded him as governor of Syria and used Antipater's counsel in all things.

At that time dissension arose among the Romans over Pompey and Julius Caesar. After Pompey's flight across the Ionian Sea, Caesar gained possession of all affairs and of Rome. He released Aristobulus and sent him into Syria with two cohorts, judging that through him he could easily subject Judea to himself.

But Caesar's hope was frustrated, for Aristobulus died by poison at the hands of the studiosi, that is, the friends of Pompey. His son Alexander was also killed at Antioch, struck with the axe according to Pompey's letters, after an accusation concerning the things he had committed against the Romans had first been heard before the tribunal.

Only Antigonus survived. With his sisters he fled to a certain Ptolemy son of Mennaueus, who dwelt beneath Lebanon. Ptolemy took Antigonus's younger sister Alexandra as wife. By her, as some relate, he fathered a son named Lysanias, who was afterward tetrarch of Abilene.

After this a battle was fought in Emathia between the Pompeian and Caesarian parties. Emathia is named from Emath; it is Reblatha, afterward called Antioch or Epiphania. Antipater, father of Herod the Ascalonite, was present in this battle with Jews on Pompey's side.

When Antipater returned to Judea, fearing Caesar's attack, he sent his children to their Arab kinsmen. After Pompey died, Antipater placed himself under Caesar's patronage. Caesar sent Mithridates of Pergamum to conquer Pelusium and sent with him Nicholas Ptolemy and Antipater with three thousand Jews.

There Antipater's courage shone especially. He was the first to climb over the wall. By his prudence he also inclined the Memphites to Caesar's service. When battle was joined with the Egyptians and many were killed, Antipater's entire body was pierced with wounds, but against expectation he survived the battle.

After victory was obtained, he had Mithridates as a witness before Caesar to his deeds, while Marcus Antonius also commended him in many respects. He became Caesar's friend. Caesar gave him Roman immunity and citizenship and, for his sake, confirmed Hyrcanus in the pontificate.

At that time Antigonus, brother of Aristobulus mentioned above, accused Antipater and Hyrcanus before Caesar, saying that by their counsel his brother and father had perished. In response Antipater cast off his garment, displayed the multitude of his wounds, and said there was no need for words, since his scars cried out, even if he remained silent, that he had been faithful to the Romans, while Antigonus had been their son. For no one could draw Antipater away from Pompey while he lived, nor would anyone now be able to tear him from Caesar.

Caesar then gave Antipater the choice of any dignity under the high priest in Judea. Setting aside the measure of a dignity, Antipater was declared procurator of Judea under Caesar. He also obtained permission to rebuild the overthrown walls of his country. Caesar granted the kingdom to Hyrcanus as well, yet so that he should not be called king, and appointed his own kinsman Sextus over Syria.

§ XXII. Antipater's Sons

After this Antipater appointed his elder son Phasaelus as procurator under him at Jerusalem and placed Herod over Galilee. Herod was energetic, for he killed the leader of robbers, Hezekiah, together with his followers. He rendered the land so quiet that Herod was publicly sung of as the father of Galilee.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Four (continued)

Phasaelus likewise strove with honorable rivalry to surpass his brother's character. For this reason, and because their father conducted royal affairs through their services, he too was honored. Yet on this account they were no less faithful to Hyrcanus.

Nevertheless, it is impossible for anyone to escape envy in deeds well performed. There were men who told Hyrcanus that, after affairs had been entrusted to Antipater and his sons, Hyrcanus himself sat with the empty name of king. Gradually inflamed by these words, Hyrcanus ordered Herod summoned to state his case.

After first fortifying Galilee, Herod hastened to the king, carrying with him a letter from Sextus ordering Hyrcanus to absolve Herod from every charge and fault. Not long afterward Herod was made commander of Sextus's army. Herod would then have avenged upon Hyrcanus the insult of the aforesaid summons had his father and brother not mitigated his assault.

Meanwhile Caesar was treacherously killed by Brutus and Cassius, as will be related more fully below. After this Cassius came into Syria, of which he had formerly been governor. Assembling an army against the young Octavian Augustus and Marcus Antonius, he exacted seventy talents from the Jews. Herod was the first to bring one hundred talents from Galilee and thereby earned the favor of Cassius, who bore the delay of the others indignantly. Herod also went with Cassius to the battle; if he obtained victory, Cassius promised him the kingdom of Judea.

At that time one of Hyrcanus's friends, named Mallichus, was with him and aspired to the priesthood. When he resolved to attack Hyrcanus with poison, he determined first to attack Antipater, forgetful of his benefits. Antipater, Herod's father, therefore received poison through a servant and died.

Mallichus, when he was suspected of Antipater's death, excused himself to Herod in many ways. Herod complained to Cassius concerning his father's death and received a written reply from him authorizing him to avenge treachery by treachery. Cassius wrote to the chiliarchs that they should aid Herod in this matter.

Herod invited Hyrcanus and Mallichus to dinner. While they were on their way, the chiliarchs--that is, men who had a thousand soldiers under them--surrounded Mallichus and killed him. Hyrcanus collapsed, overcome with stupor. When his spirit had scarcely returned, he asked Herod who had killed Mallichus. When one of them replied, "At Cassius's command," Hyrcanus said, "Cassius has kept both me and my country safe by killing the man who plotted against us both."

Not long afterward, while Herod lay ill at Damascus, Phoenix, brother of Mallichus, took up arms against Phasaelus in vengeance for his brother, supported by the aid of Hyrcanus. When Herod recovered, he attempted to attack Hyrcanus, but through affinity they returned to concord.

Herod had a wife named Doside, but she was lowborn; by her he fathered Antipater. He married in addition Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus. For love of her he even had himself circumcised and became a proselyte. Herod indeed had nine wives, from seven of whom he received innumerable offspring.

It will suffice to enumerate a few of these: his firstborn Antipater by Doris; Alexander and Aristobulus by Mariamne; Archelaus by Matica the Samaritan; and Herod Antipas, who was afterward tetrarch, and Philip by Cleopatra of Jerusalem. Some, however, think that this Herod was Mariamne's son.

After Cassius was killed on the Philippian fields, Caesar departed for Italy and Antonius for Syria. The leading men of the Jews accused Phasaelus and Herod before Antonius, alleging that they possessed the chief power by force and that only the name remained to Hyrcanus.

Herod pacified Antonius with gifts, recalling to his memory his father's former friendship with him. When the Jewish men came again to Antioch to accuse him, with Hyrcanus also present, Antonius asked Hyrcanus who were most fit to administer affairs. When Hyrcanus preferred Herod and his brothers to the others, the delighted Antonius declared these same men procurators of Judea.

After Antonius went to Rome, Pacorus, king of the Parthians, crossed the Euphrates with a strong force. Lysanias came down to him--he was a son of Antigonus and a grandson of Ptolemy by Alexandra, as was said above--and promised him one thousand talents and five hundred women if he would place Antigonus in the kingdom.

Having consequently received many thousands of Parthians from Pacorus, Antigonus assaulted Jerusalem. Phasaelus guarded the walls, while Herod guarded the royal house. But when Antigonus entered the city on the day of Pentecost, fighting took place even in the marketplace.

When negotiations for peace began, Antigonus deceitfully requested the king of the Parthians as arbiter of the peace. Hyrcanus, Phasaelus, and Antigonus went out and hastened to the Parthian king. But Herod refused to go down with them, for his wife Mariamne advised him never to place trust in the good faith of the Parthians.

Hyrcanus and Phasaelus were seized by the Parthians on the journey. When Herod learned this, he fled by night to his Idumean kinsmen. He sent his wife, children, and all his household goods ahead and, following behind them, withstood the attacks of their pursuers. He found the Jews who pursued him more grievous than the Parthians and fought with them at the sixtieth stade from Jerusalem. There, because of his incredible victory, he afterward fortified a very strong fortress that he called Herodium.

Leaving his wives and children in the fortress of Masada under the protection of his brother Josippus, he proceeded to Petra, the city of the Arabs. The Parthians not only restored Antigonus to the kingdom but also delivered Phasaelus and Hyrcanus to him to be beaten.

Antigonus bit off Hyrcanus's ears, lest, if circumstances changed and he were released, he should receive the pontificate, for sacred rites ought to be celebrated by one who is whole. But he was forestalled by the courage of Phasaelus, who, since he had neither access to a weapon nor free hands, broke his head against a rock and expired. When he learned that Herod had escaped, he said that he wished to die with an even mind because he left an avenger alive.

There are some who say concerning Hyrcanus that a physician was sent to him by Antigonus, who poured poison into his ears as though it were medicine, and that he died. Josephus, however, relates that he was sent to the Parthians and long held in derision.

When Herod learned of his brother's death, he hastened to Rome, not deterred by the harshness of winter. After his ship was wrecked near Pamphylia and repaired at Rhodes, he proceeded to Rome and first explained the reason for his journey to Antonius. Antonius marveled at his misfortunes, took pity upon him, and persuaded the Senate to declare him king of Judea.

Herod was therefore crowned and led to the Capitol, with Augustus and Antonius standing on either side of him. The decree of the Senate concerning this act was deposited there. Herod was sent back to Judea with two leaders, Ventidius and Silo, to establish him in the kingdom.

When they came into Galilee, Antigonus corrupted Silo with a payment. For this reason they postponed meeting Antigonus in battle by inventing pretexts. When they finally besieged Jerusalem, the Romans, frightened both by the harshness of winter and by scarcity of provisions, withdrew from the siege and wintered in Idumea and Galilee.

Herod was nevertheless not idle then, for he pursued the multitude of robbers and even suffocated them in caves. At that time Antonius was staying near Athens and was already held by love for Cleopatra. Herod hastened to him to make a complaint concerning Silo's deceit.

Meanwhile Sosius--or, according to others, Josippus--despised Herod's command and fought against Antigonus so that he might perform some illustrious deed. He was defeated and beheaded by Papius, commander of Antigonus's army, and Antigonus inhumanly attacked his severed head with his spurs.

When Antonius learned of Silo's deceit, he sent Sosius with Herod and a strong force. Coming into Judea, Herod defeated Papius as he met him and sent his head to his brother Pheroras as consolation for their murdered brother.

At last, after Jerusalem had been besieged for five months, the Romans rushed into it in the sixth month and spared no age, although Herod begged them to show mercy. Antigonus likewise came down and prostrated himself at the feet of Sosius. Sosius had no pity upon him but mocked him, called him Antigona, and cast him into chains.

When the entire multitude of soldiers was incited to see the sacred objects and despoil the sanctuary, Herod restrained them, saying that victory would be more bitter for him than if he had been defeated. He reproached Sosius with leaving him king of a solitude if the city were emptied of its wealth, and promised that he would give each soldier payment from his own resources.

When he had fulfilled his promise, Sosius returned to Antonius, bringing Antigonus bound with a golden chain. Antonius struck him with the axe. Herod was confirmed in the kingdom of Judea in the fourth year after he had received the diadem at Rome. Hence one sometimes reads more and sometimes fewer years for Herod's reign.

Dissension arose between Mariamne and Herod's sister Salonia. Salonia reproached Mariamne with harlotry, and Mariamne reproached Salonia with low birth. At his sister's advice Herod treacherously killed Hyrcanus.

This is according to those who say that Hyrcanus did not die after Antigonus cut off his ears, but returned to Jerusalem after Herod was established in the kingdom and was restored to his former status in the priesthood, though without administration. Herod killed Hyrcanus under the pretext that Hyrcanus said the kingdom was owed to him.

As consolation to Mariamne, Hyrcanus's granddaughter, Herod ordained her brother Jonathan as high priest when he was seventeen years old. At Mariamne's request, whom he loved beyond measure, he expelled Doris and her son Antipater from Jerusalem, permitting them to go up to Jerusalem to worship only on the three solemn feasts. Conversely, at Salonia's suggestion Jonathan was killed because he appeared to aspire to the kingdom.

When Salonia accused Mariamne of adultery, she added that Mariamne had expressly sent her image to Antonius in order to incite him to love her. To learn whether this was so, Herod hastened to Antonius, placing Mariamne under the custody of Salonia's husband. He gave the man certain instructions among the signs, by which he was to kill Mariamne if Herod's death were reported to him.

While Herod delayed, Salonia's husband told Mariamne what had been commanded of him. When Herod returned, his wife slept upon his breast and tearfully told him that he had commanded her death. Leaping from the bed, Herod asked his sister, "Did your husband sleep with Mariamne?" She said, "He did." Herod immediately caused Mariamne and his sister's husband to be killed.

He grieved so greatly over the death of his wife Mariamne, whom he had loved beyond measure, that like a lunatic he frequently turned to madness. When he recovered, he recalled Antipater with his mother. But he sent the sons he had received from Mariamne, Aristobulus and Alexander, to Rome to be educated in the liberal arts.

In this way, as the advent of Christ approached, the kingdom was transferred from Judah to foreigners. For Herod, as was said, was an Idumean on his father's side, since his father Antipater was from Idumea. On his mother's side he was from Arabia, for his grandfather Antipater took as wife a woman named Cyprus, niece of the king of the Arabs, from whom Herod and his brothers were born. Nevertheless, Herod had himself circumcised so that he might have the Jewish woman Mariamne as wife.

Thus you may know that Jacob's prophecy was fulfilled, in which he said in the penultimate chapter of Genesis: "The scepter shall not be taken away from Judah, nor a ruler from his thigh, until he who is to be sent shall come," or, according to another reading, "the Messiah."

The kingdom began in Saul or David and continued without interruption until Zedekiah, the last of David's line, and until the transmigration. Afterward it was not entirely taken away but interrupted. For in the time of the Maccabees, although there was no kingdom or royal dignity, the leadership and principality of the Jewish people nevertheless belonged to those Maccabees, who were at once priests and leaders.

Before the time of the Maccabees, the more eminent men among that people were commonly from the tribe of Judah or Levi. Zerubbabel and Nehemiah, who returned from the Babylonian captivity with permission from Darius and Artaxerxes to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple, were of the tribe of Judah, while Ezra was of the tribe of Levi. Daniel and his companions were also of the tribe of Judah. During the captivity, under Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, and Darius, they were the foremost men over the provinces through their administrations of the kingdom.

But when the leadership or principality belonged to the tribe of Levi, as in the time of the Maccabees, who were from the tribe of Levi, it can nevertheless be said in some manner that the leadership of the people had not ceased from the tribe of Judah. This was because those two tribes--the royal tribe of Judah and the priestly tribe of Levi--contracted marriages with one another, as is evident in the wife of Aaron and the wife of the high priest Jehoiada, who were from the tribe of Judah. Thus, at least through the female line, the leaders were from the tribe of Judah.

The first descendant of the Maccabees to place the diadem upon himself and assume royal dignity was Alexander Jannaeus, as was said above. From him descended Hyrcanus, the last king from the Jewish people. But Antigonus removed him and afterward usurped the kingdom for himself; Antigonus was subsequently beheaded by Antonius.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Four (conclusion)

The kingdom of Judea passed to Herod, having been conferred upon him at Rome by the Senate at the insistence and prayers of Antonius and Octavian Augustus. This Herod was a foreigner, partly Idumean and, through his mother, from Arabia. During his reign Christ was born, and the prophecy of Jacob mentioned above was fulfilled. Hence Matthew 2 says: "When Jesus was born in the days of Herod, king of Judea," and so forth.

Chapter Five

After the monarchy of the Greeks, which began in Alexander the Great and after his death was diminished and divided into four kingdoms--namely, Asia, Egypt, Macedonia, and Syria--there follows the fourth monarchy of the world, which is believed to be the last. This is the monarchy of the Romans, according to Daniel's visions of the statue whose legs were iron but whose feet were mixed with earth, and of the four beasts coming up from the sea, of which the last was a beast unlike the others, having iron teeth, crushing all things and trampling them beneath its feet.

According to the doctors this signifies the Roman Empire, which began under Julius Caesar, who lived before Christ's nativity, and has remained until the present day, 1458. Hence it has endured longer than the others.

For although Constantine transferred the seat of the empire from the city of Rome to Constantinople in Greece, and it was afterward transferred from the Greeks to the Franks by the supreme pontiffs Adrian and Leo--the first of the Franks being Charlemagne--and was then transferred from the Franks to the Teutons, of whom Otto I was the first, and remains with them down to the present day, nevertheless its ruler has always been and is still called Emperor of the Romans.

Beginning, therefore, from the earlier kingdoms so that the commencement of this empire and its varying mode of government may be understood: as Vincent says in book 7, chapter 1 of the Historical Mirror, the kingdom of the Latins took its rise under Latus, their first king, who lived in the time of Aioth, judge of Israel. It endured until the eighth year of Darius Hystaspes, which was the eightieth year after the transmigration to Babylon--and we say after the return from captivity to Judea. Such a kingdom ran for 889 years.

It had six Latin kings, of whom the first was Latus; fourteen Alban kings, of whom the first was Ascanius; and seven Roman kings, of whom the first was Romulus. Romulus first founded the city of Rome and reigned there, and the city was named after him. This was at the time when King Ahaz reigned in Judah, or, according to others, his son Hezekiah.

The last of these seven Roman kings was Tarquin the Proud. After Brutus expelled him because of the adultery committed against Lucretia, the Romans governed their dominion through consuls. These were temporary: a consul assumed office for a year and administered the care of the commonwealth. This mode of government was maintained for 462 years, after which Julius Caesar usurped the empire for himself alone.

Some notable events performed by the Romans in the time of these consuls are briefly explained. In the first year was Brutus, who removed the tyranny of the kings. Then in the fortieth year the decemvirs were established. Camillus was consul in the 136th year; Quintilius dictator in the 148th; Papirius consul in the 186th; Maenius and Marcus Regulus in the 243rd; Publius Cornelius Scipio in the 292nd; Fabius Maximus dictator in the 298th; Lucius Aemilius Paulus and Terentius Varro in the 299th; Jovinus and Marcellus in the 303rd; Claudius Marcus Limius Salinator in the 305th; Scipio Africanus in the 361st; and Scipio Africanus the Younger in the 364th.

Afterward came Scipio Nasica, then Postulemus and Marcellus, and Marius and Gnaeus. Sulla lived in the 422nd year; Marcus Tullius Cicero, Pompey, and Crassus in the 457th. In the time of the Scipios occurred the Punic wars, that is, those against the Carthaginians; in the time of Marius, the Jugurthine War; and in the time of Cicero, the Catilinarian War. This is related by Master Thomas the Englishman in the exposition he made upon the first ten books of The City of God.

In the History of the Franks it is read that in the time of Aioth, the second of the judges of Israel, Troy was built by a certain man called Troius. After standing for 185 years, it was captured and destroyed by the Greeks in the time of Jabdo, judge of Israel, because of the adultery and abduction of Helen, wife of the Greek Menelaus, by Paris, son of Priam, king of the Trojans.

Then Aeneas, who had nevertheless betrayed that very city although he was Priam's kinsman, departed from it and came with a great fleet into Italy. King Latinus gave him in marriage his only daughter, named Laninia. King Latinus had previously promised his daughter Laninia to Turnus, but he did not keep his promise because he gave her to Aeneas when he came from Troy into Italy.

The king of the Rutulians, together with Turnus, made war against Latinus. In the first encounter King Latinus was killed by Turnus, and so too was Pallas the giant, son of King Evander, who had come to aid Latinus and Aeneas. In the second battle Turnus was killed by Aeneas. In the third Aeneas was killed and translated into a god.

Aeneas founded a city that he called Lavinium, where he reigned three years. His son Ascanius reigned twenty-seven years. Afterward Ascanius built another city near Rome, which he called Alba, and left Lavinium to Lavinia, his mother--or, according to others, his stepmother. The kingdom of Lavinium was transferred to Alba, where Ascanius reigned. That kingdom of the Albans endured until the time of Tullus Hostilius, the third king of the Romans.

§ I. Romulus and Remus

Returning, therefore, to the first Roman king: this was Romulus, whose brother was Remus. Justin speaks as follows in book 44 concerning their birth and origin. Amulius was the last king of the Albans. He expelled from the kingdom his elder brother, named Numitor. To prevent offspring, he condemned Numitor's daughter, called Rhea--or, according to others, Ilia--to perpetual virginity, dedicating her to the goddess Vesta. He did this so that no avenger of her father might be born from her.

But although she remained enclosed in the grove of Mars, she gave birth to twins. It was uncertain whether they were conceived through rape or by Mars. Although Justin speaks in this manner, he expresses the opinion of that time. For it is believed that they were conceived through rape, or at least through an incubus demon.

Amulius ordered these children to be exposed so that they would die, from which injury their mother died. According to others, however, as punishment for incest she was buried alive.

Vesta was said to be the goddess of the earth, as though standing firm, because the earth stands forever. She herself was also said to be goddess of fire because fire is found in the earth. Because nothing is born from fire, she was therefore called a virgin, a Vestal goddess, because a virgin does not give birth; and those dedicated to her were bound to preserve virginity.

This divine power was not fashioned into an image--that is, a statue--as were the other idols, because fire cannot be represented. Instead, a perpetual fire was preserved in her temple, which one of those virgins nourished by placing wood upon it. Because it was once extinguished, the virgin who guarded it was burned.

A she-wolf nourished the exposed children Romulus and Remus. But Faustulus, a shepherd of the royal herd, found them beside the bank of the Tiber and carried them to his wife Acca Larentia, as Helinand says. Because of the beauty and rapacity of her lustful body she was called a she-wolf by her neighbors; hence even down to our own memory the cells of prostitutes are called lupanaria.

When Romulus and Remus had grown up, they drove robbers away from plundering the livestock. Remus was captured by the robbers and brought before Numitor as himself a robber. When Numitor saw him, Faustulus suddenly arrived with Romulus. They formed a conspiracy, killed Amulius, and restored Numitor to the kingdom.

Romulus and Remus are called sons of Mars because they were warlike, or because they were conceived in the temple of Mars; nevertheless, they were not conceived by him but through rape.

As is contained in the Chronicles, in the time of Ahaz, king of Judah, Rome was founded upon Mount Aventine by the twins Romulus and Remus. In the third year from the founding of the city, Remus was killed with a shepherd's mattock by Fabius, Romulus's commander--according to some, by Romulus's contrivance so that he alone might reign--and Romulus alone was raised to the kingdom.

Jerome says: "Rome could not have two kings at once and was dedicated with fratricide," as is cited in Cause 7, Question 1, Among Bees.

At the same time, according to Augustine in The City of God, the Erythraean Sibyl is said to have flourished. The verses beginning, "As a sign of judgment, the earth will grow wet with sweat," and so forth, which predicted many things about Christ, are said to be hers.

If this occurred in the time of Hezekiah, Rome was therefore founded in the 335th year of the Fourth Age and, according to Jerome's computation, in the 3,223rd year from the beginning of the world. But according to the Seventy and Bede, whose computation is more commonly held, it was the 4,457th year. If, according to others, it was founded in the year of Ahaz, it was a little earlier, because Ahaz was Hezekiah's father. According to Eusebius in the Chronicles, the aforesaid Romulus and Remus were born in the 405th year after the captivity or destruction of Troy.

After Romulus constructed the walls of the very large city, those who were with him were not sufficient to fill it. He built a temple called an asylum, promising impunity to everyone who fled to it. For this reason a very great multitude of robbers and fugitives gathered within the city, as Titus Livy writes in the first book On the Origin of the City.

Romulus saw that they had no wives and that the city could not long stand without them. He sent to the neighboring cities, asking that their daughters be given to his men as wives. But from its very beginning the city of Romulus was hateful. The neighbors feared this multitude of such men, namely robbers, while Romulus and his men were held in contempt because they were shepherds and poor.

The neighbors therefore answered Romulus and his companions that, just as they had opened an asylum for men wishing to flee to them, so they should open one for women as well, and in this way obtain wives, for the neighbors refused to give them their daughters.

Hearing this, Romulus concealed his mind as though the matter did not concern him. He decreed that circus games should be celebrated for the god Consus--that is, the god of counsels--and caused it to be proclaimed so that many of the neighbors would gather for the spectacle. While these games were underway, Romulus arranged that when women came from Sabina, a city near Rome, to watch the games, each man should seize as his wife whichever woman he wished. This was done.

Afterward Romulus and his men waged wars against the fathers of those girls, who wished to avenge the injury done to them and recover their daughters. Immediately after the abduction of their daughters, their parents went about the neighboring cities in soiled garments and with tears, inciting them by their complaints against the Romans because of the injury done to them. Although the greater part of the abducted women were Sabines, there were nevertheless others from other neighboring cities.

First, moved for this reason, the Ceninenses made a great attack upon Roman territory and laid it waste. But Romulus and his men defeated them while they were scattered through the fields, killed their leader, and captured their city. Afterward the Crustumini made war upon the Romans and were defeated.

Last of all, a more serious war was waged against the Romans by the Sabines, and in the first encounter they captured the citadel of the Capitol. When the daughter of Spurius Tarpeius, who commanded the Capitoline citadel, went out to draw water, Titus Tatius, prince of the Sabines, met her with his men and promised the girl gifts if she would admit them into the citadel. They entered while the Romans were unaware, killed the girl, and occupied the citadel.

On the following day they engaged the Romans. They routed Hostilius, commander of the Roman army, and the Roman army as far as the old gate of the palace. But Romulus and his men vowed to build a temple to Jove so that his army might cease fleeing and strengthen itself to resist. When the army of Romulus did so, it began through brave fighting to gain the upper hand against the Sabines.

Then the Sabine women who had been abducted, with disheveled hair and torn garments, threw themselves between the battle lines and the flying weapons. On one side they begged their parents and on the other their husbands not to stain themselves with the impious blood of fathers-in-law and sons-in-law. Thus they moved the minds of both sides. In the ensuing silence the leaders made treaties, formed one city from the two, conferred rule upon Rome, and wished the Sabines to be called Quirites on equal terms.

Titus Livy narrates the death of Romulus in this manner. While Romulus was reviewing his army at the marsh of Caprea, a great storm with thunder suddenly arose. Romulus, covered by the cloud itself, was taken from the sight of the assembly and was not seen afterward. For this reason the multitude said or believed that he had been translated into a god. Some, however, said that the senators then hated him and tore him to pieces.

A certain man named Julius Proculus confirmed the belief in his deification, declaring that Romulus had appeared to him on the road, already made a god, and given him many commands. Thus Romulus was regarded as a god by the Romans and called Quirinus from the spear he was accustomed to carry. For in the Sabine language quiris means the same as spear. They considered him the greatest god after Jove.

Behold what sort of gods the pagan Romans had: Jove, whom they called the highest god, was a most criminal man. He expelled his father Saturn from the kingdom so that he himself might reign in Crete; he was a violator of virgins, an adulterer, and a sodomite, as is said of Ganymede. Romulus was a fratricide, the prince of robbers, hostile to his neighbors, and the abductor of the Sabine women.

§ II. Numa Pompilius

After the death of Romulus, as Titus Livy says in book 1 On the Origin of the City, the senators, after the people conceded to them that they might choose Romulus's successor, chose Numa Pompilius for their king. Although he was not from the Romans but from the Sabines, they chose him because of his great reputation for justice and religion.

When Numa, having been chosen in this way, saw that a kingdom could not stand without laws, and that he could not devote himself to giving laws unless peace existed in the city, he immediately made peace all around at the beginning of his reign. He possessed this peace throughout his whole rule, namely forty-three years, although Eutropius says forty-one years.

After peace was made, he established a temple to the god Janus. Its closure signified peace, as though peace remained enclosed among the Romans, while its opening signified war, so that all soldiers who went out to war might return from battle and be found unharmed within it.

Having done this, he devoted himself entirely to establishing laws and instituting and ordering sacred rites. He established certain gods to be worshiped in the city, transmitted the manner of worshiping them, and occupied the greater part of his life with ceremonies and sacred matters.

After Numa died, Tullus Hostilius, who succeeded him in the kingdom, immediately caused the temple of Janus to be opened. He waged wars and devoted himself entirely to martial affairs.

From Numa's time until Octavian Augustus, under whom Christ was born, the temple of Janus was closed only once, namely after the First Punic War under the consul Manilius. In the time of Octavian, when the city rested from wars after Antonius had been defeated by him, it was closed again. Consequently, from the time of Numa until the time of Octavian the Romans had peace for only one year; nor had they peace before Numa, because Romulus continually waged wars.

Concerning Janus himself, for whom Numa made the temple, it should be known that he reigned on Mount Janiculum, which is now within the city in part and in the neighboring regions. This occurred when Saturn, expelled by his son Jove, came from Crete into those parts. Because Saturn taught people to cultivate vineyards and live civilly, Janus received him as a partner in the kingdom.

After Janus died and was deified according to their opinion, they attributed to him the power of closing and opening all things. Numa therefore established a temple for him that he wished to be closed and opened at different times, as has been said.

Isidore says concerning the laws instituted by him in Distinction 7, chapter Moses: "Numa Pompilius, who succeeded Romulus in the kingdom, first established laws for the Romans." In Distinction 1 it is said: "The law of the Quirites is called the law of the Romans, because only the Quirites--that is, the Romans--use those laws." There the Gloss says that "Romans" means all who are subject to Roman rule. Hence they are called imperial laws in another manner. How many kinds or names of those laws there are is declared throughout Distinction 2.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

This same Numa added two months to the year, namely January and February, because previously the year had been divided into ten months.

Augustine speaks of Numa Pompilius in the penultimate chapter of book 7 of The City of God, citing Varro. When a certain plowman was working a field near the Janiculum, where Numa's tomb stood, he dug up and found a chest underground. In it were seven books containing the institutions of the sacred rites composed by the said Numa Pompilius. Those institutions had been devised by him at the devil's instigation. For Augustine says that Numa was driven to practice hydromancy, so that in water he might see images of the gods--or rather, deceptions of demons--from whom he might hear what he ought to establish and observe in sacred rites.

Varro says that this kind of divination was brought from Persia and records that Numa himself, and later the philosopher Pythagoras, used it. He also relates that by it, with human blood applied, even the dead are raised. When the said books were found and presented, the praetor Pompilius caused them to be burned publicly by authority of the Senate. Numa had wished to keep them hidden because he thought them harmful to people; the Senate caused them to be burned because their teaching appeared to draw people away from the religion and worship of the gods, as Valerius says.

§ III. Tullus Hostilius

The third king of the Romans was called Tullus Hostilius. He was devoted to military affairs, and so he caused the temple of Janus to be opened. Disdaining peace, he sought occasions for wars, beginning with Alba, which had been, as it were, the mother of Rome, because Romulus, the builder of Rome, was descended through his mother from those who reigned at Alba. These two cities, Alba and Rome, had been sufficiently friendly with one another down to this Tullus, the third king of the Romans.

He repeatedly provoked the Albans to war, the two cities now contending over which one ought to possess dominion, as Titus Livy relates in book 1. On one occasion, when the armies of both cities had been led out to fight, their commanders agreed upon the following course in order to avoid the slaughter of many: three brothers from the Roman army, strong in bodily power and vigorous in arms, called the Horatii, would fight three other brothers from the Alban army, called the Curiatii, who were no less valiant. Everyone else would remain at rest, and whichever side's champions won would possess dominion.

When the three Horatii fought the same number of Curiatii, two of the Horatii were killed, while the third survived. None of the Curiatii was killed, but all three were gravely wounded. The Horatius who remained unwounded, realizing that he could not resist the three together, even though they were wounded, feigned flight so that the three, attempting to pursue him, would become separated from one another. Once they were apart, he turned upon his pursuers. He first engaged and killed the one who had drawn nearest him, then the next who arrived, and finally the third. Having killed them, he returned to his own men amid the Romans' great rejoicing, and thus dominion was awarded to the Romans.

When this Horatius entered Rome in triumph with the spoils of the three Curiatii whom he had killed, his sister recognized the spoils of one of them, to whom she had already been betrothed but not yet given in marriage. Perceiving the death of her bridegroom, she wept out of affection for him. The said Horatius took this so badly that he killed her, exercising excessive cruelty in this act.

The Albans were displeased that Mettius, the commander of their army, had placed the victory in the conflict of three men, by which dominion had fallen to the Romans. In order to reconcile the Albans to himself and please them, Mettius, seeing that they were not sufficient to conquer the Romans openly, stirred up other neighboring peoples against Rome, namely the Fidenates and the Veientes, while reserving himself and his own men for treachery. For when Tullus, king of the Romans, took the Albans and Mettius their commander with him to fight those peoples, trusting that they would aid him, Mettius deserted Tullus at the clash of battle and went up with the Albans onto a nearby mountain. There he could watch the fortune of the combatants and join whichever side he saw prevailing.

When Tullus discovered this, he cried out to his army that they need not be at all alarmed by the Albans' withdrawal, because they had withdrawn at his command in order to attack the enemy from the rear. Tullus and the Romans defeated the peoples who had come against him. After the victory he captured Mettius, commander of the Albans, and caused his body to be pulled apart in two directions. He utterly destroyed the walls and houses of the Alban city and compelled its citizens to move from there to Rome, to dwell on the Caelian Hill adjoining the city. Thus he enlarged Rome with the Albans, for according to Titus Livy the city of Alba had stood for four hundred years.

Titus Livy also relates that when a plague grew severe at Rome, Tullus fell into a long illness. Thereafter, abandoning his former ferocity toward war, he turned his mind to the sacred rites of the gods. While he was performing certain secret, solemn sacrifices to Jove, and doing so incorrectly, he and his household were struck and consumed by lightning.

§ IV. Ancus Marcius, Tarquin the Elder, Servius Tullius, and Tarquin the Proud

The fourth king of the Romans, as Titus Livy relates, was called Ancus Marcius. I have not yet read what he did, except that he founded the city of Ostia on the sea at the sixteenth milestone from Rome, as is said in the Martiniana Chronicle, and first caused a bridge to be made across the Tiber between Mount Aventine and the Janiculum. He lived in the time of Josiah, king of Judah, and reigned thirty-five years. From Ostia takes his name the cardinal bishop of Ostia who consecrates the pope. Ostia, however, is now entirely destroyed together with its port.

It should also be noted that Tarquin the Elder, a foreigner who came to Rome, found such favor with Ancus Marcius, the fourth king of the Romans, that at Ancus's death he was made guardian of the king's sons. After King Ancus Marcius died, when the Roman citizens assembled to provide themselves with a future king, Tarquin, who was guardian of Ancus's sons, sent them hunting. In their absence he asked the Romans for the kingdom and obtained it.

Although Tarquin afterward performed many vigorous deeds in the kingdom, the sons of Ancus conspired against him because of the injury done to them when he obtained the kingdom and because he had appointed neither of them as his successor, but instead a certain slave, Tullius, to whom he had betrothed his daughter. They selected two shepherds accustomed to fighting with rustic iron tools to kill him. According to their agreement, the men quarreled with each other and appealed to the king. When they had been admitted and brought before him, and the king was listening intently to one of them making his complaint, the other raised an axe, struck the king on the head, and killed him. Thus Tarquin the Elder, fifth king of the Romans, ended his life.

He was succeeded by Servius Tullius, the sixth king of the Romans. Servius made ditches around the city's walls and was the first to institute the taking of a census from the people, a practice previously unknown. He gave his daughter in marriage to Tarquin, who became the seventh king after him and was called Tarquin the Proud.

As Titus Livy relates in book 1, this Tarquin, incited by the wickedness of his wife, the daughter of Servius Tullius, sought the kingdom. First he inveighed against King Tullius before the senators, and afterward did the same while addressing the people in the forum. Surrounded by a multitude of armed men, he installed himself in the royal palace and ordered a herald to summon the senators before King Tarquin. On hearing this, Tullius immediately hurried there and began rebuking Tarquin. Tarquin at once hurled him down the steps. Though gravely injured, Tullius tried to make his way home, but men sent by Tarquin killed him on the road. His own daughter Tullia, hastening to salute the new king, caused her carriage to be driven over her father's body. Thus Tarquin the Proud usurped the kingdom of the Romans. He afterward subdued the Volsci and Gabini, peoples neighboring Rome.

Later he built a temple to Jove on the city's hill. This hill was first called Saturn because Saturn had inhabited it, and was afterward called the Tarpeian Hill. While the temple's foundation was being dug, a human head with its face intact was found underground. From this the hill was thereafter called the Capitoline Hill and the temple the Capitol. The work was so costly that, according to Titus Livy, the magnificence of the Romans in the time of Augustus, when they ruled the whole world, could scarcely produce anything equal to it.

Aulus Gellius relates in book 1 that an unknown old woman approached King Tarquin the Proud carrying nine books, which she said were divine oracles, and declared that she wished to sell them. Since in the king's judgment she asked an excessive price, he laughed at her. She then made a fire in the king's presence and burned three of the books, asking whether he would buy the six remaining books for the same price. He answered that the old woman was mad. She immediately burned three others and questioned the king about the three books that remained just as she had about the six. Seeing the woman's constancy, he bought the three books for no less a price than she had asked for all of them. After the woman departed from the king, she was never found anywhere.

Those three books were placed in a shrine and called the Sibylline books. Fifteen men resorted to them as to an oracle whenever the immortal gods had to be consulted on behalf of the state. Thus says Aulus Gellius. Isidore speaks differently in the Etymologies: the Cumaean Sibyl, so called from Cumae, a city of Campania, brought nine books containing the decrees of the Romans not to Tarquin the Proud but to Tarquin the Elder, the fifth king of the Romans. If the event occurred as Aulus Gellius says, that woman appears to have been the devil in a woman's form.

Tarquin the Proud, the seventh king, was expelled from the kingdom because of the adultery his son committed against Lucretia. Titus Livy gives her story at length in book 1. Lucretia's husband, the most noble Roman Tarquin Collatinus, was at the siege of Ardea, a city of the Rutuli, and was dining with Sextus Tarquin, son of Tarquin the Proud, the last king, and with other royal youths. A conversation arose among them about their wives. Each began to praise his own and prefer her to the others.

Then Lucretia's husband said: "There is no need of words, for the truth can be learned from deeds." They mounted their horses to visit their wives unexpectedly and learn what each was doing. At the beginning of the night, those whose wives were at Rome came there. Entering their homes suddenly with their companions, they found their wives occupied with luxury and banquets. Proceeding afterward to Collatia, a town near Rome from which Lucretia's husband was called Collatinus, they suddenly entered the house of Tarquin Collatinus and found Lucretia occupied with wool-working among her maidservants. The prize among the wives for honorable conduct therefore remained with Lucretia.

Sextus Tarquin, son of King Tarquin, was suddenly seized with love for her and considered how he might possess her. A few days later, without Collatinus's knowledge, this son of King Tarquin came with one companion to Lucretia's house. She received him honorably and after supper caused him to be conducted to bed. During the night, when everyone was asleep, he secretly came to Lucretia's bed. Holding a sword in his hand, he awakened her and demanded by entreaties that she consent to him. He threatened that if she did not consent, he would kill her and place one of the slain servants beside her, and then publish abroad that he had killed her because of the adultery she had committed with the servant. Fearing infamy more than death, she yielded to him.

After Tarquin's departure, Lucretia immediately sent for her husband Collatinus and for her father. When they came, she explained what had happened and killed herself with a sword she had hidden beneath her clothing, after exacting from her family a pledge to avenge the injury upon the said Tarquin. Augustine reproves Lucretia both for adultery and for homicide, as appears at length in book 1 of The City of God and in Cause 32, Question 5, Is It So?

Because of this crime of Tarquin, the royal title, or royal dignity, was taken away from the city. Thereupon Lucretia's kinsmen and friends carried her body to Rome so as to incite the people still more against the king. At the time King Tarquin was outside the city with his army at the siege of Ardea. When he returned and wished to enter the city, they closed the gates to him and refused to admit him, both because of what had been done to Lucretia and because of his own pride and tyranny.

Afterward he long troubled the Romans in the hope of recovering the kingdom, aided by the army of Prosemyes, king of Clusium. At last, despairing of accomplishing his purpose, he grew old at Tusculum and ended his life there. Then, as Tullius relates in On

Friendship, he is said first to have recognized which friends had been faithful and which unfaithful, when he could repay neither group.

Thus the seven kings reigned for 243 years, according to Augustine, Eutropius, and Titus Livy. Throughout the whole period of the kings, Rome did not possess territory beyond fifteen or twenty miles, according to Eutropius.

§ V. The First Consuls

The first two consuls were then created: Brutus and Tarquin Collatinus, Lucretia's husband. When Brutus discovered that his sons and other kinsmen were secretly discussing the restoration of the expelled King Tarquin to the city, he exposed the conspiracy and by sentence caused his sons and the other accomplices in the faction to be killed publicly.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

Of this deed Virgil says: "Love of fatherland prevailed, and an immense desire for praise."

As Titus Livy relates, these two sons of Brutus and two of his kinsmen--that is, his wife's brothers--together with several other young men, had been accustomed during the reign of Tarquin the Proud to lead a luxurious and dissolute life with the sons of King Tarquin. After his expulsion they therefore took it badly that much of their former freedom to do evil had been taken away. They said that the laws were deaf and inexorable things, more salutary and favorable to the needy than to the powerful, and that if one exceeded due measure they allowed no relaxation or pardon.

They discussed these things with the men whom Tarquin had arranged to send to the city to reclaim his property, and the plan for King Tarquin's return would have taken effect had they not been exposed by a servant who heard their discussions. Once the treason was revealed, Brutus caused his sons and kinsmen first to be beaten publicly with rods in his presence and by his sentence, and then to be beheaded, without showing any sign of grief. As Valerius says, he stripped himself of the father in order to display the consul.

This happened in the first year of his consulship, the 244th year from the founding of the city. Later, in the war that Tarquin stirred up against him, angered by this, Brutus fought bravely against Arruns, son of King Tarquin, and the two fell dead from wounds inflicted upon each other. Brutus was succeeded in the consulship by Spurius Lucretius, father of Lucretia, who had been violated by Tarquin's son, but he died of disease within the year.

The royal name was so hateful to the Romans that, although the consul Collatinus had labored faithfully for the fatherland and had freed the city from royal tyranny, they most ungratefully drove him from the consulship and the city because he bore the name Tarquin.

The newly instituted dignity of the consulship extended for one whole year and no longer. As Eutropius says, the consular dignity or office was annual lest those holding power become more insolent through its long continuance. Two consuls were created so that if one wished to become wicked, the other, possessing equal power, might impede and restrain him. Yet they did not possess absolute power: they could restrain Roman citizens and place them in chains, but could not kill them without the people's command; and an appeal could be made from them.

Later, when the dominion had increased, another dignity of greater power was instituted, called the dictatorship. It lasted for six months, could pass judgment of death, and allowed no appeal. It did not, however, continue regularly like the consulship, but was employed rarely and in great necessities. Thus says Titus Livy.

Brutus, Collatinus's colleague in the consulship, was the cause of his expulsion from the city. As Titus Livy relates, Brutus summoned the plebeians to an assembly and recalled how they had sworn that they would leave no one in the city and suffer no one to reign there from whom danger to liberty could arise. He added that he did not believe the Roman people had recovered its customary liberty while a royal family and a royal name--namely Tarquin Collatinus--remained not only in the city but also in command, that is, in the consulship. By this means he brought it about that Tarquin Collatinus not only resigned the consulship within the year, but also left the city after gathering and carrying away his patrimony.

Here it should be noted that Sallust greatly commends the Roman commonwealth in the time of the earlier consuls, saying in the Catilinarian War that right and goodness prevailed among them less by laws than by nature. Yet Augustine, in book 2, chapter 17 and the chapters following of The City of God, shows by many examples that this is not true, because they observed neither natural right nor equity in the time of either the kings or the consuls, but committed many unjust deeds: against the Sabines in the abduction of their daughters, against Tarquin Collatinus, and against Marcus Chamillus in his expulsion from the city.

Titus Livy tells the history of Chamillus. Veii, a most powerful city nearly twenty miles from Rome, had been besieged by the Romans for ten years, and during the siege the Romans had very often fought the Veientes with an evil outcome. At last Marcus Chamillus was made consul and sent against them. He made a subterranean passage as far as the city's citadel and sent soldiers through it. While the citizens were occupied with defending the walls then under assault and left the citadel empty, first the citadel itself and then the city were captured.

Afterward, because Chamillus had offended the plebeians in dividing the spoil, he was summoned to judgment before them. As Valerius relates in book 5, Luceus Apulcius, tribune of the plebs, accused him as a petulator, that is, a thief of the commonwealth, for the Veientine booty, and by harsh sentences he was sent into exile. This happened when he had been deprived of an excellent young son and ought rather to have been soothed with great consolations than burdened with disgrace. The tribunes of the plebs complained that fifteen thousand pieces of bronze were missing from the treasury, and his penalty was fixed at the same sum. Titus Livy says that, certain of his condemnation, he voluntarily went into exile at Ardea and was condemned in his absence to ten thousand pieces of bronze. Thus they showed the greatest ingratitude toward him.

Nevertheless, in the third year afterward, when the Capitol was besieged by the Gauls, the Romans were compelled by necessity to recall him to the city and create him dictator. The dignity of dictator was greater than the consulship, for it stood even over the consuls, though it was not continuous but used at certain times. Chamillus immediately arrived with an army while the Romans were counting out to the Gauls the money with which they had purchased their freedom. He not only raised the siege but defeated the Gauls and afterward almost completely destroyed them.

These things occurred in the 365th year from the founding of the city and the 122nd after the expulsion of the kings. In the same year Chamillus captured the city of the Volsci, who had waged war for seventy years, as well as the cities of the Aequi and the Sutrini. About the same time Quintus Cincinnatus accepted the surrender of the city of Penestre together with eight cities in fewer than twenty days.

§ VI. Porsenna and Mucius Scaevola

When Tarquin the Proud was expelled from the city's kingdom, as Titus Livy testifies in book 2, he went to Porsenna, king of the city of Clusium, a most famous and powerful man, and asked his aid. Porsenna came to Rome with his powerful army and with the Etruscans and afflicted the Romans with a long and exceedingly severe siege.

Then Mucius Scaevola asked the Senate's permission to enter Porsenna's camp. Having obtained it, he reached Porsenna's royal seat, where he killed a secretary sitting beside the king. Arrested and led before the king's tribunal, he confessed that he was a Roman citizen and had come to kill the king; that he regarded killing and being killed as equal; and that it belonged to a Roman to suffer and to do all things.

When the king ordered him to be tortured in the flames so that more of the affair might be extracted from him, Mucius voluntarily extended his hand into the fire and held it there motionless until the king, stricken with horror, ordered him to be removed from it, saying: "Go away, you who have dared deeds more hostile against yourself than against me."

Then Mucius, as though wishing to repay the king for his kindness, said: "What you could not extort by threats, now receive freely from me. Know that three hundred of us, the leading young men of Rome, have conspired to attack you in this manner. My lot was first; each of the others in turn will attempt the same when opportunity arises." When the king heard this and considered the greatness of the danger if three hundred men who valued their lives as nothing continually plotted against him, he sent ambassadors to offer the Romans terms of peace of his own accord. Once peace was established, he withdrew from the siege.

Augustine, however, in book 4, chapter 2 and book 5, chapter 28 of The City of God, says with Valerius Maximus that Mucius put his hand into the fire because he had struck someone other than the man he intended. He had meant to strike King Porsenna but struck someone else, and therefore, angered at his hand for its error, he put it into the fire. According to Orosius, this Porsenna was king of Etruria, that is, Tuscany; hence the Etruscans are called Tuscans. He besieged Rome for three years and received much help from its neighbors in his attempt to recover the kingdom for Tarquin, but did not prevail.

§ VII. The Secession of the Plebs and the Twelve Tables

In the fifteenth year after Tarquin the Proud, last king of the Romans, had been expelled from the kingdom--or in the following, sixteenth year according to Titus Livy, book 2--the plebeians began to be harassed by their superiors. At first, those chosen for war served at their own expense. Since there were many wars, or rather they scarcely ever ceased from wars and plagues, they were compelled to borrow money from the powerful, with the result that they could afterward satisfy neither the principal nor the interest demanded for the loan. They were therefore overcome, imprisoned, and treated very badly.

For these reasons sedition arose between the senators and the plebeians, the plebs complaining of such harsh oppression by their superiors. The plebs withdrew three miles from the city and occupied the Sacred Mount, which some call the Aventine Hill within the city. At length the plebs was reconciled on condition that they have certain magistrates of their own who would protect them against the oppression and injuries of their superiors. These magistrates were called tribunes of the plebs.

Forty years after this dissension, in the 300th year from the founding of the city, another dissension arose between the consuls and the tribunes of the plebs. The consuls denied that the power of making laws belonged to the tribunes and plebs, saying that it belonged only to themselves and consequently that the laws enacted by the tribunes together with the plebs had no force. Nevertheless, the consuls, tribunes, and everyone else agreed that men should be sent into Greece to obtain laws, as Titus Livy says in book 3.

After the envoys had been sent to Athens for laws, two evils arose together at Rome: plague and famine among both human beings and beasts of burden. The city was consequently exhausted by funerals, and many distinguished men died that year: four tribunes of the plebs, the priest of Romulus, the priest who presided over the auguries, and several other great men.

Ten men were created, as Titus Livy and Orosius relate. These decemvirs were given for one year the power customarily given to the consuls. Although in the first year they conducted themselves well and modestly, in the following year one of them, Appius Claudius, forcibly continued in office when his colleagues resigned their magistracy, that is, that office. When his colleagues saw this, they resumed the magistracy they had resigned, greatly against the people's will.

Appius Claudius added another evil deed. He burned with lust for the daughter of a certain plebeian soldier who was absent from the city with the army. So that he might possess her more easily, Appius persuaded one of his clients to claim her in a legal action as a slave, intending to prove that she was his maidservant, so that once awarded to the client she would come into Appius's power. Appius himself was judge in the case and, in the father's absence, adjudged the girl to his client as his slave.

Before the sentence could be executed, the girl's father was summoned by his friend. Seeing that he could not resist the wickedness, he killed his daughter. At once a tumult arose in the city, the entire populace detesting Appius's wickedness. The father went out to the army, which was not far away, and complained of the decemvir Appius. Because the army had always consisted for the most part of plebeians, it seceded from the senators and settled on the Aventine Hill, abandoning Algidus, the place where it had been fighting the Aequi, a people so called.

This dissension was settled and the army reconciled to the senators when the tribunician power that the decemvirs had obstructed was restored to the plebs, the decemvirs themselves were expelled from office, and every fault was remitted to the army and its soldiers.

In the year preceding the creation of the decemvirs, Roman envoys had been sent to the Athenians to bring back Solon's laws. This Solon was one of the Seven Sages of the world. According to Valerius, Solon gave the Athenians such excellent laws that if they had been willing to use them perpetually, they would have possessed everlasting dominion. At last he was expelled from his homeland and spent his old age on Cyprus.

When the envoys brought back the ten tablets of Athenian laws mentioned above, ten men were created according to the number of the tablets. They were given consular power, and no appeal from them was permitted. They received the power to enact and amend laws. From the ten tablets of Athenian laws translated into Latin, they extracted some provisions and corrected others, filling ten tablets. They nevertheless added two new tablets in which they wrote new laws, for the Roman envoys had looked beyond the laws themselves into the customs of the Athenians and other Greeks and reported them. Thus there were twelve tablets of laws in all, called the Laws of the Twelve Tables, as appears at the beginning of the Digest. Isidore also discusses this in the Etymologies, and from him the Decretum, Distinction 7, Moses.

§ VIII. Famine and the Poisoning of the Matrons

In the 308th year from the founding of the city, a most severe famine afflicted the Romans. Many, having lost hope of food and wishing not to be tortured long by hunger, drowned themselves in the Tiber. For this reason Lutius Mimitius was created prefect of the grain supply, that is, the man who was to have chief care of provisions for the city. He afterward compelled those who had hidden grain to sell it, so that the city might at least have enough for one month.

At the same time there was a certain Lutius Emilius, a very wealthy man of equestrian rank. He purchased grain elsewhere with his own money, brought it into the city, and distributed it to the plebs. Enticed by so great a benefit, the plebs promised him the consulship. He said this was far too little for so great a benefit and that it would be insufficient unless they made him king.

These things reached the Senate, which immediately appointed the now eighty-year-old Lutius Quintus Cincinnatus dictator. At that time a dictator's power was like that later possessed by dictatorial emperors, except that it lasted for only half a year. Servilius Ahala was appointed his master of the horse. Lutius Emilius and the plebs were amazed at the sight.

Meanwhile the dictator sent the master of the horse to summon Lutius Emilius to trial. Aemilius withdrew into the crowd of his supporters. When an officer seized him, he was rescued and fled, crying out that the senators were oppressing him because he had come to the plebs' aid in such necessity. But the master of the horse pursued him as he shouted and killed him. When a great tumult over this arose among the plebs, the dictator ordered them to come before him and pronounced in their presence that Aemilius had been killed justly, because when summoned to judgment he had scorned to come, even if he had been innocent.

In the 323rd year from the founding of the city, as Titus Livy and Orosius relate, while Claudius and Valerius were consuls and all the leading men of the city were dying from a similar disease, a certain maidservant disclosed the cause to Fabius Maximus after first being promised immunity. She said that the matrons were brewing poisons, and that if the consuls would follow her, they would apprehend them by manifest evidence.

They followed and found the matrons cooking wholesome medicines but keeping other substances concealed. These were carried into the forum, and twenty-two matrons were summoned. Two of them, one Cornelia and the other Sergia, asserted that the medicines were healthful. When they drank them at the judge's command, they died immediately.

Their companions were arrested--a very large number of matrons who admitted that they did the same--and 220 of them were condemned. It was believed that they had acted more from derangement of mind than from wickedness. Orosius, however, says that 380 were condemned together. Valerius, who also reports this, says that an inquiry into poisoning had been unknown both to Roman laws and customs until that time.

§ IX

In the 365th year, the Veientes were defeated by the Romans.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

About the same time the Senonian Gauls captured and burned the city, as Augustine touches upon in book 2, chapter 22 of The City of God, and as Titus Livy in book 5 and Eutropius also relate at length. The Senonian Gauls, led by Brennio and possessing a very numerous and exceedingly strong army, advanced upon Rome with all their forces. The consul Fabius met them but could not resist. After the Romans were defeated and killed beside the river called the Allia, eleven miles from the city, the Gauls entered the undefended city. They slaughtered the senators, who sat rigid in their seats like statues, burned them in the conflagration of their houses, and buried them beneath the collapse of the roofs. They shut up under siege in the citadel of the Capitol all the remaining youth, who are known to have numbered one thousand men.

There they subjected and sold the unhappy remnant through hunger, plague, and despair. For the Romans bargained for the Gauls' withdrawal at a price of one thousand pounds of gold--that is, the Gauls promised that they would depart from the siege--not because Rome was held in slight esteem among them, but because they had already so destroyed it that it could then be of no further strength, as Orosius says.

While they were besieging the Capitol, on a certain night the Gauls discovered a path by which the Capitol could be climbed, though with great difficulty, and began silently to ascend one after another. This escaped the watchmen, but Mallius Torquatus, awakened by the cry of a goose, ran to meet those climbing, threw them down, and killed many of them. Thus he saved the Capitol.

At last the siege was broken through Chamilus, whom, as said above, the Romans had unjustly delivered into exile and now recalled to Rome and created dictator; the army of the Gauls was reduced to nothing. Wishing to repay the goose because the Capitol had been saved by its cry, the Romans worshiped a goose as a god. As Pliny says in book 29, just as the geese earned honor by defending the Capitol while the dogs were silent, so every year the dogs undergo yearly punishments: fixed upon a fork with their shoulders, they hang--that is, pay the penalty.

After these things, when the Gauls came against the city on another occasion, one of their strongest men challenged a certain noble Roman to single combat. The Roman entered the duel, killed the Gaul, removed a golden collar from the dead man's neck, and put it upon his own. Because of this his house and all his descendants from him were called Torquati.

About those times the Romans are said to have founded the cities of Ariminum in Romandiola and Beneventum in Samnium.

The city was also afflicted by a great plague, and in its midst the earth opened in a great chasm. From its abyss an excessive stench exhaled and infected many. When the Romans sought from their gods--that is, demons speaking through images or possessed people--a remedy for closing it, their soothsayers replied that if they wished Rome's commonwealth to be everlasting, they must devote to the chasm that in which they were most powerful and most excellent, and by that very thing fill it. Curtius therefore interpreted this to mean that the Romans surpassed others in strength and arms. Fully armed and seated upon his horse, he threw himself headlong into the cavern. In his honor all the citizens cast grain upon him, as Valerius in book 5 and Titus Livy write. This happened in the 390th year from the founding of the city.

§ X. The Two Detii

In the 426th year, as Valerius in book 5, chapter 4 and Titus Livy in book 8 relate, there were two Detii, father and son, who were consuls of the Romans. Concerning the first, the father: while he was consul with Mallius Torquatus in the war against the Latins, a certain majestic figure appeared to Detius in a vision by night. It said that in that war the commander would fall on one side and the army on the other; and that the army whose commander devoted himself and the opposing army to death and the infernal gods would conquer.

When, therefore, in the battle that was afterward joined, the left wing over which Detius presided yielded to the enemy, Detius devoted himself and the enemy army to death and the infernal gods in these words: "Jupiter, Father Mars, Quirinus--that is, Romulus--and so forth: I pray and venerate you, and I seek and bear a favor--that is, I desire that you prosper strength and victory for the Roman people and afflict the enemies of the Quirites with terror, dread, and death. And just as I have declared in words and spoken, as it were, in the presence of witnesses, so for the commonwealth of the Quirites, for their laws and their army, I devote myself to the divine shades and to Earth."

Having spoken these words, Detius mounted his horse and cast himself into the midst of the enemy. At that time he appeared to each army somewhat more majestic--that is, more excellent--than anyone is ordinarily seen by human beings. Immediately the terror that had invaded the Romans invaded the Latins. When Detius was killed, the army of the Latins fell. Thus says Valerius. It must be believed that this vision proceeded through the work of the demons, to whom he descended when he died.

Concerning the other Detius, Titus Livy relates in book 4 that when he waged war against the Tuscans, to whose aid the Gauls had come, and when he, now consul for the fourth time, saw the army he commanded yielding to the enemy, he recalled his father's deed and similarly devoted himself to the infernal powers. When he was killed, the Roman army conquered. Yet, since he was a consul and commander of the army, he could, had he wished, have devoted another man from the Roman legion for the safety of his army; but he preferred to expose himself to death.

§ XI. The War with the Samnites

Concerning the Romans' war with the Samnites, about the 412th year from the founding of the city, Eutropius says in book 2 that the Samnites dwell between Picenum, Campania, and Apulia, 130 miles from the city.

When war existed between the Romans and the Samnites and Marcus Curius was consul of the Romans, Samnite envoys came to him because he was extremely poor. Finding him sitting upon a bench beside the hearth and dining from a wooden bowl, they offered him a great weight of gold publicly sent to him and invited him with kindly words to accept it. Relaxing his face slightly in a smile, he said: "Tell the Samnites that Marcus Curius prefers to command rich men rather than himself become rich, and remember that I can neither be defeated in battle nor corrupted by money." Likewise, when he had driven King Pirus from Italy, he touched nothing at all of the royal booty with which he had enriched the army and the city. And although the Senate had assigned seven iugera of land to the people but fifty to himself, he did not exceed the measure of the popular allotment, judging a citizen who was not content with what was given to everyone else to be of little fitness for the commonwealth. Thus says Valerius.

Titus Livy relates in book 9 that when war existed between the Samnites and Romans, Pontius, leader of the Samnites, held his army near the Caudine Forks, that is, at a certain place so called. Pontius sent ten soldiers dressed as shepherds to feed livestock in different places beside the road along which the Roman army was to pass. He commanded them, when the Romans came and asked where the Samnite army was, to answer with one accord that it had gone to besiege Luceria, a city allied with the Romans.

When the Romans arrived and heard this, they decided to go to Luceria to free it from siege. There were two roads: one beside the sea, but longer; the other beside the Caudine Forks, and shorter. They chose the latter so that they might aid their allies more quickly. That road is enclosed on both sides by mountains, possessing only one entrance and one exit through two passes, between which lies a certain plain. When they had passed through one defile and reached the plain, and wished to enter the other, they found the road made perilous by trees thrown crosswise upon it. They also saw armed guards on the mountain beside them. Thus they were enclosed so that they could neither retreat nor advance farther.

At last, driven by necessity, they sent envoys to the Samnites, saying there must be either a reasonable peace or war. The Samnites answered that the war was already finished, but peace was promised on these conditions: the Romans were to surrender all their arms and every other piece of equipment, each retaining only his clothing; then all were to pass under the yoke, first the consuls, afterward the other magistrates, and finally the rest of the multitude. The Romans accepted this peace under the greatest abasement, compelled by necessity, and so returned to the city in disgrace.

As Titus Livy says, when anyone was to be sent under the yoke, two spears or pieces of wood were raised and another was placed across them, as forks are made on which thieves are hanged. Those sent under the yoke passed through the middle of them as a sign of subjection. The Samnites also retained six hundred Roman soldiers as hostages.

Beyond the foregoing, Pontius, leader of the Samnites, answered the envoys whom the Roman consuls sent concerning peace that the territory of the Samnites already partly occupied by the Romans should be restored to them, the colonists whom the Romans had sent there should be withdrawn, and each people thereafter--the Roman and the Samnite--should be permitted to live by its own laws. Pontius said that he would enter a treaty of peace on these conditions.

The consuls answered that they could not enter this treaty without the people's command, without the priests who presided over the agreements of a treaty, and without the fixed solemn ceremonial observed in making one. Nevertheless, the legates, quaestors, and tribunes of the soldiers pledged that peace would be made on those conditions.

When the consuls and army had returned to Rome, what had been promised displeased the people. After taking counsel among themselves, they deliberated how they might be released from the said agreement. At last one of the consuls, Spurius Postumius, advised that the consuls and all who had pledged themselves should be handed over to the Samnites by the fetials--that is, the priests who presided over the treaty of peace. When everyone approved his counsel, all the guarantors were sent back, bound by the fetials, and offered to Pontius in surrender.

Pontius vehemently denounced the Romans' faithlessness. He said that Spurius Postumius had done what he ought with respect to himself, but the Roman people was not thereby released from its pledge, because it ought to return not only the guarantor but also the whole Roman army that he had dismissed. Let the army therefore be restored to the place where the pledge was made; he was ready to restore its weapons, and when that had been done they might repudiate the conditions of peace there if they wished. Otherwise, he said that he was unwilling to accept the guarantors in surrender. Although Pontius appeared to be asking reasonably, the Romans would not agree to do these things.

They immediately sent a stronger, picked army against the Samnites. This Roman army defeated and so crushed the Samnites that, as is said in the Martiniana, twenty-four thousand of them and their king together with the remaining multitude were killed; their city was captured and utterly overturned. Snow already covered everything and one could not live outside shelter. The consul therefore led his army out of Samnium. As he came to Rome a triumph was granted him by universal consent. He triumphed in the insignia of his magistracy, as was the custom in those times, with a magnificent triumph. Foot soldiers and horsemen distinguished by military gifts passed and were borne along. Many civic, vallary, and mural crowns were seen; the Samnite spoils, remarkable for their beauty and splendor, were viewed and compared with the earlier spoils by which the conspicuous public places were adorned.

Several noble captives, renowned for their own and their fathers' deeds, were led along. Heavy bronze was carried through, amounting to two million, and thirty-three thousand of gold. It was said that this gold had been raised from the captives, while that which had been captured from the cities amounted to 330,000; all the bronze and silver was placed in the treasury.

That city was very wealthy and possessed arms of gold and silver. It lay between Campania and Apulia, as was said. Capua, a most noble and great city, is said to have been the chief city of its country, so that it seemed almost another Rome or Carthage.

Eutropius says in book 2 that if the Romans had kept toward the Samnites the good faith of the treaty that they wished their subjects to keep toward themselves, either the Romans would not have existed at all or they would have served beneath Samnite dominion. According to Eutropius, the Romans' war against the Samnites endured forty-seven years, and the Romans had no enemy more cruel than the Samnites, who were finally destroyed as has been said.

Papirius, consul of the Romans, first fought these Samnites in the sixth year of King Ptolemy, who first reigned in Egypt after the death of Alexander the Great, and reduced them to servitude for fourteen years.

As Macrobius relates in the Saturnalia, when this Papirius was a boy, his father took him to the Senate for a council. After he returned home, his mother asked what had been discussed there. When the boy said that it was secret and could not be told, his mother threatened him with blows unless he spoke. To escape, he told an amusing lie: he said that the council had discussed whether it was more expedient for one man to have two wives or one wife two husbands. When she reported this to other women, a very great multitude assembled and went to the Senate, asking that it be established instead that one woman should have two husbands. The senators wondered at this, investigated where it had originated, and found that it had proceeded from a boy's invention. They therefore decreed that boys should no longer be admitted to that council with their fathers, Papirius alone excepted.

When Papirius later went to war, the augurs told him that he would fare badly in battle. He despised them, engaged the enemy, and won the victory.

In the 463rd year from the founding of the city, as Orosius relates in book 3, while Dolabella and Domitius were consuls, the Lucanians, Bruttii, and Samnites made an alliance with the Etruscans and Senonian Gauls and prepared wars against the Romans. The Romans sent envoys to entreat the Gauls, but the Gauls killed them. For this reason the praetor Caecilius was sent against them with an army. On arriving among the Etruscans he was killed; seven tribunes of the plebs were killed in that war, many nobles were slaughtered, and twenty-eight thousand Romans were laid low, although in the end they were victorious.

§ XII. The Tarentine War and Pirus

In the 464th year from the founding of the city, as Orosius relates in book 4, the Tarentines saw a Roman fleet passing over the sea and attacked it as an enemy. Only five ships escaped by flight; they captured the other ships and dragged them into their port, killing all those who could be useful in war and selling the others.

The Romans sent envoys to Tarentum to complain of the injury, but they were repulsed and also received insults from the Tarentines. As Valerius says, one of them was sprinkled with urine. For these reasons an immense war arose.

The Romans considered the identity and strength of the enemies making noise all around them and at last, compelled by necessity, forced the proletarii to take up arms. To explain this word proletarii, it should be known that because the Romans were continually occupied with military affairs and consequently could attend neither to domestic matters nor to the procreation of offspring, they ordained that those who through poverty could not suffice for military service should remain in the city, devoting themselves to procreation. They perceived that a city could not long endure without the procreation of offspring.

Those who were the most insignificant and poorest among the Roman plebs and paid in the census no more than 1,500 pieces of bronze were called proletarii, says Aulus Gellius. In harsh times for the commonwealth, when there was a shortage of young men, these proletarii were enrolled for emergency military service, and arms were supplied to them at public expense. They were therefore called proletarii from the office of procreating offspring.

After a great Roman army was assembled, the consul Aemilius attacked the territory of the Tarentines with his forces, devastating everything by fire and sword. He also occupied many towns and cruelly avenged the injury received. Many of the Tarentines' people aided them, but Pirus, king of the Epirotes, increased their power above all. Epirus is part of Greece, and the Tarentines were kinsmen of the Greeks, for the Lacedaemonians founded Tarentum.

Pirus therefore possessed the entire forces of Epirus, Thessaly, and Macedonia. He brought with him into Italy twenty elephants, which were unknown to the Romans. The first battle between the Romans and Pirus--to whom the whole war is ascribed although he was acting for the Tarentines--was fought at Eleacra, a city of Campania, against Laevinus, consul of the Romans.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

There the entire day was consumed in fighting, with neither side fleeing, until the elephants were brought in. These were terrifying to the Romans, who had never seen that kind of animal before, and especially to their horses, which trembled at the sight of them. By their flight the Romans showed that they had been defeated.

Nevertheless, Pirus publicly acknowledged the savagery of the disaster he had received and his loss by fastening an inscription in the temple of Jove at Tarentum, on which he wrote: "These men--the Romans--who before this had been unconquered, O best Father of Olympus, I conquered in battle, and by the same men I was conquered." When his men reproached him for saying that he was defeated when he had conquered, he answered: "If I win once more in the same manner, I shall return to Epirus without a single soldier."

Nevertheless, 13,880 Roman foot soldiers fell in that battle and 310 were captured; 248 horsemen were killed and 800 captured.

After these things a second battle between the Romans and Pirus occurred on the borders of Apulia. Although the slaughter was great on each side, the Romans nevertheless conquered. For Pirus, pierced through the arm, was the first to withdraw from battle, while Fabricius, legate of the Romans, was wounded. Fire was applied beneath the elephants, between their hindquarters and soft parts. In their fury they carried about the engines placed upon them and became the destruction of their own men. Five thousand Romans were killed in this battle and twenty thousand from Pirus's army.

In the third battle, as Eutropius relates in book 2, Pirus was put to flight. He returned to Greece and was killed at the city of Argos.

In the first war Pirus consulted Appolinem about the outcome of the war. The answer given him was: "I say to you, Pirus, that the Romans can conquer." He understood this to mean that he could conquer the Romans, but it could also be understood that the Romans could conquer him, as happened. Augustine adduces this in book 3, chapter 17 of The City of God, showing the deceitfulness of the demon in his answers, which are doubtful or equivocal so that he may deceive, as occurred here.

§ XIII. Plagues and Pagan Rites

In the 455th year from the founding of the city, an exceedingly great plague invaded Rome and continued for three years, as Titus Livy relates in book 10. When the Sibylline books were consulted for a remedy, it was discovered that Aesculapius had to be brought from Epidaurus to Rome.

Aesculapius is called the god of medicine. He was a certain man who first invented the art of medicine and was therefore considered a god. Epidaurus is the city now called Duratium, where Aesculapius--that is, his statue--was worshiped.

Roman envoys were sent to obtain him. When they entered his temple, which stood five miles from Epidaurus, behold, a serpent that had sometimes, though rarely, been seen by the Epidaurians--but was never seen without some good coming to them, on account of which they worshiped that serpent in the likeness of Aesculapius--began to crawl with gentle motion through the most frequented parts of the city. It was seen for three days, bearing the eagerness of one seeking a more illustrious abode. Then it proceeded to the Roman ship and climbed aboard, where it entered the cabin of one of the envoys and rested there.

When in the course of sailing they reached Anicium, the serpent, which had remained everywhere aboard the ship, slipped onto land, entered a temple of Aesculapius that was nearby, and remained there for three days while food was given to it. It afterward returned to the ship and allowed itself to be carried to Rome. There it came out upon the bank of the Tiber and swam across to the island where its temple was dedicated to Aesculapius; and the plague ceased among the Romans.

This was a deception of the devil, so that they would worship him in that creature, as Augustine shows in book 3, chapters 12 and 17 of The City of God. There he shows that in the 481st year from the founding of the city Aesculapius himself was later unable to heal or deliver Rome when another plague came upon it. As Orosius relates, that plague extended beyond two years and depopulated the city. When the Sibylline books were consulted, the answer--namely, from demons speaking conjecturally through augurs--was that the plague had been imposed by heavenly wrath because many temples of the gods were occupied by private persons rather than by the gods or their ministers. All of this was the devil's deception. That plague affected human beings and beasts of burden, and especially pregnant women with respect to the offspring existing and dying in their wombs.

Valerius also relates another marvelous work, though it is believed to have been the work of demons. As he says in book 2, chapter 1, when a raging plague was ravaging the city and the fields--that is, their fruits--a certain Valesius, a countryman but a rich one, had two sons and a daughter laboring with an illness beyond the physicians' hope. He prayed to the gods familiar to him that they would turn the children's danger upon his own head.

The answer came that the children would be saved if he immediately carried them down the river Tiber to Tarentum and there refreshed them with the hot water they desired, drawn from an altar of Father Dis--that is, Pluto, who is called the god of the infernal region--and Proserpina, whom the poets call goddess of that region. Understanding this to mean Tarentum, the great and famous city very far from Rome, he greatly feared to undertake so long a voyage. Nevertheless, in hope of his children's health, he began the journey.

As he made for Ostia along the Tiber, the children became thirsty and he wished to relieve them with hot water, but he saw that no fire was at hand by which the water could be heated. From afar he perceived smoke appearing at a certain place, which, as he learned from the ship's pilot, was called Tarentum. Leaving the ship and drawing water from the river, he hurried there, made a fire, heated the water, and gave it to the children to drink. After drinking it, they immediately fell asleep and were cured.

When they awoke, they said they had seen in their sleep a certain god wiping their bodies and commanding that, after an altar had been sought from Dis and Proserpina, from whom the water had been brought, black victims should be sacrificed there and couches for the gods and nocturnal games should be held. The children's father, seeing no altar there, went to the city to buy a new one, instructing his people in the meantime to dig foundations for placing it. As they dug, twenty feet deep underground they found an altar inscribed to Proserpina and Father Dis. When Valesius received word of this from a messenger, he sacrificed victims and held games there, and caused games and divine banquets to be celebrated on three successive nights, because that was the number of his children who had been healed. Thus says Valerius.

Although these games had first been instituted in the first year after the expulsion of the kings and later abolished, they were renewed in the time of the First Punic War, in which an innumerable multitude was killed on each side.

It should also be noted that during the Roman war against the Latins, when Manilius Torquatus was consul with Decius Mus, Torquatus issued an edict that no one should fight outside the regular order. Torquatus's son approached the enemy camp of the Latins with his fellow cavalymen. Geminus Metius commanded the Tusculan horsemen, who were Latins. Seeing Torquatus's son and knowing him to be a vigorous man, Metius began with insulting words to entice him into single combat. Moved partly by anger and partly by shame lest he appear to refuse the contest, Torquatus's son engaged him, immediately killed him after throwing him from his horse, and returned to his father with the slain enemy's spoils, relating what he had done.

The father at once assembled the multitude of the army and said to his son: "Since you have feared neither consular command nor your father's majesty, but contrary to our edict have fought outside the regular order, and so far as lay in you have dissolved the military discipline through which the Roman state has stood until this day, you have driven me to this necessity: I must forget either the commonwealth or myself and my own. Let us suffer the penalty for our offense rather than make the commonwealth pay so great a loss for our transgressions. We shall be a sorrowful example, but a salutary one for the young.” He immediately caused his bound son to be killed at a stake and returned to Rome with the victory. Thus say Titus Livy, Valerius, and Augustine in book 1 of The City of God.

§ XIV. The First Punic War

Just as the origin of the war between the Romans and King Pirus was the city of Tarentum, which he had first wished to aid, so the city of Tarentum was also the origin of the First Punic War. When the Tarentines heard of Pirus's death, they sought and obtained aid from the Carthaginians. Fighting against the Romans, they were defeated, although the Carthaginians had not yet been judged enemies by the Romans. Hence this does not belong to the First Punic War, but preceded it by nine years and was its occasion.

There were three Punic wars at different times between the Romans and Carthaginians. Carthage was a most powerful city in Africa, ruling all Africa and part of Spain, just as Rome was most powerful in Italy. Hence all Africans were called Carthaginians, and they were also called Poeni, Puni, Punici, and Africans. According to Eutropius, the First Punic War lasted twenty-two years, the second twenty-nine, and the third four.

In the First Punic War, which began in the twentieth year of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, Hannibal the Elder was ravaging the coast of Italy with a fleet equipped with seventy ships. Under the consuls Gnaeus Cornelius and Gaius Diullius, the Romans likewise caused a fleet to be built and equipped. The consul Diullius accomplished this quickly: within sixty days after the trees had been felled, a fleet of 130 ships stood launched at anchor.

The other consul, Cornelius, went to the island of Lipari with sixteen ships. Summoned by Hannibal, as though to a conference for peace, he was captured by Punic treachery and summoned in chains. When the consul Diullius heard this, he set out against Hannibal with thirty ships. A naval battle was joined. Hannibal lost the ship in which he was sailing but was taken off in a skiff and escaped. Thirty-one of his ships were captured and thirteen sunk; three thousand men are reported to have been killed and three thousand captured. Thus says Orosius.

In the ninth year of this First Punic War, Manilius Vulscho and Marcus Regulus were created consuls at Rome. According to Orosius, book 4, they were ordered to wage war in Africa with 430 ships and set out for Sicily, which was then under Carthaginian control.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

After obtaining victory there, the consuls crossed farther into Africa. Three hundred fortresses and towns were captured there. The consul Manilius returned to Rome, bringing with him 27,000 captives and immense spoils.

Marcus Regulus received the Carthaginian war as his lot. After killing an enormous serpent that had injured many in his army--whose skin, carried to Rome, is said to have measured 120 feet--he fought fiercely against three Carthaginian commanders, namely two men named Hasdrubal and Auulcar. In that battle 17,000 Carthaginians were killed, 5,000 captured, and eight hundred elephants brought to Rome.

Broken and exhausted by various wars and disasters, the Carthaginians sought peace from Regulus. But when they heard the intolerable conditions of peace that he had dictated, they preferred to die armed rather than assent to such terms. They therefore obtained soldiers from different regions, formed a great army, summoned Zamcippus, king of the Lacedaemonians, together with his auxiliaries, and appointed him commander in the war. An immense disaster for the Romans followed: thirty thousand Romans were killed, and Marcus Regulus was captured and cast into chains.

As Eutropius relates in book 2, when the Romans heard of the slaughter of their army and Regulus's capture, they created Paulus Aemilius and Servus Fulvius consuls. Having prepared a great fleet of three hundred ships, these went against the Africans. First they defeated the Africans in a naval battle, and the consul Aemilius sank 104 enemy ships and captured thirty.

The Africans were again defeated by the consul Metellus, who killed twenty thousand of the enemy and captured their elephants, so that Metellus brought the elephants to Rome with a great many captives. But when the Roman fleet was returning to Italy with very great booty, it was overturned in a shipwreck: 120 ships sank, and seventy barely escaped after jettisoning their cargoes.

Auulcar, commander of the Poeni, was sent with an army into Numidia and Mauretania. After he had treated everyone there cruelly and as enemies because they were said to have received Regulus, he condemned the survivors to pay one thousand talents of silver and twenty thousand oxen.

Hasdrubal, commander of the Poeni and ninth commander of the Carthaginians, had fought against Metellus and been defeated at Panormus. Twenty thousand Carthaginians were killed and twenty-six elephants, together with many others, were captured and brought to Rome. Hasdrubal himself fled with a few men to Lilybaeum and was condemned in his absence by the Poeni.

After these disasters, the Carthaginians sent Regulus, who had now been their captive for five years, to Rome so that he might obtain an exchange of prisoners. He came before the Senate and set forth the Africans' request, namely an exchange or release of the captives of each side. The Senate was inclined from affection to make the proposed exchange, especially for the liberation of Regulus himself. But Regulus urged the Senate that neither peace with the Africans nor such an exchange should be made in any way, saying that their strength was now broken and they had no hope of escape, while he himself was not of such value that so many thousands of strong African captives should be released for him, an old man, and for a few Romans.

When the Romans heard Regulus's argument in the Senate, they accepted his counsel. Although they offered to keep him at Rome, he would not agree, wishing to preserve the oath by which he had promised the Carthaginians that he would return to them if he did not obtain the proposed exchange. When he returned to Carthage and they heard what he had done, they killed him by a cruel death.

In the 507th year from the founding of the city, as Orosius relates, a sudden ruin of Rome itself came before the Romans' triumph. While Quintus Lactantius and Aulus Maenius were consuls, the river Tiber, swollen by unaccustomed rains and overflowing beyond expectation both in duration and magnitude, cast down all the buildings of Rome situated on level ground. The varying inequalities of the places combined toward a single destruction: whatever the slower flood covered, it dissolved by soaking; whatever the course of the torrent encountered, it overthrew by its impact.

A destruction by fire more grievous still followed the very severe disaster of the waters. It is uncertain whence the fire arose. It wandered through many parts of the city, made a pitiable slaughter of both people and houses, and in a single conflagration consumed so great a work as many foreign victories could not have supplied. While everything around the forum was being devastated, the temple of Vesta was seized by the fire. The gods did not even aid themselves: a temporary fire overwhelmed that fire which was thought eternal. Hence the pontiff Metellus, while rescuing the gods that were about to burn, scarcely escaped with his arm half consumed; and the temple of the goddess Vesta was burned.

§ XV. The Second Punic War

In the twenty-third year of the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes, king of Egypt, and the 530th year from the founding of the city, the Second Punic War--that is, between the Romans and Carthaginians--began, according to Orosius. It was most grievous to both sides and caused very great destruction.

According to Orosius and Valerius Maximus, many prodigies in different regions preceded this war. Valerius says that at the beginnings and disturbances of the wars, an ox at Rome changed its lowing into human speech. Pieces of flesh also fell scattered like snow. Birds of prey carried off the greater number, while the remainder lay on the ground for several days, altered neither by a foul odor nor by an ugly appearance.

It is also reported that stones rained in Picenum; in Gaul a wolf took a sword from the sheath of a watchman; in Sicily two shields sweated blood, and reapers found bloody ears of grain; and at Caere waters flowed mixed with blood. Valerius adds that in the Second Punic War it was established that an ox belonging to Gnaeus Domitius said, "Beware, Rome." Augustine supports this final prodigy concerning the speaking ox in book 3 of The City of God. Adding certain other things, he says: "I omit oxen that spoke; children not yet born crying certain words from their mothers' wombs; flying serpents; and women and hens changed into men and the male sex."

Hannibal, commander of the Carthaginians, unjustly began this Second Punic War by failing to preserve the agreements of peace made between the Romans and Carthaginians. This Hannibal was the Romans' greatest enemy. As Titus Livy, Orosius, and Eutropius relate, when he was nine years old he swore to his father Auulcar at the altars that he would fight against the Romans as soon as he could.

As Valerius relates, wishing also to signify how greatly Rome and Carthage differed in mutual hatred, Hannibal planted his foot in the ground and raised some dust. He said that the war between them would end only when one had been reduced to dust. It should also be known that this Hannibal is different from the Hannibal who was defeated in the First Punic War while commander of the Carthaginians.

Titus Livy calls this Second Punic War the most memorable of all wars ever waged. Fortune varied so greatly in it that those who conquered came closer to danger. The two sides contended with hatreds greater even than their strength. The Romans were indignant that the Africans, although defeated in the First Punic War, should voluntarily carry arms against the Romans, who had been victorious. The Poeni were also indignant because it seemed to them that the Romans commanded them too proudly and greedily.

This war began under Publius Cornelius Scipio and was ended by his son, likewise called Scipio, who was named Africanus from the Africa he subdued. It lasted eighteen years according to Augustine in book 5 of The City of God, but sixteen according to Orosius and Titus Livy.

Since part of Spain was subject to the Carthaginians and no sea intervenes between Spain and Rome, Hannibal, in order to avoid the dangers of the sea, made his way from Africa toward Italy where the sea dividing Africa and Europe is narrowest; and on each of its shores he possessed ports subject to Carthage. Another reason was that he might obtain an occasion for attacking the Romans.

Coming into Spain, Hannibal attacked Saguntum. This was a very powerful city of Spain, situated on the frontier of the African dominion. It was not subject to that dominion but was an ally and friend of the Romans. Hannibal knew that he could thereby obtain an occasion for fighting the Romans, because if Saguntum were besieged or attacked, the Romans would come to aid or defend it. Therefore he moved war against Saguntum before moving it against the Romans, lest he appear openly to violate the peace faithfully made between Rome and Carthage after the First Punic War.

As Titus Livy also relates, Hannibal first fought against cities neighboring Saguntum that did not belong to the Romans' alliance and confederation, seeking an occasion to attack Saguntum. When he had defeated the Saguntines and besieged them after they fled into their city, Roman envoys came to him so that he would withdraw from the siege. He mocked them, saying that because he was occupied with military affairs against his enemies, he could not hear them. The envoys therefore went on to Carthage and complained in vain that the treaty of peace had now been broken, then returned to Rome.

While they thus drew out the time, Saguntum was captured and destroyed, to the great shame of the Romans, who in such necessity did not aid their friends and allies as they should have done. Before the city was captured, the Saguntines were tormented by such hunger that they fed upon the corpses of their own people.

A certain soldier of Hannibal who was a friend of the Saguntines, wishing at least to save the citizens' lives, promised them life and another place where they could build a city, provided that they surrender Saguntum with its gold and silver to Hannibal. They obtained time for deliberation, kindled an enormous pyre in the middle of the city, first cast the gold into it together with all their household goods, then slew their wives and children and unanimously threw themselves into the fire.

After the city had thus been taken by assault, Hannibal crossed the Pyrenees, which divide Spain from Gaul. Passing through the Gauls, he reached the Alps on the nineteenth day from the Pyrenees. Wherever he encountered resistance he opened a way for himself with sword and iron. In the Alps he overcame in battle the Gauls who resisted him and broke apart impassable rocks with fire and iron. After consuming four days in these things, on the fifth day he reached the plains of Italy, namely the Piedmontese regions. At that time his army contained one hundred thousand foot soldiers and twenty thousand horsemen.

Scipio, consul of the Romans, was the first to meet him with an army. When battle was joined near the Ticinus, which flows into the Po, Scipio was gravely wounded but escaped death when his son Scipio, still very young, rescued him. Nearly all the Roman army that the consul Scipio commanded was killed there.

Afterward the same consul fought Hannibal again at the river Trebia, which is near Piacenza, with a similar fortune. Sempronius, the other Roman consul, learned of his colleague's misfortune and returned from Sicily. He engaged Hannibal at the same river, lost his army, and escaped almost alone. Hannibal was also wounded in this battle.

When Hannibal afterward crossed into Tuscany at the beginning of spring, he was caught on the summit of the Apennine mountain. Shut in and burdened by snow for two days, he was frozen there with his army. A great number of people, very many of his beasts of burden, and almost all the elephants died from the cold.

Advancing from there by a marshy road near the Sarnos, he lost the greater part of his allies and beasts of burden. Through the violence of the cold, his vigils, and his labors, he also lost the eye that had long been diseased. Nevertheless, escaping the marshes with difficulty, he approached the camp of the consul Flaminius and provoked him to battle at Transimenum, now called Lake Perusinus. There Hannibal's craft surrounded and slaughtered the entire Roman army. The Roman consul himself was killed; fifteen thousand men are reported killed and six thousand captured. The ardor of the combatants in this battle was so great that the soldiers did not perceive a most severe earthquake, though it was so violent that it destroyed cities, moved mountains, cast down rocks, and drove rivers backward.

After these things followed the battle of Cannae, that is, near Cannae, a village of Apulia, where Hannibal fought the two consuls Aemilius Paulus and Terentius Varro. Forty-four thousand from the Roman army were killed, and a great part of Hannibal's army was slain. Aemilius Paulus died in that battle. Nine former consuls and twenty praetors were killed; thirty senators were killed or captured; and three hundred noble men, forty thousand infantry soldiers, and 3,500 horsemen were lost. Varro, the other consul, fled to Venusia with fifty soldiers.

There is no doubt that this would have been the last day of the Roman state if Hannibal had advanced to attack the city immediately after his victory. In that battle the Romans were so afflicted that the Italian cities previously subject to them thereafter deserted the Romans and adhered to Hannibal, chief among them Capua. It should also be known that in addition to these engagements there were many other battles between Hannibal and the Romans. In some the Romans were superior, but in others the Carthaginians.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

Likewise, while Hannibal fought in Italy, Hasdrubal fought in Spain against the Romans. He killed the two Scipios, brothers and commanders of the Romans sent against him into Spain, and inflicted many slaughters upon the Romans.

Concerning Hannibal's victory over the Romans at Cannae, Orosius and Augustine in book 3 of The City of God say that Hannibal sent to Carthage three modii of gold rings taken from the Romans he had killed. From this the number of the other dead could be better understood, since not everyone but only the greater and more noble men used gold rings.

As Orosius says, after the aforesaid disaster the Romans despaired so greatly that the senators deliberated and thought they should enter into a plan for abandoning Italy and seeking other places to inhabit. This would then have been confirmed had not Cornelius Scipio, a tribune of the soldiers who was afterward called Scipio Africanus, terrified them with drawn sword and compelled them instead to swear by his words to defend the fatherland.

After this was done, the Romans dared breathe again in hope of life and created Decius Junius dictator. He held a levy of soldiers from the age of seventeen and formed an unseasoned and disorderly force consisting of four legions collected from everywhere. He then also compelled slaves of proven strength and willingness--either offered by their masters or, if necessary, purchased at public expense--to take the military oath under the title of liberty. Valerius says that there were twenty thousand slaves. The dictator Junius also enrolled in military service men liable for crimes or debts, promising them immunity; their number rose to six thousand.

When the treasury lacked money to provide for the army, on the counsel of the consul Valerius all the citizens--and first the senators--retained only a small portion for themselves and gave their property or money to support the treasury. A large sum was thereby collected.

After that Roman slaughter at Cannae, as has been said, in the tenth year of this Second Punic War, while Gracchus Fulvius and Sulpicius were consuls, Hannibal moved his army from Campania. Proceeding by the Latin Way, he encamped beside the river Amanis, three miles from the city, to the incredible terror of the whole community. While the matrons, crazed with fear, ran along the battlements and, leaning out over the walls, eagerly wished to fight, Hannibal approached the Colline Gate with lightly equipped cavalry. He then drew up his entire army in battle line.

The consuls did not refuse battle. When the battle lines of both sides stood exposed, such a torrent of rain mixed with hail suddenly poured from the clouds that the disordered ranks could scarcely retain their weapons and withdraw into their camps. When calm weather returned and the armies came back onto the field and into battle line, a still more violent storm poured down. It terrified them more greatly and forced them in fear to return to the interior of their camps.

Hannibal is then said to have declared: "When I could, I did not have the will"--namely, immediately after the victory at Cannae--"and when I wished, I did not have the power to capture Rome," because the rain prevented him.

§ XVI. Scipio Africanus and the End of the Second Punic War

While Hannibal was roaming through Italy, Scipio Africanus the Elder transported an army into Africa. There he killed a very great multitude of Africans in different places and so terrified and oppressed the Carthaginians that necessity compelled them to recall Hannibal with his army from Italy for their defense. He left Italy weeping. Coming into Africa, he requested a conference with Scipio.

At their first meeting, the two most illustrious commanders received one another after standing a long time in mutual astonishment and admiration, and held negotiations for peace. But when the peace negotiations failed, battle was joined. Hannibal was defeated, and more than twenty thousand Carthaginians were killed. He then fled to Carthage and persuaded its Senate to seek peace, since no other hope now remained. Peace was granted through Scipio with the will of the Roman Senate and people. Nevertheless, more than five hundred ships were taken out onto the open sea and burned.

For a fuller explanation concerning this Scipio, it should be known that there were many very famous Scipios. Two of them were brothers: Publius Cornelius Scipio, consul of the Romans in the first year of the Second Punic War, and the other, Gnaeus Scipio, commander of the Romans in Spain against Mago, commander of the Poeni, whom he defeated and captured. These two brother Scipios were both afterward killed in Spain by Hasdrubal, Hannibal's brother.

There were also two other Scipios, sons of the aforesaid Publius Cornelius. One was called Publius Scipio Africanus because he finally defeated Hannibal and conquered Africa. The other was called Lutius Scipio Asiaticus because he conquered Asia Minor and triumphed over it. The first of these two was called Africanus the Elder.

There was another Scipio, a grandson, who was called Africanus the Younger because in the Third Punic War he conquered in Africa and destroyed the Carthaginians. Besides these five there was Scipio Nasica, who according to Titus Livy was the son of the aforesaid Gnaeus Scipio. After the Romans' victory in the Third Punic War, he advised that Carthage not be destroyed, for this reason: lest Roman vigor, always exercised by wars, be dissolved into idleness through security and leisure, as Augustine relates in book 1 of The City of God.

Catho the Censor gave the Senate the contrary counsel, namely that Carthage should be destroyed because of the suspicion of rebellion. This was done, though not immediately after his counsel. As Titus Livy says in book 44, the Senate held a middle course between the opinions of Catho and Scipio. It decreed that Carthage should stand, but only in such a condition that it would not be feared by the Romans. It therefore wished the Carthaginians to build for themselves another city ten miles from the sea. Because they refused to observe this, Carthage was attacked and entirely destroyed. Orosius, however, says that he never saw a just cause for that Third Punic War on the Romans' side.

Returning to Scipio Africanus the Elder, the historians relate many praiseworthy things about him. Titus Livy says that from the time this Scipio passed out of boyhood, he conducted no public or private business on any day before going to the Capitol, that is, to the temple of Jove. He would enter the temple, sit there, and sometimes spend time in secret. He maintained this custom throughout his life, whether deliberately or by fearing [read: deliberately or rashly], created belief about himself. The widespread opinion was that he was of divine stock.

Aulus Gellius relates that the mother of Africanus had previously been barren, so that his father despaired of having children by her. Later, while she slept alone in her chamber and bed during her husband's absence, an enormous serpent suddenly appeared lying beside her. When those who saw it became frightened and cried out, it slipped away and could not be found. Her husband Publius Scipio reported this very thing to the haruspices. After making sacrifice, they answered that children would be born from her. Soon afterward the woman conceived Scipio himself.

Before dawn Scipio was accustomed to come to the Capitol, order Jove's sanctuary opened, and remain there alone for a long time, as though consulting with Jove about the commonwealth. The aeditui, that is, the temple keepers, also often swore that only when Scipio entered the Capitol did the dogs, which raged against others, neither bark at him nor ever rush upon him.

After he gained victory in the Second Punic War, certain men accused him out of envy concerning a sum of money removed from the treasury. According to Valerius, when Scipio saw the malice of his accusers and was once charged concerning it, he answered: "I do not think wickedness has come to such a point that my innocence must be investigated. For although I subjected all Africa to your power, I brought back nothing from it that is called mine except my surname. The treasures of Asia made my brother greedy; but each of us is richer in envy than in money."

Seeing the citizens' ingratitude, he departed from the city in indignation. As Eutropius says in book 4, after living long in exile at Amiturninum, he died of disease. In the same year Hannibal, seeing that Prusias, king of Bithynia, to whom he had fled, was going to hand him over to the Romans, drank poison and died so that he would not be delivered to them alive. According to Valerius, Scipio caused this to be inscribed upon his tomb: "Ungrateful fatherland, you do not even possess my bones." Although this Scipio is greatly commended by the gentiles in many respects, nevertheless, because he was an idolater, he did not escape the hell of the damned.

§ XVII. The Third Punic War

The third and last Punic War, as Orosius relates in book 4, was ended in the 602nd year from the founding of the city, while Lucius Censorius and Marcus Maenius were consuls. When the Senate decreed that Carthage must be destroyed, the consuls and Scipio, then a tribune of the soldiers, went into Africa and held camp near Utica. They summoned the Carthaginians and ordered them to surrender their arms. So great a mass of arms was immediately delivered that all Africa could easily have been armed with them.

After surrendering their arms, they were ordered to abandon the city and withdraw ten miles from the sea. At this they felt such sorrow and were turned to such despair that they chose either to defend the city or be buried with it. They therefore created two Hasdrubals as their commanders and set about making weapons, supplying the lack of bronze and iron with gold and silver.

The consuls determined to attack Carthage, whose walls extended for thirty miles. Although they destroyed some part of the wall, they were nevertheless defeated and repulsed by the Carthaginians. Scipio defended them as they fled, driving back within the walls the Carthaginians whom the consuls were pursuing. Nevertheless, the city was defended against the Romans for four years.

At the beginning, when he had undertaken the war, Mantinus, consul of the Romans, received an army from Pompilius at Numantia, a city of Spain belonging to the Carthaginian dominion. As Orosius says in book 5, Mantinus fought the Numantines so unsuccessfully that, compelled by utter despair, he made a most shameful treaty with them, although Pompilius had made another equally disgraceful treaty with the same people.

The Senate dissolved the treaty and handed Mantinus over to the Numantines. It ordered him to be exposed before their gate with his body naked and his hands bound behind his back. Remaining there in this condition until night, abandoned by his own people, he was not received by the enemy. Orosius says that this city alone, for fourteen years and with only four thousand allies, not only withstood forty thousand Romans but defeated them and afflicted them with shameful treaties.

Certain prodigies also befell the consul Mantinus when he was about to go to Spain, as Valerius says. When he boarded a ship from the Port of Hercules, a voice with no speaker was heard saying, "Mantinus, remain." When he had entered the skiff, a serpent of extraordinary size was seen and suddenly disappeared. All these were works of demons.

Afterward, in the fourth year of this Carthaginian war, Publius Scipio undertook to destroy Carthage. By fighting continuously for six days and nights, he drove the Carthaginians in their final desperation to surrender, asking that they at least be permitted to live as slaves. As the Romans entered the city, some citizens voluntarily cast themselves into the fire and others threw themselves down from a height. The city was captured and burned. It burned continuously for seventeen days. Carthage was demolished, every movable stone being crushed into dust, seven hundred years after it had been founded.

§ XVIII. Other Wars and Dissensions

Between the Second and Third Punic Wars the Macedonian War arose. The first was against Philip, king of Macedonia--not Philip, father of Alexander the Great, who had died long before, but another Philip, who in the Second Punic War had promised aid to Hannibal against the Romans. When Philip was defeated and the First Macedonian War ended, there followed the Syrian War against Antiochus, king of Syria. After he was defeated, there followed the Mithridatic War, and then the Second Macedonian War against Perseus, son of the aforesaid King Philip of the Macedonians, after his father's death.

When Perseus was defeated and captured, there followed the exceedingly terrible war against the Celtiberians in Spain. Fear of them so invaded the Romans that no soldier or legate dared go into Spain except Publius Scipio, called Africanus the Younger, who offered to go voluntarily. Coming into Spain, he inflicted a very great slaughter upon its peoples.

Besides the aforesaid five famous wars, before the Third Punic War the Romans also had other wars with different nations: the Equolian, Istrian, Gallo-Greek, Illyrian, and Third Macedonian wars; but they all occurred far from the city.

In those times they also had several dissensions among themselves within the city, as in the expulsion or exile of Scipio Africanus and of Scipio Asiaticus.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

For, as Valerius relates in book 5 concerning Scipio Asiaticus, after Asia had been conquered, he was cast down by the Roman people and ordered to be taken to prison as though guilty of taking public money, that is, embezzlement. Such treatment certainly could not have been inflicted upon such great men in the city without great and numerous dissensions, since they were held in the highest esteem, as Augustine also touches upon in book 3, chapter 21 of The City of God.

§ XIX. The Two Gracchi

Meanwhile, while Scipio was waging the Third Punic War against the Numantines in Spain, seditions were being stirred among the Romans, as Orosius says. There were two brothers called the Gracchi. Each was a tribune, and each was killed in a popular tumult. Although Sallust praises both as champions of the plebs' liberty, others reprove them as seditious men.

Concerning the first Gracchus, named Tiberius, Titus Livy in book 58 and Orosius in book 5 say that while he was tribune of the plebs, he determined to divide among the people the public land that, as it appeared to him, certain private persons, namely the nobles, possessed unjustly. He passed a law that no one should possess more than ten iugera of public land. He appointed himself, his brother Gaius Gracchus, and Appius Claudius as three men to divide the land. He also promulgated another law, namely that these three should judge which land was public and which private, so that he might open a way for himself to divide more widely.

When Otto, a tribune of the plebs, opposed him, Gracchus took away his tribunician authority. By these acts he incurred the Senate's anger and raised the people to insolence.

At that time Attalus, son of Cumenis, died and by his testament ordered the Roman people to succeed him as heir to the dominion of Asia, of which he had been king. Gracchus, seeking the people's favor, wished the money to be distributed to them.

When the day of the electoral assembly arrived, on which magistrates were customarily chosen, Gracchus intended to continue in office in the following year also, hoping to be elected tribune again. The inflamed nobility drove the people away with fragments of benches. First they knocked Gracchus to the ground with a fragment, then killed him with a club as he attempted to rise. Two hundred others were killed in that sedition, and their bodies were cast into the Tiber. Gracchus's own corpse, having been exhumed, wasted away.

Valerius also says of him that, when he held the oppressed commonwealth by popular favor, he openly declared, with the Senate held in contempt, that everything ought to be done through the plebs. Valerius likewise says that when the second Scipio Africanus, who had married Gracchus's sister, returned to Rome after defeating the Numantines, Gnaeus Carbo, tribune of the plebs and a most turbulent avenger of the recently suppressed sedition, asked Africanus after the aforesaid killing what he thought of the death of Tiberius Gracchus.

Carbo sought by the authority of this most weighty man to add great increase to the fire already begun, not doubting that because of so close a family connection Scipio would say something pitiable in memory of the dead man. But Scipio pronounced that Gracchus appeared to have been killed justly.

Before the second Gracchus, namely Gaius, became tribune, as Valerius relates in book 1, he was overcome by sleep and saw the image of his brother Tiberius Gracchus, who told him that by no means could he avoid dying by the same fate by which Tiberius himself had fallen. This proved true, for so it happened.

As Orosius says, once Gaius had been created tribune of the plebs through a tumult, he became a great destruction to the commonwealth. He repeatedly stirred the people into most bitter seditions by gifts and promises, especially through the agrarian law, that is, the distribution and division of lands. Numitius, who had succeeded his brother in the tribunate, had for the most part abolished the statutes and laws of Gracchus that had been the cause of his brother's death. Indignant at this, Gaius gathered many allies and ascended the Capitol, where an assembly was being held.

There he raised a very great tumult, and a certain herald was killed by the Gracchans. Afterward he met resistance in battle. His whole multitude, after the outcome of the war had long remained uncertain, was scattered by archers sent by the consul Opimius. Gracchus was [read: fled]. And while his friends fought on his behalf and, lest he be captured alive, offered his neck to his slave. The dead Gracchus's head was carried to the consul, while his body was taken to his mother Cornelia, who had been the daughter of Africanus the Elder. There was also another Tiberius Gracchus, a good citizen, who according to Valerius in book 1 was killed in a different manner.

For a fuller explanation of the foregoing, it should be known that when cities of the enemy were captured by the Romans and their citizens expelled or killed, or when they were deprived of their lands and possessions in another manner, Roman nobles often retained for themselves the lands of the captured cities. This appeared inequitable and unjust to the plebs, because such lands were acquired by the blood and labor of soldiers, who for the most part came from the plebs. The plebs therefore wished such lands to be divided and distributed among themselves, while the nobles did not. For this reason dissension very often arose between the senators and plebs, according to Titus Livy, book 2 On the Origin of the World [read: On the Origin of the City].

For this reason the aforesaid two Gracchi, while tribunes and champions of the plebs, took care to promulgate the agrarian law, that is, the law concerning the distribution of lands. Because of this they became hateful to the Senate and were killed.

Orosius relates in book 5 that, although Opimius was brave as consul in the war against the friends of the second Gracchus, he was cruel in the judicial inquiry. He killed more than three thousand men by punishments. Many of them, without their case even being stated--that is, without being heard in judgment--were killed although innocent. As Valerius relates, the consul Opimius also caused the head of Gaius Gracchus, purchased from one of Gracchus's associates for its weight in gold, to be fixed upon a spear and carried through the city.

§ XX. Saturninus, Glaucia, and Drusus

After the killing of both Gracchi, as Orosius relates, another sedition arose in the city in the 645th year from its founding. Lutius Saturninus was the bitterest enemy of Quintus Metellus, an entirely eminent man. When Metellus was created censor, Saturninus dragged him from his house and, as he fled to the Capitol, besieged him there with an armed band. But Saturninus was cast down from there by the indignation of the Roman knights, and a very great slaughter occurred before the Capitol.

Afterward Saturninus and G. Glanea, by the treachery--that is, the counsel--of Gaius Mauri, then consul, killed Antonius, who was seeking the tribunate at the same time. In the following year Marius was created consul for the sixth time, G. Glanea praetor, and Saturninus tribune of the plebs. These three conspired against the aforesaid Metellus to send him into exile. A day was therefore appointed for him to defend himself before judges who belonged to the same conspiracy as his accusers. Through wickedness he was condemned to exile, to the sorrow of the whole city.

The same Saturninus, because the vigorous and upright Menius was to become consul, pursued and killed him as he fled when a sedition arose. When the Senate and people murmured over so many evils, the consul Marius settled the whole disturbance.

Saturninus then held an assembly in his house, where some called him king and others emperor. Indignant at this, Marius arranged for battle to be made against him. While Marius guarded the gates, Saturninus, driven back by Marius's men, fled to the Capitol. Thus an unheard-of battle for the Capitol occurred. Saturninus cried openly that Marius had been the author of all his designs. When Saturninus fled into the senate house, the doors were broken and he was killed there. G. Glanea was dragged out of Claudius's house and killed. Augustine touches upon this in book 3, chapter 26 of The City of God.

There was also Marcus Drusus, who initiated the Social War. As Valerius relates, he was a man of the greatest pride. Because Lucius Philippus, consul of the Romans, had interrupted him while he addressed the people, Drusus had one of his clients, not a public officer, seize the consul by the throat and drag him to prison with such violence that much blood flowed from his nostrils. On another occasion, when the Senate sent for him to come to the senate house, he asked why they did not come to him. They did so. This Marcus Drusus committed these acts fourteen years after the sedition of Saturninus.

§ XXI. The Servile Wars and the War against the Pirates

There was also a Roman war called the Servile War, and it was threefold. In the 779th year from the founding of the city, while Lucilius and Cassius were consuls, according to Valerius in book 5 and Orosius, sixty-four gladiators broke out of the school that Lentulus was holding at Capua. They immediately appointed three commanders over themselves: Spartacus of Thrace and two Gauls, Crisso and Divonianus. They occupied Mount Eusebius.

Breaking out from there, they attacked the camp of the praetor Clodius, who had besieged them on the mountain. They put him to flight and plundered everything. Divonianus, one of their commanders, was killed there in battle. The other two soon gathered immense forces: Crisso the Gaul had ten thousand men, while Spartaco Drace had thirty thousand.

They filled everything with slaughter, burning, plunder, and rape, so that some violated women killed themselves. The Roman consuls Zelius and Lentulus were sent against them with an army. Zelius crushed Crisso as he fought most fiercely, but Lentulus, defeated by Spartacus, fled. Afterward both consuls fought Spartacus together, suffered a grievous defeat, and fled. Spartacus later killed the proconsul Gaius Cassius in battle. Such terror invaded the city as had invaded it under Hannibal.

At last the Senate sent the consul Cassius with legions and a new reinforcement of soldiers against Spartacus. As soon as he joined battle with the fugitives, he killed six thousand and captured nine hundred. Before he afterward engaged Spartacus in battle, he defeated Spartacus's auxiliaries, the Gauls and Germans, killing their commanders together with thirty thousand men. Finally, drawing up his battle line against Spartacus, he killed sixty thousand of his men and captured six thousand; Spartacus himself was killed. The others who fled were diligently sought out and killed by various commanders.

According to Eutropius, this war endured for three years amid Italy's calamities and ended in Apulia. Orosius calls it the War of the Fugitives; Augustine, the Servile War.

There was another servile war that depopulated Macedonia. Orosius relates in book 5 that in the 774th year from the founding of the city, Appius Claudius received by lot the Macedonian war. The various peoples spread around the Rhodope Mountains--that is, those who lived about them--had fled to those places and were devastating Macedonia most cruelly. Appius went out from Macedonia to drive them away and exposed himself to immense masses of evils. Surrounded by enemies and also sick, he died.

Scribonius succeeded him. Avoiding the force of those peoples, he turned arms against them. They were afterward defeated by Lucullus. Those peoples were so cruel to their captives that when they needed cups, that is, drinking vessels, they seized human heads with bloody faces, still covered with hair and with the brain not yet properly extracted, and used them without horror as though they were real cups. Augustine calls this war servile in book 3, chapter 26 of The City of God, because those peoples had formerly been subject to the Romans and, because they were most unworthy, were regarded as slaves. This war occurred five or six years before the aforesaid war of the gladiators.

Orosius also relates in book 5 another servile war that arose in Sicily. He says that after the Gracchus mentioned above had been killed, the contagion of a servile war arose. In Sicily the consul Quiso Calpurnius attacked Mamertum, where he killed nine thousand fugitives; those whom he could capture he fixed upon a gibbet. The consul Rutilius, succeeding him, captured the most strongly fortified refuges of the fugitives at Taroninium and Benna, and there destroyed more than twenty thousand slaves. They ought to have been spared had they not insolently met the sword with the sword.

This contagion widely infected many provinces. At Mirturnis 450 were crucified, and afterward as many as seven thousand slaves were crushed by Quintus Metellus, Gnaeus Servilius, and Scipio. In the Athenian mines, the same servile uprising was dispersed by the praetor Heraclitus. The same thing happened at Delos.

Eutropius relates in book 6 concerning the war against the pirates that, while the Mithridatic War was still continuing, pirates infested all the seas. Thus, although the Romans were conquerors of the whole world, navigation alone was not safe. A war against them was therefore decreed to Agneo Pompeio, and he ended it with remarkable good fortune and speed within a few months.

§ XXII. Philip and Perseus of Macedonia

It should also be known that after the Second Punic War the Romans waged war against Philip, king of Macedonia--not the father of Alexander the Great, but another Philip, whose son was called Perseus. Philip was defeated and subjected, and afterward conducted himself faithfully toward the Romans. When he died, his son Perseus began to rebel and stir up the Second Macedonian War against the Romans. He too was defeated.

The consul Paulus Aemilius was sent against him. When Paulus had assumed the consulship, he returned home and found his little daughter weeping. He asked the cause of her tears, and she answered that she wept because Persa had died, meaning a certain little puppy of hers. Comforted by this as though by an omen of the victory he would obtain over King Perseus, Paulus went with an army, defeated him, and led him to Rome.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

About the same time, though a little earlier, the Romans waged war against Antiochus, king of Syria. They also defeated him and imposed laws upon him as they wished.

Shortly afterward Attalus, son of Eumenes and king of Asia, died and by testament left the Roman people heir to his kingdom, so that by testament the kingdom of Asia Minor was added to the Romans. Attalus had a brother named Eumenes, a friend of the Romans, who had by a concubine a son named Aristomicus. When Attalus died, Aristomicus claimed the kingdom of Asia and Achaea for himself. He therefore gathered a great army and made war against the Romans. Defeated, captured, and brought to Rome, he was strangled there by order of the Senate.

As Augustine relates in book 3, chapter 11 of The City of God, Cumaeon Apollo--that is, Apollo worshiped at Cumae, a city of Campania--foresaw his death and grieved and wept. Apollo's weeping foretold Aristomicus's evil, because the Cumaeans were colonists of the Greeks--that is, they had once been Greeks and had come from Greece to inhabit that place. When they came from Greece, they brought with them the statue of Apollo that they had been accustomed to worship there.

Because the statue wept, less skillful haruspices believed it foretold evil for the Romans and therefore wished to cast it into the sea, had not the Cumaeon elders resisted. More skilled haruspices interpreted the opposite, as happened.

Valerius in book 11 and Titus Livy in book 8 say that Philip, king of Macedonia, once defeated, gave the Roman city confidence for a freer--that is, more relaxed--way of life, and that the origin of foreign luxury, that is, of new and exquisite pleasures, was found in the Asiatic army and Asia Minor and introduced at Rome.

§ XXIII. The Social War

Concerning another war called the Social War, which the Romans waged against the Lacini, who were not Roman citizens but allies: although they were subject to the Romans, the Romans called those under their dominion their allies.

Orosius relates in book 5 that in the 659th year from the founding of the city, while Sextus Julius Caesar and Lutio Marco were consuls, Drunus, tribune of the plebs, enticed all the Lacini with the hope of liberty. When he could not accomplish what he wished, he stirred them to arms. The Picentes, Nestini, Marci, Paeligni, Norsini, Samites, and Lucanians killed Gayum Servum, a praetor sent to them as legate by the Senate. They immediately closed the city and slaughtered all the Roman citizens.

A most grievous war followed, containing many battles against the Romans. Rutilus and Porcius were killed. Sometimes the Lacini conquered and sometimes the Romans, with many soldiers killed on both sides. The civil and social wars occurred at almost the same time, because the civil wars began before the Social War was finished. Eutropius says that the civil and social wars, which were also called the Italian Wars, continued for nine years.

According to Orosius, this war consumed 150,000 Romans: twenty-three men of consular rank, seven men of praetorian rank, forty former aediles, and nearly two hundred senators. Orosius adds that so many were killed that they can scarcely be numbered, because the peoples of all Italy were everywhere destroyed without discrimination.

Augustine relates in book 3, chapter 23 of The City of God that before Latium stirred the aforesaid Social War against Rome, all animals subject to human use--dogs, horses, asses, oxen, and every other kind of livestock under human dominion--suddenly became wild. Forgetting their domestic gentleness, they left their shelters, wandered freely, and opposed the approach not only of other people but even of their masters, not without death or danger to anyone who pressed them closely. Such signs therefore preceded the evil that followed.

§ XXIV. Terence

About the time of the Third Punic War, according to Eusebius in the Chronicle, Terence, writer of comedies, flourished. He was captured with other Carthaginians by the Romans. The following are his moral maxims:

“Compliance wins friends; truth breeds hatred.”

“If what you wish cannot be done, wish for what can be.”

“When we are well, we all easily give sound advice to the sick.”

“He who goes on saying whatever he wishes also hears what he does not wish.”

“Why do you attend to the concerns of others that do not pertain to you? I am a human being, and therefore I consider nothing human foreign to me.”

“License makes us all worse.”

“Human nature is generally so constituted that it judges the affairs of others better than its own.”

“The highest law is often the highest wickedness.”

“No undertaking is so easy that it is not difficult if you do it unwillingly.”

“Is it not shameful for you to give counsel to others and be wise abroad, yet be unable to help yourself?”

“Nothing is more unjust than the rule of a person who thinks nothing right unless he himself has done it.”

“There is an old saying: all things are common even among enemies.”

“Old age brings everyone this single fault: we are more attentive to property than is sufficient.”

“To neglect money at the proper time is sometimes the greatest gain.”

“This is wisdom: not merely to see what is now before your feet, but also to foresee what is to come.”

“I command you to examine human lives as in a mirror and to take an example for yourself from others.”

“All whose affairs are less prosperous are somehow suspicious; they take everything as an insult and, chiefly because of their own weakness, always believe themselves neglected.”

“Nearly all women and children are fickle in judgment.”

“This, moreover, is wisdom: bend your mind wherever there is need, and do at once what perhaps must afterward be done.”

“While a person's affairs are most prosperous, he ought to consider how he may bear adversity and misery, so that nothing may be new to his mind and whatever happens beyond expectation may be counted as gain.”

“As many men, so many opinions; each has his own custom.”

“There is nothing that cannot be corrupted by telling it badly.”

§ XXV. Judas Maccabeus and the Roman Alliance

About those times Judas Maccabeus sent envoys to the Senate seeking peace and friendship with the Romans, as is contained in 1 Maccabees 8, where the virtues of the Romans are narrated. It is said there that they are mighty in strength and agree to everything asked of them, and whoever approached them, they established friendships with them.

And how they had heard of their battles and the brave deeds they performed in Galatia; that they conquered those peoples and brought them under tribute; how much they accomplished in the region of Spain; and that they brought under their power the mines of gold and silver located there. They possessed the whole region through their counsel and patience, although those places were very far from them. They crushed the kings who came against them from the ends of the earth and defeated them in war.

They captured alive Antiochus the Great, king of Asia, after crushing him, ordaining that he and his successors should pay a great tribute and provide hostages. They gave the region of the Midori, the Lydians, and the Medes to King Eumenes. They destroyed and brought under their power the remaining kingdoms that had at any time resisted them, as well as the islands.

They preserved friendship with their friends and with those who trusted in them. They gained kingdoms both near and far, for whoever heard their name feared them. Those whom they wished to aid so that they might reign did reign; those whom they wished, they removed from their kingdom. Thus they were greatly exalted.

In all these things no one wore a diadem or was clothed in purple to be magnified by it. They made a senate house and daily consulted 320 men, always taking counsel concerning the multitude so that they might do what was worthy. Each year they committed their magistracy to one man to govern their whole land. All obeyed one, and there was neither envy nor jealousy among them.

Judas therefore chose Eupolemus, son of John, and Jason, son of Eleazar, and sent them to Rome to establish friendship and alliance with the Romans, so that they might remove from the Jews the yoke of the Greeks. The Romans established friendship and alliance with the Jews.

This was the written response they sent from Rome to Jerusalem on bronze tablets: "May it be well forever with the Romans and the nation of the Jews, by sea and land. May sword and enemy be far from them. If war first threatens the Romans, the nation of the Jews shall bring them aid wholeheartedly, as the time dictates; and they shall not supply the enemy with grain, arms, ships, and things of this sort. The Romans shall act likewise in return."

§ XXVI. Ptolemy Physcon and Jugurtha

In the 476th year of the Fifth Age, and the 4,986th year of the world according to the longer computation, Ptolemy Physcon, the eighth king of the Egyptians, reigned. In the third year of this Ptolemy's reign, King Jugurtha, fighting against the Romans, was captured according to Eusebius in the Chronicle.

As Orosius says, no battle was ever more tumultuous and terrible for a Roman soldier. The dust stirred up by the movement and noise of the horsemen running about and charging spread beneath the sky, took away the day, and brought on night. Such a storm of missiles fell that no part of the body was safe from a blow. Because of the darkness, everyone lacked sight to look ahead; because of the compression of the multitude, everyone lacked room to act for his own defense.

The Moorish and Numidian horseman did not labor to seek out a well-positioned enemy with a well-timed cast of his weapon. Rather, they cast their missiles at random, certain that their uncertain gifts would not be without effect. The Roman horsemen and foot soldiers, thus forced together, were massed into one body.

The enemy again surrounded them and tore not only the outer edges of the column but also reached its middle with weapons cast from afar. Thirst, the heat of the sun, the disorder of their own forces, and the uncertainty of death wore the disordered Romans down to the utmost despair. Suddenly the familiar aid of storms and rains that came to the Romans against the Africans was sent from heaven, bringing uncommanded deliverance.

A sudden rain supplied drink and refreshment to the thirsty and overheated Romans. For the Numidians, however, it made the shafts of the weapons they customarily hurled by hand without straps slippery and therefore useless. The shields they carried, made flexible and protective with stretched elephant hide, have this nature: they drink in falling rain like a sponge and thereby become unmanageable from the sudden weight. Because the shields could not be carried about, they could not provide defense.

Bocchus and Jugurtha, king of the Numidians, then fled. After these things 140,000 armed men were brought forward by those kings and are reported to have been cut down by the Romans to annihilation. Thereupon Bocchus abandoned hope of war and sought peace from the Romans. In order to obtain peace, he captured Jugurtha by treachery, loaded him with chains, and sent him through his legate Sulla to Marius. Jugurtha was driven before Marius's chariot in his triumph with his two sons and was soon strangled in prison.

§ XXVII. The Mithridatic War

According to Orosius, the Mithridatic War against the Romans arose in the 662nd year from the founding of the city. Mithridates undertook this war after twenty-three years of his reign and, as Justin says, fought them with varying victory for forty-five years.

According to Justin, celestial portents predicted Mithridates's future greatness. In the year he was born and again in the year he first received the kingdom, a comet shone on each occasion for eighty days, so that the whole sky seemed to blaze. In magnitude it occupied a fourth part of the sky and in brightness surpassed the sun's splendor. It consumed the span of six hours in rising and setting.

As a boy Mithridates suffered the plots of his guardians. They placed him upon a wild horse and forced him to hurl missiles and ride, but their attempts failed because Mithridates controlled the horse beyond his age. They then assailed him with poison. Fearing this, he frequently drank antidotes and made himself so secure against plots by specially sought remedies that, even when he wished to do so, he could not die by poison as an old man.

Helinand says: "I remember reading in certain physical experiments that Mithridates, fearing lest his brother poison him, every day ate while fasting twenty leaves of rue with two walnuts, the same number of dried figs, and salt mixed with them."

The aforesaid Justin adds that Mithridates, thereafter fearing that his enemies might accomplish by the sword what they could not by poison, feigned a passion for hunting. For seven years he used the shelter of neither city nor countryside but wandered through forests, spent nights in different mountainous regions, and allowed no one to know where he was. He became accustomed to driving wild beasts before him or pursuing them at a run, and even to contending with some by bodily strength. By these activities he both avoided plots and trained his body to endure every exertion.

When he came to the throne, he subdued the Scythians, Pontus, and Cappadocia. When he was silently deliberating about Asia with certain friends, he departed from his kingdom and, with no one aware, wandered through the whole region, learning the sites of all the cities and the country. He also crossed into Bithynia and, as though already lord of Asia, measured out every place advantageous for his victory.

After this he returned to his kingdom, when he was already believed to have died, and found a little child whom during his absence his sister and wife Laodice had borne. Believing him dead, she had cast herself into intercourse with his friends. As though she could cover the admitted crime with a greater wickedness, she prepared poison for him upon his arrival. Mithridates learned this from her maidservants and punished the crime upon its authors.

Finally Mithridates armed the whole East against the Romans. He sent envoys to seek aid from the Cimbri, Gallo-Greeks, Sarmatians, and Bastarnae, and ordered an army to come from Scythia. Equipped with an Asiatic army, he defeated Aquilius and Marcus Malcius. After these men and Nicomedes had been driven out, the cities received him with immense favor. He found much gold and silver and a great apparatus for war there, and granted the cities a five-year exemption.

Orosius relates in book 6 that Mithridates, king of Pontus and Armenia, wished to deprive Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, a part of Asia and a friend of the Roman people, of his kingdom. The Roman Senate warned him not to do this and declared that if he did, he would experience war brought upon him by the Romans. Greatly angered by this, Mithridates ravaged Bithynia and expelled Nicomedes from the kingdom.

When he afterward came to Ephesus, he commanded by a cruel edict that every Roman citizen found throughout Asia should be slaughtered on a single day. This was done. Words can in no way explain or comprehend the multitude of Roman citizens killed at that time, the grief of so many provinces, or the groaning both of those being killed and of their killers, when every person was compelled either to betray innocent guests and friends or himself incur danger under the penalty imposed upon those guests.

Archelaus, commander of Mithridates, was sent ahead into Achaea with 120,000 foot soldiers and horsemen. He obtained Athens and all Greece, partly by force and partly by surrender.

Sulla, to whom the Mithridatic War had fallen after his consulship, long besieged Archelaus and the Athenian port of Piraeus, fortified with a sevenfold wall, and devastated the Athenians. While Sulla was in Asia waging the Mithridatic War, he received through Lutius Tytius a message from Jove that he would overcome Mithridates, which occurred.

Afterward, when Sulla planned to return to the city and avenge his own and his followers' injuries with civil blood, a certain soldier of the sixth legion brought him another message from the same Jove. The soldier said that Jove had earlier foretold Sulla's victory over Mithridates and now promised to give him the power by which he would recover the commonwealth from his enemies, though not without much blood.

When Sulla came to Tarentum and sacrificed there, he saw upon the head of a calf's liver the likeness of a golden crown. The haruspex Postumius then answered that a splendid victory was signified for him and commanded that he alone should eat those entrails.

A short time later, a slave of a certain Lucius Pontius cried out in prophecy: "I come as a messenger from Bellona. Victory is yours, Sulla." He then added that the Capitol would burn.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

After saying this, the slave immediately left the camp. On the following day he returned in a more agitated state and cried out that the Capitol had burned. It had in fact burned, and this seems to have occurred through a revelation from demons. Augustine also treats these matters in book 2, chapter 3 of The City of God.

Orosius also relates that Marius and Eumacus, commanders sent by Mithridates against Lucullus--who had conquered Armenia and Mesopotamia--quickly gathered a great army, engaged Publius Rutilius at Calcidonia, and killed him together with a very large part of his army.

Lucullus, however, enclosed Mithridates with a trench while the latter was besieging the people of Cyzicus, and compelled him to suffer what he himself was inflicting. To encourage the Cyzicenes, Lucullus sent them as messenger one of his soldiers who was a skilled swimmer. Suspended upon two inflated skins, holding a little rod between them, and paddling beneath the water with his feet, he crossed seven miles.

Mithridates, suffering from want, ordered part of his armed forces to return home. Lucullus intercepted and utterly destroyed them. More than fifteen thousand men are said to have been killed then. At that time Fannius, who had joined Mithridates, and Metrophanes, the royal praetor, were defeated at Amanto and fled to Messina with two thousand horsemen.

Meanwhile, Orosius says, after Pompey had settled affairs in Armenia, Colchis, Cappadocia, and Syria, he advanced from Pontus into Parthia and on the fiftieth day reached Ecbatana, the capital of the Parthian kingdom.

While Mithridates was celebrating the rites of Ceres in the Bosphorus, an earthquake arose so suddenly that it is said to have caused great destruction in the cities and countryside. At the same time Castor, a prefect of Mithridates who commanded at Phanagoria, killed the king's friends, seized the citadel, and sent four of Mithridates's sons to the Roman garrisons.

Mithridates, inflamed with anger, blazed into crime. He slaughtered many of his friends at that time, as well as his son Exypodrus and another son, Machares, in parricidal murder. His son Phamaces, terrified by his brothers' example, won over the army sent to pursue him and soon led it against his father.

For a long time Mithridates pleaded with his son in vain from the top of a very high wall. When he saw that his son was inexorable, he is said to have cried out as he was about to die: "Because Phamaces commands me to die, I pray you, gods of my ancestors, if you exist, that he too may one day hear this same command from his own children."

He immediately descended to his wives, concubines, and daughters and gave poison to them all. He drank it last of all himself, but because of the remedies with which he had fortified his vital organs against harmful potions, the poison could not kill him. He paced about in vain, hoping that bodily movement might at last drive the infused pestilence through his veins. He then summoned a certain Gaul who was already running about after the wall had been breached and offered him his throat.

Such was the end of Mithridates, a man said to have been the most superstitious of all. He died in the seventy-second year of his age, always keeping with him philosophers and men most skilled in every art.

Helinand gives another account concerning Tigranes. When Pompey made war against Tigranes and overcame him, Tigranes surrendered. He came to Pompey's camp, sixteen miles from Ecbatana, and, after falling at Pompey's knees, placed his diadem in Pompey's hands. Pompey put it back upon him, judging it equally glorious to make kings and to conquer them. He treated Tigranes honorably, but punished him by taking away part of his kingdom and a very great sum of money. Phoenice and Sophene were taken from him, together with six thousand talents of silver that he was to give to the Roman people, because he had begun war against the Romans without cause.

§ XXVIII. The Roman Civil Wars

Augustine says in book 5, chapter 24 of The City of God that the beginning and cause of the Roman civil wars was the sedition raised in the city by the two tribunes called the Gracchi, of whom something was said above.

First came the civil war between Marius and Sulla, the leaders of the city's two factions. Eutropius and Orosius in book 5 say that there were three men named Marius: Gaius Marius the father, Gaius Marius his son, and Marcus Marius.

Augustine and the aforesaid historians say of the elder Marius that through him the first civil war was begun and waged. He had not inherited from his ancestors the support that enabled him to be raised to such great dignities, for although he was not noble, he was consul seven times. When he reached military age he became a paid soldier and afterward a military tribune. As he rose, he held one magistracy after another. He then served in Africa under the consul Metellus in the Romans' war against Jugurtha, king of the Numidians. At last he returned to Rome, became consul, and succeeded Metellus in the Jugurthine War.

Valerius also says of him in book 6 that he wrestled with fortune. Because he was judged inferior to the men of Arpinum in honors, he dared to seek the quaestorship at Rome; and from being so humble a Marius, an obscure Arpinate and a candidate at Rome, he emerged for Africa. He was made consul six times on account of his worth, and we do not read that he exercised great cruelty until he sought or obtained the seventh consulship. This became the occasion of the first civil war, in which he displayed excessive cruelty.

Thus, according to Orosius and Eutropius, in the 662nd year from the founding of the city, the aforesaid elder Gaius Marius, who had already been consul six times, sought a seventh consulship. At that time Sulla, who was consul, was to be sent against Mithridates, who had occupied Asia and Achaea. Marius wished both to become consul for the seventh time and to be sent against Mithridates himself. Provoked by this, Sulla came to the city with his army, fought Marius, and put him to flight. After Marius had fled, Sulla advanced into Greece against Mithridates.

Marius, fleeing and finding himself surrounded by the pressure of his pursuers, hid in the marshes of Miternenses. He was wretchedly and ignominiously dragged out, handed over as a shameful spectacle to his executioners, and thrust into prison. There he so terrified the man sent to kill him merely by his face that the man did not dare to do it.

Valerius says that a stout slave who was a Cimbrian by nation was sent to kill Marius in a private chamber at the public baths. Although Marius, while waging the Romans' war against the Cimbri, had destroyed that nation; although Marius was old, unarmed, and covered in filth; and although the slave held a drawn sword in his hands, he did not dare attack him. Blinded by the famous man's splendor, he cast away the sword and fled from the place astonished and trembling.

Marius then escaped his bonds and fled to Africa. There he stirred up his son, Gaius Marius the Younger, who was being kept in custody near Utica; joined the consul Cinna in a partnership of crimes; and resolved to return to Rome with him.

They divided their army into four parts, so that three legions were given to the elder Marius. Gnaeus Carbo took another part of the army. Valerius says that he was the source of the civil evils and their most blazing torch. A part was given to Sertorius, while the remainder of the army followed the consul Cinna.

Marius therefore took the port of Ostia by force and practiced every kind of lust, avarice, and cruelty. The consul Cinna with his legions and Marius with the fugitives then entered the city. They killed all the noblest members of the Senate and many men of consular rank. They also proscribed many, destroyed Sulla's house, and forced his wife and children to flee.

Before Sulla returned, the elder Marius had the heads of murdered citizens brought to banquets, carried to the Capitol, and heaped upon the Rostra--that is, a certain place in the Forum so called--for public display. After he had forced his way into a seventh consulship while Cinna was consul for the third time, he was at last overtaken by a late death at the beginning of his consular authority. Cinna was then made consul for the fourth time and was afterward killed by his own army. Meanwhile, also before Sulla returned, Gaius Marius the Younger and Papirius Carbo were made consuls at Rome.

The elder Marius also caused the death of Octavius, who had been consul with Cinna. Cinna favored Marius's party, which Octavius detested. Therefore Octavius, after Gnaeus Pompeius had joined him, fought Sertorius, who was a Marian. The Senate had summoned this Gnaeus Pompeius with the whole army he commanded to defend the commonwealth.

Night came and ended this unhappy battle, in which many soldiers on both sides were killed. On the following day, while the mingled bodies were being separated for burial, a Pompeian soldier--that is, one who had served in Pompeius's army--recognized the body of the brother he had killed. Thus the victorious brother, more unhappy than his defeated brother, cursed his own fratricide and the civil wars. He immediately pierced his own breast, shedding tears and blood together, and threw himself upon his brother's body.

Valerius says that when this man recognized the body of the brother he had killed, he spent a long time assailing the gods with reproaches for the gift of an impious victory. Octavius himself was eventually defeated with his army and killed when Cinna and Marius were admitted into the city, and his head was placed upon the Rostra.

The Rostra was the name of a place in the city where the Forum was, namely in the Campus Martius. It was so called from the golden beaks of the ships the Romans had captured, with which it was adorned and which were affixed there as signs of victories. The Senate house was nearby, where the tribunes of the plebs held addresses and deliberations with the people. Octavius's head was therefore placed there, as in a very crowded location, so that it might be seen by many.

Valerius also says that the aforesaid Marius, with ignoble savagery, slaughtered the most noble body of Gaius Caesar, a man of consular and censorial rank, beside the tomb--that is, the burial place--of a certain most seditious and abject man. This was not, however, the great Caesar who later became emperor, but another man.

Another man named Fimbria, a notable supporter of Sulla, was also killed. Two men named Crassus, father and son, were killed by Fimbria, who belonged to Marius's party and caused their dead bodies to be mangled. Florus, in his epitome of Titus Livy, relates that the son Crassus was killed by Fimbria's cavalry. The father Crassus, lest he suffer anything unworthy of his courage, pierced himself with his sword.

Quintus Catulus, Valerius relates in book 9, had been given as fellow consul to Marius by the Senate when Marius defeated the Cimbri and Teutons. Later, because of the civil dissensions, Marius ordered him to die. Catulus immediately shut himself in a room in which lime had been heated by a great fire, and so killed himself.

At that time, Valerius reports, Lucius Cornelius Merula, a man of consular rank and flamen of Jove, cut his veins in Jove's sanctuary so that he might not become a mockery in the most insolent writings. He thereby escaped condemnation to a shameful death, and the most ancient altars were soaked with a priest's blood.

Florus says: "That seventh purple of Marius"--that is, his consulship--"produced all these deaths of senators between the Kalends and the Ides of January. What would have happened if he had completed the year of his consulship?" For according to Titus Livy he died on the Ides of January.

It should also be known that, as Orosius relates in books 5 and 6, a certain Fimbria belonged to Marius's party and was the boldest of all men, an accomplice in the Marians' crimes. At Nicomedia he killed the consul Flaccus, to whom he had been sent as legate. He then became angry with the Ilrians--that is, the Trojans, who inhabited rebuilt Ilium, namely Troy, after its first destruction by the Greeks--because in their zeal for Sulla's party they had closed their gates against Fimbria and repelled him. He utterly destroyed Ilium, the parent of Rome, with fire and slaughter. Sulla nevertheless rebuilt it afterward. Finally, besieged by Sulla's army and driven by despair, Fimbria killed himself.

It should also be noted that this Marian Fimbria labored to have Mucius Scaevola killed at the funeral of the elder Marius. Valerius says in book 9 that no praise worthy of Scaevola could be returned for the holiness of his character. Fimbria inflicted a grave wound upon him, from which Scaevola nevertheless afterward recovered.

When Fimbria learned this, he said that he wished to prosecute Scaevola. Asked what accusation he meant to make against him, he answered that he wished to charge him with having received the weapon too sparingly into his body. This Scaevola was at last killed by the other man. For Florus relates in his epitome of Titus Livy that the praetor dasamadypsis, after convening the Senate at the will of the consul Gaius Marius, slaughtered all the nobility then in the city. Among them was Quintus Mucius Scaevola, the chief pontiff, who was killed while fleeing in the vestibule of the temple of Vesta, namely the goddess.

Orosius likewise relates in books 5 and 6 that the praetor dasamadypsis, with the consul Marius as instigator, summoned Quintus Scaevola, Domitius, Publius Autestius, and Carbo into the Senate house as though for consultation, and cruelly killed them. Their bodies were dragged with hooks and cast into the Tiber. Augustine touches upon these events in book 3, chapter 28 of The City of God.

Here it should be known that there were two notable citizens called Carbo. One was a consul and one of the principal men of the Marian party. The other was a senator on Sulla's side, and his death is the one treated here. Yet the other too was afterward killed by the Sullans.

§ XXIX. Sulla, Marius's Adversary: His Character and Cruelty

Orosius in book 5 and Valerius in book 9 say: "No one can with sufficient truth either praise or condemn Lucius Sulla, because when he sought victories he resembled the Scipios, but when he exercised victory he represented Hannibal." He ennobled the commonwealth he had defended with outstanding authority, but cruelly flooded the whole city and every part of Italy with streams of civil blood. Indeed, he ordered the severed heads of wretched men, all but retaining countenance and breath, to be brought into his sight, so that he might consume with his eyes what it was impious to consume with his mouth.

When the Senate asked him to return to the city to judge and save the fatherland from the tyranny of Marius described above, Sulla conducted himself worse than Marius and killed more citizens. Lucan marks this in book 2 when he says: "And while he cuts away limbs already too rotten, he exceeds the measure of medicine," and so forth.

Although Sulla seemed to have a just cause for war against Marius, namely to free the city from his tyranny, he nevertheless behaved with excessive cruelty, pouring out too much blood and entangling the innocent with the guilty.

He returned from Asia, where he had fought bravely against Mithridates and defeated him. Eutropius says that in the first engagement Sulla so defeated Archelaus, Mithridates's commander in Asia, who had 120,000 men, that scarcely ten of so great a multitude survived with Archelaus; Sulla himself lost only eleven men. In a second engagement he fought the same commander, who had seventy thousand chosen troops, and killed fifteen thousand of the enemy together with Archelaus's son. In a third engagement he annihilated all Archelaus's forces, while Archelaus himself hid naked in the marshes for three days. Mithridates afterward sought peace, which Sulla granted him on certain conditions.

When Sulla was preparing to return to the city and avenge the injuries inflicted upon him by the Marian party, a messenger from Jove was sent to him, namely a certain soldier of the sixth legion. The man said that he was Jove's messenger, and Sulla asked in what form Jove had appeared to him. When he described it, Sulla recognized that Jove had appeared in the same form to another messenger sent to him before.

Likewise, when Sulla was returning from Greece and passed through Tarentum toward Rome, a haruspex saw a crown in the entrails of animals that Sulla had sacrificed to discover the outcome of the war, and interpreted it as a sign of his future victory.

In ancient times various crowns were given according to the character of the victories. The triumphal crowns sent to commanders in honor of a triumph, however, were of gold. At first they were made from laurel; afterward they were made from gold. All these things, however, occurred through the mockery or deception of demons.

Frontinus says in book 1 that when Sulla had an army fully prepared to fight, victory was foretold to him by the gods, and so he offered incense. Finally, before descending into battle and in sight of the army, he prayed to a small image that he had taken from the temple of Apollo at Delphi. He asked it to hasten the victory it had promised him.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

Sulla therefore returned to the city and fought against Marius the Younger, son of the Marius who had already died. Fifteen thousand men of Marius's party were killed, while Sulla lost four hundred of his own. Sulla then brought his standard to the Colline Gate and killed eighty thousand men. After entering the city, he killed three thousand unarmed men contrary to the pledge he had given.

When Sulla struck the guilty and innocent alike with great cruelty, Quintus Catulus said to him openly: "With whom shall we live at last, if we kill armed men in war and defenseless men in peace?"

Sulla then ordered Marcus Marius to be dragged from a goatherd's hut and bound. He had him led across the Tiber and butchered after his eyes had been gouged out and his limbs mutilated, cut, or broken. Seeing this, Marius the Younger despaired and offered his neck to his slave, who killed him.

Again fighting against the Marian party at the Colline Gate, Sulla faced seventy thousand men. Twelve thousand of them surrendered to him, and in his insatiable anger he destroyed the rest.

The other consul, Carbo, fled from Ariminum to Sicily and was killed there by Gnaeus Pompey. Orosius, however, says in book 5 that Pompey, who was a Sullan, drew the aforesaid Carbo back to Sicily when Carbo wished to flee from Corsica to Egypt, and there killed him with his other companions.

Valerius also relates in book 9 that Sulla cruelly flooded the whole city and every part of Italy with civil blood. Four legions of the opposing party had followed his pledged word--that is, they trusted in the immunity he had promised them. In vain they implored mercy at a public villa in the Campus Martius, for he ordered them killed, and their bodies, mangled by the sword, were cast into the Tiber.

Five thousand men of Praeneste were summoned outside the municipal walls with the hope of safety. After throwing away their weapons, they prostrated themselves on the ground. Sulla had them killed and caused their bodies to be scattered through the fields. Hence Lucan says in book 2: "Fortune saw all her Praenestine colonists received at once upon the sword." Orosius relates that the reason for this was that Marius the Younger had held out against Sulla in the city of Praeneste and that the city had favored his party.

Sulla entered 4,600 persons upon public tablets, to be slaughtered under his dreadful edict of proscription, so that the memory of this deed might be preserved.

Orosius relates in book 5 concerning tablets of this kind that after Quintus Catulus rebuked Sulla for the excessive killing, Sulla ordered Lucio Farcidio to prepare the infamous tablet of proscription. The first proscription was of eighty men, among whom were four who had been consuls or were worthy of the consulship: Carbo, Marius, Gaius Marius, Urbanus, and Scipio. Sertonius, who was then feared above all, was also among them.

Another proscription of five hundred men was then posted. Valerius, who knew himself guilty of nothing, read it; when he saw his own name among those listed and wished to flee with a price set upon his head, he was killed. Nor did these tablets seem to set an end to the killing. Sulla's slaves slaughtered some whom he had not proscribed, while they killed others first and proscribed them afterward.

The writers therefore differ concerning the number of the proscribed. Augustine, together with Florus, gives two thousand in book 13, chapter 28 of The City of God. Valerius gives 4,700, but Orosius gives only 580. These figures are not entirely contradictory, because they can be understood as referring to different tablets. Those were said to be proscribed who had been sentenced as enemies of the commonwealth and whom citizens were permitted to kill.

According to Florus in book 3, a certain Marian named Baebius was also torn apart without a sword by the hands of the Sullans. Perhaps this happened because another man of the same name, a Sullan Baebius, had been treated in this way by the Marians. The Sullans therefore tore this Marian Baebius apart in the same manner, as if in vengeance for the other.

Two cities in Spain were also destroyed by the Sullans because they had favored the Marians and, together with the aforesaid Marians, had offered strong resistance for a long time, even after the war against Sertorius had ended. Pompey overthrew one of them, called Eximia; Africanus took the other, called Calaburna, after a long siege and destroyed it by fire. Florus also relates that Sulla ordered the ancient city of Sulmo condemned and destroyed after its citizens had been killed.

Valerius relates in book 9 concerning Sulla's death that, while obeying the vice of anger, he at last poured out his own life with much blood because of the Puteolans--that is, while indignant against them. The money promised by the decurions for restoring the Capitol was being paid too slowly. In the excessive agitation of his mind and the immoderate violence of his voice, his breast vomited forth his breath mixed with blood. It is therefore uncertain whether Sulla or Sulla's anger was extinguished first.

The Civil Wars of Sertorius and Catiline

Sertorius was a Marian, whereas Catiline was a Sullan.

After Sulla proscribed Sertorius, Orosius relates in book 5, Sertorius--being a man powerful in cunning and boldness--fled Sulla and came from Africa into Spain. There he stirred the most warlike peoples to arms. Two commanders, Metellus and Domitius, were sent against him. Hirtuleius, a commander of Sertorius, overwhelmed Domitius and his army. Metellus, wearied by many battles, also wore down the enemy until he joined Pompey's camp.

Pompey gathered an army and most bloodily plundered the city of Lauro. Pompey had thirty thousand foot soldiers and eight thousand horsemen. Sertorius then engaged Pompey and killed ten thousand of his foot soldiers, although Sertorius himself lost the same number.

Many battles were fought between them. Memmius, Pompey's quaestor and brother-in-law, was killed. The brothers Herculis and Herculei were killed, and Yppenna, who had joined Sertorius, was crushed. Finally, in the tenth year after the war began, Sertorius was killed through the treachery of his own men and brought the war to an end. Afterward the cities that had favored Sertorius surrendered; two resisted and were destroyed. Augustine touches upon these matters in book 13, chapter 30 of The City of God, and also upon Lepidus and Catulus.

Orosius says of the latter in book 5 that after Sulla died, Lepidus, an advocate and defender of the Marian party, rose against Catulus, a Sullan commander, and rekindled the ashes of civil war. Then twice in battle an ally was exhorted, and very many Romans were killed. The city of the Albans was besieged and tormented by famine. Scipio, son of Lepidus, was then captured and killed there. Brutus was killed near Rhegium while Pompey pursued him. Thus this civil war vanished with the same speed with which it had flared up.

§ XXX. Catiline

Catiline was a Sullan and had been nurtured by Sulla. Sallust wrote a book about him called the Catilinarian.

Cicero and Sallust say that Catiline was distinguished above all by his wicked lust. Driven by love for Aurelia Oristilla, he saw a single impediment preventing their marriage: his own son, the only son he had and already of adult age. He removed him with poison.

Cicero says of him in the invectives: "What evil or crime can be imagined or conceived that he did not conceive? What poisoner in all Italy, what gladiator, what robber, what hired killer, what parricide, what woman, what ruined person can be found who admits that he lived on the most intimate terms with Catiline?"

The aforesaid Lucius Sergius Catiline was therefore a man of the noblest family but of the worst disposition. Sallust says that his character was exceedingly vicious and that, oppressed by debt, he led a wretched life. So great a desire to rule the commonwealth invaded him that he considered nothing forbidden, provided only that he might attain his purpose.

He therefore formed a conspiracy of many men, whom he had promised to enrich by slaughter and plunder. He had a very strong army with which he had planned to kill the two consuls Lutius Coccum and Lucius Torquatus and seize the consulship.

Thus, in the 789th year from the founding of the city, he conspired with certain most illustrious and daring men to destroy the fatherland. While Marcus Tullius Cicero the orator and Gnaeus Antonius were consuls, Cicero exposed Catiline's conspiracy and expelled him from the city. His associates were apprehended and strangled in the fortress. Catiline was defeated in battle by the other consul, Antonius, and was killed with his men, as is said, on the plain of Pistoria.

Sallust says: "When the battle was finished, you could then perceive how much boldness and how much force of spirit had been in Catiline's army. Among them there was no freeborn man who either fled or could be captured alive." Catiline himself was found far from his own men among the corpses of the enemy, still breathing a little and retaining in his face the ferocity of spirit he had possessed while alive. Augustine touches upon these matters in book 2, chapter 23 and book 3, chapter 30 of The City of God.

Cicero likewise says of Catiline: “He possessed many signs of the greatest virtues, not expressed but merely sketched. He associated with wicked men, yet pretended to be devoted to the best men. I think there was never such a monster on earth, compounded of inclinations and desires so contrary, diverse, and mutually opposed. Who was sometimes more delightful among distinguished men? Who was more closely joined to the shameful? Who was sometimes a better citizen? Who was a worse enemy of the city? Who was more polluted in pleasures? Who more patient in labors? Who more bitter in rapacity? Who more lavish in giving?”

“This too was remarkable in him: he could turn and govern his nature for the occasion, twisting and bending it this way and that. With the austere he lived severely; with the easygoing, pleasantly; with the old, gravely; with the young, courteously; with criminals, boldly; with the luxurious, luxuriously.”

“O great power of truth, which easily defends itself by itself against the abilities, cunning, and cleverness of all, and against all fabricated snares.” Thus Cicero.

§ XXXI. The Wars More Than Civil Between Pompey and Caesar

Pompey belonged to Sulla's party, but Julius Caesar to Marius's. Lucan says of them at the beginning of his book: “Wars more than civil over the Emathian plains, and right granted to crime,” and so forth.

By “the Emathian plains” he means the plains of Thessaly, where most of the fighting occurred and much blood was poured out. Hence “Emathia” is interpreted as “blood.” He calls the wars “more than civil” because they were fought not only between citizens but also between relatives by marriage. Julius Caesar was the father-in-law and Pompey his son-in-law. After Caesar's daughter Julia, whom Pompey had married, died, they waged many wars against one another. Lucan adds that “right was granted to crime” because the law of civic fellowship and marriage affinity was turned into crime.

Pompey was called “the Great” because of the greatness of his valor. He had waged war in the East against twenty-two kings, all of whom he defeated and subjected to the Romans. He also obtained victory while waging wars against Sertorius, and earlier, after long wars that Mithridates, king of Asia, brought upon the Romans, Pompey defeated him as well.

Augustine also says of Pompey in book 18, chapter 45 of The City of God: after the deeds of the Maccabees, Aristobulus and Hyrcanus, sons of Alexander and Alexandra, fought one another for the kingdom. This Alexander had been king and high priest among the Jewish people, as had his father Aristobulus, who was the first after the Babylonian captivity to assume a diadem and be both king and high priest.

Hyrcanus sought the aid of the Romans against his brother. Pompey, the most renowned prince of the Roman people, entered Judea with an army and captured the city of Jerusalem. He opened the temple not with the devotion of a suppliant but by the right of a victor. He approached the Holy of Holies, where no one but the high priest was permitted to enter, not as a venerator but as a profaner.

He confirmed Hyrcanus in the high priesthood, imposed Antipater as guardian over the subjected nation--such guardians were then called procurators--and led Aristobulus away with him in chains. From that day the Jews began to be tributaries of the Romans.

Crassus afterward also plundered the temple. A few years later the Jews deserved to have the foreign-born Herod as king, under whom Christ was born. Thus Augustine.

Faustus Cornelius, son of Sulla, was the first who dared to enter the temple, as Vincent relates in book 6. The Romans who rushed in after him profaned the temple itself or, as is read elsewhere, stabled horses in its porticoes.

For this reason, Peter Comestor in particular says that from that time onward Pompey never fought without being defeated, although until then he had been most fortunate. Pompey admired the temple's location and adornment and its religion. Nevertheless, he took nothing from it and commanded its custodians to cleanse the temple of filth.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

§ XXXII. Julius Caesar

Julius Caesar was the most energetic of all mortals of his time. The Senate had decreed that he should wage war against the Gauls. When that war was finished, after he had subjected all Gaul and was returning victorious to Rome, he asked before approaching the city that a second consulship be given to him. He had already been consul once and sought to become consul a second time, indicating in his request that this must certainly be granted to him.

Marcellus, who was then consul, Pompey, and Latho opposed him. Caesar was ordered to dismiss the armies he possessed and return to the city. By the consul's authority certain legions were entrusted to Pompey, as though he would command a future war against Julius Caesar if Caesar wished to take up arms.

Julius ranged through various regions, even as far as Spain, and gathered a very large and powerful army. The consuls, the whole Senate, and all the nobility fled to Greece. Gathering near Epirus, they resolved to make war upon Julius there if he came into Greece.

Caesar came, engaged Pompey, and was defeated and put to flight. He nevertheless escaped because, when night arrived, Pompey was unwilling to pursue him for fear of an ambush. Caesar then said that Pompey did not know how to conquer and that Caesar could have been defeated only on that day.

They afterward fought in Thessaly. Never before had Roman forces so numerous, or commanded by better leaders, assembled together; they could easily have subjected the whole world. At last, after a long battle of doubtful fortune, Pompey's entire army fled. Pompey himself was also put to flight and went to Alexandria in Egypt, hoping to receive aid from Ptolemy, king of Egypt. Ptolemy instead sent Pompey's severed head and his ring to Caesar.

Afterward Pompey's son, daughter, and descendants were killed. Many battles and great slaughters of men followed in various regions as Caesar pursued those who had belonged to Pompey's party. This war continuously held the whole world for four years. These things have been extracted from Orosius and Eutropius.

§ XXXIII. Latho

When Latho learned that Pompey, whose party he favored, had been defeated by Caesar and beheaded by the king of Egypt, he gathered the remnants of Pompey's army and fled into Africa after placing his people aboard a thousand ships.

He led them about through sandy and serpent-filled places. Many of his men were exhausted by hunger, thirst, and heat, and many others were destroyed by serpents. He and all who followed him suffered such misery that most of them repented of having been from Julius Caesar, as Lucan says.

At last, when Latho saw Caesar prospering in everything and Pompey's party yielding everywhere, he killed himself at Utica rather than submit to Caesar in any way, although he knew that Caesar was of extraordinary clemency. Florus says that after dismissing his son and companions from his embrace, after Plato's book that teaches the immortality of the soul had been read at night by lamplight, Latho rested a little. Then, about the first watch, he drew his sword, uncovered his breast with his hand, and struck it once and again.

After this, physicians dared to violate the man with their remedies. He allowed them to do so, but when they departed he tore the wounds open again. As the force of his blood followed, he left his dying hands fixed in the wound.

Although Florus, Valerius, and some others praise this deed as though Latho had acted energetically and virtuously, Augustine in book 19 and other saints do not judge such a death to have been virtuous or glorious. They ascribe it not to fortitude but to impatience.

Augustine also proves this in book 1, chapter 23 of The City of God from the fact that Latho persuaded his own dearest son to submit to Caesar and to hope for everything from Caesar's kindness. If it was evil to submit to Caesar, why did he persuade the son whom he loved most to submit to him? If it was not evil, why did Latho commit the greatest crime--killing himself--so as not to be subject to Caesar?

Valerius relates in book 5 that when Caesar heard of Latho's death, he said both that he envied Latho's glory and that Latho had begrudged his own glory to his father. Caesar nevertheless preserved Latho's patrimony intact for his children.

It should be known that many men were called Latho. Thus there was in the city a certain house or kinship group of the Lathos, just as there were houses of the Scipios, Fabricii, Fabii, and many similar families.

According to Valerius, the first to ennoble the house of the Lathos was the Latho called Censorius. According to Hugh, censorius means the same as "judge of morals," and this Latho was therefore called Censorius because he was a judge of morals. That house was distinguished by the upright men who proceeded from it.

Gellius says that the family of the Lathos produced not one but several grandsons of Marcus Latho Censorius, born from different fathers. That Latho, who was both orator and censor, had two sons by different mothers and of widely differing ages. When one was already a young man and his mother had died, Latho himself, though very old, married the virgin daughter of his client Solini. From her Marcus Latho Solomanus was born.

From Latho's elder son--who was designated praetor, died while his father still lived, and left distinguished books on military discipline--was born Marcus Latho, a forceful orator who left many written speeches. He went to Africa as consul and died there. He too had an elder son named Latho, though not the one who died at Utica, but the one who, after being aedile and praetor, went to Narbonese Gaul and died there.

From the censor's other son, the younger son called Solomanus, were born Lucius Latho and Marcus Latho the praetor, who killed himself at Utica during the civil war. When Cicero wrote about this man's life and praises, he called him the great-grandson of Latho Censorius. Thus Gellius.

Among the Lathos, two were more distinguished: Latho Censorius, who was the first of those named, and Latho of Utica, the last of those named. The latter was called Uticensis from Utica, the city of Africa where he killed himself.

It should also be noted that, besides this Latho of Utica, there was another Latho, a Stoic philosopher, who according to Eusebius killed himself in the forty-first year of Augustus's rule from weariness with a double quartan fever, hoping to find a better life after this one.

Some believe that he was the Latho who composed the book that children learn in grammar schools. But, as Valesius says upon book 1 of The City of God, this cannot be so, because that book mentions Lucan in the verse: "If you wish to know the Roman and Punic wars, seek Lucan," and so forth. The poet Lucan lived about the time of Augustus.

§ XXXIV. Julius Caesar: His Character, Battles, and Death

According to Suetonius in his book on the seven Caesars, Julius Caesar is said to have been tall, fair in complexion, well formed in his limbs, with a somewhat full face and black and lively eyes. His health was good, except that he was accustomed suddenly to faint or even to be terrified in his sleep.

He bore the disfigurement of baldness very badly, having often found it subject to the mockery of his detractors. He therefore used to comb his thinning hair forward from the crown of his head. Not even his enemies denied that he drank wine very sparingly.

He was so indifferent about food that when a host once served rancid oil in place of fresh and the others rejected it, Caesar alone took an even more generous portion, lest he appear to accuse his host of either rusticity or avarice.

He possessed marvelous eloquence, through which he either equaled or surpassed the glory of the most excellent speakers. He left commentaries on his own deeds. Cicero says of them: "He wrote commentaries that are indeed greatly to be approved. They are bare, direct, and graceful, with every ornament of speech stripped away as though it were clothing."

He was most skilled in arms and horsemanship and endured labor beyond belief. While the column was marching he would sometimes ride but more often go ahead on foot, bareheaded whether there was sun or rain. He covered the longest journeys with incredible speed. If rivers delayed him, he crossed by swimming or by supporting himself upon inflated skins, so that he very often arrived before the messengers sent to announce him.

In a doubtful battle he would send the horses away, first of all his own, so that by removing the aid of flight he might impose upon everyone a greater necessity to remain.

He rode a remarkable horse whose feet were almost human and whose hooves were split like toes. The horse permitted no other rider, and Caesar was the first to mount it.

He often restored a wavering battle line by himself, standing in the way of those who fled, holding individual men back, and even seizing them by the throat and turning them toward the enemy.

During the assault upon the bridge at Alexandria, when a sudden enemy attack forced him into a small boat and many men threw themselves into it with him, he leapt into the sea. He escaped by swimming two hundred paces to the nearest ship, holding up his left hand so that the documents he carried would not become wet and dragging his general's cloak in his teeth so that the enemy would not obtain it as a trophy.

He behaved with the greatest restraint toward both his subordinates and his equals. Hence Suetonius says of him: "He neither observed every offense nor punished it in proportion. He was the sharpest investigator and punisher of deserters and the seditious, but restrained himself in other cases."

After a great battle and victory he never permitted everyone unrestricted license to behave wantonly. In public address he did not call his soldiers merely "soldiers," but by the more flattering name "fellow soldiers." He kept them so well equipped that he adorned their weapons with polished silver and gold, both for appearance and so that they would fight more tenaciously from fear of losing them.

He always treated his friends with such favor and indulgence that when Gaius Oppius, accompanying him on a journey through the woods, was suddenly overtaken by illness, Caesar yielded to him the only lodging that existed there and himself slept upon the ground in the open air.

He never adopted enmities so grave that he would not gladly lay them aside when an opportunity to forget them arose. In exacting vengeance too, he was by nature most gentle.

He fought many battles against different peoples, especially against the Germans and Gauls, whom he defeated. Julius Celsus says of the Gauls' character: "Just as the spirit of all Gauls is eager and ready to undertake wars, so it is soft and offers very little resistance in enduring calamities. They often form plans concerning the greatest affairs of which they must immediately repent, since they are slaves to no settled customs and most people give deceptive answers according to their wishes. The Gauls' plans are therefore sudden and abrupt, for nearly all of them pursue revolution and are quickly and readily stirred to war."

Helinand says that the warlike nation of the Belgae--that is, of the Gauls and Britons--blazed up against Caesar. Among them, the Bellovagi, superior to the others in number and courage, had sixty thousand picked armed men. The Suessiones from twelve towns had fifty thousand, and the Numeri the same number; the Atrebatas and Ambiani had ten thousand. The Morini had thirty-five thousand, the Merapi nine thousand, and the Caleti ten thousand. The Vellocasses and Viromandui had ten thousand, and the Adnatici eighteen thousand. The Aduelles, Burenes, Caeroesi, and Ceromani, who by a single name were called Germans, had forty thousand. In total they are said to have been 282,000 picked armed men, nearly all of whom were destroyed to annihilation.

Afterward, near Ottodorum, when Caesar had resolved to depart for Italy, more than thirty thousand barbarians are reported to have been cut down by the legion Galba commanded, which Caesar had sent among the Bangros and Seduni. Thirty-eight thousand Aquitanians and Cantabrians are reported to have been cut down. Caesar is next said to have killed forty thousand Germans.

Julius Celsus says that when Caesar determined to cross the river Rhine, he thought it neither safe enough to cross in ships nor consistent with his own dignity or that of the Roman people. Although the river's breadth and swiftness presented the greatest difficulty in building a bridge, he nevertheless judged that the army should not be brought across in any other way. Thus in a short time he caused a bridge of marvelous design and very strong construction to be built. Caesar led his army across it and hastened into the territory of the Sicamborum.

From there he departed for Britain. Orosius says that Caesar's cavalry was defeated by the Britons in the first engagement. In the second battle, with great danger to his own men, he defeated the Britons and turned them to flight. Thereafter the very strong city of the Ternovatum, under the leadership of Mandrogeo, surrendered to Caesar after giving forty hostages, and the other cities followed its example.

Orosius relates these and many other things concerning Caesar's Gallic War. Julius Celsus also wrote fully about it in five books devoted to the subject, where he gave these notable sayings: "Experience is the teacher of all things. We gladly believe what we wish, and we hope that others themselves feel what we feel. It is natural for all people to be incited by the love of liberty and to hate the conditions of servitude."

The same writer says: "Anger and rashness are especially innate in the Gallic people, so that they regard a slight report as a proven fact. The Gauls are open men and not at all deceitful, accustomed to fight by courage and not by guile."

Eutropius says of Caesar in book 6 that he was a man more brilliant than any who had ever lived. With his standards gathered--that is, with his battle lines deployed and arranged--he fought fifty times.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

Caesar was of such goodness that he conquered by clemency, even more than by arms, those whom he had subjected with weapons.

After settling the civil wars throughout the world, he returned to Rome and began to act with greater insolence and contrary to the custom of Roman liberty. He bestowed according to his own will honors that had formerly been conferred by the people, did not rise when the Senate came to him, and did certain royal and almost tyrannical things.

Brutus and Cassius therefore instigated a conspiracy against him, of which 260 Roman senators and knights were aware. Caesar died in the Senate house, pierced by twenty-four wounds.

Suetonius says that when Caesar perceived drawn daggers attacking him from every side, he wrapped his toga around his head and at the same time drew its fold down to his feet with his left hand, so that he might fall more honorably with the lower part of his body also covered. He was thus pierced by twenty-three wounds, uttering only a wordless groan at the first blow.

He was killed in the fifty-sixth year of his age, after ruling for five years. The Roman people, stirred by grief, wished to burn the Capitol together with the authors of the crime. His body was burned before the Rostra.

The people erected in the Forum a solid statue of an enormous stone, nearly twenty feet high, above which he was buried and which was called the Julia. The chronicles say that when he was killed, letters warning him of the conspiracy were found in his hand; if he had read them, he would certainly have taken precautions.

Augustine says in book 3, chapter 30 of The City of God that the conspiracy wished to kill him as one who sought kingship. In truth, after the kings had been expelled, he was the first to govern the Roman commonwealth as though he were king and emperor. This was very hateful to the Romans as something opposed to their ancient liberty, because before this the Senate and people performed everything by themselves or through others under their authority.

Suetonius says that almost none of Caesar's assassins survived him by more than three years or died a natural death. All were condemned. Each perished by a different misfortune, some by shipwreck and some in battle. Several killed themselves with the same dagger with which they had violated Caesar.

Many portents preceded Caesar's death. Suetonius says that a few months before it, when colonists brought into a colony were breaking open very ancient tombs in order to extend their country houses--and pursued the work more eagerly because they kept finding vessels of ancient workmanship--a bronze tablet was found in a monument in which Capys, founder of Capua, was said to have been buried. It bore Greek letters and words with this meaning: "Whenever the bones of Capys are uncovered, a descendant of Julius shall be killed by the hands of his kindred and soon avenged by great disasters throughout Italy."

On the day before the Ides of March, birds of various kinds pursued a little wren carrying a laurel twig into the Curia of Pompey from a nearby grove, and tore it apart there.

On the night before the day of the killing, Caesar dreamed that he sometimes flew above the clouds and joined his right hand with Jove's. His wife Calpurnia imagined that the roof of the house collapsed and that her husband was stabbed in her lap. Suddenly the doors of the bedroom opened of their own accord.

The Comestor says that one hundred days before Caesar's death a thunderbolt fell beside his statue in the Forum and knocked the capital letter C from his name inscribed above it. On the night before the day of his death, the windows of his bedchamber opened with so great a noise that he leapt up, thinking the house was about to fall. Thus Caesar's ambition ended together with his glory.

§ XXXV. The Origin of Florence

Lest I seem entirely forgetful of the origin of our city, namely Florence, I shall touch briefly upon it by repeating what that most eloquent man Leonardo of Arezzo writes about it in polished language at the beginning of his History of Florence.

The Romans founded the city of Florence, having been brought to Faesulae by Lucius Sulla. These men were Sullan soldiers, to whom part of the territory of Faesulae had been allotted for the outstanding service they performed with the others in the civil war. Faesulae, together with its ancient inhabitants, was handed over to them as a place of settlement. The Romans called these transfers of citizens and assignments of land "colonies," because estates for cultivation and homes for habitation were given to them.

For an understanding of the matter, the occasion for bringing new colonists into these places must be explained. Not many years before Sulla's dictatorship, almost all the peoples of Italy defected from the Romans at the same time. They were moved by indignation because, although they served alongside the Romans in every campaign and endured labors and dangers to enlarge the empire, they were increasingly excluded from its rewards.

They therefore complained among themselves more and more often. At last envoys were sent concerning the common matter and demanded that honors and magistracies be granted to them as though they were members of the citizen body. Marcus Drusus, tribune of the plebs, took up this cause, and for some time it was prolonged in doubtful hope. But when their demands were at last rejected, they openly rebelled as though against ungrateful men and waged the war called the Social War because it was waged by the allies.

When the Roman people at length prevailed in that war, they pursued the provinces that had taken the lead in rebellion and afflicted them with many disasters. They raged especially against the Picentes and Tuscans. Asculum, the most flourishing city of the Picentes, was ravaged by the Romans as though it were an enemy city, and in Tuscany Clusium was razed to the ground. In addition to the damage and slaughter of war, great calamities were inflicted upon the people of Arretium and Faesulae. The goods of many were confiscated, many people were driven into exile, and the cities were left almost empty of inhabitants.

This was the occasion, and as it were an invitation, for Sulla afterward, as dictator, to assign these places above all to his soldiers. In this manner Lucius Sulla brought soldiers into Faesulae and divided the fields among them man by man.

Most of them judged the mountain city, difficult of access and especially unnecessary amid the security of Roman rule, to be of little use to them. Leaving the mountain, they began to construct buildings and dwell upon the nearby plain below it, along the banks of the rivers Arno and Munionis.

Because the new city lay between two streams, they first called it Fluentia, and its inhabitants were called Fluctini. That name seems to have belonged to the city for some time, until, as its fortunes increased and the city grew to a greater size--or because it flourished with marvelous success--they called it Florentia instead of Fluentia.

Cicero and Sallust, two of the foremost authors of the Latin language, mention these colonists. Cicero affirms that they had been excellent Roman citizens and most courageous men, but, enriched by unexpected and sudden wealth through the civil war and Sulla, they did not know how to observe moderation in their expenses. While they built as though they were blessed and used great households, great banquets, lavish expenditures, and costly furnishings too extravagantly, they fell so deeply into debt that if they wished to free themselves, Sulla would have to be raised again for them from the dead.

Indeed, from the magnificent things that the father of Latin eloquence writes about their buildings, I infer that splendid foundations were laid for this city from its very cradle. Remains of ancient works survive even today, amid the admirable magnificence of the city in our own time. These include the aqueduct through which water gathered at the seventh milestone was conducted into the city, and an enormous theater for public games, which was then placed outside the walls but is now enclosed within the city itself and occupied by private buildings.

There is also the temple in which the baptistery now stands, an ancient and truly outstanding work that paganism consecrated to Mars. I should believe that private buildings also corresponded to this public magnificence, although less evidence of the private structures remains. As we said, the unrivaled remains of the public works bear witness to it.

While the colonists were occupied with these buildings and with the other splendor of life that Cicero recalls, neither looking ahead to the future nor sparing what they had gained, their money soon failed, as happens. At the same time their single hope of further largesse vanished: Lucius Sulla had departed not only from the dictatorship but also from life.

Partly driven by need and partly by their accustomed rewards, they therefore hoped that some new disturbance would arise. They were military men habituated to civil war and knew no way to remain at peace. Once more they pondered new dictatorships and new rewards of war. Debt too supplied another spur, one that is accustomed to give even timid men courage to disturb the peace.

By chance, at that time Lucius Chatellina undertook a revolution at Rome and entered into a great conspiracy against the commonwealth. It included many men of the equestrian order, many of the senatorial order, and some of patrician birth. Suspicion also touched Gaius Caesar, the man who afterward became dictator. At that time he was believed to desire revolution not only because he was a private citizen but also because he was burdened with debt.

Chatellina first attempted to accomplish many things at Rome. When these attempts succeeded poorly, he left part of the conspirators within the city to carry out what he had prescribed, while he determined to depart with the others and stir up war outside it.

At first he had planned to occupy Penestre in a nocturnal attack and establish the seat of war there. But when he perceived that city to be more diligently guarded, he changed his plan and chose Faesulae instead of Penestre. Departing from Rome and coming to these very places, he enveloped the whole region in war and arms.

This was the first danger and almost the final crisis of the city while it was still young and newly founded. Yet it escaped in such a manner that I would indeed say the event proved advantageous. Lentulus, Cetheus, and the other leaders of the conspiracy whom Chatellina had left at Rome tried to admit more people into partnership in the crime. Betrayed by the ambassadors of the Allobroges and convicted in the Senate, they were at last subjected to the ultimate punishment and perished.

When Chatellina heard this, because his hope was now broken and his undertaking seemed destined to fall uselessly, he tried to flee into Gaul. Surrounded by Roman armies and compelled to risk the fortune of battle, he was killed with his men in the territory of Pistoria.

In Etruria, from the earliest Roman wars down to these times, many cities and large towns that had formerly possessed authority had perished. Caere, Tarquinii, Populonia, and Luna had once been great cities situated along the shore of the Lower Sea. In the inland region there was Vehi, which I wrote above was besieged by the Romans for ten years. Rusellae, Capena, and Falerii likewise failed altogether. Clusium and Faesulae were little removed from destruction.

Some have handed down that Florence was destroyed by Attila, king of the Huns, while others say by Totila, and that it was restored a long time afterward by Charlemagne. It is, however, more than sufficiently established for us that Attila, king of the Huns, never entered Etruria and never advanced beyond the inicum river, which flows from Lake Benacus into the Po.

We show, however, that Totila, king of the Goths, raged against the Etruscan cities that had defected from the Goths after Belisarius's victory. I am thus led to believe that, through confusion of names, some people mistakenly took Attila for Totila.

Besides Florence's recent defection, an old grief is thought to have inflamed Totila's mind to destroy the city: so many thousands of Goths had long before fallen near it with their commander Radagaso. By stirring up the memory of this event in his mind, Totila wished to remove Florence, which while it stood existed in Etruria like a trophy set up over his people.

If these things are so, this city must have lain overthrown for more than two hundred years between Totila and Charlemagne. In this matter one will reasonably wonder: if the city was left empty of people for so long a time, in what places were its citizens preserved in the meantime?

It is utterly vain to believe that Charlemagne brought new inhabitants from Rome, especially when Rome was entangled in so many calamities and already so afflicted by many disasters that it needed a supply of inhabitants itself rather than being able to give them to other places. Indeed, it is recorded that at approximately those same times, when inhabitants were lacking because Rome was empty, settlers were placed from Sardinia at Hostiam, a city so necessary to the Romans.

I therefore believe that Totila inflicted great disasters, that a very great slaughter of the citizens occurred, and that the walls were overthrown. But I do not believe that the city was utterly destroyed or that it was entirely without inhabitants during the intervening time.

For I see that noble and principal temple of Mars and certain other buildings more ancient than Totila's age still standing. When I observe that they were left intact, I am unwilling to believe that the entire city was destroyed or that those buildings stood for so long without inhabitants.

I therefore believe instead that the walls were restored by Charlemagne; that the nobility, which had been scattered when the city's defenses were broken and had fortified castles upon their estates, was recalled within the city; and that the city itself, variously disordered, was restored to the form of a city--repaired rather than founded again.

We showed above which cities had perished throughout Etruria. Among those that emerged from so many tempests and survived to the end, Pisa, Florence, Perugia, and Siena stood out most prominently.

The Pisans, powerful in their fleet, long ruled the sea. They did this more easily because Pisa alone remained among the maritime Tuscan cities, Tarquinii, Luna, and Populonia having already been taken away. The Florentines prevailed on land through industry and skill. The Perugians, increasing through the fertility of their soil and the advantageous nature of their location, possessed great power. The splendor of Siena's civic affairs and the excellence of its families ennobled it far and wide and supplied the material for its power.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Five (continued)

Rusellae and Populonia, cities formerly neighboring those that survived, were nearest to them. The people of Arretium surpassed almost everyone in the goodness of their fields and the extent of their territory; but, situated between the Florentines and Perugians, the power of two very strong cities obstructed them.

Cortona indeed remained for a long time under the power of the people of Arretium and even lost the name of a city, until not long before our own age it deserved to recover its former rank. Next after these came the people of Lucca, Volterra, Pistoia, Orvieto, and Viterbo. These cities, worthy of remembrance, survived after long tempests. Thus Leonardo.

Chapter Six

Although Julius Caesar was the first emperor of the Romans, he ruled for only a short time and not peacefully but as though by violence, for which reason he was killed by the counsel and will of the senators. Therefore the fourth monarchy of the world, namely that of the Romans, is more commonly said to have begun with Octavian, his immediate successor.

Just as all emperors are named Caesars from Julius Caesar, so all are called Augusti from Octavian Augustus, because they ought to augment the commonwealth--that is, the empire--just as Octavian Augustus greatly enlarged it after defeating Antony, as will be related.

Under him Christ was born, king of kings and lord of lords, who subjected to himself--that is, to his faith--the whole monarchy. This is contained in the vision of Daniel 3, in the statue crushed by a stone, namely Christ, cut without hands from the mountain. First, however, the wars of Octavian himself and the manner in which he reached the monarchy will be treated, and afterward his character.

It should therefore be known, as can be gathered from Eutropius in book 7 and Orosius in book 6, that Octavian Augustus waged five civil wars. He waged the first, while still a youth of seventeen years, against Mark Antony after Julius Caesar had been killed. As was said, very many Roman senators and knights had conspired in Caesar's death.

Eutropius says that this Octavian was born to his father, the senator Octavius, and obtained his maternal ancestry from Aeneas through the Julian family, for Julia descended from Iulus, son of Aeneas. Octavian was also Caesar's nephew. Caesar left him his heir in his testament and ordered him to bear his name. He indeed took that name, for he was called both Caesar and Augustus, while nevertheless retaining his own name, Octavian.

Augustine's statement in book 3, chapter 30 of The City of God that Octavian was the aforesaid Caesar's adoptive son does not contradict this, for he was both his nephew by nature and his son by adoption, having been adopted as his son through the testament.

The aforesaid Mark Antony was then consul and belonged to Julius Caesar's party. He was attempting through civil wars to crush those who had killed Julius Caesar, while the Senate favored them. After Antony disturbed the commonwealth and committed many crimes, the Senate judged him an enemy and sent Octavian Augustus to pursue him. The two consuls Pansa and Idecus were nevertheless the principal commanders, and a third commander was joined to them. These three commanders therefore set out and defeated Antony at Mutina.

It happened that both consuls were killed and died, and that the three armies obeyed Octavian alone. Antony, put to flight and having lost his army, took refuge with Lepidus, who had been Caesar's master of the horse. Through Lepidus's efforts Octavian made peace with Antony and gave him his sister Octavia as wife.

As though intending to avenge the death of his adoptive father, Octavian set out for Rome with an army and extorted the consulship for himself in the twentieth year of his age. Afterward he proscribed the Senate--that is, according to Orosius, 112 members of the Senate. Cicero was among them, Antony his enemy and Lucius Antonius proscribing him.

Octavian then began to administer the commonwealth with Antony and Lepidus. Through this arrangement Cicero the orator and many other nobles were killed.

Valerius says of Cicero in book 5 that Popilius, whom Cicero had earlier defended in court against a serious charge and freed from death and capital punishment, afterward pursued Cicero to his death, although Cicero had injured him neither in deed nor in word. Of his own accord he asked Mark Antony to send him to pursue and slaughter Cicero once he had been proscribed--that is, at the time the Senate was proscribed.

Having obtained his request, Popilius ran exultantly to Gayeta, where Cicero was. He commanded the man of most illustrious dignity and outstanding service to offer him his venerable throat. Immediately he cut off the head of Roman eloquence and the most illustrious right hand of peace, carrying them with him to Rome.

Here it should be known that Cicero initially resisted Julius Caesar when, after winning his victory over Gaul, Caesar sought a second consulship; Cicero belonged to the party of Pompey and Cato. But after Julius Caesar obtained supreme rule, Cicero was reconciled to him.

After Caesar himself was killed, Mark Antony intended to usurp for himself the sole power of the empire. Among the Caesarians he pretended that, having received power, he would avenge Caesar's death. Cicero resisted him and composed invectives against him, because Antony was vicious in many respects.

Cicero then attached himself to Octavian, hoping that Octavian would defend the liberty of the fatherland. Octavian, intending to draw the whole commonwealth to himself and perceiving that Cicero would resist him, handed Cicero over to Antony, his enemy, as though for the good of securing the peace when they made peace with one another. Because Antony desired Cicero's death for the reasons given above, he ordered him to be killed in the manner already described.

Octavian waged his second war against Brutus and Cassius, who had been the leaders in Caesar's assassination. They had stirred up a great war, and Octavian and Antony advanced against them in Greece. They fought them near Philippi, a city of Macedonia. Octavian and Antony were defeated in the first battle, although Cassius, commander of the nobility, perished. In the second battle they killed Brutus and the immense body of nobles who had waged war with them.

The commonwealth was then divided between Octavian and Antony: Octavian held Spain, Gaul, and Italy, while Antony held Asia, Pontus, and the East.

Octavian waged his third war against the consul Lucius Antonius, who had been proscribed and had stirred up civil war in Italy. According to Orosius this Lucius was the uncle, but according to Eutropius the brother, of Mark Antony, who had undertaken the government of the East. Lucius Antonius was defeated and captured at Perusia, a city of Tuscany.

Octavian's fourth war was against Sextus Pompey, son of Gnaeus Pompey the Great. Sextus had stirred up a great war in Sicily after those who survived from the party of Brutus and Cassius fled to him. Octavian and Antony made war against him, but peace was at last agreed between them. Sextus Pompey afterward broke the peace and, defeated in a naval war, fled into Asia and was killed.

Octavian's fifth civil war was against the aforesaid Mark Antony. Antony had married Octavia, Octavian's sister, but afterward repudiated her and married Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, who was most wicked and most lustful. After this Antony, under Cleopatra's compulsion, stirred up a great civil war against Octavian; then in his ambition he hoped to rule even in Rome.

§ I. Augustus's Character

According to Suetonius in book 2, Augustus had an exceptional appearance and was most handsome at every stage of life, although he neglected all adornment and was so careless about arranging the hair on his head that he would hastily employ several barbers at once, now having his hair cut and now his beard shaved, while at the same time he either read or wrote something.

Whether speaking or silent, his face was calm and serene. He had clear and shining eyes in which he wished people to believe there was a certain divine force. He rejoiced if a person gazing at him intently lowered his face as though before the brightness of the sun.

He was short, but the proportion and symmetry of his limbs concealed this, so that it could not be perceived except by comparison with a taller person standing beside him.

He brought ill-settled nations back to obedience and made war upon no people without just and necessary causes. He governed military discipline with the utmost severity and only reluctantly permitted even one of his legates to visit his wife, and then only during the winter months.

If any cohorts yielded their position, he decimated them and fed them barley. He punished centurions who deserted their posts with capital penalties just as he punished ordinary soldiers. For other kinds of offenses he marked men with various disgraces: he sometimes ordered them to stand all day before the praetorium wearing tunics and without their military belts, and sometimes carrying ten-foot poles or even pieces of turf.

He considered nothing less appropriate to a perfect commander than haste and rashness. He often repeated that whatever is done well is done quickly enough. He maintained that war should never be undertaken unless greater hope of gain than fear of loss was apparent. He used to say that those who sought the smallest advantages at no small risk resembled men fishing with a golden hook, whose loss, if it broke off, no catch could compensate.

He embellished and adorned the city in keeping with the majesty of the empire, so that he rightly boasted that he had found it made of brick and left it made of marble.

He forbade young people of either sex to attend any nocturnal spectacle except in the company of an older close relative. After obtaining ten assistants from the Senate, he compelled every knight to render an account of his life. He censured some because they borrowed money at lower rates of interest and invested it at higher rates.

He frequently displayed great generosity to every order as occasions arose, so that one recognized him as a beneficial rather than a self-promoting prince. When the people complained of the scarcity and high price of wine, he restrained them with a most severe reply, saying that his son-in-law Agrippa had provided sufficiently by conducting many waters into the city, and people thirsted.

Except for a few, the kingdoms he obtained by right of war he either returned to the same people from whom he had taken them or assigned to foreigners. He also joined allied kings to one another by mutual ties of kinship. Being the readiest maker and arranger of every affinity and friendship, he brought up and educated the children of many kings together with his own.

There are many great proofs of his clemency and civility. When it was alleged against Aemilius Aelianus, among definite charges and above all else, that he was accustomed to think ill of Caesar, Augustus turned to the accuser with a look as though moved and said, "I wish you to prove these things to me."

When Tiberius complained to him rather violently and persistently by letter about the same matter, Augustus wrote back: "My Tiberius, do not indulge your age in this matter, and do not be too indignant that there is anyone who speaks ill of me. It is enough if we have ensured that no one can do us harm."

Although he knew that temples were customarily decreed even for proconsuls, he most obstinately abstained from this honor in the city. He even melted down all the silver statues that had once been erected to him. He always abhorred the title "Lord" as a curse and reproach.

While he was watching the games, the words “a just and good lord” were pronounced. When everyone exultantly approved them as though they had been spoken about him, he immediately checked the shameful flatterers with his hand and expression. On the following day he rebuked them in a very severe edict. He did not afterward permit himself to be called “lord,” even by his children or grandchildren, either seriously or in jest, and he prohibited flatteries of this kind even among them.

He did not rashly leave or enter any city or town except in the evening or at night, lest he disturb anyone for the sake of ceremonial duty. In courts of law he allowed himself to be questioned as a witness and refuted with a most even temper.

He did nothing more worthy of Augustus than these things: he did not dare to extort the nearest houses from their owners, and whenever he commended his sons to the people he added, “If they shall deserve it.” When they were still boys wearing the bordered toga, he complained most bitterly that everyone in the theater rose for them and applauded them while standing.

He wished his friends to be great and powerful in the city, yet equally subject to care as the others and bound by judicial laws. When he returned from a province, people accompanied him not only with favorable omens but also with measured songs. It was also observed that no punishment was exacted from anyone whenever he entered the city.

With sudden and complete unanimity everyone conferred upon him the title “Father of the Fatherland.” Some heads of households provided in their wills that their heirs should lead victims to the Capitol with a placard displayed and pay a vow on their behalf because they had left Augustus alive after them. Friendly and allied kings each founded cities called Caesarea in his own kingdom.

He educated his daughter and granddaughters so that he even accustomed them to wool-working, and he forbade them to say or do anything except openly and in such a way that it might be entered in the daily records. He so thoroughly kept them from associating with strangers that he once wrote to Licinius, a young man of illustrious and honorable birth, that he had acted somewhat immodestly by coming to Baiae to greet his daughter.

He neither admitted friendships easily nor failed to retain them with the greatest constancy.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Six (continued)

Nevertheless, Augustus nevertheless did not worthily pursue each person’s virtues and merits, but also his faults and offenses. As patron and master he was no less severe than approachable and merciful.

When a fierce boar suddenly charged Augustus while Diomedes, his steward, was walking beside him, Diomedes in fear thrust Augustus in the animal’s path. Augustus preferred to accuse him of timidity rather than wrongdoing. Although the matter had involved no small danger, because there had been no deceit he turned it into a joke.

They say that he never slept on any couch except one low and modestly furnished. He rarely wore any clothing except garments made at home by his sister, wife, and daughter. His togas were neither tight nor loose, and their stripe was neither broad nor narrow.

He served a dinner of three courses, or at the most abundant, six. He ate very little and was also by nature most sparing of wine, customarily drinking no more than three times during dinner and hardly drinking during the day. Instead of drink he would take bread soaked in cold water, a piece of cucumber, or fresh or dried fruit whose juice resembled wine.

From his earliest age he cultivated eloquence and liberal studies both eagerly and with the greatest labor. During the war at Mutina, amid so great a mass of affairs, he is said to have read, written, and declaimed every day.

By the stench of recondite words of truth, he took especial care to express the meaning of his mind as openly as possible. He did not spare Tiberius when the latter sometimes hunted after obsolete and recondite words. He rebuked Mark Antony as a man who wrote things that people would admire rather than understand.

He fostered the talents of his age in every way and listened kindly and patiently to those who recited their works. He was nevertheless offended if anything was composed about him unless it was both serious and written by the most excellent authors.

He was somewhat weakly terrified by thunder and lightning, so that he always and everywhere carried a sealskin about with him as a remedy. At the suspicion of a greater storm he would withdraw into a hidden and vaulted place.

§ II. Wars Under Augustus

In the thirty-seventh year of Augustus’s rule, Tiberius, who afterward succeeded him in the empire, celebrated a triumph after destroying the Vindelici, Armenians, and Pannonians. Thus Orosius.

Claudius Drusus, Caesar's stepson, received Gaul and Greece by lot and subdued them. This same Drusus, brother of Tiberius, subdued in Germany first the Susipetes and then the Tethecos and Cacios. He destroyed Marconiam almost to annihilation.

Afterward, in a single war, though one sprinkled also with the blood of his own men, he overcame the most powerful nations of the Cherusci, Suebi, and Sicambri, peoples to whom nature gave strength and custom experience of strength.

Their courage and ferocity can be judged from this: whenever their women were shut within their barriers by the advance of the Romans, after missiles and every object that their fury could use as a weapon had failed them, they dashed their little children upon the ground and hurled them into the faces of the enemy. In every killing of a son they were twice parricides.

At that time in Africa, Cossius, Caesar's commander, confined within narrow boundaries the Insulanos and the Gaetuli, who had wandered too widely. Tiberius also assailed the Germans in war and led away forty thousand of them as captives in victory. This very great and formidable war was waged for three years, and scarcely any war since the Punic War was greater.

Piso in turn was sent against the Vindelici and emerged victorious, and Agrippa overcame the Bosforanos. Thus Orosius.

The Martinian Chronicle says of the emperor Octavian: so great a man was not without vices. He was a slave to lust, for he was accustomed to recline among twelve cataniones and as many girls.

Thus this man was most fortunate in the world, so that it was said proverbially of him, "None was more fortunate than Octavian, and none better than Trajan." Even if he had possessed no other vices, he is believed to have been condemned for idolatry alone. Suetonius too, who praises him so highly, writes that he was devoted to debauchery, adulteries, and other wanton acts.

§ III. Learned Men in the Time of Octavian

In the time of this Octavian the following most learned men flourished: the historians Marcus Varro and Valerius Maximus; Marcus Tullius Cicero and Sallust, outstanding orators or rhetoricians; and the poets Vigilius, Ovid, and Oratius. Some of the more notable sayings from their books will be set down.

Marcus Varro died in the fifteenth year of Octavian's rule. These are his moral sayings:

"There is a double evil when we bear vexatiously what is necessary."

"Speak as all people do; think as few do. In many matters, to be wise against everyone is to be foolish."

"Return feigned thanks to one who gives unwillingly."

"Do not consider a thing scarcely given a benefit, but plunder."

"He gives once who gives when asked; he gives twice who gives without being asked."

"To ask more than once is to extort."

"It is most shameful to hope for repayment of gifts; it is most beautiful for gifts to be returned with interest."

"A gift is judged great according to the giver's intention."

"Do you wish to test a friend? Become unfortunate."

"A good man carries his fatherland with him wherever he goes and guards all his possessions. Let no one think that what lies outside himself is his own."

"Riches should be dismissed with the same expression with which they should be received."

"It is not as praiseworthy to remember as to discover, for the former belongs to another, but the latter is the work of one's own gift."

"Trust stands midway between opinion and knowledge, touching neither."

"The clearest kind of teaching is the presentation of examples."

"Ease in understanding the truth gives birth to negligence."

"A lover of truth does not pay as much attention to how a thing is said as to what is said."

"Choose as a teacher the man whom you admire more in his own things than in those of others."

"There are certain things that should be erased from the knowing mind because they occupy the place where truth is to be inserted."

"Books are only poor little aids to the sciences. They contain the beginnings of inquiries, so that from them the mind may take the beginnings of its work."

“Studies should nevertheless be interrupted lest they be abandoned, for the mind delights in variety.”

“He will teach nothing magnificent, because he says nothing himself.”

“Many people taste books as they taste dinner delicacies, but things quickly run through slip away still more quickly.”

“Philosophy rejects a squeamish stomach and invites a cheerful guest to a simple dinner.”

“The ear that does not commit what it hears to memory is a cracked vessel.”

“He who follows every path he sees will arrive nowhere.”

“It is a mark of ignorance to demand that a most difficult thing be done quickly.”

“To one who knows, no loss is more grievous than that of time.”

“Travelers do not go merely so that they may go; likewise life is not lived for its own sake, but so that something excellent may be done through it.”

“There is no happiness that receives misery into itself.”

“It is a sign of flattery when praise precedes a request.”

“Many people admit praise because they themselves proclaim it about themselves.”

“A wise man praises himself in this one way: by praising in others the good things that appear in himself.”

“It is useful but inglorious to succeed without labor to the labors of others.”

These are the sayings of Marcus Varro to an Athenian hearer.

This Marcus Terentius Varro died at the age of ninety. In his praise Augustine says in book 6 of The City of God: “Who inquired into the inventions of the gods more curiously than Marcus Varro?”

“Who discovered anything more learnedly? Who considered it more attentively? Who distinguished it more acutely? Who wrote more diligently and fully? Although he is less pleasing in eloquence, he is nevertheless so replete with doctrine and the sciences that in every branch of learning--which we call secular but they call liberal--he instructs a student of things as much as Cicero delights a student of words.”

Finally, Cicero himself offers Varro such testimony that in the Academic Books he says that he conducted the disputation treated there with Marcus Varro, who was his contemporary. He calls him “easily the sharpest of all men,” and where he contends that everything should be doubted, he adds without any doubt that Varro was most learned.

Cicero was certainly so sure about this matter that he set aside the doubt he customarily applied to everything, as though, when about to dispute this one matter on behalf of the Academics’ doubt, he forgot that he himself was an Academic.

Terentianus also says briefly of Varro in a most elegant phrase: “Varro was a most learned man in every field. He read so much that we wonder he had any leisure to write; he wrote so much that we can scarcely believe anyone could have read it all.”

Varro nevertheless worshiped the gods and judged that they should be worshiped in such a way that in this very work of his writings he says that he feared they would perish, not through a hostile attack but through the citizens’ negligence. He says that he delivered them from that ruin and deposited and preserved them in the memory of good people through free persons of this kind.

He wrote forty-one books of Antiquities, which he divided into human and divine subjects. He allotted twenty-five to human matters and sixteen to divine. He said that he wrote about human matters before divine because cities existed first and afterward these rites were instituted by them.

He also says that the ancient Romans worshiped God for more than 170 years without an image. “If this had continued until now,” he says, “the gods would be observed more chastely.” He adduces the Jewish nation as a witness to the same opinion.

This same Varro also says that he believes God to be the soul of the world, which the Greeks call the cosmos, and that this world itself is God. But just as a wise man, although consisting of body and soul, is called wise from his soul alone, so the world is called God from its soul alone.

“The world,” he says, “is divided into two parts, heaven and earth. Heaven is in turn divided into ether and air, and earth into water and soil.” He says that all these four parts are full of souls: immortal souls in the ether and air, and mortal souls in the water and soil.

According to Augustine in book 7 of The City of God, Varro also established three kinds of theology--that is, discourse or reasoning concerning divine things.

One is fabulous theology, which poets use when they sing in theaters and represent through mimes the shameful deeds of the gods before the people.

The second is civil theology, which priests used in temples, themselves also performing many incongruous and indecent things in the sacrifices and worship of those gods.

The third kind is called philosophical theology. Philosophers and learned men used it when they attempted to color the erroneous obscenities of civil or fabulous theology with physical interpretations, as though giving them the appearance of a higher doctrine.

Varro himself censured the first kind of theology in his writings because of the obscenities performed in it, which are detestable to every wise person. Nevertheless, he did not attack it in speech because he feared the people.

Although Varro did not condemn the second kind, namely civil theology, Seneca, though a pagan, inveighed greatly against it for the same reason: shameful and indecent acts were also performed by the priests in the temple. Augustine explains this at length in book 6 of The City of God.

Augustine most effectively empties the third kind of its vain and false subjects throughout many chapters of book 6 of The City of God.

In his books Marcus Varro made a certain distinction among the gods. He called some plebeian and named others selected--that is, chosen separately from the others. He states that there were twenty selected gods, whom he called selected because they had a better administration in the world than the other gods. Of those twenty, twelve were male and eight female: Janus, Jove, Saturn, Geminus, Mercury, Apollo, Mars, Vulcan, Neptune, the Sun, Ortus, Liber, Tellus, Ceres, Juno, Luna, Diana, Minerva, Venus, and Vestem.

Varro assigns to each of them the particular functions in which they operate. But in many chapters of the aforesaid book 7, Augustine most effectively refutes the natural interpretations Varro gives to the things said about such gods. He shows that Varro says many false and vain things and contradicts himself. In chapter 29 of that book Augustine declares that the true and one God whom we worship is accustomed to produce by himself or through various creatures all the effects assigned to the gods.

The plebeian gods were almost innumerable. Not only were certain human beings venerated as gods, such as Romulus, Aeneas, Hercules, and others of this kind, but even the vilest created things had gods or goddesses: the sewer had the goddess Cloacina, fever the goddess Febris, pallor the goddess Pallor, and so forth.

Indeed, one and the same kind of created thing had several gods or goddesses in its different stages: grain had the goddess Semetia when it was sown, Ortea when it was born, Herbea when it became grass, Nondea when it had not yet formed a joint, Spicea when it reached the ear, and Segetia when it ripened.

From all these things it is evident that all people in whom there is no knowledge of God are vain, and that the wisdom of this world with which this most renowned Varro was imbued is foolishness before God, as the Apostle says.

Therefore hell enlarged its soul and opened its mouth without limit, as Isaiah 5 says, receiving and holding forever all who worshiped something other than the one true God and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed forever.

§ IV. Valerius Maximus

Valerius Maximus published a distinguished work divided into nine books, containing many headings on the virtues, vices, and marvelous deeds of the ancient Romans and Greeks. The following few extracts are taken from it.

In the first book: "Divine anger indeed advances with a slow step toward vengeance for itself, and compensates for its delay by its gravity."

In the second book: "The passage from virtue to luxury is somewhat easier than that from luxury to virtue. The sweetness of life compels people both to do and to suffer many shameful things."

In the third book: "Virtue consecrated by public reverence does not need private praise."

Likewise, in the fourth book: "Nothing is so magnificent or so illustrious that it does not desire to be tempered by moderation. That power is safe which sets a limit to its own strength."

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Six (continued)

“A person is made rich not by possessing many things, but by desiring few.”

“Modesty is the parent of every honorable counsel, the guardian of solemn duties, the teacher of innocence, dear to neighbors, acceptable to strangers, displaying much that is favorable in every place and time.”

In the fifth book: “The sweetness of humanity penetrates even savage dispositions, softens the bereaved and fierce eyes of enemies, and finds a peaceful path among drawn swords. Under no bitterness of fortune and no squalor does the value of dear filial devotion grow cheap; indeed, its proof is the surer the more wretched it is.”

He gives the example of a certain matron who was imprisoned and was failing there from hunger. Her daughter visited her, and when she had been searched lest she bring any food to her mother, she replied: she nourished her for a long time only with milk expressed from her own breasts. When the judge considered and marveled at this, he freed the mother herself.

Valerius gives an almost similar example of another woman who nourished her imprisoned father, and adds: “The eyes of human beings fasten upon the sight and are astonished when they see the painted representation of this deed. The other virtues indeed earn much admiration, but filial devotion also merits the greatest love.”

And below: “For how rich in sweetness is this recollection: before I was born I dwelt in the same home, passed the time of infancy in the same cradle, and called the same persons parents. A wife is dear, children are sweet, friends delightful, and relatives pleasing. But no affection for those known afterward should arise that drains away the earlier affection.”

In the sixth book: “When Rutilius resisted an unjust request made by one of his friends and the man indignantly said, ‘What use to me, then, is your friendship if you do not do what I ask?’ Rutilius replied, ‘Indeed, what use to me is yours if I am going to do something dishonorable because of you?’”

In the seventh book: “That king of refined judgment who, they say, when a diadem was handed to him, held it for a long time and considered it before placing it upon his head, said: ‘O cloth more noble than happy! If anyone knew thoroughly how many anxieties, dangers, and miseries it is filled with, he would not wish to pick it up even if it lay upon the ground. For this sweetness lies close beside ruin.’”

In the eighth book: “Leisure indeed seems especially contrary to zealous industry, but it ought particularly to be joined to it--not so that virtue may disappear, but so that it may be refreshed. The nature of things does not permit a human being to endure continuous labor.”

“The ornaments of eloquence consist in suitable delivery and fitting movement of the body. When eloquence has equipped itself with them, it approaches people in three ways: by penetrating their ears, soothing their eyes, and invading their minds.”

In the ninth book: “Luxury is a seductive evil, which is sometimes easier to accuse than to avoid. Let it be inserted in our work, not so that it may receive any honor, but so that, recognizing itself, it may be driven to repentance.”

“Why should I speak further about women, whom both weakness of mind and the denial of aspiration to weightier tasks encourage to devote all their effort to the more elaborate cultivation of themselves, when I see men excellent both in name and spirit tumble into a byway unknown to ancient continence?”

“What is more foul than vices, or indeed more harmful? By them virtue is worn down, victories languish, sleeping glory is turned into infamy, and the powers of mind and body alike are conquered.”

“The passions of anger and hatred excite great waves in human breasts. The former is swifter in its onset, the latter more persistent in its desire to do harm. Each is full of consternation and never violent without tormenting itself, because when it wishes to inflict pain it suffers bitter anxiety lest vengeance fail to occur.”

“Now let treachery, a hidden and insidious evil, be drawn out from its hiding places. Its most effective powers are lying and deception, while its fruit consists in the commission of some crime, when the same evil, resolute in spirit, has enclosed cruelty within its wicked bonds. It brings as much harm to the human race as good faith supplies safety.”

§ V. Marcus Tullius Cicero

In the time of Octavian there also flourished Marcus Tullius Cicero, the most eloquent of the Latins. He was killed at Gayeta at the beginning of Octavian's rule, as was shown above.

As Augustine says in book 12 of The City of God, Cicero, wishing to define God as briefly as he could, said: “He is a certain mind, unfettered and free, separated from every mortal concretion, perceiving and moving all things, and itself endowed with everlasting motion.”

Jerome says of him in Against Jovinian: when Cicero was asked by Ircius to marry his sister after divorcing Terentia, he did not consent, saying that he could not devote himself at the same time to a wife and to philosophy.

Cicero wrote very many books, from which a very few extracts are set down here.

In the book On Duties he says: "We ought to know that all things produced on earth are created for the use of human beings, but that human beings were generated for the sake of human beings, so that they might be able to benefit one another. In this matter we ought to follow nature as our guide and bring common benefits into the midst."

"The foundation of justice is that no one be harmed, and next that the common benefit be served."

"Who does not see that one need not abide by promises which one has made when compelled by fear or deceived by fraud?"

"Injuries often arise from an overly subtle but malicious interpretation of the law. From this the saying 'the greatest right is the greatest wrong' has already become a well-worn proverb."

"Of all associations, none is more excellent or more secure than when good men who resemble one another in character are joined in familiarity. For nothing is more lovable and nothing more closely binding than a similarity of good qualities. Among those who have the same pursuits and the same desires, it comes about that one delights in another as in himself, and thus one is made from many."

"A common life and manner of living, counsels, conversations, exhortations, and sometimes even rebukes flourish especially in friendships. The most delightful friendship is that which similarity has joined together."

"Just as knowledge divorced from justice should be called cunning rather than wisdom, so too a spirit ready for danger, if it is driven by its own desire and not by the common benefit, has the name of rashness rather than courage."

"Those who will serve the republic should keep two precepts of Plato. One is that they should watch over the welfare of the citizens in such a way that they refer whatever they do to it, forgetting their own advantages. The other is that they should care for the whole body of the republic, lest while protecting one part they desert the others."

In his book On the Republic, Tullius introduces Scipio disputing about the republic and concluding, not--as some thought--that a republic cannot be governed without injustice, which is false, but that this is most true: a republic cannot be governed without the highest justice.

Lelius also confirmed this, saying: "Nothing is so hostile to a state as justice [read: injustice], and a republic can be conducted or remain standing only through great justice."

Scipio proves this through definitions of the two terms, namely "republic" and "people." He says that a republic is called the property of the people. A people is defined as an assembly not of every multitude, but of a multitude united by agreement concerning law and by a community of benefit.

From these things it is gathered that a republic and the property of a people exist when it is governed justly and well, whether under one king, under a few aristocrats, or by the whole people. He said that the rule of an unjust king is tyranny, that the rule of unjust aristocrats is faction, and he also calls the government of an unjust people tyranny.

This is evident because in those cases there is no assembly of a multitude united by agreement concerning law, since there is no law among them because there is no justice. Hence iūs, "law," is so called as though from iustum, "just." Nor is the true common benefit sought, but private benefit, namely that of the body and of temporal things, not of the soul.

He adduces a saying of the poet Ennius: "The Roman state stands by ancient customs and by men." He therefore concludes that in his own time the Roman republic was not the worst and most disgraceful republic, as Sallust described it, but that it had already perished and was nothing.

But as Augustine says in book 2 of The City of God, a republic never existed there before the faith was received, because true justice was never there. Although it was administered in some fashion by the more ancient Romans better than by the later ones, true justice nevertheless exists only in that republic whose founder and ruler is Christ, namely the Church of God.

Thus Augustine, who also says in Decretum, Cause 24, Question 1: "Where sound faith does not exist, justice cannot exist," because, as Abacuc says, "the just man lives by faith."

The same Cicero says: "Nothing is more praiseworthy or more worthy of an illustrious man than placability and clemency. These are nevertheless to be approved in such a way that severity is applied for the sake of the republic, without which a state cannot be administered."

"It is the duty of a foreigner and resident alien to do nothing beyond his own business, to inquire into nothing concerning another, and least of all to be meddlesome in a foreign republic."

“Let the speaker’s voice be sweet and not contentious, neither languid nor sing-song. Above all, let him consider the subjects about which he speaks: if serious matters, let him employ severity; if jests, charm.”

“I do not know how it happens that we perceive any fault more readily in others than in ourselves.”

“Because that very thing which we call seemly and honorable pleases us in itself and by its own nature moves the minds of everyone, we are therefore compelled by nature itself to love those in whom we perceive it to exist. This indeed is the weightiest cause of love.”

“So great is the power of justice that not even those who feed upon wrongdoing and crime can live without some portion of it. For unless even the chief of brigands distributes the booty equally, he will either be killed by his companions or abandoned.”

Catho wrote that Publius Scipio was accustomed to say that he was never less idle than when idle, nor less alone than when he was alone. It is a magnificent saying and worthy of a great and wise man, declaring that he was accustomed to think about business when at leisure and to converse when in solitude.

“Certainly, even if we could conceal our deeds from all human beings and gods, we must nevertheless do nothing avariciously, justly [read: unjustly], or lustfully.”

“Duties are especially thrown into confusion in friendships. Honors, riches, pleasures, and things of this kind that seem useful must never be placed before friendship. Nor will a good man do anything for a friend’s sake against the republic, an oath, or good faith, even if he is the judge of that very friend. For when he assumes the person of a judge, he lays aside the person of a friend.”

“If all things that friends desire are to be done, such bonds should be considered conspiracies, not friendships.”

“Every lie is to be removed from transactions. If buyer or seller comes to speak, let neither speak more than once.”

The same author says in the book On Friendship: “Friendship is nothing other than agreement in all things divine and human, together with goodwill and charity.”

“How can life be useful if it does not rest in the mutual goodwill of a friend? What is sweeter than to have someone with whom you dare to speak as with yourself?”

“Scipio used to say that nothing was more difficult than for a friend to remain until the final day of life.”

“There is no plague greater to friendships than greed for money among most people, and among all the best men rivalry for honor and glory, from which we see that the greatest hostilities have often arisen among the closest friends.”

“There is no excuse for sin if you have sinned for a friend’s sake.”

“Let this law of friendship therefore be established: that we ask honorable things from friends and do honorable things for the sake of friends. Let us rejoice to give true counsel freely, for in friendship the authority of friends who offer good persuasion is of the greatest force.”

“Let this also be established in friendship: that we neither ask for shameful things nor do them when asked. For this is a shameful excuse and must by no means be accepted if anyone admits that he acted against the republic for a friend’s sake.”

“Good men must therefore be instructed that, if through ignorance they should by some accident fall into friendships with the wicked, they should not think themselves so bound that they cannot withdraw from friends who sin against the republic. Nor should a lesser penalty be ordained for those who have followed another, the leaders of impiety.”

“I have no less concern for what the republic will be like after my death than for what it is like today.”

“Those who are superior ought to lower themselves in friendship and in this manner raise up those who are inferior.”

“The foundation of the stability and constancy we seek in friendship is good faith.”

“If God took us away from the company of human beings and placed us somewhere in solitude, supplying there an abundance of all the things nature desires but taking away the power to look upon a human being, who would be so iron-hearted that he could endure such a life, and from whom solitude would not take away the enjoyment of every pleasure? For nature loves nothing solitary.”

“The safety of anyone whose ears are so closed to truth that he cannot hear the truth from a friend must be despaired of.”

“Therefore, to admonish and to be admonished belong to true friendship: the one should be done freely but not harshly, and the other received patiently.”

“One must also know that there is no greater plague among friends than flattery, which is the vice of frivolous and deceitful people.”

The same author says in the book On Old Age: “The old age of a life lived quietly, purely, and honorably is calm and light, for the recollection of a well-lived life and of many good deeds is itself most delightful.”

“Rashness belongs to flourishing age, but prudence to advancing age. Hence anyone who wishes to read or hear about ancient events will find that the greatest republics were weakened by young men but supported or restored by old men.”

“Great affairs are conducted not by bodily strength or speed, but by counsel, authority, and judgment.”

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Six (continued)

“The speech of an old man is becoming when it is quiet and tremulous, and it often procures an audience for itself. The discourse of an eloquent old man is polished and gentle.”

“As for what people say--that old men, namely some of them, are foolish, credulous, forgetful, and dissolute--these are not the vices of old age, but of an indolent, slothful, and drowsy old age. For just as petulance or lust belongs more to young men than to old, yet not to all young men but to those who are wicked, so that senile foolishness which is called dotage belongs to old men, but not to all of them--only to the frivolous.”

“O splendid gift of age, if indeed it takes away from us that which is most vicious in youth, namely bodily lust! Pleasure, the enemy of reason, hinders counsel and dazzles the eyes of the mind; it has no fellowship with virtue.”

“The summit of old age is authority. Hence in the senate the opinion of each man who is more advanced in age holds the first place. Yet gray hairs and wrinkles cannot suddenly seize authority; rather, an earlier age honorably lived gathers the final fruits of authority.”

“A young man hopes in vain for the furthest reaches of life or promises himself that he will live a long time. For what is more foolish than to regard uncertain things as certain? Indeed, that age has many more occasions of death than old age, for young people fall into diseases more easily, are sick more severely, and are treated more painfully.”

“In this respect the old man is of a better condition: he himself has attained what the young man hopes for. Just as fruits, if unripe, are torn forcibly from trees, but if mature and fully ripened fall of themselves, so force takes life away from young people, as though violently, but ripeness takes it from old people.”

“Death which is followed by immortality should not be mourned. From youth onward we ought to have meditated upon disregarding death. Without such meditation no one can possess a tranquil mind, since it is most certain that we must die and uncertain at what time.”

The same author says in the book On Oratory: “Natural talent, because of its swift movements and its abundance for thinking and speaking, contributes the greatest power to action. But whatever offends in speaking also overshadows the things that deserve praise.”

The same author says in the Paradoxes: “There is nothing so incredible that it cannot be made probable by speaking, and nothing so rough and uncultivated that it cannot shine through oratory.”

“Just as no one who is wicked, foolish, and indolent can be well, so a good, wise, and courageous man cannot be miserable. Every wise man is free and every fool a slave. What is liberty? The power to live as you wish.”

In his book of Philippics: “The more the power of the mind exceeds that of the body, the graver are the evils conceived in the mind than those borne in the body. Therefore, the person who takes crime upon himself is more wretched than one compelled to endure another's crime.”

The same author says: “It belongs to any human being to err, but to no one except a fool to persist in error. For later thoughts, as people say, are customarily wiser. A change of counsel is the best harbor for one who is perishing.”

The same author: “Law is nothing other than right reason drawn from the divine power, commanding honorable things and forbidding their contraries.”

The same author: “Things badly gotten are badly scattered.”

The same author says in the book of Rhetoric: “Wisdom without eloquence profits little; eloquence without wisdom never profits and very often does excessive harm.”

“Although human beings are humbler and weaker than beasts in many respects, they appear to excel beasts most particularly in this: that they can speak. Therefore, he appears to me to have attained something splendid who excels human beings in that very respect in which human beings excel beasts.”

The same author says in the first book of Rhetoric: “There are six parts of a rhetorical speech: exordium, narration, partition, confirmation, refutation, and conclusion.”

“The exordium is a discourse suitably preparing the hearer’s mind for the remaining speech. This will happen if it makes him well disposed, attentive, and receptive. Goodwill is procured from four sources: from nature, from the person of our adversaries, from that of the judges, and from the cause itself about which the dispute is conducted.”

“We make our hearers attentive if we show that the things we are about to say are novel, important, and useful, and promise that we will set forth our cause briefly. We make them receptive if we explain the substance of the case clearly and briefly. When you wish to make a hearer receptive, you should make him attentive at the same time, for the person most capable of learning is the one prepared to listen most attentively.”

“Narration is an exposition of things done or as though done. It ought to have three qualities: it should be brief, credible, and clear. Yet the imitation of brevity deceives many, so that while they think themselves brief they are exceedingly long, because they strive to say many things briefly rather than few.”

“Partition makes the whole speech lucid and transparent. It has two parts. One shows what point is agreed upon with the adversaries and what remains in controversy; from it some definite matter is indicated upon which the hearer should keep his mind occupied. In the other part a distributed, brief exposition is given of the matters about which we are to speak. By it the hearer is enabled to retain definite matters in his mind and, when they have been stated, to understand that the speech will be finished. This partition ought to have three qualities: completeness, brevity, and paucity.”

“Confirmation is that through which argument adds credibility, authority, and support to our cause. Refutation is that through which the adversaries’ confirmation is dissolved, weakened, or diminished by argument. Conclusion is the end and termination of the entire speech.”

The same author says: “There are three kinds of things to be sought. One kind pleasantly attracts us to itself, capturing us by no advantage but drawing us by its own worth, such as virtue, knowledge, and truth. Another must be sought not for its own force and nature but for its fruit and usefulness, such as money. A third is joined from parts of the other two: it attracts us through pleasantness and worth and bears some usefulness before it, so that it is desired all the more, such as friendship.”

“In the first kind are honorable things, in the second useful things, and in the third are things that contain a part of honorableness and a part of usefulness. But they should be referred to the better part of the word and called honorable. From these things it follows that the divisions of things to be sought are honorableness and usefulness, while those of things to be avoided are shamefulness and uselessness.”

The same author: “The honorable has two parts, of which one is simple and the other mixed. That is, one is sought entirely for its own sake, while the other is sought in one part for its own sake and in the other for the fruit of usefulness. In the first kind, all things are embraced by one force and one name, virtue. For virtue is a habit of mind consonant with reason according to the manner of nature. It has four parts: prudence, justice, courage, and temperance.”

He next gives definitions of each one and of the virtues and their other parts, together with their definitions. All of these are treated more fully below in the treatise on the virtues.

“For their own sake, however, we must avoid not only those things contrary to the virtues—for example, cowardice contrary to courage and injustice contrary to justice—but also those which seem bordering and close to them. For a vice bordering upon every virtue is found: rashness upon confidence, obstinacy upon perseverance, superstition upon religion, and others of this kind.”

The same author says in the Tusculan Disputations: “No one would ever offer himself to death for his fatherland without a great hope of immortality. And somehow there inheres in minds a certain augury, as it were, of future ages. It exists and appears most greatly and readily in the greatest talents and loftiest spirits. If it were taken away, who would be so mad as always to live amid labors and dangers?”

“There is a Greek proverb: let each person practice the art that he knows.”

“Since we are accustomed to be inflamed to every desire by the torches of the body, we shall surely be blessed when, having left our bodies, we are free of desires and rivalries and devote ourselves entirely to contemplating and beholding things. For by nature there is also in our minds a certain insatiable desire to see the truth, which will especially enjoy that vision.”

“For there are seeds of the virtues innate in our talents. If they were permitted to grow, nature itself would lead us to the blessed life. But now, as soon as we are brought forth into the light and taken up, we continually dwell amid every kind of depravity and perversity of opinions, so that we seem almost to have sucked error with a nurse’s milk.”

The same author: "It is characteristic of foolishness to perceive the vices of others and forget one's own."

"Will is that which is desired with reason. For so the Stoics define it, and they think it exists only in the wise man. But that which is aroused more violently in opposition to reason is lust or unbridled desire, which is found in all fools."

The same author: "It is characteristic of the wise man to do nothing of which he might repent and nothing unwillingly, but to do everything splendidly, constantly, gravely, and honorably; to expect nothing as though it were certain to occur; to marvel at nothing when it occurs; and to stand by his own judgments."

"I plainly see that it was the opinion of the wisest men that law was not devised by human ingenuity, nor was it some decree of peoples, but something eternal that ruled the whole world through the wisdom of commanding and forbidding."

The same author says in the book On the Nature of the Gods: "Nothing is more lovable than virtue. Whoever has attained it will be loved by us wherever in the world he may be."

"If we refer friendship to our own benefit and not to the advantage of the person whom we love, it is not friendship but a kind of commerce in one's own advantages. Meadows, fields, and livestock are loved in this way."

The same author: "When we contemplate the heavenly things, what is so manifest as that there exists some divine power of the most excellent mind by which these things are ruled?"

"I call those men versatile whose mind turns swiftly."

The same author: "Ignorance of its cause creates wonder at a new thing, but a person does not marvel at what he sees frequently, even if he does not know why it happens."

The same author says in the book On Fate: "No external cause must be sought for voluntary movements of minds. For voluntary movement contains within itself the nature that makes it lie in our power and obey us."

The same author says in the book On the Creation of the World: "It is difficult to discover the parent of this universe, and when one has discovered him, it is unlawful to reveal him to the multitude."

The same author says in the dialogue Hortensius: "The common five lights, as it were, of speech are these: clarity, brevity, credibility, brilliance, and pleasantness."

The same author says in the Achademicis: "One ineptly teaches Minerva."

The same author: "He appears to have conquered victory itself who remitted to the vanquished the things he obtained by victory."

The same author: "Of the many virtues, none is more admirable or weightier than mercy, for human beings approach most nearly to the gods in no other way than by giving to human beings."

"Who was ever so cruel toward anyone that he would forbid him either to earn favor with himself or to make supplication to others?"

"The sustained practice of a man devoted to a subject often overcomes both talent and art."

Although this Cicero was most eloquent, he was nevertheless an unbeliever and erred in many things concerning the divine, especially by denying divine foreknowledge, as Augustine shows in book 5, chapter 9 of The City of God.

For it appeared to Cicero that human free choice could not remain intact if the infallible foreknowledge of God were presupposed. Therefore, to establish freedom of choice toward good or evil, he denied God's foreknowledge concerning human acts.

But Augustine, refuting him, shows clearly that God's infallible foreknowledge does not remove the freedom of the human will. Instead, both the foreknowledge of God and freedom of choice remain together and do not contradict one another.

This is also found in Decretum, Cause 23, Question 4, chapter Nabuchodonosor, together with the following chapter, and more fully in the First Part of Saint Thomas.

§ VI. Sallustius

Sallustius, a noble Roman citizen, was a contemporary of Tullius. He too was very eloquent, but he was an enemy of Cicero. Hence they wrote insulting invectives against one another, which is contrary to the teaching of Christians.

From this it is evident that all their labor was upon their own lips, for speaking ornately, and not for doing the things they taught. But, as Solomon says, "Their soul will not be enriched," namely with virtues; rather, they wandered poor and empty of the true virtues themselves.

Among other things, this was a common error of pagans who shone with worldly wisdom: they believed that by their own free choice, without the aid of God's grace, they could be truly virtuous. Yet Augustine says: "Where knowledge of eternal and immutable truth is absent, virtue is false even in the best virtues."

Sallustius wrote two books, namely Iugurthinum and Catellinarius, and a book of Histories, which is nevertheless not found. Some things are excerpted here from the foregoing works.

In Catellinarius he says: "Before you begin, deliberate--that is, take counsel. When you have deliberated, there is need of prompt action."

"Every excellent person prefers to act rather than to speak."

"All things obey virtue."

"Prosperous circumstances weary even the minds of the wise."

"Avarice subverts good faith, probity, and all the other good arts, and in their place it has taught pride and cruelty, to neglect God, and to possess all things."

"Avarice has zeal for money, which no wise person has loved or desired. Imbued, as it were, with evil poisons, it emasculates a manly body and mind. It is always boundless and insatiable; neither abundance nor poverty diminishes it."

"All mortals know the deeds of those who, endowed with great command, pass their lives in a lofty station. Thus in the highest fortune there is the least license."

"Many things made our ancestors great which are nothing among us: diligence at home, justice abroad, and a spirit free in deliberation, subject neither to wrongdoing nor to lust. In place of these things, however, we have luxury and avarice, public poverty and private opulence."

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Six (continued)

"There is no distinction between good and evil people. Ambition possesses all the rewards of virtue. At home they serve pleasure; abroad they serve either money or favor."

The same author says in The Jugurthine War: "To strive in vain and seek nothing by wearying oneself except hatred is the height of madness."

"Through concord small things grow; through discord the greatest things fall apart."

"There are many things which, although grievous, are nevertheless regarded as nothing through habit."

"Remember that envy follows glory. Therefore, the more distinguished you are or will be, the more anxious or solicitous you ought to be."

"It is better to be conquered in a good manner than to overcome an injury in an evil manner."

Sallust says in praise of the Romans who lived under the consuls after the kings had been expelled that right and good prevailed among them more by nature than by laws. Augustine proves in book 2, chapter 19 of The City of God that this was not true, because both in the time of the kings and in that of the consuls, even at the beginning, many unjust and evil things were done by them.

Although during that brief period when the expelled Tarquin sought to recover his lost kingdom with Porsenna's aid they were united and at peace with one another, this arose from fear of Tarquin, not from love of virtue. Hence immediately after his death, as though they no longer feared, great discords and jealousies arose between the plebeians and nobles, and even seditions.

Among other things, Sallust also says that the plebeians were oppressed by interest. Thereafter evils continually increased, together with innumerable slaughters.

§ VII. Virgil

Virgil the poet flourished in the time of Octavian. He died at Brundisium in the fifty-third year of his age, but his body was buried at Naples. He was born at Mantua.

He is commended by everyone for his books. Hence Augustine says in book 1 of The City of God: “Little children read Virgil for this reason: that the great poet, the most illustrious and best of all, may be drunk in during tender years and may not easily be erased by forgetfulness.”

Macrobius says of him that he was ignorant of no branch of knowledge. Juvenal compares him to Homer, saying: “The founder of the Iliad will be celebrated, together with the poems of high-sounding Maro, which make the palm of victory doubtful.”

When envious men objected to Virgil that he inserted the verses of others into his own work, he replied: “It belongs to men of great strength to wrest the club from Hercules’ hand.”

Virgil used to say that he fashioned verses in the manner and custom of a bear. For just as that beast brings forth shapeless and unformed offspring and afterward perfects and shapes it by licking, so the recent productions of his talent were crude, unfinished, rough, and imperfect. But afterward, by treating and cultivating them, he gave them, as it were, the lineaments of a face and countenance.

Many deeds are also reported of him as having been accomplished at Naples and Rome through the art of necromancy.

Juvenal shows that Virgil was intemperate through a most wicked vice when he says: “For if Virgil should lack a boy and tolerable lodging, all the hydras would fall from their locks.”

He published three books, as is evident in his epitaph: “I sang pastures, fields, and leaders”—that is, the Bucolics, Georgics, and Aeneid.

It should also be noted that Virgil was not as eloquent in prose as in composing verse. Hence Seneca says in book 3 of the Declamations: “Even great talents do not excel in more than one work. That felicity of talent abandoned Virgil in prose; his own eloquence deserted Cicero in poetry.”

As for the books attributed to Virgil and entitled Virgil on the Gnat and Virgil on Etna, Vincent says in book 7 of the Historical Mirror that this attribution is apocryphal.

Augustine says in book 10 of The City of God that certain things concerning Christ were prophesied by Virgil, such as:

*Now the final age of the Cumaean song has come;
a great order of ages is born anew.*

Virgil says in the Bucolics, with the following verse:

*Now a new progeny is sent down from high heaven.
Now the Virgin returns, the reign of Saturn returns.*

And this:

With you as leader, if any traces of our crime remain, made void, they shall free the lands from perpetual fear.

Jerome did not approve the claim that this was a prophecy about Christ. Rather, these things were spoken with another intention and about another person, but the sayings of a Virgilian cento were artfully adapted to Christ. Isidore confirms this.

Although what Jerome says is true, it can nevertheless stand together with what Augustine says: that Virgil spoke this prophetically, taking prophecy in a broad sense, as it is taken in John 11. There, when Caiaphas says in the council of the Jews, “It is expedient that one man die for the people,” and so forth, the Evangelist adds: “He did not say this of himself”—supply: but from the Holy Spirit—“because, since he was the high priest of that year, he prophesied that Christ was going to die for the nation,” and so forth, that is, for the salvation of the nations.

It is clear that Caiaphas did not say this with that intention, and yet he is said to have prophesied because the things he said were prophetic, although he himself did not understand them. It could therefore be said that the Holy Spirit made even pagans utter those things in order to foretell and signify the mystery of the Incarnation, although Virgil himself intended not this but something else.

The same Virgil says in the Bucolics: “Each person is drawn by his own pleasure.”

“From Jove comes the beginning.”

The same author:

You who gather flowers and strawberries growing upon the ground, flee, boys! A cold snake lies hidden in the grass.

“In the furrows to which we have often entrusted great barley, unlucky darnel and barren oats spring up.”

“We cannot all do all things.”

The same author: “The god rejoices in an odd number.”

“Love conquers all things; let us too yield to Love.” Add: and if this is so of worldly love, much more is it so of Christ’s love.

The same author says in the Georgics: “Persistent labor conquers all things, together with want pressing hard in difficult circumstances.”

“O exceedingly fortunate people, if they should know their own blessings!”

“Every best day of life is the first to flee from wretched mortals; diseases and sorrowful old age follow.”

“The older man, cold toward Venus, vainly drags along the thankless labor imposed upon him.”

“Enter upon the path of training while the minds of the young are pliant and their age is still changeable.”

The same author says in book 1 of the Aeneid: “Release your hearts from fear and shut harsh cares from your minds.”

In the second book: “Fury and anger cast the mind headlong.”

In the third: “To what do you not drive mortal hearts, accursed hunger for gold?”

In the fourth: “Fear betrays degenerate spirits.”

In the fifth: “Woman is always fickle and changeable”--that is, in what she says and thinks.

In the sixth:

Not even if I had a hundred tongues, a hundred mouths, and an iron voice could I comprehend every form of crime or run through all the names of punishments.

In praise of the Romans, he also describes what those who preside in government ought to do, saying:

*You, Roman, remember to govern the peoples with command.
These will be your arts: to impose the custom of peace, to spare the subjected, and to subdue the proud.*

He also sets down various punishments in another life for those who have sinned here. But Virgil erred in believing and saying that all punishments, whether inflicted by human or divine laws, whether in this life or after death, are applied for correction. The Platonists held this view, asserting also that no sins are unpunished.

Hence Augustine says in book 21, chapter 13 of The City of God: “From this comes that opinion of Maro.” After Virgil had said of earthly bodies and dying members that souls here fear, desire, grieve, and rejoice and, “shut within darkness and a blind prison, do not look up toward the breezes,” Maro himself--that is, Virgil--continued:

Indeed, even when life has left them with its final light-- that is, when on the final day this life leaves them,

*nevertheless, not all the evil, nor all the corporeal plagues, depart wholly from the wretched; and it is necessary that many things, long hardened deep within, grow strangely through manifold ways.
Therefore they are exercised by punishments and pay penalties for their ancient evils. Some are spread out empty, suspended to the winds; for others beneath a vast gulf
the stain of crime is washed away or burned out by fire.*

Thus Virgil.

Augustine adds there: “Those who hold these views think that after death there are no punishments except purgatorial ones.” But according to the truth of the faith, souls condemned after this life for mortal sins never escape those punishments and are not purified through them, but are tormented forever, according to Job: “In hell there is no redemption, but everlasting horror dwells there.”

And in the Gospel of Matthew, Christ says: “Whoever has blasphemed against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven, either in this age or in the future.” From these words Augustine and Gregory argue that some sins, such as venial sins, are purged by fire in the future, but that others, such as mortal sins, are expiated in no way, as is found in Distinction 25, section Alias, and in the chapter Qualis.

Augustine touches upon another error of Virgil in book 10, chapter 30 of The City of God, saying that Virgil appears to have spoken in the Platonic manner of purified souls being sent into the Elysian Fields--by which name, as though in a fable, the joys of the blessed appear to be signified--and being called to the river Lethe, that is, to forgetfulness of the past, so that, forgetful of the world above, they may revisit the vault of heaven and begin again to wish to return into bodies.

This rightly displeased the Platonist Porphyry, although he was a pagan. In truth, it is foolish to believe that from that life, which could not be most blessed unless it were most certain of its own eternity, souls would desire the corruption of corruptible bodies and return from there to these things, as though supreme purification brought it about that defilement should be sought.

For if that which is perfectly cleansed brings it about that souls forget all evils, but forgetfulness of evils produces a desire for bodies so that they may again be entangled in evils, then supreme felicity will surely be the cause of unhappiness, perfection of wisdom the cause of foolishness, and supreme cleansing the cause of uncleanness. Nor will a soul truly be blessed there as long as it is where it must be deceived in order to be blessed, for it will not be blessed unless it is secure.

§ VIII. Ovid

About the same time lived the poet Ovid, called Naso, who wrote many books in verse. A few moral verses from them are set down here.

In the book of Epistles: "The outcome proves the deeds."

"It becomes an art when a crime is learned from tender years."

"It is a virtue to have abstained from pleasing goods."

"Belief is customarily slow in great matters."

The same author says in the book without a title: "A burden becomes light when it is borne well."

"Night, love, and wine counsel nothing moderate. Night lacks shame; Liber and Love lack fear."

"Beautiful women play; she is chaste whom no one has solicited."

"Fool, what is sleep but the image of cold death?"

"What is permitted is unwelcome; what is not permitted burns more fiercely."

"I flee what follows me; I myself follow what flees."

"We always strive for the forbidden and desire things denied. Thus a sick man leans toward forbidden waters."

The same author says in the book The Art of Love: "The crop is always more fertile in another's fields, and a neighbor's livestock has a larger udder."

"An angry god is softened by a pleading voice."

"It is easy for a god to be able to do all things."

"There is no law more just than that the artificers of death should perish by their own art."

"There are as many characters in human breasts as there are forms in the world. The person who is wise will be suited to innumerable characters."

"There is no less virtue in preserving things acquired than in seeking them."

"Yield to the person who resists; by yielding you will go away the victor."

"It is a small virtue to keep silence about things; on the contrary, it is a grave fault to speak of things that must be kept silent."

"Accustom yourself to bearing badly what you bear; you will bear it well while the new branch grows together with the green bark."

"Believe me: gifts placate human beings and gods. Jove himself is placated by gifts."

"Believe one who has experienced it: do not believe quickly, for believing quickly may harm you. Procris will be no slight example for us."

The same author says in the book Remedies: "Resist beginnings; medicine is prepared too late when evils have strengthened through long delays."

"But hasten, and do not put yourself off to the coming hours. The person who is not ready today will be less ready tomorrow."

“The impatient spirit, not yet tractable by art, rejects the words of the one who admonishes and has hatred for them. I shall make a better approach when it will allow its wounds to be touched and will be fit for truthful words.”

“Who except a person bereft of reason forbids a mother to weep at the funeral of her son? This is not the time to admonish her. When she has shed her tears and filled her sick heart, that grief must be moderated with words.”

“Medicine has force at the proper times; wine given at the proper time helps, and wine given at an unsuitable time harms.”

“If you remove leisure, Cupid’s bow has perished, and his despised torches lie without light.”

“As the plane tree rejoices more in a stream than the poplar in water, and as the marsh reed rejoices in muddy soil, so Venus loves leisure.”

“Evils are neighbors to good things; under the very appearance of error, virtue has often borne accusations as a vice.”

“Let people live by the sun; let shade be pleasing in heat and water in thirst. Many things together help where individual things do not.”

The same author says in the book of the Metamorphoses:

*Although all other animals look downward upon the earth,
God gave the human being an uplifted face and ordered him to see heaven and raise an erect countenance toward the stars.*

“Riches, the incitements of evils, are dug out. Now harmful iron, and gold more harmful than iron, comes forth. War comes forth, which fights with both.”

“People live by plunder: no guest is safe from a host, nor a father-in-law from a son-in-law; harmony among brothers too is rare. A husband threatens the destruction of his wife, and she that of her husband. A son before his father seeks after his father’s years--or honors. Filial devotion lies conquered wherever the earth extends; fierce Erinys reigns.”

“You would think they had sworn themselves to wickedness, so greatly does guilt now reign everywhere.”

“It is tedious to enumerate. Hold between both extremes; you will go most safely in the middle.”

“Scarcely any power is long-lasting.”

“Alas, how difficult it is for a face not to betray a crime!”

“Pallor sits upon the face, and leanness is in the whole body. Nowhere is the gaze direct; the teeth are livid with rust. The breasts are green with bile; the tongue is suffused with venom. Laughter is absent except that which pains have produced. It does not enjoy sleep and wastes away while living.”

“Majesty and love do not agree well or remain in one seat.”

“A human being’s final day must always be awaited, and no one must be called blessed before death.”

“Love grew with time. The more it is concealed, the more the hidden fire seethes.”

“What does love not perceive? It is lawful to be taught even by an enemy.”

“A tearful beginning was followed by better fortune.”

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Six (continued)

“Souls lack death; all things flow. There is nothing in the whole world that persists. The times themselves also roll onward in ceaseless motion. No person’s hope remains his own, and nature, the renewer of things, restores one form from another.”

The same author says in the book of the Fasti: “Wealth gives honors; wealth gives friendships. The poor person lies neglected everywhere.”

“Haughtiness inheres in the beautiful, and pride follows beauty.”

“According as each person’s conscious mind is, so within the breast it conceives hope and fear according to its own deed.”

“A mind conscious of rectitude laughs at fame’s lies. But we are a crowd credulous toward vice.”

The same author says in the book of the Tristia: “As long as you are fortunate you will number many friends; if the times become cloudy, you will be alone.”

“If I had not sinned, what could you pardon? My fortune has given you material for forgiveness.”

“If Jupiter sent his thunderbolts whenever people sinned, he would be unarmed in a short time.”

“Perverse minds can corrupt all things. Nevertheless, all things are safe in their proper places.”

“No one can teach what he knows least.”

“I, the poet Naso, perished through my own talent.”

“There is a certain pleasure in weeping. Grief is filled by tears and goes out through them.”

“Glory goes by a steep path over a precipice.”

“As many grains as the sleep-bearing poppy has, as many beasts as the forest nourishes, and as many fish as swim in the water, I am pressed by so many adversities. The wise person patiently bears all bitter events.”

“Grief shut in strangles and seethes within, and is compelled to multiply its own powers.”

“A guest is cast out more shamefully than he is refused admission.”

“Long endurance of evils has conferred talent.”

“Glory gives no small strength to the spirit.”

“It is easy to be good where that which forbids one to be good has been removed.”

“Rare indeed is the virtue that fortune does not govern.”

“Fresh wounds recoil from hands brought near.”

“It is not always within the physicians' power that the sick person be relieved.”

“I do not know by what sweetness one's native soil draws everyone and does not permit them to be forgetful of it.”

“You see how leisure consumes a sluggish body, and how waters acquire corruption unless they move.”

Isidore says in the book On the Highest Good: “Christians are therefore forbidden to read the fictions of the poets because they excessively stir the mind toward the incitements of lust,” as is found in Distinction 37, chapter Ideo.

Ovid does this most particularly in his books. Therefore, his teaching ought most particularly to be avoided, except in a few moral sayings.

§ IX. Oratius

At that time there also flourished the poet Oratius, who died at Rome in the thirty-fifth year of the rule of Augustus Octavian, in the fifty-seventh year of his age. According to Vincent in the Historical Mirror, he is said to hold the first place among the Latin satiric and lyric poets.

He is called a poet of great gravity by Jerome, not because of the gratuitousness of his acts or morals, for he was most incontinent, but because of the gravity of his opinions.

He wrote books of Sermons, Epistles, and lyric Odes, and the Art of Poetry. A few of his sayings have been excerpted and follow here.

In the Art of Poetry:

*The boy who now knows how to return words and marks the ground with a sure foot delights to play with his peers, gathers anger and lays it aside rashly, and changes from hour to hour.
The beardless youth, once his guardian has at last been removed, rejoices in horses and dogs and the grass of the sunny field.
Pliable toward vice, harsh toward those who admonish him,
slow to foresee useful things and prodigal with money, lofty and desirous, he is swift to abandon the things he loved.*

“Many inconveniences surround an old man: either because he seeks things and, wretched, abstains from what he has found and fears to use it, or because he administers all matters timidly and coldly. He is a procrastinator, long in hope, sluggish, greedy for the future, difficult, querulous, a praiser of the time past when he was a boy, and a chastiser and censor of his juniors.”

“The bow will not always strike whatever it threatens.”

“Sometimes even good Homer nods.”

“What pleased once will please when repeated ten times.”

In his book of Epistles: “No one is so savage that he cannot grow gentle.”

“He who has begun well has half the deed.”

“The energetic merchant runs to the furthest Indies, fleeing poverty through the sea, through rocks, and through fires.”

“He despises what he sought and seeks again what he lately abandoned. He seethes and is inconsistent throughout the whole order of his life. He demolishes, builds, and changes square things into round.”

“The miser is always in need.”

“The envious man wastes away at another’s flourishing circumstances and beholds the other’s prosperity with tears. The Sicilian tyrants did not invent a greater torment than envy.”

“Anger is a brief madness. Rule your spirit: unless it obeys, it commands. Restrain it with reins; restrain it with chains.”

“A jar will long preserve the scent with which it was once imbued when new.”

“Citizens, citizens, money must be sought first; virtue comes after money. Queen Money gives a wife with a dowry, credit and friends, lineage and beauty.”

“Small things suit a small person.”

“Those who run across the sea change the sky, not their spirit.”

“The wicked hate to sin from fear of punishment; the good hate to sin from love of virtue.”

“Death is the final boundary line of things.”

“To have pleased leading men is not the least praise.”

“Virtue is a mean between vices, reduced from both sides.”

“Riches permit foolishness.”

“Often beware what you say about any man and to whom you say it. Flee the inquisitive questioner, for he is also a babbler. Once a word has been sent forth, it flies irrevocably.”

“Examine the sort of person you recommend and also consider carefully, lest another person’s faults soon strike you with shame.”

“For your own affair is at stake when the neighboring wall burns.”

“The sad hate the cheerful and the playful hate the sad; the swift hate the calm, and the active and energetic hate the relaxed. Drinkers, having drunk Falernian wine from the middle of the night, hate the man who refuses proffered cups, although.”

“Physicians promise what belongs to physicians; craftsmen handle the work of craftsmen. Learned and unlearned alike write poems everywhere.”

“One man often quarrels about goat’s wool.”

“There are those who consider nothing right except what has pleased themselves.”

“There is a mean in things, and finally there are fixed limits beyond and short of which the right cannot stand.”

“While fools avoid vices, they run into their contraries.”

“It is just to return pardon to one who seeks it for his sins. Again, let a rule be present that imposes equal penalties for sins.”

“Tender age is customarily treated more gently.”

“Virtue, fame, honor, divine and human things obey beautiful riches. The person who has heaped them up will be illustrious, courageous, just, and wise, and even a king and whatever he wishes.”

“Thirsty Tantalus catches at streams fleeing a little distance from his lips.”

“Alas, no one is born without vices; the best man is the one pressed by the fewest.”

All the aforesaid orators, poets, and historians, together with their emperor in whose time they shone in the world, were exterminated and descended to hell. For although through natural reason they knew God, they did not glorify him as God or give thanks. Instead, they became vain in their thoughts, saying, "Our lips belong to us; who is our lord?" They served the creature rather than the Creator, committing idolatry with the people.

Yet because truth, by whomsoever it is spoken, is from the Holy Spirit, as Ambrose says, the Spirit illuminated their intellect to recognize those things which they spoke truly and moved their tongue and hand to write them--not by dwelling within them through grace. Therefore, what is true and useful in them should not be despised, but their falsehoods and depraved morals should be detested together with them.

§ X. The Birth of Christ and the Blessed Virgin Mary

In the time of this Octavian our Lord Jesus Christ was born, namely in the forty-second year of his rule. Octavian also ruled afterward for twelve years, namely after Christ's birth.

Christ was born at a time when there was peace throughout the whole world. This had never happened from the death of Numa Pompilius, the second king of the Romans, until then. Rather, the Romans were always at war except during a single year, as is evident above.

The Romans, considering this and attributing it to Octavian's industry, wished to venerate him as a god. But the prudent emperor, understanding himself to be mortal, did not consent.

When the people were importunate with him about this, as Innocent III says, he summoned the Sibyl, a prophetess, wishing to learn through her oracles whether someone greater than he was to be born. Therefore, when on the day of the Nativity he had convened a council about this matter and the Sibyl was attending to her oracles in the emperor's chamber, at midday a golden circle appeared around the sun, and in its midst a most beautiful virgin carrying a child in her lap.

The Sibyl showed this to Caesar and said to him, "This child is greater than you; therefore adore him." A voice was also heard saying, "This is the altar of heaven." Hence that church at the place where Octavian's palace then stood, namely on the Capitol, which is now a church and convent of the Order of Friars Minor, is today called Saint Mary of the Altar of Heaven.

Orosius says of this: "In the time of Octavian, at approximately the third hour, a circle resembling a heavenly bow suddenly surrounded the orb of the sun in clear and pure, serene air, as though he were about to come who alone had made the sun itself and the whole world and would rule them." Eutropius says the same.

Innocent III also says that, when the Romans had possessed a great peace for twelve years under Octavian, they built a most beautiful temple in the city and called it the Temple of Peace. When they consulted Apollo about how long that temple would endure, the answer was: "Until a virgin gives birth."

Hearing this and believing it impossible, since it is certainly not possible according to nature, they had this carved upon its doors: "The Eternal Temple of Peace." But on the night when Christ was born it collapsed from its foundations. It was thereby shown that a virgin remaining in virginity had given birth, namely Mary.

That such great peace then existed in the world was not due to the industry of Octavian or of other human beings, but to divine dispensation, in order to indicate that he was being born who is our peace, who makes both one, and who had come in our flesh to make our peace with God.

The whole of this, namely that peace would also be possessed temporally, he had foretold through the Psalmist and the prophet Isaiah when they spoke of his coming.

First, however, something must be said briefly according to the history about the nativity of his mother. Something has been said by way of preaching about her virtues, dignity, and praises in the Third Part, under the title on the state of those comprehended, with respect to the different states; but it will be noted more abundantly, if life accompanies us, in the treatise on the gifts, under the title on the gift of piety.

The nativity, therefore, of the glorious Virgin arose from Abraham's seed, from the tribe of Judah, and from the illustrious stock of David; her glorious life illuminates all churches.

The Virgin's father was named Joachim, of the tribe of Judah, and her mother was named Anna. When they had remained barren for many years, they finally vowed that, if the Lord granted it, they would offer their offspring to God. Anna conceived the Virgin Mary, not indeed from the Holy Spirit, as some fools assert, but from Joachim in the human manner.

When she was conceived in the womb, she was not sanctified at that moment, since a soul--the subject of sanctification--did not yet exist there. But after the soul had been infused into the fully organized body, she was cleansed from original sin as quickly as possible after that infusion, not after several months as John the Baptist was. She was also cleansed more fully, so that she would be immune even from venial sins during life, a privilege believed to have been granted to no one else, according to Bernard and Augustine.

Because some hold that she was free even from original sin, although the ancients expressly say the contrary, and because the Church has determined neither position, one can hold either opinion without prejudice to salvation. But this subject is treated fully in the First Part, under the title on original sin.

Anna therefore first bore Mary, the Lord's mother, by Joachim. After he died, Anna married Cleophas, by whom she bore another daughter whom she also called Mary. She gave this second Mary in marriage to Alphaeus. By Alphaeus this Mary had four sons: James the Less; Joseph the Just, who was also called Barsabas; Simon; and Judas, or Thaddeus.

After Cleophas died, Anna married a third husband, Salome, by whom she bore a third daughter whom she likewise called Mary. This Mary married Zebedee and had two sons by him, namely John the Evangelist and James the Greater.

Hence these verses are given:

*Anna is customarily said to have conceived three Marys, whom the men Joachim, Cleophas, and Salome begot.
Joseph, Alphaeus, and Zebedee took them as wives.
The first bears Christ; the second, James the Less,
Joseph the Just, with Simon and Judas;
the third, James the Greater and winged John.*

It should also be known that Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist, was the Virgin Mary's cousin. For Elizabeth's mother, named Hismeria, was the full sister of Anna, the Virgin Mary's mother. Elizabeth is called the Virgin's kinswoman in the Gospel because she was related by blood in the way described.

Nor is this surprising, although Joachim and Anna are said to have been from the tribe of Judah and Elizabeth was of the tribe of Levi, as is evident in Luke 1, whereas according to the law everyone was obliged to take a wife from his own tribe and family. For the tribe of Judah and the priestly tribe of Levi were accustomed to intermarry with one another, and it was not considered contrary to the law.

Hence Aaron, the first high priest, also had a wife from the royal stock of David. It could therefore have happened, as Bede says, that a union of this kind arose in a more recent time, with women of the tribe of Judah being given in marriage into the tribe of Levi and conversely, so that the blessed Mary, who descended from the royal tribe of Judah, would manifestly be shown to have had blood kinship with those who were of the tribe of Levi.

Thus the blessed Mary was of both tribes. The Lord willed that these two tribes, namely the royal and the priestly, should be joined matrimonially to one another because of the mystery: to indicate that from them was to be born our Lord Jesus, true King and High Priest, who offered himself for us as a sacrifice to God upon the altar of the cross as an odor of sweetness, and who would rule his faithful as they valiantly exercised their warfare in this life and magnificently crown them in the next.

Hence he is also called Christ, which is Greek and is interpreted "anointed" in Latin.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Six (continued)

Only kings and priests were anointed. The faithful take their name from him, so that they are called Christians from Christ, as anointed persons from the Anointed One. God anointed him, namely Christ, with the oil of gladness--that is, with the Holy Spirit--above his companions, as is said in the Psalm.

Therefore, as is said in Peter's canonical epistle, Christians are "a chosen race, a royal priesthood." Giving thanks to God in the heavenly kingdom, they say: "You have redeemed us, O Lord our God, in your blood and have made us a kingdom for our God," and so forth.

Matthew in chapter 1 and Luke in chapter 3 of their Gospels describe the genealogy of the glorious Virgin and, consequently, of the Lord Jesus Christ her Son. He alone was conceived and born from her, not from the male seed of Joseph or another, but by the power of the Holy Spirit.

According to Jerome and Chrysostom, the genealogies described by the Evangelists end not in Mary but in Joseph her spouse because it was not the custom among the Jews to compose catalogues of generations, or genealogies, through women but through men. Hence, if an Evangelist had expressly composed Mary's genealogy, this novelty and unusual style would have roused the Jews to scandal.

Nevertheless, by composing Joseph's genealogy, he also implicitly and consequently traced Mary's genealogy. For since Joseph, in whom that genealogy ends, was Mary's spouse, as is evident in Matthew 1, it is thereby shown that the Virgin his spouse was also from the same genealogy and descended from the tribe of Judah and the family of David. According to the command of the law, everyone was required to take a wife from his own tribe and not from another, a rule which was then fully observed.

Joseph is called a son of David in Matthew 1 because he descended from him; therefore his spouse Mary was also of the house of David.

Chrysostom says that none of the holy women is placed in Christ's genealogy, but rather sinful women, to indicate that he came for the sake of sinners, as a physician to save and not as a Lord and judge to pass judgment.

Jerome says upon Matthew: "Our Lord Jesus Christ willed to be born not only from foreigners but even from adulterous unions, granting us great confidence that, in whatever manner we were born, so long as we imitate his footsteps, we shall not be separated from his body, whose members we have been made through faith." This is also found in Distinction 56, chapter Dominus.

Matthew and Luke differ in the manner of describing the Lord's genealogy. Matthew narrates by descending, from Abraham to Joseph, successively expressing three sets of fourteen generations through Solomon's line. Luke, however, describes seventy-seven generations by ascending from Joseph to Adam through Nathan's line.

The reason is that Matthew wrote his Gospel for the Jews. Nothing could delight converted Jews more than to hear that Christ descended from Abraham, to whom a promise had been made concerning him, and also from David, to whom Christ was also promised when it was said to him, "From the fruit of your womb I shall place one upon your throne."

Therefore, to make them more well disposed and attentive, Matthew made the Lord's genealogy, beginning from Abraham and David, the opening of his Gospel. He narrated it by descending because he intended to show Christ's humanity, through which God descended to us from heaven.

He placed three sets of fourteen to indicate that through this we are both incorporated into Christ and are his brothers through adoption if, with faith in the Trinity, we observe the ten commandments together with the four Gospels.

For the number fourteen is composed of ten and four. Fourteen multiplied three times reaches forty-two generations, through which one comes from Abraham to Christ. These signify forty-two degrees of virtues through which one reaches Christ, so that Christ may be generated in us through grace.

These acts of the virtues can be taken from the interpretation of the Hebrew names described in the genealogy itself. The first of them is Abraham, the father of faith, whose name is interpreted "father of many nations." For faith is the foundation and father of all foundations.

The last is Joseph, whose name is interpreted "increase," because the perfect person always seeks to increase in the virtues.

These degrees are also figured by the forty-two stations through which the children of Israel, after crossing the Red Sea, journeyed through the desert toward the Promised Land, which signifies the heavenly fatherland, just as the desert signifies this world.

Luke the Evangelist, however, produced the genealogy by ascending as far as God, because he reveals the form of the sacrament. Beginning there from Christ's baptism, he ascends as far as God, showing by this that the baptized ascend so as to be sons of God.

He sets down seventy-seven generations. That number, seventy-seven, signifies forgiveness, according to Matthew 18: "I do not tell you to forgive seven times, but seventy times seven." For in baptism all things are forgiven, even if there were all the sins of the seventy-seven generations from which Christ had descended.

Luke, moreover, was speaking not only to converted Jews but commonly to everyone, including the Gentiles. He therefore extends the genealogy as far as Adam, because all descend from Adam.

Matthew uses the term "begot" because he counts only sons by nature. Luke, however, says "who was," because he also includes sons made according to law or by adoption. Through this the disagreement which appears between Luke and Matthew concerning Joseph's father is resolved, for Matthew says that Joseph was the son of Jacob, while Luke calls him the son of Heli.

Augustine says in the book Questions on the Gospels that three explanations occur, one of which the Evangelist followed. Either one Evangelist named the father of Joseph by whom he was begotten, while the other set down either his maternal grandfather or someone among his elder kinsmen; or one was Joseph's natural father and the other his adoptive father; or, according to the Jewish custom, when one of two brothers had died without sons, the nearer relative took his wife and assigned to the dead kinsman the first son whom he begot from her, so that the child would be called his son. This was a certain kind of legal adoption.

Thomas says in the Third Part, question 31, that this third explanation is truer than the others. The gloss of Jerome upon Matthew also gives it, and Eusebius of Caesarea says in the Ecclesiastical History that it was handed down by Africanus the historian.

They say that Matthan and Melchi at different times each begot one son from one and the same wife, named Hescha. Matthan, who descended through Solomon, took her as his wife first and died after leaving one son, Jacob. After Matthan's death, because the law does not forbid a widow to marry another man, Helchi, who traced his lineage through Nathan to David and was from the same tribe but not the same family, took Matthan's widow as his wife and himself received from her a son named Heli.

Thus Jacob and Heli, arising from different lines of fathers, became uterine brothers, namely brothers from the same mother. One of them, Jacob, in obedience to the command of the law took the wife of his brother Heli, who had died without children, and begot Joseph. By natural descent Joseph was his own son, but according to the command of the law he was made Heli's son. Therefore Matthew says, "Jacob begot Joseph." But because Luke describes the legal generation, he names no one as having begotten him.

Although Damascene says that the blessed Virgin, Christ's mother, was related to Joseph according to the lineage in which Heli is called his father, because he says that she descended from Melchi, it must nevertheless be believed that she also drew her origin from Solomon in some manner through those fathers whom Matthew enumerates. Matthew appears to have narrated Christ's generation according to the flesh, especially since Ambrose says that Christ descended from the seed of Jeconiah. Thus Thomas in that place.

The most blessed Mary was therefore that perfectly straight branch which came forth from the root of Jesse, David's father, as was foretold by Isaiah. She was also the star of the sea--for so her name is interpreted--of whom Balaam said: "A star shall arise out of Jacob," and so forth.

Her father Joachim was a native of the city of Nazareth, and her mother Anna was from Bethlehem. Their life, as is read in a certain little book translated from Hebrew into Latin by blessed Jerome and entitled On the Nativity of Blessed Mary--which, although apocryphal, contains things consonant with reason--was simple, upright, and pious.

They divided all their substance into three parts. They offered one part to the temple and its servants, distributed the second to the poor and to pilgrims, and reserved the third part of their income for the support of themselves and their household.

Thus, just before God and pious toward human beings, for about twenty years they conducted a chaste marriage at home without the procreation of children. They vowed that, if the Lord gave them offspring, they would consign it to his service.

On one occasion, at the Feast of the Dedication, Joachim ascended to the temple in Jerusalem and stood with his offerings among his fellow citizens and fellow tribesmen who had children. Issachar the high priest scorned him together with his gifts, saying that the gifts of one whom he judged unworthy of offspring could not appear acceptable to God, and that the man who left no seed upon the earth was accursed.

Confounded by this reproach cast upon him, Joachim withdrew to his shepherds in the pastures. He did not dare to return home lest his fellow citizens mark him with the same reproach of sterility.

One day an angel of the Lord appeared to him with a great light and comforted him in his terror, saying: "Do not fear, for I am an angel sent by the Lord to announce to you that your prayers have been heard by God and your alms are pleasing to him. The reproach of sterility has not rightly been cast upon you; rather, sterility, or the abasement caused by delayed offspring, is recompensed and sometimes exalted by the nobility of the child who follows, as is evident in Sarah and Rachel."

"Behold, your wife Anna will bear you a daughter, and you will call her Mary. From infancy, as you vowed, she will be consecrated to the Lord and will be filled with the Holy Spirit from her mother's womb, namely through sanctification. Her continual dwelling will be in the Lord's temple. Just as she herself will be born wonderfully from barren Anna, so, incomparably, the Virgin will generate the Son of the Most High."

An angel of the Lord also appeared to Anna while she was anxious about her husband's return and comforted her with a similar revelation. Each, moved from his own place at the angel's command, met the other at the Golden Gate of Jerusalem. They disclosed their visions to one another and rejoiced together, giving thanks to God.

After they returned home and devoted themselves to marital union, the most blessed Mary was conceived from them and born.

When she had been weaned, her parents, striving to fulfill their vow, brought her at the age of three to the Lord's temple in order to dedicate her to God. There were fifteen steps by which one ascended to the temple--that is, to the altar of holocausts in the temple's outer court, where sacrifices were offered.

Her parents placed the girl upon the lowest step while they clothed themselves in more ceremonial garments. The most blessed Mary, though three years old, ascended all those steps by herself without anyone's aid, so that nothing seemed lacking to her perfect age. This signified that in mind she had already ascended the fifteen degrees of perfection signified in the fifteen Gradual Psalms, which were recited by the priests as they ascended to the temple. Nicholas of Lyra briefly gives their application in his commentary upon the Psalter.

When the sacrifice had been celebrated, her parents left their daughter in the temple to be guarded with the other virgins and returned home.

In ancient times it was unknown when, or on what day, the Virgin's nativity had occurred, and therefore it was not solemnized by the Church. But as Vincent relates in book 7 of the Historical Mirror, a certain holy man living a solitary life repeatedly perceived a great harmony in heaven on that day each year. When he desired to know the reason, an angel revealed that this occurred because the Lord's mother had been born on that day.

When this became known, the Church instituted the celebration of the feast of her Nativity. Later, Innocent IV instituted its octave. Hence Bernard says: "Blessed Mary was holy before she was born, for she would not be celebrated with festive praises if she had not been born holy."

§ XI. Mary's Life and Conduct in the Temple

Concerning her life and conduct while she remained in the temple, a certain little book, though apocryphal, says that she established this rule for herself: from morning until terce she devoted herself to prayer; from terce until none she occupied herself with work at the loom; from none onward she did not withdraw from prayer until an angel of the Lord appeared to her and brought her food from heaven for her sustenance.

Whatever the ministers gave her, she returned to be distributed to the poor. All her speech was full of grace, so that God was recognized upon her tongue, and she persevered in searching the law of God.

She was solicitous for her companions, lest any one of them should sin even in a small thing or become domineering or proud toward another companion. She blessed God without interruption. Lest perhaps she be withdrawn from the Lord's praises by returning a greeting, if anyone greeted her, she answered "Thanks be to God" in place of a return greeting.

Although she was more beautiful in body than all other women, such purity and such honor shone in her face that even the most unchaste men who looked upon her were not only not incited to desire her, but were urged and pierced in heart toward chastity and modesty.

Fourth Title: On the Fifth Age of the World

Chapter Six (continued)

That blessed Mary was immune from every actual sin is evident from the words of Augustine in the book On Nature and Grace: "With the exception of the holy Virgin Mary, concerning whom, for the honor of the Lord, I wish to raise absolutely no question when sins are discussed."

"For we know that more grace was bestowed upon her to conquer sin on every side, since she merited to conceive and bear him who, it is agreed, had no sin. With this Virgin alone excepted, if all the holy men and women had been asked while they lived here whether they were without sin, they would all have answered with one voice what John says: 'If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves.'" Thus Augustine.

He is speaking of venial sins. This should not be understood to mean that a holy person cannot find himself free even from venial sin for some brief period. Rather, he cannot remain so for a long time without falling into some sin, because although we can avoid individual sins, we cannot avoid them all, according to Thomas in the Summa.

Accordingly, when Mary's father and mother had left her in the temple, the Lord took her up, and she advanced daily in grace. When she had reached the age of fourteen years, the high priest admonished her and the other virgins that they should return to their own homes, or those of their parents, and devote themselves to marriage.

Although the other virgins gladly agreed, the Virgin Mary alone resisted as though the command were contrary to her, saying that she could not obey it because she had vowed virginity to God.

The high priest was anxious and perplexed about this matter, both because the law commanded that a vow be fulfilled and because, on the other hand, the custom at that time was contrary to anyone's preserving virginity rather than devoting herself to carnal propagation. He judged it fitting to consult a divine oracle concerning these matters.

Without delay, as all listened at God's propitiatory, it was heard that the prophecy of Isaiah should be consulted to determine to whom the Virgin should be betrothed, namely: "A branch shall come forth from the root of Jesse, and a flower shall ascend from his root, and the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him."

The high priest therefore ordered all men of David's family who were fit for marriage to bring their rods before him at the altar. When this was done and Joseph brought forth his rod among the others, the rod itself immediately budded and flowered, and a dove was seen to settle upon its summit.

By this sign it was shown that the Virgin was to be betrothed to Joseph. After she had been betrothed to him, she was therefore led to the home of her parents or of Joseph. For it was then customary for betrothed women sometimes to enter and remain in the homes of their spouses, preserving all honor and virginity until the wedding day.

§ XII. Mary's Betrothal and Vow

Although the Virgin could have been betrothed to Joseph through the sign and manner described above, this account is not authentic. It is, however, most certain that she was betrothed to Joseph, as the Gospel attests.

Matthew 1 says, "When Mary, the mother of Jesus, had been betrothed to Joseph," and Luke 1 says, "The angel Gabriel was sent to the Virgin Mary, betrothed to Joseph." From these words it is also evident that she was betrothed before Christ's conception.

The doctors assert that she also made a vow of virginity. But as to whether it was before or after her betrothal, Augustine appears to say that she vowed inwardly before her betrothal but afterward expressed it with her mouth.

For he says, as is found in Cause 27, Question 2, section 1: "Blessed Mary had resolved in her heart that she would preserve a vow of virginity, but she did not express the vow of virginity itself with her mouth. She subjected herself to divine disposition when she resolved that she would persevere as a virgin unless God revealed otherwise to her."

"Committing her virginity, therefore, to divine disposition, she consented to carnal union, not by desiring it, but by obeying divine inspiration in both respects. Afterward, however, she bore a son and, together with her husband, expressed with her lips what she had conceived in her heart; and each remained in virginity." Thus Augustine.

She therefore consented to the conjugal state with Joseph when God revealed it, because she had vowed in this manner. It was also revealed to her that she would not be known by that man.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One

According to some, the sixth age of the world began in Christ Jesus from his Nativity, which occurred in the forty-second year of the rule of Augustus Octavian and in the 5,199th year from the beginning of the world according to the Septuagint and Bede, but in the 3,865th year according to the Hebrews and Jerome.

According to others, the sixth age of the world begins from Christ's baptism, because at that time regenerative power was bestowed upon the waters in baptism. According to others, it begins with his Passion, when the door of paradise was opened.

Both his baptism and Passion occurred under the emperor Tiberius, Octavian's immediate successor.

Our Lord Jesus, having assumed flesh, descended from the royal and priestly tribes through patriarchs, priests, and kings. He is a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek and a high priest of the good things to come, entering the Holy of Holies by his own blood; and he is King of kings and Lord of lords, as is said in the Apocalypse.

In him the Christian empire and the supreme pontificate have their origin and true foundation, as is said in Distinction 10, chapter Quoniam idem mediator, in the text and gloss.

Just as there are two great lights in the firmament, the greater sun and the lesser moon, so in Christ the pontificate was established as the greater light and the empire as the moon. As the moon is illuminated by the sun, so the empire is instructed and directed by the priesthood, as is stated in Distinction 96, chapter Duo sunt.

In this chapter, therefore, Christ's life and miracles will be treated according to the Evangelists' narration, with their chapters cited, and afterward the supreme pontiffs, emperors, and notable deeds of their times.

Our Lord Jesus was born from the Virgin Mary on Sunday, as Vincent says in the Historical Mirror. On that day light arose for those dwelling in the region of the shadow of death, as Isaiah 9 says. On that day God said at the beginning of the world, "Let there be light," and light was made, as is stated in Genesis 1.

For as Pope Leo says, "On this day, namely Sunday, the world took its beginning, death received its destruction, and life received its beginning," namely through the Resurrection, as is found in Distinction 75, chapter Quo die.

Every creature, even heavenly creation, marvels at this mystery, Jerome says. The oracles of the prophets and predictions of the Sibyls foretold it.

For it is said in Jeremiah: "The Lord will make a new thing upon the earth: a woman shall encompass a man." It is indeed new beyond all novelties that Mary should encompass in the womb, by conceiving, a man perfect in every grace and glory, receiving him not from a human source but from the Holy Spirit.

Isaiah 66 also says: "Before she was in labor, she gave birth; before her delivery came, she bore a male. Who ever heard such a thing, and who saw anything like it?"--as though to say, no one.

For before Mary labored, before the doorway of her modesty was opened--which was never opened but was always closed forever, like the gate in the Lord's house through which the Lord alone entered and went out, as the prophet Ezekiel saw in spirit and foretold--Mary bore her firstborn son with the seal of her virginity preserved, just as, when risen, he came forth from the closed tomb with the priestly seal preserved.

Who heard or saw anything like this? Certainly no one. Bernard says that in this mystery things were joined together: God and man, mother and virgin, faith and the human heart. There never was and never will be anything similar.

Hence Maximus says in a sermon on the Nativity: "Our fathers indeed saw marvelous and innumerable works of God. Heaven rained angelic foods for them; the hardest rock supplied sweet drinks; the strongest wall of their enemies fell at the blare of trumpets; the river Jordan turned its perpetual course back toward its source; and the sun, having delayed in heaven, granted victory to the people fighting."

"But it was granted to none of them to see this: that the Only-Begotten of the Most High, whom the trembling powers of the archangels receive, would show himself to human beings as a human being." Thus Maximus.

"All these things happened to them in a figure," as 1 Corinthians 10 says. Because light is more excellent than shadow and truth than figure, if that which you admire is the shadow, how much more must that of which it is the shadow be admired? Thus Ambrose, in On Consecration, Distinction 2, chapter Revera.

The aforesaid marvels prefigured the marvels accomplished through Christ's Nativity. God gave the human race from heaven the dew of divinity and an abundance of every perfection from the richness of the earth, that is, from Christ's human nature.

The rock, which is the most steadfast Christ, offered the people sweet drinks of doctrines and sacraments. At the trumpet of the apostles' preaching, which went out into all the earth to announce this mystery, the walls of vices fell.

The Jordan of the sensitive power, which flows downward toward things to be desired and toward death, turned itself back toward seeking higher things and life. The Sun of Justice, delayed in the airy heaven upon the cross, triumphed against the powers of the air.

"This is the day the Lord has made; let us exult and rejoice in it," says the Psalmist. Ambrose expounds this concerning Christ's Nativity: "For human nature assumed by the Word is wholly day, knowing neither the sunset of sin nor the darkness of ignorance. The Lord Trinity made that day--that flesh and soul and their union with the Word."

"Therefore, let us exult in body by singing praises and psalms; let us rejoice by exulting in mind." Hence Pope Leo also says in a sermon: "Our Savior is born today; let us rejoice. No one is excluded from the gladness of this day. Let the just person exult because he is invited to the palm; let the sinner rejoice because he is called to pardon; let the Gentile take courage because he is summoned to life."

Hence Faustus says in a sermon on the Nativity: "Lead forth, faithful people, your most festive joys, for today a new thing which was once promised has been completed for us. The Maker of the world enters the narrowness of a human womb. An untouched mother becomes pregnant, and behold, like a bridegroom from his chamber, Christ proceeds from Mary's womb."

"O new and unheard-of mingling! O marvelous and unsearchable joining! God and man, Word and flesh, are united. No created intellect and no science can grasp so ineffable a mystery."

As another says: "Nature does not possess it; experience does not know it; reason does not comprehend it; the mind does not grasp it; speech is silent; talent grows dull; earth is astonished; heaven trembles; creation marvels; all things keep a profound silence, and on this day they are fulfilled."

Alan says in the Anticlaudianus:

*The force of logic is banished; all judgment of rhetoric perishes, and reason totters, so that night shines and the sun grows dark in eclipse.
The true Sun grows weak so that he may lead the stars back to their rising.
The physician falls sick that he may heal the diseased patient.
Heaven joins itself in covenant with earth: cedar with hyssop,
the giant himself with the smallest, king with servant,
rich man with pauper, purple with sackcloth.*

Thus Alan.

Likewise another says:

*Heaven is enclosed in a potsherd; the world is held in a fist.
The sphere is encircled by its center; the circle lies in its center.
The stream exceeds its source; the potter comes forth from the vessel.
The eternal Sun is obscured; light and life are darkened.
He who bears every creature is borne;
he who bears the care of all is governed.
The diameter of the infinite joins itself to a parallel side.
The Word becomes an infant of a girl and is silent;
standing above, he lies below; he is silent and thunders in the clouds.*

Thus he.

§ I. The Gospel Narratives Begin

Matthew describes the genealogy of Christ's generation according to his humanity at the beginning of his Gospel, beginning it with Abraham and ending it with Joseph, the husband of Mary, from whom Christ was born.

John the Evangelist, however, began his Gospel from Christ's eternal generation according to divinity, saying, "In the beginning was the Word," and from there descended to his temporal generation according to humanity, saying, "And the Word was made flesh."

Luke begins his Gospel from the conception of Christ's precursor, namely John the Baptist. It was announced to his father Zechariah in the temple by the archangel Gabriel on the Feast of Propitiation, when entry was made into the Holy of Holies.

Gabriel foretold John's name, his sanctification in the womb, the austerity of his life, and his office of preaching. Because Zechariah doubted and asked for a sign, he received a sign by being made mute until John's birth.

After Zechariah returned to his home, his barren wife Elizabeth conceived John the Baptist by him.

Note that Zechariah was chosen by lot to place incense in the temple. From this it cannot be argued that lots are lawful. For as Master Gratian says in Cause 26, Question 1, chapter His ita: "Before the Gospel became clear, many things were permitted which, in the time of a more perfect one, as of Zechariah or of blood relations, was prohibited neither by legal nor by evangelical or apostolic authority. It is nevertheless forbidden by ecclesiastical law."

Thus the use of lots was permitted in the Old Testament, as is evident there, but lots were prohibited by the Church lest the faithful return to the rites of idolatry under the appearance of divination, especially in ecclesiastical elections.

In the sixth month after John's conception, the angel Gabriel was sent by God to Nazareth, a city of Galilee, to the Virgin Mary betrothed to Joseph.

When Mary was terrified by the angel's greeting, "Hail, full of grace, the Lord is with you; blessed are you," and so forth, the angel comforted her and announced that she would conceive the Son of the Most High.

The Virgin asked him, not because she doubted the word announced to her as Zechariah had, but so that she might hear the manner of this conception, for she said, "I do not know a man"--that is, "I have resolved that I shall not know one," as is expounded in Cause 27, Question 2, section 1.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

The angel answered by explaining the manner: she would conceive not by human seed, but through the operation of the Holy Spirit. He adduced as an example the conception of the barren Elizabeth, which had been hidden from Mary, not to make her believe as though she had been doubtful, but to heap joy upon joy and to make the young woman think of service to the old woman, namely at Elizabeth's delivery.

Then, when Mary said, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; let it be done to me according to your word," in that moment the Word was made flesh. From the Virgin Mary--that is, from her purest blood--the matter of Christ's body was formed and at once distinguished into the lineaments of all its members. A soul newly created by God was infused into that body and united to the Godhead, filled with all grace, wisdom, and glory. All these things occurred together in an instant.

After conceiving, Mary arose and went into the hill country to Zechariah's house. When she greeted Elizabeth, the infant John leapt miraculously in Elizabeth's womb. With his use of reason hastened, as is said, he recognized the Savior's advent in the Virgin's womb and revered him. He was then sanctified from original sin, that is, cleansed.

Elizabeth, too, through a revelation made to her concerning the Word of God conceived in the Virgin, exclaimed that this merit and grace had befallen her: that the mother of the Lord had come to visit her. The most blessed Virgin, seeing that the mystery hidden from everyone was now being made manifest, was filled with a fervent spirit and poured herself out in incomprehensible thanksgiving, singing that most devout canticle, "My soul magnifies the Lord," and so forth.

Mary remained with Elizabeth for three months, namely until John's birth, which, as is piously said, she awaited. When Elizabeth then gave birth to John, all her neighbors and relatives rejoiced with her. On the eighth day they came for the child's circumcision. Although he had been cleansed from original sin through sanctification in the womb, it was nevertheless fitting that he should be circumcised so as to conform to the others of that people.

A pious dispute arose between his relatives and his mother about the imposition of a name. His mother wished him to be called John, but the others refused and sought to give him another name. When they approached his father Zechariah for a decision, he asked by a sign for a writing tablet and wrote, "John is his name." Immediately the mouth of him who had been mute was opened, and he prophesied, declaring the mystery of the Incarnation that had until then been secret and saying, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel," and so forth. Everyone marveled at this, and it was reported throughout the region.

After John was born, Mary returned to her own home, and Joseph perceived that Mary, his betrothed, was pregnant. Since he was just and knew that he had not known her, yet did not wish to expose her--that is, to accuse her, according to Augustine in Cause 2, Question 1, chapter Si peccaverit--and since he did not believe that one so holy and chaste had committed adultery, he resolved to dismiss her.

But an angel revealed to him in a dream that he should not fear to receive her, because she had conceived by the Holy Spirit a son whom he was to call Jesus, because he would save the people. “Do not fear to receive Mary your wife.” Chrysostom explains “receive” as “retain in your house.” He already had her at home according to the ancient custom by which betrothed women were kept in their spouses’ homes with all chastity, but he had already dismissed her in his mind. This is found in Cause 27, Question 2, chapter Priusquam.

“Your wife,” Origen explains, means: “the woman betrothed to you, whom I nevertheless call your wife--not because of a union accomplished or yet to come with you, but so that I may conceal her virginity from the devil and not destroy the institutions of the law.” This is found in Cause 27, Question 2, chapter Inventam.

Gregory says: “The Lord wished Mary to have a betrothed before his birth, although he did not attain to marriage with her. For just as the disciple Thomas, by doubting and touching, became a witness of the true Resurrection, so Joseph, Mary’s betrothed, became the guardian of her wholly inviolate virginity.” This is found in Cause 27, Question 2, chapter Sic quippe.

§ II. Christ’s Nativity, Circumcision, and Presentation

When a decree went out from Caesar Augustus, that is, Octavian, that the whole world should be enrolled, this meant those who were subject to the Roman Empire, for the whole world without qualification was never subject to anyone. The decree ordered everyone to go to the city from which he drew his origin, so that each might be enrolled there and pay a silver denarius in acknowledgment of subjection to the emperor.

Mary and her betrothed Joseph, to provide an example of obedience to superiors even when they are pagans, went from Nazareth to Bethlehem, the little city from which David had arisen and from whom they themselves were descended. Because many people had gathered there and, being poor, they found no house to receive them, they entered a certain lodging place: not a habitable dwelling, but a place to which people resorted in rainy weather or to converse together.

There, at about midnight on Sunday, Mary gave birth--not with pain like other women, but with supreme joy incomprehensible to us--in accordance with Isaiah’s words, “Budding, it shall bud with rejoicing and praise.” Just as the earth produces plants without being opened, so she bore her firstborn son: not one after whom other sons were born, but one before whom there was none, that is, her only-begotten. Immediately after bearing him, she adored him.

There was no midwife there, no maidservant, and no nurse, as Jerome says. The Virgin alone suckled him at a breast full from heaven. She wrapped him in cloths and laid him in a manger between an ox and an ass, as is commonly said. This agrees with Abachuc 3: “In the midst of two animals you shall be made known.” The newborn child was warmed by the animals’ warm breath.

An angel of the Lord appeared with a great light to shepherds keeping watch over their flocks in that region and announced the birth of the Savior of the world. At this there was heard a multitude of the heavenly army with him, praising God and saying, “Glory to God in the highest,” and so forth.

Speaking to one another, the shepherds said, “Let us go over to Bethlehem and see this word that has come to pass, which the Lord has made and shown to us.” They came in haste and saw the infant with his mother. Nor is Joseph believed to have been absent, since he enjoyed so great a mystery of the newborn child. After adoring him, the shepherds returned to their own affairs, glorifying God and spreading word of what had happened.

Mary preserved all these words, pondering them in her heart. As Bede says, she compared what she knew the prophets had foretold about the Son of God and her son with the things she saw fulfilled in him each day. She committed them to memory so that, at the proper time, she might disclose them to the apostles and evangelists who had not been present at these events.

On the eighth day after his birth the child was circumcised, and his name was called Jesus. Here Gratian says, in Cause 25, Question 1, final section, that Christ both gave the law and himself fulfilled it carnally: he was circumcised on the eighth day and presented in the temple on the fortieth, so that in his own person he might sanctify it. Later, to show himself Lord of the law, he cleansed a leper by touching him, contrary to the letter of the law. Many reasons are assigned for his circumcision, although he had no need of it, but this is not the place to discuss them. Thus Luke.

§ III. The Magi and the Presentation in the Temple

On the thirteenth day after his birth the Magi--that is, wise men foremost in astrology and kings--came from the East to Jerusalem, led by a star that had appeared to them either on the very day of the Nativity, as is commonly said, or on that same date in the preceding year. Believing that a child so excellent, whose birth had been revealed to them, had been born there, they asked, “Where is he who has been born King of the Jews?”

When Herod, king of Judea, heard this, he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him. He gathered those learned in the law and asked them about the birthplace sought by the Magi. When it was explained to him from Micah’s prophecy that it was

Bethlehem--“And you, Bethlehem, land of Judah,” and so forth--he pointed out the place to the Magi and urged them to make the child known to him when they had found him. He pretended that he wished to adore the one whom he intended to kill.

After leaving Jerusalem, they saw again the star whose sight they had lost upon entering the city. The star went before them until it reached the place where the child had been born and stood still there. From this they recognized that the child whom they found with his mother Mary was true God, and they adored him. Each offered gifts--there are said to have been three of them, Caspar, Balthasar, and Melchior--of gold, frankincense, and myrrh.

According to Bernard, the gold was for relief of poverty, the frankincense to remove the stable's stench, and the myrrh to strengthen the child's limbs. According to Leo, gold signified royal power, frankincense divine majesty, and myrrh his mortality. By these gifts they professed what they believed about him; or they honored him as the author of all philosophy or wisdom, which is divided into natural, moral, and rational philosophy, according to Gratian in Distinction 37.

After adoring him, they were warned in dreams not to return to Herod and went back to their own country by another road. Augustine says that interpreters of the stars--that is, of the constellations under which people are born--were then called Magi but are now called mathematicians. We read in the Gospel of those who announced Christ's birth; knowledge of their art was permitted until Christ, so that after Christ appeared no one should thereafter interpret any person's birth from the heavens. This is found in Cause 26, Question 3, chapter Igitur genus.

On the fortieth day Christ was presented in the temple by Mary and Joseph according to the law of purification. A pair of turtledoves or two young pigeons were offered for him in sacrifice, and he was redeemed for five silver shekels. The aged Simeon recognized the Savior when he was presented in the temple, took him in his arms, blessed God, and said, “Now you dismiss,” and so forth. Restoring him to his mother, Simeon prophesied concerning him: “Behold, this child is set for the fall,” and so forth, and that the sword of his Passion would pierce her soul.

Anna the prophetess, who was eighty-three years old and remained continually in the temple, also recognized him and made him known to others. Faithful women still observe this custom by not entering a church for forty days after giving birth. They do this not because it was commanded in the Old Law, for that would be to Judaize, but from a certain reverence toward the church. Yet, as Gregory says in Distinction 5, if a woman wishes to enter a church in the very hour in which she has given birth--not in contempt, but to give thanks to God--she must not be prohibited.

§ IV. Herod and the Holy Innocents

When the Magi told Herod nothing about the child they had found, at first he thought that they had been deceived and had not found him and therefore were ashamed to return to him or send a messenger. But afterward he heard the reports about the newborn King of the Jews increase through the words of the shepherds, Simeon, and Anna the prophetess. Thinking that the Magi had deliberately concealed the child they had found, and seeing that they had mocked him, he became exceedingly angry and began to devise a way of killing the child Jesus.

While he was arranging the children's slaughter, however, Caesar Augustus summoned him by letter to go to Rome and answer the accusation of his sons, as the Historian says. While traveling, Herod learned that the Magi had crossed in ships of Tarshish, and he had those ships burned, in accordance with the words, “With a vehement spirit you shall shatter the ships of Tarshish.”

When father and sons had argued their case before Augustus, they were reconciled on the condition that the sons should honor their father and remain subject to him, while he could dispose of the kingdom as he pleased. Returning to Judea, Herod informed the people that by Augustus's decree he had been constituted judge concerning his successor to the kingdom.

And, as is said, lest Herod himself, ignoble and alien to the Israelite stock, should be regarded as a foreigner, he had all the books in which the nobility of lineage was recorded and preserved in the temple burned, so that when the proofs were gone he might appear to belong to that lineage. To mingle his offspring with the royal family of the Jews, he cast off his wife Doside and married Mariagnem, the granddaughter of Aristobulus and daughter of Hyrcanus.

After returning from the aforesaid victory, he became bolder and ordered the cruel plan for slaughtering the children, intended to reach Christ, to be carried out, as the Historian says. Sending men into Bethlehem and all its territory, he had all that region's children two years old and under--meaning from two years of age down to one day old--gathered, as can be imagined, into one place and brought by their mothers or nurses under the pretext of some work of piety and munificence.

A year had already passed since the Magi's adoration, because Herod had been occupied with his journey to Rome; and it was thought that so royal a child, King of the Jews, would be more beautiful and larger than the rest. Herod therefore sought to include him among all those killed.

Thus very many little children were killed for Christ and became and were called martyrs. They bore witness not by speaking but by dying. Their number is unknown. For when the Apocalypse text sung in their office to their praise says, “One hundred and forty-four thousand, having the Lamb's name written on their foreheads," a definite number is there put for an indefinite one, comprehending under it the great mystery of the elect. It is not said that their precise number was this.

Before the Innocents were killed, an angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream and said, "Take the child and his mother and flee into Egypt, because Herod will seek the child to destroy him." Rising by night, Joseph went to Egypt with the mother and child.

When Jesus entered Egypt, as the Historian says, just as at Israel's departure from Egypt there was no house in which the firstborn had not died, so at Jesus's entrance into Egypt there was no temple in which an idol did not fall. This accorded with the prophetic words of Isaiah 19: "Behold, the Lord will ascend upon a light cloud"--that is, the Virgin, who knew neither the burdens of marriage nor those of any sin--"and will enter Egypt, and the idols of Egypt shall fall." The Lord is said to have remained there for seven years.

Here Augustine says: "Let Christ's minister flee, as Christ fled into Egypt from Herod's face. Let him who is specially sought flee, while the Church's safety remains firm through others." This is found in Cause 7, Question 1, section Hoc tunc, after chapter Adversitas.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

After Herod later died, an angel of the Lord told Joseph in a dream to return with the mother and child to the land of Israel, because those who sought to take the child's soul--that is, his life--were dead. Upon returning, Joseph heard that Archelaus, Herod's son, reigned in Judea in place of his father, and he was afraid to go there. He withdrew into the province of Galilee and dwelt in the city of Nazareth with Mary and the little child.

§ V. Christ at Twelve Years and John the Baptist

When Jesus had reached twelve years of age, Mary and Joseph went up to the temple in Jerusalem for the feast according to the law's command, and the child Jesus went with them. Laypeople remained in the temple's porticoes, although the men were separate from the women. It may piously be believed that Mary wished Jesus to follow her, but while she was withdrawn from sensible things in prayer and did not notice, the child Jesus removed himself from her presence.

Coming back to herself and not seeing the child with her, she supposed that he had gone to Joseph, for children were permitted to travel and remain with either their male or female relatives. When Mary and Joseph met each other as they left the temple and neither had Jesus, they thought he was in the company of their other relatives. After searching among them for a day without finding him, they began to grieve, fearing that he might have fallen into Archelaus's hands or had abandoned them for some other reason.

They therefore returned to Jerusalem and, after three days, found him in the temple--that is, in the temple's portico, where the doctors taught--sitting in their midst and questioning them, while everyone marveled at his words. It may piously be imagined that he was discussing the Messiah's advent.

His most blessed mother said to him, "Son, why have you done this to us? Behold, I and your father"--that is, his putative or nurturing father--"have sought you sorrowing." He answered them, "Why is it that you sought me? Did you not know that I must be in the things that are my Father's?" They did not understand.

He then went down with them to Nazareth and was subject to them. Jesus advanced in age, wisdom, and grace. This is not to be understood as an advance in the habit of wisdom or grace, for he possessed their fullness from the beginning of his conception, but as an advance in the act of outward manifestation, since he performed works demonstrating ever greater wisdom and grace.

Here Gratian says in Distinction 36, section Ecce quod sacramentum: "Our Savior first sat in the temple among the doctors, listening to and questioning them, and afterward began to preach, because one must first learn and afterward assume the office of preaching."

Nothing else about the Lord Jesus's infancy and childhood is found in the Gospels besides what has been stated. Certain other things are found in the book On the Savior's Infancy, but because that book is placed among the apocrypha in Distinction 16, chapter Sancta Romana, those things are omitted as doubtful in their truth. Nowhere is it recorded what he did or where he lived in his adolescence up to the thirtieth year of his age. In Distinction 78, chapter Presbyter, it is said that the Lord Jesus was baptized at age thirty and began to preach.

Mark the Evangelist begins his Gospel from John the Baptist's preaching, saying that Malachi had prophesied concerning John, "Behold, I send my angel"--that is, John--and Isaiah had said, "The voice of one crying in the wilderness." Luke says that John's preaching began in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, Octavian's successor, when Pontius Pilate governed Judea as the emperor's representative there, Herod was tetrarch of Galilee, and Annas and Caiaphas were high priests.

All the evangelists attest John's preaching and baptism. Matthew and Mark describe the austerity of his food and clothing: he ate locusts and wild honey--some understand "locusts" as certain roots of herbs--and his garment was made of camel hair.

Matthew gives his preaching in general: he told everyone, "Do penance, for the kingdom of heaven has drawn near." He also records John's rebuke of the scribes and Pharisees: "Brood of vipers," and so forth. Luke relates the different instructions he gave to the crowds, publicans, and soldiers who came to him.

Thus Ambrose says: "The holy Baptist gave a reply appropriate to each class of people. He told publicans not to exact beyond what was prescribed, and he taught soldiers not to make false accusations; they seek plunder, showing that military stipends were established lest, while expenses are sought, the robber be enlarged."

The exercise of mercy is common to all and is therefore a common precept. Everyone alike is moved to give to one who has nothing. This is found in Distinction 86, chapter In singulis. By the second tunic, superfluity is understood. Note also what is said about stipend-receivers and officials in Cause 23, Question 1, chapter Militare.

Mark says that John baptized and preached a baptism of penance for the remission of sins, and that many were baptized by him in the Jordan while confessing their sins. John the Evangelist says that when the Jews sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him whether he was the Christ, as many believed, he affirmed that he was neither the Christ nor Elijah nor the prophet, but the voice crying in the wilderness foretold by Isaiah.

He explained why he baptized: he baptized in water specifically to dispose people to penance, but after him would come the one who baptized inwardly, namely Christ. He was also told that a sign would be given to him by which to recognize Christ.

Matthew relates more explicitly that Christ approached John while John was baptizing people in the Jordan and asked to be baptized by him. When John refused out of humility, saying, "I ought to be baptized by you," Christ commanded him, "Thus it is fitting for us to fulfill all justice," that is, the most perfect humility.

John then baptized him. In that act he saw the heavens opened and a dove--that is, the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove--descending upon Christ, and he heard the Father's voice thunder, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Mark relates the same very briefly.

Luke also adds Christ's age then: he was beginning to be about thirty years old and was thought to be the son of Joseph, who was of Heli, and so forth. By ascending he sets out seventy-seven generations from which Christ was descended as far as Adam, touching upon profound mysteries that are not to be explained here.

Note that on January 6, the Epiphany, the thirteenth day after his birth, Christ was adored by the Magi. After thirty years had passed, he was baptized by John the Baptist on the same date. After another year had passed, on that same day he performed the first of his signs at the wedding, changing water into wine. The Church sings this firmly. According to Bede, in the following year, on the same date, he fed five thousand men from five loaves and two fish.

§ VI. The First Disciples and Early Ministry

The next day, John was standing with his disciples near the Jordan. Seeing Christ pass by, he said, "Behold the Lamb of God." Upon hearing this, two of his disciples followed Christ, one of whom was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. They approached with him the house of his dwelling, namely Christ's, and remained with him that day. Andrew found his brother Simon and told him that he had found the Messiah; then he brought him to Christ. Christ first said to him, "You are Simon Bariona"; then, "You shall be called Cephas," which is interpreted Peter.

The following day, while walking through Galilee, Jesus found Philip and said to him, "Follow me," which Philip did. Philip afterward found Nathanael, a man learned in the law, told him that he had found the Messiah, and led him to Jesus. Jesus praised him highly, saying, "Behold a true Israelite in whom there is no guile."

When Nathanael asked how Jesus knew him, Jesus answered, "Before Philip called you, when you were under the fig tree, I knew you." Nathanael then confessed him to be the Messiah, saying, "You are the Son of God," and so forth. Christ said that they would see angels ascending and descending over him.

When Jesus heard that John had been imprisoned by Herod, he withdrew into Galilee and came to Capernaum. He began to preach, saying, "Do penance, for the kingdom of heaven has drawn near," according to Matthew, so that what had been spoken by Isaiah might be fulfilled: "The people of the nations who walked in darkness saw a great light," and so forth, namely the light of Christ's doctrine.

Walking beside the Sea of Galilee, Jesus saw two brothers, Andrew and Peter, who were fishermen, and called them. Leaving everything, they followed him. Then he saw two other brothers, James and John, the sons of Zebedee, mending their nets with their father. He called them, and they left their father and their nets and followed him.

They nevertheless returned to their own affairs. Later, on another occasion, after they had fished all night and caught nothing, Christ preached from Simon's boat near the shore. At Christ's command Simon Peter let down his net and enclosed so great a multitude of fish that they filled both his own little boat and those of his partners John and James. After seeing this miracle they followed Christ wholly from then on. The Historian, however, places this last calling second and the second calling just described third.

Ambrose says that Peter alone was told, "Lead the boat into the deep," that is, into the depth of disputations. For what is so deep as to see the depth of the riches, know the Son of God, and take up the confession of divine generation? Although the human mind cannot comprehend it fully through rational investigation, the fullness of faith embraces it. This is found in Cause 24, Question 1, chapter Non turbatur.

Jesus went throughout all Galilee, preaching and healing all the sick who were brought to him from every place.

At the wedding celebrated at Cana of Galilee, which is commonly said to have been that of John the Evangelist, the Virgin Mary attended as a relative, and Jesus was invited with his disciples. There he changed water into wine, and his disciples believed in him, that is, were more firmly established in the faith. John, without consummating the marriage, followed Christ as a virgin.

Jesus then went to Nazareth and entered the synagogue. The book of the prophet Isaiah was given to him, and opening it he read the first passage he encountered: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me and sent me to evangelize," and so forth, from Isaiah 61. When he had read it, he said that it was then fulfilled. Thus Luke.

Luke also relates that the Pharisees said, "Do here in your own country the many things we have heard were done in Capernaum." He did not do so but introduced the examples of Elisha and Elijah performing miracles for foreigners rather than Israelites because of the Israelites' unbelief. Angered, they led him to the brow of the hill to cast him down, but he escaped.

Jesus afterward called Matthew as he stood at the tollbooth, saying, "Follow me," and Matthew followed him. Matthew gave him a banquet in his house, where many sinners ate with them. When the Pharisees murmured about this to his disciples, Jesus answered that he had come to call sinners, because the healthy have no need of a physician.

§ VII. The Sermon on the Mount

Seeing the crowds, Jesus ascended the mountain. When he sat down, his disciples--that is, the twelve apostles already chosen by him--approached him. He delivered to them a long sermon, which Matthew alone reports continuously over three chapters, setting out the entire life of the Christian religion.

Luke touches upon some of these things, but they are commonly held, according to Augustine, to belong to another sermon that Jesus gave when he came down from the mountain and stood on a level place, where both the disciples and a great crowd of people were gathered around him.

There, after an admonition to love one's enemies, Christ added, "Give loans, hoping for nothing from them, and your reward shall be great." From this even mental usury is prohibited, as is clear in the chapter Consuluit of the title On Usury in the Extravagantes, and throughout Cause 14, Question 3. There Christ also urges mercy, saying, "Be merciful," and so forth. The manner of giving alms is given in Distinction 86, chapter Non satis, and fully in the fourth part under the title On Mercy.

Returning to the sermon delivered on the mountain, Christ first sets down the seven Beatitudes, which, according to Thomas, are acts of the virtues, and their rewards. The one placed eighth is not a distinct Beatitude but a kind of trial and perfection of the others.

Gratian says in Cause 22, Question 4, chapter Ex his omnibus, after chapter Haec autem vita: "In the Old Law a bodily punishment was appointed; in the law of the Gospel pardon of every sin is promised through penance. Hence the former began from terror, saying, 'I am a jealous God, visiting sins'--that is, punishing them--'to the third and fourth generation.' The latter, however, begins from the mildness of gentleness and mercy, saying, 'Blessed are the poor in spirit; blessed are the meek; blessed are the merciful.' In the former it is said, 'Whoever has done this or that shall die the death.' In the latter, 'I rejoice over one sinner who does penance,' and, 'I came not to call the just but sinners.' The beginning of the preaching both of the Savior and of his precursor invited sinners to penance, saying, 'Do penance.'" Thus Gratian.

Christ then shows that prelates ought to be perfect, calling them by similitudes: salt, because of prudence and wisdom; the light of the world, because of the shining example of their lives; a city set upon a mountain, because of their instruction and providence toward subjects; and a burning lamp, because of the eminence of their fervor and reputation. He concludes that whoever teaches and loosens--that is, acts contrary to--God's commandments shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven, meaning no one, according to Gregory.

Among other things Christ says, “I came not to destroy the law but to fulfill it.” Isidore says: “It is just for a prince to obey his own laws, and then let him think that his laws should be observed by everyone when he first shows them reverence.” This is found in Distinction 10.

According to Thomas in the Summa, Christ fulfilled the laws in five ways: first, by observing the legal provisions according to the letter; second, by fulfilling in himself through his works the things that they prefigured; third, by rightly expounding the moral precepts and excluding the scribes’ false understandings; fourth, by perfecting them, that is, by instituting the sacraments of grace; and fifth, by adding counsels to the moral precepts.

Then he invalidated the scribes’ false interpretations of the law, declaring that one must abstain not only from evil outward works but also from evil thoughts. He said, “Unless your justice abounds,” and so forth, and prohibited anger, the appetite of carnal concupiscence, and the bill of divorce.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

Chrysostom says: “God judges not only from works but also from thoughts.” This is found in Cause 22, Question 5, chapter Qui periurare, and in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Si cui.

Chrysostom also says: “Many strive for chastity in body but commit adultery in their will, since the Lord says, ‘Whoever looks upon a woman to lust after her has already committed adultery.’ Therefore the will frequently sins without the work.” This is found in Cause 32, Question 5, chapter Sicut enim. As he says in the same place, a work performed without the will does not make sin; likewise, justice is not perfected by a work unless the will is present.

Ambrose says: “Anger often leads even the innocent into guilt, because when we become angry beyond what is just and wish to restrain the sins of others, we ourselves commit more serious ones.” This is found in Cause 11, Question 3, chapter Ira.

Christ deals with occasions of sin when he says, “If your eye scandalizes you, pluck it out,” and so forth. By the eye understand some object of contemplation, by the hand an action, and by the foot an affection. Or understand by the eye a doctor or counselor, by the hand an administrator, and by the foot a servant. If they scandalize, that is, lead to sin, they must be plucked out, that is, removed, even if they appear necessary.

Jerome says: “Putrid flesh must be cut away; a diseased sheep must be driven from the folds, lest the whole house, lump, body, and flock burn, be corrupted, putrefy, and perish.” This is found in Cause 24, Question 3.

Christ prohibits an unlawful and vain oath when he says not to swear at all, that is, without an urgent cause, either by the Creator or by creatures. Augustine says in Cause 22, Question 1: “The Lord is understood to have commanded that one not swear lest anyone pursue oath-taking as though it were a good, and through habitual swearing be carried by custom into perjury.”

What Christ adds bears upon this: “Let your speech be ‘Yes, yes; no, no’”—that is, simple, truthful speech affirming or denying without an oath, so that what is felt in the heart as yes or no is expressed by the mouth as yes or no, that is, as affirmation or negation. “And whatever is more”—that is, to swear--“is from evil,” namely from the infirmity or unbelief of the person to whom one speaks, because he does not believe what is said.

It is not evil to swear when one ought to do so, but the oath proceeds from the evil of human infirmity, which does not believe a person speaking simply unless he swears. Thus Augustine there. That one must not swear by creatures is treated in the chapter Considera and the four chapters following it.

Christ commands love of enemies, excluding hatred of them from the heart, mouth, and deed, when he says, “You have heard that it was said to those of old, ‘You shall love your friend,’” and so forth. Christ says in the Gospel: “You have heard that it was said in the law”—namely, concerning the mode of vengeance established by the law--“an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. But I, taking away this reciprocal requital and inviting you to gentleness and the perfection of charity, tell you not to resist evil, but love your enemies,” and so forth.

Every wicked person is an enemy of the good; every friend of this world is an enemy of God. One who is an enemy of God is an enemy of justice and goodness. Gratian says this in Cause 23, Question 4, chapter Haec autem, in the following section. Augustine says: “I exhort you to love your enemies, because I know no medicine more effective for healing the wounds of sinners.”

Christ instructs that alms be given not for show but with sincere intention. There are three kinds of alms. One is corporal: to give the needy whatever you can. Another is spiritual: to forgive the person by whom you have been injured. The third is to correct an offender and lead one who errs back onto the way of truth. Thus Albinus, Distinction 45, chapter Tria.

When Christ says, “Let not your left hand know what your right hand does,” the left hand--that is, an evil intention--must not involve itself in the right hand, that is, in your good work.

He admonishes us to pray in the secret place of the heart and teaches what must be prayed for, forming the Lord’s Prayer with his own mouth. “When you stand at prayer, most beloved brothers, you must keep watch and apply yourselves to prayer with your whole heart. Let every carnal and worldly thought depart, so that at that time the soul thinks of nothing besides the one thing for which it prays. Let the breast be closed against the adversary--that is, let it be open to God alone--lest during prayer it admit God’s enemy to itself.” Thus Cyprian, in On Consecration, Distinction 1, chapter Quando. This is to enter the chamber of the secret heart with the door--that is, the outward senses--closed.

Christ teaches the manner of fasting and that treasures must not be stored up, saying, “When you fast,” and so forth. “When you fast, anoint your head and wash your face, so that you may not appear to people to be fasting,” and so forth.

Fasting must therefore be accompanied by the giving of alms. Hence Gregory says: “What you take away from yourself by fasting, give to the poor.” This is to anoint the head, that is, Christ, with the oil of mercy while removing vices.

Augustine says: “A general fast is to abstain from iniquities.” This is found in On Consecration, Distinction 5. Likewise Pope Pius says: “It avails nothing toward the merit of eternal life to fast and pray and perform other works of religion unless the mind restrains itself from iniquity and the tongue from disparagements.” This is found in On Consecration, Distinction 5. This is to wash the face, that is, the conscience.

Third, a fast must be undertaken with pure intention and discretion. Jerome says: “Let your fasts be pure, continual, and moderate, that is, hunger daily and dine daily. Fasting heals the wounds of the languishing, and sanctifies those who have been healed.” This is found in On Consecration, Distinction 5. This is not to wish to appear to people to be fasting.

“Do not store up treasures for yourselves on earth.” Ambrose says: “All the covetous, all the avaricious, possess Gehazi’s leprosy together with their riches. By the evil reward they have acquired, they have gathered for themselves not so much the resources of an inheritance as a treasure of crimes, with eternal punishment and brief enjoyment.” This is found in Cause 1, Question 1, chapter Cum ordinaretur.

Jerome likewise says: “To have received what is to be distributed to the poor, and to reserve it while very many are hungry, is either caution or timidity; or, what is a most manifest crime, to have withheld something from it surpasses the cruelty of every robber.”

That Theban Socrates, once a very rich man, cast away a great weight of gold when he set out to philosophize, nor did he think that he could possess virtues and riches at the same time. Yet we follow Christ loaded down with gold. This is found in Cause 12, Question 2, chapter Gloria.

Ambrose says: “That person truly is the Lord’s treasurer who accomplishes what his blood accomplished,” namely, as gold does, by freeing people from miseries.

“The lamp of your body is your eye,” and so forth, Matthew 6. The eye is the intention; the body is the aggregate of works that are good in themselves. Therefore, if the eye of the intention is simple, namely directed toward God, then the works that follow are also luminous and good. The contrary follows if the intention is evil.

Ambrose says: “It is not enough to do good unless it proceeds from a good source, that is, from a good will and intention.” This is found in Distinction 86, chapter Non satis, and Cause 14, Question 5, chapter Scriptum est.

“All things whatsoever you wish people to do to you, do you also to them,” Matthew 7. Gratian, at the beginning of Distinction 1, shows that this belongs to natural law. The gloss there says that “whatsoever you wish” means what you wish rationally.

“Enter by the narrow gate, because wide is the gate and spacious the way that leads to perdition, and many enter through it,” Matthew 7. The gate through which one goes out onto the road is appetite; the road is the outward work. It is narrow when it accords with reason and consists of virtuous works, because virtue and knowledge concern difficult things.

Adamantius, that is, Origen, says: “Not to sin belongs to God alone; to amend one’s ways belongs to the wise. But rarely will you find someone who corrects himself. Confession of sin is rare, and penance is rare. Nature--that is, sensuality--and shame resist, because all flesh is liable to fault. It weighs present things above future ones, pleasant things above grave ones, joyful things above sorrowful ones, and swift deeds above slower works. Iniquity, which counsels harm, is swift; virtue is slow and delays, judging what is becoming and honorable before it begins, while iniquity rushes everything headlong.” This is found in On Penance, Distinction 3, chapter Inter haec.

The wide gate and way also mean living according to sensuality and doing evil, and this leads many to perdition. Augustine says: “Let sinners not rejoice because they find many like themselves, for they will burn no less because they burn with many.” This is found in Cause 2, Question 1, chapter Multi.

“Do not give what is holy to dogs,” and so forth, Matthew 7. This means that the fellowship of Holy Communion must not readily be given to unclean spirits, namely notorious sinners, according to Ambrose in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Hi qui. One must also beware lest the words of preaching or disputation about the more secret matters of faith be disclosed to the unworthy, as Origen says in Distinction 43, chapter In mandatis. Concerning evil persons who prophesy or perform miracles, see Cause 1, Question 1, chapter Prophetavit.

Christ calls people back from excessive and undue solicitude for temporal things, saying, “No one can serve two masters,” that is, God and the world, and concluding, “Seek first the kingdom of God,” and so forth. When the Lord commanded that no thought be taken for tomorrow, he prohibited excessive solicitude, as has been said. This was not commanded so that no money at all would be kept, but so that God would not be served for the sake of temporal things and the way of justice would not be abandoned for fear of poverty. Thus Augustine in Cause 12, Question 1, chapter Habebat.

What Christ adds, “Sufficient for the day is its own evil,” means its own solicitude and labor, which is called evil because it is the evil of punishment and causes affliction. This is found in Cause 14, Question 5, section Sed hoc.

He commands that one not judge, that is, not rashly condemn another person’s offense while being worse oneself, under the likeness of the mote and the beam. “Let us not judge rashly and carelessly in any way without examination,” since the voice of Truth says, “Judge not, that you may not be judged.” Let no one be moved by evils merely heard, nor let anyone ever believe assertions indiscriminately without certain proof.

The Lord’s example is adduced: he did not judge the evils of the Sodomites, whose cry had ascended to heaven, without the proof of faithful witnesses. This is found in Cause 2, Question 1, chapter Deus omnipotens.

Concerning an evil judge Gregory says: “When someone is placed amid grave sins, while he overlooks his own he does not wash away those of others.” This is found in Cause 3, Question 7. Ambrose says: “Let the one who has nothing to condemn in himself judge another’s error; let the one who does not do the same things judge,” and so forth.

Christ exhorts to frequency in prayer under the likeness of a neighbor asking for an egg, bread, and a fish, which signify hope, charity, and faith. Luke gives the same teaching, but first supplies the likeness of a person who has a friend to whom he goes at midnight to ask him to lend three loaves. The friend first refuses but afterward rises because of his persistence and gives him as many as he needs.

The importunate woman in the Gospel, namely the Canaanite woman, at last merited to be heard. Although the door was shut with bolts, a friend received loaves from a friend even at midnight. God, who cannot be overcome within himself by anyone’s powers, is overcome by the publican’s prayers. Nineveh, which had perished through sins, stood firm through tears. Thus Jerome in On Penance, Distinction 1.

Christ says that one must beware of false prophets in sheep’s clothing: “Beware of false prophets.” He thereby intimates that on the day of judgment many who prophesy and perform miracles will be rejected because they were evil.

Finally, in concluding the sermon, Christ compares the person who hears and observes his teaching to a wise man who built his house upon a rock, where it remains firm when beaten by winds, rivers, and rain. He compares the person who hears but does not do what he hears to a fool who builds his house upon sand, and it quickly falls.

§ VIII. Healings and Other Miracles

When Jesus afterward came down from the mountain, great crowds followed him: some because of devotion to his teaching and life, some to obtain healing, others to observe him, and others from curiosity.

A leper met him and said, “If you will, you can cleanse me.” Jesus healed him from leprosy by the touch of his hand and sent him to show himself to the priest, indicating by this that one cleansed from the leprosy of sin must nevertheless present himself to the priest through confession and offer the sacrifice of satisfaction.

After Jesus entered the city of Capernaum, he heard the centurion explaining that his paralytic servant—that is, his servant boy—was badly tormented. Jesus healed him while absent and greatly commended the centurion’s faith above Israel, announcing both the conversion of the Gentiles in the centurion’s marvelous faith and the rejection of the Jews.

On another occasion he healed in the synagogue on the Sabbath a man whose right hand was withered. Indignant at this, the Pharisees considered what they should do about Jesus.

When Jesus entered Peter’s house, he was moved by the apostles’ prayers and healed Peter’s mother-in-law, who was suffering from a fever. After sunset he freed all the sick who were brought to him, together with those possessed by demons. As the demons departed from many, they cried out, “You are the Son of God.” But Christ rebuked them and did not allow them to speak that truth, teaching by this that we should neither seek even truth from demons nor believe it when they utter it, because they intend to deceive.

Jesus went out into the desert. When the crowds sought him and, after finding him, wished to keep him with them, he did not agree, saying, "I must also evangelize the other cities."

He refused a man who said that he wished to follow him as a disciple, because the man sought this from avarice for gain or from ostentation. Another man offered himself for this purpose but wished first to bury his father; Jesus commanded him to follow and not care for his father's burial. When another offered to follow him but first wished to go and take leave of those at home, Christ said, "No one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of God."

After the girl's resurrection, Matthew relates that two blind men approached Jesus to receive their sight. When he asked them, "Do you believe that I can do this for you?" and they answered yes, he said, "According to your faith let it be done to you." He restored their sight by his touch.

He commanded them to tell no one, teaching by this that good works are to be concealed, especially to avoid vainglory. They nevertheless spread the report throughout that entire country.

Crossing by boat over the sea into the Lake of Gennesaret, Jesus slept while a storm arose, because of which his disciples awoke him. Rising, he commanded the winds and the sea, and the storm ceased.

Upon returning to Capernaum he healed a paralytic who had been lowered through the tiles before him. Because Christ said to him, "Your sins are forgiven you," thereby showing that sin was the cause of his infirmity, the Pharisees said in their hearts that he blasphemed, because this belongs properly to God.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

They, however, believed Christ to be a mere man. Christ showed them his divinity by knowing their thoughts, which belongs to God alone, and manifested that he possessed this power by the man's sudden healing.

Invited to dine by Simon the Pharisee, Christ went with his disciples to Simon's house. While they were eating, a woman who was a sinner in that city came to his feet, watered them with her tears, wiped them with her hair, and anointed them with ointment. When Simon murmured, Christ commended her love.

According to Gregory, she is commonly believed to have been Mary Magdalene, the sister of Martha and Lazarus. She is called a sinner not because she was a public prostitute, but because otherwise she was very vain and lascivious in mind, and perhaps in body, in accordance with what is found in the hymn: "After the scandals of wanton flesh, from a cauldron she becomes a vial," and so forth. Some doctors, however, say that this woman was not Mary Magdalene but another.

When Jesus entered a certain village--Bethany, as is commonly said--a woman named Martha received him into her house. Her sister Mary remained at Christ's feet to hear his words. Martha therefore complained to Jesus that Mary did not help her but left her to minister alone. Christ answered by defending Mary because she had chosen the best part.

The contemplative life, signified by Mary, is safer, more joyful, and longer lasting. Yet Martha's action is not evil but good, and is even better suited to the present life, in which the human being is born to labor. It is more useful to neighbors and more fruitful in accidental merits. As regards essential merit, however, the greater person is the one more perfect in charity, whether in the contemplative or active life.

§ IX. The Cleansing of the Temple and Christ's Ministry in Judea and Samaria

Jesus went up to Jerusalem with his disciples at the Jews' Passover. Entering the temple, that is, its porticoes, and making a whip of cords, he drove from the temple all who bought and sold, in detestation of sacrilege, irreverence toward churches, and simoniacs, who are signified by the buyers and sellers. This is treated in Cause 1, Question 1, and, concerning unjust merchants, in Distinction 88, chapter Eiciens, and the chapter Quam.

When the Jews asked for a sign declaring by whose authority he did these things, he answered, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up," speaking of the temple of his body. "Destroy" means "you will destroy it by inflicting death"; "I will raise it" means "I will raise it from the dead."

The Jews understood this of Solomon's temple and said, "This temple was built in forty-six years." They were speaking not of its construction by Solomon, for that was completed in eleven years, but of its rebuilding by Nehemiah and Zerubbabel after the Babylonian captivity under Darius II.

Nicodemus, a Pharisee and doctor of the law who was Christ's secret disciple, came to him by night and said, "We know that you have come from God as a teacher, for no one can perform these signs that you perform unless God is with him." These words show that this occurred after Christ had performed and publicized many miracles.

Christ answered, "Amen, I say to you, unless a person is born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Christ thereby declares that the second birth is spiritual, namely the one accomplished through faith in baptism, either in act or in intention, and that it cannot precede the first, carnal birth from the mother's womb. This is found in On Consecration, Distinction 4, chapter Qui in maternis.

In what follows he also shows the necessity of baptism; the distinct person of the Holy Spirit, who breathes where he wills; the Ascension into heaven; the figure and benefit of the Passion in the bronze serpent, "because just as Moses," and so forth; and, in addition, the immensity of divine love toward us: "For God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son."

On another occasion Christ went into Judea and remained there. He baptized, not by himself, John says, but through his disciples. A certain rivalry and indiscreet zeal consequently arose among John's disciples against Christ, because Christ's reputation for sanctity and miracles increased more every day, as did the number of his disciples.

John's disciples therefore approached him and said, "Rabbi, he who was with you beyond the Jordan, to whom you bore testimony--behold, he baptizes, and everyone comes to him." To enlighten them and remove their jealousy, John said: "A person cannot receive anything"--namely, lawfully, toward any ministry and beyond the common law--"unless it has been given to him from heaven."

"You yourselves know that I told you, 'I am not the Christ,' namely, as you suppose, but that I was sent to bear witness before him, that is, before the Christ of whom you speak. The one who has the bride, namely the Church, is the bridegroom, that is, this Christ. But I, the bridegroom's friend, rejoice and am not saddened by his reputation. He must increase, namely in fame, so as to be known and adored as God; but I must decrease, so that it may be known that I am not the Christ but his servant and friend."

"He who is of the earth speaks of the earth; he who comes from heaven is above all. For God does not give the Spirit by measure. He who believes in the Son has eternal life; he who does not believe in the Son shall not see life." Thus John the Baptist.

When Jesus left Judea and went into another province, namely Galilee, he had to pass through the province lying between them, namely Samaria. Traveling, he came near the city of Sychar, formerly called Shechem, beside Jacob's estate. Wearied from the journey, Jesus sat by the well there and awaited his disciples, who had gone into the city to buy food, for it was about the sixth hour.

A Samaritan woman then came to draw water. When Christ asked her for water to drink, she answered that Jews--one of whom she recognized him to be from his clothing--had no dealings with Samaritans. Thus, after a long disputation, this wanton woman, who after five husbands was living in concubinage, was converted when she heard that he was the Messiah. Running to the city, she announced to everyone that they should come to see him.

Meanwhile, the disciples returned with food and urged him to dine. He answered that he had another food to eat, speaking of the food of spiritual refreshment that he received from the conversion of the people of that city, who flocked to see and hear him. He remained with them for two days at their request, and many more believed in him as the Savior of the world.

Jesus's weariness from the journey signifies the Word's assumption of passible flesh upon the road of the Incarnation. His sitting by the well at the sixth hour and resting in the Virgin signifies the sixth age of the world. The woman signifies either human nature or the Church gathered from the Gentiles, which, after the legitimate exercise of the five senses, when it came to the use of reason, clung by fornication in various errors to the devil. Yet because it naturally thirsted for the true and supreme good, it was converted to Christ by hearing Christ's teaching. He remains with the converted for two days, that is, in the works of love of God and neighbor.

A ruler then begged Jesus to come to the house where his son lay sick at Capernaum, gravely ill with a fever. Jesus did not go, so that the ruler might understand that he could heal the boy while absent, which the ruler did not believe, and so as to teach that in necessities we ought to regard nature more than fortune. Thus Jesus offered to go to the centurion's servant without being asked, but refused to go to the ruler's son even when urgently entreated, as Gregory says.

Finally Jesus told him, "Go; your son lives." The son was healed at that same hour, as the ruler learned from his servants, namely the seventh hour, because through the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit the soul is healed from the fever of sin, which proceeds from the appetite's disordered heat.

When a feast day of the Jews approached, Christ went up to Jerusalem and entered the porticoes of a certain pool there. There were five porticoes, in which people afflicted with various illnesses lay awaiting the movement of the pool's water. At an uncertain time an angel of the Lord moved it, and after this movement the first sick person to enter the pool was healed.

Jesus saw a cripple who lay there and had suffered from that infirmity for thirty-eight years. He healed him, saying, "Rise, take up your bed, and walk." The Jews were scandalized when they saw him carrying his bed on the Sabbath. Christ later found him in the temple and said, “Sin no more, lest something worse happen to you.” This shows that infirmities proceed from sins, as in the chapter Cum infirmitas in the Extravagantes, under the title On Penance and Remission, although this does not always occur.

The water’s healing power arose partly from the angel’s ministry, partly from the power of the wood of the future cross that Solomon had hidden there and that later floated up, according to the Historian, and partly from its figure of baptism. One who descends into baptism is healed, namely by remaining in the unity of faith and love. The five porticoes signify the Mosaic Law in five books, which revealed sins but did not heal them.

Christ afterward said many things to the Jews against their unbelief and concerning his divinity: that the Father works even until now, namely works of governing the world, and that he works with the Father according to his divinity; that the Father gave him the power to raise the dead and to judge; and that the hour comes in which all who are in the tombs will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live.

Those who have done good will come forth into the resurrection of life, but those who have done evil into the resurrection of judgment. John the Baptist had borne witness concerning Christ; John was a burning and shining lamp, and the Jews had wished to rejoice in his light for a time, namely by regarding John as the Christ. Yet Christ possessed testimony greater than John’s.

He told them to search the Scriptures, because they bore witness concerning him. But they could not believe because they sought glory from people, not from God. They did not receive him when he came in the name of God the Father, namely by believing in him. Another would come in his own name, namely Antichrist, and they would receive him as the promised Messiah.

§ X. The Calling and Mission of the Apostles

Concerning the calling and mission of the apostles, it must be known that the apostles were called by Christ three times. First, they were called to some knowledge of him, a calling treated in John 1. Second, they were called to familiarity, when at Christ’s word they cast the net and enclosed so many fish that they filled both little boats; they then followed him.

Third, they were called to his discipleship. This occurred when, walking beside the Sea of Galilee, he saw Peter and Andrew fishing and called them, saying, “Come after me; I will make you fishers of men.” Later on that same day he similarly called James and John, who were mending their nets with Zebedee their father, and they followed him. This concerns Peter, Andrew, James, and John.

The calling of Philip and Matthew is recorded individually. Concerning the other apostles, when or how their calling occurred is not recorded in detail. Matthew, Mark, and Luke chiefly narrate that after the twelve had heard the sermon on the mountain discussed above, they were appointed to the apostolate and sent to preach and perform miracles, while observing austerity and poverty.

Mark says that Christ went up the mountain, called to himself those whom he wished, and appointed twelve to remain with him and to be sent to preach. Like the other evangelists, he gives the names of the twelve apostles: Simon, to whom he gave the name Peter; John and James, sons of Zebedee, whom he called Boarges, which is interpreted “son of thunder”; Andrew, Peter’s brother; Philip and Bartholomew; Matthew, Thomas, and James the son of Alphaeus, that is, James the Less; Thaddeus, also called Judas; Simon the Canaanite, his brother; and Judas Iscariot, who betrayed him.

After the sermon on the mountain, however, he sent the twelve to preach, according to Matthew and Luke. Matthew says: “Jesus sent these twelve, commanding them and saying, ‘Do not go into the way of the Gentiles,’ namely for the present, ‘nor into the cities of the Samaritans; but go rather to the sheep that have perished from the house of Israel. As you go, preach that the kingdom of heaven has drawn near. Heal the sick; cleanse lepers; raise the dead; cast out demons. Freely you have received; freely give. Do not possess gold or silver or money, nor a traveling bag, two tunics, shoes, or a staff, for the worker is worthy of his reward.’”

There is a fourfold manner of expounding these instructions given to the apostles. First, they may not have been given as precepts binding the apostles to observe them under mortal sin, but as admonitions directing their life, like the ceremonial observances of religious, because they lived like religious under Christ’s discipleship.

Second, although they were precepts, they were nevertheless temporary and Christ relaxed them at the time of the Passion and thereafter.

Third, Christ intended through them to remove from the apostles and their successors in prelacy and preaching an inordinate affection for earthly things, and also in practice to cut away from them excessive wealth, signified by not carrying gold, silver, or money; bodily delights, signified by not possessing shoes and two tunics; flatteries and blandishments, when he says, “Greet no one along the way”; and excessive solicitude in providing for themselves, signified by carrying no traveling bag, purse, or bread on the way.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

They were also to eat what was set before them, namely those things that openly came to them as food. They were to cut away vengeance for injuries by carrying no rod, as Ambrose says concerning this last point in Cause 11, Question 3, chapter Ira.

Fourth, these things may be understood as prohibited according to a mystical sense. Gold signifies worldly wisdom; silver, vain eloquence; and money, a profit-seeking intention in preaching. In footwear, the affection is commanded to be stripped of bestial passions. A double manner of life, or hypocrisy, is forbidden in the two tunics. They are not permitted to carry bread, lest they chiefly intend to obtain the sustenance of life from these things.

They must not carry the staff upon which a traveler sometimes leans, namely their own or human confidence. They must greet no one by rendering either themselves or another certain and secure of salvation, because “the Lord knows those who are his,” says the Apostle, and, as Solomon says in Ecclesiastes 9, “No one knows whether he is worthy of hatred or love.”

They are commanded not to pass from house to house, lest they inquisitively seek to know the lives of others, or become wanderers and bearers of news.

Mark adds that Christ prohibited them from having or carrying these things except a staff alone, and said that they should go shod with sandals. This may perhaps be reconciled as follows: Mark speaks of a staff, meaning a walking stick for support, while those who prohibit a staff speak of a rod, meaning a cudgel for striking. Under the staff that is permitted are understood the authority of governance and the power of demanding necessities.

Christ also foretold the adversities they would suffer, exhorting them to constancy and prudence and saying: “Behold, I send you as sheep among wolves. Be therefore prudent as serpents and simple as doves.” Explaining this, Jerome says in Cause 16, Question 1, chapter Si cupis, that they should neither be overthrown by others’ snares nor devise deceits against anyone, but be like doves without gall.

He makes them wary of their persecutors, before whom they were to flee from one place to another when their presence was not necessary for the flock’s salvation, as is explained in the final section of Cause 7, Question 1. Against those who refused to receive them or hear their teaching, they were even to shake the dust from their feet and depart.

He then sets down the destruction that would follow for those who did not receive them, greater at the judgment than that of the Sodomites. He foretold woes prepared for Corozaim, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, where he had preached and performed many miracles, because they were not converted to penance and faith by such teaching and miracles, although Sodom, Tyre, and Sidon, cities of unbelievers, would have been converted if they had seen them.

No reason can be given why he did not perform those miracles or teach there; one can only marvel, while holding that the whole was done most justly, as Augustine says in Cause 23, Question 4, chapter De tiris.

Christ strengthens them toward patience by his own example, since, although he was the master and householder, he was not heard but was mocked and called belzebug. When they were brought before kings and governors because they preached his doctrine, they were not to take much forethought about what they should answer, because the Holy Spirit would speak through their mouths.

Unbelieving relatives and parents would also sometimes betray them and procure their death, and they would be hated by all people, namely by the reprobate. “But do not fear,” he says, “those who kill the body. Rather fear him who can destroy soul and body in hell.”

Nor were they to withdraw from pursuing Christ’s teaching and life because of affection for kindred, father, mother, wife, children, or others, because one who loves them more than his own salvation or than Christ is not worthy of him, and a person’s enemies are those of his own household.

When Christ says, “I came not to send peace but a sword,” he speaks of the carnal peace that sinners seek in the world. Christ came to send its contrary, the sword of God’s word, which destroys such peace. Yet he commanded that true peace be announced to everyone and that they greet a house with it upon entering, saying, “Peace to this house.”

Those who received them would receive a reward even if they gave them a cup of cold water in the name of a disciple. What Christ says, “Nothing is covered that shall not be revealed,” is understood either of this life or of the future judgment.

Mark alone relates that when the sermon to the disciples was finished and they came to the house, great crowds gathered around Jesus, seeking either to speak with him or to be healed, so that they could not eat because they were occupied with the people. When the disciples heard, they went out to restrain him, saying that he had been turned to madness. Thus the Evangelist.

It seems that one should imagine that, from consideration of the divine honor resulting from the miracles he had performed and the people’s devotion, Jesus gave some unusual sign of fervor. But the apostles, still inexperienced and unacquainted with such things, suspected madness.

Mark also adds that when the apostles went out they cast out demons, anointed the sick with oil, and healed them.

On another occasion, as Luke alone relates, Jesus also appointed seventy-two other disciples and sent them two by two before his face, saying: "The harvest indeed is great, but the workers are few. Ask therefore the Lord of the harvest to send workers into his harvest." He imposed upon them almost all the commands he had given the twelve when sending them to preach.

When the aforesaid envoys returned from preaching, they reported to Christ with a certain vain and proud joy, "Lord, even the demons are subject to us in your name." Bringing them back to humility and fear, Christ said, "I saw Satan falling like lightning from heaven," namely because of pride. He saw this according to his divinity.

"Do not therefore rejoice," he says, "that the spirits are subject to you, but rejoice that your names are written in heaven," according to predestination and present justice.

Note here that just as bishops hold the place of the apostles, so priests succeed in the place of the seventy-two disciples, as is found in Distinction 21, chapter In novo. Jesus then adds what extends to all prelates: "He who hears you hears me," namely by obeying; "and he who despises you despises me," namely by transgressing your just commands.

§ XI. The Miraculous Multiplication of the Loaves and Fish, and Christ's Walking upon the Sea

Concerning the loaves and fish miraculously multiplied by Christ when he broke them to satisfy many thousands of people, and concerning his walking upon the sea, it must first be known that all four evangelists relate the multiplication of the five loaves and two fish.

When the Jews' Passover was approaching, a very great crowd followed Christ as he ascended the mountain with his disciples. Christ took the five barley loaves and two fish that a boy had, multiplied them by breaking them, and gave them to the apostles to set before the crowds, who ate upon the grass in groups of fifty.

When all were satisfied, numbering five thousand apart from the children and women, the apostles collected the fragments that remained at Christ's command and filled twelve baskets.

In narrating this miracle, John states more explicitly Christ's question to Philip, Philip's response that two hundred denarii would not suffice for buying food, and Andrew's information to Christ that one boy was there who had five loaves. Thus John expresses what the other three evangelists passed over.

What Mark and Luke state about arranging the crowds in groups of fifty to sit and eat, Matthew and John omit. From this varied narration, neither falsity nor contradiction can be alleged among the evangelists, just as none arises when several people recounting deeds performed by one person narrate some matters more briefly and others more fully in their circumstances.

This banquet signifies the spiritual refreshment that occurs in the Church Militant through the teaching of the five books of the Mosaic Law, with the Prophets and Psalms as though they were two fish. For Gratian says in Distinction 36, section 2: "By discoursing, Christ expounded the sacred writings of the Law and the Prophets." This is to break the loaves and fish. Afterward he gave the knowledge of them to his disciples and through them dispensed those things to the faithful.

The twelve baskets of gathered fragments signify the difficult mysteries of Scripture of which the people are not capable, which the doctors themselves must gather and contemplate by themselves. This can also be expounded of the banquet of the Church Triumphant.

On another occasion the crowds remained with Christ for three days to hear his words in a desert place. Jesus said, "I have compassion upon the crowd," because they had nothing to eat and he did not wish to send them away fasting to their own homes, lest they fail on the way.

From seven loaves found among the disciples and a few small fish, broken and multiplied by Christ, four thousand people were satisfied, apart from the children and women. Seven baskets of fragments remained.

This signifies the spiritual refreshment received from the Church's seven sacraments by those who are perfectly masters of a body composed of four elements and of the four passions of the sensitive part through the four cardinal virtues. For a thousand signifies perfection.

After the miracle of the five loaves and two fish, John relates that, upon seeing the sign, the people said, "This truly is the prophet who is to come into the world," that is, the Messiah promised in the Law. Jesus knew that they wished to seize him and make him king, and fled to the mountain, teaching us to avoid lordships because they are dangerous.

Because he had commanded the disciples to cross before him in a boat, they sailed without him. Their boat was in the middle of the sea, tossed by waves because of the contrary wind. About the fourth watch of the night, they saw Jesus walking upon the waters of the sea and approaching them. Thinking him a phantom, they cried out in fear. He exhorted them not to fear, saying, "Have confidence; it is I."

Peter alone, as Matthew relates, said: “Lord, if it is you, command me to come to you upon the waters.” Jesus said, “Come.” As Peter walked upon the waters, he saw the strong wind, became afraid, and began to sink. Crying out, “Lord, save me,” he was grasped by Christ’s hand. Christ said, “O you of little faith, why did you doubt?” When Christ entered the boat, the storm ceased.

Here is a great mystery concerning the ship of the Church, which is shaken by the waves of tribulations and temptations but is not submerged and does not fail.

Ambrose says of this little boat in Cause 24, Question 1, chapter Non turbatur: “The ship that has Peter is not disturbed; the one that has Judas is disturbed. Although the merits of many disciples sailed there, nevertheless the betrayer’s perfidy still agitated it. Peter was in each, but one who is firm through his own merits is disturbed by those of another. Let us therefore beware of the perfidious person; let us beware of the betrayer, lest many of us be tossed because of one.”

“Therefore the ship in which prudence sails is not disturbed. Perfidy is absent; faith overcomes. For how could it be disturbed when the one presiding over it is the foundation of the Church? Disturbance is there where faith is small; security is there where love is perfect.” Thus Ambrose there.

What Ambrose says about Peter’s boat, that it is not disturbed, is understood of Peter’s own boat when, casting the net at Christ’s command, he enclosed an exceedingly great multitude of fish.

§ XII. The Sacrament of the Eucharist

Concerning the sacrament of the Eucharist, commended in many ways, the Jews’ murmuring, and the disciples’ withdrawal on account of it: when other disciples withdrew because Christ had said, “My flesh is truly food,” and so forth, he asked the twelve apostles whether they too wished to depart. Peter answered for them all, “You have the words of eternal life; to whom shall we go?”--that is, where shall we be comforted unless with you?

Here Ambrose says in Cause 24, Question 1, chapter Quae dignior: “This is the only one whom no one ought to forsake or exchange, to whom it is rightly said, ‘Lord, to whom shall we go?’ You see the executor of the heavenly commands: because he did not exchange this lodging, he merited the dwelling of heavenly fellowship.” John alone narrates the aforesaid things concerning the sacrament.

After the miracle of the five loaves and the crossing of the sea that follows it, John alone writes that the crowds sought Jesus. He told them: “You seek me not because you saw signs, but because you ate of my loaves.” In this he signifies those who seek Christ in the clergy or religious life for temporal things.

He adds, “Labor not for food that perishes, but for that which remains unto eternal life,” that is, labor in such a way that you can attain the abiding life of the homeland, not merely so that you may have temporal life.

When they asked what they should do to work the works of the Father, he answered that they should believe in the one whom the Father sent, that is, love him by believing.

They asked what sign he would give so that they ought to believe in him, since their fathers had received the sign of manna from heaven so that they might believe God and Moses as one sent by him. He answered that Moses had not given them the true bread from heaven, but that his Father would give the true bread from heaven. For the true bread is the one who descends from heaven and gives life to the world, namely Christ himself.

Not understanding him but thinking of material bread, they said, “Lord, give us this bread always.” He declared that he was that bread of life, and that whoever came to him, namely to receive him, would not hunger for worldly things. But because they did not come to him, namely by believing in him, they could not eat that bread.

He adds: “Everything that the Father gives me shall come to me; and the one who comes to me,” namely by believing, “I shall not cast outside,” that is, outside the Church, “because I came not to do my own will but the will of him who sent me.” This is the Father’s will: that those given to Christ by predestination and present justice should not be cast out but should live in the body of the Church.

He adds: “No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him, and I shall raise him up,” and so forth. Here Augustine greatly commends grace: “No one comes unless drawn by God. Why he draws this person and does not draw that one, do not judge if you do not wish to err. If you are not yet drawn, pray that you may be drawn.”

Augustine also says: “If we are drawn, therefore, do we believe unwillingly? Do not think that you are drawn unwillingly, for the soul is drawn not unwillingly but by love. You show a green branch to a sheep and draw it. You show nuts to a child and draw him. Moreover, if the poet was permitted to say, ‘His own pleasure draws each person,’ with love, not necessity, inviting him, how much more do we say that a person is drawn to Christ when he delights in justice, delights in truth, delights in blessedness, and delights in eternal life--all of which is Christ.”

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

Christ then says that he is the living bread who descended from heaven, and that whoever eats it will not die, namely eternally. The bread that he would give was his flesh.

When the Jews disputed, saying, “How can this man give us his flesh to eat?” he showed the necessity of eating it: “Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you have no life in you.” Understanding this badly, namely of his visible flesh as meat from a butcher’s stall is eaten, they said, “This is a hard saying; who can hear it?” Scandalized by this, some of the disciples withdrew from him.

But note that Christ is eaten for life in two ways. In one way, he is eaten spiritually alone, which occurs through the habit of charity by which Christ is united to us. This is necessary for everyone who is to be saved. In this way baptized children eat Christ’s flesh, as do even those not baptized who already truly believe.

In the other way he is eaten sacramentally and worthily. This is necessary for baptized adults at its proper place and time, namely as the Church commands and when there is an available minister. Yet Christ’s flesh is not then eaten materially, as the Jews understood, but spiritually, that is, hidden beneath those species.

Hence he said: “The words I speak to you are spirit and life; the flesh profits nothing,” that is, the words I have spoken, when understood spiritually, will justify you, but when understood carnally will profit nothing. This is found in On Consecration, Distinction 2, chapter Prima haeresis.

From the aforesaid words of Christ are shown the truth of Christ’s body in the sacrament, its necessity and usefulness, and the fitness required for eating: that one come to Christ with the foot of the intellect by believing and with the foot of the affection by loving him. Concerning all these things, see On Consecration, Distinction 2, chapter Revera, and many other chapters.

§ XIII. John the Baptist’s Disciples, Christ’s Commendation of John, Fasting, and John’s Death

When John the Baptist had been imprisoned by Herod and heard of Christ’s marvelous works, he sent two of his disciples to say, “Are you he who is to come, or do we await another?” This statement is expounded in four ways.

The first is Chrysostom’s. He says that John asked this question--whether Christ was the promised Messiah whom the Jews awaited--not for himself but for his disciples. John saw that his disciples had a higher estimation of him and a lower one of Christ than they ought. Hence they envied Christ, whose reputation increased more than John’s. So that they would not remain in error after John’s death, he sent them to question Christ, so that John’s disciples might perceive from the miracles of Christ that they saw that he was the Messiah who was to come.

The second exposition is Ambrose’s. He says that John doubted not in faith but in piety, that is, he spoke in the manner of one doubting and asked whether Christ was the one who would come to undergo the Passion for the world. It was as though he said: “Will your condescension be so great that, just as you came into the world, so you will also deign to suffer, although you are the most innocent Lamb, not guilty of death like others? The world does not merit this.”

The third is Gregory’s, in a homily. John did not ask whether Christ would come to redeem the human race by his Passion, for he had foretold this when he said, “Behold the Lamb of God,” and so forth, namely the Lamb to be sacrificed upon the altar of the cross. Rather he asked whether, when Christ died, he would deign personally to visit the fathers in limbo and lead them out, or would send another for this purpose, so that John, knowing the answer before going to his own death and to that limbo, could announce it to those fathers.

The fourth is Hilary’s. He expounds the first part of the statement affirmatively rather than interrogatively, as though John said, “You are certainly the one who is to come to save the world.” He expounds the second part negatively: “Or do we await another?” as though to say, “Certainly we do not await another, as the faithless Jews now do.”

When John’s disciples came to Christ and asked the aforesaid question, Jesus then performed many of the miracles related here, as Luke says. He answered those disciples: “Go and report to John the things you have heard and seen. The blind see,” and so forth. It was as though he said: “From these things you can perceive that I am the Messiah, because I have performed the marvels that Isaiah foretold Christ would perform when he came.” Isaiah 35 says: “God himself will come and save us. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened,” and so forth.

Those miracles also signify the effects of Christ's grace in our soul when it comes. It enlightens the intellect, directs the limping affection, cleanses leprosy--that is, sin--restores the hearing of obedience, raises to life the act of producing merits, and evangelizes by instructing one's neighbor.

After John's disciples departed, Christ commended John wonderfully: for his constancy in truth, because he was not a reed shaken by the wind of doubts; for his austerity of life and sincerity of teaching, because he was not clothed in soft garments and did not use flattery; for the greatness of his wisdom, because he was more than a prophet; and for the purity of his conscience, because he was the angel foretold to him: "Behold, I send my angel," and so forth, Malachi 3.

Christ also commended the excellence of John's merit and glory, adding, "Among those born of women there has not arisen a greater than John the Baptist." According to Augustine, two are excepted. The Virgin Mary was born, but not as a male, that is, she was a woman. Second, Christ was much greater; he was not born of a woman, meaning one corrupted, but of a virgin.

Hence Christ adds: "He who is less in the kingdom of heaven," that is, in the Church Militant, "is greater than he," namely in perfection. Christ was then less in age and in people's estimation. Or this can be understood otherwise: the least angel in heaven--for at that time no human being was yet in heaven--is greater than John in natural perfection and the perfection of grace, because grace had been consummated in the angels.

Christ adds: "From the days of John, the kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent"--namely those resisting sensuality--"seize it."

He then inveighs against the Jews who murmured both about John and about him: "To what shall I liken this generation? It is like children playing in the marketplace," and so forth. "John came not eating," namely common foods, "and they say, 'He has a demon.' The Son of Man, Christ, came eating and drinking," namely like others, "and they say, 'Behold a gluttonous man and a drinker of wine, a friend of publicans.' And wisdom is justified by all her children," that is, regarded as just by her disciples.

Here Augustine says: "He shows that the children of wisdom understand that justice lies neither in abstaining nor in eating, but in equanimously enduring want and in temperance amid abundance, in not being corrupted, and in taking or not taking at the proper time those things whose use is not reprehensible but whose desire is." This is found in Distinction 41, chapter Quod dicit.

When on one occasion the disciples questioned him about the advent of Elijah, who was to precede the Messiah's advent, Christ answered: "Elijah has already come, and they did not recognize him but did to him whatever they wished. And if you are willing to receive it, John himself is Elijah." John was not Elijah in person, but in zeal, office, and solitude. Each rebuked the wicked, even kings, with great zeal for God. Just as Elijah will precede Christ's second advent to instruct and dispose everyone for Christ, so John preceded the first.

At another time the Pharisees and John's disciples asked Christ why his disciples did not fast as they did. Jesus answered by assigning two reasons. The first was that the bridegroom's children cannot fast while the bridegroom is with them--that is, it is not fitting to fast but to rejoice. Christ is the Church's bridegroom and the apostles are the bridegroom's children. As long as he dwelt with them, he did not wish to afflict them with fasts.

The other reason was to teach that those who are inexperienced on God's way and beginning to serve God must not be burdened with abstinences or harsh precepts that they cannot bear. He introduced the example of wine not being put into old wineskins.

John rebuked Herod for incest and adultery, saying: "It is not lawful for you to have your brother's wife," namely Philip's wife, whom Herod had taken away from him. Herodias herself, who had left her lawful husband and adhered to Herod, hated John, plotted against him, and wished to kill him. But she could not do so openly.

Herod himself, as Mark relates, feared John, knowing that he was a just and holy man. Upon hearing him Herod did many things and listened to him gladly. Finally, at Herodias's instigation, he seized John and imprisoned him.

On Herod's birthday, Herodias's daughter danced before him and the princes of Galilee. She pleased them all so greatly that Herod promised to give her whatever she asked, even if she sought half his kingdom, confirming this with an oath. Instructed by her mother, she asked that John the Baptist's head be given to her immediately.

The king was saddened by her request because of his oath, lest he appear perjured by not keeping his promise. He commanded John's head to be cut off in prison and given to the girl. The head was brought on a dish and given to the girl, who presented it to her most wicked mother. Upon hearing this, John's disciples took his body and buried it. The history concerning where his head was found is counted among the apocrypha in Distinction 15, chapter Sancta Romana.

Concerning Herod's oath, Ambrose says in his book On Duties: "Herod shamefully promised a reward to the dancer and cruelly paid it. It was shameful that a kingdom was promised for a dance; it was cruel that a prophet's death was given out of reverence for an oath. How much more tolerable it would have been to commit perjury with such an oath--if it can even be called perjury--than to fulfill what he had sworn while drunk amid wine and had promised under oath among dancing choirs." This is found in Cause 22, Question 4, chapter Unicuique.

When Herod heard of Christ's miracles, he falsely thought that Christ was John raised from the dead and therefore performed miracles. He said: "John, whom I beheaded, has risen from the dead, and therefore powers work in him."

When some people told Jesus that Herod wished to kill him and that he should therefore withdraw, Jesus said to them: "Go and tell that fox: Behold, I cast out demons and accomplish healings today and tomorrow," that is, for a short time, "and on the third day I am consummated." John the Evangelist also says that John the Baptist performed no sign while he lived.

§ XIV. The Institution of the Sacraments of the New New Law

According to Thomas in the fourth book, there are two opinions concerning the institution of the sacraments of the New Law. One is that Christ did not institute all the sacraments personally, but only certain more principal ones, such as baptism and the Eucharist, and instituted the others through the apostles after the Holy Spirit's coming.

The other and better opinion is that Christ personally instituted all the Church's sacraments. For since the sacraments are the foundations of the evangelical law and causes of grace, and since the Lord Jesus is the lawgiver of that law and the bestower of grace, according to John 1, "Grace and truth were made through Jesus Christ," it is more fittingly said that he personally instituted all the sacraments, though not in the same manner.

He instituted the more principal and necessary sacraments more explicitly by determining their matter, form, and usefulness, as with baptism, the Eucharist, and penance. He instituted the others personally but implicitly and figuratively, to be explained and promulgated through the apostles.

He instituted baptism, which is first and greatest in usefulness, by conferring upon it its cleansing power when he was baptized by John in the River Jordan. Then, by the touch of his most pure flesh, he bestowed regenerative power upon all waters.

Thus Christ's baptism and the sacrament of circumcision operated together to cleanse sins until Christ's Passion. Then the power of circumcision was made void, as all the other legal observances--that is, the ceremonial ones--became dead, and the power of baptism alone remained.

Christ expressed baptism's matter when he said in John 3, "Unless a person is born again of water and the Holy Spirit, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Here its necessity is also expressed: without baptism in act for those lacking the use of reason, or in intention when a minister or opportunity is lacking for adults, the kingdom of God cannot be possessed.

He expressed the form after his Resurrection when, as Matthew relates, he said to the disciples: "Teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." The act of baptism or washing is expressed when "baptizing" is said, that is, saying, "I baptize." The person baptized is expressed when "baptizing them" is said, that is, saying, "I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit."

"In the name" means "in the power," for the power of the Trinity produces baptism's effect. Hence the Trinity also appeared at Christ's baptism. "I" does not belong to the substance of the form, although it ought to be said.

Christ also shows baptism's effect when he says: "He who believes and is baptized shall be saved," namely if he believes truly and not fictitiously and preserves baptismal grace. This is found in the first chapter and chapter Maiores of the title On Baptism in the Decretals.

As to the Eucharist, he expressed the matter when it is said that he took bread and afterward took the chalice in which there was wine. He expressed the form when he said, "This is my body," and, "This is the chalice," and so forth. The explanation of these things is found in chapter Cum Marthae of the title On the Celebration of Mass in the Decretals. He expressed its usefulness when he said, "He who eats this bread shall live forever," John 6, which is understood of a worthy reception of the Eucharist.

Concerning the sacrament of penance, he showed its necessity by saying, "Unless you do penance, you shall all perish," and its usefulness by saying, "Do penance, for the kingdom of heaven has drawn near."

He declared figuratively that confession must be made to priests even after sins have been cleansed through contrition, when he sent the leper cleansed of leprosy away in Matthew 8, saying, "Show yourself to the priest." But he delegated to James the Less the promulgation of this precept concerning vocal confession. Hence James 5 says: "Confess your sins to one another," that is, to priests who have the keys of the Church, and not to others.

He gave the apostles the power of binding and loosing in the person of all priests when, after his Resurrection, he said: "Receive the Holy Spirit. The sins of those whom you retain"--namely, by not absolving them--"are retained; and the sins of those whom you forgive are forgiven."

Again, before his Passion, he said to them, as Matthew relates: "Whatever you loose upon earth shall be loosed in heaven, and whatever you bind upon earth shall be bound in heaven." This is understood when the key does not err. Hence Cause 25, Question 1, chapter Manet, says: "Peter's privilege remains," namely concerning the aforesaid absolution or binding, "when judgment is rendered according to equity."

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

In this binding and loosing is also included the sentence of excommunication.

Christ instituted the sacrament of confirmation tacitly and, as it were, figuratively when certain little children were brought to him so that he might bless them. When the apostles, out of reverence for their master, repelled them, Jesus said: "Let the little children come to me and do not prevent them, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." As Matthew, Mark, and Luke attest, Jesus laid his hands upon each of them and blessed them. Hence that sacrament is also called the imposition of hands, as in On Consecration, Distinction 4, chapter Manus quoque.

The apostles were confirmed on the day of Pentecost by the power of the Holy Spirit from on high. Christ expressly ordained through the apostles that this sacrament be instituted as to its matter, form, and mode, as in the first chapter of the title On Sacred Unction in the Decretals.

He similarly instituted the sacrament of extreme unction, namely by a figure, also expressing its matter when, as Mark alone relates, he sent the apostles to preach and to anoint the sick with oil, and they were healed. There the sacrament's power or effect is also shown, namely the health of soul and body. But James explained the sacrament more fully, saying: "Is anyone among you sick? Let him bring in the priests of the Church, that they may pray for him, anointing him with oil."

Although marriage was instituted at the beginning in the earthly paradise, Christ instituted it as a sacrament of the Church: an act signifying not merely the aptitude for the indissoluble union of Christ with the Church, or of the divine nature with the human in Christ, and conferring grace like the other sacraments, although not so much. He did this when the Jews asked him whether it was lawful to put away a wife and he said: "What God has joined"--namely through true marriage--"let no man separate," that is, by dissolving a bond of this kind, whoever that man might be, whether a judge, a private person, or the spouses themselves.

The sacrament of orders is more obscure. Nevertheless, according to the doctors and the gloss on the Decree, Christ, who was the high priest of good things to come, is said to have instituted it at the Last Supper when he told the disciples, "Do this in memory of me," and then to have given all the orders to the disciples. There is no doubt concerning the power to confect his true body.

Here, according to Thomas in the fourth book, it must be noted that there is a threefold power in conferring the effect of the sacraments.

The first is the power of authority, which belonged to Christ according to his divinity: to remove sins and confer grace by his own power together with the Holy Spirit. This cannot be granted to any creature.

The second is the power of excellence, granted to Christ alone according to his humanity: that his Passion should operate meritoriously in the sacraments; that the sacraments could be given in Jesus's name; and that he could give any sacrament without its form and matter, or the effect of a sacrament without the sacrament itself, such as the remission of sins without baptism or confession, and the like. Through this power he conferred the sacrament of orders upon the apostles without matter and form by its institution.

Third, he conferred ministerial power upon the apostles, which all priests possess. Concerning the number, effects, matter, and form of the sacraments, a full treatment is found in many places in the third part.

§ XV. Christ's Miracles, First Concerning Those Freed from Demons

Near the beginning of Christ's preaching, Luke relates that in the synagogue there was a man possessing an unclean spirit who cried out: "What have we to do with you, Jesus of Nazareth? Have you come to destroy us? I know that you are the Holy One of God." When Jesus said, "Be silent and come out of him," the man was freed.

In the country of the Gerasenes, as Matthew, Mark, and Luke write, Christ freed a demoniac who had a legion of demons. A legion is said to contain the number six thousand six hundred and sixty-six.

Mark narrates this more fully. He says that this demoniac lived naked day and night among the tombs and mountains and was so savage that no one could tame him. He cut himself with stones, and when bound with chains he broke them.

Seeing Jesus from afar, he ran to him, adored him, and said: "What have I to do with you, Jesus, Son of the Most High God? I adjure you by God not to torment me." For Jesus was saying to him, "Come out of him, unclean spirit." When Jesus asked his name, he answered, "Legion, because we are many."

Those demons begged him not to cast them out of the region, or, if he did cast them out, at least to permit them to enter a herd of swine that was there. When permission was given, they entered the swine, which suddenly threw themselves into the nearby sea, about two thousand in number.

Their herdsmen fled and announced this in the city and countryside. Those who went out to see found the man freed from the demon, clothed, and of sound mind with Jesus. Upon hearing what had happened, they asked Jesus to depart from them.

When Jesus entered the little boat to cross the sea, the man who had been freed began to ask to remain with him. Jesus refused but told him to go to his own people and relate how much the Lord had done for him.

Matthew says that there were two such demoniacs. There is no falsity here, but the grammatical figure in which the plural is put for the singular. Likewise, when he says that the two thieves crucified with Christ reproached him, only one did so. He put two to designate the human race in its two first parents, or the Jewish people and the Gentile people as two distinct peoples possessed by many demons through many vices and freed by Christ.

Note also that the devil can harm neither people nor even swine without permission given him by Christ. Nor was the swine's owner harmed in this without a just cause. Hence Isidore says in On the Supreme Good: "According to the Catholic faith, no one can harm the nature of God; the nature of God cannot unjustly harm anything; nor does it permit anyone to harm unjustly." This is found in Cause 11, Question 3.

It is signified that the demon receives power especially over the lustful, whom it submerges headlong into vices.

A Canaanite woman also cried out for her demon-possessed daughter, saying: "Have mercy on me, Son of David; my daughter is grievously tormented by a demon." At first he showed himself harsh toward her. In the house where she approached him, he answered her nothing. On the road, when the disciples entreated him for her because she cried after them, he answered, "I was sent only to the sheep that have perished from the house of Israel."

When she herself approached, he said: "It is not good to take the children's bread and cast it to the dogs." She answered patiently: "Yes, Lord, for the little dogs also eat the crumbs that fall from their masters' table." At last he heard her, saying, "O woman, great is your faith; let it be done to you as you wish."

Her faith was great in the height of truth, because she confessed Christ as God and man when she said, "Have mercy on me," and so forth, although she had not seen signs or heard the Law. It was great in the breadth of charity, because she labored for her neighbor's deliverance, namely her daughter's, by coming to Christ and crying after him. It was great in the length of long-suffering, because she persevered when repulsed, even amid insults. Her daughter was healed in that hour.

He delayed hearing her so that he might more greatly arouse her affection, as frequently happens in all our affairs. The bread was the abundant refreshment of Christ's teaching and miracles, which, as to those more fit to receive it, was to be given first to the Jews, who honored the true God, rather than to the Gentiles as dogs made unclean through idolatry. Nevertheless, it was not unfitting to give at least crumbs--that is, a few miracles and some of his words--even to Gentiles such as this Canaanite woman.

As Chrysostom says, she did not go to diviners, seek amulets, or summon deceitful women, but abandoned every diabolical invention and came to Jesus.

For, as Gregory says in the seventh book, one must first flee to him who can heal the passions of our soul. Yet people, in a perverse order, first summon help from human beings, namely improperly; only when human aids have failed do they think that the grace of divine favor must be requested. This is found in On Consecration, Distinction 1, chapter Omnis.

To follow superstitions and incantations is not to go to Christ but to the devil, as Augustine shows in Cause 26, Question 2, chapter Illud quidem.

A certain man also brought Christ his son to be healed, who had a mute spirit and whom Matthew calls a lunatic. When the spirit seized him, it dashed him down, made him foam, grind his teeth, and grow rigid. The father had first brought him to the disciples, but they had not been able to cast this demon out as they had others.

Approaching Jesus for deliverance, the father heard him answer: "O unbelieving generation, how long shall I be with you? How long shall I endure you? Bring him to me." When the boy was brought before Jesus, the spirit dashed him down and made him roll about.

Jesus asked how long it had tormented him. The father said: "From infancy; and it has frequently cast him into fire and water to destroy him. But if you can do anything, help us." Jesus said to him, "If you can believe, all things are possible to one who believes." The boy's father said: "I believe, Lord; help my unbelief."

Jesus rebuked the demon and ordered it to depart. It came out, tearing the boy, so that people said he was dead. But Christ took him by the hand and raised him up healthy.

When the disciples went into the house and asked why they had been unable to cast out that demon, he answered: "This kind of demon is not cast out except by prayer and fasting." Yet, as Matthew says, he first told them that they had been unable to cast it out because of their unbelief.

He said that if they possessed faith like a mustard seed--humble, constant, and fervent, qualities signified by a mustard seed's being small, tenacious, and hot--they would say to this mountain, "Be removed," that is, "Devil, depart," and it would happen, and nothing would be impossible to one who believes.

Luke relates that when the disciples said to Christ, "Increase our faith," Jesus answered: "If you had faith like a mustard seed, you would say to this mulberry tree, 'Be uprooted and transplanted,' and it would happen."

Ambrose explains that the mulberry tree signifies the devil, because it first has white mulberries, but afterward they become black through heat. Likewise, the devil was created by God with innocent powers, but through the heat of pride they became black and vicious.

A person tells the mountain or mulberry tree to pass from here or to be transplanted when he resists the devil--called a mountain because of pride, or a mulberry tree because of wickedness--as the devil tempts him or another, commanding it to depart either from himself or from another who is tempted. Or when the devil has already taken root in someone through consent, it departs when that person returns to penance from humble and fervent faith, according to James's words: "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you."

The evangelists do not contradict each other because one speaks of a mountain and another of a mulberry tree, for Christ spoke many times about faith, once of a mountain and another time of a mulberry tree. It is also said that this was done literally by Alexander the Great.

From the fact that the father of this demoniac said, "I believe, Lord; help my unbelief," that is, by increasing the smallness of my faith, Gregory argues in On Penance, Distinction 2, chapter Cum sanctam, that in faith, as in the other virtues, there are degrees of beginners, those advancing, and those completed or perfect, according to Job's words, "Through each of my degrees I shall declare him." He demonstrates this diffusely in many ways.

Matthew and Mark also relate, but Luke more fully: "Jesus was casting out a demon, and it was mute," and so forth. In that Gospel are shown Christ's kindness, the Jews' wickedness, and a woman's fervent faith.

Christ's kindness is manifested in that he healed the mute demoniac, that is, the person whom the devil had made mute. Matthew adds that he was also blind. Hence Christ performed three miracles at once: he restored his speech and sight and freed him from the demon.

Christ performs this miracle daily in penitent sinners, restoring the lost light of the mind to them, restoring speech for a threefold confession--praises of God, admonitions to one's neighbor, and confession of one's own sins--and absolving the person detained by the devil from the devil's works. The crowds of Jews rightly marveled at these things.

Their wickedness is shown because some of them said, "He casts out demons through belzebul, prince of demons." Others, for the sake of testing and calumny, sought a sign from heaven, such as making thunder roar, lightning flash, and the like. Christ did not do this, because they would not have believed on that account but would have made false accusations, attributing the signs either to natural causes or to invocations of demons.

Instead, by his knowledge of hidden things he indicates the truth of his divinity. He proves the falsity of their statement in many ways, amid their faithless obstinacy and most wicked perversity.

First he shows his divinity because he knew their thoughts. They said in their heart, or so quietly among themselves that he could not hear, that he cast out demons through belzebul. But it belongs to God to know the hidden things of hearts, according to Solomon's words to God, "You alone know the hearts of the children of men," and the Psalm, "God, who knows the hidden things of the heart."

If demons sometimes appear to know such things, this is only conjecturally, insofar as from certain signs--not only words, but gestures too--they infer an interior disposition, as Augustine says in Cause 26, Question 4, chapter Sciendum. When Christ therefore showed through the words that follow that he knew their thoughts, he proved clearly that he was God. Hence the Evangelist says, "But when he knew their thoughts."

Second, Christ refutes the falsity of the Jews' statement in four ways. First, by reducing it to an impossible consequence: if Christ cast out a demon by the power of the prince of demons, it would follow that the devil's kingdom and dominion, by which he ruled worldly people, was divided and therefore desolated and annihilated, because experience, the teacher of things, teaches that "every kingdom divided against itself shall be desolated," and so forth.

But to say this is impossible, because the contrary clearly appeared: in Christ's time the devil's dominion in the world was neither desolated nor diminished, but reigned especially among the Gentiles through idolatry and among the Jews through disobedience to the commandments and faithlessness. If the devil's kingdom was not desolated, therefore, it was not divided. If it was not divided, one demon did not expel another. And if one did not expel another, Christ did not cast out demons by belzebug's power.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

The second argument is from the lesser. Certain others who cast out demons, such as the apostles or exorcists, were lesser than Christ, for he had given them that power. He had also given Solomon the knowledge of exorcisms for adjuring and expelling demons, as is said in Distinction 21, section 1.

Yet the Jews did not say of the apostles or exorcists that they cast out demons by belzebug's power. Much less, therefore, should they have said this of Christ, who was greater. This is what he means when he says: "If I cast out demons through belzebug, through whom do your sons"--the apostles or exorcists descended from you--"cast them out? Therefore they shall be your judges," to convict you of your false estimation.

"But if I cast out demons by the finger of God," which Matthew expounds by saying, "If by the Spirit of God"--the Spirit who is called the finger, who proceeds from the Son called the hand of God, as a finger proceeds from a hand, and who has distinct gifts as a finger has several joints or distinct parts--"then certainly the kingdom of God has come upon you." You ought to enter that kingdom by believing and depart from the devil's kingdom, which is to be destroyed.

The third argument is from examples. We see that a victor in a battle against another certainly has no need of the help of one whom he has completely defeated. The devil, who is called strong in natural powers and armed in malice, guarded his court--that is, the world in which he dwelt--lest he lose it. All things were in carnal peace, because there was no one to resist the vices he suggested.

But the Son of God, stronger than he, came into the world and waged a mighty contest against him, because, as John 3 says, "The Son of God came to destroy the works of the devil." He conquered him, according to Augustine's saying: "With an unarmed hand fastened to the cross he vanquished the powers of the air."

He conquered him so completely that he took away the devil's arms, namely by exposing his malice through teaching and weakening it through the merit of the Passion. He distributed the spoils: that is, he removed from the devil the souls that the devil had taken away from God and subjected to himself, and by their conversion assigned them to the Church. Christ therefore needs no help from belzebug, since belzebug has been utterly conquered by him.

The fourth argument is from contraries, for it is a rule of contraries that they mutually expel one another, not that one helps the other produce its effect. Health, for example, does not help sickness make the body sick, nor the reverse.

Christ and the devil are contraries in themselves and in their works. Christ is supremely good and full of all holiness; the devil is supremely evil and full of all wickedness. Christ desires and works for the salvation of people; the devil desires and labors for their destruction by inciting them to vices.

Therefore, when Christ procures people's deliverance from the devil by casting out demons, he does not use belzebug's help, since the demons intend through the effect of malice to enter people, not to depart from them. This is what he means when he says: "He who is not with me"--that is, conformed to my will in procuring people's salvation, as the devil is not--"is against me; and he who does not gather with me" by cooperating to lead people to good "scatters," by separating people from unity as the devil does.

Third, as a principal point, Christ foretells the utmost wickedness into which the Jews would come through their faithlessness and obstinacy when he adds: "When an unclean spirit has gone out of a man, he walks through dry and waterless places," and so forth.

This spirit is the devil. He went out from the Jewish people when, after receiving the Law, they abandoned the rites of Egyptian idolatry. Cast out through the due worship of the true God, the devil approached the minds of the Gentiles, which were dry for want of the moisture of grace and waterless through privation of the water of true wisdom. There he rested for a time.

Later, disturbed by the apostles' preaching and driven from the Gentiles through their conversion, he found no rest there. He said in effect, "I shall return to my house from which I came out," that is, to the Jewish people. Finding it swept, ornamented, and empty, he took seven spirits more wicked than himself, and they entered the former house.

The devil found the Jewish people empty of faith and grace, swept as to the Law's outward uncleannesses, and ornamented with legal ceremonies. He entered that people with seven spirits, that is, with the wickedness of all vices. For the number seven signifies universality. Hence Christ concludes, "So shall it be with this most wicked generation."

Morally, the unclean spirit that dwells in a person before baptism, or in one who sins mortally after baptism, is cast out through baptism or through true penance. Once cast out, it runs about to deceive others, namely those who are dry of devotion and waterless, empty of the teaching of wisdom.

But when the devil perceives that the baptized or penitent person from whom it departed acts more sluggishly, is idle, and remains alone, it returns to him with seven demons, that is, with a plurality of vices, now tempting and overcoming through one and now through another. Hence that person's latter state becomes worse than the former because of ingratitude and negligence.

Therefore Bede, treating the words "I shall return to my house," and so forth, says: "This verse is to be feared, not expounded, lest the fault that we believed extinguished in us oppress us while we remain empty through carelessness." This is found in On Penance, Distinction 4, chapter Revertar.

In the following chapter he likewise says: "Whomever heretical perversity or worldly desire seizes after baptism, it immediately casts down into the depths of every vice."

Finally, a woman's great devotion and fervor are indicated. She is said to have been Martha's maidservant, named Marcella. Raising her voice from the crowd, she said, "Blessed is the womb that bore you," blessing not only Christ who was teaching but also his mother.

Other women are not blessed in conceiving, carrying children in the womb, and nourishing them, but are wretched because of the labor, pain, and lust they suffer in these things. The Virgin alone was blessed, because she lacked all these and bore one through whom all who believe in him are blessed.

Christ approved her statement as most true and added: "Indeed, blessed are those who hear," and so forth. It was as though he said: "Not only she who bore me is blessed, but all who hear God's word and keep it." Because the Virgin Mary heard and kept God's word above all others by observing it, she is therefore most blessed above all.

Each person conceives Christ through a good purpose of conversion, gives birth to him through the execution of a good work, and nourishes him through frequent prayer and Holy Communion. Hearing or reading the divine word is the beginning of this. "Blessed therefore are those who hear," and so forth.

From what was said above, that the unclean spirit takes with it seven spirits more wicked than itself, this can be understood of the seven kinds of sin against the Holy Spirit: presumption, despair, assault upon acknowledged truth, envy of a brother's grace, obstinacy, final impenitence, and contempt for the precepts of one's superiors. Concerning this last, see Cause 25, Question 1, chapter Violatores.

Matthew adds that after the discourse on blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, Pharisees approached Christ and said, "Master, we wish to see a sign from you." He answered them: "An evil and adulterous generation seeks a sign, and no sign shall be given it except the sign of Jonah," and so forth.

While he was saying these things, someone told him: "Behold, your mother and your brothers stand outside, wishing to speak with you." Extending his hand toward the disciples, he said: "This is my mother, and these are my brothers. For whoever does my Father's will is my brother, sister, and mother."

Matthew and Mark also add that, in the aforesaid refutation of the Jews, to aggravate the guilt of their false accusation or blasphemy from the gravity of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit into which they had fallen, Jesus said: "Whoever speaks a word against the Son of Man shall be forgiven; but whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit shall not be forgiven, either in this age or in the next."

According to Thomas in the Secunda Secundae, Question 14, blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is understood in three ways.

In one way, it means common blasphemy against God, which consists in attributing to God what does not belong to him or denying what does belong to God, insofar as each of the three divine persons is spirit and is holy. The Jews fell into this crime by attributing to the devil what belongs to God alone, namely the performance of miracles. They spoke a word against the Son of Man when they called him a glutton, a drinker, and the carpenter's son, statements contrary to the reverence due his humanity.

In the second way, blasphemy against the Holy Spirit arises from malice--not just any malice, but that which rejects the impediments to sin. It has six species, concerning which see Thomas in the place cited and the Master near the end of the second book of the Sentences. Among them are assault upon acknowledged truth and envy of a brother's grace increasing in the world. The Jews fell into sins of this kind when they attacked the truth of Christ's teaching and works out of envy.

In the third way, according to Augustine, blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is final impenitence. This does not mean the intention never to repent in the future, for in that sense it is one of the six species of blasphemy taken in the second way. Rather, it means remaining in any mortal sin continuously until death.

Hence Eusebius says: “The holy fathers have said that this is the unforgivable sin and blasphemy against the Holy Spirit: to persevere in crimes until the end of life.” This is found in On Penance, Distinction 3, the second chapter Inter haec. Christ foresaw and foretold that many of them would fall into this blasphemy.

It is called unforgivable because, in the first and second senses, it is forgiven rarely or with difficulty because of its gravity, since such people are converted only with difficulty. In the third sense it is simply not forgiven, because such a person never repents. This is found in On Penance, Distinction 1, in the section Quod autem after chapter Importuna.

From this statement Gregory also argues in Distinction 25, chapter Qualis, that some sins are forgiven in the other life. This is true of venial sins, which are expiated by punishments even in purgatory. For when Christ says that sin against the Holy Spirit is not forgiven even in the future, it is implied that some sins are forgiven there, although only venial ones, as Gregory exemplifies there. These things are treated diffusely in the second part.

That Christ also cast out other demons is evident from what was said above from Luke 4, that demons went out from many people, and so forth. When Mark says at the end that Christ had cast seven demons out of Mary Magdalene, to whom he first appeared after rising, this is understood of the seven kinds of vices by which the devil possessed her soul, not her body, and not of bodily torment.

Concerning another person who cast out demons but did not follow Christ, perhaps by the power of exorcisms: when the apostles told Christ that they had forbidden the man to do this, Jesus answered, “Do not forbid him. He who is not against you is for you.”

§ XVI. A Deaf and Mute Man Healed

Apart from the demoniacs who were freed, some of whom were also mute, Mark alone relates the healing of one man who was mute and deaf but not demon-possessed. He says that Jesus left the borders of Tyre, came through Sidon to the Sea of Galilee, and so forth.

Certain people brought him a deaf and mute man and entreated him on the man’s behalf. Jesus drew him apart from the crowd, put his fingers into his ears, touched his tongue with his own spittle, and said, “epheta,” which is interpreted in Latin as “Be opened.” Immediately the man was freed from deafness and muteness and spoke correctly.

Although Jesus commanded them to tell no one, the more he commanded, the more widely they proclaimed it, saying, “He has done all things well,” and so forth.

In the statement that “they entreated him on the man’s behalf,” it must be noted, according to Gratian in On Penance, Distinction 1, section Denique, that all whom Christ healed are read to have been preceded by a request from their own voice or by the prayers of friends.

Christ’s drawing the man apart from the crowd indicates that if a sinner, deaf to hearing—that is, obeying—God’s law and mute in praising and confessing, is to be healed in mind, he must be separated from the crowd of vices as regards both the cessation of the act and the tumult of the passions. This accords with Ambrose’s words: “When wickedness is renounced, virtue immediately stands by, for the departure of malice effects the entrance of virtue.” This is found in Cause 27, Question 1.

In that what Christ did to this man when he said “epheta” is done in baptism, according to Rabanus it is given to be understood that, through the figurative saliva and the priest’s touch, divine wisdom and power work the salvation of that catechumen. Let his nostrils be opened to receive the fragrance of the knowledge of God, and let his ears be opened to hear God’s commandments. This is found in On Consecration, Distinction 4.

Christ afterward commanded that this be told to no one because the command referred to the mystery, not to the vocal sound, namely that no one should seek human praise in his own good and marvelous works, according to Ambrose’s saying: “It is a rule of truth that one do nothing for the sake of commending oneself.” This is found in Cause 11, Question 3, chapter Si quis vero non obediat.

Those who spread the report therefore did not act contrary to the command. Rather, it is noted there that the more a person truly flees human glory, the more glory follows him, as Tullius says of Cato.

§ XVII. Concerning the Blind Illuminated by Christ

In addition to the mute demoniac who was also blind, Christ gave sight to four people in particular. Matthew relates of the first, after the raising of the synagogue ruler’s daughter, that two blind men followed Jesus as he traveled, crying, “Have mercy on us, Son of David.”

When they came to him in the house, he asked: “What do you wish me to do for you?” They answered, “That our eyes may be opened.” Jesus said, “Do you believe that I can do this for you?” They said, “Indeed, Lord.” He answered, “According to your faith let it be done to you,” and they immediately received sight.

Although he commanded that the deed be kept hidden, they spread it throughout that whole land.

Mark relates another blind man who was brought to Jesus at Bethsaida while others entreated on his behalf.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

Jesus led him outside the village, spat upon his eyes, and touched them with his hand. When he asked whether the man saw anything, the man answered, "I see men like trees." Jesus again laid his hand upon his eyes. The man began to see and was restored so that he saw everything clearly. Jesus commanded him to go home and tell no one.

The three Evangelists Matthew, Mark, and Luke relate the illumination by the Lord Jesus of a blind man at Jericho. Matthew, however, says that there were two, putting the plural for the singular on account of the mystery, to signify the blindness of the human race derived from our first parents in both sexes and in both peoples.

Mark and Luke speak of one man, whose name Mark also gives, saying: "batinnus, the son of Timaeus," sat begging beside the road. Hearing that Jesus was passing by, he began to cry, "Son of David, have mercy on me." When the crowds rebuked him and told him to be silent, he cried out much more, "Have mercy," and so forth.

Jesus stopped and commanded him to come. Casting off his garment, he sprang up and came to him. When Jesus asked what he wanted, he answered, "Lord, that I may see." Jesus said to him, "Look; your faith has saved you." When he saw, he followed him, and all the crowd praised God for it. For it is said that he immediately saw and followed him, magnifying God.

Three things can be considered in true and perfect conversion: sudden illumination, because he immediately saw; devout thanksgiving, because he magnified God; and third, upright conduct, because he followed him.

This is the difference between God and nature in their works, although God himself, as the first agent, also moves nature to act. Nature does not work suddenly but successively, as is evident in the formation of the bodies of animals and plants. God, however, works in an instant in those things that he alone does directly, as in miracles and in the justification of a sinner. Hence it says that the man immediately saw. For, as Gregory says, "The grace of the Holy Spirit, which illuminates the mind, knows no slow exertions."

Nevertheless, as Augustine says, "He who made you without you will not justify you without you," that is, without your cooperation. Therefore, to receive illumination we ought on our part to do certain things that this blind man, illuminated by Christ, did.

Note in order seven things that concur in, or dispose one toward, the illumination of a sinner through grace.

First, if he is not on the road of the commandments, at least let him not sit outside the road through obstinacy, but beside the road through the exercise of works that belong to the class of good things.

Second, let him be a beggar by procuring the intercessions of others. Just as many have been healed by Christ and the saints from bodily infirmities through the prayers of others, so too have many been healed from spiritual infirmities, as is evident in the paralytic healed by Christ and in others.

Third, let him hear about Jesus the Savior, that is, about matters pertaining to salvation. Thus, while Peter was preaching, the Holy Spirit fell upon all who heard, and they were enlightened in mind, Acts 10.

Fourth, let him cry out by recognizing his misery through desire for pardon. Gregory says in the Moralia: "He cries loudly who loves greatly," namely by ardently desiring what he asks.

Fifth, when the crowds of companions or passions make a din and wish to hinder him, let him not abandon perseverance in good, according to the saying: "If he continues knocking, the man will rise and give him as many as he needs," Luke 11.

Sixth, let him cast away the garment of the body through mortification of it. Jerome says: "Let him who is a sinner and is stung by his own conscience be clothed in haircloth and bewail his own sins or those of the people. Let him enter the Church from which he had departed because of his sins and lie in sackcloth, so that by austerity of life he may compensate for the former pleasures through which he offended God." This is in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Qui sacerdos.

Seventh, let him present himself to Jesus by expressing through confession the misery of the blindness of his sins. For the priest represents Christ. Hence Proverbs says: "He who hides his crimes shall not prosper; but he who confesses and forsakes them shall find grace," and through grace the sinner is illuminated.

§ XVIII. The Man Blind from Birth Illuminated by Christ

John alone relates the healing of the man blind from birth. He says: "As Jesus passed by, he saw a man blind from birth," and his disciples asked him: "Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?"

They erred in thinking that every infirmity proceeds from the person's own actual sin or that of his parents. Christ excluded this opinion as untrue, showing that the man had not been born blind for that reason but "that the works of God might be made manifest in him," that is, so that God's glory might be obtained from his illumination.

Then Jesus made clay from the dust of the earth and spittle, anointed the man's eyes with it, and said: "Go to the pool of Siloam and wash." When he had done this, he received sight.

Spiritually, this intimates the mystery of Christ's Incarnation, signified by the clay made from spittle and earth. The spittle signifies the eternal Word proceeding from the Father's mouth; the dust signifies human nature made from dust. These were joined when the Word was made flesh.

This mystery, therefore, was placed upon the eyes of the human race, blind from birth through original sin--that is, it was received by the understanding through faith--and, with the subsequent washing of baptism, which has its power from Christ's Passion, it illuminated that race.

Concerning this illumination, as regards the Gentile people, the nation of the Jews was divided. Some of them, believing devoutly that this had been done by God, were converted to Christ; others spoke against Christ, saying that he was not sent by God but was a sinner and a transgressor of the divine Law.

As to the history: when the man returned home, his neighbors who saw him began to dispute among themselves whether he was the blind man who had been accustomed to sit begging in a certain place. Some asserted that it was he; others contradicted them, saying that it was not he but someone like him. Hearing them, and grateful to confess the benefit, he said, "I am he."

When asked how he had received his sight, he answered that it came from washing in the water of Siloam at Jesus's command, after clay had first been placed upon his eyes.

They led him to the Pharisees in the synagogue. When these questioned him about the manner of his illumination, he told them what he had already declared to his neighbors. Because that day was the Sabbath, some of them began to say: "This man is not from God, because he does not keep the Sabbath," although this deed was not in fact contrary to Sabbath observance. But others who were devout said: "How can a sinful man perform such signs?" Thus there was a schism among them, that is, a division of opinions about him.

Calling the blind man, they asked what he thought of Jesus. He answered, "He is a prophet." Not believing him, they sent for his parents and asked whether he had been born blind and how he now saw. They said that he was indeed their son and had been born blind, but that they did not know how or by whom he had received sight; they should ask the man himself, for he was of age.

The parents said this because they feared displeasing the Pharisees, since it had already been agreed that whoever confessed Jesus to be the Christ should be cast out of the synagogue as excommunicate.

Questioning him again about the manner of the miracle, they sought a way to slander it. They said, "Give glory to God. We know that this man is a sinner"--as though to say: acknowledge that you were illuminated by God, not by this man.

He answered them, "Whether he is a sinner I do not know," that is, "I do not know him to be a sinner, but rather just." When they again asked, "What did he do to you?"--as though asking whether he had invoked bezebub--the man, indignant at their dullness, said: "I told you, as you heard. Why do you wish to hear it again? Do you too wish to become his disciples?" It was as though he said: "You do not ask so that you may know the truth and become his disciples, but so that you may slander the miracle. I therefore refuse to explain it further."

Then they cursed him, saying: "You be his disciple; we are disciples of Moses. We know that God spoke to Moses, but we do not know where this man comes from."

He said to them: "This is the marvelous thing: that you do not know where he comes from, and yet he opened my eyes. We know that God does not hear sinners," namely by granting their prayer. Augustine says that he spoke this while his mind was not yet perfectly illuminated, for God does hear sinners even if they do not merit it. Or, according to Thomas, God does not hear sinners precisely insofar as they are sinners, that is, when they ask for unlawful things; it is otherwise when they ask for lawful or necessary things.

Celidonius then added: "If this man were not from God, he could do nothing." Hearing this, the Pharisees cast him out of the synagogue as a blasphemer, saying: "You were born wholly in sins, and do you teach us?"

Christ found him in the temple and asked whether he believed in the Son of God. When the man asked who he was so that he might believe in him, Christ answered: "You have seen him, and he who speaks with you is he." Falling down, the man worshiped him and said: "Lord, I believe."

Then Christ said: "For judgment"--that is, for discernment--"I came into this world, that those who do not see"--the Gentiles who did not know God--"may see" by believing in Christ, as afterward happened; "and that those who see"--the Jews then worshipping the true God--"may become blind" by falling into unbelief.

This is understood consecutively, not causally, because Christ's advent did not cause the blindness of the Jews; rather, through their own indisposition, blindness followed upon his advent.

When the Pharisees said, "Are we also blind?" he answered: "If you were blind, you would not have sin"--that is, if you understood yourselves to be ignorant of the truth and sought it, you would not have the sin of your unbelief. "But because you say, 'We see,'" that is, because you suppose yourselves to know the truth, "your sin remains."

Christ also restored sight to several other blind people, as is evident in Matthew 11: "The blind see," namely those illuminated by him when John's disciples came to him. Matthew 15 says that he healed the blind, the lame, and other sick people who were placed before him. After he cast the buyers and sellers out of the temple, blind and lame people came to him and he healed them, as Matthew 21 records.

§ XIX. The Dead Raised by Christ: First, the Synagogue Ruler's Daughter

The raising of the synagogue ruler's daughter occurred near the beginning of Christ's preaching, as Matthew, Mark, and Luke relate--Matthew more briefly and the others more fully. Another miracle coincided with it, namely the healing of the woman with a flow of blood.

While Jesus was speaking to the crowds, a certain ruler of the synagogue, whose name according to Luke was yairus, came to him and asked Jesus to come to his house to raise his daughter, who had by then died. The girl was not yet dead, but her father had left her laboring at the point of death, as Luke and Mark say. Matthew, abbreviating the account, said that she was already dead, because this happened very soon. She was her father's only daughter and was twelve years old.

As Jesus went with the girl's father to his house, a certain woman, whom Ambrose says was Martha, inserted herself into the crowd accompanying Jesus. She had suffered a flow of blood for twelve years and had spent all her substance upon physicians for remedies, yet she could not be healed and grew worse, as Mark and Luke say. Seeking to touch Christ's garment and trusting that she would thereby be healed, she touched its fringe, that is, its lowest part toward his feet, and was immediately cured.

Jesus, who knew all hidden things and knew what had happened, said according to Luke and Mark: "Who touched me?" Peter, as though astonished, answered: "Master, the crowds press upon you, and you say, 'Who touched me?'"--as though to say: not one person, but many, are doing this.

Jesus said, "Someone touched me, for I know that power has gone out from me." Looking around over the crowd, as Mark relates, he saw the woman approach him with reverential fear, aware that she had been healed, and recount what had happened. Jesus comforted her, saying: "Your faith has saved you. Go in peace."

As he continued on his way, a messenger came to the synagogue ruler and said: "Your daughter has just died. Why trouble the teacher?"--as though to say: he need not come to heal her, because she is already dead. The messenger did not believe that Jesus possessed power so great that he could raise her.

Jesus comforted yairus and encouraged him to faith, saying: "Do not fear. Only believe, and she shall be saved." Entering the house where the dead girl lay, he found flute players, that is, people who sang a lament to incite those present to weeping. Christ said to them: "Depart. The girl is not dead but sleeps." Because she was about to be raised immediately, as though she slept, and to be healed without any difficulty or delay, he said that she slept.

They thought that he spoke of ordinary sleep and mocked him; for this reason they did not merit to see the miracle. When they had been cast out, and only Peter, James, John, and the girl's father and mother were present, Jesus took the girl's hand and said: "Girl, arise." She immediately arose. He ordered that food be given her, to show that she had truly, not phantasmatically, been raised. Although he commanded that this be kept secret, its fame went out through all that land.

Spiritually, this episode signifies the conversion through Christ's advent first of the Gentile people and afterward of the Jewish people. The synagogue ruler's daughter is the Jewish people, whose father was Moses the lawgiver. Moses, with the other patriarchs and prophets, understood that the synagogue was sick unto death and could not be healed from sins except by the laying of Christ's hand upon it--that is, through the mystery of the Incarnation, in which the union of the two natures was made as though by a certain joining. This he prayed for and ardently desired.

When Christ came to heal the synagogue by example and teaching, the woman suffering the flow of blood--that is, the Gentile world--intervened. Her flow of blood was the continual commission of sin. David prayed to be healed from these flows of blood, namely from sins, saying:

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

“Deliver me from bloodguiltiness, O God, the God of my salvation.”

The Gentile world had fallen sick when that little girl was born. For the synagogue was in a certain way born into the light of the virtues when the Law was given to it through Moses. Then the Gentile world became visibly sick, because comparison with the virtues practiced under the commandments exposed the weakness and misery of its vices.

The physicians from whom it had sought healing were philosophers and poets. By their natural or moral teachings they could not heal the Gentile world from sins; instead, it grew worse by multiplying errors each day.

But when the Gentile world heard Christ and the crowd of apostles preaching his mighty works, it conceived the devotion of faith and believed that it would be healed if it touched his garment or its fringe--that is, if it imitated his manner of life, not in the working of miracles, but at least by following the footsteps of the humility with which he lived on earth. Doing this, it was healed by faith and dismissed in peace of mind.

Meanwhile, the girl dies, because the Jewish people, to whom Christ was first sent for healing, fell into the death of unbelief. Yet, once the Gentile world has been healed by conversion to the faith, it is foretold by the prophets that the Jewish people too will be saved, which will occur at the end of the age.

Then the flute players will be cast out--that is, the false teachers of the Jews will be rejected--as will the tumultuous crowd who believe that the synagogue is to be saved not through Christ but through Antichrist. At last Christ will hold its hand, that is, give life to its works through conversion to the faith; and he will command that it be given food, namely evangelical teaching and the Eucharist, which those now dead cannot eat.

Not everyone converted from the Gentiles is healed. Although many outwardly touch the Christian manner of worship, only the one woman who remains in the unity of the Church and of charity, and who imitates Christ's way of life with faith and humility, is healed.

Hence Bede says: “Whoever in any way separates himself from the unity of the faith or the fellowship of Peter can neither be loosed from the bonds of sins nor enter the gate of the heavenly kingdom.” This is in Cause 24, Question 1. In the next chapter Jerome says that even if such people, namely the wicked, offer holocausts so that they appear to fast, give alms, and promise chastity, God does not accept the offering, since they are not in Christ's charity.

§ XX. The Widow's Young Son Raised by Christ

Luke alone relates the raising of the widow's young son by Christ. He says: “Jesus went to the city of naim, and his disciples and a great crowd went with him. When he drew near the city gate, behold, a dead man was being carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow; and a great crowd from the city was with her,” that is, they accompanied her, following, as was customary, the bier on which her dead son lay.

When Jesus saw her, he was moved with mercy toward her and said, “Do not weep.” When the bearers had stopped, Jesus came forward, touched the bier, and said: “Young man, I say to you, arise.” The dead man sat up and began to speak, and Jesus gave him to his mother. Seeing this, all magnified God, saying: “A great prophet has arisen among us,” and “God has visited his people.”

This resurrection signifies the enlivening of a sinner through grace. Augustine says in On Penance, Distinction 1: “One raised in the body lives while his raiser is absent; but it is not so with one raised in the soul.” Since God is the life of the soul and the soul is the life of the body, just as the body cannot live when the soul is absent, neither can the soul live through grace unless God is present.

The soul therefore dies through sin, according to Ezekiel 18: “The soul that sins shall die.” Augustine says in On Penance, Distinction 2: “Just as sin is reached through three stages--suggestion, pleasure, and consent--so there are three differences of sin: in the heart, in the deed, and in habit,” corresponding to three deaths.

The first is as though in the house, like the girl, when consent is given in the heart to desire, that is, to the pleasure of sin. The second is as though already carried outside the gate, like the young man, when consent proceeds into deed. The third is when the mind is pressed down, as though by the mass of an evil habit, like Lazarus already stinking in the tomb. No one who reads the Gospel is unaware that the Lord raised these three kinds of dead people. Thus Augustine.

Likewise Gratian, in On Penance, Distinction 1, section Et his, says that Christ heard others praying for the three dead whom he restored to life. He heard of a fourth dead man when a certain disciple told him, “Lord, permit me to bury my father and then follow you,” Matthew 9 [read: Matthew 8]. But because no living people prayed for him, he did not merit to be raised. This signifies sin through obstinacy, from which a person is not raised because he places an obstacle to grace.

This young man therefore signifies a person sinning in deed, and this is what it means to be carried outside the gate. The gates of the soul are the external senses, through which sins are committed in deed. Hence the prophet says: “Death has entered through our gates.”

The bearers outside the gate are the four passions about which Virgil speaks, as Augustine relates in The City of God: “Hence they desire and fear, rejoice and grieve.” These induce people to evil deeds, especially the young, for Genesis 6 says: “The sense of man and all his thought are prone to evil from his youth.” And in Cause 12, Question 1, it is said: “Every age is prone to evil from its youth; nothing is more uncertain than the life of the young.” This is also evident from the parable of the prodigal young man, who departed from his father and consumed all his substance by living wantonly, Luke 15.

Alternatively, the four bearers who carry the wicked to burial, that is, into habit, are these: first, the excuse or defense of sins--“Let not my heart incline to words of malice, to make excuses in sins”; second, the flattery of others--“Let not the oil of the sinner fatten my head,” that is, let my mind not be fostered by flattery; third, the companionship of the wicked--“With the perverse you will be perverted”; fourth, avoidance of correction--Ecclesiasticus says, “A foolish man will avoid correction,” and so forth.

If the young man is to rise to the life of grace, these passions directed toward evil, or these inducements, must cease. This is what it means for the bearers to stop, for Christ to address him with a word of inspiration, for Christ to touch the bier through affliction of the body, and for the Church to pray for him.

Hence Ambrose says: “Let Mother Church weep for you; let Christ see you weeping and say, ‘Blessed are those who mourn.’ He loves for many to pray on behalf of one. Finally, moved by the widow’s tears, he raised her son.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 1. Thus the sinner rises.

§ XXI. The Raising of Lazarus

The raising of Lazarus occurred near the time of the Passion and was more remarkable than the other miracles. John alone relates it, saying: “There was a certain sick man named Lazarus, of Bethany,” and so forth.

Lazarus was the brother of Martha and Mary Magdalene, who were of noble Jewish ancestry and possessed great wealth. When their paternal inheritance was divided among them, the fortified town of Bethany was assigned to Martha as her share; to Mary, the town called magalon, from which she was called Magdalene; and to Lazarus, many and large buildings in Jerusalem, for he pursued military service. Martha occupied herself with governing the household, while Mary, being most beautiful, occupied herself with vanities.

Christ loved them because they were devoted to him, and especially Mary, who became his disciple after washing the Lord’s feet with her tears. He was frequently Martha’s guest in her house at Bethany. Bethany was near Jerusalem, fifteen stadia, that is, about two miles away, for according to the doctors a stadium is the eighth part of a mile.

When Lazarus had fallen sick at Bethany, his sisters sent a messenger to Jesus, who was then in the province of Galilee, saying through him: “Lord, behold, he whom you love is sick.” They did not go themselves, because it was not fitting for young women to travel about, and because they could not properly abandon their brother in his sickness but had to care for him. Nor did they say, “Come and heal him,” but only made the sickness known, leaving the healing to Christ’s will, for he knew better what was expedient. It is enough to tell a loving person of one’s need; if he truly loves, he will provide.

On hearing this, Jesus said to the messenger: “This sickness is not unto death,” that is, not such that Lazarus would be held by death. For although death followed, Lazarus was raised so quickly that he did not appear to remain dead. “But it is for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified through it,” by manifesting in this deed the power of his divinity. From this deed, utility accrued not to Christ but to human beings.

After the messenger’s words, Jesus remained there for two days so that, from Lazarus’s longer detention in death, the miracle might appear greater and more extraordinary. Lazarus died in the meantime.

After this Jesus said to his disciples, “Let us go into Judea again.” He had withdrawn from there for a time, yielding to the malice and fury of the Jews, who had sought to stone him because he preached the truth to them and reproved their vices.

The disciples answered: “Rabbi”--that is, Master--“the Jews were just now seeking to stone you, and are you going there again?” It was as though they said: “Do not go, lest they kill you. Even if you have no care for yourself, do not choose to leave us orphans in this way.”

Jesus answered: “Are there not twelve hours in the day?” It was as though he said: the day varies through many hours, and in each part of it a person can change his purpose and will, so that at one hour he wants one thing and at another its contrary. So too with the Jews: although they wished to kill me, they could change their purpose.

Moreover, the day contains twelve hours, corresponding to the twelve parts into which the artificial day was then divided. Since I am the spiritual day, wholly luminous, and you twelve apostles are like the twelve hours, receiving light from me, you ought to follow me and my will, not I you.

“For he who walks in the day,” that is, he who works according to my illumination, “does not stumble”--that is, does not sin--because in what he does he is enlightened by the light of grace coming from me. “He who walks in the night,” namely in the absence of the light of grace, stumbles, that is, sins. For according to Thomas in the Summa, a sinner cannot long remain in mortal sin without falling into other sins. It was as though Christ said: “Follow me if you do not wish to err.”

If it is asked how Judas was then an illuminated hour, since Christ called him a devil, one may answer that Judas was good for a time and in the light of grace, although afterward he became evil; or that Christ was speaking of Matthias, who was to be substituted for Judas in the apostolate.

So that the apostles might not think that he wished to go to Judea lightly and without an urgent cause, he assigned the reason for his journey, saying: “Lazarus our friend sleeps, but I go to awaken him from sleep,” because he is our friend. He was speaking of Lazarus’s death.

Scripture calls bodily death “sleep,” according to the saying to the Thessalonians: “I do not wish you to be ignorant, brothers, concerning those who sleep,” as is also evident in the books of Kings. The reason is that, just as a sleeping person rises from sleep after a time and without difficulty, so all of us shall rise at the end, in which deed there will be no difficulty for God.

Moreover, in sleep one who is well disposed in body and mind has pleasant dreams and rises stronger and more beautiful. One who is badly disposed has terrible dreams that afflict him, and rises exhausted and ugly.

So it is spiritually. One who dies well disposed, namely in grace on earth, has in heaven beautiful visions of God and the saints, in which he rejoices, according to the saying: “Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.” At last he rises stronger and more beautiful, glorified in soul and body. But one who dies badly, namely in mortal sin, thereafter has terrible visions of demons and other evils by which he is cruelly tormented. At the end he rises in a worse condition, because he is tormented in soul and body.

The apostles, being unlearned and understanding his words as bodily sleep, said: “Lord, if he sleeps, he shall be saved”--as though to say: sleep in a grave illness is a good sign of healing, and therefore you need not go.

Jesus then said openly to them: “Lazarus is dead, and I rejoice”--not over the evil of death, but “for your sake,” that is, because of the benefit to you that will follow. Since I was not bodily present when he died, yet now tell you what is hidden, you are to believe--that is, to be confirmed more and more in faith in my divinity. “Let us therefore go to raise him.”

Then Thomas said to his companions: “Let us also go and die with him.” It was as though he said: “Let us by no means abandon him, but expose ourselves with him to the danger of death by going. Why should we wish to outlive him if he dies?”

As Jesus went with his disciples and approached Bethany, Martha was told of it. She went out to meet him and said: “Lord, if you had been here, my brother would not have died.” For where the fountain of life is, death cannot draw near. “But even now I know that whatever you ask of God, God will give you.” She did not believe that he was God, for she thought that God had to ask another, but regarded him as a most holy man.

Jesus said to her, “Your brother shall rise.” Martha answered: “I know by faith that he shall rise on the last day”--as though to say: “I do not know whether you speak of that last resurrection or of a present one.”

Christ said: “I am the resurrection and the life,” namely causally. “He who believes in me,” that is, by loving, “even if he has previously died” in sins, “shall live” by receiving grace; “and everyone who lives and believes in me,” that is, perseveres in grace and love, “shall not die forever,” that is, shall not go to eternal death. “Do you believe this?”

She answered: “Yes, Lord, I have believed,” and so forth.

Martha returned home and told her sister Mary: “The Master is here and calls you.” It appears that Jesus had told her to say this. On hearing it, Mary immediately rose and went to Jesus. She had previously been sitting in the house mourning, accompanied by many who had come from Jerusalem to console the sisters for their brother’s death.

Those who were with Mary thought that she was going to Lazarus’s tomb to mourn there, moved by natural affection, and followed her. But she left the dead man and approached the fountain of life, the Lord Jesus, who was still outside the village where Martha had met him. Falling at his feet, she said: “Lord, if you had been here, my brother would not have died.” When Jesus saw Mary weeping, and the others with her, he groaned in spirit and troubled himself--that is, he was saddened and outwardly showed his grief--saying: “Where have you laid him?”

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One (continued)

He certainly knew the place, since he knows all things, but he asked in order to show that he did not thrust himself forward to work miracles but was asked by others. It also intimates that the sinner signified by the dead Lazarus is unknown to God, that is, rejected by him and not pleasing to him in his works.

They said: “Lord, come and see.” And Jesus wept, both out of compassion for Lazarus’s sisters, who grieved at being deprived of their brother--for it is human to weep with those who weep--and according to the Wise Man’s saying: “Weep a little over the dead, for his light has failed.”

Devout tears at the death of human beings, especially of the just, are not condemned. The women who followed Jesus to the cross did this. Ambrose too is read to have wept bitterly when he heard of the death of a certain just man, both because that man had preceded him to rest and because it is difficult to find others like such men.

Cyprian, however, inveighs fiercely against those who mourn immoderately or from despair, as though such persons were wholly lost, Cause 13, Question 2, chapter Praeposterum.

Christ wept no less from compassion for Lazarus, who was to be recalled from a safe place to the miseries and dangers of the world, as is said in Cause 13, Question 2, chapter Qui divina.

Some interpreted Christ’s weeping as proceeding from love; others, as pretense, said: “Could not this man, who opened the eyes of the man born blind, have caused Lazarus not to die?”

Jesus, showing sadness, came to the tomb made in a cave, where a stone had been placed at its mouth. Jesus said: “Take away the stone.” Certainly he who could raise Lazarus could also have brought him out of the tomb with the stone opened. But to remove the Jews’ slanders concerning the miracle he had the tomb opened. For if it had not been opened, perhaps they would have said that this was not the true Lazarus, but a phantasmal body produced by the devil’s work, and that Lazarus’s own body remained in the tomb. He therefore wished it opened so that they could see that the body had first been there in the tomb and had not remained there after the resurrection.

Martha then said: “Lord, by now he stinks, for he has been dead four days.” A sinner dead in sin can be called four-days-dead because he acts against four luminous laws: the natural law, the law of the Decalogue, the evangelical law, and human law. He stinks through the evil reputation of his wicked works.

Christ said to her: “Did I not tell you that, if you believe, you shall see the glory of God,” that is, the resurrection of your brother, from which the glory of God--the power of the divinity--will be manifested?

When the stone had therefore been removed, Jesus raised his eyes to heaven and said: “Father, I thank you,” and so forth. Afterward he cried with a loud voice: “Lazarus, come forth.” Jesus did many things in this resurrection: he was saddened, shed tears, gave thanks, and cried aloud, showing that many things must be done to rise from sin, especially from habitual sin, since, as the Philosopher says, habit is like a second nature.

Immediately the risen Lazarus came out, his hands and feet bound with grave-clothes, that is, with bands, and his face covered with a napkin. Christ said to the disciples: “Loose him and let him go.” Thus everyone could perceive from his walking that he had truly been raised.

Note what Gregory says in the Register: “The absolution of the one presiding is then true when it follows the judgment of the inner Judge.” The raising of the four-days-dead man aptly signifies this, because the Lord first raised and enlivened Lazarus, saying, “Lazarus, come forth,” and afterward Lazarus, now alive and having left the tomb, was loosed by the disciples. This is in Cause 11, Question 3.

Augustine likewise says: “He presented the risen Lazarus to the disciples to be loosed,” thereby showing that the power of loosing was granted to priests. This is in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Quem poenitet. Thus anyone who rises from sin through contrition is loosed through confession; once absolved, let him go forward through satisfaction.

§ XXII. Other Miracles of the Savior Related by the Evangelists

Other miracles of the Savior are related by the Evangelists, although they may seem lesser than those previously described.

Luke alone relates that, as Jesus entered a certain village, ten lepers met him and cried from afar: "Jesus, Master, have mercy on us." When he saw them, he said: "Go and show yourselves to the priests." While they were on their way, they were cleansed.

Only one of them, a Samaritan, returned after being cleansed and gave thanks with a loud voice. Jesus said: "Were not ten cleansed? Where are the nine? No one has been found to return and give glory to God except this foreigner." He said to him: "Arise; your faith has saved you."

The village is the world, into which the Son of God entered through the Incarnation. Ten leprous men meet him, that is, people infected with sins and errors. They are called ten because they transgress the Ten Commandments and contradict the truth of the faith.

Just as leprosy infects others, and the leper's body has one part infected and another sound, so heresy, as Bede says, mingles true things with false and infects others. Therefore, just as lepers were separated from others under the Law, so heretics are separated from the Church and from the communion of the faithful, as are wicked people whose crimes are notorious.

But when they acknowledge their error and sins and ask for mercy, Christ teaches the manner of cleansing: they are to show themselves to priests and be reconciled to the Church, and sinners are to show themselves to priests through confession.

Hence Augustine, on the words "Go and show yourselves to the priests," says: "Since you sinned in your own persons, be ashamed in your own persons by confessing your sins, not by indicating them through others or through letters." This is in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Quem poenitet.

While a person purposes to do this, he is already cleansed before God from the leprosy of sin. But some, once they have received forgiveness, ungratefully pursue their own advantages and do not seek Jesus. The just and elect, however, are signified by the one man because they remain in the unity of faith and love; and by the Samaritan, a name interpreted "guardian," because they guard themselves and God's commandments. Acknowledging God's grace, they seek Jesus and magnify him. This man is praised by Christ, while the others are declared ungrateful and condemned.

This is intimated when it is said, "Where are the nine?" as though they were unknown because they do not attain the number of the Decalogue through observing it.

Luke also writes of a certain woman who was bent over, or bowed down, so that she could not look upward. Jesus said to her: "Woman, you are released from your infirmity," and, when he laid his hand upon her, she was immediately made upright.

When the ruler of the synagogue indignantly reproved this and said that people should come on other days, not the Sabbath, to obtain healing, Jesus refuted his rebuke as foolish, since on the Sabbaths they rescued their brute animals from dangers. How much more lawfully, therefore, could that woman be healed on the Sabbath from the bond of infirmity in which the devil had held her bound for eighteen years? From this it is inferred that her deformity had been induced by the devil's work.

This woman signifies human nature, which the weight of earthly solicitude oppressed, so that it did not look toward heavenly things because it attended only to things below. This is in Distinction 49, chapter Hinc etenim. Or she signifies the sinful soul. She was healed by Christ's hand, that is, by grace touching the mind and freeing it from this curvature produced by the devil's instigation.

Matthew and Mark say that on the day following Palm Sunday, as Jesus came from Bethany to Jerusalem and was hungry, he approached a fig tree beside the road. It had only leaves, and he went to see whether he might find fruit there. Because he found none--for it was not the season for figs--he cursed it, saying: "May fruit never grow from you." At this word it immediately withered.

When the disciples marveled, Jesus said: "If you have faith, whatever you ask shall be done for you." This shows that Christ hungers, that is, desires the fruit of good works in us and in the Jewish people. His going to see whether the tree had fruit indicates free will; the fact that it was not the season of fruits intimates God's infallible foreknowledge, which nevertheless does not take away our freedom.

Therefore, when Christ finds in us only the leaves of words and not the fruits of works, he finally curses us by condemning us, so that we wholly wither away from grace and can bear fruit no longer. He also condemned the Jewish people, who rested in the leaves of legal observances without the fruit of faith.

Gratian, Cause 23, Question 4, after chapter Nabuchodonosor, says of the Tyrians and Sidonians: "In all these things our vices are ascribed to the judgment of the human mind. Divine clemency mercifully turns this judgment toward good in the elect, but justly leaves it toward evil in the condemned." Thus Gratian. The devotion of faith ought to believe this, not scrutinize it.

Luke relates of the man with dropsy that Jesus entered a certain Pharisee's house to eat on the Sabbath. When a man with dropsy had been brought before him, he asked those who were watching him whether it was lawful to heal on the Sabbath. When they remained silent, he took the man and healed him, declaring this to be lawful because they themselves rescued brute animals on the Sabbath. He reproved or admonished them to avoid ambition and pride, signified in that man with dropsy, and also avarice.

Matthew speaks of a stater, that is, a certain coin, perhaps a grosso or a bolognino, miraculously found by Peter in a fish's mouth. After Christ's Transfiguration, when he had come to Capernaum, those who collected the didrachma--that is, a certain sum for the toll on passage--approached Peter and said: "Does your master not pay the didrachma?" He answered, "Yes," that is, he does.

When Peter entered the house, Jesus anticipated him and said: "Simon, what do you think? From whom do earthly kings receive tribute or tax: from their sons or from strangers?" When Peter answered, "From strangers," Jesus said: "Then the sons are free. But lest we scandalize them, go to the sea and cast in a hook. Take the first fish that comes up, and when you open its mouth you shall find a stater. Take it and give it to them for me and for yourself."

Note what Ambrose says in Cause 11, Question 1: "This is a great and special lesson, by which Christian men are taught that they ought to be subject to higher powers, lest anyone suppose that a just ordinance of an earthly king is to be dissolved. For if the Son of God paid the tax, who are you, so great, that you suppose it should not be paid?"

The gloss there says that tribute or tax is a sign of subjection, but not a full proof of it. This is in the title On Privileges, chapter Recepimus. Because Christ was subject to no one, since he was without sin and supreme over all, he paid not from obligation but to remove scandal. Hence he said to Peter, "Lest we scandalize them, go," and so forth.

Gregory says in Cause 11, Question 3, chapter Inter verba: "Even detractors and those scandalized through ignorance are to be summoned and admonished calmly, and satisfaction ought to be made to them in every way, because the Lord says, 'Lest we scandalize them,'" and so forth, as was said. "But if they are unwilling to be satisfied by the truth, you have the consolation you behold in the Gospel," namely Matthew 15: "Leave them"--that is, leave them to be scandalized--"they are blind," and so forth.

It should also be noted, as is said in Cause 23, Question 8, chapter Tributum, that Peter was not ordered to give the whole fish or its head, because the Church ought not to be given to the emperor, nor can the pontifical summit, which presides like the head of the Church, be subjected to kings. He was ordered to give the stater found in the fish's mouth, because the Church pays tribute from those exterior goods of the Church that are evident to all. This was instituted of old for peace and quiet, because they ought to protect and defend us. Thus the text there.

As the gloss there says, the Church gives tribute to kings not as a sign of subjection, as happens with laypeople, since the Church is not subject to them, but as assistance and on account of protection. It is therefore not to be given to them if they do not defend. It says that it is to be given from exterior things, that is, not from the goods of the Church that are dedicated to the Lord, but from those that come to churchmen together with such an obligation, namely that tribute be paid.

The miracles Christ performed at the time of his Passion must not be omitted. When the crowds came to seize him, Jesus asked whom they sought. When they answered, "Jesus of Nazareth," and he said, "I am he," they all fell backward to the ground together with their leader Judas, and at his command they arose. This showed that he did not lack power to escape and destroy them, and intimated that through their unbelief they would be delivered into a reprobate sense.

He also restored to the head of the high priest's servant the right ear that Peter had cut off, as Luke writes.

Note here what Ambrose says in Cause 24, Question 1: "If Peter deliberately struck the ear, he taught that the Jews ought not to possess an ear in spirit, for they did not possess it in the mystery, namely faith. But the good Lord restored hearing even to that man in accordance with the prophetic sayings, showing that those who were wounded in Christ's Passion could themselves be healed if they were converted, since every sin is washed away in Christ's Passion."

"Peter therefore takes away the ear. Why Peter? Because he is the one who received the keys of the kingdom of heaven. He condemns and also absolves." And below: "Let us take care that no one's ear be taken away while Christ's Passion is read. If we refer the weakness of bodily suffering to his divinity, the ear is cut away; and it is cut away by Peter, who did not allow Christ to be regarded as a prophet but taught that he was the Son of God." Thus Ambrose.

At Christ's death, the sun was darkened, rocks were split, and the veil of the temple was divided. When the tombs were opened, many bodies arose at his Resurrection to announce the truth of the mystery to many.

For the sun of understanding is darkened at so great an indignity done to Christ; hard hearts, such as those of the centurion and others, were split open to compunction; the veil of ceremonies was removed so that hidden mysteries might be revealed; and innumerable people dead in sins rose to spiritual life.

To these we join the miracle that Christ suddenly gave unlearned fishermen skill in preaching and power to perform miracles, and what is greatest of all: at the Last Supper he gave himself as food in the sacrament.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter One (conclusion)

The turning of water into wine at the wedding; the deliverance of the royal official's son and Peter's mother-in-law from fevers; the healing of the centurion's servant, the paralytic offered to Christ upon a bed, the sick man at the pool, and the man with the withered hand; the twice-calmed storm at sea; Christ's and Peter's walking upon the waters; and the two multiplications of the loaves with the fishes have been treated above.

It was not without a miracle that Christ emerged unharmed from the midst of those who wished to cast him down from a mountain and, on another occasion, to stone him. Nor was it without a miracle that he twice cast the sellers and buyers out of the temple with such authority that no one dared oppose him.

So much for the miracles individually related. For, as is said at the end of John: "Jesus performed many other signs that are not written." Chrysostom says that his miracles are an immeasurable sea.

Chapter Two: On Christ's Teaching through Parables

The Parables of Sown Fields and Vineyards

Matthew and Mark say that Jesus spoke many things to the crowds in parables and did not speak to them without parables. This appears to be understood as applying generally, and this was so that what had been said through the prophet David might be fulfilled: "I shall open my mouth in parables; I shall utter things hidden from the foundation of the world."

A parable means a likeness, the word Luke uses. A likeness is proposed of something that either happened or at least could have happened, according to the Philosopher's saying in the Ethics: "We set forth examples not because they are so, but so that learners may perceive," that is, understand through guidance by such examples and likenesses.

Jerome says that it is customary among the Palestinians--that is, in those parts where Jesus preached--to introduce a likeness into every discourse, so that what cannot be retained through a proposition may at least be retained through a likeness.

From this it is inferred that examples are to be used frequently when preaching to crowds so that they may understand, and that one should conform to the country's customs in matters conducive to usefulness.

As Matthew relates, Jesus spoke these things while remaining in a boat beside the seashore, where the crowds stood to hear. For the preacher ought to leave the land, that is, affection for earthly things, and be separated from the press of people rather than mingle among the crowds.

Jesus said: "The sower went out to sow his seed." Matthew, Mark, and Luke record this parable and agree substantially. The soil sown is presented under a fourfold difference: muddy, rocky, thorny, and fruitful. These can occur in one field in its different parts. Only in the fourth part did perfect fruit follow, with variation--thirtyfold, sixtyfold, and a hundredfold--according to the differing goodness of that soil's parts.

The one who went out from the heavenly house is principally the Son of God, who says in John 16: "I came forth from the Father and came into the world," namely through the Incarnation, without abandoning his union of substance with the Father.

He came to sow the word of truth. He himself says in John 18: "For this I came into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth." This is his seed, because he is truth itself. Whoever preached or preaches the truth in the Old or New Testament, Christ is the beginning or principal sower. Hence he says in Luke 10: "He who hears you hears me."

The preacher is like the basket or sack that the sower uses in sowing. Hence Augustine says: "What am I but the sower's basket? Christ himself deigned to place in me the seed that I scatter for you. Do not attend to the basket's low worth, but to the sower's nobility."

A prelate of the Church ought to observe the Apostle's command in 2 Timothy 4: "Preach the word; be urgent in season and out of season." Gregory says there: "Before saying 'out of season,' he first said 'in season,' because in the hearer's mind importunity destroys itself by its own disadvantage if it does not know how to preserve seasonableness." This is in Distinction 43, chapter Sit rector.

Pope Nicholas says: "The dispensation of heavenly seed has been entrusted to us. Woe to us if we do not scatter it; woe if we remain silent." This is in the same distinction.

Augustine shows the seed of God's word to be of such nobility and usefulness when he says in Cause 1, Question 1: "I ask you, brothers and sisters, which seems greater to you: the word of God or the body of Christ? If you truly wish to answer, you ought to say that the word of God is no less than Christ's body. Therefore, with as much care as we take when the body of Christ is ministered to us, lest any of it fall from our hands to the ground, let us take equal care lest, while we think or speak about something else, the word of Christ bestowed upon us perish from a pure heart."

As the gloss says, as regards its effect the word is not only no less but greater, because people are converted through the preached word, not through the Eucharist.

The sown field is the world, or the assembly of hearers, which falls under a fourfold difference.

Some are devoted to wantonness and curiosity, going to sermons to look at women or hear something curious. These are the muddy ground beside the road, which is trampled by passersby along the paths through fields in rainy weather. So their minds are trampled by frequent thoughts and various vanities.

When they hear, therefore, because their minds are directed elsewhere, the birds of heaven--that is, the demons ranging through the air--come and snatch the word from their hearts. Although they hear the word, the devil works so that it is not understood or retained in the mind.

The second are hard and dry through pride and insensibility, signified by rocky ground. Although they hear sermons, retain them in mind, and begin to proceed outwardly to good works, yet because they lack sufficient earth of humility and moisture of grace, when the heat of great tribulation or temptation comes they fail in their good purpose and perseverance in the virtues and wither away from grace. Hence they do not bear the fruit of eternal salvation, for Christ says: "Not he who begins, but he who perseveres to the end shall be saved."

The third are the covetous, signified by thorny ground. Although temporal goods seem to delight, they truly prick the mind like thorns with continual anxieties and cares unto the shedding of blood, that is, to the commission of sins. For because of avarice there arise thefts, frauds, usuries, and other evils.

When such people hear sermons, they are sometimes pierced with compunction and propose to produce fruits worthy of penance, beginning fasts, almsgiving, confessions, and the like. But the thorns of covetous desires spring up and grow so greatly that they choke the good purpose. They neither restore what they have wrongfully taken nor refrain from acquiring more wrongfully.

The fourth are well disposed. Hearing devoutly, they receive the seed--that is, a good purpose--with humility and retain it through meditation. With the rain of compunction falling and the solar ray of grace coming upon them, they truly bear fruit.

That they obtain the fruit of salvation appears as by a sign in the patience they possess in tribulations and temptations. According to the goodness of their disposition, however, they bear more or less fruit. Hence Matthew and Mark add what Luke omitted: that one bears thirtyfold, another sixtyfold, and another a hundredfold.

Here the threefold state of the good is designated. The married state is good when a person keeps what he hears and possesses patience; the thirtyfold fruit corresponds to it. When the number thirty is represented by the hands it shows the marital joining, since two fingers are joined in designating it. Because it is composed of three and ten, it intimates observance of the Ten Commandments in faith in the Trinity.

The second is the widowed state. One who lives continently and patiently, with more perfect observance of the commandments and faith, is better, other things being equal. This state therefore renders the sixtyfold fruit, which is twice as great as the first. When this number is represented by the hands, one finger presses upon another, signifying the oppression and affliction of such a state.

The third is the virginal state, which is most perfect. Hence, according to the system of finger-counting, this number is placed on the right hand rather than the left, where the other lower numbers are placed. For, as Jerome says, to live in the flesh beyond the flesh, which is the life of virgins, is angelic rather than human. The state of the angels, that is, of the heavenly homeland, is signified by the right hand. This state therefore renders a more abundant fruit of merit and reward, provided that it is maintained as it ought to be.

After Christ spoke the parable to the crowds, he cried out: "He who has ears to hear, let him hear." He cried out because sometimes the preacher must cry aloud with his voice according to the subject. He must always cry out in mind, that is, with a desire not for praise or gain but for the conversion of souls.

He means: "He who hears with the bodily ear should also hear with the ear of the heart," namely by understanding spiritually and acting.

As Matthew relates, the disciples asked him: "Why do you speak in parables," namely without explaining them? "Explain at least this parable to us." The twelve apostles said this when he was alone--that is, alone with them.

Assigning the reason, Christ said to them: "To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God," that is, the secrets of the Scriptures and the Church; "but to the others in parables," that is, only supernaturally, not with inward savor--to the others, namely those separated from your unity and virtue--"so that seeing they may not see, and hearing they may not understand, lest at any time they be converted and their sins be healed," as Mark says.

This, like the earlier passage, is understood consecutively, not causally. Christ did not speak in parables in order to obscure their minds. Rather, because of their indisposition, this result followed from Christ's manner of speaking: hearing with the ear, they did not hear by performing the deed; seeing, that is, understanding superficially, they did not see spiritually.

Thus the prophecy of Isaiah, introduced by Matthew, is fulfilled: "Hearing you shall hear and shall not understand; seeing you shall see and shall not see," and so forth. The Apostle expounded the aforesaid parable.

Note here that not all things are to be preached to everyone. Cruder things are to be preached to the unlearned and more perfect spiritual things to the spiritually mature. Concerning this, see Cause 8, Question 1, chapter Oportet eum.

§ I. Another Parable, of the Good Seed and the Tares

Matthew alone relates that after the foregoing Christ presented another parable, saying: "The kingdom of heaven is like a man who was the father of a household and sowed good seed in his field. While the men slept, an enemy came and oversowed tares in the midst of the wheat. When the wheat had sprung up, the tares also appeared, growing with it.

"The servants asked their lord: 'Lord, did you not sow good seed in your field? Whence then does it have tares?' The lord answered: 'An enemy has done this.' The servants said: 'Do you wish us to go and gather them?' He answered: 'No, lest perhaps in uprooting the tares you uproot the wheat with them. Let both grow until the harvest. Then I shall say to the reapers: Gather the tares first into bundles to be burned, but gather the wheat into my barn.'"

Christ afterward expounded this parable to the disciples in the house. First, the statement "The kingdom of heaven is like a man who was the father of a household," and so forth, is understood in this way: what occurs in the Church, which is called the kingdom of heaven, is like what is related in this likeness.

This man is God, the father through creation of every family in heaven, on earth, and beneath the earth. His field, as Christ himself explained, is the world. His enemy is the devil, who is called a man because he is rational or intellectual, as a human being is. The father's servants, who dwell with him in the house of the Church, are holy men. The time of harvest is the end of the world.

It remains to consider the good seed. The good seed can be expounded in three ways, with three kinds of tares corresponding by opposition. There is good seed from the truth of doctrine, good seed from the virtue of law, and good seed from the holiness of the Church. Over the first are sown the tares of falsehood; over the second, the tares of vice; and over the third are scattered the tares of the whole multitude of the wicked. This accords with Romans.

Christ appears to expound the parable according to the last sense, yet with reference to the first and second as well. God placed good seed in the field of the world, namely good human beings--good according to nature and grace, which he infused into our first parents. Similarly, he placed good angels in the empyrean heaven.

Although through original sin the devil oversowed tares by tempting our first parents, God cleansed that sin through various remedies and placed within his Church people good through infused grace, as is evident in Abel and other holy men descended from him.

The devil, however, oversowed tares, that is, wicked people, by suggesting malice to some, not by compelling them to evil. These wicked people were among the good: Chaym and his descendants, for example. Thus Ham was found like tares among Noah's good sons Shem and Japheth; in Abraham's house, Ishmael was found like tares alongside Isaac, the good seed; in Isaac's family, Jacob was the good seed and Esau the tares; among David's sons, Solomon and Nathan were good seed, while Amon and Absalom were tares.

After the Babylonian transmigration, Mattathias and his sons were good seed, while Menelaus, Jason, and others were tares. In Christ's school, the other apostles were good seed while Iudas Scharioth was tares. In the primitive Church, the apostles' disciples and six of the deacons were good seed, while the seventh, Nicolas, was tares.

Sometimes this mixture occurs through the sleep of men, that is, the negligence of prelates and rulers who do not punish crimes. Thus the wheat, the good seed, and the tares, which are called darnel, arise and grow together--that is, the good together with the wicked.

For the householder's servants to ask whence the tares came into the field although he had sown good seed, and to ask whether he wishes the tares uprooted, is for good men in the Church to marvel at such a mixture in the Church, although God himself has prepared both all good people and all good things--sacraments, teachings, and the like--for the salvation of all, and to desire, if it pleased God, that the wicked be exterminated lest they harm the good.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

But God does not will this; rather, he permits this mixture of the wicked with the good until the harvest, that is, the end of the world, lest the wheat be uprooted with the tares.

For some people are tares for a time who afterward become the finest wheat, as Saul afterward became Paul, a vessel of election. If such persons, while evil but destined afterward to become good, were called out of the world while they were tares, the wheat too--that is, what they would later become--would be uprooted with them.

The second reason is that such tares sometimes possess secular power and a following. If the Church wished to uproot them, that is, punish and separate them by sentences, the wheat too would be uprooted, because they would act maliciously against the good and could procure many evils of body and soul. Augustine notes this in Cause 23, Question 4, chapter Non potest esse, and in Distinction 50, chapter Ut constitueretur.

The third reason is that people wicked in their conduct serve to exercise the good, so that patience may be increased in them. Hence Gregory says in Cause 7, Question 1, in the penultimate section: "The iron of our mind cannot reach the sharp edge of virtue unless the file of another's wickedness wears against it. He who is not exercised by Cain's malice does not know how to be Abel." Thus, if the tares were removed, the wheat too would be uprooted as regards its advancement.

The fourth reason is that if the good wished to separate themselves from the tares--that is, from wicked people who are tolerated by the Church, beyond detestation of their vices--a schism would follow among them. In such a separation the wheat too would be uprooted, because the good themselves would become evil by being divided from the unity of the Church.

Augustine teaches this in Cause 23, Question 4, saying upon John: "Dearest brothers, what did our Lord Jesus Christ wish to admonish his Church when he willed to have one traitor among the twelve, except that we should tolerate the wicked lest we divide Christ's body?"

The Lord's words through the prophet to his servants, "Depart from there," namely from wicked people, "go out and do not touch the unclean," are not, as Augustine explains, to be understood as separation from communion with wicked people while they are tolerated and have not been cast out by censures.

Rather, as he explains in Cause 23, Question 4, "To depart and not touch the unclean is not to consent to the sins of others among whom we live. To go out from the midst of Babylon is to do what pertains to correcting them, so far as it can be done in peace according to each person's rank and condition."

Departure can also be understood as avoiding domestic association with such people when someone is weak in mind, according to the saying: "With the perverse you will be perverted."

This also accords with what Augustine says: "How great is the swelling of arrogance, how great the forgetfulness of humanity and frailty, and how great the boast of pride, that someone should believe himself able to do what the Lord did not grant even to the apostles: that he can distinguish the tares from the wheat." This is in Cause 23, Question 4, chapter Quantus.

Note that this does not prevent wicked members of the faithful from being excommunicated for just causes and thus separated from the faithful, because excommunication is not directed to the uprooting of salvation but to conversion.

Hence Pope Urban says beautifully: "It must be noted that some say we act against the Gospel parable, in which the Lord commanded that the tares not be uprooted, when we subject some who deserve excommunication to excommunication. They say that Saint Augustine too contradicts this in the place where he says that the tares are not to be cut off: the wicked are to be borne, not cast away.

"To these it must first be answered: if heretics and the wicked are not to be excommunicated, why did that same holy father Augustine, together with the legates of the Holy Roman Church and with his holy bishops, excommunicate Pelagius and Celestinum, who were introducing a new heresy into the Church, and separate them from God's Church? He acted similarly against the Donatists.

"The Lord himself, who here speaks parabolically about the tares, elsewhere openly commands that excommunication be imposed: 'If he is corrected by the Church and does not obey, let him be to you as a heathen and a publican.' Hence it plainly appears that excommunication is one thing and uprooting another. A person is excommunicated so that his spirit may be saved. Thus excommunication is discipline, not uprooting." This is in Cause 24, Question 3, chapter Notandum.

He is not therefore uprooted, because the Church does not intend simply to separate him from the land of the living. Rather, through excommunication, when he is convicted and does not amend, he is in some measure cut off so that he may be amended and at least may not harm others by evil example.

Until the harvest, therefore--that is, death or the Last Judgment--God permissively wills the wicked to be mixed with the good. Then he says to the reapers, who shall gather the wheat, namely the good, and the tares, namely the wicked, by performing their ministry in preparing the remains of the dead, that they are to separate the wheat from the tares, one from another.

He says: "Gather the tares into bundles to be burned." First, their removal from earthly things is intimated, because "gather" means by separating them from the earth, according to Job's saying: "When the rich man dies, he shall take nothing with him."

Second, the gathering of the reprobate is intimated. The wicked are called tares because they are useless to themselves and harmful to others. Just as they were gathered here by living together in vices, so they will be placed together in bundles amid torments: the avaricious with the avaricious, the wanton with the wanton, and likewise the rest, as Gregory says in the Moralia.

Third, their torment is set forth, because they are gathered "to be burned."

"But gather the wheat into my barn." Here, first, the property of the elect is designated. Wheat falls to the earth through humility; if it dies through the extinction of vices, and if it shall have been consonant, as Jerome says, grain sprouts in the soil through moisture and warmth. Thus it bears much fruit. The moisture is devotion and the warmth is love.

Second, the angels' cooperation is intimated: "Gather," namely, you reapers--that is, all the angels--direct them into one place, "into my barn." There their happiness and security are signified, because they cannot lose these things.

Concerning the seed of truth, the Lord says: "I planted you, my vineyard, wholly true seed," namely, I placed all true seed in it through the patriarchs, the Law, the prophets, and the Gospel.

Hence Cyprian says: "Having abandoned error, let us follow truth, because in Esdras truth prevails, lives, and endures forever and ever." "Your word is truth," John 6, both concerning what is to be believed, what is to be done, and what is to be desired, as is evident in the Scriptures.

But the devil oversowed the tares of errors and falsehoods. This is no wonder, because he is a liar and their father and did not stand in the truth, John 8. He incited Ninus and other kings to invent false gods so that people would believe in them; philosophers, poets, and orators to treat many crimes as lawful acts; and heretics, Jews, and pagans to invent errors.

These tares are mixed with the wheat because, according to Bede, no doctrine is so false that it does not have some truth inserted into it. God does not permit the whole field of the Church to be cleansed of every tare. I call the Church the faithful in number, not in merit.

All heresies have arisen from wicked members of the faithful at the devil's instigation. Although many have failed, new ones nevertheless arise from time to time. God permits this so that the doctors who labor to refute them may be sharpened and better exercised in Sacred Scripture.

Many errors are also not known to the prelates, and they must therefore be left. Only at the end will all the truth of the faith be declared and falsehood condemned.

Concerning the second seed, that of virtuousness, Ecclesiastes says: "In the morning sow your seed, and in the evening let not your hand cease," that is, act virtuously in youth and old age.

Seneca says that seeds have been scattered within us, namely inclinations toward the virtues. Because, as the Philosopher says in the Ethics, a habit is generated from frequent acts, the seed of acquired virtues advances and grows from those acts.

If the infused virtues bestowed by God are added, then, as the Psalm says, "His seed shall be mighty upon the earth": the seed of one who fears God and ardently observes his commandments. Although all these virtues are in habit equally in the same degree, nevertheless one person shines forth more than another in their outward acts, according to the acts of the different virtues, as Thomas says in the Summa.

But when people sleep--that is, give themselves over to the body and negligence--the devil oversows the tares of vices, such as pride, envy, anger, and the like. The field of our mind, however greatly it abounds in the wheat of virtues, is never without the tares of vices, at least venial ones.

God permits this and does not allow them to be wholly uprooted because sometimes the wheat too would be uprooted through pride. Therefore, so that people may preserve themselves in humility, God permits these tares. At the harvest, that is, death, they are cast into the fire--namely, that of purgatory--if people die with them, while the wheat of the virtues is rewarded in heaven.

Mark alone sets down another parable spoken by Jesus about seed, saying: "The kingdom of God is as if a man should cast seed into the earth and sleep and rise night and day, and the seed should sprout and grow while he knows not how. For the earth bears fruit of itself: first the blade, then the ear, and then the full grain in the ear. When it has produced fruit of itself, he immediately puts in the sickle, because the harvest has come.”

Gregory expounds this likeness beautifully upon Ezekiel, in On Penance, Distinction 2, chapter Dum sanctam: “Every virtue is increased as though by certain stages and is led through increases of merits to the summit. The beginnings of virtue are one thing, its advancement another, and its perfection another. The Lord describes these stages under the name of the harvest, saying: ‘So is the kingdom of God,’” and so forth.

“A man casts seed into the earth when he plants a good intention in his heart, namely when he resolves to live virtuously and love God above all things, which intention he received from God according to the Apostle’s saying: ‘God gives seed to the sower.’ After casting the seed, he sleeps when he rests in the hope of a good work.

“He rises by night and by day because he advances amid adversity and prosperity. The seed sprouts and grows while he does not know it, because he cannot yet measure its increases. Virtue, once begun, is led onward to advancement.

“The earth bears fruit of itself because, when grace comes first, a person’s mind rises spontaneously to the fruit of good work. But the earth first produces the blade, then the ear, and afterward the full grain. To produce the blade is to possess the tenderness of a good beginning. Virtue comes to the ear when it draws itself onward to advancement in good work. It is brought to full grain when virtue advances so far that it can belong to a robust and perfect work.

“God puts in the sickle and reaps the harvest when, after he has brought a person to perfect works according to his fixed appointment, he cuts off temporal life by a sentence sent forth, so that he may bring his grain to the heavenly barns.” Thus Gregory, who also gives examples concerning Peter.

They add another parable spoken by Christ, about a grain of mustard seed, which is the least of all seeds but, once sown, grows so that it becomes greater than all garden plants, and the birds rest in its branches and beneath its shade. Christ compares the kingdom of God to this.

It is the humble, steadfast, and fervent faith of the Church. In the beginning it was least in the number of those who received it, since only Christ’s disciples received it. All sects of doctrine had, as it were, more followers at their beginnings. But this faith, once sown--that is, preached--grew throughout the world above all sects.

Thus in its branches, that is, in princes, prelates, and doctors who are branches scattered through the different regions, the birds of heaven--angels or contemplatives--and other peoples rest in their exemplary lives and are protected by them.

Christ said to his disciples: “Fear not, little flock, for it has pleased your Father to give you the kingdom.” But to hear how greatly it grew, listen to Jerome: “Gaul, Britain, Africa, Persia, the East, and India adore one Christ and follow one rule of truth.” This is in Distinction 93, chapter Legimus.

Matthew adds another parable: “The kingdom of heaven is like leaven that a woman took and hid in three measures of meal until the whole was leavened.” This leaven is evangelical teaching. Hence, when Christ said to the disciples, “Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees,” they afterward understood that he was speaking of the Pharisees’ teaching.

The woman, therefore, that is, the Church, put this leaven of doctrine into three measures, that is, among the people inhabiting Asia, Africa, and Europe. Thus the whole was leavened, because many from every part of the world received evangelical teaching.

§ II. The Parable of the Vineyard to Which Many Were Called at Different Hours

Matthew alone sets down this parable. The householder, the vineyard’s owner, is God, who continually governs those whom he created. The Church is his vineyard, according to Isaiah’s saying: “The vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel.” Nothing can be done virtuously except in the vineyard of the Church.

Hence Pope Lutius says: “Do not depart from the right faith of the Church and the apostolic path, that is, action according to the apostles’ teaching, on account of any disturbance, knowing according to the Savior’s saying that blessed are those who suffer persecution for righteousness,” that is, for acting well, whether in themselves or in others. For righteousness is cultivated in this vineyard, and while cultivating it one suffers persecution from the flesh, the devil, and the world.

Pope Lutius’s authority continues: “This is the living tradition of the apostles; this is the true charity that is to be preached and especially loved and fostered, and confidently held by all. This holy apostolic Church, the mother of all Christ’s churches, is shown by the grace of almighty God never to have strayed from the path of apostolic tradition nor to have succumbed to corruption by heretical novelties, but remains unblemished just as it received the faith from its first authors, Christ’s apostles.” This is in Cause 24, Question 1, chapter A recta.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

The gloss there says that “the Church” here means the collection of good faithful people, which will always exist and cannot fail because Christ prayed for it.

Hence Pope Dyonisius says: “Let each person remain content within his own bounds and so guard the church and people entrusted to him that he may render an account of all things before the tribunal of the eternal Judge and receive not judgment but glory for his deeds.” This is in Cause 13, Question 1, chapter Ecclesias.

This is to cultivate and guard: to instruct, correct, and provide examples. As Gregory says, “Because the Church has had righteous people from the beginning until now, it has produced as many shoots as it has had such people.”

The vineyard’s cultivators are those who have cultivated others, as though with an iron tool, by their teaching and example of life so that they might produce the fruit of good works. Or they are all the elect, who have cultivated themselves within this vineyard by pruning their lives and practicing virtues.

It is not incongruous for the same persons to be both the vineyard and its cultivators under different relations. Insofar as they receive such cultivation within themselves through good works, they are the vineyard; they are cultivators because they themselves act voluntarily.

The first hour was the world’s first age, in which God went out--not locally, but efficiently--to hire laborers into his vineyard, that is, people acting well and teaching others in the Church, such as Abel, Seth, Enoch, and others. He promised to give them the daily denarius in the evening, though only in the sixth age, not from condign merit, because, as the Apostle says in Romans 8, “The sufferings of this time are not worthy of the glory to come,” but from congruous merit. For it is fitting that one who labors faithfully for God be rewarded. No reward can quiet a human being except God.

The third hour was the second age, which extends from Noah to David. In it God sent Noah, Shem, arbaham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph to instruct the world; they taught people to worship the true God and to govern themselves.

The sixth hour lasted from David until the transmigration, during which many prophets taught the Lord’s way. The ninth was from the Babylonian transmigration until Christ; during it the holy machabei and the prophets aggeus, Zechariah, Malachi, or Esdras instructed others.

The eleventh hour was and is the sixth age in which we live. In it God found many standing idle in the marketplace--that is, Gentiles performing no meritorious good--and reproved them. They excused themselves because no one had hired them, namely because they had no laws or prophets to instruct them in the worship of God and the governance of themselves. God sent these too into the vineyard when they were converted to the faith, so that they might work well.

Evening, which is the day’s end, is the end of the world, or the end of human life for each person, as Gregory says.

The laborers are summoned by the steward to receive their wage because, at the Lord God’s disposition, the eternal wage is given to us through Christ, who is called the steward. By the merit of his Passion he opened the gate of heaven to us.

The steward is commanded to begin paying the wage from the last because those who die under the New Testament, signified by those called at the eleventh hour, immediately fly upward and receive the wage of glory if no obstacle of sin is present in those faithful people. But those who died under the Old Testament, in the first, third, sixth, and ninth hours, did not fly upward but descended to limbo.

When the earlier laborers saw these last receive the denarius--that is, the vision of glory and complete repose--they thought that more would be given to them because they had labored more, that is, longer. But they received only the denarius, that is, the vision and enjoyment of God, which is the one essential reward of all the saints.

Yet within this reward, one who loved more perfectly in the world beholds more clearly and enjoys more delightfully. Thus star differs from star in brightness, although each person is most fully put at rest and made happy. According to the greater or lesser labors endured here for God, however, the accidental reward, a certain joy concerning a created thing, is greater or lesser, according to the Apostle’s saying: “Each shall receive his own wage according to his labor.”

The statement that the earlier cultivators of the vineyard murmured when they saw that they received no more than the last, as though a worthy wage were not paid to them although they had labored more than the others, is hypothetical speech, that is, it proceeds from a supposition, even of an impossible thing. As Gregory says, it is impossible for anyone in glory to murmur or for a murmurer to reach that place.

But if one supposes impossibly that the fathers of the Old Testament murmured because they thought themselves rewarded less than justly, it is shown that they cannot complain. What was promised to them is given: the denarius, that is, heavenly glory, which alone suffices for all things and is beyond condign merit.

If God wishes freely to give someone who labored little the same wage, or even more, he does no injury to the former laborer. The quantity of the wage of glory is given according to the quantity of a person's love, and it can happen that someone reaches greater charity in a very brief time after conversion than another does by laboring long in good works.

If someone from his own property and liberality gave one person a hundred florins and another of equal condition only ten, he would certainly not be said to injure the second, because he withholds nothing owed to him. Indeed, the ten that he did not owe the second man he gave freely; therefore that man has reason to love him and give thanks.

So too the Lord God, who is indebted to no one to give grace but gives from his goodness to whomever he gives, cannot be accused of respect of persons for giving to one and not another, or more to one than another. "Is it not lawful," it is said, "for me to do what I will" in conferring nature, grace, and glory? "Is your eye"--that is, your mind--"wicked" in murmuring against me "because I am good" by giving someone more than seems just to you? It is as though he said: "You have no just cause for complaint."

"Thus the last shall be first and the first last." This means that the fathers of the New Testament, who were called last to labor in the vineyard of the Church, will be first to receive the wage because, unless something else obstructs it, they can receive it when they die. The first, the fathers of the Old Testament, were last because they received the wage of glory later.

Or, to confound the hardness of the Jews, the last--that is, the Gentiles who were called to Christ's faith in the last age, from which the wage comes to us through the apostles' preaching--will be first to be converted and receive the wage. The first--that is, the Jews who had earlier been called through the prophets and patriarchs, and finally to faith through Christ's preaching--will generally be last among the Jews to be converted to the faith, according to the Psalm: "They shall be converted in the evening and shall suffer hunger like dogs," and so forth. Then those converted to the faith will receive the wage, which will occur at the end.

Therefore the text fittingly continues: "Many are called," namely to faith through preaching--Jews and Gentiles--"but few are chosen," because few Jews were converted, not all Gentiles were converted, and among those converted to the faith few labor as they ought in the Church's vineyard through works of righteousness. Therefore few are chosen to receive the wage.

The denarius signifies the essential heavenly reward: by reason of its material, because it is made of metal, which endures; by reason of its form, because its round or circular shape is the most capacious of all and that reward contains all good things; by reason of the figure visible upon it, namely the emperor's, for the whole wage is vision, and the better-disposed eye sees more subtly as that vision becomes clearer; and by reason of what it contains, because it holds the value of ten coins and is given to one who observes the Ten Commandments.

Concerning "Many are called," Cyprian says: "As the Lord finds you when he calls you," namely through death, "so he judges you." This is in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Numquid.

"Many are called, but few are chosen," because, as Gregory says in On Penance, Distinction 3, "many begin well who finish their lives in evil." Gratian says there that one who does not work in charity does not begin well.

Augustine says in his book On Rebuke and Grace: "Because of the hidden nature of this humility, we must believe that some of the children of perdition, without receiving the gift of perseverance to the end, begin to live in the faith that works through love and afterward fall." This is in On Penance, Distinction 3, chapter Idem.

"Can this man who still refuses to be corrected," namely from his vices, "say: 'What did I do, since I did not receive the gift of perseverance?' He is known to have received living faith, and through his own fault to have lost what he had received, because by his own will he relapsed from a good life into an evil one."

The chosen can therefore be called those who persevere, and these are few. The called are not only the wicked, but also the good who do not persevere.

Hence Gregory, speaking upon Ezekiel about the condition of the elect, says: "'They did not turn back when they went,' namely, those living creatures he had seen in the vision, which signify the righteous. For," Gregory says, "all the elect so tend toward good things that they do not return to perpetrating evil." "He who perseveres to the end shall be saved." This is in On Penance, Distinction 2, chapter Pennata.

This vineyard can also be expounded morally of each soul. Its vines are the powers of the soul and its fruits are works. God's call to act virtuously is his sending laborers into it at different hours to cultivate it: at the first hour in childhood, the third in adolescence, the sixth in youth, the ninth in mature age, and the eleventh in old age. Evening is the end of life, and the wage repaid for labor is the reward.

Sometimes those converted later die sooner. If they have labored perfectly during that short time, they are rewarded sooner than those called in childhood, and sometimes even more abundantly if they cultivated better. Those converted younger cannot complain, because everything comes from the Lord's liberality.

§ III. Another Parable of a Vineyard

Mark, Matthew, and Luke relate another parable preached by Christ concerning a vineyard, by which he reproves the hardness and ingratitude of the Jews and foretells their rejection. He spoke it near the time of his Passion.

“A certain man planted a vineyard, surrounded it with a hedge, dug a winepress in it”—which Mark calls a vat—“and built a tower in its midst. After leasing it to tenant farmers, he went abroad,” and so forth.

This man signifies God, who planted the vineyard—that is, the Jewish people—when he led it out of Egypt and chose it from all nations to become his peculiar people, according to the Psalm: “You transplanted a vineyard from Egypt; you cast out the nations,” namely from the promised land, “and planted it.”

The hedge with which he surrounded it was the guardianship of angels that defended that people. The winepress, which presses, was fear of the Law, through which they guarded themselves from evils lest they incur the Law’s penalties. The tower was the Lord’s most noble temple; through the prayers and sacrifices made there they were protected against their adversaries.

He leased it to tenant farmers when he ordained that this people be ruled and governed by priests and doctors of the Law. They were to procure for the Lord the fruit of good works that the people bore by their cultivation, not reserve it for themselves.

He went abroad, not by abandoning that people but by leaving both priests and people in the freedom of their choice.

The vineyard’s lord then sent his servants to the tenant farmer. Matthew speaks of servants in the plural, while Mark and Luke speak of a servant in the singular. There appears to be no contradiction, because as regards what they signified they were one through unity of purpose: the prophets sought one thing, namely that the vineyard—that people—should bear fruit for the Lord. Personally, however, they were many.

God therefore sent Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel to instruct that people and reprove its doctors and rulers, so that it might produce the fruits of good works to God’s honor. But they killed one with an iron saw, namely Isaiah; they stoned another, Jeremiah; and they killed another, Ezekiel.

Again he sent more servants, to whom they did similar things, neither receiving nor hearing them. Hence Stephen said to them in Acts 6: “You stiff-necked and uncircumcised in hearts and ears, you have always resisted the Holy Spirit. Which of the righteous did your fathers not persecute?”

At last, eager for the fruitfulness of his vineyard, that is, of that people, he says by way of the effect: “I shall send my beloved Son,” namely through the Incarnation, so that he may teach them the way of salvation and they may bear fruit for the Lord.

Note that Luke does not merely say, as Matthew does, “They will reverence my Son,” but also adds “perhaps”—as though to say: it will be in their freedom to hear and reverence him or not. He does not say “perhaps” as though he did not know what they would do or that they would not be converted by his words, but to show that God’s foreknowledge of the things that people were to do did not compel them to those deeds.

Hence Augustine says in Cause 23, Question 4, chapter Nabuchddonosor: “It is most foolishly said that God’s predestination—that is, foreknowledge—works in all things, whether toward good or toward evil, so that some necessity seems to impel people to either. In good acts, the will is to be understood as not without grace; in evil acts, the will is to be understood as without grace: namely, as the cause of our good or evil work.”

“Having therefore one most beloved son,” Mark says, he sent nothing dearer or more precious than him to him, because he determined that he should be incarnate. Once incarnate and living among them, preaching and performing miracles, the Son admonished the people to bear fruit for the Lord. He reproved the vineyard’s tenants—the scribes and Pharisees—who sought for that people signified by the vineyard to bear fruit for themselves in tithes and offerings, but did not care that the people should bear fruit for God through good works.

When the vineyard’s tenants saw him—that is, when they perceived his works—they recognized him as the Son of God or the Messiah promised in the Law. This does not mean that they truly acknowledged him, but that they saw such works of his that, from those works and according to the prophecies given to them, they could have recognized him as the promised Messiah and the Son of God.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

But their malice blinded them, as Wisdom 2 says. Hence ignorance did not and does not excuse them from the sin of unbelief, as is said in Cause 1, Question 4, in the last section.

The vineyard's tenants therefore said to one another: "Come, let us kill him, and we shall have this vineyard, which is his inheritance." Once this man was killed, who by his teaching turned the people toward bearing fruit, the vineyard would remain to them with its customary tithes, offerings, rites, and sacrifices.

They cast him outside the vineyard and killed him, because the Lord Jesus suffered outside the gate of Jerusalem, where this vineyard--the people--was.

Concluding the parable, Christ said: "When the lord of the vineyard comes, what will he do to those tenant farmers?" How will he treat them for such cruelty and ingratitude?

The simple people in the crowd answered this question as reason teaches should be done in such a case: "He will miserably destroy those wicked men and lease his vineyard to other tenant farmers." Matthew says that they told him this. But the scribes and Pharisees, maliciously understanding that he spoke against them, added what Luke reports, saying: "God forbid," namely, that he should miserably destroy them as the crowds had said.

Christ showed that those crowds had spoken truly. Confirming the point, he himself said: "He will miserably destroy those wicked men," and so forth. As Mark says, he miserably destroyed the obstinate wicked Jews temporally in Jerusalem's destruction by Titus and Vespasian, because through their unbelief they all descend to hell.

He leased the vineyard--that is, the Church, which once existed among that people because they alone worshiped the true God while all others declined into idolatry--to others. That is, he committed it to be ruled and cultivated by prelates converted from the Gentile world. By true admonitions and holy examples, they caused the peoples entrusted to them to bear fruit for the Lord.

Through the prophet David in the Psalm, Christ nevertheless shows himself over both the Jewish people and the Gentile people, to whom the vineyard was to be transferred in its cultivation as regards those converted to faith from both peoples.

Hence Jesus said: "Have you never read in the Scriptures, 'The stone that the builders rejected,'" and so forth? Because David lived before the building of the temple made by his son Solomon, he appears to have prophesied both the figure and the thing figured.

The Master of the Scholastic History says that while Solomon's temple was being built, a certain notable stone came to the builders' hands. Although they repeatedly tried to place it among the other stones in the walls, they could not, because it did not fit with the others. Sometimes it was found larger and sometimes smaller than was needed.

At last they placed it at the temple's summit, at the temple's corner, where and from which two walls were joined. It was so well desired there that all marveled as though this had been done by the Lord.

This stone is Christ, as the Apostle says. The builders of Solomon's temple are the same as the vineyard's tenants, namely the spiritual governors of the Jewish people. The stones were the people whom they instructed to observe God's Law.

The stone Christ came into their hands when he lived among them. They wished to build him in with the others, that is, to regard him as a mere man and subject him to the ceremonies of the Law that they taught to others. But he could not fit suitably, because he did things beyond the powers--that is, the manner--of human beings.

Hence the chief priests, who were the builders, rejected that stone and treated him as rejected. But God exalted him and gave him the name above every name, establishing him at the summit of the Church's temple as its head, in whom two walls are joined into one: the Jewish and Gentile peoples, as regards those converted in unity of faith and love.

"He who falls upon this stone shall be broken; but upon whomever it falls, it shall crush him." Christ speaks metaphorically of the differing falls of the Jews who stumble against this stone, Christ. The difference is that some fall upon the stone, while the stone falls upon others.

If an earthen vessel falls upon a stone, it is broken but only into large pieces and can be restored with iron. But if a great stone falls upon an earthen vessel, it is completely shattered and crushed so that it cannot be repaired.

One who gravely offends Christ falls upon the stone. Although such a person is broken from the integrity of a good life, he can nevertheless amend until the end of life and be restored by the iron of penance.

But if he waits until the stone falls upon him--that is, until the judgment of death is inflicted--he is then crushed so that he is irreparable. It is as though Christ wished to say: "And if you stumble against me by not believing, take care not to remain in unbelief until the end."

All three Evangelists say that when the chief priests recognized that this parable was directed against them, they sought to seize and kill him. But they omitted to do so because they feared the people, who were affectionate and devoted to him, lest they snatch him from their hands.

Morally, the vineyard is the soul; the vines are its powers and the fruits its works. God planted it when he created it. He places the hedge of angelic guardianship around it. The winepress is the remorse of conscience that presses it. The tower is reason, by which it can distinguish friends from enemies and good things from evil.

He leases it to cultivators when he infuses the soul into the body so that it may cultivate it. He goes abroad by leaving it in freedom of choice. The time for bearing fruit approaches when it is in the middle of childhood and begins to possess a spark of reason.

Then God sends his servants--whether people exhorting it to good, angels, or inspirations inciting it to good--so that it may render to God the fruit of good works. But some people despise these things and as though kill them by not following them. God sends further inspirations, exhortations, or tribulations, all of which they similarly despise.

Finally, he himself approaches by grace, inducing them to true conversion. But such a person sometimes becomes so ungrateful and wicked that he kills Christ himself by depriving himself of his grace. Of such people the Apostle says in Hebrews: "Crucifying again the Son of God within themselves and holding him up to contempt." Therefore, when the Lord comes to such people in death, he will miserably destroy those wicked men, and so forth.

§ IV. Another Parable

Matthew alone relates this parable, which Christ pronounced immediately after the foregoing vineyard parable. A man who owned a vineyard told his elder son to go cultivate it. The son answered that he would, but did nothing. When the father commanded the other son to do the same, he refused to go but afterward went.

When Jesus asked which of them did the father's will more fully, they answered: "The second," because he went to cultivate even though at first he contradicted.

This vineyard is the Church, to cultivate which God sent two sons: the Jewish people and the Gentile people. He commanded each through the natural law that each possessed.

The elder, the Jewish people, promised God that it would go when, after the Law was given to it--which in its moral part was a certain explanation of the natural law--they said to Moses: "We shall do everything the Lord has commanded us, and we shall obey him." Yet they did not cultivate this vineyard, that is, by observing the Law's precepts.

Although the Lord commanded the other people, the Gentiles, through the implanted natural law to cultivate the vineyard, because they did not bind themselves to or receive the Law of the Decalogue they as though refused to go. Instructed by the apostles' preaching, however, they entered the Church's vineyard and cultivated it with great diligence. They therefore obey God the Father.

This can also be expounded morally of ecclesiastical persons--clerics and religious--who are called to labor in the Church and promise to do many things, such as observe chastity, poverty, and the like, but through negligence do not do them. Others of lesser condition, namely laypeople, do not promise these things but sometimes perform them. Thus these latter are obedient, not the former.

Hence Jerome says in Cause 8, Question 1: "I fear that, just as the queen of the south, coming from the ends of the earth, will judge the people of her time, and the Ninevites likewise," and so forth, "so many among the peoples will judge bishops who do not perform what befits their office."

Jerome therefore says: "Not only bishops, priests, and deacons ought to take great care that they excel in conduct and speech all the people over whom they preside, but also those of lower rank, because it greatly destroys God's Church when laypeople are better than clerics." This is in Cause 8, Question 1, chapter Qualis.

Luke alone relates another parable concerning a vineyard in which its lord planted a fig tree. When it bore no fruit after three years, the lord said to the vineyard's cultivator: "Behold, for three years I have come seeking fruit on this fig tree and find none. Cut it down, therefore. Why does it also occupy the ground?"

The cultivator answered: "Lord, leave it for this year, until I dig around it and put manure about it. If it does not bear fruit in the future, you shall cut it down."

This vineyard is the Church, in which different nations are planted like various trees. Among the rest, however, the Jewish people were planted like a sweeter tree. Although they were awaited for the fruit of full conversion for three years--the time of the Mosaic Law, the time of the prophets, and the time of grace--they have still not produced the fruit of true faith.

For this reason the Lord God as though showed that he wished to cut them down when he destroyed that people through Titus and Vespasian. Nevertheless, the vineyard's cultivators, the prelates and doctors, considering that even within this third year, the time of grace, its fruitfulness is foretold by the prophecies to occur at the end, say to the Lord in desire that it should still be awaited for fruit, by digging and applying manure.

§ V. Three Parables in Which the Kingdom of Heaven Is Compared to a Treasure, a Pearl, and a Net

Matthew alone relates these three parables spoken by Christ.

He says: “The kingdom of heaven is like a treasure hidden in a field,” and so forth. This treasure is knowledge of divine wisdom, namely of the supreme good, together with the savor of grace. Wisdom 7 says of it: “It is an infinite treasure to human beings,” namely wisdom, and so forth.

This treasure is hidden in the field of humility. Through humility a person humbles himself, taking his understanding captive in obedience to Christ in matters of faith, attributing no good to himself, unlike the philosophers, who said, “Our lips are our own,” and became fools. He subjects himself to obey God’s will and commandments.

The treasure is found there. Whoever finds it sells all things to buy the field itself: that is, he places everything second--substance, honor, knowledge, and life--to attain that humility and wisdom, and thus obtains the treasure.

Again, “The kingdom of heaven is like a man seeking fine pearls,” and so forth. These pearls are goods regarded as beautiful and precious and naturally desired and sought: riches, honors, powers, knowledge, pleasures of the flesh, a moral life, and the like.

While a person seeks these by desire, if he finds one pearl that he understands to be more precious than all because it contains the virtue and worth of all the others--true blessedness in the heavenly homeland--he surrenders all to attain it. He deprives himself of all those other goods in order to obtain it because he places affection for it before all the foregoing things and withdraws any one of them from himself whenever it would hinder him from attaining it.

Again, “The kingdom of heaven is like a net cast into the sea,” and so forth. What is related in this likeness resembles what occurs in the Church, which is called the kingdom of heaven.

This net is the Church’s preaching, woven from the authorities of the saints, which are bound to one another because of their agreement. The fishermen are the prelates and doctors who cast the nets of sermons into the sea of worldly life, where human beings are like fish, according to Abacuh: “You make human beings like the fishes of the sea.”

Not all fish but many are caught in these nets, namely those who receive the faith. Among them, some are good fish and some bad, all within the one net of the Church’s teaching. At last, when the net is drawn in at the end, the good faithful will be separated from the wicked by the angels’ ministry at the Last Judgment; the good will be taken into rest and the wicked cast outside.

Christ then adds: “Every scribe learned in the kingdom of heaven is like a householder who brings forth from his treasure new things and old” to govern his household. So too the prelate and doctor who casts the net must bring forth from the treasure of his wisdom, to catch many fish and lead them to faith--even though some will prove wicked--new things in his preaching, namely examples and sayings from the New Testament, and old things from the Old Testament.

Or the old things are those belonging to the old life, namely sins, which he preaches are to be avoided; the new are those belonging to newness of life, namely virtues, which he teaches are to be loved. Or sometimes he adduces old things from the Gentiles, and especially new things from the Church’s doctors.

Or from the treasure of his prudence he brings forth new things and old, namely deeds and words by which, so far as he can, he may meet the needs of both good and wicked people, not separating them from each other in the present, until the net is full--that is, until the number of faithful people foreknown and predestined by God, fixed and known to him alone, is complete.

Meanwhile, as Augustine says: “Not knowing who belongs to the number of the predestined and who does not, we ought to be so moved toward everyone by an affection of charity that we wish all to be saved.” This is in Cause 24, Question 3, chapter Corripiantur.

Therefore prelates, preachers, and other faithful people ought not to separate themselves from wicked people who are tolerated, because this is to be done at the end of the world, when the net is full. Hence Augustine says: “We commit a greater evil by separation from the good than we avoid by association with the wicked.”

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

God imputes to such a person neither his own sins, because he did not commit them, nor the sins of others, because he did not approve them; nor negligence, because he did not remain silent; nor pride, because he remained in unity.

Augustine likewise says upon the Psalm: “Who will give me wings like a dove?” He does not say, ‘like a raven.’ Although the dove seeks to fly away from troubles, it does not abandon love but always begets [read: groans].” So a good person wishes to be separated in body, but not in love, from those whom he cannot benefit.

If he is sometimes bound to them not by the birdlime of desire but by care and duty, so that he cannot abandon them, let him then say with the Apostle: “I desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ, but it is necessary to remain in the flesh for your sake.” Thus there is merit from the desire.

“Behold, I have gone far away in flight,” says the Psalm. Augustine expounds this as flight not in place, lest the charity of the good be broken and the exercise supplied by the wicked be lost; God mingles the wicked among them, as he mingled Judas with the disciples. All these are Augustine’s words in Cause 7, Question 1, in the section Cum autem, before the final chapter.

§ VI. Parables Showing God’s Great Kindness and Mercy in Receiving Converted and Penitent Sinners

Luke successively sets down three parables of this kind: concerning the ninety-nine sheep left in the desert to seek the wandering one; concerning the woman’s joy when she found ten drachmas [read: one of ten drachmas]; and concerning the prodigal who returned to his father and was immediately received.

The Evangelist says: “Publicans and sinners were drawing near to Jesus to hear him.” The Psalm teaches: “Salvation”—which certainly comes from Jesus, whose name is also interpreted “Savior”—“is far from sinners.” Jesus is not far in spatial distance, because he is everywhere according to his divinity, but in dissimilarity of virtue; the worse a sinner is, the farther away he is.

Likewise, according to the Psalm, “The Lord is near to all who act innocently toward him in truth [read: all who call upon him in truth]”; and the prophet Joel says: “Whoever calls upon the Lord’s name shall be saved.” This is not to be understood of outward or vocal invocation alone, but, as Augustine says, “of one who calls upon him by serving him, not contradicting him.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 3, chapter Adhuc. For “lord” and “servant” are correlatives.

Such a person draws near to Jesus, desiring salvation and disposing himself to hear and obey.

The scribes and Pharisees murmured. The scribes were doctors of the Law; the Pharisees were a sect of Jews who lived more austere and religiously than the rest, just as religious do now.

Murmuring is a certain complaint accompanied by impatience, especially against superiors, and is therefore called a sin. Distinction 90 says: “Let him who murmurs be a stranger to the unity of the brethren.”

This murmuring was prefigured in the murmuring of Maria, Aaron’s sister, against Moses because of the Ethiopian wife he had taken. As Gratian says, Miriam signifies the synagogue, or others who murmur against Christ because he took as wife the Church from the Gentiles, previously blackened by vices; or because Christ and other prelates and doctors receive sinners into their familiarity in order to produce from them children of good works.

Because they murmur unjustly, they are therefore struck by God with the leprosy of unbelief or another sin. This is in Cause 2, Question 7, in the section before chapter Paulus.

The Evangelist expresses their murmuring by saying: “This man receives sinners and eats with them.” It was as though they said: “This shows that he is a great sinner. For, as the Wise Man says, ‘Every animal loves its own likeness’ and inclines toward it,” namely to associate with it.

“But this Jesus shows great affection for the greatest and most manifest sinners, because he receives them, speaks familiarly with them, and eats with them. Therefore he is a sinner like them, for if he were just, he would shrink from and avoid them.”

They argued badly and falsely. Christ did not love them or show them familiarity insofar as they were sinners—that is, on account of their sins—but because they were disposing themselves toward amendment and works of virtue, and therefore approached him to hear the teaching of salvation. Christ received them as a physician frequents the sick, not because their sickness delights him but in order to expel it.

Hence Augustine says in his book On Penance: “From this it is evident that sins greatly displease him,” namely God, “for he is always ready to destroy them. If he loved them, he would not always destroy but preserve them and cherish them as his own gifts. But he destroys the sins he finds, lest what he created be dissolved and what he loved be corrupted.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 3, chapter Adhuc.

Their murmuring did not proceed from zeal for true justice because sin displeased them, but from the zeal of envy and pride. It came from envy because they begrudged Christ's growing fame, not only among the just but also among sinners who devoutly followed and heard him, and sought to diminish it by such disparagement.

It also came from pride because, being proud and considering themselves just, they did not deign to associate with sinners, as though the sinners were unworthy even of their speech. In this way they wished to accuse Christ of appearing unlike themselves.

Hence Gregory says in a homily: "True justice has compassion, but false justice has disdain. Although the just rightly tend to be indignant with sinners, what is done through the swelling of pride is one thing and what is done through zeal for discipline another. The just are indignant, yet do not disdain; they stir persecution, yet love.

"But, on the contrary, those of false justice tend to be proud, despise all others, show no merciful condescension to the weak, and become worse because they do not believe themselves sinners." This is in Distinction 45, chapter Vera.

Jerome says to the same effect upon Jeremiah: "Such people say, 'Depart,' namely, 'you polluted people. Depart, go away. Do not touch us. Do not communicate with us.' Such speech does not illuminate the eye, heal the sick, or cure the infirm; rather, it kills them and casts them into despair.

"Good rulers, considering the weakness of others from their own weakness, strive more through humility and meekness to rescue sinners from the snare of error than through austerity to drive them, swimming, into savage destruction." This is in the same distinction, chapter Recedite.

The Lord afterward showed with what affection, diligence, and joy a sinner should be received to penance and how one should work toward this, speaking this parable: "Who among you, if he has a hundred sheep and loses one," and so forth?

This man is God, both God and man, the creator of the world, feeding his sheep in heaven through enjoyment and on earth through interior consolation.

The hundred sheep are angels and innocent human beings created by him. The ninety-nine are the nine orders of angels. Ninety signifies their perfection because it results from nine multiplied ten times. Ten, because it is the first boundary of numbers, signifies perfection, while nine signifies the number of orders.

The hundredth sheep is human nature. It wandered, according to the Psalm: "I have wandered like a sheep that has perished," when our first parents transgressed God's command. Because all human beings existed within them according to seminal power, all sinned and perished in Adam.

Seeking this wandering sheep, namely the human race, the heavenly shepherd as though left the ninety-nine in the desert when God was made man--not in the desert, that is, heaven, which is called a desert because it had been abandoned by the evil angel and by man, but in the world. He did not abandon the angels according to his divinity, but differed from them in the humanity he assumed.

He sought it by laboring greatly in teaching, healing the sick, traveling about, suffering many things, and instituting sacraments for this sheep. At last, having found it, he placed it upon his shoulders when he himself bore our sins in his body--that is, the punishment for sins--upon the wood of the cross, "that, being dead to sins, we might live to righteousness," as Peter says in his canonical epistle.

He brought it back to the desert of heaven with the others when he ascended into heaven in our nature and opened heaven to others. With his friends, the holy souls, and his neighbors, the holy angels, he held great joy and festivity over repaired human nature.

He concludes concerning every sinner converted to penance: "So I say to you, there is joy in heaven over one sinner doing penance more than over ninety-nine just persons who need no penance."

This is understood in two ways. In one way, it refers to the falsely just who consider themselves just and not in need of penance, though they are not just. What is said is then clear. Cause 11, Question 3, chapter Iniustum, says: "Humble confession in evil deeds is better than proud glorying in good ones."

In another way, it can refer to people who are truly just but imperfect, and to a converted sinner who through fervor ascends to great perfection. Other things being equal, there should be greater joy over a just person remaining in innocence than over a penitent sinner.

Matthew adds: "It is not my Father's will that one of these little ones should perish." This is understood of the elect; or, if said of all, it is understood of the antecedent will, not the consequent will, which was treated above in the First Part under the title on eternal law.

This example shows that compassion and mercy are to be used toward sinners wishing to return to penance. Hence Cause 26, Question 7 says: “One who repents from the heart ought to be received as the Lord showed when he summoned his friends and neighbors, saying, ‘Rejoice with me, because I have found the sheep I had lost.’”

Ambrose likewise says in his book On Paradise: “The shepherd in the Gospel is read to have carried the loose sheep [read: the weary sheep], not cast it away.” Solomon says: “Do not be less just.” Moderation ought to temper justice. For how can a person be offered to you for healing if you regard with loathing the one who supposes that he will be an object not of compassion but of contempt to his physician?

Ambrose likewise speaks in the person of Christ: “I pardon willingly; for your sake I forgive. I prefer mercy to sacrifice, because by sacrifice the just person is commended, while by mercy the sinner is redeemed. I came not to call the just but sinners. In the Law there is sacrifice; in the Gospel, mercy. The Law was given through Moses; through me, grace.” Thus Ambrose, in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Serpens.

Christ adds another parable on the same subject, related by Luke alone: “What woman, having ten drachmas, if she loses one, does not light a lamp,” and so forth?

As Gregory explains, this woman is divine Wisdom, who possessed ten drachmas, that is, ten kinds of creatures marked with her image. Nine were the nine orders of angels. The tenth, lost through the sin of our first parents, was human nature, as though unknown--that is, deprived of the vision of divine Wisdom.

To find it, Wisdom lit a lamp when, by God’s operation, the Word became flesh. In Christ’s person, as in a lamp of the kind made both anciently and now for the poor, Christ’s flesh was the earth, assumed from our earthly flesh; his most pure soul, filled with the oil of grace, was like a white wick with oil; and his divinity was like the fire. For, as Deuteronomy says, “Our God is a consuming fire.”

When the lamp was lit through the Incarnation of the Son of God, Wisdom overturned the house of human conduct by changing morals through Christ’s teaching and examples. She sought diligently, working those things through which human nature would be found and seen approvingly by God through the infusion of grace.

When it was found, she summoned her neighbors and friends to rejoice with her, namely the angelic creatures and holy souls, by manifesting the deed to them through its effect and granting them joy over it.

She concludes: “So I say to you, there is joy before God’s angels over one sinner doing penance.”

Jerome says: “Because the divine nature is merciful and kind and more inclined to pardon than to vengeance, because it does not desire the sinner’s death but that he be converted and live, if anyone after a fall into sins is converted to true penance, he will quickly obtain pardon from the merciful Judge.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Idem.

Jerome continues: “It is possible that, just as the Church, which formerly had spot, wrinkle, and uncleanness, was afterward restored, so too the sinner should run to the physician, because the healthy have no need of a physician but those who are ill, so that he may heal his wounds, and he shall become part of the Church, which is the body.”

And again, lest perhaps those remembering their sin return more slowly, he says: “I shall cause you still to dwell in tabernacles as in the days of festivity, so that what baptism does, penance too may do, and they may dwell in the Savior’s tabernacles in the Church.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 1.

§ VII. The Prodigal Received Most Joyfully by His Father

Luke alone relates this most beautiful parable. “A certain man,” he says, “had two sons. The younger said: ‘Father, give me the portion of the substance that falls to me,’” and so forth.

It has two expositions. The first, which I shall touch upon very briefly, concerns two peoples: the Jewish people as elder because of their dignity, and the Gentile people as younger, under one common father, God, through creation and governance.

The younger, the Gentile people, departed from the Father through idolatry and fell into many crimes and a want of truth. Nor could the teachings of the philosophers and poets, signified by husks--as in Distinction 37, section Hinc etiam--satisfy the stomach of its mind. It was otherwise with the Jewish people, who remained with God the Father through knowledge and worship of the true God.

At last the Gentile people came to itself and recognized its misery from the teaching of the Gospel offered to it. It returned to the heavenly Father through conversion to the faith and was received with great joy and ornaments into grace.

Perceiving this, the elder son, the Jewish people, was indignant and would not enter the Father’s house, the Church. Although the heavenly Father exhorts it to do so through the Scriptures, it still remains outside in unbelief.

Morally, the parable signifies two states: that of the just but proud, and that of converted sinners. God is nevertheless the father and governor of both states.

Because every age is prone to evil from its youth, at the beginning of the use of reason, when carnal concupiscence incites a person toward pleasurable things, someone of that age desires liberty, so that he may be shaken free from the yoke of subjection to parents and teachers under whom he had previously been placed. This is the young man asking his father to give him a portion of the substance.

The heavenly Father's substance is whatever we possess of natural, spiritual, and temporal goods.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

"For what do you have that you did not receive?" says the Apostle in Romans. The young man therefore asks--that is, longs and desires at that age--to use freedom of choice concerning the aforesaid goods, supposing that this will conduce to his good.

The heavenly Father divides the substance because he grants freedom of choice and the ability to use the goods bestowed either well or badly. Jerome says in his book Against Jovinian: "God created us with free choice. We are drawn by necessity neither to virtues nor to vices; otherwise, where there is necessity there is no crown." This is in On Penance, Distinction 2, chapter Si enim.

People commonly begin in adolescence to use freedom of choice badly, because "the number of fools is infinite," Ecclesiastes 1. Departing from the heavenly Father through the loss of grace, they travel into a distant country by entering the state of the wicked, which is unlike God's goodness.

From the Gospel text one can note the incursion of such a sinner into the seven capital sins.

When the young man asks his father for his portion of the substance, the pride of presumption is indicated, as though God were bound to him and he presumed that he could govern himself well by himself.

When he goes into a country distant from his father, envy is indicated. Nothing is so distant from God as envy, since God is goodness and charity itself, to which envy is contrary.

When he dissipates his substance by living wantonly, lust is plainly indicated, which rules adolescents before the other sins and more openly. Although the spiritual substance of virtues is dissipated in every mortal judgment, in lust not only grace but also temporal substance, reputation, and especially natural substance are dissipated.

When it is said that, after a famine arose in that country, he began to be in need, avarice is indicated. As Jerome says, "The unbeliever"--that is, the avaricious man, which according to the Apostle is the service of idols--"needs even a penny," because he seems to himself to need everything.

Note that a great famine arises in that country distant from the Father, that is, in the state of sin. Because rest of mind is found neither in lust nor in the other vices, there remains the desire for the true and supreme good implanted in human minds, as Boethius says. This is spiritual hunger.

When it is said that he went and attached himself to one of the citizens of that country, anger is signified. The citizens of that distant country are demons obstinate in malice. One of them is called Abador, a name interpreted "destroyer," who tempts concerning anger. One made like him adheres to him. Chrysostom says that an angry man resembles a demoniac who acts furiously, and the same writer says that there is nothing between anger and madness.

When it is said that this citizen sent him to the farm to feed swine, sloth is intimated. Commonly, citizens and nobles, as this man was, remain idle on a farm, and he was to feed swine because the slothful and idle person feeds and nourishes unclean and wanton thoughts, figured by swine.

Finally, when it is said that he desired to fill his stomach with husks, gluttony is intimated, which sins even in the vilest foods by desiring them too ardently or beyond measure.

Next is intimated the manner of his conversion to penance through contrition, confession, and satisfaction. Seneca says that the beginning of salvation is knowledge of oneself, which occurs through interior consideration. Hence the Evangelist says: "But returning to himself."

A person remains outside himself while he is wrapped in sins and does not use reason. But the Lord says through the prophet: "Return to the heart, O transgressors."

A person turns away from God in four ways and, while remaining outside himself, goes farther and farther away. The first, as Jerome says, is to have thought things that are evil; the second, to have acquiesced in perverse thoughts; the third, to have resolved in the mind to fulfill them in deed; the fourth, not to do penance but to take pleasure in one's sin. This is Jerome in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Super tribus.

At the first stage a mortal sin can also be noted, namely through lingering pleasure without consent to the deed. Therefore, inviting the soul to penance four times, God says in the Song: "Return, return, O Sunamitis; return, return, that we may behold you." According to Jerome, "Sunamitis" is interpreted "wretched," "captive," or "mortified," all of which suit the sinful soul.

Return, therefore, by departing from those four stages. Return within yourself by considering both the state of the good and the state of sinners. Hence the text says that, returning to himself, he said: "How many hired servants in my father's house abound in bread."

In the Father's house, which is the Church, the hired servants are those who serve God. Although they serve principally from love of the Father, they nevertheless hope without doubt to obtain the greatest reward from him. Even now, beyond their hoped-for wage, they abound in the bread of spiritual consolation within their very works. These consolations surpass every human consolation, and the things that could be related about them are omitted.

"But I perish here with hunger," namely in this state of sin. What refreshment is there in it, when even the Philosopher says that every wicked person is filled with regret and is drawn now this way and now that by his passions toward diverse and contrary things? Augustine says: "You commanded, Lord, and so it came to be, that every disordered mind should be its own punishment."

Here a person suffers a deficiency through hunger, deprived of spiritual goods; in the other life, deprived of heavenly goods. How many evils he endures and incurs through sin is not to be discussed here.

"I shall arise," by ceasing from the act of sinning, "and go to my father," directing myself toward God through fear and hope, and at every step recalling my sins and crushing myself with remorse. "I shall say to him: Father, I have sinned against heaven and before you."

In confession, this means disclosing to the priest both manifest sins, which are said to be before heaven, and hidden sins, which are said to be before God because he alone knows them. All this is to be done with humility, so that the penitent says it with feeling: "I am now unworthy to be called your son."

He should resolve to make satisfaction according to God's and the confessor's command, saying effectively: "Make me like one of your hired servants," that is: "Just as you command them to do what you will, so impose it upon me too, and I am ready. Just as you refresh them with spiritual foods, so console me too, though unworthy."

If a sinner is truly converted, he carries out in deed what he conceives in mind. "He arose," therefore, departing from the purpose of sinning. Pope Callistus says: "A man is changed from sin and rises by God's grace from his fall." This is in Distinction 50, chapter Ponderet.

"He came toward his father's house," the Church, grieving over the deeds he recalls. Ambrose says: "There is nothing of such great sorrow as when someone placed under the captivity of sin remembers from where he has slipped, from what state he has fallen, and that from the fair and beautiful appearance of the divine constitution he has flowed downward toward these earthly and bodily things." This is in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Sunt qui arbitrantur.

"While he was still far away," because, although worn down by imperfect sorrow, he was not yet contrite, "his father saw him" with the eye of mercy. With this eye the Lord looked upon Peter after he denied him and made him weep bitterly over his sin.

The Lord says through Malachi: "Be converted to me," by disposing and fitting yourselves for grace, "and I shall be converted to you" by conferring it.

Jerome says: "God's moderation and kindness seek only our return and desire to save us through his long-suffering goodness." This is in Distinction 93, chapter Diaconi.

Pope Leo says: "We cannot set a measure upon God's mercy or define times for it, for conversion suffers no delays with him." Hence the text continues: "Moved with mercy for him, he ran to meet him." The Psalm says: "His mercy shall come before me," by infusing first grace, which is called prevenient because it is bestowed without any preceding merit.

Jerome says: "That, though great, you may regard the little; that, though a rich shepherd, you may not despise the sick sheep: Christ took the thief from the cross into paradise. And lest anyone think conversion ever too late, he made the punishment for homicide into martyrdom. Christ, I say, joyfully embraces the returning prodigal and, leaving the ninety-nine sheep, carries upon the devout shepherd's shoulders the one little sheep that remained.

"Where the sinner recognizes his wound and brings himself to the physician for healing, there the rod is not needed, but the spirit of gentleness." This is in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Importuna.

“He fell upon his neck,” embracing him, by which union through love is intimated. Love, according to Dionysius, has a unitive power. Hence the Apostle says in 1 Corinthians 6: “He who adheres to God” through charity “is one spirit with him.”

“He kissed him,” reconciling to himself the one who had formerly been his enemy. The Apostle says in Romans 5: “When we were enemies” through sins against God, “we were reconciled through the death of his Son,” from which penance and the other sacraments possess their power. A kiss is a sign of reconciliation and peace.

Having forgiven the offense, he restored the merits the man had acquired by bringing his mortified good works back to life. Hence Augustine says in On Penance, Distinction 3: “It is devout to believe, and faith demands, that when Christ’s grace has destroyed the former evils, it also rewards the good things. When it destroys what it did not find as its own, it loves and cherishes what it planted in the sinner.”

“The son spoke,” namely by confessing aloud. Hence Ambrose says in a sermon: “Behold, now the acceptable time is present, in which confession frees the soul from death. Confession opens paradise. Confession grants the hope of salvation. Hence Scripture says: ‘Declare your iniquities, that you may be justified.’” Thus Ambrose, in On Penance, Distinction 1.

“Father, I have sinned against heaven and before you.” The priest is called father. Gregory says in Distinction 96: “Who doubts that Christ’s priests are accounted the fathers and teachers of all the faithful?” Let the penitent therefore confess to him all sins committed against God--this is to sin against heaven--and those committed against people--this is to sin before you. Or “against heaven” means hidden sins, known in heaven, that is, to God; “before you” means manifest sins, known to people.

Pope Leo says: “God’s manifold mercy so aids human falls that hope of eternal life is restored not only through the mercy of baptism but also through the medicine of penance, so that those who have violated baptism’s gifts may, by condemning themselves through their own judgment”--namely by confessing to a priest--“come to forgiveness of their crimes.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 1.

“I am now unworthy to be called your son.” I do not ask to be treated indulgently as a son, but to be afflicted with penances. Augustine says that the penitent should place himself at the judge’s discretion in the priest’s judgment, reserving nothing of himself to himself, so that at the priest’s command he may do everything to recover the soul’s life that he would do to avoid bodily death--and this with joy, because he recovers an infinite life. Thus Augustine, in On Penance, Distinction 5, chapter 1.

The same Augustine says in a sermon on penitents: “It is not enough to change one’s conduct for the better and depart from former evils unless satisfaction is made for what has been done through the sorrow of penance, through the groaning of humility--that is, humble confession--through the sacrifice of a contrite heart, with alms and fasts cooperating.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 1. Understand this as applying, when the ability is present, to confession and satisfaction.

In Cause 26, Question 7 it is said: “Let the penitent receive within himself the disposition possessed by the man who said: ‘I have hated and abhorred iniquity.’” And the Apostle says of those who were made sorrowful according to God: “What great care it has worked in you, and what defense, zeal, and punishment; in all things you have shown yourselves careful in the matter.” Even in the very things in which he sinned, let the penitent do many contrary deeds, as Zache did. Thus the canon.

The father said to the servants: these are either the angels who cooperate in bringing sinners back to God and procuring good things for them; or preachers, who in their sermons ought to give confidence of pardon to those converted to penance, for the Lord says in Ezekiel: “Is the death of the wicked my will, and not rather that he be converted and live?” And again: “If the wicked man turns away from his wickedness, I shall remember none of his iniquities.”

Or the servants are the ministers of the sacraments, who ought to be ready to minister penance to all penitents, especially at death. Hence Cause 26, Question 6 says: “If a priest denies penance to the dying,” when they do what they ought, “he is guilty of their souls, because the Lord says: ‘On whatever day the sinner is converted to penance, he shall live and shall not die.’ True confession can occur at the final moment, because the Lord examines not only time but also the heart, just as the thief merited to be in paradise through the penance of one moment.”

“Quickly bring forth the first robe,” that is, declare and by your ministry work to this end, that the purity lost through crimes may be restored. For true penance, Augustine says, strives to bring the confessor back to baptismal purity. This is in On Penance, Distinction 3, chapter Sunt plures.

John Chrysostom speaks most devoutly in his book On the Restoration of the Fallen: “Believe me, such is God’s mercy toward human beings. It never rejects a person’s penance if it is offered sincerely and simply. Even if someone has reached the summit of evils, nevertheless, if he wishes to return from there to the way of virtue, God receives him, willingly embraces him, and does everything to recall him to his former state.

“What is still more excellent and eminent, even if someone cannot fulfill the whole order of satisfaction, God does not reject whatever little penance he performs, even in however brief a time.” Thus Chrysostom, in On Penance, Distinction 3. He gives the examples of Achab, Manassen, and those in the Lives of the Fathers.

“Quickly bring forth the first robe and clothe him.” As Ambrose says: “When wickedness is renounced, virtue immediately stands by, for the departure of malice effects the entrance of virtue.”

This first robe, that is, the chief and principal virtue, can be understood as charity, which is the wedding garment. It is the first virtue restored through penance and it covers the multitude and ugliness of sins. Stripped of it by sin, our first parents recognized themselves to be naked, whereas they had previously been clothed in it.

“Clothe him,” that is, teach the converted sinner to show this charity also in his outward conduct.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

“Give a ring for his hand.” The ring is faith, by which we are espoused to God. Hence the prophet Oseas says: “I shall espouse you to me in faith.” Give it on his finger, not in his purse--that is, instruct him to show it by works.

Hence Augustine says: “In the body of the one and immaculate dove,” namely the Church, “neither a heretic nor a wicked Christian is found. Just as if someone’s hand were withered, it would indeed be a true member, although ineffective and dead for want of blood, so faith, although true, is dead without works.” This is in Cause 1, Question 1, chapter Sicut urgeri.

“And shoes for his feet.” Shoes, which are made from the skins of dead animals, are the examples of the saints, especially those whom the Lord made living from among the dead after they had been mortified through penance.

These examples should be proposed so that the feet of the affections may be shod: lest, if bare, they stumble against the stone of obstinacy and pride through despair; be wounded by the thorns of avarice; or be befouled by the mud of former lusts.

Instead, having conceived hope of pardon, let the penitent walk confidently in the house of the Church through the examples of the penitent sinful woman, the publican, the praying and persevering Canaanite woman, the persecuting Paul, and the confessing thief.

Ambrose says: “No one can worthily do penance who has not hoped for pardon.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 1. Indeed, he should hope even for glory, since the penitent thief was told, “Today you shall be with me in paradise,” and heavenly glory was shown to Paul after his conversion.

“Bring the fatted calf,” that is, admit him to the sacrament of the Eucharist and set it before the penitent. In it is Christ, signified by the fatted calf that was offered under the Law.

Pope Leo says: “The mediator of God and human beings, the man Christ Jesus, delivered to the rulers of the Church this power: that they should give the satisfaction of penance to those confessing and, when they had been cleansed by that saving satisfaction, admit them to the communion of the sacraments through the gate of reconciliation.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Multiplex.

“And kill it,” that is, show that Christ, the calf, was killed for his sins, which is represented in the sacrament. Hence the book of Prosper’s Sentences says: “Christ was sacrificed once in himself, and yet a representation of that sacrifice occurs daily in the sacrament. True God and true man, he hung only once upon the cross, offering himself to the Father as a living, passible, and mortal victim, efficacious for the redemption of the living and the dead”--namely, those whom the depth of divine counsel judged, foreknew, predestined, and called to be redeemed. This is in On Consecration, Distinction 2, chapter Semel.

“Let us eat and feast.” Revelation 3 says: “If anyone opens the door to me,” namely through confession, “I shall enter to him and sup with him, and he with me.”

Priests cannot feast upon those who offer themselves deceitfully to penance. Their food, Origen says, is the remission of sins. Hence the true priest also says: “My food is to do my Father’s will,” that is, that converted and penitent sinners be saved. This is in On Penance, Distinction 3, chapter Inter haec, the first chapter.

“Because this son of mine was dead and has come to life again.” Gratian says: “Obstinacy of mind and contempt for confession are a certain death of impiety and leprosy of pride. A person comes to life again from them when, through grace, sorrow for sin and the desire for confession are inspired in him.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 1.

“He had perished and has been found.” The Psalm says: “I wandered like a sheep that has perished; seek your servant, Lord.” Above it was said: “I have found my sheep that I had lost.”

“And they began to feast,” because there is joy in the heaven of the Church--both militant and triumphant--over one sinner doing penance.

When the elder son heard these things, he was indignant, remained outside, and did not wish to rejoice with his father, brother, and the rest of the household. He signifies certain proud people who seem to themselves just and innocent because they have not withdrawn from the Church's house through great and manifest crimes like great sinners, and who labor in the Father's field through works belonging to the class of good things.

They are troubled and grow ill because God receives great sinners, if penitent, into pardon and bestows on them fervent and abundant gifts of grace, more than upon themselves, as is evident in Paul and many others.

Yet through the Scriptures the most merciful Father shows such people that his goodness speaks in this way and that nothing is thereby subtracted from their paternal inheritance. Even if the indignant person remains so, the best Father nevertheless does not desist from restoring the sinner.

This was also figured in the raising of the four-days-dead Lazarus. The chief priests and Pharisees, who appeared just and learned to themselves, were indignant against the Lord because of it and sought to kill Lazarus himself.

But Christ, invited with his disciples, came to a supper where Lazarus himself was a guest with others, and the whole house was filled with the fragrance of the poured-out ointment. Ambrose touches upon this mystery, saying: "However great the stench of the dead man, namely the sinner--that is, his infamy--may be, it is immediately wholly abolished when the sacred ointment of penance gives forth fragrance.

"The dead man rises through grace, and his bonds, namely those of sins, are commanded to be loosed by the Church's ministers. The veil is taken from his face, because one whose sin has been forgiven has nothing for which he should blush.

"When everyone ought to rejoice in so great a grace of the Lord and so great a miracle of the divine gift, the wicked were disturbed and prepared a plan against Christ. Do you not recognize that you are deservedly their successors, whose hardness you have inherited?

"For if you are indignant and conceive a plan against the Church because you see the dead return to life in the Church and sinners be raised through pardon, then, insofar as it lies in you, through envy you wish to kill again those who have been raised.

"But Jesus does not revoke his favor; rather, he heaps up liberality. He carefully keeps those whom he raised alive, and, when the glory of the resurrection has been celebrated, he joyfully comes to the supper." Thus Ambrose, in On Penance, Distinction 1, chapter Quantulibet.

There were certain heretics who said that sins could not be purged more than once through penance. Against them Augustine argues through reasons and examples in On Penance, Distinction 3, chapter Adhuc isti perfidi.

Because a preacher's intention ought to be to lead sinners back to penance, this parable would be excellent material for preaching throughout Lent.

First, in one part of Lent, one could speak of the capital sins with their offspring, by which a person is estranged from God, as treated above. Second, in another part, one could speak of revelation unto penance, and there of contrition, confession, and satisfaction. Next, one could speak of the restoration of the virtues, hope, and charity, as has been noted. Finally, one could speak of Communion and the Passion, and at the end of the Resurrection, the banquet of heavenly glory, the resurrection, and so forth.

§ VIII. Parables by Which Christ Shows God's Immense Kindness and Diligence in Calling People to the Banquet of the Church Militant and Triumphant

First, concerning the Church militant, Matthew alone relates the parable, saying: "The kingdom of heaven is like a man who was a king and made a wedding feast for his son," and so forth.

That is, what occurs in the Church, which is called the kingdom of heaven, is like what is related in this likeness. The good faithful are called heavens because they are raised from the earth through contempt of temporal things; God reigns and dwells in them through grace.

Note that because all our cognition takes its origin from the senses, and spiritual and divine things cannot be understood by human beings--especially those devoted to sensible things, as commonly happens--unless they are eaten through examples and likenesses drawn from sensible things they know, Sacred Scripture in both the Old and New Testaments therefore speaks of spiritual and divine matters through likenesses of bodily things, so that they may be grasped more fittingly.

People are accustomed to rejoice and delight especially in banquets, foremost among which are those held at weddings, and at such events they desire to find themselves present. Therefore, to express in some small degree the spiritual joy and refreshment possessed by the elect not only in future glory but also here in the Church militant, Scripture speaks of it under the parable of a royal wedding banquet.

It does so to incite people to seek such spiritual refreshment, since all incline toward joys and delights, and spiritual delights incomparably surpass and are more perfect than all bodily ones. Hence Bernard says: “Once the sweetness of the spirit has been tasted, all flesh loses its savor.”

This man is God the Father. He is called a man because of intellect, although his intellect is otherwise and incomparably more excellent than that of a human being or angel. He “dwells in inaccessible light,” says the Apostle. He is a king because he continually governs those whom he created. The Psalm says: “The Lord is a great God and a great king above all gods.”

His Son is the Father’s only-begotten. Hence we first “saw his glory, as of the only-begotten of the Father.” The Father made a wedding feast for his Son when he decreed that he should become incarnate.

The Son took human nature as his bride, from which the Church comes, whose head he is. He united that nature to himself in the unity of the Word’s person: the Word was made flesh, a human being being assumed, not God consumed.

The Virgin’s womb was the bridal chamber of this union, according to the Psalm: “Like a bridegroom proceeding from his bridal chamber, he rejoiced like a most mighty giant,” from a twofold substance, divine and human, “to run his course,” that is, cheerfully and eagerly, as though he ran most swiftly. He made his way from heaven to earth.

Those in the heavenly homeland rejoice exceedingly over this mystery of the Incarnation, figured in the wedding of hester and assueri, saying in Revelation: “Let us rejoice and exult, for the wedding of the Lamb has come.”

“He called many.” It does not say all, because little children of any nation, even Christian, who die uncleansed from original sin and without the use of reason are not called to the Church’s wedding feast.

All others are called, and these are many, because they come from every nation under heaven. Even before the wedding was celebrated in act—that is, before the mystery was accomplished through the act of the Incarnation—all were called at least through the natural law. By observing it, they were also called through hidden inspiration or revelation to believe at least that God exists and that he rewards those who seek him, namely through good works; that reward was procured in this wedding.

Such persons entered this wedding feast ecclesiastically as members of the Church, although they were very few, like Job, to whom this wedding mystery was also more fully revealed.

The Jewish people were called in a special way through the Mosaic Law, the prophets, and the examples of the saints of that time.

“He sent his servants to call those invited,” for the most part, when God willed certain holy men, his true servants who perfectly obeyed him, to exist in the world and solicit others by words and examples toward good conduct according to the natural or written Law, such as patriarchs, prophets, and Gentiles.

“They would not come,” because, as the Psalm says, “All turned aside” from the right way; “together they became useless; there is none who does good.” All the Gentiles had declined into idolatry, and the Jews into disobedience to the Law, according to Jeremiah: “From of old you broke the yoke” of the natural law; “you burst the bonds” of the commandments of the written Law; “you said, ‘I will not serve,’” namely by obeying God.

“Again he sent other servants,” namely his apostles, disciples, and martyrs, and even the Church’s bridegroom himself, their teacher in his humanity, teaching and inviting people to the wedding feast, that is, to the faith.

“The Lord sent me,” he himself says through Isaiah, “and his Spirit, to evangelize the poor,” to preach an acceptable year of the Lord and a day of repayment of good things for evils.

Through these servants he said: “Tell those invited: Behold, I have prepared my banquet.” The banquet of spiritual refreshment had been promised in the Old Testament, according to Isaiah: “The Lord shall make on this mountain a banquet of fat things, a banquet of marrow, a banquet of purified vintage, and shall cast death down forever.” Christ and the apostles announced that it had been prepared.

Jesus says: “Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I shall refresh you,” Matthew 11. Again he says: “I appoint to you that you may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom,” Luke 22.

The Psalm shows how much strength the food of this royal wedding table grants, saying: “You have prepared a table before me against those who trouble me,” a table refreshing and strengthening me against the devil, the flesh, and the world.

The Apostle intimates how exquisite these feasts are in 1 Corinthians 2: “Eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the human heart, what God has prepared for those who love him.”

The prince of the apostles says: “God has regenerated us into a living hope, into an incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading inheritance, preserved in heaven in us who are guarded by God’s power through faith for a salvation prepared to be revealed in the last time.” And below: “Believing in him, you shall exult with unutterable and glorified joy,” 1 Peter 1.

Faith in this mystery already accomplished, namely the Incarnation, and hope of reaching the glory thereby prepared for us are the spiritual refreshment of this banquet of the Church.

“Behold,” he says of the present, “I have prepared my banquet; my oxen and fatlings are killed.” The oxen signify the fathers of the Old Testament and the fatlings the saints of the New Testament. The examples of those already dead are set before us for imitation and refresh us at the banquet of the Church militant.

Hence Gregory says in a homily: “What is signified by the oxen except the fathers of the Old Testament? For when, by permission, they had received leave to strike their adversaries by repaying hatred, what else, so to speak, were they but oxen who struck their enemies with the horn of bodily power?

“What is figured by the fatlings except the fathers of the New Testament, who, while receiving the richness of inward grace and separating themselves from earthly desires, raise themselves to the heights as though by the wing of contemplation?”

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

This is in Cause 23, Question 4, canon Cum in lege.

It is to be noted, Gregory says, that in the first invitation nothing is said about oxen and fatlings, but in the second the oxen and fatlings are now recalled as slaughtered. For when we refuse to hear his words, almighty God adds examples, so that everything we believe impossible may become easier for us to hope for, insofar as we hear that others have passed through these things.

Or, according to Origen, the banquet is God’s discourse. The oxen are the strong teachings there; the fatlings are the sweet and delightful ones.

“And all things are ready”: namely, all that pertains to the mystery of the Lord’s Passion and our redemption, according to Chrysostom.

Or, according to the Gloss, all things are ready in that the entrance to the kingdom, formerly closed, has been opened through faith in my Incarnation.

Or, according to Chrysostom, all things are ready because whatever is required for salvation has already been fulfilled in the Scriptures. One who is ignorant finds there what he may learn; one who is stubborn finds there what he may fear; and one who labors finds there promises by which he may be stirred to work.

Or all things are ready because nothing necessary or conducive to salvation and spiritual refreshment is lacking from the Church’s banquet. There are the sacraments, which purge sins, increase virtues, and cause spiritual joys. There is the food of angels, bread from heaven possessing every savor of sweetness; and what is better than the Lord’s body and blood? Jerome says this in Cause 1, Question 1, canon Multi.

There too, namely in the Church, are the teachings of the Scriptures, of which the Psalm says: “How sweet are your words to my palate, sweeter than honey to my mouth.” There are the divine offices, the chants and instruments of the sweetly sounding Church.

“Come therefore to the wedding,” namely the Church’s wedding, the apostles said as they traveled throughout the world, for “their sound has gone forth into all the earth.” What they sounded forth in their preaching follows: “He has placed his tabernacle in the sun,” that is, the mystery of the Incarnation. They taught how people might come to the wedding through the law, namely the spotless law of the Lord, concerning which it follows: “The law of the Lord is spotless”—by receiving the law and evangelical doctrine and observing the law of charity.

“But they neglected it,” for the most part. For only a few were converted to the faith by Christ, the apostles, and the first preachers of the Gospel, in comparison with those who remained in unbelief. Those who did not believe therefore did not come to the wedding, although invited by the preachers.

The cause of this neglect was either a disordered affection for bodily pleasures, an excessive appetite for temporal riches, or a faithless contempt for divine things. These are indicated when it says: “One went away to his farm,” and so forth.

Citizens go to a farm for bodily recreation, which is not in itself unlawful. But when someone seeks bodily pleasures and recreations in such a way that on their account he neglects to approach the Church’s banquet by the way of the virtues, he is deprived both of it and of his own salvation.

Those therefore who, lest he admit the pleasures of the flesh [read: lest they lose the pleasures of the flesh], did not wish to receive the apostles’ teaching, which opposed them. Peter says: “I beseech you, as strangers and pilgrims, to abstain from carnal desires, which wage war against the soul.” So too now there are many whose god is their belly, giving themselves to lust like the horse and mule. These neglected to approach the wedding.

“Another went to his business.” Business properly occurs when a thing is bought so that, without being changed in substance or quality, it may be sold more dearly at another time or place, as Chrysostom says in Distinction 88, canon Eiciens.

Although this can be made honorable by its purpose when it is conducted for a good end--such as the support of oneself and one's household, provision for the commonwealth, or assistance to the poor--and in the proper manner, nevertheless of itself it appears to serve greed, because it knows no limit when it is conducted for profit. Avarice, to which merchants commonly devote themselves, is therefore signified by it.

We cannot adhere to the author of good things through living faith unless we utterly cast out greed, which is the root of all evils, Gregory says in Distinction 47, canon Bonorum, “Insofar as the love of temporal substance is preferred to God.”

Many therefore did not hear by assenting to the preaching of the Lord's disciples, because they were devoted to avarice. Hence Paul also said in 1 Timothy 6: “Charge the rich not to be high-minded, nor to hope in the uncertainty of their riches,” and so forth.

Alternatively, according to Hilary, the one man's farm and the other's business are explained thus: by worldly ambition people occupy themselves as though with a farm, since a man has lordship over and possession of his farm; but more people are detained in business by desire for money.

Or, according to Gregory, the farm signifies the exercise of earthly labor and business signifies other worldly activities. Therefore, whoever is intent upon earthly labor or devoted to worldly activities, and neglects to ponder the mystery of the Lord's Incarnation and to live according to it, refuses to come to the wedding, as though going to his farm or business.

“But the rest abused and killed” the servants who invited them. These were the malicious and very wicked men who killed Christ, the apostles, and other martyrs who preached the truth. The first among them were the Jews who persecuted the Church, and afterward other Gentile tyrants, Roman emperors, and other unbelieving princes of the world.

“When the king heard this, he was angry.” Anger is not said to be in God properly, but figuratively, after the likeness of people who are called angry when they punish. Hence Augustine says: “God's anger is not, as man's is, a disturbance of an agitated mind, but the tranquil establishment of a just punishment.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 3, canon Productior.

“And sending his armies, he destroyed those murderers.” According to Gregory, the armies of the heavenly king are the ranks of angels. Among human beings, every judgment of his is carried out through angels. Through their ministry, therefore, God destroyed the persecutors of the Church who had killed the apostles and martyrs in order to extinguish evangelical doctrine: temporally, by ending badly, and eternally, by consigning them to damnation.

“And he burned their city with fire,” because, according to Gregory, not only their souls but also the bodies in which they had dwelt will be tormented in the fire of Gehenna.

Or, according to Origen, the city of these impious men is the perverse and manifold doctrine of unbelievers, which is consumed and eradicated by fire.

It should be noted, however, that according to certain doctors the first and second call of the servants to the wedding are explained with reference to the Jewish people. Thus the first call began with Abraham, to whom the special promise of the Incarnation was made: “In your seed all nations shall be blessed,” and it continued through the other patriarchs.

The invitation preceding this call seems to mean the implanted natural law, which urges one toward the good and naturally seeks happiness. The second call is understood to have begun with the law given through Moses and to have continued through the prophets who followed, down to Christ and the apostles preaching in Judea.

By those who neglected the invitation and went to their farm, Chrysostom understands the common people among the Jews, whom delight in the world separated from Christ. By those who went to their business he understands the priests of that people and the other ministers of the Temple, who were devoted to avarice. Christ said to them: “Do not make my Father's house a house of business.” Thus they were separated from the true faith.

Those who, out of the hatred and envy of malice, killed Christ and the apostles are signified by the murderers. Against them the heavenly king, angry at their obstinacy in unbelief, sent his armies: according to Jerome, the Romans under the rulers Titus and Vespasian. He destroyed them, scattered the remnants who survived, burned their chief city Jerusalem, and reduced it to nothing.

The Romans and their rulers are called God's armies, although they were unbelievers, because they were stirred up to punish the Jews by God's command and disposition, as is said in Cause 23, Question 5, the final section and what follows.

What follows--“Then the king said: Go to the ends of the roads, and call everyone,” and so forth--is explained of the call made when the Jews drove the apostles from their territories, and the apostles dispersed throughout the world to preach to the Gentiles.

The second call can nevertheless be explained more generally, as has been said: it is called one that began with Christ and the apostles and ended with the peace granted to the Church when Constantine was converted to the faith.

God's purpose and predestination cannot fail or be frustrated, because he has his appointed number of the elect in the Church militant and afterward in the Church triumphant. Hence the king said to his ministers--that is, to the Church's prelates or to the angels set over the calling of the Gentiles, to whom he reveals his secrets and ordinances. This is what it means to tell them: "My wedding is ready, but those who were invited were not worthy." It is as though he said: spiritual and eternal refreshment has been prepared through the mystery of the Incarnation, and many had been invited and called, especially the Jews, through preachers, examples, and displayed miracles. But they made themselves unworthy through either their negligence or their malice, not through anything on God's part, for "God wills all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth," says the Apostle.

"Go therefore to the ends of the roads," you preachers--that is, according to Remigius, to the Gentiles, who were at the ends of the roads, namely in errors lying outside the way of truth.

Or, according to Chrysostom, go to all sinners of whatever condition, who are outside the way of the virtues that leads to God and are in various vices that lead to the devil.

Or, according to Gregory, since actions of human beings are called "ways" in Sacred Scripture, the ends of the roads can be understood as failures of action. Those whom no earthly success accompanies in their activities come more readily to God.

"And call to the wedding all whom you find." Ambrose says: "God excludes no crime, since he has forgiven all sins," in On Penance, Distinction 1, canon Nemo: that is, no one who comes to this wedding through baptism and penance. One comes not on foot, but by faith and conduct.

"The servants went out": either the apostles, going from Judea to the city of the Gentiles, are understood; or the angels, going from the inner places of divine counsel--where they comprehend the mysteries to be performed--to the ends of the roads, that is, to people living according to diverse rites outside the true worship of God.

"They gathered all whom they found, good and bad." According to Jerome, there was infinite diversity among the Gentiles. Some were devoted to honorable and moral life, although they were unbelievers, and these are called good. Others were devoted to crimes, and these are called bad. Yet people from both classes were converted to the faith and gathered into the Church's wedding.

Or the "good" are those truly converted to the faith, and the "bad" those who approached deceitfully, like Simon Magus. Nevertheless, the Church's prelates--the ministers of this king--admitted both together to the sacraments, because the bad displayed themselves as good and their deceit was unknown.

Or the good and bad are the elect and the reprobate. Even if the latter were truly converted, they afterward entangled themselves in vices, as did Nicholas, one of the seven deacons.

"And the wedding was filled with guests," because the Church was filled with those converted to the faith. This occurred especially when peace had been granted to the Church after the persecutions of the unbelieving emperors, and Constantine granted the faculty and freedom to build churches, celebrate the offices publicly, destroy idols, assemble councils, and preach publicly. The house of the Church was filled, yet with good and evil intermingled.

Hence Gregory says in a homily: "This life, which is situated between heaven and hell, just as it subsists in the middle, commonly receives citizens from both sides. Holy Church now receives them indiscriminately, but afterward distinguishes them at their departure. Therefore, if you are good, tolerate the wicked with equanimity for as long as you subsist here, because whoever does not tolerate the wicked bears witness against himself through his intolerance that he is not good." This is in Cause 23, Question 4, canon Haec vita.

Gregory likewise says: "That bridegroom who was going to call good and evil people to the wedding, wished to be born from both good and evil people. By his example they may learn that the iniquity of their parents cannot harm them." This is in Distinction 56, canon Impletae sunt nuptiae.

According to Origen, the wedding was filled with good and bad because both good and bad had to be called--not so that the bad should remain bad, but so that they might put off garments contrary to the wedding and put on wedding garments, concerning which the Apostle says: "Clothe yourselves with heartfelt mercy and kindness," and so forth.

"But the king entered to see the guests." Chrysostom says that this is not said because God is not somewhere, but because wherever he wishes to look through judgment, there he is said to be present; and wherever he does not wish to look through judgment, there he is said to be absent, namely for that time. The day of inspection, therefore, is the day of judgment, when he will visit the Christians who now recline at the tables of the Scriptures or the sacraments.

He is said there to have "seen a man," because at the final universal judgment he makes everyone see the wicked together with their acts of malice. Hence it follows: "not clothed in a wedding garment." It says "a man" in the singular because, according to Origen, all who preserve malice after the faith they had possessed belong to one class.

According to Gregory, the wedding garment means charity, because the Lord possessed it when he came to unite the Church to himself. Therefore, one who has faith in the Church but does not have charity enters the wedding without a wedding garment. Concerning this garment of charity the Psalm says of the Church: “The queen stood at your right hand in gilded clothing,” through which, namely, she is joined to the good.

Or, according to Augustine, one comes to the wedding without a wedding garment when he seeks there not the Bridegroom’s glory but his own.

Or, according to Hilary, the wedding garment is the grace of the Holy Spirit and the splendor of a heavenly habit, that is, purity, concerning which Ecclesiastes says: “Let your garments always be white,” that is, let your conduct be clean.

Or, according to Jerome, the wedding garment is observance of the Law and the Gospel, as though it were the garment of the new man. Whoever under the Christian name does not possess it on the day of judgment will be rebuked.

Hence it follows: “And he said to him: Friend, how did you enter here without having a wedding garment?” He calls him a friend because he was invited to the wedding as a friend through faith. He enters and remains there because he is numbered with the other Christians and admitted to the sacraments. But he is charged with shamelessness, because with a filthy garment he pollutes the wedding purity.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

For just as God is honored and the Church adorned through the good, so through evil believers the Lord is blasphemed because of their sins, as the Apostle says, and the Church is disfigured.

“But he was speechless.” Origen says that one who sins and has not put on the Lord Jesus by receiving faith and baptism appears to have some excuse of ignorance or the like. But a Christian has none, since he knew how he ought to conduct himself, and therefore he is struck speechless.

The unbeliever also, because he has already been judged and his condemnation is known, is neither arraigned at judgment nor his life examined, but is only condemned. The wicked Christian, however, is examined and questioned about how he entered without a wedding garment. He is nevertheless speechless because his conscience points out his evil works to him and that he is justly to be condemned.

Because it is no longer the time for repenting or changing the will, the king therefore says to his ministers: “Bind his hands and feet.” The hands are works and the feet are affections. They are then said to be bound because the ability to do or will meritorious good is taken away.

His ministers are the angels, concerning whom Matthew 13 says: “The angels shall go out and separate the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire.”

“Cast him into the exterior darkness,” that is, into hell, a land of gloom covered by the shadow of death. For although tormenting fire is there, it does not shine for them, but is dark, as though smoky and somewhat old.

Or, according to Gregory, the feet and hands are then bound by the rigor of the sentence, since the wicked were unwilling now to bind them from depraved works through the amendment of life. Or punishment then binds those whom guilt now bound from good works. We call blindness of mind “interior darkness,” but eternal damnation “exterior darkness.”

“There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.” Jerome says that the magnitude of the torments is shown through a metaphor from bodily members. Or the members are also described to prove the truth of the resurrection of bodies.

Thus, according to Gregory, teeth of the body shall gnash there which delighted here in gluttony. Eyes shall weep there which there [read: here] were occupied with unlawful desires, so that the individual members may be subjected to punishment there, since here they served in subjection to the corresponding individual vices.

Because at the wedding banquet it is not the beginning but the end that is sought, it therefore follows: “Many are called, but few are chosen.” Hilary says: “To have been invited without exception is the public kindness of humanity, but from among the invited and called, election on account of the judgment of meritorious uprightness.”

Some, Gregory says, do not even begin good things, while others by no means persevere in the good things they began. Therefore, let each person fear and humble himself all the more, insofar as he does not know whether he is chosen.

“He chose us,” says the Apostle, “before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and immaculate”: that is, without the stain of mortal sin, and holy--that is, firm and persevering. Because this is proper to the elect, and because many enter the Church’s wedding through faith when called, but few are without mortal sin and persevering in good, therefore many are called and few are chosen.

§ IX. The Parable of the Talents Granted by the Lord in Different Numbers to His Servants

Matthew alone relates this parable, which Christ preached to the Jews near the time of his Passion, saying: “A man setting out for a distant country called his servants,” and so forth.

Here the rigor of justice is shown in demanding an account of the goods granted to us, whether in the particular judgment through death or in the universal judgment at the end of the world. First, therefore, the various bestowal of goods by God is set out; second, the diverse employment by man of what has been bestowed; third, the fitting recompense of what has been employed.

It says: “A certain man setting out for a distant country.” According to Gregory, this man is our Redeemer, who in the flesh he had assumed went away into heaven. For the proper place of flesh is earth, and it is said to go, as it were, into a distant country when it is placed in heaven by our Redeemer.

Or, according to Origen, it can be said that God travels abroad in us who walk by faith and not by sight. For “while we are in this body,” says the Apostle, “we are absent from the Lord.”

“He called his servants”: whether the apostles, all believers, or all human beings, who in different ways are called his servants--either through obedience to his commandments, the service of latria, or universal providence.

“He delivered his goods to them.” All the goods we possess are the Lord’s. “For what do you have that you did not receive?” says the Apostle.

“To one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one.” Hilary understands the diverse graces delivered to each person in the five, two, and one talents.

These talents, however, are explained more particularly by different authors in different ways. Some explain them only as the doctrine delivered to the apostles and to others to be communicated to the peoples. Origen, for example, says that some received from Christ a greater dispensation of God’s utterances, others less--as it were, not understanding the affairs of the world even by half in comparison with their betters--and still others less, as though one talent.

One receives five talents when he can lead all the sensible things of the Scriptures to more divine senses. One receives two when he has been instructed in bodily doctrine, that is, in the literal sense. For two appears to be a carnal number, namely in the married state. If one has still less ability, the master of the household gave him one talent.

Gregory explains it otherwise in a homily: “To one he gave five talents,” and so forth. By five talents is expressed the gift of knowledge through the five exterior senses: a great knowledge and administration of temporal things, which are apprehended through the senses. By two talents understanding and action are designated. By the name of one talent understanding alone is expressed.

The one who had received five talents doubles them by trading. Jerome says that one who received the earthly senses doubled for himself the knowledge of heavenly things, understanding the Creator from creatures and incorporeal things from corporeal things.

Or, according to Gregory, he is one who rises through knowledge of temporal things more perfectly into knowledge of divine things, using and directing them to the contemplation and love of God; or one who duly exercises the administration of temporal things.

According to Gregory, one receives and multiplies two talents when, although unable to penetrate mystical and sublime things, he nevertheless teaches whatever he can from what he has received, for the aim of the heavenly homeland; and when he keeps himself from pleasures and other vices, he restrains others from them also by admonishing them.

Or one receives two talents when he receives both the virtue of acting well and understanding of heavenly things, according to Gregory.

Hilary explains it otherwise. “To one he gave five talents.” The one who received five talents is the people of those believing from the Law, that is, the Jewish people; progressing from the Law, they doubled its very fear by fulfilling it in the operation of evangelical faith. For there are five books of the Mosaic Law.

The people of the Gentiles is the one who received two talents, justified by faith and by confession of the Son and of the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; they confessed our Lord Jesus Christ as God and man, from spirit and flesh. Just as the Jewish people doubled through faith in the Gospel the entire mystery that they had known in the five talents, that is, in the Law, so the Gentile people merited understanding and action through the increase of the two talents.

The one who received one talent and hid it in the ground is the people persisting in the Law, who because of envy at the salvation of the Gentiles hid the talent received in the earth. To hide a talent in the earth is to conceal the glory of the new preaching under detraction concerning the Passion of the body.

It may also be explained otherwise: "To one he gave five talents," and so forth. By the five talents can be understood five kinds of goods that God bestows on some of his servants.

The first is a good of nature, namely body and soul with their powers. The second is a good of fortune, such as riches, power, glory, and the like. The third is the good of sanctifying grace, with the virtues and gifts. The fourth is the good of grace gratuitously given, such as prophecy, the working of miracles, and the like. The fifth is the good of glory, that is, the Eucharist, where God himself is truly present, which is the consummation and end of all the sacraments--that is, the faculty of confecting and administering it, as in priests.

God gave these five kinds of goods to some. They multiplied them insofar as, by duly exercising themselves in them, they increased their merit of grace and glory.

One receives two talents when he receives both the goods of nature and the goods of sanctifying grace, even if the others are lacking, or little of those goods common to all in baptism and afterward once more in true penance. They double them when they use them rightly or refer them to the love of God and neighbor.

One talent, namely the good of nature, is received by all and denied to none. One hides even this when he does not follow the judgment of reason, but hides it in the earth when he obscures reason, entangling himself in earthly things.

"He gave to each according to his own ability." As regards talents of doctrine and knowledge, God gives according to the ability to comprehend; as regards talents of grace and virtues, he gives according to the strength of one's endeavor to receive them.

"And he immediately set out." The Gloss says that he did not change place, but permitted them free power to act and left them to their own choice.

"Therefore, the one who had received five talents worked with them and gained another five." He does so when, by exercising himself in the goods received--in teaching; in the bodily senses and powers of the soul; in temporal goods; in the virtues and graces gratuitously given; and in the sacraments--he multiplies his merits. Likewise, the one with two gains the same amount. One who does not exercise the one talent is a person who wastes away in idleness and omission.

"But after a long time." Jerome says that this is stated because a great span of time lies between the Savior's Ascension and his second coming. "Here too," Chrysostom says, "see that the Lord does not everywhere demand an account at once, so that you may learn his patience."

Or, according to Origen, "after a long time" means after he had sent away those fit to trade for the salvation of souls. And perhaps for this reason one does not easily find anyone among those fit for such a work who passes swiftly from this life, as is evident from the fact that the apostles grew old, as is clear of Peter and Paul.

"The lord of those servants came." Origen says: "Observe in this place that the servants do not go to the lord to be judged, but the lord comes to them when the time--namely the foreordained time--has been fulfilled."

"And he settled accounts with them." Jerome says: "In the settling of accounts there is the examination of judgment." Augustine says: "Animals," namely brutes, "will render no account of their deeds, because they do not possess reason. Human beings, however, because they were made rational, will render an account to God concerning themselves and all the things they received for the use of the present life, and according to the quality of their acts they shall receive either punishment or glory." This is in Cause 15, Question 1, section Ex eo.

Gregory says in a homily: "This reading admonishes us to consider lest those who are seen to have received more than others in this world be judged more severely by the author of the world. For when gifts are increased, accounts for the gifts also grow. Therefore, each person ought to be the humbler because of the gift, the more he perceives himself obligated in rendering an account."

"And the one who had received five talents approached." Origen says: "Confidence made him dare to approach the Lord first." This servant, who returned the talents doubled, is praised by the Lord and brought to eternal reward. Hence it follows: "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Rabanus says: "Well done" is an interjection of rejoicing, through which the Lord expresses his joy and invites the servant who has labored well to eternal joy, concerning which the prophet says: "You shall gladden us with joy before your face."

"Good servant." Chrysostom says: "One who speaks of the good that pertains to his neighbor." "Faithful," because he appropriated to himself none of the things that belong to God.

"Because you were faithful over a few things." Jerome says this is because everything we possess in the present, although it appears great and abundant, is nevertheless small and little in comparison with future things.

“I shall place you over many things.” According to Gregory, one is then placed over many things when, every distress of corruption having been conquered, he glories in eternal joys in that heavenly dwelling. He is then also perfectly admitted into his Lord’s joy when, taken up into that eternal homeland and into the companies of the angels, he rejoices so inwardly in the gift that nothing remains outside to grieve him through corruption.

Jerome says: “What greater thing can be given to a faithful servant than to be with the Lord and to see his Lord’s joy?” Chrysostom says that through this word he shows every beatitude. Augustine says: “This shall be our full joy, than which there is no greater: to enjoy God the Trinity, in whose image we were made.”

“The one who had received two also approached,” and so forth. Origen says: “Understand this approach as the passage from this world to the other.” Jerome says that the same speech of the master of the household caresses both servants--the one who had made ten from five talents and the one who had made four from two--and receives both with similar joy, considering not the magnitude of the gain but the will shown in their diligence.

Hence Origen says that because the same things were said to both--namely, “Enter into joy”--perhaps one who had lesser ability but exercised the whole of what he had as he ought will possess nothing less before God than the one who had greater ability. For this alone is sought: that a person use for God’s glory everything he has from God.

This, however, must be understood so that all who act virtuously, although one does so more abundantly and perfectly than another, enjoy a similar joy in kind, because all enjoy God and are altogether at rest in the vision of God. Yet in particular, those who loved God more ardently here see him more clearly and enjoy him more fully; and those who labored more for God here receive more accidental joy.

“But the one who had received one talent also approached.” Jerome says: “What is written is indeed true: in excusing sins, this servant too incurs the sin of pride together with sloth and negligence.”

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

For he ought simply to have confessed his inactivity and begged the master of the household. Instead, he slanders him and says that he acted with prudent counsel, lest, while seeking gains on the money, he put even the principal at risk. Hence he says: “Lord, I know that you are a hard man,” and so forth.

Origen says: “The Lord is truly hard toward those who abuse his mercy for negligence and not for conversion.” Jerome says: “If we are not converted, if we are stiff-necked, if we persevere in evils continually to the end, God does not have mercy on those continually sinning.” This is in Distinction 93, canon Diaconi.

“You reap where you have not sown and gather where you have not scattered.” Origen says: “We understand that our Lord truly reaps where he has not sown, because the just person sows in the spirit, from which the Lord reaps eternal life. He also gathers where he has not scattered, because he accounts as bestowed upon himself whatever has been sown among the poor.”

Or, according to Jerome, through this we also understand the good life of the Gentiles and philosophers, which the Lord receives, namely in order to lead them to faith.

“For I feared you.” Gregory says: “There are many within the Church, whose image this servant bears, who fear to enter upon the ways of a better life, yet do not fear to lie idle in the sloth of their body. Although they consider themselves sinners, they tremble to take up the ways of holiness.”

Or, according to Hilary, by this servant is understood the Jewish people persisting in the Law, saying, “I feared you,” as though through fear of the ancient precepts it abstained from the use of evangelical liberty and said: “Behold what is yours,” namely the talent, as though it had remained among the things commanded by the Lord. Yet it knew that the fruits of justice were to be reaped where the Law had not been sown, and that those from the Gentiles who were not dispersed from Abraham’s stock were to be gathered.

But what he thought he had said as an excuse, Jerome says, is turned into his own fault. Hence it follows: “His lord answered him: Wicked and slothful servant.” Jerome says that he is called a wicked servant because he slandered his lord, and slothful because he was unwilling to double the talent, so that he is condemned for pride in the one and negligence in the other.

“You ought therefore to have entrusted my money to the money changers.” Jerome says: “If you knew me to be hard and cruel and to pursue such things--that is, if you ought to have known that I would seek my own more diligently--you should have given my money to the money changers.”

The money is the preaching of the Gospel and the divine word, which ought to have been given to money changers--that is, to other teachers, as the apostles did when they ordained priests and bishops throughout the individual provinces--or to all believers, who can double the money and return it with interest by fulfilling in deed what they learned in speech.

Hence it is said: "And upon coming I would have exacted what was mine with interest." Gregory says: "Just as the peril of teachers is considered if they retain the Lord's money, that is, his doctrine, so too is that of their hearers, because what they heard is required from them with interest: from what they hear they are to strive also to understand what they have not heard." Add also that they are to put it into practice.

Hence Pope Nicholas says: "Just as no slight danger lies upon bishops for having kept silent about what is fitting, so too--and may it not be--is there no middling danger for those who disdain to obey when they ought." This is in Distinction 43, canon Dispensatio.

"I would have exacted it with interest": he calls the spiritual multiplication of the goods granted "interest." Concerning this spiritual interest Pope Leo says: "We ought to practice lending at interest through the ground and to look: that what we mercifully bestow here, we may be able to receive from the Lord, who gives increase both manifold and everlasting." This is in Distinction 46, canon Sicut non suo.

Let us hear with what sentence the Lord strikes the slothful servant. The Lord says: "Take the talent away from him and give it to the one who has ten talents." Gregory says: "It seemed fitting that it should be given to the one who had received two talents rather than to the one who had received five, for it ought to have been given to the one who had less. But since knowledge of exterior things is designated by the five talents, while understanding and action are designated by two, the one who received two had more than the one who received five. For the one who merited the administration of exterior things through the five talents was still empty of the understanding of eternal things. Therefore, the one talent, by which we said understanding was signified, ought to be given to the one who had administered well the exterior things he had received. We see this daily in Holy Church, so that those who faithfully administer exterior things also become powerful in inward understanding."

Or, according to Jerome, the talent is given to the one who had made ten so that we may understand that, although the joy is equal in the labor of each--the one who doubled five talents and the one who doubled two--a greater reward is nevertheless owed to those who labor more with the Lord's money. It is understood as equal in kind, as was said above.

"For to everyone who has, it shall be given," and so forth. Chrysostom says: "The person who has the grace of speech and teaching for making progress, but does not use it, loses the grace. But one who applies effort draws a greater gift to himself; and from one who does not have, even what he has shall be taken away."

Jerome says: "Many who are naturally wise and possess sharpness of intellect corrupt this good of nature if they are negligent and idle, and the reward promised to them appears to pass to others."

It can also be understood thus: one who has faith and a good will in the Lord shall receive from the good judge, even if he has something less in deed, as a human being. But one who does not have faith shall lose even the other virtues that he appeared naturally to possess.

Or again, according to Gregory, one who does not possess charity loses even those things he appeared to have received.

Chrysostom says that the wicked servant is punished not only by loss but also by unbearable punishment. Hence it follows: "Cast the useless servant into the exterior darkness." Origen says: "Perhaps there is no illumination there, not even bodily illumination; nor is there any regard from God there, as toward those unworthy of contemplating God."

Hence Chrysostom says that not only one who seizes another's property or acts wickedly is punished, but also one who does not do good things.

§ X. The Parable of the Ten Virgins, Five Wise and Five Foolish

Matthew alone relates this parable. From it is shown that it is not enough to perform things that belong to the class of good works unless they are done in the proper manner: in charity; or with spiritual joy, which proceeds from purity of intention in good works; or with mercy and the other virtues, each of which is signified by the oil.

Therefore Jesus says: "Then"--namely at the future judgment of which he was speaking--"the kingdom of heaven," that is, the present Church according to Gregory, "shall be like ten virgins who went out to meet the bridegroom and the bride," and so forth.

This is explained in many ways by different authors. According to Chrysostom, the Lord places the parable in the persons of virgins to show that, although virginity is a great thing--for it is the highest degree in the chastity that ought to be in the faithful, whether conjugal, widowed, or virginal--nevertheless, if it is destitute of works of mercy, it will be cast outside with adulterers.

Hence Jerome also says: "One who does not possess clemency and is not clothed with heartfelt mercy and tears has not yet fulfilled the law of Christ, however spiritual he may appear." This is in Distinction 86.

They are called ten, of whom five are wise and five foolish, because, according to Gregory, each person subsists through the five bodily senses. Five doubled makes ten, which number is the first limit of numbers and therefore signifies universality. Because the multitude of the faithful is gathered from both sexes, Holy Church is declared like ten virgins. Since the good are mingled there with the wicked and the elect with the reprobate, five of these ten virgins are called wise and five foolish.

Or, according to Origen, all who have received the word of God, that is, the faith, are called virgins. Since God's word is supreme purity--that is, without falsity--it imparts of its purity to those who receive it, that is, believe, so that they may be free from the worship of idols and other errors.

Or, according to Jerome, five are called wise and five foolish. The wise are those who possess the five senses while hastening toward heavenly things and desiring those above. For John spoke of spiritual sight, hearing, and touch: "What we have seen, what we have heard, what we have beheld with our eyes, and what our hands have touched, concerning the Word of life." Of taste the Psalm says: "Taste and see that the Lord is sweet." Of smell it is said in the Song of Songs: "We run in the fragrance of your ointments."

Others gape after earthly fruits: thinking earthly things in their minds, which is to see; loving them, which is to touch; receiving them from others, which is to hear; inclining themselves toward the stench of evil examples, which is to smell; and delighting in vices, which is to taste. These are signified by the five foolish virgins.

Or, according to Augustine in a homily, the five wise and five foolish virgins signify the fivefold continence from the allurements of the body. The soul's appetite must be restrained from the pleasure of the eyes, ears, smell, taste, and touch. But this continence can be found in both the good and the wicked.

In part it is practiced before God by those who restrain themselves from these things so that they may please him in the inward joy of conscience, which arises from a pure intention--namely, of pleasing God and the like. These are the wise virgins. For prudence especially regards the proper end, according to the saying: "Act prudently and consider the end."

In part, however, this continence called virginity is observed before human beings alone, because one abstains from pleasures of the senses in this way for the sake of human glory. These are the five foolish virgins, who do not judge the end rightly.

Yet both groups are virgins; just as one who possesses one form of this continence possesses them all, so all the senses mutually follow one another. Therefore, all five senses must be either wise or all foolish.

Or, according to Hilary, the discourse--that is, the statement without qualification--is framed in the five wise and five foolish virgins concerning believers and unbelievers. According to this interpretation, the oil in the vessel is faith with works in the conscience, which unbelievers do not possess.

Thus the five wise virgins took oil in their vessels with their lamps, but the foolish took no oil. This oil is understood differently according to the different interpretations proposed.

According to the first, it signifies charity, or mercy according to its effect, following the saying of Ecclesiastes: "Let oil not fail from your head," that is, your mind. According to the second, it signifies devotion, following Matthew 5 [read: Matthew 6]: "Anoint your head." According to the third, which is Augustine's, it signifies spiritual joy proceeding from pure intention, following the Psalm: "God has anointed you with the oil of gladness." According to the fourth, Hilary's, it signifies faith together with its work.

The vessels signify hearts or conscience. A lamp, from which light appears, signifies works. Oil is put from the vessel into the lamp to nourish the light, because from charity, devotion, spiritual joy, or true faith habituated in the mind, one proceeds to a good act so that they may shine for others through example. The good do this, but the wicked do not, because their oil fails.

Or again, according to Chrysostom, the oil signifies the word of teaching by which the vessels of souls are filled, for nothing strengthens as does moral discourse. It preserves the light of faith and the fire of charity.

The wise virgins therefore receive enough oil for the delay of their departure, that is, death. Although the foolish received lamps that were lit at first, nevertheless, because they did not receive enough oil to last them to the end--being negligent about the continued teaching that strengthens faith and the light of good deeds--their lamps were therefore extinguished.

It is said of both groups: "They went out to meet the bridegroom and the bride." According to Hilary, the bridegroom and bride can be called the two natures in Christ: one person, namely the Word, as bridegroom, and the human nature united to him as bride.

Or the bridegroom is Christ and the bride the Church triumphant. The Apocalypse says: "I saw the holy city Jerusalem descending from heaven as a bride." They go out to meet Christ at his coming because we are continually tending toward death, through which some of us are admitted to the heavenly wedding and others excluded.

"But while the bridegroom delayed, they all became drowsy and slept." This delay is the time by which the end of human life, or the end of the world, is deferred. According to Gregory, to sleep is to die. To become drowsy before sleep is to languish from health before death, because one comes through the weight of sickness to the sleep of death.

Or, with respect to each person's particular end, to sleep and become drowsy is to rest in expectation of reward. This happens in greater or lesser degree.

Or, according to Origen, while the bridegroom delays until the consummation of life, some senses suffer drowsiness, behaving as though in the night of the world; and they sleep, acting more remissly, as it were, from that vital sense. Yet the wise virgins did not lose their lamps or despair of preserving their oil.

Hence it follows: "But at midnight a cry was made." Jerome says: "It is a tradition of the Jews that Christ will come at midnight, in likeness to the time in Egypt when the Passover was celebrated and the destroyer came. Hence I also think that the apostolic tradition remained that on the day of the Easter vigil it was not permissible to dismiss the people before midnight, while they awaited Christ's coming."

Or "at midnight" means when no one hopes for or knows it. Hence Jerome says: "Suddenly, therefore, as though in the dead of night when all are secure and sleep is deepest, Christ's coming shall resound through the cry of the angels and the trumpets of the powers going before him. 'Behold, the bridegroom comes.'"

Hilary says: "When the trumpet awakens them, that is, by divine power, they proceed to meet the bridegroom alone. For bridegroom and bride will then already be one--that is, flesh and God--because the humility of the flesh will have been transformed into spiritual glory."

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

Or, according to Augustine, where it says that the virgins come to meet the bridegroom--"Go out to meet him"--I think it should be understood so that the one called the bride is constituted from the virgins themselves. It is as though, when all Christians in the Church run together, the children were said to run to their mother, although the one called the mother is constituted from the children themselves gathered together. For now the Church is betrothed and is a virgin who is to be led to the wedding. At that time, when all mortality in her has passed away, she shall be held in a mortal union [read: an immortal union].

Or, according to Origen, "at midnight," that is, at the height of remiss negligence, "a cry was made," that is, the prompting of angels and a good thing crying out among the senses of those who were sleeping, namely the negligent. Everyone hears this prompting and rises, but not everyone fittingly places adornment upon the lamps--only the wise.

Hence it is said: "Then all the virgins arose." Gregory says: "All the virgins arise because all, both elect and reprobate, are awakened from the sleep of their death. They trim their lamps because they count with themselves the works for which they expect eternal beatitude."

Or, according to Augustine, "they trimmed them" because they prepared the accounts to be rendered for their works.

Or, according to Hilary, taking up the lamps is the return of souls into bodies, and their light is the shining forth of the conscience of a good work, which is contained in the vessels of the bodies.

"But the foolish said to the wise," and so forth, "because our lamps are going out." The foolish virgins' lamps go out because their works, which had appeared bright outwardly to human beings, are darkened within at the coming of the judge.

"Give us some of your oil." Gregory says: "What does it mean that they ask the wise for oil, except that at the coming of the judge, when they find themselves empty within, they seek testimony from without? As though, deceived by their own confidence, they were to say to their neighbors: 'Because you see us rejected as though without works, say of our works what you saw.'"

Augustine says: "Those whose deeds are supported by another's praise fail when that praise is withdrawn." Hence, from the fact that they complain their lamps are going out, they show that these lamps shine in part, yet they do not have unfailing light or enduring works.

Therefore, if anyone has a virginal soul and is a lover of chastity, he ought not to be content in a middling fashion with those things that grow quickly and quickly wither in the heat, but should pursue perfect virtues so that he may have everlasting light.

These foolish virgins were foolish not only when they departed from here lacking mercy, but also when they thought that they would receive it there, where they asked at an inopportune time. Although nothing is more merciful than those wise virgins, who were approved because of mercy, nevertheless they were not foolishly petitioned in their request.

Hence it follows: "The wise answered, saying: Lest perhaps there not be enough," and so forth. From this we learn that none of us will be able to add anything there to the works with which we shall be found.

According to Jerome, this reply of the wise is not from avarice but from fear, nor can the virtues of some support the vices of others on the day of judgment. They nevertheless give counsel that the others ought not to meet the bridegroom without oil.

Jerome says: "This oil is sold and is bought at a great price and acquired by difficult labor." We understand this not only of alms, but of all the virtues and the counsels of teachers.

The wise say: "Lest perhaps there not be enough for us and for you," because, according to Augustine, no one is aided before God by another's testimony, since the secrets of the heart are manifest to him. Each person's own conscience bears witness to him, and scarcely suffices for him.

"Go rather to those who sell," that is, according to Origen, to the teachers, "and buy for yourselves," that is, receive from them; its price is perseverance, love of learning, and the diligence and labor of those who desire to speak.

Or, according to Augustine, "Go rather," and so forth. From this statement they should not be thought to have given counsel, but indirectly to have recalled the others' crime. For flatterers sell oil: whether praising false things or things unknown, they lead souls into errors and, by counseling vain joys to those foolish souls, receive from them some reward of temporal advantage. Therefore it is said: "Go to those who sell and buy for yourselves," that is: Let us now see how those accustomed to sell you praises may assist you.

But because, as Jerome says, the time for buying had already passed, when the day of judgment arrived there was no place for penance or for performing new works; rather, they were compelled to settle the account of their former works. Hence it follows: "While they went to buy, the bridegroom came."

Here, according to Chrysostom, it is shown that even if we become merciful after death, we shall gain nothing from it toward escaping punishment. Thus it did not benefit the rich man that after death he became merciful and concerned for those who belonged to him.

Or, according to Origen, "While they went to buy," and so forth. One can find certain people who neglected to learn something useful when they ought to have done so. At the very departure from their life, while they arrange to learn, they are overtaken by death.

Or, according to Augustine, "While they went to buy," and so forth--that is, while they inclined themselves toward things outside and sought to rejoice in accustomed things because they had not known inward joys--the one who judges came.

"And those who were ready entered with him into the wedding," that is, according to Augustine, those for whom conscience bore testimony before God. They entered with him into the wedding, where the pure soul is joined fruitfully to the pure and perfect Word of God.

"And the door was shut," because, according to Jerome, after the day of judgment no opportunity for good works and justice remains. For, Augustine says, once those numbered among the angelic life have been received, the entrance to the kingdom of heaven is closed.

"At last the remaining virgins also came." Augustine says: "It is not said that they had bought oil." They are therefore to be understood, when no joy from others' praises now remains, as returning amid distress and great afflictions to implore God. But great is his severity after judgment, whose ineffable mercy was extended before judgment.

They therefore say: "Lord, Lord, open to us." Jerome says: "This excellent naming of the Lord is a confession and judgment of faith. But what does it profit to invoke with the voice the one whom you deny by works?"

Or, according to the Gloss, compelled by the grief of exclusion they repeat the name of dominion, not calling him Father, whose mercy they despised during their life.

"And he answered: Amen I say to you, I do not know you." Augustine explains this from the rule that God's art, that is, his wisdom, does not admit into joy those who endeavored to perform something according to his commandments not before God, but in order to please human beings.

Jerome says: "The Lord knows those who are his," that is, he approves the good; and one who does not know, namely necessary things, will be unknown--that is, rejected. According to the Philosopher, every wicked person is ignorant, namely in the act of choosing sin. Although they are virgins either through bodily purity or confession of the true faith, nevertheless, because they do not have oil--namely charity or spiritual joy from a pure intention--they are unknown to the bridegroom.

He concludes: "Watch therefore, because you know neither the day nor the hour." Jerome says: "All the things said before are understood by this: because we do not know the day of judgment, let us solicitously prepare good works for ourselves."

Augustine says: "Each person knows not only the day and hour of that final time when the bridegroom will come, but also the day and hour of his own falling asleep. Whoever is ready for that will also be ready when the voice sounds by which all shall be awakened."

The petition of the foolish virgins to the wise and afterward to God can also be understood hypothetically, that is, by supposition. For since all the reprobate know on the day of judgment that there is no place for repenting or means of obtaining anything, they will not ask. Nevertheless, on the supposition that they were to seek the saints' suffrages or God's mercy for deliverance, they would receive nothing.

Hence Jerome says: "In the present age we know that we can assist one another either with prayers or counsels. But when we come before Christ's tribunal, neither Job nor Daniel nor Noah will be able to pray for anyone; rather, each person shall carry his own burden." This is in Cause 13, Question 2, canon In praesenti.

§ XI. The Lord Exhorts to Watchfulness by the Examples of the Householder and the Servant-Steward

The Lord also exhorted to this watchfulness in Matthew 24, saying: "Watch, because you do not know at what hour your Lord will come."

Augustine says that he told not only the apostles to watch, but their successors also, and everyone until his final coming. That final day of judgment about which Christ spoke will come for each person when the day of his death comes, so that he departs from here in the state in which he is to be judged at that judgment. Thus every Christian ought to watch, lest the Lord's coming find him unprepared. For that day of the final judgment will find unprepared the person whom the last day of his life finds unprepared.

"You do not know at what hour." Origen says: "All are vain who either profess to know when the consummation of the world will occur or boast that they know the end of their own life, which no one can know unless illuminated by the Holy Spirit," namely in such matters.

"Watch," Gregory says. "One watches who keeps the eyes open to the hope of the true light. One watches who preserves in action what he believes. One watches who repels from himself the darkness of torpor and negligence."

Christ introduces an example for these things, saying: "Know this, that if the householder knew at what hour the thief was to come, he certainly would not allow his house to be broken into."

Origen says: "The householder is the sense of a human being, that is, reason; his house is the soul; the thief is the devil." Every contrary discourse that enters the soul of the negligent not by a natural entrance is like a burglar of the house: first destroying, as it were, the soul's natural structures, namely natural understandings, and entering through that breach, it plunders the soul like a house.

Sometimes, however, someone finds the thief in the very act of breaking in and, apprehending him, kills him by thrusting in a word that strikes him. That is, perceiving the impulse of temptation, he conquers the temptation with the sword of God's word prohibiting that evil, and so, as it were, kills the devil.

The thief does not come in the day, namely when the soul of a diligent person is illuminated by the sun of justice, but in the night, namely when one remains in malice or negligence, or in a time of temptations or tribulations. Although in that night one does not possess the sun's light, if he has at least the lamp of the word, namely of God--that is, divine discourse--a resolution toward better things and watchfulness, his resolution will not be broken through and he will not be plundered, but will drive the thief away.

Or, according to Gregory, the thief is death. When it finds the householder, that is, the spirit, sleeping and unprepared, it destroys the house of the body by killing it and snatches the unwitting soul away to punishments.

Therefore he says: "Be ready, because you know neither the day nor the hour." Our Lord wished the final hour to be unknown so that it could always be suspected, and so that, since we cannot foresee it at all, we may prepare ourselves for it without interruption.

Christ also adds the example of the faithful servant, saying: "Who, do you think, is the faithful and prudent servant whom his lord appointed over his household to give them food at the proper time?"

Hilary says that above the Lord had exhorted every heart to the unwearied care of watchfulness, but now he especially commands the rulers of the people to be solicitous in expectation of his coming. For he signifies the faithful and prudent servant appointed over the household when he says: "Who, do you think," and so forth.

This does not imply ignorance in the Lord, nor, according to Remigius, the impossibility of attaining virtue, but difficulty or rarity, according to Gratian in On Penance, Distinction 1, section Quod autem omni.

According to the Gloss, three good qualities of prelates are noted in these words. The first is fidelity, when he says, "Faithful." A servant is faithful to the Lord when he serves for the Lord's sake and feeds Christ's sheep not for profit but for love of Christ. He is faithful who makes nothing belonging to his lord his own and wastes nothing of his lord's goods vainly or uselessly.

The second is discretion, when it says, "Prudent." A prudent servant examines the capacity, life, and conduct of his subjects. He is prudent who knows the reason according to which the things given ought to be dispensed. Origen says: "To give food at the proper time requires prudence; not to take away the food of the needy requires fidelity."

The third is avoidance of ambition, when it says, “Whom his lord appointed”: namely one who, according to the Gloss, was called by God, not one who intruded himself.

Pope Leo says: “A principate that fear extorted or ambition seized, even if it does not offend by its acts or conduct, is nevertheless pernicious by the example of its beginning. And it is difficult for things begun from a bad origin to be brought to a good end.” This is in Cause 1, Question 1, canon Principatus.

According to Origen, an ecclesiastical prelate is also called faithful and prudent concerning the Church’s revenues: so that he does not devour what belongs to widows, remembers the poor, and retains no more for himself than those who suffer need.

He is understood as prudent when he understands the circumstances of the needy on account of which they are needy. For one who wishes to dispense ecclesiastical revenues needs great wisdom; and what is found in Distinction 86, canon Non satis, directs one toward this manner and consideration.

What Jerome says in Cause 12, Question 2, canon Gloria episcopi, and in Cause 16, Question 1, also pertains to fidelity: whatever clerics possess belongs to the poor.

Again, according to Origen, he is called faithful and prudent so that he does not pour out rational and spiritual food upon those for whom it is not fitting, wishing to show himself prudent. Instead, to those who have greater need of a word that may edify their conduct and order their life than of one that illuminates with the light of knowledge, he gives the former; nor does he shrink from expounding higher things to those able to hear more acutely, lest those naturally gifted in intellect or sharpened through practice in secular wisdom despise one who expounds trivial things.

What is said in Distinction 43, canon In mandatis; in canon Sit rector, the final section; and in Cause 8, Question 1, canon Oportet, also pertains to this.

Chrysostom says that this parable also applies to secular princes. Each person ought to use what he possesses for the common benefit, not for the injury of servants or his own destruction, whether he possesses wisdom, a principate, or anything else.

Although, Basil says, it is difficult to find fidelity and prudence in one person, it is nevertheless not impossible.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

For the Lord would not call a servant blessed who could not be found. For he says: “Blessed is that servant whom, when he comes,” and so forth.

“He shall appoint him over all his goods”: according to Origen, so that he may reign together with Christ, to whom the Father delivered all his goods, and so that they too may be stewards over every creature.

Or, according to Hilary, “over all his goods” means that he shall be placed in God’s glory, because beyond it there is nothing better.

According to Rabanus, this is not so that they alone, but so that they more than others, may have eternal rewards--that is, greater ones--both for their own life and for keeping watch over the flock.

“But if that wicked servant shall say,” and so forth. Chrysostom says that the Lord teaches his hearer not only by the honor that awaits the good, but also by the punishment with which he threatens the wicked, when he says: “If he shall say,” and so forth.

“My lord delays his coming.” First he describes this servant’s conduct by his vain confidence in a long life. As Jerome says: “Security begets negligence, and negligence offense.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 1, canon Praedixerat.

“And he began to strike his fellow servants.” Here note pride, for he strikes them so that he may be feared and may show that he rules among the clergy. What is found in Distinction 45, canon Licet, together with the following canon, pertains excellently to this.

Or, according to Rabanus, to strike one’s fellow servants is to corrupt the consciences of the weak by word or example. In the final canon of Distinction 45 it is also said: “A teacher who strikes the consciences of the weak with useless speech is a striker.”

“And to eat and drink with drunkards.” According to Augustine, lust and pleasure are noted here. Jerome says: “To you, O priest, it is permitted to live from the altar, not to live luxuriously.”

“The lord will come on a day he does not expect.” Augustine says to Hesychius that of three servants of God preparing themselves for Christ’s coming--one saying that he will come sooner, the second later, and the third that he does not know either alternative, namely whether he will come sooner or later--the third is more consonant with the Gospel. He hopes for what the first says, endures what the second thinks, and errs in neither, because he affirms or denies none of them.

For if the Lord does not come as the first says or believes, that servant not only erred but also falls into danger of believing that he will never come, because he did not come when the servant said. The second also can err if the Lord comes soon and also appears to give an occasion for negligence.

“The lord will divide him.” Jerome says that this is not to be understood as though he cuts him apart with a sword, but that he separates him from the fellowship of the saints.

Or, according to Origen, he divides him when he takes away from him his spirit--that is, the spiritual gift of power or knowledge bestowed on him--and sends his knowledge with his body into Gehenna.

The same Lord shows how such servants ought to be prepared in different watches, saying to the disciples, as Luke 12 relates: “Watch.” Mark too relates that the Lord said: “Watch, for you do not know when the lord comes: in the evening, at midnight, at cockcrow, or in the morning, lest when he comes suddenly he find you sleeping.”

Jerome says: “One who sleeps attends not to true bodies but to phantasms, and upon waking is empty of the things he had seen. Such indeed are those whom the love of the world carries away during life: they leave behind at death the life they dreamed to be real.”

Theophilus says: “He concealed from us the time of his coming because this was expedient for us. For if we do not take care now when we do not know our end, what would we do if we knew it? We would defer our acts of malice to the very end.”

One departs in the evening when he dies in old age, at midnight when he dies in the middle of youth, and at cockcrow when reason is completed in us. For when a child begins to live according to reason, then the cock cries out in him--the instinct of reason awakening him from the sleep of sensuality. Morning is childhood.

§ XII. The Parable of the Unforgiving Servant

Matthew alone relates the parable of the servant whose lord, when the servant humbled himself, forgave him ten thousand talents, but who afterward refused to grant his fellow servant, who owed him one hundred denarii, a delay in which to pay. The lord, angry against him, demanded the whole debt he had remitted and delivered him to the torturers for this reason.

Here are shown the fullness of divine clemency, the magnitude of fraternal hatred, and the punitude of gratitude [read: the punishment of ingratitude].

First is shown God’s immense clemency in forgiving the sins of penitents. For immediately before this, Peter asked whether he ought to forgive a brother who sinned against him as many as seven times, and Christ answered: “I do not say to you seven times, but as many as seventy-seven times,” that is, all transgressions.

Augustine derives this meaning as follows. The Law is signified by the number ten because it is commended in the Ten Commandments, while sin is signified by eleven because it transgresses ten. Seven signifies universality because time unfolds in seven days. Seven multiplied by eleven--that is, seven times eleven--makes seventy-seven. Therefore Christ wished all sins to be forgiven to one who truly repents.

He introduces the parable for this purpose, saying: “The kingdom of heaven is like a man who was a king and wished to settle accounts with his servants.”

Origen says that just as the Son of God is wisdom, justice, and truth, so he himself is the kingdom--not of any of those who are below, but of all those who are above, in whose senses justice and the other virtues reign. They have been made heavens because they bear the image of the heavenly Christ. Thus this kingdom of heaven, that is, the Son of God, when made in the likeness of sinful flesh, was then made like a man who was a king, joining human beings to himself.

Or, according to Remigius, the Church is called the kingdom of heaven, because in it the Lord works what is described in this parable. This king, therefore, is God, ruling and governing everything he created. By the servants are designated all human beings, whom he created to praise him and to whom he gave the law of nature. He wishes to settle accounts with them when he examines the life, conduct, and acts of each.

Origen says: “At the end of our life an account is to be settled before the king. Nor do we say this so that there should be a suspicion that such a necessary matter might require a long time. For when God wishes to examine the minds of all, by some ineffable power he will quickly cause everything done by all at every time to come into the mind of each individual.”

“And when he began to settle accounts, one was brought to him who owed ten thousand talents.” Augustine says this is because the Law commands obligation in the Ten Commandments: the debt of ten thousand talents is the complete transgression of all the commandments.

“And since he had nothing with which to repay,” a person who sins voluntarily and of his own accord cannot rise again in any way by his own effort. He has nothing from which to repay because he finds nothing within himself by which he may free himself from sins.

“Therefore his lord commanded that he, his wife, his children, and everything he possessed be sold, and payment made.” The sinner’s wife is folly and the pleasure or desire of the flesh. According to Augustine, therefore, through this it is signified that the transgressor of the Decalogue ought to pay penalties because of desire and wicked works, as though through wife and children. This is his price, for the price of the person sold is the punishment of the person condemned.

Chrysostom says that he ordered this not out of cruelty but out of ineffable affection.

For he wishes to frighten him by these threats so that the servant may supplicate and not be sold. This occurred, and therefore it follows: “But that servant, falling down,” and so forth.

Here it should be noted that this king, God, wishes to settle accounts and begins to settle them with his servants in this life, at the future particular judgment in death, and afterward at the universal judgment in the final resurrection.

In the future, indeed, there is no place there for penance or mercy. As Cyprian says: “As the Lord finds you when he calls you,” namely through death, “so also he judges you.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 1, canon Numquid.

Of those who die impenitent Gratian says that the Psalm’s words are to be understood: “He shall not give God his appeasement, and he shall labor forever for the price of his soul’s redemption.” This is in Cause 13, Question 2, section Verum.

In the present, this king now begins to settle accounts with the servant liable for a great debt when, by infusing compunction into the transgressor of all the commandments, he shows him the multitude and gravity of his sins. Because of them, as is clear in the Scriptures, he commands that the sinner be sold together with his wife, his evil will; his children, namely his works; and all his powers, and that payment be made--that is, that at the demand of divine justice he be tormented in Gehenna for his demerits.

Understanding this, the sinner knows that he is justly to be condemned. Yet, trusting in the king’s clemency in this life, this servant falls prostrate upon the earth, humbling himself and recognizing that he is earth and has been given like earth as food to the serpent. He does not excuse himself concerning his demerit, but asks that mercy be shown him, promising with a purpose for the future that he will make satisfaction.

Hence he says: “Have patience with me,” namely by waiting, “and I shall repay you everything,” namely by making satisfaction. According to Anselm, to make satisfaction is to repay the honor owed to God which one took away by sinning, namely by withdrawing through evil living the time in which he ought continually to have served God. By afterward doing works of satisfaction to which he was not otherwise bound, he compensates, as it were, for what was taken away.

Jerome says: “Whoever you are who are conscious of some error, for as long as you know that you erred, for as long as you sinned, humble yourself for no less time and make satisfaction to him in the confession of penance. For if you amend yourself, if you correct yourself, the Lord is kind and merciful, and he tempers vengeance for one who anticipates it by repenting.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 1.

Hence Augustine says: “Great is God’s mercy, that he forgives sins upon the promise alone,” that is, upon the purpose of confessing and making satisfaction. This is in On Penance, Distinction 1.

Remigius says that God’s kindness and clemency toward converted sinners are generous, because he is always ready to forgive sins through baptism or penance. Hence it follows: “But his lord, taking pity on him, released him and forgave him the debt.”

Chrysostom says: “See the superabundance of divine love. The servant asks only for a delay of time, but the king gave him more than he asks: his release and the remission of the entire loan.” The king did not forgive the debt before the servant rendered an account because he wished to teach him from how great a debt he was freed, so that at least in this way he might become gentler toward his fellow servants. But what he afterward did was unworthy of what had gone before.

For it follows: “That servant went out.” Chrysostom says that by the word “went out” it is shown that not much time passed, but immediately, while the benefit was still in his ears, he wickedly abused the liberation to what had not been given to him.

“For he found one of his fellow servants who owed him one hundred denarii.” Augustine says that sin is found in each debt: in the one liable for ten thousand talents and in the one obligated for ten denarii [read: one hundred denarii]. For the denarius is the number of the Law, and ten times ten times one hundred makes ten thousand. Therefore each is a debtor and each a petitioner for pardon. For every human being is both a debtor to God and has his neighbor as a debtor.

Chrysostom says: “The difference between sins committed against a human being and sins committed against God is as great as the difference between ten denarii [read: one hundred denarii] and ten thousand talents--indeed, also much less, which is evident from the difference between the persons and from the fewness of those sinning. For when a human being sees us, we cease and are reluctant to sin; but although God sees us, we do not cease on any day, but do and speak everything without fear.

“Sins against God appear graver not only from this, but also from the benefit we have obtained from him. For he caused us to exist and worked all things for our sake. He breathed a rational soul into us, sent his Son, opened heaven to us, and made us his sons. Therefore, even if we died for him every day, would we repay him anything worthy? By no means; indeed, this too would again conduce to our benefit. But we, on the contrary, transgress his laws.”

Thus, according to Remigius, the debtor of ten thousand talents signifies one who commits greater sins against God, while the debtor of one hundred denarii signifies one who commits lesser sins against his neighbor.

But that ungrateful servant, Augustine says, was unwilling to show to the other what had been shown to him, though unworthy. For it follows: “And seizing him, he choked him, saying: Repay what you owe.” Remigius explains: that is, he pressed him more harshly, so as to exact vengeance from him.

Origen says: “I think he choked him because he had departed from the king. For he would not have choked his fellow servant if he had not departed from the king.”

“And his fellow servant, falling down, begged him, saying: Have patience with me, and I shall repay you everything.” Augustine says: “What is owed, even if it is kindly forgiven, is nevertheless not unjustly demanded. But one who exacts the debt beyond measure sins,” as this servant did when he inflicted violence upon one who was then unable to pay. This is in Cause 14, Question 1.

“But he would not,” that is, he persisted against him. He maintained the intention that the other should suffer punishments. “But he went and cast him into prison”: that is, according to Remigius, he burned with great anger so that he might exact vengeance from the one from whom he had received an injury, which is the debt of ten denarii [read: one hundred denarii].

“Until he should repay the debt”: that is, according to Remigius, once his brother had been seized, he exacted vengeance from him for the injury.

Chrysostom says: “See the Lord’s charity and the servant’s cruelty. Here the servant receives total release from the Lord; there his fellow servant asked only for delay from a servant, yet he did not grant even this.”

It follows: “But his fellow servants, seeing what was done, were exceedingly grieved.” Augustine understands the Church by the fellow servants, for it looses and binds him.

Or, according to Remigius, perhaps the angels, the preachers of the Church, or any believers are to be understood by the fellow servants. When they see that some brother who has obtained remission of sins is unwilling to have mercy on his fellow servant, they are grieved at his perdition.

“And they came and told their lord.” According to Remigius, to tell this to their lord is to show the sorrows and contrition in their affection.

“Then his lord called him,” namely through the sentence of death, commanded him to depart from this world, and said to him: “Wicked servant, I forgave you all the debt,” and so forth.

Chrysostom says: “When he owed his lord ten thousand talents, the lord did not call him wicked or revile him, but had pity. But when he became ungrateful toward his fellow servant, then he calls him wicked.”

“Should you not also have had mercy on your fellow servant, just as I had mercy on you?”

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

Augustine says: “Forgive, and it shall be forgiven you. I forgave first; forgive at least afterward. For if you do not forgive, I shall recall you and lay again upon you whatever I had forgiven.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 4.

Here it should also be noted that the servant gave no answer, because immediately after this life the argument of excuse will cease. Since he was not made better by the benefit, it remains that he be corrected by punishment.

“And being angry, he delivered him to the torturers.” It was not said that he was angry when he ordered him to be sold, because that was not an act of anger but rather of love directed toward correction. Now, however, it is a sentence of torment and punishment.

The torturers are said to be demons, because they are always prepared to receive lost souls and torture them in the punishment of eternal damnation.

“Until he should repay the whole debt”: Remigius says that the finite is placed for the infinite, and the meaning is that he will always pay and never finish paying; therefore, he will always suffer punishment.

Christ concludes: “So also shall my heavenly Father do to you,” namely just as this servant’s lord did to him.

Hence Augustine says: “One who, forgetful of the divine benefit, wishes to avenge his own injuries will not only fail to merit pardon for future sins, but the sins he rejoiced had been forgiven him will be imputed to him for punishment.” This is in On Penance, Distinction 4.

Gregory likewise says in that distinction: “It is clear from the Gospel sayings that if we do not forgive from the heart what is committed against us, then what we rejoiced had been forgiven us through penance is required from us again.” Hence Christ says: “Unless each one of you forgives his brother from your hearts.”

According to Peter, three things commonly arise from an injury inflicted upon someone. The first is rancor in the heart, that is, hatred, and this must be forgiven immediately--that is, it must never be held.

The second is a sign of rancor, such as avoidance of speech, greeting, and the like. This must be remitted especially when the one who inflicted the injury seeks pardon.

The third is prosecution of the injuries, and one is not bound to abandon this unless due satisfaction has been made.

From this parable a question is raised by the theologians in Book Four, Distinction 22, and by the canonists throughout On Penance, Distinction 4: whether sins forgiven through penance return to the soul through a subsequent mortal sin. Many opinions are set out both in the text and in the Gloss.

But blessed Thomas answers more perfectly on Book Four at the stated distinction and determines simply that they return neither as regards guilt nor as regards punishment, but as regards a certain effect of ingratitude. Through that ingratitude for the pardon already received for sins, the subsequent sin is graver and must be punished with a more severe penalty than if that circumstance of ingratitude were absent. According to this effect, sins are said to return in the cited canons.

§ XIII. Christ Shows the Magnitude of His Mercy toward Penitent Sinners by Examples in Both Sexes

He shows this not only through parables, but through examples. First he shows it in the sinful woman, of whom Luke alone says: “A certain Pharisee asked Jesus to eat with him.”

First it should be noted that the Apostle says: “God, though rich in his mercy, became poor for our sake, so that he might enrich us by his poverty.” For although he was Lord of all, the Son of Man had nowhere to lay his head: neither house nor field, but he retained for his own necessities and those of his companions the few alms offered to him.

Hence, when invited by this Pharisee, he came as a poor man to the meal, not unaware that the sinful woman would come and offer him a better banquet of penance. “And entering the Pharisee’s house, he reclined at table.”

Gregory of Nyssa says: “Luke, more a physician of souls than of bodies, shows God himself and our most merciful Savior visiting others, not so that he may obtain something from their riches, but so that he may impart of his own justice.”

Below it is said that he went about, traveling from place to place. Hence Gregory Nazianzen says: “He goes from place to place not only to gain more people, but also to dedicate many places. He sleeps and labors so that he may sanctify sleep and labor. He weeps so that he may give value to tears. He preaches heavenly things so that he may exalt his hearers.”

“And behold, a woman who was a sinner in the city.” Cyril says: “A woman of a dishonorable life, displaying nevertheless a faithful affection, comes to Christ as though asking that pardon for what she had committed be generously granted.”

A Greek author says: “The four evangelists say that Christ was anointed with ointment by a woman. I think that there were three women, because of the character of the persons, their manner of acting, and the difference in times. John relates of Mary, Lazarus’s sister, that six days before Passover she anointed Jesus’s feet in her own home. But Matthew, after saying, ‘You know that after two days the Passover will occur,’ adds that in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, a woman poured ointment over the Lord’s head; she did not anoint his feet as Mary did. Mark speaks similarly to Matthew. Luke, however, relates this not near the time of the Passion, but in the middle of his Gospel.”

Chrysostom asserts that there were two such women: one contained in John, and the other presented by the other three evangelists.

Ambrose leaves it doubtful, saying that the woman who anointed the feet may not be the same as the one who afterward anointed the head, lest the evangelists appear to have contradicted one another. It can also be resolved through a difference in merit and time: then she was still a sinner, but later she was more perfect.

Augustine, in On the Harmony of the Evangelists, says: “I think it must be understood that the same Mary did this twice. Once was what Luke related, when on first approaching with humility and tears she merited remission of sins. Hence John too, when he began to speak of Lazarus being raised, said: 'Mary was the one who had anointed the Lord with ointment and wiped his feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick.' But what she did again in Bethany, near the time of the Passion, is something else that does not pertain to Luke's narrative, but is related by the other three."

Gregory, in a homily, supposes that she was the same woman and one Mary, namely Mary Magdalene: first the sinner of whom Luke speaks here, then converted and perfectly anointing Christ's head and feet in Bethany, and the one to whom, according to Luke, Mark, and John, he first appeared after rising.

Hence Luke himself, immediately after the account of this event--the conversion of the sinful woman who washed Jesus's feet with her tears--states that as Jesus traveled to preach, several women followed him, among whom was Mary Magdalene, from whom seven demons had gone out. Mark too writes this in his final chapter.

Bede says on Luke that this Magdalene is the same sinful woman whose penance Luke had related immediately before. Gregory says in a homily that Mary had possessed seven demons because she was full of every vice, for the number seven signifies universality.

Thomas, in his postil on John, says that Jerome, Chrysostom, and Origen hold that this sinful woman of whom Luke speaks here was not Mary Magdalene, Lazarus's sister, who afterward anointed Jesus's feet with ointment in Bethany, but another woman whose name is not given. Gregory, Augustine, and Bede say she was one and the same person: the sinful woman Mary Magdalene, Lazarus's sister, who anointed his feet now and again in Bethany. Ambrose reports both opinions and prefers neither. Nevertheless, the common opinion is the one just stated of Gregory, Augustine, and Bede, and Thomas appears to incline to it in the stated postil, chapter 12.

"Who was a sinner in the city." Here a question arises: on the supposition that this woman was Mary Magdalene, Lazarus's sister, was she a public prostitute? It appears so, both because prostitutes are commonly called sinful women and because certain holy doctors say this.

Chrysostom says: "The prostitute was made more honorable than virgins. For after she was inflamed by penance, she burned with love of Christ." Pope Leo says: "When this woman went out from the brothel, the disciple," namely Judas, "entered Gehenna."

Others have thought that she was a virgin in body, although not in mind, according to John Damascene, and that Christ cast seven demons from her--that is, one capital vice together with the other six: lust as regards thought. Through assent to this thought she was ruled by it, but not through the deed.

A middle way appears more reasonable: she was neither a public prostitute nor a virgin in body, but was dishonorable in mind and body within her own house, as happens among many noble and wealthy women.

That she was a public prostitute does not appear likely: both because she was the wealthy lady of the castle of Magdala, and because it was expressly contrary to the law of Moses, where it is commanded: "There shall be no prostitute among the daughters of Israel," of which people she was a member. Moreover, she had Lazarus, a most noble citizen, as her own brother and Martha as her honorable sister. They would never have endured such great infamy in their own city, Jerusalem.

In answer to the position of the doctors who call her a prostitute, it can be said that they speak by exaggeration. It is also often said of a dishonorable woman that she is a prostitute, even if she does not dwell in a public place.

Properly speaking, however, "sinful woman" does not signify this. It is a verbal noun conveying a habit or frequency of sin. Just as a male is called a sinner not only when lustful, but when entangled in other vices, so a woman devoted to various vices is called a sinful woman.

That she was a virgin in body does not appear likely either. Hence it is said of her in the hymn: "Mary, sister of Lazarus, who committed so many crimes," and afterward: "After the scandals of wanton flesh, from a cauldron she is made a daughter," and so forth.

Nor in her offices is the versicle said that is used of virgins--"Virgins shall be brought to the king after her"--but in its place: "Her many sins are forgiven." Nevertheless, none of these matters has been determined by the Church.

"When she knew that Jesus had reclined at table in the Pharisee's house." Although the Gospel does not state how Mary was induced to penance, it can piously be believed that it was from hearing Christ's preaching. For when a very great multitude from every class of people, even young people, gathered for his sermons, Mary--who was beautiful, vain, and curious, desiring to be seen and loved by worldly people--went to places where people gathered so that she might be seen.

Therefore, when she went to hear Christ preach, Jesus saw her and, foreknowing her future conversion, began to speak against the vanities of the world and about the punishments that would follow. Mary was thereby moved to compunction, and when the sermon ended and she heard where he was going to dine, she brought an alabaster vessel of ointment.

Bede says: “Alabaster is a kind of white marble interspersed with various colors, which is customarily suitable for ointment vessels because it is said to preserve ointments very well.” Supply: she entered the house where Jesus was.

Gregory says: “Because this woman saw the stains of her shame, she ran to wash them at the fountain of mercy. She was not ashamed of the guests, for because she was gravely ashamed of herself within, she believed there was nothing that should shame her without. Learn with what grief she burned, since she was not ashamed to weep amid a feast.”

“And standing behind him beside his feet.” Gregory of Nyssa says: “Showing her unworthiness, she stood behind his back and before him with downcast eyes and loosened hair, embracing his feet and pouring tears over them. Through these things she showed her sorrowful soul while imploring pardon.”

“She began to water his feet with tears and wiped them with her hair; she kissed his feet and anointed them with ointment.” Gregory says in a homily: “As many delights as she had possessed in herself, so many holocausts she found from herself. She converted the number of her crimes into the number of virtues, so that everything in her by which she had despised God in sin might now serve him anew in penance.

“She had desired earthly things with her eyes and gazed vainly, but now, wearing them down through penance, she wept. She had displayed her hair for the adornment of her face, but now she wiped away tears with that hair. She had spoken proud and perhaps shameful things with her mouth, but now, kissing the Lord’s feet, she fixed it upon the footprints of her Redeemer. She had employed ointment for herself for the shameful fragrance of the flesh, but now she offered it laudably to God.”

The Pharisee, seeing these things, despises not only the sinful woman coming to the Lord, but also rebukes the Lord who receives her. Hence it follows: “But the Pharisee who had invited him, seeing this, said within himself: If this man were a prophet, he would surely know who and what sort of woman is touching him, for she is a sinner.”

Gregory says: “Behold, the Pharisee, truly proud within himself and falsely just, rebukes the sick woman for her sickness and the physician for giving assistance. If that woman had come to the Pharisee’s feet, she would assuredly have departed driven away with kicks. For he would have believed himself defiled by another’s sin, because true justice did not fill his own footsteps.

“Thus too certain men placed in priestly office, if perhaps they have acted justly in exterior things or in small matters, despise their neighbors and subjects and disdain whatever sinners are placed among the people. It is necessary, however, that when we behold any sinners, he will not permit them. First let us mourn ourselves in their calamity, because perhaps we have either fallen into similar things or can fall.”

The physician Christ therefore stood among two sick people, namely Mary and Simon. One was held by a fever in his senses; the other had lost the sense of his mind.

The Lord, Titus says, heard not his words but beheld his thoughts, and showed himself the Lord of the prophets. Hence it follows: “And Jesus, answering”—namely Simon’s thought—“said: Simon, I have something to say to you.” Made more attentive by these words, Simon says: “Master, speak.”

But Jesus proposes an illustration concerning two debtors, saying: “Two debtors owed a certain moneylender,” and so forth. Titus says, as though Christ said: Neither are you without debt. Why, therefore, do you grow proud even if you are held for fewer things? For you too need pardon.

Hence he adds concerning pardon: “When they had nothing with which to repay, he forgave them both.” The Gloss says: “No one can be freed from the debt of sin unless he obtains divine grace.”

He is then asked which one loves the giver who forgave the debt more: the one to whom five hundred were forgiven, or the one to whom fifty were forgiven. The Pharisee at once replies: “I suppose that it is the one to whom he forgave more.” Here it should be noted that while the Pharisee is convicted by his own sentence, he is like a madman carrying the rope by which he is bound.

But Jesus says: “You have judged rightly.” Turning toward the woman, he said: “Do you see this woman?” and so forth. The good deeds of the sinful woman, which she had performed toward him from love, and the evil deeds of the falsely just man, which he had committed from neglect, are enumerated.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

“I entered your house,” and so forth. Titus says, as though Christ said: The use of water is easy, but the outpouring of tears is not easy. You did not use what was readily available, while she poured out what was not readily available, washing my feet with tears.

Chrysostom says: “Just as serenity comes when a violent storm has broken forth, so when tears have been poured out, tranquility appears and the darkness of guilt passes away. And just as through water and the Spirit, so through tears and confession we are made new again.”

Hence it follows: “Her many sins are forgiven, because she loved much.” Gregory says: “The rust of sin is consumed all the more, the more the sinner’s heart burns in the great fire of charity.”

Titus says: “It happens more often that one who has sinned greatly is purified through confession, while one who sins little does not come to the remedy of confession because of arrogance.”

“But one to whom less is forgiven loves less.” Chrysostom says: “Therefore we need a fervent soul, because nothing prevents a person from becoming great. Let no one among the fallen despair, therefore, and let no virtuous person sleep or trust in what he has, for often a prostitute precedes him.”

Hence it follows: “But he said to her: Your sins are forgiven you.” Behold, the sick woman who had come to the physician has been healed. Yet others are still sick because of her salvation. Hence it follows: “And those who reclined at table with him began to say within themselves: Who is this who even forgives sins?”

Gregory says: “But the heavenly physician pays no regard to the sick people whom he saw becoming even worse because of the medicine. He confirms the woman he had healed by a sentence of his kindness, saying: ‘Your faith has saved you.’” Gregory adds: because she did not doubt that she could receive what she sought.

Theophilus says that the one through whom Christ forgave sins does not stop at the remission of sin, but adds the performance of good. Hence it follows: “Go in peace,” that is, in justice. For justice is the peace of the human being with God, just as sin is enmity between the human being and God. It is as though he said: Perform everything that leads you toward peace.

Mystically, this woman signifies the Gentile world devoted to every vice. When it heard that Christ had reclined through the Incarnation in the house of Simon the leper, that is, among the Jewish people, it was converted through preaching and approached the Lord Jesus through faith: weeping for its sins, anointing him through devotion, and venerating the feet, that is, Christ’s humanity. On a second occasion it also anointed the head, that is, adored his divinity, now better taught and advancing in virtue.

But the Pharisee, that is, the Jewish people, murmurs at such a conversion and reception. Christ, however, shows that after its conversion the Gentile people displayed greater signs of love toward him than did the Jewish people, and therefore its sins were forgiven. The comparison introduced concerning the two debtors pertains to this.

For the Jewish people was a debtor to God, who is called a moneylender because he wishes the goods bestowed upon us as though by a loan to be repaid to him by our acknowledging that they come from him, using them for his honor, and multiplying merits.

The Jewish people was a debtor for fifty, which is the number of the Jubilee, in which there occurred remission of debts, liberation from servitude, and rest from cultivating the land. Even as regards its elect, that people was a debtor to God through the debt of original sin, its nature not yet purified; through the debt of servitude to the devil; and through the debt of eternal rest, which it could not possess although it was created for it. All these things were forgiven it by Christ through his Passion, as regards those converted to the faith, or virtually.

The Gentile people was a debtor for five hundred, a number resulting from fifty multiplied by ten, because it was liable to God not only through original sin, served the devil, and was estranged from the rest of heavenly beatitude, but was also a debtor through actual sins committed against the Ten Commandments.

Each people was forgiven as regards the elect. But where transgression abounded, says the Apostle, there the grace of remission will also abound, devotion, and love, namely among the converted Gentile people.

A notable example of his mercy also appears in the adulterous woman, to whom he said: “Neither do I condemn you. Go, and now sin no more.”

It must nevertheless be observed that Christ possessed absolute power over even the greatest criminals in both forums. Hence he could simply remit the penalty of death owed for adultery in the contentious forum without imposing another punishment, and in the penitential forum could forgive guilt and punishment without any confession or satisfaction, because he possessed the power of excellence in the sacraments.

It must nevertheless be believed that he then infused such great contrition into the adulterous woman that it sufficed for the destruction of all guilt and punishment, just as he had done for Magdalene.

Therefore, since human beings do not possess such absolute power either in the forum of causes or in the forum of souls, a judge could not and ought not absolve the guilty person without imposing some punishment, whether in the contentious forum or the penitential forum. For, as Ambrose says, “A good judge pronounces according to the laws and rights.” This is in Cause 3, Question 7, canon Iudicet.

§ XIV. His Immense Clemency Is Also Manifested toward Sinful Men

This appears not only in Peter when he denied Christ and in all the apostles when they withdrew from faith in his divinity at the time of the Passion, but also in Zacchaeus, who was a chief of the publicans.

For Luke relates: "When Jesus was walking through Jericho." Jericho is interpreted as "moon" and signifies the world, full of changes like the moon. Jesus's walking through it is his Incarnation. There, just as the blind man was illuminated, so Zacchaeus was separated from an immoderate affection for earthly things, because through Christ's Incarnation the world--which had been blind, darkened by many errors, and wholly devoted to the love of earthly things--was illuminated and freed from desires by God's grace and teaching.

It follows: "Behold, a man named Zacchaeus." His name is expressed so that the account may be understood as true history and not a parable.

"A chief of the publicans." Cyril says: "A publican is a greedy man, unrestrained toward another's supnum, a lover, for this is the publicans' office." Or "publican" means a public sinner. He was chief of such people, as though worse than the others.

Who, therefore, should despair of himself when this man comes to Christ--a man whose wealth, Alcuin says, arose from fraud, although he nevertheless made restitution for that fraud, as is clear below?

"And he was rich," so that you may understand that all rich people are commonly avaricious. Jerome says: "Every rich person is either unjust or heir to an unjust person."

"And he sought to see who Jesus was." Titus says: "The seed of salvation had sprouted in him because he desired to see Jesus. Since he had not yet seen him, when he had seen him he departed, as it were, from the madness of the publican. For one who sees Jesus cannot persist in wicked deeds."

"And he could not because of the crowd, since he was small in stature." Titus says that there were two impediments to this vision. The people hindered him--not so much a crowd of men as one of sins--and he was small in stature.

Ambrose explains him as small in malice, that is, through a defect of the goodness which is greatness of soul; or small in faith.

"And running ahead, he climbed a sycamore tree so that he might see him." Cyril says: "The crowd is the confusion of an unskilled multitude, which cannot see the summit of wisdom. Therefore, as long as Zacchaeus is in the crowd he does not see Christ; but when he has passed beyond the people he merits the justice he desired to behold in the sycamore tree."

Bede says: "The sycamore is a tree like the mulberry in its leaves, but surpassing it in height, whence it is called celsa by the Latins. It is called the foolish fig tree and signifies the cross. For the Lord's cross nourishes believers like a fig tree, but is mocked as foolish by unbelievers. Zacchaeus, small in stature, climbs this tree so that he may be exalted together with it, when each humble person, conscious of his own weakness, cries: 'Far be it from me to glory except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.'"

"Because Jesus was to pass that way." Ambrose says: "The evangelist beautifully adds that Jesus was to pass that way--either where the sycamore stood, or where Zacchaeus would believe--so that he might preserve the mystery and sow grace. For he had come in such a way that he would pass from the Jews to the Gentiles."

"And when he came to the place, Jesus looked up and saw him." Cyril says: "He saw the man's soul striving most readily toward holy living and converted him to rest."

Bede says: "The Lord walking through the city comes to the place where Zacchaeus had climbed the sycamore, because, when preachers in whom he himself both spoke and journeyed had been sent throughout the world, he came to the people of the nations, who were already exalted by faith in his Passion. Looking up, he saw them because he chose them through grace."

Or, according to Ambrose, Zacchaeus is above the tree because he is above the Law.

"And Jesus said to him." Ambrose says: "He takes him and, though not himself invited, invites himself. For he knew that his host's reward would be abundant. Although he had not heard the voice of one inviting him, he had nevertheless heard his affection."

Therefore he said: "Zacchaeus, make haste and come down, because today I must remain in your house." Titus says: "He desired only to see him, but the one who knows how to do more than we ask gave him beyond what he expected, namely that he should receive him in his house."

Bede says: "Behold, the camel, having laid aside the burden of its hump, passed through the eye of the needle. That is, the rich man and publican, abandoning the love of riches and despising the wealth of this age, received the blessing of the Lord's reception."

Hence it follows: "And he made haste and came down." Bede says: "He who is ordered to come down from the sycamore and thus prepare a dwelling in his house--this is what the Apostle says: 'Even if we have known Christ according to the flesh, yet now we know him no longer.' And: 'Although he was crucified through weakness, yet he lives by the power of God.'"

“And he received him rejoicing.” Chrysostom says: “Consider the Savior’s exceeding goodness. The innocent one associates with the guilty; the fountain of justice with avarice, which is the material of wickedness. Entering the publican’s house, he suffers no injury from the cloud of avarice, but by the brilliance of justice destroys avarice.”

But biting accusers and lovers of recrimination attempt to inveigh against the things he did. For it follows: “And when all saw it, they murmured, saying that he had turned aside to a sinful man.”

Chrysostom says: “Although accused as a glutton and friend of publicans, he scorned it in order to complete his purpose. For even a physician, unless he endures the pus of the sick, does not free them from disease.” This also occurred then, because the publican was converted and made better.

For it follows: “Zacchaeus stood and said to Jesus.” Chrysostom says: “Hear a wonder: he has not yet learned, and he obeys. Just as the sun, pouring its rays into a house, illuminates not by word but by deed, so the Savior, by the rays of justice, drove away the darkness of wickedness.”

“Behold,” he says, “I give half of my goods to the poor.” Chrysostom says that it must be considered more carefully that Zacchaeus’s wealth was not only unjust, acquired through frauds and robberies, but had also been gathered in part from his patrimony. Otherwise, how could he restore fourfold what had been unjustly extorted? He knew the Law commanding fourfold restitution.

Therefore he adds: “If I have defrauded anyone, I restore fourfold.” Augustine says: “Whatever anyone has taken against the right of human fellowship by thefts, robberies, calumnies, oppressions, or invasions, we judge ought to be restored rather than given away, according to the example of Zacchaeus the publican.” This is in Cause 14, Question 5, canon Non sane.

That he restored to those defrauded what he had defrauded was required by the debt of justice; that he restored it fourfold was supererogation; that he gave half of his goods to the poor was perfection. Once what had been wrongly taken was restored, he distributed to the poor what remained there.

According to Theophilus, it should be noted that he does not say, “I shall give” and “I shall restore,” promising to do so in the future, but “I give half” and “I restore fourfold,” doing so in the present. This is against those who resolve and do not act.

“And Jesus answered him: Today salvation has been made for this house.” By this he signified that Zacchaeus himself attained salvation through the good inhabitant.

“Because he too is a son of Abraham.” Bede says: “He is called a son of Abraham not because he was born from Abraham’s stock, but because he imitated his faith. Just as Abraham left his paternal land and household, so Zacchaeus left his goods to be divided among the poor.”

He beautifully says “he too,” so that he might show that not only those who had lived justly, but also those who recover their senses after injustice, belong to the children of promise.

“For the Son of Man came to seek and save what had perished.” Since some murmured because he stayed with a sinful man, he said this to restrain them: “The Son of Man came,” and so forth. According to Chrysostom, it is as though he said: “Why do you accuse me if I set sinners right? So far am I from hatred of sinners that I came for their sake. For I came as a physician, not as a judge. For this reason I endure the reproaches of the sick and their stench, so that I may offer remedies.”

Someone asks here how Paul commands that if a brother is insolent, avaricious, or the like, one should not even take food with such people, while Christ was a table companion of publicans. The answer is that by then these publicans had advanced so as to become brothers. Yet the Apostle commanded avoidance of brothers only while they persisted in evil; these men, however, had already changed. This is Chrysostom’s explanation.

Mystically, Bede says, Zacchaeus--whose name is interpreted “justified”--signifies the believing people from the Gentiles, depressed and made small through preoccupation with temporal things, but sanctified by the Lord. When the Lord entered Jericho, they wished to see the Savior, seeking to participate in the faith he brought to the world.

§ XV. “Let Your Loins Be Girded and Your Lamps Burning”

Theophilus says: “Loins,” that is, always ready to perform the works of our Lord. “Burning lamps,” that is, do not lead your life in darkness. But let the light of reason be with us, showing us the things to be done and avoided.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

For the world is night. Those who carry out practical activity have their loins girded, for such is the habit of ministers, who must also possess burning lamps, that is, the gift of discretion. Thus the practical person may know not only what he ought to do, but also how; otherwise, people are on a precipice.

Theophilus speaks of lamps in the plural: "Let us have two burning lamps: the conception of the mind continually shining in the soul, by which we are illuminated, and the teaching by which we illuminate others."

Or, according to Gregory, we gird our loins when we restrain the flesh from lust. For lust is in the loins of men, since seed descends from there. We have lamps in our hands when we show shining examples in our works.

Or, according to Augustine, he teaches us to gird our loins through continence from the love of earthly things, and to have burning lamps so that we may do this itself for a true end and with right intention. But if both these things are done, it remains that we place our whole hope in the Redeemer's coming.

Hence it follows: "And you, be like men waiting for their lord when he returns from the wedding." The Lord went to the wedding because, ascending into heaven as a new man, he joined to himself the heavenly multitude of angels.

Theophilus says: "The Lord also daily administers in heaven the souls of the saints, whom Paul or another like him offers to him as a chaste virgin." He returns from the wedding celebrated in heaven, perhaps universally at the consummation of the entire Church when he will come from heaven in the Father's glory, or perhaps at individual hours as he stands by the unexpected consummation of each person.

"So that when he comes and knocks," and so forth. Gregory says: "The Lord comes when he hastens to judgment; he knocks when through sickness he now announces that death is near. We open to him at once when we receive him with love. For one who fears to depart from the body does not wish to open to the judge when he knocks and dreads seeing as his judge the one whom he despised. One opens at once when, having recognized the time of approaching death, he grows cheerful from hope, based on good deeds performed, concerning the glory of recompense."

"Blessed are those servants whom, when the Lord comes, he finds watching." Gregory says: "One watches who keeps the eyes of the mind open to the sight of the true light, who preserves in action what he believes, and who repels from himself the darkness of torpor and negligence."

"Amen I say to you, that he shall gird himself." Origen says: "For justice shall be a girdle around his loins according to Isaiah, through which he girds himself," that is, prepares himself for recompense.

Or, according to Theophilus, he girds himself because he does not lavish the entire abundance of good things, but restrains it according to a certain measure. For who can contain God in all his greatness? Hence even the seraphim are said to be veiled because of his excellence.

"And he shall make them recline," that is, rest completely. Just as the whole body rests when one reclines, so in future glory the entire blessed person will at last rest in body and soul. He shall make those wearied recline, refreshing them and setting spiritual delights before them.

"And passing, he shall minister to them," that is, granting an equal life to them, so that just as they ministered to him, he ministers to them.

According to Gregory, he is called "passing" when he returns from judgment to the kingdom. Or the Lord passes when he lifts us from the form of his humanity to contemplation of his divinity.

According to Gregory, the first watch is childhood, the second youth, and the third old age, and so forth.

§ XVI. The Rich Banqueter and Lazarus the Beggar

According to Bede, this is not merely a parable, that is, a similitude, but an example of something that happened; and according to Ambrose it is the account of a true history, because a proper name is expressed. Nevertheless, it is also called a parable or similitude so that others may be admonished by it.

For, as Cyril relates from a tradition of the Jews, there was at that time in Jerusalem a certain Lazarus oppressed by extreme want and sickness. Christ remembered him, introducing him as an example for the greater manifestation of his discourse.

From this it is openly intimated that by God's wondrous providence the good are oppressed and afflicted in many ways in this age while the wicked prosper, but in the other age the wicked are tormented in hell and the good remain in the rest of felicity.

Hence he says: "There was a certain rich man." Because in the present the wicked are preeminent over the good in lordship, the life of the wicked rich man is therefore set out first.

He is called a “man” insofar as the word is derived from humus, earth--not insofar as he is a rational animal, for with his whole affection he was devoted to earthly desires and did not use reason.

He is called “a certain” man, and his proper name is not expressed, so that he may be tormented in that in which he sinned. For he was among the number of those who, according to the Psalm, “called their names upon their own lands”; therefore, after the passage of this life he loses his name.

His name is also passed over as though Christ did not know him, because Christ is said not to know sinners, that is, not to approve their deeds. Christ also passes over his name, although he knew it, so as not to scandalize his hearers. For, as John Damascene relates, this rich man is said to have been a blood relative of Zechariah, the father of the Baptist, and known to many.

“He was rich.” He is not rich now, but poor, blind, and naked. He “was” rich because all those things have passed away like a shadow.

Ambrose says: “Riches are not criminal in themselves, but luxury brings riches into disgrace.” Jerome says: “Every rich person is either unjust or avaricious.” According to Augustine, the worm of the rich is pride.

For avarice consists not only in acquiring unlawfully, but also in retaining tenaciously and not helping the poor when one ought, as this banqueter did. In addition, it consists in the order of loving: in establishing one’s final end in riches, according to Thomas in the Summa.

“Who was clothed in purple and fine linen.” Behold the boastfulness of pride. According to Bede, purple is the color of royal dress, produced from sea-shells cut around with iron, while fine linen is a kind of very white and very soft flax.

Gregory says: “If the cultivation of subtle and costly clothing were not a fault, divine speech would by no means express this so vigilantly, placing it as a cause of his condemnation. For no one seeks costly clothing except for vainglory.” The Gloss of Thomas adds: costly clothing means clothing exceeding the quality of one’s station.

“And he feasted splendidly every day.” The feasts denote superfluity; “every day,” continuity; “splendidly,” sumptuous solicitude.

Chrysostom says: “He covered ash and dust with purple. And what garments, what banquets, for a body to be gnawed by worms!” Gregory says: “It must be considered carefully that banquets can scarcely be celebrated without fault, for pleasure almost always accompanies feasts.”

Jerome says: “The belly and the genitals are neighboring members, so that from the nearness of the members the alliance of the vices may be understood.” This is in Distinction 44, section 1.

Next Lazarus’s condition is set out, and therefore it follows: “There was a certain beggar.” His begging and all his misery have passed away; he is not poor now, but exceedingly rich.

“Named Lazarus.” His name is given because such people are known to God, that is, approved and pleasing in their works, because they are supported by God’s grace. Thus Lazarus is interpreted “one aided,” namely aided by God’s grace.

“Full of sores,” so that his merit might increase further. He had not only beggary, which is extreme poverty seeking alms--whence mendicus, beggar, means one who speaks with his hand--but also a grave illness. Because he was full of sores, he had not one but many, so much so that he lay helpless.

Despised by all, he found no house or hospice to receive him, but lay in the street. “For he lay before the rich man’s gate.”

It is remarkable that this proud and avaricious rich man allowed him to remain before his house and did not drive him away. But this is believed to have been done wholly by divine dispensation, both so that the crown of patience might thereby be prepared for the poor man, who daily saw that wicked man prosper so greatly while he himself, free from those crimes, was held in such calamity--and hence could be tempted--and so that judgment of damnation might be prepared for the rich man, since, seeing such want every day, he did not assist even in the smallest things.

For, as it follows, “the beggar desired to be filled,” not with meats and costly things, but “with the crumbs that fell from the rich man’s table.” Amid so many wounds he does not recall the pains of his sores, but hunger, as though he said to him: Give me as alms what you throw away from the table; make loss into gain. “But no one gave to him.”

For the cruel master also had cruel servants. Thus Chrysostom says: “The rich are so forgetful of the human condition that, as though they were above nature, they take from the miseries of the poor incitements to their own desires. They laugh at the needy, insult the indigent, and take from those whom they ought to pity.”

Yet God does not desert his own even when afflicted. Hence it follows: “The dogs came and licked his sores.” Chrysostom says: “The wounds which no human being deigned to wash and touch, savage beasts lick.”

Next the departure of each is set out. The Lord says: “And it came to pass that the beggar died.” It came to pass, namely by divine dispensation working so that a reward might be rendered to the needy man.

“That the beggar died.” Lazarus did not die, but the beggar did--his poverty and misery. He himself, as regards the soul, lives forever and in rest. Hence it follows: “And he was carried by the angels.”

Chrysostom says: “Such punishment is suddenly exchanged for delights. He is carried after so many labors because he had failed, lest he should labor even by walking.” But this carrying is not bodily support, since neither a soul nor an angel is corporeal, but joyful companionship and defense from the devil’s snares.

Chrysostom says: “One angel would have sufficed to carry the poor man. But several come so that they may make a choir of rejoicing. Each angel rejoices to touch such a burden. Gladly are they burdened with such loads, so that they may lead human beings to the kingdoms of heaven.”

“Into Abraham’s bosom.” Chrysostom says: “He is carried into Abraham’s bosom so that Abraham may caress and refresh him.” Abraham’s bosom is now paradise, Chrysostom says.

For in the Old Testament Abraham’s bosom was the limbo of the fathers. It is so called because, just as a bosom is a place of safety and rest--for we place in our bosom what we wish to be safe lest we lose it, and little children rest in their mother’s bosom--so the souls descending to limbo were secure of their salvation and rested there. They were not afflicted by the punishment of fire, although they did not see God.

It is called Abraham’s bosom because the souls of the faithful descended there. Abraham is called their father and the father of faith, because he was the first to confess the true God publicly among the idolatrous Chaldeans, and worship of the true God remained in his household alone. With great faith he believed that, when he was already one hundred years old and his wife sterile, a son would be born from him in whom the nations would be saved.

The rich banqueter’s death follows. “And the rich man also died,” because his riches failed him. As the Psalm says: “When the rich man dies, he shall not take everything, nor shall the glory of his house descend with him.”

Chrysostom says: “He was indeed then dead in body, but his soul had been dead before. For he performed none of the soul’s works, since all his fervor arising from love of neighbor had expired, and he was deadlier than the dead.”

No one is said to have ministered at the rich man’s burial, as was said for Lazarus. For as long as the rich man delighted in the broad way he had many flattering attendants, but when he reached the end he was deprived of all. Let us hear what his soul received.

“He was buried in hell,” namely with the burial Jeremiah describes concerning King Jehoiakim: “He shall be buried with the burial of an ass.” This burial is as follows.

When an ass dies, three parts are made from it. Its masters receive its skin. So too the rich man’s relatives receive temporal or exterior goods, signified by the skin. And just as drums are made from an ass’s skin, at whose sound people rejoice and dance, so the survivors use the riches of sinners for vain rejoicings.

The flesh of an ass is gnawed and consumed by worms; so too a human corpse. But its bones are exposed to heat and cold, enduring. The souls of sinners also, remaining with their powers, will pass “from the waters of snow to excessive heat” in hell, where there is no redemption, as Job says.

Basil says: “Hell is a certain common place in the depths of the earth, shadowed and dark on every side. It has a kind of opening extending into the deep, through which there can be descent for souls condemned to punishment.” Augustine says: “Burial in hell is the depth of punishments, which devours the proud and unmerciful after this life.”

Finally his punitive recompense is set out. Hence it follows: “But lifting up his eyes when he was in torments.” Gregory says: “The eyes which guilt closed, punishment now opens. During life he refused to open the eyes of mercy toward the beggar; now, under punishment, he is compelled to open them toward that beggar when consoled.”

Chrysostom says: “For after the rich man’s death, his reclining in Gehenna and his sight of Lazarus’s delight increased his ruin, so that he might experience punishment more unbearably not only from the nature of the torments, but also by comparison with the other’s honor.”

Hence it says, “when he was in torments.” Chrysostom says: “It does not say ‘in torment,’ but ‘in torments.’ Infinite torments possess him”--the Gloss adds, infinite in duration--and also, beyond our comprehension here, he was wholly in torments. He had only his eyes free so that he might behold another’s joy and thereby be tormented more.

“He saw Abraham afar off.” Gregory says: “If Abraham had not then been in the lower regions, this rich man placed in torments would not have seen him.” For after departing the flesh, the confines of hell--that is, of limbo--held those who followed the ways of the heavenly homeland, not so that the punishment of fire might afflict them as sinners, but so that guilt for the first sin might keep them, resting in more remote places, from entering the kingdom, because the Mediator’s intercession had not yet arrived.

“And Lazarus in his bosom.” Chrysostom says: “There were many just poor people there, but the one who lay at his gate met his sight for his sorrow.” From this it becomes known that all whom we offend will be cast before our sight.

“And crying out, he said.” Chrysostom says: “The magnitude of the punishment produced a great cry.” “Father Abraham”: he calls Abraham father by nature, because he recognized that he descended from Abraham’s race. But he was not his son by imitation, because Abraham was charitable and this man cruel.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

The former remained before the doors of his tent so that he might receive travelers; this man, however, noticed even those who remained before his house without showing mercy.

Chrysostom says: “Yet he does not address his speech to Lazarus, but to Abraham, perhaps because he was ashamed, or because he thought Lazarus remembered his wrongs, judging him by himself.”

“Have mercy on me.” Chrysostom says: “In vain do you practice repentance where there is no place for repentance. Torments compel you, not the affection of the mind. I do not know whether one who is in the kingdom of heaven can have mercy on one who is in hell.”

“Send Lazarus.” Chrysostom says: “You err, wretched man. Abraham cannot send Lazarus, but he can receive him. You did not deem Lazarus worthy to be seen, and now you desire his finger. What you ask, you ought to have done for him while you were still alive. You desire water, although before you disdained delicately prepared foods.”

Chrysostom says: “The situation is changed, and it is made known to everyone who was rich and who was poor. For just as in a theater, when evening comes and those present depart, stripping themselves and putting aside their costumes, those who had seemed to everyone to be kings and praetors are afterward seen as they are, so also when death comes and the spectacle is ended, and all have laid aside the masks of poverty and riches, they are judged from their works alone: who are truly rich, who poor, who glorious, and who inglorious.”

Gregory says: “The rich man begged for a drop of water, he who in this life denied crumbs of bread.”

The mention here of members such as eyes, tongue, and finger must not be understood materially as referring to members of the body, but tropically. For such things are also said of God, in whom there is nothing corporeal. That rich man and Lazarus were in the lower regions in soul, not in body. Since the soul is a spirit, it does not have a corporeal tongue or finger. Rather, his sight is his knowledge; his tongue is the guilt of his evil speech in the world; his speech is an intellectual conception or its manifestation; the tip of the finger is the smallest work; and the water, according to Augustine, is some relief from punishment.

Hence he adds: “That he may cool my tongue.” Gregory says: “Why does one placed in torments ask for his tongue to be cooled more than another part, except that he had sinned through loquacity at banquets,” such as by detraction, derision, and speaking vain and shameful things? Therefore he burned especially in his tongue, that is, he was specially tormented for the sin of the tongue.

Chrysostom says: “For his tongue spoke many proud things. Where the sin was, there also is the punishment. And because he sinned most greatly there, he is therefore tormented there more severely.”

Or, according to Augustine, the fact that he wishes his tongue to be cooled although he burned throughout in the flame signifies what is written: “Death and life are in the hands of the tongue,” and that confession by the mouth is made unto salvation, which that man had not done.

The tip of the finger signifies even the smallest work by which help is given through the Holy Spirit. “Because,” he says, “I am tormented in this flame.” Although that fire or flame is material, it does not act upon the soul—which is a spirit and naturally nobler than it—except as the instrument of divine justice, supernaturally afflicting the soul by way of detention, according to Thomas in the Fourth Book, or even by way of infliction, according to Peter of La Palu. According to Augustine, in Distinction 25, section Alias ea, it exceeds every punishment of the present life.

“Because I am tormented,” and so forth. Basil says: “A fitting recompense is rendered to the rich man: that fire and infernal punishment, a parched tongue; groaning in place of the sounding lyre; desire for a drop in place of drink; deep darkness in place of monstrous spectacles; and the ever-wakeful worm in place of an unceasing retinue.”

Chrysostom says: "He was tormented not because he was rich, but because he showed no mercy." Gregory says: "From this one must gather with what punishment a person who seizes the property of others is to be chastised, if one who does not distribute his own is punished by the damnation of hell." This is in Cause 12, Question 2, canon Et si illi.

Ambrose says that he is also tormented because being deprived of delights is punishment for the luxurious person. Water, however, is no refreshment for a soul placed amid pains. But because, Gregory says, the rich man had not shown mercy to the poor man lying at his gate, he is not heard when he himself needs mercy.

Hence it follows: "And Abraham said to him: Son, remember." Chrysostom says: "Observe the patriarch's goodness. He calls him son, but offers no assistance to one who had deprived himself of a remedy."

"Remember," he says; that is, attend to the past, and do not forget how many times you were delighted by riches. "You received good things in your life." Chrysostom says: "Those things, namely, which you thought were true goods and believed that there were no others. Therefore, because you are filled with them, no other goods remain for you to possess."

"And Lazarus evil things," that is, things which you thought were true evils, although they were not: even if they were evils for the body, they were not evils for the soul.

Ambrose says: "Those things are not evils which neither entangle the mind in crime nor bind the conscience. Hence no wise person will call poverty, low birth, sickness, or death evils." This is in Cause 15, Question 1, canon Illa cavenda.

"You received good things," and so forth. Chrysostom says: "An evil person cannot be evil in everything, but has some good things," namely works good in their kind. Nor can a good person be good in everything, but he has some evils, namely sins. Therefore, when an evil person receives prosperity, it is to his own harm. For when he receives recompense here for those few good things, he will be punished more severely there. This is in On Penance, Distinction 3, canon Quid ergo. And when a good person endures evils, that is, adversities, he is cleansed from sins through them.

"But now he is comforted here." The Apostle says: "If we suffer together, we shall also reign together"; and, "If we are companions in sufferings, we shall also be companions in consolation." The Psalmist also says: "According to the multitude of my sorrows," and so forth.

"But you are tormented." Jerome says: "It is difficult--indeed, impossible--for anyone to enjoy both present and future goods, and to pass from delights to delights, so that he appears glorious in both ages, filling his belly here and his mind there." He speaks this way, however, about enjoyment.

Gregory says: "Whenever you have fared well in this age, when you recall that you have done good things, fear greatly concerning those very things, lest the prosperity granted to you be the recompense for those good things. And when you see poor people commit some blameworthy acts, consider that perhaps the furnace of poverty purges those whom the smallest superficial stain of wickedness defiles."

"And besides all these things," and so forth. Chrysostom says: "After this life, hope must be placed in God's mercy but, as regards salvation, in one's own endeavors, not in naming friends or relatives as witnesses. For a brother does not redeem." Jerome says the same in Cause 13, Question 2, canon In praesenti, with the section following.

"A great chaos has been fixed." Theophilus says: "The great chaos signifies the difference between the just and sinners. For just as their affections had been different in life, so their dwelling places differ by no small degree." It is said to be "fixed" because, according to Chrysostom, it cannot be dissolved, disturbed, or shaken.

Ambrose says: "A fixed chaos stood between the rich man and the poor man, because after death merits cannot be changed." Hence it follows: "So that those who wish to pass from here to you cannot, nor can they cross from there to here."

Chrysostom says: "It is as though he said: We can see, but cannot cross. We see what we have escaped, and you see what you have lost. Our joys increase your torments, and your torments increase our joys."

Gregory says: "Just as the reprobate desire to pass to the elect, that is, to migrate from the affliction of their punishments, so for the just to pass to those afflicted and placed in torments is to go to them in mind through mercy and to wish to free them," namely by a certain natural instinct, which is called the will as nature.

But although the souls of the just possess mercy through the goodness of their nature, they are nevertheless so bound by rectitude, being united to the author of justice, that they are moved by no compassion for the reprobate. Therefore the unjust do not pass to the saints because they are not freed from perpetual damnation, nor do the just pass to the reprobate because they show them no mercy through compassion in any way.

When the saints are said to rejoice in the punishments of the damned, this must be understood not as though they rejoice in their misery, but as rejoicing in the fulfillment of divine justice and in their own escape from a similar punishment.

Theophilus says: "From this you may draw an argument against Origen, who said that, since an end must be imposed upon punishments, there will be a time when sinners will be gathered to the just and to God." Against this also stands what Christ says in Matthew 25: "Depart, accursed ones, into eternal fire."

"And he said: I ask you, therefore, father." Gregory says: "After hope concerning himself is taken away from the burning rich man, his mind turns to the relatives whom he had left behind. Hence he says: 'I ask you, therefore, father.'"

Chrysostom says: "Observe his perversity. Not even his very punishments hold him to the truth. If Abraham is his father, how does he say, 'Send him to my father's house'?"

Augustine says: "He asks that Lazarus be sent because he perceived himself to be unworthy to bear witness to the truth. And because he had not obtained even a little cooling, much less did he believe that he could be released from hell to preach the truth."

He adds: "That he may testify to them, lest they too come into this place of torments." Here it must be observed that the rich man was moved to make this request not by charity for his brothers, which he did not possess, but by self-love. For because his brothers were abusing the riches which he had left to them indiscriminately, the rich man's punishment in hell was increased by their evil works in abusing those riches, insofar as he had provided them an occasion to sin. Therefore, so that his punishment might not increase daily, he asked that Lazarus be sent to correct them, lest they use the riches badly or imitate him in evils.

"Send him to my father's house," and so forth. Gregory says: "In this matter it must be observed how greatly the punishments of the burning rich man are multiplied. For both knowledge and memory are preserved for his punishment. He recognized Lazarus, whom he had despised, and remembered the brothers whom he had left. For so that sinners may be punished more greatly in torment, they see the glory of those whom they despised and are tormented by the punishment of those whom they loved fruitlessly."

Augustine also asks here whether the dead know the things that are done here, because the rich man spoke about his brothers, and whether the elect know them too, because Abraham spoke about the life Lazarus and the rich man had lived here and about Moses. He answers that Abraham could have learned these things after their deaths through Lazarus's report, lest what is written--"Abraham did not know us"--be false. The dead can also hear some things from the angels who are present to the affairs conducted here. They can also know, by the revelation of God's Spirit, some things that it is necessary for them to know, not only past things but even future ones. Augustine says the same more fully in Cause 13, Question 2, canon Fatendum. He adds that many of the dead are believed to come to certain living persons.

Abraham answered him: "They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them." Chrysostom says: "Do not now care more for your brothers than does God, who created them and appointed teachers for them to solicit and admonish them." Here "Moses and the prophets" means the writings of Moses and the prophets.

Ambrose says: "In this passage the Lord declares that the Old Testament belongs to faith, beating back the faithlessness of the Jews and the wickedness of heretics."

Gregory says: "But because the man who had despised God's words supposed that his followers could not hear them, he says in reply: 'No, father Abraham, but if someone goes to them from the dead, they will do penance.'"

Chrysostom says: "Because he had scorned the Scriptures when he heard them and considered them fables, he judged his brothers too from the things he himself had suffered."

Gregory of Nyssa says: "We are also taught another doctrine: Lazarus's soul is not concerned about present things and does not turn itself back toward anything it left behind, while the rich man, as though caught in a kind of birdlime, is held fast by the carnal life even after death. For if anyone becomes wholly carnal in mind, not even after his body has burned away is he freed from his passions."

But a truthful sentence is immediately returned to the rich man. For Abraham says to him: "If they do not hear Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe if someone has risen from the dead."

Gregory says: "Those who despise the words of the Law will fulfill the precepts of the Redeemer who rose from the dead all the more difficultly, the more subtle they are."

Chrysostom says: "That this is true is shown by the Jews, who at one time wished to kill Lazarus and at another attacked the apostles, although some had risen from the dead at the hour of the cross, that is, when Christ rose."

"But also consider this: every dead person is a servant, whereas the one who speaks through the Scriptures is the Lord. Hence, even if a dead person should rise and an angel descend from heaven, the Scriptures are more worthy than them all. For the Lord of angels, of the dead, and of the living established them. If God had known that the dead, by rising, would benefit the living, he who treats every single thing for our benefit would not have omitted this. But if the dead rose frequently, this too would eventually be despised. And the devil would easily introduce perverse doctrines, fashioning them through his own instruments--not truly raising the dead, but deceiving the observers' sight by certain deceptions, or contriving for certain persons to feign death."

Allegorically, Gregory says that Lazarus signifies the Gentile people, full of the sores of sins, whose dogs--that is, preachers--licked its sores, that is, cleansed away its sins. Having died to sins, this people rests in Abraham's faith. The rich man signifies the Jewish people, glorying in the Law and despising the Gentile people, who was finally rejected because of unbelief.

§ XVII. The Parable of the Steward Accused of Squandering His Master's Goods and His Shrewdness in Providing for Himself

Luke alone relates that Jesus said to his disciples: "There was a certain rich man." Bede says: "Because the most suitable order of preaching is that almsgiving should be urged after penance, therefore, after Luke related three parables about penitents received into grace through God's immense clemency, he adds the parable about giving alms, saying: 'There was a certain man,'" and so forth.

This man signifies the Lord God, who is rich toward all who call upon him, and to whom belong the earth and its fullness. This man had a steward. Jerome says: "For a steward is the governor of an estate."

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

Hence he is called a villicus from a villa. An oeconomus is accordingly the administrator of the lord's money, produce, and all his goods. These are Jerome's words.

And because, in relation to our homeland and heavenly city, this world inhabited by mortals can be called an estate, every mortal can therefore be called a steward. All the goods given to him by God, whether natural, temporal, or spiritual, have been conferred upon him to be administered--that is, to be used well for the advantage of the Lord, namely his glory, and not for the person's own profit. Among these are riches, if he possesses them, which one ought to distribute to the poor rather than retain tenaciously for oneself or spend badly.

It follows: "And he was accused before him as though he had squandered his goods." Chrysostom says: "A certain erroneous opinion generated by mortals increases their crimes, because we possess whatever we possess for use in the present life as though we were its lords, and therefore seize it inopportunistically as our principal goods. But the contrary is true. For we have not been placed in the present life as lords in our own home, but as guests and strangers, and we are led where we do not wish and at a time we do not expect. One who is rich now becomes a beggar in a short while. Therefore, whoever you are, know that you are an administrator of another's possessions, and that rights of transitory and brief use have been conceded to you. Casting aside from your soul the pride of ownership, therefore, assume the humility and moderation of a good steward rather than a squanderer."

For this man is said to have been accused because he had squandered his master's goods, and so forth. Theophilus says: "When we do not administer wealth according to the lord's will, but abuse it for our own enticements, we are criminal stewards." Hence this man was accused.

Here it is also shown that an inquiry into crimes ought to take place after a report has preceded it. This is in Extra, title On Accusations, chapter Qualiter et quando.

"And his lord called him." This call of the lord does not seem to be understood as a call through death, because then one is removed from the administration of things committed to him in such a way that he cannot provide for his salvation in the other life if he administered badly and dies amid that bad administration. Rather, it seems that it must be understood as an interior call, by which God illuminates the mind to recognize itself and its defects, showing the person that he deserves to have everything taken from him and to be deprived even of life.

"And he said to him: What is this that I hear of you?" He does not say this as though he does not know by himself the evil deeds of human beings, even hidden ones, and learns them from the report of others. Rather, he says it to show that the deeds of certain sinners are such that many know them.

"Give an account of your stewardship," that is, of your administration: how, namely, you have used the goods conceded to you by God while neglecting the human beings committed to you as subjects.

"For now you will no longer be able to be steward." This is said to the sinner's mind when, being pierced with compunction because God is offended with him, he recognizes that he deserves the withdrawal of all goods, even life. The sinner therefore considers what he must do, lest he perish from eternal hunger when it happens that he dies, because then he will be removed from his stewardship.

“And he said: What shall I do, because my lord takes the stewardship away from me?”--lest, namely, I afterward perish from hunger.

“Give an account of your stewardship,” and so forth. Chrysostom says: “Daily the Lord cries such things aloud to us through their effects, showing us one who enjoyed health at midday lifeless before evening, and another expiring amid dinner; and in diverse ways we depart from this stewardship. But the faithful administrator who trusts in his own administration desires with Paul to be dissolved and to be with Christ, whereas the one whose desires--that is, whose beloved things--are earthly is troubled at his departure.”

“I cannot dig; I am ashamed to beg.” That is: in the other life I cannot provide for myself by digging, namely through contrition and confession, because there is no time for repentance there; nor through begging from others, because there is no time for showing mercy. Even if I asked for help, it would be denied me, as happened to the foolish virgins.

Therefore, I must provide for myself now. And so, with God inspiring him, he says: “I know what I shall do, so that they may receive me into their houses,” namely into the eternal mansions. Those mansions may be owed to me either by reason of an injury received or by reason of a temporal obligation, although those people are nevertheless more principally debtors of the Lord God, because all our possessions are his. I shall remit at least a part to them, because an injury of this sort against one’s neighbor is in this respect an offense against God insofar as it pertains to him.

Let him therefore remit to his neighbor who sins against him the vengeance, namely by not desiring it; let him humble himself by asking pardon from him; and let him give generous alms from his goods, although through this he dispenses from the goods of his lord.

Chrysostom says: “As often as anyone, perceiving his own end, lightens by beneficence the burden of his offenses--either by remitting debts to debtors or, by giving abundance from his resources, distributing the things that belong to the Lord--he gains many friends for himself. Before the judge they will bear witness to his goodness, not by words but by the manifestation of good works; indeed, they will prepare for him a dwelling place of refreshment.”

Nothing, however, belongs to us, but all things belong to divine dominion. Therefore he calls them the debtors of his lord.

“A hundred measures of oil.” Bede says: “A cadus in Greek is an amphora in Latin. A cor of wheat is a chorus, which is filled by thirty modii. How much a modius contains is unknown.”

“And the lord praised the steward of iniquity.” Augustine says: “We ought not assume that everything written is to be imitated. For fraud must not be committed against any lord in order that we may make alms from that very fraud.”

“He praised him because he had acted prudently.” Origen says: “It must be observed that prudence is sometimes and properly taken for right reason concerning things to be done, according to the saying, ‘The Lord established the heavens’--that is, holy men--“in prudence.’ Sometimes it is also taken improperly in an evil sense, that is, for shrewdness and cunning invention for attaining an intended end, according to the saying, ‘The serpent was more prudent than all the animals,’” that is, more shrewd and cunning.

The lord therefore did not praise the steward by way of true commendation, just as evil people, when they are praised for their acuteness in doing evil, are praised not for their wickedness but for their skill.

Augustine says: “These similitudes are stated by way of contrast, so that we may understand: if this man who committed fraud could gain praise from his lord, how much more will those please God who perform works according to his commands?” Therefore the lord praised him not for the fraud committed against him, but for the provision he had made for himself.

“Because the children of this age are more prudent in their generation than the children of light.” Bede says: “They are called children of light and children of this age here, just as they are also called children of the kingdom and children of perdition. For whatever one’s works are, he is reckoned as belonging to that source and is its child, as though begotten from light or from the age.”

Theophilus says: “He calls those who think about and seek advantages for themselves principally upon earth the children of this age, but those who manage spiritual riches with a view to divine love the children of light. In human administrations, however, we are found prudently arranging our own affairs and striving with the utmost effort so that, if we are removed from the administration, we may have a refuge for life. But when we ought to administer divine things, we do not consider beforehand the things that will afterward profit us.”

“In their generation.” Origen says: “He does not call them wiser, but more prudent; nor does he call them more prudent simply and absolutely, but ‘in their generation,’” that is, in their own affairs.

Gregory says in the Moralia: “Therefore, so that each person may find after death whatever he places in his own hand, before death let him place his riches, through alms, into the hands of the poor.”

Hence the Lord adds: “And I say to you: Make friends for yourselves from the mammon of iniquity.” Augustine says: “Mammon in Hebrew or Syriac is translated ‘riches’ in Latin.”

Some people, understanding this badly, think that by seizing the property of others and distributing alms from it to the poor, they are observing this command. But that understanding must be corrected. For alms are to be given from just labors. “Therefore, do not wish,” Augustine also says, “to make alms from interest and usury.” This is in Cause 14, Question 5. For if anyone gives the whole of what he took from others to the poor, sin is increased rather than diminished. Augustine says the same in the same Question, canon Forte.

Once that false interpretation--that someone should receive unjustly in order to give to the poor--has been removed, this saying can be explained well in many ways.

These temporal riches are called riches of iniquity, first, because they have been acquired unjustly in such a way that recovery or restitution is due. Then we make friends for ourselves from them when we restore them to those from whom we received them, not to the poor; or when things acquired in this way are given to the poor because their owners are unknown or cannot be found, provided the manner and form that are due are certainly observed, as will appear in the Second Part.

Second, they are called riches of iniquity because they are acquired through unjust and prohibited acts, as when things are acquired through magic, divination, prostitution, gambling, and the like. We make poor people our friends from these when such things are given to them, provided that such works are avoided thereafter. Concerning this, see Cause 14, Question 5, canon Qui habetis.

Third, they are called riches of iniquity because, even if justly acquired, they are acquired with much labor and excessive solicitude of mind, which excessive anxiety is called iniquity. Gratian explains it this way in Cause 14, Question 5, section Sed etiam multipliciter. We make poor people our friends from riches of this kind when we give them alms from them.

Fourth, riches are called riches of iniquity, according to Augustine, because these temporal goods are not regarded as riches--that is, as great goods--except by wicked people who have their hope and affection immersed in them. The just, however, regard spiritual and heavenly goods as riches.

Fifth, according to Basil, they are called riches of iniquity as though riches of inequality, because they are not distributed equally among human beings. For more are given to one person and fewer to another, although by God’s just dispensation or permission, even if this is unknown to us.

Sixth, according to Ambrose, they are called riches of iniquity not because they are evil in themselves, but because affection for them tempts our souls with various enticements, so that we wish to serve riches. “For pride,” Augustine says, “is the worm of the rich.”

Seventh, according to Basil: “If you have succeeded to riches by inheritance, you have received things amassed by unjust people. For among many predecessors it is necessary that someone be found who unjustly seized the property of others. Suppose that neither your father extorted it; but from where is the gold you possess? If you say, ‘From me,’ you are ignorant of God and have no knowledge of the Creator. But if it is from God, tell us the reason for which you received it. Is not the earth the Lord’s, and its fullness? Therefore, if our possessions belong to the common Lord, they will also belong to our fellow servants.” These are his words.

Thus they are called riches of iniquity because even goods justly acquired are retained unjustly when those in need are not helped through them. It is therefore evident that riches are called riches of iniquity in seven ways, and from them we ought to make friends for ourselves: by restoring them as regards the first way, and by giving alms to the poor as regards the other ways.

“So that when you fail, they may receive you into eternal tabernacles.” Gregory says: “If by the friendship of those to whom we give we acquire eternal tabernacles, those who give ought to consider how great are the goods they bestow upon the needy.”

Or, according to Augustine: “Who are those who will possess eternal tabernacles except the saints? And who are those who are to be received by them into eternal tabernacles except those who served their need and cheerfully supplied what they required? These are those least ones of Christ who left all their possessions and followed him, and distributed whatever they possessed to the poor so that, freed from worldly fetters, they might serve God.”

Or otherwise, according to Ambrose: “Make friends for yourselves from unjust mammon, so that by giving to the poor we may obtain for ourselves the favor of the angels and of the other saints.”

Chrysostom says: “The Lord did not say that they should receive us ‘into their own mansions,’ but ‘into eternal tabernacles,’ because the friendship of the saints will not protect us by itself unless good works accompany us.” Almsgiving, therefore, is the art of arts. For almsgiving does not build earthen houses for us, but bestows everlasting life.

§ XVIII. The Temptation of Christ

Concerning this, Matthew 4 says: “Jesus was led into the desert,” and so forth.

First, it must be observed that three evangelists--Matthew, Mark, and Luke--mention Christ's temptation, but John does not. According to Origen, the reason is that John began his Gospel from God, saying: "In the beginning was the Word." God, however, is not tempted. In the other three evangelists, Christ's generation or manner of life as a human being is presented; a human being is the one who is tempted, and therefore they mention it, although in diverse ways.

For Mark states only in general that Christ was tempted by Satan. Matthew and Luke, however, specify the things by which he was tempted, though in different ways. Matthew places the temptation on the pinnacle--that is, concerning vainglory or pride--in the second position, but Luke in the third. And the temptation on the mountain, concerning avarice, which Matthew places in the third position, Luke places in the second.

Augustine says: "It is uncertain to us which of these happened first. Nevertheless, falsehood ought not for this reason to be imputed to either evangelist, because it makes no difference whether one thing happened first or later, provided that the things themselves occurred."

It can also be said that this was done mysteriously, so that one evangelist would put this temptation first and the other another, to signify that vainglory and avarice beget one another, as Maximus says.

Or, according to Gregory, Luke simply preserved the order of the event, while Matthew presented the order by correspondence with the temptation of our first parents. For the devil tempted both: he conquered the first Adam, but was conquered by the second, namely Christ.

As the Master also notes in the Second Book of the Sentences, the devil first tempted Adam concerning gluttony, saying, "On whatever day you eat from it," suggesting that it was to be eaten. Second, he tempted him concerning pride when he promised them likeness to divinity, adding: "You shall be like gods." Third, he tempted him concerning avarice, taking it broadly insofar as it denotes an immoderate desire to possess knowledge, dominion, and riches. Hence he added: "Knowing good and evil." According to this order, Matthew took care to present the progress of the order of Christ's temptation.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

Second, it must be observed that Christ was tempted in one way and we in another. For since a temptation of the devil is a certain suggestion or proposal of some evil act, which he offers to our mind under the hope of some good, this can happen through a threefold progression, as Gregory notes in Distinction 5, canon Ad eius.

First, it occurs through the sudden representation of some thing to be done. These are called first movements, and by others "first-first" movements. In this there is no sin, but rather material for exercise and, if it is resisted, a crown of merit.

Second, such a suggestion advances to sensual pleasure, but short of consent, and there is venial sin.

Third, the consent of reason sometimes follows, so as deliberately to desire the evil that is suggested, or to delight in it lingeringly and not repel it from the mind. There is mortal sin at this point if the thing is against the commands of God or the Church.

Therefore, although Christ was tempted in the first way, namely through suggestion, the temptation nevertheless advanced no further, for it did not reach even sensual pleasure, where venial sin exists. Even the perfect frequently sin at this second degree.

This is what Gregory says: "When we are tempted, we frequently either consent or at least delight according to the flesh," that is, with that sensual pleasure. "But when Christ was tempted, no delight in sin bit him."

Third, it must be known that according to some people this temptation occurred only through the imagination, so that these conversations took place with no visible form appearing, but these representations were made only to Christ's imagination. It was like the occurrence to us of thoughts about certain things to be done, in which we answer ourselves while deliberating whether to do or not do the thing proposed to the mind.

Accordingly, as to the statement, "The tempter approached and said," this approach was not local but occurred through a suggestion to the imagination. The Gloss, however, says the contrary, as will be stated; so do Chrysostom and Gregory.

Others say that it occurred through a visible form, the devil taking the form of a human being with a body formed from air, as happens in apparitions of good or evil angels made to human beings. They suppose, as it were, that he assumed the form of a hermit approaching Christ in the desert by way of visitation and speaking to him in that form.

The Gloss expressly says this: that these works occurred before the bodily senses and that the devil appeared in the form of a human being. His leading Christ into the city or onto the mountain could have occurred by way of persuasion--for example, by saying to him, “Let us go to the city,” and afterward, “onto the mountain”—and Christ went with him, not compelled but voluntarily, so that he might conquer him and thereby help us in our temptations through the merit and example of his victory.

Or, if he permitted himself to be carried not over the ground but through the air, he nevertheless did not permit himself to be seen by others, as Chrysostom says. Nor, Gregory says, ought it appear unworthy to us if for an hour he permitted himself to be carried by the devil, since he permitted himself to be seized, mocked, and crucified by the devil’s members, namely Caiaphas, Pilate, and the Jews. This exposition is more common and more suitable for preaching to the people.

Fourth, it must be observed that immediately after baptism Christ went to the desert, a place of penance, giving himself to fasting rather than delights, and there he was tempted and conquered. According to Chrysostom, this intimates that after baptism or true penance no one ought to trust so greatly in the grace received that he gives himself to idleness and delights. Rather, he ought to exercise himself in bodily austerities, flee occasions of evils, devote himself to solitude of mind and meditation, and so prepare himself to resist the devil’s temptations, according to Ecclesiasticus 2: “When you approach the service of God, stand in justice and fear, and prepare your soul for temptation.”

For the more anyone devotes watchful attention to better pursuits, the more the ancient enemy assails him. Hence Pope Leo says: “Let no one trust in the purity of his heart. For that ever-watchful enemy strikes with sharper snares those whom he knows especially to abstain from sins. From whom would the impulse of his wickedness restrain him, when he dared to attack the Lord of majesty?”

Fifth, it must be observed that, although the devil knew that the Son of God was to be incarnate and to free the world—that is, the human race—from his hands, he did not know the time or manner. Therefore, he diligently watched to see whether perhaps he could recognize him and impede our liberation.

Thus, whenever he saw certain holy men perform great things, he watched to see whether perhaps they were he. And because he perceived defects and sins in them all, he judged that none of the earlier men was he.

But when he saw Christ come into the world, he did not know the manner. For although a virgin had conceived, because he saw that she had a spouse, namely Joseph, he judged that Christ had been conceived by him. For this reason God willed that she be betrothed, so that this mystery would be hidden from the devil. And the Virgin’s holiness was so great that the devil could not learn how she had conceived.

When Christ had been born, Satan certainly heard the angels singing in the air, “Glory to God in the highest”; saw a new star appear to the Magi; and saw the shepherds going to adore him and making their announcement. Dumbfounded in mind, he judged almost firmly, and said to himself, that this was the Son of God.

But when he considered the circumstances of the newborn child—namely, that like other little infants he wailed, lamented, sucked the breasts, and suffered cold in a shelter—recovering his mental confidence, he answered himself: “Who would not laugh to hear that God wails or weeps and sucks the breasts? These things belong to a human being, not to God. Therefore, this man is a human being, not God, even if these are indications of great holiness.”

Then, perceiving the adoration of the Magi and the great testimonies of Simeon and Anna when Christ was presented in the Temple, he was sufficiently alarmed concerning his divinity. But when he considered that Christ fled into Egypt like a mere human being for fear that Herod would kill him, he said to himself: “Does God fear human beings? He is not God.”

And when Christ came for baptism, he heard the voice from heaven saying: “This is my beloved Son.” And he said: “I am confounded. What is clearer than this testimony?” But seeing him baptized with sinners, he answered himself: “Why would this man be baptized if he were God? For God is without sin, and John gives baptism for the repentance of sinners. That voice therefore indicates that he is a son of God through the excellence of great holiness, not that he is the natural Son of God.”

And when Jesus afterward performed many miracles, greater and more numerous than those of earlier men, not by entreating but by commanding, the demons cried out, not from certainty but from forceful conjecture: “You are the Son of God.” Christ, however, concealed his divinity from them by adding something that belonged to humanity, such as eating with others, becoming hungry, and the like.

Therefore, when the devil now saw that Christ had remained in the desert for forty days without food, which is contrary to the human condition, he began to be driven to suspect that perhaps he was God himself. But when he noticed him becoming hungry, he cast aside that suspicion, saying: “God cannot hunger. Nor is he the only person who has done what he did by remaining without food, for Moses and Elijah, who were mere human beings, also did this. Therefore this man is not God, but a very holy man like them.”

“Yet I have deceived many most holy men—Adam, Moses, and David—in diverse ways. I shall therefore approach him to see whether I might gain something with him by inducing him to some sin, or at least recognize more certainly whether he is the Son of God.”

Christ, however, knowing his wickedness, went to the place of temptation, namely the desert, so that in the very battle of temptation the devil might be weakened and Christ's power in our temptations might also hand on to us the pattern for conquering him.

Therefore the evangelist says: "Jesus was led into the desert," and so forth. The devil presses temptation more strongly when he sees people alone. Hence in the beginning he tempted the woman when he found her without her husband.

"Into the desert." The Gloss says: "This place is between Jerusalem and Jericho, where robbers dwelt, and where the man who went down from Jerusalem to Jericho fell among robbers." He bore the figure of Adam, who was conquered by demons. It was therefore fitting that Christ should conquer the devil there where, under a figure, the devil had conquered the human being.

"By the Spirit"--certainly not by an evil spirit, but by his own spirit, that is, by reason impelling him toward virtuous works. Therefore, this leading occurred through reason's persuasion, not the compulsion of violence. Gregory and others say this. And this is how what Mark says must be understood: "The Spirit drove him into the desert."

Basil says: "Not provoking the enemy by word but entering by deed, he seeks the desert. For the devil delights in the desert; he does not suffer himself to be in cities, since civic concord saddens him."

Chrysostom says: "Not only was Christ led into the desert, but so are all the children of God who possess the Holy Spirit. For they are not content to remain idle, but the Holy Spirit urges them to undertake some great work. This is in the desert as regards the devil, because the injustice in which the devil delights is not there. Every good thing is also outside the flesh and the world, because it is not according to the will of the flesh and the world. Therefore, all the children of God go out into such a desert so that they may be tempted," understanding this consecutively, not that they act for this purpose, but that this follows from it: they are tempted there by the devil.

"That he might be tempted by the devil." Cyril says: "Behold, he who commands contests among the athletes and crowns the heads of the saints has become one of the athletes."

Origen says: "Jesus is tempted by the devil for forty days. What the temptations were we do not know," namely other temptations besides these, which perhaps were passed over because they were greater than soldiers would believe.

"And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights." Basil says: "He fasted, showing us that sobriety is necessary for the one who wishes to gird himself for the battle of temptations."

Lest this fast of Christ be believed similar to ours, in which we eat once in a natural day, Luke adds: "And he ate nothing."

"That he might be tempted by the devil." Chrysostom says: "Whoever you are, if after baptism you endure greater temptations, do not be disturbed. For you received arms for this reason, not that you may be idle, but that you may fight."

God does not prevent temptation from coming to you for five reasons. First, so that you may learn that you have been made much stronger. Second, so that you may not be exalted by the greatness of the gifts. Third, so that the devil may learn by experience that you have departed from him completely. For when a tyrant sees a fortress rebelling against him, he applies absolutely every exertion of battle to subject it to himself again.

Fourth, so that through this you may be made stronger. For through exercise in some art a person is made more capable and stronger for its works. Fifth, so that of the treasure entrusted to you, you may receive the sign of the treasure. For the devil would not come upon you to tempt you unless he saw that you had been established in greater honor.

Hilary says: "For the devil's temptations rage especially among those who have been sanctified, because victory over the saints is more greatly desired by him."

"And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights." Chrysostom says: "Christ fasted not because he needed it, but to instruct us. And so that he might establish the measure of our Lenten fast, he fasted for that length of time. But he did not proceed in fasting beyond Moses and Elijah, forty days, lest his assumption of flesh appear incredible."

Gregory says: "The author of human beings himself took no food for forty days and nights, which Luke states expressly. But insofar as we are able, during the season of Lent let us afflict our flesh through abstinence," namely by fasting and being content with one meal each day.

The number forty is observed because the power of the Decalogue is fulfilled through the four books of the Gospel; ten multiplied by four rises to forty. For in this mortal body we subsist from four elements, and through its pleasure we transgress the Lord's commands, which were received through the Decalogue. Therefore, because through the desires of the flesh we have despised the commandments of the Decalogue, it is fitting that we afflict that same flesh four times ten.

Other reasons for the Lenten fast are also assigned; they are contained in the Second Part. Concerning the manner of fasting, you also have material in On Consecration, Distinction 5, canons Quadragesima and Ieiunium.

“Afterward he was hungry.” Hilary says: “He was hungry not during the forty days, but after forty days. Therefore, when the Lord hungered, it was not that hunger stole upon him; rather, the miraculous operation left the human being to his own nature. The devil was to be conquered not by God, but by the flesh.”

Chrysostom says: “The Lord knew the devil’s thought, that he wished to tempt him. Therefore the Lord proceeded against him not as God, but as a human being--or rather as God and a human being. For not to hunger for forty days did not belong to a human being. Moses and Elijah, while fasting for forty days, hungered as mere human beings, but endured, strengthened by God. Christ, however, did not hunger during those days, which belongs to the divine nature; but to hunger at some time did not belong to God.”

Therefore, he hungered lest he be manifestly recognized as God and thus extinguish the devil’s hope of tempting him and impede his own victory. But after the devil perceived him hungering, he resumed his hope of tempting him.

Hence it follows: “The tempter approached and said to him.” Chrysostom says: “Therefore, if you have fasted and are tempted, do not say, ‘I have lost the fruit of my fast.’ For even if your fast does not profit you so that you are not tempted, it will nevertheless profit you so that you are not conquered by temptations.”

The devil says: “Command that these stones be made bread.” Ambrose says: “He began from the point at which he had already conquered,” namely our first parents, that is, from gluttony. “What does the beginning of such an address intend, except that he had learned that the Son of God was to come, but did not think he had come through bodily weakness? It belongs to one who investigates in one respect and tempts in another: he professes that he believes in God and strives to mock the human being.”

Hilary says: “Therefore, in tempting him he proposed that condition of a work through which he might recognize the power of deity from the transformation of stones into bread, and through the enticement of food mock the patience of the hungry human being.”

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Two (continued)

Jerome says: “But you are caught between two contrary alternatives, O devil. For if by his power stones can be made bread, you tempt in vain one who has such great power. But if he cannot do it, you suspect in vain that he is the Son of God.”

Chrysostom says: “Just as he blinded all human beings, so now he was invisibly blinded by Christ, so that neither would Christ acquiesce in his temptation nor would he recognize him as the Son of God, although he intended at least one of these two outcomes.”

But if it is asked how the devil tempted him through gluttony by these words, since to hunger, to desire food when one needs it, and to eat are natural and lawful in themselves, the answer is that, although this is lawful in itself, it can become unlawful through some circumstance. For example, it would be so if one did something unbecoming to satisfy such an appetite--as if a hungry religious ate without the blessing being said, or before the proper hour, and the like.

Thus, when anyone needs food, it would be a sin to seek that a miracle be performed when he can provide for himself in another way. Since Christ could provide for his need by going to nearby places, it would have appeared superfluous and vain for him, without an urgent cause, to make stones be changed into bread for eating.

But Jesus answered and said to him. Gregory says: “When tempted by the devil, the Lord answers with the precepts of sacred Scripture. Although he could have plunged his tempter into the abyss, he did not display the power of his might, so that he might give us an example: whenever we suffer any evil from a wicked person, we should be aroused toward teaching rather than vengeance.”

For he says: “It is written,” namely in Deuteronomy. Rabanus says: “Therefore, if anyone is not fed by the word of God, he does not live. For just as the human body does not live without bodily food, so the soul does not live without the word of God.” The word is said to proceed from God’s mouth when he reveals his will through the testimonies of the Scriptures.

And he adds what is written there in chapter 6: “A human being does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceeds from the mouth of God.”

Jerome says: “Christ’s purpose was to conquer through humility. Hence he also conquered his adversary with the testimonies of the Law, not by the power of his might, so that through this very thing he might honor human beings more and punish the adversary more, since the enemy of the human race was conquered as if by a human being rather than by God.”

Chrysostom says: “He did not say, ‘I do not live by bread alone,’ but, ‘A human being lives,’ so that the devil could say: ‘If he is the Son of God, he hides himself lest he show what he can do; if he is a human being, he excuses himself shrewdly lest he show that he cannot do it.’”

It can be explained that, since a human being consists of the twofold substance of soul and body, and the soul is nobler, he ought to care more for spiritual food, which is the word of God observed and not merely heard. Hence it is unbecoming that, in providing for bodily food, the soul should be deprived of its own food, namely by acting against God’s word in doing what you advise, where no necessity urges it.

Daily the devil says these things to human minds: “If you are a son of God”—if, because you are a son of God through grace—“command that these stones be made bread”; that is, let such great abstinence and such great hardness of rigor be changed into softness under the appearance of bodily necessity. But one must have recourse to the testimonies of the Scriptures.

Chrysostom says that, since from this response of Christ the devil could receive nothing certain about whether he was God or a human being, the devil took him up for another temptation, saying to himself: “This man who does not die from hunger, even if he is not the Son of God, is nevertheless a holy man. Holy men can avoid being conquered by hunger, but they sometimes fall through vainglory.” Therefore, he turned himself to this temptation.

“Then he took him up into the holy city,” that is, into Jerusalem. According to Rabanus, it is called holy because the Temple of God, the Holy of Holies, and the worship of the true God were there, and it was afterward consecrated by Christ’s blood.

According to Remigius, it is shown from this that the devil plots against Christ’s faithful even in holy places. “And he set him upon a pinnacle of the Temple.”

Remigius says: “The pinnacle was the seat of the teachers. For the Temple did not have a peak rising upon its roof like our houses, but was flat above in the custom of the Palestinians. In the Temple itself there were three levels, and on each of them was a pinnacle like a pulpit or chair for preaching or reading, from which the teachers announced the Law to the people.” Therefore, he placed him upon one of those high pinnacles, from which there was a great precipice.

“He therefore set him upon a pinnacle.” The Gloss says: “The devil always leads toward high places, elevating a person through boasting so that he may cause him to fall.” Because he had deceived many teachers in their chair through vainglory, he therefore thought that this man, placed in a teacher’s seat, could be exalted by vainglory.

Hence he said to him: “If you are the Son of God, cast yourself down.” Chrysostom says: “Through this proposition, how could he learn whether he was the Son of God or not? For to fly through the air is not properly a work of God, because it is useful to no one. But if anyone flies when provoked to do so for display, he does this from the devil rather than from God.”

“Cast yourself down.” Jerome says: “This is the devil’s voice, for he always desires that human beings fall downward. But he can persuade; he cannot cast them down.”

The devil thought within himself: “If this man throws himself down, because he is a holy man, he will suffer no injury. But human beings, seeing this miracle, will venerate him as holy, and from this honor and praise perhaps he will fall into vainglory. Or from some other result it will become known whether he is the Son of God.”

And because Christ had cited authorities of Scripture above, the devil, lest he appear ignorant of it, adds in confirmation of what he was advising: “For it is written in the Psalms: God has commanded his angels concerning you,” and so forth.

Ambrose says: “For the devil transforms himself into an angel of light, and even from the divine Scriptures themselves prepares a snare for the faithful. He uses testimonies of Scripture not to teach, but to deceive.” Hence, according to Jerome, what he cites is a prophecy not about Christ, but about a holy man.

The devil interprets Scripture badly. Heretics do likewise when they cite Scriptures to confirm their errors.

Therefore, according to the Gloss, that authority of Scripture must be explained as referring to every good human being in this way: God commands the angels that in their hands—that is, by their own aids—they are to lift him up, help him, and guard him, lest he strike his foot—that is, the affection of the mind—against a stone, that is, against the Old Law written upon tablets of stone. Or by the stone can be understood every occasion of sin or ruin.

Chrysostom says: “Truly, the Son of God is not carried in the hands of angels; rather, he himself carries the angels. And even if he is carried in the hands of angels, this is not so that, as though infirm, he may not strike his foot against a stone, but for the honor due him as Lord. But, O devil, how is it that you have read that the Son of God is carried in the hands of angels, yet have not read that he treads upon the asp and the basilisk? You bring forward the former example in your pride, but in your cunning you keep silent about the latter.” Nor does the text that was written advise him to throw himself down.

Jerome says: “He breaks the devil’s false arrows drawn from the Scriptures with the shields of the true Scriptures.” Hence it follows: “It is written,” namely in Deuteronomy, “You shall not tempt the Lord your God.”

The Gloss says: “He does not say, ‘You shall not tempt me,’ but, ‘the Lord your God,’ which any person who is tempted could say, since even one who tempts a man of God tempts a man.”

Augustine says: “It pertains to sound doctrine, when a human being has something he can do, not to tempt the Lord his God.” This certainly happens when someone can provide for a danger or necessity by a human means, but, omitting that means, seeks a miraculous effect from God, as in this case. Christ could descend from the pinnacle by stairs; it was not necessary for him to cast himself down.

The devil passes to the third temptation, namely avarice, according to Chrysostom. “For he took him up onto a very high mountain,” higher than the others, so that he could see more expanses from it, “and showed him all the kingdoms of the world and their glory.”

Chrysostom says: “He did this in a general way, for example, pointing with his finger: ‘In that direction toward the east is such a kingdom, with such noble cities in it and such riches, gold, silver, precious stones, and the like; and toward the west are such kingdoms, cities, and precious things,’ and likewise concerning the others.”

Luke relates that the devil said that all these things were in his power and that he gave them to whomever he wished. He spoke a lie, and this is no wonder, because he is a liar and the father of lies; but all things have been placed in the Lord’s dominion. How can he give kingdoms when he could not enter swine unless Christ granted permission?

Unless we say that the kingdoms of the world are the multitudes of human beings in whom the devil ruled through diverse vices as though through diverse kingdoms, such as pride, lust, and the like.

“He showed him all the kingdoms.” Chrysostom says: “It was not that the devil could enlarge his sight or show him something unknown. Rather, by displaying in words the vanity of worldly pomp, which he himself loved, as though it were beautiful and desirable, he wished to suggest that Christ come to love those things.”

And he said: “All these things I shall give you.” Jerome says: “Arrogant and proud, he speaks from boasting. The devil cannot give all kingdoms, since God has given kingdoms to holy men. But the devil gives those things that are produced through iniquity in the world; for example, he gives riches acquired through theft and other injustices.”

Remigius says: “The devil’s rashness and madness are also astonishing. He promised to give earthly kingdoms to the one who gives heavenly kingdoms to his faithful, and the world’s glory to the one who is the Lord of heavenly glory.”

“If, falling to the ground, you will adore me.” Ambrose says: “Ambition possesses a domestic danger: in order to rule others, it first serves; it bends itself through submission so that it may be presented with honor; and while it wishes to be higher, it becomes lower.”

“If, falling to the ground, you will adore me.” The Gloss says: “Behold the devil’s ancient pride. Just as in the beginning he wished to make himself like God, so now he wished to usurp divine worship for himself, saying: ‘If, falling down, you will adore me.’ Therefore, one who is about to adore the devil first falls.”

It follows: “Then Jesus said to him: Go, Satan.” Chrysostom says: “In this he sets an end to the devil’s temptation, lest he proceed further.”

Jerome says: “It is not, as many think, by the same sentence that Satan and Peter are condemned. For to Peter it is said, ‘Go behind me, Satan,’ that is, ‘Follow me, you who are contrary to my will.’ But to this one it is said, ‘Go, Satan,’ and ‘behind’ is not added, so that ‘into eternal fire’ may be understood.”

Or, according to other copies, Remigius says, “Go behind,” that is: “Remember in how great a glory you were created and into how great a misery you have fallen.”

According to Chrysostom, it must be observed that when Christ suffered an injury from the devil saying, “If you are the Son of God, cast yourself down,” or, “Command that the stones,” and so forth, he was not disturbed and did not rebuke the devil. But now, when the devil usurped for himself the honor due to God, Christ became angry and repelled him, saying: “Go, Satan.” Thus we learn from his example to endure our own injuries magnanimously, but not to suffer injuries to God even as far as hearing them. For to be patient amid one’s own injuries is praiseworthy, but to dissemble injuries to God is excessively impious.

And it follows: “It is written,” namely in Deuteronomy: “You shall adore the Lord your God, and him alone shall you serve.” Augustine says: “The one Lord our God is the Trinity itself, to whom alone we owe the service of piety.”

And in the book The City of God, Augustine says: “By the word ‘service’ is understood the worship owed to God. For latría, which is a Greek word, wherever it has been placed in the holy Scriptures, our translators have rendered as ‘service.’ But that service which we owe to human beings, according to which the Apostle commands servants to be subject to their masters, is usually called dulia in Greek. Latria, however, always--or so frequently that it is almost always--means the service that pertains to worshiping God.”

Chrysostom says: “The devil did not withdraw as though obeying a command, but Christ’s divinity, which was in him, cast the devil out.” Hence it is added: “Then the devil left him.”

This, as Chrysostom says, contributes to our consolation, because the devil does not tempt the people of God for as long as he wishes, but for as long as Christ permits. And although he permits him to tempt for a little while, he nevertheless repels him because of our weakness.

Consolation follows victory over temptation. For it follows: “And behold, angels approached.” Chrysostom says: “It does not say that the angels descended, to show that they were always on earth for his ministry. But at the Lord’s command they had withdrawn from him so that a place might be given to the devil against Christ, lest perhaps, seeing the angels around him, he would not approach him.”

“They ministered to him,” perhaps bringing food to strengthen the hungry human being.

Luke says: “And when every temptation had been completed.” Ambrose says: “Scripture would not have said that every temptation had been completed unless all the material of offenses were contained in the three temptations, because the causes of temptations are the causes of desires,” namely the enticement of the flesh, the hope of glory, and the greed for power.

“The devil withdrew from him.” Athanasius says: “He had approached him as a human being, but, finding in him no sign of his ancient seed, he withdrew.”

“He withdrew from him.” Ambrose says: “You therefore see that the devil himself is not persistent in his effort. He is accustomed to yield to true virtue. Although he does not cease to envy, he nevertheless fears to press on because he flees being defeated more frequently.”

“Until a time.” Ambrose says: “For afterward he came not to tempt him, but to fight him openly.”

Or, according to Theophilus, because Christ had triumphed over pleasure in the desert, the devil withdrew from him until the time of the cross, at which he was to tempt him through sadness.

Or, according to Maximus, in the desert the devil had suggested preferring the world’s matter to divine love. Afterward he tried to make Christ a transgressor of love for one’s neighbor, when, as he later preached the truth, the scribes and Pharisees set snares for him and disparaged him, so that he might thereby be provoked to hatred against them.

Or “until a time,” namely the time of the Passion. For then he also approached Christ, searching to see whether he might find anything of his own in him. Hence Christ said: “The prince of this world,” that is, the devil, “comes, and in me he has nothing,” that is, he will have nothing.

He tempted Christ when he said through the mouths of the scribes and Pharisees: “If he is the Christ, let him descend from the cross, and we will believe him,” as though inciting him to descend from the cross for their conversion, so that the liberation of the human race might thereby be impeded.

Fifth Title: On the Sixth Age of the World

Chapter Three: On the Teaching of the Lord Jesus in Rebuking Human Vices, Especially the Avaricious, the Ambitious, Those Devoted to Vainglory, the Proud, Hypocrites, and the Voluptuous

Hence, when a certain man, as Luke relates, had said to Jesus, “Master, tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me,” and he had answered, “Who appointed me judge or divider between you?”, knowing that the man was devoted to avarice he added: “Take heed to yourselves against all avarice.”

He added an example: “The field of a certain rich man,” he says, “brought forth abundant fruits.” From this the man began to seethe in his mind over what he ought to do with those fruits. When the thought of avarice had answered him in his mind, “I shall destroy my barns and build larger ones, and, when everything has been gathered there, I shall say to my soul: You have many goods laid up for many years; eat, rest, feast,” it was then said to him by the Lord: “Fool, this night they shall require your soul of you; whose, then, will the things you have prepared be?” And he concluded: “So it is with everyone who gathers up and is not rich toward God.”

At another time, as Matthew and the other evangelists testify, he said: “How difficultly will those who possess riches enter the kingdom of God. Amen I say to you,” that is, truly, “it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven.” And why, except because of avarice?

For Abraham was rich in possessions of gold and silver, as were King David, Job the Gentile, as is clear in sacred Scripture, and Saint Louis, king of the Franks. Nevertheless, because they were liberal rather than avaricious and poor in spirit, they undoubtedly entered the kingdom of heaven.

Jesus therefore speaks there about an avaricious rich man who acquires unlawfully, as commonly happens, for which reason Jerome says: "Every rich man is either unjust or the heir of an unjust man"; or about a rich man who, although acquiring justly, nevertheless retains tenaciously and avariciously and does not distribute to the poor when he ought. Ambrose speaks beautifully about this in Distinction 47, canon Si is. Or he speaks about a rich man who establishes his end in riches and loves them inordinately. Leo says about this: "Just as a Catholic man ought to be entangled in no error, so he ought to be entangled in no cupidity." This is in Distinction 47.

That saying about the camel is explained in another way according to the Commentary. There was a certain gate of Jerusalem which was called "the Needle" because of its narrowness. Hence burdened animals, especially a camel, could not pass through it unless their loads were laid aside.

He therefore means that, just as a laden camel could not pass through that narrow gate unless unloaded, but could then pass through, so the rich man, after laying aside things badly acquired or detained and an inordinate affection for them, could enter through the narrow way of the kingdom of heaven; otherwise he could not.

Or camelus means a rope used on a ship. This could not pass through the eye of an intact needle, but could do so when untwisted and reduced to individual threads. And so forth.

He rebuked pride and ambition when his disciples gloried in the fact that they cast demons out of the possessed. Citing the terrible example of Lucifer's punishment for pride, he said: "I saw Satan falling like lightning from heaven. Therefore, do not rejoice that spirits are subject to you, but that your names are written in heaven." Luke testifies to this.

And when a thought of ambition entered them at the time of the Passion, as they disputed which of them was greater, he restrained them, declaring that the greater person in prelacy must serve the others rather than dominate them as they supposed.

