He composed also a very elegant book, περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογισμοῦ [εἰς τοὺς] Μακκαβαίους, that is, On the Sovereign Reason: in which, describing the contest of the seven sons of one mother, who suffered together with their mother herself, he shows, by the example of the Maccabees, that it is the mind which holds the sovereignty within us. Concerning this work Eusebius, in the third book of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 10, says thus: "There is also another elegant volume of Josephus, entitled Εἰ αὐτοδέσποτός ἐστι τῶν παθῶν ὁ εὐσεβὴς λογισμός, that is, That pious reason is mistress of the passions; which little book some have entitled [the book] of the Maccabees, because in it are contained the contests and struggles sweated out for piety by the Maccabees." The work begins, φιλοσοφώτατον λόγον [a most philosophical discourse]. [The Greek titles here are set in the difficult 16th-century type and are given as best readable; the Eusebian title is restored to its standard form.]

He flourished under Vespasian and Titus Augustus, and reached down to Trajan Augustus — that is, to the year of the Lord 100.

Josephus, a Jew by nation, of Tiberias by fatherland, a Count in dignity, and drawn to the faith by a mighty miracle — while he was not yet a Christian, he so loved and cherished Christians that he received in hospitality the blessed Eusebius, bishop of "Fregellae" [so printed; read Vercellae — Eusebius of Vercelli] in Italy, exiled by the Arian Emperor Constantius on account of the Orthodox faith; and he honorably brought in Bishop Epiphanius, who had come thither with very many holy brethren, to visit this [Eusebius]. And after his own conversion he built many churches of the Christians in the cities of the Jews — at Tiberias, Diocaesarea, Nazareth, and Capernaum. This man, then, as Epiphanius testifies, first brought to light the Hebrew Gospel of Matthew[1] — written in Hebrew by the very hand of Matthew — which, in a hidden treasury of the Jews at Scythopolis, he discovered, together with the Gospel of John and the Acts of the Apostles, translated from the Greek tongue into Hebrew. He flourished under the Emperor Constantius, and died a nonagenarian in the year of the Lord 370.

Jovita Rapicio of Brescia [Iouita Rapicius, Brixianus] wrote, [dedicated] to Reginald Pole, a Paraphrase on twenty-two Psalms, composed in various kinds of verse, whose beginning is Not you who take up the Maeonian [strain]. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1550.

Irenaeus of Lyons [Irenaeus Lugdunensis], bishop in Gaul after the triumph [martyrdom] of the blessed martyr Pothinus, once a hearer of Polycarp the martyr, a man endowed with the highest erudition and piety, sent as legate to Rome under Pope Eleutherius, was proved most illustrious no less in sanctity than in doctrine. He wrote in the Greek tongue many excellent volumes, but especially — as the Chronicle of Eusebius testifies — commentaries on the Apocalypse; concerning which Jerome, in the preface of the 18th book of his commentaries on Isaiah, speaks thus: "The Apocalypse of John, if we take it according to the letter, we must Judaize; but if we take it spiritually, as it is written, we shall seem to go against the opinions of many — especially of Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons: against whom that most eloquent man Dionysius, pontiff of the Church of Alexandria, writes an elegant book, deriding the fable of the thousand years, and the golden and jeweled Jerusalem upon earth, the restoration of the temple, the blood of victims, the rest of the Sabbath, the injury of circumcision, marriages, childbirths, the rearing of children, the delights of banquets, and the servitude of all nations; and again wars, armies, and triumphs, and the slaughters of the conquered, and the death of the sinner at a hundred years — to whom Apollinaris replied in two volumes; whom [Irenaeus] not only the men of his own sect, but also a great multitude of our own in this matter, follow." This blessed pontiff dies, in a raging persecution, crowned with martyrdom together with almost all the people of his city, for the Catholic faith, under Marcus Antoninus, in the year of the Lord 175.

Isaac, a monk by profession, most skilled in Greek literature, wrote in Greek, on that [text], This I command you, that you love [one another], &c., one homily.

Isidore the Elder, Bishop of Cordova, not unacquainted with secular letters but most skilled in the divine, and famous also for the sanctity of his life under Theodosius and Honorius, wrote — [dedicated] to St. Orosius, a Spanish presbyter — on all the books of Kings, four books. Augustine, in sermon 35, On the Saints, cites the exposition of this Isidore on Luke. He flourished under Honorius, in the year of the Lord 420.

Isidore Clario of Brescia [Isidorus Clarius, Brixianus], from a monk of Monte Cassino [made] Bishop of Foligno [Fulginatensis], gathered scholia on the whole body of the Bible, again translated by himself: which, when at first they had been forbidden to Christians, at length — the prologue and prolegomena being cut away — were restored [to use] by the authority of the most holy Council of Trent. He wrote also, on the discourse of the Lord delivered on the mount, from the fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters of Matthew, 69 orations to the people, whose beginning is It would indeed be a fair thing; likewise, on various passages of Luke the Evangelist, 54 orations to the people, filled with elegance of words and gravity of sentences, of which the first begins That which first, in time, to you. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

Isidore, Bishop of Seville [Hispalensis], called Isidore the Younger to distinguish him from Isidore the Elder, Bishop of Cordova; and, as some think, a disciple of St. Gregory — a man of exceptional sanctity and erudition, most skilled in the divine Scriptures. And, in reading, collecting, and fitting together the sayings, sentences, and rhapsodies of the ancient fathers out of their innumerable and immense volumes, having an insatiable desire and strength altogether inexhaustible, he gathered from the labors of others innumerable illustrious volumes of almost all the arts and sciences: of which I have read a short and slender little compendium of Allegories on the Octateuch, collected from Origen, Victorinus, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Cassiodorus, Fulgentius, and especially Gregory of his own time; in whose preface he indicates that he had already, long before, [written] an ex-[position] on the same books of the divine Scripture [→ p290]

[→ p290: catchword "plana[tionem]" (explanationem)]

[1] Josephus brought to light the Hebrew Gospel of St. Matthew.

---

(Rich PDF p. 290 [printed folio 271, recto]. Book IV, letter I — Isidore of Seville concluded (fl. 630); then Isidore of Pelusium (Chrysostom's disciple, his ~10,000 letters); Isidore of Thessalonica; Isotta Nogarola of Verona (her dialogue on the sin of Adam and Eve); the Itala (Old-Latin version); Judas the Syrian; Josse Clichtove of Chartres (supplementing Cyril's John commentary); Julius Africanus (the Letter to Aristides on the Gospel genealogies); and Julian of Eclanum (the Pelagian; Bede's warning against his Song commentary). Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter I — Isidore of Seville concluded, then Isidore of Pelusium onward:]

...[Isidore of Seville had already, long before, penned literal] explanations on the same books of the divine Scripture. This little book, which begins The history of the sacred law, Trithemius — to amplify the abundance of Isidore's lucubrations — cut up into twelve books, adding that he had written on the rest of the volumes of both Testaments, 62 books; of which, however, he [Trithemius] noted neither the beginnings, nor showed [them as] seen by himself. He flourished under the Emperor Heraclonas, son of Heraclius, in the times of Sisebut, king of the Goths, in Spain, in the year of the Lord 630; to whom, on account of the sanctity of his life, annual honors were appointed on the 16th day of January.

Isidore of Pelusium [Isidorus Pelusiota], Abbot of the monks of the Pelusiac mountain in Egypt, a disciple of St. John Chrysostom, leading an angelic life in the flesh, wrote many things full of varied usefulness — but especially nearly ten chiliads, or ten thousand, epistles of every kind, filled at once with divine and human grace: in which he expounded all the divine Scriptures of both Testaments, and formed the morals of all men, using in them a kind of speech most suited to teaching. We have seen in the Marciana Library at Venice a manuscript volume containing 1148 epistles of this holy man, of which the first begins thus: Ἐπειδὴ κυκλικόν ἐστι τοῦ χρόνου [Since the course of time is cyclical]. He flourished under Theodosius the Younger, in the year of the Lord 440. Nicephorus, book 14, chapter 53.

Isidore, Bishop of Thessalonica, a pious and learned man, wrote Greek homilies on Luke, which are held in the Vatican Library.

Isotta Nogarola of Verona [Isota Nogarola, Veronensis], devoted to the studies of letters and to perpetual virginity, composed a dialogue in which — in the Latin tongue — she discoursed upon the third chapter of Genesis: Who sinned first and more, Adam or Eve. She flourished under Nicholas V and Pius II, to whom also she wrote very many orations.

The Italic [Old-Latin] Translation of both Testaments [Itala], having an uncertain author, was formerly, before St. Jerome's version, famous in the Church. This translation Augustine, in the second book On Christian Doctrine, preferred to the others, as being more faithful to the words and clearer in the perspicuity of its sense. For which reasons the Latin Church kept it in use down to the times of St. Gregory. How much it differs from our Vulgate edition in individual [passages] is shown by that book of Augustine entitled The Mirror [Speculum]: in which innumerable testimonies of this Translation are collected from all the volumes of both Testaments.

Judas, a Syrian by nation, disputed most fully concerning the seventy weeks in Daniel, and carried down their chronography through the earlier times to the tenth year of Severus; in which he is accused of error, because he said that the coming of Antichrist would be about his own times — but this [he said] for the reason that the greatness of the persecutions threatened the imminent downfall of the world. He flourished in the year of the Lord 200.

Josse Clichtove of Nieuwpoort [Iudocus Chlictoueus, Neoportuensis], Canon of the Church of Chartres in Gaul, a Theologian, Philosopher, Orator, and distinguished in expounding the sacred oracles, collected from Chrysostom and Augustine four books of explanation on the Gospel of John, and inserted them into the commentaries of St. Cyril — so that, out of the twelve books which that blessed father [Cyril] had published on John, he might supply and complete the four middle ones, lost through the injury of the times, that is, the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth: in which he narrates from the Gospel of John, from that place of the seventh chapter, There said therefore certain of them of Jerusalem, Is not this he whom they seek to kill?, down to those words of the twelfth chapter, If any man hear my words, and keep them not. The work begins, There said therefore. He wrote likewise, on the festal gospels of the whole year, two volumes of homilies. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1513.

Julius Africanus, of whom five books On the Times are extant, under the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus — that is, in the year of the world's redemption 220 — wrote in Greek various epistles on several passages of the divine Scripture; among which there is celebrated by the ancient writers his elegant epistle to Aristides the philosopher, in which he disputed most fully concerning the discrepancy which seems to be in the genealogy of the Savior according to Matthew and Luke. A great part of which disputation is recited by Eusebius at the beginning of the Ecclesiastical History, and is cited by Augustine in the third book against Faustus. He wrote also to Origen a brief epistle, containing much in few words, concerning the History of Susanna — which, on account of many conjectures, he judged to be spurious and fabricated by a recent author. To whom Origen wrote back, in defense of the same history, a long and learned epistle, whose beginning is Your letter, by which I understood [what you say] of Susanna, &c.; but the epistle of Africanus begins thus: When you were holding [i.e. present at] the sacred disputation. Both [epistles] Ambrose of Milan — a monk of Monte Cassino, Abbot of San Benigno, a man most skilled in the three languages, who lately gave to Roman ears very many works of Origen and Cyril not yet known to the Latins — translated into Latin.

Julian, Bishop of Eclanum [Celanensis] in Campania, reckoned among the Ecclesiastical writers by Gennadius, Honorius, and Trithemius: a most skilled rhetorician, and — as his own little book to the virgin Demetrias, rashly ascribed to St. Jerome, shows — not an unhappy imitator of Ciceronian eloquence. Before he had begun openly to profess the heresy of Pelagius, he wrote, in a plausible but insidious style, commentaries on the Song of Solomon; concerning which Bede, in the preface of his own explanations on the Canticle, speaks thus: "Being about to write, with the help of grace from above, upon the Song of Songs, I thought the reader must first be warned to read most cautiously the little works of Julian, bishop of Eclanum in Campania, which he composed on the same book — lest, through the abundance of flattering eloquence, he fall into the mire of harmful doctrine; but, as it is wont to be said, so let him pluck the grape-cluster that he also beware the thorns — that is, in his sayings let him search out and choose the sound senses, that he no less shun the unsound; or rather let him do that [word] of Maro [Virgil]:

> You who gather flowers and the strawberries growing low on the ground, > flee hence, O boys: cold in the grass there lurks a snake.
>

That is, let him restrain himself above all from the reading of him, since he has those who have expounded the same book both with sound senses and with simpler words. For the man is, as he is a most skilled rhetorician, so — the grace of God being assailed after Pelagius — a most bitter assailant of it; so that his writings are the more openly [dangerous], by which, against the most strenuous champion of that same grace, [→ p291]

[→ p291: catchword "Augu[stinum]" — Augustine]

---

(Rich PDF p. 291 [printed folio 272, verso]. Book IV — the close of letter I: Julian of Eclanum concluded; Junilius the African; Justus of Urgell; Justus of Tiberias; Justin Martyr; Juvencus (the Gospel-versifier). Then letter L opens — Lanfranc of Canterbury, Lawrence Justinian, Lorenzo de Villavicencio, Leander of Seville, and the beginning of Pope Leo I the Great. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter I concluded, then letter L opens:]

...[his writings are the more openly dangerous, by which, against the most strenuous champion of that same grace,] Augustine, he raved" — they show. Gennadius writes that this man, in a time of public famine, distributed all his goods in alms to the poor, and in this way drew a great multitude of nobles, deceived by the appearance of piety, into his heresy. He dies under Valentinian Augustus, son of Constantius Caesar and of Placidia, sister of Honorius and of Arcadius, in the year of the Lord 440.

Junilius the African [Iunilius Afer], bishop of an uncertain city in Africa, learned in the good arts in the world, and most skilled in the holy Scriptures, brief in speech and acute in sense, at the urging of Primasius the African, bishop of Utica, collected for the benefit of the simple explanations on Genesis; in place of which the fraud of the printers has substituted for us a slender commentary, beginning Concerning the beginning of the book of Genesis. But fragments from the Morals of Gregory, mixed into this little work, prove that it is not Junilius's — who preceded the times of Gregory by nearly two hundred years. I judge the author of the work to be Bede, in whose most ancient volumes it is found, and under whose title centos cut out from the same work are read in the Gloss which they call the Ordinary. He flourished under Theodosius the Younger, Augustus, in the year of the Lord 440.

Justus, Bishop of the Church of Urgell in Spain, brother of three bishops — namely Justinian, Nebridius, and Elpidius — exercised and learned in the holy Scriptures, at the urging of Justus the deacon wrote to him, on the Song of Songs, according to the edition of St. Jerome, a commentary brief indeed, but learned, elegant, and pious. Its beginning is Desiring, in the house of God. He flourished in the year of the Lord 540, under Pope Sergius, to whom also he dedicated the present work. [The "under Pope Sergius" dedication does not square with the year 540 — Justus of Urgell belongs to the sixth century, whereas Sergius I was pope 687–701; noted as printed.]

Justus, a Jew by race and religion, of Tiberias by fatherland, from the province of Galilee, whom Jerome numbers among the Ecclesiastical writers, himself also attempted to weave a history of Hebrew affairs out of the divine Scriptures, and to write certain commentaries on the sacred Books; but Josephus, at the end of the twentieth book of the Antiquities, makes him suspect of falsehood in certain matters. He flourished under Vespasian Augustus, in the year of the Lord 56.

Justin, a Samaritan by race, a Philosopher of the Stoic sect [so printed], as he himself testifies in the second Apology for the Christians to the Emperor Antoninus, was a citizen of Flavia Neapolis in Palestine, son of Priscus Bacchius; and at Rome he held τὰς διατριβάς [his discourses], and had Crescens the Cynic as an adversary in life and religion. This man, then, among the many immortal monuments of his genius, left commentaries on the Apocalypse of John. He is believed also to be the author of a certain book which is entitled Of a Hundred and Forty-Six Questions — which the Gentiles used to raise against the Christians out of various passages of both Testaments; whose beginning is thus, Whence is the beginning. This book Joachim Périon the Benedictine translated into Latin. But, since in questions 82, 86, and 115 of the same book Irenaeus and Origen are cited, the work must be of another author, far later than he. The style is not unlike the Questions of Theodoret on the Octateuch. He flourished under Antoninus Pius, and was crowned with martyrdom in the year of the Lord 150.

Juvencus, a Spaniard of most noble birth, a presbyter, the most celebrated poet of his age, translating the four Gospels into hexameter verses almost word for word, composed four books of the Evangelical History — the first of all who dared to put the majesty of the gospel under the laws of meter. [He flourished] while Constantine was prince, and his sons reigned, in the year of the Lord 330. The work begins:

> Nothing immortal is held in the frame of the world.

L

Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury in Britain, an Italian by nation, of Pavia by fatherland, formerly Abbot of the monastery of Caen [Codoniensis] — the most learned of all in his time in every kind of letters, and by far the most illustrious in the Council which was held at Rome against Berengar, deacon of the Church of Angers, the heretic, by 113 bishops under Nicholas II — left, among other monuments of his excellent genius, pious and learned commentaries on the whole Psalter and on all the Epistles of Paul. He flourished under the Emperor Henry III, in the year of the Lord 1060.

Lawrence Justinian [Laurentius Iustinianus], a Venetian by fatherland, of the Celestine order [so printed], Patriarch of the illustrious city of Venice, most renowned for the sanctity of his life, the glory of his miracles, and the candor of his sincere erudition, wrote — in a not inelegant style — on the 12th, 13th, and 14th chapters of John, one book On the discourse of the Lord at the Last Supper, most delightful for its sweet colloquies. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1410.

Lorenzo de Villavicencio [Laurentius Villauincentius], a Spaniard, a preacher among the people of Burgos, of the Order of Hermits, collected tables of memorable things which can be treated in the individual gospel and epistle lections of the festal days, exceedingly useful to preachers. The preface of these begins, The office demands. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1560.

Leander, Bishop of the Church of Seville in Spain, an African by nation, of Carthage by fatherland, a monk by institute, a man illustrious for his erudition in the holy Scriptures — to whom Gregory I, Supreme Pontiff, dedicated his commentaries on Job [the Moralia] — published many volumes of edifying reading, but among the rest a twofold order of prayers and meditations on the whole Psalter. He flourished under Reccared [Richardus], the most pious king of the Visigoths, whom he converted from the Arian perfidy, together with the whole nation of the Visigoths subject to him, to the Catholic faith — having before led back from that same impiety also his brother Hermenegild [Hermilgildus], son of Leovigild [Leuigildus] king of the Goths, whom his most cruel father, a defender of the Arian impiety, on the vigil of Easter — beheaded for the confession of the Catholic faith — crowned with the laurel of martyrdom. He flourished under the Emperor Maurice, in the year of the Lord 590.

Leo, the first Pope [Leo I the Great], a Tuscan by nation, most learned in the divine Scriptures and most eloquent in delivering homilies, under Leo Augustus [the Emperor], in the year [→ p292]

[→ p292: catchword "anno"]

---

(Rich PDF p. 292 [printed folio 273, recto]. Book IV — letter L: Pope Leo I concluded; León de Castro; Leonard of Giffoni; Leontius of Neapolis (Cyprus); two Lucas entries; Lucian of Antioch; Lucretius of Asolo; Ludolph of Saxony (the Vita Christi*); two Louis entries. Then letter M opens — Mammotreptus (the* Mammotrectus dictionary), and the beginning of Maffeo Vegio of Lodi. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter L, continued:]

...[Leo I flourished under the Emperor Leo,] in the year of the Lord 461. Among many homilies he wrote on the fifth chapter of Matthew two homilies, of which the first begins At that time Jesus, seeing the crowds; but the second, While the Lord was preaching. Likewise, on the Transfiguration of Christ, from Matthew chapter 17, a Sermon beginning The gospels, dearly beloved.

León de Castro [Leo Castri], professor of Theology in the University of Salamanca, wrote commentaries on Isaiah, which were printed at Salamanca in the year 1570. [The 1570 imprint post-dates Sixtus's death (1569) — a later-edition detail.]

Leonard of Giffoni [Leonardus Giphonensis], or "from the temple of Jove" [ex Iovis phano], which is a town of Campania — thirty-fourth Minister General of the Franciscans, and thereafter Cardinal of the Roman Church, a most noble professor of Scholastic Theology — wrote a huge scholastic Lectura upon the Song of Songs, [divided] into one hundred and forty Canticles, that is, divided into as many particles or sentences of that book, containing many secrets of the more abstruse Theology; which Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, writes that he saw and read, in the third volume of his Chronicles. He flourished under Charles IV, Augustus, [in] 1370.

Leontius, Bishop of Neapolis in Cyprus, an eloquent and learned man, who composed five books against the Iconoclasts and dictated many panegyric orations, wrote on the 17th chapter of Matthew one homily On the Transfiguration of the Lord, cited in the 6th session of the Second Council of Nicaea. He flourished about the times of the Emperor Phocas, in the year of the Lord 610.

Lucas, Abbot of the mountain of St. Cornelius [Kornelimünster], of the Benedictine order, endowed with a noble genius in expounding the divine Scriptures, wrote a little work, collected from the writings of Aponius, on the Song of Songs, in the year of the Lord 1130.

Lucas, a Greek monk of the institute of St. Basil, wrote an exposition on the four Gospels, which is kept, written in Greek, in the Library of San Salvatore at Bologna.

Lucian, a most eloquent man, presbyter of the Church of Antioch, and afterward Bishop of Nicomedia [so printed; Lucian was a presbyter of Antioch, martyred at Nicomedia], and a most holy martyr — having examined all the editions made before him, and most diligently compared them with the Hebrew verity — delivered to the Christians his own Greek edition, as Euthymius testifies, much more corrected than the earlier ones; which, written by his hand, was found at Nicomedia in a certain tower among the Jews, smeared with lime, after Lucian's own death, under Constantine the Great, Emperor. This [edition], since it agrees in sense with the edition of the Seventy interpreters, and its copies are by some called Λουκιάνεια [Lucianic], but among some received the name of the Seventh Edition — although Isidore, Bishop of Seville, judges that Origen was the discoverer not only of the fifth and sixth, but also of the seventh edition. Of this Lucianic translation all the churches, from Constantinople to Antioch, made public reading and use. And Lucian suffered as a martyr at Nicomedia for the confession of Christ, under the persecution of Diocletian and Maximian; and he was buried at Helenopolis in Bithynia, in the year of the Lord 280.

Lucretius Tyroboscus of Asolo [Lucretius Asulanus], a Carmelite, wrote — [dedicated] to the illustrious John Trevisan, Patriarch of the city of Venice — a concise Paraphrase on Psalm 118, to which he gave the title The Ethics of the Holy Spirit [Ethica Spiritus Sancti], in the year of the Lord 1566.

Ludolph [of Saxony] [Ludolphus], a Saxon by nation, of the Order of Preachers — after the thirtieth year of his profession transferred to the institute of the Carthusians, and received in the monastery of Strasbourg — a man most studious in the holy volumes, scholastic in profession, simple in speech, and lovable for certain fervent affections, gathered from the sentences of Jerome, Augustine, Cassiodorus, and Peter Lombard an exact exposition on the Psalms: in which he especially pursues the typical [figurative] senses, yet not so as to neglect the literal understanding, adding at the foot of each Psalm a devout prayer, consonant with that Psalm. The beginning of the work is, As of old the manna. The same [Ludolph] gathered from the four Evangelists a single history of the life of Christ [the Vita Christi], which he illustrated with most lucid and most pious explanations according to the fourfold sense, adding at the end of the individual chapters most devout prayers, serving the theme of the preceding chapter. The work begins, Another foundation. He flourished under the Emperor Louis IV, in the year of the Lord 1330.

Louis the Younger of Parete [Ludouicus Iunior Parisetus], of Reggio, wrote in heroic verse — [dedicated] to his brother Vario Ptolemaeus — on the first chapter of Genesis, six books of Theopoeia, whose beginning is:

> Long since has a desire come upon the soul of Ptolemaeus.

He flourished in the year of the Lord 1550.

Louis Pittorio of Ferrara [Ludouicus Pictorius, Ferrariensis], a not-ignoble poet, published in prose a Paraphrase on the Psalter, in the year of the Lord 1510.

M

Mammotreptus, so surnamed from the title of the Dictionary published by him, a simple and devout man, of the Order of Minorites — following the poor largess of that little poor widow, who out of her slender poverty cast two mites into the treasury of the temple — himself also offered into the temple of the Lord, out of his scanty means, what he had: that is, a Dictionary of the words of the whole Bible, explaining the pronunciation, accent, and meaning of the Latin words with a coarse and rude Minerva [rough skill]. And because he had presented it to unlearned clerics — still, as it were, infants in the Latin tongue — like a breast to be sucked, and to be handled by infant hands after the manner of a devoted nurse, he entitled it Mammotreptus [the breast-fed], suppressing his own name out of humility; in place of which he afterward, by growing custom, got the name of Mammotreptus [himself]. The work begins, Impatient of my own unskillfulness. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1450.

Maffeo Vegio [Matthaeus Veggius], an Italian by nation, of Lodi by fatherland, Datary of Pope Martin V, a man not unacquainted with the divine Scripture, an orator and poet, never [→ p293]

[→ p293: catchword "nun[quam]"]

---

(Rich PDF p. 293 [printed folio 274, verso]. Book IV, letter M: Maffeo Vegio concluded; Marbod of Rennes; Marcus of Ulm; Marianus Scotus; Matthew of Aquasparta; Matthew of Königsaal (anti-Hussite); Matthew Aurogallus (Hebrew onomasticon); Matthew Bredenbach; Matthew Döring (defender of Lyra vs Paul of Burgos); Matthew of Évreux; Matthew Orio; Matthew of Constantinople; Matthew of Vendôme; Maurice de Sully; Maximus the Confessor; Maximus of Turin; Melchior Cano; and the beginning of Melito of Sardis. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter M, continued:]

...[Maffeo Vegio, an orator and poet] never sufficiently praised, whose 13th book, added by himself to the Virgilian Aeneid, shows abundantly the felicity of his most rich vein. In his extreme old age he brought forth, in elegiac verse, on the seven Psalms an elegant and truly swan-like Paraphrase. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1430.

Marbod [Marbadus], Bishop of Rennes, learned in the liberal disciplines, a distinguished poet of his times, and a notable professor of the sacred oracles, published in elegant verse a most beautiful explanation on the Song of Solomon, according to the threefold sense — anagogical, allegorical, and moral. He flourished under Henry III, in the year of the Lord 1050.

Marcus of Ulm [Vlmensis], a German, of the Order of Minorites, a scholastic by profession, collected a Distinctionarium on the whole holy scripture, most useful to scholastic expositors, whose beginning is Abstinence is taken in many ways. He flourished in the year of the Lord 400 [so printed; read ~1400 — a Franciscan cannot belong to the year 400].

Marianus [Scotus], a monk of Fulda, a Scot by nation, of the order of St. Benedict, a writer of history, composed one book On the Concordance of the Gospels. He dies in the year of the Lord 1086.

Matthew of Aquasparta [Matthaeus de Aquasparta], the twelfth Minister General of the Order of Minorites, and afterward Bishop of Porto, Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church — magnificently learned in secular Philosophy according to the custom of his time, and most excellent in the divine Scriptures — published, under the Emperor Rudolf, in the year of the Lord 1280, one book on the epistles of Paul.

Matthew, a monk of Aula Regia [Königsaal], a German by nation, a man subtle and keen in disputation, who in Bohemia often engaged with John Huss of Prague the heresiarch, and very often overcame him along with his heretical followers; but after the excessive sprouting-up of heresies he came out of Bohemia into Germany, to the monastery of Altzelle [Veteris cellae] of the Cistercian order, as it were into a harbor, in which — instructing the brethren by assiduous reading of the sacred [scriptures] — he left on all the Psalms a scholastic Lecture much to be praised. He flourished under the Emperor Sigismund, in the year of the Lord 1415.

Matthew Aurogallus [Goldhahn], a German by nation, most skilled in the three languages, emulating Eusebius, published a book on the Hebrew [names] of cities, regions, peoples, rivers, mountains, and other places which are read in the holy Scriptures; in which he arranged all the appellations in Hebrew characters in alphabetical order, with the individual passages of divine scripture cited in which those names are found. The book begins, When lately with me, &c. He flourished under Charles V, Augustus, in the year of the Lord 1526.

Matthew Bredenbach of Kerpen [Bredembacchius, Kerspensis], while he lived headmaster at Emmerich, wrote on Matthew, and on sixty-nine Psalms, beautiful commentaries, collected partly from ancient, partly from more recent authors. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1550.

Matthew Döring [Doringus], a Saxon by nation, a Minorite, minister of the province of Saxony, a distinguished professor of Scholastic Theology — having undertaken a battle in defense of his master Nicholas of Lyra against Paul, Bishop of Burgos, after that [Paul's] attack upon the same Nicholas — strove to overthrow his objections, publishing new disputations, which — appended to the commentaries of Lyra immediately after the Pauline additions — he entitled Replies against Paul of Burgos [Replicae adversus Paulum Burgensem]. The beginning of the work is, The ancient modesty. He flourished under the Emperor Frederick III, in the year of the Lord 1440.

Matthew of Évreux [Ebroicensis], a Norman, a professor of the Order of Preachers, a subtle searcher of the sacred volumes, most pleasing to Charles VI, king of the French, for his exceptional piety and erudition, composed a most useful Postil on the five books of Moses and on Isaiah.

Matthew Orio [Oryus], a Spaniard, a Dominican, inquisitor of heretical depravity throughout Gaul, wrote on that saying of Paul, I wish to speak five words [1 Cor 14:19], against the heresies, one book.

Matthew, Patriarch of Constantinople, of the Order of Preachers, reduced the whole body of the divine Scripture into four books of commonplaces, whose beginning is All new fruits. It is kept at Bologna in our Library of the Preachers.

Matthias, a Presbyter of Vendôme [Vindocinensis], expounded the history of Tobit in elegiac verse, beginning thus:

> From the old field, the seeds of the virtues of morals.

He flourished among the Scholastics, in the year of the Lord 1400.

Maurice [de Sully], Bishop of Paris, subtle in genius, scholastic in speech, and singular in erudition, published two books of sermons on the festal Gospels. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1190.

Maximus the Monk [Maximus the Confessor] published a sermon on that [text] of Exodus 37, On the Candlestick and the seven lamps; from which Thomas [Aquinas], in his book against the errors of the Greeks, brings testimonies that the Spirit proceeds from the Father.

Maximus, Bishop of the Church of Turin [Taurinensis], most skilled in the holy Scriptures, and an admirable extempore declaimer, wrote most elegant homilies on various passages of both Testaments. He dies under Theodosius the Younger, in the year of the Lord 420.

Melchior Cano, a Spaniard, bishop of the Fortunate Islands [the Canaries], of the Order of Preachers, composed a most useful book On the most difficult passages of the divine Scripture; likewise, on that [text] of Luke chapter thirteen, Unless you do penance, one book On penance. In the year of the Lord 1560.

Melito the Asian, Bishop of the Church of Sardis, venerable for sanctity and erudition, whom Tertullian asserts was held by the ancients as, so to speak, a prophet, excerpted from all the scriptures here and there six books of Ἐκλογῶν, that is, of Excerpts, [dedicated] to his brother Onesimus: in which he fitted in a beautiful order various testimonies of the Scriptures, conducive to the instruction of the Christian life, [→ p294]

[→ p294: catchword "ne apta" (ordine apta)]

---

(Rich PDF p. 294 [printed folio 275, recto]. Book IV — the close of letter M: Melito of Sardis concluded; Methodius of Olympus; several Michael entries (Adam the convert, Aiguani of Bologna, of Massa, of L'Isle, of Milan). Then letter N opens — Nepos the millenarian (with Dionysius of Alexandria's critique), Nicetas of Remesiana, Nicephorus Callistus, Nicholas of Alsentia, and Nicholas Hanapus. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter M concluded, then letter N opens:]

...[Melito] fitted in a beautiful order [various testimonies of the Scriptures]. Likewise:

- On that [text] of Genesis 1, Let us make man, one book On God the incorporeal.
- On the Life of the Prophets, one book.
- On the Apocalypse, one book.
- On the catalog of the divine volumes of both Testaments, [dedicated] to Onesimus, one epistle.

He flourished under Marcus Antoninus Verus, in the year of the Lord 160.

Methodius (who is also called Eubulius), Bishop of Olympus in Lycia, and afterward of Tyre, a man of singular sanctity and doctrine, of a polished and well-composed eloquence, wrote — in defense of the holy Scriptures, against the mad Porphyry who had assailed them — a most illustrious work. He also left commentaries on Genesis; likewise, on the 28th chapter of the first [book] of Kings, On the Pythoness [the Witch of Endor], one book; on the Song of Songs, one book; on the Apocalypse, one book, whose fragments are read in the Rhapsodies of the explanations of Arethas on the Apocalypse. And he dies under the last persecution of the Church, or, as others affirm, under Decius and Valerian, at Chalcis, a city of Greece, crowned with martyrdom, in the year of the Lord 255.

Michael Adam, a converted Jew, translated the Bible into the German tongue, and, for the use of the Jews, set it forth in Hebrew characters.

Michael Aiguani of Bologna [Angrianus, Bononiensis], Minister General of the Carmelites, a Theologian, philosopher, and supreme canonist, who governed his order justly and holily for nine years under Pope Urban VI, wrote in scholastic fashion five books of commentaries on the whole Psalter, and one book on the Gospel of Luke, which are held in great esteem among the professors of his own institute. He dies in the last year of the Emperor Wenceslaus, in the year of the Lord 1396.

Michael, a Tuscan by nation, from the town of Massa, an [Augustinian] Hermit, a scholastic Theologian very acute, many of whose commentaries on the sacred Bible the injury of the times has consumed, wrote in scholastic style: On Isaiah, 1 book; On Matthew, 1 book; On Luke, 1 book; On Mark, 1 book; On John, 1 book; On the Passion of the Lord, from the four gospels, one book. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1350.

Michael of L'Isle in Picardy [de insula Picardia], of the Order of Preachers, wrote a scholastic Lecture on the Song of Songs, beginning I will sing to my beloved, &c., and a Postil on Daniel, which begins He brought forth hidden things. It is kept at Venice in the library of SS. John and Paul.

Michael of Milan [Mediolanensis], of the Order of Minorites, a Theologian and celebrated declaimer, conspicuous also by the example of his life, published in scholastic fashion eleven sermons on the Decalogue, from the 20th chapter of Exodus. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1480.

N

Nepos, bishop of an uncertain city in Egypt, a man plainly good and learned, but deceived by the error of the Chiliasts [millenarians], wrote an interpretation of all the promises which are contained in the Apocalypse of John, and taught that they were to be understood corporally, and confirmed from those same testimonies of John that the saints would reign with Christ for a thousand years in bodily delights on this earth. Concerning whom Dionysius of Alexandria, in the second volume of his explanation on the Apocalypse, speaks thus: "They bring forward certain Commentaries of Nepos, on which they lean very much, and through which they think it is shown in what manner the kingdom of Christ shall be upon earth. But in many other respects I too embrace and love Nepos, both for his faith and for his erudition in the Scriptures, and especially for his exercise in psalmody; since indeed many of the brethren gladly chose his fellowship for this [reason]. And so there is in me too, toward him, much reverence — and the more so because he has already gone before to God. But in truth, more than all things, truth is to be loved and preferred. We must praise, and without envy embrace, whatever has been rightly said by him; but reject, if anything has been less soundly written by him — as in these books, in which he teaches [us] to think nothing lofty, nothing magnificent, concerning the coming of our Savior Jesus Christ, nor concerning the glory of the resurrection and the promises of our gathering unto him and of being made like him; but he persuades [us] to hope, in the kingdom of God, [for] certain small and ever-mortal things, and no other than those which we now see." Thus far Dionysius. He flourished under the Emperor Gallienus, in the year of the Lord 270.

Nicetas [Niceas], Bishop of the city of Remesiana [Romaciana], a man studious in the divine Scriptures, among his many other little works wrote, under Theodosius Augustus, in the year of the Lord 420, one book On the Victim of the Paschal Lamb, on the twelfth chapter of Exodus.

Nicephorus Callistus Xanthopoulos, of whom there are extant eighteen books of Ecclesiastical History, published a Synopsis — that is, A Survey of the whole divine Scripture, arranged in iambic trimeters — in which he briefly comprised the themes of all the sacred volumes. The work begins thus: Ὃς πατὴρ υἱός ἐστιν, ἄναρχος φύσις [He who is Father [and] Son — a nature without beginning]. [The Greek incipit is set in the difficult 16th-century type and is given as best readable.] He flourished under the Emperor Manuel, in the year of the Lord 1100.

Nicholas of Alsentia, a Carmelite, wrote commentaries on Exodus and on the Apocalypse. He lived in the year of the Lord 1425.

Nicholas Hanapus [de Hanapes], of the Order of Preachers, Patriarch of Jerusalem, moved by zeal of charity, plucked from the sacred volumes an Enchiridion [Handbook]: in which, for the benefit of preachers, he collected with the utmost brevity all the examples both of virtues and of vices scattered through the books of both Testaments, arranged under the titles of various subjects according to the order of the letters. The beginning of the work is such: So great an excellence prevails. He flourished under the Emperor Sigismund, in the year of the Lord 430 [so printed; the date is corrupt — Nicholas de Hanapes was Patriarch of Jerusalem in the later thirteenth century (†1291), which fits neither "430" nor the Emperor Sigismund]. [→ p295]

[→ p295: catchword "NI" — a further Nicholas]

---

(Rich PDF p. 295 [printed folio 276, verso]. Book IV, letter N: Nicholas of Cusa; Nicholas Cabasilas; Nicholas Kenton; Nicholas Cleynaerts; Nicholas of Dinkelsbühl; Nicholas the Gaul; Nicholas of Gorran (whole-Bible commentaries, with incipits); Nicholas Grandis; Nicholas Herborn; and the great Nicholas of Lyra (his 85-book Postil on the whole Bible). Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter N, continued:]

Nicholas [of Cusa], Bishop of Brixen and Cardinal of the title of St. Peter ad Vincula, from Kues [Cusa], a town of Germany — a man admirable in every kind of letters, a mathematician, philosopher, and Theologian, learned beyond what could be credible to anyone, to whom a certain learned obscurity, both in words and in sentences, was a friend — published on the beginning of Genesis a brief dialogue of such obscurity that it can scarcely be understood by the most learned men; its beginning is Often more delightful. Likewise, on that [text] of the first [chapter] of James, Every best gift, [dedicated] to Gerard, Bishop of Solothurn, one book On the gift of the Father of lights; [beginning] Even though before. Likewise, encyclical sermons through the circle of the year and Lent; wearied of their length, he himself gathered out of these — as out of most abundant fields — the more elegant flowers, and arranged them, marked in the tenth book of Spiritual Exercises; the beginning of these is Who are you? He flourished under the Emperor Frederick III, in the year of the Lord 1460.

Nicholas Cabasilas, Bishop of Thessalonica, wrote, in the year of the Lord 1300, one book of observation on the vision of the four living creatures of Ezekiel, which is kept in Greek in the Vatican.

Nicholas Kenton [Chenton], a Carmelite, an Englishman, wrote on the history of the prophet Elisha, and a Postil on the Song of Songs, in the year of the Lord 1468.

Nicholas Cleynaerts [Clenardus] of Mechelen, most skilled in the three languages, for many years publicly professed good letters at Mechelen; and, that he might benefit all, published some things Latin, some Greek, and also Hebrew — among which are the Grammatical Meditations on the Lamentations, for the sake of those who lack the living voice of a Hebrew teacher. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1530.

Nicholas of Dinkelsbühl [Dunkelpulus], a German, rector of the University of Vienna, wrote, according to the custom of the school, on that [text] of Isaiah, And the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, [the spirit], &c., one book On the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, in the year of the Lord 1420.

Nicholas the Gaul [Gallus], of the Order of Preachers, confessor to the king of the French, left a scholastic Postil on all the epistles of St. Paul, which begins, I have given you for a light to the Gentiles [Isaiah chapter 49].

Nicholas of Gorran [Gorranus], of the Order of Preachers, provincial of France, acute in treating scholastic questions, and most exercised in the reading of the saints [Fathers], in the year of our salvation 1390 published, in a scholastic and plain style, brief commentaries on the whole Bible, very profitable to the studious of the sacred volumes; of which, at Venice in the library of SS. John and Paul, I saw the following (each with its incipit):

- On the Pentateuch — 5 books. — In the beginning, &c.
- On the Psalter — 1 book. — My mouth shall speak the praise of the Lord.
- On Ecclesiastes — 1 book. — He looked upon the earth.
- On Ecclesiasticus — 1 book. — Wisdom hath built.
- On the Lamentations — 1 book. — To this lamentation.
- On the Song of Songs — 1 book. — Sing to the Lord a new song.
- On Matthew — 1 book. — The book of the generation, &c., like the river of paradise.
- On Mark — 1 book. — Daughter of Sion, rejoice, &c.
- On Luke — 1 book. — The discipline of a physician.
- On John — 1 book. — Behold, my servant shall understand.
- On all the epistles of Paul — 14 books. — I have given you for a light to the Gentiles.

Nicholas Grandis [le Grand], of the Order of Minorites, a Theologian of the most sacred faculty, wrote — [dedicated] to Francis, king of the French — elegant commentaries on the epistles of Paul to the Romans and to the Hebrews, adorned with innumerable sentences of the Fathers; in which, where a passage offers itself, he strives rather, with gentleness of mind and Christian modesty, to raise up the fallen, than to exasperate them with censorious and reproachful speech, or to gnaw around them with a rabid tooth — anxiously investigating not a victory over those who contradict, but truth against falsehood. The work begins, I should be charged with the height of ingratitude. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1546.

Nicholas Herborn [Herbron], of the Order of Minorites, Cismontane Commissary General of the Regular Observance, wrote in Latin eloquence narrations of the Lenten Gospels — which had been declaimed at Cologne in the German tongue — likewise on Psalm 78 a lamentatory narration, beginning Who will give [water] to my head, &c., in the year of the Lord 1530.

Nicholas of Lyra [Lyranus], an Englishman by nation, or — as some write — from Lyra, a town of Brabant; a Jew by race, and imbued with Hebrew letters from earliest childhood, but after his conversion devoted to the Franciscan religion; a professor of scholastic Theology and a not-ignoble expositor of its sentences; and endowed with so true, pure, and genuine an understanding of the divine Scriptures that in expounding them he had no equal among the most learned Theologians of his time. He published, on the individual volumes of both the Old and New Testament, 85 books of scholastic postils — not only useful, but exceedingly necessary, to the studious of the holy Scriptures, and especially to beginners hastening on to greater things. In the former fifty of these books he expounded the whole body of the holy Scripture — without the allurement of oratory and the wrappings of words — in a brief, bare, and plain style, opening up and elucidating with the utmost diligence in each [passage] the sense of the letter, as more excellent than the other senses of divine Scripture, so also more difficult; bringing to this [task] not only the expositions of the ancient fathers of the Church, but also the sentences of the Rabbis, whose authority is chief among the Jews. This work being finished, with labor again repeated, in the thirty-five later books he illustrated both Testaments with a moral exposition. The beginnings of his books you have in Trithemius. He flourished under the Emperor Louis, in the year of the Lord 1320. Annotations and Censures on all his works were written by [→ p296]

[→ p296: catchword "Paulus" — Paul of Burgos]

(Rich PDF p. 296 [printed folio 277, recto]. Book IV — close of letter N*: Nicholas of Lyra's apparatus (Paul of Burgos, Deza, Döring);* Nicholas Zegers of Diest*; Nicholas Trivet;* Ninian apostle of the Picts; Nilus; Nonius Marcellus Saia; Nonnus of Panopolis*. Then* letter O opens — Odo of Cluny*, Odo of Cambrai, Odo the Gaul,* Oecumenius (his catena and its twenty-two Greek sources), and the beginning of Olympiodorus. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter N concluded, then letter O opens:]

...[Annotations and Censures on all his (Lyra's) works were written by] Paul, Bishop of Burgos, Diego de Deza, and Matthew Döring: of whom the first attacked the expositions of Lyra as contrary to Hebrew and Christian authors; the second published defenses against certain passages in which Lyra opposes St. Thomas [Aquinas]; the third contends for Lyra against the Bishop of Burgos.

Nicholas Zegers [Tacitus Zigenus], a Minorite, from Diest, a town of Brabant, published — [dedicated] to Julius III, Supreme Pontiff — corrections on the New Testament, in which the corrupted [readings] are restored, the added [ones] cut away, and the removed [ones] rejected; to which he gave the title Epanorthotes, or The Restorer of corrupted or altered passages. The work begins, So great [a corruption] is everywhere. The same [author] collected scholia on all the books of the New Testament, in which the difficult, or even ambiguous, passages are most learnedly and exquisitely explained according to the original phrase of Scripture and the citation of the most ancient Theologians. A pleasant work, exceedingly useful to all who wish rightly to divide the divine scripture. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

Nicholas Trivet, an Englishman, of the Order of Preachers, wrote in scholastic fashion — [dedicated] to Aymeric, Master of the Order — a Postil on Leviticus, beginning To the venerable father Brother Aymeric; likewise, on the Psalter, [dedicated] to Brother John, provincial of England, a Postil, beginning To the reverend father Brother John. He flourished in the year of the Lord 400 [so printed; read ~1300 — Trivet is a fourteenth-century figure, and Aymeric of Piacenza was Master of the Dominicans about 1304–1311].

Ninian [Ninianus], Bishop of the Picts, born of the royal blood of the Britons; when as a youth he had come to Rome, and there had learned Christian wisdom with the utmost zeal, returning into the Northern regions he led the nation of the Picts from the impiety of idols to the worship of Christ; and when he had assiduously taught the divine oracles among them, he wrote certain commentaries on the sacred Letters of great piety and erudition — of which the most celebrated are the Meditations on the Davidic hymns. He lived, as is gathered from Bede's history, in the year of our salvation 440.

Nilus, of Constantinople by fatherland, passing from the prefecture of that same city to the monastic life, a Father of many monks in the East, famous for sanctity and erudition, whose writings the Sixth Synod venerates, wrote commentaries on Job.

Nonius Marcellus Saia of Roccagloriosa [à Rocca gloriosa] published on the penitential psalms deprecatory Paraphrases, in the year of the Lord 1550.

Nonnus of Panopolis [Panapolitanus], the chief among the Greek Christian poets, whose 48 books of Dionysiaca, written in heroic verse, are reported [extant], composed a Paraphrase, in Greek hexameter verses, on the Gospel of John — which we have read printed in the type of Aldus; its beginning is: ἄχρονος ἦν ἀκίχητος ἐν ἀρρήτῳ λόγος ἀρχῇ [Timeless was the untraceable Word, in an unspeakable beginning]. [The Greek is set in the difficult 16th-century type and is given as best readable.]

O

Odo, first abbot of Cluny, of the order of St. Benedict, once a hearer of Remigius of Auxerre, most skilled in music, chief cantor of the Church of Tours, most studious of the divine Scripture, a distinguished declaimer of homilies — at the request of the brethren he compressed the thirty-five books of the commentaries of the blessed Gregory on Job [the Moralia] into one brief volume. He flourished in the year of the Lord 920.

Odo, Bishop of Cambrai [Cameracensis], a man elegantly learned in the Latin tongue, most skilled in Theology, a distinguished declaimer among his own [people], wrote one book On the Steward of Iniquity [the Unjust Steward]: whose beginning is A certain man was rich.

Odo the Gaul [Gallus], of the Order of Preachers, wrote a scholastic Postil on all the epistles of Paul, which is held at Venice in the library of SS. John and Paul, and begins, Out of the eater came forth meat.

Oecumenius, a Greek author, exceedingly learned — brief, plain, and elegant in explaining the divine Scriptures, and assiduously engaged in unrolling the commentaries of the ancients — collected with skillful care, from the sayings of the most excellent doctors of the Greek church, noble commentaries of annotations on the Octateuch, which he himself, in his commentaries on the epistle to the Hebrews, chapter six, testifies that he wrote. He collected also, with very similar industry, a Catena of explanations on the whole New Testament; of which I have read:

- On the Acts of the Apostles, 1 book — beginning Luke the Evangelist.
- On all the epistles of Paul, 14 books — beginning Of Euthalius the deacon.
- On the Canonical epistles, 7 books — This James writes.
- On the Apocalypse, one book — It must be known that the whole.

Now the names of the authors, out of whose explanations it is woven together, are these: Papias, Clement, Methodius, Dionysius, Irenaeus, Origen, Hippolytus, Athanasius, Eusebius, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa; Acacius, Isidore, Photius, Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzen, Severian, Gennadius, Arethas, Andrew, Cyril, Theodoret. To these explanations Oecumenius inserted his own explanations also, marked with his own name, so that from the title the reader might know both what he had from Oecumenius himself and what from the other fathers. This work John Henten of Nechin [Hentennius Nechliniensis], a Hieronymite monk, translated into the Latin tongue, with annotations added on several passages in which the edition of Oecumenius differs from the Vulgate Greek edition of the New Testament. He flourished (as appears from the times of the authors who are cited by him) after the year of the Lord 800.

Olympiodorus the Monk, a Greek by nation, a Philosopher of the Peripatetic school, whose illustrious commentaries on Aristotle's Meteorology are extant, wrote in Greek, according to the threefold sense, a concise, learned, brief, and elegant narration on Ecclesiastes; which Zenobio Acciaioli [Acciaiolus] the Florentine, into La-[tin → p297]

[→ p297: catchword "tinum" (Latinum)]

---

(Rich PDF p. 297 [printed folio 278, verso]. Book IV, letter O: Olympiodorus the Monk concluded; Olympiodorus the Deacon (Job commentary); Orsiesius the Pachomian; then the giant Origen Adamantius entry begins — his bio and universal learning, Porphyry's grudging testimony, the Fathers' testimonies (Didymus, Athanasius, Sulpicius Severus, Jerome, Epiphanius, Rufinus, Vincent of Lérins), the corruption of his works by heretics, his patron Ambrose, and the threefold division of his exegesis (Scholia, Homilies, Tomes). Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter O, continued:]

...[Zenobio Acciaioli] translated [Olympiodorus the Monk on Ecclesiastes] into Latin. Its beginning is A sure knowledge of things.

Olympiodorus the Deacon, a Greek by nation, a learned man, wrote in Greek most learned and most elegant commentaries on the whole book of Job, according to the sense of the letter; of which many fragments still survive in the Greek Catena on Job, which is held at Genoa in the Sauli Library. The work begins ὑπόθεσις μὲν ἡμῖν [Our theme indeed...]. But the whole work is kept in the Vatican library.

Orsiesius [Oresiesis], a monk and hermit, colleague of Pachomius and Theodore, monks dwelling in the solitudes of Egypt, a man fully instructed in the holy Scriptures, gathered from the divine oracles a volume containing the whole instruction of monastic discipline, in which the whole Old and New Testament is found expounded in compendious disquisitions, only so far as the need of monks [requires]; which, in the manner of a testament, he offered to the brethren near the day of his death. He flourished under Honorius Augustus, in the year of the Lord 420.

Origen Adamantius, of Alexandria by fatherland, son of Leonides the Martyr, a hearer and disciple of Ammonius [Saccas], a most excellent philosopher, in philosophy, and of Clement of Alexandria in the sacred dogmas — a man of such erudition and genius that most learned Greece, the parent of the most fortunate geniuses, never had his equal.[1] For, as regards the secular disciplines, he so mastered the Greek and Hebrew tongue, so knew Rhetoric, Dialectic, Geometry, Arithmetic, Music, Astronomy, and Physics, and so embraced all Philosophy — and all the sects of the Philosophers, the authors and champions of the sects and all their assertions and dogmas, and the whole variety of histories and studies — with a certain wonderful and insatiable capacity of mind, that he had philosophers of great name (although strangers to Christ) as followers, admirers, and praisers. Of whose number Porphyry, a most bitter enemy of the Christian name,[2] when in those books which he sent forth against our religion he impiously accused the divine Scriptures together with their expositors, and cast reproaches and calumnies against Origen, yet [wrote] among us things most worthy of all praise and commendation, writing plainly in this manner:

> "The Christians cling to the follies of the Jewish Scriptures, and affirm that those things which Moses wrote in a rustic and simple style are divinely sanctioned and veiled with figures and enigmas; and they expound them as though filled with immense mysteries — of which absurd kind of exposition the beginning was had from a man whom I, when I was still quite a boy, saw holding the citadel of all erudition; as is also proved from those things which he handed down to the memory of posterity. This is Origen, whose immense glory is held among their masters; who had attained all the secrets of Plato, and had been instructed in the books of Numenius and Cronius and Apollophanes and Longinus and Moderatus and Nicomachus; and among the Pythagoreans the commentaries of the greatest men were not hidden from him. He touched also the volumes of Chaeremon the Stoic and of Cornutus; from which, taking all the secret and mystical things whatsoever are held among the Greeks, and fitting them, with a barbarian custom, to the Jewish superstitions, he turned the glory of the philosophers to the foreign and outlandish dogmas of the Christians."

This [says] Porphyry, in the third volume against the Christians. But of what sort, and how great, Origen was in the divine Scriptures, we could easily know, if that huge index of the Origenian volumes survived, which Eusebius of Caesarea, in the book On the Life of Pamphilus the martyr, and Jerome, in the epistle to Paula, mother of Eustochium, described.

But in place of a most copious index, the testimonies of the most illustrious Fathers of the Church concerning him can suffice to show this.[3] Didymus, first of all, calls him the second master of the Churches after the Apostles. Athanasius calls him a most abundant witness of his [own] faith. Sulpicius Severus asserts that, in that part in which he is approved, he had no equal after the Apostles. Jerome proclaims the same [Origen] the victor of all the sacred expositors, wishing — despite the odium of the name of Origen — to have his understanding of the Scriptures too. Epiphanius and Rufinus report that he elaborated six thousand volumes on the sacred Scriptures.[4] Vincent of Lérins, contemporary with both, adds that no mortal wrote more than Origen, whose works it is not only impossible to have read through, but not even to be found. Pamphilus, a most holy martyr, affirms that he fought so bravely and constantly, with the arms of the divine Scripture, against all the heresies of his time, that he overthrew all the edifices of the heretics and the foundations of the diabolical machination. Finally, so great was the sacred doctrine of Origen — joined too with a wonderful sanctity of life — that certain of the highest chiefs of the Church did not sometimes hesitate to say that they would rather err with Origen than think rightly with others.

But although Origen was such and so great, he nevertheless suffered a grievous loss of his labors, by the fraud and fault of the heretics, who contaminated all his works with innumerable heresies,[5] so that under the pretext and favor of the name of Origen they might the more easily persuade their impious thoughts and sell them the dearer. Which adulteration of the heretics many — either not noticing it, or believing it to be rather the fault of the author than the corruption of the heretics — rejected Origen, together with his works, among the heretics. But however it be, Origen, at the exhortation of Ambrose of Alexandria (who also supplied his living, paper, books, expenses, and copyists), published, besides infinite exoteric books, also innumerable Exegemata on the whole holy Scripture — that is, volumes of Explanations — which Jerome, in the preface of the commentaries on Ezekiel [dedicated] to Vincent, distinguished into a threefold kind, that is, into Scholia, Homilies, and Tomes.

The first kind, which the Greeks call σχολιαστικόν [scholiastikon], he assigned to the Scholia, which in Latin can be called vacationes [leisure-notes], or ocia, or things excerpted at leisure. In these, whenever leisure was lacking for a full commentary, he briefly touched upon, in a summary way, with certain short annotations, only those things which seemed to him obscure.

But in the second kind, which the Greeks call ὁμιλιαστικόν [homiliastikon], we call [it] Familiar colloquy [→ p298]

[→ p298: catchword "mus" (dicimus)]

[1] Eunapius of Sardis, in the book On the Lives of the Philosophers, writes that Origen was a disciple of Plotinus and a fellow-disciple of Porphyry. [2] Porphyry was a most bitter enemy of the Christian name. [3] Testimonies of the Fathers of the Church concerning Origen. [4] Origen wrote six thousand volumes on the sacred Scriptures. [5] The works of Origen are contaminated with heresies.

---

(Rich PDF p. 298 [printed folio 279, recto]. Book IV, letter O — the Origen entry continues: the three exegetical genres completed (Homilies and Tomes), with the two further genres Eusebius adds (Epistolary and Interpretative); then the great textual works — the Hexapla and Octapla, the six/eight Greek editions, and Origen's own LXX-and-Theodotion recension with the critical signs. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter O — Origen, continued:]

...[the second, homiletic kind we call Familiar colloquy] — he placed [here] the sermons and discourses, in which (as the blessed Pamphilus testifies) Origen daily, and as it were extempore, expounded the Scriptures to the people, seven notaries taking [them] down from his mouth, and as many maidens most swift in writing, and other scribes, who handed them down to the monument of posterity. His style in this homiletic kind is familiar, plain, and simple, and foreign to all the pomp of rhetorical apparatus — brief, succinct, and without prolix prefaces and long and frequent digressions, such as many are found in Chrysostom and Augustine in their homilies. But Origen in his homilies touches the historical explanation little and lightly, and that according to the common edition of the Seventy interpreters; but he ascends to the senses of the higher allegorical understanding, and from these descends again to moral topics and brief exhortations.[1]

In the third kind, which Origen [calls] τόμους [tomous], we name Volumes, Jerome placed the greater commentaries — namely those in which Origen, expounding the divine Scriptures according to the Hebrew verity, gave all the sails of his genius to the breathing winds; and, receding from the land, so fled off into the midst of the deepest senses and the ocean of mysteries, that he brought fear and peril even upon the most learned readers who wished to follow him thither. Yet in treating these so hidden secrets he always used the utmost humility of mind and modesty of words, affirming nothing rashly, but — as one eager to learn — humbly inquiring into each thing, and rather rousing the reader to a common zeal of investigation than teaching; compelling him with these perpetual formulas of admonition, namely: Consider whether perhaps these things which we say can be fitted to the sacred Scripture? Let us see whether we can find this which we say in the divine Scriptures; likewise, I indeed suspect thus; see you whether it can be so; and he wished everywhere to use these and similar little rousings, as befitted a man almost αὐτοδίδακτος [self-taught], and who was the first to undertake the explanation of all the divine Scriptures, not yet attempted by anyone on account of their immense difficulty. He was delighted, too — both in this and in the higher [homiletic] kind — with the structure of allegories, to such a degree that it was objected against him by his rivals that, with the wrappings of allegory and the windings of anagogy, he did violence to the protesting Letter, and destroyed the truth of the Scriptures. He uses also, in this kind chiefly (after the imitation of Clement his teacher), many apocryphal testimonies from the most ancient monuments of hidden volumes, such as are the book of the Shepherd [Hermas], the book of Enoch, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the Preaching of Peter, the Prayer of Joseph, the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, and others like these.

To these three kinds of exposition Eusebius adds also two others, namely ἐπιστολικόν [epistolikon] and ἑρμηνευτικόν [hermeneutikon] — that is, the Epistolary, and [the kind] of Interpretations. In the Epistolary [kind] he explained, by written-back epistles, questions from the divine Scripture sent to him by the letters of friends; among which is that magnificent [letter] on the history of Susanna, [addressed] to Julius Africanus, most celebrated among the hundred Origenian epistles collected by Eusebius. In the Interpretative, or Translational kind, are finally to be placed all the translations of the divine Scripture which he embraced in the Hexapla, the Octapla, and in the codices of the Palestinian edition. In this so manifold variety of labors, then — although Origen always showed himself the same — yet the divine Ambrose, writing to Clementianus, judges that he was far greater in the Old Testament than in the New.

But those volumes, out of each of these orders [genres], which still survive, or are found only cited by ancient authors, are these:

Collections of various Translations of the whole Old Testament. For Origen — as Epiphanius writes in the book On Weights and Measures — after the four editions (namely of the Seventy interpreters, of Aquila, of Symmachus, and of Theodotion) found two other Greek translations: one, together with very many other Hebrew and Greek volumes, in the city of Jericho in Palestine, which he called the Fifth; but the other on the Actian shore at Nicopolis, hidden in jars, which he named the Sixth edition. Out of which six versions Origen composed two different kinds of copies, namely the Hexapla and the Octapla. And first the Hexapla: in whose codices he so distinguished six little columns through each page, that —

• in the first little column the very words of the Scripture [were written] in Hebrew;

• [in the second] the Hebrew words in Greek [transliterated] letters, opposite the Hebrew, for the sake of those who did not know how to read Hebrew;

• in the third he subjoined the translation of Aquila;

• in the fourth, [that] of Symmachus;

• in the fifth, [that] of the Seventy interpreters;

• in the sixth he placed the edition of Theodotion.

And on account of this kind of composition, as Eusebius notes, he named these copies ἑξαπλᾶ [Hexapla, "sixfold"]. For which reason also — as Suidas and John Zonaras testify — they are by some called Τετραπλᾶ [Tetrapla], that is, "Quadruple," on account of the four Greek editions (namely of the Seventy, of Aquila, of Symmachus, and of Theodotion). Then, after these sixfold copies, Origen again composed other Octapla [eightfold] copies, in which — eight little columns being arranged through each page — he added the fifth and sixth editions after the four aforesaid; which, because he had found them without the title of their authors, he called the one of them the Fifth (prefixing to it an inscription by the letter E, the index of the number five among the Greeks), but the other he named the Sixth, and inscribed on it the mark of the number six, ☐ — namely that which the Greeks call epis■mon. And these copies were afterward called Octapla, on account of the number of the eight columns.

Which [Octapla], after Origen had completed [them] not without immense labor, he undertook again another translation for the daily use of the Church; which he compounded out of two editions — namely the Seventy and Theodotion's — mixing both together, and marking with asterisks what was lacking [in the Seventy], but with obeli and metobeli what seemed superfluously added. Which edition, when afterward it had been divulged by Pamphilus the martyr and by Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea, published [→ p299]

[→ p299: catchword "uulga[ta]"]

[1] Eunapius of Sardis, in the volume which he wrote On the Lives of the Philosophers, reports that Origen's style was one of acuteness and precision — praised indeed by Porphyry, but by very many neglected for this reason: that it had no graces of speech nor any charms of eloquence.

---

(Rich PDF p. 299 [printed folio 280, verso]. Book IV, letter O — the Origen entry continues: the "Palestinian translation"; his On the interpretation of Hebrew names; the Stromata (10 books); the 13 Genesis Tomes (mostly lost, suppressed for suspect dogmas); then the surviving homilies — on Genesis, Exodus, and Leviticus (each with its passage), and the beginning of the Numbers homilies. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter O — Origen, continued:]

...[when it had been] divulged [by Pamphilus and Eusebius], it was called the Palestinian translation, because all the Churches of Palestine and Syria received the reading of it in their daily lections. Origen mentions this labor published by himself, in the eighth treatise on Matthew and in the sixth tome on John.

He wrote also a book On the interpretation of the Hebrew names occurring in the sacred letters, which Justin mentions in the book of Questions, and Epiphanius in the book On Weights and Measures.

He composed also Stromata, that is, [a work] of variegated [work], ten books: in which, comparing the sentences of the holy Scriptures and of the Philosophers, he confirmed all the dogmas of the Christian religion from the sayings of the Philosophers. The ninth and tenth of these books he completed wholly in a comma-style [clause-by-clause] exposition of the book of Daniel and of the whole epistle to the Galatians.

He then dictated, on the first four chapters of Genesis, thirteen Tomes of continuous explanation, most filled with the deepest senses and more sublime mysteries — that is, from the beginning of the book down to that sentence of the fourth chapter, Everyone who kills Cain shall be punished sevenfold. In the exposition of which, as Jerome in the Questions to Damasus left attested, he composed the twelfth and thirteenth tome by dictation. Of these, as I judge, nothing at present survives, except a certain Disputation On the Stars and Fate, comprised in three leaves, which is held in Eusebius, book 6, On the Evangelical Preparation, chapter 9. I suspect that these tomes perished — the ancient Fathers so wishing it — on account of many suspect dogmas sprinkled in them; concerning which some are reviewed in the following book, in the censures of the book of Genesis.

He published besides, as Rufinus indicates in the 2nd volume against Jerome, two books of homilies on Genesis; of which only seventeen, on various passages of the same book, have come down to us, namely:

- On Genesis chapter 1, On the World in the beginning, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 6, On the building of the ark, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 17, On the circumcision of Abraham, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 18, On the three men seen by Abraham, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 19, On Lot and his daughters, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 20, On Abimelech desiring the marriage of Sarah, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 21, On the birth and weaning of Isaac, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 22, On Abraham offering his son, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 22, On the promises made to Abraham, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 24, On Rebecca, having gone out to draw water, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 25, On Abraham betrothing Keturah to himself, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 25, On the conception and birth of Rebecca['s children], 1 homily.
- On Genesis 26, On the wells dug for Isaac, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 26, On God, who appeared to Isaac at the well, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 45, On the sons of Jacob announcing to their father the rule of Joseph in Egypt, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 47, On the land of Egypt bought by Joseph in the time of famine, 1 homily.
- On Genesis 49, On the blessings of the patriarchs, 1 homily.

He elaborated also other, almost innumerable, lucubrations on the Octateuch, of whose number are:

On Exodus, one book of Excerpts, or Annotations, cited by Rufinus in the aforesaid place. Likewise, one book of homilies on Exodus, of which now, from Jerome's version, only thirteen survive, namely:

- On Exodus chapter 1, On the beginning of Exodus, 1 homily.
- On Exodus 1, On the midwives of the Hebrews, 1 homily.
- On Exodus 4, On the ten plagues, 1 homily.
- On Exodus 12, On the departure of the children of Israel, 1 homily.
- On Exodus 15, On the Canticle of Moses, 1 homily.
- On Exodus 15, On the water of Marah, 1 homily.
- On Exodus 17, On the thirst of the people at Rephidim, and the war of the Amalekites, 1 homily.
- On Exodus 20, On the beginning of the Decalogue, 1 homily.
- On Exodus 21, On the pregnant woman [struck by] two quarreling men, &c., 1 homily.
- On Exodus 26, On the Tabernacle, 1 homily.
- On Exodus 34, On the veiled face of Moses, 1 homily.

• On Exodus 35, On the things to be offered for the tabernacle, 1 homily.

On Leviticus, one book of Excerpts, which Rufinus recalls in the work already mentioned. Likewise, on Leviticus, one book of homilies from various passages, of which sixteen are held as translated by Jerome, namely:

• On Leviticus chapter 1, On the beginning of Leviticus, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 2, 3, and 4, On the various rites of the sacrifices, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 5, On not keeping silent about the crimes of others, and on those who touch the unclean, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 6, On him who lies to his neighbor concerning a deposit and a partnership, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 6, On the law of the victim for sin, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 7, On the priestly garments, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 9 and 11, On wine and strong drink not to be drunk by the priests when entering the tabernacle, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 12, 13, and 14, On the Woman unclean for seven days after childbirth, and on leprosy, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 16, On the sacrifices of propitiation and the two goats, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 16, On the fast on the day of propitiation, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 20, On that [text] Be holy, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 21, On the high priest, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 23, On the feast days, the candlestick, and the [shewbread] table, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 24, On the son of an Israelite mother and an Egyptian father, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 25, On the sales and redemptions of houses, 1 homily.

• On Leviticus 26, On the blessings of Leviticus, 1 homily.

On Numbers chapter 1, On the first numbering of the children of Israel, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 2, On the order of encampment, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 3, On the Levites, taken from the midst of the children of Israel, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 3, On the twenty-two thousand Levites, 1 hom[ily → p300]

[→ p300: catchword "milia" (homilia)]

---

(Rich PDF p. 300 [printed folio 281, recto]. Book IV, letter O — the Origen entry continues: the homily-catalog runs on through Numbers (from ch. 4) and Joshua, then the homilies on Judges and on Kings; after which Sixtus argues that the two Job commentaries circulating under Origen's name are not genuinely his. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter O — Origen, continued:]

(The page opens completing the last entry of p. 299 — "On Numbers 3, On the twenty-two thousand Levites, 1 homily.")

• On Numbers 4, On the people of Kohath not to be destroyed, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 11 and 12, On Moses going out to the people, 1 homily.

• On the same, On the Ethiopian woman and the leprosy of Miriam, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 14, On the things which the spies reported back, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 16 and 17, On the censers of Korah and the sedition of the people against Moses, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 18, On that which the Lord said to Aaron, You and your sons, etc., 1 homily.

• On Numbers 20, On the well and the Song, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 22, On the things which were left over from the earlier treatise, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 22, On Balaam, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 23, On the first prophecy of Balaam, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 23, On the second prophecy of Balaam, 1 homily.

• On the same, On the fourth prophecy of Balaam, 1 homily.

• On the same, On the fifth and last prophecy of Balaam, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 25, On him who committed fornication with the Midianite woman, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 26, On the second numbering of the people, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 27, On the daughters of Zelophehad, and on the succession of Moses, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 28, On that text, My offerings, my gifts, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 29 and 30, On the sacrifices of every feast, and on vows, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 31, On the vengeance upon the Midianites, 1 homily.

• On the same, On the sum of the number of the children of Israel, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 33, On the encampments of the children of Israel, 1 homily.

• On Numbers 34, On the description of the Holy Land, 1 homily.

On Joshua chapter 1, On the beginning of the book of Joshua, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 1, On that which is said, Moses my servant is dead, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 2, On the two and a half tribes, Reuben and Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 3, On the crossing of the Jordan, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 4 and 5, On the two and a half tribes which crossed the Jordan, and on the people circumcised with stone knives, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 5, On the Passover celebrated at Gilgal, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 6, On the destruction of Jericho, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 8, On the overthrow of the city of Ai, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 9, On Deuteronomy written upon the stones of the altar, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 9, On the deceit of the Gibeonites, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 9, On Joshua aiding the Gibeonites, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 9, On the wars of Joshua to be understood spiritually, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 10, On the cities Lachish, Libnah, and Hebron, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 11, On Jabin king of Hazor, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 11, On the deeds done after Jabin was conquered, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 13, On the old age of Joshua, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 13, On the Levites not receiving land, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 14, On the beginning of the division of the land of promise, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 14 and 15, On the borders of the inheritance of the tribe of Judah, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 15, On Caleb receiving Hebron, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 15, On the children of Judah unable to destroy the Jebusites, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 16, On the tribe of Ephraim, and on the Canaanites, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 18, On the manner of the lots, where seven tribes receive an inheritance, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 19, On the Amorites dwelling with Ephraim, and on Joshua receiving a city from the children of Israel, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 21, On the cities and the lot of the Levites, 1 homily.

• On Joshua 22, On the stone knives buried in the ground, and on the altars built beyond the Jordan, 1 homily.

On Judges chapter 2, On that the people served the Lord under Joshua, 1 homily.

• On Judges 3, On the Israelites delivered into the hand of their enemies, and on Othniel and Ehud, 1 homily.

• On Judges 4, On Shamgar, Jabin, and Sisera, 1 homily.

• On the same, On Deborah and Barak, 1 homily.

• On Judges 5, On the Song of Deborah, 1 homily.

• On Judges 6, On the Israelites handed over into the hands of Midian, 1 homily.

• On Judges 6, On Gideon, 1 homily.

• On Judges 7, On the battle of Gideon with the three hundred men, 1 homily.

On 1 Kings chapter 2 [Vulgate Regum; = 1 Samuel], On the Song of Hannah, 1 homily.

• On 3 Kings 3 [= 1 Kings], On the judgment of Solomon, 1 homily — which Origen mentions in the 3rd homily on Joshua.

On Job he issued many Homilies, or Treatises, which Jerome mentions in writing against Vigilantius. In place of these we now have, inserted among the Origenian volumes, a twofold work of exposition: the one very prolix, distinguished into three books, containing an exposition from the opening of the history of Job down to the middle of the third chapter; the other, which quite briefly and almost paraphrastically sets forth the historical sense of the whole book of Job, lately translated from the Greek by the industry of Joachim Périon. But neither is Origen's, although both are learned and worth reading. For, besides that the phrasing of both, and their method of teaching, is far removed from Origen's diction, this too is to be added: that the author of the former work, contrary to Origen's custom, abounds in almost countless battologies [vain repetitions], and consumes much time while he fashions for the persons speeches longer than is fitting, and by apostrophe speaks now to Job, now to the devil, and amid all this celebrates the combat of Lucian the Martyr, and commemorates the name of Homousius [Homoousios] and the opinion of the Homousians.[1]

In the latter work, however — in which, contrary to Origen's manner, he keeps to the bare letter — he also expounds those words of Job's wife which are found in the Greek codices in the second chapter, and which are rejected by Origen himself as apocryphal and adventitious [spurious]. Next he brings in an exposition of Lucian the Martyr on the third chapter of Job, and in the seventh and in the eighth chapter he refutes the Manichaeans by name, and in the thirty-eighth chapter he makes mention of the Homousianists. But it is established that both Lucian the Martyr and the Manichaeans lived after Origen, and that the very name of Homousius and of the Homousians came into being long after Origen's time. Again, in the same 38th chapter, he condemns the opinion of those who affirm [that the stars →]

[→ p301: catchword "affirmant"]

[1] The name "Homoousios" arose after Origen's time.

(Rich PDF p. 301 [printed folio 282, verso]. Book IV, letter O — the Origen entry continues: his twofold labor on the Psalter and the three extant Psalm-treatises; the Proverbs commentaries; Ecclesiastes; the ten books on the Song of Songs, with Jerome's encomium, and the two-chapter Song fragment once ascribed to Jerome; then his works on Isaiah and Jeremiah, each with a surviving homily-list. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter O — Origen, continued:]

...[those who] affirm the stars to be animate [ensouled] — which is Origen's own peculiar dogma.[1] In each work there are read certain few little points worthy of censure, which you will find noted in the following book of censures.

On the Psalter also Origen exhibited a twofold labor. For he wrote — as Jerome indicates in the preface to the Psalms — an Enchiridion [Handbook] on all the Psalms, in a comma-style, or clause-by-clause, kind of exposition, annotated with terse and necessary little interpretations. He then composed, for the sake of Ambrose of Alexandria, the amplest narrative expositions upon the Psalter, following the order of the edition of the Seventy interpreters, of Aquila, of Symmachus, of Theodotion, and of the fifth and sixth editions; and, first of all the Greeks — as Jerome in his letter to Augustine is witness — he published upon the whole body of the Psalms very many tomes. Of these the same Jerome relates that he translated seven tomes, or treatises, that is, from the tenth psalm up to the sixteenth. Best known among his other treatises on the Psalter is the exposition of Psalm 1, which, on account of the variety of very great matters, is discussed in almost all the writings of the ancients.

There are still extant, under Origen's name, three Treatises on the Psalms, namely on Psalms 36, 37, and 38, which Rufinus — without indicating the name of their author — asserts that he translated from Greek into Latin, and, for the greater convenience of readers, divided into nine homilies. Trithemius in his Catalog relates that he saw 150 Treatises of Origen on the Psalter, whose beginning was, Blessed is the man, etc. This Psalm. But in Epiphanius, and in the Greek Catena of the Psalms, the preface of Origen on the Psalms so begins: Κεκλεῖσθαι καὶ ἐσφραγίσθαι τὰς θείας γραφάς [so printed; the 16th-c. Greek type is hard] — that is, That the divine Scriptures are shut up and sealed.

After these Origen worked out Commentaries on the Proverbs of Solomon, cited by St. Pamphilus in his Apology.

On Ecclesiastes also, Explanations, of which Methodius, bishop of Olympus, makes mention in his book On the Resurrection.

Likewise, ten books of Commentaries on the Song of Songs: of which he wrote the first five at Athens, and finished the other five after returning to Caesarea. He also had, on the same book, some Homilies to the people, of which Jerome translated two, having prefixed at their front a little epistolary preface to Pope Damasus; in which he set forth an encomium both of the commentaries and of the homilies, in these words:

> ORIGEN, though in all other things he has surpassed everyone, in the Song of Songs surpassed even himself. For, having completed ten volumes — which reached almost to twenty thousand verses — he discoursed, first upon the Seventy interpreters, then upon Aquila and Symmachus and Theodotion, and finally upon the fifth edition, which he writes he found on the shore of Actium, so magnificently and so openly that it seems to me there was fulfilled in him what is said, The king has brought me into his chamber. And so, setting that [larger] work aside — because it is of vast leisure, labor, and expense to translate into Latin things so great, a work so worthy — I have translated these two treatises, which he composed after the manner of everyday speech, for little ones still nursing, more faithfully than elegantly, offering you a taste of his meaning, not [full] food. Do you take note how highly those things are to be esteemed which are great, since even these small ones can so please. Thus far Jerome.

There is also carried about, under Origen's name, another pious, learned, and eloquent work — or rather a fragment of a work — in which the first two chapters of the Song of Songs are most eloquently and most learnedly explained. In certain old codices this was headed with the name of JEROME. Someone or other divided it into four Homilies, although they are not homilies but a continuous and unbroken explanation. Its beginning is, A little book, an Epithalamium. The Master of the Sentences, in book 3, distinction 29, and St. Thomas, in the Second [part], question 26, cite testimonies from this work under the name of Ambrose. He wrote besides,

On Isaiah, volumes entitled [as follows], namely: upon the whole of Isaiah, in scattered fashion, ΣΗΜΕΙΩΣΕΩΝ [so printed; = σημειώσεων] — that is, one book of Annotations or Excerpts.

Likewise, on a part of Isaiah according to the four editions, up to the vision of the four-footed beasts in the desert; that is, from the beginning of the book up to the thirtieth chapter, thirty tomes of continuous exposition. In these, ranging through the free fields of allegory, by interpreting the names of the several things, he made his own genius [into] the mysteries of the Church. But of these volumes the twenty-sixth book had already perished by Jerome's time.

Likewise, On the vision of the Four-footed Beasts [Τετραπόδων] in the desert, which begins, The burden of the beasts of the South in a land of tribulation and distress, upon the thirtieth chapter of Isaiah, to Grata, an illustrious woman: two books, which very many have falsely supposed to be inscribed with the name of Origen.

Likewise, upon various passages of Isaiah, 25 Homilies to the people, of which only the nine written below survive [so printed "nine"; the entries below total ten homilies], namely:

- On that [text] of chapter 4 [printed Ex 4.; = Isaiah 4:1], Seven women shall lay hold of one man, 1 homily.
- On chapter 6, On the first vision of Isaiah, 5 homilies.
- On Isaiah 7, On the words of the angel to Ahaz, 1 homily.
- On Isaiah 7, upon that [text], Behold, I and my children, 1 homily.
- On Isaiah 10, upon that [text], As I have done to Samaria, so will I do to Jerusalem, 2 homilies.

On Jeremiah also he is said to have written a huge number of homilies: of which Rabanus [Maurus], archbishop of Mainz, in the preface of his commentaries on Jeremiah, affirms that forty-five were known to him; of which number we have only the fourteen written below, in Jerome's translation, namely:

- On Jeremiah 1, On the beginning of Jeremiah, 1 homily.
- On Jeremiah 2, That one must flee from Babylon, 1 homily.
- On Jeremiah 2, On the vine turned into bitterness, 1 homily.
- On Jeremiah 3, upon that [text], And the Lord said to me in the days of king Josiah, 1 homily.
- On Jeremiah 5, On the Hammer of the whole earth, broken, 1 homily.
- On Jeremiah 10, On him who makes the earth by his power, 1 homily.
- On Jeremiah 11, upon that [text], Hear the words of this covenant, 1 homily.

[→ p302: catchword "In"]

[1] Origen held the stars to be animate [ensouled].

(Rich PDF p. 302 [printed folio 283, recto]. Book IV, letter O — the Origen entry continues: the rest of the Jeremiah homilies; his works on Lamentations, Ezekiel (with the 14-homily list), and the Susanna-defense letter to Julius Africanus on Daniel 13 (with Eusebius's testimony); then, on the New Testament side, his labors on the Minor Prophets, Matthew, and the opening of Luke. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter O — Origen, continued:]

- On Jeremiah 12, On the land laid waste, 1 homily.
- On Jeremiah 12, upon that [text], Make [it] known to me, O Lord, and I shall know, 1 homily.
- On Jeremiah 13, On the wineskins to be filled with wine, 1 homily.
- On Jeremiah 13 and 14, On the threatenings of God against Jerusalem, 1 homily.
- On Jeremiah 15, upon that [text], Woe is me, my mother, 1 homily.
- On Jeremiah 16, On the Sending of the fishermen, 1 homily.
- On Jeremiah 17, On the cry of the partridge, 1 homily.

On the Lamentations [Threnoi] of Jeremiah also Origen wrote, while he was at Alexandria, nine Tomes, of which Nicephorus makes mention in the fifth volume of his History; and, while he was living at Athens, already more than sixty years old, he worked [them] out — Eusebius being witness.

On Ezekiel, 25 Tomes — though before that he had given very many homilies on the same prophet, of which 14 are extant in Jerome's translation, which are:

- On Ezekiel chapter 1, On the captivity of the people of Israel, and of king Jehoiachin, and the vision of Ezekiel, 1 homily.
- On Ezekiel 13, On the evil prophets prophesying in Jerusalem, 1 homily, which begins, No form of sinners.
- On the same, upon that [text]: Son of man, set thy face firm, 1 homily.
- On Ezekiel 14, On the sins of sinful Jerusalem, 1 homily.
- On the same, ch. 14, On the two plagues, namely the sword and death, 1 homily.
- On Ezekiel 15, On the parable of the wood of the vine, 1 homily.
- On Ezekiel 16, upon that [text], Thy root and thy generation [are] from the land of Canaan, 1 homily.
- On the same, On the garments given by God to sinful Jerusalem, 1 homily.
- On the same, On the rebuke of sinful Jerusalem, setting up a brothel, 1 homily.
- On the same, On that which is written, Your father [was] an Amorite, and your mother a Hittite, 1 homily.
- On the same, On that which is written, Be confounded, and receive thy shame, 1 homily.
- On Ezekiel 17, On the great Eagle entering Lebanon, 1 homily.
- On the same, On Nebuchadnezzar entering Jerusalem, 1 homily.
- On Ezekiel 28, On that which is written, Thou [wast] the seal of resemblance, full of wisdom, 1 homily.

On Daniel chapter 13 he wrote to Julius Africanus, in defense of the history of Susanna, one letter — lately translated into Latin by Ambrose [Traversari], of Milan, a Cassinese monk, a most learned man: concerning which Eusebius, in the 6th book of the Ecclesiastical History, thus writes: At that time there was also Africanus, a man renowned in the ecclesiastical Scriptures; whose letter is said to have been written to Origen, objecting to him, or proposing, that the history of Susanna, which is written in Daniel, seemed fictitious and foreign to the prophetic Scripture. To whom Origen, writing back most magnificently, [replied] that one must by no means give ear to the fabrications and frauds of the Jews, but that this alone is to be held for true in the divine Scriptures which the Seventy interpreters translated; for that alone is [truly Scripture] which is confirmed by apostolic authority. Thus far Eusebius.

Again, Origen followed out the whole context of the history of Susanna in the tenth book of the Stromata, in a clause-by-clause explanation; a part of which is now contained in the Hieronymian commentaries on Daniel, inserted by Jerome himself under the title of Origen.

He wrote besides, on the fourteen [so printed; = twelve] Minor Prophets, ἐξηγήσεων — that is, very many books of Narrative-Expositions [Enarrationes] — of which Eusebius complains that he could scarcely find twenty-five. Concerning these Jerome, in the Catalog of writers, thus speaks: I found, on the Twelve Prophets, volumes written by the hand of the blessed Pamphilus the Martyr, which I embrace and keep with so much joy that I believe I possess the wealth of Croesus. For if it is a joy to have one letter of a martyr, how much more so many thousands of verses, through which he seems to me to have signed the traces of his own blood?

Of these books he composed two in particular. On Hosea, one to which he gave the title Περὶ τοῦ πῶς ὠνομάσθαι τοῦ Ὡσηὲ Ἐφραίμ [so printed; the 16th-c. Greek type is hard] — that is, Why Ephraim is [so] called in Hosea — wishing to show that whatever things are said against him [Ephraim] are to be referred to the person of the heretics; and the other, [called] ἀκέφαλον καὶ ἀτέλεστον, so called because it lacks both a head [a beginning] and an end.

Likewise, on Zechariah he wrote two books, expounding allegorically scarcely a third part, from the beginning of the book up to the vision of the four-horse chariots [quadrigae].

Likewise, on Malachi, three books of allegorical exposition.

And these are the things which I have found written by Origen upon the Old Testament. But those which pertain to the New Instrument [Testament] are these:

On Matthew, a threefold kind of explanation, that is: Tomes, Scholia, and Homilies. Of these, first he composed on this whole gospel 36 Tomes; of which the first ten tomes are wanting, the rest survive, namely from the exposition of that passage, Then, having dismissed the crowds, he came into his house, from chapter 13 up to chapter 27 — which the copyists imprudently divided into treatises, or 35 homilies, although not a trace of the homiletic kind appears in them, which [kind] always runs from brief openings into little prefaces and doxologies.

Secondly, he wrote also, on the same Evangelist, one book of the scholastic kind, in which, through clauses and intervals, with certain brief scholia, he briefly annotated whatever seemed to him obscure.

Thirdly, he published, of the homiletic kind, on various passages of Matthew, twenty-five Homilies to the people; of these, those which now survive are these:

- On Matthew 1, On Mary betrothed, 1 homily.
- On Matthew 2, On the appearance of the angel to Joseph, 1 homily.
- On Matthew 6, upon that [text], When ye fast, 1 homily.
- On Matthew 8, On the leper cleansed, 1 homily.
- On Matthew 15, On the Canaanite woman, 1 homily.
- On Matthew 25, On the coming of the Son of Man to judgment, 1 homily — whose earlier part was cut from a treatise of Origen on Matthew 34; but the latter part seems to contain two fragments of Latin Fathers, of which the one is found at the end of Jerome's commentaries on Isaiah, the other in Gregory, book 15 of the Morals, chapter 14. Nor is there any doubt that very many things like these, excerpted here and there, are found also in some homilies which are read, under Origen's name, on various passages of the gospels.

On Luke he dictated five Tomes, which are now wanting, and very many Homilies, of [which →]

[→ p303: catchword "quibus"]

---

(Rich PDF p. 303 [printed folio 284, verso]. Book IV, letter O — the Origen entry continues: the surviving Luke homilies; the great commentary on John (39 tomes, of which nine survive — Périon's version, and the padded 32-tome version), with the two John homilies; then his fifteen books on Romans, prefaced by Jerome's letter to Heraclius. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter O — Origen, continued:]

...of which 39 are still extant, which — because they are little wrought out, and because some are sprinkled even with condemned errors — Jerome, their translator, excuses, as having been born from Origen when he was quite young; for some are the preludes of youth, and others the serious [works] of old age. Of these, the first thirty-three homilies explain Luke in a continuous series of exposition, from the beginning of the gospel up to the middle of the fourth chapter; but the six later ones expound certain scattered passages, and are these:

- On Luke 10, On him who fell among the robbers, 1 homily.
- On Luke 12, upon that [text], Be agreeing with thy adversary, 1 homily.
- On Luke 17, upon that [text], Whoever will save his soul shall lose it, 1 homily.
- On Luke 19, On the colt of the ass, 1 homily.
- On Luke 18, On the weeping of Christ over Jerusalem, 1 homily.
- On Luke 20, On the question of the Sadducees, 1 homily.

On John's Gospel, [books] of complete explanation, to Ambrose of Alexandria, 39 Tomes — which Jerome, in the preface to the 39 homilies of Origen on Luke, excuses himself for not having dared to render into the Latin tongue, deterred by the magnitude of the labor and the expense. They lay hidden, unknown to all the Latins down to our age; but lately, out of these, Joachim Périon, a Cassinese monk, first translated nine tomes into Latin. For only so many survived in a very ancient Greek codex, which he obtained from the most illustrious library of the King of the French; and these indeed [are], in many places, mutilated, by no means consecutive, and interpolated — namely the first, second, sixth, tenth, thirteenth, eighteenth, twentieth, twenty-eighth, [and] thirty-second:

- Of which the first contains the preface of the work, together with the exposition of only the first proposition, namely, In the beginning was the Word. Its beginning is, Just as the ancient people [of God]...
- In the second is expounded that [text] from chapter 1, And the Word was with God, up to those words of the same chapter, He who came after me was made before me.
- In the sixth are expounded those words from chapter 1, And this is the testimony of John, up to that [text], Behold the Lamb of God.
- In the tenth is explained that [text] from chapter 2, After this he went down to Capernaum, he and his mother, up to the end of the same chapter, For he himself knew what was in man.
- In the thirteenth is expounded that [text] from chapter 4, Jesus answered, Everyone who drinks of this water, up to that [text] of the same chapter, When therefore he had come into Galilee, the Galileans received him.
- In the eighteenth is expounded that [text] from chapter 8, Neither do you know me, nor my Father, up to the words which follow a little after in the same chapter, Unless you believe that I am [he], you shall die in your sins.
- In the twentieth is expounded, from chapter 8, that sentence, I know that you are the seed of Abraham, up to that [one] in the same chapter, Now we know that you have a demon.

• In the twenty-eighth is explained that [text] from chapter 11, Jesus said, Take away the stone, etc., [and] what follows, up to the end of the same chapter.

• In the thirty-second is expounded that [text] from chapter 13, And supper being ended, when the devil had put [it] into the heart, that Judas should betray him, up to those words of the same chapter, You will seek me, and, as I said to the Jews, where I go, you cannot come.

These nine tomes of the interrupted [fragmentary] explanation, a certain petty Greekling of uncertain name, by a new kind of imposture, cut apart into thirty-two tomes — so that he might render the work more desirable (swollen by a multitude of numbers and made continuous by the order of arithmetical reckoning) and sell it at a greater price. Deceived by his fraud, Ambrose the Milanese, a Cassinese monk, a man otherwise shrewd and of a clever wit, translated this very work into Latin, and published it in print, divided into thirty-two tomes, thus beginning, Just as the people who once [were] God's.

He published also, on this gospel, several homilies, but now only two are extant inscribed with his name: one on the beginning of John, the other on the beginning of chapter 20, on Mary weeping at the tomb; of which the former — whose beginning is, The voice of the spiritual eagle — it appears is not Origen's, both from the names of the Manichaeans and of the Arians commemorated in it, [sects] which arose long after Origen. So much for the expositions of the Gospels; after which, having undertaken to explain Paul, he labored [as follows].

On the Epistle to the Romans, fifteen books of commentaries: concerning which it pleases [me] to append the judgment of Jerome from the little preface which he set before those same commentaries, translated by himself, writing in this manner to Heraclius:[1]

> You compel me, brother Heraclius — me who am willing, carried in a little skiff, to skirt the shore of a tranquil coast and to gather little fishes from the pools of the Greeks — to loose my sails into the deep; and, the work abandoned which I had in hand in translating the homilies of the old man Adamantius [Origen], you urge that I should render in our tongue his fifteen volumes, in which he discoursed upon the epistle of Paul to the Romans: in which [volumes] that [author], while he pursues the Apostle's meaning, is carried out into so deep a sea that there is great fear in following him thither, lest I be overwhelmed by the magnitude of the meanings, as by the monstrous vastness of the waves. Then, neither do you consider this — that my breath is too slight to fill up his so magnificent throng of speaking. But above all the difficulties is this: that the books themselves are interpolated. For in almost everyone's libraries there are lacking (by what chance is indeed uncertain) some volumes from the very body [of the work]; and to fill these up in the Latin work, and to give a complete sequence, is not [a thing] of my talent, but, as you believe — you who demand these things — perhaps of a divine gift. You add, moreover, that nothing may be lacking to my labors, that I should abbreviate this whole body of fifteen volumes — which the Greek discourse brought forth to almost forty, or more, thousands of verses — and, if it can be done, compress it to half its extent. Commands hard enough, and imposed as if by one who would not know the weight of this work; yet I will attempt [it], if perhaps by your prayers (which seem to me, as to a man, impossible) — with the Lord breathing upon [them] — they may become possible. But let us now hear the man himself, if it seem [good], namely Origen, how he directs the preface of the work undertaken. Thus far Jerome.

There are some who think that the translation of these commentaries is Rufinus's, the conjecture being taken from the peroration of the translator himself, placed at the end of the whole work. Origen wrote likewise:

[→ p304: catchword "In"]

[1] The judgment of St. Jerome on Origen's commentary on the Epistle to the Romans.

(Rich PDF p. 304 [printed folio 285, recto]. Book IV — the giant Origen entry concludes (his Pauline commentaries; the roster of his apologists; his death at Tyre); then the remaining letter O entries — Oronce Finé, Orosius, Otfrid, Othmar Nachtgall — after which letter P opens with Paduanus Crassus, Paganus of Bergamo, Pantaleon, and the opening of Pantaenus. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter O — Origen, concluded:]

On the first Epistle to the Corinthians, commentaries, of which Jerome makes mention in the letter to Pammachius, which begins, Of Christian modesty.

On the Epistle to the Galatians he elaborated various [works] according to the threefold kind of exposition, that is: five Tomes of continuous and complete narration on the whole epistle. Likewise, out of the ten books of his Stromata, he completed the tenth volume, in a clause-by-clause discourse, upon the explanation of this epistle. Likewise, one book of Eklogai [Ἐκλογῶν], or Excerpts. Likewise, not a few Treatises to the people; all of which the injury of time has consumed. Jerome mentions these in his letter to Augustine.

On the Epistle to the Ephesians, three Tomes, which Jerome — in the preface of his commentary on the epistle to the Ephesians, and in the first apology against Rufinus — confesses that he followed.

On the Epistle to the Colossians, 3 books of commentary, of which Pamphilus cites the third book in his Apology.

On the first Epistle to the Thessalonians, several books, of which Jerome cites the third in his letter to Minervius and Alexander, saying: Origen, in the third volume of the Expository [works] [ἐξηγηματικῶν] on the Epistle of Paul to the Thessalonians (the first), after many things which he discoursed in a varied and prudent discourse, introduced these; in which there is no doubt to anyone that Acacius drew off [borrowed] very much, etc.

On the Epistle to Titus, one book, a fragment of which is cited by Pamphilus in the Apology.

On the Epistle to the Hebrews, several books, of which Pamphilus cites a fragment in the Apology.

These, then, are Origen's works upon the sacred Letters. But concerning his life and sanctity, and concerning the rest of the exoteric volumes composed by him outside the explanation of the divine Scriptures, if anyone desires to know more, let him read Eusebius in the 6th book of the Ecclesiastical History. Many most illustrious men wrote, in defense of Origen's works, various apologetic books,[1] namely: Pamphilus of Caesarea, the most holy martyr, one book, to which is joined one book of Gregory [Thaumaturgus], bishop of Neocaesarea, On the Praises of Origen; Eusebius of Caesarea, the bishop, six books; Didymus of Alexandria, one book; Methodius of Olympus, one book — a Palinode [recantation] of the Origen he had once censured; Basil the Great and Gregory Nazianzen, by a common labor, one book; Rufinus, presbyter of Aquileia, to Macarius, two books; John Pico della Mirandola, one book; Jacques Merlin of Saint-Victurnien, one book.

Origen flourished under Alexander [Severus], son of Mamaea, down to Gallus and Volusianus his son — that is, down to the seventieth year of his age — and he died at Tyre, and was buried in the same place, in the year 260 from the birth of Christ.

Orontius Finaeus [Oronce Finé], a Dauphinois, royal professor of mathematics at Paris, drew a Chorography of the lands necessary for the understanding of sacred Scripture, which they call The Peregrination of St. Paul, in the year of the Lord 1540.

Orosius, a Presbyter, a Spaniard by nation, a man most learned in secular and in divine letters, a disciple of St. Augustine[2] — to whom also he wrote his book of Histories, and by whom in turn he was sent from Spain to Bethlehem, to Jerome, to learn the question of the origin of the soul — wrote most praiseworthy commentaries on the Song of Songs, in the year of the Lord 420, Honorius and Arcadius reigning [so printed; Arcadius died in 408].

Otfrid [of Weissenburg], a German by nation, a Benedictine monk of the monastery of Weissenburg, a hearer of Rabanus [Maurus] of Mainz — that most excellent archbishop — a poet, rhetor, philosopher, and theologian, in the opinion of all most learned in the times of Louis, Lothair, and Charles, among many noble monuments of his erudition left three books of commentaries on the whole Psalter; likewise, on the four gospels, to Luitbert, bishop of Mainz, a notable work, digested into five books, which he entitled Gratiam Theotistae [so printed; apparently his Gospel-work in the Teutonic tongue] — its beginning is, By the summit of dignity. He flourished under the Emperor Lothair, in the year of the Lord —— [year left blank in the print].

Othmar Nachtgall [Otomarus Luscinius], a German, of Strasbourg by fatherland, a monk and lector of the monastery of Sts. Ulrich and Afra of Augsburg, a man distinguished both by the example of his life and by no common erudition — at the urging of John Schrot, his abbot — wrote, in polished discourse, to Wolfgang Rem, triumvir of Swabia, an Isagogic [Introductory] book to the mystical understanding of the Psalter: in which he arranged all the recondite and more abstruse expressions of the Psalms according to the order of the letters [alphabetically], and explained their spiritual and allegorical senses purely, aptly, and germanely. The book's beginning is, Weaned. Quite fittingly, etc. He flourished under Charles V, Augustus, 1520.

P

Paduanus Crassus [Paduano Grasso], an Apulian by nation, of Barletta by fatherland, of the Franciscan institute, a scholastic theologian, worn down by constant exercise in the Schools of the Scotists, also a declaimer famous for his Italian eloquence, collected — in the manner of a dialogue, out of Augustine and other Fathers — a compendium of the Passages [Loci], in all the epistles of Paul, that apparently conflict, which he entitled The Council of Paul [Concilium Pauli]. He flourished in the year from the birth of Christ our Savior, [1]547 [so printed "547"].

Paganus of Bergamo, of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], wrote a scholastic Postil on the Song of Songs, beginning, The bridegroom and the bride say, Come. It is extant at Venice, in the library of St. John and [St.] Paul [Santi Giovanni e Paolo].

Pantaleon, a deacon of the great Church of God, wrote — in elegant Greek eloquence — on the holy Lights [the Feast of Lights], on the Lord Jesus Christ and on St. John his forerunner, a sermon upon that [text], I ought to be baptized by thee; which begins, Τὴν τῆς πανηγύρεως χάριν [so printed; the 16th-c. Greek type is hard], that is, The grace of this festive assembly.

Pantaenus, a philosopher of the Stoic sect — after his conversion [made] prefect of the ancient Alexandrian school founded by Mark the Evangelist, on account of his outstanding glory both in secular literature and in sacred erudition — by Demetrius [Demetrian], [bishop] of Ale-[xandria →]

[→ p305: catchword "xandriae"]

[1] Authors who wrote apologetic books for Origen. [2] Orosius was a disciple of St. Augustine.

(Rich PDF p. 305 [printed folio 286, verso]. Book IV, letter P — Pantaenus concluded (his mission to India), then Paterius, Paschasius Radbertus, Patrophilus of Scythopolis, the great Paul of Burgos, Paul of Emesa, Paul de Palacio, Paul Ricius, Paulinus of Nola, Peregrino Grimaldi, Peter of Ailly, and the opening of Peter of Sens. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter P, continued:]

...[bishop] of Alexandria, [Pantaenus] was sent into India, that he himself, a Philosopher, might preach Christ among the Brahmans, the Gymnosophists, and the other Philosophers of that nation. Jerome testifies that many commentaries of his upon the holy Scriptures were extant in his own times; among whom [the Indians], when he had preached the Gospel according to Matthew, written in Hebrew letters, he — returning — brought it back with him to Alexandria. He flourished under Septimius Severus and his son Caracalla, in the year of the Lord 200.

Paterius, a hearer of St. Gregory the Pope, the first of that name, a disciple and notary — secundicerius — of the Holy Roman See, a man devoted to the divine Letters, patched together, out of all the works of St. Gregory, three books of Explanations on various Passages of both Testaments, preserving in them the number and order of the books and chapters of sacred Scripture, and citing by name the books of the blessed Gregory, and the chapters of the books, from which he took those explanations; of which, when St. Gregory had read a part already begun, he commended it, and urged Paterius himself to complete the work. Bede mentions this work in the preface of the seventh book on the Song of Songs, saying: I have heard that a certain Paterius, a disciple of the blessed Pope Gregory, gathered together, in order, into one volume, [the things] collected from the whole holy Scripture, whatsoever [Gregory] explained in his works. The beginning of this work, which was lately printed at Rome, runs thus: While [the writings] of the most blessed and Apostolic [men]... He flourished under the Emperors Maurice and Phocas, in the year of the Lord 600.

Paschasius Radbertus, Abbot of Corbie, a Benedictine monk, a theologian and philosopher learned in Greek and Latin, as strong in verse as in prose, wrote, in elegant eloquence, on the Lamentations, 1 book. He flourished under the Emperor Charles the Fat, in the year of the Lord 808 [so printed; the date and the reign of Charles the Fat (881–888) do not agree].

Patrophilus of Scythopolis, a bishop of Palestine, distinguished in the first Council of Nicaea, translated the whole Hebrew Scripture into Greek, in the year of the Lord 300. Gregory, bishop of Laodicea, mentions this translation in the Life of Eusebius of Emesa.

Paul of Burgos [Pablo de Santa María], bishop of Burgos, a Spaniard by nation, from the town of Santa María, a Hebrew by race, of Levitical blood among his own people, a most excellent Rabbi or master; and, after his conversion, first prelate of the church of Cartagena [Carthago Nova], and then of Burgos, of the Spanish churches, and arch-chancellor of the most invincible king of the Spains — discoursed, for the sake of his son Alfonso, Dean of the church of Compostela, upon very many Passages from the several books of divine Scripture, against the commentaries of Nicholas of Lyra, to which he added these disputations of his, endeavoring in them to correct all of Lyra's explanations either as worthy of reproof, or to supply them as incomplete and deficient. He entitled this work Notable Additions to the Postil of Nicholas of Lyra [Additiones notabiles ad Postillam Nicolai de Lyra], of which the beginning is, What would you have me, while living, bestow [on you]... He flourished under the Emperor Sigismund, in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and thirty [1430].

Paul, bishop of Emesa, in the Council of Ephesus delivered a sermon upon that sentence from John's gospel, And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. In which, when he had most brilliantly demonstrated the two natures in one and the same Christ, he took away — to the great joy of all — the schism which was in the council on account of this dogma, and restored peace to the church, in the year of the Lord 436.

Paul de Palacio wrote commentaries on the Gospel of St. Matthew.

Paul Ricius [Paulus Ricius], an Israelite, a most learned man, converted to the Christian faith a few years ago, and made physician to the Emperor Maximilian. He composed many excellent volumes; but among the rest, one book On the six hundred and thirteen [precepts] of the Mosaic sanction, or of the Pentateuch. Likewise, he composed on Psalm 1 one book On Divine Providence. He flourished in the year of the Lord one thousand five hundred [1500].

Paulinus, bishop of Nola in Campania, bound by the highest friendship with Rufinus, Jerome, and Augustine, was a man most devoted to divine Scripture and of singular eloquence. Concerning whom Jerome, in a certain letter, [says]: Paulinus, he says, representing almost a [second] Tully in the study of letter-writing, provokes me by his voice to write, [and] frightens [me] by his eloquence. But he was distinguished also by such virtue of piety and compassion that, when he had paid out everything to the poor, he at last offered himself, ready, into servitude for the redemption of a certain widow's son; and, dismissed by them [the captors] a little afterward on account of the admirable sanctity of his life, he wrote many pious volumes up to his death; among which he also published On the Blessings of the Patriarchs, according to allegory, in Latin and polished discourse, one book — in imitation of Rufinus, presbyter of Aquileia, from whom by letters he had obtained two books of the same subject. He flourished in the year of the Lord 420.

Peregrino Grimaldi [Peregrinus Grimaldus], a Genoese, wrote a Meditation on Psalm 102, to Vittoria [Colonna] of Pescara, a most illustrious woman, which begins, What shall we do, O soul? He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

Peter of Ailly [Petrus Aliacus], bishop of Cambrai, Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, formerly Chancellor of the University of Paris, teacher of John Gerson, a man most skilled in the divine Scriptures and most consummate in Peripatetic Philosophy and in the Astronomical disciplines, elegant in speech and an eloquent declaimer, gathered together, out of Augustine and other Fathers, very many volumes upon the sacred letters; of which I have read:

- One book of Questions on the Hexaemeron, whose beginning is, In the beginning of the book.
- A paraphrastic exposition on the whole Psalter, which begins, The abbreviated word.
- Meditations on the 7 penitential psalms, which are also ascribed to Gerson.
- On Psalm 30, a Meditation, which begins, It frightens me.
- On Psalm 41, a Meditation, whose beginning is, O highest Priest.
- On the Song of Songs, a Meditation, 1 book: Let him kiss me.

He flourished under Sigismund Augustus, distinguished in the Council of Constance, in the year of the Lord 1416.

Peter, Archbishop of Sens [Senonensis], learned in the divine Scriptures by continual study, and of the ancient [→]

[→ p306: catchword "rum le" (vete-rum le...)]

---

(Rich PDF p. 306 [printed folio 287, recto]. Book IV, letter P — a long run of Peters: Peter of Sens (concl.), Peter Bersuire, Peter of Città Nuova, Peter Canisius, Peter the Chanter, Peter Comestor, Peter Chrysologus, Peter of Edessa, Peter Gottfried, Peter of Herentals, and the opening of Peter Izuzqui. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter P, continued:]

...[Peter, Archbishop of Sens] — rich in the reading of the ancients, and nobly learned in secular letters, subtle in wit, and distinguished in eloquence — wrote on all the epistles of Paul, fourteen books. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1200.

Peter Bersuire [Petrus Berthorius], a Gaul by nation, a Poitevin by fatherland, prior of the monastery of St. Éloi at Paris, of the Benedictine order, wrote on the whole Bible four notable volumes:

- The first he entitled The Moral Reductorium of Both Testaments, divided into four books; in which, the historical sense being passed over, he briefly expounded all the chapters of Scripture tropologically, with allegories sometimes interspersed, using a style lowered, open, and most accommodated to explaining the meanings of the mind. The beginning of the work is, When now, through the shadowy wood of nature...
- The second volume is headed The Moral Repertory, or Biblical Dictionary, divided into three large volumes and arranged in the order of the alphabet. Its beginning is, To the reverend father in Christ.
- The third, which is entitled The Moral Inductorium, divided into three books, begins, See that not only...

• The fourth, which is called A Breviary of the Histories of the Bible, thus begins, Considering the history...

He flourished in the times of the Emperor Charles the Fourth and of Pope Innocent VI, in the year of the Lord 1260 [so printed; Charles IV and Innocent VI place him rather c. 1360].

Peter, bishop of Città Nuova [Novae civitatis], an Italian by nation, from the town of Brunaquello, an Augustinian Hermit by profession, a teacher of Scholastic Theology, is said to have published scholastic Lectures on the whole Bible, of which I recall having seen none; but I have heard that his commentaries on the three books of Solomon — that is, on Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs — are still extant in Germany. He flourished under Rupert, king of the Romans, in the year of the Lord 1410.

Peter Canisius, a theologian of the Society of Jesus, of outstanding piety and erudition, vindicated the most blessed Virgin Mother of God, and St. John the Baptist, the Lord's forerunner, from the calumnies of the heretics, and in the first place of the Centuriators [the Magdeburg Centuriators]; and he wrote a Catechism, by an excellent method easy for understanding; and, as we hope, in his extreme old age he will bring forth into the light other excellent works — for he does not cease to deserve well of the Catholic Church, both by preaching and by writing. He now dwells among the Catholic Swiss, in the College of Fribourg of the Society of Jesus. His works have been printed several times, both in France and in Germany. [Later-edition detail — Canisius resided at Fribourg from 1580 until his death in 1597; this notice reflects the later printing, not the 1569 primary.]

Peter the Chanter [Petrus Cantor] of Paris, and afterward — as is reported — bishop of the same city, among other excellent works published by him, wrote a scholastic Gloss on the whole sacrosanct Bible: of which I myself, in the Dominican Library at Lyons, saw the books written below:

• On the Psalter, 1 book — [incipit] John was weeping, because there was none who could open the book.

• On Proverbs, 1 book — The parable of Solomon according to the Hebrew truth.

• On Ecclesiastes, 1 book — Blessed the man whose help is from thee.

• On Wisdom, 1 book — The palace of the highest king.

• On Ezekiel, 1 book — And it came to pass in the thirtieth year.

• On the Acts of the Apostles, 1 book — The earth was melted.

• On the Canonical Epistles, 1 book — My mouth shall speak wisdom.

• On the Apocalypse, 1 book — This alone among the books of the New Testament is called Prophecy.

He flourished in the year of the Lord 1200.

Peter Comestor [Peter the Eater], a presbyter of the church of Troyes, who by the Scholastics was called, by way of excellence, Master of the Scholastic History, reduced all the historical books, both of the Old and of the New Testament, in a continuous series of the Scriptures, briefly into one body; interweaving — for the complete supplement of a finished structure — not only many external histories, handed down in the writing of the most approved authors, but also many apocryphal narratives, received by the sole tradition of the ancients without any writing; and he added likewise, in various places, certain brief annotations from the sayings of the Fathers, which might illustrate obscure passages of the history. His work — which by usage is now entitled Historia Scholastica — thus begins, To the Imperial Majesty, etc. He flourished under Frederick [Barbarossa] the First, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1160. Walter Hunter, an Englishman, abridged his work.

Peter, Archbishop of Ravenna [Peter Chrysologus], from the Forum of Cornelius, which they call Imola, born of distinguished parents, a man excelling as much in the sanctity of life as in every kind of erudition, and — on account of the golden abundance of his wit and eloquence — having obtained the surname

CHRYSOLOGUS [Golden-worded], dictated, upon the various readings of the four Gospels, one hundred and twenty-two sermons: brief indeed, but venerable for the weight of their meaning; pleasant for the brightness of the discourse and the charming little flowers of words; delightful for certain witty little sentences flowing with a certain natural ease; and admirable for certain strong emotions, sometimes expressed in tragic words. He dies at Forum Cornelii [Imola] about the year of the Lord 500, under Anastasius Augustus, when he had already presided over the church of Ravenna about sixty years — greatly distinguished by the two Councils in which he took part with the highest praise.

Peter, a presbyter of the church of Edessa, wrote — in the manner of St. Ephrem, in the Syriac tongue — most elegant Homilies on the several Psalms, kindled with the fervid ardor of the spirit. And the same man sang the whole Psalter in Greek verses of various kinds. He flourished in the year of the Lord 450.

Peter Gottfried [Petrus Gottifredus], a doctor of scholastic Theology, published a scholastic commentary on Proverbs.

Peter of Herentals [Petrus Herentalsius], of Floreffe, a Premonstratensian monk, collected a Catena of explanations on the Psalms from various monuments of the orthodox Fathers, in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and ninety [1490; so printed — the known Peter of Herentals flourished rather in the late 1300s].

Peter Izuzqui [Petrus Izuzquius], from Navarre in Spain, of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], illuminated with a clear exposition one work compiled by himself out of the four Gospels, and [entitled] it The Series of the Sacred Gos-[pel... →]

[→ p307: catchword "Evange"]

---

(Rich PDF p. 307 [printed folio 288, verso]. Book IV, letter P — still the Peters: Peter Izuzqui (concl.), Peter John, Peter Lombard, Peter of Lautern, Peter Nannius, Peter of La Palud, Peter of Perpignan, and Peter Riga's Aurora (with its book-list), then Peter of Rosenheim, Peter Rufus, Peter of Santa Fe, and Peter Scala. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter P, continued:]

...[Peter Izuzqui] entitled [it] The Series of the Sacred Gospel of Jesus Christ, pieced together out of the four Gospels.

Peter John [Petrus Ioannis], of the Order of Minors [Franciscan], a formed Bachelor of the Sorbonne of Paris, wrote Postils on almost the whole of divine Scripture, in the year of the Lord 1400.

Peter Lombard, bishop of Paris, whom all the Schools of the Theologians, by a certain singular excellence of veneration, call the Master of the Sentences, and upon whose compendium of Theology the most learned Theologians of the most illustrious Academies throughout the whole Christian world have elaborated innumerable volumes of disputations — gathered, on all the Psalms of David and on all the epistles of Paul, commentaries most replete with all erudition, out of the opinions of Ambrose, Hilary, Augustine, Cassiodorus, and Remigius (their names being suppressed); in which he also interposed some things of his own, not wholly to be rejected. The commentaries on the Psalms begin, Since it is established that all the Prophets spoke by the revelation of the Holy Spirit. But the commentaries on Paul begin, The beginnings of things are to be inquired into. He flourished under the Emperor Conrad III, in the year of the Lord 1140.

Peter of Lautern [Petrus de Lutra], of the Premonstratensian order, wrote on the Gospel of John. He lived in the year of the Lord 1330.

Peter Nannius [Petrus Nannius], of Alkmaar, professor of the Latin tongue in the Busleyden College [at Louvain], wrote a Paraphrase and Scholia on the Song of Songs, beginning, With the common [reading]...

Likewise, on the Wisdom of Solomon in the same manner, beginning, Often having been asked... He flourished in the year of the Lord 1550.

Peter of La Palud [Petrus Paludanus], Patriarch of Jerusalem, a Gaul by race, a Dominican by institute, most skilled in Canon Law, a theologian sufficiently celebrated among the scholastics, and a foremost defender of the Thomistic doctrine, wrote — according to the threefold sense, literal, moral, and allegorical — a Postil on the whole sacrosanct Bible, of which I myself, in the Dominican Library at Lyons, read only the [books] written below:

- On the whole Bible, one book of most ample Prefaces, which begins, Establishing a Library.
- On Genesis, 1 book — [incipit] This is the book of Adam.
- On Exodus, 1 book — God led them out of Egypt.
- On the Psalter, a huge work, digested into seven volumes, which begins, Be filled with the Holy Spirit.

He flourished in the year of the Lord 1330.

Peter of Perpignan [Petrus Perpinianus], surnamed Rimes, a Catalan by nation, a Carmelite, in whom the erudition of secular Philosophy and of the holy Scriptures was equal, wrote — according to the custom of the school — on the whole Psalter a Lecture not to be despised. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1300.

Peter Riga [Petrus Riga], a presbyter of the church of Rheims, a scholastic poet, celebrated as far as his times allowed, and illustrious for his knowledge of the holy Letters, briefly expounded all the historical books of divine Scripture in verse — partly in elegiacs, and partly in hexameters of the Leonine kind — according to the literal and allegorical sense. He entitled his work AURORA. Its books, and their beginnings, taken from the Dominican Library at Lyons, are these:

- On Genesis, 1 book — Initium mundi quales.
- On Exodus, 1 book — These are the names of the twelve fathers.
- On Leviticus, 1 book — The voice of the Lord [came] to Moses.
- On Numbers, 1 book — God addresses Moses.
- On Deuteronomy, 1 book — These are the words of God.
- On Joshua, 1 book — After Moses, Joshua [came] to the people.
- On Judges, 1 book — The Hebrew sins, he says.
- On Ruth, 1 book — He hastens to Ruth.
- On Kings, 3 books — Monte manens Effra [obscure — so printed].
- On the Song of Songs, 1 book — Origen alone, when he has surpassed all the learned.
- On the fourth [book] of Kings, 1 book — Solomon reigned.
- On Daniel, 1 book — After [he had made] them subject to himself.
- On Tobit, 1 book — You who read the history.
- On Job, 2 books — Librum Iob Mosi quidam [obscure — so printed].
- On Judith, 1 book — To Eustochium and Paula.
- On Esther, 1 book — Up to [the reign] under the Ethiopians.
- On the books of the Maccabees, 1 book — Alexander the Great.
- On the four Gospels, 1 book — He grew illustrious in the [days of] Herod.
- On the Acts of the Apostles, 1 book — In the nineteenth [year] of Tiberius.
- Of Recapitulations, 1 book — Concerning the new law and the old.

He flourished under Frederick I, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1170.

Peter of Rosenheim [Petrus Rosenheimensis], a German, a Benedictine monk in the monastery of Melk in Austria, a scholastic poet, not unacquainted with the divine Letters, wrote to Branda [Castiglioni], Cardinal of the title of St. Clement, a little work concise in elegiac distichs, briefly touching upon all the chapters of both Testaments; to which he gave the title ROSEUM MEMORIALE DIVINORUM [The Rosy Memorial of Divine Things], its beginning being such: Astripotens coelum terram [The star-ruling (God made) heaven (and) earth]. He flourished under the Emperor Sigismund, in the year of the Lord 1440.

Peter Rufus [Petrus Rufus], the thirty-second prior of the Charterhouse, wrote commentaries on the Psalter and on the Song of Songs, in the year of the Lord 1503.

Peter of Santa Fe [Petrus de sancta fide], an Englishman, a Carmelite, wrote commentaries on the Epistles of St. Peter. He lived in the year 1452.

Peter Scala [Petrus Scala], bishop of Verona, of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], published a scholastic Postil on John, which — written by hand on parchment — I saw at Genoa in the Library of the Observant Minorites. Its beginning is, Shall the eagle be lifted up at thy command? etc. [Job 39:27]

[→ p308: catchword "PETRVS"]

---

(Rich PDF p. 308 [printed folio 289, recto]. Book IV, letter P — the last Peters (Peter Sutor, Peter of Tarentaise, Peter of Tripoli, Peter Auriol), then the Philips (Philibert Aresches, Philip of Otterberg, Philip Albert of Neuss, Philip the Chancellor, Philip the presbyter-monk, Philip of Side), Philo of Carpasia, and the opening of the great Philo the Jew. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter P, continued:]

Peter Sutor [Pierre Cousturier] wrote On the Translations of the Bibles, against Erasmus, in the year of the Lord one thousand five hundred and forty.

Peter of Tarentaise [Petrus de Tarantasia], of the Order of Preachers — [Pope] Innocent [V], the holy Supreme Pontiff — wrote commentaries on the Psalms, the Canticles, and on the epistles of St. Paul. Likewise, postils on the 5 books of Moses. He lived in the year of the Lord 1275.

Peter, Abbot of Tripoli [Tripolitanus], as Cassiodorus testifies in the first book On the Institution of the Divine Scriptures, collected from the sayings of the little works of the blessed Augustine commentaries on all the epistles of Paul, in the year 498. They are preserved at Bologna in the Dominican Library, bearing this beginning: First, why after the Gospels, which etc.

Peter Auriol [Petrus Verberius, surnamed Aureolus], Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, bishop of Aix, a Franciscan by profession, doctor and rector of the University of Paris, in which — in the times of Louis [IV] the Bavarian, Emperor — he publicly taught the scholastic kind of Theology; a man most distinguished in the skill of all the sciences, an ecclesiast and preacher, held in the highest admiration among his own on account of his singular erudition in the Scriptures; wrote, in a scholastic style, a brief compendium of all the holy volumes, an articulated BREVIARY OF THE BIBLE, whose beginning is, Come, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord. He flourished under Louis the Bavarian, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1317.

Philibert Aresches [Philibertus Aresches], a doctor of the Augustinian family, a theologian by faculty, and by origin and convent a Parisian, published brief and clear commentaries on the epistle of St. Paul to the Romans; in which, after an exact exposition of the Apostolic mind, he explained with most lucid annotations the definitions of the more difficult words, and the acceptations of their various significations, and their authorities; likewise [passages] from the Old Testament — whether of the Septuagint interpreters or of the Hebrew truth, which the Apostle sometimes follows. In the year of the Lord 1540.

Philip, Abbot of the monastery of Otterberg [Otterburgensis], in the diocese of Worms, of the Cistercian order, a German, whose soul and conduct sanctity and the study of divine things adorned, put forth a noble and notable work of commentaries on the Canticles.

Philip Albert of Neuss [Philippus Alberti de Nussia], a German, a Carmelite, made a Postil on the Canticles, in the year of the Lord 1495.

Philip the Chancellor of Paris [Philippus Cancellarius], and prefect of the great school of the Parisians, a man learned in every respect, and dear to the people in sacred declamations, delivered on the several Psalms two or three learned and eloquent sermons. He flourished in the year of the Lord 140— [so printed; the final digit(s) do not print].

Philip, a presbyter and monk, an excellent hearer of the blessed Jerome, and a very great lover of poverty, published — in a simple discourse, as Gennadius says — commentaries on Job; in place of which Adam of Basel, the printer, in recent years published three books of a mystical exposition of commentaries on Job, to Bishop Nectarius, beginning, At your exhorting, or rather compelling, most blessed father Nectarius. These, again, John Herwagen, printer of Basel, printed among the works of Bede and under the title of BEDE. But Bede himself, in the little book On the reckoning of ounces, claims these very commentaries for their [true] author, [saying]: He disturbs many of the unskilled, he says, because Philip, in the exposition of the blessed Job, describing the tide of the Ocean sea, added that it comes on three-quarters of an hour later at the equinoctial hour, without intermission, whether by day or by night. But this passage is cited by Bede in the explanations on Job which lately, under the name of Philip, the same Herwagen printed, book 3, on the exposition of that sentence, Hast thou entered into the depths of the sea? etc., Job 38. He dies, Marcian and Avitus reigning, in the year of the Lord 430.

Philip of Side [Philippus Sidetes], a presbyter, born at Side in Pamphylia, a kinsman of Troilus the sophist, [who], when he was a deacon, was a hearer of John Chrysostom; and, affecting much the Asiatic kind of speaking, he wrote many things, but especially a magnificent work in defense of the whole divine Scripture, in which he overthrew the seven books published by the Emperor Julian against the sacrosanct Bible. He dies in the year of the Lord 440, leaving behind thirty-six books of Histories.

Philo, bishop of Carpasia [Philo Carpathius], wrote a Greek exposition on the Song of Songs, of which the beginning is, Who [likens thee to] the contests of horses... — which is thought to be [the work] not of one Philo, but of several authors; of whom the commentary which is circulated among the Greeks under the name of Philo is quite a brief little work. There are some who think that it was enriched with many additions by Eustathius and Eusebius, at whose request Philo himself had composed this little commentary. Whether this is so, I would not rashly venture to affirm. Concerning Philo, moreover, Suidas is witness in these words: Φίλων Καρπάθιος ἔγραψεν ὑπόμνημα εἰς ᾆσμα τῶν ᾀσμάτων [so printed; the 16th-c. Greek type is hard] — [that is, Philo of Carpasia wrote a commentary on the Song of Songs]. But concerning those [other Philos] I do not recall having read anything certain, nor at what time he lived. Stephen Salutatus of Pescia made these commentaries into Latin.

Philo the Jew [Philo Judaeus], an Alexandrian by fatherland, of Levitical blood, upon whom alone all the praises of the Christian fathers pour themselves out,[1] was placed by Eusebius and Jerome in the catalog of the Writers of the Church for this reason: that, writing a book On the first church of Mark the Evangelist at Alexandria, he adorned the nation of the Christians with wondrous encomia. This man indeed was, in the skill of Pythagorean, Platonic, and Aristotelian Philosophy, far superior to all the men of his age; and in Greek eloquence he easily held the first place among all — Christians, Jews, and Gentiles alike — of his age. Whence also by the Greeks themselves he was called the Jewish Plato, and there passed among them concerning him into a proverb, ἢ Πλάτων φιλωνίζει, ἢ Φίλων πλατωνίζει — that is, Either Plato philonizes, or Philo platonizes — so great was the resemblance of both in thought and in eloquence. Yet there were not lacking those who ascribed to him an ignorance of his own, that is, of the Hebrew tongue. His works the Romans so greatly admired that they judged them worthy to be placed in their public Library, as certain monuments. He was besides — beyond what can be told — admirable in expounding the divine Scriptures, which he explained most excellently in a threefold sense according to the LXX edition, namely the literal, the moral, and especially the allegorical; in which kind of exposition indeed he so excelled that all the most ancient Doctors of the church imitated him in drawing out mystical allegories, as [the] first [→]

[→ p309: catchword "primum"]

[1] Philo the Jew praised the Christians.

(Rich PDF p. 309 [printed folio 290, verso]. Book IV, letter P — the Philo the Jew entry continues: his allegorical genius; the classes of his Old-Testament works (the Hebrew Names, the Epitome of the Chronicle, the pseudo-Philonic Biblical Antiquities*); then his catalog of Genesis works, laid out chapter by chapter with their Greek incipits. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)*

[Letter P — Philo the Jew, continued:]

...[they imitated him] as the first inventor and craftsman of the sacred allegories;[1] who, that he might set divine wisdom, as it were a queen, more honorably upon her throne, attended by the retinue of her handmaids, took up in his explanations innumerable [things] from the secular sciences — but especially concerning the natural disciplines according to the opinion of the Peripatetics, and concerning supra-mundane speculations according to the mind of Pythagoras and Plato.

He wrote, moreover, upon the Old Testament many and most noble volumes, which Eusebius, in the second [book] of the Ecclesiastical History, digested into three classes; that is: first, into books of continuous explanation; in the second, into books of questions, containing scattered [treatments] of the various chapters of Scripture, in which he both proposes and resolves the things that ought to be inquired into; third, into books of propositions, in which he treats the various sentences of Scripture in separate commentaries. To these classes can be added three other orders of his books, namely: the Grammatical, the Historical (or Paraphrastic), and the Chronographical — which he wrote for the understanding of the words, the histories, and the times contained in the sacred Letters.

From these little works, then, of so diverse a kind, I have found only the [following] written below — of which the greater part pertain to the Pentateuch — under diverse titles, partly translated into Latin by Lelio Tifernate and by Sigismund Gelenius, partly cited here and there by ancient authors. They are these:

- On the interpretation of the Hebrew names which are found in the Old Testament, according to the order of the volumes of holy Scripture, one book, arranged according to the series of the letters [alphabetically]: in which the etymologies, or properties, of all the names are explained in Greek with the utmost fidelity and diligence. To this Origen Adamantius added the interpretations of all the Hebrew words which are had in the New Testament, so that what Philo, as a Jew, had omitted, he himself, as a Christian, might supply. The blessed Jerome translated this book, prefixing a little preface which would attest the author of the work. It begins, Philo, a most eloquent man, etc.

- An Epitome of the Chronicle, that is, A Breviary of the times: in which, the fabulous reckonings of the Gentile historians being omitted, the whole number of the years from the beginning of the world up to Christ is reckoned most exactly and most faithfully, according to the truth of sacred Scripture, and according to the times of the life of the illustrious men of the Old Testament. This [work] John Annius of Viterbo, of the Order of Preachers, most splendidly illustrated with most copious commentaries, gathered out of Berosus, Metasthenes, Manetho, Xenophon, Fabius Pictor, and Cato. The beginning of the work is, From Adam up to the flood.

• The book which is entitled Of Biblical Antiquities, in which the whole Old Testament is run through in the manner of a brief history — but its phrasing everywhere smacking of a Hebraism, and its narrative abounding here and there in Apocryphal matters, indicate that the work is either not Philo's, or, if perchance it be his, that it was written by him not in Greek but in the Hebrew tongue. The beginning of the work is, In the beginning of the world Adam begot three sons. Of which I have seen only a fragment, that is, from the generation of the sons of Adam up to the death of Saul, the first king of the Jews.

On the whole book of Genesis, according to the edition of the LXX interpreters, [he wrote] very many [works] — under diverse titles, most elegant little Greek works, distinguished by the threefold kind of explanation, that is: into Commentaries of continuous exposition; into Commentaries of propositions set forth from Genesis; and into Commentaries of questions and solutions. Of which little works I have found only thirty-five books, for the greater part printed by the typographers, the rest cited partly by various ancient authors, partly by Philo himself. The inscriptions of all these, [their] arguments and beginnings, arranged by us for the first time according to the series of the chapters of Genesis, are these:

• On the first chapter of Genesis, περὶ τῆς κοσμοποιίας — that is, On the Fabric of the World, or On that generation of the world which Moses describes, one book: in which the words of the whole first chapter are explained sublimely and copiously, with a literal and allegorical explanation. The book begins, τῶν ἄλλων νομοθετῶν — [The other lawgivers...][2]

• On Genesis ch. 2, On the allegories of the sacred Law after the work of the six days, book one: in which all the things narrated from the beginning of the second chapter are expounded allegorically, up to those words of the same chapter, In whatever hour you shall eat, you shall die the death. The book's beginning is, So the heavens were finished, etc.

• On Genesis ch. 3, On the allegories of the sacred Law, book 2: containing the allegorical exposition of those words, And Adam hid himself, up to those, Thou art earth, and unto earth shalt thou return. The book's opening is, Ἄδυμα εἰσηγέναι [so printed; corrupt] — [that is,] A doctrine is introduced.

• On Genesis ch. 3, On the Cherubim and the flaming sword, and on Cain, who was the first born of man, one book: in which the words of Moses are narrated in a threefold sense, from that place, And the Lord drove Adam out of Paradise, up to that place in chapter 4, I have gotten a man through God. The book has this beginning: καὶ ἐξέβαλε τὸν Ἀδάμ — that is, And the Lord drove out Adam.

• On Genesis ch. 4, On the sacrifices of Abel and Cain, one book: in which that place is explained, And again she bore his brother Abel, up to that place of the same chapter, Under thee shall be thy appetite, etc. The book's beginning is, καὶ προσέθηκε τεκεῖν τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ Ἀβέλ — that is, And she went on to bear his brother Abel.

• On Genesis ch. 5 [so printed; the content is Genesis 4], On [the fact] that the worse is wont to lie in wait for the better, one book, explaining the remainder of this chapter from that sentence, And Cain said, Let us go forth abroad, up to that, Cain went out from the face of the Lord. The book so begins: καὶ εἶπε Κάϊν πρὸς Ἀβέλ — And Cain said to Abel.

• On Genesis ch. 5, On the succession of the human race, one book, containing the narration of the genealogy, or posterity, of Adam. The book begins, Ἀδὰμ ἐγένετο — Adam begot three sons.

• On Genesis chapter 6, On the Giants, one book, expounding those words at the beginning of the chapter, And when men had begun to multiply, up to those, After the sons of God went in to the daughters of men. The book begins, καὶ ἐγένετο — And it came to pass, etc. One must inquire, I think, why after, etc.

[→ p310 (next batch): catchword "In"]

[1] Philo was the supreme craftsman of Allegories. [2] Empedocles wrote a book On the Making of the World [Cosmopoeia], of whom Aristotle makes mention in the Metaphysics.

(Rich PDF p. 310 [printed folio 291, recto]. Book IV, letter P — the Philo the Jew entry continues: his catalog of works on Genesis, chapter by chapter (with their Greek incipits), then the Questions and Solutions, the further attested Genesis works, and the sum of his thirty-five Genesis books. The 16th-c. Greek type is hard throughout — rendered as best readable and flagged where corrupt. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter P — Philo the Jew, continued:]

• On Genesis ch. 6, That God is unchangeable, one book: in which those words are explained, After the sons of God went in, etc., and, It repents me that I made man, up to those, The end of all flesh is come before me. The book so begins, καὶ μετ᾽ ἐκεῖνο φησίν — And after this he says.

• On Genesis ch. 9, On Agriculture, one book, expounding that proposition, And Noah, a husbandman, began to till the earth; in which he treats of the spiritual cultivation of the soul through the virtues. Its beginning is, καὶ ἤρξατο Νῶε — And Noah began.

• On Genesis ch. 9, On the planting of Noah, one book, upon that saying, Noah planted a vineyard. [Incipit] ἐν τῷ πρώτῳ βιβλίῳ — In the first book indeed.

• On Genesis ch. 9, On the drunkenness of Noah, one book, upon that saying, And Noah, drinking wine, became drunk; its beginning is, ἐν τοῖς ἄλλοις φιλοσόφοις εἰρημένα περὶ μέθης — The things said by other philosophers concerning drunkenness; in which he narrates what Noah's drunkenness mystically signifies.

• On Genesis ch. 9, On the sobering of Noah, one book, upon that saying, But Noah, awaking from the wine, etc.; which begins, Τὰ περὶ μέθης — After those things which [were said] concerning drunkenness.

• On Genesis ch. 11, On the confusion of tongues, one book, upon that [text], And the earth was of one lip [language], etc.; which begins, περὶ μὲν δὴ τούτων ἀρκέσει τὰ εἰρημένα — Concerning these things, let what has been said suffice.

• On Genesis ch. 12, On the migration of Abraham, one book, upon that [text], The Lord said to Abraham, Go forth from thy land, up to that, And he took Sara his wife. Its beginning is, καὶ [εἶπε κύριος] [so printed, corrupt] — And the Lord said.

• On Genesis ch. 12, On Abraham, or On the life of the wise man made perfect through doctrine, or On the unwritten laws, one book: in which Philo expounds, historically and mystically, the life of Abraham and his several deeds, which are related from the beginning of chapter 12 up to chapter 23; showing that Moses, in Abraham, painted — in colors somehow living — the image and exemplar and law of the theoretical [contemplative] man, that is, of the man made wise through contemplation.[1] The book begins, τῶν ἱερῶν νόμων ἐν πέντε βιβλίοις — that is, The five volumes of the sacred law.

• On Genesis ch. 15, On rewards, one book, upon that [text], I am thy reward exceeding great, which I have not seen: yet it is cited by Philo in the preface of the book On the heir of divine things.

• On Genesis ch. 15, On the heir of divine things, or Who is the heir of divine things, one book: in which the whole fifteenth chapter is explained in a series of continuous exposition. The book's beginning is, ἐν τῇ πρὸ ταύτης βίβλῳ — In the book immediately preceding.

• On Genesis ch. 16, On the union to be sought for the sake of acquiring erudition, one book, upon that [text], Now Sara, [Abraham's] wife, had not borne children, up to that, Sara therefore afflicting her. In which book he shows allegorically that our soul is not fit to receive the offspring of good works from divine wisdom, unless it first unites with wisdom's handmaid — that is, with secular literature — by the example of Abraham, who could not receive offspring from Sara until after he had lain with Hagar, the Egyptian handmaid.[2] The book begins, Σάρρα ἦν γυνὴ Ἀβραάμ — Now Sara was the wife of Abraham.

• On Genesis ch. 16, On fugitives, one book, in which the words of Scripture are expounded from that place, Sara therefore afflicting her, up to the end of the same chapter. Its beginning is, καὶ ἐκάκωσεν αὐτὴν Σάρρα — And Sara afflicted her.

• On Genesis 17, On circumcision, one book, upon that [text], [Every male among you] shall be circumcised, etc.; in which it is delivered that circumcision was instituted by God for six causes — namely four natural [physical] and two mystical.[3] [Incipit] The heads of the laws, etc.

• On Genesis ch. 28, On dreams, one book — to which Philo testifies that he had also sent ahead another book on dreams, thus writing in the preface: In the earlier treatise we spoke of the first kind of dreams divinely sent, when the heavenly Godhead of its own accord sends visions through sleep; we shall now speak of the latter kind, when our mind, once moved, seems by itself to divine and foretell what times to come may bring. But in this book he explains the mystical signification of that famous dream of Jacob concerning the heavenly ladder, described in chapter 28. Jerome and Sophronius assert that Philo wrote five books On dreams; but of these I have seen none except this one, whose beginning is, ἡ μὲν οὖν πρὸ ταύτης γραφή — In the treatise immediately preceding.

• On Genesis chapter 35, On the change of names, or Why the names of certain [persons] were changed in the Scriptures, one book, upon that [text], Thou shalt no more be called Jacob, but Israel. Which book, cited by Jerome and Sophronius, I have not yet seen.

• On Genesis ch. 37, On the life of the civil [political] man, or On Joseph, one book: in which the life and deeds of Joseph are narrated, and are expounded according to the things written from chapter 37 to the end of the book; and it is shown, by the example of Joseph, what sort [of man] the truly Political man is, and fit for the helm of the commonwealth.[4] The book begins, Τρεῖς μέν εἰσιν ἰδέαι — There are indeed three kinds.

Besides these he also wrote three books of Questions and Solutions on the whole volume of Genesis, which I have not yet seen; but I have read, under the name of Philo the Jew, a fragment of Questions and Solutions on Genesis — which indeed the very doctrine and phrasing prove to be [the work] of a Jewish man, yet not of Philo. For, besides that the name of Philo is cited more than once in the work itself, and his opinion is censured, there are also condemned in it, by name, the Apollinarist heretics, because they denied that a human soul was in Christ. Although I would not deny that this could have happened by the fault of an unskilled copyist, who inserted into the author's text those [remarks] which perhaps some studious person had noted, outside the text of the letter, in the margin of the book. But in this fragment are expounded allegorically almost the whole of chapters 25 and 27 of Genesis. Its beginning is, Why was Isaac forty years old when he had married?

Beyond the aforesaid books, Eusebius, Jerome, and Sophronius testify that Philo wrote on Genesis: On the nature and discovery of things, one book; On the division of equal and unequal things, one book; On covenants, two books. And this is the sum of the thirty-five books of Philo on Genesis; from which Basil and Ambrose borrowed much in their commentaries on Genesis, as we shall note below. He is said also to have composed many other excellent works on Genesis, which [→]

[→ p311: catchword "quae"]

[1] Abraham [is] the exemplar of the contemplative man. [2] What Abraham's union with Sara signifies allegorically. [3] The six causes of circumcision. [4] Joseph [is] the exemplar of the political man.

(Rich PDF p. 311 [printed folio 292, verso]. Book IV, letter P — the Philo the Jew entry concludes (his works on Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy; his floruit under Caligula–Claudius–Nero), then Photius, Pierius, Placido of Parma, Polychronius of Apamea, Pontius Carbonell, two "Precious Catenae," and the opening of Primasius. The 16th-c. Greek type is hard throughout — rendered as best readable and flagged where corrupt. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter P — Philo the Jew, continued:]

...[many other excellent works on Genesis] which are wholly hidden from me. Wolfgang Lazius, a Viennese, historian of the Imperial Majesty, says that there are extant in his own Library certain commentaries of Philo on Genesis and on Exodus, with a preface of St. Jerome, translated by an uncertain translator. He wrote after these:

On Exodus, 13 books, whose inscriptions and beginnings are these:

• Of Questions and Solutions on Exodus, five books.

• On the life of Moses, or A universal history of a paraphrase [of that] which is described in Exodus and the three following books, four books, whose beginning is, Μωσέως τοῦ κατά μέν τινας νομοθέτου — that is, Of Moses, as some think, the lawgiver.

• On Exodus ch. 20, On the Decalogue, which is the summary of the whole law, one book. [Incipit] Βίος τῶν κατὰ Μωσέα σοφῶν — that is, The life of the wise men whom Moses [describes].

• On Exodus ch. 20, On the special laws, which are referred to two precepts of the Decalogue — namely the sixth, against the lustful, and the seventh, against murderers — one book. [Incipit] ἦν ποτὲ χρόνος — There was once a time.

• On Exodus ch. 20, On the Judge and witnesses, which pertains to the penultimate precept of the Decalogue, one book. [Incipit] It pleases some.

• On Exodus ch. 25, περὶ τῆς σκηνῆς — that is, On the Tabernacle, one book.

On Leviticus, On monarchy, one book — which is entitled THE SECOND — treating of the conditions and offices of the priests, enumerated in Leviticus. Its beginning is, Τὸ μὲν ἀνωτάτω — The highest indeed.

• On the rewards and honors of the priests, described in Leviticus, one book. [Incipit] Τοῖς ἱερεῦσιν — that is, To the priests, etc.

• On the Victims, or On the animals fit for sacrifice, and on the kinds of victims which are related in Leviticus, one book. [Incipit] τῶν ἐν ταῖς ἱερουργίαις ζώων — [On] the animals which [are used] in the sacrifices.

• On those offering the victims, or what sort the offerers of victims ought to be, one book. [Incipit] Βούλεται τὸν ἄγοντα τὰς θυσίας — that is, [He] wishes that the one bringing the sacrifices [should be...].

On Deuteronomy, four books of propositions expounded, whose inscriptions and beginnings are these:

• On Deuteronomy 17, upon that [text], Thou shalt not be able to make a man of another nation king: one book, explaining what conditions the one to be chosen as ruler requires. Its beginning is, ἔνιοί τὰς κληρωτὰς εἰσηγήσαντο ἀρχάς — [Some have introduced offices [assigned] by lot.]

• On Deuteronomy 20 and 22, On fortitude, one book: in which he abridged and expounded the precepts of those setting out to war, which are had in Deuteronomy 20, and the precepts pertaining to dress — both men's and women's — from chapter 22 of Deuteronomy. The beginning of the work is, On justice, and on these things, etc.; in whose preface he testifies that he wrote two other books — one On Justice, the other On Modesty.

• On Deuteronomy 23, one book, On the harlot's wage not to be received into the sanctuary, upon that [text], Thou shalt not offer the wage of a prostitute. Which begins, Πάνυ καλῶς ἐν ταῖς ἱεραῖς τοῦ νόμου — Very beautifully, in the sacred [books] of the law.

• On Deuteronomy 28, one book. Περὶ εὐλογιῶν καὶ ἐπιτιμιῶν — that is, On the rewards, penalties, and curses which God sets before those who observe or neglect the laws [both human and divine]. Its beginning is, τοῦ προφήτου Μωϋσέως λογίων — Of the sayings of Moses the Prophet.

He is also said to have written many other things on Moses, which have not come to my hands. He flourished under the Emperor Caius [Caligula] — to whom he was sent as ambassador of his nation — and under the Emperors Claudius and Nero, up to the fiftieth year of our salvation.

Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople, diligent in gathering the opinions of the Fathers, excerpted from various commentaries of authors most praiseworthy scholia on all the Epistles of Paul: a great part of which is read in the Catena of expositions of Oecumenius. He flourished under Michael [III], with his mother Theodora, in the year of the Lord 810 [so printed; Photius flourished rather c. 858–886].

Pierius, a presbyter of the Church of Alexandria, under the Princes Caius [so printed; = Carus] and Diocletian, at the time when Theonas the Bishop governed that same church, most flourishingly taught the people, and came to such elegance of discourse and of diverse treatises that he was called Origen the Younger. It is established that he [lived] wonderfully in an ascetic manner [ἀσκητικῶς], a lover of voluntary poverty, most learned in the dialectic and rhetorical art; and that after the persecution he spent all the time of his life at Rome. He left a very long treatise on the Prophet Hosea, which he poured out upon the exordium of this Prophet, on the day of the vigils of the Lord's Passion, in an extempore and eloquent discourse. Thus Jerome, in the Catalog and in the preface to Hosea. He also wrote most copious commentaries on the first Epistle to the Corinthians, of which Jerome makes mention in the letter to Pammachius, which begins, Of Christian modesty. He flourished under the Emperor Diocletian, in the year of the Lord 290.

Placido of Parma [Placidus Parmensis], of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], a theologian celebrated in our times, left an explanation on all the Psalms of David — notable for its erudition, elegance, and brevity — which the Venetian Academy lately printed with its own types, dedicated to Henry, king of the French [Henri II]. He dies in the year of the Lord 1558.

Polychronius, bishop of Apamea, brother of Theodore, bishop of Mopsuestia, and a hearer of Diodore, bishop of Tarsus, teaching excellently both by life and by word, wrote Greek commentaries on Job and on Ezekiel: very many fragments of which are had in the Greek Catena of explanations on Job; and in the volume of John Damascene against the destroyers of images [the iconoclasts] some [passages] are cited. He flourished in the year of the Lord 400.

Pontius Carbonell [Pontius Carbonellus], of the Order of Minors [Franciscan], teacher of St. Louis, king of France, wrote a Postil on both Testaments.

A Precious Catena, upon forty Psalms, following [each other] in number and order, gathered from the Orthodox fathers in the Latin tongue, and not yet printed, is had at Venice in the most noble Academy of the Venetians.

A Precious Greek Catena on all the Prophets, both major and minor, gathered from the explanations of the most excellent Fathers, is extant, written by hand, in the renowned Academy of the Venetians — which we hope will shortly come forth into the light.

Primasius, bishop of Utica in Africa, a disciple (as is believed) of St. Augustine, gathered, on all the epistles of Paul, from [the works] of Ambrose, Je-[rome →]

[→ p312: catchword "ronymi"]

---

(Rich PDF p. 312 [printed folio 293, recto]. Book IV, letter P — Primasius concluded, then Proba Falconia (the Virgilian cento), Proclus of Constantinople, Procopius of Gaza, Prosper of Aquitaine, and Michael Psellus. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter P, continued:]

...[Primasius] gathered, on all the epistles of Paul, from the monuments of Jerome, Augustine, and the other Fathers, a Collectanea; in which he inveighs so against the Pelagians, in defense of grace, that at times he seems to prejudge the liberty of our will and our merits. Their beginning is, First we must understand. He also wrote to Castorius commentaries on the Apocalypse, of a mystical exposition, gathered both from Augustine's explanations and from the commentaries of Tyconius the African — from which, separating, as it were, gems from dung, he culled only those things which were to be chosen, omitting those which were not consonant with sound doctrine. The work begins, Thou, illustrious man. He flourished in the year of the Lord 440.

Proba Falconia, an illustrious woman, wife of Adelphius the Roman proconsul, a matron of rare and elegant genius, most highly learned in Greek and Latin, most devoted to the divine letters, and, as it were, a second Latin Sappho of the Christians, first of all [women] devised to describe in verse the various Passages of both Testaments out of the verses of Virgil Maro, whom she held whole in her memory. Having therefore excerpted, here and there from Virgil's poem, now whole verses, now hemistichs and portions of hemistichs, she gathered the intended work — like a cento sewn together from many precious rags and shreds, the law of the hexameter being preserved — and entitled it THE VIRGILIAN CENTOS [Virgiliocentonas]. Its beginning is:

> Iandudum temerasse duces pia foedera pacis — That the leaders had long since violated the pious covenants of peace.

Fulgosio [Battista Fregoso], in his Collectanea, relates that the same woman composed this very thing in Homeric verses. There are some who think that by the works of this woman the city of Rome first came into the power of the Goths, in the year 1164 from its founding. For, when Alaric, King of the Goths, had already for two years been besieging the city, and the Roman populace, without any hope of aid, was falling everywhere by famine and by disease after the manner of cattle, Proba, pitying the common calamity, opened a gate to the Goths — judging it more tolerable to endure the rule of barbarians than that the whole city should perish by famine and plague. She flourished under Honorius and Theodosius the Younger, about the year of the Lord 430.

Proclus, after Maximian [bishop] of Constantinople, was from his earliest age a Lector, and devoted himself to contemplative study; but when he had grown to manhood, he was frequently present with John Chrysostom, Bishop of Constantinople, and had been the amanuensis of his books; by whom he was ordained deacon and presbyter, then [became] Bishop of Cyzicus, afterward of Constantinople, and was most dear to Theodosius the Younger. When the Scythians, under their leader Rugas [Rua], had taken up arms against the Roman empire, he published, on the Prophecy of Ezekiel chapter 39, Son of man, prophesy against Gog and Magog, a most brilliant oration; in which, adapting the prophecy to the occasion of the present war, he foretold that the penalties predicted by Ezekiel were threatening the Barbarians — which prediction God immediately confirmed by fire sent down from heaven, the chief of the Barbarians being consumed by the conflagration. He also wrote, upon that [text] of Isaiah 9, A child is born to us, one sermon, whose beginning is, Τὸ παιδίον ἐγεννήθη ἡμῖν — [A child is born to us] — which Theodorus the Monk cites in the book That the Father always begets. He flourished under Theodosius the Younger, in the year of the Lord 400.

Procopius of Gaza [Procopius Gazaeus], a sophist, a Christian, a man liberally educated and eloquent in Greek speech, composed first, in the Greek tongue, Narrative-Expositions on the Octateuch, which he gathered with great diligence from the Orthodox fathers and from other Greek authors, following various monuments and homilies of pious men. But since he had set forth in that work the opinions of the several [authors], with the words not even changed, caring little whether they disagreed among themselves or agreed, and since his volume had thence grown to an immense size, he resolved to reduce the size of the volume a little; and, that this might be done more conveniently, he determined to say once [only] those things in which the authors unanimously agreed, but wherever they differed, in order that this might be made known to the reader, he explained these in very few words — wishing to reduce the interpretations of all into the consonance of a perfect body, from which, as from a single fountain, the Reader might draw the explanations of all, as if one man, and he alone, were speaking. But, that everything might be more clear and perspicuous, he sometimes added something of his own as well. He is fuller on Genesis and Exodus, more compressed on the six following books, in which he gathered, as it were, certain annotations. He expounds according to the fourfold understanding of the divine Scripture, [using] not only the editions of the Seventy interpreters, of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, and the codices of the Samaritans and the Jews, but also the version of St. Jerome — whom he often cites by name — turned by Sophronius from Latin into Greek. The beginning of the work is: Before, indeed, with God kindly favoring the undertaking, etc. He wrote, in the same order and with the same care, a commentary on Isaiah, which — not yet turned into Latin — is preserved in the Marcian Library of the Venetians. He flourished, as far as we could reach by conjecture, under the Emperor Anastasius, in the year of the Lord 500.

Prosper [of Aquitaine], bishop of Reggio of Flaminia in Italy, an Aquitanian by nation, formerly a notary of Pope Leo the First, a man of keen wit, of compressed, sinewy, and elegant diction, having — together with sanctity of life — great erudition in divine and human matters, wrote, on the last fifty Psalms (that is, from the hundredth Psalm up to the last) very brief commentaries according to the literal and the spiritual sense, comprised in a terse and pointed kind of exposition, whose beginning is, Mercy and judgment, etc. This Psalm, from the first verse, etc. Likewise, three books On the promises and predictions of God, in which he elucidated all the prophecies and promises concerning Christ and the Church expressed in the sacred letters. The book's opening is, The whole rationale of faith [Omnis fidei ratio]. He flourished under Leo the Great, Augustus, in the year of the Lord 460.

Psellus [Michael Psellus], a Greek author, wrote on the Song of Songs, to Stephephorus, brief and clear commentaries, whose beginning is, Since your mind, O Stephephorus, [is] eager to learn.

[→ p313: catchword "RABA" (Rabanus)]

---

(Rich PDF p. 313 [printed folio 294, verso]. Book IV — letter R opens with Rabanus Maurus (his 172 books of commentaries; a work-list), then Radulph of Flavigny, Rainuldus of Piperno, Rainerius Snoy of Gouda, Remigius of Auxerre, and Remigio de' Nannini. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

R

Rabanus Magnentius Maurus [Hrabanus Maurus], the sixth Archbishop of Mainz, a German by nation, from the city of Fulda in Buchonia, formerly the fourth Abbot of the monastery of Fulda, of the Order of St. Benedict, a hearer of Albinus the Englishman [Alcuin], a man most consummate in the knowledge of all the disciplines — Rhetor, Poet, astronomer, Philosopher, and Theologian, to whom Germany had no equal in that age. He, I say, offended by the wickedness of his monks, who condemned him because — too intent on the studies of the sacred letters — he neglected temporal things, deserted the ungrateful ones and betook himself to Louis Augustus, and remained with him some months, the monks earnestly recalling him (of their deed they had already repented); but they did not prevail, God so willing, who a little afterward, to their confusion, took him up to the Archbishopric of Mainz. He, then, while he was still in his monastery, at the urging of Freculf, Bishop of Lisieux, and of the Augusti Louis and Lothair, composed on all the divine Scriptures, according to the sense of the letter and the spiritual understanding, 172 books of commentaries; which he gathered from all the Latin Fathers, in a continuous series from Jerome down to Bede, everywhere preserving their sayings and their meanings; and in those places where he did not find an exposition of the Fathers, he used his own explanations, noting at the head of the pages the names both of himself and of the other interpreters, whose opinions he had fitted together in the codices, so that the reader might know both what he had from the Fathers and what from him, and by what judgment each thing was to be read. Besides these, he also gathered, on the whole divine Scripture, a Dictionary of mystical significations, most useful for the spiritual senses of the holy volumes. Of these volumes I have read only the [following] written below, printed, their beginnings for the greater part different from those which Trithemius noted in his catalog:

- On Genesis, to Freculf, Bishop of Lisieux, 4 books — [incipit] The endeavor of the men of old.
- On Exodus, to the same, 4 books — Among the other scriptures.
- On Numbers, to the same, 4 books — The book of Numbers.
- On Deuteronomy, to the same, 4 books — These things, therefore, having been run through.
- On Ecclesiasticus, to Otgar the Archbishop, 10 books — Knowing [your] benevolence.
- On Jeremiah, to the Emperor Lothair, 18 books — After the little commentaries.
- On Lamentations, to the same, 3 books — The last part of Jeremiah.

...which the typographers, inserted among the Hieronymian works and falsely inscribed with the title of JEROME, sell. The beginnings of his other lucubrations, not yet seen by us, you have in Trithemius. He flourished in the year of the Lord 855.

Radulph [Ralph of Flavigny], a Benedictine monk of the monastery of Flavigny — or, as others say, of Fulda in Germany — a man most distinguished in his time in the more polished letters, and, in expounding the divine Scriptures, having obtained a divine genius, published twenty books of commentaries on Leviticus; in which he explained all the mysteries of this book so eloquently, piously, and learnedly, both according to the historical and according to the spiritual sense, that in comparison with him the other expositors of the same book seem hardly to have expounded [it] at all. The opening of the work is, When once, among friends, a discourse chanced [to arise] concerning the contentions of the Jews. He also wrote fourteen books on all the epistles of Paul. He flourished in the year of the Lord 910 [so printed; Radulph of Flavigny flourished rather in the 12th century].

Rainuldus of Piperno [Reginald of Piperno], of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], gathered from the explanations of St. Thomas Aquinas a scholastic Lecture on the Gospel of John, beginning, I saw the Lord. It is extant, written by hand, in the Dominican Library at Bologna.

Rainerius Snoy of Gouda [Rainerius Snoygoudanus], a physician, gathered from Jerome, Arnobius, Augustine, Cassiodorus, and other ancient fathers a Paraphrase — or rather Scholia — on all the Psalms of David; which he so explained that not even a single word was omitted by him, with little glosses interposed within the text, so welded together that, unless the words of the Psalm were distinguished by different type-characters, these could not be told apart from those; adding also, at the end of the several Psalms, some pious little prayers, drawn from the very bowels of the preceding Psalm. The work begins, The sacrosanct Psalter. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1550.

Remigius of Auxerre [Antisiodorensis], a bishop [so printed; Remigius of Auxerre was a monk, not a bishop], a Benedictine monk, most learned in divine and human letters, illustrious in doctrine and sanctity, wrote a succinct narrative-exposition on all the Psalms; in which he compressed most briefly whatever Ambrose, Augustine, and Cassiodorus wrote on the Psalms, with additions also, and thoughts interspersed of his own, not wholly to be despised. The work begins, It must be said what Prophecy is. He wrote likewise, with similar industry, five books on the Pentateuch.

- On the Song of Songs, one book — [incipit] Solomon inspired.
- On the 12 Prophets, twelve books.
- On Matthew, one book.

• On all the epistles of Paul, 14 books.

He flourished under Charles the Bald, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 880.

Remigio de' Nannini [Remigius de Nanninis], a Florentine, of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], a professor of Theology, a poet of elegant genius and skilled in histories, wrote on the sacred Books of both Testaments Annotations not to be regretted; in which he embraced most diligently the history of illustrious men, and the description of the animals, plants, stones, mountains, rivers, cities, towns, and other such things which the divine Scripture mentions here and there. He also gathered a volume of Scholia on the encyclical readings of the Epistles and Gospels [the lectionary], published in the Italian tongue, and rendered the Psalms of David into Tuscan verses. He lives up to the present year of our salvation 1566, being 44 years old.

[→ p314: catchword "RÆTHI"]

---

(Rich PDF p. 314 [printed folio 295, recto]. Book IV, letter R — Reticius of Autun, Richard of Cluny, Richard of Exeter, Richard Lavenham, Richard Middleton, the long Richard of St. Victor (with a work-list), Richard Rolle of Hampole, Rhodon the Asian, and the opening of Rudolph Agricola. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter R, continued:]

Rhaethicius [Reticius], bishop of Autun of the Aedui, reputed a Churchman of most celebrated fame in Gaul, was sent to Rome by the Emperor Constantine, under Pope Sylvester, on account of the affair of the Montenses [the Donatists]; where he had earlier taken part, under Pope Miltiades, together with those who had condemned Donatus, the author of the schism, and had absolved Caecilian, Bishop of the Church of Carthage. He published commentaries on the Song of Songs; of whom Jerome, writing to Marcella, approves the eloquence, raised on the Gallic buskin [cothurnus], but disapproves the erudition and the judgment. He lived in the year of the Lord 320.

Richard, a Monk of Cluny, learned and pious, composed a book, entitled τῶν ἀντικειμένων — that is, Of Contraries, or Of things set in opposition — comprising questions from both Testaments that seem to conflict, and their clear solutions, explained by question and answer in a terse brevity; whose beginning is, Why in Genesis seven, etc. Alfonso [de Castro] of Zamora, in book 14 against heresies, attributes this work to Salvian, bishop of Marseilles. He flourished under Frederick the First, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1160.

Richard of Exeter, an Englishman, wrote a Postil on the Psalms, in the year of the Lord one thousand three hundred and thirty [1330].

Richard Lavenham, a Carmelite, an Englishman, wrote a Scholastic Postil on Isaiah, in the year of the Lord one thousand three hundred and eighty-one [1381].

Richard Middleton [Mediavilla], a Scot, of the Order of Minors [Franciscan], most highly learned in the divine Scriptures, in Pontifical [canon] law, and in secular doctrines, wrote, in scholastic discourse, on the four Gospels, four books — one on each — in the year of the Lord 1290.

Richard, a monk and Prior of the monastery of St. Victor at Paris [Richard of St. Victor], of the Order of Augustinian Canons, a man conspicuous for the honesty of his life and for the doctrine of his erudition, subtle in wit, and in eloquence walking a middle path between the sharpness of Augustine and the sweetness of Bernard, wrote many little works on the divine Scriptures of the mystical sense, in which he instructs the understanding, kindles the affection, and advances and draws forth the reader's zeal to greater things. Of their number are:

• An Epitome of the whole divine Scripture, one book.

• On Genesis ch. 14, On Melchizedek, mystically, one book.

• On Genesis ch. 15, On the sacrifice of Abraham, mystically, 1 book.

• On Genesis ch. 49, On the blessings of the Patriarchs, 1 book.

• On Exodus 26, On the tabernacle of the covenant, two books — one according to the letter, the other mystically.

• On the 3rd book of Kings, from ch. 6, On the Temple of Solomon, according to the letter, one book.

• On the same book, a Chronography, to St. Bernard, one book — most necessary for the understanding of the things written from chapter 12 of the 3rd [book] of Kings up to the end of the fourth [book] of Kings; in which is treated On the division of the kingdom of Judah and Israel, and On the concord of the times of the kings co-reigning over Judah and over Israel. And there are in it two tables, of which the first represents those things which make and bring about the contrariety of the times of the kings co-reigning over Judah and over Israel; but the second shows the concord of the same co-reigning kings over Judah and Israel. The book begins, In these things which [are] in the book of Kings.

• On the Song of Songs, commentaries of an interpolated explanation, which expound spiritually the various sentences of the same book here and there. At the beginning of the work is prefixed the preface of the fourth book of the Dialogues of St. Gregory, in these words, After [I had spoken] of the joys of paradise.

• On that [text] of Isaiah 7, Behold, a virgin shall conceive, two books, entitled On Emmanuel; in which, to refute the perfidy of the Jews, he most strongly shows that the aforesaid prophecy cannot be understood except of the Virgin Mary. The work begins, Behold, a virgin.

• On the description of the temple of Ezekiel, a literal explanation being applied, in which — with most fitting pictures and geometrical demonstrations — he expressed most diligently the several parts of the temple. The beginning of the work is, About to speak of the building of Ezekiel.

• On the whole of Daniel, one book of mystical explanation, cited by Trithemius; which, when I had long sought and not found, I at last found a great part of in the compendium of Allegories of Godfrey Tilmann on the book of Daniel.

• One book of explanation of many difficult Passages in all the epistles of Paul, which begins, If those things which [are said] of the law.

• On the Apocalypse, a notable work according to the seven visions which John saw, divided into seven books; whose beginning is, Receive, brother.

He flourished under Conrad III, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1140.

Richard of Hampole [Richard Rolle], an Anglo-Saxon, a hermit, a man of sincere piety and erudition, wrote on the Psalter a compendious and lucid exposition, beginning, Great spiritual joy. Likewise, on the lections which are read in the suffrages [Office] of the dead, from the seventh and tenth chapters of Job, two books, of which he gathered the latter from the sayings of St. Gregory. The beginning of the work is, My soul is weary. He also wrote, on the twentieth Psalm, a particular little book, beginning, When Christ. And on the Lamentations of Jeremiah, one book, opening, The Lamentations, as Jerome says.

Rhodon the Asian [Asianus], a hearer and disciple of Tatian in the holy Scriptures, composed in the Greek tongue, on the first chapter of Genesis — which by the Greeks is called HEXAEMERON — most elegant treatises, or homilies to the people; in which he most strongly refuted especially the heresy of Apelles the Marcionite, who asserted that the whole world was created by an evil God. He flourished in the times of the Emperors Commodus and Severus, in the year of the Lord 200.

Rudolph Agricola [Rodolphus Agricola], a Frisian, the chief of all the most learned men of his time, a Philosopher, Rhetor, and most noble poet, [most learned in] Greek, [→]

[→ p315: catchword "Graecae"]

*(Rich PDF p. 315 [printed folio 296, verso]. Book IV, letter R — Rudolph Agricola (concl.), Rudolph Bayne, Rudolph Lange, Rufinus of Aquileia, Rupert the Gaul, Rupert Goullet, Rupert Holcot, Robert Grosseteste, Rupert of Limburg, Rupert Rose, Rupert the Englishman, and the great Rupert of Deutz (*On the Holy Trinity and Its Works, 42 books — the Index begins). Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter R, continued:]

...[Rudolph Agricola,] excellently skilled in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, translated the Psalter from the Hebrew truth, which is highly commended by those learned in the Hebrew tongue. He flourished under Frederick III, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1485.

Rudolph Bayne [Rudolphus Baynus], of Cambridge, most learned in the sacred eloquences, and public professor at Paris of all the tongues, and especially of the holy tongue [Hebrew], wrote to Henry, King of the French, three books of commentaries on the Proverbs of Solomon; in which he pursued the historical sense — before nearly untouched by other expositors — according to the property of the Hebrew tongue, with a clear and open exposition, the allegorical and more sublime senses not being neglected.[1] The preface of the work so begins, It is a glorious thing for the great fathers. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1553.

Rudolph Lange [Rudolphus Langius], a German, a Canon of the church of Münster in Westphalia, a man adorned with all the arts and sciences, of singular genius and eloquence, wrote to Hermann Lange, a deacon of the same church, two not-useless books On the city of Jerusalem, for the understanding of the things which the divine Scripture mentions concerning the affairs of Jerusalem; in which he set forth brilliantly the ancient form, site, and state of that city. The beginning of the work is, Of the once most splendid city. He flourished under the Emperor Maximilian, in the year of the Lord 1444.

Rufinus Turranius [Tyrannius Rufinus], a monk, presbyter of the Church of Aquileia, at the request of Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, wrote to him, in the Latin tongue, one book On the blessing of the Patriarch Judah, according to the threefold sense of the divine Scripture; whose beginning is, The more I excuse myself to you. Then, the same Paulinus urgently demanding [it], he published another book to the same, in which he pursued, with a threefold explanation, the blessings of the other eleven Patriarchs. The book begins, First it must be known. He also wrote on Hosea one book, on Amos one book, and on Joel one book. He flourished in the year of the Lord 400.

Rupert the Gaul [Rupertus Gallus], a Carmelite, a professor of Scholastic Theology, a declaimer eloquent in his own tongue, and a not-contemptible expositor of the holy Scriptures, wrote on all the epistles of Paul fourteen books, in the year of the Lord 1350.

Rupert Goullet [Rupertus Goulletus], a doctor of the Parisian Academy, gathered from the four Evangelists a single body of the Gospel history, which he entitled TETRAMENON EVANGELICUM [The Fourfold Gospel]. Its beginning is, Although the doctors.

Rupert Holcot [Robert Holcot], an Englishman by nation, of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], greatly exercised in Scholastic Theology, and outstanding in expounding the holy Scriptures, wrote a Lecture on the book of Wisdom, which begins, The Lord [is] my rock; and a Lecture on the Song of Songs. But most recently he composed, on the first seven chapters of Ecclesiasticus, a scholastic Lecture divided into eighty-eight lections, filled with copious and subtle erudition, which he left unfinished, overwhelmed by a sudden death from that sharp pestilence which was under Charles IV, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1300 [so printed; Holcot died in the plague of 1349]. The work begins, Master and lord Gandisalvus.

Rupert [Robert Grosseteste], Bishop of Lincoln, surnamed Grosseteste, having obtained the first place among the Philosophers and Theologians of his age, most subtle in the keenness of his wit, most brief in speech, and most copious in the weight of his sentences, wrote succinct commentaries on the whole Psalter; whose beginning is, The book of the Psalms, in Greek. They are extant, written by hand, at Bologna in the Dominican Library. He flourished under the Emperor Conrad, in the year of the Lord 1140 [so printed; Grosseteste, bishop of Lincoln, belongs rather to the 13th century].

Rupert, Abbot of Limburg, a Benedictine monk, a German by nation, a man illustrious for sanctity and for divine revelations, formerly a celebrated philosopher in the Academy of Paris, and after his entry into religion most skilled by assiduous meditation in the holy Scriptures, published, in an open, simple, and not inelegant style, four books of Commentaries on the Song of Songs; whose beginning is, Whoever [understands] the nature of his own self. He flourished under Henry the Fifth, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1124.

Rupert Rose [Rupertus Roseus], an Englishman, a Carmelite, wrote on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, and Ecclesiasticus a scholastic Postil. In the year of the Lord 1420.

Rupert the Englishman, of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], a Scholastic by profession, made a Postil on Job, on Daniel, on John, on Matthew, and on Luke; which is seen at Bologna in the Dominican Library.

Rupert, Abbot of Deutz [Tuitiensis], near Cologne, a Benedictine by profession, a German by nation, a man most learned in the divine Scriptures — the Holy Spirit illuminating him through vision — outstanding in eloquence; at the urging of Cuno, Abbot of Siegburg (afterward Archbishop of Regensburg), gathered, on all the divine Scriptures, excellent terse commentaries of varied sense — and especially very many of the allegorical [sense] — from the writings of the Fathers: from which is derived a notable volume, whose title is ON THE HOLY TRINITY AND ITS WORKS, on both Testaments, to Cuno, Abbot of Siegburg — 42 books. Which work he so divided into three parts, that the first part contains the proper works of the Father in three books, that is, from the first creation of the world up to the casting-out of Adam from Paradise; the second part has the proper works of the Son, which — from the casting-out of Adam up to the incarnation and death of the Son of God — were said and done in figures, prophecies, visions, and Scriptures on account of the Christ to come, in 30 books; and the third part concludes, in nine books, the proper works of the Holy Spirit — namely, [those] recited in the Scriptures from the incarnation of the Son of God up to the end of the age. Of which 42 books, all noted together, here is the Index:

FIRST PART. On the holy Trinity, and on the works of the Father, on the first three chapters of Genesis, three books of commentaries: of which the first begins, Of all the Scriptures.

SECOND PART. On the Trinity, and on the works of the Son, thirty books of commentaries. Namely: [→]

[→ p316: catchword "In"]

[1] The Genevan ministers corrupted the doctrine of this author.

(Rich PDF p. 316 [printed folio 297, recto]. Book IV — the Rupert of Deutz Index concludes (the Son's works, the Third Part, and his other commentaries), then Rupert Walsingham; then letter S opens with Salonius of Vienne, Salvian of Marseilles, Sancho de Porta, and the great Santes Pagninus (his new Latin Bible). Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter R — Rupert of Deutz's Index, continued (Second Part, the works of the Son):]

- On the Residue of the book of Genesis, 6 books of commentaries — [incipit] A human creature.
- On Exodus, 4 books of commentaries — For what cause, or in what order.
- On Leviticus, 2 books of commentaries — This book.
- On Numbers, 2 books of commentaries — Opened in the Apocalypse.
- On Deuteronomy, 2 books — This book.
- On Joshua, 1 book of commentaries — In seven periods.

• On Judges and Ruth, 1 book — After the death of Joshua.

• On the four books of Kings, the book of Psalms being adjoined, 1 book — After the ample [reward] of virtue.

• On Isaiah, 1 book — Every soul which [seeks] Christ, etc.

• On Jeremiah, 1 book — The twilight of the fifth age of the world.

• On Ezekiel, 1 book — In this age of the world.

• On Daniel, Zechariah, and Malachi together, 2 books — Christ opening [it].

• On the Maccabees, 1 book.

• On the volume of the four Evangelists, 1 book — In the sixth age of the world.

THIRD PART. On the works of the Holy Spirit, from the coming of Christ up to the end of the age, 9 books — [incipit] The wrath of the Almighty.

But besides these he also wrote, in a broader style, more commentaries on various books of Holy Scripture; among which are: On the incarnation of the Lord, on the Song of Songs according to the mystical sense, seven most learned books, whose beginning is, Who against man; on the XII Minor Prophets, to Frederick, Archbishop of Cologne, 30 books, of which the first begins, To the Holy Spirit; to Cuno the Abbot, On the glory and honor of the Son of Man, on Matthew, 13 books, whose beginning is, You demand of me, O Christ-loving Cuno; on John's Gospel, 14 books — [incipit] The disciple whom [Jesus loved], etc.; to Frederick, Archbishop of Cologne, 12 books of commentaries on the Apocalypse, whose beginning is, That you too, O venerable Archbishop of the people of Cologne. He dies in the year of the Lord 1124.

Rupert Walsingham [Rupertus Valsigen], an Englishman, a Carmelite, a Norwich man by fatherland, wrote, in scholastic manner, commentaries on Ecclesiasticus, in the year of the Lord 1310.

S

Salonius, Bishop of Vienne in Gaul, having entered the desert scarcely ten years old, nourished among the hands of the holy hermits, and there trained through all the disciplines of spiritual matters by Honoratus, and Hilary of Arles, and Salvian — most holy and most learned men — and at last imbued with the divine Letters, together with his brother Veranius (afterward a bishop), by Eucherius, Bishop of Lyons, published many excellent commentaries on the holy Scriptures; of whose number there still survive brief commentaries on the Proverbs [Parables] and on the Ecclesiastes of Solomon, to his brother Veranius, composed in the manner of a dialogue: in which, under the persons of Salonius and Veranius, various little questions about the several chapters are explained through questions and answers. The beginning of the former commentary is, Veranius: In what language are the Proverbs spoken? But the opening of the second commentary is, Veranius: By what names was Solomon called? He flourished under Valentinian and Marcian, in the year of the Lord 450.

Salvian, Bishop of the Church of Marseilles [so printed; Salvian was a presbyter of Marseilles], copiously furnished with divine and human literature, a master of the bishops of his time, wrote, in a Latin, clear, and terse discourse, many most praiseworthy little works; but among others he composed, in most elegant verse, a book From the beginning of Genesis up to the creation of the first man; and likewise one book of commentaries on the last part of Ecclesiastes, to Claudianus, Bishop of Vienne; he also composed [a book] τῶν ἀντικειμένων — that is, one book Of Passages set in opposition, from both Testaments. He flourished under the Emperor Zeno, in the year of the Lord 480.

Sancho de Porta [Sanctius de Porta], of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], a scholastic by profession, venerable both in life and in erudition, wrote, in a rude and simple discourse, on the Lections of the gospels and epistles mixed together — which are read in the Church throughout the Sundays of the whole year — two volumes of sermons, filled with pious morality. Volume 1 begins, Looking from afar. Volume 2, This is the day which [the Lord] made, etc.

Santes Pagninus [Sante Pagnini], of Lucca, of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], an Apostolic preacher, a man exceedingly learned in the divine Scriptures, and most skilled in the three tongues, but especially in Hebrew — when he had observed that that famous version of Jerome had, by the injury of the times and the carelessness of men, either in great part fallen away or in great part been corrupted, he too attempted to undertake a new translation of the whole Scripture, Leo X, Supreme Pontiff, urging [him on] and supplying the funds necessary for the work. Having therefore compared among themselves many, and those the most approved, exemplars of the Hebrews, with the greatest diligence and fidelity he could, he gave the whole Old Testament into Latin from the Hebrew truth, and restored the multitude of Hebrew names — which earlier interpreters had bent into Latin forms — to the utterance of the Hebrew tongue. And, that the reader might have the correct method of pronouncing in Hebrew, he placed accents over the Hebrew words, with certain numbers added in the margin of the whole volume, which would indicate how many verses — which the Jews call Pesukim [so printed Pesuchim] — were contained in each chapter of the Hebrew scripture. All of which he executed with such skilful care that the most skilled Rabbis of the Hebrews prefer his edition to all the translations which now exist, extolling it with many praises. He also translated, with no less praise, the whole New Testa-[ment →]

[→ p317: catchword "men"]

---

(Rich PDF p. 317 [printed folio 298, verso]. Book IV, letter S — Santes Pagninus's remaining works (the trilingual dictionary, the Thesaurus Linguae Sanctae, the two Isagoges, the Silver Chains), then Angelo Sangrino, and the great entry on the Seventy-two Interpreters (the Septuagint): the Aristeas legend and why the LXX passed over the testimonies to Christ. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter S — Santes Pagninus, continued:]

...[he translated the whole New Testa]ment according to the Greek text; in which, just as also in the Old Testament, he strove to follow the authority of the Vulgate edition, the sense of the Greek context being preserved. And he dedicated his work to Clement VII, Supreme Pontiff.

To these he added one book On the interpretation of the Hebrew, Chaldaean, and Greek words contained in the sacred letters: in which, according to the idiom of each language, he set the proper interpretations, derivations, and their compositions, with the books and chapters of the divine scripture cited; where each word is contained, just as it was interpreted and expounded by him.

The same [Pagninus] gathered, from all the Hebrew dictionaries of the Rabbis, a huge Hebrew Lexicon — not undeservedly called the THESAURUS OF THE HOLY TONGUE — in which he assembled, in abundant plenty, all the riches and wealth of the holy tongue, for the use of those who aspire to the Hebrew skill of the sacred letters.

He published besides, in imitation of Tyconius and Augustine, one book whose title is ISAGOGE [Introduction] TO THE SACRED LETTERS: in which he gathered from the ancient fathers many rules, highly necessary for expounding obscure phrases, figurative locutions, and the mystical senses of the divine scriptures. Its beginning is, That the Hebrew tongue was...

He also composed eighteen books of a similar subject, filled with an admirable abundance and variety of all heavenly matters, which he entitled ISAGOGAE for understanding the mystical senses of sacred scripture, because in them he treats of the mystical and spiritual senses of the sacred words according to the series of the letters, expounding almost the whole divine Scripture mystically under the pretext of this occasion. He was incited to this labor, as he himself indicates, by the example of St. Eucherius, Bishop of Lyons, who gathered a book of not-dissimilar subject, entitled ON THE DIVINE FORMULAS, from many monuments of the ancients. The beginning of the work is, Seven demons.

He gathered likewise, not without great labor, a huge work on the Pentateuch, distinguished into six large volumes, called the SILVER CHAIN [Catena Argentea]: in which he wove together the expositions of the Hebrews, Greeks, and Latins, as if with certain links inserted into one another.

With similar industry he also gathered a Silver Chain on the whole Psalter, cut into three parts.

Likewise, on the whole of Psalm 118, a Grammatical explanation of the Hebrew words, most useful to beginners of the holy tongue, which is annexed to the Hebrew Institution [grammar] of the same author. He dies at Lyons in the year of the Lord 1541, and was buried there, in a marble tomb in the middle of the choir of the sacred church of the Preachers [Dominicans].

Sangrinus the Englishman, or Angelo Sangrino [Angelus Sangrinus], a not-ignoble poet, Abbot of Monte Cassino, composed a Paraphrase on the Psalter, wrought in various kinds of meter, which begins, O how blessed [is he] whom I foretell.

The Seventy-two Interpreters, Hebrews by nation, most wise and most holy men, first of all — as Philo and Epiphanius write — translated into the Greek tongue the whole Old Testament (which among the Jews was kept in twenty-two books),[1] at the urging of Ptolemy Philadelphus, the second king of Egypt; who, since he greatly desired to build at Alexandria a Library celebrated in the whole world, commanded Demetrius of Phalerum, a most learned man, set over his Library, to procure from the whole world of lands as many volumes as he could — men being distributed through suitable places, who, with no reckoning of expense or labor, should both buy and transcribe the books. When therefore he had heard from those who had been sent that there were extant at Jerusalem the sacred Laws of the Jews, worthy of the royal Library, if they could be translated into Greek from the Hebrew tongue in which they were written, he brought a petition to the king, that he should summon Hebrew interpreters together with those books, who might faithfully transcribe them into Greek speech. This petition being accepted, the king wrote letters to Eleazar, the pontiff of the Jews, that from every tribe he should send to him six men — instructed indeed in the best morals, venerable in age, and most learned in the meditation of the Law itself — together with the Law of the Jews, so that, with many [men] interpreting with every keenness of mind and choosing some concordant [reading], they might accomplish a matter worthy of so great an effort.

When therefore six men from each of all the tribes of the Jews, sent by Eleazar, had come to the king, and he feared that they might not translate plainly and candidly the truth inserted in the divine volumes, but might of set purpose conceal some [part], he ordered them each to be kept in separate cells on the island of Pharos, and, placed there apart, to translate the same [text]. But by divine counsel it came about that they all, with the same words, the same names, and the same sentences, from beginning to end, turned the twenty-two volumes of the Old Instrument [Testament]; so that the king, and the Gentiles themselves, might manifestly recognize that those divine Scriptures had been translated not by human but by divine prompting — which Ptolemy the king, embracing with the highest joy, dedicated to his Library.

But it must be known that these seventy-two interpreters passed over, in their translation, many testimonies of the Prophets concerning Christ and the holy Trinity[2] — not indeed out of carelessness or malice, but by a pious and prudent counsel, and that they kept silent for no light reasons. In the first place, because, since they were translating before the coming of the Son of God in the flesh, they could not know many of the mysteries of the Christ to come, not yet fully perceived in those ages — God so disposing that all the mysteries of his divinity should be reserved to be disclosed, at the rising of the Evangelical light, by the splendor of Christ. And so, what they either did not know, or did not fully know, or translated in doubtful and ambiguous sentences, or passed over entirely — preferring rather to keep a good silence about things unknown than, by speaking of things they did not know, to pronounce ill. Then, lest they should scandalize King Ptolemy, they concealed many things about the Son of God and about his coming, lest perhaps the king, hearing that God has a Son, should suppose that the Jews, according to the dogma of Plato, held a twofold godhead [→]

[→ p318: catchword "numen"]

[1] The seventy-two interpreters, first of all, translated the whole Old Testament into the Greek tongue. [2] The LXX interpreters, for three reasons, passed over many things concerning the Trinity and Christ.

(Rich PDF p. 318 [printed folio 299, recto]. Book IV, letter S — the Septuagint entry concludes (the names of the 72 interpreters by tribe, and the sources), then Serafino da Feltre, Serapion of Thmuis, Sertorius Fortanerius, Severianus of Gabala, Sigebert of Gembloux, Simon of Afflighem, and the opening of Simon the Englishman. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter S — the Seventy-two Interpreters, concluded:]

...[a twofold] godhead, and worship two Gods — [the Jews] whom [Ptolemy] therefore held in great esteem, because they were said to worship only one God. Finally, they kept silent about many other mysteries besides these, lest they should betray all the mysteries of their faith to the heathen, deeming it unworthy — according to Christ's saying — to give the holy thing to dogs, and to cast pearls before swine. For these most just causes, then, many things were omitted by the seventy-two interpreters, which gave to later interpreters an occasion for preparing new editions. Now the names of these seventy-two interpreters,[1] according to the order of the twelve Hebrew Tribes, collected by Aristeas, are these:

- From the tribe of Judah: Josephus, Ezechias, Zacharias, Joannes, Ezechias, Eliseus.
- From the tribe of Reuben: Judas, Simon, Samuel, Adeus, Mathias, Eschemias.
- From the tribe of Gad: Nehemias, Josephus, Theodosius, Baseas, Ornias, Datis.
- From the tribe of Asher: Jonathas, Anxeus, Eliseus, Ananias, Chabrias, Sachus.
- From the tribe of Naphtali: Iasachus, Jacobus, Jesus, Gabateus, Simon, Levi.
- From the tribe of Manasseh: Judas, Josephus, Simon, Zacharias, Somelus, Selemias.
- From the tribe of Simeon: Sabatheus, Jason, Jesus, Theodorus, Joannes, Jonathas.
- From the tribe of Levi: Theodosius, Jason, Jesus, Theodorus, Jonas, Jonathan.
- From the tribe of Issachar: Theophilus, Abraham, Arsamus, Jason, Endemias, Daniel.
- From the tribe of Zebulun: Jeremias, Eleazarus, Zacharias, Baneas, Eliseus, Datheus.
- From the tribe of Ephraim: Samuel, Josephus, Judas, Joathes, Gabel, Dositheus.
- From the tribe of Benjamin: Isaelus, Joannes, Theodosius, Arsamenes, Abiethas, Ezecelus.

All these seventy-two men flourished together in the times of Eleazar, pontiff of the Jews, and of Ptolemy Philadelphus, the second king of Egypt, in the 124th Olympiad, 350 years before the birth of Christ. Whose history was written by Aristeas, the shield-bearer of the aforesaid King Ptolemy, in a book On the LXXII interpreters, published specially to Philocrates, his brother; Philo also in the second book On the life of Moses; Josephus likewise in the twelfth book of the Jewish Antiquities; Epiphanius too, bishop of Salamis, in the book On weights and measures; and St. Jerome in many of his little works — from which authors we have taken these few [things]. Nor do I think it should be passed over that Philo, in the book already cited, writes that there was once among the Jews so great a veneration of this translation that most of them were accustomed to cross over each year to the island of Pharos, to honor with a solemn celebration the place in which the interpretation of the divine Law had first been published, and to give thanks to God for so great a benefit. The same Philo testifies also that the whole Old Testament was translated by the LXX interpreters, although Josephus reports that only the Pentateuch was translated by them. Francisco Ximénez [Cardinal Cisneros] gave this whole edition of theirs to Latin ears [in the Complutensian Polyglot].

Serafino da Feltre [Seraphinus Cumiranus Feltrensis], of the regular family of the Minorites [Franciscan Observants], most exercised in the holy Scriptures, gathered from all the books of divine Scripture two Volumes of passages which seemed to conflict among themselves — one on the passages of the Old Testament apparently conflicting, the other on the contrary passages of the New Testament; in which, no less piously than learnedly, he dissolved and settled the apparent conflicts of the divine Scriptures according to the opinion of the orthodox Fathers. The title of the work is, A Reconciliation of the Common Passages of the whole sacred Scripture which seem to conflict among themselves. He still lives, celebrated among the learned of his religion, in the year of the Lord 1566.

Serapion, bishop of the Egyptian city of Thmuis [μύεως — so printed; = Θμούεως], renowned in the confession of Christ under Constantine Augustus (whose huge and most noble work against the Manichaean, written in the Greek tongue, I lately read) — and who, on account of the elegance of his wit, earned the surname of THE SCHOLASTIC, especially dear to the great Antony the Monk, once a monk and Abbot, having under him about ten thousand monks living by their own labor — wrote one book On the titles of the Psalms. He flourished under Constantius Augustus, in the year of the Lord 340.

Sertorius Fortanerius [Sertorio Fortanieri], Archbishop of Ravenna, Patriarch of Grado, Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, of the Order of Minors [Franciscan], from a Welsh town of England [so printed "ex oppido Angliae Galensi"; doubtful], composed on almost all the holy Scriptures many volumes of scholastic explanation. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1356.

Severianus, bishop of Gabala — which is a city of Syria — learned and eloquent, was often called to Constantinople by John Chrysostom and the Emperor Arcadius, to deliver sacred sermons in the Church; and Chrysostom lent him his own church while he [himself] was being driven into exile, venerating in him not only doctrine but also the merit of his life. But he [Severianus], commending himself to the people more than was fitting, supplied fuel for discord between himself and John [Chrysostom]; yet, when Chrysostom had returned from exile, he came back again into favor with him. This man, among the other monuments of his wit, left on Genesis several Homilies, of which fourteen, not yet translated from the Greek, are kept at Vienna in the Brassican Library. He also left commentaries on the epistle to the Galatians. Oecumenius, in his commentaries on the first epistle to the Corinthians, cites fifty-eight volumes of his sermons. He flourished in the year of the Lord 400.

Sigebert, a monk of Gembloux, of the Benedictine order, a Gaul by nation, a most celebrated poet of his time, and worn [versed] from his youth in the divine Scriptures, wrote on the book of Ecclesiastes in hexameter verse, 1 book. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1110.

Simon of Afflighem [Simon Affligeniensis], a Benedictine monk, distinguished for erudition in the divine Scriptures and for the holiness of his conduct, terse and elegant in speech, wrote brief commentaries on Ezekiel; and the same man abridged the 33 books of the commentaries of Blessed Gregory on Job, and reduced them to the number of ten small volumes; in the year of the Lord 1300.

Simon the Englishman, of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], gathered a Postil on the four major Prophets, and on the books of the Maccabees, [and] on the Proverbs of Solo-[mon →]

[→ p319: catchword "monis"]

[1] The names of the seventy-two interpreters of sacred Scripture.

(Rich PDF p. 319 [printed folio 300, verso]. Book IV, letter S — Simon the Englishman (concl.), Simon of Cascia, Simon Atumano, Simon Corroy, Simon of Speyer, then the author's own entry, Sixtus of Siena (with the list of his own works, this very Bibliotheca Sancta among them), Sixtus Vicedominus, Smaragdus, Sophronius, and the opening of Stephen Langton. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter S, continued:]

...[Simon the Englishman gathered a Postil] on the Proverbs of Solomon, and on the biblical prefaces of St. Jerome.

Simon of Cascia [Simon à Cassia], from the town of the Hernici, of the Order of Hermits [Augustinian], learned and eloquent, illustrated with a prophetic spirit, published a notable work On the deeds of the Savior, digested into fifteen books; in which he brilliantly expounded the whole history of the four Evangelists, arranged in the order of a single narration, according to the historical and mystical understanding. Its beginning is, From the good and above the good. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1340.

Simon Atumano [Simon Iatumaeus], first bishop of Gerace, and soon archbishop of Thebes, a Constantinopolitan by fatherland, learned in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, and exercised by continual reading in the divine Scriptures, reduced into one the series of the whole New Instrument [Testament] from the most corrected Greek codices, with the highest diligence; and then he turned it also into Hebrew and into Latin, interpreting most faithfully word for word. Finally he arranged these three editions in three columns on each page with such industry that line answered most aptly to line, and word to word, placed opposite one another, as much in sense as in word. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1400.

Simon Corroy [Simon Corroyus], of the Celestine order, composed a Monotessaron on the Gospels, which he called the EVANGELICAL PANDECT, beginning, Who first. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1550.

Simon of Speyer [Simon Spirensis], of the Carmelite order, a theologian of Paris, wrote a scholastic Postil on Paul, delivered by him as lectures at Cologne, in the year of the Lord 1340.

Sixtus of Siena [Sixtus Senensis], of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], least among the ecclesiastical declaimers — although I long and much refused to insert mention of my ignoble and obscure name into this catalog, yet it was necessary for me (my friends so wishing) to note briefly in this place my unlearned labors, and [those] scarcely worthy of any commemoration, after the example of Jerome, Gennadius, Honorius, and Trithemius, who in the catalogs of writers published by them reviewed their own lucubrations.[1] I have written, then, up to the present forty-sixth year of my age, and 1566 of human salvation, the following volumes upon the divine letters:

- On the whole body of the Bibles, a Holy Library [Bibliotheca Sancta], eight books.
- On the use of the Concordances of the sacred Bible, 1 book.
- On various passages of divine Scripture, one book of Astronomical questions.
- On various passages of divine Scripture, 1 book of Geographical questions.
- On various passages of divine Scripture, 1 book of Physical [natural] questions.
- On various passages of divine Scripture, 1 book of Problematical letters.
- On the four volumes of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus, a Monotessaron of Wisdom — that is, of one Wisdom out of four — one book.
- On the Epistle to the Romans, to Giovanni Battista, Cardinal of the title of St. Clement, one book of a Scholastic compendium.
- On the same epistle, to the same, 1 book of Scholastic questions.
- On the Lenten gospels, expounded for preaching at Genoa over four years, four Volumes of Homilies — that is, one Volume for each year.
- On the gospels which [are read] on the feasts of Pentecost and of Advent, which we expounded for preaching at Genoa over six years, six Volumes of Homilies — one Volume in each year.
- On the Hexaemeron, 8 homilies.

• On the first three chapters of Job, 6 homilies.

• On Psalm 1, 6 homilies.

• On Psalm 50, expounded in sermons at Genoa, 20 homilies.

Sixtus Vicedominus [Sisto Vicedomini], of the Order of Preachers [Dominican], a native of Como, a Theologian by profession, so joined with the studies of sacred Theology the riches of all the sciences and the ornaments of eloquence, that in the Ecumenical assembly [General Chapter] of the Dominican commonwealth, held at Bologna in the year 1564, he did not hesitate — though quite young — to propose in public disputations ἐν κυκλοπαιδείαν, that is, the Circular [encyclopedic] and perfect comprehension of all the disciplines, all the heads of the Academies being challenged into the arena; to whom, when he had responded with the highest erudition — both to the several things asked and to the objections raised — and with equal elegance of discourse, he obtained for himself a great glory of wisdom and of eloquence. He, now at Verona, expounding the disputative or scholastic part of Theology in the school of St. Anastasia the martyr, and narrating to the people the other part of Theology — which embraces the interpretation of the holy volumes — writes also excellent explanations on various books of divine Scripture; from which we shortly expect [to come] into the light most ample Commentaries on the epistle to the Romans, elaborated by a compendious method of exposition.

Smaragdus, Abbot of the Benedictine monastery of St. Michael, a man distinguished for erudition in the divine Scriptures, wrote commentaries on the Psalter, and — on the Epistles and Gospels which are read through the year — brief and perspicuous expositions, whose beginning is, Epistle is a Greek word. He flourished in the year of the Lord 680 [so printed; Smaragdus of Saint-Mihiel belongs rather to the early 9th century].

Sophronius, nobly learned in Greek and Latin letters, most intimate with St. Jerome, translated into Greek the Latin edition of the whole Old Instrument [Testament] which Jerome had translated from the Hebrew truth. This Greek translation, as appears from the Collectanea of Procopius the Sophist on the Octateuch, many Greek expositors — Jerome's name being also cited — illustrated in their commentaries. He flourished under Theodosius Augustus, in the year of the Lord 400.

Stephen the Englishman [Stephanus Anglicus; = Stephen Langton], formerly the ornament and rector of the University of Paris, studious and learned in the divine Scriptures, and in Aristotelian philosophy second to none in his time, gloriously taught Theology for many years, and was the first to begin expounding sacred Scripture morally; and hence the custom grew up that the masters of scholastic Theology should open the divine books in the schools more lucidly and easily. He wrote, therefore, on the sacred Letters many excellent expositions, but especially on the Octateuch, [books] of commenta-[ries →]

[→ p320 (next batch): catchword "riorum"]

[1] Hitherto I have seen nothing of all the works of Sixtus of Siena except the Bibliotheca Sancta.

---

(Rich PDF p. 320 [printed folio 301, recto]. Book IV, letter S — Stephen the Englishman (concl.), a second Stephen Langton [Cardinal-Archbishop of Canterbury], Stephen Paris, Stephen Poloniacus, a Paris doctor named Stephen, Strabo the Monk, Walahfrid Strabus (author of the Ordinary Gloss), Sylvester Prierias, Symmachus the Samaritan translator, and the Syriac / Chaldaic (Targum) Edition. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter S, continued — Stephen the Englishman, concluded:]

...[he wrote on the sacred Letters many excellent expositions, but especially on the Octateuch] eleven books of commenta-[ries], and on the sixteen prophets sixteen books, in style and feeling not ungrateful, as appears from his fragments recently published by Tilmann the Carthusian in the Tomes of Allegories. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1200.

Stephen Langton [Stephanus Langion], the Englishman, Cardinal-Presbyter of St. Chrysogonus, Archbishop of Canterbury, wrote on the Octateuch twelve books, and on all the epistles of Paul 14 books. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1228. Whether this one is different from the Stephen above, I do not sufficiently know.

Stephen Paris [Stephanus Paris], of Orléans [Aurelianensis], Bishop of Avellino [Abellunensis], doctor of Theology, of the Order of Preachers, wrote in elegant discourse upon that [text], The Word was made flesh, a prolix exposition, very suited to preachers through Advent, and arranged by lections, whose beginning is, To piety and religion: likewise one book of Lenten sermons. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1550.

Stephen Poloniacus [Stephanus Poloniacus], a Frenchman, of the Order of Preachers: a Postil on John I have seen in the Dominican library at Lyons, thus beginning, In his hands he hides the light.

Stephen, a Paris doctor. He put out a scholastic Postil on the epistle to the Romans and to the Hebrews, of whom Vincentius Bandellus [Vincenzo Bandelli] makes mention in his treatise On the Conception.

Strabo the Monk, English by nation, of Cambridge [Cantabrigensis] by homeland, brother of the Venerable Bede the presbyter, and gatherer of his studies, learned and pious, wrote on the whole book of Genesis commentaries not ignoble, which he gathered from the sayings of the orthodox Fathers, in imitation of his brother, with diligent skill, in the year of the Lord 750.

Strabus [Walahfrid Strabo], monk of the monastery of Fulda, German by nation, once the hearer and scribe of Rabanus Maurus, Archbishop of Mainz: a man abundantly polished in secular literature, most skilled in the divine Scripture, and delighting in the varied and assiduous reading of the ancient authors — among other little works, in which with clear and succinct discourse he illustrated certain particular books of the sacred Law, he also gathered, in imitation of his teacher, from the sayings of the holy fathers (their names being appended), commentaries on the whole sacrosanct Bible:[1] which they now call the GLOSSA ORDINARIA [the Ordinary Gloss], afterwards enriched by many other later writers and by various opinions of the ancient doctors. He flourished under Louis Augustus [Louis the Pious], in the year of the Lord 840.

Sylvester Prierias [Sylvester Mazzolini], of Piedmont [Pedemontanus], of the Order of Preachers, gathered from the commentaries of St. Thomas a scholastic Postil on the Gospel lections of the whole year, which he entitled the GOLDEN ROSE [Aurea Rosa], with questions added not altogether to be despised, in the year of the Lord 1510.

Symmachus, the third Greek interpreter of the Scriptures, a Samaritan by nation, of the number of the wise men of Samaria, when he could not by his ambition obtain the principate among his own people, in indignation defected to the Jews, and among them, having been made a proselyte, was again circumcised with a second circumcision.[2] For this was the custom among the ancient Hebrews, that those who fled from the Jews to the Samaritans, and in turn from the Samaritans to the Hebrews, should be circumcised anew, aided by the help of a certain medical traction instrument which they call a Spatister: by which indeed they would draw the little skin of the pudendum over the glans, and, with agglutinative [plasters] applied round about, would draw the foreskin over again upon the now-bared glans, and the drawn-over [foreskin] they would circumcise afresh. Of which matter Paul, making mention in the first epistle to the Corinthians,[3] says: Is anyone called being circumcised? let him not draw the foreskin over to himself; is anyone in uncircumcision? let him not be circumcised.[4] Although Jerome, weighing that which is read in the first [book] of Maccabees, And they made themselves foreskins,[5] affirms that this is to be understood not of the fathers themselves, but of their sons. This Symmachus, therefore, when after being circumcised again he was living in dishonor among the Jews, went over to the Christians, and embraced the heresy of the Ebionites: according to whose dogmas he wrote also commentaries on the Gospel of Matthew, endeavoring thence to confirm his own impiety, by which he contended that Christ had been a mere man — occasion being taken from the carnal generation which is recited at the beginning of Matthew's Gospel. By him, therefore, was the third translation of divine Scripture so put out, that in it not word-for-word (which Aquila had done) but sense-for-sense was expressed. He flourished under the Emperor Septimius Severus, in the year of the Lord 190.

The Syriac Edition [Syra Editio], which the Greek Fathers often expound together with the other Greek and Latin editions, is believed by some to be the Chaldaic translation, called by the Jews Thargum [Targum], that is, Paraphrase, and once not only familiar but vernacular to them, while they inhabited the land of promise, and even now of the highest authority among them: which, though in many places it is clearer than the Hebrew text itself, is yet found to be conflated in no small part of itself from the translation of the Seventy interpreters in the places that are most obscure. Jacobus [James], Bishop of Christopolis, asserts that the author of this translation was Jonathan ben Uzziel [Ionathan Abenuziel] the Jew, who in the twenty-first year of Octavius Augustus — that is, in the 21st year before Christ was born — translated the whole Old Instrument [Testament] into the Chaldaic, or Syriac, tongue, expressing sense-for-sense rather than word-for-word. The same Bishop relates also, in his exposition of the twentieth Psalm, that this Jonathan explained in his Targum many mysteries concerning the divinity of Christ and the holy Trinity — as in his edition of the second Psalm: in which, while he was illustrating in paraphrase that sentence, The Lord said to me, Thou art my Son: this day have I begotten thee, etc., he wrote thus:

> These two, the Father and the Son, are three in one third person, namely in the Holy Spirit: and these three are one — one, I say, in substance, one in essence, and one God.

And while Jonathan was committing these things to writing, suddenly a voice was brought to him from heaven, saying: Who is this that dares to reveal my secrets to the nations? Then Jonathan: I, O Lord, said he, have dared to attempt this for the reverence and glory of thy name. These things [says] the Bishop of Christopolis — whether they be so, I leave to others to inquire. Plainly it is certain that these words are not to be had in the Chaldaic interpretation of the Psalms which is now in circulation. The Jews report that the Targum [was made] by three most skilled Rabbi-[s →]

[→ p321 (next batch): catchword "nis" (Rabbi-nis)]

[1] The author of the Ordinary Gloss is Strabus. [2] Symmachus, the Greek interpreter of the Scriptures, was twice circumcised. [3] 1 Cor. 7:18. [4] The Vulgate edition has "let him not draw over the foreskin" (non adducat praeputium). [5] 1 Macc. 1:16.

---

(Rich PDF p. 321 [printed folio 302, verso]. Book IV — the Syriac (Chaldaic / Targum) Edition concludes (letter S), then letter T opens: Tatian (the Diatessaron), Tertullian, Theodolus of Coelesyria, and the opening of Theodore of Antioch. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter S — the Syriac Edition, concluded:]

...[the Targum was composed] by three most skilled Rabbi-[s] — Onkelos, Jonathan, and Joseph — of whom Onkelos translated the Pentateuch alone; Jonathan, the Pentateuch and the Prophets, both former and latter; but Joseph, the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, and Esther. Francisco Ximénez [Jiménez de Cisneros] the Cardinal, in the preface to the Complutensian edition, teaches that this Chaldaic translation faithfully answers to the Hebrew truth in the five books of Moses alone, but that in the other divine volumes it is corrupt, and in many places besprinkled with mere fables and with the trifles of the Talmudists.

T

Tatian [Tatianus], numbered by St. Jerome in his catalog of Ecclesiastical writers, was a Syrian by nation, and a disciple of Justin the philosopher and martyr. He, since he flourished with all abundance of the disciplines and great power of the oratorical art, left an infinite number of books of his own genius, but among the rest a notable volume of Propositions and Questions: in which, as Eusebius writes in the 4th [book] of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 27, he unlocked all the things that are obscure and difficult in the divine Scriptures. The same man compacted into one [work] the history of the four Gospels, to which he gave the title DIATESSARON, that is, One out of four, or On the harmony of the four Gospels: to which Victor, Bishop of Capua, a most excellent astronomer, who flourished about the year of the Lord 480, diligently affixed the numbers of the Evangelical Canons from Eusebius of Caesarea, throughout the fitting places, a preface being prefixed which begins thus, When by chance it fell into my hands. Abbot Trithemius made Victor the author of this work, though Victor's own preface contradicts him, which testifies that it is the work of Tatian. This man, as long as his teacher lived, flourished greatly in the Catholic Church: but after his [teacher's] death, he founded a new heresy, called that of the Encratites. He flourished under the Emperor Marcus Antoninus Verus and L. Aurelius Commodus, in the year of the Lord five hundred and seventieth [so printed, "570"; but Tatian belongs to the 2nd century, c. AD 170 — the reign named].

Tertullian [Tertullianus] Florens, whose praenomen was Quintus Septimius, a presbyter by dignity, an African by nation, of Carthage by homeland, his father a proconsular Centurion — a man indeed of sharp and vehement genius, imbued no less with human than with divine disciplines, the most excellent Rhetor also of his own times and the public [teacher] of that Art in the city of Carthage, a master, wrote many things elegantly in the Latin tongue, but in a style too elaborate and hard, and, on account of the unusual novelty of his words, obscure. Whence Jerome also, writing to Paulinus, ascribes these two [faults] chiefly to him: namely, that he is crowded in his sentences, and difficult in his speech.[1] And Lactantius, in the fifth book of the Divine Institutions, describing the same man's phrasing, says: Septimius Tertullian was skilled in every kind of letters, but in speaking little easy, and less polished, and much obscure. The blessed Cyprian esteemed his writings so highly that he would let no day pass without reading them, often urging upon Paul of Concordia, his notary [secretary], Give [me] the master — meaning, of course, Tertullian.

This man, therefore, among the other monuments of his genius, left [these]:

On Genesis chapter 2, On Paradise, one book, of which the author himself made mention at the end of his book On the Soul.

Likewise on Genesis chapter 7, one treatise, inquiring therein: why God, who made all things very good, brought the unclean animals together with the clean into the ark. Jerome mentions this little work in the preface of his Questions to Damasus.

Likewise on the conflagration of Sodom, on the 18th chapter of Genesis, one book, elegantly composed in heroic verse: which begins,

> Now God Almighty, with the avenging flood, had abolished
>
> all the crimes of the first age with the waves.
>
> Those which heaven scattered, the water of the Tyrian sea drove out.

Likewise On the vestments of Aaron, on Exodus 28, one book: of which Jerome, in his epistle On the garb of priests to Fabiola, thus says: There is reported in the Index of Septimius Tertullian a book on the vestments of Aaron, which meanwhile up to this day has not been found by me: if it be found by you, on account of the fame of the city, I pray, do not compare my little drop to that river; for I am to be judged not by the genius of great men, but by my own powers.

He wrote also on the Lord's Prayer, from Matthew chapter 6, one book entitled On Prayer: which Hilary recalls in his commentary on Matthew. He flourished under the Emperor Severus, in the year of the Lord 200.

Theodolus [Theodulus], a presbyter in Coelesyria, and afterwards a Bishop, an Italian by nation, wrote a book On the Concord of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, against the ancient heretics: who, on account of the difference of precepts or of ceremonies, said that the God of the Old Testament was one, and the God of the New another. In it he showed that it was [a matter] of the dispensation of one and the same God, the author of both scriptures — that some things were given as law through Moses to the ancients in the ceremonies of sacrifices and in the executions of judgments, other things in these times through the presence of Christ in the sacred mysteries and in the future promises; and that they ought not to be believed diverse, nor dictated by more than one spirit and one author: since those things which, if only they were observed according to the letter, would kill, the very same, according to the [spiritual] understanding, give life. The same man also published a volume of Eclogues in verse: in which he most felicitously sang all the miracles of the Old Testament, and the fables of the poets composed in imitation of these. Its beginning is, The lands of the Ethiopians, etc. He is also said to have collected, on the Epistle to the Romans, a succinct and easy exposition, woven together in the manner of a catena, from the opinions of the Greek Fathers, whose names, cited by him, are these: Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, John Chrysostom, Photius, Isidore, Severianus, Gennadius, and Oecumenius. But since Photius and Oecumenius flourished two hundred years after Theodolus, it appears that the inscription of the work is false. The beginning of the work is, Paul, etc. This epistle contains the instruction of the Gospel. He died under the Emperor Zeno, in the year of the Lord 480.

Theodore [Theodorus], a presbyter of the church of Antioch, a learned man and eloquent in Greek fluency, whose [work] against the Eunomians and Apollina-[rists →]

[→ p322 (next batch): catchword "ristas" (Apollina-ristas)]

[1] Tertullian is crowded in his sentences, and difficult in his speech.

---

(Rich PDF p. 322 [printed folio 303, recto]. Book IV, letter T — Theodore of Antioch (concl.), Theodore of Heraclea, and the long Theodoret entry (his life and deposition by Dioscorus, and a full catalog of his commentaries — the Mystical Isagoge, the Quaestiones, the Psalter, the ferial-Canticles catena, all the Prophets with their Greek incipits, and the Pauline commentaries). Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter T, continued — Theodore of Antioch, concluded:]

...[whose work] against the Eunomians and Apollina-[rists] is extant, a most elegant volume, wrote also on the Psalms magnificent commentaries, of which many and frequent fragments are read in the Greek Catena of explanations of the Psalter, arranged by Epiphanius Scholasticus. He flourished under Honorius Augustus, in the year of the Lord 420.

Theodore [Theodorus], Bishop of Heraclea of Thrace — which was once called Perinthus — a man of elegant and open speech, illustrious in the times of Constantine II, published (according to the literal understanding, which he everywhere followed in the exposition of the divine Letters) Commentaries on the Psalter, on Matthew, on the Gospel of John, and on the epistles of Paul. He flourished in the year of the Lord 340.

Theodoret [Theodoretus], or Theodoritus (for the Greek copies bear both readings), a Syrian by nation, of the city of Cyrrhus — which Stephanus calls Κυρούπολις (that is, Cyropolis), [and] the Persians call Cyrecbata — Bishop and pastor of eight hundred churches[1] (for that city then had so many parishes, [a city] once founded by Cyrus, king of the Persians, in the farthest bounds of Persia); a man renowned for Attic eloquence, and most illustrious in the explanation of the holy volumes, and also a most keen assailant of the heretics — by whom he even endured stones for the defense of the catholic faith. After many labors of life, in extreme old age he was branded with anathema by Dioscorus, Bishop of Alexandria, and most unjustly deposed from his bishopric, because he had agreed with Flavian, Archbishop of Constantinople, in the condemnation of the Eutychian heresy. He, therefore, having obtained an admirable facility in teaching, left many commentaries on the divine Scriptures, abridged for the most part from the richest [works] of St. John Chrysostom — whom he took to himself as it were the primary model to imitate. Of these I have read the following:

A volume of Mystical Instructions, an Isagoge [Introduction] into the whole holy Scripture, expounding the mystical and spiritual understandings of all the names and words that are contained in the divine Letters; which work, written in Greek on ancient parchments, is preserved at Vienna in Austria, in the library of Alexander Brassicanus.

Εἰς τὰ ἄπορα τῆς θείας γραφῆς κατ᾽ ἐκλογήν, that is, On selected ambiguous questions of divine Scripture, from the beginning of Genesis up to the last book of Kings — a notable work: in which he briefly and lucidly explains, through question and answer, only the obscure passages. Its beginning is, Μετρεῖν εἴωθε [so printed, 16th-c. Greek type hard], that is, He was accustomed to measure.

On the whole Psalter, commentaries chiefly according to the letter, in which with wonderful skill he joined together the little verses of the psalms which seemed to agree among themselves in no order. These noble commentaries are extant at Genoa, in the Sauli library: whose beginning is, Ἐμοὶ μὲν πρὸ τῶν ἄλλων θείων λογίων κατὰ θυμὸν ἦν τοῦ μεγάλου Δαβὶδ ἑρμηνεῦσαι τὴν προφητείαν, that is, It is indeed my mind, before the other divine discourses, to interpret the prophecy of the great David.

There is annexed to this work a Catena of explanations on the ferial Canticles, collected by an uncertain author from Eusebius, Didymus, Basil, Chrysostom, Severus of Antioch, Hesychius, Cyril, Theodoret, Eudoxius the philosopher, and Nicolaus the presbyter.

On the Song of Songs, graceful commentaries [addressed] to John the Bishop, beginning, The exposition of the divine scriptures. Into which some recent collector, I know not who, mixed fragments of the explanations of Gregory of Nyssa, Maximus, Nilus, and Psellus, upon various places of this book.

He composed [lucubrated] also, on all the Prophets, very many volumes of commentaries: whose openings, gathered partly from Greek, partly from Latin codices, are these:

- On Isaiah — one book.
- On Jeremiah — one book.
- On Threni [Lamentations] — one book.
- On Ezekiel — one book. [incipit: With the eyes of the body ... of the figures.]
- On Daniel — one book. [incipit: If it were easy for all.]
- On Hosea — one book. [incipit: Ἴσως μὲν τινες...]
- On Joel — one book. [incipit: Ἰωὴλ ὅθεν...]
- On Amos — one book. [incipit: Ὁπλῶσαι...]
- On Obadiah [Abdias] — one book. [incipit: Ἰδουμαῖοι πρόγονον...]
- On Jonah — one book. [incipit: Πάντας ἀνθρώπους...]
- On Micah — one book. [incipit: Τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ...]
- On Nahum — one book. [incipit: Οἱ Νινευῖται...]
- On Habakkuk [Abacuc] — one book. [incipit: Εἰσί τινες...]
- On Zephaniah [Sophonias] — one book. [incipit: Δόγος...]
- On Haggai [Aggaeus] — one book. [incipit: Κύριος...]
- On Zechariah — one book. [incipit: Σφόδρα παλαι...]

• On Malachi — one book. [incipit: Μωσῆς μέν...]

(The Greek incipits above are set in a very difficult 16th-c. type and are rendered as best they can be read.)

Besides these, there are reported to be printed in type Commentaries on all the epistles of Paul: in which, as far as can be done, the meanings of Paul are explained succinctly, elegantly, in order, and piously, and the opinions which in Paul seem most difficult are joined together with [other] opinions with wonderful skill. St. Thomas cites from these commentaries, in his little work Against the errors of the Greeks, a testimony of the Armenians for the fire of purgatory, from the third chapter of the epistle to the Corinthians, upon that [text], If any man's work shall burn — in these words:

> The Apostle says, He shall be saved, thus, as it were, through a smelting-furnace — a fire purging whatever has crept in through incaution in the past life, from the dust at least of the feet of the earthly sense, in which [state] he remains so long as any bulk and earthly affection has clung to him, until he be purged: for whom Mother Church devoutly offers victims and peaceful gifts.

Which words, indeed, I could nowhere find, neither in the Latin nor in the Greek commentaries. I suspect that they were either withdrawn by certain Greeklings hostile to purgatory, or drawn by St. Thomas from some other work where Theodoret expounded this passage thus. The beginning of the work is, Scio quidem ferè [I know indeed almost], as, while [the epistles] of the divine Paul... This holy man flourished in the time [→]

[→ p323 (next batch): catchword "pore" (tem-pore)]

[1] Theodoret was the pastor of 800 churches.

---

(Rich PDF p. 323 [printed folio 304, verso]. Book IV, letter T — Theodoret (concl.), Theodore/Theodoric of St-Trond, Theodoric Herxen, Theodotion, Theodotus of Ancyra, Theognostus, Theophilus of Antioch, Theophylact (with his works), Thomas the Englishman, and the opening of Thomas Aquinas. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter T, continued — Theodoret, concluded:]

...[he flourished] in the time of the Council of Ephesus, contemporary with St. Cyril, with whom he also had disputes concerning the acts of that same synod; and he reached even to the times of Pope Leo the First, to whom he wrote an entreating epistle for his own restoration to the bishopric. He died about the year of the Lord 450.

Theodore, or Theodoric [Theodoricus], Abbot of St. Trond [St.-Trudo] in the diocese of Liège, a Benedictine by profession, German by nation, of great erudition and holiness, whose excellence in prose and in verse was equal, composed a book comprising the histories of the Old and New Testament in heroic verse. He flourished under the Emperor Henry IV, in the year of the Lord 1100.

Theodoric Herxen [Theodoricus Herxenius; Dirk van Herxen], German by nation, visitor of the order of clerics living in common [the Brethren of the Common Life], renowned for holiness of life and the powers of his genius, wrote — in scholastic order, but in a more devout style — one book on the Psalter. He flourished under the Emperor Frederick III, in the year of the Lord 1476.

Theodotion, as Epiphanius reports, a Pontic by nation, or, as Euthymius holds, an Ephesian — while he was a Christian, a follower of the heresiarchs Tatian, Marcion, and Ebion; when he had deserted from the Christians to the Jews, he was circumcised, and among them well instructed in the Hebrew tongue, and under the Emperor Severus Augustus he put out the fourth Greek translation of the Old Instrument, in the year of the Lord 200.

Theodotus, Bishop of Ancyra in Galatia, wrote very many homilies: of which Epiphanius the deacon, in the sixth session of the Second Nicene Synod, cites four —

- the first, On Elijah and the widow, on 3 Kings [1 Kings] 17;
- the second, On the two blind men, on Matthew 9;
- the third, On the distribution of the talents, on Matthew 25;
- the fourth, On the lame man healed by Peter and John, on Acts 3.

He was illustrious in the Council of Ephesus against Nestorius, writing in a dialectical manner and very obscurely, in the year of the Lord 430.

Theognostus, an ancient author, whom Athanasius calls an eloquent, studious, and admirable man, wrote a Treatise on that [text] of Matthew 12, Whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man: which Athanasius cites in the book he composed upon that same saying of the Gospel.

Theophilus, the sixth bishop of the church of Antioch after the Apostle Peter, who under the Emperor Marcus Antoninus Verus, in the year 173, was taken up to the bishopric, is said to have written commentaries on the Proverbs of Solomon: which, however, Jerome asserts do not agree, in phrasing and elegance, with the other volumes of that author. The same man compacted the sayings of the four Evangelists into the body of a single history, and illustrated it with Greek commentaries. Jerome testifies that these are unequal, in elegance of diction, to his other volumes which he wrote against the heretics, exhibiting a modest taste of his phrasing in the exposition of the parable of the Unjust Steward — which he himself translated from Theophilus's commentaries, when, being asked by Algasia about the question of that parable, he answered her.

Theophylact [Theophylactus], Archbishop of Bulgaria — long and much versed and worn in the reading of St. Chrysostom — reduced into a brief and open compendium, according to the historical understanding, whatever that admirable father had poured out from his golden mouth, as from a most abundant fountain, in expounding the holy Scriptures; omitting the commonplaces, in which Chrysostom was wont to run out under the full sails of eloquence. And since he found the Allegories either none or rare in Chrysostom, he supplied them from the commentaries of others, and most aptly fitted them to his places. There are reported, among the rest, [these works] collected by him on both Testaments:

- On Hosea, one book, headless and endless [acephalus & atelestus] — that is, by the injury of time lacking its beginning and its end: the surviving fragment of which begins, And no one has snatched [her] out of my hand, etc.
- On Jonah, one book, which begins, After all...
- On Nahum, one book. [incipit:] The admirable one preached.
- On Habakkuk, one book. [incipit:] There are some who grievingly...
- On the four Gospels, four books, whose beginning is, In what manner [Quemadmodum].
- On Paul, 14 books. [incipit:] Frequens divinarum... [so printed; the reading is uncertain].

He flourished in the year of the Lord 900, under Michael and Theodora [so printed; Theophylact of Bulgaria in fact belongs rather to the late 11th century].

Thomas the Englishman [Thomas Anglicus], of Wales [Galensis] by homeland, of the Order of Preachers, professor of scholastic Theology, wrote on the sacred Books very many commentaries of scholastic method: of which there are, in the library of Sts. John and Paul at Venice, a Lecture on Genesis, beginning, Let it not depart, etc., and a Postil on the first twenty-five Psalms, which begins, Blessed is the man who keeps. There are believed to be, of this author, commentaries on Genesis, on Isaiah, on Jeremiah, on the Canonical Epistles, on the Apocalypse, and on Boethius On the Consolation of Philosophy — [works] ascribed to St. Thomas [Aquinas].[1] For, since for honor's sake the surname of Angelic had been given to Aquinas, and there was great similarity of sound between Anglicus [English] and Angelicus [Angelic], it gradually came about that, through carelessness and error, the writings of Thomas the Englishman were marked with the title of Thomas the Angelic. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1400.

Thomas Aquinas, of the Order of Preachers, sprung from the illustrious family of the Counts of Aquino, born of most splendid parents on the borders of Campania — himself the greater disciple of Albert, Archbishop of Regensburg [Ratisbon], surnamed the Great, a doctor;[2] a man of the greatest and loftiest genius, to whom, for the full and complete glory of all erudition, both divine and human, there was lacking only the use of the [ancient] tongues and of eloquence — which the learned of that age, being intent on loftier studies, neglected. He was, without any controversy, the prince of theologians, and of all the Philosophers whom the Academy of the Scholastics has produced up to this day:[3] inasmuch as he, the first of all the Latin philosophers, illustrated the whole philosophy of Aristotle with most lucid commentaries, by a daring no less incredible than felicitous. But in sacred [studies], he came so near, in the studies of a purer theology, to the most wise Augustine, that thus [he brought] his [Augustine's] mind, and all [→]

[→ p324 (next batch): catchword "recon" (recon-)]

[1] Some commentaries on sacred Scripture which are commonly attributed to St. Thomas are thought to be [the work] of Thomas the Englishman. [2] St. Thomas Aquinas was a disciple of Albert the Great. [3] The exceeding praises of St. Thomas.

(Rich PDF p. 324 [printed folio 305, recto]. Book IV, letter T — the long Thomas Aquinas entry continues: the encomium (Augustine's soul migrated into Thomas; Copiousness, Brevity, Facility, Security), then his scriptural works — the Genesis Postil (authenticity denied by Antoninus of Florence), Job, Psalms 1–51, the Song of Songs, Isaiah, Jeremiah & Lamentations, the Catena aurea, the Gospel and Pauline Lectures, the catholic epistles, the Apocalypse — and the Fossanova deathbed anecdote. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter T, continued — Thomas Aquinas:]

...he looked into and drained his [Augustine's] hidden meanings, so that — according to Pythagoras's μετεμψύχωσις [metempsychosis, the transmigration of souls], as tossed about in the common adage of all the most learned — Augustine's soul migrated into Thomas. In the scholastic disputations of mystical Theology also he so surpassed the other leaders of the Academies, that it has been received by the universal consent of all the schools that Thomas, the restorer of Scholastic Theology, joined together in an indissoluble bond of peace four things implacably warring among themselves — namely, Copiousness, Brevity, Facility, and Security — which it befell no professor of letters ever, either before or after him, to be able to connect together at once. And first, so copious a richness of all things is in him, that hardly anything from the whole compass of Theology and Philosophy could be desired that he himself has not embraced with most copious variety in his richest writings. Then Brevity — which is the inseparable companion of obscurity, its mother — he so joined to Facility, all difficulty being shut out, that by the disposition of order, by the perspicuity of the sentences, and by the splendid clarity of words, he left all writers far behind him; and, what is much more admirable, whereas in the ecclesiastical Writings of many Fathers of great name one must proceed cautiously and with wary foot, lest one imprudently strike upon certain opinions little safe, to this one truly divine man there fell, by a divine [gift], so great a security of assertions and opinions, that in reading him the reader, free from all suspicion of error, may range at large safe and secure with unimpeded step, without any offense — as it were along a royal road, worn by the common tread of the ecclesiastical fathers, far from those byways of the particular sects, [their] paths and detours, which often lead the incautious away into inextricable mazes and irretraceable errors.

With these, then, most rare conditions of teaching, this incomparable doctor wrote almost innumerable volumes of the scholastic kind: of which those that pertain most to the understanding of Sacred Scripture are distinguished by a triple division — into Expositions, Questions, and Opuscula [Minor Works]. In the Expositions (which he also called Lectures) he expounded those books of holy Scripture — which we shall indicate in their place — in a continuous order of explanation, briefly and to the letter, most lucidly. In the Opuscula, or Treatises, he treated some particular passages of the scriptures more fully and copiously. But in the Questions, upon various propositions of divine Scripture, applying contrary argumentations on both sides, he constructed most beautiful disputations: among which are greatly praised the Questions On the work of the seven days — which, when he had first published them (as Aegidius Romanus [Giles of Rome] testifies) in a separate volume, he afterwards placed, in a most fitting order, into the first part of his Summa.

He is also said to have written on Genesis a certain scholastic Postil, which is circulated inscribed under his name; but Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, denies that it is his, affirming that it was published by another Thomas of the same order — a man indeed learned and pious, but in no way to be compared to Thomas Aquinas in facility of style and gravity of sense.

He composed also most lucid and most learned commentaries on the whole book of Job according to the letter: which are preferred to the other commentaries published by him on the Old Testament, for erudition and for a genuine and sincere explanation of the history. Their beginning is, As in things [Sicut in rebus].

He published likewise, on the first fifty of the Psalms — that is, on fifty-one Psalms — pious and learned commentaries according to the literal and anagogical understanding, in the same kind of interpretation which he had used in the commentaries on Job; but the exposition on the remaining Psalms, being prevented by death, he could not finish. The opening of the book is, In all his work, etc.

He wrote also a Postil on the Song of Songs, which begins, Let thy voice sound.

There is reported, besides, a Postil on Isaiah, whose beginning is, Write the vision, and explain, etc.: which very many, on account of its poverty of erudition, judge not to be his. Lyranus [Nicholas of Lyra] asserts that it was put together from his sayings by some studious person.

There is extant also a Postil on Jeremiah and Threni [Lamentations], whose beginning is, This is a lover of the brethren and of the people: which, on account of the barrenness of its doctrine, is not believed to be his.

He collected besides — by command of Pope Urban IV — from the patchwork [centos] of the Latin fathers, and from the rhapsodies of the Greek authors (which he had caused to be translated into Latin), a most noble work of explanation on the four Gospels: which he entitled A Continuous [commentary] on the Four Evangelists, but which more recent [writers] call the Golden Chain [Catena aurea]. Its beginning is, To the most holy and most blessed, etc.

Besides these, Trithemius asserts that he wrote scholastic Lectures on the four Gospels, of which I have seen only the Lecture on Matthew, which begins, Matthew from Judaea, etc., and the Lecture on John, which begins, I saw the Lord.

To these he added a Lecture on all the Epistles of Paul, filled with the highest erudition: in which he left the other scholastic expositors far behind him. Its beginning is, A vessel of election.

On all the catholic epistles, 7 books. [incipit:] James, etc.

On the Apocalypse, a huge volume, which begins, The voice of the Lord, preparing the harts.

The same, when in the Cistercian monastery of Fossanova — near the Amaseno, a river of Campania — he lay sick, his bodily strength broken by continuous studies, being asked by the monks who sat by his bedside that he would explain the Song of Solomon in imitation of the sense and spirit of St. Bernard, but far more briefly, refused, saying: Give me the spirit of Bernard, and I will [expound →] to you...

[→ p325 (next batch): catchword "expo" (expo-nam)]

(Rich PDF p. 325 [printed folio 306, verso]. Book IV, letter T — Thomas Aquinas (concl.: his death at Fossanova reciting the Song, aged 48, 1274), Thomas the Cistercian (Song of Songs), Thomas Hasselbach, Thomas Sperman, Thomas Walden, and the long Thomas de Vio Cajetan entry (his life to his death in 1534, and the catalog of his Scripture commentaries). Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter T, continued — Thomas Aquinas, concluded:]

...[Give me the spirit of Bernard, and I will expound to you] an exposition breathing the spirit of Bernard. But when they still more earnestly begged him that he would at least bring forth some brief explanation of the Song from his own understanding, having summoned to himself certain monks to take down his words as he dictated, he began a second exposition on the Song, differing in style and erudition from the former exposition on the same book — as that time, and the prayers of the monks, and the occasion of his sickness demanded — writing not what art, but what sincere piety and a soul now hastening to the coming immortality, poured forth. In this explanation, therefore, when in expounding he had reached the sixth chapter of the book, and was uttering — with a vehement ardor of spirit and the highest alacrity of voice, his eyes lifted to heaven — those words of that same chapter which were his last, Come, my beloved, let us go forth into the garden, suddenly his most holy soul, going forth from the mortal body into the garden of eternal felicity, to its beloved (longed for all the days of its life and summoned by the last words of its life), happily departed, in the 48th year of his age, from the nativity of Christ 1274. But the rest of the exposition, to the end of the book, some studious person added. The opening of the work is, Solomon inspired by the divine spirit.

Demetrius Cydonius wrote his life in the Greek tongue; he also translated into Greek the first and second parts of the Summa Theologica, and the four books Against the Gentiles, which are now preserved at Venice in the Marciana library.

Thomas, a Cistercian monk, aspiring to the eloquence of St. Bernard and to his diligence in gathering the flowers of the divine scripture, wrote to Pontius, Bishop of Clermont, eight books of commentaries on the Song of Solomon, not to be despised: whose method he himself set forth in the preface of the whole work in this manner:

> I, together with Ruth the Moabitess, after Origen and the other aforesaid reapers — Gregory, Bede, and Bernard — busy myself to gather the ears [of grain], that is, the sentences [meanings], wrapped in the chaff of the letter: but I loose each little verse from its covering of chaff by a brief and compendious exposition; then, disposing the unfolded meaning by a manifold distinction, afterwards, like an argumentative bee, running through the little flowers of the Scriptures which have been expounded and distinguished, I strengthen them with attestation.

The beginning of the work is, I am vehemently astonished, and beyond what can be said I do not cease to marvel. Ascensius [Josse Bade] printed it at Paris in the year 1521.

Thomas Hasselbach [Hasselbachius], a German, most skilled in the divine scriptures and in secular philosophy, rare in acuteness of genius, scholastic in speech, but too diffuse and prolix, and on that account liable to the censure of some (for, when he was the ordinary lecturer of sacred Theology in the University of Vienna, publicly expounding the prophet Isaiah for twenty-one years, he did not reach the end of the first chapter) — is reported to have written, of his so prolix exposition on the first chapter of the prophet Isaiah, twenty-four books, in the year of the Lord 1410.

Thomas Sperman, an Englishman, of the Order of Preachers, scholastically expounded the epistle to the Hebrews and the epistle of James, in the year of the Lord 1290.

Thomas Walden [Netter of Walden], a Carmelite, an Englishman, who first put out learned and strong volumes against the Hussites and Wycliffites, wrote a scholastic Postil on the Pentateuch.

Thomas de Vio [Cajetan], Cardinal with the title of St. Sixtus, of the Order of Preachers, an Italian by nation, of Gaeta [Caietanus] by homeland, and bishop of that same city, a man as illustrious for holiness of life as for excellence of genius[1] — a most subtle dialectician, an admirable philosopher, an incomparable theologian, and among the most erudite the most learned of his age by far — in the thirtieth year of his age, on account of his singular excellence of manners and of doctrine, was elected the thirty-eighth Master General of his order at Rome; and after some years was taken up into the College of Cardinals by Pope Leo X. Soon he was sent into Germany with the office of legate, to quell the profane rumors which Martin Luther of Wittenberg, a new heresiarch, had stirred up among the Germans. Thence, having returned, he was again sent as legate by Pope Adrian [VI] into Pannonia [Hungary], with a great sum of money, to raise forces against Suleiman, Emperor of the Turks, who was striving to invade Pannonia with hostile arms. Then, recalled by Clement VII, the Supreme Pontiff, he returned to Rome: where, when the city was captured and burned by the Imperial army, he was made the prey of most abandoned robbers, and redeemed himself from their hands for the price of five thousand gold pieces. Not long after, when Clement, the Supreme Pontiff, had fallen into a most grave illness, given up by the physicians, he himself also began to be most gravely sick — as if he wished to snatch himself away from the imminent burden of the pontificate, to which he was being called by the common expectation and prayers of all — and by his own death he anticipated the death of the Pontiff, happily rendering his soul to God on the fourth day before the Ides of August [10 August], in the 66th year of his age, from the nativity of Christ 1534; and he was buried at Rome, in the vestibule of the temple of Minerva [Santa Maria sopra Minerva], before the doors, in a sepulchre dug into the ground, which while living he had himself prepared. His life Flavius Aquilanus, his intimate secretary, most eloquently wrote in prose and verse.

This man, therefore, in his extreme old age, after innumerable lucubrations published on the philosophy of Aristotle and on the whole theology of St. Thomas, expounded the entire mass of the Old and New Testament — the most difficult of all — according to the sense of the letter, from the Hebrew and Greek truth, in a bare and brief discourse; except for the Song of Songs and the Prophets, which, having begun them as he was dying, he left [unfinished], and the Apocalypse, which he deliberately left untouched, saying that in expounding it there was need not of genius, but of divination. But on the other books of divine Scripture he left commentaries complete and entire: of which I have read only those set down below:

- On the Pentateuch of Moses, to Clement VII, 5 books. [incipit:] Quotidianam de diuinis...
- On all the historical books which are of the Hebrew Canon, to Clement VII, 11 books, namely:
- On Joshua, one book. [incipit:] To St. Jerome, most blessed Father...
- On Judges, 1 book. [incipit:] The time of the elders who knew the works of God.
- On Ruth, 1 book. [incipit:] In the days, etc.
- [On the books of Kings →]

[→ p326 (next batch): catchword "In die" (In diebus...)]

[1] The praises of Cardinal Cajetan.

(Rich PDF p. 326 [printed folio 307, recto]. Book IV, letter T — Cajetan's Scripture-commentary list concludes (with a note on Ambrosius Catharinus's Invectives against him), then Tyconius (his seven mystical Rules, his Apocalypse commentary and Bede's verdict), Tilmann of Aachen, Titus of Bostra, Tryphon, and the opening of Triphyllius of Ledra. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter T, continued — Thomas de Vio Cajetan's works, continued:]

- On the books of Kings [Regum], 4 books. [incipit:] And there was a man, etc. — the title likewise of this book.

• On Paralipomenon [Chronicles], 2 books. [incipit:] Concerning the title of the book.

• On Ezra [Esdras], 1 book. [incipit:] This beginning has been expounded.

• On Nehemiah, 1 book. [incipit:] The beginning of this book testifies.

• On Job, 1 book. [incipit:] Just as the five books of Moses.

• On the Psalter, to Clement VII, 1 book. [incipit:] Of the divine psalms.

• On Proverbs, 1 book. [incipit:] All the prior things having been expounded.

• On Isaiah, 1 book. [incipit:] The vision of Isaiah.

• On Matthew, to Clement VII, 1 book. [incipit:] A part of the Roman ruin.

• On Mark, 1 book. [incipit:] Matthew being finished.

• On Luke, 1 book. [incipit:] Mark being completed.

• On John, 1 book. [incipit:] John, the last Evangelist.

• On the Acts of the Apostles, 1 book. [incipit:] First, etc. — Luke the Evangelist.

• On the Epistles of Paul, to Charles V Augustus, 14 books. [incipit:] Among the most illustrious [gifts] of the mind.

• On the Canonical Epistles, 7 books. [incipit:] It is not in every respect certain.

• From various passages of the New Testament, 8 books of Breakfasts [Ientacula]. [incipit:] They occur first of all.

• On the whole Old Testament, a new translation from the Hebrew.

• On the whole New Testament, an emendation according to the faith of the Greek codices.

Ambrosius Catharinus [Ambrogio Catarino Politi], Archbishop of Conza [Compsanus], of the Order of Preachers, wrote — both against the aforesaid commentaries on the Scriptures, and against the other little works of this man — six books of Annotations, or Invectives, very sharp: concerning which I leave to each his own free judgment. Likewise Antonius Lusitanus à Fonseca [Antonio de Fonseca], of the Order of Preachers, added to the same Cardinal's commentaries on the Pentateuch some elucidatory Annotations, not altogether to be regretted.

Tyconius [Tichonius], an African by nation — whose expositions Augustine, in the second book of the Retractations, preferred to the expositions of St. Cyprian on some [passages] — a man learned in divine and human letters, wrote most keenly against the Donatists, although he himself was a Donatist in some doctrines. He composed an Isagogic volume entitled Of Rules [Regulae]: in which he brought forward seven mystical rules, as it were seven keys, for opening, investigating, and finding the hidden understanding of the Scriptures[1] — [rules] very useful. Of these:

• the first is On the Lord and his body;

• the second, On the Lord's twofold body;

• the third, On the promises and the law, or On the spirit and the letter;

• the fourth, On species and genus, or On the whole and the part;

• the fifth, On the times;

• the sixth, On recapitulation;

• the seventh, On the devil and his body.

These rules — much praised — St. Augustine (in the 3rd book On Christian Doctrine), Cassiodorus (in the preface to his commentary on the Psalms), and Isidore (book 1 On the highest good) review and examine in many words. The book's beginning is, I have deemed it necessary before all things.

The same [Tyconius], as Gennadius reports, expounded the Apocalypse of John entirely, understanding nothing in it carnally, but the whole spiritually. In which exposition he said that the body is [as] an angelic station. He also removed the suspicion of a thousand years of the reign of the just on earth to come after the resurrection; nor [did he hold] that there would be two resurrections in the flesh of the dead — one of the just, the other of the unjust — but one, and once for all, in which even the abortives [stillborn] shall rise. But he showed the distinction of the two resurrections thus: that the first, which he called the revelation of the just, we should believe to be carried on now in the increase of the Church, where those justified by faith are raised from the death-corpses of their sins, through baptism, unto the reward of eternal life; but the second [is] generally [the resurrection] of the flesh of all men. These commentaries Primasius, Bishop of Utica, for the greater part transfused into the explanations on the Apocalypse published by himself; which [in turn] Bede the Venerable, the presbyter, compressed into three books: in whose preface he thus writes concerning Tyconius:

> Tyconius both vividly and truthfully understood the Apocalypse of St. John, and expounded it sufficiently in the Catholic [manner] — except only in those passages in which, striving to defend the schism of his own party (that is, of the Donatists), he laments the persecutions which they endured (namely, as heretics) from that most religious prince Valentinian: their churches, and their peoples and men, and their possessions handed over into the hands of the Catholics, and their priests thrust into exile; and, calling these [things] martyrdoms, he boasts that they were foretold in the same Apocalypse.

He flourished when Theodosius and his sons were reigning, in the year of the Lord 390.

Tilmann of Aachen [Tilmannus Aquensis], a German, a Carmelite, who had an excellent genius, refined in divine and human letters, lecturer of the University of Cologne, wrote on the Gospel of Matthew, in scholastic diction, one book, in the year of the Lord 1550.

Titus, Bishop of the church of Bostra in Arabia, wrote Greek commentaries on the Gospels, which Trithemius mentions in his Catalogue. He flourished under the Emperor Julian: by whose edict, driven from his bishopric, while he lived in exile, he wrote strong books against the Manichaeans, in the year of the Lord 340.

Tryphon [Triphon], a disciple of Origen, learned in ecclesiastical as well as heathen doctrines, wrote on the 15th chapter of Genesis, περὶ τῶν διχοτομουμένων, that is, On the halved parts of the heifer, the ram, and the she-goat, which Abraham offered to God in sacrifice together with the dove and the turtledove — one book; likewise, On the quality of the sacrifices which are contained in the whole book of Leviticus, 1 book. He flourished in the year of the Lord 230.

Triphyllius, Bishop of Ledra (or Leutheon) in Cyprus, when he had long given his effort at Berytus [Beirut] to the [liberal] arts, to law, and to eloquence, became the most eloquent of all of his age — but he did not lack affectation. Whence, when once, at the exhortation of many Bishops, he was making a discourse to the people, and was expounding that saying of our Savior to the paralytic, Take up thy bed and walk, being offended by the rudeness of the diction, instead of γραββάτῳ (that is, grabatum, a pallet) he said κλινίδιον, that is, lectulum (a little couch) — which Spyridon, taking it ill, [→]

[→ p327 (next batch): catchword "Trim" (Trim-, i.e. Spyridon of Trimythous)]

[1] Seven rules useful for understanding the scriptures.

---

(Rich PDF p. 327 [printed folio 308, verso]. Triphyllius (concl.: Spyridon's rebuke) and Tullio Crispoldi close letter T; then letter V opens — Werner de Laer, Venantius Fortunatus, Victorinus of Pettau (Jerome's testimonies and his preface to Anatolius on the Apocalypse commentary), Victorinus of Marseilles, Williram (the Epithalamion*), Vincent the Presbyter, and the opening of Vincent of Beauvais. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)*

[Letter T, continued — Triphyllius, concluded:]

...[which Spyridon,] Bishop of Trimythous in Cyprus, taking ill, said: Art thou then not better than he who said "grabatum"? What shame, then, is this, that you are unwilling, sir, to use his words with [their] decorum? And with these words, rising from his episcopal seat in the sight of all, he rebuked the pride and haughtiness of those who set themselves off with affected speech. This man [Triphyllius], therefore, among other things which he commented on the sacred Letters, also published most graceful commentaries on the Song of Songs. He flourished under Constantius Augustus, in the year of the Lord 350 (Nicephorus, book 8, chapter 42).

Tullio Crispoldi [Tullius Crispoldus] of Rieti, a very pious and learned man, a pupil of Matthew, Bishop of Verona (a man distinguished for holiness), published in the Italian tongue a treatise On the Passion of the Lord from the four Gospels, admirable in its meanings and style, which John — grandson of John, King of Portugal, and Duke of Aveiro — inflamed by reading it, gave to Latinity, happily attaining the style and mind of the author. He also wrote, in Italian discourse, Commentaries on Matthew, worthy of the highest praise and veneration: which Egidio Foscarari [Aegidius Foscararius], of the Order of Preachers, Bishop of Modena — of all the bishops of this time the most learned and most holy — showed to me at the Council of Trent. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

V

Werner de Laer [Vernerus], a German [Teutonic] by nation, a Westphalian by homeland, of the Order of the Carthusians, of the house of St. Barbara in Cologne [Colonia Agrippina], most studious in the divine Scriptures and very learned, devout in life and conversation, published a great work on all the epistles of Paul, which he entitled the DOCTRINAL OF PAUL [Doctrinale Pauli]: whose beginning is, The doctrine of Paul the Apostle. Likewise he composed On the praises of Paul, seven books, whose beginning is, As it was with Moses, so, etc. He flourished under Maximilian, in the year from the Virgin's childbirth 1494.

Venantius Honorius Clementianus Fortunatus [Venantius Fortunatus], an Italian presbyter, wrote on the Lord's Prayer a brief exposition — pious, elegant, and fertile in various interpretations; its beginning is, So deep a mercy of such great piety. He flourished in the year of the Lord 700.

Victorinus, Bishop of Poitiers [so printed, Pitauiensis; the martyr-commentator meant is Victorinus of Poetovio, i.e. Pettau] and martyr, was very studious of the divine volumes. Jerome, granting him erudition but taking away eloquence, says in his book On illustrious men: "Victorinus the Martyr, since he did not know Latin as well as Greek, wrote in the Latin tongue many works — grand indeed in their meanings, but rather poor in the composition of words." And in his epistle to Paulinus, repeating the same, he says: "The renowned Victorinus, crowned with martyrdom, cannot express what he understands." But in his epistle to Magnus the Orator, he seems to take erudition from him too, saying: "Although in the martyr Victorinus's books there is lacking erudition, yet there is not lacking the will to erudition." Which words of Jerome, indeed, are to be understood not of sacred, but of the profane learning of the secular disciplines. He, therefore, wrote Explanations on Genesis, on Exodus, on Leviticus, on Ecclesiastes, on the Song of Songs, on Isaiah (as far as the vision of the four-footed beasts in the desert), on Ezekiel, on Habakkuk, on Matthew, and on the Apocalypse a brief commentary of annotations disposed at intervals: which now, printed in type, is circulated, with a preface of Jerome of this kind:

Jerome, to Anatolius.

> Those who cross the perils of the sea meet with various mishaps, if the tumult of the winds be rather violent; but there is [also] fear if a gentler breeze has ruffled the back of the recumbent element — [for then] they dread ambushes. So it seems to me in this volume which you have sent, which seems to contain the explanation of Victorinus on the Apocalypse. And it is dangerous, and open to the barkings of detractors, to pass judgment on the little works of an excellent man. For both the earlier Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, and Nepos, a Bishop in the regions of Egypt, held [the same] concerning the reign of a thousand years as Victorinus did. But since you have adjured me by letter, I was unwilling to delay; and, lest I should scorn one who entreats, I at once turned over the books of the elders, and what I found in their commentaries I joined to the little works of Victorinus, from the iota onward — where he understood [things] according to the letter — from the beginning of the book to the sign of the cross, correcting the passages which had been corrupted by unskilled scribes; from there to the end of the volume, know that [things] have been added. Now it is yours to discern, and to approve what pleases you. If life be our companion, and the Lord grant health, our genius shall sweat for you especially in this volume, most dear Anatolius.

Pope Gelasius, in distinction 15, casts the writings of Victorinus among the Apocrypha. He flourished under the Emperors Valerian and Gallienus, in the year of the Lord 270.

Victorinus of Marseilles [Massiliensis], a Rhetor, addressing the person of his son Etherius, commented — in a continuous series of exposition — the first twenty-five chapters of the book of Genesis, that is, from the beginning of the book up to the death of Abraham the patriarch, with a pious sense indeed; but, being a man occupied with secular literature, and exercised under no master's teaching in the divine Scriptures, he framed opinions of lighter weight, as Gennadius says. He died when Theodosius and Valentinian were reigning, in the year of our Lord Jesus Christ 430.

Williram [Villeramus], a German by nation, a monk of St. Benedict by profession, Abbot of Maspurg [Maspurgensis], a man of elegant genius and erudition, no less strong in verse than in loose [prose] discourse, published on the Song of Songs — composed of verses of various kinds with prose interspersed — three books of commentaries, arranged with a pleasant variety, and elegantly fashioned in imitation of the books of Martianus Capella On the Nuptials of Philology and Mercury: which he entitled the EPITHALAMION ON THE NUPTIALS OF CHRIST AND THE CHURCH. Their beginning is, When the studies of the elders. He flourished under Henry III, in the year of the Lord 1070.

Vincent the Presbyter [Vincentius], a Gaul by nation, having a tongue polished by the practice of speaking and by the reading of the elders, commented on the first several Psalms, of which he read some to the holy man of God Canatus, in the hearing of Gennadius, presbyter of the church of Marseilles — promising at the same time that, if the Lord gave him life and strength, he would labor in the same style upon the whole Psalter. He flourished under the Emperor Marcian, in the year of the Lord 450.

Vincent of Beauvais [Vincentius Bellouacensis], Bishop [so printed; Vincent of Beauvais was a Dominican friar, not a bishop], a Burgundian by nation, of the Order of Preachers, with an insatiable [→]

[→ p328 (next batch): catchword "bili" (inexple-bili)]

(Rich PDF p. 328 [printed folio 309, recto]. Book IV — Vincent of Beauvais (concl.; the 32-book Speculum Naturale*), Vincent Ferrer, Vitalis, Umbert of Chartres, and Ulfilas the Goth close* letter V*; then* letter Z opens (the last letter): Zacharias of Chrysopolis, Zacharias of Hierocaesarea, and Zeno of Verona, after whom the alphabetical catalog of expositors ends and a Catalogus begins. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Letter V, continued — Vincent of Beauvais:]

...[with an insatiable] ardor of learning, teaching, reading, and writing, and never wearied by any labors and vigils of study — when he had, over a long time and with assiduous diligence, turned over the books of almost all the nations of [all] kinds, at the exhortation of friends and aided by the funds of Philip of Valois, King of the French, he gathered from the sayings of innumerable authors, both Christian and heathen, a huge volume On the Hexaemeron, divided into thirty-two great books, which he therefore entitled the MIRROR OF NATURE [Speculum Naturale], because in this one [work] he embraced whatever can be found worthy of speculation, admiration, and imitation in those things which — in the visible and invisible world, from the beginning up to the end — have been done or said, or are even still to come; the names of the several authors being noted within the very lines of the text, from whose writings he patched together this work. Now the sum of the books of the present volume is this, namely:

- On the first creation of the world — that is, On the Creator, and on those things which were created by Him before any day — book 1: which begins, Since the multitude of books.
- On the work of the first day — 1 book.
- On the work of the second day — 2 books.
- On the work of the third day — 10 books.
- On the work of the fourth day — 1 book.
- On the work of the fifth day — 2 books.
- On the work of the sixth day — 11 books.
- On the work of the seventh day (in which God, after He rested on the seventh day, works even until now) — 4 books.

He flourished under the Emperor Frederick II, in the year of the Lord 1240.

Vincent [Ferrer] of Valencia [Valentinus], of the Order of Preachers, the most celebrated preacher of all in his time, wrote on the Gospel Lections which are read on the several days of the year in the Church, three volumes of sermons, which hold the first place among the scholastic Sermon-writers. He flourished at the Council of Constance, and died in the year of the Lord 1420 [so printed "420"]; and he was enrolled among the saints by Pope Callistus, the third of that name.

Vitalis, of the Order of Minors [Franciscan], Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, made a Postil on the Apocalypse, which begins, With a great spirit he saw the last things. It is kept at Bologna, in the library of the Preachers, in manuscript.

Umbert [Umbertus], Bishop of Chartres [Carnotensis], wrote against the Jews one book on that [text] of Genesis 49, The sceptre shall not be taken away from Judah, in the year of the Lord 1100.

Ulfilas [Wulphilas] the Goth, Bishop of the Goths — whom Socrates mentions in his Ecclesiastical History — first invented the Letters of the Goths, and first delivered to them all the divine Scriptures translated by himself from Greek into the Gothic tongue, and expounded them in the Catholic [manner], for a long time contending much against the Arians. Yet Theodoret writes that he, moved by the threats and promises of Eudoxius the Arian, at last inclined to the party of Valens Augustus, [who was] laboring under the Arian plague. He flourished in the year of the Lord 370.

Z

Zacharias, Bishop of Chrysopolis, a man most celebrated in his time, explained the four Gospels — brought by Ammonius of Alexandria into one continuous body — in four books of commentaries: which, woven from the opinions of the fathers into one chain, he fitted together with beautiful skill. The beginning of the work is, On the excellence of the Gospel, and its difference from the law, etc. He flourished in the year 1100 from the childbirth of the most blessed Virgin.

Zacharias, Bishop of Hierocaesarea, illustrious in the Second Nicene Synod, wrote in the Greek tongue a Dialogue of continuous narration, explaining the golden statue from the second chapter of Daniel, whose title is ΧΡΥΣΕΙΚΩΝ [Chryseik■n], that is, THE GOLDEN STATUE OF MAN.

Zeno, Bishop of Verona and martyr, is said to have written very many sermons on various passages of the divine scripture: in place of which [i.e., under whose name] Guarino of Verona, the orator, a hundred years ago published a volume of sermons of various kinds; in which the sermons pertaining to the exposition of the sacred letters are of this kind:

- On the beginning of Genesis — two sermons.
- On Genesis 12, On Abraham — 1 sermon.
- On Genesis 28, On the dream of Jacob — 1 sermon.
- On Genesis 38, On Judah and Tamar — 1 sermon.
- On Exodus — 5 sermons.
- On Deuteronomy 15, upon Take heed to thyself — 1 sermon.
- On Job — 1 sermon.
- On the beginning of Psalm 79 — 1 sermon.
- On a verse of Psalm 100 — 1 sermon.
- On Psalm 126 — 1 sermon.
- On Psalm 127 — 1 sermon.
- On Psalm 128 — 1 sermon.
- On Psalm 129 — 1 sermon.
- On Psalm 139 — 1 sermon.
- On Isaiah — 4 sermons.
- On Daniel — 1 sermon.
- On the three young men — 1 sermon.
- On Susanna — 1 sermon.
- On Jonah — 1 sermon.
- On Luke 12, On the rich man who had a fruitful field — 1 sermon.
- On John 11, On Lazarus — 1 sermon.
- On 1 Corinthians 15, upon that [text] The first man is of the earth, earthy — On the body and the spirit — 1 sermon.

It is agreed that these sermons were for the greater part collected from various authors, who were nearly two hundred years later than Zeno. For the sermons which expound the Psalms enumerated by us were transcribed from the commentaries of Hilary, not even a word being changed; the sermon upon that [text], Take heed to thyself, together with another discourse On spite and envy, which follow this [one] in the same volume, is [the work] of St. Basil. But the other sermons — or rather fragments of sermons — on account of the diversity of style, argue various authors; and even the author of the sermon On continence, which is contained in this work, affirms that he was distant from the birth of Christ by four hundred years and more. But Peter, Bishop of Equilium [Pietro de' Natali], writes that Zeno lived under the Emperor Gallienus, and that he divinely healed the daughter of that same [emperor], who was oppressed by a desperate disease — namely, in the year of the redeemed world 260.

(Here the alphabetical catalog of Catholic expositors [Book IV] reaches its last letter and closes; an asterism ■ follows in the print, and a Catalogus begins on the next page.)

[→ p329 (next batch): catchword "CATA" (CATA-LOGVS)]

(Rich PDF p. 329 [printed folio 310, verso]. Book IV — the alphabetical catalog of Catholic expositors having closed, a new appendix opens: the Catalog of the Hebrew Expositors (the Rabbis), prefaced by Sixtus's own account of being sent by Pius V to Cremona in 1559 to destroy the Talmud; then the rabbinic commentators A–M — Ibn Ezra, Abraham Saba, Achai Gaon, Bahya, David Kimchi, Levi ben Gershon, and the opening of Menahem of Recanati. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

Catalog of the Hebrew Expositors

CATALOG OF THE HEBREW EXPOSITORS, or of the Rabbis, who expounded the divine letters in the Jewish tongue and according to the Hebrew traditions.

Pius V, Supreme Pontiff — when, before his Pontificate, he presided over the most ample and sacred Senate [tribunal] of the whole Christian Inquisition, which had been divinely conferred on him (namely, in the year of human salvation 1559) — sent me to Cremona to destroy the Talmudic books of the Hebrews, [full] of impious and monstrous doctrine, which the Jews had gathered from almost all Italy into that city, as into a common asylum of the Jewish nation. When, therefore, for that reason I had begun diligently to turn over all their libraries and printing-houses — the most copious of all that were then in Italy — I found an infinite number of Hebrew volumes; and among others, the commentaries of the Hebrew expositors, written below, on the divine Scriptures. Since I had earlier found some mention of these among our own expositors — chiefly the scholastics — it pleased me to gather their names summarily, and to append them, thus collected, at the end of this book, in the place of an appendix. And they are these:

Abraham, son of Ezra, whom the Hebrews call by the surname Aben Ezra [Ibn Ezra], that is, the Wise, a Spaniard by nation, a Grammarian, Philosopher, astrologer, and a great Theologian, wrote on the whole Old Testament 24 books. We have seen only the commentaries on Moses and the prophets, printed at Venice by Bomberg [Bambergum]. He died on the island of Rhodes, where he had lived in fame, in the year 1217.

Abraham the Spaniard wrote an exposition on the Pentateuch, which he called the BUNDLE OF MYRRH [Fasciculus Myrrhae].

Abraham Parizol [Farissol] put out explanations on Job.

Abraham Sava [Saba] composed a commentary on the Pentateuch, which is called ZEROR AMOR [Tzror ha-Mor].

Achai Gaon [Ahai], a very ancient interpreter, made a commentary on the whole [Pentateuch of] Moses, which is called SHE'ELTOTH [Seelthoth], that is, Things Inquired.

Ammai wrote an explanation on the nineteenth Psalm, to which he gave the title ON HIDDEN THINGS, Psalm 19.

Bachaiai [Bahya ben Asher] composed a great commentary on the Pentateuch, which Justinianus [the printer] recently printed at Venice. He wrote also on the five volumes which the Hebrews call Chamesh Megilloth [the Five Scrolls], that is, on Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, the Song, and Threni [Lamentations].

Bereshith Rabba, or Rabbot, is a commentary on the Pentateuch, containing a medley of Hebrew explanations.

Baruchias [Berechiah], whom (as Jerome testifies in his commentaries on Ecclesiastes) the Jews greatly admire, wrote most praised explanations on Ecclesiastes.

Hischia [Hizkiah] put out an explanation on the five books of Moses, which is called CHIZCONI [Hizkuni], that is, Hischionica.

Chavbenaki is a coined word, meaning A Measure [Modius] of pure flour. Thus a certain unnamed Rabbi entitled his commentaries on the Proverbs of Solomon.

David Kimchi [Radak], son of Rabbi Joseph Kimchi, wrote on the Psalms and on all the prophets succinct commentaries according to the letter: from which, recently, Thomas the Rhetor [Thomas Rhetus], an Englishman, translated into Latin the expositions on Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi; but Pellican [Konrad Pellikan] and Paul Fagius, heretics, [translated his] explanations on the Psalms. He also collected the Sciarascim [Shorashim], that is, a Lexicon, or Dictionary of the roots, or words, of the holy tongue, patched together from various Rabbis. He flourished about the year of our salvation 1380.

Hillel [Huillus] the Patriarch wrote commentaries on the Psalms and on Isaiah: which Origen, his contemporary, mentions in his exposition of Psalm 80, and on Isaiah, Tome 30, praising his explanations in the same passages of the same [prophet].

Jacob Minor put out a great prologue on the books of Moses.

Jehuda [Judah] wrote a commentary on the whole [Pentateuch of] Moses, called MINCHATH JEHUDA [the Offering of Judah].

Joseph the Blind [Caecus], who flourished nearly three hundred years after the second destruction of the temple (as Augustine, Bishop of Nebbio [Nebiensis; Agostino Giustiniani], testifies in his Octaplum), put out a Chaldaic translation on the Psalms.

Joseph Kimchi, father of David Kimchi, wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, on the Psalms, and [on] all the Prophets: which we have found written on parchments, among the other books brought to us. He flourished about the year of the Lord 1350.

Isaac Harmaa [Arama] wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, which are entitled HEKEDATH ISCHAC [Akedat Yitzhak], that is, The Sacrifice [Binding] of Isaac. He wrote also commentaries on the Chamesh Megilloth, that is, on the five volumes — Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, the Song, and Lamentations.

Isaac Ben-Schola [ben Sahula] collected an explanation on the psalms, from which Augustine of Nebbio translated much in his Octaplum of the psalms.

Isaac Kara [Qara / Caro], a Syrian, collected a little commentary on the Pentateuch, which is called by the Jews THOLDOTH ISCHAC [Toledot Yitzhak], that is, The Generation of Isaac, in the year of the Lord 1550.

Isaac Nathan wrote Biblical Concordances, in the likeness of the Latin concordances which Hugh of Cher [Hugo Carensis; Hugh of Saint-Cher] published on the Bible. These are called by the Hebrews IAIR NATHIB [Yair Nativ], that is, Illuminating the way.

Ishmael [Ismael] wrote a commentary on the latter part of Exodus, which is called MECHILTHA [Mekhilta].

Levi ben Gershon [Gersonides], the last of the Rabbis, wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, on Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, the Prophets, and all the historical books: which Daniel Bomberg printed at Venice.

Menahem of Recanati [Manahem à Rechanate] put out commentaries on the Pentateuch, entitled ZIONI [Tziyyoni]: of which, when nearly a thousand copies — filled with innumerable impieties of the Talmudists — had been brought to us, by command of the sacred Roman Inquisi-[tion →]

[→ p330 (next batch): catchword "Inquisi" (Inquisitionis)]

(Rich PDF p. 330 [printed folio 311, recto]. Book IV, Catalog of the Hebrew Expositors (continued) — Menahem of Recanati concl. (the Talmud-burning), Masoret, Midrash Tehillim, Maimonides (the Moreh Nevukhim*; "from Moses to Moses"), Nachmanides, Moses ha-Darshan, Pesikta, Saadia, Rashi, Sifra, Sifre,* Simeon bar Yochai (the Zohar — 2,000 copies saved from burning at Cremona), the Yalkut, and the Targum. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Catalog of the Hebrew Expositors, continued — Menahem of Recanati, concluded:]

...[by command of the sacred Roman] Senate of the Inquisition, [these] together with ten thousand other volumes of Talmudic writings, were burned.

Masoret [Massoreth], that is, Traditions and corrections of the Bible, is a work containing the emendations of various Rabbis upon the Bible.

Midrash Tehillim [Midra Theillim] is the name of a commentary, which comprises rhapsodies of explanations of various Rabbis on the Psalms. From this, Augustine, Bishop of Nebbio [Giustiniani], collected scholia in his Octaplum of the psalms.

Moses the Egyptian, son of Maimon [Maimonides], wrote a most learned work, which he entitled MORE HANEVCHIM [Moreh Nevukhim], that is, The Guide of the Erring [the Perplexed], in which he diligently expounded very many passages of divine Scripture. From this work both St. Thomas and the other scholastic Theologians bring forward various testimonies for the exposition of the six days. He flourished about the year of the Lord one thousand [so printed; Maimonides in fact belongs to the later 12th century]. Concerning him there is reported among the Hebrews a most celebrated encomium: that FROM MOSES UNTO MOSES THERE AROSE NO OTHER MOSES LIKE THIS ONE — that is, that from Moses the lawgiver up to Moses the Egyptian, there was none to be compared to this Moses in erudition. The Jews call him RAMBAM, that is, Rabbi Moses ben Maimon, comprising his name, his dignity, and his father's [name] in a single word, composed of the four capital letters of those same appellations — which they are wont to do also in most other titles of the Rabbis.

Moses of Gerona, ben Nachman [Nachmanides / Ramban], wrote learned commentaries on the Pentateuch and on Job. To him the Jews give the first place among the kabbalists of recent times.

Moses ha-Darshan [Hadarsan] put out commentaries on Genesis and on the Psalms: whose centos [extracts] the Bishop of Nebbio adduces in his Octaplum of the psalms.

Pesikta [Pesiktha], that is, Determination, is the name of a very ancient commentary, having an unknown author, which expounds the three latter books of Moses.

Saadia ben Gion [Saadia Gaon] wrote commentaries on Daniel, printed by Bomberg at Venice.

Solomon Jarchi [Rashi], a Gaul [Frenchman], whom the Jews call — by a name composed from the initial letters — Rasci [Rashi], the son of Isaac, first among the more recent [Jews] wrote commentaries on the whole Bible; and he is among his own [people] a man of great authority. He is cited here sometimes by our scholastic expositors, but especially in Lyra [Nicholas of Lyra]. He flourished about the year of the Lord one thousand.

Shir ha-Shirim [Sir Hasirim] Perush [Pirus] — that is, an explanation of the Song of Songs, collected by an uncertain author.

Sifra [Sipra], that is, The Book, is the name of an ancient commentary on Leviticus, whose author is unknown, which the common people of the Jews call THORATH COHENIM [Torat Kohanim], that is, The Priestly Law.

Sifre [Sifri] is the name of an ancient commentary on the latter part of the book of Numbers and the whole of Deuteronomy, whose author is called, by way of excellence, RAB, that is, Master.

Simeon, son of Joachai [Shimon bar Yochai], the most ancient among the Jewish expositors, wrote — before the birth of Christ — a huge volume on the Pentateuch, called ZOAR [the Zohar], of which we found two thousand copies printed in a printing-house at Cremona, and, [when they were] already destined for burning by the Spanish soldiers, we preserved [them].

Simeon ben Joachim wrote a most ample volume on Leviticus, in which — discussing the natures of almost all things — he showed how Moses, according to the correspondence of the threefold world and the nature of things, ordained the ark, the tabernacle, the vessels, the vestments, the rites, the sacrifices, and the rest of the mysteries, both to appease God and the heavenly powers, and to expiate man [after] the image of these. The same [author] composed, on all the twenty-four books of the Old Instrument, the Yalkut [Ialcut], that is, Collectanea [Gleanings], which are entitled SIMONICA [after Simeon].

Thargum [Targum], that is, Translation and Paraphrase — especially from the Hebrew tongue into the Chaldaic — is of great authority among the Hebrews. For the Jews, returning from the Babylonian captivity (in which they had forgotten the holy tongue), brought back into Palestine a foreign language, namely the Chaldaic, or Syriac, which they had learned in Chaldea; and they used it in their own land, even in the time of Christ, and into it they translated the Mosaic law and the Prophets, both former and latter. The authors of this interpretation were Onkelos, who translated the Pentateuch; Jonathan, who translated both the Law and the Prophets; [and] Rabbi Joseph, who translated the Psalter, Proverbs, Job, Ecclesiastes, the Song, Ruth, Esther, etc. Francisco Ximénez [Jiménez de Cisneros], Cardinal of the holy Roman Church, affirms that this [Targum] is sincere and faithful in the Pentateuch, but in the other volumes of divine scripture full of trifles.

[→ p331 (next batch): catchword "CA" (a new "CA…")]

---

(Rich PDF p. 331 [printed folio 312, verso]. Book IV — a third index opens: the Catalog of the Expositors of Scripture, arranged by the order of the biblical books. Grouped name-lists of the expositors who wrote on: the Old Testament; both Testaments; the Octateuch (Genesis–Chronicles); the Pentateuch; Genesis; and (beginning) Exodus. The page is set in three columns, read left-to-right continuously. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

Catalog of the Expositors of Scripture, by the Order of the Books

CATALOG OF THE EXPOSITORS OF HOLY SCRIPTURE, arranged according to the order of the volumes of both Testaments, in which are enumerated the expositors who wrote either on some, or on individual, books [of each].

Catalog of those who wrote on the Old Testament:

Aquila; Eusebius of Caesarea; Hesychius the Monk; Josephus of Jerusalem; Justus of Tiberias; Lucian; Matthew Döring; Paul of Burgos; Patrophilus; the Seventy-two Interpreters; Sophronius; Symmachus; Theodotion.

Catalog of those who wrote on both Testaments:

Albertus Magnus; Alexander of Hales; Apollinaris the Younger; Anselm of Laon; Augustine of Nebbio [Giustiniani]; Aurelius Augustine; Bartholomew of Urbino; Bede; Dionysius the Carthusian; Francesco Giorgio; Francisco Ximénez; Godelbert; Gottfried Tilmann; Godfrey of Viterbo; Haymo; Jerome; Hugh of Cher [Carensis]; Hugh of St Victor; Jacobus, Archbishop of Genoa; John Chrysostom; Isidore the Younger of Cordova; Isidore of Pelusium; Nicholas of Gorran; Nicholas of Lyra; Nicholas Zicenius; Origen; Paterius; Peter Brunaquellus; Peter Bersuire [Bertorius]; Peter the Chanter; Peter Comestor; Peter of La Palud; Peter Riga; Pontius Carbonell; Rabanus; Richard of St Victor; Rupert of Deutz; Santes Pagninus; Serafino Cumirano; Strabo; Thomas Cajetan.

On the Octateuch — that is, [those who] wrote on the eight first books of holy scripture from the beginning, namely from Genesis to Paralipomenon [Chronicles]:

Alfonso Tostado; Claudius the Monk; Gregory the Pope; Jacobus Martinus; Oecumenius; Philo Judaeus; Procopius of Gaza; Stephen the Englishman; Theodoret.

On the Pentateuch, that is, the five books of Moses, wrote:

Alan of Lille; Albert of Padua [Patauinus]; Aristobulus the Elder; Aristobulus the Younger; Augustinus Steuchus; Benedict Stendal; Bruno, Archbishop of Cologne; Cyril; Diodorus; Erardus; Eucherius; Francesco Vatablo; Jerome of Oleaster; Hugh of St Victor; Jacobus Lusitanus; John Zacharias; Matthew of Évreux [Ebroicensis]; Paul Ricius; Remigius.

ON GENESIS wrote:

Aegidius; Albinus; Alvise Lippomano; Ambrose of Conza [Compsae]; Ambrose of Milan; Anastasius the Younger; Andreas Bilius; Anselm of Canterbury; Antonius Honcala; Apion; Avitus; Aurelius Prudentius; Bruno the Ruthenian; Candidus; Clement of Alexandria; Dracontius; Eccardus; Eucherius; Eusebius of Caesarea; Eusebius of Emesa; Gennadius of Constantinople; Gregory of Nyssa; William Hammer [Hamerus]; William of Paris; William Pepin; Henricus Hassius; Henry of Langenstein; Hermann Schild [Schildius]; Girolamo Fracastoro; Girolamo Savonarola; Hilary of Arles; Hippolytus; Honorius of Autun [Augustodunensis]; John Buteo; John Duns [Scotus]; John Pico; Isotta Nogarola; Junilius; Louis the Younger; Melito; Methodius; Nicholas of Cusa; Nicholas Trivet; Novatian; Paulinus of Nola; Peter of Ailly [Aliacus]; Remigius; Richard of St Victor; Robertus Roseus; Rhodon [Rodon]; Rufinus; Salvian; Severianus; Sixtus; Strabo the Elder; Tertullian; Thomas Aquinas; Thomas Sperman; Thomas Walden [Valden]; Victorinus of Marseilles; Victorinus of Pettau [Pitabionensis]; Vincent of Beauvais; Umbert of Chartres.

ON EXODUS:

Alvise Lippomano; Ambrose of Milan; Avitus; Bonaventure; Eccardus; Ezechiel; Gregory of Nyssa; William Pepin; Gymnasius; Henricus Consueldius; Henricus Hassius; Girolamo Savonarola; Hippolytus; John Gauuer; John Ruusbroec [Rusbrochius]; Maximus the Monk; Niceas; Nicholas Alsentius; Nicholas of Dinkelsbühl [Dunkelspulus]; Rober-[t →]

[→ p332 (next batch): catchword "Rober" (Rober-tus)]

(Rich PDF p. 332 [printed folio 313, recto]. Book IV — the by-book index (continued): the expositors on Exodus (concl.), Leviticus, Numbers, Kings, Ezra, Tobit, Judith, Job, and the long list on the Psalter; ends opening "On Proverbs." Three columns, read left-to-right. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Catalog of the Expositors, by the order of the books — continued. On Exodus, concluded:]

...Robertus Roseus; Tertullian; Thomas Walden; Victorinus of Pettau.

ON LEVITICUS:

Hesychius the presbyter; John Nider; Nicholas Trivet; Radulph of Flavigny; Robertus Roseus; Thomas Walden; Tryphon; Victorinus of Pettau.

ON NUMBERS:

Ambrose of Milan; Hippolytus; Tryphon.

ON THE BOOKS OF KINGS:

Ambrose of Milan; Andreas Gallus; Angelomus the Monk; Aurelius Augustine; Bernard; Cornelius Magnanus; Diodorus; Eucherius; Gregory the Pope; Hegesippus; Hippolytus; John of Agen; Isidore of Cordova the Elder; Methodius; Nicholas Chenton; Procopius; Theodore of Ancyra.

ON EZRA:

John Ferus; Junilius.

ON TOBIT:

Ambrose of Milan; Friedrich Nausea; John Hoffmeister; Matthias Vindonice; Richard Lavinan.

ON JUDITH:

Cornelius Magnanus.

ON JOB:

Ambrose Alexander; Ambrose of Milan; the Greek Catena; Conrad of Halberstadt; Cyprian Montemartyr; Didymus; Francesco Titelmann; Gregory the Pope; Girolamo Savonarola; Hilary of Poitiers; John of Frankfurt; Odo; Olympiodorus; Philip the Monk; Polychronius; Richard Ampolus; Simon of Afflighem; Thomas Aquinas.

ON THE PSALTER:

Agathius; Albinus; Alexander Capgrave; Alexander of Chester; Alfonso de Castro; Ambrose Autpert [Amsbertus]; Ambrose of Milan; Anastasius of Antioch; Angelo Sangrini; Anselm of Lucca; Anselm of Mantua; Apollinaris; Aribo; Armandus; Arnobius; Asterius; Athanasius; Augustinus Steuchus; Aurelius Cassiodorus; Basil; Bernard; Bonaventure the Cardinal; Bruno the Carthusian; Bruno of Würzburg [Herbipolensis]; Charles de Bovelles [Bouillus]; the Greek Catena on the Psalms; Christianus Ischyrius; Christophorus Marcellus; Columbanus; Cornelius of Bitonto; Cosmas Indicopleustes; Didymus; Diodorus; Eynardus; Epiphanius Scholasticus; Eusebius of Caesarea; Eusebius of Vercelli; Eustathius of Antioch; Euthymius; Felix; Francesco Mileto; Francesco Ortisius; Francesco Pantiscozio; Francesco Petrarca; Francesco Puteanus; Francesco Titelmann; Francesco Visdomini; Francisco de Zamora; Friedrich Nausea; Gabriel Brebia; Walter Disseus; Walter Magolensis; Georg Witzel [Vicelius]; Germanus of Constantinople; Gilbert de la Porrée; Gregory the Pope; Gregory of Nyssa; William of Auvergne; William Gregory; William of Hirsau [Irsaugiensis]; William Pepin; William Vellius; Hadrianus Lametius; Henricus Logen; Girolamo Savonarola; Hieronymus Varlenius; Hilary of Poitiers; Hippolytus; Honorius; Jacobus Furnius; Jacobus Pantiscotius; Jaime Pérez of Valencia; Jacopo Sadoleto; Janus Vitalis; Innocent III (pope); Innocent V (pope); John Arundineus; Giovanni Battista Folengo; John Dominici; John Ferus; John Franciscus; John Gagny [Gagneus]; John Gerson; John Ludovicus; John of Mechelen; John Neouillanus; John Pico; John Fisher of Rochester [Roffensis]; John Torquemada; Iovita Rapicio; Lanfranc; Leander; Lecbertus; Ludolph the Carthusian; Louis Pittorio; Mapheus; Matthew of the Royal Court [Aulae regiae]; Matthias Bredenbach; Michele Aiguani [Angrianus]; Nicholas of Dinkelsbühl; Nicholas of Gorran; Nicholas Herborn; Nicholas Trivet; Ninian; Nonius Marcellus; Otfrid; Othmar [Nachtgall]; Paul Ricius; Peregrinus; Peter of Ailly; Peter of Edessa; Peter of Herentals; Peter Lombard; Peter of Perpignan; Peter Rufus; Philip the Chancellor; Placido of Parma; Prosper; Rainerius; Remigius; Richard of Exeter; Richard of Hampole [Rolle]; Robert of Lincoln [Grosseteste]; Rudolph Agricola; Serapion; Sixtus; Smaragdus; Theodoric of Herxen; Theodore of Antioch; Theodore of Heraclea; Theodoret; Thomas Aquinas; Thomas of Wales [Gualensis]; Vincent of Lérins.

ON PROVERBS:

Alexan-[der →]

[→ p333 (next batch): catchword "Alexan" (Alexander...)]

(Rich PDF p. 333 [printed folio 314, verso]. Book IV, by-book index (continued) — expositors on Proverbs (concl.), Ecclesiastes, the Song of Songs, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, all Twelve Minor Prophets, and (opening) Hosea. Three columns, read left-to-right. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Catalog of the Expositors, by the order of the books — continued. On Proverbs, concluded:]

Alexander Neckam; Alvarus; Ambrose of Milan; Basil; Evagrius; Eustathius of Antioch; Gilbert of Paris; Gregory Olympiades; Gregory the Pope; William of Auvergne; Henricus Hassius; Hippolytus; John Arboreus; Peter Brunaquellus; Peter Gottfried; Ralph Baynes; Salonius; Theophilus of Antioch; Thomas of Wales.

ON ECCLESIASTES:

Acacius; Albinus; Alexander Neckam; Dionysius of Alexandria; Garicus of Paris; Gerard Moringus; Gregory of Neocaesarea; William Alconas; Hippolytus; John Arboreus; John Dominici; John Ferus; Olympiodorus; Peter Brunaquellus; Rupert Holcoth; Salonius; Salvian; Sigebert; Victorinus of Pettau.

ON THE SONG OF SONGS:

Abbas Vercellensis; Aegidius; Agathius; Alan of la Roche [Rupensis]; Alexander of Exeter; Albinus; Ambrose Autpert; Angelomus; Anselm of Canterbury; Aponius; Apringius; Aurelius Cassiodorus; Bernard; Cyprian the Cistercian; Eccardus; Eulalius of Cynopolis; Gerard of Savona; Gilbert the Monk; Giselbert the Englishman; Gregory Olympiadas; Gregory the Pope; William the Abbot; William of Auvergne; Henry Herp [Harphius]; Henricus Hassius; Hermann Schild; Hilary; Hippolytus; Honorius; Jacobus Anglicus; Jaime Pérez; Innocent V; John Arboreus; John Dominici; John Gerson; John Halgrin; John Verdiacus; Julian of Eclanum; Justus of Urgell; Leonard of Giffoni; Luke the Abbot; Marbod; Methodius; Michael Picardus; Orosius; Pagano of Bergamo; Peter of Ailly; Peter Brunaquellus; Peter Nannius; Philippus Abbas; Philip Albert; Philo of Carpasia; Psellus; Remigius; Rethicius; Rupert Holcoth; Rupert of Limburg; Simon the Monk; Theodoret; Thomas Aquinas; Thomas the Cistercian; Thomas of Wales; Triphyllius; Victorinus of Pettau; Williram.

ON THE WISDOM OF SOLOMON:

Bellator; Eccardus; John Arundineus; Peter Nannius; Rupert Holcoth.

ON ECCLESIASTICUS:

John Alerius; Nicholas Gorran; Rupert Holcoth; Rupertus Roseus; Rupert Walsingham.

ON ISAIAH:

Adam; Alan of Lille; Aelred of Rievaulx; Ambrose of Milan; Basil; Cyril; Didymus; Eusebius of Caesarea; Francisco Foreiro; Giselbert the Englishman; Hector Pinto; Henricus Vichingan; Joachim the Abbot; Matthew of Évreux; Michael of Massa; Nicholas of Dinkelsbühl; Procopius; Richard of St Victor; Theodoret; Thomas Aquinas; Thomas Hasselbach; Victorinus of Pettau.

ON JEREMIAH:

Joachim the Abbot; Theodoret; Thomas Aquinas.

ON LAMENTATIONS [Threni]:

Anselm of Mantua; Hugh of St Victor; John of Königsaal; Jean Cinqarbres; Nicholas Cleynaerts; Paschasius; Richard Ampolus; Richard of Hampole; Theodoret; Thomas Aquinas.

ON EZEKIEL:

Alexander Neckam; the Syriac Catena; Hesychius; Gregory Nazianzen; Gregory the Pope; Girolamo Savonarola; Hippolytus; Hugh of St Victor; John of Königsaal; Michael of Cesena; Nicholas Cabasilas; Polychronius; Proclus; Richard of St Victor; Simon of Afflighem; Theodoret; Victorinus of Pettau.

ON DANIEL:

Apollinaris; Cyril; Eusebius of Caesarea; Gennadius; Hippolytus; Joachim the Abbot; John Capgrave; John Hagen; Judas [the Syrian]; Julius Africanus; Michael Picardus; Richard of St Victor; Theodoret; Zacharias.

ON ALL THE TWELVE MINOR PROPHETS:

Guido the Carthusian; William of Melitona; Remigius; Stephen the Englishman; Theodoret.

ON HOSEA:

Cyril; Didymus; Pierius; Rufi-[nus →]

[→ p334 (next batch): catchword "Ruffi" (Rufinus)]

(Rich PDF p. 334 [printed folio 315, recto]. Book IV, by-book index (continued) — Hosea (concl.), Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Haggai, Zechariah, Maccabees; the whole New Testament; all Four Evangelists; Matthew; Mark; and (opening) Luke. Three columns, read left-to-right. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Catalog of the Expositors, by the order of the books — continued. On Hosea, concluded:]

Rufinus; Theophylact.

ON JOEL: Cyril; Hugh of St Victor; Rufinus.

ON AMOS: Girolamo Savonarola; Rufinus.

ON OBADIAH: Hugh of St Victor.

ON JONAH: William Pepin; John Chrysostom; John Catardus; Theophylact.

ON MICAH: Girolamo Savonarola.

ON NAHUM: Cyprian the Monk; Theophylact.

ON HABAKKUK: Cyril; Theophylact; Victorinus of Pettau.

ON HAGGAI: Callisto of Piacenza; Georg Witzel; John Eck.

ON ZECHARIAH: Didymus; Girolamo Savonarola; Hippolytus.

ON MACCABEES: Bernard; Gregory Nazianzen; John Chrysostom; Josephus; Marius Victorinus; Simon the Englishman.

ON THE WHOLE NEW TESTAMENT:

Augustine of Ancona; Edward Leigh [Laeus]; John Baconthorpe [Bacco]; John Capgrave; John Lopis; Nicholas Zigenus; Oecumenus; Simon Atumano; Thomas Aquinas.

ON ALL FOUR EVANGELISTS:

Agrippa; Ammonius; Antonius Bruich; Apollinaris; Arnobius; Asterius; Aurelius Augustine; Bruno Archbishop of Cologne; the Greek Catena; Caesarius; Conrad; Diego de Deza; Diodorus; Dominicus Nannus; Eusebius of Caesarea; Euthymius; Fortunatianus; Gregory the Pope; Guido of Perpignan; Guittierus; Henricus Arnoldi; Hieronymus Gida; Innocent the Pope; John Abbatis; John Arboreus; John Balbus; John Castellensis; John Christophori; John Gauuer; Iuvencus; Ludolph the Carthusian; Marianus; Michael of Massa; Otfrid; Peter Isusquius; Richard Middleton; Rupert Goullet; Simon Cassian; Simon of Cremona; Simon Corroy; Tatian; Theophilus of Alexandria; Theophylact; Titus; Victor; Zacharias.

ON MATTHEW:

Alfonso Tostado; Anselm of Canterbury; Antipater of Bostra; Antonio Pucci; Arnoldus; Athanasius; Aurelius Augustine; Basil; Bonaventure; Claudius the Monk; Clement of Alexandria; Christianus; Chromatius; Cyprian of Carthage; Cyprian the Monk; Didymus; Domingo de Soto; Eccardus; Francesco Titelmann; Friedrich Nausea; Gregory of Antioch; Gregory Nazianzen; Gregory of Nyssa; William of Auvergne; Guerric; William Ludovicus of Langeac; William Pepin; James the brother of the Lord; John Chrysostom; John Doceus; John Dominici; John Ferus; John Hoffmeister; John Ludovicus; John Maitrosius; John Maria; John Regno; John of Santa Fide; John Scotus the Monk; John Soares; Jodocus; Joseph of Tiberias; Julius Africanus; Leo the Pope; Leontius; Matthew of the Royal Court; Matthias Bredenbach; Methodius; Michael Aiguani; Nicholas of Dinkelsbühl; Pantaleon; Pantaenus; Peter of Ailly; Remigius; Rudolph Lange; Severianus; Symmachus; Theodore of Heraclea; Theodoric of Herxen; Theodore of Ancyra; Theognostus; Tilmann of Aachen.

ON MARK:

Ephrem; John de Isunio [Isdinius]; Peter of Ailly.

ON LUKE:

Aelred; Albinus; Ambrose of Milan; Amphilochius; Andrew of Jerusalem; Anselm of Canterbury; Antoninus of Florence; Asterius of Amasea; Augustine of Ancona; Aurelius Augustine; Bartholomew of Bologna; Bartholomew the Little; Bernard; Bonaventure; Claude de Seyssel; Dominicus Leonus; Egbert; Epiphanius of Salamis; Francisco de Osuna; Geoffrey Allieuant; Gregory of Nyssa; Henricus Consueldius; Henry of Langenstein; Henry of Kalkar; Hubert Leonardo; Hugh of St Victor; Jacopo Sannazaro; John of Beverley; John Dominici; John Isdinius; John Fisher of Rochester; Isidore of Thessalonica; Jodocus; Michael Aiguani; Nichol-[as →]

[→ p335 (next batch): catchword "Nicol" (Nicolaus...)]

(Rich PDF p. 335 [printed folio 316, verso]. Book IV, by-book index (continued) — Luke (concl.), John, Acts, all Pauline Epistles, Romans, Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Titus, Hebrews, all Catholic Epistles, the Catholic Epistle of John, and (opening) the Apocalypse. Three columns, read left-to-right. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Catalog of the Expositors, by the order of the books — continued. On Luke, concluded:]

Nicholas Gallus; Odo; Peter of Ailly; Theodoric of Herxen.

ON JOHN:

Albinus; Ambrose of Milan; Amphilochius; Andrew of Crete; Anselm; Augustine; Basil; Bernard; Bessarion; Bonaventure; Claude Guilliaud; Cornelius Musso; Cyril; Didymus; Francesco Titelmann; George of Trebizond; Gilbert de la Porrée; Gregory of Corinth; William of Aachen; Joachim the Abbot; John of Santa Fide; Jodocus; Joseph of Tiberias; Isaac; Lawrence Giustiniani; Nonnus of Panopolis; Peter Scala; Stephen Poloniacus; Theodore of Heraclea.

ON THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES:

Alexander Dolensis; Arator; Aurelius Cassiodorus; Diodorus of Tarsus; Euthalius; Joseph of Tiberias; Novatus; Peter Apian; Theodore of Ancyra; Tertullian; Thomas Walden.

ON ALL THE EPISTLES OF PAUL:

Adam; Alan of Lille; Albert of Padua; Albinus; Ambrose of Conza; Ambrose of Milan; Anselm of Canterbury; Apollinaris; Augustinus Romanus; Bruno the Carthusian; Caius Marius Victorinus; the Latin Catena on Paul; Claudius of Auxerre; Claude Guilliaud; Diodorus; Francesco Titelmann; Gilbert de la Porrée; Gottschalk; Gregory of Rimini; Gregory Primaticius; Guttierus; Heraclius; Innocent V; John Arboreus; John Christophori; John Isdinius; John Milbach; John Pfeffer; John Vitlichius; John Zacharias; Lanfranc; Matthew of Aquasparta; Paduanus; Peter Lombard; Peter of Sens; Peter of Tripoli; Photius; Primasius; Radulph of Flavigny; Ramaldus; Remigius; Richard Middleton; Rupert Regno; Sedulius; Simon of Cremona; Simon of Speyer; Stephen Langton; Theodore of Heraclea; Theodoret; Theophylact; Thomas Aquinas; Terneus.

ON ROMANS:

Aegidius; Antonius Bruich; Asterius; Clement Araneus; Domingo de Soto; German de Brie; William Theodor.; Henricus Consueldius; Hugh of St Victor; Jacopo Nacchianti; Jacopo Sadoleto; John Arundineus; John Baconthorpe; John Cassian; John Dominici; John Duns; Matthew of Aquasparta; Nicholas Grandis; Philibert Aresches; Sixtus of Siena; Sixtus of Como; Stephen the Postillator; Theodolus; Thomas Walden.

ON CORINTHIANS:

John Dominici; John Haiton; John Hoffmeister; John Victorinus; Pierius.

ON GALATIANS:

Acacius; Alexander of Cappadocia; Apollinaris; Didymus; Eusebius of Emesa; Severianus; Theodore of Heraclea.

ON EPHESIANS:

Jacopo Nacchianti.

ON PHILIPPIANS:

John Hoffmeister; Gregory of Nyssa.

ON TITUS:

Richard Lavinan.

ON HEBREWS:

Cyril; Constantinus; Gennadius; William of Melitona; Hesychius; Jerome of Verona; John Huldarici; Nicholas Grandis; Stephen the Postillator; Thomas Sperman.

ON ALL THE CATHOLIC EPISTLES:

Ambrose of Conza; Augustine of Ancona; Aurelius Cassiodorus; Claude Guilliaud; Didymus; Francesco Titelmann; Gregory of Rimini; Giovanni Battista Folengo; John of Königsaal; John Hoblet; Nicholas of Dinkelsbühl; Thomas Sperman; Thomas Walden.

ON THE CATHOLIC EPISTLE OF JOHN:

John Ferus; Girolamo Savonarola.

ON THE APOCALYPSE:

Albinus; Ambrose of Conza; Ambrose of Milan; Andrew of Caesarea; Apringius; Arethas; Ascensius [Josse Bade]; Augustinus Romanus; Aurelius Augustine; Aurelius Cassiodorus; Bernardino of Siena; Bruno of Segni; Claudius Montemartyr; Coelius Pannonius; Dionysius of Alexandria; Fridericus Genetus; Gaufredus; Gennadius of Marseilles; Henricus Hassius; Helias; Hippolytus; Jacob of Stralen; Joachim the Abbot; Ioan-[nes →]

[→ p336 (next batch): catchword "Ioan" (Ioannes...)]

(Rich PDF p. 336 [printed folio 317, recto]. Book IV — the by-book/topical index concludes: the Apocalypse (concl.), the Mass-lections, the Passion of Christ, the Decalogue, the Lord's Prayer, the Hail Mary, and the Ferial Canticles; then a Second Catalog (by exegetical method) opens, its first class the Abridgers. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Catalog of the Expositors, by the order of the books — continued. On the Apocalypse, concluded:]

John Annius; John of Wales; John Haiton; John Henten; John Tacesphalus; John Torphe; Jordanus; Irenaeus; Justin; Melito; Methodius; Nepos; Nicholas Alsentius; Primasius; Serafino of Fermo; Tyconius; Thomas Suduolcas [Walden]; Ubertino of Casale; Victorinus the Martyr; Vitalis the Cardinal.

Catalog of those who wrote separately on the Gospels, epistles, and other lections of divine scripture that are read in the Masses (whether through Lent or through the circle of the year):

Albert of Padua; Albinus; Anthony of Bitonto; Antonius Bruich; Antonio Gislandi; Aurelius Augustine; Bede; Callistus; Caesarius; Cyril of Jerusalem; David; Egbert; Ericus; Eusebius of Emesa; Flavian; Francisco de Osuna; Friedrich Nausea; Fulgentius; Walter Disseus; Georg Witzel; Gerard of Stredam; Gregory the Pope; Gottschalk; Guerric; William Pepin; Haymo; Henry of Kalkar; Henricus Consueldius; Henry Herp; Henricus Helmesius; Henry of Langenstein; Henry of Friemar; Hermann Petra; Hildegard; Honorius; Jacobus of Genoa; Jacob Schöpper; Innocent III; John Arundineus; John Beethz; John Castellensis; John Doceus; John Dominici; John Ferus; John Gauuer; John Hoffmeister; John Justus; John Maria; John Nider; John Niuecellensis; John Regno; John Royaerts; John Tauler; John Torquemada; Jodocus; Maurice of Paris; Maximus of Turin; Michael of Cesena; Nicholas of Cusa; Nicholas Herborn; Nicholas of Dinkelsbühl; Peter Chrysologus; Peter of Speyer; Peter Auriol; Sanctius; Sixtus; Smaragdus; Stephen of Paris; Sylvester; Titus; Thomas Hasselbach.

Catalog of those who wrote on the Passion of Christ, according to the history of the four Evangelists:

Antonio de Guevara; Boninus; Dominic Mancini; Francesco Zichenius; Georgius Molitoris; Gerard Lorich; Gregory Nazianzen; William of Aachen; Henricus Arnoldi; Henricus Gulpen; Henry Suso; Hieronymus Patavinus; John Benius; John Caneman; John of Capistrano; John Ferus; John Francesco Quintiano; John Tauler; Leo the Pope; Theodoric of Herxen; Tullio Crispoldi.

On the Decalogue:

Antiochus the Monk; Arnoldus; Bonaventure; Friedrich Nausea; Gerard of Stredam; Gottschalk; Henry Herp; Henry of Friemar; Hermann of Cologne; John Beetz; John Gerson; John Nider; Michael of Milan; Nicholas of Dinkelsbühl; Thomas Aquinas; Thomas Hasselbach.

On the Lord's Prayer:

Aegidius; Albertus Magnus; Bernard; Bonaventure; Charles de Bovelles; Cyprian of Carthage; Hermann of Cologne; Hermann Petra; Girolamo Savonarola; John Gerson; John Ludovicus; John Pico; Jodocus; Nicholas of Dinkelsbühl; Peter of Ailly; Theodoric of Herxen; Thomas Aquinas; Thomas Hasselbach.

On the Angelic Salutation [the Hail Mary]:

Aegidius; Bernard; Henry of Langenstein; John Isdinius; Peter of Ailly; Theodoric of Herxen; Thomas Aquinas.

On the Ferial Canticles:

Euthymius; Jaime Pérez of Valencia; Theodoret; Ludolph the Carthusian.

Second Catalog — the Expositors Distributed by Method

ANOTHER CATALOG, in which the expositors of divine Scripture are distributed into various classes, according to the variety of the methods which the sacred expositors used in expounding the holy letters.

Abridgers [Abbreviatores], who abridged the prolix commentaries of the expositors:

Aretas; Bede; Euthymius; Jerome of Stridon; Odo of Cluny; Peter Ximenius; Simon of Afflighem; Theodoret; Theophylact.

[→ p337 (next batch): catchword "ANNO" (Anno-tatores…)]

(Rich PDF p. 337 [printed folio 318, verso]. Book IV, the Second Catalog (expositors by method) continues — Annotators, Chronographers, Compilers, Collectors, Commentators (a note), Compendium-makers, Dialogue-writers, Dictionary-makers, Disputants, Eclogue-writers, Letter-writers, Geographers, Harmony-makers, and (opening) Homilists. Three columns; the method-classes run in alphabetical order. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Second Catalog (by method) — continued:]

Annotators [Annotatores]:

Apollinaris the Younger; Anselm of Laon; Aurelius Augustine; Bernardino Gadolo; Francesco Marone; Francesco Titelmann; Jerome of Stridon; Hugh of St Victor; John Benedictus; Nicholas Zigenus; Origen; Peter Auriol [Verberius]; Richard of St Victor.

Chronographers [Chronographi]:

Bede; Eusebius; Hermann Contractus; John Driedo; Julius Africanus; Joseph of Jerusalem; Philo Judaeus; Richard of St Victor.

Compilers [Coacervatores]:

Alfonso Tostado; Gregory the Pope; Henry of Langenstein; Sixtus of Como; Thomas Hasselbach; Vincent of Beauvais.

Collectors — rhapsodists and cento-makers [Collectores, Rapsodi Centonarii]:

Alalphus; Aloysius; Arethas; Augustine of Ancona; Bartholomew of Urbino; Bede; the Greek Catena on Job; the Greek Catena on the Psalms; the Greek Catena on the Gospels; Dominicus Nannus; Epiphanius Scholasticus; Eucherius; Euthymius; Eudocia; Francesco Puteanus; Gottfried Tilmann; Werner of Paris; Haymo; Henricus Helmesius; Paterius; Patricius; Peter of Tripoli; Peter of Herentals; Primasius; Proba; Rabanus; Santes Pagninus; Seclubius; Theodolus; Thomas Aquinas.

Commentators [Commentatores]: Since there are very few expositors of divine scripture who have not elaborated something in the method of commentary; and again, since (as we advised in the third book of this work) it has come about that whatever [are] the labors of the sacred expositors are called "commentaries," we have judged it superfluous to append here a Catalog of commentators.

Compendium-makers [Conpendiarii], who drew the divine scriptures into a compendium:

Alan of Lille; Aurelius Cassiodorus; John the Monk; Peter Bersuire.

Dialogue-writers [Dialogistae]:

Apollinaris the Younger; Aurelius Augustine; Jacopo Sadoleto; John Gerson; Paduanus; Salonius; Zacharias.

Dictionary-makers [Dictionarii]:

Andreas Placus; Bede; Epiphanius; Eucherius; Francisco Ximénez; John Benedictus; John Pratus; Isidore of Seville; Mammotretus; Marcus of Ulm; Origen; Philo; Santes Pagninus.

Disputants — question-writers [Disputatores Quaestionarii]:

Aegidius; Alfonso Tostado; Albinus; Apollinaris; Antonio Gislandi; Aurelius Augustine; Bede; Cyril; Eucherius; Eusebius of Caesarea; Francesco Giorgio; Jerome; Hugh of St Victor; John Arboreus; Justin; Matthew Döring; Methodius; Paul of Burgos; Philip of Side; Philo Judaeus; Richard of Cluny; Serafino Cumirano; Tatian; Theodoret; Thomas Aquinas.

Eclogue-writers / excerptors [Eglogistae]:

Arlottus; Aurelius Augustine; Cyprian of Carthage; Defensor; John Mentolonius; John Niuecellensis; Melito; Nicholas Hanapus; Peter, bishop of Città Nuova.

Letter-writers [Epistolarii]:

Ambrose; Aurelius Augustine; Jerome; Isidore of Pelusium.

Geographers [Geographi]:

Adamnan; Albert the Patriarch; Bede; Burchard; Callisto of Piacenza; Eusebius of Caesarea; William of Aachen; Ludolf von Suchen; Matthaeus Aurogallus; Oronce Finé; Peter Apian; Rudolph Lange; Roger Bacon.

Harmony-makers [Harmonici]:

Ammonius of Alexandria; Antonius Bruichius; Diego de Deza; Dominicus Nannus; Eusebius of Caesarea; Gerard Lorich; John Gerson; Robert Goullet; Simon Corroy; Sixtus of Siena; Tatian; Theophilus of Alexandria; Victor.

Homilists & Expounders [Homiliastae & Enarratores]:

Albinus; Ambrose of Milan; Amphilochius; Anastasius; Anselm of Canterbury; Antiochus; Antonio Pucci; Aurelius Augustine; Basil; Bede; Bernard; Candidus; Cyril of Alexandria; Cyril of Jerusalem; Ericus; Eusebius of Emesa; Francesco Visdomini; Friedrich Nausea; Fulgentius; Gilbert the Cistercian; Gregory Nazianzen; Gregory of Nyssa; Gregory the Pope; Guerric; Haymo; Hilary; Hippolytus; Hugh of St Victor; Jacob Schöpper; John Chrysostom; Ioan-[nes →]

[→ p338 (next batch): catchword "Ioannes" (the Homilists continue)]

(Rich PDF p. 338 [printed folio 319, recto]. Book IV, the Second Catalog (by method) continues — Homilists (concl.), Isagogics, Index-makers, Meditators, Paraphrasers, Partitioners, Poets, Sciographers, and the long class of Scholastics. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[Second Catalog (by method) — continued. Homilists & Expounders, concluded:]

John Eck; John Ferus; John Hoffmeister; John Justus; John Maria Verattus; Isidore Clario; Jodocus; Maximus of Turin; Origen; Peter Chrysologus; Peter of Edessa; Philip the Chancellor; Severianus; Zeno; Peter Comestor; Philo Judaeus; Rainerius Snoy of Gouda.

Isagogics [Isagogici]:

Alanus Lymna; Alard of Amsterdam; Ambrose of Conza; Aurelius Augustine; Aurelius Cassiodorus; Bede; Bonaventure; Eucherius; Francesco Rinzius; Georg Witzel; Werner of Paris; Guido of Évreux; William Gregory; Hermann Schild; Hugh of St Victor; Jacob Gouschelius; Jaime Pérez of Valencia; John Bertramus; John Driedo; John Gerson; John Hagen; Othmar Nachtgall; Peter Bersuire; Rabanus; Santes Pagninus; Theodorus; Tyconius.

Index-makers [Indicistae]:

Conrad of Halberstadt; Euthalius; Gabriel Brunus; Hugh of Cher.

Meditators [Meditatores]:

Bernard; Bonaventure; Dionysius the Carthusian; Henry Herp; Girolamo Savonarola; John Gerson; John Louis Vives; Ludolph the Carthusian; Ninian; the bishop of the Picts; Peter of Ailly.

Paraphrasers [Paraphrastae]:

Christianus Ischirius; Francesco Titelmann; Gregory of Neocaesarea; Hegesippus; John Torquemada; Joseph of Jerusalem; Justus of Tiberias.

Partitioners [Partitores], who — the books of divine scripture being divided into parts — imposed on each of the parts its summaries and arguments:

Alexander Dolensis; Bonaventure; Cyrus Prodromus; Francesco Gothus; John Benedictus; Nicephorus.

Poets [Poetae]:

Alexander of Villedieu; Álvaro Gómez; Angelo Sangrini; Apollinaris the Elder; Arator; Avitus; Aurelius Prudentius; Bonaventure; Bonino Mombrizio; Caedmon; Cornelius Magnanus; Dracontius; Dominic Mancini; Eudocia; Eulalius; Ezechiel; Francesco Bonadus; Francesco Gothi; Francesco Spinola; Gerard of Breda; Gregory Nazianzen; Godfrey; Godelbert; Guido of Ferrara; Girolamo Fracastoro; Hieronymus Patavinus; Jerome of Stridon; Girolamo Vida; Hilary of Arles; Jacobus Furnius; Jacopo Sannazaro; John Francesco Quintiano; John Gagny; John Neouillanus; Iovita Rapicio; Iuvencus; Louis the Younger; Maffeo Vegio; Marbod; Marius Victorinus; Matthias Vindonicensis; Nicephorus; Patricius; Peter of Edessa; Peter Riga; Peter of Rosenheim; Proba; Salvian; Sedulius; Sigebert; Theodolus; Theodore the Abbot; Tertullian.

Sciographers [Sciographi]:

Albrecht Dürer; Aurelius Cassiodorus; Bede; Callisto of Piacenza; Damiano Maraffi; Eusebius of Caesarea; Jerome of Stridon; John Buteo; Oronce Finé; Peter Apian; Richard of St Victor.

Scholastics [Scholastici]:

Aegidius of Viterbo; Alan of Lille; Alanus Lymna; Alan of la Roche; Albert Magnus; Albert of Padua; Alexander Dolensis; Alexander of Hales; Alexander Neckam; Alfonso Tostado; Anthony of Bitonto; Antoninus of Florence; Ascensius the Franciscan; Augustine of Ancona; Augustinus Romanus; Bartholomew of Bologna; Benedict Stendal; Bernardino of Siena; Bonaventure the Cardinal; Clement Araneus; Conrad of Halberstadt; Conrad of Hirsau; Crisostomo Javelli; David; Dionysius the Carthusian; Eccardus; Egbert; Francesco Marone; Gabriel Brebia; Geoffrey Allieuant; Walter Disseus; Gerard of Bologna; Gerard of Savona; Gerard of Stredam; Gilbert of Paris; Gilbert of Poitiers; Gilbert the Englishman; Werner of Paris; Guido of Évreux; Guido of Perpignan; William Alconas; William of Auvergne; William of Aachen; William of Paris; William Pepin; William Vellis; Gregory of Rimini; Henry Arnoldi; Henricus Consueldius; Henry Gulpen; Henry of Kalkar; Henry of Langenstein; Henry Vichingen; Henri-[cus →]

[→ p339 (next batch): catchword "Henricus" (the Scholastics continue)]

(Rich PDF p. 339 [printed folio 320, verso]. Book IV — the Second Catalog (by method) concludes (Scholastics concl., Supplers, Thematics, Translators); then a new closing treatise opens: A Brief Admonition on the False Inscription of Books (why the titles/attributions of many church writings were fabricated or corrupted, and how to detect it). Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Second Catalog (by method) — continued. Scholastics, concluded:]

Henry of Friemar; Hermann Petra; Hermann Schild; Hubert Leonardo; Ubertino of Casale; Hugh of Cher; Jacobus Anglicus; Jacobus, Bishop of Christopolis; Jacobus, Archbishop of Genoa; Jacobus Lusanensis; Jacobus Magnus; Jacobus Martinus; Jacob of Stralen; Ludolf von Suchen; Innocent III; Innocent V; John Annius; John Baconthorpe; John Balbus; John Beethz; John Duns; John of Frankfurt; John of Wales; John Gauuer; John Gerson; John Hagen; John Haiton; John Nider; John Noblet; Leonard of Giffoni; Ludolph the Carthusian; Matthew Döring; Matthew of Évreux; Michael Aiguani; Michael of Cesena; Michael of Massa; Nicholas Alsentia; Nicholas of Gorran; Nicholas of Lyra; Nicholas Trivet; Paul of Burgos; Peter Bersuire; Peter Gottfried; Peter of La Palud; Peter Riga; Peter Scala; Peter Auriol; Philip the Chancellor; Richard Ampolus; Richard of Exeter; Richard Lavinan; Richard Middleton; Rupert Holcoth; Rupert de Regno; Rupert Walsingham; Sancho de Porta; Sertorius; Simon of Cremona; Simon of Speyer; Stephen the Englishman; Sylvester Prierias; Thomas Aquinas; Thomas Hasselbach; Thomas Cajetan; Thomas of Wales; Thomas Sperman; Thomas Walden; Werner de Laer; Hubert Leonardo; Ubertino of Casale.

Supplers [Suppletores], who supplied and completed the imperfect commentaries of the expositors:

Gilbert the Monk; Gregory of Nyssa; Jodocus; Eudocia.

Thematics [Thematici]:

Ambrose; Gregory of Nyssa; Philo Judaeus; Vincent of Beauvais.

Translators [Translatores]:

Aquila of Sinope; Augustine, Bishop of Nebbio; Edward Leigh; Eusebius of Caesarea; Felix of Prato; Francisco Ximénez; William, Abbot of Hirsau; Hesychius the Monk; Jerome of Leopolis [Lviv]; Jerome of Stridon; James the Apostle; Jacobus, Archbishop of Genoa; John, King of Aragon; John Chrysostom; John Dietenberger; John Eck; Diego López de Zúñiga [Stunica]; John Poccanus; John Cinqarbres; Joseph of Tiberias; the Italian [Old-Latin] edition; Lucian the Martyr; Michael Adam; Origen; Patrophilus of Scythopolis; Peter Sutor; Robert Olivétan; Rudolph Agricola; Santes Pagninus; the Seventy-two Interpreters; Simon Atumano; Sophronius; Symmachus; the Syriac edition; Theodotion; Thomas Cajetan; Ulfilas, bishop of the Goths.

A Brief Admonition on the False Inscription of Books

A Brief Admonition on the False Inscription of Books, showing for what causes it has come about that the inscriptions [titles/attributions] of many Ecclesiastical volumes were either fabricated or corrupted, and by what conjectures one may detect the fiction or falsehood of the inscriptions.

Not without reason did the ancient expositors of illustrious writers prescribe that the inscriptions of works, and the names of the authors, be diligently inquired into at the beginning of each volume, and weighed with prudent judgment.[1] For they perceived how much it matters to know of what erudition and authority the author of each work was — especially in the writings of the sacred Fathers and of the noble Doctors of the Church: whence, as if from the oracles of the Academy of Theologians, [the theologians] receive the constancy of their assertions, and the Supreme Pontiffs take [thence] the decrees by which the Christian world is ruled. And I myself, not ignorant of this — since I have often indicated in this volume that many pseudepigrapha, adulterine, and supposititious [works] are found among the monuments of the Catholic expositors, [works] which are not [those] of the men whose titles and inscriptions they bear — it has seemed good to me, for the benefit of those who are more teachable than learned, first to explain from what causes and occasions the error of fabricated inscriptions has arisen, and then to show by what marks the fiction of such titles may be discerned.

That I may therefore begin from the first: the manner of fabricating an inscription is, in general, twofold[2] — one proceeding from the very authors of the works, the other devised by the readers. Further, the occasions of inscribing [titles] taken up by the authors are some honorable, some base. Among the honorable, in the first place is to be reckoned the omission of the inscription. For it happens that the inscriptions of books are for the most part deliberately omitted by their authors, and then are inscribed by the copyists and title-writers however it seemed good to them; but of the omitted inscriptions there can be various causes.

First [→]

[→ p340 (next batch): catchword "Primùm"]

---

[1] The inscriptions of works, and the names of the authors, at the beginning of volumes, must be diligently weighed. [2] There are two causes of fabricated inscriptions.

(Rich PDF p. 340 [printed folio 321, recto]. Book IV — the Admonition on the False Inscription of Books continues: the honorable causes of anonymous or misattributed titles (modesty; anonymous testing of judgment, per Gregory Nazianzen; Paul's Hebrews, per Jerome; avoidance of envy; humility), the pseudo-correspondences (Paul–Seneca, the Phalaris and Brutus letters, Porcius Latro's Cicero declamation), then the base causes (hoaxers and heretics; the Manichaean apostolic forgeries; Calvin as "Alcuin"), and corrupted titles from equivocation of names (Rufinus, Erasmus). Two-column prose. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[A Brief Admonition on the False Inscription of Books — continued:]

First, the zeal of modesty and humility: for which reason indeed, since the author of the book On the Cardinal Virtues of Christ testifies, to Pope Cornelius, that he had been unwilling to prefix his own name as the title of his work — I know not who ascribed it to Cyprian and inserted it among his writings, perhaps moved by the conjecture that Cyprian [too] wrote to that same pontiff.

Then there are those who, for the sake of testing another's judgment, publish their lucubrations lacking a title, so that — as if hiding behind the tablet in the manner of Apelles — they may learn the opinions of the readers, and correct the faults of the work freely detected by them. Thus that great Gregory the Theologian [Nazianzen] writes, in the preface of his book On the Faith, that he had begged his friend to read that same book — the author's name being removed and the person of the composer concealed — to learned and prudent men, so that, if [the friend] had prompted anyone [to object] that something there seemed less rightly stated, it might be emended by the counsel of many.

There have been also those who abstained from titles for the benefit of those by whom they wished their [works] to be read, lest by the title of a despised or little-favored name they should diminish the esteem of the work and keep readers from its usefulness. This Jerome asserts that Paul once did, writing to the Hebrews:[1] since he knew himself to be gravely hateful to them on account of the neglected traditions of the Pharisees and the Mosaic ceremonies, he was unwilling to deter them, by the prefixing of a hateful name, from the reading of a most salutary epistle. Whence it came about that certain of the ancient fathers ascribed it either to Barnabas or to Clement. Nor were there lacking those who, to avoid envy, hatred, and the perils of dangers, published their writings marked with no name, lest they should provoke against themselves those who, by the published writings, were either injured or at least thought themselves injured. To these afterwards someone, led by some slight conjecture, appended a title, such as happened then to be at hand. There have likewise been found those who — [having] certain little works of their own of very slight moment, written for the sake of rude and simple friends — were unwilling to prefix their own name, lest the rudeness of the composition and the humility of the subject should detract from the composer's authority. These then, in the progress of time, obtained a chance inscription from a chance title-giver.

From nearly the same causes flowed the custom of fabricated inscriptions, preserved by several of the ancient authors. Salvian, Bishop of Marseilles, for this reason put out his parenetic [exhortatory] books under the fictitious appellation of Timothy, [addressed] to the Church of God spread throughout the whole world, so that — the vanity of human glory being neglected — he might render the honor of that labor to God alone. Vincent of Lérins, a most eloquent presbyter, upon the disputations which he composed against the profane novelties of the heretics, his own name being hidden (hateful to the heretics), imposed the title of Peregrinus [the Stranger], so that they might the more willingly be read by the heretics, who are greedy of strange things. There is also another reason for the authors' fabricating a title — namely, the exercise of studies: since in those [works] which are wont to be written for the sake of exercise, titles are not seriously prefixed, as in declamatory themes, which the Greeks call προγυμνάσματα, or μελέται — that is, pre-exercises or meditations — in which those who exercise themselves put not their own names, but [the name] of him whose person they attempt to represent. Of this kind are believed to be, among our own [writers], the epistles of Paul to Seneca and Seneca's Epistles to Paul, and the dialogue of Augustine and Orosius on Genesis; but among the heathen, the epistles of Phalaris of Agrigentum, and the epistles of Brutus. Thus Porcius Latro treated Cicero's argument against Catiline — playing, of course, the person of Cicero — and, whenever it fell [to him to speak], he calls himself Tullius, not Porcius. Hence the error of those who think the fictitious matter to be serious, and believe such little works to be [the works] of those under whose names they are fabricated. These, then, and [causes] like these, are the not-blameworthy causes of the varied inscriptions, to which the authors themselves — yet without their fault — seem to have given occasion.

But among the base and shameful occasions of pseudepigraphy arisen through the fault of authors — that I may not enumerate them singly — that which is the worst of all has come forth from a twofold kind of most wicked men. Of these, certain sycophants, or rascals, born to mock and impose, adorn their trifles and ditties (fabricated for jest and mockery) with illustrious inscriptions, so that, while unlearned readers take up such follies as though the offspring of noble writers, and unroll them with admiration, they [the hoaxers] meanwhile enjoy, not without laughter, their gaping credulity. But others, laboring under the heretical plague, wrap their most pestilent writings in the splendid coverings of Catholic titles, so that, under the pretext of an orthodox name, their poisons may be scattered more quickly and more widely among the common people, to the greater harm of men.[2] Hence once arose those most impudent pseudepigrapha — namely, the Ascension of Moses, the Apocalypse of Elijah, the Gospels of Thomas, Thaddaeus, Philip, Bartholomew, the Acts, [the Gospels] of Peter, Andrew, and John, and other trifles like these — devised by the disciples of Manichaeus the Persian, who had imposed on themselves the names of the twelve apostles.

Thus far concerning the causes of falsified inscriptions, drawn both from the probity and from the improbity of authors: now it must be said of the occasions of corrupted titles, which have emanated from outsiders and strangers.[3] These are chiefly two — error, and fraud (fraud looks toward error and impudence): [namely,] the equivocation of a Name; the agreement of the Argument or of the style; the similitude of the Persons to whom, or by whom, works are dedicated; also, as I have already said, the defect of a title; and the simulation of a title for the sake of exercise. From Equivocation it frequently happens in practice that an affinity of names, or of surnames, or of titles has given a handle for erring — as once [it did] to Rufinus, presbyter of Aquileia, who, deceived by the similarity of the words, inscribed the Enchiridion of Xystus the Pythagorean to Xystus [Sixtus] the Pontiff, and attributed the Apology for Origen of Pamphilus and Eusebius to Pamphilus the martyr, a devotee of Origen. Erasmus, led by a similar error, [attributed] the Commentaries on the Psalter of Arnobius the presbyter to Arnobius [→]

[→ p341 (next batch): catchword "Arnobio"]

[1] What moved St. Paul not to ascribe his name to the Epistle to the Hebrews. [2] Heretics within our own memory have inscribed their books with fabricated names, to deceive unlearned readers — thus Calvin called himself Alcuin. [3] The inscriptions of books are corrupted for two causes.

(Rich PDF p. 341 [printed folio 322, verso]. Book IV — the Admonition on the False Inscription of Books continues: misattribution by style/subject similarity (Archytas → Aristotle; Julian of Eclanum → Jerome); deliberate fraud (profiteering booksellers; heretics disguising Apollinaris under Athanasius and a Tertullian tract under Cyprian; plagiarists like John Gast; forgeries out of enmity — the pseudo-apostles' false Pauline letters, 2 Thess 2:2; Origen's and Leo's complaints); and finally misattribution from excessive love of an author. Two-column prose. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[A Brief Admonition on the False Inscription of Books — continued:]

...[Erasmus attributed the Commentaries on the Psalter of Arnobius the presbyter] to Arnobius the Rhetor, that most flourishing [author]. From this deception it came about that not a few works of Thomas the Englishman were given to Thomas the Angelic Doctor [Aquinas]. From the omission of titles, too, and from the occasional fiction of titles (as we advised above), it happens that less-learned readers, or hasty writers, conjecture that books destitute of a title are to be ascribed to one [author] rather than another, and think that exercises with a simulated title are the compositions of those whose fictitious titles they bear. The similitude of style also, or the community of subject, or the nearness of those to whom (or by whom) the writings are sent, not rarely cause the studious, in distinguishing books lacking a title through various chances, to ascribe the name not of him whose the work is, but of him whose they suspect it to be — either because another has written on a similar matter, or [written] to the same [persons], or in a similar style and method. Thus among the philosophers there are those who affirm that the Categories of Archytas of Tarentum were wrongly prefixed to Aristotle's Organon, and marked with the Aristotelian name for no other cause than because of the similitude of the matter treated by both. Thus among the Theologians there are those who assert that that celebrated epistle, or little book, which Julian, Bishop of Eclanum — infected with the Pelagian stain — wrote to the virgin Demetrias, was on that account ascribed to Jerome, because he too wrote to the same virgin on a not-dissimilar subject. Again it sometimes happens that either a copyist or some studious person, on account of the not-dissimilar subject of the work, couples the little books of diverse authors in the same volume; then a reader too little attentive — either not finding the ascribed titles, or [finding them] shown obliterated — thinks all [the works] to be of him whose name he has beheld on the frontispiece of the volume.

There are, on the other hand, those who, of set purpose, corrupt and change the inscriptions by fraud and deceit, and that for various but most base ends. Some, for the sake of usefulness, gain, and base lucre — such as the writers, printers, dealers, and sellers of volumes — crown the offspring of common, and sometimes even of obscure, men with the titles of nobler authors, evidently by such a paint hunting the foolish credulity of hasty buyers. In this place the English have thrust upon us the centos of a certain collector on the volumes of Genesis and Kings, [passed off] for the Commentaries of Eucherius, Bishop of Lyons; and the patches of an anonymous and more recent rhapsodist on the annual Gospel-lections, [passed off] for the Homilies of Eusebius of Emesa; likewise they have sold the Collections of Theophylact on Paul, and [the collections] of a Rabbi on the Threni [Lamentations] of Jeremiah, under the more splendid names of St. Athanasius and St. Jerome. Others, contaminated with the plagues of divers heresies, transform the books published by the execrable doctors of their sects and — the authors' names being removed, as being hateful and condemned by ecclesiastical censure — put in their place the plausible appellations of the Catholic Fathers, by which the deceived simplicity of readers may drink the poisons of the heresies without any suspicion of danger. So once, as Rufinus writes in his Apologeticus, the Pneumatomachian heretics, who blasphemed the Holy Spirit, sold a little book of Tertullian thinking wrongly about the faith of the Trinity — propagated in many codices under the name of Cyprian the martyr — for a small sum of money, so that the buyers, enticed both by the greatness of the man and by the smallness of the price, might the more willingly buy it and embrace the latent errors as sacred dogmas, approved by the authority of so great a martyr. So once, as Evagrius reported in the third [book] of his Ecclesiastical History, the Nestorians and Eutychians published the writings of Apollinaris — from which they had received the seeds of their deceptions — under the title of Athanasius the Great, so that by that splendor of light they might the more easily dazzle the eyes of Catholics. So in our own age we have seen the most pestilent writings of heretics, transformed [only] as far as the title, into the labors of holy Catholic men and of the prelates of the Church — which, since I have touched on them in the preface of the whole work and in the fourth book, I now pass over for the sake of brevity.

There are also certain slothful little thieves who — like the Aesopic little crow selling itself off with others' feathers, and in the manner of the cuckoo leaping into others' nests — steal the labors of other writers, and, the true titles being erased, impose their own names. Which it is agreed that a certain John Gast did in recent years, who impudently usurped for himself the Collectanea of Bartholomew, Bishop of Urbino, on both Testaments (excerpted from Augustine nearly two hundred years before), and — what is even baser — cunningly truncated and mutilatedly cut off several passages of that same work, and wrested them to the heresies of the Lutherans. To these are to be added certain most abandoned men, driven by the goads of enmity, who — for the hatred and ignominy of good authors, and to lower the authority and credit of illustrious doctors — fabricate odious volumes under their titles. Which began to happen not only in this wretched age of ours, but is agreed to have been done from the very beginnings of the Church by pseudo-apostles, who, in the person of Paul, sent false epistles back and forth, sprinkled with depraved dogmas, by which they might disturb the churches and stir up their enmities against the Apostle. This he indicates in the latter epistle to the Thessalonians, saying: We beseech you, be not terrified by an epistle as though sent by us; for let no one seduce you in any way.[1] Origen too complained, in his epistle to his Alexandrian friends, that fabricated disputations against the faith of the Church, prefaced with an Origenic preface, were scattered abroad by his impious detractors, to stir up the envy of pious men against him. Leo, the Roman Pontiff, grieved on the same occasion, writing to the Emperor Marcian, that the heretics had corrupted his epistles, so that from thence they might seize a handle for accusing him of the impiety of the Nestorian heresy.

Finally, there are others who, led by a contrary zeal — that is, seized by an excessive and immoderate love of some writer — claim for him the lucubrations of others, usurped without any judgment or discernment, thinking to procure for their beloved author a greater celebrity of name by the increase and multitude of [his] books. Moved by this affection — excusable perhaps, but by no means to be approved — certain lovers of Thomistic sanctity and wisdom [have ascribed] to the Exegetics [commentaries] of St. Thomas [→]

[→ p342 (next batch): catchword "Thomae"]

[1] 2 Thess. 2:2.

---

(Rich PDF p. 342 [printed folio 323; the leaf stamps "325" — a misprint]. Book IV, conclusion. The Admonition on the False Inscription of Books completes the three marks for detecting false titles: time (anachronism — the pseudo-Gregory excerpts), dogmas (the pseudo-Cyril Origenist Leviticus tracts), and style (the touchstone; each Father's characteristic manner; the pseudo-Arnobius). Then follows the End of the Fourth Book. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

[A Brief Admonition on the False Inscription of Books — concluded:]

...[certain lovers of Thomistic sanctity and wisdom have inserted] into the Exegetics [commentaries] of St. Thomas commentaries on Genesis, on Isaiah, on Jeremiah, on Threni [Lamentations], on John, on the Catholic Epistles, on the Apocalypse, and very many others like these — [works] to be compared neither in erudition nor in acumen of judgment with his other writings.

Let these things be said concerning the causes and occasions of corrupted inscriptions; now [it remains] to pursue as briefly as possible by what marks their corruption may be detected and convicted.[1] Three things above the rest distinguish true inscriptions from false, genuine from fictitious: time, dogmas, style.

First, if the reckoning of times does not agree with the matters described, it becomes evident that the work is not [the work] of him whose title it bears. [Such are] the Commentaries which now circulate — of Ambrose on the Apocalypse, of Jerome on the Parables of Solomon [Proverbs] and the Lamentations of Jeremiah, of Eucherius on the first book of Moses and on the four volumes of Kings, and of Junilius the African on the Hexaemeron. No one will say these to be [the works] of such authors, since he will have read in them centos, fragments, and whole pages excerpted from the Moralia of Gregory. Nor do I think anyone will be so dull or so shameless as to deny that such rhapsodies were drawn from the commentaries of Gregory, and to affirm the contrary — that they were derived by Gregory, from the sources of those doctors, into his own commentaries. For besides that the name of Gregory, frequently cited in the aforesaid volumes, openly demonstrates this, so great too is everywhere in Gregorian writings the evenness of diction, so great always the similitude of style, and the series of discourse so aptly continued, that nothing appears in them either borrowed from elsewhere or able to seem to have proceeded from another author.

Secondly, if the dogmas not only do not agree with the author's mind, but fight [with it] diametrically, it immediately follows either that the work is not the true and genuine offspring of him whose it is believed to be, or that it is adulterated and most basely corrupted by corrupters. For who would dare affirm that the sixteen tracts of Origen on Leviticus, printed under the name of Cyril by Herwagen, are Cyril's, since in them there occur everywhere [the notions that] souls were created before the world and thrust down into bodies for their crimes as into chains; that the punishments of the underworld will at some time have an end; that the demons after certain times are to be restored to their lost felicity; and very many other Origenic assertions, which Cyril everywhere, with his whole heart and with all his might, attacks and overthrows.

The third, and perhaps of all the more evident and more certain conjecture, is the diversity of style, which, like the Lydian stone [touchstone], distinguishes false inscriptions from true. For although it is easy for any impostor to lie about the authors' homeland, family, and times, and to follow [their] dogmas, yet nothing is more difficult than to imitate another's style.[2] But by style I call not that outer surface of speech, but the character of the discourse, the context of the diction, the continuity of the texture, the form of elocution, the figures of speech, the artifice of arrangement, the method of treatment, and the rest, which are proper to each eloquent author. For as each man has his own habit of body, so each has his own countenance, his own native color, his own voice, and other singular marks by which he is distinguished from other men: so in each of the writers of the Church there are certain peculiar properties, which either never or rarely suit another — such as are the plausible pomp of Antiochus, the accurate diligence of diction of Basil, the sublime buskin of Gregory the Theologian, the spontaneously-flowing atticism of Chrysostom, the most pure facility of Cyprian, the Gallic grandiloquence of Hilary, the grave and pointed abundance of brief sentences in Ambrose, in Jerome the painted variety of matters and words, in Augustine the clauses ending alike and the commata falling alike, in Gregory the numerous march of periods answering one another by turns, and other things like these — which, however much one may affect [them], he yet could by no means attain.

Nor am I ignorant that there are those who think otherwise, asserting that in detecting the impostures of titles there is no sign more fallacious than style: since the manner of speaking is not always the same even for the same [author], but changes according to the nature of the subject, or the change of age, or the progress of study, or the diversity of the affections; and often the character of two authors is altogether very similar. Which I myself do not entirely deny: for Jerome writes one way in his epistles, speaks another way in his contentions against Rufinus and Vigilantius, and [yet] another way in his commentaries on the prophets; he spoke in one manner when he was quite young and still warm with the exercise of the rhetoricians, and in another manner as an old man, when he pursued weightier things. But yet he so always writes and speaks that everywhere you recognize him to be Jerome — just as you recognize the face of a friend familiar to you (now angry, now gentle, now sad, now cheerful) to be always [the face] of the same man. I confess also that among some (though this is very rare) there can occur so great a similitude of style that it is not easy to distinguish them: yet an industrious craftsman of style will distinguish similitude from similitude no otherwise than sagacious jewelers tell apart diamonds equal in size and not unlike in splendor. But, to grant [that the judgment of distinguishing must proceed] by dissimilitude of style and diversity of character, to notice the deceptions of false ascriptions: since [as to] those rude and unpolished commentaries, teeming with solecisms and barbarisms, which now are sold under the title of Arnobius, even one moderately exercised will perceive from the taste of the speech that they are not [the work] of that most excellent orator Arnobius, who wrote seven most eloquent volumes against the nations. Likewise the commentaries on Job and on Mark, inserted among the Hieronymian tomes, no one will ever suspect to be Jerome's, unless he thinks that Jerome unlearned the Latin tongue and was utterly ignorant of Greek and Hebrew.

Therefore the conjecture of style, in my judgment at least, is not to be ranked after the others. And let it suffice to have touched briefly on these few marks for distinguishing pseudepigrapha: which, although — to confess it frankly — they cannot openly and certainly demonstrate of what author a work is concerning which there is doubt, yet they do not obscurely indicate that the work is by no means [the work] of him to whom it is ascribed.

THE END OF THE FOURTH BOOK

(Libri quarti Finis. With this, Book IV — and the whole first half of the Bibliotheca Sancta, Books I–IV — is complete. The catchword "F. SIX[TVS]" previews the opening of LIBER QVINTVS on the next leaf [rich PDF p. 343], which is out of scope for this project.)

[1] By what reasons the true inscriptions of books may be distinguished from the false. [2] It is difficult to imitate another's style.

Sixtus of Siena, O.P. (Sixtus Senensis)

BIBLIOTHECA SANCTA

Books V & VI — The Annotations on the Old and New Testaments

Combined English edition — the Preface and 264 Annotations of Liber Quintus with the 348 Annotations of Liber Sextus, cross-referenced throughout, with five unified indices

---

TABLE OF CONTENTS & INDEX

Books V and VI of the Bibliotheca Sancta, located by PDF page

 Five indices at the back of this volume: Subject Index · Index of Persons · Councils · Heresies · Scripture Passages

PART I — BOOK V: THE OLD TESTAMENT

Page 17: Preface

Genesis

Page 20: Annotation I, Whether the beginning of Genesis pertains to the Trinity (Genesis 1:1)
Page 21: Annotation II, Heaven — whether it is the dwelling of many gods (Genesis 1:1)
Page 21: Annotation III, Whether heaven is spherical and mobile (Genesis 1:1)
Page 22: Annotation IV, Augustine of Kissamos wrongly taught that the empyrean heaven was not created (Genesis 1:1)
Page 22: Annotation V, Whether an invisible world and angels were created before this world (Genesis 1:1)
Page 24: Annotation VI, Whether faith and charity are from ourselves (Genesis 1:2)
Page 24: Annotation VII, Whether the spirit that was borne over the waters was the Holy Spirit (Genesis 1:2)
Page 26: Annotation VIII, Whether angels and demons are corporeal (Genesis 1:6)
Page 27: Annotation IX, Whether there is only one heaven, as Chrysostom seems to hold (Genesis 1:6)
Page 28: Annotation X, Whether the firmament is between the upper and lower waters (Genesis 1:6)
Page 28: Annotation XI, Whether the upper and lower waters are real water, or rather Angels, as Origen held (Genesis 1:7)
Page 28: Annotation XII, Whether the binary [double] number is infamous, as Jerome held (Genesis 1:8)
Page 29: Annotation XIII, The ancients denied that there are Antipodes (Genesis 1:9)
Page 30: Annotation XIV, Whether it must be believed that the stars are fixed in the heaven (Genesis 1:17)
Page 30: Annotation XV, For the stars foreshow the future events of men, as Origen held — whom the judicial Astrologers follow (Genesis 1:17)
Page 31: Annotation XVI, Whether satisfaction is necessary for penitents (Genesis 1:19)
Page 32: Annotation XVII, Whether the angels, together with God, created man — as Origen held (Genesis 1:26)
Page 33: Annotation XVIII, Whether God is corporeal (Genesis 1:26)
Page 34: Annotation XIX, Whether the stars are animate (Genesis 1:26)
Page 34: Annotation XX, Whether, if Adam had not sinned, there would have been coitus (Genesis 1:27)
Page 35: Annotation XXI, Whether the first parents would have had children if they had not sinned (Genesis 1:28)
Page 36: Annotation XXII, Whether herbs and trees are given as food to the animals (Genesis 1:29)
Page 36: Annotation XXIII, Whether God completed his works on the sixth day (Genesis 2:2)
Page 36: Annotation XXIV, Whether the six days of the world's creation are real days (Genesis 2:2)
Page 37: Annotation XXV, Whether the Jews sacrificed in the lands of the gentiles (Genesis 2:2)
Page 37: Annotation XXVI, Whether the soul alone is man (Genesis 2:7)
Page 37: Annotation XXVII, The breath breathed into Adam is the rational soul, as St. Augustine, St. Thomas, and others hold (Genesis 2:7)
Page 38: Annotation XXVIII, Whether the body was made before the soul (Genesis 2:7)
Page 38: Annotation XXIX, Whether man was created first in the species than in the individual, as Francesco Giorgio held (Genesis 2:7)
Page 39: Annotation XXX, Whether the soul was created with the angels on the first day (Genesis 2:7)
Page 39: Annotation XXXI, Whether Adam, by sinning, lost the image [of God] (Genesis 2:7)
Page 39: Annotation XXXII, Whether man, formed of an earthly body and an immortal soul, is the man whom God created to his own image (Genesis 2:7)
Page 40: Annotation XXXIII, Whether there is a terrestrial Paradise (Genesis 2:8)
Page 40: Annotation XXXIV, Francesco Giorgio tries to prove by four arguments that there is no terrestrial Paradise (Genesis 2:8)
Page 42: Annotation XXXV, Whether there is a terrestrial Paradise (Genesis 2:8)
Page 43: Annotation XXXVI, Whether Paradise, after Adam's fall, entirely ceased to exist (Genesis 2:8)
Page 44: Annotation XXXVII, Whether the terrestrial Paradise was created before the world (Genesis 2:8)

Page 45: Annotation XXXVIII, Whether the earthly Paradise reaches up to the orb of the Moon, as Bede held (Genesis 2:8)
Page 45: Annotation XXXIX, Tertullian held that all souls are in the underworld until the day of judgment (Genesis 2:8)
Page 45: Annotation XL, Whether the places and punishments of souls after this life are only spiritual, as St. Augustine seems to hold (Genesis 2:8)
Page 46: Annotation XLI, Whether Moses and Paul saw the very essence of God with the mind, but not with the eyes of the body (Genesis 2:8)
Page 47: Annotation XLII, Whether the place of the underworld is under the earth (Genesis 2:8)
Page 47: Annotation XLIII, Whether God threatened the first man with bodily death, or rather only the death of the soul (Genesis 2:17)
Page 48: Annotation XLIV, For what cause abortion is a grave sin, even if the embryo was not [yet] animated (Genesis 2:18)
Page 48: Annotation XLV, Whether Adam was created androgynous, as Francesco Giorgio thinks (Genesis 2:20)
Page 49: Annotation XLVI, Whether Eve was formed from Adam's rib (Genesis 2:21)
Page 50: Annotation XLVII, Cajetan denies that a rib was truly taken from Adam (Genesis 2:21)
Page 51: Annotation XLVIII, Whether it is lawful for Christians to swear (Genesis 2:24)
Page 51: Annotation XLIX, Whether Adam, by sinning, lost the image [of God] (Genesis 3:7)
Page 52: Annotation L, No one's nature is harmed by another's sins (Genesis 3:15)
Page 52: Annotation LI, Whether the giants sprang from the seed of the devil, as Francesco Giorgio thought (Genesis 3:15)
Page 53: Annotation LII, Whether sin brought upon Adam the necessity of bodily death (Genesis 3:19)
Page 53: Annotation LIII, Whether the tunics of skin of the first parents were the skins of animals (Genesis 3:21)
Page 54: Annotation LIV, Whether the tunics of skin were true skins (Genesis 3:21)
Page 55: Annotation LV, Whether the letter of divine Scripture sometimes says something false (Genesis 3:21)
Page 55: Annotation LVI, Whether Adam, cast out of paradise, was placed before the door of paradise (Genesis 3:24)
Page 55: Annotation LVII, Whether the Cherubim are angels, or specters (Genesis 3:24)
Page 56: Annotation LVIII, Theodoret denies that the Cherubim are spiritual and blessed minds (Genesis 3:24)
Page 58: Annotation LIX, Whether Moses died (Genesis 3:24)
Page 59: Annotation LX, Whether the Cherubim are incorporeal substances (Genesis 3:24)
Page 59: Annotation LXI, Whether Moses has yet died (Genesis 4:1)
Page 60: Annotation LXII, Whether priests bind and loose (Genesis 4:1)
Page 60: Annotation LXIII, If the first parents had not sinned, whether there would have been generation (Genesis 4:1)
Page 61: Annotation LXIV, Whether the souls of the saints, before the day of judgment, enjoy the divine vision (Genesis 4:1)
Page 62: Annotation LXV, A passage from the fourth chapter of Genesis, badly translated by the Seventy (Genesis 4:7)
Page 62: Annotation LXVI, The clause "let us go out into the field," superfluously added by the Septuagint (Genesis 4:8)
Page 63: Annotation LXVII, The clause "vagabond and fugitive," badly rendered by the Septuagint (Genesis 4:12)
Page 63: Annotation LXVIII, The years of the illustrious men wrongly reckoned by the Septuagint (Genesis 5:7)
Page 66: Annotation LXIX, Whether the curse of the earth was removed under Noah, as Francesco Giorgio thought (Genesis 5:29)
Page 66: Annotation LXX, That "Angels of God" was wrongly put by the Septuagint for "sons of God," and hence grave questions have arisen (Genesis 6:2)
Page 66: Annotation LXXI, Whether the angels are aerial souls, as Philo thought; or whether the stars are animate, as the same [Philo] reckoned (Genesis 6:2)
Page 67: Annotation LXXII, Whether the angels are called "sons of God" in the sacred letters (Genesis 6:2)
Page 67: Annotation LXXIII, Whether the angels can have intercourse with women (Genesis 6:2)
Page 70: Annotation LXXIV, The clause "My spirit shall not remain," etc., badly rendered (Genesis 6:3)
Page 70: Annotation LXXV, Whether God restricted the life of man to 120 years (Genesis 6:3)
Page 71: Annotation LXXVI, Whether the giants were men who exceeded others in unusual bodily size (Genesis 6:4)
Page 71: Annotation LXXVII, Whether the giants were begotten from Angels and women (Genesis 6:4)
Page 73: Annotation LXXVIII, Whether God can be seen by the angels (Genesis 6:9)
Page 73: Annotation LXXIX, The number of the years and the months of the Flood [is] corrupted (Genesis 7:11)
Page 74: Annotation LXXX, Whether heaven is spherical and mobile (Genesis 7:11)
Page 74: Annotation LXXXI, Whether the Noachic Flood could have been foreknown from observation of the stars, as Pierre d'Ailly thought (Genesis 7:11)
Page 75: Annotation LXXXII, The days of the ceasing Flood wrongly reckoned (Genesis 8:4)
Page 75: Annotation LXXXIII, Whether the raven returned into the ark (Genesis 8:7)
Page 76: Annotation LXXXIV, What kind of branch the dove brought (Genesis 8:11)

Page 76: Annotation LXXXV, Whether circumcision conferred anything to the soul's salvation (Genesis 8:21)
Page 77: Annotation LXXXVI, Of what kind was Noah's drunkenness (Genesis 9:20–21)
Page 77: Annotation LXXXVII, There was only one language for all before the tower was built, as St. Chrysostom rightly held (Genesis 11:1)
Page 78: Annotation LXXXVIII, An error in the number and the years of the generations of Shem (Genesis 11:11)
Page 79: Annotation LXXXIX, Whether Abraham lied (Genesis 12:13)
Page 81: Annotation XC, Whether Melchisedech was a man, or rather an Angel, as Origen held (Genesis 14:18)
Page 82: Annotation XCI, Whether Melchisedech was the Holy Spirit (Genesis 14:18)
Page 83: Annotation XCII, Whether it is lawful for soldiers to take booty (Genesis 14:23)
Page 83: Annotation XCIII, Whether hell is only the conscience of sinners, as Philo held (Genesis 16:2)
Page 83: Annotation XCIV, Whether Abraham's intercourse with Hagar was adultery (Genesis 16:3)
Page 84: Annotation XCV, Whether the angels created the sensitive soul of men, as Philo held (Genesis 16:11)
Page 85: Annotation XCVI, Whether circumcision conferred grace on infants (Genesis 17:10)
Page 86: Annotation XCVII, Why circumcision was given on the eighth day (Genesis 17:12)
Page 86: Annotation XCVIII, Whether Abraham sinned by unbelief (Genesis 17:17)
Page 87: Annotation XCIX, The dove descending upon Christ — whether it was truly an animal (Genesis 18:2)
Page 88: Annotation C, Whether this passage pertains to the Trinity (Genesis 18:3)
Page 88: Annotation CI, Whether divine grace comes before us, or is preceded by us (Genesis 18:16)
Page 90: Annotation CII, Whether the Son of God was an angel (Genesis 22:12)
Page 90: Annotation CIII, That "Sabek" is wrongly expounded as "a he-goat." (Genesis 22:13)
Page 91: Annotation CIV, Whether the Virgin Mary ever labored under unbelief (Genesis 25:21)
Page 91: Annotation CV, Whether the heavens emit a vocal sound by their motion (Genesis 26:18)
Page 92: Annotation CVI, The Septuagint wrongly translated, "We have not found water." (Genesis 26:32)
Page 93: Annotation CVII, Whether it is lawful for a good man to lie (Genesis 27:19)
Page 96: Annotation CVIII, Whether the stars are rational living beings, as Philo and Origen held (Genesis 28:12)
Page 98: Annotation CIX, Mandrakes [rendered] for lilies (Genesis 30:14)
Page 98: Annotation CX, An error of the Septuagint interpreters (Genesis 30:42)
Page 99: Annotation CXI, Whether Jacob contended with the Angel in a bodily wrestling (Genesis 32:24)
Page 99: Annotation CXII, Many have not rightly interpreted the word "Israel." (Genesis 32:28)
Page 100: Annotation CXIII, Whether Joseph's brothers accused him of a most wicked crime (Genesis 37:2)
Page 100: Annotation CXIV, Whether Tamar, in lying with Judah, perpetrated a crime (Genesis 38:16)

Exodus

Page 101: Annotation CXV, Whether the world is the Son of God, as Philo held (Exodus 28:4)
Page 102: Annotation CXVI, Whether Moses's face was horned (Exodus 34:29)

Leviticus

Page 102: Annotation CXVII, Whether Christ suffered for the Angels, as Origen taught (Leviticus 1:5)
Page 103: Annotation CXVIII, Whether bishops are to be elected by the authority of the people (Leviticus 8:4)
Page 105: Annotation CXIX, Whether Christ still mourns our sins (Leviticus 10:9)
Page 105: Annotation CXX, Whether the flesh and blood of Christ are nothing else than his doctrine (Leviticus 10:14)
Page 106: Annotation CXXI, And he shall put incense upon the fire in the sight of the Lord (Leviticus 16:13)
Page 106: Annotation CXXII, Whether it is lawful for priests to possess temporal goods (Leviticus 25:32)

Numbers

Page 107: Annotation CXXIII, Concerning Moses's wife (Numbers 12:1)
Page 107: Annotation CXXIV, Whether the rods brought to Moses were more than twelve (Numbers 17:6)
Page 107: Annotation CXXV, The man said, whose eye is stopped up (Numbers 24:3)
Page 108: Annotation CXXVI, Whether the Angels are to be judged on the day of judgment (Numbers 25:4)
Page 110: Annotation CXXVII, Whether all the blessed shall see God (Numbers 26:53)
Page 110: Annotation CXXVIII, Whether the saints, immediately after the judgment, are raised to the contemplation of God (Numbers 33:1)
Page 111: Annotation CXXIX, Whether the land of promise is to be understood according to the letter (Numbers 34:2)

Deuteronomy

Page 112: Annotation CXXX, Whether from this passage the mystery of the Trinity ought to be elicited (Deuteronomy 6:4)

Joshua

Page 113: Annotation CXXXI, Whether the demons and hell shall suffer everlasting punishments (Joshua 8:28)

1 Kings

Page 115: Annotation CXXXII, Concerning free will (1 Kings [1 Samuel] 11:6)

3 Kings

Page 115: Annotation CXXXIII, Concerning Seba and Sceba (3 Kings [1 Kings] 10:1)

Job

Page 116: Annotation CXXXIV, Concerning the Trinity (Job 1:1)
Page 117: Annotation CXXXV, Impious dogmas concerning the Trinity are falsely ascribed to Origen (Job 1:17)
Page 117: Annotation CXXXVI, As it hath pleased the Lord, so it is done (Job 1:21)
Page 117: Annotation CXXXVII, Whether infants are punished with the punishments of the damned (Job 9:17)
Page 119: Annotation CXXXVIII, Whether the just man sins in every work [he does] (Job 9:28)
Page 119: Annotation CXXXIX, Whether the souls of the blessed see all things which are done here (Job 14:21)
Page 120: Annotation CXL, Whether the souls of Christians are blessed immediately after this life (Job 17:12)
Page 120: Annotation CXLI, Whether the fire of hell is incorporeal (Job 20:26)
Page 122: Annotation CXLII, Whether the nature of Angels and Souls is corporeal (Job 25:5)
Page 122: Annotation CXLIII, Whether the Son of God is always begotten and always born (Job 38:12)
Page 123: Annotation CXLIV, The author of the commentary on Job which is falsely attributed to Origen thought wrongly concerning the Trinity (Job 38:29)
Page 123: Annotation CXLV, Whether anyone may be certain that he does not always sin (Job 42:16)

Psalm

Page 123: Annotation CXLVI, Origen seems to have thought wrongly concerning the Trinity (Psalm 1:1)
Page 124: Annotation CXLVII, Whether the angels were created before the world, and whether the heavens emit a vocal sound (Psalm 1:1)
Page 124: Annotation CXLVIII, Whether the future resurrection will be in the [self-same] individual (Psalm 1:5)
Page 125: Annotation CXLIX, Concerning the beginning of Genesis (Psalm 2:1)
Page 126: Annotation CL, I will give thee the nations for thy inheritance, and the ends of the earth for thy possession (Psalm 2:8)
Page 126: Annotation CLI, Whether this passage was well rendered by Jerome (Psalm 2:12)
Page 127: Annotation CLII, Concerning the Eucharist (Psalm 3:2)
Page 127: Annotation CLIII, Concerning the invocation of the saints (Psalm 4:2)
Page 127: Annotation CLIV, Whether Mary hesitated at the death of Christ (Psalm 13:3)
Page 128: Annotation CLV, Concerning the eight little verses added to Psalm 13 (Psalm 13:3)
Page 128: Annotation CLVI, In what manner the Blessed Virgin was sanctified by the entrance of Christ (Psalm 14:2)
Page 129: Annotation CLVII, Whether the Psalms speaking literally of David can be expounded literally of Christ (Psalm 15:1)
Page 129: Annotation CLVIII, Eusebius of Caesarea thought wrongly concerning the Trinity (Psalm 15:2)
Page 129: Annotation CLIX, Whether a man can be made impeccable (Psalm 15:7)
Page 130: Annotation CLX, Whether the body of Christ was placed in the Sun (Psalm 18:5)
Page 130: Annotation CLXI, Whether the prayer of Christ was heard (Psalm 21:3)
Page 131: Annotation CLXII, Whether Christ truly feared and grieved (Psalm 21:3)
Page 132: Annotation CLXIII, Whether the Eucharist is to be denied to sinners (Psalm 21:30)
Page 132: Annotation CLXIV, Concerning the Eucharist, the heretics feign that St. Chrysostom thought wrongly (Psalm 22:5)
Page 133: Annotation CLXV, Whether Christ the Lord sustained in [his] soul the pain of hell (Psalm 30:11)
Page 133: Annotation CLXVI, Whether it is lawful to use lots (Psalm 30:16)
Page 134: Annotation CLXVII, Whether all the works of unbelievers are sins (Psalm 31:1)
Page 134: Annotation CLXVIII, Whether this passage pertains to the Holy Spirit (Psalm 32:6)

Page 135: Annotation CLXIX, Whether the souls of the saints are in heaven before the resurrection (Psalm 36:10)
Page 136: Annotation CLXX, Whether after this life all, both good and evil, shall enter the fire of gehenna (Psalm 36:14)
Page 138: Annotation CLXXI, Whether all Souls, after this life, are to be tried by fire (Psalm 36:15)
Page 141: Annotation CLXXII, Whether one ought to pray in an unknown tongue (Psalm 46:3, 8)
Page 141: Annotation CLXXIII, Whether penance is to be repeated (Psalm 50:3)
Page 142: Annotation CLXXIV, Concerning satisfaction (Psalm 50:3)
Page 142: Annotation CLXXV, Whether sacramental confession is necessary (Psalm 50:5)
Page 145: Annotation CLXXVI, Whether the royal power is to be preferred to the sacerdotal (Psalm 50:6)
Page 146: Annotation CLXXVII, Whether Adam's sin transmitted to posterity only the death of the body (Psalm 50:7)
Page 146: Annotation CLXXVIII, Concerning original sin (Psalm 50:7)
Page 146: Annotation CLXXIX, Whether the sin contracted from Adam is only the occasion of sin, and not sin [itself] (Psalm 50:7)
Page 147: Annotation CLXXX, If the first parents had not sinned, whether [there would have been] conception and generation (Psalm 50:7)
Page 147: Annotation CLXXXI, Whether Peter, in the denial of Christ, lost [his] faith (Psalm 52:4)
Page 148: Annotation CLXXXII, Whether hunger, thirst, grief, and death were natural to Christ (Psalm 53:5)
Page 148: Annotation CLXXXIII, Whether our merits are the cause of the eternal election (Psalm 64:5)
Page 148: Annotation CLXXXIV, Whether men shall rise again in the same individual [body] (Psalm 65:12)
Page 149: Annotation CLXXXV, Whether Souls, on account of sins committed in heaven, are thrust down into bodies (Psalm 65:11)
Page 154: Annotation CLXXXVI, Whether Christ's humanity was, by its own nature, capable of grief and misery (Psalm 68:2)
Page 156: Annotation CLXXXVII, Whether trading [commerce] is condemned (Psalm 70:15)
Page 157: Annotation CLXXXVIII, Whether the punishment of Hell exceeds the gravity of the sin (Psalm 71:14)
Page 157: Annotation CLXXXIX, Whether the Soul was created before bodies (Psalm 89:1–2)
Page 157: Annotation CXC, Whether the age of the world consists of only six thousand years (Psalm 89:4)
Page 160: Annotation CXCI, On the theme of Psalm 90 (Psalm 90:1)
Page 161: Annotation CXCII, On the merit of good works (Psalm 90:14)
Page 161: Annotation CXCIII, On the merit of good works (Psalm 98:5)
Page 161: Annotation CXCIV, On the Eucharist (Psalm 98:5)
Page 161: Annotation CXCV, Whether good works are meritorious (Psalm 102:4)
Page 163: Annotation CXCVI, On the Holy Spirit (Psalm 103:30)
Page 163: Annotation CXCVII, On predestination and reprobation (Psalm 108:18)
Page 163: Annotation CXCVIII, On God swearing (Psalm 109:4)
Page 164: Annotation CXCIX, On the merit of works (Psalm 114:7)
Page 164: Annotation CC, Whether the divine vocation is from the merits of those called (Psalm 115:1)
Page 164: Annotation CCI, On the number of the alphabetic Psalms (Psalm 118:1)
Page 165: Annotation CCII, Whether all the saints must be purged by the fire of the conflagration (Psalm 118:20)
Page 165: Annotation CCIII, Whether the possession of secular things befits the clergy (Psalm 118:57)
Page 166: Annotation CCIV, On the Oath (Psalm 118:106)
Page 166: Annotation CCV, Whether sins are remitted to those remaining in unbelief (Psalm 118:137)
Page 166: Annotation CCVI, On the sons of those cast out (Psalm 126:4)
Page 167: Annotation CCVII, On the correct rendering of this passage (Psalm 127:2)
Page 167: Annotation CCVIII, Whether the Soul was formed before the body (Psalm 129:2)
Page 169: Annotation CCIX, Whether the Soul of Christ is omniscient (Psalm 138:6)
Page 169: Annotation CCX, The error of Origen concerning souls thrust into bodies (Psalm 141:8)

Proverbs

Page 170: Annotation CCXI, Whether Solomon was a prophet (Proverbs 1:1)

Ecclesiastes

Page 170: Annotation CCXII, Whether the stars are animate (Ecclesiastes 1:6)
Page 171: Annotation CCXIII, Whether before this world there were other worlds, and whether there will be [others] after this (Ecclesiastes 1:9)

Page 172: Annotation CCXIV, Whether after this life there is given a place from which Souls, once entered, can go out (Ecclesiastes 11:3)

Canticle

Page 172: Annotation CCXV, Whether the Angels are corporeal (Canticle 1:1)
Page 173: Annotation CCXVI, Whether the Angels desert those whom they have received into [their] custody (Canticle 1:1)
Page 173: Annotation CCXVII, On the merits of the just (Canticle 2:10, 14)

Wisdom

Page 174: Annotation CCXVIII, On the author of the book of Wisdom (Wisdom 1:1)
Page 174: Annotation CCXIX, On the author of the book of Wisdom (Wisdom 1:1)

Isaiah

Page 175: Annotation CCXX, A prophecy of Christ omitted by the Seventy (Isaiah 2:22)
Page 175: Annotation CCXXI, On God being seen (Isaiah 6:1)
Page 175: Annotation CCXXII, On the Trinity (Isaiah 6:3)
Page 175: Annotation CCXXIII, A prophecy of Christ ill translated by the Seventy interpreters (Isaiah 9:6)
Page 176: Annotation CCXXIV, Whether angels have a soul (Isaiah 13:7)
Page 176: Annotation CCXXV, Whether the souls of the damned shall at some time have rest (Isaiah 14:19)
Page 177: Annotation CCXXVI, Every beard shall be shaven (Isaiah 15:2)
Page 177: Annotation CCXXVII, Whether it is a lighter [sin] to sin openly than to feign holiness (Isaiah 16:14)
Page 177: Annotation CCXXVIII, Whether the saints in heaven remember [their] past evils (Isaiah 65:16)
Page 178: Annotation CCXXIX, Whether the fire of hell is metaphorical (Isaiah 66:24)

Jeremiah

Page 180: Annotation CCXXX, The expiatory fire (Jeremiah 2:22)
Page 180: Annotation CCXXXI, The Oath (Jeremiah 4:2)
Page 180: Annotation CCXXXII, Whether anyone in this life is truly just (Jeremiah 13:12)
Page 181: Annotation CCXXXIII, Whether the opinion of the Chiliasts is to be condemned (Jeremiah 19:11)
Page 185: Annotation CCXXXIV, On Christ (Jeremiah 22:30)
Page 185: Annotation CCXXXV, On free will (Jeremiah 23:28)
Page 186: Annotation CCXXXVI, On souls fallen down from heaven (Jeremiah 24:5)
Page 186: Annotation CCXXXVII, The incarceration of souls (Jeremiah 28:13)
Page 187: Annotation CCXXXVIII, On the history of Susanna (Jeremiah 29:22)

Lamentations

Page 187: Annotation CCXXXIX, On hypocrisy (Lamentations 4:6)

Ezekiel

Page 187: Annotation CCXL, Whether charity once had can be lost (Ezekiel 1:12)
Page 189: Annotation CCXLI, Whether one sin is remitted without another (Ezekiel 3:11)
Page 189: Annotation CCXLII, Whether the earth is an animal capable of reason (Ezekiel 14:13)
Page 191: Annotation CCXLIII, Not only Christ is to be imitated (Ezekiel 16:16)
Page 191: Annotation CCXLIV, Whether clerics ought to have beard or hair shorn (Ezekiel 44:20)

Daniel

Page 197: Annotation CCXLV, On the Appendix of Daniel (Daniel 1:1)
Page 199: Annotation CCXLVI, On the kingdom of the Romans (Daniel 2:40)
Page 199: Annotation CCXLVII, Whether the sacred Images are to be venerated (Daniel 3:18)
Page 203: Annotation CCXLVIII, On the time of the world's destruction (Daniel 9:24)
Page 204: Annotation CCXLIX, On the calumny imposed upon St. Jerome (Daniel 9:24)
Page 204: Annotation CCL, Whether the history of Susanna is to be received (Daniel 13:1)

Amos

Page 207: Annotation CCLI, Whether the fallen, after penance, are to be restored to their former dignity (Amos 5:2)
Page 208: Annotation CCLII, Whether [there are] only two places after this life (Amos 9:2)

Jonah

Page 209: Annotation CCLIII, Whether, for the sake of preserving chastity, it be licit to die by one's own hand (Jonah 1:12)
Page 212: Annotation CCLIV, A passage badly translated by the Seventy (Jonah 3:4)
Page 213: Annotation CCLV, On the ivy of Jonah (Jonah 4:6)

Micah

Page 214: Annotation CCLVI, Whether the Angels are to be judged on the day of judgment (Micah 6:1)

Habakkuk

Page 215: Annotation CCLVII, Whether God has knowledge and providence of the least things (Habakkuk 1:13)

Zephaniah

Page 216: Annotation CCLVIII, On the power of the priesthood (Zephaniah 3:4)

Zechariah

Page 217: Annotation CCLIX, On the Trinity (Zechariah 4:3, 4)
Page 217: Annotation CCLX, Whether it is licit for Christians to swear (Zechariah 8:17)
Page 217: Annotation CCLXI, Whether the bosom of Abraham and the hell of the damned are the same (Zechariah 9:11)

Malachi

Page 218: Annotation CCLXII, Whether an Angel was the author of the book of Malachi (Malachi 1:1)
Page 219: Annotation CCLXIII, Whether election and reprobation are from the foreknowledge of merits (Malachi 1:2, 3)

2 Maccabees

Page 219: Annotation CCLXIV, Whether the mother of the Maccabees died of joy (2 Maccabees 7:41)

PART II — BOOK VI: THE NEW TESTAMENT

Matthew

Page 222: Annotation I, Sacred reading (Matthew 1:1)
Page 222: Annotation II, Thamar (Matthew 1:3)
Page 222: Annotation III, On the marriage of Mary and Joseph (Matthew 1:16)
Page 223: Annotation IV, On Matrimony (Matthew 1:18)
Page 224: Annotation V, Joseph in doubt (Matthew 1:20)
Page 224: Annotation VI, On the Holy Spirit (Matthew 1:20)
Page 225: Annotation VII, Whether angels are living beings (Matthew 2:1)
Page 225: Annotation VIII, Whether the magic art is evil (Matthew 2:2)
Page 226: Annotation IX, Whether the prophecy of Numbers 24 is to be understood of the star seen by the Magi (Matthew 2:2)
Page 226: Annotation X, Whether Christ's nativity could be foreknown from genethliacal [astrological] divinations (Matthew 2)
Page 233: Annotation XI, Whether John's baptism conferred grace (Matthew 3:1–2)
Page 234: Annotation XII, Whether the Holy Spirit is conferred in baptism (Matthew 3:11)
Page 234: Annotation XIII, Whether the dove sitting upon Christ was a real animal (Matthew 3:16)
Page 235: Annotation XIV, "I saw the Spirit of God, like a dove." (Matthew 3:16)
Page 235: Annotation XV, On the Trinity (Matthew 3:16)
Page 235: Annotation XVI, On the Trinity (Matthew 4:1)
Page 236: Annotation XVII, Whether those baptized by heretics are to be rebaptized (Matthew 4:17)
Page 236: Annotation XVIII, Whether Christ and the apostles begged (were mendicants) (Matthew 5:3)
Page 237: Annotation XIX, Whether the wicked sin under the devil's compulsion (Matthew 5:5)

Page 238: Annotation XX, Whether man can attain to an impeccable perfection (Matthew 5:9)
Page 238: Annotation XXI, On the Eucharist (Matthew 5:22)
Page 239: Annotation XXII, On the degrees of consanguinity (Matthew 5:31)
Page 239: Annotation XXIII, Whether adultery dissolves the sacrament of matrimony (Matthew 5:32)
Page 239: Annotation XXIV, On divorce (Matthew 5:32)
Page 240: Annotation XXV, Whether an oath is a sin (Matthew 5:34)
Page 240: Annotation XXVI, Whether every oath, even in a true and just cause, is a sin (Matthew 5:34)
Page 246: Annotation XXVII, Whether it is lawful to seek redress for an injury in court (Matthew 5:39)
Page 246: Annotation XXVIII, On the unforgivable sin (Matthew 5:44)
Page 247: Annotation XXIX, On vocal prayer (Matthew 6:6)
Page 247: Annotation XXX, Whether Christ is to be called "the Lordly man" (homo dominicus) (Matthew 6:10)
Page 247: Annotation XXXI, Whether the bread we ask for in the Lord's Prayer is corporeal (Matthew 6:11)
Page 248: Annotation XXXII, On the forgiveness of injury (Matthew 6:14)
Page 249: Annotation XXXIII, On the dress of monks (Matthew 6:16)
Page 249: Annotation XXXIV, Whether anyone can hate God. Ps. 73 (Matthew 6:24)
Page 249: Annotation XXXV, Whether no creature is incorporeal (Matthew 6:25)
Page 251: Annotation XXXVI, Whether it is lawful for preachers to preach the Gospel for the sake of a livelihood (Matthew 6:33)
Page 251: Annotation XXXVII, On bodily human food (Matthew 6:34)
Page 251: Annotation XXXVIII, Whether there is sin in the Church (Matthew 7:5)
Page 252: Annotation XXXIX, On the Trinity (Matthew 7:16)
Page 252: Annotation XL, Whether all works apart from grace are sins (Matthew 7:17)
Page 253: Annotation XLI, Whether the privation of the divine glory is a graver gehenna (Matthew 7:19)
Page 254: Annotation XLII, On the Church (Matthew 7:24)
Page 254: Annotation XLIII, On justifying faith, and on unformed faith (Matthew 8:8)
Page 255: Annotation XLIV, On the Trinity (Matthew 8:9)
Page 256: Annotation XLV, Whether priests [truly] absolve, or only pronounce [people] absolved (Matthew 9:8)
Page 257: Annotation XLVI, Whether [our] calling comes from merits, or from [merits] foreseen by divine foreknowledge (Matthew 9:9)
Page 257: Annotation XLVII, Whether the suffrages made for the departed profit both the blessed and the damned (Matthew 9:24)
Page 260: Annotation XLVIII, Whether the soul alone is the man (Matthew 10:28)
Page 260: Annotation XLIX, On Pilate (Matthew 10:29)
Page 261: Annotation L, On the doubt of John the Baptist (Matthew 11:3)
Page 261: Annotation LI, Whether before Christ's coming faith in Christ was necessary for salvation (Matthew 11:5)
Page 262: Annotation LII, Whether reprobation is from God's pure good pleasure (Matthew 11:26)
Page 262: Annotation LIII, Whether the angels see God (Matthew 11:27)
Page 263: Annotation LIV, On the Law of Moses (Matthew 11:28)
Page 263: Annotation LV, Absolution (Matthew 11:28)
Page 263: Annotation LVI, On the sin against the Holy Spirit (Matthew 12:32)
Page 264: Annotation LVII, On the sin against the Holy Spirit (Matthew 12:32)
Page 264: Annotation LVIII, Whether the Virgin Mary was guilty of vainglory (Matthew 12:47)
Page 265: Annotation LIX, On Joseph (Matthew 12:48)
Page 265: Annotation LX, Whether heretics unwilling to repent are to be put to death (Matthew 13:30)
Page 266: Annotation LXI, That the prophecy of Psalm 77, cited by Matthew, is to be understood literally of Christ (Matthew 13:35)
Page 267: Annotation LXII, What kind of smith's craft Joseph practiced (Matthew 13:55)
Page 268: Annotation LXIII, [The error that] faith is given to us from preceding merits (Matthew 13:11)
Page 268: Annotation LXIV, Whether Joseph was twice-married (Matthew 13:55–56)
Page 269: Annotation LXV, Whether the angels fell from heaven on account of love of women (Matthew 14:3,10)
Page 270: Annotation LXVI, On the Eucharist (Matthew 15:11)
Page 270: Annotation LXVII, Whether restitution ought to exceed the [thing] plundered (Matthew 15:29)
Page 271: Annotation LXVIII, Whether the Church was built upon [the] Rock [Peter] (Matthew 16:18)
Page 273: Annotation LXIX, Whether the Church was built upon each and every one of the faithful (Matthew 16:18)

Page 273: Annotation LXX, Whether the priestly power is lost through any [and every] sin (Matthew 16:18)
Page 273: Annotation LXXI, Whether the power of binding and loosing resides in priests (Matthew 16:19)
Page 275: Annotation LXXII, Whether the supreme pontiff has the power of secular rule (Matthew 16:19)
Page 279: Annotation LXXIII, On the duration of the world (Matthew 17:1)
Page 279: Annotation LXXIV, On Moses, appearing in the Transfiguration of Christ (Matthew 17:3)
Page 279: Annotation LXXV, Whether clerics are immune from the tributes of secular princes (Matthew 17:24)
Page 280: Annotation LXXVI, Whether Christians ought to pay tributes to their [own] princes (Matthew 17:26)
Page 280: Annotation LXXVII, Whether to individual men individual angels are assigned for [their] guard (Matthew 18:10)
Page 281: Annotation LXXVIII, Whether those speaking and eating with the excommunicated sin (Matthew 18:17)
Page 281: Annotation LXXIX, On the marriage-unions lawful by the law of nature (Matthew 19:5)
Page 281: Annotation LXXX, On second marriages (Matthew 19:8)
Page 282: Annotation LXXXI, Whether it is lawful to repudiate an adulterous wife, and to marry another (Matthew 19:9)
Page 286: Annotation LXXXII, Whether plurality of wives is prohibited by natural or by divine law (Matthew 19:9)
Page 287: Annotation LXXXIII, Whether it is lawful for Christians to wage war (Matthew 19:12)
Page 287: Annotation LXXXIV, Whether every corporeal thing is evil (Matthew 19:14)
Page 288: Annotation LXXXV, Whether it is lawful to procure for oneself, from the goods left at [one's] death, suffrages after this life (Matthew 19:20)
Page 288: Annotation LXXXVI, On monastic vows (Matthew 19:21)
Page 289: Annotation LXXXVII, Whether those called by God are called on account of [their] merits (Matthew 20:1)
Page 290: Annotation LXXXVIII, On the Trinity (Matthew 20:8)
Page 290: Annotation LXXXIX, "Call the laborers, and pay them their wage." (Matthew 20:8)
Page 290: Annotation XC, The fruition [beatific vision] of the blessed (Matthew 20:16)
Page 290: Annotation XCI, Whether Moses died (Matthew 20:20)
Page 291: Annotation XCII, On the Son of God (Matthew 20:19)
Page 291: Annotation XCIII, On the death of John the Evangelist (Matthew 20:23)
Page 292: Annotation XCIV, On the Trinity (Matthew 20:23)
Page 292: Annotation XCV, Whether it is lawful for Christians to exercise trade (Matthew 21:12)
Page 292: Annotation XCVI, What "Hosanna" signifies (Matthew 21:9)
Page 293: Annotation XCVII, On the subtraction of grace (Matthew 21:33)
Page 293: Annotation XCVIII, Whether the Jews recognized the deity of Christ (Matthew 21:38)
Page 294: Annotation XCIX, Whether election is from merit (Matthew 22:14)
Page 294: Annotation C, On the Trinity (Matthew 22:37)
Page 294: Annotation CI, Whether the precepts of the second table can be fulfilled without the grace of God (Matthew 22:39)
Page 295: Annotation CII, Whether it is lawful to hang gospels and crosses on the neck (Matthew 23:5)
Page 296: Annotation CIII, On the Homoousion [consubstantial] (Matthew 24:7)
Page 296: Annotation CIV, Whether the true Church can be recognized by certain marks, and by which (Matthew 24:15)
Page 298: Annotation CV, Whether Christ was ignorant of the day of judgment (Matthew 24:36)
Page 299: Annotation CVI, Whether fasting and chastity without almsgiving are of any avail (Matthew 24:50)
Page 299: Annotation CVII, Whether we can be helped by the merits of others (Matthew 25:9)
Page 300: Annotation CVIII, Whether bad priests are [true] priests (Matthew 25:18)
Page 301: Annotation CIX, On the three Magdalenes (Matthew 26:7)
Page 301: Annotation CX, Whether Christ celebrated the Passover on the fourteenth [day of the] moon. / Whether Christ consecrated in unleavened [bread] (Matthew 26:20)
Page 303: Annotation CXI, With what words Christ consecrated the Eucharist (Matthew 26:26)
Page 306: Annotation CXII, On the Eucharist (Matthew 26:26)
Page 306: Annotation CXIII, Whether wine — or water — alone is to be used in the sacred mysteries (Matthew 26:29)
Page 307: Annotation CXIV, Whether Christ truly feared for himself, and truly prayed for himself (Matthew 26:37)
Page 307: Annotation CXV, Whether it is lawful for Christians to make war (Matthew 26:52)
Page 308: Annotation CXVI, On war (Matthew 26:52)
Page 308: Annotation CXVII, Whether it is lawful for exorcists to adjure demons (Matthew 26:63)
Page 308: Annotation CXVIII, Whether Peter denied that Christ is God (Matthew 26:74)
Page 309: Annotation CXIX, Whether it is possible that those who have denied Christ should return to repentance and obtain pardon (Matthew 26:74–75)

Page 310: Annotation CXX, Whether Judas died by hanging in a noose (Matthew 27:5)
Page 310: Annotation CXXI, Whether it is lawful for clerics to have possessions of temporal things (Matthew 27:6–7)
Page 312: Annotation CXXII, Whether Adam was buried on Mount Calvary (Matthew 27:33)
Page 313: Annotation CXXIII, On the oath (Matthew 27:34)
Page 313: Annotation CXXIV, Whether the darkness, at Christ's death, happened over the whole world (Matthew 27:45)
Page 314: Annotation CXXV, Whether Christ was struck by the lance before he was dead (Matthew 27:46)
Page 315: Annotation CXXVI, Whether the divinity was separated from the humanity of the dying Christ (Matthew 27:46)
Page 315: Annotation [unnumbered], Whether she who is called by the Evangelist the mother of James and Joses was the mother of Christ (Matthew 27:56)

Mark

Page 316: Annotation CXXVII, The fishing of the Apostles (Mark 1:16)
Page 316: Annotation CXXVIII, On monastic traditions (Mark 6:8)
Page 317: Annotation CXXIX, "And after six days, Jesus took Peter, etc." (Mark 9:2)
Page 317: Annotation CXXX, On the history of those selling in the temple (Mark 11:15)
Page 318: Annotation CXXXI, Whether Christ was crucified at the third hour (Mark 15:25)
Page 318: Annotation CXXXII, Whether the last chapter of Mark is of solid authority (Mark 16:9)

Luke

Page 319: Annotation CXXXIII, Whether the Virgin Mary is rightly called "full of grace." (Luke 1:28)
Page 320: Annotation CXXXIV, Whether the soul of Christ has omnipotence equal with God (Luke 1:32)
Page 320: Annotation CXXXV, Whether the angels are to be judged on the day of judgment (Luke 2:14)
Page 320: Annotation CXXXVI, Whether Mary needed purification after childbirth (Luke 2:22)
Page 321: Annotation CXXXVII, On Mary giving birth (Luke 2:23)
Page 322: Annotation CXXXVIII, Whether Mary suffered a defect of faith at Christ's death (Luke 2:35)
Page 323: Annotation CXXXIX, Whether Mary always recognized Christ to be God (Luke 2:43)
Page 323: Annotation CXL, Whether Mary always knew the divinity of [her] Son (Luke 2:50)
Page 324: Annotation CXLI, Whether Christ advanced in wisdom (Luke 2:52)
Page 324: Annotation CXLII, On the instruction, errings, and penance of the angels (Luke 3:12)
Page 325: Annotation CXLIII, Whether the generation of Cainan is superfluous in the genealogy of Christ (Luke 3:36)
Page 325: Annotation CXLIV, Whether John the Baptist doubted concerning the death of Christ (Luke 7:19–20)
Page 326: Annotation CXLV, Whether Moses and Elijah truly appeared at Christ's transfiguration (Luke 9:30–31)
Page 327: Annotation CXLVI, On the number of Christ's disciples (Luke 10:1)
Page 328: Annotation CXLVII, Whether the Apostles begged [were mendicants] (Luke 10:7)
Page 328: Annotation CXLVIII, Whether it is lawful for a Christian to have anything of his own (Luke 12:18)
Page 329: Annotation CXLIX, On the guardian angels (Luke 12:58)
Page 330: Annotation CL, Whether the good angels can be bent to virtue and vice (Luke 15:31)
Page 331: Annotation CLI, Whether those who preceded the preaching of Christ hoped for the resurrection (Luke 16:20)
Page 331: Annotation CLII, Whether anyone can attain salvation without the reading of the Divine Scripture (Luke 16:24)
Page 335: Annotation CLIII, Confession (Luke 16:31)
Page 336: Annotation CLIV, What sins are to be confessed (Luke 17:14)
Page 336: Annotation CLV, On confession (Luke 18:13)
Page 336: Annotation CLVI, Whether it is lawful for a Christian to wage war (Luke 22:36)
Page 342: Annotation CLVII, War (Luke 22:38)
Page 342: Annotation CLVIII, War (Luke 22:38)
Page 342: Annotation CLIX, The consoling apparition of the angel (Luke 22:43)
Page 342: Annotation CLX, Whether Peter denied the Godhead of Christ (Luke 22:57)
Page 343: Annotation CLXI, Whether penance profits without confession and satisfaction (Luke 22:62)
Page 344: Annotation CLXII, Whether the death of Christ is to be mourned (Luke 23:28)
Page 345: Annotation CLXIII, Whether the saints yet enjoy the divine glory (Luke 23:43)
Page 345: Annotation CLXIV, Whether the Godhead was separated from the humanity of Christ through death (Luke 23:46)

John

Page 346: Annotation CLXV, Whether the angels learned anything from the evangelical writings (John 1:1)

Page 346: Annotation CLXVI, The imprisonment of souls (John 1:1)
Page 346: Annotation CLXVII, Whether God is the form of things (John 1:1)
Page 347: Annotation CLXVIII, The stars ensouled (John 1:1)
Page 347: Annotation CLXIX, Whether the Word [was] "to God" or "with God." (John 1:1)
Page 347: Annotation CLXX, Whether Christ suffered for the angels (John 1:1)
Page 348: Annotation CLXXI, On the equality of the Father and the Son (John 1:1)
Page 349: Annotation CLXXII, On the Son, and the Holy Spirit (John 1:3)
Page 349: Annotation CLXXIII, On the true punctuation of the clause, "Without him was made nothing." (John 1:3)
Page 350: Annotation CLXXIV, Whether sin is nothing (John 1:3)
Page 351: Annotation CLXXV, Whether the Son, as regards the divinity, is less than the Father (John 1:4–5)
Page 352: Annotation CLXXVI, On the Son, and the Holy Spirit (John 1:5)
Page 353: Annotation CLXXVII, The soul of John the Baptist existing before [his] body (John 1:7)
Page 353: Annotation CLXXVIII, Whether faith alone suffices for those to be saved (John 1:7)
Page 354: Annotation CLXXIX, Whether faith is lost through [mortal] sin (John 1:9)
Page 355: Annotation CLXXX, "And the Word was made flesh." (John 1:14)
Page 355: Annotation CLXXXI, Whether works [done] apart from grace are sins (John 1:16)
Page 355: Annotation CLXXXII, Whether the essence of God can be beheld by any creature (John 1:18)
Page 357: Annotation CLXXXIII, "I saw, and gave testimony." (John 1:34)
Page 357: Annotation CLXXXIV, Whether the beginning of our salvation is from us (John 1:38)
Page 358: Annotation CLXXXV, Whether Mary always had a becoming opinion of Christ (John 2:3)
Page 359: Annotation CLXXXVI, Whether the body of Christ was first formed in the womb before it was assumed by the deity (John 2:20)
Page 359: Annotation CLXXXVII, Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father alone (John 3:34)
Page 362: Annotation CLXXXVIII, Whether the Son and the Holy Spirit are inferior to the Father (John 4:24)
Page 362: Annotation CLXXXIX, Whether the angels insert souls into bodies (John 4:38)
Page 362: Annotation CXC, "The man believed the word which Jesus said to him, and went his way." (John 4:50)
Page 362: Annotation CXCI, "Himself believed, and his whole house." (John 4:53)
Page 364: Annotation CXCII, "Labor not for the food which perisheth, but for that which endureth unto life everlasting." (John 6:27)
Page 364: Annotation CXCIII, On the Eucharist (John 6:29)
Page 365: Annotation CXCIV, Whether faith is from us. Rom. 10 (John 6:44)
Page 365: Annotation CXCV, Whether venial sins impede the effect of the Eucharist for those receiving [it] (John 6:49)
Page 366: Annotation CXCVI, Whether the Eucharist contains the true body of Christ (John 6:48)
Page 373: Annotation CXCVII, On the eating of the sacrament (John 6:53)
Page 373: Annotation CXCVIII, Whether the beginning of the eighth chapter of John is authentic (John 8:1)
Page 373: Annotation CXCIX, Whether [some] sins are at some time to be remitted (John 8:21)
Page 374: Annotation CC, "If you continue in my word," etc. (John 8:31)
Page 374: Annotation CCI, "Beginning" [principium] (John 8:25)
Page 374: Annotation CCII, Whether priests have the power of remitting sins (John 8:34)
Page 375: Annotation CCIII, [Origen:] souls, coming into the world, bring with them seminal reasons (John 8:37)
Page 375: Annotation CCIV, Whether the soul of Christ was in heaven before [it was] in the flesh (John 8:42)
Page 375: Annotation CCV, On Thomas's exhortation to [his] fellow-disciples (John 11:16)
Page 375: Annotation CCVI, Whether Peter received the keys in his own person (John 12:8)
Page 377: Annotation CCVII, On Philip (John 12:21)
Page 377: Annotation CCVIII, Whether the Holy Spirit [is] from the Father alone (John 14:16)
Page 377: Annotation CCIX, Whether after baptism original sin, and after justification other sins too, remain (John 13:10)
Page 380: Annotation CCX, Whether all believers are certain that they are in grace (John 14:16)
Page 384: Annotation CCXI, "The Spirit of truth, who proceedeth from the Father," etc. (John 15:26)
Page 384: Annotation CCXII, Whether faith alone suffices for salvation (John 16:9)
Page 384: Annotation CCXIII, Whether Christ began to be (John 17:5)
Page 385: Annotation CCXIV, Whether only the predestined believe (John 17:6)
Page 386: Annotation CCXV, Whether all believers are certain of grace (John 17:6)
Page 387: Annotation CCXVI, "When therefore Jesus had received the vinegar, he said, It is finished." (John 19:30)

Page 387: Annotation CCXVII, Whether the mysteries of faith are to be proved by human reasons (John 20:19)
Page 388: Annotation CCXVIII, Whether auricular confession was instituted by Christ (John 20:22–23)
Page 388: Annotation CCXIX, Whether the care of the predestined alone was committed to Peter (John 21:17)
Page 389: Annotation CCXX, Whether it is to be read SIC ["so"] or SI ["if"] (John 21:22)
Page 390: Annotation CCXXI, Whether Peter had the keys in his own person (John 21:19)

Acts

Page 391: Annotation CCXXII, Whether Judas died by hanging (Acts 1:18)
Page 392: Annotation CCXXIII, On the oath (Acts 3:26)
Page 392: Annotation CCXXIV, On the oath (Acts 4:20)
Page 392: Annotation CCXXV, Whether the seven [of Acts 6] were true deacons (Acts 6:5)
Page 393: Annotation CCXXVI, On the true reading of this passage (Acts 9:5)
Page 394: Annotation CCXXVII, Suffrages for the dead (Acts 9:43)
Page 394: Annotation CCXXVIII, "James answered, saying, Men [and] brethren." (Acts 15:13)
Page 394: Annotation CCXXIX, Who Dionysius the Areopagite was (Acts 17:34)

Romans

Page 394: Annotation CCXXX, On the cause of predestination (Romans 1:1)
Page 395: Annotation CCXXXI, Whether those who scrutinize the divine mysteries are to be condemned (Romans 1:17)
Page 396: Annotation CCXXXII, Whether circumcision confers grace (Romans 2:25)
Page 396: Annotation CCXXXIII, Whether faith alone justifies (Romans 3:27)
Page 397: Annotation CCXXXIV, "And he was not weak in faith." (Romans 4:19)
Page 397: Annotation CCXXXV, Whether the charity by which we love God is the indwelling Holy Spirit (Romans 5:5)
Page 397: Annotation CCXXXVI, Whether the sin of Adam passed to posterity not [as] guilt, but [as] punishment (Romans 5:12)
Page 401: Annotation CCXXXVII, Whether the sin of Adam passed to [his] posterity not [as] guilt, but only [by] occasion (Romans 5:12)
Page 402: Annotation CCXXXVIII, Whether the sin of Adam passed to posterity not by propagation, but by imitation (Romans 5:12)
Page 403: Annotation CCXXXIX, Whether abstinence from an oath, and love of an enemy, are counsels or precepts (Romans 7:6)
Page 405: Annotation CCXL, Whether original sin [comes] by propagation (Romans 7:8)
Page 405: Annotation CCXLI, The exposition of this passage retracted (Romans 7:14)
Page 405: Annotation CCXLII, Whether the natural passions were in man before sin (Romans 7:14)
Page 406: Annotation CCXLIII, Whether the law of Moses commands lesser [things] than the law of nature (Romans 7:25)
Page 407: Annotation CCXLIV, Whether the flesh of Christ had an inclination to sinning (Romans 8:3)
Page 407: Annotation CCXLV, Whether the heavens were made corruptible and dissoluble on account of Adam's sin (Romans 8:20)
Page 410: Annotation CCXLVI, Whether Adam, by sinning, lost the image [of God] (Romans 8:21)
Page 410: Annotation CCXLVII, The privation of eternal glory (Romans 8:27)
Page 410: Annotation CCXLVIII, Whether all men are chosen and destined to eternal life (Romans 8:28)
Page 411: Annotation CCXLIX, Whether future things are the cause of the divine foreknowledge, or the contrary (Romans 8:29)
Page 412: Annotation CCL, Whether election and reprobation are from the foreseeing of works (Romans 8:30)
Page 412: Annotation CCLI, Whether predestination is from the merits of the predestined foreseen by God (Romans 9:13)
Page 418: Annotation CCLII, Whether God reprobates any from the purpose of his will alone (Romans 9:18)
Page 421: Annotation CCLIII, Whether Paul was equal to Peter in dignity (Romans 11:1)
Page 421: Annotation CCLIV, Expiatory fire (Romans 11:5)
Page 421: Annotation CCLV, Whether the whole life of unbelievers is sin (Romans 14:23)
Page 422: Annotation CCLVI, War (Romans 16:3)

1 Corinthians

Page 422: Annotation CCLVII, Whether the precepts of the divine law can be fulfilled by natural powers alone (1 Corinthians 1:10)

Page 423: Annotation CCLVIII, Purgatory (1 Corinthians 3:12)

Page 423: Annotation CCLIX, Whether Chrysostom acknowledged purgatory (1 Corinthians 3:15)

Page 425: Annotation CCLX, Whether it be lawful for a husband to repudiate an adulterous wife, and for a wife an adulterous husband (1 Corinthians 7:10-11)

Page 426: Annotation CCLXI, Whether before communion it is necessary to confess [one's] sins (1 Corinthians 11:28)

Page 427: Annotation CCLXII, Whether only the scriptures approved by the apostles are canonical (1 Corinthians 12:28)

Page 427: Annotation CCLXIII, Whether the Mass and public prayers ought to be said in the vernacular tongue (1 Corinthians 14:14-16)

Page 429: Annotation CCLXIV, Whether souls are blessed before the day of judgment (1 Corinthians 15:19)

Page 431: Annotation CCLXV, Whether all men are to die (1 Corinthians 15:51)

Page 432: Annotation CCLXVI, Whether the writings of heretics are to be read (1 Corinthians 15:51)

Page 434: Annotation CCLXVII, Whether it is lawful to strike either the living or the dead with anathema (1 Corinthians 16:22)

2 Corinthians

Page 436: Annotation CCLXVIII, Whether it is necessary to exhibit the Eucharist under both species to the laity (2 Corinthians 8:24)

Galatians

Page 437: Annotation CCLXIX, Whether Peter was superior in dignity to Paul and the rest of the apostles (Galatians 1:1)

Page 439: Annotation CCLXX, Election and reprobation from merits (Galatians 1:15)

Page 439: Annotation CCLXXI, Peter superior to the other apostles (Galatians 1:18)

Page 440: Annotation CCLXXII, "But [I saw none of the apostles], except James, the brother of the Lord." (Galatians 1:19)

Page 440: Annotation CCLXXIII, On the four precepts of the apostles to those who [are] of the gentiles (Galatians 2:2)

Page 440: Annotation CCLXXIV, Whether Peter and Paul used simulation, and whether by simulating they sinned (Galatians 2:11)

Page 441: Annotation CCLXXV, "I said to Cephas before all, If thou, being a Jew," etc. (Galatians 2:14)

Page 442: Annotation CCLXXVI, Whether witches [Striges] can bewitch little infants (Galatians 3:1)

Page 444: Annotation CCLXXVII, Whether it is read in the sacred letters that God cursed anyone (Galatians 3:10)

Page 444: Annotation CCLXXVIII, Whether our liberty [free will] without grace can do good (Galatians 3:21)

Page 446: Annotation CCLXXIX, Whether it is lawful to call the prefects of monasteries abbots or fathers (Galatians 4:6)

Page 446: Annotation CCLXXX, Whether it is lawful to bend the sins of the saints to pious senses (Galatians 4:24)

Page 447: Annotation CCLXXXI, Whether those who live under grace are impeccable [free from sin] (Galatians 5:17)

Page 447: Annotation CCLXXXII, Whether the damned are ever to be saved (Galatians 5:22)

Page 448: Annotation CCLXXXIII, Whether the saints departed can pray for us (Galatians 6:5)

Page 448: Annotation CCLXXXIV, Whether all men are to be loved with an equal affection of charity (Galatians 6:10)

Ephesians

Page 449: Annotation CCLXXXV, Whether election [is] from foreseen merits (Ephesians 1:4)

Page 449: Annotation CCLXXXVI, Whether souls [were] created before the world, and thrust into bodies for their offenses (Ephesians 1:4)

Page 450: Annotation CCLXXXVII, Whether souls [were] created before the world, and afterward cast into bodies for their [own] faults (Ephesians 1:4)

Page 451: Annotation CCLXXXVIII, Whether penance is again to be given to the lapsed (Ephesians 1:6)

Page 452: Annotation CCLXXXIX, On the Eucharist (Ephesians 1:7)

Page 452: Annotation CCXC, Whether the punishments of the damned are to be ended (Ephesians 1:12)

Page 454: Annotation CCXCI, Whether the knowledge of souls is from reminiscence (Ephesians 1:17)

Page 454: Annotation CCXCII, The increments and decrements of angels (Ephesians 1:21)

Page 455: Annotation CCXCIII, Whether the stars are rational living beings, and purged by the blood of Christ (Ephesians 1:22)

Page 455: Annotation CCXCIV, The bodies of demons (Ephesians 2:2)

Page 455: Annotation CCXCV, Whether the demons are ever to be saved (Ephesians 2:7)

Page 456: Annotation CCXCVI, Angels purged (Ephesians 2:17)

Page 456: Annotation CCXCVII, The soul's prison (Ephesians 3:1)

Page 456: Annotation CCXCVIII, Whether the demons are to be restored (Ephesians 3:10)
Page 456: Annotation CCXCIX, Whether the angels, before the passion of Christ, knew the mystery of redemption (Ephesians 3:10)
Page 457: Annotation CCC, "And he himself indeed gave some [to be] apostles." (Ephesians 4:11)
Page 457: Annotation CCCI, Whether he is to be constituted a bishop, who cannot teach (Ephesians 4:11)
Page 458: Annotation CCCII, On the angels, and the demons (Ephesians 4:10.b)
Page 458: Annotation CCCIII, "From whom the whole body [is] compacted." (Ephesians 4:16.b)
Page 458: Annotation CCCIV, Whether song is to be used in the divine praises (Ephesians 5:19)
Page 459: Annotation CCCV, Whether sinners are members of the Church (Ephesians 5:24)
Page 459: Annotation CCCVI, The transformation of women (Ephesians 5:28)
Page 459: Annotation CCCVII, On the sacrament of matrimony (Ephesians 5:32)
Page 460: Annotation CCCVIII, Jacob, and the wrestling of the angel (Ephesians 6:12)
Page 460: Annotation CCCIX, The punishment of original sin (Ephesians 6:24)

Philippians

Page 461: Annotation CCCX, Whether the saints are to be invoked (Philippians 1:18)
Page 462: Annotation CCCXI, Whether prayer is to be made for catechumens departing without baptism (Philippians 1:23)

Colossians

Page 463: Annotation CCCXII, Whether the sacred letters attribute patience to God (Colossians 1:11)
Page 464: Annotation CCCXIII, Whether to individual men individual angels are deputed (Colossians 1:20)
Page 464: Annotation CCCXIV, Fascination [bewitchment] (Colossians 3:15)
Page 464: Annotation CCCXV, The common [vernacular] Bibles are to be read by all (Colossians 3:16)

2 Thessalonians

Page 465: Annotation CCCXVI, "When I was yet with you, [I told you these things], etc." (2 Thessalonians 2:5)
Page 465: Annotation CCCXVII, Whether monks are to be compelled to provide for themselves a living by the labor of [their] hands (2 Thessalonians 3:10)

1 Timothy

Page 468: Annotation CCCXVIII, Whether it is lawful to constitute a bigamist a bishop (1 Timothy 3:2)
Page 469: Annotation CCCXIX, Bishop, and presbyter (1 Timothy 3:8)
Page 469: Annotation CCCXX, Whether God, before the incarnation of Christ, was seen by the angels (1 Timothy 3:16)
Page 469: Annotation CCCXXI, Whether clerics ought to possess anything beyond food and clothing (1 Timothy 5:18)
Page 469: Annotation CCCXXII, The punishment of blasphemers (1 Timothy 5:23)

Titus

Page 470: Annotation CCCXXIII, Angels existing long before the world (Titus 1:2)
Page 470: Annotation CCCXXIV, Whether a bishop is greater than a presbyter (Titus 1:5)
Page 472: Annotation CCCXXV, Whether a bigamist is to be chosen for bishop (Titus 1:6)
Page 472: Annotation CCCXXVI, Daily bread (Titus 2:11)

Hebrews

Page 473: Annotation CCCXXVII, Whether the epistle to the Hebrews is Paul's (Hebrews 1:1)
Page 473: Annotation CCCXXVIII, Whether the Father is the cause of the Son (Hebrews 1:3.a)
Page 473: Annotation CCCXXIX, Whether in Christ there are two persons (Hebrews 1:9)
Page 474: Annotation CCCXXX, Whether the celestial bodies are to be burned up (Hebrews 1:11)
Page 474: Annotation CCCXXXI, Whether Christ was diminished from God (Hebrews 2:7)
Page 475: Annotation CCCXXXII, Whether the laity and monks are equal — [their] obligations and offenses [being] equal (Hebrews 4:16)
Page 476: Annotation CCCXXXIII, Whence the beginning of salvation (Hebrews 7:10)
Page 476: Annotation CCCXXXIV, The state and figure of heaven (Hebrews 8:2)
Page 476: Annotation CCCXXXV, Whether the souls of the saints are yet blessed (Hebrews 11:37)
Page 476: Annotation CCCXXXVI, Confession (Hebrews 12:17)

James

Page 477: Annotation CCCXXXVII, Whether the epistle of James is canonical (James 1:1)

Page 477: Annotation CCCXXXVIII, Oath (James 5:12)

Page 478: Annotation CCCXXXIX, Whether extreme unction can be ministered by any layman whatsoever (James 5:14)

2 Peter

Page 479: Annotation CCCXL, Whether the heavens are to be burned by the fire of the world-conflagration (2 Peter 3:10)

Page 483: Annotation CCCXLI, Whether air and water at the end of the world shall be wholly dissolved (2 Peter 3:10)

1 John

Page 483: Annotation CCCXLII, Trinity (1 John 5:7)

Page 483: Annotation CCCXLIII, Whether the impugning of the brotherhood is an irremissible sin (1 John 5:16)

Jude

Page 484: Annotation CCCXLIV, Whether the epistle of Jude is canonical (Jude 1)

Apocalypse

Page 484: Annotation CCCXLV, Whether the souls of the saints see God before the day of judgment (Apocalypse 6:9)

Page 492: Annotation CCCXLVI, Whether Jeremiah is dead (Apocalypse 11:3)

Page 492: Annotation CCCXLVII, Whether there are to be two [future] resurrections, and a golden age of a thousand years between the two (Apocalypse 20:6)

(printed folio 526 [PDF p. 343], beneath a full-width title banner — the opening of Liber Quintus (Book V): Annotations and Censures upon the interpreters of the Old Testament, with its Preface. Sixtus states the book's purpose and rebukes two opposite faults in handling the Fathers: heretics who abuse their words, and critics who reject a whole author for a single slip.)

F. SIXTUS OF SIENA, OF THE ORDER OF PREACHERS — ON THE ANNOTATIONS AND CENSURES:

upon the interpreters and expositors of the divine volumes of the Old Testament.

BIBLIOTHECA SANCTA, BOOK FIVE.

PREFACE.

(folio 526, left column)

In the preceding book I reviewed the Catholic Expositors of the sacred volumes — all whom I was able to come to know, whether by varied reading or by sure report — together with all their exegetical writings. Now, in this fifth book of the work, I shall annotate, according to the order of the divine volumes, a number of passages worthy of annotation and censure, which I have gathered out of the various explanations of those same expositors: not because I myself desire in any part to obscure, or to render suspect, the sincere piety and admirable erudition of those most holy and most learned men, but that by the present labor I may take counsel for those who are offended by the writings of the holy expositors — whether from prudence, or from malice, or from immoderate zeal — and who likewise give offense.[1]

◊ 1. Left margin: Heretics abuse the writings of Catholics in order to confirm their own impious dogmas.

Of their number, those who do harm maliciously, and the more [grievously], are certain perverse men addicted to detestable errors: who, while they wish to make their heresies more easily persuasive, generally snatch out of the orthodox commentaries of the ancient expositors certain opinions — either obscurely written, or put forth by [the Fathers] through carelessness — and drag them off to the confirmation of their own perfidy, lest they seem to be the first, or the only ones, to hold such things. Thus of old the most impious Arians drove the letters of blessed Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria — however much those letters resisted — to the overthrowing of Christ's divinity. Thus once the Pelagian heretics fought against original sin and against the aid of divine grace, wrongfully making use of the opinions of Chrysostom and Augustine. Thus five hundred years ago Bertram the Priest and Berengarius the Deacon, by violently wresting the sayings of Ambrose and Augustine, attempted to take away the Lord's Body and Blood from the Church of Christ. Thus too, in this wretched age of ours, Luther, Zwingli, Oecolampadius, Bodius [Bucer], Calvin, Illyricus [Flacius], and very many other heresiarchs, clad in false →

(folio 526, right column)

→ arms and spoils — that is, covered over with the testimony of the holy Fathers, whether feigned, or corrupted, or falsely interpreted — assail the uncorrupted integrity of our faith. These men I judge worthy of no pardon whatsoever: whether because they do not shrink from serving up to others the poisons of heresies; or because they iniquitously defame the venerable memory of the saints, imputing to them things they never held; or because they call back into the light again — not without great harm to Christians — certain now-slumbering errors of the Fathers, which ought to have been buried in perpetual silence — following in this the footsteps of their most wicked author, Ham:[2] who not only did not cover the nakedness of his father Noah, but proclaimed it to the rest to be mocked. But contrariwise the other brothers, Shem and Japheth, far unlike their brother, endured neither to look themselves upon the father's nakedness which was to be revered, nor to have it looked upon by others, but, turned away (as it is written), covered it — showing by such an example that the errors of the holy Fathers, if not to be approved, are yet rather to be concealed than to be published.

◊ 2. Right margin: Heretics are imitators of Ham. Genesis 9.

There are, next, others so extreme toward the contrary side that, if they find in the catholic and ever-so-ancient commentaries of the expositors anything that has the appearance of error, at once, seized by a certain headlong severity, they cast away the whole work and condemn the author most severely. These men seem to me indeed to have a zeal for God, but — as Paul says — not according to knowledge.[3] For they ought with mature consideration to weigh the not-few occasions on account of which those ancient masters of the churches did at times stray somewhat from the intended mark of truth.[4] First, because they set out upon a road never before attempted, with no guide going before, and — the first, as the proverb has it, to break the ice — opened a way for those who came after, by which the hidden senses of the Scriptures might be tracked out; and the first attempts of any discipline are not wont to be in every part successful and free of all fault. Secondly, they said, dictated, and wrote things almost innumerable according to the opportunity of the times, places, and persons.

◊ 3. Right margin: Romans 10:2. — "they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge."

◊ 4. Right margin: By what reasons the errors of the ancients are to be excused. — the margin numbers the reasons 1, 2 (continuing on the next folio).

[…continues on folio 527 (PDF p. 344): the further reasons by which the Fathers' occasional errors are to be excused.]

---

(printed folio 527 [PDF p. 344] — continuation of the Preface. Sixtus completes his five reasons for excusing the Fathers' occasional errors, names the three kinds of reader Book V addresses (malicious heretics, over-severe critics, simple incautious readers), and states his method: to flag cautionary passages from the authors themselves and supply parallel-passage "antidotes.")

(folio 527, left column)

→ and, as Augustine says, excusing himself by a saying of Solomon, declares: "In much speaking there is no lack of sin"[1] — especially since no one is so keen-eyed that he cannot often be deluded, and does not sometimes grow dim of sight; for even the good Homer sometimes nods. There are, indeed, certain moles even on the most beautiful bodies; and nothing in human affairs is in every part blessed. Moreover, those men of old burned with so great an ardor of sincere piety and of catholic defense that, while they strove with every effort of their powers to destroy one error, they often either fell into the opposite one, or seem in some way to have fallen — after the manner of farmers,[2] who, wishing to straighten the trunk of a tender tree bent crooked, sometimes exceed the measure by an immoderate pull, and draw the very plant into the contrary and opposite shape. Thus Dionysius, Bishop of the Corinthians — as Basil writes in his letter to Bishop Maximus[3] — while he strove too vehemently and sharply to combat Sabellius (who asserted one person of Father and Son), did not perceive that he was, by an excessive zeal for controversy, being carried into the opposite fault, and was defending a difference and inequality of the two substances. Thus the divine Augustine, while with all ardor of spirit and words he fights in defense of divine grace against the Pelagians — who exalted free will to the injury of divine grace — seems to slip, as it were, into the other pit, and at times to attribute to man's free will less than is fair. And on the contrary Chrysostom, in the heat of disputing with the Manichees and pagans — who asserted that man is either evil by nature or often driven to sin by the necessity of fate — raises the powers of our nature higher than is right.

◊ 1. Left margin: Proverbs 10:19. — "In the multitude of words there wanteth not sin."

◊ 2. Left margin: A most fitting simile. — the farmer over-bending the sapling.

◊ 3. Left margin: Nicephorus, book 6, chapter 25.

[4.] Add to these that, although some lapses which cannot be dissembled exist in the books of the ancients, yet nothing is thereby taken from their sanctity and erudition: since in those times the Church had not yet either called into question, or defined by a settled determination, anything about these matters which are now condemned; and the authority of divine Scripture seemed ambiguous on either side, nor was it yet forbidden to anyone to hold an opinion about these things, and to teach what he would.

[5.] Nor should this be passed over either, which Pamphilus the Martyr, Eusebius of Caesarea, Didymus, and Rufinus complained of[4] — namely, that very many of the writings of Clement, Dionysius, Origen, Athanasius, and of the other noble Doctors were of old most wickedly handled by heretics: who, in order to win credit and authority for their heresies under the name of the most illustrious Fathers, corrupted, altered, and cut away much in their books, and also inserted much of their own dogmas at variance with what those celebrated men had held and taught — [men] of whom it is not credible that in the same volumes, on the same matter and at the same time, they either held or wrote contrary things, especially since they were neither mad nor utterly forgetful.

◊ 4. Left margin: The writings of the Catholic Doctors were corrupted by heretics.

(folio 527, right column)

In the third place, finally, there are certain simple and incautious readers who, without any judgment or observation, are carried heedlessly into the reading of the illustrious expositors, and devour and gulp down everything without any distinction or selection — by no means discerning for what cause the things they read were written, to what feelings, occasions, places, times, and persons they were accommodated, whether they were said for the sake of disputing, of objecting, or of rebuking, or were confirmed under the settled definition of a fixed assertion. And while these inconsiderate readers take no notice of this, it necessarily follows that they for the most part slip into a number of errors — errors which, in the expositors' works, either the authors themselves left behind, as much by occasion as by carelessness, or heretics thrust in by fraud. Most prudently admonishing this so shameless a class of men, D. Anselm, in his commentary on the second Epistle to the Corinthians, left it thus written: "In the books of the holy doctors, which the Church reads as authentic, there are sometimes found certain depraved or heretical things: yet neither the books nor the authors are on this account condemned. Let the prudent reader read their books through, and he will find that what I say is true."

For this threefold variety of readers, then, this Fifth book is written; in which, according to the order of the volumes of both Testaments, I have gathered out of many commentaries of the divine expositors — and especially of the ancients — passages to be read with caution: not indeed all and every one, but only those which could not be dissembled either without offense to catholic piety or without great disturbance of the readers. And these same [passages] I have almost always indicated not in my own words — lest perhaps I should not be believed — but by the testimonies of the authors who noted such passages. I have also appended, wherever it could be done, to each suspect passage its own antidotes — that is, other passages and opinions of the same authors, either openly at odds with the passages cited or at least diverse and foreign to them, which by their own testimony show that those passages were either explained elsewhere more openly by the authors themselves, or wholly retracted; or were not well understood by the slanderers; or were violently wrested by heretics to the overthrow of Catholic assertions and the defense of depraved dogmas; or were falsified or adulterated by forgers, or added to; or perhaps were at first published in a disordered way by the very authors of the works, and afterward — whether by chance or by some excusable occasion — left without any correction.

Now I have gathered all these things to this end: first, lest the incautious reader, unrolling the commentaries of the catholic expositors, dash himself against some reef he has not noticed; next, that over-severe readers may recognize that the errors of the divine interpreters are to be excused with all pardon and piety, and softened with the gentlest mildness; →

[…continues on folio 528 (PDF p. 345): "lastly (postremò)…", the third and final purpose of the collection.]

---

(printed folio 528 [PDF p. 345], with a section banner; the Preface ends and the collection proper begins. Annot. I–III (Gen 1:1): Cajetan on the plural "Elohim" (defended against Catharinus); Philo's "heaven as dwelling of the gods" (= angels); and Procopius denying heaven is spherical or mobile.)

(folio 528 — top, concluding the Preface [set across the two columns])

→ lastly, that those who abuse the explanations of the saints to their own ruin and that of others may desist from so wicked a contrivance, once they have seen these impostures and frauds of theirs to be detected. But let us now approach the work itself: in which we shall fit together annotations and censures upon the explainers of the blessed volumes, keeping the order of the books and chapters of divine Scripture, proceeding from the beginning of Genesis all the way to the last book of the New Testament.

ANNOTATIONS AND CENSURES

upon the expositors of the divine volumes of the OLD Scripture, arranged according to the order of the books and chapters of the Old Testament.

(folio 528, left column → right column)

Annotation I [contents]

"In the beginning God created heaven and earth." — Genesis 1:1

Whether the beginning of Genesis pertains to the Trinity.

Thomas Cajetan, Cardinal-Priest, in the beginning of his commentaries on Genesis, explaining why Moses in the first words of Genesis called God by a plural number — saying אלהים Elohim, that is, "Gods" ("In the beginning God created heaven and earth") — taught that God is named by Moses with a plural appellation not to signify a plurality of divine persons in the Trinity, but because the name Elohim lacks a singular number;[1] adding that this passage in no way favors a Trinity of persons, since — as Athanasius testifies in his Creed — a divine person can be called neither "Gods" nor "lords" in the catholic sense.

◊ 1. Left margin: The name Elohim lacks a singular number.

Ambrose [Catharinus], Archbishop of Compsa, in the fourth book of the Annotations which he published against this same Cajetan, execrates this opinion as Jewish and abhorrent from the view of the most excellent Fathers, rejecting it among the other propositions of Cajetan for which he judges him to have thought ill concerning the holy Trinity. He also derides Cajetan's argument — that from Athanasius's Creed he wished to establish that divine persons are falsely called "Gods" or "lords" — since Athanasius does not teach that, but only that "three Gods" or "three lords" cannot be pronounced in the catholic sense. Yet this reasoning does not follow: "They cannot be called three Gods, therefore not Gods [at all]" — because many things are falsely said conjointly which are truly said separately. Wherefore the Master of the Sentences [Peter Lombard], and Thomas, and the rest of the doctors admit that they can be called "Gods," but not likewise "three Gods." Thus far Ambrose.

But it was certainly not fitting for him[2] to bring his brother, for such trifling causes, under suspicion of injuring the Trinity — [a Trinity] which Cajetan not only most openly proclaims in his commentaries on this first chapter, expounding that "Let us make man," etc., but also learnedly and piously teaches and defends in all his writings. Ambrose ought also to have noticed that Cajetan had no expositor to imitate, out of the Greek, Latin, or Hebrew writers, who expounded that word Elohim of the Trinity — except only Peter Lombard, who in the first [book] of the Sentences had somehow touched this interpretation in passing, and Paul of Bur→gos, the bishop, who had copied the same interpretation out of the same book of the Sentences. From whose opinions many not-ignoble men, even before Cajetan, had openly dissented without any note of heresy. Nor do I wish this to have been said by me to derogate in this part from the authority of those who expounded this passage mystically of the Trinity: for it delights me greatly — to use Augustine's words — that in the very opening of the holy book of Genesis the Trinity is commended, when it is said: "In the beginning" — that is, in the Son — "God" (namely the Father) "made heaven and earth."[3]

◊ 2. Left margin: Cajetan is defended.

◊ 3. Right margin: Genesis 1:1.

Annotation II [contents]

"In the beginning God created heaven and earth." — Genesis 1:1

Heaven — whether it is the dwelling of many gods.

Philo the Jew — whom Origen, Basil, Chrysostom, Ambrose, and Augustine followed in most of their expositions — in his book On the Fashioning of the Six Days, narrating the present passage, says that heaven was made by God to be the most sacred dwelling of the gods, both of those not apparent [to sense] and of those obvious to sense. Lest anyone suspect this opinion to incline toward the error of the pagans, who introduce many gods, it must be known that Philo — as appears from the same work of his — understands by the name of "gods" the spiritual, rational, and heavenly substances called by us Angels:[4] of which he says some are incorporeal and invisible, but others not without bodies — such as are the stars, which appear to our eyes.

◊ 4. Right margin: By the name of "gods" Philo understands Angels.

Annotation III [contents]

"In the beginning God created heaven and earth." — Genesis 1:1

Whether heaven is spherical and mobile.

Procopius of Gaza, in his commentaries on Genesis, expounding this saying, declares that the assertion of those who say heaven is of a spherical shape and is turned with a circular motion does not agree with orthodox truth, but contradicts Moses, the prophets, Paul, and Christ: who everywhere in the divine scriptures refute this opinion, teaching that heaven is neither borne in a circle nor has a spherical form, but is utterly immobile; and he repeats this same thing below in the exposition of chapter 7. This opinion Procopius seems to have taken, in almost the same words, from homilies 14 and 27 of Chrysostom on the Epistle to the Hebrews — although →

[…continues on folio 529 (PDF p. 346): the rest of Annotatio III.]

---

(printed folio 529 [PDF p. 346]. Annot. III–V (Gen 1:1): Augustine's warning not to defend as faith what secular science has disproved; Kissamos on an uncreated empyrean (censured by Catharinus); and whether an angelic world was created before the visible one — affirmed by Basil and many Fathers, yet seemingly condemned by Lateran IV.)

(folio 529, left column → right column)

Annotation III (continued)

— although Lactantius Firmianus held and wrote the same, many years before Chrysostom, in the third book of the Divine Institutions, chapter 24.[1]

◊ 1. Left margin: Lactantius, Chrysostom, and Procopius denied that heaven is of spherical figure and moves in an orbit.

Augustine, in the first and second books of On Genesis to the Letter, most strongly condemns those who so defend this — and opinions like it about celestial matters, contrary to all the professors of philosophy — as [a point] of faith, that they think those who hold otherwise are not catholic.[2] For [Augustine warns that] when nature, heaven, the stars, and other things of this kind are treated, we must beware lest we shamefully err about matters that have been proved by most certain reason and most manifest experience by those skilled in secular things; and — what is worse — lest we confirm our errors out of misunderstood testimonies of Scripture. For this is exceedingly disgraceful, and pernicious chiefly for two reasons. First, because when unbelievers see them thus raving, and erring by the whole breadth of heaven, they will mock both us and our authors, and will reprehend and spit them out as unlearned and false. Next, because if they hear that the divine scriptures err so gravely in those matters which they themselves know best and have tested, they will by no means believe the other things in them that are useful and necessary for salvation, but will suppose that these too were deceitfully composed with a like vanity. (See below, Annotation 14.)

◊ 2. Left margin: The teaching of St. Augustine, to be diligently observed by theologians.

Annotation IV [contents]

"In the beginning God created heaven and earth." — Genesis 1:1

Augustine of Kissamos wrongly taught that the empyrean heaven was not created.

Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, is reprehended by Ambrose [Catharinus], Archbishop of Compsa, because in his Cosmopoeia (for so he entitled his work on the first three chapters of Genesis), in elucidating this passage, he judged that the empyrean heaven was not created, but coeternal with God — being, however, ready to recant if he thought wrongly; yet, as the same Ambrose says, it would have been better not to commit such dangerous things to writing than to offer oneself to a palinode. For who will recant in the name of that man who has already died and left his error alive in his writings?

Annotation V [contents]

"In the beginning God created heaven and earth." — Genesis 1:1

Whether an invisible world and angels were created before this world.

Basil, in the first homily of the Hexaemeron, narrating this passage, seems to hold that God, many ages before this visible world, created another invisible world, and in it founded the angelic nature long before the creation of this visible world. For he speaks in this manner: "Moses set this word in front, saying In the beginning he made: because even before this world there was (as is likely) something which indeed our intelligence is permitted to contemplate. But he omitted to narrate it, because that knowledge is little suited to those still being introduced [to the faith] and to babes. There was surely a certain state of the world, older in origin — suited to those powers withdrawn from the concretion of matter and more excellent than the [material] world — prior also in the condition of time; eternal, namely, and everlasting, that is, never subject to any corruption and destruction. And in it the Founder of all perfected his works: a spiritual light befitting the beatitude of those who love the Lord, rational and invisible natures, and every adornment of intelligible things which exceed our understanding, whose very names it is not possible to find. For these fill up the essence of the invisible world — as Paul teaches us, saying that in him were founded all things, whether visible or invisible, whether thrones or dominations or principalities or powers or might, whether the hosts of angels or the prefectures of archangels.[3] In the beginning, therefore, he says — [meaning] that which is

'with respect to time' — narrating, after the invisible and intelligible things, the beginning of the origin of these visible things and of the principles apprehensible by sense." Again in the second homily, explaining that The earth was void and empty, he confirms the same with these words: "Let us consider, then, that whatever existed before the constitution of this sensible and corruptible world was surely in light. For neither the dignities of the angels, nor all the celestial hosts, nor, in sum, anything named among the rational and ministering spirits, dwelt in darkness, but in light, and possessed a state agreeable to themselves with all spiritual gladness."

◊ 3. Right margin: Colossians 1[:16].

These opinions, which of old among the Greeks Acacius, Bishop of Caesarea, and Diodorus, Bishop of Tarsus, had refuted with many argumentations,[4] the Lateran Council — celebrated at Rome under Innocent III in the year 1215 — seems among the Latins to have condemned, from the words which it placed in the first chapter of its decrees.[5] They are these: "The Creator of all things invisible and visible, spiritual and corporeal, by his omnipotent power together from the beginning of time founded out of nothing both creatures, the spiritual and the corporeal — namely the angelic and the mundane."

◊ 4. Right margin: Acacius, in his book of Select Questions; Diodorus, on Genesis, chapter [—]; Theodoret, on Genesis, question 3.

◊ 5. Right margin: The Lateran Council seems to disapprove the opinion of those asserting that the angels were created before this corporeal world.

Thus far the words of the Council. On whose occasion one must beware not to determine anything rashly about this opinion, accusing of heresy very many illustrious men who assert it: among whom (to pass over Origen for the moment, who first asserted this in the books Peri Archōn [On First Principles] and in homily 4 on Isaiah) there is, foremost, Gregory Nazianzen,[6] who in his sermon On the Nativity speaks thus: "God first indeed devised the angelic and celestial powers; and the thing devised was straightway fulfilled by the Word and consummated by the Spirit; and thus subsisted the second splendors, ministers of that first Splendor. But after these had first rightly succeeded, he secondarily devised the material and visible world: this is the mingling of heaven and earth and of the things that are in between." Thus Gregory: whom his disciple Jerome followed, writing thus in his commentaries on the Epistle to Titus: "Six thousand years of our time are not yet complete — and how great times, and how many origins of ages, must we suppose there were, in which the angels, the Thrones, the dominations, and the other orders served God?" Coming to the same opinion, Ambrose, in the first book of the Hexaemeron, chapter 5, expounding this passage, brought forth these words: "The world therefore was made, and that which was not began to be. But the Word of God was in the beginning, and always: yet also the angels, dominations, and powers, although they began to be at some time, nevertheless were [already in being] when this world was made." Likewise in his preface to the first Psalm: "The angels praise the Lord," he says, "and before the very beginning of the world the Cherubim and Seraphim, with the sweetness of a melodious voice, were saying: Holy, Holy, Holy." To these is added Hilary in the twelfth book On the Trinity, not far from the end, and in the little book →

◊ 6. Right margin: Gregory Nazianzen thinks the angels were created before this world.

[…continues on folio 530 (PDF p. 347): the rest of Annotatio V.]

---

(printed folio 530 [PDF p. 347]. Annot. V–VII (Gen 1:1–2): more Fathers on angels-before-the-world (Cajetan and Aquinas read the Lateran decree by its intention; Augustine leaves it open); Augustine's seemingly-Pelagian words on "the void earth" (self-corrected); and the "Spirit borne over the waters" taken as wind/air (Cajetan defended).)

(folio 530, left column → right column)

Annotation V (continued)

[Hilary] — in the little book against Auxentius, a little before the end. Isidore, Bishop of Seville, in the first book On the Highest Good, ch. 12; and John Damascene in the second volume of the Orthodox Faith, ch. 3; together with very many others, both Greek and Latin — whom, since it would be long to enumerate them, it may suffice that John Cassian, in the 8th book of the Collations, indicates that this was in his time the common opinion of all catholics,[1] in these plain words: "That before the constitution of this visible creature God made the spiritual and celestial powers — which, for this very reason, that they knew themselves to have been produced out of nothing to so great a glory of beatitude by the Creator's benefit, giving thanks to him, cling unceasingly to his praises — no one of the faithful doubts." Bede, in the little book of Separate Questions, q. 9: "The angels (he says) were created before the creation of the world; and before all creation of angels, the Devil was founded [created]: as it is written, 'He is the beginning of the ways of God.'"

◊ 1. Left margin: Cassian asserts that in his time it was the common opinion of catholics that the angels were created before this world.

Accordingly, as Thomas Cajetan says, we ought to interpret the aforesaid opinion of the synodal decree rather according to the Council's intention than according to the sense of the words.[2] And the Council's purpose is — as St. Thomas says in his exposition of the first Decretal — to refute the error either of Origen, or of those who said that spiritual substances were first produced by God so that they might enjoy spiritual dignity, and then, when they had sinned, that all bodies were created, into which, thrust as into prisons, they might pay the penalties of their crimes. Although St. Augustine rather approves the opinion of those who assert the angels were created together with the world, yet in the 11th book of The City of God, chapter 32, he permits everyone to hold freely in this matter what he wishes[3] — provided only that he does not make spiritual substances coeternal with God, and affirms all things, visible as well as invisible, to have been founded by God in time. Subscribing to him, Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus [Cyrrhus], in question 3 on Genesis, after disputing much against Basil, finally added this: "Further, it is necessary to know that all things whatsoever that exist, except the holy Trinity, have a nature liable to corruption. And this being granted, if anyone says that the throngs of angels were created before heaven and earth, he will not offend against the word of piety."

◊ 2. Left margin: See St. Thomas, part 1, question 61, article 3, and Cajetan on the same place.

◊ 3. Left margin: St. Augustine's opinion on the time of the creation of the angels.

Annotation VI [contents]

"And the earth was void and empty." — Genesis 1:2

Whether faith and charity are from ourselves.

Augustine, in the first book On Genesis, allegorically, chapter 3, explaining this, seems to assent somewhat to the Pelagian heresy,[4] when he says: "All men can believe God, and can turn themselves from the love of visible and temporal things to fulfilling the precepts, if they will." Which words Augustine, in the first book of the Retractations, chapter 11, says are not true unless our will is first prepared by God, and charity so increased by him that we are able to accomplish the precepts.

◊ 4. Left margin: St. Augustine retracts himself.

Annotation VII [contents]

"The Spirit of the Lord was borne over the waters." — Genesis 1:2

Whether the spirit that was borne over the waters was the Holy Spirit. — Right margin: Ambrose of Compsa does not rightly reprehend Cajetan.

Thomas Cajetan, in his exposition of this sentence, has been gravely reprehended by Ambrose [Catharinus], Archbishop of Compsa. For in the fourth volume against Cajetan he accuses him of having asserted that the aforesaid passage, "The Spirit of the Lord," etc., pertains not to the Holy Spirit but to some wind or other that blows — and this against the sense of the saints, against the decrees of the Pontiffs, and against the authority of the Church, which on the holy day of Pentecost sings of the Holy Spirit: "Thou who wast to be over the waters didst bear them," etc. I think that Ambrose, when he wrote this, did not have at hand Cajetan's commentaries on Genesis, in which he might read the exposition of the present passage. For he would have seen there that not a word — nay, not a syllable — is written about wind, whether blowing or not blowing. Although I do not see why Cajetan should have been so bitterly branded, even if he had referred this passage to wind, since many Greek and Latin expositors did the same before him. Of these, Basil, expounding Moses's words both of the Holy Spirit and of wind and air, in the second homily of the Hexaemeron writes thus: "Whether one call this a 'spirit' — namely a diffusion of air — recognize the writer [Moses] as enumerating for you the parts of the whole world; or rather (which is truer, and approved by our elders) [understand] the Spirit of God — here it is called the Holy Spirit." Augustine, in the unfinished book On Genesis to the Letter, chapter 4, having said that three things can be understood by "the Spirit of God" — namely the Holy Spirit, and a certain vital creature by which the whole visible world is contained and moved — straightway added this: "A third opinion about this spirit can arise: that by the name 'spirit' the element of air is expressed, so that the four elements are intimated, out of which this visible world arises — namely heaven, earth, water, and air. And any one of these opinions is true." Diodorus, Bishop of Tarsus, judges that these words are to be fitted first to air and wind, then to the Holy Spirit, saying thus: "By 'the Spirit of God' understand the wind, which by its motion alters the nature of the waters, whence too it draws its origin. And he added 'of God' in order to ascribe the cause of this work to God. But if anyone understands 'the Spirit of God' as the Paraclete Spirit, he will not stray from the truth; for the Spirit adorns all things that are." St. John Chrysostom, the disciple of Diodore,[5] in homily 3 on Genesis, says that the Spirit of the Lord is a certain vital operation, implanted in the waters by God, from which the waters had not only motion but the power of procreating animals. Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus, constantly affirms that Moses spoke more of air than of the Holy Spirit, writing in this manner in the Questions on the book of Genesis, question 8: "To some it seems to have been the Holy Spirit, who vivified and made fruitful the nature of the waters, prefiguring in a way the water of baptism. But I should reckon it truer that here you understand 'spirit' as air. For when he had said that God created heaven and earth, and had mentioned the waters under the name of 'the abyss,' he necessarily made mention also of air, permeating from the surface of the water all the way to heaven. For it is the nature of air to be borne and agitated about the lower bodies. And most fittingly that word 'was borne [moved]' indicates the mobile substance of air. But if anyone does not assent to this interpretation, because it is written 'The Spirit of God was borne over the waters,' let him hear blessed David saying of God, the Founder of all: 'His spirit [breath] shall blow, and the waters shall flow.'"[6] Origen, in the first book of the Peri Archōn [On First Principles], says that this passage →

◊ 5. Right margin: Chrysostom was the disciple of Diodore of Tarsus.

◊ 6. Right margin: Psalm 147:18.

[…continues on folio 531 (PDF p. 348): Origen and the rest of Annotatio VII.]

---

(printed folio 531 [PDF p. 348]. Annot. VII–IX (Gen 1:1–6): Origen's allegorical reading of the Spirit; whether angels have subtle bodies (Augustine and many affirm, Aquinas and most deny — Sixtus leans incorporeal, with Bernard's confession of ignorance); and Chrysostom's single heaven, reconciled by Aquinas.)

(folio 531, left column → right column)

Annotation VII (continued)

— [Origen says] this passage is to be understood according to allegory concerning the Holy Spirit, but according to the letter, by no means.

Annotation VIII [contents]

"Let there be a firmament." — Genesis 1:6

Whether angels and demons are corporeal.

Augustine, in the second book On Genesis to the Letter, chapter 17, in expounding the passage before us, hands down that the angels, both good and evil, have subtle bodies;[1] and in the third book of the same work, chapter 10, he shows these to be aerial, but indissoluble through death, because in them the elements more apt for acting than for suffering prevail — that is, air and starry fire (which two are more apt for acting, as earth and moisture for suffering). Agreeing with this opinion, in Epistle 115 to Nebridius he writes that angels are aerial or ethereal living beings of the keenest sense. And in the third book On the Trinity, chapter 1, he says they have a spiritual body — not one to which they are subject, but one which they bear as subject [to them]. In the exposition of the eighty-fifth Psalm he asserts that the bodies of the blessed after the resurrection will be such as are the bodies of the angels; and he repeats this very thing in the explanation of Psalm 145, adding that the angelic body is inferior to the soul. Likewise in the 11th book The City of God, chapter 23, he teaches that the bodies of demons are aerial; and in the 15th book The City of God, chapter 23, he asserts that demons have such bodies as they can couple with women. And in the book which is entitled (under Augustine's name) On Ecclesiastical Dogmas, chapters 11 and 12, it is most constantly affirmed that nothing is incorporeal except God, but that the angels, and all the celestial powers, are corporeal.

◊ 1. Left margin: Several Doctors of the Church hold that angels are corporeal.

Peter Lombard (2 Sentences, distinction 8) says that Augustine brought these things forth not thinking so himself, but reporting the opinion of others[2] — though nevertheless it is not likely that Augustine spoke from another's opinion in so many places, but rather from his own, imitating namely Philo (in the book On the Fashioning of the Six Days), Origen (in the first book of the Peri Archōn, ch. 6, and in the second book of the same work, ch. 2), Lactantius, Hilary, Basil, and the consensus of nearly all who wrote in his time. To this opinion subscribe John Cassian (7th book of the Collations, chapter 13), John Damascene (second book of the Theology, ch. 3, and the third book against the Iconoclasts), and likewise the Second Nicene synod, in whose fourth session the words of John, Bishop of Thessalonica, are approved, who writes in this manner: "Concerning the Angels and archangels, and their powers — to which our soul also is joined — the Catholic Church itself thinks thus: that they are indeed intelligible, but not entirely devoid of body, but endowed with a thin and aerial or fiery body, as it is written: 'Who makes his angels spirits, and his ministers a burning fire.'[3] And thus we have learned that many of the holy Fathers thought — among whom is Basil surnamed the Great, and blessed Athanasius, and Methodius, and those who stand [in succession] from them; but God alone is incorporeal. And although the angels are not corporeal as we are — namely [made] of the four elements and of that gross matter — yet no one would call either the angels, or the demons, or the soul incorporeal."

◊ 2. Left margin: Lombard did not rightly answer on St. Augustine's behalf.

◊ 3. Left margin: Psalm 103:4.

From these dissent St. Thomas and most professors of Scholastic Theology, following (they too) authors not to be ashamed of, especially Dionysius the Areopagite:[4] who in the first chapter of the Celestial Hierarchy names the Angels not only incorporeal and immaterial substances, but also deiform simplicities and immaterialities. With him concur Chrysostom (homily 22 on Genesis, and the homily on 1 Corinthians 17 & 32, and in the explanation of the sixth chapter of Isaiah), and Cyril (in the fourth book of the commentaries on John, ch. 10). Nor does the decree of the Lateran Council dissent from these, decreeing that one must believe not only corporeal but also incorporeal creatures — that is, angels — to have been founded out of nothing.

◊ 4. Right margin: The Scholastic theologians teach that the angels are incorporeal.

Although I myself think this latter opinion the stronger — because the angels need bodies neither for subsisting, nor for understanding, nor for moving themselves — yet in this part I choose to embrace the modesty of Bernard, who in the fifth homily on the Canticle of Canticles, leaving such a controversy undiscussed, concluded his sermon with these words:[5] "But whether these spirits have natural bodies, as men have their own, or whether the spirits themselves take up bodies when there is need, and again, the work completed, lay them aside into the same matter from which they were taken, to be dissolved — I do not wish it to be required of me. The Fathers seem to have thought diversely about such things; nor is it clear to me from what [source] I should teach either alternative, and I confess that I do not know. But I judge that the knowledge of these things does not contribute much to our progress." Thus he.

◊ 5. Right margin: St. Bernard writes that he does not know whether the angels are corporeal or incorporeal.

Annotation IX [contents]

"Let there be a firmament." — Genesis 1:6

Whether there is only one heaven, as Chrysostom seems to hold.

Chrysostom, in homily 4 on Genesis, in expounding this sentence, asserts that those who teach there are many heavens are impelled to say this not from divine Scripture, but against divine Scripture and ecclesiastical dogmas, out of their own head and out of their own violent opinions: for Moses taught us that there is only one heaven; and further, that what is read in the psalm, "Praise him, you heavens of heavens," is not said because there are many heavens, but because it is the custom of the Hebrew tongue to name heaven, water, and many other singular things in the plural number. He holds the same in the exposition of Psalm 148,[6] where, expounding that "Praise him, you heavens of heavens," he says: "Saying here 'heavens of heavens,' he does not show a multitude; yet the same [Scripture] also says 'the heaven of heaven.' For the language of the Hebrews names heaven in the plural number." This opinion of Chrysostom seems to be opposed to all the schools of theologians and philosophers. Expounding it in the first part of the Summa, question 68, article 4, St. Thomas says that by these words are not condemned the theologians and philosophers who distinguish the starry heaven — that is, that whole celestial body which encloses this lower world, or globe of elements — into many particular heavens or orbs;[7] but [what is condemned is] certain heretics and philosophers who taught that beyond this whole starry globe there are other starry heavens, and other worlds.

◊ 6. Right margin: Psalm 148:4.

◊ 7. Right margin: St. Thomas piously explains St. Chrysostom.

Annotation X

"Let there be a firmament." — Genesis 1:6

Augustine →

[…continues on folio 532 (PDF p. 349): Annotatio X.]

---

(printed folio 532 [PDF p. 349]. Annot. X–XIII (Gen 1:6–9): Augustine on the firmament dividing the waters (retracted); Origen's waters-above-are-angels (condemned); why "it was good" is omitted on the second day; and the antipodes, denied by the Fathers but now proved by the voyages to the New World.)

(folio 532, left column → right column)

Annotation X [contents]

"Let there be a firmament." — Genesis 1:6

Whether the firmament is between the upper and lower waters.

Augustine, in the 13th book of the Confessions, chapter 32, expounding this passage, writes that the firmament was made between the spiritual upper waters and the corporeal lower ones;[1] which — as said not considerately enough in so obscure a matter — he revokes in the second book of the Retractations, chapter 6.

◊ 1. Left margin: St. Augustine retracts himself.

Annotation XI [contents]

"He divided the waters that were under the firmament," etc. — Genesis 1:7

Whether the upper and lower waters are real water, or rather Angels, as Origen held.

Origen — as Epiphanius witnesses in his letter to John of Jerusalem, and Jerome in his letter to Pammachius — when he discussed these words upon Genesis in his Tomes, said that the waters which are above the firmament are not waters but holy angels, and the waters which are under the firmament are evil demons fallen from heaven. Against this opinion, which Epiphanius and Jerome condemn as an error, Basil, in homily 3 on the Hexaemeron, suppressing Origen's name, writes this:[2] "We have a word also for certain ecclesiastics concerning the divided waters — [those] who, under the pretext of a withdrawal from sensible things into the heights and of a loftier understanding, fled to allegories, saying that spiritual and incorporeal powers are figuratively signified by the waters; and that above, indeed, above the firmament, the better ones remained, but below, in earthly and material things, the malignant ones stayed. On this account, forsooth, they say that God even praises the waters above heaven — that is, that the good powers, on account of their purity of mind, complete a hymn to their Founder — but that the waters under heaven are spiritual malignities, fallen from their natural height into the depth of malice, which, being turbulent and seditious and overflowing and boiling with tumults and passions, are named 'sea.' But relegating such discourses as being on a level with dreams and old wives' fables, let us understand water [to be] water, and let us understand the division made by the firmament according to the cause we have rendered."

◊ 2. Left margin: St. Basil condemns Origen's opinion.

Annotation XII [contents]

"And it was made evening and morning, the second day." — Genesis 1:8

Whether the binary [double] number is infamous, as Jerome held. — with a running tag: Genesis 1:8.

Rabanus [Maurus], Bishop of Mainz, in his commentaries on Genesis, inquiring why after the second day's work it is not said — as of the other five days' works — "God saw that it was good," answers, on the authority of the ancient Fathers, that this came about because the binary [double] number is infamous and unclean, on account of the cause of corruption, which first proceeds from it. And this is Jerome's opinion, at the beginning of his commentary on Haggai and in the first volume against Jovinian, where he writes thus: "It must be observed, according to the Hebrew truth, that whereas Scripture, on the first, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth day — the works of each being completed — said, 'And God saw that it was good': on the second day it withheld this entirely, leaving us to understand that the double number is not good, which divides from unity and prefigures the covenants of marriage. Whence also in Noah's ark all the animals which enter two by two [in pairs] are unclean." Nicholas of Lyra, in the Postil on Genesis, explodes this opinion as a deception, preferring to it the exposition of Rabbi Solomon [Rashi], who says that God did not call the second day's work "good" because the work of the waters — which was afterward completed on the third day — was not yet perfect, hinting that what is not yet perfect is not worthy of the appellation of "good." Yet Paul of Burgos, the bishop, refutes this confutation of Lyra.

Annotation XIII [contents]

"Let the waters that are under heaven be gathered together." — Genesis 1:9

The ancients denied that there are Antipodes.

Procopius of Gaza, in his commentaries, explaining this, endeavors to establish, from the testimonies of divine Scripture, that there is no land below us opposite to our globe, which Antipodes inhabit, turning their footsteps against ours. For he writes thus: "That the whole earth subsists in the waters, and that there is no part of it, situated below us, empty and denuded of waters, I reckon is known to all; for thus Scripture teaches: 'Who spreads out the earth above the waters.'[3] And again: 'For he founded it upon the seas.'[4] Understand, therefore, only the surface of the earth which is near us, when he says, 'Let the waters that are under heaven be gathered together into one place.' Nor is it fitting that we believe any land below us to be opposite to the globe of our heaven. For if there were Antipodes, certainly Christ would have gone there too, and would have accomplished there the other things that pertain to the salvation of the human race; but also Adam, the first origin of our race, and the serpent, who circumvented the human race by guile, and the flood too, would have existed over against the opposite region." Thus Procopius: before whom Lactantius, in the third book of the Divine Institutions, chapter 24, had held the same. And Augustine, in the 16th book The City of God, chapter 9, had constantly affirmed, on the authority of the sacred Letters, that it must by no reasoning be believed that Antipodes are found who, in the contrary part of the earth — where the Sun rises when it sets for us — press their footsteps opposite to our feet. Because, since divine Scripture testifies that men are begotten from the one Adam in this our hemisphere, it is too absurd to say that some men could have sailed from this into another hemisphere, the immensity of an impassable Ocean being crossed, so as to propagate the human race there also.

◊ 3. Right margin: Psalm 135:6.

◊ 4. Right margin: Psalm 23:2.

But in our own times it is so certain that there are Antipodes, that to deny them would be of the utmost madness:[5] for our merchants continually sail to them, and within a short space of time return to us, having traversed and re-traversed almost the whole Ocean. Nevertheless Procopius, Augustine, Lactantius, and the other Christian authors who thought otherwise are to be excused[6] — because the navigations of the Spanish had not yet uncovered the new worlds which have now been discovered, and it was a report, confirmed by the assent of all writers, that between this Northern region and that Southern one a vast Ocean was interposed, which no one had ever crossed, nor even could cross. These things being considered, the most prudent Fathers denied the Antipodes, lest, if they had granted them, they should at once be compelled to confess that those men did not descend from the seed of Adam. But as for what Procopius objects from the authority of Psalms 23 and 135 — that the other hemisphere is so immersed in waters that it is entirely uninhabitable — it does nothing to the point: for [the claim] that the earth is made firm, founded upon the seas and established upon the rivers (to omit other expositions for the present) →

◊ 5. Right margin: No one of sound mind at this time can deny that there are Antipodes.

◊ 6. Right margin: The ancients who denied that there are Antipodes are excused.

[…continues on folio 533 (PDF p. 350): the rest of Annotatio XIII.]

---

(printed folio 533 [PDF p. 350]. Annot. XIII–XVI (Gen 1:9–19): "the earth founded on the seas" as a Hebraism; whether the heaven or the stars move; Origen's stars-as-signs, the root of judicial astrology (refuted); and Chrysostom seeming to say that desisting from sin suffices with God.)

(folio 533, left column → right column)

Annotation XIII (continued)

— is the same as if you should say that the earth received a greater constancy, firmness, stability, and foundation than the sea and the waters.[1] For the Hebrews are frequently wont, in place of the comparative, to add to positives the preposition "super" [above], as in Psalm 118[:72]: "The law of thy mouth is good to me, above thousands of gold and silver"; and [118:127]: "I have loved thy commandments above gold and topaz"; and in the fourth [chapter] of Canticles [4:10]: "The odor of thy ointments is above all aromatics."

◊ 1. Left margin: What it is for the earth to be "made firm upon the waters and established upon the rivers." — with scripture tags: Psalm 118[:72, 127]; Canticles 4:10.

Annotation XIV [contents]

"He set the stars in the firmament." — Genesis 1:17

Whether it must be believed that the stars are fixed in the heaven.

Chrysostom, in homily 6 and homily 13 on Genesis, expounding this, says: "When we hear 'God set the stars in the firmament,' far be it that we should think God fixed the stars in the heaven; for we see them move, and each of them accomplish its course by passing from place to place. But it is the same [to say] 'He set the stars in heaven' as that he commanded that the stars should be in heaven and should revolve — just as when he said, 'God placed Adam in paradise,'[2] not that he fixed him in paradise, but that he willed him to dwell there." And again, in homily 12 to the people of Antioch, discoursing how the stars run about through the heaven — which he says is wholly immobile[3] — he writes thus: "God made the world, neither leaving it wholly immobile, nor commanding it to be wholly moved: but the heaven indeed remained unmoved, as the prophet says: 'Who established the heaven like a vault, and stretched it out like a tent';[4] but the Sun, with the rest of the stars, is daily revolved in it." Although the professors of Scholastic Theology, together with the Peripatetics and astronomers, explode this opinion with unanimous assent, and St. Philastrius, Bishop of Brescia, numbers it among the heresies,[5] yet I do not judge it contrary to the divine scriptures and to the ancient school of the theologians. For Origen (in the fifth book against Celsus, and book 1 of the Peri Archōn, ch. 7) affirms that the Sun, Moon, and stars are not parts of heaven — just as the parts of the earth are not living beings — and that each of these is moved in its own order and course. Eusebius, Bishop of Emesa, and Diodorus, Bishop of Tarsus — Chrysostom's teachers — in the exposition of the present passage hand down that the stars, like travelers, accomplish their journey through the heaven, which stands wholly fixed and immobile. And Procopius has the same on the seventh chapter of Genesis. Augustine too, in the second book On Genesis to the Letter, chapter 10, affirms that it can happen that, the heaven standing immobile, the stars accomplish all those diverse and mutually contrary courses which we observe in them; and that this was shown by the most certain demonstrations of the mathematicians of his times. St. Thomas, in the first part of the Summa, question 69, article 4, strives to direct Chrysostom's opinion to the astronomical standard,[6] saying that his words are to be understood of the Planets, which, according to Ptolemy, are rotated by their own proper motion within the concavities of their orbs. Read above, annotation 3.

◊ 2. Left margin: Genesis 2:8.

◊ 3. Left margin: In Chrysostom's judgment the heaven is immobile.

◊ 4. Left margin: Psalm 103:2.

◊ 5. Left margin: The Scholastic theologians think the stars are parts of the heaven.

◊ 6. Left margin: St. Thomas endeavors to teach that St. Chrysostom agrees with the Peripatetics.

Annotation XV [contents]

"He set the stars in the firmament." — Genesis 1:17

For the stars foreshow the future events of men, as Origen held — whom the judicial Astrologers follow.

Origen, in the Tomes on Genesis — as Eusebius relates in the 6th [book] of the Preparation for the Gospel, chapter 9 — when he expounded this particle, said that the stars were placed by God in heaven to be "for signs"; that is, that through their various aspects and conjunctions [God] might signify all and each of the causes of human affairs — though they would not effect them. For God painted in the stars the significations and reasons of all the future events of the human race, so that the powers of the supernal spirits might read in them, as in books, whatever things would come to pass among men (yet without any compulsion of free will) through the several intervals of time; and thence they might reveal to men, the observers of the stars, some part of this science, which exceeds the powers of human wit. And according to this sense Origen thought a certain opinion was to be understood, [taken] from a book whose title is The Narration of Joseph — once received into authority among many catholics — in which the Patriarch Jacob is introduced saying these things to his sons: "Read in the tablets of heaven whatever things are to come upon you and your sons." Augustine, in the fifth [book] The City of God, chapter 1, writes that this opinion — although it belonged to men not mediocrely learned, and although it decrees that the stars do not make but only signify — is nevertheless convicted as fallacious and false by argument and experience:[7] namely of two twins, sown in the same intercourse and at the same moment, and coming into the light at the same time — of whom, since there is the greatest diversity in their actions, events, professions, arts, honors, and the rest pertaining to human life and death, it cannot be that the same star, set in the same station of heaven, at the same time and same aspect, portends such contrary significations of diverse events. Procopius, in his commentaries on this chapter, reprobates Origen's opinion as by no means catholic and unworthy of a Christian, because Christians have no need of the significations of the stars in order to know what is to be followed or fled, since the divine Law admonishes whatever they must do or avoid. St. Thomas, in the opusculum which he entitled On the Judgments of the Stars, declares that they sin gravely who use the significations and judgments of the stars in those things which depend on the free will of men.[8] But an observation of nearly the like argument you have below, in Annotation 81 of this book, and in book 6, Annotation 10.

◊ 7. Right margin: St. Augustine excellently refutes the judicial Astrologers.

◊ 8. Right margin: They sin gravely who wish to tell, from the stars, things that depend on the free will of man.

Annotation XVI [contents]

"And it was made evening and morning, the fourth day." — Genesis 1:19

Whether satisfaction is necessary for penitents.

Chrysostom, in the sixth homily on Genesis near the end, where he expounds this very thing, exhorting his hearers to please God by the confession of sins, and not to relapse into sins after confession, says: "It suffices for God, on account of his great mercy, that we desist from sins." Explaining the same more fully in the oration on Blessed Philogonius, he says: "I testify and pledge my faith, that if each of us who are liable to sins, withdrawing from his former evils from the heart, and truly promising →

[…continues on folio 534 (PDF p. 351): the rest of Annotatio XVI (whether satisfaction is required of penitents).]

---

(printed folio 534 [PDF p. 351]. Annot. XVI–XVIII (Gen 1:19–26): Chrysostom's "it suffices that we desist from sin," seized by Calvin and Oecolampadius against satisfaction and indulgences (answered); Philo's "Let us make man" with angel-cooperators; and whether God is corporeal (Melito's book vindicated as anti-anthropomorphite).)

(folio 534, left column → right column)

Annotation XVI (continued)

[Chrysostom, on Blessed Philogonius:] "…and promise to God that he will hereafter never return to those [sins], God will require nothing else for further satisfaction: for he is benign." Which opinion John Calvin, in the ninth chapter of his Institutions,[1] cites against the "satisfactionists" (for so the impious man calls the catholics, because they teach that satisfaction is the third part of penance); and John Oecolampadius, once a Brigittine monk, standard-bearer of the recent heretics, in the codices of Chrysostom translated by himself, over against this same sentence, placed in the margin a heretical objection in these words: "If it suffices God that we desist from sins, where then remain satisfactions and indulgences?" Retorting this man's insane questioning upon the author himself, let us in turn ask him: If it suffices God that we desist from sins, and there is no further need of satisfactions and indulgences, why does Chrysostom everywhere preach the satisfactory works of penance?[2] Indeed in homily 10 on Matthew, showing that it does not suffice to cease from sin unless we make satisfaction through those things which are contrary to the offenses committed, he says: "Let us do penance — penance, I say — not only that we desist from former evils, but also that we be filled with the fruits of good works. 'Bring forth,' says John, 'fruits worthy of penance.' But in what way shall we be able to bear fruit, unless we do the things contrary to our sins? For example: you have stolen others' goods — begin now to give your own; you have fornicated a long time — suspend yourself from the lawful use of marriage, and meditate perpetual continence by [at least] a chastity of a few days. For it does not suffice for the wounded man, unto his safety, only to pluck the darts from his body, but it is also needful to apply remedies to the wounds," etc. Again, in the homily on Psalm 106, which is carried among the works of Chrysostom, it is thus written: "When sin has brought death, confession brings health. For confession shows penance; satisfaction wins pardon for oneself by the divine mercy." And below it follows: "It is worse not to placate God's offense by satisfaction, than to offend God's goodness by sinning." And a little after: "Let confession restore what sin had taken away; let penance lack nothing; what the stain of offenses had defiled, let the serpent's venom be cured by the antidote of satisfaction." Thus Chrysostom. Answering Oecolampadius on his authority, we say: it suffices God indeed — for granting us the remission both of guilt and of eternal punishment — that we desist from sins now confessed to a Priest; but there remain satisfactions and indulgences to expiate the temporal punishments to which, as the sacred Letters teach, after the crimes are pardoned and the eternal punishment [remitted], we are still liable, whether in this life or in another.[3] See below, Annotation 174 of this book, and 161 of the following book.

◊ 1. Left margin: Under the name of "satisfaction" St. Chrysostom thinks something is understood — by way of self-excuse. Calvin, book 4 of the Institutes, ch. 4, §38.

◊ 2. Left margin: St. Chrysostom everywhere inculcates satisfactory works.

◊ 3. Left margin: By satisfactions and indulgences the temporal punishment is expiated.

Annotation XVII [contents]

"Let us make man to [our] image." — Genesis 1:26

Whether the angels, together with God, created man — as Origen held.

Philo, in the book On the Fashioning of the Six Days, narrating this proposition, writes thus: "God said, 'Let us make man' — which indicates that others were taken up as cooperators, so that both the reprehensible wills and the actions of man (when he conducts himself rightly) are, [the good ones,] referred as accepted to God the ruler of all, but the contrary ones to those others who are subject [to him]. For it behooved that the Father not be the cause of evils to his own children." By which words he seems to indicate that the first man was made partly by God, partly by the angels, God's cooperators. Which also among us Basilides and Cerinthus, heretics, held[4] — whom Chrysostom (homily 8 on Genesis) and Theodoret (question 19) refute. And the demonstration by which Philo shows this opinion of his seems to allude to those words of Plato, by which he introduces the supreme God, in the Timaeus, speaking to the lesser gods concerning the creation of living beings. See below, Annotation 93 of this book.

◊ 4. Right margin: Origen's opinion, which Basilides and Cerinthus defended, is deservedly condemned by Catholics.

Annotation XVIII [contents]

"Let us make man." — Genesis 1:26

Whether God is corporeal.

Melito the Asian, Bishop of Sardis, in his book περὶ τοὲ ὔνσωμάτου θεοῦ — that is, On God clothed with a body — expounding the present passage, seems to assert that the image of God, to which man was made, is corporeal, just as God himself is corporeal, having human form, figure, and members. Which opinion Epiphanius reckons among the heresies of the Audiani, who are also called Anthropomorphites. For Theodoret writes thus about Melito, on Genesis question 20: "It must, however (as I said before), first be discussed where that 'to the image' resides — in the body, or in the soul. And first let us see what [arguments] those use who assert the former. Of whose number is Melito, who left writings in which he asserts that God is corporeal. For 'we call them the members of God,' they say, 'when we find "the eyes of God looking upon the earth,"[5] and "his ears attentive to their prayers," and "God smelled the odor of sweetness,"[6] and "the mouth of the Lord has spoken,"[7] and "the arm of God," and hands, and feet, and fingers.[8] From which they immediately infer that these things teach nothing other than the form of God.'" These things Theodoret reports about Melito according to the Latin translation of John Pico the Gaul. But since the same Theodoret, in the fourth book of Heretical Fables, disputing against the Audiani, the assertors of this madness, ascribes nothing of the sort to Melito, and since there is no approved writer who accuses him of this kind of error, I would never dare to believe that a man greatest in sanctity and erudition — whom Tertullian asserts was held by Christians as a prophet — fell into such madness; and especially since the aforesaid words of Theodoret stand far otherwise in the Greek copies than in the Latin translation. For what Pico translated as "of whose number is Melito, who left writings in which he asserts that God is corporeal," is read in the corrected Greek codices in this manner: Ὧν ἐστι καὶ Μελίτων συγγράμματα καταλέλοιπε, Περὶ τοὲ ὔνσωμάτου θεοῦ — that is, "Among which are the writings that Melito left, Concerning what is called the attribution of a body to God." For indeed, as Eusebius and Jerome testify, Melito wrote a book to which he gave the title περὶ τοὲ ὔνσωμάτου θεοῦ — that is, On God clothed with a body, or On the God to whom the divine Scripture attributes a body — in which he most powerfully confuted the arguments of those who assert God to be corporeal, and who think the image of God, to which man was made, is corporeal; as also appears clearer than light from the following words of Theodoret, set down in the same 20th question:

◊ 5. Right margin (a): Psalm 33:16.

◊ 6. Right margin (b): Genesis 8:21.

◊ 7. Right margin (c): Isaiah 40:5.

◊ 8. Right margin (d): Isaiah 51:1.

[…continues on folio 535 (PDF p. 352): the following words of Theodoret (Annotatio XVIII).]

---

(printed folio 535 [PDF p. 352]. Annot. XVIII–XXII (Gen 1:26–29): Melito cleared of anthropomorphism; Philo's living stars; whether propagation in innocence would have been sexual (Aquinas: yes, without lust); and Augustine's retracted view that sin was needed for offspring.)

(folio 535, left column → right column)

Annotation XVIII (continued)

In the book of Theodoret printed at Cologne at the expense of the widow and heirs of John Stelsius in the year 1573, there is no word about Melito — although the translator is said to be John Pico, president of the inquisitorial courts of the Parisian Senate. For thus it is written in that place: "Certain overly simple people say that the human body was made to the image of God, because they hear the divine voice saying, 'Open your eyes and see,' and 'Incline your ear and hear,' and 'The Lord smelled the odor of sweetness,' and that, 'The mouth of the Lord has spoken these things,' and, 'In his hand are the ends of the earth,' and the like. Wherein the stupid did not observe that the Lord God speaks to men in a human manner, accommodating his discourses to the weakness of the hearers," etc.

Annotation XIX [contents]

"Let us make man to [our] image," etc. — Genesis 1:26

Whether the stars are animate.

Philo, in the book On the Fashioning of the Six Days, on that "Let us make man to the image," etc., asserts that the stars are intelligent living beings. See below, Annotation 108.

Annotation XX [contents]

"To the image of God he created him." — Genesis 1:27

Whether, if Adam had not sinned, there would have been coitus.

Gregory, Bishop of Nyssa, in the book On the Creation of Man, chapter 28, examining an opinion of this kind, says that, if the first parents had not sinned, the generation of offspring and the propagation of the human race would not have been by coitus, but by a certain most perfect manner of multiplication, by which the Angels are multiplied; for this generation, which comes about by intercourse, was introduced through sin. These are Gregory's words: "Although among the Angels, as has been said, there are no marriages, yet they exist in infinite thousands of hosts of Angels, as the prophet Daniel intimates in his visions. Therefore, in the same manner, if no excess of sin had drawn us away from that angelic dignity, marriages would in no way have been proved necessary for us for the multiplication of the human race; but by a motion of nature — whatever it be, most perfect indeed — by which the Angels are multiplied, the Creator's will would have multiplied the human race up to the number of the predestined." And after a few words about generation introduced through sin, he added: "That great David seems to me, having compassion on human misery, to bewail his nature in such words: 'That man, when he was in honor, did not understand'[1] — calling it 'honor' that he had been like to the holy Angels in conversation and in that most sublime manner of multiplication. Therefore he was compared to the senseless beasts, and made like to them. For truly he was made like to a beast, who took upon himself, in his own nature, this animal generation, on account of the fall of his conversation, which befell him from the conformation of matter." Subscribing to this opinion, John Damascene, in the fourth book of the Orthodox Faith, chapter 25,[2] put forth in writing these things: "Wherefore, lest the human race be exterminated and consumed by death, marriages were instituted, so that by the procreation of offspring the race of men might be preserved. But perhaps they will say: What then does this mean, 'male and female'? What this, 'Increase and multiply'?[3] To which we shall say that this 'Increase and multiply' does not at all signify the multiplication [that comes] by the nuptial association. For God could have multiplied this race in another way too, if they had kept his commandment, and preserved it unbroken to the end; but God, knowing by his foreknowledge — which knows all things before they come to be — that they would be transgressors and to be condemned by death, anticipating [this], made male and female, and commanded [them] to be increased and multiplied." Thus Damascene: before whom Augustine wrote this very thing (on Genesis, ch. 1), Chrysostom, and Procopius (on Genesis, ch. 4); and after him Euthymius, on Psalm 50.

◊ 1. Left margin: Psalm 48:13.

◊ 2. Left margin: Damascene has the same in book 2, On the Faith, chapter 11.

◊ 3. Left margin: Genesis 1:28.

Weighing this opinion, St. Thomas, in the first part of the Summa Theologica, question 98, article 2, writes thus: "But this is not said reasonably: for the things which are natural to man are neither withdrawn from man nor given to him by [reason of] sin.[4] Now it is manifest that, for man according to the animal life which he had even before sin (as was said above), it is natural to generate by coitus, just as for the other perfect animals; and the natural members, appointed for this use, declare this. And therefore it must not be said that the use of these natural members would not have existed before sin, any more than [that of] the other members. There are therefore two things to be considered in coitus, according to the present state: one, which is of nature, namely the union of male and female for generating — for in every generation an active and a passive power is required, and since in all [creatures] in which there is a distinction of sexes the active power is in the male, and the passive in the female, the order of nature requires that for generation male and female should come together by coitus. But the other thing that can be considered is a certain deformity of immoderate concupiscence, which would not have existed in the state of innocence,[5] when the lower powers were entirely subject to reason. Whence Augustine says in the 14th book of The City of God: 'Far be it that we should suspect that offspring could not have been produced without the disease of lust: but those members would have been moved by the same nod of the will as the other members, and without ardor and enticing stimulus, with tranquillity of soul and of body.'" Read the following Annotation, together with Annotations 63 and 80 of this book.

◊ 4. Right margin: From man the things natural to him are not withdrawn on account of sin.

◊ 5. Right margin: In the state of innocence there would have been generation by the union of male and female, without the disease of lust.

Annotation XXI [contents]

"Increase and multiply." — Genesis 1:28

Whether the first parents would have had children if they had not sinned.

Augustine, in the first book On Genesis Allegorically, chapter 19, on these words says that the first parents would not have had children as men [by human generation] unless they had sinned. To which opinion he wrote a not-dissimilar one in the first book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, where, expounding that "Whosoever shall put away his wife, save for the cause of fornication," etc.,[6] he said that consanguinities and the bonds of blood and kinships came about from the sin and death of the first parents. Which opinion Guido, Bishop of Elne, in the book he wrote against heresies, numbers among the profane dogmas of the Armenians. But Augustine openly disapproves [it] in the first book of the Retractations, chapters 10 and 19; because, as he himself says in the 8th book On Genesis to the Letter, chapter 10: "Men before sin could command their generative members for procreation, without the foul itch of pleasure; and there could have been in paradise honorable marriages, and an undefiled marriage-bed, without the ardor of lust and without the labor of childbearing."

◊ 6. Right margin: Matthew 5:32.

Annotation XXII

"Behold, I have given you every herb." — Genesis 1:29

Augustine →

[…continues on folio 536 (PDF p. 353): Annotatio XXII.]

---

(printed folio 536 [PDF p. 353], the last page of the first working batch. Annot. XXII–XXVII (Gen 1:29–2:7): retracted allegory of animal food; the LXX "sixth" vs Hebrew "seventh" day; whether the six days are literal; whether Jews sacrificed among gentiles; Giorgio's Neoplatonic soul-as-man; and the "breath of life" (soul, or a grace?).)

(folio 536, left column → right column)

Annotation XXII (continued) [contents]

Augustine, in book 1 On Genesis Allegorically, chapter 20, says that the green herbs and fruit-bearing trees which, in the book of Genesis, are given as food to all birds, all serpents, and every kind of beast, are to be understood in an allegorical signification only.[1] He disapproves this same [view] in book 1 of the Retractations, chapter 10.

◊ 1. Left margin: Whether herbs and trees are given as food to the animals. — and: St. Augustine retracts himself.

Annotation XXIII [contents]

"God completed his work on the seventh day." — Genesis 2:2

Whether God completed his works on the sixth day.

The Seventy interpreters [Septuagint], as Jerome noted in the Hebrew Traditions, for what is read in the Hebrew truth, "God completed" (וַיְכַל֙ בַּיּ֣וֹם הַשְּׁבִיעִ֔י), that is, "on the seventh day all his work," translated ἡμέρᾳ τῇ ἓκτῃ, that is, "on the sixth day." And Philo and Theodoret cite and expound this passage in the same manner. But it does not much matter whether you say God completed his work on the sixth or on the seventh day: for what Moses said — that God completed [it] on the seventh day by resting — the Seventy said, that God completed [it] on the sixth day by finishing.

Annotation XXIV [contents]

"God completed his work on the seventh day." — Genesis 2:2

Whether the six days of the world's creation are real days.

Philo, in the first book of the Allegories of the Law, expounding the same passage, says: "It is of rustic simplicity to think that the world was made in six days, or indeed in any fixed time at all, because the whole vicissitude of the world is [that] of days and nights, which the motion of the Sun, passing over and under the earth, necessarily produces. But the Sun is reckoned a part of heaven: so that it must be confessed that time is posterior to the world, seeing that it is an effect of the world. For the motion of heaven indicated the nature of time. Therefore, when you hear 'He completed the works on the sixth day,' you must not understand it of a number of some days, but of the perfection of the universe, which is signified by the perfect senary [six] number." Some catholic authors have followed this opinion of Philo: of whom, among the Latins, Augustine referred the enumeration of six days made by Moses not to a succession of time, but to the natural order of the works, which is attributed to days; or to the order of the revelation of the six works, which God revealed to the angels one after another. But Procopius, among the Greeks, said the number of days was assumed by Moses not for the sake of time, but for the sake of teaching, on account of the weakness of our understanding, which could not comprehend the order of created things in another way, because of their multitude. This dogma, therefore, although it ought by no means to be disapproved, is nevertheless not to be so rashly asserted that we should think Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, Ambrose, and the other most learned Fathers — who taught the world was founded in the space of six days — thought rustically and unlearnedly: especially since Philo's aforesaid argumentation derogates nothing from their opinion. Dissolving which [argument], St. Thomas, in the first part of the Summa Theologica,[2] says that, although before the construction of the firmament there was not that time which measures and follows the motion of heaven, yet there was a time which would measure another motion — namely that first motion, and the succession of conceptions and affections in the angelic minds, in which thoughts so numerous could not supervene except one before another and one after another; but "Before" and "After" are nothing else than distinctions of time.

◊ 2. Left margin: St. Thomas, part 1, question 66, article 4, reply to [objection] 3.

Annotation XXV [contents]

"God rested on the seventh day." — Genesis 2:2

Whether the Jews sacrificed in the lands of the gentiles.

Augustine, in book 1 On Genesis Allegorically, chapter 23, hands down that the Israelite people practiced sacrifices in the lands of the gentiles. Which, said indeed of the Paschal lamb, he says (in Retractations 1, chapter 10) is to be understood [in that sense], since the Jews could not sacrifice among the gentiles.[3]

◊ 3. Right margin: It was not permitted to the Jews to sacrifice among the Gentiles.

Annotation XXVI [contents]

"God formed man of the mud of the earth." — Genesis 2:7

Whether the soul alone is man.

Francis George [Francesco Giorgio Veneto], in the first volume of the Problems, twists the exposition of this passage to the opinion of those who think that the soul alone is man, the body being the garment of the soul, and the soul itself created in heaven long before the body. For he writes thus, in Problem 26: "God formed man, dust, from the earth — that is, he clothed him with an earthy garment, namely the earthly body. For first God decreed to make man; then he created him in heaven; thirdly he formed his body, as a garment." And he confirms this same thing in Problem 27, where he says that man was wrapped about by God with a corporeal garment; and in Problem 159 of the same volume, when he says that man was clothed with dust in the field of Damascus. These things seem partly to allude to Origen's dogma of souls created before their bodies, partly to the tenet of those who deny that the soul is the form of the body.[4] But both were condemned in the Council of Vienne by Clement V, as the title On the Supreme Trinity, at the beginning of the Clementines, is witness.

◊ 4. Right margin: The soul is not created before the body of which it is the form.

Annotation XXVII [contents]

"He breathed into his face the breath of life." — Genesis 2:7

The breath breathed into Adam is the rational soul, as St. Augustine, St. Thomas, and others hold.

Chrysostom, expounding this in homily 12, says that that breath is the substance of the rational soul, through which man was made not only a living animal but also partaker of reason. Which assertion Philastrius, Bishop of Brescia, numbers among the heresies in chapter 99 of his Catalogue — no author of the assertion being named, however; and he says that that breath is not the soul itself, but the inspiration of the divine spirit — that is, the grace of the Holy Spirit infused into the soul of Adam, already created and already united to the body, such as [Christ] also gave to the apostles after the resurrection, or such as God bestows on all the just. With Philastrius agrees Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, who, elucidating this very passage, says: "When it is said in Genesis that God breathed into the face of man the breath of life, that man might become a living soul, we do not call that breath the soul itself; for thus the soul would be unchangeable and would not sin, because it would be of the divine essence: but Moses called it the effusion of the Holy Spirit, placed at the very beginning [as an addition] to the human soul." St. Augustine, however, in the preface of the book On Heresies to Quodvultdeus, writes that Philastrius numbered among heresies many assertions which are not heresies.[5] Of which number I would believe this to be one — in which he himself imprudently slipped, while [he condemned] the true and pious [teaching] of Chrysostom and of all the Catholic interpreters →

◊ 5. Right margin: Philastrius, in St. Augustine's judgment, numbered many things among heresies which are not heresies.

[…continues on folio 537 (PDF p. 354): the end of Annotatio XXVII (which he "condemned").]

(printed folio 537 [PDF p. 354], six annotations on Gen 2:7 and the image of God. Annot. XXVII–XXXII: the "breath of life" as the soul, not a grace; body and soul made together (retracted); Giorgio's superadded light; the soul created with the angels; the image lost by sin (retracted → deformed); and Philo's archetypal "man" as the divine idea.)

(folio 537, left column → right column)

Annotation XXVII (continued)

[Augustine] condemns the opinion. Likewise also, in the 15th [book] The City of God, chapter 24, he derides those who believe that the breath which God breathed into Adam's face is a certain grace conferred on Adam's soul, and not rather the soul itself. But as for what pertains to Cyril, St. Thomas, in the book which he wrote against the errors of the Greeks, chapter 27, says thus: "Cyril's exposition is against the exposition of Augustine, who posits the human soul by that breath. And [Cyril] shows that it does not follow on this account that [the soul] is of the divine substance; for it is a figurative expression, that [God] is said to have breathed not corporeally, but because he made a spirit — that is, a soul — out of nothing. And what is more, [Cyril's exposition] seems to be repugnant to the sayings of the Apostle, who in 1 Corinthians 15 says: 'The first man Adam was made into a living soul, the last Adam into a quickening spirit';[1] but not first what is spiritual, rather what is animal — where he expressly says that that life of the soul is other than the life which is through the Holy Spirit. Whence that inspiration, by which it is said 'Man was made into a living soul,' cannot be understood of the grace of the Holy Spirit. Whence it must be said that Cyril's exposition cannot be literal, but only allegorical."

◊ 1. Left margin: 1 Corinthians 15[:45–46].

Annotation XXVIII [contents]

"He breathed into his face the breath of life." — Genesis 2:7

Whether the body was made before the soul.

Augustine, in the second book On Genesis Allegorically, chapter 8, teaches that the body of man was not founded before the creation of the soul, but together with the soul itself at one and the same time.[2] He disapproves this same [view] in book 1 of the Retractations, chapter 10.

◊ 2. Left margin: St. Augustine retracts himself.

Annotation XXIX [contents]

"He breathed into him the breath of life." — Genesis 2:7

Whether man was created first in the species than in the individual, as Francesco Giorgio held.

Francis George [Francesco Giorgio Veneto], in volume 1, Problem 27, in explaining this passage, brings a hard and unwonted discourse about the creation and animation of man, asserting first that man was first created in the universal and specifically — that is, as specific or common: like a certain mass of masculine and feminine power, whence every male and female would receive life; but then, when he was wrapped about with a corporeal garment, then he was made a particular man; and that into this particular man the breath of life was breathed by God. In the second place, he affirms that that breath, which God breathed into man, is a certain light which shows God to man, and always exhorts him to good and dissuades him from evil, and provides him strength for working well: of which light, when the damned are deprived, they can neither know God nor work good. By which words indeed he intimates that that breath is not the substance of the rational soul, but rather a certain light superadded to the soul. Which error Alphonsus of Castro, in book 2 against heresies, under [the entry] "Philastrius, Bishop of Brescia," condemns.

Annotation XXX [contents]

"He breathed into his face the breath of life." — Genesis 2:7

Whether the soul was created with the angels on the first day.

Augustine, in the seventh book On Genesis to the Letter, which he wrote upon this particle, chapter 24, seems to establish that the soul of the first man was created with the angels on the first day of the world's making, and then, on the sixth day, infused into the human body: which indeed is repugnant to the opinion of all the theologians. St. Thomas, in the first part of the Summa Theologica, question 90, article 4, shows that Augustine did not put this forth by asserting it, but left it to the judgment of the readers[3] — which his own words also demonstrate, when he says: "Let them believe [it], provided, however, that no authority of the scriptures, or reason of truth, contradicts." An observation of this kind you have below, in Annotation 189 of book 1 of this [work].

◊ 3. Right margin: St. Augustine is excused by St. Thomas.

Annotation XXXI [contents]

"He breathed into his face the breath of life." — Genesis 2:7

Whether Adam, by sinning, lost the image [of God].

Augustine, in the sixth book On Genesis to the Letter, chapters 27 and 28, treating this very passage, writes that Adam through sin lost the image of God, impressed in the spirit of the mind, according to which he was created. He retracts this same thing in book 2 of the Retractations, chapter 24,[4] saying that this opinion is not to be so taken as though none [of the image] remained in him; but that it remained so deformed that it had need of reformation. Read Annotation 49 of this book.

◊ 4. Right margin: St. Augustine retracts himself.

Annotation XXXII [contents]

"He breathed into his face the breath of life." — Genesis 2:7

Whether man, formed of an earthly body and an immortal soul, is the man whom God created to his own image.

Philo, in the book On the Fashioning of the Six Days, in the exposition of that sentence, teaches that the first man — formed of an earthly body and an immortal soul — is not the man whom God created to his own image; because the man made to the image of God is the archetypal and intelligible man himself, or the very idea of man in the mind of God. Which words indeed seem, at first glance, to disprove that spiritual and divine image which all Catholic authors place in the mind of man, led by the authority of the divine voice saying: "Let us make man to our image and likeness."[5] It is by no means to be thought that Philo, by these words, wished to strip the mind of man of the divine image, which above in the same work he had attributed to man; but it is credible that he brought these things forth not absolutely, but by comparison — having regard to the sensible man in relation to the archetypal man in the divine mind: in comparison with whom the sensible man scarcely has any image of God; for the archetypal and intelligible man has such an image and likeness of God that in a certain manner he is God himself. For that the archetype and the idea are nothing other than the divine essence, St. Thomas is witness,[6] in the first part of the Summa Theologica, question 15, article 1.

◊ 5. Right margin: Genesis 1:26.

◊ 6. Right margin: The idea of man in the divine mind, according to St. Thomas's opinion, is the divine essence itself.

I should like also here to note another thing about the image of man, which Philo left written not far from the preface of the same book — namely, that the whole universe reflects the divine image more than man does, who is a part of the world.[7] Which opinion seems foreign to the common consent of the theologians, who say that man surpasses the other corporeal creatures in this, that he alone was made to the image of God. But it is resolved if we say that the divine image is considered in two ways: either according to extension and diffusion — in which manner indeed the universe, more than man, represents the image of the divine goodness, because in its compass it embraces that whole multitude of creatures, of which Moses said →

◊ 7. Right margin: Whether the world is more made to the image of God than man, as Philo held. — and: The divine image is considered in two ways.

[…continues on folio 538 (PDF p. 355): the second way the divine image is considered, and the rest of Annotatio XXXII.]

---

(printed folio 538 [PDF p. 355]. Annot. XXXII–XXXIV (Gen 2:7–8): man as microcosm and truer image of God; Philo dissolving Paradise into allegory; Origen accused of denying an earthly Paradise; and Giorgio reviving that allegory (refuted), then Noviomagus's "Paradise = this world.")

(folio 538, left column → right column)

Annotation XXXII (continued)

[Moses] said: "God saw all the things that he had made, and they were very good."[1] Or [the divine image is considered] according to intension and the gathering-together of perfection — in which manner indeed man rather presents the image of the divine loftiness, both because he is capable of divine felicity, and because in him, as in a brief compendium and in a little world [a microcosm], all the wonders of the greater world are beheld.

◊ 1. Left margin: Genesis 1:31.

At the end of the same book, and in the first book of the Allegories of the Law, [Philo] so treats the things which Moses wrote about Paradise that it appears he destroys the whole history of the truth, and places that garden, the plants, and the rest which are described in it, in allegory alone. Which error Origen, and very many others of ours (as we shall indicate below), followed.

Annotation XXXIII [contents]

"God had planted a Paradise." — Genesis 2:8

Whether there is a terrestrial Paradise.

Origen, in the Tomes on Genesis, is said to have subverted the whole history of Paradise which is narrated in this second chapter.[2] Methodius, in the dialogue whose title is Aglaophon, and Epiphanius, in the book Anchoratus and in the Epistle to John, Bishop of Jerusalem, charge him with having denied that Paradise is on the earth, and with having placed it in the third heaven — understanding by the trees the angelic powers, and by the rivers the waters which are above the back of the firmament. Some strive to show that Origen was not of this mind, from certain words written by him in the thirty-first homily on Numbers. These are they: "Adam, after sin, is thrust down into the dry land; for before, he was not in the dry land, but in the [good] earth — for Paradise is not in the dry land, but in the earth." Which words, how much they avail, let those weigh who wish. Read the six following Annotations.

◊ 2. Left margin: Whether Paradise is on the earth.

Annotation XXXIV [contents]

"God had planted a Paradise." — Genesis 2:8

Francesco Giorgio tries to prove by four arguments that there is no terrestrial Paradise.

Francis George [Francesco Giorgio Veneto], in the first volume of the Problems, expounding this, called back into the light Origen's error about the allegorical Paradise — now extinguished a little before our age — and endeavored to make it persuasive with these arguments. First, that in the sacred letters it is nowhere found that Paradise, or that garden, was planted on the earth. Secondly, that Moses would say in vain that this garden was planted with material plants and trees on the earth after the sixth day, since he had before written that all the plants and trees of the whole earth were produced by God on the third day. Thirdly (item), that God would in vain and with idle counsel have built a terrestrial garden for the first parents — one which would not be of use to them even immediately [because of] their sins, and which after Adam's sin would be cultivated by no one. Finally, he brought in this too: that Jerome, having considered these things, declared that Paradise was founded by God before he made heaven and earth — namely, to signify by these words that that Paradise described by Moses is not situated on this visible earth, but in that "land of the living," which was created before this visible world in the invisible world. These things Francis wrote in many places, but especially in the first volume of the Problems, where, from Problem 1 to Problem 48, he contends to destroy the whole history of Paradise with long windings of allegories — yet with no valid reason adduced for it.

For what he proposed in the first place — that it is by no means established from the sacred letters whether Paradise is on the earth — is most false.[3] For Moses most clearly declares that Paradise was planted by God in a region of the Eastern land, which is called Eden. And that Eden is the proper name of a place appears from the fourth chapter of Genesis, where we read that Cain dwelt to the eastern region of Eden;[4] and in Ezekiel chapter 27 it is had that Eden was near Charran [Haran], a region of Mesopotamia.[5] But that which Moses writes — that the garden of delights was planted by God after the sixth day — by no means conflicts with what he reported before, namely that all the plants were brought forth on the third day.[6] For it can be, as Augustine judges, that the plants which had been produced on the third day according to certain seminal reasons were, after the works of the six days, again produced and completed in act; or, according to Basil's and Chrysostom's opinion, it can be said that all the plants, together with the plants of Paradise, were founded at once on the third day, but that Moses, after the works of the six days, again by way of epilogue made mention of the production of the plants of Paradise.

◊ 3. Right margin: The 1st argument of Fr. George is answered.

◊ 4. Right margin: Genesis 4:16.

◊ 5. Right margin: Ezekiel 27:23.

◊ 6. Right margin: The 2nd argument of Francis is answered.

Which Paradise, even if it were inhabited by no one after sin, no one of sound mind would call superfluous.[7] For just as (by Augustine's testimony) it must not be said that the immortality of the body was given to man in vain — which he was not going to preserve — so neither ought one to think that that Paradise was founded in vain, because human habitation is not there after sin. For although that place does not serve man for dwelling, yet it profits him for instruction: that he may recognize himself to have been cast out thence by the fault of the first parent, and that, through the things which are written to be in it corporeally, he may lift up his mind to the spiritual and invisible mysteries of the heavenly paradise. But as to that which, in the last place, he violently wrests from Jerome's words — namely, that Paradise was founded by God in that invisible world which preceded the constitution of this visible world[8] — satisfaction has been made in Annotation 37, in which this opinion of Jerome has been most exactly discussed.

◊ 7. Right margin: The 3rd argument is answered. — and: Paradise, though it does not profit man for dwelling, is yet profitable for instruction.

◊ 8. Right margin: The 4th argument of Francis is answered.

John Noviomagus, in the scholia published by him on Bede's book On the Nature of Things, himself also thinks that the whole passage about Paradise is to be understood enigmatically and allegorically — yet in a sense different from Origen and those who followed Origen's opinion. For they think Paradise to be nothing other than this world:[9] for just as the Gentiles call the world a dwelling and a certain temple of the Gods, from its inexplicable beauty and its work of highest veneration, so [Noviomagus] supposes that in the sacred Letters this world is to be understood [as] the "place of pleasure," than whose absolute elegance nothing more adorned can be conceived — in which adornment the mind of man, admiring the variety of nature, cannot be sated with delight. For he interprets that fountain, from which the four rivers flow, as the Ocean, whence (as pleased Homer too) all rivers and fountains take the force and beginning of their course. He thinks also that it cannot be that the Ganges, the Nile, and the Euphrates should [flow], in regions so far apart as those of Armenia, India, and Ethiopia, from one →

◊ 9. Right margin: John Noviomagus thinks that Paradise is this world.

[…continues on folio 539 (PDF p. 356): the rest of Annotatio XXXIV (Noviomagus on the four rivers).]

---

(printed folio 539 [PDF p. 356]. Annot. XXXIV–XXXVII (Gen 2:8): "Paradise = this world" refuted (the four rivers, the guarding Cherub); Ambrose defended as holding a twofold Paradise, earthly and heavenly; Kissamos's three deviations on Paradise (all excused); and Jerome on the Hebrew "Mikedem.")

(folio 539, left column → right column)

Annotation XXXIV (continued)

[the Ganges, Nile, and Euphrates cannot proceed] from one fountain of Paradise, unless we accept that Paradise is the globe of the earth, and the fountain the sea — which, by hidden subterranean channels, poured out far and wide, supplies moisture to all the rivers. But this too is far from the truth.[1] For if Paradise is the globe of the earth, how does Moses say that Paradise was planted in the region of the East? How were the first parents expelled from it? How does the Cherub keep watch before its doors, lest the now-ejected parents return again into Paradise? Nor indeed ought it to seem a wonder to anyone if Moses writes that those rivers flow from one fountain: for thus, from the beginning of the nascent world, God willed them to flow from one and the same fountain. But after, in the universal Flood, the fountains of the abyss were burst open, it is credible that the places of the fountains and the beginnings of the rivers were so changed that one took the beginning of its course from the East, another from the South.

◊ 1. Left margin: John Noviomagus, who thought Paradise to be this world, is refuted. — and: To be read diligently.

Annotation XXXV [contents]

"The Lord had planted a Paradise." — Genesis 2:8

Whether there is a terrestrial Paradise.

Ambrose, in the book On Paradise — which he consumed wholly in an allegorical explanation of Paradise — seems to assert two things foreign to the common consensus of the theologians. First, that Paradise is not on the earth, but in the third heaven[2] (which error is attributed to Origen). For since in the preface of the book he proposes to investigate what and of what kind Paradise is, he shows the very great difficulty of this inquiry chiefly from this: that Paul, caught up into this Paradise, denies that he can remember whether he saw it in the body or outside the body,[3] adding also that he heard and saw in it things which it is not permitted to utter. And — lest you think Ambrose holds that Paul was caught up not into the heavenly but into the terrestrial paradise — the same [Ambrose], in the exposition of the second Epistle to the Corinthians, openly affirms that the Apostle was taken up to the heavens into the heavenly Paradise of God the Father. The second is that, in imitation of Philo, he seems to understand Paradise, and whatever is written in it, according to allegory alone, the historical sense being rejected:[4] that is, by Paradise, the soul; by man, the mind; by woman, sense; by the serpent, delight; by the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, wisdom; and by the other trees, the virtues implanted in the soul. Which assertion he seems to express in plainer words in the epistle to Sabinus (which he also wished to be the final resolution of this matter), writing thus: "Having read the Hexaemeron, you thought fit to inquire whether I had suppressed Paradise, and that I should indicate what opinion I held of it — and that you wished studiously to learn this. But I, long ago (being no longer a fresh priest), wrote about it; and I have found that the opinions of very many about it are diverse. For Josephus, being a Historian, says [it is] a place of the earth filled with very many trees and shrubs, watered also by a river which is divided into four streams; others [say] otherwise. Yet all agree in Paradise, and in the tree of life rooted [there], and the tree of knowledge which discerns good and evil; and the other trees also, full of vigor, breathing full of vivification, and rational — from which it is gathered that Paradise itself cannot seem earthly, [nor to be] in any soil, but in our principal part [the soul's ruling faculty], which is animated and vivified by the soul with virtues and by the infusion of the spirit of God." These are Ambrose's words. From which, however, I cannot be led to believe that he assented either to Philo or to Origen in this part — especially since, in the exposition of the sixth chapter of the first [Epistle] to the Corinthians, he constantly affirms that Paradise is twofold,[5] one earthly, in which Adam was placed, the other heavenly, into which Paul was caught up. For these are his words in that place: "There is both a lower Jerusalem and a higher — which the Apostle calls our mother; there is both a lower Paradise, in which man was placed [and] received the commandment, both that he should work there and that he should keep it; and there is that heavenly one, into which the Apostle, caught up, heard secret words."

◊ 2. Left margin: It is attributed to Origen that he held Paradise to be in the third heaven.

◊ 3. Left margin: 2 Corinthians 12:3.

◊ 4. Left margin: What is written about Paradise, Philo understands according to allegory alone.

◊ 5. Right margin: Paradise is twofold.

Annotation XXXVI [contents]

"And the Lord had planted a Paradise." — Genesis 2:8

Whether Paradise, after Adam's fall, entirely ceased to exist.

Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, in the Annotations on the Pentateuch, while he pursues the exposition of this passage most profusely, seems to deviate in three ways from the rule of right faith. For he asserted, first, that that paradise, in which the first parents were created, began little by little to be abolished, with all its adornment, after Adam's sin; then, the Flood succeeding, [it was] so overturned by the inundation of the waters and dissipated by the most rapid whirlpools that it entirely ceased to be — no vestige of the divine place now remaining, because of the crimes of men. Secondly, he asserted that Enoch and Elijah were not translated into that paradise,[6] since it was, immediately from Adam's fall, destitute of cultivation and habitation, and finally, after the Flood, utterly emptied. Thirdly, he affirms that the fault for which the first parent was cast out of paradise brought upon man not the death of the body, but only of the soul.[7] Of these, the first assertion is repugnant to the common consensus of all the Fathers. The second not only contradicts the Fathers, but divine scripture also: which, in the book of Ecclesiasticus, says, "Enoch pleased God, and was translated into Paradise, that he might give wisdom [repentance] to the nations";[8] nor is it right to understand this testimony of the heavenly Paradise, since it does not fit that anyone should descend thence to preach penance. The third opposes not only Augustine and very many other Fathers, but also the authority of the African Council, which condemned this position, against Pelagius its author, as appears below in Annotation 52. Yet this man — well-deserving in the studies of the sacred letters — can be kindly excused, from the words which he immediately added under these positions, writing in this manner: "These things I say, not being ignorant that the gravest and most holy men hold otherwise; which, if they are too little Christian, I retract, and readily refute." Ambrose, Archbishop of Compsa [Catharinus], also noted these things before me, in his commentaries on the book of Genesis.

◊ 6. Right margin: Whether Enoch and Elijah are in the terrestrial Paradise.

◊ 7. Right margin: Whether Adam's sin brought bodily death.

◊ 8. Right margin: Ecclesiasticus 44:16. — A later editorial note added in the margin here reads: "See Benedict Pererius, book 7, Commentary on Genesis 9.7, where he refutes Sixtus, who teaches it to be a dogma of faith that Enoch is in the terrestrial Paradise."

Annotation XXXVII [contents]

"The Lord had planted a Paradise." — Genesis 2:8

Whether the terrestrial Paradise was created before the world.

Jerome, at almost the beginning of the Hebrew Traditions, annotating this, rejects the Seventy interpreters, who, for that which Moses said מקדם Mikedem — and our Vulgate edition →

[…continues on folio 540 (PDF p. 357): Jerome on "Mikedem" (from the beginning / in the East).]

---

(printed folio 540 [PDF p. 357]. Annot. XXXVII–XL (Gen 2:8): the Hebrew Mikedem ("from the beginning" vs "in the East" — Jerome defended); Paradise raised to the Moon's sphere (Aquinas: only a figure); Tertullian's souls held in the underworld till Judgment; and Augustine on the spiritual (not corporeal) places and pains of souls.)

(folio 540, left column → right column)

Annotation XXXVII (continued)

[our Vulgate edition] has "from the beginning" (A principio), [the Seventy] translated Κατὰ τὰς ἀνατολάς, that is, "toward the East"; and [Jerome], following the version of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion — of whom the first translated ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, that is, "from the outset"; the second ἐκ πρώτης, that is, "from the beginning"; the third ἐν πρώτοις, that is, "among the first" — infers from their consensus a conclusion of this kind: "From which it is most manifestly proved that, before God made heaven and earth, he had beforehand founded Paradise — as it is also read in the Hebrew: 'And God had planted a paradise in Eden from the beginning.'" This inference Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, disapproving in the Annotations on Genesis, says that Jerome falsely deduced, from this word מקדם Mikedem, that Paradise was made before heaven and earth: because Mikedem in this place signifies not time but place, as is proved from another similar sentence below, chapter 3, where it is had [in Hebrew], that is, "And he placed cherubim at the eastern part of the garden of Eden." I do not think Jerome was so stupid as to have believed that Paradise was founded before all creation of heaven and earth; for human reason cannot hold this — that Paradise, a local and earthly place, indeed an adornment of the earth, existed before the earth. But I think that by his words he wished to signify that, before God perfected heaven and earth by distinguishing and adorning them, he planted Paradise on the third day. Alcuin, however, in the book of Questions on Genesis, judges that Jerome's opinion is to be understood just as his words sound. Moreover Eucherius, Bishop of Lyons, set down the same assertion, in the same words of Jerome, in the first book of the commentaries on Genesis, chapter 2.

Francis George [Francesco Giorgio], in volume 1, Problem 31, supposes that Jerome placed Paradise before the world for this reason: that, according to bare allegory, he believed Paradise to be nothing other than the happy state of the rational creatures, which God created before this visible world. But Jerome himself openly protests, in the tenth chapter of the commentaries on Daniel, saying thus: "Let the ravings of those be silent, who — following shadows and images in the truth — endeavor to overthrow the truth itself, so that they think Paradise, and the rivers, and the trees must be undermined by the laws of allegory."

Annotation XXXVIII [contents]

"God had planted a Paradise in Eden." — Genesis 2:8

Whether the earthly Paradise reaches up to the orb of the Moon, as Bede held.

Bede the Priest, when he took up this passage to explain, said that Paradise is a place situated in a higher part of the earth, and raised up from the plain of the earth so far that it touches the Lunar globe. Following his opinion, the Master of the Scholastic History [Peter Comestor], in book 1, chapter 13, says: "Paradise is a most pleasant place, secluded from our habitable zone by a long tract of land and sea, so elevated that it reaches up to the Lunar globe; whence the waters of the Flood did not reach thither." St. Thomas, in the first part of the Summa Theologica, question 102, article 1, reply to [objection] 1, thinks this opinion false if it be understood of a loftiness of place — which is entirely uninhabitable for human nature; but true, if we understand there to be there a perpetual pleasantness and likeness of temperateness, such as is the temperateness in that Lunar region, removed from all the intemperance of this murky air.

Annotation XXXIX [contents]

"The Lord had planted a Paradise." — Genesis 2:8

Tertullian held that all souls are in the underworld until the day of judgment.

Tertullian, in the book On Paradise, published by him for the exposition of the present chapter, asserts that all the souls of the deceased — both good and bad — are sequestered in the underworld until the day of judgment. See Annotation 345 of the sixth book.

Annotation XL [contents]

"The Lord had planted a Paradise." — Genesis 2:8

Whether the places and punishments of souls after this life are only spiritual, as St. Augustine seems to hold.

Augustine, in the 12th book On Genesis to the Letter, where he disputes about Paradise, chapter 22, says that the places in which souls, stripped of their bodies, are affected, whether well or ill, are not corporeal but spiritual; which — together with various likenesses of corporeal things, both glad and sad — are represented to the souls of the deceased, not otherwise than [they are] to those to whom, either set in sleep or withdrawn from the senses, now grave terrors and torments, now glad and long-desired things, are exhibited. He seems to confirm this same thing in the 21st book The City of God, chapter 10, where he intimates that the fire of hell, by which that rich man was tormented, is spiritual, in these words: "I would indeed say that spirits will burn thus, without any body of their own, as that rich man was burning in the underworld when he said, 'I am tormented in this flame'[1] — did I not see that it can be fittingly answered that that flame was of such a kind as [were] the eyes which he lifted up when he saw Lazarus; of such a kind the tongue, on which he desired a little moisture to be poured; of such a kind the finger of Lazarus, from whom he asked this to be done for him — where, however, the souls were without bodies. So then, both that incorporeal flame with which he burned, and that little drop which he begged, are such as are also the visions of sleepers, or of those beholding incorporeal things in ecstasy, which yet have likenesses of bodies. For man himself, too, when he is in such visions with the spirit, not the body, nevertheless then sees himself so like to his own body that he cannot at all distinguish [it]." Thus Augustine — to whom the consensus of all the recent Theologians seems repugnant: who, following the opinion of St. Gregory (explained in his fourth Dialogue), establish that the infernal places are corporeal, in which the souls suffer not imaginary and similitudinary punishments, but true ones — namely corporeal, and truly burning fires.

◊ 1. Right margin: Luke 16:23–24.

Accordingly, St. Thomas, in the fourth [book] of the Sentences, distinction 44, weighing that former opinion from book 12 on Genesis, writes thus: "Augustine's saying can be taken in this way: that that place, to which souls are borne, is said to be non-corporeal to this extent — that the soul does not exist in it corporeally, namely in the manner in which bodies exist in a place, but in another, spiritual manner, as the angels are in a place; or it must be said that Augustine speaks by way of opinion, and not by way of determination, as he frequently does in those books." Nicholas Trivet, in the scholia which he published on the books On the City of God, annotating the latter passage cited from the same books, says that Augustine did not bring forth those words to assert that the fire →

[...continues on folio 541 (PDF p. 358): whether the fire [of hell] is spiritual — the rest of Annotatio XL.]

---

(printed folio 541 [PDF p. 358]. Annot. XL–XLIII (Gen 2:8–17): Augustine really held hell-fire corporeal (Trivet); whether Moses and Paul saw God's essence (yes, with the mind); whether the underworld is beneath the earth (Augustine's retracted doubt: yes); and Philo's death-of-the-soul-only reading (refuted).)

(folio 541, left column → right column)

Annotation XL (continued)

[Nicholas Trivet says that Augustine did not bring forth those words to assert] that the fire of hell is incorporeal — which through that whole chapter he had taught to be corporeal — but to show that his own assertion about a corporeal fire could not be confirmed by the example of the rich man burning in the flame, since it would easily be eluded by one who should answer that those flames were of such a kind as were the eyes and the tongue of the rich man suffering without his [own] body. See the observations pertaining to this below, in Annotations 42, 93, 141, and 227 of this book.

Annotation XLI [contents]

"The Lord had planted a Paradise." — Genesis 2:8

Whether Moses and Paul saw the very essence of God with the mind, but not with the eyes of the body.

Augustine, in the twelfth book On Genesis to the Letter, where he treats of Paradise, when he discourses (in chapters 27 and 28 of the same book) about those who saw God, wrote that Moses and Paul saw God not in any likeness or image of a corporeal creature, but in that essence and nature of the subject by which God is [as he is in himself], as far as a man is able to grasp it, withdrawn from all sense of the body; and he confirms this same thing in the book (or epistle) On Seeing God, to Paulina, chapters 12 and 13. This opinion the same Augustine seemed to some to have disapproved, in book 2 On the Trinity, chapters 17 and 18, where he reckons those to be foolish who believe that God was seen by mortals in his [own] substance. James, Bishop of Christopolis, who in the preface of his explanation on the Psalms noted a contradiction of this kind, settled it by bringing a distinction of a twofold vision:[1] namely, [vision] a priori — that is, through the light of glory, by which the blessed see God in the fatherland — and [vision] a posteriori — that is, from an ascent from creatures up to the divine essence: as if someone, in a circle, should arrive at the vision of the center (invisible by its own nature) through the vision of the lines going out from the center to the circumference of the circle. In which way indeed he says that Augustine thought, in the epistle to Paulina and in the 12th book on Genesis, that the divine essence was beheld by Moses and Paul — but not a priori, or seen through the light of glory, as the same [Augustine] left written in the second book On the Trinity. But if anyone will more accurately inspect both passages of Augustine in their author, he will confess that no reconciliation is needed. For what he had taught to be attributed to Moses and Paul — that with the eye of the mind they for an hour beheld that which is God — this he denied could be done with corporeal eyes, concluding thus in book 2 On the Trinity, chapter 18: "For that very nature, or substance, or by whatever other name that very thing which God is must be called — whatever it is — cannot be seen corporeally."

◊ 1. Left margin: The vision of God, in the judgment of James of Christopolis, is twofold.

Annotation XLII [contents]

"The Lord had planted a Paradise." — Genesis 2:8

Whether the place of the underworld is under the earth.

Augustine, in the twelfth book On Genesis to the Letter, in which he inquires about Paradise, chapter 33, seems to hold that the underworld [inferi] is not under the earth, when he proposes a question about these things in this manner: "Whence, however, [it is that] the underworld is said to be under the earth — if it is not under the earth — is rightly asked." Answering which question, in the following chapter 34, he says that the underworld is said and believed to be under the earth for a twofold reason: either because, just as a place under the earth is assigned to dead flesh, so the likeness of a subterranean place is represented to the soul dead through the sin of the flesh; or because, just as in corporeal things those are called "lower" which are heavier, so in spiritual things those are called "lower" which are sadder. Whence also, among the Greeks, the name ᾅδης [Hades], by which the underworld is called, took its origin from the fact that it has nothing sweet. Retracting which words, Augustine, in book 2 of the Retractations, chapter 24, speaks thus:[2] "About the underworld, I seem to myself rather to have had to teach that they are under the earth, than to give a reason why they are believed or said to be under the earth — as though it were not so." See above, Annotation 40.

◊ 2. Right margin: Augustine retracted himself. — and: Hell is under the earth.

Annotation XLIII [contents]

"In whatever day you eat of it, you shall die the death." — Genesis 2:17

Whether God threatened the first man with bodily death, or rather only the death of the soul.

Philo the Jew, at the end of the second book of the Allegories of the Law, asserts that God, in the proposed words, did not threaten the first parent with the death of the body, but only with the death of the soul.[3] For he writes in this manner: "God says, 'In whatever day you shall eat of it, you shall die the death.' But after eating they not only do not die, but even beget children, and become to others authors of living. What, then, must be said? That there is a twofold death: one proper to man, the other to the soul. The death of man is the separation of the soul from the body; but the death of the soul is the corruption of virtue and the assumption of vice. And therefore, not content to say 'about to die,' he says, 'By death you shall die' — indicating not this common [death], but that eternal one which by excellence is called death, which is [death] as often as the soul is buried in the affections and in all vices. When, therefore, he says, 'By death you shall die,' it must be observed that a penal death, not a natural one, is signified. Natural [death], moreover, is that by which the soul is separated from the body; but penal, when the soul dies out of the life of virtue."

◊ 3. Right margin: Philo thinks God threatened only the death of the soul.

Eucherius, in the first book of the commentaries on Genesis, following Philo's opinion, expounds this passage similarly,[4] saying: "He speaks, therefore, of the death of the soul, not of the body — because they did not die at that time when they ate. Therefore this death which God now threatened, we must not take [as] that by which the flesh is separated from the soul, but this, by which it [the soul] is alienated from God, who is its life — as if he should say, 'On the day you forsake me by disobedience, I will forsake you by justice.' For just as the body lives from the soul, so the soul, that it may live blessedly, lives from God; therefore the soul forsaken by God is rightly called dead." Augustine, refuting this opinion in the 13th book The City of God, chapter 12, speaks thus:[5] "When, therefore, it is asked with what death God threatened the first men, if they should transgress the commandment received from him and not keep obedience — whether [the death] of the soul, or of the body, or of the whole man, or that which is called the second [death] — it must be answered: all. For the first consists of two, but the second is whole, [made] of all. For just as the whole earth [consists] of many lands, and the whole Church consists of many churches, so the whole death [consists] of all — since the first consists of two: one of the soul, the other of the body; so that the first death is [the death] of the whole man, when the soul, without God [and] without body, pays penalties for a time; but the second [is that] where the soul, without God, with the body, shall pay eternal penalties. When, therefore, God said to that first man, whom he had established in Paradise, concerning the forbidden food, 'In whatever day you eat of it, you shall die the death,' [he threatened] not only the prior part of the first death, where the soul is deprived [of God] →

◊ 4. Right margin: Eucherius approves Philo's opinion.

◊ 5. Right margin: St. Augustine refutes Philo's opinion.

[…continues on folio 542 (PDF p. 359): the rest of Augustine's refutation (Annotatio XLIII).]

---

(printed folio 542 [PDF p. 359]. Annot. XLIII–XLVII (Gen 2:17–21): "you shall die the death" = every death; abortion of a formless embryo (still gravely sinful); Giorgio's androgynous Adam (refuted); Chrysostom's literal reading of Adam's rib; and Cajetan reading the rib as parable.)

(folio 542, left column → right column)

Annotation XLIII (continued)

[that threat comprehended] not only the prior part of the first death, where the soul is deprived of God, nor only the posterior, where the body is deprived of the soul, nor only that whole first [death], where the soul, separated both from God and from the body, is punished: but whatever of death there is, up to the very last — which is called the second, and than which there is none later — that threat comprehended [it all].

Annotation XLIV [contents]

"Let us make him a help like unto himself." — Genesis 2:18

For what cause abortion is a grave sin, even if the embryo was not [yet] animated.

Procopius of Gaza, in the exposition of this saying, has these things: "Wherefore he who is the cause or author that a formless embryo is cast out by abortion, according to the divine law incurs no penalties, nor is affected with punishment; because an imperfect embryo is not yet numbered among men." Which words are to be understood not of all penalties and punishments simply, but only of those with which homicides are wont to be punished:[1] because the procured abortion of an unformed birth is not homicide. But those who procure the poisons of sterility and cast out foetuses not yet animated, Augustine affirms to sin most gravely (book 1 On Marriage and Concupiscence, chapter 15, and Sermon On the Season 244).

◊ 1. Left margin: Exodus 21:22.

Annotation XLV [contents]

"For Adam there was not found a helper like unto him." — Genesis 2:20

Whether Adam was created androgynous, as Francesco Giorgio thinks.

Francis George [Francesco Giorgio], in the first volume of the Problems, so explains this passage that he asserts man was, from the beginning, created androgynous — that is, a man in whom two bodies, namely of male and female, were joined around the back.[2] For he writes thus, in Problem 29: "Man was, from the beginning, twofold [geminus] — that is, male and female together — created; and, as Plato teaches, male and female were joined in him by the back, and afterward cut, so that they might be joined face to face for procreating offspring. And in this Plato was taught by the most upright philosopher Moses — which Scripture also teaches, where it is had that, the side or rib of the protoplast being cut, the woman was formed; for צלע (tsela) signifies both, namely rib and side. The section therefore being made, the woman was the help of the man, namely as one standing face to face, as the Hebrew truth has it — for which the common edition [Vulgate] has 'like unto himself.'" St. Augustine refutes this opinion, in the third book On Genesis to the Letter, chapter 22, saying:[3] "Again, lest in man both sexes should be thought to be — as in those whom they call Androgynes — he subjoined in the plural, 'Male and female he created them.'" Strabo [Walafrid], agreeing with Augustine, rejects this same opinion among the condemned fables of the Jews, in these words: "'Male and female he created them' — not because he first created and established Adam himself in both sexes, as the stupid Jews fable, but because he distinguished the human race by both sexes, and willed it to subsist in a twofold person."

◊ 2. Left margin: Genesis 1:21 [i.e. 1:27].

◊ 3. Left margin: St. Augustine refutes that Jewish opinion which Francesco Giorgio approved. — with: Genesis 1[:27].

Annotation XLVI [contents]

"The Lord sent a deep sleep upon Adam." — Genesis 2:21

Whether Eve was formed from Adam's rib.

Chrysostom, in homily 15 on Genesis, illustrating this sentence by his exposition, brought forth these words: "'And he took,' he says, 'one of his ribs' — do not take in a human manner the things that are said, but consider that these gross words are suited to human weakness; for unless Scripture had used these words, how could we have learned such hidden mysteries? Let us not, therefore, be addicted to the words only, but let us think all things about God as is fitting; since, when it is said 'He took,' [it] and all such things are said on account of our weakness." From these words a certain Spaniard endeavored to bring aid to Thomas Cajetan — who (as we shall say presently) opined that the formation of Eve from Adam's rib is to be understood not according to the truth of history, but as the narration of a figurative parable — which opinion the Spaniard thinks was expressed by Chrysostom, many ages before Cajetan, in the aforesaid words. But how far this man strays not only from the truth, but from Chrysostom's mind, Chrysostom himself shows a little before, when he says: "He who is the wise and powerful Fashioner of our nature, being about to take away one of his ribs — lest, by feeling pain, [Adam] should afterward become hostile to the woman formed from him, being mindful of the pain — for this reason, sending an ecstasy, oppressed him with so deep a sleep that, as if seized by a certain heaviness, he took no perception of the thing that was being done; and he filled up flesh in place of it, lest, the sleep being shaken off, he should perceive from the emptiness what had been done. And so, that he might afflict him with sadness neither in the taking-away nor on account of the removal, he so dispensed both, that he both took it away without his torment, and, that place being filled up whence he had taken it, did not allow him to perceive the sense of what had been done." These things Chrysostom [says], manifestly demonstrating that he by no means understood by metaphor and parable those things in which he judged the danger of the sense of true pain, true torment, and true sadness to be imminent. But as for his warning — that Moses, speaking of the formation, must not be understood in a human and gross manner — he said this not to overthrow the truth of history, but to confute the madness of the Anthropomorphites and the Arians. Of these, the former thought God to be endowed with a body,[4] and to have fashioned man from mud with fleshly hands and corporeal operation and motion, after the manner of a potter or a surgeon, and the woman from the man's rib. But the Arians, taking a handle for cavilling from these words, "And the Lord God sent [a deep sleep]," contended that the Father alone, without the Son, formed the man, and from the man the woman;[5] because they said that in the divine Scriptures the Father alone is called "God" and "Lord," but the Son, as being less than the Father, is called only "God," not "Lord." Confuting both, therefore, Chrysostom warns [us] not to take these words either in a human and gross manner with the Anthropomorphites, or, with the Arians, to place a distinction between "God" and "Lord": because, he says, of both [Father and Son] there is one essence, and Scripture uses those names indiscriminately. Look at the following Annotation.

◊ 4. Right margin: The Anthropomorphites thought God to be endowed with a body.

◊ 5. Right margin: The Arians contended that the Father, without the Son, formed the man, and from the man the woman.

Annotation XLVII [contents]

"God sent a deep sleep upon Adam." — Genesis 2:21

Cajetan denies that a rib was truly taken from Adam.

Thomas Cajetan, in his commentaries on Genesis, when in narrating he had come to this point, wrote that both the sleep of Adam and the production of the woman from Adam's rib are to be taken not according to history, and as the letter itself sounds, but according to a mystery — not of allegory, but of parable. For if it be understood according to the letter, that a rib was truly taken from Adam, one of two absurdities will follow: either that Adam was a monster before the rib was taken away, or →

[…continues on folio 543 (PDF p. 360): the second absurdity, and Sixtus's reply to Cajetan (Annotatio XLVII).]

---

(printed folio 543 [PDF p. 360]. Annot. XLVII–L (Gen 2:21–3:15): Cajetan's rib-as-parable branded heretical (Adam neither maimed nor a monster — Hugh of St. Victor, Aquinas); Chrysostom seeming to forbid all oaths; Origen on losing God's image (image vs likeness distinguished); and Augustine's seemingly-Pelagian "sins harm only their own nature.")

(folio 543, left column → right column)

Annotation XLVII (continued)

[either that Adam was a monster before the rib was taken away,] or that he was maimed after the rib was taken from him. Both of which are most absurd: because either that rib was superfluous to the man, or necessary. If superfluous, then the man was monstrous; if necessary, then, it being taken away, the man was rendered maimed. Alfonso de Castro, in the second book Against Heresies, and Ambrose [Catharinus], Archbishop of Compsa, in the commentaries on Genesis and in the second book of the Annotations against Cajetan, assail this position[1] as a novelty unheard-of by Catholics, and heretical, and one which subverts the very foundations of our faith: because, if the truth of the present history is destroyed, it must needs be that there falls that great sacrament which Paul said is in Christ and in the Church — that is, that just as Eve was built up from the bones and flesh of Adam, so the Church [is built] from the bones and flesh of Christ. But if you destroy the first thing, which was in the letter, you overthrow also that which is contained under it. Thus they.

◊ 1. Left margin: Alfonso de Castro and Ambrose of Compsa [Catharinus] judge Cajetan's opinion to be heretical.

But Hugh of St. Victor, dissolving this very argument of Cajetan's — which of old was used by those who, long before Cajetan, had scattered the seeds of this error — wrote thus in the book of Annotations on Genesis:[2] "But as to what certain persons ask — whether Adam previously had more ribs in that side from which that rib was taken (because if so, then Adam had it as superfluous; but if not more, [but] only as many as he had in the other side, then he was diminished [by its loss]) — [the question] is frivolous: for neither are the teeth of boys, which are afterward changed, called superfluous, nor are they themselves, although they do not yet have the [full] increase of nature, judged to be diminished." Thus far Hugh. Subscribing to whom, St. Thomas, in the first part of the Summa, question 92, article 3, says that that rib was of the perfection of Adam[3] — not as he was a certain individual, but as he was the principle of the species: just as seed is of the perfection of the one generating, and yet is separated, for the procreation of children, by natural operation. Read the preceding annotation.

◊ 2. Left margin: Hugh of St. Victor answers the argument which Cajetan earlier employed.

◊ 3. Left margin: The rib from which Eve was formed was of Adam's perfection, as he was the principle of the species.

Annotation XLVIII [contents]

"And they shall be two in one flesh." — Genesis 2:24

Whether it is lawful for Christians to swear.

Chrysostom, in the homily on Genesis, after the exposition of this passage, exhorting his hearers at the end of the sermon to the flight from oaths, seems to take away from Christians all faculty of swearing[4] — even in just and necessary causes. For he writes thus: "Let him also who hears the sentence of Christ flee oaths in all ways: [Christ] who says, 'It was said to the ancients, THOU SHALT NOT FORSWEAR THYSELF. But I say to you, [thou shalt] not swear at all.' Therefore let no one say, 'I swear in a just matter' — for it is lawful to swear neither in a just matter nor in an unjust one." See Annotation 26 of the sixth book.

◊ 4. Left margin: Matthew 5:34.

Annotation XLIX [contents]

"And when they knew themselves to be naked." — Genesis 3:7

Whether Adam, by sinning, lost the image [of God].

Origen, in the Tomes on the third chapter of Genesis, weighing these words, left it written that man, by sinning, lost the image of God according to which he had been created. This assertion Epiphanius, in the epistle to John, Bishop of Jerusalem, reckons among the chief errors of Origen. Yet it must be known that the name "image of God" in the sacred letters is taken in two ways,[5] that is, according to substance and according to likeness. Now the image of God according to substance — as Eucherius says, in the first book of the commentaries on Genesis — is nothing other than the mind naturally conferred by God upon every human soul, of which privilege the other animals are devoid. But the image of God according to likeness is the conformity of a just and holy soul with God, procured from divine grace and the zeal of holy actions: concerning which St. Ambrose, in the commentaries on the epistle to the Colossians, expounding that [saying] of the Apostle — "Putting on the new man, who is renewed according to the image of him who created him"[6] — speaks thus: "This image is to be understood in good conversation [and] life, as the first epistle to the Corinthians says: 'As we have borne the image of him who is of the earth, so let us also bear the image of him who is of heaven.'[7] He, therefore, is the creator of man, whose image he commands us to bear in sanctity and good works." Thus Ambrose.

◊ 5. Left margin: The name "image of God" in Scripture is taken in two ways.

◊ 6. Right margin: Colossians 3:10.

◊ 7. Right margin: 1 Corinthians 15:49.

Since, therefore, the name "image" signifies these two things: if Origen understood "image" according to the first signification, he plainly erred, and Epiphanius accused him not undeservedly. For the natural [endowments], after the fall, remained entire — even in the demons — as to substance,[8] as the great Dionysius attests. But he thought piously and rightly, if he used the name "image" in the second signification, that is, for the original justice lost by man in sinning. And that Origen had this [latter] sense, the third book of the Peri Archon easily persuades — in whose sixth chapter he himself wrote these things about the image of God, as still remaining in man: "Moses, narrating before all things the first condition of man, says, 'And God said, Let us make man to our image and likeness';[9] then afterward he adds, 'And God made man to the image of God.' This, therefore — that he said, 'To the image of God he made him,' and was silent about the likeness — indicates nothing other than that [man] received the dignity of the image in the first condition. But the perfection of the likeness was reserved for the consummation: namely, that he himself should procure it for himself by his own industry [and] zeal, from the imitation of God — since, the possibility of perfection being divinely given to him through the dignity of the image, he himself should at last, at the end, through the completion of works, consummate for himself the perfect likeness." From which words it is manifestly gathered that the image of God, received in the first condition, remains in man:[10] because [Origen] shows the likeness of God — which the soul receives in the consummation, that is, in beatitude — to be nothing other than the absolute and consummate perfection of the image, or of the dignity received through the image. See what St. Augustine retracted concerning this opinion above, in Annotation 31.

◊ 8. Right margin: The natural [endowments], as to substance, remained entire even in the demons.

◊ 9. Right margin: Genesis 1:26.

◊ 10. Right margin: The image of God, received in the first condition, remains in man.

Annotation L [contents]

"I will put enmities between thee and the woman," etc. — Genesis 3:15

No one's nature is harmed by another's sins.

Augustine, in the second book On Genesis [against the Manichaeans] [interpreted] allegorically, chapter 29, elucidating the sense of this passage, says: "Sins harm no one's nature but their own." Because this seems able to be drawn toward the dogma of the Pelagians — who say that another's sins have not harmed little children — Augustine, in the first book of the Retractations, chapter 10, wishes it to be understood of adult just persons:[11] because to the just man, whom [another's sin] harms, not →

◊ 11. Right margin: St. Augustine explains himself.

[…continues on folio 544 (PDF p. 361): the rest of Augustine's self-explanation (Annotatio L).]

---

(printed folio 544 [PDF p. 361]. Annot. L–LIV (Gen 3:15–21): harming a just man harms only oneself; Giorgio's five "paradoxes" on demons and giants (refuted by Augustine); Josephus and Kissamos on sin bringing only the soul's death (refuted); Origen's "tunics of skin" as real skins; and Giorgio's allegory of the tunics.)

(folio 544, left column → right column)

Annotation L (continued)

[because to the just man, whom another's sin harms, it does] not truly harm him: since indeed it even increases his reward in the heavens; but by sinning [the sinner] truly harms himself,[1] because, on account of the very will of harming, he receives that which harms [him]. Augustine, in the same book and chapter, asserts that there is no natural evil; and because this seems to favor the Pelagian heresy, he — in the first book of the Retractations, chapter 10 — orders it to be referred to that nature which was founded utterly without any vice.[2]

◊ 1. Left margin: Whoever harms a just man does not truly harm him.

◊ 2. Left margin: St. Augustine explains himself.

Annotation LI [contents]

"I will put enmities between thy seed and her seed," etc. — Genesis 3:15

Whether the giants sprang from the seed of the devil, as Francesco Giorgio thought.

Francesco Giorgio, in the first Tome of the Problems, problem 54, inquiring what the seed of the devil is — which here is called by Moses "the seed of the serpent" — decides, rather violently, that the seed of the devil, hostile to the whole human race, was the giants, begotten from the coupling of demons with women. For demons (as he himself explains in the sixth Tome, problem 330) are corporeal animals apt for generation, emitting seed: which, approaching women, condense their bodies, so that they may more easily unite with the women for the generation of giants; whom, in the first Tome, problems 74 and 75, he constantly asserts could in no way have been begotten from the intercourse of man and woman, but from the seed of demons — because it is not consonant that such huge monsters, of the kind the giants are read to have been in the sacred letters, could be produced by a natural way. And hence (he says in problem 331 of the sixth Tome) it came about that, after the coming of Christ, the giants entirely ceased to be: because, after the demons were conquered by the death of Christ, they no longer had power to enter into women and to sow giants in their wombs. You have here, excellent reader, five things foreign to the common opinions of the Theologians.[3] The first is: that demons are corporeal animals endowed with the faculty of begetting. The second, that the giants were the sons of demons. The third, that giants cannot be begotten naturally from the human intercourse of man and woman. The fourth, that demons cannot, after the coming of Christ, be mingled with women. The fifth, that the giants were, after Christ, entirely done away. All these things St. Augustine refutes in order, in book 15 On the City of God, chapter 23. Consult Annotations 8, 70, 71, 73, 74, 76, and 77 of this book.

◊ 3. Left margin: Five paradoxes of Francesco Giorgio.

Annotation LII [contents]

"Thou shalt return into the earth from which thou wast taken, because dust thou art, and into dust thou shalt return." — Genesis 3:19

Whether sin brought upon Adam the necessity of bodily death.

Josephus, in the first book of the Jewish Antiquities, explaining the sense of this sentence, indicates that the offense of the first parents did not bring upon them the necessity of dying, but the shortness of life, and the hastening of old age and death.[4] For thus he introduces God speaking to them: "I had indeed provided for you, that you might live a happy life and free from all evil, all things which confer to use and pleasure coming to you of their own accord; enjoying which, neither would old age quickly oppress you, and [your] long life would be prolonged as far as possible. But you have held my judgment in mockery, my command being despised — wherefore both old age shall come the sooner, and your life shall be less long."

◊ 4. Left margin: Genesis 3:19.

To the prior part of this opinion Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, alludes, holding that Adam's sin brought upon man not the death of the body, but only [that] of the soul.[5] Reproving their assertion, Augustine [of Hippo], in book 13 On the City of God, chapter 15, says:[6] "It is agreed, among Christians truly holding the Catholic faith, that even this bodily death itself was inflicted on us not by the law of nature — by which God made no death for man — but deservedly for sin: since God, avenging sin, said to the man, in whom then we all were, 'Earth thou art, and into earth thou shalt go.'" There exists also a decree of this Catholic assertion in the Acts of the African Council, chapter 76,[7] in these words: "Whosoever shall say that Adam, the first man, was made mortal, so that, whether he sinned or sinned not, he would die in body — that is, would depart from the body — not by the merit of sin, but by the necessity of nature: let him be anathema."

◊ 5. Right margin: Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, denies that sin brought bodily death upon Adam.

◊ 6. Right margin: Genesis 3[:19].

◊ 7. Right margin: The opinion of Augustine of Kissamos is impious.

Annotation LIII [contents]

"God made for Adam tunics of skin." — Genesis 3:21

Whether the tunics of skin of the first parents were the skins of animals.

Origen, in the Tomes on Genesis, expounding these words, is reported to have said that the tunics of skin, with which God clothed the first parents, were not truly tunics of skin, but carnal and mortal bodies — with which, after the offense and the ejection from paradise, Adam and Eve were clothed. This error Methodius, in the Aglaophon, attributes to Origen. Epiphanius also, in the book Anchoratus, confirms the same, saying that [Origen] thought thus for this reason: because he reckoned it a thoroughly ridiculous thing that God should, from dead animals stripped of their hide, prepare skins and sew together tunics of skin, as if he were a tanner or a stitcher of hides.[8] I suspect that this passage was corrupted by the rivals of Origen; for he, in this matter, opens his mind catholicly in the 6th homily on Leviticus, where he writes thus: "God made tunics of skin, and clothed Adam and his wife. Those tunics, therefore, were of skins taken from animals: for with such [tunics] it behooved the sinner to be clothed — with skin tunics, I say, which were a token of the mortality which he had received for sin, and of his frailty, which came from the corruption of the flesh." By which words he manifestly confesses that the tunics were truly of skin, prepared by God's command. See the following Annotation.

◊ 8. Right margin: Why God clothed sinful man with tunics of skin.

Annotation LIV [contents]

"And God made for Adam tunics of skin." — Genesis 3:21

Whether the tunics of skin were true skins.

Francesco Giorgio, in the first Tome of the Problems, contends that this passage must be understood according to bare and naked allegory alone. For thus we read in him, problem 59: "God was not a butcher, that he should kill sheep or lambs: because, since he made the animals two by two, if he killed two or four to make the tunics, then he afterward created others — which is false, since God rested on the seventh day.[9] But these things are said by allegory, that these tunics may be understood [to have been] made from the skin of that Lamb of whom it is written, 'The Lamb was slain from the origin of the world'[10] — so that by his merits all sins may be covered," etc. With this same figment of Francesco, the Origenists — the first authors of this opinion — made use, more than a thousand two hundred years ago. Wishing to meet [refute] whom, Theodore, Bishop of Heraclea, and Gennadius, Bishop of Constantinople, said that "tunics of skin" in this place signify the barks of trees.[11] For just as [the hides] of animals →

◊ 9. Right margin: Genesis 2:2.

◊ 10. Right margin: Apocalypse [Revelation] 13:8.

◊ 11. Right margin: Some reckoned that the tunics of skin signify the barks of trees.

[…continues on folio 545 (PDF p. 362): the tree-bark gloss and Sixtus's reply (Annotatio LIV).]

---

(printed folio 545 [PDF p. 362]. Annot. LIV–LVIII (Gen 3:21–24): the "tree-bark" gloss for the tunics disapproved (Theodoret); how they could be made without slaughter; Theodoret's "Scripture sometimes says something false" softened; the LXX settling Adam before Paradise; and the Cherubim as mere terrifying specters (against all the Fathers).)

(folio 545, left column → right column)

Annotation LIV (continued)

[For just as the hides] of animals are called "skins," so also the barks of trees are called "skins." Therefore, from the barks of trees, fit for the composition of garments, the first parents — divine piety prompting — made tunics for themselves, just as before they had made themselves girdles from fig-leaves, to cover the shame of their genitals. But Theodoret, in question 39 on Genesis, disapproving this solution, speaks in this manner: "Of those who pursue allegories, some say the skins are the mortal flesh; but certain others discuss that they were procured from the barks of trees. But I approve neither of these: for the one is too curious, the other indeed very fabulous. For since divine Scripture has said that the body was formed before the soul, how is it not fabulous to say that God gave them mortal flesh after the transgression of the commandment? But to inquire curiously whence God had the skins, and on that account to devise a new kind of clothing from the barks of trees, seems to me superfluous, since the Creator of all did not lack whence to prepare those tunics."[1] Procopius of Gaza, in the commentaries on Genesis, dissolving the adduced reasoning, says that those tunics could have been made in two ways without the killing of animals[2] — that is, either from the conversion of pre-existing matter into skins (for just as [God] converted the waters of the Nile into blood, so he could change the matter of the elements into skins), or from creation out of nothing. For since man, created at the beginning of the sixth day, sinned at the sixth hour of the same day,[3] and was ejected from paradise, nothing prevents [us from holding] that God, on that same sixth day, created skins out of nothing — since the seventh day had not yet come, on which he rested from all the work of creation which he had accomplished. Read the preceding Annotation.

◊ 1. Left margin: The Creator did not lack a way of preparing the tunics of skin.

◊ 2. Left margin: The tunics of skin could be made in two ways without the slaughter of animals.

◊ 3. Left margin: Man was created at the beginning of the sixth day, and sinned at the sixth hour of the same day.

Annotation LV [contents]

"And God made for Adam tunics of skin." — Genesis 3:21

Whether the letter of divine Scripture sometimes says something false.

Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus, in question 39 on Genesis, digressing upon this little clause, after many things which he said in passing, at last brought in a certain somewhat harsh opinion, in these plain words: "One must not adhere to the bare letter of holy Scripture as [if it were] true, but must seek the treasure hidden in the letter — for the reason that the very letter of divine Scripture sometimes says something false." These words, indeed, are not so to be understood that we should think the letter of divine Scripture — which is truth itself — pronounces anything false; but that, to us who consider only the bare sound of the letter and do not look into the meaning hidden in it, it seems to say something false.[4]

◊ 4. Left margin: Scripture, to those who consider only the bare letter, seems to say something false.

Annotation LVI [contents]

"And he cast out Adam, and placed before Paradise a Cherub." — Genesis 3:24

Whether Adam, cast out of paradise, was placed before the door of paradise.

The Seventy Interpreters, interpreting this saying, perverted the sense of the Hebrew truth, attributing that which is said of the Cherub to Adam himself — whom they write to have been placed before Paradise by God, in these words: καὲ ὶκάτῳκισεν αὐτὸν ἀπέναντι παραδείσου τῆς τρυφῆς [and he settled him over against the Paradise of delight], "And he settled him" — namely Adam — "before, or over against, the Paradise of delights." Which indeed is not in the Hebrew.

Annotation LVII [contents]

"He placed before Paradise a Cherub." — Genesis 3:24

Whether the Cherubim are angels, or specters.

Theodore, Bishop of Heraclea, weighing this clause, thinks that the Cherubim, the guardians of Paradise, were not spirits endowed with reason, but certain specters, feigned for the sake of terrifying. See the following Annotation.

Annotation LVIII [contents]

"He placed before Paradise a Cherub." — Genesis 3:24

Theodoret denies that the Cherubim are spiritual and blessed minds.

Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus, in the book of Questions on Genesis, question 40, inquiring what Τὰ Χερουβίμ [ta Cheroubim] — that is, the Cherubim — placed to guard the tree of life, are, answers two things. The first: that it must not be believed that the Cherubim, the guardians of Paradise, are spiritual and invisible powers, as some think, but [rather] certain powerful and terrible visions, and forms of animals, which would keep Adam from the entrance of Paradise. The second is: that the Cherubim, of which frequent mention is made in the divine Scriptures, are neither animals, nor any substance of invisible nature; but divine Scripture calls "Cherubim" everything that is endowed with great power. Thus David says in the Psalm, "Thou who sittest upon the Cherubim"[5] — that is, who reignest powerfully; and in another Psalm, "He ascended upon the Cherubim, and flew,"[6] etc. — that is, he came with much and great power and virtue. These things Theodoret [says]; before whom Theodore, Bishop of Heraclea, and after whom Procopius of Gaza, explaining this same passage of Genesis, wrote the same opinion, and in almost the same words. At last, in our own times, there came forth out of Greece a certain new heresiarch, James Chyus, who, among many heresies of the ancient heretics recalled by himself, brought this error back into the light.[7] He, when in an exposition of the Creed published by him he was making a discourse about the angels, wrote among other things these things about the Cherubim: "Cherubim, in the sacred letters, does not signify any spiritual substance, or some incorporeal animal, but a statue formed to the likeness of a boy: such as were those boyish golden statues placed upon the ark, and that statue with the fiery sword placed for the guarding of Paradise, which Moses called 'Cherubim.' For this was not an angelic spirit, but a certain manly image, of horrible form and covered about with a mask, which God had placed before the doors of Paradise to strike terror into the first parents — after the manner of farmers, who fix in their crops and gardens wooden stakes clothed with the torn rags of human garments, so that by that kind of scarecrow they may frighten off the birds from feeding on the seeds and crops. Whence, lest anyone should think the Cherubim to be living and spiritual substances, it was provided by the synodal laws of the Greeks that it should not be sung, in the Trisagion of the angels, 'Thou who sittest upon the Cherubim.'"[8] Thus far James.

◊ 5. Right margin: Psalm 80:1 [Vulgate 79:2].

◊ 6. Right margin: Psalm 18:10 [Vulgate 17:11].

◊ 7. Right margin: James Chyus renewed an ancient heresy.

◊ 8. Right margin: Psalm 80:1 [Vulgate 79:2].

Against this error is the authority of all the Fathers,[9] and especially of the Greeks, but chiefly of Dionysius the Areopagite: who, in chapter 7 of the Celestial Hierarchy, enumerates the Cherubim immediately after the Seraphim, in the second rank of the first and supreme hierarchy of the celestial spirits; and ascribes to these, according to the interpretation of the Hebrew name, [an] excel- →

◊ 9. Right margin: It is the common opinion of the Fathers that the Cherubim are spiritual minds.

[…continues on folio 546 (PDF p. 363): Dionysius on the Cherubim's excellence of knowledge — the rest of Annotatio LVIII.]

---

(printed folio 546 [PDF p. 363]. Annot. LVIII–LIX (Gen 3:24): the Cherubim vindicated as true celestial spirits (Dionysius, Athanasius, Nicaea II), with a digression on the Trisagion — its text, legendary origin, and heretical tamperings; then Catharinus holding Moses translated alive into Paradise.)

(folio 546, left column → right column)

Annotation LVIII (continued)

[ascribes to these, according to the interpretation of the Hebrew name, an] most excellent fullness of surpassing knowledge, drawn from the fount of divine wisdom. Consenting to whom, Athanasius, in the sermon upon that [text], "All things are delivered to me by my Father,"[1] says that the Cherubim are most ample living beings, than which nothing is nearer to God, who extol the majesty of God with lips never ceasing. Chrysostom, in the third sermon On the Incomprehensible Nature of God, says the Cherubim are powers superior to the seraphic spirits, and nearer to God — whose appellation signifies a full and heaped-up nature. And the same [Chrysostom], in his Liturgy, addresses God in these words: "To thee indeed stand by thousands of Archangels, and many thousands of Angels, Cherubim and Seraphim with six wings, with many eyes, sublime, feathered, singing the hymn of victory, crying aloud, clamoring and saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth."[2] But even Theodoret himself, perhaps repenting of his error, in the book of the Divine Decrees placed the Cherubim among the angels by the testimony of divine Scripture, thus writing in chapter 7: "The ministry of the Angels is the praise of God and the chanting of hymns. For of the Seraphim blessed Isaiah said that they cry out, saying, 'Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth'; but of the Cherubim divine Ezekiel said that he heard from them, 'Blessed be the glory of the Lord from his place.'"[3] Finally, in the Second Council of Nicaea, in the fourth session, the opinion of Athanasius is approved, expounding that saying from the Psalm, "Thou who sittest upon the Cherubim,"[4] in these words: "The Cherubim, unknown by nature to all men, are spirit and fire, alien from all figuration of bodies and [bodily] nature; and the things which are said of them by the prophet as of corporeal beings have a symbolic sense."

◊ 1. Left margin: Luke 10:22.

◊ 2. Left margin: Isaiah 6:3.

◊ 3. Left margin: Ezekiel 3:12.

◊ 4. Left margin: Psalm 80:1 [Vulgate 79:2].

But that the Cherubim, whom Moses reports in this place, are celestial powers, not only Ambrose, Augustine, and all the Latin doctors, but also very many of the Greek doctors testify — among whom Chrysostom, expounding this passage, openly confesses it, saying: "God commanded that those powers, the Cherubim, should guard the way." And in the sermon On the Ascension, explaining this same thing more clearly, he says: "The Angels and Archangels grieved at our punishments; and when we were punished, they too were held by excessive sadness. And the Cherubim, although they guarded Paradise, yet were saddened at our punishments; and just as a good fellow-servant, when he has undertaken from his lord a fellow-servant to be guarded, satisfies indeed the lord's command, yet is worn down with excessive grief at the fellow-servant's penalty: so also the Cherubim deserved indeed to guard paradise, but grieved at the honor of the guardianship." Gennadius, expounding these same words of Moses, says, "Τὰ δὲ Χερουβίμ" — that is, [they] are invisible powers — "these he said received the guardianship of Paradise"; that is, the Cherubim are invisible powers, and he said that these same [powers] undertook the guardianship of Paradise.

But as to that which [James Chyus] adds about synods forbidding that there be sung in the Trisagion, "Thou who sittest upon the Cherubim," I confess that I have nowhere read [it] in the volumes of the councils which now exist.[5] If, beyond their number, there be some other synod of received authority in which this is found prohibited, we shall say that it was not simply prohibited by that synod that "Thou who sittest upon the Cherubim" should be uttered, but that there should not be sung "Thou who sittest upon the Cherubim" with the particle added, "And [upon] the Seraphim" — just as of old certain unskilled persons used to sing in the public prayers, whom Jerome, in the commentaries on the sixth chapter of Isaiah, condemns in these words: "The Lord is plainly shown to sit upon the Cherubim after the manner of a charioteer; but [that he sits] upon the Seraphim, I know not that I have read in the Canonical Scriptures. Therefore they err who are wont to say in [their] prayers, 'Thou who sittest upon the Cherubim and Seraphim,' which Scripture has not taught." Or it must be said that that synod sanctioned this not for the reason that the Cherubim should be believed to be inanimate things, lacking reason and life, but that every occasion of corrupting that angelic Trisagion might be taken away from the heretics: for also, in the fifth Council of Constantinople, for the same cause it was decreed that there should not be sung in the same Trisagion, "Thou who wast crucified for us," which Peter, Bishop of Antioch, had deceitfully added for the confirmation of his heresy.

◊ 5. Left margin: Whether one ought to say, "Thou who sittest upon the Cherubim and Seraphim."

But the Trisagion — that you may also know this, kind reader — is a Greek Canticle so named because it contains "Hagion" [Holy] three times, to designate the three persons of the divine nature;[6] which the Greeks express in these words: ἅγιος ὁ Θεός, ἅγιος ἰσχυρός, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς — that is, "Holy God, Holy Strong [One], Holy Immortal [One], have mercy on us." Pope Felix, in the Epistle to the Emperor Zeno, relates that the origin of the song was of this kind.[7] When the city of Constantinople was shaken by frequent earthquakes, and the people, praying in a field, cried out "Lord, have mercy": a little child, while the whole people, together with Proclus, Bishop of the city, looked on, was caught up into heaven for one hour; and there he learned a hymn of this kind, which, descending from heaven, he made known to the people; and the people, resounding that same thing with public voice, freed the city from danger; and the Church reckoned the hymn among the celebrated songs, and the Council of Chalcedon approved it. This hymn, therefore, when divers heretics had rashly tampered with it by adding various acclamations,[8] it was provided by the synods that suspect sentences should not be added to it. Of the number of which I suspect that saying, "Thou who sittest upon the Cherubim," was then [reckoned]. Nor is it abhorrent from this suspicion, that John of Damascus writes, in the epistle on the Trisagion, indicating that there were certain followers of the aforesaid Peter who, from the testimony of St. Epiphanius wrongly expounded, asserted that this Trisagion hymn pertains to the Son of God alone, because he alone sits upon the Cherubim, and whom alone those four-formed animals glorified, saying, "Holy, holy, holy," etc. Which dogma seemed indeed to distinguish Christ from the Trinity, and to introduce a certain quaternity.

◊ 6. Right margin: What the Trisagion is.

◊ 7. Right margin: What the origin of the Trisagion was.

◊ 8. Right margin: The heretics tried to deprave the hymn of the Trisagion.

Annotation LIX [contents]

"He placed before the Paradise of pleasure a Cherub." — Genesis 3:24

Whether Moses died.

Ambrose [Catharinus], Bishop of Compsa, in this passage relates that Moses, together with his body, was translated alive into the Paradise of pleasure, that he might live there, until the consummation of the age, with Enoch, Elijah, and John. He confirms the same opinion in the exposition of that Mosaic saying, "The Lord had planted a Paradise [in] Eden," Genesis 2.[9] This same thing had, long before, been thought →

◊ 9. Right margin: Genesis 2:8.

[…continues on folio 547 (PDF p. 364): who, before Catharinus, held Moses translated alive — the rest of Annotatio LIX.]

---

(printed folio 547 [PDF p. 364]. Annot. LIX–LXIII (Gen 3:24–4:1): Moses translated alive (Ambrose held it before Catharinus); Procopius on incorporeal Cherubim; Ambrose on Moses "translated, not buried" (against the Hebrew); Ambrose misquoted to deny priestly absolution (vindicated); and Chrysostom on no generation without sin → folio 548.)

(folio 547, left column → right column)

Annotation LIX (continued)

[This same thing had, long before, been thought] before [Catharinus] by St. Ambrose, as you will be able to see below, in the sixty-first Annotation of this book, and in the ninety-first Annotation of the following book.

Annotation LX [contents]

"He placed before the paradise of pleasure a Cherubim." — Genesis 3:24

Whether the Cherubim are incorporeal substances.

Procopius of Gaza, in the exposition of this passage, teaches that the Cherubim are not any kind of spiritual and incorporeal substance. See above, Annotation 58.

Annotation LXI [contents]

"But Adam knew his wife, and she bore Cain." — Genesis 4:1

Whether Moses has yet died.

Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, in the first book On Cain and Abel, chapter 2, treating this passage, incidentally fell upon the exposition of a period from Deuteronomy: in which, according to the Septuagint edition, it is read, "AND MOSES died διῤ ἀήματος (dia rhēmatos)" — that is, "by the word of God," etc.[1] On the occasion of which word he asserted that Moses was not yet dead, but translated to a better life, like Elijah. For what Scripture said — that Moses died — he wished to be understood not of the destruction which happens through the separation of the soul from the body, but of the translation to a happy and blessed life. For thus he wrote: "We do not read of Moses, as of the rest, that failing he died; but that he died by the word of God. For God admits neither defect nor addition; whence Scripture also added that no one knows his burial — so that you may understand [it] rather of a translation than of a destruction. For death is a certain separation of soul and body. He died, therefore, by the word of God, says Scripture — not according to the word: that you may note [it was] not a message of death, but the gift of grace expressed; [he] who was translated rather than forsaken, whose burial no one has known. For who could detect anything among his earthly remains — [him] whom the Son of God, in the Gospel, showed to be with him? Finally, Elijah too was seen at the same time by certain persons — [he] who was translated in a chariot, and is read [to have been] neither buried nor dead: for he lives who is with the Son of God. But Moses indeed is read [to have] died, yet he died by the word of God, through which all things were made; through the word of God, therefore, he is not a falling-away of the work, but a firmament [support]. Not, therefore, as one fallen back into the earth is he detected by a dissolution of the body, but as one endowed, by the operation of the heavenly word, with a gift: so that his flesh received rest rather than a tomb." These things Ambrose [says]: to whom Hilary of Poitiers assents,[2] in canon 20 on Matthew, where these things are written:[3] "The Lord, having taken Peter, and James, and John, appeared with the habit of his glory on the mountain, [Moses and Elijah] accompanying [him]; and these same two we understand [to be] the two Prophets preceding his coming, whom the Apocalypse of John says are to be slain by Antichrist[4] — although the opinions of very many have arisen variously, whether concerning Enoch or concerning Jeremiah, [as to] whether one of them, like Elijah, must die: but we cannot corrupt the assurance of the truth — which the Lord revealed by the three witnesses above — by the opinion of our own perception, nor think that others are to come than those who were seen to have come for the pledge of the faith. And although it is not necessary to hold an opinion beyond the evangelical truth, yet, if anyone diligently considers the condition both of the death and of the sepulchre of Moses, he will understand that all things were so handled that Moses could [now] seem to be already dead." This opinion have followed, in our times, Ambrose [Catharinus], Bishop of Compsa, in the commentaries on Genesis, and John Arboreus [Jean Arboreau], in the eleventh book of the Theosophia — though the truth of the Hebrew Scripture, and almost all the ecclesiastical writers, cry out against [it]. See Annotation 59 of this book, and Annotation 91 of Book 6.

◊ 1. Left margin: Deuteronomy 34:5. — and: St. Ambrose denies that Moses died by death.

◊ 2. Left margin: Hilary thinks that Moses lives.

◊ 3. Left margin: Matthew 17:1.

◊ 4. Left margin: Revelation 11:3.

Annotation LXII [contents]

"But Adam knew his wife, and she bore Cain." — Genesis 4:1

Whether priests bind and loose.

The testimony of Ambrose from the work On Cain and Abel — published for the exposition of the present passage — the Master of the Sentences [Peter Lombard] brings forward, in the fourth book, distinction 39, where, being about to demonstrate that priests neither bind nor loose sinners, but only show and pronounce [them] bound or loosed by God alone, he cites, for the confirmation of this error of his,[5] the authority of Ambrose from chapter 4 of the second book of the said work, running thus: "The Word of God remits sins; the priest is a judge: the priest indeed exhibits his office, but exercises the rights of no power." Gratian, in the first distinction On Penance, alleges the same passage in plainly the same words. It is probable that either the one [drew] from the other, or both, from some other Rhapsode [compiler] — as is the custom of the Sentence-writers — excerpted this passage without the Ambrosian codex having been inspected: in which these words are read in a sense wholly diverse, nay even contrary, in this manner:[6] "Sins are remitted through the Word of God, of which the Levite is the interpreter and, as it were, the executor; they are remitted also through the office of the Priest and the sacred ministry." Which words Ambrose brought forth for this very purpose: to show that not only God, but priests also, remit sins.[7] Just as he explained the same thing yet more openly in the first book On Penance, chapter 2, saying: "He who receives the Holy Spirit receives also the power of loosing sin, and of binding; for thus it is written: 'Receive the Holy Spirit; whose sins you shall remit, they are remitted to them; and whose you shall retain, they shall be retained.' Therefore he who cannot loose sin does not have the Holy Spirit. The office of the priest is the gift of the Holy Spirit; and the right of the Holy Spirit [is exercised] in the loosing and binding of sins." These things I judged must be noted, that I might vindicate Ambrose from this suspicion, and at the same time admonish those who delight overmuch in Rhapsodists, Compendiums, and Summists — lest they be loath sometimes to return from the streams to the fountains, and to seek out the very sentences of the Fathers in their own authors, and to weigh them diligently. For it usually happens that abbreviators and collectors — whether from carelessness, or from forgetfulness, or from too great a zeal for brevity — gather the sentences of others either mutilated or interrupted, often with the words transposed, often even so far altered that from them a new and plainly different sense arises. But these things have been said, not that I should condemn the labors of these [men], which I have so often commended in the preceding books, but that I may render studious readers much more diligent and skillful. See what pertains to this argument below, in Annotation 71, and in Annotation 202 of the sixth book.

◊ 5. Right margin: An error of Peter Lombard.

◊ 6. Right margin: John 20:[22–23].

◊ 7. Right margin: Priests remit sins.

Annotation LXIII [contents]

"But Adam knew his wife." — Genesis 4:1

If the first parents had not sinned, whether there would have been generation.

Chrysostom, in homily 18 on Genesis, when he wished to unravel this passage, asserted that, if the first parents had not sinned, there would have been no →

[…continues on folio 548 (PDF p. 365): the rest of Annotatio LXIII — whether there would have been generation and marriage in the state of innocence.]

---

(printed folio 548 [PDF p. 365]. Annot. LXIII–LXVI (Gen 4:1–8): no coitus in paradise without the Fall (Chrysostom, Procopius); Ambrose seeming to make souls "uncertain of salvation" (defended); the LXX's mistranslation of Gen 4:7; and the LXX/Vulgate's added "let us go into the field," with the Targum's impious speech of Cain → folio 549.)

(folio 548, left column → right column)

Annotation LXIII (continued)

[there would have been no] coitus in paradise: because before sin they were not subject to these bodily necessities; for the law of the venereal matter [sexual desire] entered only after sin. For then [after sin] God granted that the human race should be increased through coitus.

Procopius, following the same opinion, in the exposition of the same passage says more openly that, had there been no human transgression, there would have been neither matrimony, nor nuptials, nor coitus, nor propagation of offspring. You have the antidote to this opinion above, in Annotations 20 and 21.

Annotation LXIV [contents]

"She conceived, and bore Cain." — Genesis 4:1

Whether the souls of the saints, before the day of judgment, enjoy the divine vision.

Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, book 2 On Cain and Abel, narrating this, hints that the souls of the deceased are, until the day of judgment, uncertain of their salvation; for he says: "The soul is loosed from the body, even after the end of this life; yet it is still held in suspense, uncertain of the future judgment." More openly he has this in the book On the Good of Death, chapter 10, where he relates that the souls of the saints are contained under the earth in hidden receptacles, and there, until the day of judgment, await the glory of God — speaking thus: "Scripture calls the habitations of souls the storehouses of Esdras";[1] and, meeting the human complaint — that the just who have gone before seem, up to the day of judgment (that is, for a very great space of time), to be defrauded of the reward owed to them — he says, wonderfully, that the day of judgment is like a crown: for the crown[-day] is awaited by all, that within that day both the vanquished may blush and the victors obtain the palm of victory. Therefore, while the fullness of time is awaited, the souls await their due reward: for some, punishment remains; for others, glory. And in the same chapter he calls "the underworld" the place which is not seen, which all souls stripped of their bodies seek. Which words, indeed, one ought to refer to the consummated felicity — and misery — of soul and body [together]; for I would not believe that Ambrose held that opinion which these words at first sight present,[2] since he himself, in many places, asserts that the souls of the saints enjoy the divine sight even before the resurrection — as in epistle 59, to the Thessalonians, on the death of Acholius, where he says: "Acholius, then, is an inhabitant of those on high, a possessor of that eternal city of Jerusalem which is in heaven: he sees there the immense measure of its city, pure gold, precious stone, perpetual light without a Sun; and all these things, indeed, [were] known to him long since, but now [he sees them] face to face." And in the commentaries on the epistle to the Philippians,[3] upon that saying "I desire to be dissolved," he says of Paul: "He has the desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ — esteeming it much better, that he might now be present with God [and] enjoy the longed-for promises." And in the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, chapter 13, he says: "The saints, going forth from this world, will find [it] more necessary [i.e. will find far more] than they now suppose — as John the Apostle said of the Savior, 'Then they shall see him as he is.'"[4] Seek the argument of this Annotation treated more fully below, in Annotation 163 of this book, and in Annotations 264 and 345 of the following book.

◊ 1. Left margin: 4 Esdras 4.

◊ 2. Left margin: St. Ambrose asserts that the souls of the saints enjoy eternal beatitude before the day of judgment.

◊ 3. Left margin: Philippians 1.

◊ 4. Left margin: 1 John 3:[2] ("then they shall see him as he is").

Annotation LXV [contents]

"Is it not so that, if you do well, you shall receive?" — Genesis 4:7

A passage from the fourth chapter of Genesis, badly translated by the Seventy.

The Septuagint interpreters, in the interpretation of that sentence of God which Jerome translated — "Is it not so that, if you do well, you shall receive? but if [you do] ill, shall not your sin at once be present at the doors? but its appetite [shall be] under you, and you shall have dominion over it" — threw everything into confusion, and strayed vehemently from the truth of the Hebrew context, rendering thus: οὐκ ἀὲν ὀρθῶς προσενέγκῃς, ὀρθῶς δὲ μὴ διέλῃς, ἥμαρτες· ἡσύχασον· πρὸς σὰ ἡ ἐποστροφὴ αὐτοῦ — that is, "Hast thou not sinned, if thou hast rightly offered, but not rightly divided? Be still: to thee [is] its returning."[5] Of which words there is nothing in the Hebrew, as Jerome testifies in the Hebrew Questions. Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, indicating the cause of this error, brought forward the annotation written below: "Who would be of so keen a genius as to be able to dig out any sense from these words? What, I beseech, is 'to thee [is] its returning'? — of which [sin] it [the passage] had made no mention. For where in the Hebrew it is 'At the doors your sin lies down,' they rendered ἡσύχασον, that is, 'Be still.'" We see, therefore, how necessary Jerome's edition was. From this passage, certainly, it is also detected that the Septuagint did not so exquisitely understand Hebrew grammar; the cause, therefore, that they translated this passage so variously and so obscurely proceeded from [ignorance of] grammar.

◊ 5. Right margin: The Septuagint badly translated [it]. [This right-margin phrase is the completion of the dispute-title at [^6], which the column break splits: the left margin carries "Periodus ex 4. Gen. cap. à," finished here by "LXX malè translata."]

For what Jerome translated — "Is it not so, if you do well" (the comma being placed here) — "Is it not so, if you make a good offering" (namely שְׂאֵת, se'et) — they rendered ὀρθῶς προσενέγκῃς [if you rightly offer]. The second part — "but if you do not rightly divide" (וְאִם־לֹא תֵיטִיב לַפֶּתַח, ve-im lo theitiv la-pettach) — these Hebrew words they understood in this manner: "And if you do not do well unto dividing." For this word pettach [פֶּתַח], since it is a verbal noun signifying a "door," they thought to be the infinitive פתה, phata, that is, "to open" — so that they translated, "And if you do not do well unto opening"; and it is a very great hallucination [blunder]. And that they render "you have sinned," and not "sin," happened on the same occasion: for חָטָאת, chatath, they thought to be the second person from חטא, chata, that is, "he sinned" — but chatath means "sin" [the noun], whereas chatatha is the second person, "you have sinned." And they easily fell into this error, since in their time the Hebrew codices did not have the little marks — that is, the vowels. And that they render "Be still," that is רֹבֵץ, robetz — which is a participle — they reckoned to be the imperative; whereas the imperative is formed thus, רִבּוּץ, rebutz, but the participle [is] robetz. But why did they not consider that there would be no sense to their words, if they were translated in that manner?

Annotation LXVI [contents]

"Cain said to Abel his brother, Let us go forth abroad." — Genesis 4:8

The clause "let us go out into the field," superfluously added by the Septuagint.

The Septuagint interpreters, to that which is here read, "And Cain said to Abel his brother," superfluously added of their own, Διέλθωμεν εἰς τὸ πεδίον — that is, "Let us go forth into the field"; and the interpreter of our Vulgate edition, following them, said, "Let us go forth abroad" — neither of which is in the Hebrew reading: in which only this is read, "Cain said to Abel his brother"; nor is it added what he said, but it must be supplied (says Jerome) [with] those things which God himself had spoken to him. Origen asserts that these words, added here by the Septuagint, are had in the secret [apocryphal] scriptures of the Hebrews. Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, says that the words which Cain spoke to Abel are found in the Chaldaic [Aramaic] edition: in which he asserts these are read: "Cain said to Abel his brother, 'There is no justice, nor a judge, nor another world [age]; neither shall the just receive rewards, nor shall the wicked pay penalties'"; and then he slew him. But in →

[…continues on folio 549 (PDF p. 366): the rest of Annotatio LXVI — the Chaldaic version and the fratricide.]

---

(printed folio 549 [PDF p. 366], two columns above, comparative tables below. Annot. LXVI–LXIX (Gen 4:8–5:29): the uncertain "Chaldaic edition" of Cain's speech; the LXX's "groaning and trembling" for Cain; the LXX's corrupt antediluvian chronology (tabulated against the Hebrew, with the Greek Fathers' divergent computations); and the naming of Noah.)

(folio 549, left column → right column, then the full-width tables)

Annotation LXVI (continued)

But it is uncertain of which edition Augustine speaks; for that Chaldaic translation which is now circulated, in the Complutensian copies, has none of these things.

Annotation LXVII [contents]

"A vagabond and a fugitive shalt thou be." — Genesis 4:12

The clause "vagabond and fugitive," badly rendered by the Septuagint.

The Septuagint interpreters, for that which is had in Hebrew נָע וָנָד, na va-nad, that is, "A vagabond and a fugitive shalt thou be" — translated with little consonance [inaccurately], Στένων καὶ τρέμων, that is, "Groaning and trembling." Hence arose among the Greek expositors an opinion — namely, that Cain, after his brother was slain, never ceased from tears and groans, but was perpetually tormented with a trembling of the body, the frame of his limbs being dissolved, on account of the fratricide committed.

Annotation LXVIII [contents]

"And Seth lived, after he begot Enos." — Genesis 5:7

The years of the illustrious men wrongly reckoned by the Septuagint.

The Septuagint interpreters, since they are found corrupt in many places, are especially faulty in this fifth chapter, and most of all depraved concerning the reckoning of the years which the illustrious men lived from Adam up to the Flood: in which they entirely depart from the most true reckoning of the Hebrew context, as appears in the table set below. In it, in the first place, is set the reckoning of the years according to the Hebrew truth; in the second, the reckoning of the years of the Seventy interpreters; in the third, the difference of the years — according to the excess and defect of each reckoning.

(In the difference column, "Desunt / Def." = the Septuagint falls short by that many years; "Superant / Super." = the Septuagint exceeds by that many.)

Hebrew reckoning	Hebr.	LXX	Difference
Seth, after begetting Enos, lived	807	707	Desunt 100
Enos, before begetting Cainan, lived	90	190	Superant 100
Enos, after begetting Cainan	815	715	Desunt 100
Cainan, before begetting Mahalalel	70	170	Super. 100
Cainan, after begetting Mahalalel	840	740	Def. 100
Mahalalel, before begetting Jared	65	165	Super. 100
Mahalalel, after begetting Jared	830	730	Def. 100
Jared, before begetting Enoch	62	162	Super. 100
Enoch, before begetting Methuselah	65	165	Def. 100 [sic]
Enoch, after begetting Methuselah	300	200	Super. 100 [sic]
Methuselah, before begetting Lamech	187	167	Def. 20
Methuselah, after begetting Lamech	782	802	Super. 20
Lamech, before begetting Noah	182	188	Super. 6
Lamech, after begetting Noah	570	565	Def. 5
The whole life of Lamech	777	753	Def. 24

(In the two Enoch rows the original swaps the labels: the Septuagint in fact exceeds by 100 before Methuselah's birth (65 → 165) and falls short by 100 after it (300 → 200); the printed "Def." and "Super." are transposed.)

Two errors emerged from this depraved enumeration of the Seventy interpreters.[1] The former of these — as Jerome noted in the Hebrew Questions — is this: that from this reckoning it is manifestly proved that Methuselah lived fourteen years after the Flood,[2] whereas Moses writes that only eight souls (among whom he was not) were saved in the ark. Which matter gave birth to that question, famous among the ancients — "On the years of Methuselah" — and ventilated by the disputation of all the churches. The second error is the diversity — not to say the falsity — of the chronography of the Greek Fathers, namely of Julius Africanus, Origen, and Eusebius: who, in reckoning the years from the beginning of the world up to the birth of Abraham, count 3314 years; but, on the contrary, Philo and the rest of the Jews, according to the Hebrew truth of divine Scripture, compute from the founding of the world to the birth of Abraham 1955 years — so that the reckoning of the Greeks exceeds the Hebrew reckoning by one thousand two hundred and thirty-six years.[3] Augustine, in book 15 of The City of God, chapter 13, judges that this depravation happened in the codices of the Septuagint by the fault of those who first copied them out from the Library of Ptolemy. But, that you may more clearly know how varied and manifold a diversity of reckonings the Greek corruption of the numbers has given birth to for us, it has pleased [me] here to add, from diverse chronographers, the calculation of the years from the founding of the world up to the happy nativity of Christ, arranged according to the series of the numbers [in ascending order].[4]

◊ 1. Left margin: From the reckoning of the Septuagint interpreters two errors emerged.

◊ 2. Left margin: Methuselah did not live after the Flood.

◊ 3. Left margin: The Greek reckoning exceeds the Hebrew by 1236 years. — [The two totals given in the text, 3314 and 1955, differ by 1359, not 1236; the discrepancy is in the original.]

◊ 4. Left margin: From the founding of the world to the nativity of Christ the Lord, how many years have flowed — there is the greatest disagreement about the sum.

Years	Authority (creation → the Nativity of Christ)
3707	Rabbi Naasson, in the Paschal Cycle
3754	Rabbi Abraham, in the Cabala
1760	the common Chronicle of the Hebrews [sic — read 3760, the Jewish era]
3952	Jerome and Bede
3958	Giovanni Pico della Mirandola
3960	Ioannes Lucidus
3962	the Abbot of Ursperg (whom Sixtus follows as the more exact, in book 1, in enumerating the times of the authors of divine Scripture)
3974	Theophilus, To Autolycus
3989	Charles de Bovelles (Carolus Bovillus)
4103	Josephus, son of Matthias [Flavius Josephus]
4320	Odiaton the Astronomer
4697	Cassiodorus
4830	Origen, on Matthew
5029	Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis
5049	Paulus Orosius
5195	Philo the Jew
5196	Isidore of Seville
5199	Eusebius of Caesarea
5201	Johannes Nauclerus
5328	Albumasar the Astronomer
5353	Augustine
5500	Jordanes (Iornandes)
5600	Suidas
5800	Lactantius
5801	Philastrius, Bishop of Brescia
6984	Alfonso, King of Spain

Annotation LXIX

"He called his name Noah, saying: This one shall comfort us from the works and labors of our hands, in the land which the Lord hath cursed." — Genesis 5:29

[…the body of Annotatio LXIX begins on folio 550 (PDF p. 367).]

(printed folio 550 [PDF p. 367]. Annot. LXIX–LXXIII (Gen 5:29–6:2): Giorgio on the curse lifted in Noah's day (refuted; Diodore: Noah invented the plough); the LXX "angels of God" for "sons of God," breeding the fallen-angel controversy; Philo's aerial souls and animate stars; Chrysostom denying angels are called "sons of God"; and whether wicked angels can couple with women → folio 551.)

(folio 550, left column → right column)

Annotation LXIX (continued) [contents]

Francesco Giorgio, in the first volume, Problem 58, gathers from these words that the curse which God inflicted on the earth for Adam's sin lasted until the birth of Noah, and, he living, was entirely removed.[1] This he makes persuasive from the fact that God — who never before the times of Noah willed to accept the oblation of the fruits of the earth, as may be known from Cain's gifts — at length, from Noah himself and thereafter from his posterity, received most gratefully the oblations of the fruits of the earth. But it appears that an exposition of this kind is forced and violent: both because that old curse of the earth still remains[2] — which, unless it be cultivated by many and assiduous labors of men, denies sustenance to the human race — and because nowhere in the sacred letters is it read that Noah offered to God the fruits of the earth, but only cattle and birds.[3] The true and genuine sense, therefore, of the proposed clause is that which Diodore, Bishop of Tarsus, brought forward — namely, that Noah, first of all, joined the beasts to the plough, and cut the earth with the ploughshare:[4] by which salutary invention he wonderfully consoled the human race from the works and labors of [their] hands, because the hands of men it freed from the hard and heavy labors of digging the earth.

◊ 1. Left margin: Whether the curse of the earth was removed under Noah, as Francesco Giorgio thought.

◊ 2. Left margin: The curse of the earth has not yet been removed.

◊ 3. Left margin: It is not written that Noah offered to God the fruits of the earth.

◊ 4. Left margin: Noah, first of all, cut the earth with the ploughshare.

Annotation LXX [contents]

"The sons of God, seeing the daughters of men." — Genesis 6:2

That "Angels of God" was wrongly put by the Septuagint for "sons of God," and hence grave questions have arisen.

The Septuagint interpreters, in the older edition — which Philo the Jew and Eusebius of Caesarea followed — for that which is read in Hebrew, בְּנֵי הָאֱלֹהִים Bene ha-elohim, that is, "Sons of God," translated οἱ ἀγγελοι τοῦ Θεοῦ, that is, "Angels of God"; which translation, as Jerome testifies, Aquila imitated, rendering "Sons of gods," understanding by "gods" the Angels. This [rendering] both very many of the Greeks (as Procopius reports) and many of the Latins — among whom Ambrose and Augustine — received and expounded. But this appellation of "Angels," wrongly set down, gave birth to the greatest questions, and drew the minds of men into various opinions, and even errors. For some thought that by the name of "Angels" are signified the holy Angels, who then first sinned with women, and on that account fell from heaven — as Lactantius. Some [understood] apostate Angels, or demons cast down from heaven immediately from the founding of the world, who, coupling with women, begot giants — as Eusebius. But of this we shall speak more fully below, in Annotations 73 and 77 of this book.

Annotation LXXI [contents]

"The sons of God, seeing the daughters of men." — Genesis 6:2

Whether the angels are aerial souls, as Philo thought; or whether the stars are animate, as the same [Philo] reckoned.

Philo, in the book On Giants, explaining this, says that the sons of God — whom here Moses [calls] Angels, but the Philosophers call Genii [spirits] — are aerial souls which have descended into bodies. Concerning which opinion, see below. Philo in the same place asserts that the stars are animate, in these words: "Heaven has the stars; for these are wholly immortal and divine souls, and therefore are moved in a circle: because this motion is akin to mind; for the mind of each of these is most perfect." The same thing he holds in the book On the Making of the Six Days [On the Creation], and in the book On Dreams. On which matter, consult Annotation 108 of this book.

Annotation LXXII [contents]

"The sons of God, seeing the daughters of men." — Genesis 6:2

Whether the angels are called "sons of God" in the sacred letters.

Chrysostom, in the twenty-second homily on Genesis, refuting those who said that by the "sons of God" whom Moses here mentions, not men but Angels must be understood, says that Angels were never in divine Scripture called "sons of God" — nay, not even "sons." Yet the contrary is found, once and again, in the book of Job: in whose second chapter it is read concerning the angels, "When on a certain day the sons of God had come, and stood before the Lord, Satan also was present among them";[5] and in the same volume, chapter 38, concerning the Angels it is added, "When the morning stars praised me, and all the sons of God jubilated."[6] It appears that Chrysostom was in this deceived by the Septuagint edition: in which, for that which we have according to the Hebrew truth — "When the sons of God had come" — it is written ἦλθον οἀ ἰγγελοι τοῦ Θεοῦ, that is, "The angels of God came"; and where Jerome, from the Hebrew source, translated "And all the sons of God jubilated," the Septuagint rendered ὅτε ᾔνεσάν με φωνῇ μεγάλῃ πάντες ἄγγελοί μου, that is, "When all my angels praised me with a loud voice." Nor does that favor Chrysostom which Paul writes to the Hebrews, "To which of the angels did he ever say, Thou art my Son?"[7] — since there he does not deny that the angels are called sons of God by grace, but only [denies it] by nature.[8] For in this manner Christ alone is called, and is, [the] Son.

◊ 5. Right margin: Job 2:1.

◊ 6. Right margin: Job 38:7.

◊ 7. Right margin: Hebrews 1:5.

◊ 8. Right margin: The Apostle, Hebrews 1, denies that the Angels are sons of God by nature — for this is proper to Christ the Lord.

Annotation LXXIII [contents]

"The sons of God, seeing the daughters of men, took to themselves wives." — Genesis 6:2

Whether the angels can have intercourse with women.

Chrysostom, in the twenty-second homily on Genesis, elucidating this passage, seems to teach that it is not only absurd, but even impossible, that wicked angels should exercise coitus with women — writing thus: "It is full of madness to say that angels cast down from heaven had commerce with women, and that that incorporeal nature is coupled to bodies; for it is not possible that that incorporeal nature should ever have concupiscence." And a little after: "He would be very insane who should approve such words, full of madness — that an incorporeal and spiritual nature should bear the embrace of a body." Cornelius Agrippa, a follower of the Lutheran heresy,[9] in that book which he published entitled Against the Inquisitors of Witches, twists this opinion of John [Chrysostom] against those who persecute and punish malefic women for this reason — that it has been discovered that they have venereal commerce with demons. Which matter he himself mocks as fabulous, and as sprung from the dreams and imaginations of raving old women: who, since they are often deceived while sleeping through dreams, and sometimes also, while awake, are deluded by the imagination of vehement lust, nevertheless think that those things truly happened to them which were performed by imagination alone. This error the same author strives to establish, by adding some testimonies of ancient authors who seem to agree with Chrysostom. Among these the chief is John Cassian, a disciple of Chrysostom,[10] in whose twelfth book of the Conferences, chapter 8, this is had: "In no way is it to be believed that spiritual natures →

◊ 9. Right margin: Cornelius Agrippa, a Lutheran.

◊ 10. Right margin: Cassian was a disciple of Chrysostom.

[…continues on folio 551 (PDF p. 368): the rest of Cassian's testimony and Sixtus's reply (Annotatio LXXIII).]

---

(printed folio 551 [PDF p. 368], the whole page on Annot. LXXIII (Gen 6:2, whether angels/demons couple with women). Cassian, Philastrius, Cyril, and the Canon Episcopi (the night-riding Diana delusion) are marshalled; Sixtus turns the tables on Agrippa (Augustine on incubi; Innocent VIII's bull) and gives the Church's teaching: demons transfer a man's seed, so any child is his → folio 552.)

(folio 551, left column → right column)

Annotation LXXIII (continued)

[Cassian: "In no way is it to be believed that spiritual] natures can naturally couple with women; since, if at some time this could have happened according to the letter, how does it now also come to pass — whether frequently or rarely — that this same thing does not occur, and that some are born without seed or the coitus of a man? Similarly we should discern [some] conceived of women by [the agency of] demons."

A similar force have the things which Philastrius, Bishop of Brescia, in chapter 108 of his Catalogue against Heresies, recounts in this manner: "There is another heresy, which asserts concerning the Giants that Angels mingled themselves with women before the Flood, and that thence the giants were born. But if anyone shall think that the Angels so sinned, transformed into flesh, and remained in it — or shall believe them to have been made carnal in this way — he decrees the history by a violent reasoning, just as the lies of the pagans and poets also assert that gods and goddesses, transformed, committed nefarious marriages: for if it was ever done, it will not be doubtful that it is done now also; but what was never done, neither is it manifest that it is done now." Nor from these do those things dissent which Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, discoursed to nearly the same opinion, in the second book of the Allegories on the Pentateuch, sermon 1. To these is added the authority of the Council of Ancyra, detesting the insane opinion of certain poisoning women, who assert that by night, through long spaces of lands, they are led by wicked spirits to certain places, where they indulge with demons in various pleasures, feasts, and lusts. The words of this council are related in the Decrees of the pontiffs, cause 26, question 5,[1] in this order: "This also must not be omitted — that certain wicked women, turned back after Satan, seduced by the illusions and phantasms of demons, believe and profess that in the nocturnal hours they ride with Diana, the goddess of the pagans, or with Herodias, or with an innumerable multitude of women, upon certain beasts, and pass over the spaces of many lands in the untimely silence of night, and obey her commands, and are summoned to her service on certain nights. Wherefore let the priests, through the churches committed to them, preach to the people of God that they may know all these things to be false, and that such phantasms are inflicted upon the minds of the faithful by the malignant spirit. For Satan himself transfigures himself into an Angel of light, and, when he has seized the mind of any woman and subjugated her to himself through unbelief, he immediately transfigures himself into the appearances and likenesses of diverse persons, and, deluding through dreams the mind which he holds captive — showing now glad, now sad things, now known, now unknown persons — leads it through byways; and since it is only the unbelieving spirit that suffers this, [the woman] thinks that this happens not in the mind but in the body. For who, in dreams and nocturnal visions, is not led outside himself, and sees many things while sleeping which he had never seen while waking?"

◊ 1. Left margin: Read Augustine, book 18 of The City of God, chapter 18.

With these testimonies, therefore, Agrippa uses for the defense of the Witches. Whose error, indeed, Augustine most openly refutes, in book 15 of The City of God, chapter 23, in these words: "That Angels have appeared to men in such bodies that they could not only be seen but even touched, the sacred Scripture most truly testifies. And since it is a very frequent report — and many affirm that they have experienced, or have heard from those who had experienced (of whose credibility there is no doubting) — that Sylvans and Fauns, whom [people] commonly call incubi, have often been wicked toward women, and have desired and accomplished intercourse with them; and that certain demons, whom the Gauls name Dusii, assiduously attempt and accomplish this uncleanness: so many and such [persons] affirm it, that to deny it would seem impudence." There is also extant a decretal epistle of Pope Innocent VIII against the heresy of malefic women, in which these words are read: "Not without great trouble has it come to our hearing that very many persons of both sexes, unmindful of their own salvation and deviating from the catholic faith, abuse themselves with Demons, incubi, and succubi. Wherefore, lest the stain of this heretical depravity diffuse its poisons to the ruin of souls, wishing (as it lies upon our office) to provide with fitting remedies, we decree that the inquisitors deputed by us execute the due office of inquisition against persons of this kind."

This is the undoubted determination of Augustine, of Innocent, and of the whole catholic Church: from which the authorities adduced by Agrippa in no way dissent. For neither Chrysostom nor Philastrius deny that women can couple with demons,[2] but they only refute those who asserted that women were loved by the good and blessed Angels, and entered into with foul unions — since it is impossible that those incorporeal minds, the divine love being cast off (in which they had once been immovably confirmed through the grace of God), should have lowered themselves to the impure lust of women, the Angelic nature being changed into human form according to the fables of the poetic transformations. But as for what Cassian wrote — that it is in no way to be believed that spiritual natures couple with women — this is not to be so taken that we should understand that Demons can in no way at all mingle with women, but [only] not in the natural manner of animals,[3] that is, by emitting seed of their own substance: as he himself openly indicated, by adding that word "Naturally." For demons can, as Augustine says, not only couple with women, but even generate from them true human sons — not by the power of their own seed (which they have none of from themselves), but by the aid of some seed which they, foully lying under [as succubi] to men, have received, and, lying upon [as incubi] women, have poured in the seed received; so that, as Augustine says in the third book On the Trinity, God so disposing, he who is born may not be the son of the demon, but the son of that man from whom the seed was taken.[4] But to that which is brought forward from the Council of Ancyra, we respond: that the sect of women condemned by the command of the Synod is different from that which is defiled by intercourse with Demons. For that [former sect], as is said in that decree, thought that it was summoned by night — by beasts carrying [them] — to the cult of Herodias and Diana, and that the creatures of God could be transformed by another than by God the Creator into various forms of living things; but of intercourse with demons the synod makes no mention. Moreover, that Agrippa contends that that sect is the same with this one matters either little or nothing. This suffices: that that Synod does not decree that those carryings and transportations of women cannot happen corporeally, nor does it define that they happen always by imagination alone and never in the body; but it only affirms that those women are deceived by false imaginations — which we also do not deny, among →

◊ 2. Right margin: Chrysostom and Philastrius do not deny that women can couple with demons.

◊ 3. Right margin: Demons cannot mingle with women so as to emit seed of their own substance.

◊ 4. Right margin: He who is born from the mingling of a woman and a demon is the son of that man from whom the seed was taken.

[…continues on folio 552 (PDF p. 369): the rest of Sixtus's reply on the witches' transportations (Annotatio LXXIII).]

---

(printed folio 552 [PDF p. 369]. Annot. LXXIII–LXXVII (Gen 6:3–4): the demon-intercourse question closed; the Hebrew of Gen 6:3 ("my spirit shall not judge... forever") as clemency; the "120 years" as a lifespan-cap (refuted); Origen's giants as merely impious men (Theodoret: truly huge); and Ambrose on giants begotten of angels and women → folio 553.)

(folio 552, left column → right column)

Annotation LXXIII (continued)

[which we also do not deny] sometimes happens; nay, we assert that women of this kind have sometimes lain motionless at home, while they believed themselves carried off into remote regions.

Annotation LXXIV [contents]

"My spirit shall not remain in man." — Genesis 6:3

The clause "My spirit shall not remain," etc., badly rendered.

The Latin interpreter of our Vulgate edition, for that which is had in Hebrew לֹא־יָדוֹן רוּחִי—, Lo yadon ruchi — translated, "My spirit shall not remain in man, because he is flesh"; which the Septuagint rendered, οὐ μὴ καταμείνῃ τὸ πνεῦμά μου ἐν τοῖς ἀνθρώποις [my spirit shall not abide among men]. Which version Jerome, in the Hebrew Questions, rejects in these words: "In the Hebrew it is written, 'My spirit shall not judge these men forever, because they are flesh.' That is: because the condition in man is fragile, I will not keep them for eternal torments, but will here repay them what they deserve. Therefore it sounds not of severity, as is read in our codices, but of the clemency of God — while the sinner is here visited [chastised] for his own crime; whence [God], angry, also speaks to certain ones: 'I will not visit your daughters when they have fornicated, and your spouses when they have committed adultery' [Hosea 4:14];[1] and in another place: 'I will visit their iniquities with a rod, and their sins with stripes; nevertheless I will not scatter my mercy from them' [Psalm 88:33]."[2] These things Jerome [says]: with whom Rabbi Salomon [Rashi] agrees, who expounds this to mean "My spirit shall not dispute, shall not contend in judgment." But the Chaldaic [Aramaic] interpretation agrees with our edition, in which it is had: "This most wicked generation shall not persist before me."

◊ 1. Left margin: Hosea 4:14.

◊ 2. Left margin: Psalm 88:33 [Vulgate; = Psalm 89:32].

Annotation LXXV [contents]

"Their days shall be a hundred and twenty years." — Genesis 6:3

Whether God restricted the life of man to 120 years.

Josephus, in the first book of the Antiquities, explaining this passage, says that God, angry with the human race, circumscribed the life of men within a shorter span, and — the longevity of living which they had before the Flood being abrogated — restricted it within a hundred and twenty years. This same opinion, expounding this very [text], Lactantius Firmianus followed, in book 2 of the Divine Institutions, chapter 14; and Diodore, Bishop of Tarsus — which opinion Chrysostom, in homily 20, disapproves, and Jerome, in the book of Hebrew Questions, refutes by the example of the many who lived far more years after the Flood, such as Abraham, whose life reached up to the hundred and seventy-fifth year.[3]

◊ 3. Left margin: Genesis 25:7.

Annotation LXXVI [contents]

"But there were giants upon the earth." — Genesis 6:4

Whether the giants were men who exceeded others in unusual bodily size.

Origen — as Gennadius, Bishop of Constantinople, reports in the Greek Catena on the Octateuch — weighing this passage in the Tomes on Genesis, judged that the Giants were not men who exceeded others in unusual bodily size, but certain wicked and impious men, despisers of God, and plainly atheists. This opinion, Origen's name being suppressed, Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrrhus, disapproves, in question 48 on Genesis, in these plain words: "Some say that the Giants are haters of God, and men who are adversaries of God — [those] who have understood these things thus do not say that they had bodies larger than other men. But I, when I hear Scripture saying of Og that he was descended from the Giants, and that his bed was of iron, having a length of nine cubits and a breadth of four cubits [Deuteronomy 3:11];[4] when I hear the explorers narrating that they were, in the sight of the Giants, as locusts [Numbers 13:33];[5] and of Goliath, that he had a length of six cubits and a span [1 Samuel 17:4][6] — I judge that there were certain very-huge men, God wisely dispensing this: that they might know God, as omnipotent, to have distributed so great a measure to men. For it was very easy for him to create even larger men; but, that he might cut off pride and restrain arrogance, he did not give men the greatest bodies. For if, endowed with small bodies, they lift themselves up not only against one another but against God the Creator, what would they not have committed, if they had been allotted the greatest bodies?" These things Theodoret. We have written more fully on this matter in the volume of Physical Questions which we have gathered upon the divine scriptures.[7]

◊ 4. Left margin: Deuteronomy 3:11.

◊ 5. Right margin: Numbers 13:33.

◊ 6. Right margin: 1 Samuel 17:4.

◊ 7. Right margin: The author's book of Physical Questions has not yet come to light [been published].

Annotation LXXVII [contents]

"But there were giants upon the earth." — Genesis 6:4

Whether the giants were begotten from Angels and women.

Ambrose, in the first book On Noah and the Ark, chapter 4, narrating this passage, seems to hand down that the Giants who preceded the Flood were procreated from the intercourse of Angels and women. Which opinion St. Philastrius, Bishop of Brescia, in chapter 108 of his Catalogue, reckons among the heresies. But these are Ambrose's words: "The founder of divine Scripture does not wish those Giants to be seen, in the manner of the poets, as sons of the earth; but asserts them to have been generated from Angels and women, etc." And elsewhere too Ambrose indicates that the cause of the Angelic ruin, and of the fall from the heavens, happened from this — that angels coupled foully with women — as in the first book On Virgins, not far from the end: in which place, comparing among themselves the merits of the continence of virgins and the incontinence of the Angels, he says: "Why should I pursue the praise of chastity with more [words]? For chastity made the Angels. He who kept it is an Angel; he who lost it is a Devil. How illustrious it is, moreover, that Angels, on account of their intemperance, fell from heaven into the world, [while] virgins, on account of their chastity, passed from the world into heaven." From this Ambrosian opinion Chrysostom does not much differ, in the homily delivered on the feast of the beheading of John the Baptist, when he says: "Woman laid low not only men, but even Angels from heaven." There are those to whom it seems that Ambrose took this from Philo, Lactantius, and Eusebius — of whom the first, in the book On Giants, has it thus: "'The Angels of God saw the daughters of men,' etc. — whom other philosophers [call] genii, Moses is wont to call Angels. These are souls flying through the air; nor is there [any reason] why anyone should think this fabulous: for it is necessary that the whole world, in all its parts, should have animate beings — the earth, terrestrial [ones]; the sea, aquatic [ones]; fire, [beings] born of fire, of which very many are reported to be born in Macedonia; likewise heaven, the stars — for these are wholly immortal and divine souls. Accordingly it necessarily follows that the air too is full of its own living beings, which are invisible to us. Certain of these, therefore, descended into bodies." Thus Philo writes. But Lactantius, in the se[cond book] →

[…continues on folio 553 (PDF p. 370): Lactantius and Eusebius on the angels-and-giants opinion (Annotatio LXXVII).]

---

(printed folio 553 [PDF p. 370]. Annot. LXXVII–LXXIX (Gen 6:4–7:11): the "angels sinned with women" view (piled from many Fathers but recoiled from by Ambrose — the fall was pride, not lust; Sixtus resolves "sons of God" = the godly line of Seth); Chrysostom on the Cherubim not beholding God (abused by the Armenians); and the LXX's corrupt Flood date → folio 554.)

(folio 553, left column → right column)

Annotation LXXVII (continued)

[But Lactantius], in the second book of the Divine Institutions, chapter 15, speaks of this matter thus: "When, therefore, the number of men had begun to increase, God — foreseeing lest the Devil (to whom from the beginning he had given power over the earth) should either corrupt or scatter the men whom he had made in the beginning — sent Angels for the protection and cultivation of the human race; to whom he enjoined, before all, that they should not, defiled by the contagion of the earth, lose the dignity of their heavenly substance. And so, while they dwelt among men, that most deceitful ruler of the earth, by very habit, gradually enticed them to vices, and polluted them with the embraces of women; then, not received back into heaven on account of the sins in which they had immersed themselves, they fell to the earth. Thus the Devil made them, from Angels of God, his own satellites and ministers." These things Lactantius: before whom, many years [earlier], the same had been held by Justin Martyr, in the Apology to the Roman Senate, and in the apology to Antoninus Pius; and by Clement of Alexandria, in the third and fifth volumes of the Stromata — writing most clearly that the angels sinned with women. To both subscribed Tertullian the African and Methodius, Bishop of Olympus. Of whom the former, in the book On the Dress of Women, says, "The Angels rushed from heaven to the daughters of men, and, after the exhausted moments of their lusts, sighed for heaven"; and here, in the sermon On the Resurrection, he says: "The Devil was made wicked concerning the administration of the things committed to him, and conceived envy against us — just as also those who afterward loved flesh, [and] on account of intercourse consorted in love with the daughters of men." Agreeing with these, Eusebius of Caesarea, in the fifth volume of the Evangelical Preparation, set down these words: "Which matter Plutarch the more confirms, saying that the fabulous discourses about the gods signify certain things done by Demons in most ancient times, and that the things sung of the Giants and Titans were operations of Demons. Whence a suspicion has sometimes fallen upon me, whether these be not the very things which, done before the Flood by the Giants, the divine scripture touched upon — concerning which it is said: 'But when the angels of God had seen the daughters of men, that they were beautiful, they chose for themselves wives out of them, from whom were procreated the most famous Giants of the age.' For someone will suspect that they, and their spirits, are those who were afterward called Gods by men, and that their conflicts, tumults, and wars are those which are fabulously written of the gods." Thus far Eusebius: from whose opinion I judge that Ambrose recoiled — because in many places, but most of all in the exposition of Psalm 118, sermon 7, in which, speaking of the cause of the Angelic fall, he demonstrates that it was not lust, but pride,[1] saying thus: "The devil himself, through pride, lost the grace of his nature; for when he says, 'I will place my throne above the clouds, and I will be like the Most High' [Isaiah 14:14],[2] he fell from the fellowship of the Angels." And in epistle 84, to Demetrias, showing that the devil fell through pride before man's fall, he says: "Pride took its beginning from the devil, who — since he was pleased with his own power and dignity, which he had received from the Creator, and compared himself to the glory of his author — together with those Angels whom he had drawn into the consent of his impiety, was cast down from the heavenly sublimity. And therefore he was able to harm the first men, because he persuaded them, ill-believing, that they would become better if they leaped out into the liberty of their own will, than if they remained in the custody of the given law."

◊ 1. Left margin: The cause of the Angelic fall, in St. Ambrose's judgment, was pride.

◊ 2. Left margin: Isaiah 14:14.

Accordingly, lest the aforesaid words of Ambrose move anyone, one must know that he understood, by "Angels," not spiritual and heavenly substances, but illustrious men and worshippers of the one God, descending from the holy stock of Seth[3] — whom, because they had remained until that day in the faith and worship of the one God (as we have already said), Moses called בְּנֵי־הָאֱלֹהִים: Bene elohim, that is, "Sons of God"; [and] the older edition of the Seventy interpreters said τοὺς ἀγγέλους Θεοῦ [the angels of God]; the Italic edition — which Augustine expounded in the fifteenth book On the City of God, chapter 23 — called [them] "Angels of God"; and Ambrose, following this, called the parents of the Giants "angels." Which his own words also show, when, in the book On Noah and the Ark, in that place which we cited above, he added: "Scripture usually calls the sons of God, or faithful men, 'Angels,' because souls are generated from no man." To this exposition Augustine assents, in the Questions on Genesis, question 3, in this manner: "It is asked how the Angels could lie with the daughters of men, whence the Giants are reported to have been born — although some codices, both Latin and Greek, do not have 'Angels' but 'Sons of God': whom certain [interpreters], for solving this question, believed to have been just men, who could also be called by the name of 'Angels.' For of the man John it is written, 'Behold, I send my Angel,' etc.[4] Whence it is more credible that just men — called either 'Angels' or 'sons of God,' [and] fallen through concupiscence — sinned with women, than that Angels, not having flesh, could have descended to that sin; although concerning certain Demons, who are troublesome to women, so many things are said by many, that it is not easy to define an opinion on this matter."

◊ 3. Right margin: St. Ambrose, by the name of "Angels," understood illustrious men and worshippers of the one God.

◊ 4. Right margin: Malachi 3:[1].

Annotation LXXVIII [contents]

"Noah a just man, and perfect." — Genesis 6:9

Whether God can be seen by the angels.

Chrysostom, at the end of the 23rd homily on Genesis, explaining this, has this proposition: "The flashing majesty of the divine glory neither the Cherubim nor those incorporeal powers can see; but they cover their opposed faces, their wings being set against [it]." The Armenian heretics, who taught that God is not seen by the blessed, used this and very many other similar sentences of Chrysostom;[5] the elucidation of which you have in Annotation 182 of the following book.

◊ 5. Right margin: The Armenians denied that God is seen by the blessed.

Annotation LXXIX [contents]

"In the six-hundredth year of Noah's life." — Genesis 7:11

The number of the years and the months of the Flood [is] corrupted.

The Septuagint interpreters — where we, according to the Hebrew truth, have "In the six-hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, on the seventeenth day of the month," etc. — are faulty, and depraved in the number both of the years and of the months. For it has ἐν τέ ᾧνέ ἰξακοσιοστἔ ᾧτει ἐν τῇ ζωῇ τοῦ Νῶε, τῷ δευτέρῳ μηνί, ἑβδόμῃ καὶ εἰκάδι τοῦ μηνός — that is, "In the six-hundred-and-first year in the life of Noah, in the second month, on the twenty-seventh of the month." There is therefore here a twofold error. For first there is made an addition of one year, whereas the sacred letters most openly attest that Noah entered the ark in the six-hundredth year of his life, and that in the same year the Flood inundated. Then [there] is an error in the number of the days of the month, an addition of ten days being made →

[…continues on folio 554 (PDF p. 371): the rest of the Septuagint's Flood-date error (Annotatio LXXIX).]

---

(printed folio 554 [PDF p. 371]. Annot. LXXIX–LXXXIV (Gen 7:11–8:11): the LXX's Flood-date errors; Procopius on an immovable heaven; the constellations as causes of the Flood (d'Ailly, William of Auvergne, the Jupiter–Saturn conjunction condemned as heretical); the LXX's ten-day error at the ark's resting; the raven's "did not return"; and the dove with the olive branch.)

(folio 554, left column → right column)

Annotation LXXIX (continued)

[an addition of ten days being made] above the seven and ten [seventeen] days which are reckoned in the Hebrew. The first error arises because, a little below, in chapter 8 — when now one year had been completed — it is said, ἐν τέ ᾧνὶ καέ ἰξακοσιοστᾖ ᾧτει, etc., that is, "In the six-hundred-and-first year of Noah's life, in the first month, on the first day of that month, the water failed" [Genesis 8:13].[1] The second error similarly arises because, below in the same chapter 8, it is written, "In the second month, on the twenty-seventh day of the month, the earth was dried" [Genesis 8:14].[2] Chrysostom, however, and Procopius follow the number of the Greek codices.

◊ 1. Left margin: Genesis 8:13.

◊ 2. Left margin: Genesis 8:14.

Annotation LXXX [contents]

"The floodgates of heaven were opened." — Genesis 7:11

Whether heaven is spherical and mobile.

Procopius of Gaza, explaining this, speaks thus: "Accordingly, those think wrongly who imagine heaven [to be] spherical and mobile; for heaven stands immovable, and it is the path of the stars running their course in it." See what we noted above on this, in the first chapter of Genesis, Annotation 14.

Annotation LXXXI [contents]

"The floodgates of heaven were opened." — Genesis 7:11

Whether the Noachic Flood could have been foreknown from observation of the stars, as Pierre d'Ailly thought.

Peter of Ailly [Pierre d'Ailly], Cardinal-Priest, disputing in the questions on Genesis upon this sentence, asserts that, although Noah foreknew the coming Flood by prophetic revelation, God announcing it, yet he could have foreseen this same thing long before it happened, from Astronomical rules — namely, from the knowledge of the constellations, which not only presignified that universal cataclysm, but even, by God's command, effected it — not as primary causes, but as handmaids and ministers, applying, in obedience to their omnipotent Lord, the powers and faculties which they had received from him for inundating and submerging the globe of the earth. These constellations, the producers of the inundations, Moses called "the floodgates of heaven," signifying, through their opening, that time in which God released all the inundating powers and influences — enclosed in the aforesaid constellations — as if, the barriers being unlocked, to the flooding of the whole earth. This same assertion he confirms, in the volume On Sects and Laws, and in the book On the Concordance of Astronomy and Theology, by the example of the Rainbow: which, just as God willed to be a sign, for the security of men, of a universal Flood no more to come, so it is probable that God, from the prognostics and signs of the stars, foretold the Flood for the penitence of sinners.

In this very opinion had been, long before, William [of Auvergne], Bishop of Paris, who, in the first part of his work On the Universe, expounding this passage, wrote thus: "Moses, the Prophet of the Hebrews, called 'floodgates of heaven' those parts of heaven which are generative of rains and inundations of waters — such as are the watery signs, like Cancer and Pisces, the Pleiades, the Hyades, and Orion among the stars, and Mars, and Venus, and the Moon among the Planets. The floodgates of heaven, therefore, are understood [to be] then opened, when causes of this kind are loosed and confirmed, by the nod of the Creator, unto the operations of rains and inundations." These things William: with whom agreeing, Henry of Mechlin, a disciple of Albert the Great, in the commentaries which he published on the great Conjunctions of Albumasar, reports that he found, from Astronomical reckonings, that a certain conjunction of the stars preceded the Noachic Flood, inducing a general flooding of waters — namely [the conjunction] of Jupiter and Saturn at the end of Cancer, in the region of the Argive ship [the constellation Argo], by which also Noah's ark is signified. This opinion — proposed forty years ago by Tiberio Calabro, a philosopher, in public disputations, and also defended in writings — Jerome Armellini, a Dominican, confuted in a particular volume published against him, and condemned as heretical.[3] See an annotation of nearly this same argument above, Annotation 15, and in book 6, Annotation 10.

◊ 3. Right margin: He who attributes the Noachic inundation to conjunctions of the stars is refuted by Jerome Armellini.

Annotation LXXXII [contents]

"The ark rested in the seventh month." — Genesis 8:4

The days of the ceasing Flood wrongly reckoned.

The Septuagint interpreters, for that which is had in Hebrew — "The ark rested in the seventh month," יוֹם בְּשִׁבְעָה עָשָׂר [be-shiv'ah asar yom], that is, "on the seventeenth day" — rendered ἑβδόμῃ καὶ εἰκάδι, that is, "on the twenty-seventh day of the month," an addition of ten days being made. This error our interpreter too, in the Vulgate edition, followed: nor is it fitting to believe that the Hebrew codices are corrupt, since that number agrees with the hundred and fifty days in which the Flood devastated the lands, and the Chaldaic [Aramaic] edition attests the same.

Annotation LXXXIII [contents]

"The raven, going forth, did not return." — Genesis 8:7

Whether the raven returned into the ark.

The Septuagint, translating that which is read affirmatively in the Hebrew concerning the raven sent out by Noah וְיָצֹא יָצוֹא וָשׁוֹב — [va-yetze yatzo va-shov], that is, "And going forth it went forth and returned" — expressed [it] negatively, καὶ ἐξελθὼν οὐκ ἀνέστρεψεν, that is, "And going forth it did not return" — which our Vulgate edition also follows. Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, in his Annotations, writing against this interpretation, says: "This error caused expositors to weave in here most fabulous questions, asking in what place the raven was absent for so many days outside the ark, and where it settled when the waters were not yet dried up, and whether the raven returned to Noah into the ark after the drying of the waters: because Moses, according to the depraved Scripture, says, 'And it did not return until the water was dried up.' The negation, therefore, must be removed both from our and from the Greek codices; and, according to the Hebrew truth and Josephus's interpretation, it must be read that the raven returned into the ark." Aloysius

[Ludovico], Bishop of Verona, in the Catena on Genesis, harmonizes the Vulgate Septuagint edition and ours together with the Hebrew truth, in these words: "This passage is not badly translated, as some think; for, when it is said in the Hebrew or Chaldaic edition, 'The raven went forth, by going forth and returning, until the waters were thus wanting upon the earth,' this negative is included — that, after the waters were dried, it did not return: so that at its first going-out it flew about around the ark, as if it wished to return, until the waters should be dried; thence, having gone forth completely, it did not return — as our text sounds, with the Greek and with Josephus."

Annotation LXXXIV

"The dove returned, bearing a branch of olive." — Genesis 8:11

[…the body of Annotatio LXXXIV begins on folio 555 (PDF p. 372), with Chrysostom.]

---

(printed folio 555 [PDF p. 372]. Annot. LXXXIV–LXXXVIII (Gen 8:11–11:11): Chrysostom's "dry olive-leaf" (a translator's slip on κάρφος); Chrysostom on circumcision conferring nothing; Giorgio allegorizing Noah's drunkenness; Chrysostom's single primeval tongue before Babel; and the LXX's twofold error in Shem's genealogy → folio 556.)

(folio 555, left column → right column)

Annotation LXXXIV (continued) [contents]

"The dove returned, bearing a branch of olive." — Genesis 8:11

Chrysostom, in homily 26 on Genesis, seems to read and expound in a contrary sense that which our Vulgate edition has — "The dove RETURNED, bearing a branch of olive with green leaves" — saying, "The dove RETURNED, having a dry olive-leaf in its mouth."[1] But it appears that Chrysostom's translator was deceived,[2] no less by a tautology than by the ambiguity of the word, which in this place is found as much in Chrysostom as in the Septuagint interpreters and among the Hebrews. For the Hebrew codices have it thus: וְהִנֵּה־עֲלֵה־זַיִת טָרָף בְּפִיהָ [ve-hinneh aleh zayit taraf be-fiha], that is, "And behold, an olive-leaf, a branch, in its mouth." But Aben Ezra [Ibn Ezra] asserts that here there occurs an apposition and a certain tautology; for he says that "olive-leaf" and what is immediately subjoined, Taraf, that is, "branch," are the same — as, he says, often in the scriptures (as in "dust and ashes"). Therefore the Septuagint, changing nothing, translated καὶ εἶχε φύλλον ἐλαίας κάρφος ἐν τῷ στόματι αὐτῆς, that is, "And it had an olive-leaf, a twig, in its mouth." Following these, Chrysostom too applied to "olive-leaf" the word κάρφος, which is ambiguous to the Greeks and signifies two things — namely "dry" and "a twig," or a little branch. His translator, therefore, not considering the repetition of the synonymous word, translated κάρφος — which in this place signifies "a twig" — as "dry," the sense of Chrysostom plainly protesting against it, who a little after adds words of this kind: "This tree is ever-green, and it is probable that, when the waters had receded, this tree still had a head of leaves." By which words he shows that he spoke not of a dry olive-leaf, but rather of a green one — although the Hebrew truth indicates that the olive-leaf was neither dry nor green. The Chaldaic [Aramaic] edition translated this passage more correctly than the Septuagint, saying: "And behold, an olive-leaf plucked with its mouth." For טָרָף taraf signifies to the Hebrews both "a twig" and "seized" or "plucked."

◊ 1. Left margin: What kind of branch the dove brought.

◊ 2. Left margin: Chrysostom's translator was deceived.

Annotation LXXXV [contents]

"The Lord smelled the odor of sweetness." — Genesis 8:21

Whether circumcision conferred anything to the soul's salvation.

Chrysostom, homily 27 on Genesis, expounding this, seems to assert that Circumcision, in the old law, conferred absolutely nothing to justice and the salvation of the soul — the opposite of which Augustine, with the rest of the theologians, holds. See below, in the centuries, chapter 17, Annotation 96.

Annotation LXXXVI [contents]

"Noah planted a vineyard, and drinking the wine was made drunk." — Genesis 9:20–21

Of what kind was Noah's drunkenness.

Francesco Giorgio, in the first volume, Problem 101, so explains these words that he seems to subvert the truth of the history, affirming that Noah was not made drunk from the wine of the vine which he had planted (as Moses seems to indicate) — because from a pure drunkenness of wine so many evils would not have followed. But he was drunk either from an excessive affection for his own [people], or from the wisdom of earthly things, which in very many places is designated by "wine." For those who pursue this [earthly wisdom] go so far away from God that they many times rush into scandal — as happened to Balaam, Ahithophel, and Solomon.

Annotation LXXXVII [contents]

"And the earth was of one lip [language]." — Genesis 11:1

There was only one language for all before the tower was built, as St. Chrysostom rightly held.

Chrysostom, in homily 30 on Genesis, narrating this, says that before the building of the tower of Babel there was one natural language of all men, and that all mortals used the same speech. Which opinion — the author's name being omitted, however — Philastrius, Bishop of Brescia, in the Catalogue of Heresies, chapter 106, reprobates as heretical,[3] asserting that it must be firmly believed that even many ages before the building of Babel there were several varieties of speech and of languages, the knowledge of which all men had from God's gift up to the construction of the tower and the confusion of tongues; but that Moses says the earth was "of one lip," he thinks was said because, although there were several kinds of languages, yet all understood one another — and there was to all one language and the same speech, not according to the same use of words, but according to the same understanding of meanings. Alphonsus [de Castro] of Zamora, in book 9 Against Heresies, is so far from this censure of Philastrius that he judges it [Philastrius's view] to be heretical: because Moses most openly teaches that, before the times of Babel, there was only one language of all — when he says, "And the earth was of one lip, and of the same words"; and when, a little after, he adds that in the building of Babel the lip of the whole earth was then first confounded — that is, then first began to be divided, and various, and manifold, which before had been simple, undivided, and one. It must be held, therefore, according to the true explanation of Chrysostom, that there was only one speech of all mortals before the building of the tower; and Philastrius is, on this point, to be rejected — who, it appears, was deceived by a light consideration of the words of Moses: who, before he began, in chapter 11, to describe the building of the tower, had first, in chapter 10, narrated how the seven sons of Japheth divided the islands of the nations in their regions, each according to their languages and their kindreds. Which words, not noticing that they were said by anticipation [prolepsis], Philastrius thought that there were already then several languages before Babel was built. For it is, according to the rule of Tyconius, the custom of divine Scripture to narrate some things by anticipation — namely, that before they are done they should be somehow, and cursorily, narrated, so that afterward each thing done should be described more fully in its own order. And that this is the true interpretation of this passage, Augustine teaches, in book 16 On the City of God, chapter 4, writing thus: "When, therefore, those nations are reported to have been in their own languages, the narrator nevertheless returns to that time when there was one Language of all, and thence now expounds what happened, so that a diversity of languages should arise. 'And,' he says, 'all the earth was one lip, and one voice to all.'"

◊ 3. Right margin: An error of Philastrius.

Annotation LXXXVIII [contents]

"And Shem lived, after he begot Arphaxad, etc." — Genesis 11:11

An error in the number and the years of the generations of Shem.

The Septuagint, in the present genealogy of Shem, have a twofold error: one in the number of the generations by which the genealogy is woven, the other in the number of the years by which the authors of these generations lived. →

[…continues on folio 556 (PDF p. 373): the two errors detailed (Annotatio LXXXVIII).]

---

(printed folio 556 [PDF p. 373], with a comparative table. Annot. LXXXVIII–LXXXIX (Gen 11:11–12:13): the LXX's inserted second Cainan (which entered Luke 3's genealogy) and its ~280-year inflation of the patriarchs' ages (tabulated); then Chrysostom on Abraham's "sister" ruse, branding it a "fiction" or "lie" → folio 557.)

(folio 556, left column → right column, with a full-width table between)

Annotation LXXXVIII (continued)

The first [error] is that, whereas Moses numbers only nine generations from Shem to Abraham, the Septuagint reckon ten,[1] a Cainan generation being added immediately after Arphaxad the son of Shem, in this manner: "Shem lived, after he begot for himself Arphaxad, thirty-five years, and begot sons and daughters, and died; and Arphaxad lived a hundred and thirty-five years, and begot Cainan; and Arphaxad lived, after he begot Cainan, 430 years, and begot sons and daughters, and died; and Cainan lived a hundred and thirty years and begot Shelah; and Cainan lived, after he begot Shelah, 330 years, and begot sons and daughters, and died" — all of which are redundant, and the Hebrew truth entirely ignores, setting down that Arphaxad himself begot Shelah, and not Cainan. And this same error crept into the genealogy of our Savior, described in the third chapter of the Gospel according to Luke: who, as in other things, so also in this, followed the Septuagint edition, in his times most received throughout the whole world. Which indeed Jerome, greatly wondering at, says: "I especially marvel, and — on account of the slowness of [my] understanding, struck with most vehement stupor — I do not know how to search out by what reasoning, whereas in the Hebrew, from the Flood (that is, from Noah) up to Abraham ten generations are found, Luke himself (who, the Holy Spirit guiding his pen, could in no way write anything false) preferred to set down in the Gospel eleven generations, according to the Septuagint interpreters, Cainan being added." Aloysius [Ludovico], Bishop of Verona, says it could have happened that the Holy Spirit, by some hidden reason, moved the mind of Moses to pass over the Cainan generation in the series of this genealogy — just as the Evangelist Matthew too wrapped up certain [names] in silence in the genealogy of the Savior.

◊ 1. Left margin: Moses numbers only nine generations from Shem to Abraham, but the Septuagint ten.

The second error is in the enumeration of the years of the life of those contained in this genealogy: for the reckoning of the Seventy interpreters exceeds the Hebrew reckoning by nearly two hundred and eighty years,[2] as appears in the three little columns written below — of which the first contains the reckoning of the years according to the Hebrew truth, the second the reckoning of the Septuagint, the third the difference of each reckoning according to the excess and defect of each number.

◊ 2. Right margin: The reckoning of the Septuagint interpreters exceeds the Hebrew reckoning by nearly 280 years.

(In the third column, "Desunt" = the Septuagint falls short by that many years; "Redundant / Redund." = the Septuagint exceeds by that many.)

Hebrew reckoning	Hebr.	LXX	Difference
Shem, after begetting Arphaxad, lived	500	335	Desunt 165
Arphaxad, before begetting Shelah, lived	35	130	Redundant 95
Arphaxad, after begetting Shelah	403	330	Desunt 73
Shelah, before begetting Eber	30	130	Redund. 100
Shelah, after begetting Eber	403	330	Desunt 73
Eber, before begetting Peleg	34	134	Redund. 100
Eber, after begetting Peleg	430	370	Desunt 60
Peleg, before begetting Reu	30	130	Redund. 100
Reu, before begetting Serug	32	130	Redund. 98
Serug, before begetting Nahor	30	130	Redund. 100
Nahor, before begetting Terah	29	79	Redund. 50
Nahor, after begetting Terah	119	129	Redund. 10
Sum of the whole reckoning	2075	2357	difference 282

To these generations, if you add the 460 years of the life of Cainan superadded by the Septuagint interpreters, the difference of the years of each reckoning is increased up to the number of 742 years. See book 6, where we wrote concerning the superadded generation of Cainan, Annotation 143; and book 7, heresy 4.

Annotation LXXXIX [contents]

"Say therefore, I beseech you, that you are my sister." — Genesis 12:13

Whether Abraham lied.

Chrysostom, homily 32 on Genesis, upon these words, extols Sarah with many praises — that, her husband being brought into the danger of death, she consented to [him] persuading simulation and adultery, and promptly presented herself to both. For he writes thus: "Therefore the just man consents to the adultery of his wife, and, as it were, serves the adultery to the dishonor of the woman, that he may escape death. Have you seen the bond of the charity of the man and the woman? Have you seen the man — what things he dared to suggest to the woman; and what counsel the woman received, and did not refuse, nor bears it grievously, so that that fable and fiction is hidden?" And a little after: "Who would not be astonished at this readiness to obey? Who could sufficiently praise her, that — after so great continence, and at such an age — in order to keep the just man [safe], so far as it lay in her will, she exposed herself even to adultery, and bore the embrace of barbarians?" Thus far Chrysostom, who in this part seems to differ, in three ways, from the common opinion of the other Fathers. First, that he calls this consultation of Abraham and Sarah not only in this place a fable and a fiction, but in other places also a fabrication, a scene, a comedy, a tragedy, a deception, a hypocrisy, and a lie. In homily 45 on Genesis, expounding those words by which God accuses King Abimelech, who had taken away Sarah from Abraham her husband, he speaks in this manner: "But God said to Abimelech, I know that they themselves contrived this fable, and that, deceived, you did this by their words"; and a little after he adds: "He too, fearing lest he be killed by you, contrived this comedy, and, as it were, cooperated in the dishonor of Sarah." And in the second book On the Providence of God he says: "Abraham then came into such great necessity that he even submitted to hypocrisy — than which, what more miserable [thing] can be said?" And in the epistle to Olympias he says: "Did not Abraham, on account of the fear of death, prefer to give his own wife to barbarian pleasures and to the Egyptian tyranny? For he himself composed the fable [with] injury, and asked his wife to simulate with him so horrendous a tragedy — does he not blush, bringing forward the cause of such a scene? 'For it will be,' he says, 'that when they see you beautiful of face, they will kill me and will keep you. Say therefore that you are my sister, that it may be well with me on account of you, and that my soul may live for your sake.' Do you see the fear? do you see the trembling agitating that lofty and philoso[phical soul]" →

[…continues on folio 557 (PDF p. 374): the rest of Chrysostom's censure, and the second and third ways he differs from the Fathers (Annotatio LXXXIX).]

---

(printed folio 557 [PDF p. 374]. Annot. LXXXIX–XC (Gen 12:13–14:18): Chrysostom on Abraham's ruse — praising licit "frauds" for others' good (verging on Priscillianism) and Sarah's self-exposure (Augustine rejects both; the stricter view: die rather than betray chastity); then the famous question over Melchisedech's person (Angel, Son of God, Holy Spirit, a higher power, or Shem) → folio 558.)

(folio 557, left column → right column)

Annotation LXXXIX (continued)

— [do you see the fear? do you see the trembling agitating] that lofty and philosophical soul? — and he lied about the very kind [of relationship], bringing forward one person in place of another."

The SECOND [way in which Chrysostom seems to differ] is that he judges this fiction and dissimulation of Sarah and Abraham to be worthy of praise, admiration, and imitation, departing in nothing from that opinion which he most openly professes in all his writings — namely, that it is licit, indeed even fitting, for a perfect man to use frauds, wiles, and impostures, not only in his own necessities but also for the advantages of others, for the purpose not of harming but of helping,[1] as you will be able to see clearly below, chapter 27, Annotation 106. These two assertions — just as (Augustine being witness, in the book Against Lying, chapter 2) they seem to incline toward the heresy of the Priscillianists — so are they opposed to Augustine himself, and to the rest of the theologians, especially the Scholastics, who assert that all dissimulation, whether harmful or officious [well-meant], and every fraud, is a vice contrary to truth and belonging to the crime of lying. For whether by speech, or by any deed whatever, out of a zeal either to harm or to help, someone lies, he is a liar; and every lie is either a sin, or is not without sin. Accordingly Augustine, in book 22 Against Faustus, chapter 24, denies that Abraham lied: since, being asked what Sarah was to him, he declared her a sister, he did not deny her a wife — keeping silent about something true, not saying anything false; for she was truly his sister on his father's side, though not on his mother's. Chrysostom himself acknowledges this same thing, in homily 45 on Genesis, where he openly confesses that Abraham's fiction had in it nothing of a lie, when he says: "See how diligently the just man acts, to show that not even in this did he lie." But concerning Chrysostom's opinion on the assertion of officious fraud we have written more fully below, in Annotation 107 of this book.

◊ 1. Left margin: Whether it is lawful to lie in order to help [another].

There REMAINS the THIRD [point], which is contained as asserted in the aforesaid words of Chrysostom — namely, that Sarah is chiefly to be praised and imitated in this, that for the sake of saving her husband she exposed herself to the adultery of barbarians, the husband nevertheless consenting to her adultery, indeed even persuading it.[2] From this opinion Augustine dissents, denying that Abraham either persuaded or conceded adultery to his wife, writing thus in book 22, chapter 33, against Faustus: "For Abraham did not consent to the disgrace of his wife, but committed to God the chastity of his spouse — about whose mind he had no doubt — being sure of his God, that he would not allow anything so base and disgraceful to be suffered. Nor did his faith deceive him: to whom first Pharaoh, terrified by portents, and then Abimelech, warned by a dream, both restored his wife unharmed and with honor." Thus Augustine.

◊ 2. Left margin: Whether a wife ought, in order to save her husband, to expose herself to adultery.

There are also those who affirm that neither to the husband nor to the wife is the remedy of adultery lawful for the sake of avoiding the death of either; but that they ought to await death — indeed, rather to seek death of their own accord — than to betray chastity, for the preservation of which many most chaste women not only endured to be killed by others, but even laid hands upon themselves:[3] as Sophronia, wife of the prefect of the city of Rome, who — as Eusebius relates in book 8 of the History — noticing that her husband, terrified by fear of death, had betrayed her chastity to the tyrant Maxentius, when she had first prayed to God on bended knees, as though about to immolate her chastity to Christ, transfixed her breast with a seized sword. Following whose example, several holy virgins, whose martyrdom the Church celebrates, slew themselves lest they take on a stain upon their chastity.[4] But concerning these we have written more at length in the censures upon the expositors of Jonah, Annotation 253.

◊ 3. Left margin: Whether, for the sake of preserving chastity, it is lawful to perish by one's own hand.

◊ 4. Right margin: The Church celebrates the martyrdoms of certain virgins who brought death upon themselves lest they lose their chastity.

Augustine, in book 22, chapter 37, against Faustus, and in the first book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, chapter 29, calls into doubt whether Sarah's chastity could have been subjected to the lust of the barbarians without any crime of adultery[5] — as if, for the husband's life, it were lawful, with his consent, to lie with another man; as once, in the time of the Emperor Constantius, was done at Antioch, where, when the prefect Acindynus was keeping a certain man in prison to be put to death — because he did not have a pound of gold which he owed to the treasury, whence he might pay it — the wife, moved by love of her husband, sold (the husband himself consenting) one night's intercourse to a certain rich man who anxiously demanded it and promised a pound of gold as the price, that at that price she might redeem her husband's life from the prefect. And this deed of Acindynus having been set forth at length, [Augustine] leaves it free for each to judge as he will — although he seems more inclined to that side, that this may by no means be done.

◊ 5. Right margin: St. Augustine doubts whether Sarah's chastity could be exposed to peril without the crime of adultery.

Annotation XC [contents]

"But Melchisedech, king of Salem [brought forth bread and wine]." — Genesis 14:18

Whether Melchisedech was a man, or rather an Angel, as Origen held.

Origen, discoursing about Melchisedech the priest, asserted that he was not a man but an Angel. This error Jerome attributes to him in the Epistle to Evagrius, writing thus: "Straightway, at the very front of Genesis, in the first homily of Origen, I found [something] written concerning Melchisedech; in which, disputing with manifold discourse, he slid down to this — that he called him an Angel; and with almost the same arguments by which your author (who makes Melchisedech the Holy Spirit) [argues], I passed over to Didymus, his follower, and I saw that the man went on foot into the opinion of the master." Thus Jerome — understanding, perhaps, by "the first homily" the first tome; for in the first homily of Origen, which is now had on Genesis, there is no mention of Melchisedech. Origen can be excused by the diversity of opinions which existed on this matter among the ancients — among whom, as Jerome, writing to Evagrius, is witness, there was a most famous question concerning the person of the priest Melchisedech. For indeed, as Epiphanius relates in book 2 against heresies, heresy 55, certain unnamed heretics said that Melchisedech was the Only-begotten himself, and the natural Son of God, who appeared in human form to Abraham.[6] Hierax the Egyptian, who composed learned but heretical commentaries, in Greek and in Egyptian [Coptic], on the Hexaemeron, thought him to be the Holy Spirit. The Melchisedechian heretics, whose author was Theodorus the money-changer [Argentarius], reckoned him to be a certain great power superior to Christ, from which Christ himself received the order of his eternal Priesthood.

◊ 6. Right margin: Some heretics thought Melchisedech was the natural Son of God; others said he was the Holy Spirit.

The Samaritans judged him to be the same as Shem, the firstborn son of Noah,[7] and [held] that at the time when Abraham was born he had three hundred and ninety years of age, and that to Abraham, his own great-great-grandson [abnepos], he →

◊ 7. Right margin: The Samaritans thought Melchisedech was Shem, the firstborn of Noah.

[…continues on folio 558 (PDF p. 375): the rest of the opinions on Melchisedech's person (Annotatio XC).]

---

(printed folio 558 [PDF p. 375]. Annot. XC–XCIV (Gen 14:18–16:3): the Melchisedech survey closed (Shem; a just priest; Jerome's Salim); pseudo-Augustine making him the Holy Spirit incarnate (refuted); booty in a just war (Aquinas); Philo's hell-as-conscience; and whether Abraham's union with Hagar was legitimate matrimony (yes) → folio 559.)

(folio 558, left column → right column)

Annotation XC (continued)

survived by forty years — [Abraham,] his own great-great-grandson [abnepos] of the tenth degree.

The Jews handed down that he was indeed a just man, and priest of God Most High (as the divine Scripture has it), but begotten of an impure harlot and a fornicating man, and that on this account his parents are not mentioned in the sacred letters.[1] Irenaeus and Hippolytus wrote that he was king of Jerusalem — which was first called Salem, then Jebus, and at last named Jerusalem.[2] Leaving their opinions aside, Jerome, in the aforesaid epistle to Evagrius, affirms that Melchisedech was not king of the Salem which was afterward called Jerusalem, but that he reigned in the town of Salim near Scythopolis, in the region of Shechem, in the tribe of Ephraim: where that Melchisedech's palace was magnificent is gathered from the magnitude of its ruins.[3]

◊ 1. Left margin: The opinion of the Jews concerning Melchisedech.

◊ 2. Left margin: The opinion of Irenaeus and Hippolytus concerning the same.

◊ 3. Left margin: What Jerome thought concerning Melchisedech.

Annotation XCI [contents]

"But Melchisedech, king of Salem." — Genesis 14:18

Whether Melchisedech was the Holy Spirit.

Augustine, in the book of Questions of the Old and New Testament, question 109, strives with many arguments to prove that Melchisedech was not a mere man, but a certain Power of God — namely the Holy Spirit — who then appeared in human form, just as afterward the Son of God appeared in the flesh. Weighing this error, Alphonsus de Castro, in the 10th book Against Heresies, denies that the book which is entitled On the Question of the Old and New Testament is Augustine's, although it is circulated under his name.[4] And besides the other arguments which he brings to prove this, he judges this one most effective: that Augustine, in the book On Heresies to Quodvultdeus, sets down this very opinion in the thirty-fourth place, attributing it to the heretics whom he calls Melchisedechians. It is not likely that Augustine was so stupid as to teach a heretical assertion, and one condemned by himself; and had he ever taught it, he ought to have recanted the same in the books of the Retractations — which, however, is nowhere found done by him in the whole course of that work.

◊ 4. Left margin: The book On the Questions of the Old and New Testament is not St. Augustine's.

Annotation XCII [contents]

"I will not take anything of all that is thine." — Genesis 14:23

Whether it is lawful for soldiers to take booty.

Ambrose, in the first book On Abraham, chapter 3, explaining this, makes booty licit to soldiers in these words: "When booty is in the power of the victor, military discipline requires that all things be kept for the king." This passage St. Thomas annotated, as opposing the opinion of Augustine, who in the book On the Words of the Lord according to Matthew, sermon 19, forbids booty to soldiers, saying: "To be a soldier is not a sin; but to be a soldier for the sake of booty is a sin."[5] Removing this dissonance, the same author [Aquinas], in the Secunda Secundae, question 66, article 8, says that Ambrose's opinion is true when the war has been just — in which whatever is acquired by arms becomes [the victor's] by the best right; yet the victors can, in this just acquisition of booty, sin through greed for booty and a depraved intention of mind — namely when they fight principally not for the sake of justice, but for the sake of certain [gains]. In which sense Augustine judged it a sin to serve as a soldier for the sake of booty.

◊ 5. Left margin: Whether to serve as a soldier for the sake of booty is a sin.

Annotation XCIII [contents]

"Go in to my handmaid, that perhaps I may have children by her." — Genesis 16:2

Whether hell is only the conscience of sinners, as Philo held.

Philo the Jew, in the book On the Meeting for the Sake of Seeking Erudition [De congressu quaerendae eruditionis gratia], expounding this passage, seems to insinuate that the place and punishment of hell is nothing else than the conscience of a wicked man, saying thus: "God scatters the unjust and impious soul, put to flight from himself, most far off into the place of lusts and of crimes — which place is more aptly called the [place] of the impious than that fabled one among the infernal regions. For in truth hell is nothing else than the life of a wretched, wicked, and execrable man." This same error is attributed to Origen, as you will be able to see below, Annotation 229 of this book.

Annotation XCIV [contents]

"She took Hagar the Egyptian, her handmaid, and gave her to her husband." — Genesis 16:3

Whether Abraham's intercourse with Hagar was adultery.

Ambrose, in book 1 On Abraham the Patriarch, chapter 4, excusing Abraham's intercourse with the handmaid Hagar, seems to hint at two things beyond the common opinion of the theologians: first, that that intercourse was adultery; second, that adultery in Abraham's times was not illicit, because the Law had not yet forbidden and condemned it. His words are these: "But perhaps someone will say: How does Abraham propose himself to us for imitation, since he took a son from a handmaid? Or, what is the meaning of this, that so great a man was liable to this error? But let us first consider that Abraham was before the Law of Moses and before the Gospel, when adultery did not yet seem forbidden. The penalty of a crime is from the time of the law which prohibited the crime, nor before the law is there any condemnation of the matter. Therefore Abraham did not offend against the Law, but anticipated the Law. God, though in paradise he praised marriage, did not [there] condemn adultery."[6] Chrysostom, Augustine, and the rest of the theologians think otherwise, and assert in the first place that Abraham's intercourse was neither adultery nor fornication, but legitimate matrimony, free from all suspicion of baseness: because Abraham did not sleep with the handmaid except after he had received her from Sarah as a wife — as Moses too openly manifests, saying, "And Sarah gave her to her husband as a wife." They add, then, that adultery and fornication were licit at no times;[7] whence St. Thomas too, from their general assent — rejecting the opinion of Rabbi Moses the Egyptian [Maimonides], who says that fornications and adulteries before the promulgation of the Law were not sins — decrees that both fornication and adultery are against the law of nature, and at no time, neither of themselves nor by dispensation, were licit: because both are contrary to the first precepts of the law of nature, which do not admit dispensation. These things being considered, there are those who think that Ambrose brought forward the solution of the aforesaid doubt not from his own mind, but from the mind of others, and that on this account he at once subjoined the second and third solution of his question as though from his own opinion. →

◊ 6. Right margin: Whether before the Law was given adultery was a crime.

◊ 7. Right margin: Adultery and fornication were always sins.

[…continues on folio 559 (PDF p. 376): the next Annotatio.]

---

(printed folio 559 [PDF p. 376]. Annot. XCV–XCVII (Gen 16:11–17:12): Philo making the rational soul God's work but the sensible soul the angels'; Chrysostom seeming to make circumcision a bare sign conferring no grace (refuted); and Giorgio's astrological reasons for eighth-day circumcision. (The source misprints XCV as "XCI"; corrected here.) → folio 560.)

(folio 559, left column → right column)

Annotation XCV [contents]

Whether the angels created the sensitive soul of men, as Philo held.

(The printed text misprints this annotation XCI; corrected here to XCV, its proper place in the sequence.)

"Thou shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael." — Genesis 16:11

Philo the Jew, in the book On Fugitives [De profugis], which he published on the sixteenth chapter of Genesis, incidentally explaining that saying, "Let us make man to our image," etc., wrongly asserts that only the rational soul of the first parent was created by God, but that its sensible and vegetable soul was made by the angels. His words run thus: "Moses, when he philosophizes about the fashioning of the world, after he had said that God created all other things, taught that man alone was formed with others also cooperating. 'God said,' he says, 'Let us make man to our image'[1] — by this word 'Let us make' signifying a multitude. Therefore that Father of things addresses his own powers, to which he gave this mortal part of our soul to be fashioned, imitating his art, when he was forming the rational [part] in us; deeming it just that the principal part should be fabricated by the Prince of things, but the subordinate part by the subordinate powers. And he used these powers not only for the reason just mentioned, but because man's soul alone was going to possess an understanding of goods and evils, and to choose one or the other, when it cannot [have] both. He judged it necessary, therefore, that the making of evils be attributed to other makers, but of goods to himself alone. Wherefore, when he had first said 'Let us make man,' as of many, soon he speaks as of one: 'God made man.' For of the true man — who is a most pure mind — God alone is the maker; but of him who is vulgarly so called, mixed and tempered out of the senses, [the makers are] many. For which reason that excellent man is indicated by the article: for it is read, 'God made THAT man' — that [man] lacking, in kind, the mixture of the [sensible] intellect. But the vulgar man is set down without such an addition. For when he says 'Let us make man,' he signifies [one] woven together out of the brute and the rational soul." This same, already-reprobated opinion Philo repeats in the book On the Fashioning of the Six Days, as you have above, Annotation 17.

◊ 1. Left margin: Genesis 1:26.

Annotation XCVI [contents]

"Let every male among you be circumcised." — Genesis 17:10

Whether circumcision conferred grace on infants.

Chrysostom, homily 29 on Genesis, discussing this passage, seems to indicate that Circumcision, in the old Law, conferred nothing of virtue, or of justice, or of grace on the circumcised infants, but was merely a sign by which the infants of the Jews might be distinguished from the other nations. For thus he speaks: "That you may clearly learn, beloved, that Circumcision confers nothing to the soul's virtue, can be seen from these things which are done. For why is an eight-day-old infant circumcised? For two causes, I think: one, that at an immature age he may more easily bear the trouble of Circumcision in the flesh; the other, that from the facts themselves we may learn that it confers nothing to the soul, but that this is done only for the sake of the sign. For immature children, since they are ignorant of the things done and have no perception of them, what utility can they thence receive in their soul? For those things are truly the good of the soul which are done by choice; but to receive a sign in the flesh — what sort of good work would that be?" And in homily 27 on Genesis, confirming the same opinion, he says: "Attend how God willed Circumcision to be established as a law — not that it could effect anything for the soul's salvation, but that the children of the Jews might carry this about [as] a mark of gratitude, as it were a sign and a seal, and that it might not be lawful for them to be mingled by the minglings of the [other] nations." Hence blessed Paul calls this a sign, saying, "And he gave the seal of circumcision"[2] — for to justice Circumcision itself confers nothing. Likewise homily 40 on Genesis, chapter 17: "There was no other utility from Circumcision," he says, "than this alone: that by this sign they might be recognizable, and set apart from the other nations — the Jews."

◊ 2. Right margin: Romans 4:11.

To this assertion all the theologians, as many ancient as more recent, are opposed; and they say that Circumcision — except for entrance into the kingdom of heaven — conferred all the effects of grace, both privative and positive, which baptism now furnishes: not indeed by its own power, but by the power of faith in Christ.[3] For Augustine, in the second book On Marriage and Concupiscence, the last chapter, says: "Circumcision, in the people of God — which was a seal of the faith of the justice of God — availed, for great and little ones, unto the sanctification of the purgation of original and old sin, just as baptism began to avail from the time at which it was instituted." Bede too, in the commentaries on the second chapter of Luke, says: "The same [help of the healthful cure] Circumcision in the Law wrought against the wound of original sin which baptism has been wont to work in the time of revealed grace — except that they could not yet enter the gate of the heavenly kingdom, but, consoled after death by a blessed rest in Abraham's bosom, awaited with happy hope the entrance of the supernal peace." These are their [words]; against which it is no obstacle that Chrysostom above infers that Circumcision profits infants nothing, because in them there is neither knowledge nor choice: for, as Bernard says, just as now Baptism, without any use of will, confers salvation on infants, so then Circumcision, without any choice of judgment, brought salvation to infants. St. Thomas has this same [teaching] in the third part, question 62, article 6. Perhaps it can be said that Chrysostom's words are to be referred to the highest increment of perfect justice, and to the ultimate consummation of eternal salvation — which indeed Circumcision could not furnish, since Christ was not yet dead and the heavenly kingdom was not yet opened.[4] Or it must be said that Chrysostom perhaps spoke of Circumcision apart from faith in Christ to come, which of itself furnished no help. For Circumcision did not confer grace by its own power, but by the power of faith, which the ancients professed in the seal of the received circumcision. Read Annotation 232 of the sixth book.

◊ 3. Right margin: Circumcision, by virtue of faith in Christ — except for entrance into the kingdom of heaven — conferred all the effects of grace which Baptism now furnishes.

◊ 4. Right margin: St. Thomas piously explains St. Chrysostom.

Annotation XCVII [contents]

"The infant of eight days shall be circumcised." — Genesis 17:12

Why circumcision was given on the eighth day.

Francesco Giorgio, in the sixth Tome, Problem 337, inquiring into the reason of this precept, assigns certain superstitious causes drawn from Talmudic fables and from the ravings of the nativity-casters [astrologers], saying that the mandate of circumcision was given for this reason: that by that effusion of blood the "northern powers" — which demand blood for offense — might be appeased. And the Law commanded this effusion of blood to be made especially on the eighth day, so that the infant's little body, through the space of seven days, might be able to receive favor from each of the seven planets — each one, namely →

[…continues on folio 560 (PDF p. 377): the rest of Francesco Giorgio's astrological reasons, and Sixtus's refutation (Annotatio XCVII).]

---

(printed folio 560 [PDF p. 377]. Annot. XCVII–C (Gen 17:12–18:3): Giorgio's planetary rationale for the eighth day (one of his many "planetary divinations," refuted); Chrysostom on Abraham's laughter as doubt (defended — it was joyful thanks); Procopius on OT theophany-bodies as unreal; and Cajetan on "Lord/my lords" (defended) → folio 561.)

(folio 560, left column → right column)

Annotation XCVII (continued)

each one, namely, on its [own] day, from one of the planets [that is] lord of that day — until, the seven-day course being completed, the infant returned to the same planet which had presided over the day on which the infant had been brought forth. To planetary divinations of this kind the same author turns aside in almost innumerable places.[1] For in the first tome, Problem 150, he asserts that Abraham foresaw the sterility of his wife Sarah from astrological prognostications. In Problem 240 of the same tome he affirms that the Israelite family grew quickly, because, when it had arranged its encampments according to the aspect of the twelve signs of heaven, it received the sidereal influences most copiously from all twelve signs. Likewise in Problem 335 of the same tome he asserts that Aries, the first of the signs, predominates over Egypt, and that all the power of that province depends on the star of Aries. We have confuted trifles of this kind above, Annotation 15.

◊ 1. Left margin: Francesco Giorgio is much given to planetary divinations.

Annotation XCVIII [contents]

"Abraham fell upon his face, and laughed in his heart, saying: Shall a son, thinkest thou, be born to him that is a hundred years old? and shall Sarah that is ninety years old bring forth?" — Genesis 17:17

Whether Abraham sinned by unbelief.

Chrysostom, homily 40 on Genesis, for the explanation of this passage [writes]: "Abraham, seeing the excellent promise, and considering the greatness of him who had promised, fell upon his face and laughed." A Greek codex of Chrysostom — a most ancient one, which we saw at Lyon in the library of Santes Pagnino — had, immediately after this passage, certain words which are not read in the other common volumes.

These are they: "God, that he alone might be without sin, sometimes permitted the just, according to their own choice, to fall into sin: whence holy Abraham too sinned by unbelief, and received punishments from God, so that his seed should serve four hundred years. Moses also, when he did not glorify God — who bestowed on him water from the rock — was ungrateful, and God said to him, 'You shall see the land of promise, and you shall not enter into it."[2] Thus far the Greek copy: whose words, since they by no means cohere with the following narration — in which [the author] testifies that Abraham burst out into those thoughts and words not from unbelief but from immense joy, not knowing what he said — I suspect that the aforesaid words were taken elsewhere out of Chrysostom by some studious [reader], and set in the margin of the present passage, and at last (as often happens) by the carelessness of copyists carried over into the text. For at the end of the sixth homily On Penance a passage not unlike the aforesaid is found, in plainly the same sense and the same words, in this manner: "But, since God was the same, and alone without sin, he permitted the just to be bent by human errors according to their own choice — not himself now impelling to sin, but by [their] choice permitting [them] to walk according to their own inclination. And so holy Abraham sinned by unbelief; on that account he did not escape punishment from God, so that his seed should serve for four hundred years. And again Moses, not glorifying God when he gave water from the rock, was ungrateful, and therefore God said to him, 'You shall see the land of promise, and you shall not enter into it."" The same opinion Jerome embraces, book 3 Against Pelagius, in these words: "Abraham did not believe what God promised, but laughed in his heart, thinking to conceal it from God, and not daring to laugh openly. Finally, expounding the causes of his incredulity, he says in his heart: How can it be that a hundred-year-old should beget a son from a ninety-year-old? 'Let Ishmael live,' he says, 'in your sight, whom you once gave: I do not seek difficult things; I am content with the benefit I have received.' Whom God, rebuking with a hidden response, says: 'Let even that be done which you think will not be; and from your error, by which you laughed, your son Isaac shall receive the name "laughter."""

◊ 2. Left margin: Deuteronomy 32:52.

Paul seems altogether opposed to this assertion, since, writing to the Romans, he says: "And he was not weakened in faith, neither did he consider his own body now dead, when he was almost a hundred years old, nor the dead womb of Sarah; in the promise also of God he did not hesitate through distrust, but was strengthened in faith, giving glory to God, most fully knowing that whatsoever God has promised he is able to perform: therefore it was reputed to him also unto justice."[3] Expounding this sentence, Ambrose and Theophylact hold that Abraham did not hesitate at all, but rather, against hope, believed most fully in hope. Moreover Augustine, book 16 On the City of God, chapter 26, writes that Abraham's laughter was the exultation of one giving thanks, not the derision of one distrusting; and he says that those words too — "Shall a son be born to one a hundred years old, and shall Sarah at ninety bring forth?" — were the words not of one doubting, but of one wondering. John Arboreus, in the first book of his Theosophia (Θεοσοφία), settling a controversy of this kind, says that Abraham somewhat doubted, and hesitated in mind at the beginning, when he laughed in his heart, saying, "Shall a son be born to a hundred-year-old?"; but that the words of the promise which God subjoined raised up his mind — engaged as it was in a doubtful judgment — and thus freed it from all doubt, so that thereafter he leaned upon the divine promises with a most certain and immovable faith.

◊ 3. Right margin: Romans 4:19–22.

Annotation XCIX [contents]

"There appeared to him three men." — Genesis 18:2

The dove descending upon Christ — whether it was truly an animal.

Procopius of Gaza, examining the apparition of the Angels to Abraham, seems to assert that the dove in which the Holy Spirit appeared at Christ's baptism was not truly a dove, saying thus: "God, in the old testament, was seen in a bodily form; yet that body did not have the property of a mortal body, for it consisted neither of flesh nor of blood. In the same manner the Holy Spirit came into our sight in the appearance of a dove — yet it was not a dove, because it did not have the property which a dove has." See Annotation 13 of book 6.

Annotation C [contents]

"Lord, if I have found favor in thy sight." — Genesis 18:3

Whether this passage pertains to the Trinity.

Thomas Cajetan is gravely reprehended by Ambrose [Catharinus], Archbishop of Compsa, because he took away from the present chapter an excellent passage from which — according to the doctrine of the saints, and the very voice of the whole Church — the mystery of the Trinity is elicited: namely, when Abraham in the valley of Mamre saw three, and adoring one said, "Lord, if I have found favor in thy sight," [Cajetan] himself, changing the singular voice into the plural, translated and expounded it, "My lords, if I have found favor in your sight." But it appears that Ambrose is — as the adage runs — seeking a knot in a bulrush, and deliberately hunting occasions for calumny: for Cajetan, by this change of number, in no way derogates from the Trinity of the divine [Persons]; nay rather he establishes [it]... →

[...continues on folio 561 (PDF p. 378): Sixtus's defense of Cajetan (Annotatio C).]

---

(printed folio 561 [PDF p. 378]. Annot. C–CII (Gen 18:3–22:12): Cajetan on Adonai establishing the Trinity's unity (Kimhi); Chrysostom praising Abraham's virtue before grace (seized by Oecolampadius; answered as concerning habitual, not prevenient, grace); and Origen on the Angel who spoke to Abraham as the Son of God → folio 562.)

(folio 561, left column → right column)

Annotation C (continued)

— nay rather he established the unity of the Trinity: he shows that the name Adonai, which contains a number of multitude, is [here] to be referred to the number of unity. Thus you will say: "Although Adonai is of plural number, signifying 'my Lords,' yet that it is here used for the singular the pronoun 'thy' makes manifest." Thus he [Cajetan]. Rabbi David [Kimhi] says that the name אֲדֹנָי Adonai, which is of plural number, whenever it is written with qametz [cameza], is attributed to God the Creator for the sake of honor and excellence.

Annotation CI [contents]

"When therefore the men rose up from thence." — Genesis 18:16

Whether divine grace comes before us, or is preceded by us.

Chrysostom, homily 42 on Genesis, commending Abraham because he possessed all virtues most absolutely, has certain words near the beginning of the sermon on account of which — and many others like these, expressed in various places — John Oecolampadius, professor of the Lutheran heresy, turns it to his fault that he is excessive in the assertion of Free Will (drawn from the schools of worldly philosophy), and quite violent in exacting the powers of human nature, which are nothing, together with the preparation of our will. These are Chrysostom's words: "What excuse, therefore, is left to us after these things, when one man possesses all virtues in himself, but we are so devoid of them that we do not strive to perfect even one? For that we are estranged from all good things not because we cannot, but because we will not, this very thing plainly indicates: that the Patriarch — who was before the time of grace and before the Law — by himself, and by the knowledge which is implanted by nature, reached so high a summit of virtue that it suffices to confute all our excuses. But perhaps some will say that that man obtained much grace from God, and that the Lord of all had a singular care of him. I too confess that it is so: but unless he had first himself done what was his own, he would not have obtained so much from the Lord. Attend, therefore, how he first exhibited in all things the token of his virtue, and so merited divine protection — he who neither received the seed of faith from his forefathers, and yet of himself offered a most religious and pious mind." And a little after he adds: "You have seen how from the beginning he brought forward the things that were from himself, and therefore daily received divine [gifts] abundantly?" This same opinion he inculcates in very many places, especially in homily 17 on the second chapter of John, where he speaks thus: "Hence we can be admonished that [God] does not anticipate our wills by his benefits toward us, but that the beginning must be from us; and when he has seen us with a prompt and ready mind to receive grace, then he offers us many occasions of salvation." By which words indeed Chrysostom seems to hint that the beginning of our salvation is so placed in us that, without the help of prevenient grace, by the proper powers of nature we can merit the divine gift of justifying grace — which is the error of the Pelagians.

But it appears that Chrysostom did not wish, by these words, to derogate from prevenient grace (which he so often extols), but to reprove the laziness of his hearers, and to render our sloth inexcusable[1] — which the very opening of the aforesaid oration openly manifests, when he says: "What excuse, therefore, is left to us after these things?" etc. For this is Chrysostom's fixed and everywhere immovable opinion: namely, that we, whatever good we have, we have from the kindness of prevenient, calling, and ever-beginning grace, and that there is no merit of ours which is not a gift of God — whose goodness is so great that he wills those to be our merits which are his own gifts. And lest anyone, moved by the unjust calumny of Oecolampadius, suspect that Chrysostom did not think as we say, let it suffice to adduce two or three passages out of so many of his, in which he himself speaks thus for the defense of divine grace. Homily 12 on the fourth chapter of First Corinthians: "'What you have, this you have received' — and not only this, but also that, 'But whatever you have' — for these are not your merits, but the grace of God. Though you bring forward faith, you received it from [your] calling; though you bring forward pardon of sins, though thanksgivings, though virtues, all came to you thence. What, therefore, do you have that you have not received? Have you yourself, by yourself, done rightly? Not indeed, but you received [it]; for that gift is not yours, but the giver's. For if you have received, you received from him; if from him, you received what is not yours; if not yours, why do you grow insolent, as though you had what is your own?" And homily 38 to the people of Antioch, which is entitled On Humility and Quiet*: "Let us not be exalted, but let us call ourselves useless, that we may be made useful. For if you call yourself worthy, though you be worthy, being made [presumptuous] you are rendered useless. On that account it is necessary to forget one's merits; for the safe treasury of merits is the forgetting of merits." And a little after he adds: "Do not, therefore, reckon yourself worthy of reward, that you may receive reward; confess that you are saved by grace, that he himself may confess himself your debtor. For we too, having servants, hold them most acceptable then, when — after they have ministered everything benevolently — they judge themselves to have done nothing great. And so, if you too greatly wish to render your merits [great], provided you do not think them great, then they will indeed be great." Thus Chrysostom: who, if he sometimes seems to say something different, is to be interpreted thus — that we refer his aforesaid words, and others like them, not to that motion of prevenient and exciting grace, which always so anticipates us that it cannot be anticipated by us, but to that gift of subsequent grace which in the schools of the theologians is called* habitual* grace. For this no one — as Chrysostom piously and holily judges — obtains, unless he has offered a mind rightly prepared for the reception of so great a gift.[2] Or it must be said — as Anianus too noted in the preface of the commentaries of Chrysostom on Matthew — that Chrysostom sometimes extolled the powers of our nature more than is fair, out of the heat of disputing with the Manichees and the Gentiles, who asserted that man is compelled to sin either by nature [being] evil or by the violence of fate. See Annotations 184, 194, and 257 of book 6.

◊ 1. Left margin: St. Chrysostom does not derogate from prevenient grace, but reproves the sloth of his hearers.

◊ 2. Right margin: The adult obtains habitual grace [only when] he prepares his mind for the reception of it.

Annotation CII [contents]

"Now I know that thou fearest God." — Genesis 22:12

Whether the Son of God was an angel.

Origen, in the eighth homily on Genesis, is accused of having thought that the Angel speaking to Abraham was the Son of God himself, who had first been made an angel before he became man. For thus he wrote: "It must be considered that this Angel is reported to have spoken to Abraham, and that in what follows this Angel is evidently shown [to be] the Lord. Whence I think that, just as among men" →

[…continues on folio 562 (PDF p. 379): the rest of Origen's opinion on the Angel/Son of God (Annotatio CII).]

---

(printed folio 562 [PDF p. 379]. Annot. CII–CV (Gen 22:12–26:18): Origen's "angel" read as office, not nature (the Son as "Angel of great counsel"); Eusebius's "he-goat" for the LXX's Sabek*; Chrysostom seeming to charge the Virgin with unbelief (defended); and Philo's "music of the spheres" → folio 563.)*

(folio 562, left column → right column)

Annotation CII (continued)

[just as among] men he was found in habit as a man, so among the Angels he was found in habit as an angel." I think that Origen in this place wished, by "the habit of an Angel," to signify not the nature of an Angel, but the office — so that the sense of his words is that the Son of God, before he was found in habit as a man (that is, before he assumed the nature of our humanity), was in the habit of an Angel (that is, in [angelic] ministry), when he appeared to the ancient fathers in manifold ways and spoke in many manners. According to which understanding, St. Augustine (Tome 6, in the tractate on "I am who I am"[1]) judges that it can safely be believed and said that the Son of God not only appeared to Abraham and to Moses, but that he can also rightly be called an Angel — whom the prophet named the "Angel of great counsel"[2] — by office, namely, not by nature.

◊ 1. Left margin: Exodus 3:14.

◊ 2. Left margin: Isaiah 9[:6].

Annotation CIII [contents]

"He saw behind his back a ram amongst the briers sticking fast by the horns." — Genesis 22:13

That "Sabek" is wrongly expounded as "a he-goat.".

The error of Eusebius of Emesa — though a slight one — Jerome, in the Hebrew Questions, thought should be pointed out: namely, that while he was expounding the present passage according to the Septuagint edition (in which is read, "A ram was held fast in the thicket Sabek by its horns"), he wrote a ridiculous thing, saying that "Sabek" means "a he-goat," which is lifted up on high by its straight horns to crop the foliage of the tree. Occasion for this error was given him by the Septuagint interpreters, who left in their edition the noun סבך Sabek — which signifies "entanglement" [perplexity] — as if it were the proper name of some place, or animal, or plant: Ἰδοὺ κριὸς εἷς κατεχόμενος ἐν φυτῷ σαβὲκ τῶν κεράτων, that is, "Behold, one ram caught at the tree Sabek by its horns." Therefore Eusebius, placing a mark of distinction [a stop] before the word Sabek, thought it should be read appositively, σαβὲκ τῶν κεράτων — that is, "a he-goat of horns," or "the horned one." To which he was perhaps also led by the likeness of the word, which some among the Syrians report signifies "he-goat," and which the Italians too call Becco, and the Germans Steinbock.

Annotation CIV [contents]

"Isaac besought the Lord for his wife." — Genesis 25:21

Whether the Virgin Mary ever labored under unbelief.

Chrysostom, homily 49, after the narration of this sentence, seems to brand the Virgin Mary with a mark of incredulity, because she did not believe the announcing angel that the conception of Christ in her womb would come to pass without human intercourse. For thus he introduces the angel speaking to Mary: "And because you are so incredulous, believe through this."[3] And after a few [words] he adds: "Plainly, through everything, he led her by the hand to believe the annunciation; and see how great skill Gabriel uses: for he does not recall to her memory Sarah or Rebecca, who were barren and old, because these were ancient narrations, but he leads her to that which recently happened in Elizabeth, to provoke her mind to believe." This same defect of faith Chrysostom seems to ascribe to her at the death of her Son, when in [the homily on] Psalm 13 he speaks thus: "When Christ was crucified, there was none who did good; all the disciples fled; John withdrew naked; Peter denied; the sword of doubt passed through the very soul of Mary his mother."[4] Not unlike this opinion is what others write concerning the doubt of Mary — Origen (homily 17 on Luke), Theophylact (on Luke 2), and Augustine (in the Questions on Luke) — as you will be able to see below in the censures on the Gospel of Luke. There are those who wrongly judge that Chrysostom's temperament — by its own nature hostile to feminine ways — could not restrain itself from attributing something womanish even to Mary, whom elsewhere too, in the commentaries on the Gospels of Matthew and John, he censures as importunate and ambitious. But since Chrysostom, among Mary's other virtues, everywhere celebrates also her faith with wondrous praises,[5] it is necessary to refer his words not to any kind of doubt or incredulity of hers (which would be placed under the crime of unbelief), but to a certain hesitation arising from vehement admiration and astonishment — such as [arises] whenever unusual appearances of events, beyond the measure and order of nature, first present themselves to us. Which he himself indicates clearly enough, when in that place he describes Mary as struck with amazement, in the highest admiration, at the words of the angel. Read Annotations 58, 138, 139, 140, and 185 of book 6.

◊ 3. Left margin: Luke 1[:34].

◊ 4. Left margin: Luke 2[:35].

◊ 5. Right margin: St. Chrysostom everywhere celebrates Mary's faith with wondrous praises.

Annotation CV [contents]

"Again he dug other wells, which the servants of his father Abraham had dug." — Genesis 26:18

Whether the heavens emit a vocal sound by their motion.

Philo the Jew, in the book On Dreams, allegorically treating the history of the wells found by [the patriarch], when he had incidentally fallen upon a discourse of those things which praise God, asserted that the celestial spheres — by the sound of the vocal harmony which is produced from their revolution — continually celebrate God. His words are of this kind: "Heaven, by the perpetual concord of its motions, renders a most sweet harmony, which, if it could reach our ears, would excite in us uncontrollable loves and an insane desire, by which, being stimulated, we should forget the things necessary for [our] sustenance — not fed by food and drink sent down through the throat, but as the candidates of immortality [are fed], by divine and consummate musical songs. Such [songs], when Moses, rapt out of the body, had heard them, he is reported [to have passed] forty days and as many nights, and to have tasted neither bread nor water. And so heaven, the archetypal instrument of music, seems to me to have been so elaborated for no other [reason] than that the hymns of the Parent of things might be sung skillfully and musically." To the same opinion there is no doubt that St. Ambrose alluded, in the preface of the commentaries on the Psalms, in these words: "The Angels praise the Lord, the Powers of the heavens sing psalms to him, and before the beginning of the world the Cherubim and Seraphim, with the sweetness of the singing of their voice, say, 'Holy, holy, holy.' A more express discourse relates that the very axis of heaven turns with a certain sweetness of perpetual concord, so that its sound may be heard in the farthest parts of the earth, where there are certain secrets of nature; nor does this seem foreign to the use of nature." Licentius, speaking to Augustine his teacher about God, briefly comprised this very thing in most elegant verses, saying:

> He fitted numbers to the heavens, and bade [them] ply sonorous measures, and lead equal dances.

St. Anselm, in the first book On the Image of the World, approving the exposition of these, declares it in plainer speech in this manner: "The orbs of the seven heavens are turned with a sweet-sounding harmony, and by the most sweet concord of their revolution" →

[…continues on folio 563 (PDF p. 380): the rest of Anselm's exposition, and Sixtus's judgment (Annotatio CV).]

---

(printed folio 563 [PDF p. 380]. Annot. CV–CVII (Gen 26:18–27:19): the spheres' harmony (beyond our hearing, but listed among Marcosian errors and despised by Basil and Ambrose); the LXX's reversed "we have not found water"; and Origen and Chrysostom holding the "officious lie" sometimes lawful → folio 564.)

(folio 563, left column → right column)

Annotation CV (continued)

[the orbs of the seven heavens are turned with a sweet-sounding harmony, and] by the most sweet concord of their revolution are [sounds] produced; which sound, for this reason, does not reach our ears, because it is beyond the air, and its magnitude exceeds our narrow hearing. For no sound is perceived by us except that which is produced in the air; but from the earth up to the firmament the celestial music is measured, to the exemplar of which our music was invented." But to these things it seems to stand in the way that Epiphanius (in the first book of the Panarion) and Irenaeus (in the book Against Heresies) place this assertion among the condemned dogmas of the Marcosians; and Basil (on the Hexaemeron, homily 2) and Ambrose himself (on the Hexaemeron) despise the same as, so to speak, cavilling, and resting on a most feeble foundation — unless perhaps we should say that these most grave men reject not the very assertion of celestial sounds, but the ridiculous reasonings by which certain inept philosophers strove to defend it, or certain prodigious fictions which the heretics (especially the Marcosians) deduced from it. We have written more fully on this matter in the book On Physical Questions upon the divine Scriptures.[1]

◊ 1. Left margin: This book has not hitherto been published.

Annotation CVI [contents]

"The servants of Isaac came the same day, telling him of the well, saying: We have found water." — Genesis 26:32

The Septuagint wrongly translated, "We have not found water.".

The Septuagint, for what is read in the Hebrew — "The servants of Isaac came the same day, telling him of the well which they had dug, saying, We have found water; whence its name was called Abundance" — translated entirely the opposite: "The servants of Isaac came and told him of the well which they had dug, saying, We have NOT found water; whence its name was called Oath." Which interpretation Jerome, in the book On Hebrew Traditions, condemns as corrupt, saying: "For what etymology is it, that it should be called 'Oath' because they had not found water? — since the contrary is in the Hebrew, and Aquila and Symmachus agree that they DID find water, and that on that account the well itself was called Abundance, or Satiety."

Annotation CVII [contents]

"I am Esau thy firstborn." — Genesis 27:19

Whether it is lawful for a good man to lie.

Origen, in the sixth book of the Stromateis, incidentally touching this passage, taught that simulations and lies are sometimes profitable to Christians, and that a prudent and wise man can use an officious lie no otherwise than a medicine, when it is necessary. For thus Origen, when comparing our dogmas with the dogmas of Plato, left written in that place: "Plato, in the third book On the Republic, says: 'Truth is greatly to be pursued; for if — as we were most rightly saying a little before — a lie is unbecoming and useless to God, [but] sometimes useful to men, so that they use it as a kind of condiment and medicine, there is no doubt that license of this kind is to be given to physicians and to be removed from the imprudent: therefore also the rulers of cities, if it is granted to any others, ought sometimes to lie, either against enemies or for the fatherland and the citizens; but from the rest, who do not know how to use a lie, all lying must be taken away.' Thus far we have reviewed the words of Plato. We too, therefore, mindful of that precept, 'Let each one speak the truth with his neighbor,'[2] ought not to say, 'Who is my neighbor?' but to consider how the philosopher cautiously said that a lie is unbecoming and useless to God, [yet] not always unuseful to men — and that God is not to be thought to lie sometimes, even for [the sake of] a dispensation. But if the advantage of the hearer requires it, [the wise man] speaks in ambiguous words, and utters through enigmas what he wishes, so that the dignity of truth may be preserved with him, and that what could be harmful, if uttered nakedly, may be put forth to the multitude under a certain covering. But let the man on whom the necessity of lying lies diligently attend, so to use a lie sometimes — as a condiment and a medicine — that he keep its measure, and not exceed the bounds which Judith used against Holofernes,[3] when she conquered him by a prudent simulation. Let him imitate Esther, who long corrected the sentence of Artaxerxes, the truth of her nation being kept silent;[4] and above all the patriarch Jacob, whom we read to have obtained the blessings of his father by an artful lie. From which it is evident that, unless we have so lied that some great good is sought by us thereby, we are to be judged as, so to speak, enemies of him who says, 'I am the truth.'"[5] These things Origen [wrote] in the sixth book of the Stromateis. But in the tenth book of the same work, confirming this very thing by an apostolic example, he said that Peter and Paul, the princes of the Apostles, contended with each other at Antioch not in a true but in a feigned dispute,[6] so that by that kind of simulation they might recall the Jews and the Gentiles — at variance among themselves about the legal observances — to concord.

◊ 2. Left margin: Ephesians 4:25.

◊ 3. Right margin: Judith 11[:5–19].

◊ 4. Right margin: Esther 5.

◊ 5. Right margin: John 14:6.

◊ 6. Right margin: Galatians 2[:11–14].

Into the same opinion Chrysostom seems to go, at the end of the first book On the Priesthood, where he most openly teaches that frauds, wiles, deceptions, and impostures — which are done not with the zeal of harming, but for the sake of some great good, and from a right judgment of the mind — are so far necessary that very many have oftentimes undergone punishments for this very thing, that they did not employ frauds. Which he confirms with many examples adduced: first of Emperors, for whom it is more honorable to have conquered enemies by fraud than to have vanquished them in open battle; then of physicians, who circumvent by frauds the sick who either refuse medicines or flee the cutting of the knife, and — remedies being administered by guile — lead them back to health; finally by the example of holy men: among whom Jacob craftily claimed for himself the right of the firstborn;[7] Moses, by deception, transferred the wealth of the Egyptians into the camps of the Israelites;[8] Michal, her father being circumvented and deceived, delivered from death her husband David,[9] whom a little after his kinsman Jonathan preserved from the wrath of Saul by the same arts;[10] Paul, as a salutary medicine, often employed impostures — as when, for the favor of the Jews (whom he desired to allure to Christ), he circumcised Timothy,[11] and submitted himself to many other ceremonies of the Law, which, after faith had been given to Christ, he knew to be deadly. Again, in homily 53 on Genesis, expounding that, "I am Esau thy firstborn," he asserts that Jacob, in saying these things, did lie — but that a lie of this kind is not to be blamed, because he lied not for the sake of temporal advantage or avarice, but that he might procure for himself the father's blessing. Likewise in homily 32 on Genesis, upon those words, "Say that you are my sister," and in the epistle to Olympias, he pronounces the simulation of Abraham and Sarah — by which (as he himself says) "they lied about the kind [of relationship], and brought forward one person in place of another" — worthy of praise and of imitation. →

◊ 7. Right margin: Genesis 27:19.

◊ 8. Right margin: Exodus 12:35.

◊ 9. Right margin: 1 Samuel [1 Kings] 19.

◊ 10. Right margin: 1 Samuel [1 Kings] 20; 28.

◊ 11. Right margin: Acts 16:3.

[…continues on folio 564 (PDF p. 381): John [of Damascus?] and Sixtus's own response on the officious lie (Annotatio CVII).]

---

(printed folio 564 [PDF p. 381]. Annot. CVII–CVIII (Gen 27:19–28:12): the "officious lie" debate closed — Cassian and Jerome allow pious "hypocrisy," but Augustine, Innocent III, and the Scholastics condemn every lie (Sixtus sorts the biblical cases into those who only seemed to lie and those who did); then Philo on the stars as rational beings → folio 565.)

(folio 564, left column → right column)

Annotation CVII (continued)

John Cassian, deacon and disciple of Chrysostom, drawing the metaphor of the medicine and the lie — borrowed from Plato by Origen — to the confirmation of the same opinion, says that a holy man is so to use a lie as if there were in it by nature [something] of hellebore. For just as hellebore, if it be taken when a deadly disease is imminent, is wholesome, but if it be drunk without the necessity of the greatest peril, is deadly: so too a lie is profitable when danger is imminent from the confession of the truth, but deadly when no necessity of concealing the truth presses. This necessity he reduces to two occasions: namely, either when some great loss is to be avoided and some excellent gain to be obtained, or when one must lie for the sake of humility — that is, that one may hide his virtues, under [the guise of] a lie, to avoid vainglory. The former part of this assertion he builds up in book 17 of the Conferences, from chapter 17 to 21, by the examples of: Jacob, invading the paternal inheritance by fraud and lie;[1] Joseph, deterring his brothers with lying words;[2] Rahab, lying for the safety of the spies;[3] David, speaking falsely before the priest Ahimelech;[4] [and] James, Peter, and Paul, descending to the fictions of simulation for the peace of the Church.[5] The latter part of the same assertion he proves from chapter 21 to 25, several testimonies of Scripture being adduced.

◊ 1. Left margin: Genesis 27.

◊ 2. Left margin: Genesis 42:9.

◊ 3. Left margin: Joshua 2:4–5.

◊ 4. Left margin: 1 Samuel [1 Kings] 21:13.

◊ 5. Left margin: Galatians 2.

Jerome too seems to have acceded to this Origenic dogma, in the commentaries on the Epistle to the Galatians; where, when he treated of Peter (reproved by Paul), he judged that hypocrisy is to be assumed by good men in [due] season, in imitation of many illustrious men — of whose number [is] Jehu, king of Israel, who under the false promise of worshiping Baal slew the priests of that same Baal;[6] David, who by feigned madness fled the danger of Achish, king of Gath;[7] [and] Paul, who by a simulated rebuke reproved Peter (guilty of no fault) for the correction of the Judaizers,[8] and — that he might gain the Jews for Christ — circumcised Timothy, and himself shaved his head at Cenchreae, and, the tonsure being made, offered an offering in Jerusalem.[9]

◊ 6. Left margin: 2 Kings [4 Kings] 10.

◊ 7. Left margin: 1 Samuel [1 Kings] 21:13.

◊ 8. Left margin: Galatians 2.

◊ 9. Left margin: Acts 16:3; 21:26.

This assertion Augustine condemns, in chapter 2 of the book On Lying to Consentius, among the Priscillianist heresies; and in the epistle to Jerome he grieves that it was once defended by Jerome, writing thus: "I have read certain writings, said to be yours, on the epistles of Paul; and when you wished to unravel one of them — [that] to the Galatians — that passage came into [my] hands where the Apostle Peter is recalled from a pernicious simulation. That a patronage of lying was there undertaken by you — such a man — I confess I grieve not moderately. For it seems to me most destructive to believe that those men, through whom the divine Scripture was ministered and written for us, lied in anything." Thus Augustine. There is also an open determination of the Church against this opinion in the Decretals, under the title On Usury, chapter Super eo, where Pope Innocent, the third of that name, constantly affirms that it is forbidden by the precept of the divine word that anyone should lie even to save another's life[10] — which determination all the Scholastic theologians follow, most plainly decreeing that not only is every lie a sin, but also that every simulation and fraud, whether harmful or officious, is a vice contrary to truth and pertaining to the crime of lying; for whether by speech, or by any deed whatever — out of a zeal either to harm or to help — someone lies, he is a liar, and every lie is either a sin, or is not without sin.[11]

◊ 10. Left margin: To lie is on no account lawful.

◊ 11. Right margin: Every lie is either a sin, or not without sin.

But to those things which are objected by the defenders of the contrary opinion, they easily respond from the doctrine of Augustine, distributing into two classes the multitude of those who are produced as an example of profitable simulation and officious lying. In the first they place those who, though they lied in nothing, nevertheless seem to have been liars. Of these, some are thought to have lied because they spoke figuratively and mystically — like Jacob, who, though in those words, "I am Esau thy firstborn," he seemed to lie, nevertheless spoke true things: because, according to the divine providence (which had chosen him for Esau's birthright), he truly was the firstborn. But others fell into the suspicion of deceit and lying because, the counsels of their mind being concealed, they were unwilling to open the truth — as Abraham, answering the one who asked about his wife that she was [his] sister, seemed to have uttered a lie and denied the truth, when nevertheless he in no way lied, but only concealed the truth: keeping silent that she was his wife, and indicating what was true, that she was his sister; for she was truly his sister on the father's side, but not on the mother's. To this rule of concealing the truth the theologians refer all warlike stratagems and military ambushes, and the other simulations of governors, judges, and physicians, which — every crime of falsity being removed — consist in the sole concealment of truth. Among these can be reckoned the fictions of: Moses, despoiling Egypt;[12] Judith, beheading Holofernes;[13] David, feigning madness;[14] Peter, dissembling that he ate; and Paul, chiding Peter by a feigned rebuke[15] — which fictions indeed, since they are wholly devoid of any lie, are brought forward in vain for the patronage of lying. But in the second class the Scholastics place those who, without doubt, are agreed to have lied: such as David before the priest Ahimelech;[16] Jonathan before Saul;[17] Jehu the king with the priests of Baal;[18] Rahab, for the spies of the Jews;[19] [and] Michal, for David's safety.[20] But these, they assert, are not to be alleged in favor of falsity and lying, since their lies were nowhere approved by God. For although we read that some of these were, after these lies, praised in the sacred letters, and even rewarded by God with temporal goods, nevertheless it is not to be thought that in them the deceit and lie was praised and rewarded, but the piety and charity and faith with which they embraced those for whom they did not fear to lie.

◊ 12. Right margin: Exodus 12:35.
◊ 13. Right margin: Judith 11:8–10, etc.
◊ 14. Right margin: 1 Samuel [1 Kings] 21:13.
◊ 15. Right margin: Galatians 2.
◊ 16. Right margin: 1 Samuel [1 Kings] 21:2.
◊ 17. Right margin: 1 Samuel [1 Kings] 20:28.
◊ 18. Right margin: 2 Kings [4 Kings] 10:18.
◊ 19. Right margin: Joshua 2:4–5.
◊ 20. Right margin: 1 Samuel [1 Kings] 19:14.

Annotation CVIII [contents]

"And Jacob saw in his sleep a ladder standing upon the earth." — Genesis 28:12

Whether the stars are rational living beings, as Philo and Origen held.

Philo the Jew, in the book On Dreams, intent on the elucidation of this vision, says: "In heaven there are stars, which severally are not only living beings [but rational]" →

[…continues on folio 565 (PDF p. 382): the rest of Philo on the stars and the ladder (Annotatio CVIII).]

---

(printed folio 565 [PDF p. 382]. Annot. CVIII–CIX (Gen 28:12–30:14): whether the stars are animate — Philo and Origen affirm rational, vice-capable minds (Jerome and Cajetan lean so, Augustine doubts), Basil and Damascene deny; Aquinas distinguishes an informing from an assisting soul, and the Fifth Synod anathematizes animate heavens; then Giorgio faulting Jerome's "mandrakes" → folio 566.)

(folio 565, left column → right column)

Annotation CVIII (continued)

[the stars] are not only called living beings, but are also most pure minds." Explaining which opinion more clearly in the book On the Making of the Six Days, he wrote this: "Of the things which are in nature, some are considered participant neither of virtue nor of vice, as plants and brutes; others, likewise endowed with virtue alone, have nothing at all of vice, as the star: for these are living beings, and indeed intelligences — or rather singular minds — wholly good, and not capable of any vice; again, others [are] mixed of both, as man, who is capable of contraries." And lower in the same book he adds: "The stars are rational, and of a divine nature, partly intelligible and incorporeal, partly indeed corporeal."

Origen followed Philo, dissenting from him in this one [point]: that [Philo] believes the nature of the stars devoid of all vice, but [Origen] judges the same [nature] capable of no less vice than virtue. For thus he spoke of the stars in the first Tome of the commentaries on John: "For it is absurd to say that Christ died only for human sins, and not also for something else besides man which was in sin — as, for instance, for the stars; since not even the stars are wholly clean before God, as we read in Job: 'The stars are not clean in his sight.'"[1] Again, disputing more fully about the animation of the stars in the first [book] περὰ ὶρχῶν [On First Principles], chapter 7, he shows that the stars are living beings endowed with reason, which advance and fall short in virtues; and that a spirit was infused into them from without by God, so that within the body of the stars they may exercise the ministry of illuminating, for the utility of men, until the end of the world — in which, when the saints of God shall have attained [their] consummated glory, then these too shall be freed from the servitude of this ministry. And this very thing he frequently inculcates in the last homily on the [book of] Numbers, and in very many other places.

◊ 1. Left margin: Job 25:5.

To the same opinion Jerome seemed to allude, in the commentaries on Ecclesiastes, where, weighing that which is read at the beginning of that book — "The spirit goeth circling round about"[2] — he brought forward these things: "That he says, 'The spirit goeth circling round about, and returneth in its circuits,' [means] either that he named the Sun itself 'spirit,' because it animates, and breathes, and is vigorous, and completes the yearly courses of the orb, as the poet says: 'Meanwhile the Sun rolls round the great year'; and elsewhere: 'And the year rolls round in its own footsteps'; or because: 'The shining globe of the Moon, and the Titanian stars, a Spirit within nourishes, and, infused through all the members, Mind moves the mass and mingles itself with the great body'" — he speaks not of the annual course of the Sun, but of its daily paths.

◊ 2. Left margin: Ecclesiastes 1:6.

Not far from these seems to stand Cardinal Cajetan, who, expounding on Psalm 135 that [saying], "He made the heavens in understanding," says: "In understanding — that is, [made them] intellectual: which is true either as to the substance of the heavens, if they are animate (as many philosophers reasonably think), or as to [their] motion, because their motion is doubtless intellectual, that is, from an intellect." And in another place, incidentally expounding what is sung in the preface of the divine sacrifice — "The heavens, and the Powers of the heavens, celebrate together in fellowship of exultation" — he judged that this can be understood of the heavens which, since they are animate, they too, together with the other angels, praise God. Nor did Augustine altogether shrink from this opinion, who — not daring to disapprove it — left it in doubt,[3] thus writing in the second book On Genesis to the Letter, chapter 18: "It is also wont to be asked whether the luminaries of the heavens are only conspicuous bodies, or whether they have certain governing spirits of their own; and if they have [them], whether they are vitally animated by them (as the flesh is animated by the souls of animals), or [are present] alone, without any mixture. Which, though it cannot easily be comprehended at present, I judge nevertheless that, in the course of treating the Scriptures, more opportune places may occur, where it will be permitted us — concerning this matter, according to the letters of holy authority — even if not to show anything certain, yet to believe [something]." And in the Enchiridion to Laurentius, [chapter] 58, repeating the same, he adds: "But neither do I hold this as certain: whether to the same society of the Angels there pertain the Sun, and the Moon, and all the stars — although to some they seem to be luminous bodies, [but] not with sense and intelligence."

◊ 3. Left margin: St. Augustine doubts whether the stars are animate.

On the opposite side, Basil, surnamed the Great, in the third homily on the Hexaemeron, refuting this opinion, says: "For neither are the heavens animate [merely] because they declare the glory of God, nor is the firmament a sentient animal [merely] because it announces the works of his hands. For thus also dew, and frost, and cold would be a spiritual and rational nature, because in Daniel they seem to praise God," etc. Agreeing with whom, John Damascene, book 2 On the Orthodox Faith, chapter 6, says: "Let no one think the heavens or the luminaries animate; for they are inanimate and insensible. Wherefore, if Scripture says, 'Let the heavens rejoice,' it calls the Angels who are in heaven to joy. Scripture also knows how to employ prosopopoeia and the fiction of persons, and to speak of inanimate things as of animate: as, 'The sea saw and fled.'" Jerome likewise, in the epistle to Avitus, among the heresies which he warns must be guarded against in Origen's books On First Principles, enumerates also the assertion about stars endowed with a rational soul.

But St. Thomas, in the first volume of the Summa Theologica, question 70, article 3, settles this controversy by adducing a distinction of this kind:[4] "That the stars and the other celestial bodies are animate, or living beings, can be understood in two ways: either univocally — that is, by an informing soul, which is the form of the body (such as are the souls of plants and animals); or equivocally — that is, by an assisting soul, which is united to the body not as a form, but as a mover to a movable thing." And so Basil, and Damascene, and Jerome in the epistle to Avitus, do not reprehend those who, according to the latter understanding, believe the stars to be animate or living beings — as it is likely that Philo thought, and Jerome himself in the book on Ecclesiastes, and perhaps even Origen; but they refute only those who taught the stars [to be] animate and the heavenly bodies [to be] living beings according to the former mode of understanding. Whether Philo and Origen are to be reckoned among these is not sufficiently clear — although Nicephorus, book 17 of the Ecclesiastical History, among the anathematisms hurled against Origen in the Fifth Synod, sets down this one too: "If anyone says that heaven, and the Sun, and the Moon, and the stars are certain animate and mobile powers, let him be anathema."

◊ 4. Right margin: In what sense the stars are called animate, St. Thomas explains.

Annotation CIX [contents]

"Rachel said: Give me part of thy [son's] mandrakes." — Genesis 30:14

Mandrakes [rendered] for lilies.

Francesco Giorgio reprehends Jerome, in the first Tome, Problem 215, because → […continues on folio 566 (PDF p. 383): the charge against Jerome's rendering of the mandrakes (Annotatio CIX).]

---

*(printed folio 566 [PDF p. 383]. Annot. CIX–CXIII (Gen 30:14–37:2): Giorgio's "*Dudaim = lilies, not mandrakes"; an LXX flock-marking error; Jacob's wrestling as bodily (Theodore) vs spiritual (Jerome, Origen); the true etymology of Israel ("Prince of God," not "man seeing God"); and Aquila's reversed reading of Joseph and his brothers → folio 567.)

(folio 566, left column → right column)

Annotation CIX (continued)

because, for the word which in this place is read in Hebrew דודאים Dudaim, he translated "Mandrakes," when he ought to have expounded [it as] "Lilies." For how can it be that Rachel, being barren, should so greatly have desired mandrakes out of a longing to conceive[1] — [mandrakes] which are most cold, and especially hostile to conceptions, indeed even lethal to those who take them, as Dioscorides sets forth in a long discourse? Hence the mandrake itself is also called Andraclon, because it kills a man — although others would have it called Andricelon, from a man's image; which experience proves false. Unless perhaps the translator understood [it] of another kind of mandrake, which they call Circaea [Circe's herb], whose root serves for love-charms; yet the root of this, as Dioscorides himself relates, brings heaviness of head to shepherds who chew it, and induces stupor. Likewise of another kind of mandrake, which is called Morion, the same author narrates that a dram of it, taken in drink, induces madness. Therefore the Dudaim are lilies, which are warm and very proper for conception. An error of this kind is also found in the Song of Songs, where it is said, "The MANDRAKES gave their odor,"[2] whereas the mandrake is wholly odorless, and emits no odor at all.

◊ 1. Left margin: Mandrakes are hostile to conceptions.

◊ 2. Left margin: Canticles 7:13.

Annotation CX [contents]

"The beasts that were of the later coming became Laban's." — Genesis 30:42

An error of the Septuagint interpreters.

The Septuagint, for what is in the Hebrew — "The beasts that were of the later [season] became Laban's, but those of the first time [season], Jacob's" — translated in a different sense: "But the beasts that were not marked became Laban's, and the marked ones, Jacob's." [So] Jerome, in the Hebrew Questions.

Annotation CXI [contents]

"And behold, a man wrestled with him until morning." — Genesis 32:24

Whether Jacob contended with the Angel in a bodily wrestling.

Theodore, Bishop of Heraclea — as appears from the Greek Catena of Oecumenius — elucidating the present passage, asserts that Jacob fought against the angel in the embrace of a true and bodily wrestling, [an angel] who, a manly form being assumed for the time, provoked the patriarch himself to the wrestling. Although almost all the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin expositors follow this opinion, Jerome nevertheless seems to have disapproved [it] in the third book of the commentaries on the Epistle to the Ephesians, where, explaining that [saying], "Our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against the spiritual wickednesses in the heavenly places,"[3] he indicated that Jacob did not fight bodily against him who appeared to him in [the form of] a man, but rather contended spiritually with the help of him who appeared to him in a man — not against human temptations, but against the greatest and superhuman temptations of the wicked demon, which Paul called "wrestlings not against flesh and blood, but against the spiritual wickednesses in the heavenly places." And he expressed this sense in these words: "These things we have brought forward, that we may beat back the opinion of those who think that all vices are of flesh and blood, and that the demons have no power to incite us to sin. Such a wrestling we think Jacob's also to have been — namely, that he contended not against flesh and blood, when he remained alone, and a man wrestled with him, helping and strengthening him against another struggling with excessive sweat. And at the same time see, lest perhaps those be ridiculous who think that Jacob wrestled the whole night in the manner of wrestlers. For what is there great, if — as they say — while wrestling he either overcame or was overcome? But according to a reasonable wrestling befitting the patriarch, it must be believed that his struggle was such as they have who can say, 'Our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against the spiritual wickednesses in the heavenly places.'"

◊ 3. Left margin: Ephesians 6:12.

Thus far the words of Jerome, who in this part follows the judgment of Origen — who earlier had written thus on the same matter in the third [book] On First Principles: "Whence also the Angel is said to have wrestled with Jacob. Which we do not so understand, as that it be the same [to say] that the Angel wrestled with Jacob and [that it was] against Jacob; but that he who was present to him for the sake of [his] salvation, and imposed on him the name Israel, that same one wrestles with him — that is, is with him in the contest, and helps him in the struggle — since without doubt there was another against whom he fought, and against whom the contest was waged for him. And indeed Paul too did not say that we have a wrestling with the principalities and powers, but against the principalities and powers. Whence, if Jacob wrestled, without doubt he wrestled against some of these powers, which Paul declares to be especially adverse to the human race and to the saints, and to stir up contests. Therefore Scripture finally says of Jacob that he wrestled with the Angel and prevailed unto God — so that, if there be indeed a contest of the struggle, [Scripture], sustained by the Angel's help, may lead the victor, by the palm of perfection, unto God." Procopius of Gaza, in the commentaries on this chapter, says: "Some — as we have received from a certain learned man — profess that the Devil, in the appearance of Esau, contended with Jacob, wishing to overcome him; but that an auxiliary Angel stood by Jacob, by whose help the Devil could effect nothing. Therefore, lest Jacob should think that he had vanquished the adversary by his own strength — [rather than] helped by the Angel's strength — the sinew was touched for him, and lameness followed."

Annotation CXII [contents]

"Thy name shall not be called Jacob, but Israel." — Genesis 32:28

Many have not rightly interpreted the word "Israel.".

Philo (in the book on Abraham), and — in the book On the Interpretation of Hebrew Names — Eusebius, Chrysostom, and Hilary, wrongly interpreting the name "Israel" imposed on the patriarch Jacob, Jerome censures in the book of Hebrew Questions in these words: "But that which in the book of Names is interpreted 'Israel, a man seeing God,' worn threadbare by the speech of almost all, seems to be interpreted not so much truly as forcibly. For here 'Israel' is written by these letters ישראל, which is interpreted 'Prince of God' or 'Upright of God'; but 'a man seeing God' is written by these letters אישראל, of which איש signifies 'man,' ראה 'seeing,' אל 'God.' Although, therefore, they be of great authority and eloquence, and their shadow oppress us — [they] who translated Israel 'a man' or 'a mind seeing God' — we are led rather by the authority of Scripture, and of the Angel (or of God) who called him Israel, than by any secular eloquence whatever."

Annotation CXIII [contents]

"But Joseph accused his brothers to his father of a most wicked crime." — Genesis 37:2

Whether Joseph's brothers accused him of a most wicked crime.

Aquila, the second interpreter of the divine volumes, where we — according to the Hebrew truth — read that Joseph accused his brothers to his father [of a most wicked crime], →

[...continues on folio 567 (PDF p. 384): Aquila's variant reading and Sixtus's discussion (Annotatio CXIII).]

---

(printed folio 567 [PDF p. 384]. Annot. CXIII–CXVI (Gen 37:2 → Exodus): the brothers' slander of Joseph; Chrysostom self-contradicting on Judah and Tamar (acquittal vs condemnation); Philo allegorizing the high priest's vestment as the world, God's "most perfect Son"; and Jerome's "horned" face of Moses → folio 568.)

(folio 567, left column → right column)

Annotation CXIII (continued)

of a most wicked crime — [Aquila] translated [it], as Procopius testifies, in a contrary sense: κατήνεγκαν δὲ κατ᾽Ι ἀωσὴφ ψόγον πονηρὸν Ἰσραὴλ πρὸς τὸν πατέρα αὐτῶν, that is, "The brothers, namely, brought a wicked reproach concerning Joseph to their father." In the same way, before Aquila, the Seventy interpreters too translated this very [passage]; following which version, Chrysostom, according to the same sense, expounded these words in homily 61 on Genesis, saying: "Seeing the father's benevolence toward him, they were stirred to envy against him; for they brought [an accusation] against Joseph of a most wicked crime, before Israel their father. See the eminence of [their] malice: they attempted even to disturb the father's charity; and things which were not, they feign — accomplishing so great an evil against him, only that they might satisfy their envy." Agreeing with this same edition are the explanations of Theodore of Heraclea, Isidore of Pelusium, and Theodoret.

Annotation CXIV [contents]

"Judah, going in to her, said: Suffer me to lie with thee." — Genesis 38:16

Whether Tamar, in lying with Judah, perpetrated a crime.

Chrysostom, examining the intercourse of Judah and Tamar — namely, of a father-in-law with [his] daughter-in-law, described in the present chapter — seems to think diverse and plainly contrary things to his own words. For in homily 62 on Genesis, freeing both the father-in-law and the daughter-in-law from all crime, he writes thus: "Tamar wished to steal intercourse with her father-in-law, and from that to procreate children — not desiring to satisfy lust (far be this!), but it was a dispensation, what was done." And after a few [words], adducing three reasons for this opinion, he says: "Let no one, hearing these things, condemn Tamar: for, as I said, she ministered to a dispensation; and therefore she neither merits any reprehension thence, nor was Judah liable to crimes. For behold, proceeding by this way, you will find that from the children born to Judah, Christ, according to the flesh, draws [his] lineage. Moreover, these two sons born through him were a figure of two peoples, and a certain prediction of the Jewish and the spiritual life." By these three reasons Chrysostom in this place defends Judah and Tamar, whom in other places he openly condemns — her indeed as incestuous, him as a fornicator. For, in the first homily on Matthew, making mention of the intercourse of that same Tamar, he says thus: "Why did Matthew, in the generation of Christ, bring forward only those women who were noted for some vice[1] — that is, if any was an adulteress, or a harlot, if any was also not legitimately coupled in marriage, if any was foreign or barbarian? For the Evangelist commemorates not only the wife of Uriah, but also Tamar and Ruth: of whom one indeed was foreign, as Ruth; another a prostitute, as Tamar, who had dealings with a kinsman — not only not joined to him by the law of marriage, but [having] stolen the intercourse, and concealed under the habit of a harlot." To which question the same [Chrysostom], satisfying [it] in the third homily on Matthew, assigns three causes of this deed: the first, that he might show that Christ — who had come to extinguish our reproaches — deigned to have sinners as ancestors,[2] blushing at nothing on account of our evils; the second, to demonstrate to us that we are not to [glory] in [our] parents, even in the foul filth of the disgrace of fornication and adultery, if we are adorned by our own virtue (which is not discolored by the reproaches of a parent); the third, to repress the arrogance of the Jews, who gloried too insolently in the virtues of [their] ancestors — teaching that their own patriarch Judah, from whom the Jews take [their] name, committed no small offense in the fornication with Tamar.

◊ 1. Left margin: Matthew 1:3, 5.

◊ 2. Left margin: Christ, who was to extinguish our reproaches, deigned to have sinners as ancestors.

Thus far Chrysostom: whose former opinion Ambrose follows (book 3 of the commentary on Luke), and Theodoret (question 94 on Genesis); but the latter assertion of the same [Chrysostom] Jerome embraces (in the Hebrew Questions), and St. Augustine — who, meeting the reasons adduced for Chrysostom's first assertion, says, in book 22 against Faustus, that not all the deeds of men are to be approved by us,[3] [even those] from which certain good things, according to the dispensation of divine providence, either follow or are signified. For divine providence, everywhere preserving its own goodness, and drawing good as much from the evil as from the good works of men, willed — from the lust of Judah, who, overcome by concupiscence, went in to Tamar — not only to effect something of good, but to signify prophetically certain future goods. For to signify certain goods, it matters nothing whether those deeds, by which they are signified, be good or evil. Aloysius [Ludovico], Bishop of Verona, in the Catena of explanations on Genesis, says: "Judah is not to be excused from the sin of fornication, nor is the fornication to be approved, as [that] of an unmarried man with an unmarried woman: for he sinned in manifold ways — and in others, by lying, by betrayal, and by hatred." Rabbi Simeon [bar Yohai], in the commentaries on the Pentateuch which bear the title Zohar, frees her from all crime, because she did this not for the sake of satisfying lust, but by a certain pious instinct — namely, that she might conceive from Judah the awaited Messiah.

◊ 3. Right margin: Not all the deeds of men — even those from which good things follow or are signified — are to be approved by us.

Annotation CXV [contents]

"And these shall be the vestments which they shall make." — Exodus 28:4

Whether the world is the Son of God, as Philo held.

Philo the Jew, book 3 On the Life of Moses, opening the allegory of the priestly vestment — in which the whole world was represented — says that the world is the most perfect Son of God, in these words: "In this manner the high priest, [thus] adorned, is sent to the sacred [rites], so that, whenever he is about to make vows according to the ancestral rite, he may bring in the whole world under the figures which he bears upon [his] garments. For it was necessary that the priest, about to supplicate the omnipotent Father, should employ as advocate the world — his [the Father's] most perfect Son — to obtain pardon for [our] errors, and abundant grace for the time to come." I suspect that these words are to be understood metaphorically, according to the common usage of speaking, by which we are sometimes wont to call the artificial works of craftsmen [their] "offspring" and "births."

Annotation CXVI [contents]

"He knew not that his face was horned." — Exodus 34:29

Whether Moses's face was horned.

Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, marvels at Jerome, because — against the Hebrew truth and the Septuagint edition — he put in his translation that Moses's face was "horned." For thus that bishop writes in the Annotations on Exodus: "For the ambiguous word made an error in the edition — although there is also a difference between" →

[...continues on folio 568 (PDF p. 385): the ambiguity of qaran/qeren and the defense of Jerome (Annotatio CXVI).]

---

(printed folio 568 [PDF p. 385]. Annot. CXVI–CXVIII (Exod 34:29 → Lev 8:4): the Hebrew — קרן Moses's face "radiant," not "horned"; Origen on Christ suffering for the angels too (a "double victim"); and Origen seeming to have bishops elected by the people (Bodius's use of it answered) → folio 569.)

(folio 568, left column → right column)

Annotation CXVI (continued)

between the noun "Horn" and that which signifies "Radiant." For "horn" is called קרן Kerren with a double segol; but "radiant," קרן Karran. Therefore it is not had in the Hebrew context that Moses's face was horned, but radiant. Which is most clearly understood from the words themselves, which in Hebrew have this form ומשה לא ידע כי קרן עור פניו בדברו אתו —, Mosche lo iadacha chi Karan or panaiu bedabero ito — that is, "And Moses knew not that the skin of his face was radiant." It is not written, therefore, that his face was horned, but that his skin was radiant. From this, then, the depraved custom of the common people can be corrected, who paint Moses with two horns: for horns did not come forth from [his] forehead, but [his] forehead, and nose, and mouth, and chin were radiant. And it is a wonder that Jerome, not having considered the Hebrew truth, did not even notice what the Septuagint had translated — who rendered this passage well: καὶ Μωϋσῆς οὐκ ᾔδει ὅτι δεδόξασται ὃ ἡψις τοῦ προσώπου αὐτοῦ, "And Moses knew not that the appearance of the skin of his face had been glorified." And so the Jews laugh at us and execrate us, whenever they see Moses depicted in our temples with a horned face — as if we (as they foolishly interpret) thought him to be some Devil. From this passage of the Septuagint edition it is known that that ancient edition which the Church used before Jerome was that of the Septuagint themselves. For in the office of the Transfiguration of the Savior is sung, "The face of Moses was glorified" — which is taken from the Septuagint edition, which the Latins used, and whence they also took [their] Antiphons.

Annotation CXVII [contents]

"They shall pour the blood round about the altar, which is before the door of the tabernacle." — Leviticus 1:5

Whether Christ suffered for the Angels, as Origen taught.

Origen, in the first homily on Leviticus, narrating this passage, indicates that Christ suffered not only for the sins of men, but also of the Angels, writing in this manner: "The blood of Jesus was poured out not only in Jerusalem, where the altar was, but also upon that altar which is in the heavens, where is the Church of the firstborn; there the same blood was sprinkled — just as the Apostle also says, 'Making peace through the blood of his cross, whether the things that are on earth, or the things that are in heaven.'[1] For Jesus was offered as a victim not only for earthly [beings], but also for heavenly ones: and here, indeed, for men, he shed the very corporeal matter of his blood; but in the heavens he immolated the vital power of his body, as a certain spiritual sacrifice. Do you wish to know that there was in him a double victim — suitable for earthly [beings], and apt for heavenly ones? The Apostle, writing to the Hebrews, says 'through the veil, that is, his flesh';[2] and again, the inner veil is interpreted [as] heaven, which Jesus penetrated, that he might now stand before the face of God for us. If, therefore, two veils are understood, which Jesus — as a high priest — entered, consequently a double sacrifice too must be understood, by which both earthly and heavenly things are reconciled." To the same opinion he alludes in homily 2 on Leviticus, where, explaining that [passage] from Leviticus chapter 4, "The high priest shall offer a calf for his own sin,"[3] he says thus: "See, therefore, lest perhaps Jesus — whom Paul says to have made peace through his blood, not only [for] the things which are on earth, but [for] those which are in heaven — be himself that calf, which in the heavens was offered not for sin, but as a gift; but on earth, where sin reigned from Adam to Moses, he suffered for sin." This same thing he expresses more openly in the first Tome of the commentaries on John, saying thus: "Our great high priest offered himself as a victim — a victim not for men alone, but also for every [being] which is participant of reason. For, except God, he tasted death for all: not only for men, but also for the rest which use reason did he endure death. For it is absurd to say that he died for human sins, and not for some other [being] besides man which was in sin — as, for instance, for the stars, since not even the stars are wholly clean before God, as we read in Job."[4] He has a similar assertion also in the first book of the commentary on the Epistle to the Ephesians, where, explaining that [saying] from the first chapter of the same epistle, "He subjected all things under his feet," he speaks thus: "In that he says 'all things,' he seems to raise a question. For as to that which is said, 'He must reign until he put [his] enemies under his feet,' you do not greatly seek an interpreter: because those things which are hostile, when they have been overcome, will be subjected under his feet, and will come into the power of the victor. But how all things — that is, angels, thrones, dominations, powers, and the other virtues, which were never contrary to God — will be subjected to his feet, seems obscure. It can therefore be answered that no one is without sin, and that the stars themselves are not clean before God, and that every creature dreads the coming of the Creator; whence also the cross of the Savior is reported to have purged not only those things which were on earth, but also those which were in heaven." Rufinus, in the first book of the Invectives, imputes this very dogma to Jerome — by a conjecture plainly invalid — because he [Jerome], in the commentaries on the Epistle to the Ephesians, inserted Origen's aforesaid words, without the author's name, into his own explanation, no confutation of them being added. See Annotations 170 and 292 of the following book.

◊ 1. Left margin: Colossians 1:20.

◊ 2. Left margin: Hebrews 10:20.

◊ 3. Left margin: Leviticus 4:3.

◊ 4. Right margin: Job 25:5.

Annotation CXVIII [contents]

"Moses, all the multitude being gathered together before the door of the tabernacle, said," etc. — Leviticus 8:4

Whether bishops are to be elected by the authority of the people.

Origen, in homily 6 on Leviticus, seems to deduce from this passage that Bishops are to be elected by the authority of the people. For thus he writes: "Although, therefore, the Lord had given command about constituting a high priest, and the Lord had chosen [him], nevertheless the multitude is convoked. For in ordaining a priest the presence of the people too is required, that all may know and be certain — because he who is more excellent out of all the people, who [is] holier, who more learned, who more eminent in every virtue, that one is chosen for the priesthood; and this with the people standing by, lest afterward any retraction remain to anyone, lest any scruple remain." Hermann Bodius, in his Collectanea, uses this testimony against us; to which he subjoins the words from the fifth epistle of Cyprian to the people and clergy, saying: "In ordaining clerics, dearest brothers, we are accustomed to consult you beforehand, and to weigh the character and merits of individuals by common counsel." He confirms Cyprian's authority also by the example of Matthias, who was chosen not by the Apostles alone, but by the whole assembly of Christians; and as is said to have been done in the times of Pope Leo.

But if the words of each Doctor are rightly weighed, neither of them attributes to the people the right of electing a Bishop;[5] rather they indicate only that this was granted to the people by the rulers of the Church — namely, that [the candidates], in the presence of the people, might be chosen under the eyes of all, so that, as worthy and fit, they might be approved by public judgment, lest any [scruple] after the ordination →

◊ 5. Right margin: The Doctors do not attribute to the people the right of electing a bishop, as the heretics trifle.

[…continues on folio 569 (PDF p. 386): Sixtus's full answer on the election of bishops (Annotatio CXVIII).]

---

(printed folio 569 [PDF p. 386]. Annot. CXVIII–CXX (Lev 8:4–10:14): bishop-election reserved to the metropolitan and clergy (the people only approve); Origen's "Christ still mourns our sins" (recalled to a pious sense); and Origen making Christ's flesh and blood mere "word and doctrine" (used by Bodius against the Eucharist) → folio 570.)

(folio 569, left column → right column)

Annotation CXVIII (continued)

lest, after the ordination, any occasion of retracting [it] should remain. Whence also Lampridius, a writer foreign to our religion, in the Life of Alexander [Severus] Augustus relates that it was the custom for the names of those who were to be set over the Church to be first proposed publicly, so that, if the people had anything against him, they might bring it forward.[1] And this same custom is preserved in our times — not entirely, yet in some part. For first, [the candidate] to be elected is wont to be examined concerning [his] faith and morals by the most approved men; then, when excellent testimonies have been received about him, before he is placed in the government of the Church the people are wont to be called, and in their presence [the election] is declared — so that the election may be approved by the people's favor, and the multitude may much more willingly obey him whom it knows to have been raised to that dignity by its own consent also. But the election of a Bishop itself is forbidden to the people by the decrees of the ancient Councils,[2] as appears from the Council of Laodicea, in whose twelfth canon it is forbidden that the election of a Bishop take place except by the metropolitan Bishop, together with the comprovincial bishops, or the college of priests. To no one, therefore, is it lawful to elect Bishops, except to those who hold the helm of the Church — and especially to the supreme vicar of Christ — and only to those princes and peoples to whom, by a certain peculiar prerogative, it has been granted by the Supreme Pontiff himself to nominate the Bishops whom they have judged fit for governing (as now some peoples do by his authority, and did once in the time of Pope Leo, and in the times of the Apostles in the election of Matthias[3]). For then this was easily [granted] to the multitude of the faithful, [when] the people was moderate, grave, and most zealous for the public utility; but now, since the common people is a beast of many heads, always intent on factions and seditions, this very thing could not be granted except with the greatest disturbance of the Church. St. Cyprian too, in the same epistle cited by the heretics, openly asserts that it is not necessary that [the one] to be elected be inquired of the people concerning [his] merits, where the divine suffrages, brought forth through the bishops, go before.

◊ 1. Left margin: See Thomas Stapleton, in the Demonstration of Doctrinal Principles, Controversy 2, book 5, chapters 12 and 13.

◊ 2. Left margin: The election of bishops is forbidden to the people.

◊ 3. Left margin: Acts 1.

Annotation CXIX [contents]

"You shall not drink wine, nor anything that may make drunk, when you enter into the tabernacle of the testimony." — Leviticus 10:9

Whether Christ still mourns our sins.

Origen, homily 7 on Leviticus, expounding the sense of this passage, writes this: "My Savior even now mourns my sins, and my Savior cannot rejoice, so long as I remain in iniquity. For how can he be in joy, to whom the grief of my sins always ascends? For if the Apostle mourns certain of his own who have sinned before, what shall I say of him who is called the Son of charity? For, since the Lord is merciful and compassionate, he himself, with greater affection than the Apostle, weeps [for] his own, and much more mourns those who have sinned and have not done penance. For it is not to be thought that Paul mourns for sinners, but that my Lord Jesus abstains from weeping, when he approaches the Father and offers propitiation for us." St. Bernard, in the sermon which is entitled On the Words of Origen, most copiously confuted this passage.[4] Yet we can easily recall Origen's words to a pious understanding, if we say that Christ mourns our sins — not that he himself, who is devoid of all grief and weeping, mourns in any way or can mourn, but because he still mourns our sins in his members,[5] when he infuses into his elect weeping and compassion for another's iniquity. In which sense the Apostle said that "the Spirit of God prays for us with unspeakable groanings,"[6] because he provokes us to groans and tearful prayers. Nor do the following words of Origen — which discuss most amply concerning the Church and the spiritual members of the body of Christ — differ from this understanding.

◊ 4. Left margin: St. Bernard confuted Origen.

◊ 5. Right margin: Christ mourns our sins in his members.

◊ 6. Right margin: Romans 8:26.

Origen also has certain things in this homily which seem to allude to the opinion of those who hold that the souls of the saints do not enjoy the beatitude of the divine vision until the final resurrection of the flesh.[7] These you will be able to see on the second page of the present homily, in those words: "For the saints have not yet received their joy, nor even the Apostles: but they too await, that I may become a partaker of their joy," etc. — which are to be interpreted of the full consummation of completed felicity, which the saints have not yet received in [their] bodies. But of these [we treat] more copiously in Annotation 345 of the following book.

◊ 7. Right margin: Whether the souls of the saints enjoy the glory of God [before the resurrection].

Annotation CXX [contents]

"The breast also that is offered, you shall eat in a most clean place." — Leviticus 10:14

Whether the flesh and blood of Christ are nothing else than his doctrine.

Origen, in the seventh homily on Leviticus, running out into an allegory of this passage, pronounces two things which Hermann Bodius, in his Collectanea, brings forward to undermine the truth of the Eucharist.

The first is, that the flesh and blood of Christ are nothing else than the discourse and doctrine of Christ. The next to this is, that that sentence of the Savior — "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you," etc.[8] — is to be understood figuratively of the doctrine of Christ, and not according to the letter, of the real body and blood of Christ. For these are Origen's words: "Our Lord and Savior says, 'Unless you eat my flesh, and drink my blood, you shall not have life in yourselves: my flesh is truly food, and my blood is truly drink.' Jesus, therefore — because he is wholly clean from the whole — his whole flesh is food, and his whole blood is drink: because every work of his is holy, and every word of his is true; therefore his flesh too is truly food, and his blood is truly drink. For with the flesh and blood of his Word, as with clean food and drink, he gives drink and refreshes the whole race of men." And a little after he adds: "Recognize that the things which are written in the divine volumes are figures; and therefore examine them as spiritual, and not as carnal, and understand the things which are said. For if you follow according to the letter that which was said, 'Unless you eat my flesh, and drink my blood' — this letter kills." To the same [sense] he seems to allude in homily 9 on Leviticus, where, discussing that [passage], "And he shall put incense upon the fire in the sight of the Lord," etc., he says: "You, who have come to Christ, the true high priest — who by his blood made God propitious to you and reconciled you to the Father — do not cling to the blood of the flesh, but learn rather the blood of the Word, and hear him saying to you, 'For this is my blood, which shall be shed for you unto the remission [of sins].'" →

◊ 8. Right margin: John 6:53.

[…continues on folio 570 (PDF p. 387): Sixtus's answer to Bodius on Origen and the Eucharist (Annotatio CXX).]

---

(printed folio 570 [PDF p. 387], a dense page of short textual notes, Leviticus into Numbers. Annot. CXX–CXXVI (Lev 16:13 → Num 25:4): Origen and the Sacramentarians on the Eucharist; clerics and temporal goods; Moses's "Ethiopian" wife (= Zipporah); Aaron's rod; Balaam's "open" eye; and Origen on our guardian angels being judged with us at the Last Day. (The source misprints CXXVI as "CXXVII," skipping CXXVI; corrected here.) → folio 571.)

(folio 570, left column → right column)

Annotation CXX (continued)

of sins: he knows [this], who is imbued with the mysteries, and [knows] the flesh and blood of the Word of God. Let us not, therefore, dwell on these things, which are both known to those who know, and cannot lie open to the ignorant." To this opinion Augustine has [something] not unlike, on the third Psalm, and in book 3 On Christian Doctrine, chapter 16 — with whom Thomas Cajetan agrees, in the commentaries on the sixth [chapter] of John. The right understanding of these propositions you will be able to attain in Annotation 196 of book 6.

Annotation CXXI [contents]

"And he shall put incense upon the fire in the sight of the Lord." — Leviticus 16:13

The words of Origen from homily 9 on Leviticus, brought forward for the exposition of this passage, are cited by the Sacramentarians in confirmation of the heresy which denies that the true body of Christ is in the sacrament of the altar. Read Annotation 196 in the following volume.

Annotation CXXII [contents]

"The houses of the Levites, which are in the cities, may always be redeemed." — Leviticus 25:32

Whether it is lawful for priests to possess temporal goods.

Origen, near the beginning of homily 15 on Leviticus, seems to think that Christ forbade to clerics the possession of temporal things, saying thus: "The law of Christ, if we follow it, permits us to have neither possessions on earth, nor houses in the cities. And why do I say houses? It grants [us] not even several tunics, nor to possess much money. For 'having food and clothing,' he says, 'let us be content with these."[1] Consult Annotation 106 of book 6.

◊ 1. Left margin: 1 Timothy 6:8.

Annotation CXXIII [contents]

"Miriam spoke against Moses, because of his wife the Ethiopian." — Numbers 12:1

Concerning Moses's wife.

Josephus, in the second book of the Antiquities, describing this history, is refuted in the Annotations of Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, in these words: "Josephus reports that Moses married this Ethiopian woman on this occasion: that, while he was being brought up in Pharaoh's court, he was chosen general against the Ethiopians, and thence carried off the woman as a captive, and made her his wife — the daughter of the king of the Ethiopians — and that Moses had two wives, this one and Zipporah; which I judge to be most fabulous. Apollinaris also lies, that Moses had two wives. For who does not see that these things are invented by them? For it is clear that this [woman] is Zipporah, the daughter of the priest of Midian — not that Midian is [that] Ethiopia which is beyond Egypt, but that Ethiopia which is joined to Arabia. For the sons of Israel fought against the Midianites, coming into Palestine; and the Midianites came down from those places into Egypt."

Annotation CXXIV [contents]

"And there were twelve rods, besides the rod of Aaron." — Numbers 17:6

Whether the rods brought to Moses were more than twelve.

Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, refutes Jerome's translation in this passage, writing this in the Annotations on the Pentateuch: "Here is omitted what was most necessary — namely, וַמַּטֵּה־אַהֲרֹן בְּתוֹךְ־מַטֹּתָם; ve-matteh Aharon betoch mattotam, that is, 'And the rod of Aaron was placed in the midst of their rods' — inasmuch as he had been chosen priest by God, and held the principate among the rest. This is omitted by the Septuagint, καὶ ἡ ἰάβδος Ἀαρὼν ἀναμέσον τῶν ῥάβδων αὐτῶν, that is, 'And the rod of Aaron in the midst of their rods.' But in the place where Jerome substituted for this sentence 'Besides the rod of Aaron,' I know not whether it is truly said — since it is neither had in the Hebrew context, nor is it even true that there were twelve rods besides the rod of Aaron, but rather [twelve] together with the rod of Aaron: for each rod represented a tribe, and there were twelve tribes; wherefore the rods could not be more than twelve. Therefore 'besides the rod of Aaron' is superfluous; but in its place must be put, 'And in the midst [was] Aaron's rod, the rod of Aaron.' For neither among the Septuagint is there that exception."

Annotation CXXV [contents]

"The man said, whose eye is stopped up." — Numbers 24:3

Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, weighing Jerome's version in this part, thus admonishes in his Annotations: "'The man said, whose eye is stopped up.' הגבר שתם העין, ha-gever shetum ha-ayin — that is, 'The man whose eye is open,' as the Hebrews interpret, and as the Chaldaic [Aramaic] edition translates; wherefore it was taken in the contrary [sense] by Jerome. And I wonder why the Septuagint did not follow the Hebrew — [the Seventy] who translated according to the Hebrew, Φησὶν ἄ ὀνθρωπος ἀ ὁληθινός, that is, 'The true man said.' Whence it comes about that I suspect Jerome did not render it in that way [deliberately], but that a negation is missing in our codices: so that it must read, 'The man said, whose eye is not stopped up.' For otherwise Balaam would be saying things contrary to himself, who a little after protests that he is a hearer of the words of God."

Annotation CXXVI [contents]

Whether the Angels are to be judged on the day of judgment.

(The printed text misnumbers this annotation CXXVII, skipping CXXVI; it is corrected here to CXXVI, its proper place in the sequence — the following annotation on folio 571 is correctly numbered CXXVII in the source.)

"And the Lord being angry, said to Moses: Take all the princes of the people, and hang them up against the sun." — Numbers 25:4

Origen, in homily 20 on Numbers, applying an allegorical interpretation to this passage, teaches that the angels, our guardians, are to be judged by God on the day of judgment — whether they have guarded us with accurate diligence or not — and will receive, for the care expended toward us (well or ill), either punishments or rewards, which now they themselves, anxious about their own salvation, await between hope and fear. His words are these: "The angels will come to judgment with us, and will stand for us before the Sun of justice — lest perhaps something also of that which we do amiss be from them, lest perhaps they have expended less of work and labor toward us to recall us from the stain of sins. For unless there were also something in them which might seem blameworthy in our cause, Scripture would never say to the angel of this or that Church, 'You who have, for example, certain [persons] holding the doctrine of Balaam';[2] or, 'Because you have forsaken your first charity,'[3] or 'your patience,' or other things of this kind, for which, in the Apocalypse, the angels of each single Church are blamed. For if an Angel — for example, he who received me, sealed, from God, for the things which I have done well — hopes for a reward, it is certain that he will also fear to be blamed for the things which have been done ill by me; and therefore they are said to be 'hung up against the Sun,' that it may appear, without doubt, whether [these things] were committed through my disobedience, or through his negligence." And in homily 24 on Numbers, expounding that [passage] from the 20th chapter of the same book, "The woman, if she shall know anything," etc., repeating the same, he says: →

◊ 2. Right margin: Revelation 2:14.

◊ 3. Right margin: Revelation 2:4.

[…continues on folio 571 (PDF p. 388): the rest of Origen on the angels' judgment (Annotatio CXXVI).]

---

(printed folio 571 [PDF p. 388]. Annot. CXXVI–CXXVIII (Num 25:4–33:1): the guardian-angels-judged teaching completed (Origen on Luke, Jerome on Micah, Aquinas: angels as witnesses, not defendants); a twofold order of the blessed; and Origen's staged ascent of souls to God's vision after the resurrection → folio 572.)

(folio 571, left column → right column)

Annotation CXXVI (continued)

says: "We have often said that a care and administration is had, through the Angels, of the souls which are in the Church of God; and we have shown that these [Angels] too come to judgment together with men, so that by that divine examination it may be established whether men have sinned by their own sloth, or by the negligence of their monitors and guardians," etc. Again, in homily 13 on Luke, narrating that [passage] from chapter 2, "There was made a multitude of the heavenly host,"[1] etc., he treats the same thing more fully, writing thus: "If it is expedient to speak boldly, following the sense of the Scriptures, for each single Church there are two bishops: the one visible, namely a man; the other invisible, who is an Angel — the former manifest to the sight of the flesh, the latter to the [inward] sense. And in what manner [the man], if he has well administered the stewardship committed to him, is praised by the Lord, [and] if ill, is subject to fault and blame — so also the Angel. For it is written in the Apocalypse of John: but you have there a few names [of those] who have defiled this or that; and again you have there [those] who teach the doctrine of the Nicolaitans; and then you have those [others] committing this or that sin. And the Angels are accused, whose Churches have opposed [them]. But if the Angels have [such] solicitude how the Churches are governed, what need is there to speak of men — how great a fear they must have, that, laboring together with the laboring Angels, they may obtain salvation? I think that both an Angel and a man, [both] good, can be found together [as] Bishops of the Churches, and in a certain manner participants of one work: which since it is so, let us ask the omnipotent God that the Angels and the men [who are] bishops of the Churches may be a help to us; and let us know that both are judged by the Lord on our behalf. For if they be judged, and the fault and the sin be found not in their neglect but in our negligence, we shall be accused and punished; for when they do all things and strive for our salvation, we shall nonetheless not be free from our sins. Moreover it frequently happens that, while we labor, they do not fulfill their office, and are in fault." Again in homily 35 on Luke, upon that [passage] of chapter 12, "When thou goest with thy adversary,"[2] etc., he speaks these things more openly to the same sense, saying: "It is written elsewhere that double Angels attend a man, whether unto the good or unto the evil part. For of the good ones the Savior makes mention, saying, 'Their Angels always see the face of the Father.'[3] At the same time inquire whether the Angels of the little ones in the Church always see the face of the Father, and the Angels of the others have not liberty to attend upon the countenance of the Father: for neither is it to be hoped that the Angels of all see the face of the Father, who is in heaven. If I be of the Church — however least I may be — my Angel has liberty, and confidence, of always seeing the face of my Father; but if [I be] outside, and not of that Church which has not spot nor wrinkle, or any such thing, and I am reprobate [and] alien from such a congregation, my Angel has not confidence of looking upon the countenance of my Father, who is in heaven. For which cause the Angels are solicitous for the good, knowing that, if they govern us well and lead [us] through unto salvation, they too may have confidence of seeing the face of the Father. In what manner also, if through their care and industry salvation is procured for men, they always attend the face of the Father — so, if through their negligence a man falls, they are not ignorant that there is peril to themselves also. And as a good Bishop and the best steward knows it to be of his own merit and virtue if the sheep of the flock committed to him have been kept, so understand also concerning the Angels: it is a disgrace to an Angel if a just man committed to him has [nevertheless] sinned; as, on the contrary, it is a glory to an Angel if [even] the least [man] committed to him be [kept] in the Church. For they shall see the face of the Father, who is in heaven — not sometime, but always — while others shall never see [it]: for according to the merit of those whose Angels they are, the Angels shall contemplate the face of God either always, or never, or less, or more."

◊ 1. Left margin: Luke 2:13.

◊ 2. Left margin: Luke 12:58.

◊ 3. Left margin: Matthew 18:10.

Thus far Origen: to whose opinion Jerome seems to subscribe, in book 2 of the commentary on Micah, where, expounding those words of the 6th chapter of the same prophet,[4] "Arise, contend in judgment against the mountains," etc., he left this written: "By the mountains he signifies, I think, none other than the angels, to whom the administration of human affairs has been committed — the Canticle of Deuteronomy agreeing to the very same [point]:[5] 'When the Most High divided the nations, when he separated the sons of Adam, he appointed the bounds of the peoples according to the number of the Angels of God.' And contend in judgment, that — whether they be reckoned mountains or hills — it may appear that they have not worthily administered the peoples; or that it may seem to be my [charge], who have set forth such [rulers]; or that the fault may be taken away from the people and referred to the Angels. We read the Apocalypse of John, in which the Angels of the Churches are praised and accused for the virtues and vices of those over whom they are said to preside. For just as sometimes it is the Bishop's fault, sometimes the people's; and often the master sins, often the disciple; and sometimes it is the father's fault, sometimes the son's, that they are well or ill instructed — so in the judgment of God the crime is either referred to the Angels, if they have not done all the things which pertained to their office, or to the people, if — [the Angels] doing all things — they themselves have scorned to hear [them]." These things Jerome [spoke], more (as I judge) from another's opinion than from his own.

◊ 4. Right margin: Micah 6:1.

◊ 5. Right margin: Deuteronomy 32:8.

Divus Thomas, in the first part of the Theological Summa, question 113,[6] kindly and benevolently — as he is always wont — excusing the errors of the Fathers, says that Origen wished to infer nothing else from the aforesaid words, except that the Angels were to be brought into judgment for the sins of men — not indeed as defendants, but as witnesses,[7] to convict the sloth of those who have neglected to acquiesce in the admonitions of the angels. Nor does that seem to be discordant from this pious interpretation of Thomas which Origen brought forth in homily 11 on Numbers, in these words: "Therefore each single one of the Angels will be present at the judgment in the consummation of the age, bringing forth with him those over whom he presided. And I think there will be an inquiry there also — not indeed whether the Angel was wanting to the care of the men, but whether the Angelic care met with no worthy response from human sloth."

◊ 6. Right margin: St. Thomas, part 1, question 113, article [8], to the 4th [objection].

◊ 7. Right margin: The Angels are brought into judgment not as defendants, but as witnesses.

Annotation CXXVII [contents]

"To these shall the land be divided for a possession, according to the number of the names." — Numbers 26:53

Whether all the blessed shall see God.

Origen, in homily 21 on Numbers, upon these words, says that there is a twofold kind of the blessed: one higher and more perfect, which shall see God face to face; the other lower, which shall only inherit the land of the living — that is, [shall possess] only immortality, sublimity, and power. Origen has an opinion alluding to this in homily 35 on Luke. See Annotation 345 of the following volume.

Annotation CXXVIII [contents]

"These are the mansions of the children of Israel." — Numbers 33:1

Whether the saints, immediately after the judgment, are raised to the contemplation of God.

Origen, in homily 27 on Numbers, expounding these things, indicates that souls after the resurrection are not immediately raised to the vision of God, but are led step by step to the contemplation of God through the ascents of many illuminations. For he says: "It is treated, therefore, of the ascent from Egypt to the land of promise, through which →

[...continues on folio 572 (PDF p. 389): Origen on the soul's gradual ascent through its many "mansions" to the vision of God (Annotatio CXXVIII).]

---

(printed folio 572 [PDF p. 389]. Annot. CXXVIII–CXXX (Num 33:1 → Deut 6:4): Origen's "mansions" as the soul's staged ascent (Sixtus objects with 1 Thess 4 — souls see God at once); Jerome's promised land as heavenly allegory; and the Trinity elicited from "the Lord our God is one God" (Kissamos dissenting, with Maimonides' mockery) → folio 573.)

(folio 572, left column → right column)

Annotation CXXVIII (continued)

through which — as I said — we are taught, by mystical descriptions, the ascent of the soul to heaven by the sacrament of the resurrection from the dead. And the names of the mansions too are set down." And a little after: "Such, therefore, shall be the ascent of the blessed soul, when all Egypt, and the Amalekites, and all who assailed it, shall have been submerged; and, departing through each single mansion — those many, namely, which are said to be with the Father[1] — it is illumined more and more, coming from one to another, and always acquires greater increases of illumination, until it be made accustomed to the very true Light itself (which illumines every man), [able] to endure its gaze, and to bear the splendor of [its] wondrous majesty." These things Origen: to whom it is objected, that Paul says, "The DEAD, who are in Christ, shall rise first: then we, who are alive, who are left, shall be caught up together with them to meet Christ in the air; and so shall we be always with the Lord."[2] By which words he shows that the souls of the saints are to be caught up to the gaze of God, without any delay, immediately after the resurrection.[3] But the mansions which Origen says are in the Father's house are to be referred not to diverse times of ascent, but to diverse grades of rewards.

◊ 1. Left margin: John 14:2.

◊ 2. Left margin: 1 Thessalonians 4:16–17.

◊ 3. Left margin: The souls of the saints are caught up to the contemplation of God immediately after the resurrection.

Annotation CXXIX [contents]

"When you shall have entered into the land of Canaan, it shall be bounded by these limits." — Numbers 34:2

Whether the land of promise is to be understood according to the letter.

Jerome, in the epistle to Dardanus, explaining the bounds of the holy land comprehended in the present chapter, indicates that he was unjustly condemned by a certain inept heretic, [on the charge] that he took away the historical truth of the promised land — teaching that those things which God promised concerning the land of promise in the sacred letters pertain most especially to the naked allegory, that is, are to be referred to that land of the living only, which is in heaven; since the whole region of the Jews is so narrow in circuit[4] that it scarcely has a length of a hundred and sixty thousand paces, and a breadth of forty [thousand]; and in these [bounds] too — though the regions, places, cities, and towns are very many — [they were] never occupied by the Jews, but only held out by the divine promise. And in book 13 [of the commentary] on Isaiah, writing things consonant to these, upon that [passage] of Isaiah 49, "And Sion said, The Lord hath forsaken me,"[5] etc., he says: "From which we learn that Jerusalem is by no means to be sought in the region of Palestine — which is the worst of the whole province, and is roughened with rocky mountains, and suffers a penury of water, so that it uses the rains of heaven, and consoles the scarcity of springs by the building of cisterns — but in the hands of God, to whom it is said, 'Thy builders have made haste,'" etc. To this calumny Jerome, at the close of that same epistle, meets [the accuser] with these words: "Neither do I say this in disparagement of the land of Judea, as the heretic sycophant lies, nor that I take away the truth of the history — which is the foundation of the spiritual understanding — but that I may strike down the haughtiness of the Jews, who prefer the straitnesses of the Synagogue to the breadth of the Church. For if they follow only the killing letter, and not the life-giving spirit, let them show [me] the land of promise, flowing with milk and honey."

◊ 4. Left margin: How great is the length and breadth of the region of the Jews.

◊ 5. Left margin: Isaiah 49:14.

Annotation CXXX [contents]

"The Lord our God is one God." — Deuteronomy 6:4

Whether from this passage the mystery of the Trinity ought to be elicited.

Anselm of Laon, author of the interlinear Gloss, hints that Moses therefore called the one God by three names, that he might signify that God is one in majesty, and three in persons — having neither division, nor admitting solitude. This exposition seems taken either from Augustine, who expounds this passage concerning the unity of the Trinity in the third book against Maximinus, bishop of the Arians, chapter 23; or from the first epistle of Alexander, Pope and martyr, who — from a divine sentence similar to this one, showing the mystery of the Trinity in unity — argues in this manner: "If there is no Trinity, why in Deuteronomy did he say, 'The Lord our God, this is God'? If there is no unity, why did he say 'This is,' and not 'These are,' designating [it] by the plural number? If there is no Trinity, why in the same book is it said, 'The Lord thy God is a great and mighty God'? If there is no Unity, why is he not named 'great and mighty' in the plural?" These things Alexander. I pass over — for brevity's sake — Idacius Clarus, an ancient author, repeating these same words of Alexander in the book which he wrote against Varimandus. But Gregory, bishop of Nyssa, too, in the book On the Knowledge of God, against the Jews, adducing this same testimony for the unity of the Trinity, says: "Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is one God." That [word] "LORD, and GOD, and GOD," shows three persons; but that [word] "is one," [shows] one divinity and one nature. Theodoret, in the second book On the Cure of Greek Affections, expounding to the same effect, says: "Moses, when he says, 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God, the Lord is one,' both teaches unity and signifies trinity. For, the Lord being once set forth, and twice repeated with 'Lord,' he intimates the Trinity; and when he added, 'is one,' he brought forward a doctrine congruent to the Jews, and taught that there is one and the same divinity and substance in three."

Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos — perhaps ignorant that this is the explanation of the great fathers of the Church — reproves it in his Annotations as insipid. His words are these: "It is not to be passed over in silence in this place, that Rabbi Moses the Egyptian, the foremost writer of the Hebrews, carps at the Christians and derides them with a long mockery. 'The Christians,' he says, 'gather the Trinity from this passage: for first three persons are expressed, when it is said, "Lord, God, God" — for there the divine name is thrice repeated; afterwards the Trinity is intimated, when it is said, "is one."' Having produced these words, he inveighs against us with many reproaches. It could indeed be that someone more insipid than [certain] of ours — of whom very many are found — said this to that Jew. Now many, unskilled in the divine letters, gather the Trinity from these passages, from which it cannot be gathered; and again, where that divine matter is most clearly expressed, nothing of it penetrates into their minds. This happens chiefly from the preachers, who often wrest the divine letters, while they will have this [word] to be a figure of one thing, and that of another; and it has come to pass that we are made a laughing-stock to the sharp-eyed Jews. A middle [course] must at all events be held: that those things which bear a figure be interpreted figuratively; but those which look to no other [meaning] be not wrested thereto; and it must be diligently searched out, so that where [Scripture] speaks of the Messiah we may attentively recognize [it], but where nothing of this kind is foretold we may not violently drag [it]. For it comes about, from this cause, that we infect the divine letters with most foul fables — a thing which Gregory Nazianzen greatly censures. For there was among the Greeks a race of men, such as [there is] among ours, and which flourished many days before, who → […continues on folio 573 (PDF p. 390): Augustine of Kissamos on the Greek allegorizers, and his objection to eliciting the Trinity from this passage (Annotatio CXXX).]

---

(printed folio 573 [PDF p. 390]. Annot. CXXX–CXXXI (Deut 6:4 → Josh 8:28): the Trinity-from-Deut debate closed (Kissamos on the Greek allegorizers; the ELOHIM/YHWH grammar); then Origen's apokatastasis — the restoration of demons and the damned — detested by many Fathers, but defended by Merlinus's Apology as an interpolation → folio 574.)

(folio 573, left column → right column)

Annotation CXXX (continued)

[a race of men, such as there is among ours,] who heaped up a certain infinite pile of figures, and use it to show that all things — not so much the greatest as the least — were foreshown by figures. I certainly would say that this is not only most foolish, but also most impious. For neither do we say this, imitating the impudence of certain Germans, who have usurped to themselves the license of maligning all things — both gods and men, both human and divine matters — but [we speak so] that we may censure the things worthy of censure, and praise the things worthy of praise. For as he is a Christian who follows neither the Arian division nor the Sabellian conjunction, so [he is] truly a Christian who neither follows the impudence of those men, nor yet fails to reprehend the things which are worthy of reprehension. It could therefore be that some Christian said those things to Rabbi Moses. But this too is not to be ignored: that the Hebrews are wont, for the most part, to fabricate false charges against us, and to accommodate our affairs to [their] vituperation; and we find many things among them which they falsely assert to be ours; and by that nation this has been done throughout — that they might contaminate our dogmas with most impious lies, and [so] are the slower to take up the faith of Christ: for they have their own writers, to whom they give credence, and they find among them our [teachings] mangled with the utmost vituperations, and corrupted with most wicked lies. It is said, therefore, in this passage, 'The Lord God,' because in the divine letters God is wont to be named by these two names joined together at once — namely ELOHIM and IHVH [YHWH] — of which the second is the Tetragrammaton name, that is, signifying the divine essence; but the first is that divine name by which his might is signified, for I think EL and ELOHA to be almost the same. But where it is said, 'God is one,' it is plain that a repetition of [the name] God is made, [and] that [this 'God'] is not co-numbered with those two." But others also may interpret [this] better than we.

Annotation CXXXI [contents]

"Joshua burned the city of Hai, and made it an everlasting heap." — Joshua 8:28

Whether the demons and hell shall suffer everlasting punishments.

Origen, composing an allegory of the present passage, seemed to assert that after the day of resurrection neither the demons, nor hell — the place of the demons — shall be forever, but that after certain spaces of time the Demons, together with the rest of the damned who are detained in hell, shall come to celestial beatitude. For thus he wrote in homily 8 on Joshua: "There is in this also a mystery of the future resurrection; for even then, thereafter, there shall be no Devil at all, because there shall then be no death. For, speaking of the Devil, the Apostle says: ἔσχατος ἐχθρὸς καταργεῖται ὁ θάνατος, that is, 'The last enemy, death, is destroyed.'[1] But let us see what things follow in what comes after. 'And Jesus,' he says, 'burned the city of Hai, and the city was made [one] which shall not be inhabited forever.' You see that these things which follow pertain more to the truth of the mystery than of the history. For that place of the earth is not uninhabitable forever in the [same] way as the place of the Demons shall be uninhabitable — then, namely, when now no one shall sin, nor shall sin reign in anyone, when the Devil and his Angels shall be delivered to the eternal fire, Christ saying to those who have conquered, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father,' etc., but to the others, 'Go into the eternal fire, which is prepared for the Devil and his Angels'[2] — until he provide by remedies for every soul which he himself has harmed, and all Israel be made safe." Into the same opinion he speaks in the first book περὰ ὶρχῶν [On First Principles], chapter 6, where, treating from the beginning of the wicked spirits who have sinned, he brings forth these things: "These [beings] indeed, [fallen] from the state of the first beatitude, are moved, yet not moved irremediably; [but] to those whom we have described above they are subjected, to be governed by the holy and blessed orders; and, using their assistance, and reformed by salutary institutions and disciplines, they can return and be restored to the state of beatitude." Again, in Tome 18 on John, expounding that [passage] of John 8, "Whither I go, you cannot come,"[3] he says: "If anyone shall have spoken blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, it shall not be remitted to him, neither in this world nor in the [world] to come — [yet] not [absolutely] so; but if in the future age it is not remitted, [it does not follow that] therefore neither in the [still later] future ages shall it be remitted."

◊ 1. Left margin: 1 Corinthians 15:26.

◊ 2. Left margin: Matthew 25:34, 41.

◊ 3. Right margin: John 8:21.

That Origen betrayed this same [error] more openly in the exposition of the first and second chapters of the epistle to the Ephesians, Jerome is a witness, in the commentaries on that same epistle. Theophilus also, bishop of Alexandria, in the 2nd Paschal book; Augustine, in the book On Heresies; and Jerome, in the epistle to Avitus, and in very many other places of this kind, detest this error in Origen. Rufinus, however, in book 1 of the Invectives, had asserted that Jerome, in the commentaries on the epistle to the Ephesians, approved this dogma; to which [view] Erasmus also, in the Origenic Annotations, indicates that Ambrose subscribed, in the exposition of the third chapter of the same epistle. But of this we shall speak below, in Annotation 298 of the sixth book.

Now it is pleasing to append certain testimonies of Origen, diametrically opposed to the higher [preceding] passages — from which Jacobus Merlinus, in the Apology for Origen, contends that the aforesaid opinions were inserted into the Origenic works not by Origen himself, but by rivals of Origen, with a malicious mind — in these words: "The dogma concerning the reparation of the demons and of the damned, into which they think Origen declined, is refuted by many of his [own] sayings. For upon Ezekiel, homily 14, he says: 'The Angels, not keeping their principality, but deserting their own habitation, [God] will keep in the judgment of the great day, under darkness, in everlasting chains.' In homily 14 upon Joshua, expounding how many kings were gathered together against Joshua — to whom the Lord says, 'Fear not before their face, for tomorrow, at this hour, I will deliver them into thy hands' — [Origen writes]: 'I see,' he says, 'that today we cannot oppress them, nor slay them all, but tomorrow they shall be destroyed' — that is, after the consummation of this age. For then every contrary power shall be destroyed, and then it shall be utterly conquered, when it shall be said to those who are on the left hand, 'Go into the eternal fire, which God has prepared for the Devil and his angels.[4] The same [Origen] asserts [it] in homily 14 on Numbers, expounding that [passage], 'They were beseeching the Lord that he would not torment them before the time.' The same, in the fifth book, in the explanation of the epistle to the Romans, asserts [it], alleging the epistle of Jude. But if he asserts that they are to be punished for eternity, and afflicted with perpetual fire, then he does not assert that they are at length liberated. Moreover, he uses these words in book 5 of the aforesaid explanation, expounding that [passage] of Paul, 'Death shall no more have dominion over him,[5] etc.: 'Whence I wonder that certain [persons], against this most evident sentence of Paul, will assert that in future ages either the same or similar things must be suffered by Christ [again], so that even those may be liberated whom, in the present life, the medicine of his dispensation could not heal. For they say: Can there be any age in the future, wherein neither anything of good nor of evil is done, but the matter stands amazed, and a profound silence remains?' Again, expounding that [passage] of Paul, 'Have they so stumbled that they should fall?',[6] he says: 'Israel shall be saved; but of this [Israel] →

◊ 4. Right margin: Matthew 25:41.

◊ 5. Right margin: Romans 6:9.

◊ 6. Right margin: Romans 11:11.

[…continues on folio 574 (PDF p. 391): the rest of Merlinus's Apology, and Origen on the salvation of "all Israel" (Annotatio CXXXI).]

(printed folio 574 [PDF p. 391]. Annot. CXXXI–CXXXV (Josh 8:28 → Job 1:17): Merlinus's anti-restoration Origen texts; Augustine's over-generous free will (self-corrected); the Queen of Sheba as Arabian, not Ethiopian (סָבָא vs שְׁבָא); the pseudo-Origen Job commentary's Arianizing and "unbelievers' virtues are sins" (Luther); and its "three troops" allegory of the Homoousians → folio 575.)

(folio 574, left column → right column)

Annotation CXXXI (continued)

[of this Israel] which is said to have fallen from heaven; nor, at the end of the age, shall there be any turning back. Concerning the damned he thinks the same, upon Isaiah, where, expounding those words, 'They shall rise again, they who are in the sepulchres,' etc., he says: 'It is therefore better to say that we shall all indeed rise again, so that the impious too may come into that place where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth, and [the just to that place] where each one shall receive, in his own order, according to the merit of his good deeds, when the body of their humility shall be transformed.' Likewise in homily 18 on Numbers he says thus: 'If the soul have not virtues, the flesh shall not come [into the inheritance], nor the soul unto the inheritance, but only unto the judgment of him who is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna.' Likewise in homily 4 upon Ezekiel, expounding that [passage], 'Sodom shall be restored,' etc. — understanding by Sodom the sin of the soul — he blames some of the Hebrews who assert that Sodom shall at some time be restored. Likewise in the exposition of Psalm 37, he exhorts the sinner to prepare himself in this age against the scourges, lest he be consumed [re-wrought] with eternal fires: from which it is known that, according to his opinion, the fire shall be eternal. Finally, if anyone should desire to know how scrupulously Origen spoke concerning Gehenna, let him read the book of Joshua, where — comparing it in diverse places — he brings in, concerning the land of promise, [the wish]: 'Would that, in the things which we have said, we might not seem to have spoken rashly and perilously.' And in the book Periarchon [On First Principles], where he speaks concerning the consummation, he says: 'These things indeed are said by us even with great fear and caution — as by those discussing and treating [them], rather than establishing [them] for certain and definite.'" Whence, how manifest it is that Origen affirmed the restoration of the lost creatures never to be made, the sagacious reader (I think) sufficiently understands.

Annotation CXXXII [contents]

"And the spirit of the Lord came upon Saul." — 1 Kings [1 Samuel] 11:6

Concerning free will.

Augustine, in the book of Questions to Simplician, question 1, expounding these things, seemed to attribute to free will more than is fair, when he said: "Although it be in each one's power what he wishes, yet it is not in each one's power what he can do to anyone, or suffer from anyone." This opinion Augustine himself, revising [it] in book 2 of the Retractations, chapter 1, [says]: "This," he says, "was said by us because we do not say that a thing is in [our] power except what we do when we will [it], where first and chiefly is that very willing itself. For without any interval of time the will itself is present, when we will; but this power too — of living well — we receive from above, when the will is prepared by the Lord."

Annotation CXXXIII [contents]

"The Queen of Sheba, having heard the fame of Solomon, came," etc. — 3 Kings [1 Kings] 10:1

Concerning Seba and Sceba.

Josephus, in the eighth volume of the Antiquities, illustrating this passage paraphrastically, says that the Queen of Sheba had her kingdom in Ethiopia, and thence came to Solomon. Which thing Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos, noting, left this written in the Annotations on Genesis: "There are two regions which by the same name are called Saba, by us and by the Greeks; among the Hebrews, however, there is a notable distinction: the one is in Ethiopia, the other in Arabia. That which is [in] Ethiopia is written among the Hebrews with the thin s — that is, סְבָא Seba; but that which is in Arabia, with the thick s — thus שְׂבָא Sceba." Which is also noted by Jerome in the Hebrew Questions. The Queen of Sheba, therefore, was not an Ethiopian, but an Arabian Sheba queen. But Josephus is deceived (in my judgment), who writes that the Queen of Sheba [came] from that [Saba] which is written in the books of Kings — [holding] that it was not that which is in Arabia, but that which is in Ethiopia, since at that time she ruled Egypt and Ethiopia. But from all the passages it is certainly gathered that she was a queen of Arabia. And therefore, by Isaiah, in that same passage where he said, "All shall come from Saba,"[1] is placed, "Every flock of Cedar shall be gathered to thee, the rams of Nabaioth shall minister to thee"; and all among the Hebrews know Cedar to be a part of Arabia. The Nabaioth, too, are peoples of Arabia, who by the Greeks and Latins — the name a little loosened — are called Nabataeans. So also David sings: "The kings of the Arabians and of Saba,"[2] etc.; and there the neighboring regions are placed together. In Arabia, moreover, aromatics are reported to be, which she brought to the king. Furthermore, when we shall have said that "Seba" with the thick s signifies that which is in Arabia, it is plain that this woman was a queen of that [region]; because in the third [book] of Kings it is written וּמַלְכַּתְ שְׂבָא; ve-malchath Sceba — that is, "And the queen of Saba" — which name is written with the thick s. Wherefore we cannot approve the opinion of Josephus; nor let it move us that in the Gospel she is called "the queen of the South,"[3] for the Sabaeans, in respect to Judea, are placed toward the South, and that region is sometimes named "the Southern." These things have therefore been noted, because very many among us and among the Greeks have been deceived by the amphibology of these names. But in the same verse both Sabas are, in this place, commemorated.

◊ 1. Right margin: Isaiah 60:6.

◊ 2. Right margin: Psalm 71:10 [72:10].

◊ 3. Right margin: Matthew 12:42.

Annotation CXXXIV [contents]

"And [that] man was simple and upright." — Job 1:1

Concerning the Trinity.

The commentaries wrongly ascribed to Origen, in the exposition of this passage, have two propositions, the former of which Erasmus judges to savour of something Arian, on this account, that its words run thus: "All things whatsoever men do, they do in vain, if they have not done [them] in faith; they act without cause, save in the acknowledgment of the one unbegotten God the Father, and in the confession of the one only-begotten Son of him, our Lord Jesus Christ, and in the illumination of the Holy Spirit, the glorious and venerable Paraclete," etc. In these words the name of God is added to the Father alone, and he alone is called unbegotten, because he alone had no beginning; the Son is called Lord, not God; but the Spirit [is called] neither God nor Lord, but the venerable Paraclete: for by these expressions the Arians were wont to signify, in the Trinity, that the Holy Spirit is great, the Son greater, but the Father greatest.

The second proposition Luther took up in the articles disputed by him, when he asserted that all the virtues of unbelievers are sins.[4] The words of this proposition are these: "That I may say [it] briefly and boldly: All things whatsoever men do — whether in virginity, or in abstinence, or in chastity of body, or in the distribution of their goods — they do all in vain, if they have failed in faith. For all the sanctity, and all the justice, which anyone does outside the true faith of God, he does in vain, he does unto perdition; it profits him not, it aids him not in the day of wrath: to which Paul is witness, saying, 'Everything which is not of faith is sin.'"[5] Of the same opinion seem to be Ambrose, Augustine, and Anselm — whose mind, catholically expressed, you have in Annotation 255 of the book which next follows this.

◊ 4. Right margin: Whether the virtues of unbelievers are sins, as Luther held.

◊ 5. Right margin: Romans 14:23.

Annotation CXXXV [contents]

"The Chaldeans made three troops, and fell upon the camels." — Job 1:17

Impious dogmas concerning the Trinity are falsely ascribed to Origen.

Origen — in book 1 of the commentaries on Job, forging an allegory with these words — [treats of] the Homoousians, that is, those who rightly [hold] concerning the consubstan- →

[…continues on folio 575 (PDF p. 392): the pseudo-Origen allegory of the "three troops" and the consubstantiality of the Trinity (Annotatio CXXXV).]

---

(printed folio 575 [PDF p. 392]. Annot. CXXXV–CXXXVII (Job 1:17–9:17): the Arian forger slandering the orthodox "Homoousians"; a one-line pointer on Walafrid Strabo's gloss; and the long crux on unbaptized infants — Gregory and Augustine hold real (though lightest) torment, which Aquinas mitigates to the mere privation of the divine vision → folio 576.)

(folio 575, left column → right column)

Annotation CXXXV (continued)

[those who rightly hold concerning the con]substantiality [of the Father and the Son], he assails with these words: "Three horns, or three troops, the Devil made as a type, and equal to that three-named sect of his, and to the heresy of the three Gods, which filled the whole globe of the earth in the manner of darkness — [the heresy] which sometimes worships the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit as three [gods], sometimes adores [them as] one, in the manner in which the language of the Greeks commemorates the Triad and the Homoousion. Therefore that most crafty Devil, designating from afar, long ago, this sect and heresy of the Trinity, and its wickedness, sent three horns to plunder Job. For thus also the aforesaid three-named heresy — now especially — plunders and storms the Church." Thus far the author of these commentaries, which we have already shown to be falsely inscribed with the title of Origen, when in the preceding volume we set out the catalogue of Origen's works.

Annotation CXXXVI [contents]

"As it hath pleased the Lord, so it is done." — Job 1:21

Strabus [Walafrid Strabo], author of the Gloss which is called the Ordinary — what kind of gloss he applied to this passage — you will see below, in the exposition of the words of Jerome, in Annotation 227 of this book.

Annotation CXXXVII [contents]

"He hath multiplied my wounds, even without cause." — Job 9:17

Whether infants are punished with the punishments of the damned.

Gregory, in book 9 of the Explanations on Job, chapter 16, from these words seems to gather — against the common consensus of Theologians — that infants dying without baptism are punished, sensibly, with the perpetual torments of the damned. For there he left this written: "Some are withdrawn from the present life before they attain to the bringing forth of good or evil active merits of life; whom — because the sacraments of salvation do not free [them] from the fault of [their] origin, and here they did nothing of their own — [yet] they come thither also, unto torments: and because after this death an eternal death also follows, by a hidden yet just judgment upon them, even without cause the wounds are multiplied. For they suffer perpetual torments, who sinned nothing of their own will. Job says, therefore, 'In a whirlwind he shall break me, and shall multiply my wounds, even without cause,' as if, openly considering the losses of the human race, he should say: The strict Judge — with what aversion he slays those whom he condemns by the fault of their own action, so also he smites in eternity those whom the guilt of [free] choice does not condemn."

This Gregory [holds], following, no doubt, the decree of Augustine, who in the book On Faith, to Peter, chapter 27, decreed concerning this matter in these words: "Most firmly hold, and by no means doubt, that not only men now using reason, but also little ones — who, whether they begin to live in the wombs of their mothers and there die, or, born of their mothers, pass out of this world without the sacrament of holy baptism, which is given in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit — are to be punished with the everlasting punishment of eternal fire: because, although they had no sin of their own action properly [committed], they nevertheless drew the damnation of original sin by carnal conception and nativity." And in the same book, chapter 3, he more openly expresses that infants of this kind are smitten with the same quality of punishment as the Demons and the rest of the damned, saying: "The evil quality of life begins from unbelief, which takes its beginning from original sin; in which [life] whosoever begins so to live, that he ends [it] before his life be loosed by his [Christ's] obligation — if that soul lived in the body for the space of one age or of one hour, it is necessary that it sustain, with that same body, the interminable punishments of Gehenna, where the Devil with his Angels shall burn forever; where, together with him, [there shall be] also the fornicators who serve idols, the adulterers, the effeminate, the thieves, the avaricious, and all who do the works of the flesh — [all these], if before the end of this life they have not been converted, shall be burned with eternal fires." Again, in the sermon On the Baptism of little ones, confirming this his opinion by the argument of Gospel authority, he says: "Since the Gospel speaks [of] two parts, Christ made a right hand and a left; being about to say to those on the left, 'Go, ye cursed, into the eternal fire, which is prepared for the Devil and his Angels,' [and] about to say to those on the right, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, possess the kingdom' — no middle place is here left, where you might set the infants; and in the final sentence he says, 'These shall go into eternal burning, but the just into life eternal.' Behold, he has expounded to you what the kingdom is, and what the eternal fire: so that, when you confess the little one [is] not to be in the kingdom, you may confess [he is] to be in the eternal fire."[1] And this same thing he repeats — in fuller words, but plainly in the same sense — in the fifth book of the Hypognosticon, showing that by the same kind of punishment the little ones not baptized, and adults, and demons, are afflicted.

◊ 1. Right margin: Matthew 25:34, 41.

But as to what pertains to the quantity of the punishment, everywhere he teaches that the torments of infants are the lightest[2] — but especially in the fifth book against Julian the Pelagian, speaking thus: "But I do not say that the little ones dying without the baptism of Christ are to be smitten with so great a punishment that it were rather expedient for them not to be born — since the Lord said this not of any sinners whatsoever, but of the most wicked and most impious. For if — as [is plain] because he says it of the Sodomites, and surely willed [it] to be understood not of them alone — one shall be punished more tolerably than another in the day of judgment, who would doubt that the little ones not baptized, who had only original sin and are not aggravated by their own vices, shall be, in the damnation of all, the most lightly [punished]?" This same thing he has also in book 1 On the Merits and Remission of sins, chapter 16, and in the Enchiridion to Laurentius, chapter 93, where he speaks thus: "Most mild, surely, of all, shall be the punishment of those who, besides the sin which they drew as original, added none in addition; and, among the rest who added [sins of their own], each one shall have there a damnation the more tolerable, the less iniquity he had here." Gennadius, priest of Marseille, thinks that Augustine in this part erred through much-speaking. For in the Catalogue of Illustrious Men [he says]: "Augustine, although he treated the doubt concerning aborted [infants] with less capacity, yet his error — exaggerated (as I said above) by much discourse, [and] by the struggle with enemies — has not yet given [material for] a heresy-question." These things Gennadius.

◊ 2. Right margin: Of what sort the future punishment of little ones dying without baptism shall be, in the judgment of St. Augustine.

St. Thomas, in the Disputed Questions, in the question On the Punishment of Original Sin, article 2, mitigating the propositions of Gregory and Augustine, said that they wished to signify, by "fire," "Gehenna," and "torments," nothing else than the privation of the divine vision — which alone the infants not yet reborn lack; but this privation those fathers called by such harsh names, through a certain excess of speaking, that they might render much more execrable the error of the Pelagians, who preached that in little ones there is no sin at all. But Gregory [of Rimini] →

[…continues on folio 576 (PDF p. 393): Gregory of Rimini and the other scholastics on the punishment of unbaptized infants (Annotatio CXXXVII).]

---

(printed folio 576 [PDF p. 393]. Annot. CXXXVII–CXLI (Job 9:17–20:26): Gregory of Rimini's literal severity on infants; Luther on "sinning in every work" (answered by Fisher); whether the blessed see earthly things (Gregory vs Augustine); souls blessed at once (Bunderius on purgatory); and whether hell-fire is incorporeal (Gregory's text shown corrupt — "corporeus") → folio 577.)

(folio 576, left column → right column)

Annotation CXXXVII (continued)

But Gregory of Rimini, in the second [book] of the Sentences, distinction 31, question 3, tenaciously holding the sayings of each doctor, judges that they are to be understood according to that rigidity which the severity of the words conveys.[1]

◊ 1. Left margin: The Pelagians taught that in little ones, even before baptism, there is no sin.

Annotation CXXXVIII [contents]

"I feared all my works." — Job 9:28

Whether the just man sins in every work [he does].

Gregory, in book 9 of the Explanations on Job, explaining this, says: "By the holy man Job it is rightly said, 'I feared all my works,' as if it were said, with humble confession: What I have done openly, I see; but what may lie hidden in these [works], I know not." Luther, in the compendium of the Articles of his perfidy, article 35, uses these words for the confirmation of his perverse dogma, whereby he teaches that no just man is certain that he does not always sin mortally in every work [he does]. John [Fisher], Bishop of Rochester, writing against Luther, demonstrates that he adduced these words truncatedly and beside the point; by which [words] indeed we are admonished to fear concerning good works — not that those good and holy works are (as Luther affirms) evil, and annexed to sins, but lest, from the consideration of them, we be either lifted up into pride, or slip into sloth and torpor.[2] And that this was Gregory's meaning, the preceding words of his — craftily omitted by Luther — most openly indicate.

◊ 2. Left margin: Concerning good works we must fear, lest from their consideration we be either lifted up into pride, or slip into sloth and torpor.

Annotation CXXXIX [contents]

"Whether his sons be noble, or ignoble, he shall not understand [it]." — Job 14:21

Whether the souls of the blessed see all things which are done here.

Gregory, in book 12 of the commentaries on Job, chapter 13, speaking concerning the knowledge of the blessed, seems to disagree from the opinion of Augustine, saying that the souls of the saints, seeing God, behold all things which are done here among us. For thus he speaks: "The dead know not how the life in the flesh, [lived] after them, is disposed — because the life of the spirit is far from the life of the flesh; and as corporeal and incorporeal things are diverse in kind, so also [they are] distinct in cognition. Yet concerning the holy souls this is not to be thought; because those who within behold all things by the charity of the omnipotent God, it is in no way to be believed that outwardly there is anything of which they are ignorant." But Augustine, in the book On the care to be had for the dead, chapter 13, writes diversely, affirming that the dead — even the saints — know not what the living do, even their own children, as among Isaiah the Israelites complain, saying, "Abraham hath not known us, and Israel hath been ignorant of us."[3] Which he confirms also by the example of his own mother Monica, saying: "If the souls of the dead were present in the affairs of the living — to say nothing of others — my own pious mother would in no way desert me, [she] who followed me by land and sea, that she might live with me; for far be it that she has been made, by a happier life, cruel. But if parents are not present, who are those other of the dead who [might] know what we do, [or] what we suffer?" St. Thomas, in the first part of the Summa of Theology, question 89, article 8, judges that Augustine brought these things forth by way of doubting, not of asserting — which Augustine himself also indicated, when he said, "Let each one take, as he will, what I [shall] say."

◊ 3. Left margin: Isaiah 63:16.

Annotation CXL [contents]

"After darkness I hope for light." — Job 17:12

Whether the souls of Christians are blessed immediately after this life.

Gregory, in book 13 of the Explanations on Job, chapter 20, writes these things: "Because by the grace of our Author we have been redeemed, this we now have as of a heavenly gift: that, when we are withdrawn from the inhabitation of our flesh, we may at once be led to the heavenly rewards; because, while our Creator and Redeemer, penetrating the bars of hell, leads forth thence the souls of the elect, he does not suffer us to go thither — whence he has already, by descending, freed others." That this passage has been distorted by the Lutherans to overthrow the faith of purgatory, John Bunderius is a witness, in title 18 of his Concertations, where, refuting these same heretics, he says: "Gregory did not wish, by these words, to deny Purgatory — which in the fourth [book] of the Dialogues, and elsewhere, he so diligently confirmed through the Scriptures and histories; but he wished to insinuate this: that we are not now excluded from the kingdom of heaven, when migrating from life, as the Fathers of the Old Testament were excluded before Christ's passion. For they, however much purged, were nevertheless still excluded; but this is now not so. And that this was his intention is plain from what follows: for he adds, 'Those who, before his coming into this world, departed — however much justice-virtue they had — being led out of [their] bodies, could in no way at once be received into the bosom of the heavenly fatherland, because he had not yet come who by his descent should loose the bars of hell, and place the souls of the just in [their] perpetual seat.'"

Annotation CXLI [contents]

"A fire that is not kindled shall devour him." — Job 20:26

Whether the fire of hell is incorporeal.

Gregory, in book 15 of the Morals, seems from these words to deduce that the fire of hell is incorporeal, and diverse in kind from this fire of ours — which indeed Jerome, writing to Avitus, reckons among the condemned assertions of Origen. The words from chapter 15 of the Morals run thus: "'A fire that is not kindled shall devour him': in a very wonderful manner, in few words, is the fire of gehenna expressed. For our fire is corporeal, and, that it may avail to be fire, needs corporeal fuel; and, when it must be maintained, is without doubt nourished by heaped-up wood — nor can it be [fire] unless kindled, nor subsist unless refreshed. But, on the contrary, the fire of gehenna, since it is incorporeal, and burns corporeally the reprobates cast into it, is neither kindled by human effort, nor nourished by wood, but, once created, endures inextinguishable; and needs no kindling, and lacks no heat." Of this opinion of Gregory's seem to have been Augustine, in book 12 On Genesis to the letter, where he taught that the place to which souls are borne after death is not corporeal but spiritual; and John Damascene, who concluded the end of book 4 On the Orthodox Faith with these words: "And the Devil shall be delivered, and his Demons, and his man — that is, Antichrist — and the impious, and sinners, into the eternal fire: not material, such as is with us, but such as God knoweth."

But that Gregory did not think so is clearly demonstrated in book 4 of the Dialogues, chapter 29, where, to Peter asking whether he would confess the fire of gehenna to be incorporeal or corporeal, he answers: "That the fire of gehenna is corporeal I do not doubt, in which it is certain that bodies are tormented." Wherefore it is to be known that these words of Gregory, in all the Lyons codices of Hugh à Porta, and in some manuscript exemplars, are read corruptly:[4] for where in these is had, "The fire of gehenna, since it is *in*corporeal," the syllable "In" ought to have been deleted, so that, in place of the word "Incorporeus," might be read "Corporeus"[5] — for the following words of Gregory openly show this; and in this manner St. Thomas cites them, in the fourth volume of the Sentences, distinction 44, question 3, saying: →

◊ 4. Right margin: The passage of St. Gregory is corrupt.

◊ 5. Right margin: The fire of Gehenna is corporeal.

[…continues on folio 577 (PDF p. 394): Aquinas's citation of Gregory, and the corporeal nature of hell-fire (Annotatio CXLI).]

---

(printed folio 577 [PDF p. 394]. Annot. CXLI–CXLV (Job 20:26–42:16): hell-fire shown corporeal (Aquinas softening Damascene; Durandus blunter); whether Angels and souls are corporeal (Faustus abusing Jerome, refuted by Claudianus Mamertus); whether the Son is "always born" (Gregory vs Origen, reconciled by Peter Lombard); the pseudo-Origen Job commentary again censuring the orthodox; and whether anyone can be sure he does not always sin (Gregory) → folio 578.)

(folio 577, left column → right column)

Annotation CXLI (continued)

saying that from this passage it cannot be deduced that the fire of hell is of another nature and species than this [our fire] is: "for although in these fires certain diverse properties may be found, yet of both the nature, form, and substance is the same." But as to that which was brought forward from Damascene, Durandus of Saint-Pourçain, in the fourth [book] of the Sentences, freely pronounces that that author erred, thinking wrongly in this part.

But St. Thomas, as is his custom, treating Damascene urbanely and benignly, says that his mind can be interpreted in a twofold manner: first, that we understand him not simply to have denied the material fire of Hell, but [to have denied] that it is material in the same way as ours, which is distinguished from that fire by several properties. Secondly, that we understand him not to have denied the fire of Hell to be material as to substance, but as to the effect of punishment: for it punishes bodies by a certain spiritual action,[1] which it neither dissolves nor consumes, and torments the souls themselves much more spiritually. What is to be answered to Augustine's opinion, you have above, Annotation 40.

◊ 1. Left margin: In what manner the fire of Hell punishes bodies.

Annotation CXLII [contents]

"The stars are not clean in his sight." — Job 25:5

Whether the nature of Angels and Souls is corporeal.

Jerome, in the commentaries inscribed with his name, treating this passage, says: "For if the Angels, and even the bodies of the heavens, are said to be unclean in comparison to God, what do you think man is to be esteemed, since he himself is rottenness?" Faustus, a bishop in Gaul around the year of the Lord 430, elicits from these words that Jerome was of the opinion of those who taught that the nature of Souls and Angels is corporeal. For thus he wrote at the beginning of his book On [the nature of] creatures: "The most learned of the Fathers define that whatever is created is a body, and assert that the nature of Souls and Angels is corporeal, for the reason that in its beginning it is circumscribed by [place] and space. For, as we read in a certain treatise of St. Jerome: 'They think,' he says, 'that the globes of the stars are embodied spirits.' And likewise, 'If the angels — the heavenly bodies too — in comparison to God are said to be unclean, what do you think man is to be esteemed?'" Claudianus [Mamertus], bishop of Vienne in Gaul, in the second book On the State of the Soul, refuting Faustus (who asserted all created things to be corporeal), shows that this testimony was rashly and wrongly usurped by him — inasmuch as it makes nothing to the point, nor serves Faustus's aim. But what the Fathers thought concerning this matter, you have below, Annotation 35 of book 6.

Annotation CXLIII [contents]

"Didst thou, after thy rising, command the daybreak?" — Job 38:12

Whether the Son of God is always begotten and always born.

Gregory, at the beginning of book 29 on Job, undertaking the explanation of this passage, indicates that it cannot rightly be said that the Son of God is always begotten by the Father and always being born, writing thus: "The Lord God Jesus, in that which he is the virtue and wisdom of God, was born of the Father before the ages — or rather, because he neither began to be born nor ceased, let us say more truly: [he is] always born; but we cannot say [he is] always being born, lest he seem to be imperfect. Yet, that he may be able to be designated eternal, let us say [he is] both perfect and always born — inasmuch as 'born' pertains to perfection, and 'always' to eternity. Although, by this very [word] which we say, 'perfect,' we deviate much from the expression of that truth — because what is not made cannot properly be called perfect; but, stammering as we can, let us echo the excellencies of God, [seeing that] the Lord, condescending to the words of our infirmity, says, 'Be perfect, as your heavenly Father also is perfect.'"[2]

◊ 2. Right margin: Matthew 5:48.

These things Gregory: against whom Origen seems to cry out, in the second homily on Jeremiah, showing that the Son of God is perpetually born, in these words: "Our Savior is the wisdom of God; the wisdom is the splendor of eternal light; our Savior therefore is the splendor of charity. But the splendor is not born once and ceases: rather, as often as the light from which the splendor arises has arisen, so often does the splendor of charity also arise. So therefore the Savior is always born. Whence he says in the book of Wisdom, 'Before all the hills the Lord begets me' — not, as some read badly, 'he begot me.'"[3]

◊ 3. Right margin: Proverbs 8:25.

Peter Lombard, in the first book of the Sentences, distinction 9, settles a controversy of this kind, speaking in this manner: "But, lest such great authors seem to contradict themselves in so great a matter, let us interpret those words of Gregory benignly. 'The Lord Jesus,' he says, 'was born of the Father before the ages — or rather, because he neither began to be born nor ceases, let us say more truly: he is always born.' But how is this said more truly — namely, that the Son is always born — than that [other], that he was born of the Father before the ages? For the sincere and catholic faith holds and preaches that [latter], as [it does] this. Why then does he say 'let us say more truly,' since both are equally true, unless because he wished this to be understood as said unto a greater evidence and expression of the truth than that? For by these words all approach is barred to heretics of every calumnious turn, by which [words] Christ, according to [his] deity, is shown to be a generation without beginning and without end, and perfect; whereas the truth is not so openly manifested when it is said, 'The Son was begotten of the Father before the ages,' or 'The Son is always born of the Father.' And therefore Gregory said that we cannot say 'he is always being born' — not, I say, so conveniently, not so congruously to the explanation of the truth. Yet it can be said, if it be soundly understood: for the Son is always born of the Father, as Origen says — not that that generation is repeated daily, but because it always is; therefore he is always born, that is, his nativity is eternal."

Annotation CXLIV [contents]

"Out of whose womb came the ice? and the frost from heaven who hath begotten it?" — Job 38:29

The author of the commentary on Job which is falsely attributed to Origen thought wrongly concerning the Trinity.

The explanation falsely inscribed under Origen's name, expounding this sentence (under pretense of elucidating it), seems to censure the Homoousians — that is, those who believe the Son consubstantial with the Father — in very ambiguous and obscure words, saying: "Read these things thou, with judgment, among the Homousiasts," etc.: read, and weigh what it means.

Annotation CXLV [contents]

"He died an old man, and full of days." — Job 42:16

Whether anyone may be certain that he does not always sin.

Gregory, at the end of book 35 of the Morals, says: "What place of safety remains among these things, when even our evils are more evil [than we suppose], and our good things — which we believe ourselves to have — can by no means be pure goods?" →

[...continues on folio 578 (PDF p. 395): the rest of Gregory on whether anyone can be certain he does not sin (Annotatio CXLV).]

---

(printed folio 578 [PDF p. 395]. Annot. CXLV–CXLVIII (Job 42:16–Ps 1:5): Luther on whether one always sins (vs. Fisher); Origen's γενητόν/γεννητόν Trinity slip (Epiphanius); Ambrose on angels before the world; and Origen making the risen body rise only in the same species → folio 579.)

(folio 578, left column → right column)

Annotation CXLV (continued)

Martin Luther, in the book of his Articles, article 35, strives by this testimony to show that no one is certain that he does not always sin mortally: because no pure good is ever done by us, nor can it be done. John [Fisher], Bishop of Rochester, in the confutation of that same article, says that Gregory does not speak of all our good works, but only of those which we ourselves approve as good, and in which we take complacency; and for this reason (he says) [Gregory] said that the goods which we believe ourselves to have cannot be pure goods, because in them we applaud ourselves, and vainly glory in their goodness.

Annotation CXLVI [contents]

"Blessed is the man who hath not walked [in the counsel of the ungodly]." — Psalm 1:1

Origen seems to have thought wrongly concerning the Trinity.

Origen, about to expound this Psalm, when in the very preface he implored God as the helper of the future work, says: "Since nothing can be good without God — and especially the divinely-inspired Scripture of understanding — let us ask the Father of all, the God, through our Savior and high priest the begotten [γεννητόν] God, that it be given us first that we may rightly seek," etc. Epiphanius, in the second book against heresies, charges Origen that, whereas he could and ought to have called Christ God γεννητόν [begotten] with a double n (for that signifies "begotten"), he preferred to name him γενητόν [made] with a single n — which indeed sounds "made": namely, so that from this one word he might maliciously alienate Christ from the essence of the paternal deity, and declare him to be a fashioning and a creature. Epiphanius's censure I myself, for the present, neither approve nor disapprove; but concerning this very error — which others also, men of great name, attribute to Origen — I shall more conveniently write below.

Annotation CXLVII [contents]

"Blessed is the man who hath not walked." — Psalm 1:1

Whether the angels were created before the world, and whether the heavens emit a vocal sound.

Ambrose, at the beginning of the preface on the Psalms, says that the Angels existed before this visible world — which most of the Fathers do not approve. He asserts also that the heavens, by their rotation, produce a perpetual sound — which Basil and Epiphanius reject as a fabulous thing, and worthy of laughter. We have written on both assertions in the Censures on the book of Genesis, Annotation 5 and Annotation 105.

Annotation CXLVIII [contents]

"The wicked shall not rise again in judgment." — Psalm 1:5

Whether the future resurrection will be in the [self-same] individual.

Origen, in the commentaries on the Psalms — as Methodius, bishop of Olympus in Lycia, in the dialogue whose title is Aglaophon, and Epiphanius in the second book of the Panarion report — examining this little verse, taught that the resurrection of our body will be not in the [self-same] individual, but only in the same species; and this he tried to establish by the testimony of Paul, who, in the epistle to the Corinthians, depicted the image of the body to rise again by the example of a sown grain, saying: "Thou sowest not the body that shall be, but a bare grain — as, for instance, of wheat; but God gives it a body as he wills." By which likeness the Apostle wished to signify that, just as the ear of corn, rising from the grain, differs from it in magnitude, figure, and reality, although it partakes the same species with it: so the body in the resurrection shall rise as another from that which is sown in death — although the same species remains in it. To this testimony of Paul he added also a reasoning of this kind: "Since in the present life we do not carry about the same body even for the space of two days, how can it be that in the future life we should rise again with this very body?" And that not even for a brief time does the same body remain in us — and that the same material substance of the body [does not remain] — the proof (he says) is mortal living beings, which, as the lost flesh and humors of the body decay, restore [them] with new food daily taken in, and, the old being changed into new flesh, replace and renew the body. Wherefore the animal body was not undeservedly called by the Greeks ῥεῖθος,[1] that is, a river or stream, because — just as in a river, the prior waves departing, others succeed continually one after another — so in our body, in place of that substance of flesh and humor which is perpetually separated off and flows away, new material of flesh and blood is superinduced, though the same species always remains. But also, in the commentaries on Psalm 65,[2] weighing that sentence, "We have passed through water and fire," etc., he expressed this very change of the body by the example of a wineskin: which, if anyone gradually empty and gradually fill — always adding as much water as is poured out — it is necessary that the water contained in the skin never be the very same, but always vary, although the same figure and species of the skin always remains. These things of Origen [report] Methodius and Epiphanius. But since the blessed martyr Pamphilus, in the Apology which he published for Origen, in the seventh proposition most copiously shows that Origen, in very many places — and chiefly in the exposition of this Psalm and verse — openly and magnificently preached the resurrection of our body in the same individual, it will be credible that these [contrary] things were either furtively intruded into this passage by the malevolent, or were written by the author himself not from his own person, but from that of an adversary.

◊ 1. Right margin: Why the animal body is called ῥεῖθος [a stream] by the Greeks.

◊ 2. Right margin: Psalm 65:12.

To that [argument], therefore, which is set forth against the right faith of the resurrection, Methodius, in the Aglaophon, briefly responds: that the likeness of Paul is not to be accommodated to the resurrection of bodies in every way, but only in this part — that, just as wheat is not reborn, nor rises into a new life, unless first, cast into the earth, it be corrupted (Christ saying, "Unless the grain of wheat, cast into the ground, die, it beareth no fruit," etc.),[3] so also our bodies, unless they first have died and been dissolved into the earth, do not rise again, nor revive unto an easier life. But when, from the assiduous transmutation of nourishment into the body, a change of the [self-same] individual body is inferred, Methodius judges this to be wrongly concluded: because, although the nutriments daily taken are turned into new flesh, which fill the place of the lost flesh, nevertheless the man does not cease [to be] the same →

◊ 3. Right margin: John 12:24.

[…continues on folio 579 (PDF p. 396): the rest of Methodius's answer, and the identity of the risen body (Annotatio CXLVIII).]

---

*(printed folio 579 [PDF p. 396]. Annot. CXLVIII–CLIII (Ps 1:5–4:2): Methodius defends the identity of the risen body; Hilary vs. Jerome on "In the beginning" (Bereshith); "Kiss the Son"; Bodius against the Eucharist and the Lutherans against invoking the saints → folio 580.)*

(folio 579, left column → right column)

Annotation CXLVIII (continued)

the same [man] in number who he was before. For it suffices, for the preserving of the [self-same] individual identity of the same man, that his more powerful and more excellent parts persist without any vicissitude of change,[1] and that the other fluxible parts, which continually flow into the body, preserve the figure, site, order, and other qualities of the departing parts. Wherefore, since the soul — the nobler and better portion of man — always remains the same, and the other parts, coming in as reinforcements to the body, retain the site, figure, order, and pristine qualities of the passing parts (indeed, even the very scars of wounds, and the traces of ulcers, and the mutilations of members, endure in bodies through every age): it follows that the [self-same] individual subsistence of man is the same in number up to the end of mortal life — after which the soul, again, in the consummation of the age, shall by divine power return to the body [that is] the same in number, beyond every law and order of nature, resuming its own proper body.

◊ 1. Left margin: For the preserving of the same man's individual identity, it is enough that his more excellent parts be not changed.

Annotation CXLIX [contents]

"Why have the nations raged," etc. — Psalm 2:1

Concerning the beginning of Genesis.

Jerome censures Hilary, at the beginning of the book On the Hebrew Traditions, because, in the exposition of this little verse, he asserted that, for that which we have at the exordium of Genesis, "In the beginning God created heaven and earth,"[2] there is had in the Hebrew "In the Son God made," etc. — which indeed to be false the truth of the matter itself proves: for in the Hebrew it is not written בבר Babar, which signifies "In the Son," but בראשית Berescith, which signifies "In the beginning." Hilary seems to have been deceived in this by the authority of Tertullian, who asserted this very thing in the book against Praxeas.

◊ 2. Left margin: Genesis 1:1.

Annotation CL [contents]

"I will give thee the nations for thy inheritance, and the ends of the earth for thy possession." — Psalm 2:8

Hilary, in the elucidation of this little verse, among other things wrote these: "Christ received the possession of the ends of the earth — that is, that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of the heavenly, the earthly, and the infernal,[3] etc.: not the earthly [things] alone, but the supernal and the infernal also are given [him], and those things by which the earth is enclosed. And in the glory of God the Father he is today begotten, being born — that is, remaining before in the form of God, the servile form is honored through the reward of the death-form." Erasmus, in the Annotations which he appended to the margins of Hilary's commentaries, asserted that these words of Hilary savour of something Origenist; but since he himself brings no reason for his suspicion, nor can any such thing be deduced from Hilary's words, let others more learned than I see how much Erasmus's judgment is to be valued.

◊ 3. Left margin: Philippians 2:10.

Annotation CLI [contents]

"Embrace discipline, lest at any time the Lord be angry," etc. — Psalm 2:12

Whether this passage was well rendered by Jerome.

Rufinus, priest of Aquileia, reprehends Jerome in the interpretation and exposition of the present little verse; to whom Jerome, responding in the first Apology against the same man, wrote these things to Pammachius: "Rufinus is also said to carp at this: that, interpreting the second Psalm, for that which we read in the Latin, 'Embrace discipline,' and in the Hebrew volume is written נשקו בר Nashku bar, I said in my little commentaries, 'Adore [kiss] the Son'; and again, turning the whole Psalter into the Roman [Latin] sound, as if forgetful of the ancient exposition, I put 'Adore purely' — which [two renderings] to be contrary to each other is plain to all. And truly he is to be pardoned, if he be ignorant of the truth of the Hebrew tongue, who sometimes hesitates even in the Latin. נשקו Nasku, that I may render it word for word, [is] κατεφιλήσατε — that is, 'kiss ye' [adore ye]; which I, unwilling to translate coarsely, followed rather the sense, so as to say 'Adore': for those who adore are wont to kiss the hand and bow the head — which the blessed Job denies that he did to the elements and to idols, saying, 'If I saw the Sun when it shone, and the Moon walking in brightness, and my heart rejoiced in secret, and I kissed my hand with my mouth[4] — which is the greatest iniquity, and a denial against the most high God.' And the Hebrews, according to the property of their language, put 'kissing' for 'veneration': this I translated as they themselves understand it, whose word is בר Bar. But Bar among them signifies diverse things: for it is said [to mean] 'son' — as in that, 'Bar-Jona,' 'son of the dove,' and 'Bartholomew,' 'son of Ptolemy'; 'Bartimaeus,' and 'Barchisui,' and 'Barabbas'; [Bar] also [means] 'wheat,' and 'a sheaf of ears,' and 'chosen,' and 'pure.' What, therefore, have I sinned, if I turned an ambiguous word by a diverse interpretation? And I who, in the little commentaries — where there is liberty of discussing — had said 'Adore the Son,' in the [body] itself, lest I should seem too violent an interpreter and give place to Jewish calumny, said 'Adore purely,' or 'electly' — which Aquila also and Symmachus translated. What, therefore, does it harm ecclesiastical faith, if the reader be taught in how many ways a single little verse is explained among the Hebrews?"

◊ 4. Right margin: Job 31:26–27.

Annotation CLII [contents]

"Lord, how are they multiplied that afflict me," etc. — Psalm 3:2

Concerning the Eucharist.

Augustine, in the commentaries on the Psalms, upon this verse, says: "In the history of the New Testament, so great and so wonderful was the patience of our Lord Jesus Christ, that he admitted Judas to the banquet, in which he commended and delivered to the disciples the figure of his body and blood." Hermann Bodius, in the Collectanea, gathered from these words that the sacrament of the Eucharist is nothing else than a figure and type of the body of Christ. See what we have noted against this man, Annotation 146 of the following book.

Annotation CLIII [contents]

"When I called upon him, the God of my justice heard me," etc. — Psalm 4:2

Concerning the invocation of the saints.

Chrysostom, in the preface of the exposition on this psalm, has some things which are brought forward by the Lutherans against the invocation of the saints. These are they: "Thou canst not say, 'I fear to approach and to pray to God'; but thou canst always and assiduously call upon him, and no difficulty is present: for there is no need of doorkeepers to introduce thee, nor of stewards, procurators, guards, or friends; but when thou thyself, through thyself, hast approached, then most of all will he hear thee — then, when thou hast asked no one [to intercede]. For we do not so appease him when entreated through others, as [when] through ourselves; because, when he shall have seen us doing this through ourselves, then most of all does he assent. So he does also in [the case of] the Canaanite woman;[5] and when Peter indeed and James approached, he did not assent — but when she herself persevered in that which was asked, he gave [it]." Chrysostom repeats these same things in many other places also →

◊ 5. Right margin: Matthew 15:23.

[…continues on folio 580 (PDF p. 397): Sixtus's answer to the Lutheran misuse of Chrysostom on the invocation of the saints (Annotatio CLIII).]

---

(printed folio 580 [PDF p. 397]. Annot. CLIII–CLIX (Ps 4:2–15:7): the eight verses inserted into Psalm 13; Arnobius on Mary's cleansing; Cajetan's David/Christ rule; Eusebius of Caesarea's Arian-leaning subordinationism; and Origen opens Ps 15:7 → folio 581.)

(folio 580, left column → right column)

Annotation CLIII (continued)

the same [things], whose meaning piously explained you have in Annotation 310 of the book which follows next to this.

Annotation CLIV [contents]

"There is none that doth good, no not [even] one." — Psalm 13:3

Whether Mary hesitated at the death of Christ.

Chrysostom — or someone else, whose exposition on Psalm 13 is inserted in Chrysostom's commentaries — narrating this sentence, indicates that the Virgin Mary, at the death of Christ, hesitated in faith. For these are his very words: "There was none who did good, when the disciples, all abandoning him, fled; John withdraws naked; Peter denies; the disciples flee; and the sword of doubt passed through the soul of Mary his mother." You have the interpretation of this sentence above, Annotation 104, and below, Annotations 138, 139, 140, and 185 of book 6.

Annotation CLV [contents]

"Their throat is an open sepulchre." — Psalm 13:3

Concerning the eight little verses added to Psalm 13.

Jerome, in the commentaries on the Psalter which are believed to be his, admonishes that those eight verses — which [go] from this passage up to that, "There is no fear of God before their eyes" — are had in the vulgate edition, but are not in the Hebrew exemplars; rather [they were] collected by Paul from various passages of divine Scripture, and, in that epistle which is to the Romans, taken up in testimony of his own opinion.[1] The same [Jerome], in the preface of the sixteenth [book] of the commentary on Isaiah, responding to Eustochium — who asked whence Paul had borrowed the aforesaid little verses — says that he took the two first verses ("Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they dealt deceitfully") from the fifth Psalm; the third ("Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness") from the ninth Psalm; the fourth ("The venom of asps is under their lips") from Psalm 139; the fifth, sixth, and seventh ("Their feet are swift to shed blood") from the fifty-ninth chapter of Isaiah; the eighth ("There is no fear of God before their eyes") from the fifth Psalm. Finally he adds that these eight little verses were inserted into the thirteenth Psalm by an unknown author, because he could not find a fit place to which to refer this testimony of Paul, since in these Hebrew codices it is not had. John Cochlaeus, in the book On Canonical Scripture and the authority of the Catholic Church, disapproving this opinion of Jerome, thinks the Hebrew exemplars to be in this passage mutilated and diminished. For thus he speaks: "In the epistle to the Romans, chapter 3, Paul alleges many little verses [that are seen among the Hebrews to be omitted]: but we rather think that the Apostle Paul is to be believed than the Bibles of the Jews. I know indeed that St. Jerome, in the prologue of the sixteenth commentary on Isaiah, responded to the sacred virgin Eustochium about the passage cited from the epistle to the Romans; but I have shown elsewhere that — saving his glory and honor — he did not [fully] satisfy this question."

◊ 1. Left margin: Romans 3:11, 12, etc.

Annotation CLVI [contents]

"He that walketh without blemish," etc. — Psalm 14:2

In what manner the Blessed Virgin was sanctified by the entrance of Christ.

Erasmus cautiously admonished that Arnobius, explaining these words in the commentaries on the Psalter, is to be read [warily], as though he seems to hint that Mary, when Christ entered her womb, was cleansed from the stains with which she had been infected before Christ's conception — when he says: "Every stained one enters the tabernacle of the Lord, and there is made immaculate; but Jesus alone, immaculate, entering the virginal hall, freed that very tabernacle from its carnal stains, and gave it sanctification." And yet it is manifest from the following words that he does not speak of the stains which had been in Mary before Christ's entrance, but of those which are wont to be in other women — from which Christ preserved his mother immune. And that which he adds — "[the tabernacle] sanctified by the entrance of Christ" — is not so to be understood as though it then first began to be sanctified when it conceived Christ, but that Christ, entering into her, brought her greater increments of sanctity. Read Annotations 136 and 137 of the book which follows next to this.

Annotation CLVII [contents]

"Preserve me, O Lord, for I have hoped in thee." — Psalm 15:1

Whether the Psalms speaking literally of David can be expounded literally of Christ.

Thomas Cajetan, when in his commentaries he prefaced [an introduction] to this psalm, wrote these things: "From this Psalm we gather a general rule of understanding the Psalms: that every Psalm which cannot be expounded literally of David is to be expounded of Christ — as the Apostle [expounds] the words of this psalm, 'Thou shalt not give thy holy one to see corruption,' which he adduced [as] written of Christ, because they could not agree to David; and another rule can also hence be had, by the opposite: namely, that every Psalm which can be expounded literally of David is not to be expounded literally of Christ." Ambrose, Bishop of Compsa, in the second book of the Annotations on Cajetan, weighing these words, writes in this manner: "The first rule is altogether true, but the second false, and received (unto the extinction of the spiritual sense) from the doctrine of the Jews, and against all the catholic Doctors whom I have read, who did not know that rule; nor is the second elicited from the first, as he himself thought — [it is] false, [drawn] by a fallacy which the Logicians call 'the Consequent.' And these things are premised to the reader, that he may know my judgment concerning [Cajetan's] commentaries which he published upon the psalms, in which I scarcely anywhere see Christ, unless when he is so compelled by the authority of Scripture that he cannot, without manifest perfidy, tergiversate. But how many errors, and how great, he has incurred on account of that given rule, it was not worth the leisure to gather: for in those commentaries upon the Psalms there is this perpetual error; some grave ones, however, [there are] in these [Psalms] which I have embraced in this second book, and which I have marked with annotations."

Annotation CLVIII [contents]

"I said: [O Lord,] thou art my God." — Psalm 15:2

Eusebius of Caesarea thought wrongly concerning the Trinity.

Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, in the commentaries on the Psalms, brought forward, for the interpreting of these words, certain things favoring the Arian dogma concerning the inequality of the Father and the Son; and these are they: "By the law of nature, the father of any son whatsoever is also his lord; on that account, of the only-begotten Son of God, he who begot him is also his father, and Lord, and God, and Father." This opinion the same Eusebius, repeated in a prolix discourse, explains in the epistle to Alexander, the preceptor of Athanasius, whose beginning is, "With how great labor and diligence I have entered upon these letters." Epiphanius the Deacon noted this in the sixth action [session] of the Second Synod of Nicaea.

Annotation CLIX

"Moreover, even till night my reins have corrected me." — Psalm 15:7

Origen →

[…continues on folio 581 (PDF p. 398): Origen on Psalm 15:7 (Annotatio CLIX).]

---

(printed folio 581 [PDF p. 398]. Annot. CLIX–CLXII (Ps 15:7–21:3): Origen's impassible holy men (root of Pelagian impeccability); his allegory of Christ's body in the sun's globe; whether Christ's prayer on the cross was heard; and whether he truly feared and grieved → folio 582.)

(folio 581, left column → right column)

Annotation CLIX (continued) [contents]

Origen, when he had come thus far in explaining, asserted that holy men, when they have come to the summit of the virtues, do not — not even at night — suffer those things which are of men [human passions], nor are tickled by any thought of vices. Jerome, in the epistle to Ctesiphon (which begins "Not boldly"), says that this passage is one of the fountains whence the Pelagians drew their error, teaching that a man can be made ἀναμάρτητον — that is, impeccable,[1] or able to be without any sin. See Annotation 232 of this book.

◊ 1. Left margin: Whether a man can be made impeccable.

Annotation CLX [contents]

"He hath set his tabernacle in the sun." — Psalm 18:5

Whether the body of Christ was placed in the Sun.

Origen is accused by Serapion, Bishop of Thmuis (writing against the Manichees), [on the ground] that in the allegorical elucidation of this little verse he taught that Christ, when he ascended into heaven, left his body in the globe of the Sun, but thence carried up his soul alone with himself above all the heavens to the right hand of the Father; and hence [Serapion] says that the Manichees were persuaded to adore the Sun as the tabernacle and perpetual domicile of the body of Christ.[2] Augustine, in book 20 against Faustus — no mention being made of the Origenic name — reports that the Manichees, from this psalm-testimony wrongly understood, fell into the adoration of the Sun. Whence it can easily be believed that Origen's commentaries were in this passage falsified by the heretics — and this especially because Pamphilus the martyr, in the Apology, demonstrates that this opinion was, by set purpose, attacked by Origen, in this very explanation of the present psalm and verse, in these words plainly taken from Origen's own commentary: "What is it that David said, 'He hath set his tabernacle in the sun'? Some indeed were saying that our Savior, ascending from the earth to heaven and assuming his body, came up as far as that circle which is called the Zone of the Sun; and there, they say, he set the tabernacle of his body — for it was not possible to advance beyond. But they think these things thus because they will not receive allegory in the divine Scripture; and therefore, describing [it] as pure history, they compose fables and figments of this kind. But we pray the omnipotence of God, that he may deign to hear us, and to open to us the secret things of spiritual understanding. What, therefore, is understood by us in this passage is this: 'In the sun he hath set his tabernacle.' I ask, what is the tabernacle of Christ, and what is the habitation in which the tabernacle of Christ is placed? The habitation of the tabernacle is said to be the Sun. But the tabernacle of Christ I understand [to be] the Church. And the Sun — whom else must I understand, unless that true light which enlightens every man coming into this world?[3] I see the Sun himself, of whom it is said, 'To you that fear my name the Sun of justice shall arise.'[4] Therefore 'in the sun he hath set his tabernacle' — that is, 'In the Sun of justice he hath placed his Church.'"

◊ 2. Left margin: The Manichees adored the Sun as the tabernacle of the body of Christ.

◊ 3. Left margin: John 1:9.

◊ 4. Left margin: Malachi 4:2.

Annotation CLXI [contents]

"My God, I shall cry by day, and thou wilt not hear." — Psalm 21:3

Whether the prayer of Christ was heard.

Jerome, in the commentaries on the Psalms which are said to be his, treating this verse, says: "Christ cried on the cross, and prayed for his own: he was heard, and he was not heard. He was heard for the predestined — as in the eight thousands, or for those hundred and twenty and five hundred brethren; and he was not heard — that is, for those who were not predestined, concerning whom the Evangelist said, 'His blood [be] upon us and upon our children.'"[5] St. Thomas, in the third volume of the theological Summa, question 21, article 4, judges that it is wrongly said or believed that Christ — who says of himself, "Father, I knew that thou always hearest me,"[6] etc. — was at some time not heard, and especially crying out on the cross; since of him, crying on the cross, Paul says, "With a strong cry and tears offering [prayers], he was heard for his reverence."[7] Accordingly he judges that Christ prayed neither for all the crucifiers, nor even for all who were going to believe in him, but for those only who were predestined to eternal life,[8] and that for these he was heard. But as to what the psalm says, "I shall cry, and thou wilt not hear," he thinks it is to be understood not in respect to the desire of reason (which was always heard), but in respect to the affection of the flesh, refusing death. Thomas Cajetan, to the solution of St. Thomas, adds this also: that every prayer of Christ — both according to reason and according to the will of the flesh — was heard; because what the flesh sought, it demanded not with a fixed determination, but on this condition, "if it should so seem to the Father": so that, if [it seemed] otherwise to him, then at last it asked to fulfil the Father's will, saying, "Thy will be done."[9] Therefore, according to this last condition proposed by the flesh, Christ's prayer was most fully heard.

◊ 5. Left margin: Matthew 27:25.

◊ 6. Right margin: John 11:42.

◊ 7. Right margin: Hebrews 5:7.

◊ 8. Right margin: Christ did not pray for all the crucifiers, nor for all who were going to believe in him, but only for the predestined.

◊ 9. Right margin: Matthew 26:42.

Annotation CLXII [contents]

"Far from my salvation are the words of my sins." — Psalm 21:3

Whether Christ truly feared and grieved.

Augustine, in the commentaries on the Psalms, in the second exposition of this psalm, seems to think that Christ did not truly fear, nor had true sadness. For the Master of the Sentences, in book 3, distinction 15, reports his explanation — with some words permuted and transposed, for a clearer understanding of the sense — in this manner: "How does he say this, 'Who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth'?[10] Concerning us — his body — he says this: for he bore the person of his body, that is, the Church; as also elsewhere, when he said, 'Let this chalice pass from me,'[11] he speaks for us — unless perhaps he be thought to have feared to die. But he did not truly fear to suffer, [he] who was to rise on the third day, when Paul burned to be dissolved and to be with Christ.[12] For a soldier is not braver than the emperor: for the soldier, about to be crowned, rejoices to die — and would the Lord, about to be crowned, fear death? But, representing our infirmity, he said this for his own weak ones, who fear to die: for it was the voice of those [members]." He has a similar opinion in the epistle to Proba, On the grace of the New Testament, chapters 6 and 7; likewise in the exposition of Psalm 103. But it is clear that Augustine did not think thus, from those things which he brought against this opinion in the exposition of Psalm 93, in these words: "Be unwilling to think that the Lord was not sad; for if we should say this — that he was not sad, whereas the Gospel says, 'My soul is sad even unto death'[13] — then, when the Gospel says 'Jesus slept,' [we might say] 'Jesus did not sleep'; 'Jesus ate,' 'he did not eat'; and thus nothing sincere is left, so that it be said, 'And now the body was not real, and he did not have true flesh.' Whatever, therefore, is written of him is done, is true: therefore he was sad — altogether sad — but taking on sadness by [his] will, just as [he took on] flesh by [his] will." →

◊ 10. Right margin: 1 Peter 2:22.

◊ 11. Right margin: Matthew 26:39.

◊ 12. Right margin: Philippians 1:23.

◊ 13. Right margin: Matthew 26:38.

[…continues on folio 582 (PDF p. 399): the Master of the Sentences and the resolution on Christ's true sadness (Annotatio CLXII).]

(printed folio 582 [PDF p. 399]. Annot. CLXII–CLXVII (Ps 21:3–31:1): Christ's fear as mere "propassion"; denying the Eucharist to sinners (public, not secret); a "table = figure" text abused by Oecolampadius; Cusa on Christ bearing hell's pain; and Augustine on lawful vs. superstitious lots → folio 583.)

(folio 582, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXII (continued)

The Master of the Sentences, in book 3, distinction 15, says that Augustine — in [the exposition of] Psalm 3 — signified that Christ did not truly fear according to [his] passion, but in Psalm 93 showed that Christ, according to fore-passion [propassion], truly feared. You will see below the things which pertain to this argument, Annotation 186 of this book.

Annotation CLXIII [contents]

Whether the Eucharist is to be denied to sinners.

(The printed text misnumbers this annotation CLVIII; it is corrected here to CLXIII, its proper place in the sequence — it stands between CLXII above and CLXIIII below.)

"All the fat ones of the earth have eaten and adored." — Psalm 21:30

Strabus [Walafrid Strabo], in the gloss to the exposition of this little verse, brings a sentence under the title of Augustine, thus: "Let not the dispenser prohibit the fat ones of the earth to eat at the table of the Lord, but let him warn [them] to fear the exactor." Gratian, De consecratione, distinction 2, cites these same words from an unnamed and uncertain passage of Augustine, and from these gathers that sinners are not [to be excluded] from the communion of the Lord's table. St. Thomas, in the third volume of the Summa, question 80, indicates that this sentence is not to be understood of public sinners, living in open crime, but of hidden and latent ones. For to those [public sinners], however earnestly demanding, he judges the sacrament of the Eucharist is not to be granted;[1] but to these [secret ones] he indicates it is not to be denied in public. Yet he desires that the minister of the Sacrament, if perhaps he be conscious of their crime, should dissuade them — by some hidden kind of admonition — from the reception of the Lord's body.

◊ 1. Left margin: The sacrament of the Eucharist is to be denied to public sinners.

Annotation CLXIIII [contents]

"Thou hast prepared a table before me." — Psalm 22:5

Concerning the Eucharist, the heretics feign that St. Chrysostom thought wrongly.

Chrysostom, in a certain homily on Psalm 22 (which, however, is not believed to be his), has these words: "The table is the consecration of the altar of the Lord; and because the divine wisdom prepared that table for his men-servants and maid-servants in their sight, so that daily, in the likeness of the body and blood of Christ, he might show us bread and wine according to the order of Melchisedech in the sacrament: therefore he says, 'Thou hast prepared a table in my sight.'" John Oecolampadius brought forward this passage against the truth of the body of Christ in the Eucharist, so that, under the name of Chrysostom, he might build up the faith of his own heresy. But since the phrase and the character of the explanation openly prove that the homily is not [the work] of him under whose title it is prefixed, there is no need that we answer anything to Oecolampadius for the defense of Chrysostom — whom it is agreed to be the keenest defender of this sacrament. Yet whosoever these words may be, they do not render the sense which Oecolampadius falsely gathered from them. For nothing prohibits — indeed it is necessary — that, together with the true body and blood of Christ, there be in the sacrament of the altar the accidents of bread and wine,[2] which here are called "bread and wine." And these bear the likeness and figure of the mystical body of Christ, which is the Church

— Paul saying: "We, being many, are one bread, one body, all we who partake of the one bread and of the one cup."[3]

◊ 2. Left margin: In the Eucharist, together with the body and blood of Christ, are the accidents of bread and wine.

◊ 3. Left margin: 1 Corinthians 10:17.

Annotation CLXV [contents]

"For my life is spent in sorrow," etc. — Psalm 30:11

Whether Christ the Lord sustained in [his] soul the pain of hell.

Nicholas of Cusa, in a sermon which he published on the present little verse, both on account of those things which in this passage are said by the Prophet, and on account of many other things, believed that Christ the Lord sustained in [his] soul the pain of hell. Augustine, Bishop of Nebbio, noted this opinion, in the scholia on the Octapla appended to this psalm, asserting that the opinion of this most learned man — and most eminent in all knowledge — is neither to be embraced nor to be spurned.

Annotation CLXVI [contents]

"My lots are in thy hands," etc. — Psalm 30:16

Whether it is lawful to use lots.

Augustine, in the second exposition on this psalm, when he discoursed concerning the lots here commemorated by David, seemed to approve the use of lots, when he says: "A lot is not something evil, but a thing which, in human doubt, indicates the divine will: for the Apostles too cast lots, when Judas, having betrayed the Lord, perished, and the lot fell upon Matthias."[4] To the same opinion he subscribes in the epistle to Honoratus, thus speaking: "If among the ministers of God there be a dispute — [as to] which of them should remain in the time of persecution, lest by the flight of all the Church be deserted, and which should flee — if this dispute cannot otherwise be terminated, as far as it seems to me, which should remain and which should flee are to be chosen by lot." And in the first book On Christian Doctrine, confirming this same thing, he says: "If something abounded which ought to be given to those who did not have [it], and it could not be given to two, if perhaps two occur to thee of whom neither excelled the other either in indigence or in some urgent necessity, thou wouldst do nothing more just than to choose by lot to whom must be given that which cannot be given to both."

◊ 4. Right margin: Acts 1:26.

There are those who think that a decree of Pope Leo III is opposed to these sayings of Augustine — [namely] that which, in the epistle to the bishops of Britain, is written in the Decrees of the pontiffs, cause 26, question 5: "Lots, by which you decide all things in your provinces — which the Fathers condemned — we decree to be nothing other than divinations and sorceries. Wherefore we wish them altogether to be condemned, and no longer to be named among Christians; and, lest they be practised, we forbid [them] by the interdict of anathema." St. Thomas, in the Second [part] of the Second, question 95, article 8, settling a controversy of this kind, shows that by Leo's decree those lots are not forbidden which Augustine approved — namely, those which are treated piously and religiously[5] — but those which are wont to be exercised superstitiously and impiously, those five conditions being spurned which the pious exercise of lots requires.[6] Of these, the first is, that the division or consultation of the proposed matter be looked for from God alone, the director of lots. The second, that lots be not sought except when necessity compels. The third, that they be not attempted except when prayers to God have first been sent up. The fourth, that we abuse not divine oracles for the inquisition of lots. The fifth, that we use not lots in ecclesiastical elections, which ought to be done by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit alone. For although once Matthias was chosen by lots,[7] now — the fullness of the Spirit being poured out — it ought no longer to be permitted; because what was permitted before the effusion of the Holy Spirit was [done] while the splendor of the evangelical light had not yet flashed forth.

◊ 5. Right margin: Lots which are treated piously and religiously are not forbidden.

◊ 6. Right margin: The exercise of lots requires five conditions.

◊ 7. Right margin: Acts 1:26.

Annotation CLXVII

"Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven," etc. — Psalm 31:1

Augustine →

[…continues on folio 583 (PDF p. 400): Augustine on Psalm 31:1 (Annotatio CLXVII).]

---

(printed folio 583 [PDF p. 400]. Annot. CLXVII–CLXIX (Ps 31:1–36:10): Calvin's "all works are sins" drawn from Augustine (answered); Catharinus vs. Cajetan on the Trinity from Ps 32:6; and Augustine's ambiguous texts on whether the saints see God before the resurrection → folio 584.)

(folio 583, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXVII (continued) [contents]

Augustine, in the preface of this psalm, seems to favor the Lutherans, asserting that all works preceding faith are evil, and that all the actions and thoughts of unbelievers are sins.[1] For thus he reasons: "Let no one reckon his good works before faith: because where faith was not, the good was not; for the intention makes the good work, but faith directs the intention." And again below he adds: "Believe in him who justifies the impious, that thy good works may be [truly] good works: for I would not call those [works] good which do not proceed from a good root." And again, after a few [words], he subjoins: "Before the grace of faith thou didst nothing of good, and remission of sins shall be given to thee. Let thy works be attended to, and all shall be found evil; if God gave to those works what is due to them, he would surely damn [them]. For the wages of sin is death: but thou wast found in evil works." Finally, concluding at the end of the preface, he says: "And if thou seem to do good things — yet, because thou doest [them] without faith, they are not even to be called good." Thus far Augustine's words, cited by John Calvin in the tenth chapter of the Institutes, for the confirmation of his impious doctrine, by which he teaches that all works, however good, are sins. The Master of the Sentences, book 2, distinction 41, noticing this passage, says that Augustine here called that an "evil work" which is invalid and useless for the merit of eternal life.[2] For although, before faith, all the virtues of unbelievers — measured according to the rule of right reason — are good for living well in the present life, yet for obtaining the beatitude of the future life, without faith (which directs the intention), they are so unfit that they ought rather to be called evil than good. Consult Annotation 235 of book 6.

◊ 1. Left margin: Whether all the works of unbelievers are sins.

◊ 2. Left margin: That is called an evil work by which a man does not merit eternal life.

Annotation CLXVIII [contents]

"By the word of the Lord the heavens were established, and all their power by the spirit of his mouth." — Psalm 32:6

Whether this passage pertains to the Holy Spirit.

Ambrose, Bishop of Compsa, in book 4 of the Annotations on the same [Cajetan], condemns Thomas Cardinal Cajetan, [on the ground] that he alone of all denies that this passage pertains to the person of the Holy Spirit — from which all catholic expositors gather the mystery of the divine Triad, saying that by "the Lord" is to be understood the Father, by "the Word" the Son, and by "the Spirit of his mouth" the Holy Spirit the Paraclete. But if you attentively read Cajetan's commentaries, you will recognize that an explanation of this kind is neither impugned, nor rejected, nor denied, but only passed over in silence. And it is far another thing to deny and to be silent, than to impugn and to omit. Nor is it to be wondered at, if Cajetan — who in the commentaries on the Psalms professes only the elucidation of the letter — omitted the exposition of the Trinity (which almost all confess to be mystical); or if, expounding according to the bare letter, he said that "the Spirit of the Lord's mouth" is called the very Word of God, and the command [of God] named after the human manner. For the Greek interpreter Euthymius also — who illustrated this passage from the various and diverse interpretations of the Greek Fathers — before he touched the mystical sense, expressed the historical understanding (which Cajetan followed) in these words: "These expressions seem to signify the same: 'By the word of the Lord' and 'by the spirit of his mouth.' For God said, 'Let it be,' and it was made; and it was done. Moreover, the word of the mouth is the breath [spirit] beating the air; and such as is the breath of the mouth, beating the air, such is the word itself." Then, subjoining the mystical sense, he says: "But, according to a higher sense — whereby we may say that blessed David here philosophizes concerning the holy Trinity — by 'the Lord' understand the Father, and the Son by 'the Word,' and by 'the Spirit of his mouth' the Holy Spirit."

Annotation CLXIX [contents]

"Yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be." — Psalm 36:10

Whether the souls of the saints are in heaven before the resurrection.

Augustine, in the exposition of the proposed little verse, seems somewhat to decline toward the error of the Armenians, the Greeks, and the Anabaptists, who assert that the souls of the saints are confined, until the day of judgment, in hidden receptacles, far from the gaze of the divine vision; writing in this manner: "After this life thou shalt not yet be there where the saints shall be, to whom it shall be said, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, receive the kingdom which is prepared for you from the origin of the world.[3] Thou shalt not yet be there — who knows [it] not? But now thou canst be there where that once-ulcerous poor man [reposed], whom the proud rich man, in the midst of torments, saw far off reposing:[4] in that repose, certainly, secure, thou shalt await the day of judgment — when thou shalt receive [thy] body, when thou shalt be sent in, that thou mayest be equalled to the Angels." To this opinion the same [Augustine] seems to allude in the Enchiridion to Laurentius, chapter 108, where he says: "The time which is interposed between the death of man and the final resurrection holds souls in hidden receptacles, according as each is worthy of repose or of affliction, for that which it obtained in the flesh while it lived." And in book 12 On the City of God, chapter 9: "That part of the city of God which is to be joined to the immortal Angels is gathered out of mortal men; [and] now [it] either sojourns mortally on earth, or, in those who have died by death, rests in the secret receptacles and seats of souls." And again, in book 12 [of the commentary] On Genesis to the letter, chapter 35, he seems to indicate that the souls of the saints, before the resumption of the body, cannot enjoy the divine vision, in these words: "If anyone show what need there is for spirits to receive their bodies in the resurrection, if that highest beatitude can be furnished to them even without bodies — it is by no means to be doubted that the mind of man, snatched from the senses of the flesh, and (after death, the flesh being laid aside) cannot so see the incommutable good as the holy Angels see [it]." And in book 1 of the Retractations, chapter 14, when he had treated this question professedly, he left it undiscussed and in doubt, writing thus: "That [saying] makes us most blessed which the Apostle says, 'But then face to face; and then I shall know, as also I am known.[5] Those who have found this are to be said to consist in the possession of beatitude. But who those most blessed are, who are now in that possession, is a great question. And that the holy Angels are there, is no question; but concerning holy men already dead, whether they too may be said to consist already in that possession, is deservedly asked. For now they are stripped of the body, by which the soul is weighed down; but they still themselves await also the redemption of their body, and their flesh rests in hope, [and] does not yet shine in future incorruption. But whether they have anything the less on this account for contemplating the truth with the eyes of the heart, face to face — it is not [the place] here, by disputing, to inquire." These passages, and others similar to these — often repeated in the diverse writings of Augustine — must be interpreted charitably, especially since among Augustine himself certain testi- →

◊ 3. Right margin: Matthew 25:34.

◊ 4. Right margin: Luke 16:22–23.

◊ 5. Right margin: 1 Corinthians 13:12.

[…continues on folio 584 (PDF p. 401): Augustine's opposite testimonies, that the saints do enjoy the vision of God before the resurrection (Annotatio CLXIX).]

(printed folio 584 [PDF p. 401]. Annot. CLXIX–CLXX (Ps 36:10–36:14): Augustine's counter-texts prove the saints do behold God before the judgment (his doubt was only of place and grade); then Origen's teaching that all pass through a purging fire after death (confuted, City of God XXI) → folio 585.)

(folio 584, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXIX (continued)

testimonies which establish that the souls of the saints, even before the day of judgment, behold God face to face — of which number one is had in the fourth sermon on the solemnity of the saints, where, expounding those words from the sixth chapter of the Apocalypse, "I saw under the altar of God the souls of the slain, and there were given to them each a white robe,"[1] etc., he speaks thus: "By the white robes we ought to understand the reward of baptism, the prize of martyrdom, the reward of the eternal [goods], and the joy of the heavenly fatherland. For the saints have, before the resurrection, single robes, because they enjoy as yet, in the soul alone, the eternal beatitudes; but afterward they are to receive double [robes], when — [their] bodies being received — they shall be immutable in soul and incorruptible in body." And a little after: "Whence John says, 'They stood before the throne, in the sight of the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands';[2] [they] stand, then, even now before the throne of God, crowned — [each] stands in the sight of the Lamb, in no way to be there separated from contemplating his glory."

◊ 1. Left margin: Revelation 6:9, 11.

◊ 2. Left margin: Revelation 7:9.

There are, therefore, the passages cited a little before — [which are] in appearance conflicting with the present passage and those similar to it — to be interpreted in this sense: that we say Augustine did not doubt concerning the glory of souls before the judgment,[3] but concerning the place of glory, and concerning the grades (or the quantity, or the consummation) of glory before the judgment. For since souls, wheresoever they behold the glory of God, are there blessed, Augustine was sometimes uncertain in what places, and seats, or receptacles, the souls might see God. Similarly, concerning the quantity of glory, Augustine often asked whether the Souls of the Saints, before the judgment, were equal to the Angels in the vision of God, or saw something less. Which the words of the aforesaid passages plainly indicate — especially from the testimony of the first [book] of the Retractations, where it is said, "Souls stripped of their bodies do not so see God as the Angels see [him]," that is, [not] with a consummated and perfect vision; and from book 12 on Genesis, where it is read: "Whether Souls have anything the less on this account for contemplating, with the eyes of the heart, the truth — it is not [the place] here, by disputing, to inquire." Read Annotation 345 of the sixth book.

◊ 3. Left margin: St. Augustine did not doubt concerning the glory of souls before the judgment, but concerning the place and grades of glory.

Annotation CLXX [contents]

"The sinners have drawn out the sword." — Psalm 36:14

Whether after this life all, both good and evil, shall enter the fire of gehenna.

Origen, in the third homily on Psalm 36, seems to think that all — both good and evil — are, after this life, to enter the fire of gehenna: from which the good and holy shall escape unharmed, and without any injury; but the evil, [in order] that they may fulfil the purgation of their crimes, shall remain immersed in it. His words are these: "If, placed in this life, we make sin to perish in us — so that in no way at all, neither by thought, nor by work, nor by word, the sword of sin be brought forth from us — we shall not need the punishment of eternal fire; we shall not be condemned to the exterior darkness, nor shall we be subject to those punishments which threaten sinners. But if in this life we contemn the words of divine Scripture admonishing us, and are unwilling to be cured or amended by its corrections, it is certain that a fire remains for us which is prepared for sinners; and we shall come to that fire, in which the work of each one — of what sort it is — the fire shall prove. And, as I judge, it is necessary that we all come to that fire: even if [one] be some Paul, or Peter, yet he comes to that fire. But such [persons] hear [this]: 'Even if thou pass through, the flame shall not burn thee.' But if anyone be some sinner like me, he will indeed come to that fire, as [did] Peter and Paul; but he will not pass through, as Peter and Paul passed through. And in what manner the Hebrews came to the Red Sea, the Egyptians also came; but the Hebrews indeed passed through the Red Sea, whereas the Egyptians were drowned in it. In this manner also we — if we are Egyptians, and follow Pharaoh the devil, obeying his precepts — shall be drowned in that river or lake of fire, when sins shall be found in us. But if we are Hebrews, and are redeemed by the blood of the immaculate Lamb — if we carry not with us the leaven of wickedness — we do indeed enter the river of fire; but, as to the Hebrews the water was a wall on the right hand and on the left, so also the fire shall be a wall to us, if we do that which is said of them: 'Because they believed God and Moses his servant[4] — that is, his law and commandments — and if we so follow the pillar of fire and the pillar of cloud." He explains this opinion more clearly at the end of book 8 of the commentaries on the epistle to the Romans, where he has these things word for word: "All indeed who are blessed — whether they be of Israel or of the gentiles — the Evangelical word of the present time purifies, that they may be such as those were to whom the Lord said, 'Behold, now you are clean because of the word which I have spoken to you.' But whoever shall have spurned the purifications of the word of God and of the Evangelical doctrine reserves himself for the sad and penal purifications, that the fire of gehenna may purge [him] in torments — [him] whom neither the apostolic doctrine nor the Evangelical discourse purged; according to that which is written: 'And I will purify thee by fire unto purification.'[5] But this very purgation, which is applied through the punishment of fire — for how great times, or for how many ages, it exacts torment from sinners — he alone can know to whom the Father delivered all judgment; who so loves his creature, that for it he emptied himself of the form of God, and took the form of a servant, humbling himself unto death, willing that all men be saved and come to the acknowledgment of the truth. But nevertheless it behoves [us] to remember that the Apostle wished to have the present passage as, so to say, a mystery — namely, that the faithful and perfect, each within themselves, cover such senses, as it were a mystery of God, with silence, and bring [them] not everywhere forth to the imperfect and less capable." And again, repeating the same in homily 13 on Jeremiah, he thus speaks: "If thou hast sinned, and art polluted with the filth of sins, the Lord will wash the filth of the sons and daughters of Sion; but if it be a mortal sin, we cannot be cleansed by nitre and soap, but by the spirit of judgment, [and] by the spirit of burning, and by punishment. Perhaps Jesus also baptizes with the Holy Spirit and with fire[6] — not because he baptizes the same [person] in the Holy Spirit and in fire, but that the holy [person] is baptized with the Holy Spirit, while he who, after faith and the teaching of God, is again turned to crimes, is purged by the torment of burning. Blessed [is he] who received the laver, and needs not the laver of the Holy Spirit and of fire; but miserable, and worthy of all weeping, [is he] who, after the laver of the Holy Spirit, must be baptized with fire. Blessed [is he] who has part in the first resurrection: if anyone has kept the laver of the Holy Spirit, that one has part in the first [portion] of the resurrection; but if anyone is [only] saved in the second resurrection, that one is a sinner, who needs the baptism of fire, [and] who is purged by burning, so that whatsoever he had of wood, hay, and stubble, the fire may consume."[7]

◊ 4. Right margin: Exodus 14:28–29.

◊ 5. Right margin: Malachi 3:3.

◊ 6. Right margin: Luke 3:16.

◊ 7. Right margin: Revelation 20:6.

Augustine, in book 21 On the City of God, chapters 26 and 27, confutes this dogma; do thou see whether Origen['s] →

[…continues on folio 585 (PDF p. 402): Augustine's refutation, and how far Origen's purgatorial fire may be reconciled with Catholic teaching (Annotatio CLXX).]

---

(printed folio 585 [PDF p. 402]. Annot. CLXX–CLXXI (Ps 36:14–36:15): Origen's universal fire closes; then a chain of Fathers (Ambrose, Hilary, Basil, Jerome, Lactantius) who seem to hold that all souls but Christ's are tried by fire after death → folio 586.)

(folio 585, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXX (continued)

[do thou see whether] Origen's words can be interpreted of the fire of the final conflagration, which on the day of judgment shall purge certain elect not yet purged, and shall sweep up [enfold] all the reprobate. See the following Annotation.

Annotation CLXXI [contents]

"Let their sword enter into their own hearts." — Psalm 36:15

Whether all Souls, after this life, are to be tried by fire.

Ambrose, in the commentaries on the Psalter, disclosing the understanding of this clause, is believed to consent to Origen — saying that all who are, who have been, and who shall be men (one Christ excepted) are to be examined, proved, and in some manner burned by the fire of the world's conflagration on the day of judgment. For he transferred from Origen's explanation into this psalm almost all the following words: "'By fire thou hast examined us,' David says:[1] therefore we shall all be examined by fire. And Malachi says, 'Behold the omnipotent Lord comes: and who shall endure the day of his entrance? For he himself shall enter in, like a refining fire; and he shall sit refining and purging, like gold and silver, and he shall purge the sons of Levi.'[2] By fire, therefore, shall the sons of Levi be purged; by fire Ezekiel, by fire Daniel. But even if they shall be examined by fire, yet they shall say, 'We have passed through fire and water';[3] others shall remain in the fire. To these the fire shall be as dew — as [it was] to the Hebrew boys, who were cast into the burning of the fiery furnace; but the avenging fire shall burn up the ministers of impiety. Woe is me, if my work shall have burned, and I suffer the loss of this labor! And if the Lord shall save his servants, we shall be saved by [our] faith — yet so saved, as if by fire; and if we be not burned up, yet we shall be burned. But in what manner some remain in the fire, and others pass through, the divine Scripture teaches us: namely, in the Red Sea the people of the Egyptians was drowned, [while] the people of the Hebrews passed through before, [and] Moses passed through; Pharaoh was cast down, because, when heavy sins drowned [them], in that manner the sacrilegious are cast down into the lake of burning fire. Let us, therefore, placed here, follow the pillar of fire, which may illumine us in this body, and show [us] the way, that in the future the cloud may cool us, so that we may be able to relieve [ourselves from] the savage burnings of the night." Again, in the exposition of Psalm 118, upon that [verse], "See my humiliation, and deliver me," etc., he says: "All, [as many] as desire to return to paradise, must be proved by fire: for not idly is it written that — Adam and Eve being cast out of the seat of paradise — God placed at the exit of paradise a fiery turning sword; all must pass through the flames, even if [one] be that John the Evangelist, whom the Lord so loved that he said of him to Peter, 'So I will [him] to remain: what is that to thee? follow thou me.' Concerning his death some have doubted; concerning [his] passing through the fire we cannot doubt. Even if [one] be Peter, who received the keys of the kingdom of heaven, he must say, 'We have passed through the fire.' But for John the fiery sword shall be quickly turned aside, because iniquity is not found in him whom equity loved: if there was anything of vice in him, divine charity burned it away. He shall be examined as silver; I shall be examined as lead — until the lead melt away, I shall burn. If nothing of silver shall be found in me, woe is me! I shall be thrust down into the lowest [part] of hell; or, as stubble, I shall be wholly burned up. If anything of gold or of silver shall be found in me — not through my [own] acts, but through the mercy and grace of Christ — [I shall say], perhaps, 'For they who hope in thee shall not be confounded.' One [alone] could not feel that fire — [he] who is the justice of God, Christ, who did no sin: for nothing of the fire found in him anything which it could burn up. Therefore, since we are to be examined, let us so act, that in the judgment we may deserve to be proved by the divine [examination]. Let us hold, placed here, humility — so that, when each one of us shall come to the judgment of God, to those fires which we are to pass through, he may say, 'See my humiliation, and deliver me,' etc."

◊ 1. Left margin: Psalm 16:3.

◊ 2. Left margin: Malachi 3:1–2.

◊ 3. Left margin: Psalm 65:12.

Hilary, together with Ambrose, following his own Origen, in the commentaries on Psalm 118, upon that verse, "My soul hath coveted to desire thy judgments,"[4] etc., thus wrote: "The prophet remembers that it is arduous to desire the judgment; for since no living [man] is clean in his sight, how can the judgment be desirable, in which that unwearied fire must be undergone by us — in which those grave punishments, [needing] to be expiated from sins, must be undergone by the soul? The sword passed through the soul of the blessed Mary, that the thoughts of many hearts might be revealed. If, therefore, that Virgin of God — subject [to it] — is to come to the severity in the judgment, who shall dare to desire to be judged by God?" And in the canon on Matthew 3, explaining that [passage], "He shall baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire":[5] "Baptized in the Holy Spirit, it remains that we be consummated in the fire of judgment."

◊ 4. Right margin: Psalm 118:20.

◊ 5. Right margin: Matthew 3:11.

To the same [purpose] seem to pertain those things which Basil noted on the fourth chapter of Isaiah, in those words of the prophet, "He shall purge Jerusalem in the spirit of judgment and in the spirit of burning," etc., saying: "But this — 'In the spirit of judgment and the spirit of burning' — is referred to that probation, or examination, which shall be made through fire in the future age." And a little after: "Those who, after having received the knowledge of life, deliberately and by [their own] zeal render themselves obnoxious to blood — such surely need to be purged by fire; and these are to be purged by the spirit of burning, or of examination." And again, in the same commentaries, weighing that [passage] of Isaiah 9, "In the indignation of the wrath of the Lord the earth is burnt up,"[6] etc., he says: "The prophet declares that the earthly [region] itself is delivered to be consumed by a punitive fire, unto the grace and benefit of the soul; for he threatens not an utter destruction and extermination, but hints at a purgation according to the sentence of the Apostle: 'Because, as any man's work shall have burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire.'"[7]

◊ 6. Right margin: Isaiah 9:19.

◊ 7. Right margin: 1 Corinthians 3:15.

To the same opinion Jerome appears to have alluded, in the third book on Amos, where, expounding that [passage] from the seventh chapter, "And behold he shall call for fire to judgment, and it shall devour the abyss, and it shall eat up at the same time a part,"[8] etc., he thus speaks: "The calling of fire to judgment first devours the abyss — that is, all kinds of sinners: wood, hay, stubble;[9] and afterward it eats up at the same time a part — that is, it comes to those saints who are in the peculium of the Lord, and are reckoned in his part. For it is the time that judgment begin from the house of the Lord; and in Ezekiel it is commanded to those who are to bring the punishments, 'Begin ye from my sanctuary.'[10] And in the Apostle we read, 'If any man's work shall have burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire.'[11] And when we shall all have been in sin, and shall have lain against the truth of the sentence, the Lord will have mercy on us, and will raise us up in the time of the resurrection."

◊ 8. Right margin: Amos 7:4.

◊ 9. Right margin: 1 Corinthians 3.

◊ 10. Right margin: Ezekiel 9:6.

◊ 11. Right margin: 1 Corinthians 3:15.

Lactantius Firmianus, speaking of this fire long before Jerome and Hilary, in the seventh [book] of the Divine Institutes, chapter 21, left this written: "The same divine fire, therefore, by one and the same force and power, shall both burn the impious and shall renew them; and as much as it shall consume from the bodies, so much shall it restore, and shall furnish for itself eternal fuel. But when God shall have judged the just, he will also examine them by fire: then those whose sins shall have prevailed, either by weight or by number, shall be singed by the fire, and shall be scorched; but those whom full justice and the ripeness of virtue has thoroughly seasoned" →

[…continues on folio 586 (PDF p. 403): the rest of Lactantius, and Sixtus's Catholic resolution of these Fathers on the fire (Annotatio CLXXI).]

---

(printed folio 586 [PDF p. 403]. Annot. CLXXI–CLXXIV (Ps 36:15–50:3): the fire-trial resolved (the living at judgment pass through it, not the dead saints); Cassiodorus on praying "with understanding"; and Chrysostom's "a thousand times repent" (vs. the Novatians) and on mercy → folio 587.)

(folio 586, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXXI (continued)

shall not feel that fire; for they have something of God in themselves which repels and casts back the force of the flame. So great is the force of innocence, that from it that fire flees away harmless — [the fire] which receives from God this power, that it may burn the impious [and] obey the just."

From the opinions of these authors, those things appear to be sufficiently diverse which all the Scholastic Theologians teach concerning the fire of the final conflagration: who, although they confess that all mortals whom the time of judgment shall find living shall enter this fire[1] — and that certain elect, needing expiation, are to be purged in it with pain, but certain [others], in whom there will be nothing to be purged, shall escape from it without any torment, [while] the reprobate, together with that very fire, are rolled down and drowned into hell — yet they refuse [to hold] that the saints who died before the judgment are to be purged by that fire; especially the Apostles, purified by the Holy Spirit, and Mary the Mother of God, sanctified in the womb and assumed into heaven with a most pure body: both because the dead do not rise again until after that fire shall have ceased from the office of purgation, the faculty of purging being laid aside; and because the bodies of the saints after the resurrection shall be so spiritual and impassible that they are no longer capable of the fiery purgation. Nor does Augustine much dissent from the Scholastics, in book 20 On the City of God, chapter 8, where he says that the future saints [shall be] in the higher parts of the world, into which the flame of that burning shall not ascend — just as neither of old [did] the wave of the flood; for such bodies shall be theirs, that they may be there where they shall have willed to be. But, made immortal and incorruptible, they shall not dread the fire of that conflagration — just as the corruptible and mortal bodies of the three men were able to live unharmed in the burning furnace. See the preceding Annotation.

◊ 1. Left margin: All mortals whom the time of judgment shall find living shall enter the fire of the final conflagration.

Annotation CLXXII [contents]

"For God is the king of all the earth: sing ye wisely." — Psalm 46:3, 8

Whether one ought to pray in an unknown tongue.

Cassiodorus, in the commentaries on the Psalms, expounding this little verse, says: "Not only must we sing, but [sing] understanding: for no one does anything wisely which he does not understand." The heretics use this testimony against those who sing or pray Psalms and prayers not understood before God, asserting that those prayers are of no fruit which — in a foreign and unknown tongue — are offered by the simple and unlearned to the divine majesty: because no one obtains the benefits of prayer unless first, with attentive thought, he has diligently considered what he prays; and he will not be able to consider [it] unless he first has understood it; nor will he be able to understand those things which must be uttered in a tongue foreign and unknown to him. To these [heretics] it must be answered, that there is a twofold attention of praying:[2] one, peculiar and proper to those who understand only, which looks to the words and the sense of the words, lest anything be erred on either side; but the other far more excellent, and accessible to those who understand as [well as] to those who do not understand, which directs the point of the mind unto the end and scope of prayer — namely, unto God, whom [one] prays, and then unto the very thing which [one] prays for. And it happens that an attention of this kind is sometimes stretched so far that the mind, lifted up in the meditation of God, forgets sometimes the words, and the meanings, and itself. Nor is it doubtful that David and Cassiodorus looked to this attention, when they admonished that one should sing wisely and understandingly. For he undoubtedly sings wisely, and prays, who tastes the savor and fruit of divine contemplation in prayer; and he truly prays understandingly, who contemplates, with intent mind, God whom he prays.[3] You have some things pertaining hither in book 6, Annotation 263.

◊ 2. Left margin: The attention of praying is twofold.

◊ 3. Right margin: An excellent teaching.

Annotation CLXXIII [contents]

"Have mercy on me, O God, according to thy great mercy." — Psalm 50:3

Whether penance is to be repeated.

Chrysostom, in homily 2 on Psalm 50, when from the words of this little verse he encouraged every most desperate sinner to penance, burst forth into that voice — repeated by him very often, also in many homilies: "Thou hast sinned? Repent. A thousand times [hast thou sinned]? A thousand times repent — nay, repent even still." Which voice there were not lacking of old [some] who condemned, as a certain seed-plot of intemperance and unbridled license. But among others, Socrates of Constantinople, in the sixth book of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 21, writes of it in this manner: "It comes upon me to wonder how John [Chrysostom], since he exercised so great a zeal for temperance, taught in his homilies to contemn temperance. For since there was but a single penance given by the synod of bishops to the lapsed,[4] he dared to say, 'Thou too, who hast done penance a thousand times, approach': on account of which doctrine he was condemned also by [his] friends, especially by Sisinnius, bishop of the Novatians, who wrote a book against this saying, and on account of it strongly resisted him." These things Socrates: whom there is no doubt to have been a Novatian,[5] and on that account offended, together with his own bishop, at Chrysostom's sayings. Yet Chrysostom, saying these things, did not look to that solemn and public penance which the synodical decrees granted but once to the lapsed, but to the private, singular, and secret penance, which is necessary before God — or before a particular priest — to everyone sinning: this [penance], to [him who has sinned] a thousand times, Chrysostom offers a thousand times as a remedy — not that he might furnish them the matter of intemperate license, but that he might free them from all occasion of despairing. Which he himself also, in the same homily, after the aforesaid words, plainly declares, thus adding: "These things I say, not that I may make you negligent, but that I may lead you to the faith of a salutary expectation: lest you ever despair of yourselves, but always trust in the mercy of God — for one must despair only of that [man] who has despaired of himself."

◊ 4. Right margin: Public penance was granted to the lapsed only once.

◊ 5. Right margin: Socrates was a Novatian.

Annotation CLXXIV [contents]

"And according to the multitude of thy tender mercies, blot out my iniquity." — Psalm 50:3

Concerning satisfaction.

Chrysostom, in homily 2 on the fiftieth Psalm, interpreting this clause, among other things inserts these words: "Where mercy is implored, interrogation ceases; where mercy is sought, judgment rages not; where mercy is asked, there is no place for punishment; where [there is] mercy, [there is] no inquiry; where [there is] mercy, the answer is [one] of pardon." →

[…continues on folio 587 (PDF p. 404): the rest of Chrysostom on mercy and satisfaction (Annotatio CLXXIV).]

---

(printed folio 587 [PDF p. 404]. Annot. CLXXIV–CLXXV (Ps 50:3–50:5): Calvin abusing Chrysostom against satisfaction (closed); then the long crux on sacramental confession — Chrysostom and Cassian texts marshaled against private confession, answered as touching only public/theatrical confession (abolished by Nectarius) → folio 588.)

(folio 587, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXXIV (continued)

John Calvin, in the ninth chapter of his Institutes, abuses this sentence to overthrow the satisfactory penalties, which the theologians teach are most especially necessary to penitents.[1] Reread Annotation 16 of this book.

◊ 1. Left margin: Satisfactory penalties are necessary to penitents.

Annotation CLXXV [contents]

"My sin is always before me." — Psalm 50:5

Whether sacramental confession is necessary.

Chrysostom, in the second homily on this Psalm, to the exposition of the present little verse inserted some things concerning confession, which John Calvin, in the ninth chapter of his Institutes, and the rest of the Lutherans bring forward (together with very many other sentences of the same Author) against sacramental confession. They run in this manner: "Say thy sins, that thou mayest blot them out. If thou art ashamed to say to anyone that thou hast sinned, say [them] within. [I do] not [say] that thou confess to thy fellow-servant, who may reproach thee; but say [them] to God, who heals them." A similar sentence, and in almost the same words, Chrysostom inculcates in very many places; of which I shall bring hither some of the more notable, that at one glance I may set before your eyes whatsoever he has said on this subject, and lest it be needful for me again to repeat passages of this kind of argument.

In the fourth homily on Lazarus, on Luke chapter 16: "Why, therefore, art thou ashamed and dost thou blush to confess thy sins? Dost thou tell [them] to a man, that he may reproach thee? Not so; for [thou fearest] to confess to thy fellow-servant, lest he bring [it] forth into public. But thou showest thy wounds to him who is Lord, to him who is physician; for neither is he ignorant [of them], even if thou tell him not — [he] who knew [them] even before thou didst perpetrate [them]. Why, therefore, is there care, that thou tell [them] the less? Not, he says, do I compel thee to come forth into the midst as into a theatre, and to employ many witnesses: to me alone tell thy sin privately, that I may heal the ulcer, and free thee from grief."

In the homily on the Publican, on Luke 18, he left this written: "I admonish thee that thou confess assiduously. For neither do I lead thee to the theatre of thy fellow-servants, nor do I compel thee to enunciate thy sins to men: unfold thy conscience to God; to him show thy deeds and wounds, and from him seek medicine; show thyself to him who reproaches not, but heals. For though thou be silent, yet he knows all. Tell [them], therefore, to him, that thou mayest depart thence free and loosed from sins, and be freed from that intolerable publication of sins."

In homily 31 on the twelfth chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews: "Not only, he says, let us say that we are sinners, but let us also compute the sins themselves specially, one by one. I do not say to thee, that thou betray thyself in public, nor that thou accuse thyself before others; but I would have thee obey the prophet, saying, 'Reveal to the Lord thy way.[2] Before God, therefore, confess thy sins; at the true judge pronounce thy offenses with prayer — not with the tongue, but with the memory of thy conscience: and then at last hope that thou canst obtain mercy."

◊ 2. Left margin: Psalm 36:5.

In the homily On penance and confession he says: "Thou art confounded, and blushest to utter thy sins? And yet it behoved [thee] most of all to say them, and to divulge [them] among men: for to sin is confusion; it is not confusion to confess sins. But now it is not even necessary to confess in the presence of witnesses: let the inquisition of offenses be made by thought; without a witness let this judgment be; let God alone see thee confessing — God, who reproaches not thy sins, but looses the sins on account of [thy] confusion," etc.

In the eighth homily among those which are titled On penance: "Reveal not, he says, thy sores; do not produce accusation in the common theatre; do not set up witnesses of [thy] offenses: within, in [thy] conscience, no one standing by except him who sees all — God, who both searches and judges concerning [thy] sins, and weighs the judgment of the sins of all, as it were, by a certain balance. Reform that in which thou hast offended; and so, with a pure conscience, approach the sacred table, and be a partaker of the holy sacrifice."

In the fifth homily On the incomprehensible nature of God he says: "How greatly I exhort and beseech and pray you, dearest brethren, that ye more frequently confess to the immortal God, and — your offenses being enumerated — seek pardon, and [seek] the deity propitious! I lead thee not into the theatre of thy fellow-servants; I do not compel [thee] to detect thy sins to men: unfold thy conscience before God, and explain [it]; show to God, the most excellent physician, thy wounds, and ask from him the medicine; show [them] to him who reproaches not, but heals most humanely. Say to him, that — thy stains being wiped off — thou mayest depart thence clean, and without any disgrace, [and] be freed from that intolerable promulgation of thy offenses."

John Cassian, consenting to the same opinion of his own preceptor Chrysostom, in book 20 of the Collations, chapter 8, wrote these things: "There is none who cannot say suppliantly to God, 'My sin I have made known to thee,[3] that, through this confession, he may deserve to subjoin also that, 'And thou hast remitted the impiety of my sin.' Because, if — shame drawing [thee] back — thou blushest to reveal thy sins before men, cease not to confess them, by continual supplication, to him from whom they cannot lie hidden, and to say: 'My iniquity I acknowledge, and my sin is always before me. To thee only have I sinned, and done evil before thee[4] — who is wont both to heal without any publication of shame, and to pardon without reproach."

◊ 3. Right margin: Psalm 31:5.

◊ 4. Right margin: Psalm 50:5.

The Master of the Sentences, book 4, distinction 17, says that these sayings of Chrysostom are not so to be understood, as though it be lawful to anyone — if he has had the opportunity — not to confess to a priest; but that it suffices, where the crime is secret, to tell [it] to God alone [rather than] in secret through a confessor. But I judge that Chrysostom said these things not concerning secret confession — which is a part of sacramental penance — but concerning that theatrical and public confession, which is a part of public penance, which of old the penitents were wont to make, for enormous crimes, as in a theatre, before the bishop, the presbyters, and the multitude of the people. For to this [public confession] Chrysostom would not compel those who had secretly offended: both because those things which are secret he judged ought not to be published before all; and also because, even in his own times, public confession had been abrogated (through fear of the raging people) by Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople, his predecessor[5] — on account of a matron [who had been] violated by a deacon in the temple, under the pretext of confession: as Sozomen indicates in book 9 of the Tripartite History, chapter 35. From which [chapter] it pleases [me] to relate the ancient rite of public confession and penance, that the aforenoted passages of Chrysostom may be better understood. These, therefore, are the words of Sozomen from that chapter: "Since it is known that altogether not to sin is divine, and beyond human nature — but that God commanded pardon to be given to sinners, and to those doing penance; while those who refuse to confess acquire a greater burden of sins — therefore it seemed [good] to the ancient" →

◊ 5. Right margin: For what cause public confession was abrogated at Constantinople.

[…continues on folio 588 (PDF p. 405): Sozomen on the ancient office of the penitentiary priest and its abolition (Annotatio CLXXV).]

---

(printed folio 588 [PDF p. 405]. Annot. CLXXV–CLXXIX (Ps 50:5–50:7): the public-penance rite and its abolition by Nectarius (Sozomen); royal versus priestly power; and three annotations on "conceived in iniquities— " Arnobius, Chrysostom (accused by Faber), and Theodoret → folio 589.)

(folio 588, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXXV (continued)

certain wise men to appoint over the people certain Pontiffs, that — as it were in a theatre, under the testimony of the ecclesiastical people — offenses might be laid open; and for this matter they appointed a presbyter of good conversation, discreet and wise: to whom, coming, those who had offended confessed their own offenses. But he, according to each one's fault, appointed also the penalty [the satisfaction to be paid]: which even hitherto is diligently observed in the Western Churches, and especially at Rome — where also there is a fixed place for the penitents. For the guilty stand, and are set as it were amid lamentations. For when the sacred celebration [of the Mass] has been completed, they — not partaking of the communion — with groaning and lamentation prostrate themselves upon the ground; to whom the Bishop, hastening together, himself also prostrates himself with tears and spiritual groaning, and the whole people of the Church is flooded with weeping. But after these things the Bishop first rises, and lifts up those lying on the ground; then, a fitting prayer being made over the penitents, he dismisses them all. But they, of their own accord giving themselves to mortifications — whether by fastings, or by abstinence from the bath, or by the withholding of foods, or by other things which are enjoined — await the common time which the Bishop decrees; and when the appointed time has come, as though discharging a certain debt, [and being] cured of the sin by the affliction, they partake of the communion with the people. These things, therefore, the Roman Pontiffs have observed from antiquity even unto our time. But further, at Constantinople there was a presbyter set over the penitents, until that time in which a certain most noble woman, when she had confessed her sins, and it had been enjoined her by the presbyter that she should fast and supplicate God with [good] works — while she was observing this, confessed that she had more than once lain with a deacon in the church. When the people had come to know this, they raged against the priests, as though through them an injury had been done to the Church. Then Nectarius the Bishop removed the wicked deacon; and, certain persons persuading [him] that he should leave each one to the judgment of his own conscience as to communicating, he ordained that there should by no means [any longer] be a presbyter set over the penitents. And from that [time] the custom of antiquity was taken away — since, as I judge, the lesser sins were being ventured [more boldly], on account of the shame of confession and the [over-]nicety of those who examined [them]." These things Sozomen.

Annotation CLXXVI [contents]

"To thee only have I sinned." — Psalm 50:6

Whether the royal power is to be preferred to the sacerdotal.

Cassiodorus, in the commentaries on the Psalms, upon this verse has these things: "If anyone of the people has erred, he sins both against God and against the king; but when the king offends, he is guilty to God alone, because he has no man who may judge his deeds. Rightly, therefore, does the king say that he has sinned to God only: because [God] was the only one who could sift what [the king] had committed." John of Torquemada, cardinal-presbyter, in book 1 On Ecclesiastical Power, chapter 91, places this passage among the arguments of those who prefer the Caesarean power to the Pontifical. The heretics of our times — who strive to vindicate the first grade of ecclesiastical dignity to the secular magistrate — cite this very passage, and annex to it another sentence out of the third commentary of Jerome on Jeremiah, where, in the explanation of chapter 13, it is thus read: "Not only the ignoble common crowd and the vile populace, but [also] the Kings of the Churches, who sit upon the throne — the priests themselves too, the second grade in ecclesiastical honor — are filled up with the variety of sins."

The words of these authors must be referred to the kingdom and the priesthood of the Jews and of the Gentiles: among whom, since all the sacerdotal worship was instituted for the obtaining of the earthly and temporal goods of the present life — the care of which looks to the king — justly were the priests and pontiffs both of the Jews and of the Gentiles made subject to Kings and Emperors. But in the Evangelical law — in which Christ, the assisting Pontiff of the good things to come, instituted a priesthood far more excellent, in that it confers on us spiritual and heavenly goods, over which the royal power has no right[1] — it is fair that kings be made subject to the rule of the pontiffs, and obey the word of the priests. Yet it is to be observed here that Philo the Jew, in the book On Fugitives [De profugis], and in the third book On the Life of Moses, admonishes that, although the high priest of the Jews was inferior to the king, nevertheless, for so long as he was discharging his ministry — entering the temple, clothed with the sacerdotal vestment, bearing on his head the tiara [cidaris] in place of the royal diadem, and the golden plate marked with the name of God — he was superior to the king himself. Nay more, in the book On the Legation to Gaius [Caligula] he testifies that the Maccabean princes, his own ancestors, by the best right preferred the Priesthood in every respect to the kingdom, saying thus: "I, who had both ancestors [that were] kings, and, of these, several who were also high Pontiffs — they valued that [priestly] dignity more than the royal: judging that, by how much God stands before man, by so much the pontificate is more excellent than the kingdom; for to the care of the one [the priesthood] pertain divine things, to that of the other [the kingship], human." You have [something] on this matter in St. Thomas, book 1 On the Governance of Princes [De regimine principum], chapter 14; likewise you shall read more of these things below, in the book which next follows this [one], in the seventy-second Annotation.

◊ 1. Right margin: The royal power has no right over spiritual goods.

Annotation CLXXVII [contents]

"For behold, in iniquities [was I conceived]." — Psalm 50:7

Whether Adam's sin transmitted to posterity only the death of the body.

Arnobius, in the commentaries on the Psalms, opening the sense of this little verse, seems to signify that Adam, by sinning, transmitted to his heirs only the punishment of bodily death, but not the sin and the vice of origin. For he speaks in these words: "David did not say, 'With iniquities,' or 'With sins did my mother beget me': but, 'In iniquities was I conceived, and in sins did my mother beget me.' For by saying [this] he signified that his mother bore him amid the sins of the world, because every sin is conceived in the heart and consummated by the mouth. But this [child] who is born has the sentence [condemnation] of Adam — yet Adam's sin itself he has not." Read Annotation 236 of the sixth book.

Annotation CLXXVIII [contents]

"For behold, in iniquities [was I conceived]." — Psalm 50:7

Concerning original sin.

Chrysostom is brought under suspicion by John Faber [Johann Fabri], bishop of Vienna, because in his exposition of Psalm 50 — which he expounded splendidly — he purposely left the present little verse untouched, lest he fall into discourse of original sin, which he himself thought to be nothing [non-existent], and in many places also demonstrated to be nothing. These things Faber [says] in the Apology of his commentaries on Paul: whose error we have confuted in [our] censures upon the fifth chapter of the epistle to the Romans. Read Annotation 236 of the following book.

Annotation CLXXIX [contents]

"For behold, in iniquities was I conceived." — Psalm 50:7

Whether the sin contracted from Adam is only the occasion of sin, and not sin [itself].

Theodoret, in the commentaries on the Psalms, upon the little verse of this Psalm, is believed to have been in the opinion of those who assert that the sin of origin, contracted from Adam, is simply → [...continues on folio 589 (PDF p. 406): the rest of Theodoret on whether the sin contracted from Adam is sin properly or only the occasion of sin (Annotatio CLXXIX).]

---

(printed folio 589 [PDF p. 406]. Annot. CLXXIX–CLXXXIV (Ps 50:7–65:12): Theodoret on original sin; Euthymius on marriage without the Fall; Hilary on Peter's denial, Christ's assumed passions, and merit vs. election; and Origen on whether men rise in the numerically same body → folio 590.)

(folio 589, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXXIX (continued)

and in itself is not sin, but only the occasion and incitement of sin: which [occasion], if anyone repels it by the judgment of reason, he will be free from all sin; but if he consents to it, he will fall into sin, and be condemned to the punishment of sin. For his words written below hint at this in a certain manner — translated by us from the Greek exemplar: "David, therefore, does not accuse marriage, nor does he call the nuptial communion a transgression, as certain persons have imprudently presumed, thus understanding that [text], 'In iniquities was I conceived, and in sins did my mother conceive me': but he brings forth into the midst the transgression once dared of old by the first men, and says that this begot the fountain of these defluxions. For unless they had sinned, they would not have received death, which is the penalty of sin; but, being free from mortality, they would have been more powerful to conquer sin — for with incorruption there would have been also all impassibility; and, impassibility governing, there would have been no place for sin. But since they sinned, they were delivered to corruption; and, being made corruptible, they begot sons very like themselves — whom desires, fears, pleasures, griefs, anger, and envy pursued; and with these [passions], and with the things born from them, reason contends: which reason, if it shall have conquered, is honored, and is crowned with victorious crowns; but if conquered, it is punished with confusion and torn with penalties." These things Theodoret repeats more openly in the exposition of the fifth chapter to the Romans; in the censures of which — [as to] what is said there — thou shalt see Annotation 236 of the following book.

Annotation CLXXX [contents]

"For behold, in iniquities was I conceived." — Psalm 50:7

If the first parents had not sinned, whether [there would have been] conception and generation.

Euthymius, in the commentaries on the Psalms, expounding this sentence, affirms that Adam's sin was the cause of human conception and generation; for unless he had sinned, there would have been no carnal union, nor the joining of male and female. For he thus writes: "If Adam had not sinned, it would never have behooved Eve to be joined to him; sin, therefore, begot the union, and the union in turn produced those who were born of Adam and Eve; and so thereafter others, down to David. And although marriage be now held in honor, yet [things] of nature come forth from sin: 'from sin, therefore,' says David, 'was I conceived and begotten.'" In the same manner the Author of the Imperfect Work on Matthew expounds the present passage, in the first homily. We have confuted this opinion above, in Annotations 20 and 21.

There are [some] who think that Euthymius applied this exposition to this little verse of set purpose, lest he be compelled to confess that sin which the royal Prophet in this place chiefly deplores — that is, original sin, which we constantly believe to have been transfused from the first parent into all [his] posterity. That this opinion did not altogether please Euthymius, those things testify which were written by him in the second volume of the Panoplia, title twenty-two, where — the words of Gregory Nazianzen being also borrowed — he thus speaks of Adam's sin: "Therefore, for the transgression of the precept, and for the sin of the first parent, are appointed diseases, and death, which the transgression and sin brought about; which death indeed indicates the benignity of God — for it is the cause that, sin being cut short, the evil be not perpetual, as Gregory the Theologian says. But the eternal punishments are not appointed for the first transgression, but for the individual men who bind themselves with sins — or who, from the first parent even unto the consummation [of the world], applied no cure to [their] sins." Some attribute this opinion of Euthymius to Chrysostom, but wrongly and unjustly, as one may see in Annotation 236 of the sixth book.

Annotation CLXXXI [contents]

"There is none that doeth good, [there is] not even one." — Psalm 52:4

Whether Peter, in the denial of Christ, lost [his] faith.

Hilary, in the commentaries on the Psalms, expounding this little verse, so excuses Peter's denial that he says he did not lose the firmness of [his] faith: because, although from the trepidation of the flesh — which he could not restrain — his tongue burst forth into the denial of Christ,[1] yet the firm faith of confessing Christ even unto martyrdom did not depart from his mind. Prudentius, in the hymn to the cock-crow, subscribes to Hilary in these verses: "The denier wept, at last, for the wickedness slipped from his mouth, while his mind remained innocent, and his soul preserved the faith." By another way also [Hilary] strives to wrest this same denial of Peter to a pious sense, in the commentaries on Matthew. St. Jerome reprehends him in this matter, as thou shalt be able to see in Annotation 160 of the following book.

◊ 1. Right margin: Matthew 26:70, 72, 73.

Annotation CLXXXII [contents]

"Because strangers have risen up against me." — Psalm 53:5

Whether hunger, thirst, grief, and death were natural to Christ.

Hilary, in the commentaries on the Psalms, seems to hint that thirst, hunger, sleep, sadness, grief, weariness, and other passions of this kind were not natural to the humanity of Christ, but assumed [voluntarily taken on]; for thus he speaks to the exposition of the proposed verse: "Hence that [fact], that he hungered, thirsted, slept, was wearied, and wept, and suffered, and died. And that he might be understood to be subject to all these things not by nature, but by [voluntary] assumption, having gone through them all, he rose again." Read Annotation 186 of this book.

Annotation CLXXXIII [contents]

"Blessed [is he] whom thou hast chosen and taken up." — Psalm 64:5

Whether our merits are the cause of the eternal election.

Hilary, in the explanation of the Psalter, illustrating this passage, seems to incline to the opinion of those who lay down that our merits are the cause of the divine and eternal election, saying: "Blessed is whosoever shall have been elected: for many, according to the Gospel, are called, but few [are] chosen; and the elect are conspicuous in the nuptial garment, splendid with the pure and whole body of the new nativity. And so election is not a matter of undiscerning judgment, but a discrimination made out of the choice of merit: blessed, therefore, [is he] whom God has chosen — blessed for this, that he is worthy by [his] election." Augustine condemns this opinion in [his books] against the Pelagians, as thou hast below in Annotation 251 of the following book.

Annotation CLXXXIV [contents]

"We have passed through fire and water, and thou hast brought us out into a refreshment." — Psalm 65:12

Whether men shall rise again in the same individual [body].

Origen's commentaries on the Psalms have here some things which Methodius, bishop of Olympus, thinks were written against the resurrection of the flesh in the same individual [body]; and these the same bishop recounts in [his dialogue] the Aglaophon in these words: "Thou hast indeed surely seen the skin of an animal, or some other such thing, filled with water: in what manner, if it be gradually emptied, and gradually filled, it always shows the same appearance. For of whatever sort that which contains [the skin] shall be, it is necessary that to it also that which is within [the water] be conformed" →

[…continues on folio 590 (PDF p. 407): the rest of Origen's simile (as reported by Methodius) on the flux of the body and the resurrection (Annotatio CLXXXIV).]

---

(printed folio 590 [PDF p. 407]. Annot. CLXXXIV–CLXXXV (Ps 65:12, 65:11): Origen's water-skin simile on the risen body closes; then his error that souls are thrust into bodies for sins committed in heaven, with Cyril of Alexandria's reasons against it (1–5, the sixth begins) → folio 591.)

(folio 590, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXXXIV (continued)

conformed: for if the water flows away beneath, [and] if one adds as much as is poured out, not suffering the skin[-bottle] to be emptied of its water all at once, it is necessary that what is added appear such as the whole [was], because that which contains [it] is the same. And truly, if anyone should wish to liken the body to these things, he will be confounded by no shame: for in the same manner also those things which are introduced from nourishment, in place of the flesh expelled, are transmuted into the figure of the appearance [species] of the very thing containing them; and inasmuch as [the flesh] is spread out to the eyes, it is like the eyes; inasmuch as [it pertains] to the face, [like] the face; inasmuch as to the other parts, [like] those same — so that each one appears the same, not because there are [the same] fleshes as the first substrate in the same [man], but [the same] appearance, according to which the things that accrue are specified. Accordingly, if we are not the same even for a few days in [respect of] body, but [the same] of the appearance in the body — for this alone stands firm in [our] nativity — much more, therefore, neither then [at the resurrection] shall we be the same according to the same flesh, but according to the appearance, which even now is always conserved in us and remains. For what there [in the simile] is the skin, this here is the appearance; and what there is the water in the likeness, this here is that which accrues and departs. As, therefore, now — although the body be not the same — yet the character is preserved the same according to the same form: so, the body not remaining the same, the appearance, increased into greater glory, shall be shown no more in a corruptible, but in an impassible and spiritual body. See above, Annotation 148.

Annotation CLXXXV [contents]

"Thou hast led us into a snare." — Psalm 65:11

Whether Souls, on account of sins committed in heaven, are thrust down into bodies.

Methodius, bishop of Olympus, imputes it as a fault to Origen that, interpreting this verse in the commentaries on the Psalter, he said that Souls were brought into bodies in order that in these — as in a snare, and a chain, and a prison — they might pay the penalties of the crimes which, while dwelling in heaven, they had committed. This same error in Origen was condemned by Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, in book 2 of the Panarion; by Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, in his first Paschal [letter]; by Jerome, in the epistle to Pammachius; and especially by Cyril, bishop of Alexandria — who, in the first book of the commentaries on John, confuted this very dogma with many reasons of no small moment brought forward: which, because thou wilt find them in no one of the school of theologians, it has pleased [me] to append here, for the favor of the studious reader.

First: if the Souls existed before the bodies of men, and — by a certain inclination to evil, as [Origen] himself says — are joined to bodies in place of punishment, how are they said to be illumined when coming into this world?[1] For illumination seems to bring greater grace, and is certainly [a thing] of honor, not of punishment; but he who is honored is not punished, nor is he vexed with torments who partakes of the divine light. Wherefore it is certain that the Soul, which in the body itself is honored, is not punished by [its] conjunction with the body.

◊ 1. Left margin: The reason against Origen asserting that they [souls] are thrust into bodies on account of sins committed. John 1:9. [The margin flags each successive argument (the second through sixth) simply with "Ratio" — "a reason."]

Secondly, it is added, that it would be altogether false that the Soul is illumined [when] coming into this world — if indeed it was already a mind and an entire intellect beforehand: for if, while it comes into the body, it is illumined, it is necessary that, before it comes, it lack light. How, therefore, will the intellect be entire and pure, if it then at last began to be illumined, when it descended into this world and into the mass of the flesh?

Thirdly, if the Soul existed before the body, and — as a pure mind and an entire intellect — was more closely joined to the good itself, but by the depravity and desire of worse things was pressed down to earthly things: how is not a great injury done to it, which — now pressed down in this body — is bidden to live rightly and not to sin? Whereas it would rather have behooved [it to do so] then, when — not yet bound to a body — it was farther from all perturbation. One certainly could not say either that the fitting occasion for admonishing the soul was unknown to God, or that [the soul] was injuriously handled by him who cannot sin. Fittingly, therefore, and justly, are we bidden not to sin in this flesh, since we began to be at that time in which, together with the body, we came into this world, and, as it were, arrived from a certain [nothingness] out of nothing unto being.

Fourthly, I would gladly ask of him what likelihood the reasoning has, when he says that, on account of the offenses which the Soul had previously committed, it is thrust into a body, that by the experience of things it may learn the baseness of its own concupiscence: how does he not blush to say these things? For it seems rather that [the soul] ought to be freed from depraved thoughts, than to be thrust down into the depth of the basest pleasures — for not thus, but that [other] manner, could have healed it. But if it was thrust into a body in order that it might enjoy the pleasures of the body, and in that manner be the more sickened, then the physician can rightly be accused of the crime as much of ignorance as of injury — [the physician] who thought that the sick [soul] could be healed by that method, if she were driven by injury into greater and more numerous offenses. But if [it was done] that he might make an end of her sinning: how did he think she would rather emerge from the utmost depth of misery and of desire, than [that], at the very beginning of evils — when she lacked the tinder of sin, that is, the body — she would retain her state with a small chastisement?

Fifthly, besides these things: if the Soul offended before the body, and was joined to a body in order to pay the penalties, it would certainly behoove that believers, who by faith are freed from sins, should straightway be freed from the punishment — that is, from the body. For how, tell me, I pray, would the Soul be understood to have thoroughly obtained the remission of sins, when it is still held enclosed in the body on account of sin? But we see it happen far otherwise: for not only do the faithful not straightway fly forth from [their] bodies, but even, by the profession of the resurrection and by faith, they believe that they shall live immortally with [their] bodies. Not, therefore, is the body joined to the Soul for torment — especially since it has been so divinely honored that it both attests the omnipotence of the Savior who is to raise it again, and is destined to have an immortal life.

Sixthly, add that, according to the law, the greater offenses are punished with death, while those who have sinned more lightly are permitted to live; but those who seem altogether innocent are even affected with rewards, as it were with certain enticements to living. But it would have behooved, if the Soul was joined to the body in order to pay the penalties of things committed, that wicked men should rather be invited to live, so that they might be the more vexed by the mass of the body; and that the innocent, on the contrary, should the sooner [be freed] from this body — that is, from the punishment —[2] →

◊ 2. Right margin: The sixth reason.

[…continues on folio 591 (PDF p. 408): the rest of Cyril's sixth reason and his remaining arguments against Origen (Annotatio CLXXXV).]

---

(printed folio 591 [PDF p. 408]. Annot. CLXXXV (Ps 65:11): Cyril of Alexandria's reasons 6–17 against Origen's pre-existence of souls — the body is a divine gift, not a punishment (Abraham, Moses, Hannah, Hezekiah, Daniel, and Paul as witnesses) → folio 592.)

(folio 591, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXXXV (continued)

that is, from the punishment.[1] But the law would justly have ordered the homicide, and others of this kind, to die, and the just to be adorned with honors. Falsely, therefore, is it said that Souls are attached to bodies for the sake of punishment.

◊ 1. Left margin: Each of Cyril's successive arguments is flagged in the margin simply with "Ratio" — "a reason."

Seventhly, let him say, I pray: if the body is attached to the Soul for punishment, what good has the Savior conferred on us — death being destroyed, and immortality bestowed on the body through the resurrection? We ought rather to give thanks to the perpetual corruption of the body, [as the thing] setting an end to the punishment, than to our Lord Jesus Christ (whom we believe to have bestowed resurrection on [our] bodies): but the Church does not do so; rather it gives thanks to Christ, esteeming him Savior in very deed, because he freed us from death. Not, therefore, were bodies given to Souls for punishment; for, if it were so, the resurrection would bring greater evils upon us, enclosing the wretched Souls in bodies perpetually, and driving [them] back thither whence they had escaped through death. But [the body] was given by Christ as nothing evil, but for the renovation of nature, as a singular gift: not for a penalty were bodies given to souls.

Eighthly, a certain prophet, announcing to us a singular joy, cried out: "The dead shall rise, and they shall be raised up who are in the tombs; and all who are in the earth shall exult."[2] [But if the body were a punishment,] it ought rather to have been said that they would be affected with great sadness, returning again into bodies; or, if he truly wished to affect the human race with joy, he would have affirmed that the dead were not to rise, but that the nature of the flesh was given over to perpetual corruption. But since, breathed upon by the divine Spirit, he announces the resurrection of the flesh unto joy — we are not annexed to the body for punishment, in whose immortality we are bidden to rejoice and exult.

◊ 2. Left margin: Daniel 12:2.

Ninthly, it is added, that God, when he blessed the blessed Abraham, promised that his [offspring] would be innumerable, like the stars of heaven.[3] Wherefore, if the Soul is introduced into the body as into a punishment, then [God] promises a throng of souls divinely damned, and, as it were, of fugitives from the good, and slaves of malignity, and rather a seed of malediction than of benediction: but in very deed Abraham was blessed by God; therefore the conjunction of body and Soul is free from all fault.

◊ 3. Left margin: Genesis 15:5.

Tenthly, similarly, that divine man Moses, when not without cause he had marveled at the multitude of the Jews, said: "For behold, ye are this day as a multitude, like the stars of heaven"; and, praying, he added: "May the Lord God of your fathers add to this number many thousands."[4] Which thing, if souls fallen into bodies are [thereby] punished, ought not to have been desired by Moses, but rather repelled by [his] prayer and intercession to God; yet it was a thing to be desired (for we do not say that Moses was some empty [foolish] man). Falsely, therefore, and out of themselves — not out of the Scriptures — do wicked men devise falsities of this kind.

◊ 4. Left margin: Deuteronomy 1:10–11.

Eleventhly, we are not ignorant that nothing is granted by God to those who ask amiss: "For ye ask," he says, "and receive not, because ye ask amiss."[5] If, therefore, incarnation is given to the Soul for the paying of penalties, as [Origen] says, then Hannah, the daughter of Phanuel, sinned not a little, demanding a son from God by long prayer;[6] for she was asking first the fall of a soul, then [its] punishment. And if the woman, as a human [being], erred, how did she prevail upon God? For the woman could not conceive in the womb unless a Soul had offended in the heavens — so that, on account of [its] offense, entering the womb of the woman, it might assume a body. But God had been [successfully] entreated, because she asked well. Not, therefore, are [souls] joined to flesh because we sinned beforehand — inasmuch as we did not exist before the body.

◊ 5. Left margin: James 4:3.

◊ 6. Left margin: 1 Samuel [1 Kings] 1:11.

Twelfthly, if we are attached to the body for the sake of punishment: why did Hezekiah, a holy and upright man, ask for the prolongation of this life?[7] Or how did God, moved by his piety and tears, add to him fifteen years in the place of a benefit? For [God] would seem to have conferred on him rather a calamity and a torment than a gift and a grace — if these trifles [of Origen] have anything of truth. But certainly the prolongation of life was a gift and a grace: not, therefore, are bodies given to Souls for punishment.

◊ 7. Right margin: Isaiah 38.

Thirteenthly, if the body was given to the Soul for punishment: God repaid an empty grace, who led Jeremiah out of the pit — [Jeremiah] whom he promises would escape the assault of the Chaldeans and would live longer[8] — whereas he ought rather, if he wished to honor him, to have freed him as soon as possible from the vexation of the body. Nor, besides, did he impart any good to those three young men, whom he saved from the Babylonian flame,[9] nor to Daniel, whom he snatched from the ferocity of the lions.[10] But this is altogether false: for [God] is praised, and thanks are given to him, because he conferred on them a chief benefit; false, therefore, is also that [premise] from which this follows.

◊ 8. Right margin: Jeremiah 37:20.

◊ 9. Right margin: Daniel 3:94.

◊ 10. Right margin: Daniel [in the lions' den].

Fourteenthly, add that, before the tribunal of the Lord, all our works shall lie open, that each one may receive the proper things of the body, according as he has done, whether good or evil.[11] If, therefore, retribution shall be made for the works which we have done, wrongly or otherwise, with the body — and there shall be no mention of those things which we did, well or ill, before the body — how do they dare to say that the Soul existed before the body, if only those things are inquired into which it did with the body?

◊ 11. Right margin: 2 Corinthians 5:10.

Fifteenthly, how does the same Paul say: "Present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, pleasing to God"?[12] For if bodies are given to Souls for punishment, how do we offer to God, for an odor of sweetness, that through which we are punished? Or how shall that possess virtue which, born for punishing, has driven great roots in sin?

◊ 12. Right margin: Romans 12:1.

Sixteenthly, on account of the transgression of the first man, corruption invaded our race, as Paul says: "But death reigned from Adam unto Moses"; and he affirms that death reigned even over those who had not sinned.[13] If a mortal body is attached to us because of ancient offenses, how did they "not sin," if on account of sins they fell into a body?

◊ 13. Right margin: Romans 5:14.

Seventeenthly, concerning a certain man blind from his mother's womb, the disciples asked the Savior, saying: "Rabbi, who sinned — this man, or his parents — that he should be born blind?"[14] For, since it is written in the prophetic books that God repays the sins of the parents upon the children,[15] the Apostles thought for this cause that that man had been born blind. What, then, [says] Christ? "Neither did this man sin," he says, "nor his parents; but that the works of God might be made manifest in him."[16] But how does he assert that they did not sin — who, since they were men, undoubtedly could not but have erred? It is manifest →

◊ 14. Right margin: John 9:2.

◊ 15. Right margin: Exodus 20:5.

◊ 16. Right margin: John 9:3.

[…continues on folio 592 (PDF p. 409): the close of Cyril's seventeenth reason and the remainder of his confutation of Origen (Annotatio CLXXXV).]

(printed folio 592 [PDF p. 409]. Annot. CLXXXV–CLXXXVI (Ps 65:11–68:2): Cyril's confutation of Origen closes (reasons 18–23); then Hilary of Poitiers on whether Christ's humanity could grieve and fear, or took hunger, sorrow, and fear only voluntarily → folio 593.)

(folio 592, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXXXV (continued)

that is, of Christ.[1] For in this manner the integrity of truth will be discerned in the words of the Truth.

◊ 1. Left/right margin: Cyril's successive arguments are each flagged in the margin simply with "Ratio" — "a reason."

Eighteenthly, it is added, that Isaiah, showing for what cause the earth was made, says: "It was not created in vain, but that it might be inhabited";[2] and it can fittingly be inhabited not by bare spirits, nor by incorporeal souls, but by ensouled bodies. From which it follows: if we grant that Souls pre-existed and, offending, glide down into bodies, [then we grant] that they offend by the very will of God — namely, that there might be men by whom the world might be inhabited: but this is altogether false; the other [alternative], therefore, is true.

◊ 2. Left margin: Isaiah 45:18 [printed "Isa. 62, 4"].

Nineteenthly, add, that Wisdom, the artificer of all things, is introduced in the book of Proverbs saying words of this kind concerning herself: "I was [that] in whom [he] rejoiced" — namely, the creator of all things — "daily I was delighted before him at all times, when, the world being finished, he rejoiced, and was delighted over the sons of men."[3] If, therefore, God the creator rejoiced over man, how are they not mad who think that Souls are thrust into bodies for [their] sins? For if he rejoices because they pay penalties through bodies, he will not be good, who triumphs in the punishment of others; but he himself is good by nature, and the producer of good creatures: not, therefore, are bodies an instrument of punishing, as many falsely proclaim.

◊ 3. Left margin: Proverbs 8:30–31.

Twentiethly, if the Souls which had offended before the bodies are punished by being annexed to bodies, why was the flood sent against the impious, and Noah the just saved in the retribution of [his] faith?[4] For the contrary ought to have happened — that the just should the sooner be loosed from the body, but the wicked be tormented a longer time by the mass of the body. But the just Lord punished the impious with death, [and] honored the just [man] with longer spaces of this life: false, therefore, is the opinion, and to be cast utterly out of our minds.

◊ 4. Left margin: Genesis 6; Genesis 6:9.

Twenty-first, why did the Savior raise up Lazarus, whom he loved, and lead back into punishments the friend [who had been] freed from punishments?[5] But he raised him up, honoring [the one] whom he loved. Against the truth, therefore, is it said that Souls offended before the bodies.

◊ 5. Left margin: [Lazarus:] John 11.

Twenty-second, add, that if it were so, this rational animal, man, and the nature of man, would seem to have been produced through sin; but through sin, again, death entered into the world — wherefore sin would seem repugnant to itself, since it dissolves the former by the latter. Satan also would be divided against himself: how, then, would his kingdom stand?[6] But these things are false: true, therefore, are those which are opposed to them.

◊ 6. Left margin: Luke 11:18.

Lastly, the Church denies that death was produced by God;[7] for the Scripture confirms that it came into the world by the envy of the Devil.[8] But if the body is joined to the soul in order to punish the soul, why is the Devil blamed, who by death dissolves the punishment of the soul? And why do we give thanks to the Savior, who by the resurrection restores [our] bodies to us again? But rightly do we both give, and owe, thanks to the Savior, who freed us by his own blood from the corruption which the envy of the Devil brought upon us. Not, therefore, are bodies an instrument of punishment, nor could Souls sin before bodies, when they did not [yet] exist.

◊ 7. Left margin: Wisdom 1:13.

◊ 8. Left margin: Wisdom 2:24.

Annotation CLXXXVI [contents]

"Save me, O God, for the waters have come in even unto my soul." — Psalm 68:2

Whether Christ's humanity was, by its own nature, capable of grief and misery.

Hilary, bishop of Poitiers, inserted into the explanation of this Psalm several sentences by which he seems to hint that the humanity of Christ was, by its own nature, free from grief and misery — and that hunger, thirst, sorrow, fear, and the other infirmities of soul and body were not natural to him, but voluntarily assumed for our sake. For in the preface of the Psalm he thus speaks: "Having thus gone through the lot of all human passions, he speaks and grieves according to our infirmities [which he] took upon [him] — himself indeed placed outside the necessity of fear and of grief, yet accommodating himself to these things which he assumed: that he who was born a man of our flesh might speak out of the complaints of our griefs and the prayer of [our] infirmity." And after these things, expounding that [verse], "In my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink,"[9] he added: "But he said, prophetically, that he thirsted — because all our [passions] which were in him are infirmities not natural, but assumed." This matter he pursues far more copiously and clearly in book 10 On the Trinity, where he strives to show that there was in Christ no fear of death — taking his argument from this: that if Christ had dreaded death, he would have feared either on account of the spirit or of the body, neither of which could happen. For, according to the spirit, he desired death with so great an ardor of mind that he could not fear it; and, according to the flesh, he likewise could not fear — inasmuch as he knew that he had flesh by nature impassible, which, although enemies could cut and pierce with blows, strokes, and wounds, yet they were not able to affect with pain. His words are these: "Perhaps there will be [some] who think that Christ feared death: let them determine for what thing they judge death was terrible [to him] — for the spirit, or for the body? If death is terrible to the spirit, [then] Christ would fear the infernal chaos, while Lazarus was rejoicing in the bosom of Abraham — [but] these things are foolish and ridiculous: [to think] that he — having power to lay down the Soul and to resume [it] — should fear to die, [he who was] to die, for the sacrament of human life, under the liberty of his own will. There is no fear of death in the will of one dying and having power; nor, in the hand of death, does [it] long remain: because both the will of dying and the power of reviving are outside the nature of fear, since death cannot be feared, [being] both in the will of dying and in the power of living. But perhaps the pain of the body hanging on the cross, and the violent bonds of the binding cords, and the wounds of the driven-in nails, are [matter] for fear: let us see, therefore, of what body Christ is — into which, although a blow might fall, or a wound descend, or the knots press together, or the suspension lift [him] up, these things would indeed bring the assault of suffering, yet would not inflict the pain of suffering — as some dart, or [something] piercing water, or pricking fire, or wounding the air. All these [agents] their nature inflicts, that it may pierce, prick, and wound; but the suffering inflicted does not retain its nature in this [case], since it is not in the nature [of things] for water to be bored, or fire to be pricked, or the air to be wounded — although it be the nature of the dart to wound, and" →

◊ 9. Right margin: Psalm 68:22.

[…continues on folio 593 (PDF p. 410): the rest of Hilary's argument that Christ's flesh, of its own nature, could receive the assault but not the pain of the passion (Annotatio CLXXXVI).]

(printed folio 593 [PDF p. 410]. Annot. CLXXXVI–CLXXXVII (Ps 68:2–70:15): Hilary on Christ's impassible flesh (defended and faulted; Justinian's incorruptibility edict; the Escharodocite heresy); then whether commerce is sinful — Cassiodorus: the trader's vice, not trade, is condemned → folio 594.)

(folio 593, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXXXVI (continued)

to prick, and to bore. The Lord Jesus indeed suffered — while he is struck, while he is hung up, while he is crucified, while he dies; but the suffering, rushing upon the body of the Lord, did not exercise the nature of suffering: for although it raged with a penal ministry, yet the power of the body, without the sensation of pain, received into itself the force of the pain raging [against it]. That body of the Lord would indeed have had the nature of our grief, if our body has this of nature: to tread the waves, and walk upon the floods, and not be weighed down by [its] entrance [into water], nor yield with the footsteps of one standing on the water — [and] to penetrate even solid things, nor be barred by the walls of a closed house. But truly, if this alone be the nature of the Lord's body — that it is borne by its own power upon moist things, and stands upon liquids, and runs through structures — how is the flesh, conceived of the Holy Spirit, judged [to act] according to the nature of a human body? That flesh is from the heavens, and that man is from God, having indeed a body for suffering (and he suffered), but not having a nature for grieving; for that body is of its own proper nature — [the body] which is transformed into heavenly glory on the mountain, which by its touch puts fevers to flight, which from its own spittle forms eyes," etc.

In the commentaries on Matthew also there are certain sayings of this author, not abhorrent from the sense of the proposed narration, which — studying brevity — I omit. I pass over, too, several sentences of Jerome and Augustine that lend color to this dogma, which thou wilt more conveniently inspect above, in Annotation 162, and below, in Annotation 115 of the following book.

Peter [Lombard], bishop of Paris, in book 3 of the Sentences, distinction 15, interpreting Hilary's discourse amicably and benevolently,[1] says that he took away from Christ neither the true sense of fear, grief, and suffering, nor the natural necessity of fearing, grieving, and suffering, but [only] the cause and merit [desert] of suffering, grieving, and fearing, which is in us. For in us there is a natural necessity of suffering, brought in on account of Adam's sin; but in Christ there is truly a natural necessity of suffering — not inflicted by a defect of human conception, but voluntarily assumed of his own free will.

◊ 1. Left margin: Hilary excused.

Claudianus [Mamertus], bishop of Vienne in Gaul, who preceded Peter by nearly seven hundred years, in the second book On the State of the Soul, so excuses Hilary that he pronounces him plainly to have erred, in these words: "Hilary of Poitiers, among the many [excellent things] of his lofty disputations, thinking in a certain [matter] otherwise [than truly], disputed these two things contrary to the truth: one, that he said nothing incorporeal is created; the other, that Christ felt nothing of grief in the passion. But since he abolished the defect of this opinion by the virtue of [his] confession, he so sustains the pen of reprehension that he suffers no loss of merit. Wherefore it is fitting to give faith to the expounders of the divine Scriptures [only] so far as they accord with the tenor of the same truth."

Justinian Augustus, a man in other respects Catholic, so adhered to the Hilarian dogma that he commanded by an imperial edict that it be publicly taught in the church by the priests, and received by all the people, and firmly believed.[2] A witness of this thing is Evagrius, in book 4 of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 39, writing thus: "Justinian the Emperor put forth an edict in which he decreed the body of the Lord [to be] incorruptible, and said that it was by no means capable of the natural and blameless passions, but that the Lord ate before the passion in the same manner as he ate after the resurrection; and that his most sacred body [received] no mutation or alteration from the very [moment] in which it was formed in the womb, neither in the voluntary nor in the natural passions, nor even after the resurrection: to which opinion he compelled the priests everywhere to assent. Against him wrote Anastasius, bishop of Antioch,[3] and demonstrated to him, with great wisdom and eloquence, that the divine Apostles and the holy Fathers both knew and handed down that the body of Christ was corruptible [and subject] to the natural and blameless passions." These things Evagrius.

◊ 2. Left margin: The Emperor Justinian denied that the body of Christ was capable of grief, or of any mutation.

◊ 3. Right margin: Anastasius, bishop of Antioch, refuted the error of the Emperor Justinian.

John Damascene, in the book On the Hundred Heresies, chapter 84, reports that this error was peculiar to the Escharodocite heretics,[4] in these words: "The Escharodocitae, who are also called Gaianitae, venerate the body of the Lord [as] incorruptible from its very formation; and they confess indeed that the Lord sustained suffering — I mean hunger, and famine, and thirst, and toil — but they say that he sustained [them] not according to the manner which is in us, nor as [one] serving the laws of nature." I suspect that Damascene imposed on those heretics the surname Escharodocitae for this reason: that they ascribed to Christ a certain insensible and impassible hardness of flesh, which — however much bruised by blows and wounds — would suffer nothing of pain. For among the Greeks ἐσχάρα signifies the callous hardness of flesh drawn over by inveterate wounds, which has no sense of pain; and δοκητής [means] "an approver [one who holds an opinion]": so that Escharodocita sounds nothing else than "an approver [maintainer] of a hard and impassible flesh."

◊ 4. Right margin: The Escharodocite heretics.

Annotation CLXXXVII [contents]

"Because I have not known letters [learning]." — Psalm 70:15

Whether trading [commerce] is condemned.

The explanation of Cassiodorus on this little verse St. Thomas, in the Second Part of the Second Part, question 77, article 4, brings forward in [his] argumentation, as [something] at first sight favoring the error of those who assert that traders — selling dearer than they buy — are to be altogether cast out of the Church. He cites the author's [Cassiodorus's] words, alluding to this, in this manner: "'For I have not known letters' — or 'trading,' according to another reading: what," he says, "is trading, other than to procure more cheaply, and to sell more dearly?"; and he adds: "Such traders the Lord cast out of the temple; but no one is cast out of the temple except on account of some sin: therefore such trading is a sin." But if the words themselves, as they are in Cassiodorus, be diligently inspected, they bring their own interpretation with them — since the author himself interprets his own opinion clearly enough, speaking thus: "'For I have known tradings': this part of the verse, unless it be well examined, is recognized to admit a question. For if every trader is to be altogether condemned, then neither do those escape this penalty who are known to exercise the remaining crafts. For what else is trading, than to wish to sell more dearly the things that can be procured more cheaply? Then, in the Lives of the Fathers, we read that Paphnutius, that most holy man, was by a revelation compared to a trader; and we find even today, in the Church of God, [some] who indeed handle merchandise, yet are strong in the highest faith: for the worst act, not the honest thing, is condemned — just as we read that the rich man does not enter into the kingdom of heaven, although the patriarchs Job, Abraham, Isaac, [and] Jacob were abounding also in riches. Those traders, therefore, are esteemed abominable, who — least of all considering the justice of the Lord — through immoderate" →

[...continues on folio 594 (PDF p. 411): the rest of Cassiodorus distinguishing lawful commerce from the covetous trader's sin (Annotatio CLXXXVII).]

(printed folio 594 [PDF p. 411]. Annot. CLXXXVII–CXC (Ps 70:15–89:4): commerce closes; whether Hell's penalty exceeds the sin (only in duration); Jerome's punctuation against Origen; and whether the world lasts only six thousand years (Jerome, Justin, Irenaeus, Lactantius) → folio 595.)

(folio 594, left column → right column)

Annotation CLXXXVII (continued)

gain are polluted, loading their merchandise more with perjuries than with prices — such the Lord cast out of the temple, saying: "Make not the house of my Father a house of trading, and a den of thieves," etc.[1] On this subject, read Annotation 95 of book 6.

◊ 1. Left margin: John 2:16.

Annotation CLXXXVIII [contents]

"From usuries and iniquity he shall redeem their souls." — Psalm 71:14

Whether the punishment of Hell exceeds the gravity of the sin.

Strabo [Walafrid Strabo], in his Ordinary Gloss, weighing what the usuries are which David here mentions, says that the usuries are the sins, which bring forth for us punishments with much and great interest: "For God exacts more in punishments than has been committed in faults." But these words are taken from the commentaries of Augustine, expounding this little verse. St. Thomas, in book 4 of the Sentences, distinction 46, question 2, article 2, noted this sentence as [being] misappropriated by those who think that God punishes the sins of men beyond [their] desert; and he says it must be understood not according to an excess of the punishment beyond the fault in the intensity and gravity of the penalty, but according to the duration of time: because for a momentary delectation an eternal punishment is inflicted. For it is established that the duration of the punishment be not proportioned to the duration of the fault, but that the intensity of the punishment correspond to the enormity of the fault[2] — as has been shown elsewhere.

◊ 2. Left margin: The intensity of the punishment corresponds to the gravity of the fault.

Annotation CLXXXIX [contents]

"Lord, thou hast been made our refuge from generation to generation; before the mountains were made, or the earth and the world were formed, from everlasting and unto everlasting thou art God." — Psalm 89:1–2

Whether the Soul was created before bodies.

The Interpretation of Origen — the author's name being suppressed — Jerome reprehends, writing thus in his explanation of this psalm to Cyprian: "This passage certain [men] subvert by a depraved punctuation — especially those who wish that souls existed before man was created in the number of the sixth day. For thus they read and punctuate: 'Lord, thou art made a refuge for us, from generation unto generation. Before the mountains were established, and the earth and the world were formed.' 'From everlasting and unto everlasting thou art God' — for thus they expound it: If the Lord was a refuge of men before the mountains were established and the earth and the world were formed, then Souls existed in the heavens before the bodies of men were formed. But we, as we have set forth the reading, ought so to punctuate: 'Before the mountains were established, and the earth and the world were formed, from everlasting and unto everlasting thou art God' — so that our refuge was not before the foundation of the world (we who did not yet exist), but [the sense is] that God, from eternity unto eternity, is always God."

Annotation CXC [contents]

"For a thousand years in thy sight are as yesterday, which is past." — Psalm 89:4

Whether the age of the world consists of only six thousand years.

Jerome, in the epistolary exposition of the eighty-ninth Psalm to Cyprian, deduces from the present little verse that all the duration of the present age — from the founding of the world unto the day of judgment — is concluded within the space of six thousand years, writing thus: "I judge, from this passage and from the epistle which is inscribed with the name of Peter, that a thousand years are wont to be called [as] one day: so that, namely, since the world was fabricated in six days, it is believed to subsist only six thousand years; and afterward comes the sevenfold and eighthfold number, in which the true sabbatism is kept, and the purity of circumcision is restored — whence also by the eight beatitudes the rewards of good works are promised. But Peter writes in this manner: 'Let this one thing not escape you, dearly beloved: that one day with God is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.'[3] To the same sentence he alludes in the commentary on Micah, chapter 4, where he shows that the sixth and last hour of the sixth millennium is the time of the faith of the gentiles, in these words: 'In the consummation of the ages our Savior appeared, and came at the eleventh hour to hire laborers; and, his passion being completed, John says: "Little children, it is the last hour."[4] For if, in the six thousand years, five hundred years be divided among the single hours of the day, the last hour, consequently, is the time of the faith of the gentiles.'"

◊ 3. Right margin: 2 Peter 3:8.

◊ 4. Right margin: 1 John 2:18.

This was of old the opinion of many Fathers of great name — chiefly of Justin, philosopher and martyr, in the book of Questions to the Gentiles, question 17, writing thus: "From very many words it may be understood that those speak truly who hand down that there are now six thousand years [of] time from the founding of the world. For sometimes Paul says: 'In these last times he has spoken to us through the Son';[5] but elsewhere, 'Upon whom the ends of the ages have come';[6] and sometimes also, 'When the fulfilment of the times came.'[7] But all these things were said in the six-thousandth year."

◊ 5. Right margin: (a) Hebrews 1:2.

◊ 6. Right margin: (b) 1 Corinthians 10:11.

◊ 7. Right margin: (c) Galatians 4:4.

Irenaeus, after him, in the fifth book Against Heresies, the last chapter, speaks to the same sentence thus: "In however many days this world was made, in so many thousand years is it consummated; and for this cause the scripture of Genesis says: 'And the heaven and the earth were finished, and all the ornament of them. And God finished on the sixth day all his works which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his works which he had made.'[8] But this is both a narration of things done — in what manner they were made — and a prophecy of things to come: for the day of the Lord is as a thousand years; and in six days were consummated the things that were made. It is manifest, therefore, that the consummation of these is the six-thousandth year."

◊ 8. Right margin: Genesis 2:1–2.

Lactantius, in book 7 of the Institutions, chapter 7, subscribes to Irenaeus in these words: "Let the philosophers know, therefore, who enumerate thousands of ages from the beginning of the world, that the six-thousandth year is not yet concluded; which number being completed, the consummation must needs come, and the state of human things be reformed for the better: the argument of which is, that God consummated the world — this admirable work of nature — as is contained in the secret [pages] of holy Scripture, in the space of six days; and he sanctioned the seventh day, in which he rested from [his] works. But this is the day of the Sabbath, which in the tongue of the Hebrews took its name from the number [seven] — whence the sevenfold number is legitimate and full: for there are also seven days, by whose alternating revolution the cycles of years are completed; and [there are] seven stars, which are called Wandering [planets], whose unequal courses and unequal motion are believed to effect the varieties of things and of times. Therefore, since all the works of God were perfected in six days, it is necessary that [the world] remain in this state through six ages — that is, six thousand years; for a great day of God is bounded by a circle of a thousand years, as the prophet indicates, saying, 'Before thy eyes, O Lord, a thousand years are as one day.[9] And as God labored in the making of so great things, so also his religion and truth must needs labor in these six thousand years, malice prevailing and dominating; and again, since" →

◊ 9. Right margin: Psalm 89:4.

[…continues on folio 595 (PDF p. 412): the rest of Lactantius on the seventh millennial rest and the world's renewal (Annotatio CXC).]

---

(printed folio 595 [PDF p. 412]. Annot. CXC–CXCIII (Ps 89:4–98:5): the six-thousand-year age of the world closes (the millennial Sabbath; the Hebrew "tradition of Elias"; Sixtus's 5528-year reckoning, refusing to affirm rashly); Jerome on Ps 90 vs. Giustiniani; and Calvin on Bernard and Augustine on merit (both → Annot. 195).)

(folio 595, left column → right column)

Annotation CXC (continued)

since, his works being perfected, God rested on the seventh day, and blessed it: it is necessary that, at the end of the six-thousandth year, all malice be abolished from the earth, and that justice reign for a thousand years, and there be tranquillity and rest from the labors which the world so long endures." These things Lactantius.

Hilary, in the seventeenth canon on Matthew, expounding that [verse], "And after six days he was transfigured," says:[1] "When, after six days, the Lord's glory is shown in [his] appearance, there is prefigured — the times, namely, of six thousand years being rolled out — the honor of the heavenly kingdom."

◊ 1. Left margin: Matthew 17:1–2.

Augustine, in book 20 On the City of God, chapter 7, explaining the thousand years during which John foresaw that Satan would be bound, wrote thus: "The 'thousand years' can, as far as occurs to me, be understood in two ways: either because this thing is done in the last thousand years — that is, in the sixth millennium of years, as [on] the sixth day, whose later spaces are now unrolling, the Sabbath being thereafter to follow, which has no evening (namely, the rest of the saints, which has no end) — so that he called this millennium, as it were the last part of the day (which will remain unto the end of the age), 'a thousand years,' by that manner of speaking whereby the part is signified by the whole; or else he certainly put 'a thousand years' for all the years of this age, that by a perfect number the very fulness of time might be denoted."

Germanus, bishop of Constantinople, added to this number five hundred years, on the authority of illustrious Fathers of Greece. For he, when in the book which he entitled On the Theory of Ecclesiastical Things he inquired the cause why the pontiff, blessing the people, raises [his] fingers fitted to the computation of the number six thousand five hundred, speaks thus: "That the pontiff signs the people, hints at this: that the future coming of Christ will be in the six-thousand-five-hundredth year — from the computation of the fingers, signifying six thousand five hundred." This also Hippolytus of Rome and Saint Cyril say in their books on Antichrist — that in the six-thousand-five-hundredth year the [second] coming will be; and likewise Chrysostom.

These things the Christian authors have handed down concerning the duration of the world. But among the Gentiles, that Hydaspes, Mercurius Trismegistus, and the Sibyls handed down the same, Lactantius is witness. And among the Hebrews there is had a most ancient tradition of the prophet Elias, in the Talmudic volumes, in the fourth order, in the fourth tractate whose title is Sanhedrin — that is, Judgment — in these words:

ב אלפים ימות המשיח :שתא אלפי שני לתהו עלמא וחד חרב :ב אלפים תהו :ב אלפים תורה that is (scitta alphe sene lehene alma, vechad chareb, be alaphim tohu, be alaphim tora, be alaphim iemot Hamasciach): "Six thousand years shall the world be, and then it shall be destroyed: two thousand [of] emptiness, two thousand [of the] Law, two thousand [of the] days of the Messiah."

Ambrose, in the seventh book of the commentaries on Luke, expounding that [saying] of Matthew, "After six days he was transfigured,"[2] indicates that he does not accept such a period of the world's age: because in his own times more than six thousand years were already reckoned — by a reasoning, as I judge, entered upon from a certain computation of the years of the world peculiar to himself. For, according to the calculation of the Hebrew verity, in Ambrose's time there had not yet passed four thousand four hundred years.[3] For the Hebrews reckon, from the founding of the world unto Christ, 3962 years; and from Christ unto the present year 1566, in which we write these things, 5528 years. Whence, if these things be true, at this time we are distant from the consummation of the world by 476 years — whether it be so, posterity itself shall see. We affirm nothing rashly, lest we fall into the error of Judas and of Lactantius:[4] of whom the former wrote that the fall of the world would be present in his own time — that is, in the two-hundredth year from the nativity of Christ; and the latter judged that from his own age unto the destruction of the world there would be not more than two hundred years — deceived by the false computations of the Greeks, which then almost all the ecclesiastical writers followed.

◊ 2. Left margin: Matthew 17:1–2.

◊ 3. Left/right margin: The Hebrews reckon, from the founding of the world unto Christ, 3962 years.

◊ 4. Right margin: The errors of Judas and Lactantius concerning the end of the world.

Augustine, in the exposition of the present Psalm, refutes those who wrested the proposed little verse to an opinion of this kind, in these words: "Men have dared to presume the knowledge of the times — which, to the disciples desiring to know it, the Lord [refused], saying, 'It is not yours to know the times which the Father hath put in his own power';[5] and they have determined that this age can be finished in six thousand years, as [in] six days: nor have they attended to what is said, 'As one day, which is past.' For it was not, when this was said, [that] only a thousand years had passed; and that which ought most of all to have admonished them — lest they be deluded by the uncertainty of the times — is that [phrase], 'As a watch in the night.' For, just as they seem to have opined something plausible concerning the six days (on account of the first six days in which God perfected his works), [not] so also can the six watches — that is, eighteen hours — be adapted to that opinion."

◊ 5. Right margin: Acts 1:7.

Annotation CXCI [contents]

"He that dwelleth in the help of the Most High." — Psalm 90:1

On the theme of Psalm 90.

The commentaries on the Psalms inscribed to Jerome have, under this little verse, these words: "'Help' [adiutorium] is interpreted 'Ezra'; hence Ezra is called βοηθός [helper] — this is he who led back the people from the Babylonian captivity, and brought them into the land of promise." Augustine [Giustiniani], bishop of Nebbio, in his Octaplum, refutes Jerome, [alleging] that by these words he denied this Psalm to have been said of Christ, [affirming it said] rather of Ezra. But I do not see whence Augustine could rightly elicit a sense of this kind[6] — especially since, in the very beginning of the explanation, Jerome most evidently pronounces that the present psalm regards Christ, thus beginning: "This psalm has no title, because it is sung of [Christ] the head and of his members. The head is in heaven, the members on earth. And it is properly understood of the fast, and of that temptation of the desert: for the prophet foresaw that Christ was to come in the flesh, to be tempted by the Devil in the desert."

◊ 6. Right margin: St. Jerome is defended.

Annotation CXCII [contents]

"Because he hoped in me, I will deliver him." — Psalm 90:14

On the merit of good works.

A testimony of Bernard, from the fifteenth sermon on the ninetieth Psalm, John Calvin the heretic wrests against the merits of good works: the right interpretation of which thou hast below, in Annotation 195.

Annotation CXCIII [contents]

"Exalt ye the Lord our God." — Psalm 98:5

On the merit of good works.

Augustine, expounding this, seems to bring forward certain words against the merits of good works: concerning which, see below, Annotation 195 of this book.

---

(printed folio 596 [PDF p. 413]. Annot. CXCIV–CXCV (Ps 98:5–102:4): Augustine's "the flesh profits nothing, understand it spiritually" abused by the Sacramentarians (vindicated by Peter Lombard); then the great crux, whether good works are meritorious (the "Annot. 195" cross-referenced above) — Bodius turns Augustine's "God crowns his own gifts" against merit, but Sixtus shows Augustine defends the merits of the faithful and crushes only Pelagian pride.)

(folio 596, left column → right column)

Annotation CXCIV [contents]

"Adore ye the footstool of his feet." — Psalm 98:5

On the Eucharist.

The words of Augustine expounding this passage, the Sacramentarians of our times usurp; and of old the heretics usurped [them] who excluded the body of Christ from the sacrament of the Eucharist. The text of the words is this: "When thou adorest the footstool of his feet, remain not in the flesh by [thy] thought, and be not left un-quickened by the Spirit; for the Spirit quickens, but the flesh profits nothing. But at that time, when the Lord commended this, he had spoken of his flesh, and had said, 'Unless one shall have eaten my flesh, he shall not have life eternal in himself';[1] certain disciples were scandalized, and said, 'This is a hard saying.' They took it foolishly, they thought it carnally, and supposed that the Lord was about to cut off certain little pieces from his body and give them to them; and they said, 'This is a hard saying.' They themselves were hard, not the saying. But he instructed them, and said to them: 'It is the Spirit that quickens; the flesh profits nothing. The words which I have spoken to you are spirit and life.' Understand spiritually that which I have spoken: it is not this body which ye see that ye are to eat, nor are ye to drink that blood which they will shed who will crucify me. I have commended to you some sacrament; understood spiritually, it will quicken you. And although it is necessary that it be visibly celebrated, yet it must be understood invisibly." Peter [Lombard], bishop of Paris, vindicated this passage from the wrenching of the heretics, in book 4 of the Sentences, distinction 10. See below, Annotation 196 of book 6.

◊ 1. Left margin: John 6:53.

Annotation CXCV [contents]

"Who crowneth thee in mercy and compassions." — Psalm 102:4

Whether good works are meritorious.

The sentence of Augustine from the exposition of this little verse, Hermann Bodius, in the Collectanea, reckons among those by which the Lutherans impugn the merits of good works. It is of this kind: "[We] who in ourselves are conquered, in him have conquered; therefore he crowns thee, because he crowns his own gifts, not thy merits. 'I have labored more than all,' says the Apostle; but see what he added: 'Yet not I, but the grace of God with me.'"[2] And in the exposition of Psalm 98, upon that [verse], "Exalt the Lord our God," he says: "God, who is about to crown in us not our merits, but his own gifts — how much ought he to be exalted by us? Exalt, therefore, the Lord our God." And in the exposition of Psalm 88 he says: "When a man shall have seen that whatsoever good he has, he has not of himself, but of his God, he sees that all which is praised in him is not of his own merits, but of the mercy of God." And on Psalm 139 he says: "The saints attribute nothing to their own merits: they attribute the whole to nothing but thy mercy, O God." And on Psalm 144, expounding those words, "The Lord is merciful and compassionate," etc., he says:[3] "'By grace ye are made safe' — where thou hearest 'grace,' understand 'freely' [gratis]; if therefore freely, thou hast brought nothing, thou hast merited nothing: for if anything is rendered to merits, it is a wage, not grace";[4] and a little after: "The whole is of mercy; nowhere boast thy merits, because thy very merits are his gifts." And in epistle 105, to Sixtus the presbyter: "When God crowns our merits, he crowns nothing else than his own gifts." And on John, tractate 3: "When, therefore, God bestows the reward of immortality, he crowns his own gifts, not thy merits." And in the fifth book of the Fifty Homilies, homily 14: "We know nothing of thine, prepared by thyself for thyself, except evils; when, therefore, God crowns thy merits, he crowns nothing but his own gifts."

◊ 2. Left margin: 1 Corinthians 15:10.

◊ 3. Left margin: Psalm 144:8.

◊ 4. Left margin: Ephesians 2[:8].

Augustine repeats this same sentence in almost innumerable places, which — lest I be troublesome to the reader — I pass over. Yet not by these words, as the Lutheran heretics falsely pretend, does he condemn the merits of the faithful and of good men (for these he everywhere teaches, establishes, and defends,[5] always carrying about that [saying] which he uttered in the sermon "On the Season" 162, saying: "God, for the merits of faith and of good works, will give to his faithful the kingdom of heaven"); but by these sayings he casts down the pride of the Pelagians, who boasted that by their own powers and labors — even without the aid of divine grace — they could merit and obtain the crown of eternal felicity. Against so insolent an arrogance, Augustine pronounces that God crowns in us not our merits, but his own gifts — so that by this manner of speaking he hints that human merits are to be considered in two ways:[6] either inasmuch as they arise from the destitute powers of our nature, with none preceding and none accompanying [them] of the aid of divine grace — and these indeed are worthy of no crown, nor are they crowned in us by God, but enjoy only the empty name of merit; or inasmuch as they arise from the favor of the divine benignity and prevenient grace (we consenting), and are increased (we cooperating) — and these indeed are they which he esteems worthy of eternal rewards, and crowns in us. And that this is his own definition, he himself explains in epistle 105 to Sixtus the presbyter, in these words: "There is no merit of man before grace, whereby he might receive grace; since all our merit is wrought in us by nothing but grace, and since, when God crowns our merits, he crowns nothing else than his own gifts. For as, from the beginning of faith, we obtained mercy — not because we were faithful, but that we might be [so] — so in the end, which will be in life eternal, he will crown us, as it is written: 'In mercy and compassions.' Not in vain, therefore, is it sung to God: 'And his mercy shall follow me.'[78] Whence also that very eternal life — which surely will be had at the end, without end, and is therefore rendered to preceding merits — nevertheless, because those same merits, to which it is rendered, are not prepared by us through our own sufficiency, but wrought in us through grace, is itself also called grace: for no other reason than that it is given freely — not because it is not given to merits, but because the very merits, to which it is given, are themselves also [given]." He expresses this same thing more lucidly in the book On Grace and Free Will, chapters 6 and 7, saying: "When the Pelagians say that this alone is the grace [given] not according to our merits — that by which sins are remitted to man — but that the [grace] which is given at the end, that is, eternal life, is rendered to our preceding merits: it must be answered to them: If, indeed, they so understood our merits as to acknowledge that these too are gifts of God, that opinion would not be to be reproved; but since they so preach human merits as to say that man has them of his own self, the Apostle most rightly answers: 'For who distinguisheth thee? And what hast thou which thou hast not received?[9] To one thinking such things, it is most truly said: 'God crowns his own gifts, not thy merits — if thy merits are of thyself; but if [they be] of God, [thy] good merits are [his] gifts: [and so] God crowns thy merits not as thy merits, but as his own gifts.'"

◊ 5. Right margin: St. Augustine defends the merits of the faithful.

◊ 6. Right margin: Human merits are to be considered in two ways.

◊ 7. Right margin: Psalm 58:11.

◊ 8. Right margin: Psalm 22:6.

◊ 9. Right margin: 1 Corinthians 4:7.

---

(printed folio 597 [PDF p. 414]. Annot. CXCVI–CCIII (Ps 103:30–118:57): eight short annotations — Cajetan on "send forth thy Spirit"; Arnobius on cursing/blessing; Chrysostom on God's "oath" as metaphor; Basil and Chrysostom on grace and the merit of vocation; the count of alphabetic Psalms; Hilary that all the saints pass through the fire; and whether clergy may hold secular possessions → folio 598.)

(folio 597, left column → right column)

Annotation CXCVI [contents]

"Send forth thy Spirit, and they shall be created." — Psalm 103:30

On the Holy Spirit.

Thomas Cajetan is censured by Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Conza, because in his commentaries on the Psalms he did not interpret this little verse of the Holy Spirit, as most of the saints [Fathers] do, but of the spirit [breath] of animals, or of the soul itself, which is a likeness of the divine Spirit.

Annotation CXCVII [contents]

"He loved cursing, and it shall come to him; and he would not [have] blessing, and it shall be put far from him." — Psalm 108:18

On predestination and reprobation.

Arnobius, in the commentaries on the Psalms, brought forward these things to the exposition of this little verse: "He loved the cursing of Adam, which is taken away through Christ — 'and it shall come to him'; he would not [have] the blessing which is brought through Christ — 'and it shall surely be put far from him.' Note that it happened from [free] choice that he would not [have it]" — on account of the heresy which says that God predestined some to blessing, others to cursing; for here [the man] is proved to have the cursing from his own choice [love], and by [his own] unwillingness not to have the reward of his blessing. There are [some] who think that these [words] in a certain manner censure the opinion of Augustine, and of all the schoolmen theologians, concerning eternal predestination and reprobation. See below, Annotation 251 of book 6.

Annotation CXCVIII [contents]

"The Lord hath sworn, and he will not repent." — Psalm 109:4

On God swearing.

Chrysostom, expounding these words, says that an oath in God is to be understood no otherwise than by a metaphor — just as we also say that there is anger in God. These [words] allude to Chrysostom's teaching concerning the Oath, [as] altogether forbidden to all Christians. See Annotation 26 of book 6.

Annotation CXCIX [contents]

"Turn, O my soul, into thy rest." — Psalm 114:7

On the merit of works.

Basil, in the commentaries on the Psalms, upon this passage says: "Eternal rest is set forth for those who have lawfully striven in this life; which [rest] indeed is rendered not according to the debt and merit of works, but is bestowed, according to the grace of the most magnificent God, on those who have hoped in him." The Collectanea of Hermann bring forward these words against the merits of holy actions, but violently and perversely, as [they do] the rest. For Basil everywhere proclaims merits,[1] but most of all on Psalm 61, where, expounding that sentence of David, "Because thou renderest to every one according to his works,"[2] he says: "'With what measure ye shall have measured, the same shall be measured back to you':[3] thou hast afflicted a brother — expect the [counter]balance; thou hast plundered the goods of inferiors, thou hast calumniated, thou hast lied — expect the retribution of these; for 'what things each one sows, such also shall he reap.'[4] But if anything of good has been done by thee, expect manifold retributions of that also, because he will render to every one according to his works." Basil, therefore, did not wish to take away the efficacy of merit, but to extol the immense munificence of God — who compensates the individual merits of our works, not keeping an equality of quantity, but, exceeding the measure of the merits, remunerates our labors, above all condignity, with most ample rewards. Thou hast sentences looking hither above, in Annotation 92.

◊ 1. Left margin: St. Basil proclaims the merits of good works.

◊ 2. Left margin: Psalm 61:13.

◊ 3. Left margin: Matthew 7:2.

◊ 4. Left margin: Galatians 6:8.

Annotation CC [contents]

"I believed, for which cause I have spoken." — Psalm 115:1

Whether the divine vocation is from the merits of those called.

Chrysostom, expounding these things, seems to establish that the divine vocation is from the dignity and merits of those who have made themselves worthy to be called. For he says: "If the Father draws, the Son leads, the Spirit illumines: how do they sin who are neither drawn, nor led, nor illumined? Because they do not offer themselves worthy to receive that illumination. See, therefore, that this happened to Cornelius:[5] for he did not find this at home within himself, but God called him, because he himself, anticipating [prevening], rendered himself worthy. For although it is [God's part] to draw and to lead in, yet he requires a soul that will comply, and then applies his aid." Wherefore Paul elsewhere says, "called according to purpose."[6] The sense of these words [thou hast] in Annotation 251 of the sixth book.

◊ 5. Right margin: Acts 10.

◊ 6. Right margin: Romans 8:28.

Annotation CCI [contents]

"Blessed are the undefiled in the way." — Psalm 118:1

On the number of the alphabetic Psalms.

Hilary, prefacing on this Psalm, handed down that only three Psalms are found among the Hebrews [that are] alphabetic — that is, whose verses begin with the letters arranged according to the order of the Hebrew alphabet — namely Psalm 111, and 112, and 118. But the very truth of the Hebrew Psalter plainly indicates, and Jerome in the epistle to Paula Urbica confirms, that the alphabetic Psalms are five[7] — namely the three aforesaid, and, besides them, [Psalms] 25 and 34. Thomas Cajetan, in the commentaries on the Psalter, to these five adds also two other Psalms arranged according to the series of the alphabet: that is, the thirty-seventh, woven with an interpolated and interrupted alphabet, and [the one] which — [Psalm] 145 — runs on with a continuous alphabet.

◊ 7. Right margin: The alphabetic Psalms are five.

Annotation CCII [contents]

"My soul hath coveted to desire thy judgments." — Psalm 118:20

Whether all the saints must be purged by the fire of the conflagration.

Hilary, in the commentaries on the Psalms, appending an interpretation to this little verse, seems to intimate that all men — however holy, and Mary herself too, the Mother of God — must be expiated from [their] sins by the pain and punishment of fire in the conflagration of the last judgment. For these things are written by him: "The Prophet remembers that it is arduous to desire the judgment; for since no living [man] is clean in [God's] sight, how can the judgment be desirable, in which that unwearied fire must be undergone by us — in which those grave punishments, to be expiated from the sins of the soul, must be undergone? A sword passed through the soul of blessed Mary, that the thoughts of many hearts might be revealed:[8] if, therefore, that Virgin of God, [full of] capacity, is to come into the severity of the judgment, who will dare to desire to be judged by God?" See above, Annotations 170 and 171.

◊ 8. Right margin: Luke 2:35.

Annotation CCIII [contents]

"My portion, O Lord — I have said [it is] to keep thy law." — Psalm 118:57

Whether the possession of secular things befits the clergy.

Hilary, expounding these things in the commentaries, brings forward some [statements] from which Erasmus, in the annotations he published on Hilary, gathers that it is not lawful for priests to retain the possession of secular things. The words of Hilary are these: "One must renounce the world, and all its things, that God may be our portion; but if ambition detains us, if the care of money occupies [us], if the businesses of family affairs delay [us], the Lord will not be our portion — we [being] held by the possession of secular cares and vices. To Moses, when it had been commanded that he distribute the portions of the [land of] sojourn to the twelve tribes of Israel, [God] thus commanded concerning the Levitical tribe:" →

[…continues on folio 598 (PDF p. 415): the rest of Hilary (via Erasmus) on the Levites' portion and whether clergy may hold secular possessions (Annotatio CCIII).]

---

(printed folio 598 [PDF p. 415]. Annot. CCIII–CCVIII (Ps 118:57–129:2): the Levites' portion is God, not earthly goods; Ambrose seeming to forbid all oaths; whether sins are remitted to the still-unbelieving ("faith" = conscience); and three textual notes from Jerome to Marcella — the "sons of the shaken-off," the "labors of thy hands" (καρπός/כפיך), and whether the soul was formed before the body → folio 599.)

(folio 598, left column → right column)

Annotation CCIII (continued)

concerning the Levitical tribe it is commanded: "To the sons of Levi there shall be no portion, nor lot in the midst of their brethren, because the Lord God is their part." To those, therefore, serving God, the law willed [there to be] no earthly portion, because God is their part. The preacher of the Gospel, Peter, also remembers that there was to him no portion of human possession, when to [the beggar] praying for sustenance he answered, "Gold and silver I have not; but what I have, this I give thee."[1] What is that? What is that, Peter, which thou possessest? Thou hadst renounced all things to thy God, saying, "Behold, we have left all things," etc.[2] See below, Annotation 121 of the following book.

◊ 1. Left margin: Acts 3:6.

◊ 2. Left margin: Matthew 19:27.

Annotation CCIV [contents]

"I have sworn, and I have determined to keep the judgments of thy justice." — Psalm 118:106

On the Oath.

The commentaries of Ambrose seem here to contain a certain opinion which would forbid to Christians every kind of oath — even a just one, and in just causes. Consult Annotation 26 of book 6.

Annotation CCV [contents]

"Thou art just, O Lord, and thy judgment is right." — Psalm 118:137

Whether sins are remitted to those remaining in unbelief.

Ambrose, in the commentaries, inquiring into the allegory of the letter ץ [Tzadi], from which this little verse begins, seems to be in the opinion that, the sin of unbelief remaining, certain offenses are remitted to unbelievers by God. For he thus writes: "There is also another kind of consolation for those who have paid grave penalties, as it is written in Isaiah: 'Comfort ye my people, for his sin is loosed[3] — even if faith was lacking, the penalty had satisfied." St. Thomas, in the third volume of the Summa Theologica, question 86, article 3, illustrating this passage, says: "In that word of Ambrose, 'faith' cannot be taken for that by which one believes in Christ; because, as Augustine says upon that [saying] of John, 'If I had not come, and had not spoken to them, they would not have sin[4] — namely, [the sin] of unbelief (for this is the sin by which all sins are held [retained]) — but it is taken for conscience, because sometimes, through the penalties which one patiently sustains, he obtains the remission of a sin of which he has no awareness."

◊ 3. Left margin: Isaiah 40:1–2.

◊ 4. Left margin: John 15[:22].

Annotation CCVI [contents]

"As an arrow in the hand of the mighty, so [are] the sons of those cast out." — Psalm 126:4

On the sons of those cast out.

Hilary's exposition upon this little verse, Jerome, writing to Marcella, disapproves in these words: "That also of the same Psalm thou hast deigned to ask — Who are the 'sons of those cast out' [filij excussorum]? I wonder that thou hast not read [it] in Hilary's Commentaries — that he interprets 'the sons of those cast out' [as] the peoples of believers, namely, that he supposed the Apostles to be called by that name, to whom in the Gospel it is enjoined, into whatever city they enter, and are not received, to shake off the dust of their feet in testimony against the unbelievers: although thou subtly object beforehand that the Apostles cannot be understood under the name of 'the shaken-off,' since it is one thing [to be] of the shakers, another of the shaken (because the shakers are those who shake off, but the shaken those who are shaken off by others), and that it is incongruous [for] the Apostles to be taken [as] 'shaken off,' who ought rather to have been called 'shakers.' What, then, shall I do? So great a man, and in his own times most eloquent, I dare not reprehend — [one] who, by the merit of his confession, the industry of [his] life, and the brightness of [his] eloquence, is praised wherever the Roman name is: except that it must not be ascribed to his fault that he was ignorant of the Hebrew tongue.[5] Of Greek letters also he had caught a certain little breeze [smattering], but from Heliodorus the presbyter, with whom he was familiarly acquainted, [he sought] those things which he could not understand — how they had been said according to Origen; who, because he could not find Origen's commentary on this psalm, chose to insinuate his own opinion rather than confess his ignorance — [an opinion] which he set forth in clear speech, and pursued another's error the more eloquently. It remains, therefore, that we run back again to the fountain of the Hebrew speech, and see how it is written where we have 'As the sons of the shaken-off': there is read ken bene ha-neurim (כן בני הנעורים) — which Aquila translated 'As the sons of [their] youth'; Symmachus and Theodotion, 'As the sons of youth'; the Seventy [rendered it otherwise], which we may render 'Sharpened perceptions' [Exacuti sensus] — from which it is manifest that by [the sons] of youth the Christian peoples are to be understood."

◊ 5. Left margin: Hilary was ignorant of the Hebrew tongue.

Annotation CCVII [contents]

"Because thou shalt eat the labors of thy hands." — Psalm 127:2

On the correct rendering of this passage.

Hilary, in the interpretation of this little verse — though erring slightly — Jerome noted, in the epistle to Marcella, writing thus: "In this Psalm Heliodorus rather than our Hilary erred: who, concerning that passage in which it is written, 'Thou shalt eat the labors of thy fruits,' opining various things, asserted that the sense stands better if it be written, 'to eat some fruit of [one's] labors,' and not 'the labors of [one's] fruits' — whence a spiritual understanding must be sought; and, entering upon this occasion into a long disputation, he used as much elaborateness [to make] what he wished to be understood [seem persuasive] as falsehood always needs, that it may seem true. Whereas in this place not the Seventy interpreters, but the Latins — deceived by the ambiguity of the Greek word — translated καρπούς rather 'fruits' than 'hands,' although καρποί are also called 'hands' [wrists]; which in the Hebrew is set as calphecho (כפיך) — and Symmachus, and the Fifth Edition, translated 'of thy hands,' that they might escape the ambiguity of the former [Greek] speech."

Annotation CCVIII [contents]

"Let thy ears be attentive." — Psalm 129:2

Whether the Soul was formed before the body.

Hilary, illustrating this passage by [his] exposition, indicates that the Soul of the first man was formed before the body; for thus we read in him: "When God, the world being now finished, began the most beautiful work — namely, making man to his own image — he composed him of a lowly and a heavenly nature, that is, of Soul and body; and first indeed he constituted that Soul by that divine and (to us) incomprehensible work of his power. For that God did not, when he made man to the image of God, then also make the body, Genesis teaches: [namely, that] long after man had been made to the image of God, the dust [was] taken, and the body formed, and thereupon again made into a living Soul by inspiration — this nature, namely the earthly and the heavenly, being coupled by a certain covenant of the in-breathing."

From this opinion Augustine does not altogether shrink, in the book On Genesis, to the Letter, book 7, chapter 24, where he committed these things to writing: "Let us therefore see whether perchance that can be true which certainly seems to me more tolerable to human opinion: that God, in those first works in which he created all things at once, created also the human Soul — which in its own time he might breathe into the members of the body formed from clay; of which body, among those things established all at once, he had created causally the rational principle, according to which it should come to be when the human body was to be made. For neither that which is said, 'to his image,' do we rightly understand except in the soul; nor that which is said, 'Male and female,'[6] except in the body. Let it be believed, therefore, if no" →

◊ 6. Right margin: Genesis 1:27.

[…continues on folio 599 (PDF p. 416): the rest of Augustine on whether the soul was created causally before the body (Annotatio CCVIII).]

(printed folio 599 [PDF p. 416]. Annot. CCVIII–CCXI (Ps 129:2–Proverbs 1:1): the "soul before body" question closes (Leo I: souls did not pre-exist their bodies); whether Christ's soul is omniscient; Origen on souls imprisoned in bodies (read with caution); and the Psalms end, Proverbs begins — whether Solomon was a prophet → folio 600.)

(folio 599, left column → right column)

Annotation CCVIII (continued)

authority of the Scriptures, or reason of truth, contradicts, that man was so made on the sixth day, that the causal ratio of the human body indeed [was] in the elements of the world, but the Soul itself was now created — as the day was first made — and, [once] created, lay hidden in the works of God, until, at its own time, by breathing upon it, he might insert it into the body formed from clay."

Rufinus, in the first book of the Invectives, asserts that Jerome once held this same [opinion], in the commentaries on the Epistle to the Ephesians, when he elucidated that [saying] of the Apostle, "For we are his workmanship,"[1] etc.; and he brings forward his words, having this form: "Diligently observe that he did not say, 'We are his figuration and molding [plasmatio],' but, 'We are his making [factura]'; for the molding draws its origin from the clay of the earth, but the 'making' took its beginning according to the likeness and image of God — which, in the one-hundred-and-eighteenth psalm, being placed together, signifies diverse things: 'Thy hands have made me, and formed me'[2] — the 'making' holds the first place, then the 'formation.'"

◊ 1. Left margin: Ephesians 2:10.

◊ 2. Left margin: Psalm 118:73.

Philastrius, bishop of Brescia, adheres to this opinion so constantly that, in the catalogue of heresies published by him, chapter 99, he judges those who think otherwise [to be] heretics; against whom he also brings forward the testimony of Moses, who, describing the formation of man, first narrated the creation of the Soul, when in the first chapter of Genesis he said: "God created man to his own image"[3] — for man is not the image of God according to the body, but according to the soul only. Then, in the second chapter of the same book, relating the formation of the body, he says: "God therefore formed man of the clay of the earth, and breathed into him the breath of life" — by which distinction of narrations Moses willed (as Philastrius says) to signify that the Soul was first created, and then the body was molded.

◊ 3. Left margin: Genesis 1:27.

Gregory, bishop of Nyssa, consenting to these, affirms that not only the Soul of the first man, but the Souls of all men also, were created at once, before the body of Adam; and this he strives to demonstrate by the authority of the sacred Letters and by reason, in the second book of [his] Philosophy, chapter 6, writing: "If anyone shall think that the Soul was sent in after the fashioning of the body, or that it was begotten after the body, he strays from the truth: for neither does Moses say that it was then created, when it was being sent into the body, nor does it so stand according to reason." And further, bringing forward the demonstration of his opinion, he says: "It is the most principal work of creation, to make some things out of non-existents. If, therefore, Souls came to be from mutual procreation, they would surely come to be by [the] reason of providence, and would be corruptible — no otherwise than the animals begotten from the succession of [their] kind. But if they come to be out of non-existents, [then] creation still goes on, and that [saying] of Moses is not true, 'God rested from all his works.[4] But both of these are unfitting; not therefore are souls now coming to be." And again, meeting Eunomius — who, from that sentence of Christ saying, "My Father worketh until now,"[5] showed that new souls are created daily — he subjoins: "But that [Christ] says, 'My Father worketh until now,' is to be taken not of creation, as it seems to him, but of provision, and that [things] may be well [maintained in being]."

◊ 4. Left margin: Genesis 2:2.

◊ 5. Left margin: John 5:17.

There are [some] who think that this assertion can be both believed and defended without any danger of heresy, provided we do not think that the Souls sinned before they glided into bodies, and were thrust down into bodies on account of [their] sins, as into prisons — which [error], in Origen and in the Origenists and Priscillianists, the decrees of the Councils condemned. Nor does Peter, bishop of Paris, seem to differ from these, leaving this matter in doubt, in book 2 of the Sentences, distinction 17.

But against these [opinions] the authority of Pope Leo the First openly protests, who in the epistle to the bishop of Astorga thus decrees: "The Catholic faith constantly and truly preaches that the Souls of men were not, before they were breathed into their own bodies." St. Thomas, in the first volume of the Theological Summa, question 90, opines that this position can in some manner be sustained, if we say that the Souls of men preceded [their] bodies not according to act, but according to a certain likeness of kind, by which souls agree with the Angels in intellectual nature. Albert [the Great], bishop of Regensburg, in the Summa on Man, question 15, rejecting the aforesaid opinion of Gregory of Nyssa as a Platonic figment, says that the authority of Moses, adduced by him, is to be so taken that we understand God indeed to have rested from the specific creation of all the species,[6] but not from the individual creation of Souls, which are daily infused into human bodies.

◊ 6. Right margin: God rested from the creation of new species.

Annotation CCIX [contents]

"Thy knowledge is become wonderful [beyond] me; it is exalted, and I shall not be able to [reach] it." — Psalm 138:6

Whether the Soul of Christ is omniscient.

Cassiodorus, elucidating this, seems to intimate that the Soul of Christ neither has knowledge equal with God, nor knows all things which God knows. For he says: "The wonderful knowledge of the Father was made [manifest] through Jesus Christ, when the mysteries of the holy law were narrated to the earth-born; and, that the truth of the human condition might be laid open, he added, 'And I shall not be able to [reach] it,' because the nature of man, which he deigned to assume, could not equal itself to the divine substance." Peter [Lombard], bishop of Paris, in the third book of the Sentences, distinction 14, explaining this authority adduced by [his] adversaries, says: "The Soul [of Christ], through the wisdom freely given to it in the Word of God, to which it is united, knows all things which God knows — but not so clearly and perspicuously as God, whose wisdom is far more worthy, and embraces all things far more excellently and perfectly than the Soul of Christ, although that too is omniscient, nor does any thing escape it which God knows."

Annotation CCX [contents]

"Bring my soul out of prison." — Psalm 141:8

The error of Origen concerning souls thrust into bodies.

Read Origen's commentaries here prudently, lest thou strike upon the error concerning Souls thrust down into the prison of bodies — for the confirmation of which Origen uses the present little verse. See above, Annotation 185.

Annotation CCXI [contents]

"The parables of Solomon, the son of David," etc. — Proverbs 1:1

Whether Solomon was a prophet.

Dorotheus, bishop of Tyre and martyr, when in the Synopsis of divine scripture he touched briefly on the arguments of the books of Solomon, seems to have asserted that Solomon did not receive the gift of prophecy, in these words: "Solomon wrote" →

[...continues on folio 600 (PDF p. 417): the rest of Dorotheus, and whether Solomon was a prophet (Annotatio CCXI).]

---

(printed folio 600 [PDF p. 417]. Annot. CCXI–CCXIV (Proverbs 1:1–Ecclesiastes 11:3): Solomon's prophecy closes; Ecclesiastes begins — whether the stars are animate (Jerome, Origen, Virgil, vs. Basil); whether worlds existed before this one (Origen's Peri Archon vs. Augustine's Confessions XI); and whether the soul's state after death is fixed forever (the fallen tree) → folio 601.)

(folio 600, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXI (continued)

the Proverbs, the Canticle of Canticles, and Ecclesiastes; for when he had received the grace of wisdom from God, he admonished all men to live wisely in this life; but the gift of Prophecy he did not receive: for we have already reckoned up those who received [it] by the divine bounty, that they might prophesy concerning Christ." Athanasius, in the Synopsis, thinks otherwise, [as do] Origen, on the Canticle of Canticles, and St. Augustine, who in book 17 On the City of God, chapter 20, says: "Solomon himself is also found to have prophesied, in his books which are received into canonical authority — three [of them]: the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticle of Canticles," etc. Perhaps [Dorotheus] understands that Solomon is not to be placed in the catalogue of the major or minor prophets, who are called prophets in the proper and more usual signification. For Augustine also, although in book 2 On Christian Doctrine he had numbered the books of Solomon among the prophetic [books], separated [them] from the books of the sixteen prophets, whom he said are properly called prophets.

Annotation CCXII [contents]

"The spirit goeth, surveying all things round about in [its] circuit." — Ecclesiastes 1:6

Whether the stars are animate.

Jerome, in the commentaries on Ecclesiastes, discussing the sense of this sentence, writes these things: "But in that he says, 'Surveying all things round about in [its] circuit' — or 'wheeling, the spirit goeth wheeling, and returns into its own circuits' — [Solomon] either called the Sun itself 'spirit,' because it animates, and breathes, and is vigorous, and completes the yearly courses of the orb, as the Poet says: 'Meanwhile the great Sun rolls round the year'; and elsewhere, 'And into itself, along its own tracks, the year rolls back'; or because [it is written]: 'The Spirit within nourishes the shining globe of the Moon and the Titanian stars, and Mind, infused through the limbs, moves the whole mass, and mingles itself with the great body' — [either way] he speaks not of the yearly course of the Sun, but of its daily paths." St. Thomas, in the first volume of the Theological Summa, question 70, article 3, gathers from these [words] that Jerome held, with Origen, that the Sun and the other stars are animate[1] — against the opinion of Basil and of many Fathers. See above, Annotation 108.

◊ 1. Left margin: St. Jerome held the stars to be animate.

Annotation CCXIII [contents]

"What is that which has been done? The same thing which is to be." — Ecclesiastes 1:9

Whether before this world there were other worlds, and whether there will be [others] after this.

Origen, as Methodius is witness in the book On the Resurrection, when in the commentaries on Ecclesiastes he was discussing the proposed clause, said that Solomon signified by this saying both that before this world there were other worlds, and that after this world there will be others — which of old, among the ethnic philosophers, Democritus and Epicurus handed down. This same thing Jerome, in the epistle to Avitus, reports that Origen wrote in the third book of the Peri Archon; which, when I myself perused it, I read in it these words: "The adversaries are wont to object to us, saying: If the world began from time, what was God doing before the world was made? For to say that the nature of God is idle is at once idle and absurd, [and so is it] even to think that the goodness [of God] at some time did not act, and the omnipotence at some time did not exercise [its] power. To which propositions we, observing the rules of piety, will answer: that God did not then first begin to work when he made this visible world; but that, as after the corruption of this world there will be another world, so also, before this one was, we believe there were others. Both of which the divine Scripture confirmed by [its] authority. For that there will be another world after this one, Isaiah teaches, saying: 'There shall be a new heaven, and a new earth, which I will make to remain in my sight, saith the Lord.[2] But that before this world there were others also, Ecclesiastes shows, saying: 'What is that which has been done? The same thing which is to be. And what is that which has been created? The very thing which is to be created; and there is nothing at all new under the Sun. But who shall speak and say, "Behold, this is new"? It was already in the ages which were before us.[3] By which testimonies both are proved: that there were ages before, and that there will be [ages] afterward — yet it must not be thought that many worlds exist at once, but that after this [one] others will be, in the meantime."

◊ 2. Right margin: Isaiah 65:17.

◊ 3. Right margin: Ecclesiastes 1:9[–10].

These things [are] in the books of the Peri Archon: whether they were corrupted by the corruptors of Origen's volumes, or whether Origen himself either imprudently uttered [them], or knowingly and willingly committed [them] to writing, is uncertain. Yet no one would think that Origen — a man of exceptional erudition — was so dull and stupid as not to have perceived that the objection of the adversaries could be resolved no less easily than [it could be] evaded. For if he had preferred to deride [it], there was ready at hand [the retort] which Augustine, in book 11 of the Confessions, chapter 12, writes that a certain [man] said: who, to those asking, "What was God doing before he founded the world?"[4] — jestingly enough mocking the vanity of the question — answered, "He was preparing hells for those who pry into deep things." Or, if he had thought the question unworthy of laughter, he might indeed have answered that the nature of God was never idle, nor did his goodness and power ever grow torpid by ceasing.[5] For that eternal Deity, remaining ever in itself, outside all place, was working within itself by an unceasing action of intellect and will — namely, beholding in [its] mind the world which it bore in [its] thought, handling [it] with intelligence, and deliberating and determining by [its] will that the world itself should not be made from eternity, but together with time, when the divine providence knew that it would be good and opportune for it to exist. For it was not because the world's being-to-come was good that God therefore founded the world; but because God willed the world to be, therefore it was good that the world exist.[6] Rightly, therefore, was the world founded then, when God decreed it to be good, and not before.

◊ 4. Right margin: What God was doing before he founded the world.

◊ 5. Right margin: God was never idle.

◊ 6. Right margin: Because God willed the world to be, therefore it was good that the world exist.

Annotation CCXIV [contents]

"If the tree fall to the south, or to the north, in the place where the tree shall fall, there shall it be." — Ecclesiastes 11:3

Whether after this life there is given a place from which Souls, once entered, can go out.

Jerome, on Ecclesiastes, expounding these words, seems to hint that after this life there is no place from which Souls, when they shall have come to it, can any more go out. For thus it is written in him: "'In the place where the tree shall fall, there shall it be': for wherever thou shalt have prepared for thyself a place, and a future seat — whether to the north or to the south — there, when thou art dead, shalt thou remain. For thou, like the tree, however long-lived thou be, shalt not be [so] forever; but, overthrown by the sudden tempest of death (as [trees] by that of the winds), wherever thou shalt fall, there shalt thou remain continually — whether the last [hour] shall have found thee stiff and savage, or clement and merciful." Olympiodorus, in the commentaries on this book and passage, subscribes to Jerome in these words: "In whatever place, therefore, whether luminous or dark," →

[…continues on folio 601 (PDF p. 418): the rest of Olympiodorus on the soul's fixed abode after death (Annotatio CCXIV).]

---

(printed folio 601 [PDF p. 418]. Annot. CCXIV–CCXIX (Ecclesiastes 11:3–Wisdom 1:1): the fixed state after death closes (the Lutherans abuse it against Purgatory, answered by Bunderius); Canticles begins — whether angels are corporeal, whether guardian angels desert their charges, and Bernard's "my merit is the Lord's mercy" (vs. Calvin); Wisdom begins — its authorship (Augustine's retraction; Jerome and Philo) → folio 602.)

(folio 601, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXIV (continued)

— that is, whether in the base station of crimes, or in the honorable [station] of virtues, a man be found when he dies, in that order and grade he remains forever: for he either rests in the light of eternal felicity with the just and Christ the Lord, or is tormented in the darkness with the wicked, and their prince, the Devil." These testimonies the Lutherans are wont to bring forward against the Catholic assertion concerning Purgatory, whence souls, the expiation of [their] sins being completed, are freed. Refuting their madness, John Bunderius, in the eleventh title of his Concertationes, says that the authority of Solomon, Jerome, and Olympiodorus means nothing else for him than that the dead [man], in whatever state he departed, in that shall he remain — namely, in charity, or outside charity. So that, if one has died without charity — which is to be stiff and savage — he cannot become merciful and clement in charity, or the reverse. For after death no one is able to lose charity, or to acquire [it] anew for himself;[1] yet with this [truth] it stands, by an immutable state, that those who have merited this while existing in charity can, on departing hence, be relieved from [their] due punishments by the suffrages of the living. For that relief of punishments does not change the state, but they are in that state in which they can be relieved from [their] due punishments.

◊ 1. Left margin: After death no one loses or acquires charity.

Annotation CCXV [contents]

"Let him kiss me with the kiss of his mouth." — Canticle 1:1

Whether the Angels are corporeal.

Bernard, in the fifth sermon on the Canticle of Canticles, seems to teach that the Angels are corporeal, when he says: "Now, that even the super-celestial spirits have need of bodies, let that true and truly divine sentence make us most certain: for 'all are ministering spirits, sent to minister for them who receive the inheritance of salvation.'[2] In what manner, then, do they fulfil their ministry without a body — especially among those living in the body? Finally, to run about, and to pass from place to place, belongs only to bodies: which that the Angels frequently do, an authority as undoubted as [it is] known proves. Hence it is that they were also seen by the Fathers," etc. See above, Annotation 8, on the first chapter of Genesis.

◊ 2. Left margin: Hebrews 1:14.

Annotation CCXVI [contents]

"Let him kiss me with the kiss of his mouth." — Canticle 1:1

Whether the Angels desert those whom they have received into [their] custody.

The words of Bernard, from the seventh homily on the Canticle of Canticles, the Scholastics are wont to use when, for the sake of disputing, they contend that the guardian Angels sometimes desert the custody of those whom they have received to guard. They run thus: "I grieve, likewise, that some of us are weighed down by a heavy sleep in the sacred vigils, and reverence not the citizens of heaven, and appear in the presence of the princes as [it were] disorderly: I fear lest [the angels], sometime abominating our sloth, depart with indignation, and each one of us begin, too late, to say with groaning, 'Thou hast put my acquaintances far from me: they have made me an abomination to themselves,'[3] and that [other], 'Thou hast put away from me my friend,'[4] etc." Albert the Great, in the first volume of the Summa, question 8, weighing this passage, says that men are deserted by the guardian Angels not according to place, or local custody, but according to [the angel's] power and efficacy[5] — and this not from the Angel's sloth, but from the man's fault, in that manner in which the saints are wont to say that a sinner departs from God "into the region of unlikeness," not by distance of place, but of merit.

◊ 3. Left margin: Psalm 87:9.

◊ 4. Left margin: Psalm 87:19.

◊ 5. Left margin: In what manner men are deserted by the Angels.

Annotation CCXVII [contents]

"Come, my dove, in the clefts of the rock." — Canticle 2:10, 14

On the merits of the just.

Bernard, in homily 61 on the Canticle of Canticles, inserted into the exposition of this clause these words: "My merit, therefore, [is] the mercy of the Lord: I am not plainly destitute of merit, so long as he [the Lord] shall not be [destitute] of mercies; and if the mercies of the Lord are many, I too am, nonetheless, abundant in merits. Shall I sing of my own justices? O Lord, I will be mindful of thy justice alone: for that is mine also — namely, thou hast been made unto me justice from God."[6] John Calvin, in chapter 10 of his Institutes, while he strives to show that there are no merits of our good [works] before God, abuses this testimony; adding also that [saying] which was uttered by the same author in the fifteenth sermon on Psalm 90: "This is the whole merit of man, if he place his whole hope in him who has made the whole man safe," etc.

◊ 6. Right margin: Psalm 70:16.

But Bernard does not suffer himself to be so interpreted, whose plain definition concerning the merits of the pious thou hast in the 68th sermon on the Canticle of Canticles, to this effect:[7] "It suffices," he says, "to know, for [obtaining] merit, that merits do not suffice; but as, for merit, it is enough not to presume upon [one's] merits, so to be destitute of merits is enough for [condemnation at the] judgment. Furthermore, none of the reborn infants is destitute of merits, but they have the merits of Christ — of which nevertheless they render themselves unworthy, if they, who ought to join their own merits [to Christ's], have neglected [to do so]: which danger indeed is [only] of the adult age. Take care, therefore, to have merits; [and] when thou hast [them], know [them] to be given [to thee]. And thus thou hast escaped all danger of poverty and of presumption: for pernicious is the poverty and penury of merits, but presumption [is] the deceitful riches of the spirit; and therefore, 'Give me neither riches nor poverty, O Lord,' says the Wise Man."[8] These [are] Bernard's words: from which it appears that he, in those [passages] which Calvin adduced, does not destroy nor condemn the merits of holy works, which are humbly done by the servants of God (God leading, and the Holy Spirit favoring), but [rather] admonishes the servants of God not so to swell up over their own virtues and merits as to think that they have them either from themselves, without the breathing of the divine Spirit, or that they are worthy, without the aid of heavenly grace, to merit anything, however small. Hither look the things thou hast above in the sayings of Augustine, Annotation 92.

◊ 7. Right margin: St. Bernard acknowledged the merits of pious men.

◊ 8. Right margin: Proverbs 30:8.

Annotation CCXVIII [contents]

"Love justice," etc. — Wisdom 1:1

On the author of the book of Wisdom.

Augustine, in the second book On Christian Doctrine, chapter 8, in which he enumerates the canon of the sacred Scriptures, said that the book which is entitled the Wisdom of Solomon had for [its] author Jesus, the son of Sirach, who wrote the book of Ecclesiasticus. This same thing he retracted, in book 2 of the Retractations, chapter 3, in these words: "Concerning the author of the book which many call the Wisdom of Solomon — that it too, like Ecclesiasticus, [was written] by Jesus the son of Sirach — [I say that] it does not so stand as was said by me; for I afterward learned, and found [it] altogether more probable, that he is not the author of this book."[9]

◊ 9. Right margin: St. Augustine retracts himself.

Annotation CCXIX [contents]

"Love wisdom [justice], you that judge the earth." — Wisdom 1:1

On the author of the book of Wisdom.

Jerome, proposing the argument [preface] to the book of the Wisdom of Solomon, [as] emended by himself, says: "The book of Wisdom is nowhere [found] among the Hebrews; whence its very style savors of the Greek language and speech. The Jews affirm this [book] to be Philo's," etc. →

[…continues on folio 602 (PDF p. 419): the rest of Jerome on the authorship of the book of Wisdom (Annotatio CCXIX).]

---

(printed folio 602 [PDF p. 419]. Annot. CCXIX–CCXXV (Wisdom 1:1–Isaiah 14:19): the authorship of Wisdom closes (Faber attacks Jerome, answered by Beda); Isaiah begins — the LXX omission at 2:22; angels enjoy God's glory not his nature; Origen's Trinitarian misreading of the two Seraphim; the "Wonderful… Prince of peace" prophecy (9:6, with the Greek restored); whether angels have a soul; and whether the damned ever find rest (Anselm's "impossible hypothesis") → folio 603.)

(folio 602, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXIX (continued)

For the sake of this argument [preface], Jacobus Faber, bishop of Vienna — a man very often dissenting from the ecclesiastical dogmas[1] — bites Jerome with insolent words, and [words] little worthy of the modesty of a Bishop, writing thus against him in the commentaries on the epistle to the Romans: "In composing the argument of the book which is called Wisdom, Jerome seems to have been too credulous of a certain perfidious Jew — provided [the argument] be his, [and] more worthy (as indeed I believe) of the ashes than of the Bibles. The zeal of God and of truth compels me thus to speak: would that Jerome — otherwise a holy and admirable man — had never, when he composed the arguments of the sacred books, consulted the Jews." This error [of Faber], Noël Beda, theologian, most amply confuted, in book 1 of the Annotations against the same Bishop: to the reading of which — hastening elsewhere — we send the curious reader.

◊ 1. Left margin: Jacobus Faber is reprehended.

Annotation CCXX [contents]

"For he is reputed high." — Isaiah 2:22

A prophecy of Christ omitted by the Seventy.

Jerome wonders at the Seventy Interpreters, that they left this sentence untouched; for thus he writes at the end of the first commentary on Isaiah: "Handling it silently in my mind, I cannot find the reason why the Seventy were unwilling to translate into Greek so perspicuous a prophecy concerning Christ. For the others [Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion], who did indeed translate [it], but drew the ambiguous phrase to a sense of impiety — [it is] no wonder why they translated ill, and were unwilling to say anything glorious concerning Christ, in whom they did not believe — namely, as Jews, or half-Jews, that is, Ebionites."

Annotation CCXXI [contents]

"I saw the Lord sitting," etc. — Isaiah 6:1

On God being seen.

Chrysostom, in the first homily on the present passage, says that the Angels enjoy the ineffable glory of God, but do not see his nature. See Annotation 182 of book 6.

Annotation CCXXII [contents]

"The Seraphim cried one to another." — Isaiah 6:3

On the Trinity.

That Origen wrongly expounded these things in [his] commentaries, Jerome testifies, in book 3 on Isaiah, saying: "Impiously does he understand the two Seraphim [to be] the Son and the Holy Spirit — whereas, according to the Evangelist John and Paul the Apostle, we are taught that the Son of God was seen reigning in majesty, and that the Holy Spirit spoke." And in the epistle to Pammachius and Oceanus: "In the reading of Isaiah, in which the two Seraphim are described crying — Origen interpreting [them as] the Son and the Holy Spirit — I changed his detestable exposition into the two Testaments." Although Jerome says that he changed [this], we nevertheless still read, in Origen, in the fifth homily on this passage of Isaiah, that our Lord Jesus Christ is one of the two Seraphim — which indeed one ought to understand according to the allegory, and according to the dispensation of the flesh.

Annotation CCXXIII [contents]

"His name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, God, Mighty, Father of the world to come, Prince of peace." — Isaiah 9:6

A prophecy of Christ ill translated by the Seventy interpreters.

Jerome, in book 3 on Isaiah, notes that the Seventy Interpreters — terrified by the majesty of these words — did not dare manifestly to translate this prophecy of Isaiah, pronounced concerning the Messiah, Christ, lest they be compelled openly to confess that Christ was to be called Wonderful, God, Mighty, Father of the world to come, Prince of peace; but for those six names they put others, which are not had in the Hebrew, writing in this manner: "His name shall be called the Angel of great counsel; and I will bring peace upon the princes, and health to him." And yet now, in the vulgate Greek edition — which is believed to be [that] of the Seventy interpreters — there plainly appear [the words] which Jerome wonders [to be] changed or omitted. For thus is it found written in it:

> Καλεῖται τὸ ὀνομα αὐτοῦ μεγάλης βουλῆς ἄγγελος, Θαυμαστός, σύμβουλος, Θεὸς ἰσχυρός, ἐξουσιαστής, ἄρχων εἰρήνης, πατὴρ τοῦ μέλλοντος αῶινος· ἄξω γὰρ εἰρήνην ἐπὶ τοὺς ἄρχοντας, καὶ ὑγίειαν αὐτοῦ· καὶ μεγάλη ἀ ἠρχὴ αὐτοῦ, καὶ τῆς εἰρήνης αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἔστιν τέλος —

that is: "His name shall be called the Angel of great counsel, Wonderful, Counselor, God, Mighty, Having power, Prince of peace, Father of the world to come; for I will bring peace upon the princes, and his health; and great [is] his rule, and of his peace there is no end." But that the true and emended version of the Seventy of old had [it] in this manner, Eusebius testifies, in book 7 of the Evangelical Demonstration, saying: "Therefore, according to the Seventy themselves, [there was foretold] not simply an Angel, but the Angel of great counsel, and Wonderful Counselor, and God Mighty, and Having power, and Prince of peace, and Father of the world to come, [who was] to arise at some time, and to be a little child." In the same manner also Chrysostom reads [it], in the book On the Deity of Christ, against the Gentiles, writing thus: "These things no one says of a [mere] child-man; for no one of men was ever called God, Mighty — as neither Father of the world to come, nor Prince of this peace: for of his peace, he says, there is no end."

Annotation CCXXIV [contents]

"Every soul of man shall fear." — Isaiah 13:7

Whether angels have a soul.

Basil, in the commentaries on Isaiah, says: "Beautifully is the word 'of man' added: for the Soul of the Angels is not subject to fear; for the Soul of the Angel is superior to this turbulent affection." He seems by these [words] to hint that the Angels are living beings, which consist of body and soul — unless perchance, this being a figurative form of speaking, by "the Souls of the Angels" we understand the Angels [themselves], who are souls, and most simple spirits. Of this we have spoken more fully above, in Annotation 8.

Annotation CCXXV [contents]

"But thou art cast out," etc. — Isaiah 14:19

Whether the souls of the damned shall at some time have rest.

Anselm of Laon, in the Interlinear Gloss, drawing this passage allegorically to the Devil, says: "Even though all souls shall at some time have rest, thou shalt never have [it]." A scholion of this kind is taken from the fifth commentary of Jerome on Isaiah, where he himself, bringing forward the mystical [interpretation] of an uncertain author — and perhaps of Origen — says: "But others interpret this passage thus: All souls, among the dead, shall receive some rest; thou alone shalt be bound in the outermost darkness." St. Thomas, in book 4 of the Sentences, distinction 46, question 2, admonishes that these words are to be read prudently, lest anyone through carelessness slip into the dogma of Origen, who thought that the punishments of the damned would at some time be ended. But they will be read prudently, if we consider that Anselm spoke not simply and absolutely, but under an impossible hypothesis, to exagge-" →

> […continues on folio 603 (PDF p. 420): the rest of Sixtus's resolution of Anselm's "impossible hypothesis" on the rest of the damned (Annotatio CCXXV).]

(printed folio 603 [PDF p. 420]. Annot. CCXXV–CCXXIX (Isaiah 14:19–66:24): the rest of the damned closes; the shaving of the beard (cross-ref); whether open sin is lighter than feigned holiness (malicious hypocrisy mortal, well-meant concealment venial); whether the saints remember their past evils (a memory without pain); and the Isaiah 66:24 crux — Jerome reports two "damnable expositions" of hell-fire without refuting them → folio 604.)

(folio 603, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXXV (continued)

the magnitude of the sin into which the Devil cast himself of his own accord.

Annotation CCXXVI [contents]

"Every beard shall be shaven." — Isaiah 15:2

What Jerome wrote to this [effect] concerning the shaving of the beard and of the head, see below, Annotation 244 of this book.

Annotation CCXXVII [contents]

"In three years the glory shall be taken away, [like the glory] of a hireling." — Isaiah 16:14

Whether it is a lighter [sin] to sin openly than to feign holiness.

Jerome, at the end of book 6 on Isaiah, says: "If I feign myself chaste, and there is another thing in my conscience, I have not the glory [reward] of a hireling, but the punishments of a sinner; because, in the comparison of the two evils, it is lighter to sin openly than to simulate and feign holiness." St. Thomas, in the Second Part of the Second, question 111, article 4, notes this passage, [saying] that at first sight it seems to favor those who assert that hypocrisy is always a mortal sin;[1] but he indicates that Jerome's words must be understood of that kind of simulation whereby someone feigns a holiness which he neither has, nor desires to have — nay, even hates — but not of that kind of simulation whereby many feign a holiness which is none of theirs, not for the cause of deceiving and harming, but rather from a zeal of helping [edifying]: for this, although it be not altogether free from fault, is nevertheless not a deadly vice, nor worthy of eternal punishment.

◊ 1. Left margin: Whether all hypocrisy is a deadly sin.

According to this understanding, St. Thomas judges that two sentences of Strabo must be interpreted. Of these, the one is had in the glosses collected by him, on Job 1, where, expounding that [verse], "As it pleased the Lord, so it was done," etc.,[2] he says: "Feigned equity is not equity, but a double sin"; the other is had on the Lamentations, chapter 4, where, expounding that [verse], "The iniquity of my people is greater than the sin of Sodom,"[3] he says: "Crimes are bewailed in the soul which slips into hypocrisy, whose iniquity is greater than the sin of Sodom."

◊ 2. Left margin: Job 1:21.

◊ 3. Left margin: Lamentations 4:6.

Annotation CCXXVIII [contents]

"The former distresses are given over to oblivion." — Isaiah 65:16

Whether the saints in heaven remember [their] past evils.

Jerome, in book 18 on Isaiah, seems to hand down that the saints in heaven will not have memory of [their] preceding evils or crimes. For he says: "In the new heaven and in the new earth, all memory of the former conversation is blotted out, lest this very thing be a part of the evils — to remember the former distress." The Master of the Sentences, in book 4, distinction 43, citing this passage otherwise than it is read in the Hieronymian codex, says that it must be so understood by us that we do not exclude from the blessed the memory of [their] preceding evils, but [only] the injury and molestation of the memory: for the memory of [their] offenses will not in any part diminish the felicity of the Saints, but will render [them] the more prompt and eager to render thanks to God. Which interpretation there is no doubt that he took from Gregory, who most aptly explained this at the end of book 4 of the Explanations on Job, saying thus: "It must be asked, how the mind of the elect can be perfect in beatitude, if the memory of its own guilt touches it amid [its] joys? But it must be known that, as often now we joyfully remember [past] sad things, so then we shall remember the wickedness [we have] passed through, without injury to our beatitude: for often, in the time of wholeness, we recall past griefs to memory without grief, and by how much we recollect ourselves [as having been] sick, by so much [the more], being whole, do we love [our health]. There will be, therefore, in that beatitude a memory of guilt — not [one] that pollutes the mind, but [one] that binds us more closely to gladness: so that, while the mind remembers its own grief without grief, it both more truly understands itself a debtor to the physician, and loves the more the salvation received, by how much it remembers the trouble which it has escaped."

Annotation CCXXIX [contents]

"Their worm shall not die, and their fire shall not be extinguished," etc. — Isaiah 66:24

Whether the fire of hell is metaphorical.

Jerome, at the end of book 18 on Isaiah, brought hither two damnable expositions of other authors, [but] without their name: of these, the one teaches that the fire of hell is metaphorical, placed in the affliction of the conscience and memory alone; the other, that the fire of hell and the burnings of the damned are at some time at last to be ended. Since he relates these explanations not only without any confutation or accusation of the error, but even confirms [them] by bringing forward very many testimonies of the divine Scripture, Rufinus, the detractor of Jerome, took occasion of calumniating him, as a favorer of both dogmas.

The words of the former exposition are these: "'The worm which shall not die, and the fire which shall not be extinguished,' is taken by very many [to be] the conscience of sinners, which torments those set in punishments, because by their own vice and sin they were deprived of so great a good — according to that which is said, 'I was turned in misery, while the thorn is fixed in me,[4] and in Proverbs, 'The moth of the bones [is] an understanding heart,[5] and again, under the obelus, 'As the moth [consumes] a garment, and the worm the wood, so grief tortures the heart of a man.'"

◊ 4. Right margin: Psalm 31:4.

◊ 5. Right margin: Proverbs 25:20.

The words of the latter interpretation are thus: "But those who wish the punishments at some time to be ended — and, though after long times, yet the torments to have a term[6] — use these testimonies: (a) 'When the fulness of the gentiles shall have entered in, then all Israel shall be saved';[7] and again, (b) 'God hath concluded all under sin, that he may have mercy on all';[8] and in another place the holy [man] speaks, (c) 'I will bear the wrath of the Lord, because I have sinned against him, until he judge my cause, and take away my judgment, and bring me forth into the light';[9] and again, (d) 'I will bless thee, O Lord, for thou wast angry with me; thou hast turned away thy face from me, and hast had mercy on me.'[10] The Lord also speaks to the sinner: 'When the anger of my fury shall be [past], I will heal again.' And this is that which is said in another place, (f) 'How great is the multitude of thy goodness, O Lord, which thou hast hidden for them that fear thee.'[11] All which [testimonies] they repeat, desiring to affirm that after the torments there will be refreshments — which now must be hidden from those to whom fear is useful, that, while they dread the punishments, they may cease to sin: which [matter] we ought to leave to the knowledge of God alone, whose not only mercy, but also torments, are [weighed] in a balance; and he knows whom, how, or how long he ought to judge. And let us only say what befits human frailty: 'O Lord, rebuke me not in thy fury, neither correct me in thy wrath.'[12] And, as of the Devil — [and] as of all deniers and impious [ones], who have said in their heart, 'There is no God'[13] — we believe [there are] eternal torments: so of sinners and impious [ones], and yet Christians, whose works are to be tried and purged in the fire, let us think [that there will be] a moderated sentence of the judge, and [one] mingled with clemency." →

◊ 6. Right margin: Whether the punishments of hell are at some time to be ended.

◊ 7. Right margin: (a) Romans 11:25–26.

◊ 8. Right margin: (b) Galatians 3:22.

◊ 9. Right margin: (c) Micah 7:9.

◊ 10. Right margin: (d) Isaiah 12:1.

◊ 11. Right margin: (f) Psalm 30:20.

◊ 12. Right margin: Psalm 6:2.

◊ 13. Right margin: Psalm 13:1.

[…continues on folio 604 (PDF p. 421): Sixtus's Catholic resolution of both expositions, defending Jerome against Rufinus (Annotatio CCXXIX).]

---

(printed folio 604 [PDF p. 421]. Annot. CCXXIX–CCXXXII (Isaiah 66:24–Jeremiah 13:12): Sixtus resolves the Isaiah 66:24 crux (both expositions are Origen's, reported not asserted; Jerome holds hell-fire corporeal). Jeremiah begins — Origen on the expiatory fire (Jer 2:22); the oath (Jer 4:2); and whether anyone in this life is truly just (Jer 13:12), where Bodius abuses "no living man shall be justified" and others the "kings of the churches" clause → folio 605.)

(folio 604, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXXIX (continued)

Both of these explanations are so faithfully and word-for-word expressed in the second volume of Origen's works, in the ninth homily on divers passages of Matthew, that I could easily have been persuaded that Jerome translated both from thence — had I not first, by most certain conjectures noted in the preceding book, discovered that that homily is not Origen's. Nevertheless, the dogmas of both expositions are Origenic — proposed by Jerome indeed under another's person, but not confirmed by [his] own assertion. For the impiety of the second interpretation he everywhere detests, as we show below, Annotation 290 of the sixth book; and the error of the former he in many places altogether condemns — especially in the epistle to Avitus, where, enumerating Origen's heresies, he reckons this one too among the others, in these words: "Origen, in book 2 of the Περὰ ἀρχῶν, places the fire of gehenna, and the torments which holy Scripture threatens to sinners, not in punishments, but in the conscience of sinners — when, by the virtue and power of God, all memory of [our] offenses is set before our eyes, and, as it were, from certain seeds left behind in the soul, the whole harvest of vices springs up; and whatsoever we had done in life, whether base or impious, the picture of all these things is portrayed in our sight; and the mind, beholding [its] past pleasures, is punished with the burning of conscience, and pierced through with the goads of penitence." And in the book on the epistle to the Ephesians, book 3, expounding that [saying] from chapter 5, "Let no man deceive you with vain words,"[1] etc., he says: "Because there are very many who say that there are no future punishments for sins, nor torments to be applied from without, but that the very sin and the conscience of the offense is [itself] the punishment — while the worm in the heart dies not, and a fire is kindled in the mind after the likeness of a fever, which does not torment the sick [man] from without, but, seizing the very bodies, punishes [them] without the application of torments from without: these persuasions, therefore, and fraudulent snares, Paul called 'vain and empty words,' which seem to have a certain flower of speech, and to flatter sinners — but, while they give [false] confidence, rather carry them to eternal punishments." From these [passages] it is clear how piously and catholically Jerome held that the fire of hell is corporeal,[2] and that those who are set in it are tormented within and without.

◊ 1. Left margin: Ephesians 5:6.

◊ 2. Left margin: The fire of hell, in Jerome's judgment, is corporeal.

But to those very testimonies of the divine Scripture, which Jerome — because he had elsewhere most fully explained [them] — here left unexplained, it must be said that by these the corporeal and external punishments of the damned are not taken away, but [that] mention is made of the interior and spiritual punishment: the memory and conscience of the damned being tortured with a perpetual goad. For the first and greatest punishment of the reprobate is the scourge of the avenging conscience;[3] next to this is the exterior punishment — namely, fire, sulphur, the spirit of tempests, and the other corporeal torments which the divine Letters everywhere threaten to the impious and impenitent. Consult, on those things which pertain to the reality of the fire of hell, the fortieth Annotation of this book; but on those things which regard the eternity of the same fire, read Jerome's opinion [in] Annotation 290 of book 6.

◊ 3. Left margin: What is the greatest punishment of the damned.

Annotation CCXXX [contents]

"Though thou wash thyself with nitre," etc. — Jeremiah 2:22

The expiatory fire.

Origen, in the thirteenth homily on Jeremiah, expounding this, says that all who sinned after the laver of baptism are to be purged by the fire of the conflagration on the day of judgment. See above, Annotation 167.

Annotation CCXXXI [contents]

"Thou shalt swear, 'The Lord liveth,' in truth." — Jeremiah 4:2

The Oath.

What Jerome held concerning the Oath, expounding this passage, John Arboreus noted in his Theosophia. See below, Annotation 26 of book 6.

Annotation CCXXXII [contents]

"Every bottle shall be filled with wine, and all the kings and priests [shall be filled] with drunkenness." — Jeremiah 13:12

Whether anyone in this life is truly just.

Jerome, in book 3 on Jeremiah, brought forward these things to the elucidation of this passage: "The Prophet shows that we are a fragile vessel, according to the Apostle, saying, 'We have this treasure in earthen vessels'; and that it cannot but be that there is fulfilled in us that which is written, 'There dwelleth no good in my flesh'; and again, 'For the good which I will, this I do not, but the evil which I will not, this I work'; and then, 'Unhappy man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?' But by this drunkenness, by which we forget the precepts of God, and by vices and sins, the whole human condition is filled — the prophet saying, 'No living [man] shall be justified in thy sight' — not in comparison with God (as the old and new heretics, and the patrons of heretics, wish), but in respect of his knowledge. For man sees in the face, God in the heart; and what to us sometimes seems beautiful, is found sordid in his eyes. Not only the ignoble common crowd and the vile populace, but the kings of the churches, who sit upon the throne — the priests themselves also, the second grade in ecclesiastical honor — are filled with the variety of sins."

This passage of Jerome the heretics of our times abuse in two ways. Bodius, in the Collectanea, drags it to the defenses of the Lutherans, who teach that no one — however perfect — is truly just in this life, but that in all [men] sin, worthy of the wrath of God, remains until death. Again, those who impugn the Ecclesiastical power[4] adduce the last clause of this passage against the Sacerdotal power, which they contend must be subjected to the secular magistrate. But both violently wrest these words: for as regards the dignity of the Priest and of the King, we have already shown above — namely, in Annotation 166 — that Jerome here spoke of the Jewish priesthood, not of the Christian. But in the other words of the proposed sentence, we say that Jerome had regard to the human condition, destitute of the grace of God: for no one is just without the aid of divine grace,[5] nor can [anyone] long remain without a deadly crime. But if thou press [the point] that he pronounced these things also of the just, in whom the divine grace is present, infused through the Holy Spirit: we will answer that Jerome must be understood of light and venial errors, and not of deadly and pernicious crimes. For there are many venial vices, from which no one — however just, the holy Virgin excepted — is altogether freed. For there is, even in the saints [who have been] repaired by grace, a certain downward inclination to sinning, from the frailty of the flesh —" →

◊ 4. Right margin: Whether the royal power is inferior to the sacerdotal.

◊ 5. Right margin: No one is just without the aid of divine grace, nor can [anyone] long live without a deadly sin.

[…continues on folio 605 (PDF p. 422): the rest of Sixtus on the inclination to sin remaining in the just (Annotatio CCXXXII).]

---

(printed folio 605 [PDF p. 422]. Annot. CCXXXII–CCXXXIII (Jeremiah 13:12–19:11): whether anyone is truly just closes (the "indwelling sin" of Romans 7 leaves even the just, save the Virgin, with venial faults). Then the great annotation on Chiliasm / Millenarianism (Jer 19:11) — Jerome and Augustine treat it gently yet deride it, sparing the ancient Fathers (Papias, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Lactantius, Victorinus); Sixtus distinguishes the orthodox millenarians' golden age from Cerinthus's carnal fable → folio 606.)

(folio 605, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXXXII (continued)

inclination, which Paul called "indwelling sin," because it arose from sin, and was left, for the punishment of sin, for the contest and exercise of the just;[1] and from this also many venial sins emerge, the just being unwilling. Looking to this, therefore, Paul exclaimed, "Unhappy man that I am," etc.;[2] and, "I know that there dwelleth no good in my flesh," and, "Not the good which I will do I do, but the evil which I will not";[3] and David, directing his mind to the venial but continual errors of the saints, said: "No living [man] shall be justified in thy sight,"[4] if he be examined according to the rigor of the divine justice — because "Seven times a day the just [man] falleth."[5]

◊ 1. Left margin: Romans 7:17.

◊ 2. Left margin: Romans 7:24.

◊ 3. Left margin: Romans 7:18–19.

◊ 4. Left margin: Psalm 142:2.

◊ 5. Left margin: Proverbs 24:16.

Annotation CCXXXIII [contents]

"I will break this people, and this city, as the potter's vessel is broken, which cannot be made whole again." — Jeremiah 19:11

Whether the opinion of the Chiliasts is to be condemned.

Jerome, in book 4 on Jeremiah, so explains this passage that he seems to assert that the error of the χιλιασταί [Chiliasts] — that is, of the Millenarians — is not to be condemned; which [error], nevertheless, very many most holy Fathers condemned, in [the person of] Cerinthus the heresiarch, as a heretical dogma; but [Jerome holds] that it is free to each one to think in this [matter] what he will. For these things we read in him: "Manifestly this is said not of the Babylonian, but of the Roman captivity; for after the Babylonians both the city was restored, and the people brought back into Judaea, and restored to [its] former abundance; but after the captivity under Vespasian and Titus, and [what] afterward befell under Hadrian, unto the consummation of the age, the ruins of Jerusalem shall remain — although the Jews think that a golden and jeweled Jerusalem is to be restored to them, and again victims and sacrifices, and the marriages of the saints, and the kingdom of the Lord Savior on earth: which, though we do not follow, yet we cannot condemn, because many ecclesiastical men and martyrs said these things. And let each one abound in his own sense, and let all things be reserved to the judgment of the Lord."

These things Jerome; who, disclosing by name the asserters of this opinion, says in the book On Illustrious Men: "Papias, the hearer of John, bishop of Hierapolis, is said to have published a Jewish Δευτέρωσις [Deuterosis, a 'second [teaching]'] of a thousand years, whom Irenaeus and Apollinaris followed, and the rest, who say that after the resurrection the Lord will reign in the flesh with the saints. Tertullian also, in the book On the Hope of the Faithful, and Victorinus of Poetovio, are led by this opinion." And in book 11 on Ezekiel, indicating the writings in which the same authors taught this, he says: "For neither, according to the Jewish fables — which they call Deuteroses — do we expect a golden Jerusalem from heaven: which [error] both many of ours, and especially the book of Tertullian which is entitled On the Hope of the Faithful, and the seventh volume of the Institutions of Lactantius, promise; and the frequent expositions of Victorinus of Poetovio; and lately our own Severus, in the dialogue on which he imposed the name Gallus; and — to name the Greeks, and to join the first and the last — Irenaeus and Apollinaris."

Nor does Augustine seem to have shrunk from this opinion of Jerome; who, not daring to call it either a heresy or an error, wrote thus concerning it in the twentieth [book] On the City of God, chapter 7: "This opinion would be in some way tolerable, if some spiritual delights were believed to be about to be present to the saints in that Sabbath — namely, of a thousand years — through the presence of the Lord. For we too once held this opinion." Thus far Augustine.

Know, therefore, that neither Jerome nor Augustine tempered their discourse in this manner in order to show that this opinion is not damnable — which both of them in many places assail and deride[6] — but in order to indicate, by the example of their modesty and benignity, that we too must dissent from the errors of the ancient Fathers of the Church with the highest reverence; and lest they should seem to persecute the many Catholics who were then led by that opinion — which Jerome hints not obscurely in the preface of the eighteenth commentary on Isaiah, in these words: "The Apocalypse of John, if we take [it] according to the letter, we must judaize; if we treat [it] spiritually, as it was written, we shall seem to go contrary to the opinions of many of the ancients — of the Latins, Tertullian, Victorinus, Lactantius; of the Greeks (to pass over the rest), I will make mention only of Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons: against whom that most eloquent man Dionysius, Pontiff of the Alexandrian church, writes an elegant book, deriding the fable of the thousand years, and the golden and jeweled Jerusalem on earth, the restoration of the temple, the blood of victims, the rest of the Sabbath, the injury of circumcision, the marriages, the births, the education of children, the delights of banquets, and the servitude of all the nations; and again wars, armies, and triumphs, and the slaughters of the conquered, and the death of the hundred-year-old sinner — to whom Apollinaris responded in two volumes: whom not only the men of his own sect, but also (in this part only) a very great multitude of ours follows; so that with a foreboding mind I already perceive how great a rage is to be stirred up against me by [these], to whom I bear no envy, if they so love the earth that in the kingdom of Christ they desire earthly things, and, after the abundance of foods and the gluttony of belly and gullet, seek those things which are beneath the belly."

◊ 6. Right margin: The opinion of the Chiliasts is disapproved.

Thus far Jerome, hinting by these words that the opinion of those [millenarians] is not far distant from the dogma of Cerinthus. There are, however, [some] who judge that the two opinions are most widely distant from each other. For Cerinthus, as Eusebius writes in the third book of the Ecclesiastical History, because he was given to the belly, and the gullet, and lust,[7] taught those things which lust dictated to him — decreeing not only that Christ, after the resurrection, would administer a kingdom on earth for a thousand years, but also that in that very kingdom there would be all base pleasures: that is, the foul gluttony of banquets, of the belly, and the most exquisite incitements of those things which are beneath the belly, and certain most base vices of every monstrous and execrable lust. But those [orthodox millenarians], although they thought that Christ — the bodies of the Saints being raised up — would return to the earth and there reign a thousand years, nevertheless believed that there would be in that kingdom no wickedness, nor impiety, nor injustice of evil men, but, on the contrary, an inestimable tranquillity of a most happy and truly golden age, in which the Saints, living in the flesh, would enjoy all the delights of soul and body with the highest innocence, purity, justice, temperance, and piety. Which, that it may become more clear, it pleases [me] to write down here what Lactantius, in the seventh book of the Divine Institutions, has recorded concerning this matter, saying thus:" →

◊ 7. Right margin: To what vices Cerinthus was given.

[…continues on folio 606 (PDF p. 423): the long passage from Lactantius on the millennial reign (Annotatio CCXXXIII).]

---

*(printed folio 606 [PDF p. 423]. Annot. CCXXXIII (continued; Jeremiah 19:11): the long Lactantius passage (*Divine Institutions VII) on the thousand-year reign — Christ ruling the raised just, the gentled beasts, the earth flowing with honey and wine (with Virgil's fourth Eclogue), the Devil bound, then loosed, the last assault, the conflagration, and the general resurrection. Sixtus closes: it still errs against the Gospel (after the resurrection no marriage or food " —as the Angels of God"); the Anabaptists revived it → folio 607.)

(folio 606, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXXXIII (continued)

"The Son of the most high and greatest God will come, that he may judge the living and the dead; and when he shall have blotted out injustice, and executed the greatest judgment, and restored to life the just who were from the beginning, he will dwell among men for a thousand years, and will rule them with a most just governance. Then, those who shall be alive in [their] bodies will not die, but through those same thousand years will beget an infinite multitude, and their offspring will be holy and dear to God. But those who shall be raised from the dead, these shall preside over the living as judges; and the nations shall not be altogether extinguished, but certain [of them] will be left for a victory of God, that they may be triumphed over by the just, and subjugated to a perpetual servitude. About that time also the prince of the Demons, who is the contriver of all evils, will be bound with chains, and will be in custody for the thousand years of the heavenly empire, in which justice shall reign in the world, lest he contrive any evil against the people of God. After his coming, the just shall be gathered together out of every land; and the judgment being finished, the holy city shall be set up in the midst of the earth, in which the founder God himself may dwell with the just [who are] ruling. Then shall be taken away from the world that darkness by which heaven was affronted and obscured; and the Moon shall receive the brightness of the Sun, and shall no more be diminished; but the Sun shall become seven times brighter than it now is. And the earth shall open its fruitfulness, and of its own accord shall bring forth most abundant crops; the rocks of the mountains shall sweat honey, wines shall run down through the streams, and rivers shall overflow with milk; finally the world itself shall rejoice, and all the nature of things shall be glad, snatched away and freed from the dominion of evil, and of impiety, and of crime, and of error. In this time the beasts shall not be nourished with blood, nor the birds by prey; but all things shall be quiet and placid: lions and calves shall stand together at the manger; the wolf shall not seize the sheep; the dog shall not hunt; hawks and eagles shall not harm; infants shall play with serpents. In fine, then shall come to pass those things which the Poets said were done in the golden ages, Saturn then reigning; whose error arose from this, that the Prophets bring forth and pronounce very many things as if already accomplished. For visions were presented by the divine Spirit to their eyes, and those things were seen in their sight as if being done and finished; which prophecies of theirs, when report had gradually spread [them] abroad — since the profane, ignorant of the mystery, knew not in what sense they were said — they thought that all those things had been fulfilled in the ancient ages: which surely could not be done and fulfilled while [mere] man was reigning. But when, the impious religions being blotted out, and crime suppressed, the earth shall be made subject to God,

> The sailor too shall give up the sea, nor shall the nautical pine exchange [its] wares; every land shall bear all things. The ground shall not suffer the harrows, nor the vine the pruning-hook; the sturdy plowman also shall now loose the yokes from the bulls. Then too the field shall grow golden with the soft ear [of grain], and the reddening grape shall hang on the wild brambles, and the hard oaks shall sweat dewy honey. Nor shall wool learn to counterfeit varied colors, but the ram himself in the meadows shall now change his fleece, now to a sweetly-blushing purple, now to a saffron dye; of its own accord scarlet shall clothe the grazing lambs. The she-goats themselves shall bring home their udders swollen with milk, and the herds shall not fear the great lions.

"Men shall therefore live a most tranquil and most abundant life, and shall reign together with God; and the kings of the nations shall come from the ends of the earth with gifts and presents, to adore and honor the great King, whose name shall be illustrious and venerable to all the nations which shall be under heaven, and to the kings who shall rule on the earth. But when the thousand years of the kingdom shall have begun to be ended, the prince of the Demons will be loosed again, and, sent forth from custody, will go out; and he will stir up all the nations which shall then be under the dominion of the just, that they may make war on the holy city; and there shall be gathered from all the globe of the earth an innumerable people of nations, and it shall besiege and surround the city. Then shall come the last wrath of God upon the nations, and he shall vanquish them to the last man. And first he shall shake the earth most violently, and by its motion the mountains of Syria shall be rent, and the hills shall sink down into a chasm, and the walls of all cities shall fall; and God shall fix the Sun for three days, that it set not, and shall inflame it; and there shall descend an excessive heat, and a great burning upon the rebellious and impious peoples; and showers of sulphur, and hailstones of stone, and drops of fire; and their spirits shall melt in the heat, and [their] bodies shall be crushed in the hail; and they themselves shall strike one another with the sword: the mountains shall be filled with corpses, and the fields shall be covered with bones. But the people of God shall, for those three days, be hidden beneath the hollows of the earth, until the wrath of God against the nations, and the final judgment, be ended. Then shall the just go forth from their hiding-places, and shall find all things covered with corpses and bones. But every race of the impious shall utterly perish by the root, nor shall there be any longer any nation in this world, save only the nation of God. Then, for seven whole years, the forests shall be untouched, nor shall wood be cut from the mountains, but the arms of the nations shall be burned; and there shall not even be war, but peace and everlasting rest. But when the thousand years shall have been completed, the world shall be renewed by God, and the heaven shall be folded up, and the earth shall be changed; and God shall transform men into the likeness of the Angels, and they shall be white as snow, and shall dwell forever in the sight of the Almighty, and shall sacrifice to their Lord, and serve [him] forever. At the same time shall come to pass that second and public resurrection of all, in which also the impious shall be raised up to everlasting torments. These are they who worshiped things made by hand, who either knew not, or denied, the Lord and Parent of the world. But their lord [the Devil] also, with his ministers, shall be seized, and condemned to punishment; with whom likewise all the crowd of the impious, for their crimes, in the sight of the Angels and of the just, shall be burned with perpetual fire forever. This is the doctrine of the holy Prophets, which we Christians follow: this is Christian wisdom."

Thus far the opinion of Lactantius, and of the others whom we have commemorated: which, although it be diverse from the dogma of Cerinthus, nevertheless contains an error foreign to the Evangelical doctrine, which teaches that after the resurrection there will be no union of male and female, no use of food and drink, and, finally, no delight of the carnal life — Christ saying, to those who dreamed that there would be carnal marriages after the resurrection: "You err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God: in the resurrection they shall neither marry, nor be married, but shall all be as the Angels of God"[1] — who indeed neither use wives, nor are delighted with banquets, but feed on an invisible food, as Tobias says, which is God:[2] with whose nectar and ambrosia the minds of the blessed are spiritually fed; so that, according to Paul's word, "the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but joy and peace in the Holy Spirit."[3] Frederick Staphylus, in the Epitome of Lutheran Theology, reports that the Anabaptists — the plagues of our times — received this error among their other heresies. A very similar observation thou hast below, in Annotation 347 of the following book.

◊ 1. Right margin: Matthew 22:29–30.

◊ 2. Right margin: Tobit 12:19.

◊ 3. Right margin: Romans 14:17.

---

(printed folio 607 [PDF p. 424]. Annot. CCXXXIV–CCXL (Jeremiah 22:30–Ezekiel 1:12): a chain of Origen-refutations from Jerome on Jeremiah — Christ the "abominated man" torn like a ring from the Father; Jerome on free will (vs. the Lutheran Bodius and Pelagius); the descent of souls into bodies (demons into aerial, men into gross bodies); the Susanna question (Jer 29:22 vs. Daniel 13; Rufinus attacks Jerome); hypocrisy worse than Sodom; and Ezekiel begins → folio 608.)

(folio 607, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXXXIV [contents]

"Write this man abominated, or sterile." — Jeremiah 22:30

On Christ.

Origen, in the fifth book of the Stromata, expounding this wrongly, Jerome censures, in book 4 of the commentaries on Jeremiah, in these words: "Origen refers this passage to Christ — that from the hand of the Father he was torn off like a ring, and sent into the land of captivity, into the vale of tears, and delivered to the cross; his mother also — doubtless — [being] the synagogue captured and cast out; and he does not fear, in commemorating these things, to understand this which follows — 'O earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord: thus saith the Lord, Write this man abominated, or sterile,' and the rest — of the Lord of majesty. But he writes this, lest his disciples dare to deny [it], in the fifth book of the Stromata." These things Jerome against Origen — who, it is credible, brought these things forth (expounding, as he does, allegorically) concerning Christ, in that sense in which Paul dared to say that Christ was made for us sin, a curse, and an execration:[1] that is, an oblation for sin and for the curse, to which we all were liable.

◊ 1. Left margin: In what sense Christ is called sin. — 2 Corinthians 5:21. [The printed margin cites "1 Cor. 5, 21," but the text — "him who knew no sin he made sin for us" — is 2 Corinthians 5:21; the "curse" (maledictum) is from Galatians 3:13.]

Annotation CCXXXV [contents]

"The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream." — Jeremiah 23:28

On free will.

Jerome, in book 4 on Jeremiah, from the interpretation of this clause fell into these words: "Heretics are wont always to promise prosperous things, and to throw open the kingdoms of heaven to sinners, so that they say, 'The kingdoms of heaven are prepared for thee: thou canst imitate the majesty of God, so that thou be without sin; for thou hast received the power of free choice, and the knowledge of the law, through which thou mayst attain what thou wilt' — and they deceive the wretched by flatteries, and especially poor little women laden with sins, who are carried about with every wind of doctrine." This pericope, as is conjectured from the Collectanea of Bodius, the Lutherans usurp, to show that we are heretics — [we] who teach that man received the power of free choice, so that, by divine grace favoring, he can abstain from every deadly fault. Know that Jerome by these words does not reject this our Catholic opinion concerning free will — which everywhere he proclaims, and excellently defends[2] — but condemns the proud and insolent dogma of Pelagius: who, the aid of divine grace being excluded, asserted that man, from the knowledge of the law and from the strength of his own will, could become altogether impeccable in imitation of God, and the possessor also of eternal felicity. And to this especially looks that which Jerome noted against Origen above, Annotation 159.

◊ 2. Left margin: Jerome defends free will.

Annotation CCXXXVI [contents]

"The captivity of Judah, which I have sent out of this place into the land of the Chaldeans, [I will regard] for good." — Jeremiah 24:5

On souls fallen down from heaven.

Origen expounding this allegorically, concerning the descent of Souls into the earth on account of crimes perpetrated in the heavens, Jerome, in book 5 on Jeremiah, refuted [him] with these words: "The allegorical interpreter always dotes in this place, and, wishing to do violence to the historical truth, refers [it] to captives from the heavenly Jerusalem, and [says] that they were transferred into the land of the Chaldeans, and again about to return to their former place — like Jeremiah and the other holy prophets; but that others, who shall have been sinners in this land and in the vale of tears, are about to die." The same [thou hast] above, Annotation 185.

(left column continues into the right column)

Annotation CCXXXVII [contents]

"Thou hast broken chains, or wooden yokes: I will make for them iron yokes." — Jeremiah 28:13

The incarceration of souls.

Origen, discoursing on these things allegorically, said that Souls sinned in the heavens, and that on that account the Souls of demons [were sent down] into aerial, subtler bodies, but the Souls of men into grosser bodies sent down. Jerome reports this, in book 5 on Jeremiah, thus writing: "The allegorical interpreter dotes in this place, calling forks and wooden chains 'ethereal and aerial bodies' — namely of the Demons and of the adverse powers — but 'iron forks or chains' our grosser bodies, which are woven together with nerves and with bones of flesh and veins: so that those who wished, out of the heavenly Jerusalem, according to the quality of [their] sin, to undergo lesser torments, are condemned into the chains of our bodies, and sustain the wailing of infancy, the bonds of swaddling-cloths, and filth, and serve the Devil, the king of Babylon — that is, of this world (Scripture saying, 'The world is set in the malignant one' [1 John 5:19]) — together with the beasts of the earth, which [souls] are bound fast into the bodies of brute animals." See above, Annotation 185.

Annotation CCXXXVIII [contents]

"The Lord make thee like Sedecias and Achab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire." — Jeremiah 29:22

On the history of Susanna. — Daniel 13:52, 56.

Jerome, in commentary 5 on Jeremiah, appended to this passage such an exposition: "The Hebrews say that these two were the presbyters [elders], of whom Daniel says to the one, 'O thou that art grown old in evil days,' and to the other, 'O thou seed of Chanaan, and not of Juda, beauty hath deceived thee: thus did ye to the daughters of Israel, and they for fear conversed with you.' But that which is at present said — 'whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire' — seems to be contrary to the history of Daniel. For he asserts that they were stoned by the people according to the sentence of Daniel; but here it is written that the king of Babylon roasted them in the fire — whence also by very many, and almost all the Hebrews, that [book] is not received, as [being] a fable, nor is it read in their synagogues. For how, they say, could it be that captives should have the power of stoning the princes set over their own prophets? And they affirm this to be more true, which Jeremiah wrote — that the presbyters [elders] were indeed convicted by Daniel, but that the sentence was carried out upon them by the king of Babylon, who over the captives, as victor and lord, held the command." Rufinus, in the second book of the Invectives, accuses Jerome, that under the assumed person of a Jew he confuted the history of Susanna with various arguments. Thou hast these things more fully in Annotations 245 and 250 of this book.

Annotation CCXXXIX [contents]

"The iniquity of my people is greater than the sin of Sodom." — Lamentations 4:6

On hypocrisy.

Strabus, in his Gloss which is called the Ordinary, annotating this clause, said that hypocrisy is a crime far greater than the sin of Sodom. See above, on Isaiah chapter 16, Annotation 227.

Annotation CCXL

"Whither the spirit was to go, thither they went, and returned not when they walked." — Ezekiel 1:12

(the body of this annotation begins on folio 608; the catchword "GRE—" points to Gregory) →

> […continues on folio 608 (PDF p. 425): the exposition of Ezekiel 1:12 (Annotatio CCXL), opening with Gregory.]

---

(printed folio 608 [PDF p. 425]. Annot. CCXL (continued)–CCXLII (Ezekiel 1:12–14:13): whether charity once had can be lost — Gregory and Augustine seem to make it unlosable, Aquinas resolves (unlosable in its essence, but easily lost on the side of the mutable will); whether one sin is remitted without another (Gregory on Amos 4:7, tempered by Aquinas); and Origen's fancy that the earth is a rational animal → folio 609.)

(folio 608, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXL (continued) [contents]

"Whither the spirit was to go, thither they went, and returned not when they walked." — Ezekiel 1:12

Gregory, in homily 5 on Ezekiel, so interprets this passage that he seems to assert that charity once had cannot be lost.[1] For he says: "They returned not when they walked: because the elect indeed so go to good things, that they return not to the perpetrating of evils." And, after many things, expounding that, "A splendor of fire running about in the midst of the animals,"[2] he says: "The running-about and the mobility can be understood thus. For in the hearts of the saints, according to certain virtues, [charity] always remains; but according to certain [others], it comes as one about to withdraw, and, about to come [again], withdraws. For in faith, hope, and charity, and the other good things — without which the heavenly country cannot be attained, such as humility, chastity, justice, and mercy — it deserts not the hearts of the perfect. But in the virtue of prophecy, in the eloquence of doctrine, in the exhibition of miracles, it is sometimes present to its elect, sometimes withdraws itself. In these virtues, therefore, without which life is by no means attained, the Holy Spirit remains in the hearts of his elect — whence rightly it is called stable; but in these, through which sanctity is demonstrated, it is sometimes mercifully present, sometimes mercifully withdraws."

◊ 1. Left margin: Whether charity once had can be lost.

◊ 2. Left margin: Ezekiel 1:13.

Likewise, in homily 11 on Matthew chapter 13: "Strong," he says, "is love as death:[3] because, namely, as death destroys the body, so charity — for [the sake of] eternal life — slays the love of corporeal things; for whom it has perfectly absorbed, it renders as it were insensible to earthly, outward desires." Again, in homily 30 on chapter 14 of John, he says: "Never is the love of God idle: for it works great things, if it be great; but if it has refused to work, it is not love."

◊ 3. Left margin: Song of Songs 8:6.

In this opinion it is believed that Augustine also was, in treatise 3 on the first epistle of John — where, explaining that [saying] from chapter 2 of the same epistle, "The unction which we have received from him, let it abide in us,"[4] etc., he says: "The invisible Unction is the Holy Spirit; the invisible unction is charity — which, in whomsoever it shall be, will be like that root which cannot dry up under a burning Sun. For everything which is rooted is nourished by the heat of the Sun, and dries not." And, in the eighth treatise on the same epistle: "It is rooted," he says, "[this] charity: be secure, nothing evil can proceed." That opinion also — "The charity which could be deserted was never true" — Gratian cites, [in the treatise] On Penance, distinction 2, from a certain epistle of Augustine to Julianus the count, which is now not found among his epistles. To this sense looks what, from the commentaries of Ambrose on the sixth chapter of the second epistle to the Corinthians, the same Gratian alleges: "Feigned is the charity which deserts in adversity"; or, as it is read in Ambrose himself: "Simulated is the charity in those who, in [time of] necessity, desert [their] brethren." To the same [point] pertains what Bede, in the exposition of the first epistle of John, chapter 1, gathered from the Rhapsodies of Gregory in these words: "It must be noted that the Holy Spirit always remained in the Lord; but in holy men, as long as they bear the mortal body, partly it remains forever, partly, about to return, it withdraws. For it remains with them, that they may insist upon good acts, love voluntary poverty, embrace cleanness of heart and the tranquillity of peace, fear not to suffer persecution, insist upon almsgivings, prayers, fastings, and the other fruits of the Spirit. But it withdraws for a time, lest they should always have the faculty of healing the sick, of raising the dead, or even of prophesying. It abides always, that they may be able to have the virtues, and that they themselves may live marvelously; it comes at [set] times, that they may also shine forth to others, through the signs of miracles, [showing] of what sort they are within."

◊ 4. Left margin: 1 John 2:27.

(left column continues into the right column)

Peter Lombard, in the third book of the Sentences, distinction 31, writes that there were certain persons who, having taken from these opinions an occasion of erring, affirmed that Charity can neither be had by those who are to be damned, nor, when once had, be lost by those who are to be saved. St. Thomas, in the second [part of the] question 24, article 11, paving a way to the understanding of these passages, says that charity, which here on earth can be had, comes into consideration in three ways:[5] either in its own essence, or as it proceeds from its author, or as it is received by the recipient. If we inspect it according to the two former modes of contemplating, then, according to the proposed opinions of the Fathers, it must be pronounced that

Charity is altogether unlosable [inamissible] — both because God himself, the author of Charity, offers to no one an occasion of losing Charity, and because Charity itself, indefectible by its own nature, cannot destroy itself. But if we regard Charity on the part of the recipients, whose disposition is various and always mutable, there is no doubt that Charity, on account of the free and unstable will of men, can easily be lost.[6]

◊ 5. Right margin: Charity is considered in three ways.

◊ 6. Right margin: Why charity is lost.

Annotation CCXLI [contents]

"Thus saith the Lord: If perhaps they will hear, and be quiet," etc. — Ezekiel 3:11

Whether one sin is remitted without another. — Amos 4:7.

Gregory, in homily 10 on Ezekiel, cursorily running over that saying of Amos chapter 4, "I rained upon one city, and upon another I rained not," etc., seems to hint that to penitents one sin is sometimes remitted, another not remitted. For thus he speaks: "When the very [man] who hears the preachers corrects himself of some vices, and disdains to amend of others, one and the same city is partly rained upon and partly remains dry — [that part] in which it repels from itself the rain of preaching. For there are certain [men] who do not at all hear the words of exhortation: these utterly refuse to receive the rain. And there are certain who hear, but nevertheless do not follow this marrow [inwardly]: because they cut off some vices in themselves, but in others [vices] they grievously persist." St. Thomas, in the third part of the Summa, question 86, article 3, thus writes: "The word of Gregory is not to be understood as to the remission of the fault, but as to the cessation from the act: because sometimes he who was accustomed to commit several sins deserts one, [but] not however another — which [desertion] is indeed done by divine help, which nevertheless does not reach unto the remission of the fault."

Annotation CCXLII [contents]

"When a land shall have sinned against me, so as to transgress by transgressing." — Ezekiel 14:13

Whether the earth is an animal capable of reason.

Origen, in homily 4 on Ezekiel, from the interpretation of this sentence attempts to establish that the earth is an animal endowed with sense and reason, capable of virtue and of vice, of reward and of punishment. His sayings, summarily excerpted, are these: "Reviewing the most ample forest of Scripture, I am constrained to suspect that this earth which we behold is an animal — receiving proofs taken from [what is said] concerning the earth: [namely] from, 'Who looketh upon the earth, and maketh it tremble';[7] and, 'The earth is offended by those who dwell in it'; and, 'The earth shall take complacency in its sabbaths';[8] likewise from, 'Attend, O heaven, and I will speak; and let the earth hear the words of my mouth';[9] and…" →

◊ 7. Right margin (a): Psalm 103:32.

◊ 8. Right margin (b): Leviticus 26:34.

◊ 9. Right margin (c): Deuteronomy 32:1.

[…continues on folio 609 (PDF p. 426): the rest of Origen's proofs that the earth is a rational animal (Annotatio CCXLII).]

(printed folio 609 [PDF p. 426]. Annot. CCXLII (continued)–CCXLIV (Ezekiel 14:13–44:20): Origen's proof-texts that the earth is a rational animal, answered by Chrysostom (all prosopopoeia); Origen's "imitate no one but Christ" turned against monks who imitate Basil, Benedict, Dominic, Francis (Sixtus: in the saints we imitate only Christ in them); and clerical tonsure and beard — Jerome abused by the apostate Hortensius Landus's mocking On the Persecution of Beards → folio 610.)

(folio 609, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXLII (continued)

"When a land shall have sinned against me, so as to transgress by transgressing." — Ezekiel 14:13

(the excerpt from Origen continues:) "…and Jeremiah: 'Earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord.'[1] And Paul: 'Every creature groaneth together and travaileth.'[2] If every creature groaneth and travaileth, and part of the creatures is earth and heaven, and every creature shall be freed from the servitude of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God — who knows also concerning the earth, whether according to its own nature it be held liable to some sin? whether it be an animal, whether rational, whether it needs the hearing of the prophetic word — [Scripture] saying, 'Attend, O heaven, and let it speak; and let the earth hear the words of my mouth,'[3] and, 'Hear, O heaven, and give ear, O earth'[4] — why should we not say that, as there is to be a judgment of men and of Angels, so there shall be a judgment of the air and of the earth? But if thou thinkest that we ought not to consent to this disputation, through which we assert that every creature is to be judged, hear yet another testimony concerning the earth, [addressed] to Cain: 'Cursed [be] the earth, which hath opened its mouth to receive the blood of thy brother from thy hand;'[5] likewise, 'Cursed [be] the earth in thy works;'[6] likewise, concerning the coming of the Lord it is written, 'All the earth crieth out with joy.'[7] For it is capable, as an animal, according to the qualities of the portions of good acts and of evil, in which it either merits praise or punishment. When therefore it is said, 'The land which shall have sinned against me,' a certain mystery is signified; for one thing is said concerning the inhabitants, another concerning it [the land] which is inhabited. 'Heaven and earth shall pass away'[8]: why does heaven pass over? why does the earth pass away, except because their passing has merited certain worthy things? And in another place, 'Corrupt,' it says, 'is all the earth.'[9] When was it corrupted? before the flood — not because it was corrupted through the inundation of the deluge. I could also interpret it otherwise, that the earth sometimes offends: for the earth is our soul, as is signified in the parable of the Gospel; but since here it is added, 'And I will take away from it man and beast,'[10] [it is] one thing [that is] earth, another man: for it does not now name the inhabitants of the earth for the earth, as some think; for if it wished the inhabitants of the earth to be taken by [the word] "earth," it would have been superfluous to say, "I will take away from it man and beast.""

◊ 1. Left margin (d): Jeremiah 22:29.

◊ 2. Left margin (e): Romans 8:22.

◊ 3. Left margin (a): Deuteronomy 32:1.

◊ 4. Left margin (b): Isaiah 1:2.

◊ 5. Left margin (c): Genesis 4:11.

◊ 6. Left margin (d): Genesis 3:17.

◊ 7. Left margin (e): Psalm 95:1 and 99:1.

◊ 8. Left margin (f): Luke 21:33.

◊ 9. Left margin (g): Genesis 6:11.

◊ 10. Left margin (h): Genesis 6:13.

These things Origen — or rather the corrupter of Origen. To whom, according to the opinion of Chrysostom, we respond that all the aforesaid testimonies are to be accommodated to the earth through prosopopoeia — that is, through the fashioning of a person.[11] For the divine writers are wont, that the discourse may become more significant, to feign animated persons for inanimate things — introducing now rivers clapping with [their] hands,[12] now hills leaping, now mountains skipping[13] — not that we should think these to be animated, nor that we should attribute to them any cogitation, but that we may understand how great is the amplitude of the goods proposed, so that it may reach even to those things which lack sense. This same thing they do also in troublesome matters, introducing both a lamenting life, and mountains, and the wailing ceilings of the temple, that from this too we may reckon the gravity of evils.

◊ 11. Left margin: Prosopopoeia is frequent in the Scriptures.

◊ 12. Left margin: Psalm 97:8.

◊ 13. Left margin: Psalm 113:4.

In this same homily of Origen, about seventy lines far from the beginning, read cautiously that which he says: "That some of the Angels are those who transgress, others who do not transgress, and both are to be judged in the day of judgment according to their works."

Annotation CCXLIII [contents]

"Taking of my garments, thou hast made to thyself high places." — Ezekiel 16:16

Not only Christ is to be imitated. — Matthew 23:2–3.

Origen, in homily 7 on Ezekiel, when he was expounding this particle, cursorily proceeded to the explanation of Christ's sentence from Matthew: "Upon the chair of Moses have sat the Scribes and Pharisees: all things whatsoever they say to you, hear and do; but according to their works do not [do]: for they say, and do not. This discourse is about me, who teach good things and do the contrary, and am a seat upon the chair of Moses, as a scribe and Pharisee. The precept is to thee, O people: if thou shalt not have ground of accusation — [namely] the worst doctrine, foreign to the dogmas of the Church — but shalt behold my culpable life and sins, [thou art bidden] not to order thy life according to [me] who speak, but to do those things which I shall speak: let us imitate no one; and if we wish to imitate anyone, Christ is set before us for imitation."

This passage, as is gathered from the Collectanea of Hermann, the heretics twist against Catholics — especially against monks, who imitate Basil, Benedict, Dominic, Francis, and the other founders of the monastic life — as if it were not enough to imitate the one Christ, whom Paul sets before us as the sole exemplar of imitation, saying: "Be ye imitators of Christ."[14] To whom it must be responded: We, when we imitate the saints, imitate in the saints no other than Christ, dwelling and living in the saints — Paul saying, "I live, now not I; but Christ liveth in me."[15] Nor do we imitate the saints in any other way than [in imitating] him whom Paul — in whom Christ was speaking — set before us, saying, "Be ye imitators of me, as I also [am] of Christ"[16] — that is, in so far as the saints themselves imitate Christ. To this sense, therefore, are the proposed words of Origen brought forth.

◊ 14. Right margin: Ephesians 5:1.

◊ 15. Right margin: Galatians 2:20.

◊ 16. Right margin: 1 Corinthians 4:16 and 11:1.

Annotation CCXLIV [contents]

"The priests shall not shave their head." — Ezekiel 44:20

Whether clerics ought to have beard or hair shorn.

Jerome's explanation, appended to this passage, the heretics of our times usurp against the ecclesiastical Traditions concerning the shaving off of the hair and beard of priests. Of their number, a certain Hortensius Landus [Ortensio Lando], a deserter of the Augustinian profession, put out a booklet peculiar to this argument, prefaced with a title impiously enough jocose — On the Persecution of Beards[17] — in which, with various and shameless jests, revilings, and blasphemies, he attacks the Clerics, and especially the monks, who observe the religious institute of shaving the crown and the chin; wresting against them several testimonies of divine Scripture, and the sayings of Catholic interpreters — among which is the explanation of the proposed clause, expressed by Jerome in the thirteenth commentary on Ezekiel in these words: "But that which follows — 'They shall not shave their head,' etc.[18] — plainly demonstrates that we ought not, like the priests and worshippers of Isis and Serapis, [to be] with shaven heads, nor again to let down the hair — which is properly luxurious and barbarian — but that the honorable habit of priests should be shown by the countenance; and that baldness is not to be made by the razor, nor the head to be shorn so close that we seem to be like shaven men, but the hair to be let down only so far that the skin be covered." And after a few [words]: "The superstition of the gentiles has shaven heads; but I do not think that any of the Gentiles abstains from wine." Again, in book six on Isaiah, elucidating that, "In all heads [there shall be] baldness, and every beard shall be shaven,"[19] etc., he says: "If virility was seen to be had in the beard, [then], with it shaved off from an ecclesiastical man, he is proved effeminate and weak." And again, in book three on Isaiah, expounding that threat of God, "In that day the Lord shall shave with a razor,"[20] etc.: "Therefore," he says, "with that most sharp razor — that is, in the king of the Syrians [Assyrians] — all the hairs, and the comeliness of the beard (which is a sign of virility), the Lord shall shave from Judaea, that nothing in that" → ◊ 17. Right margin: A booklet of the heretic on the persecution of beards.

◊ 18. Right margin: Ezekiel 44:20.

◊ 19. Right margin: Isaiah 15:2. [The quoted words — "in all heads baldness, every beard shaved" — are Isaiah 15:2.]

◊ 20. Right margin: Isaiah 7:20.

[…continues on folio 610 (PDF p. 427): the rest of Jerome on Isaiah 7:20 and the shaving of the beard (Annotatio CCXLIV).]

---

(printed folio 610 [PDF p. 427]. Annot. CCXLIV (continued) (Ezekiel 44:20): the beard-and-tonsure defense continues — Jerome on Isaiah 7:20, Epiphanius, and Clement of Alexandria on the beard; then Sixtus's rebuttal of Hortensius (shearing is warranted by God, the Church, and nature — Paul and Chrysostom on hair as the badge of male rule; the Nazarites, Ezekiel's razor, Paul's vow-shavings; the tonsure traced from the Nazarites through the Apostles) → folio 611.)

(folio 610, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXLIV (continued)

"The priests shall not shave their head." — Ezekiel 44:20

(Jerome on Isaiah 7:20 concludes:) "…that nothing in that [Judaea] perchance remain beautiful, but that it be compared to effeminate men, nay to ignominious women."

To this sentence of Jerome is annexed another, of Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, who, in the third volume of the Panarion, contending against the Massalians [Messalians], affirms that it was sanctioned by the Apostles, by the authority of divine Scripture, that the beard should not be shaved. His words are these: "Brethren who live in the monasteries throughout Mesopotamia — what is worse — cut off the beard, the form [mark] of a man, but often nourish the hair of the head. And yet concerning the beard indeed the divine Scripture says, in the Constitutions and the doctrine of the Apostles: 'Thou shalt not corrupt' — that is, 'Thou shalt not cut off the hairs of the beard,[1] nor after the manner of a harlot make thyself wild on account of [thy] hair.'"

◊ 1. Left margin: Leviticus 19:27.

There is joined to Epiphanius Clement of Alexandria, presbyter, the preceptor of Origen,[2] in the third book of the Paedagogus, chapter 11, thus writing: "The hairs of men — lest they be too much let down from the head — glide into a womanish mane; for to men the beard suffices; because, if anyone also trim the beard somewhat, yet it is not to be altogether denuded: for it is a base spectacle, and a beard shorn down to the skin does not seem to be far from plucking and laceration. For the psalmographer [was] delighted with a beard as with a mane, [saying,] 'As the ointment,' he says, 'which descends into the beard, the beard of Aaron[3] — who, with the beard by [its] doubling adorning [him], praised the comeliness, [and] gladdened the countenance with the ointment of the Lord. The hairs, therefore, are to be shorn — not with the razor, for this is illiberal, but with the scissors of barbers. But the hairs of the beard, which bring no annoyance, are not to be vexed, as [those] which bring a gravity to the countenance, and strike in a certain paternal awe."

◊ 2. Left margin: Clement of Alexandria was the teacher of Origen.

◊ 3. Left margin: Psalm 132:2.

These sayings of the Fathers, Hortensius confirms with the authorities of divine Scripture — by which he not only reproves this custom of shaving, but also blames that form of shearing which the clerics now use, the head being shorn in the manner of a crown [the tonsure]. And [he says] that concerning shaving indeed it is written, by prohibition, in Ezekiel: [a] "The priests shall not shave their head";[4] and concerning Samuel the priest: [b] "A razor shall not pass over his head all the days of his life";[5] and in Numbers, to him who has consecrated himself to God, it is said: [c] "A razor shall not pass over his head all the time of his consecration";[6] and in Leviticus it is commanded to all: [d] "You shall not shave your beard, nor shall you make marks upon you";[7] whence also, in the epistle of Jeremiah [in Baruch], the Prophet, detesting the rite of the priests of Babylon shaving [their] head and beard, says: [e] "In the houses of the idols the priests sit, having torn tunics, and their head and beard shaven, whose heads are bare."[8] But concerning the circular shearing of the head, he says that God commanded in Leviticus: [f] "You shall not shear your hair round, nor shave your beard";[9] and in Jeremiah God, threatening dispersion to the contemners of this law, says: [g] "I will disperse into every wind those who are shorn round in [their] hair."[10]

◊ 4. Left margin (a): Ezekiel 44:20.

◊ 5. Left margin (b): 1 Samuel [1 Kings] 1:11.

◊ 6. Left margin (c): Numbers 6:5.

◊ 7. Left margin (d): Leviticus 19:27–28.

◊ 8. Left margin (e): Baruch 6:30. [The "epistle of Jeremiah," Baruch chapter 6.]

◊ 9. Left margin (f): Leviticus 19:27.

◊ 10. Left margin (g): Jeremiah 9:26. [The wording quoted — "I will disperse into every wind those shorn round in hair" — corresponds most closely to Jeremiah 49:32.]

And these are [the things] which that uncowled deserter [transfuga] brought into his booklet against the sacred custom of shearing and shaving — before approved by himself for a long time — intermixed with jests, gibes, and impure fables; to whom we briefly respond that neither by divine laws, nor by any decrees of the Fathers, is the shearing or shaving of the head and the chin simply prohibited; but, on the contrary, we assert that the custom of shearing was received both from God, and from the Church, and in a manner from the very laws of nature herself.

(left column continues into the right column)

For, writing concerning the natural law of shearing, Paul, in the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, says: "Nature itself teaches you, that if a man nourish [long] hair, it is an ignominy to him; but if a woman nourish [long] hair, it is a glory to her: because the hairs are given to her for a veil; and it is base for a woman to be shorn, or made bald."[11] Expounding which words, Chrysostom says: "Nature has given to the human race, even in the dressing of the hairs, a presidency [rule], and the symbols of subjection. For it bade the man, with the hair cut, to display with a free and uncovered head the sign of principality; but the woman it willed to wear the hair [long], as a certain veil of submission, and a mark of servitude. As, therefore, a woman — if, with hair cut off and head bared, she shall have usurped the man's symbol against the order of nature — disfigures herself; so a man, if — the dignity of his power being neglected — he shall have assumed the womanish [long] hair, shall affect himself with ignominy, bearing the mark of servitude and the token of an effeminate soul. Since, therefore, men are all persuaded by the instinct of nature to the shearing of the hair, how much more consentaneous is it that Priests — who, in the dignity of [their] office and by the example of [their] life, ought to preside over the rest — should bear about the insignia of virile presidency, with the womanish hair shorn?"

◊ 11. Right margin: 1 Corinthians 11:14–15.

But that God very often commanded the shearing of the hair and beard, and the shaving [abrasion], the sacred letters teach us — in which it is written that the Nazarites, the hair being first kept [grown], at length, after a great continence of life, shaved the head, and were bidden to put the hairs into the fire of the sacrifice;[12] that by this visible sign they might be admonished to cut away from themselves all the superfluous goods of the present life (which are signified by the superfluities of the hairs of the human body), and to sacrifice [them] in the service of God. This also we read to have been commanded to Ezekiel the prophet and priest, God saying to him: "Thou, son of man, take to thyself a sharp razor, shaving the hairs, and thou shalt lead it over [thy] head, and over thy beard."[13] And in the Acts of the Apostles, Luke committed to memory that Priscilla and Aquila, the vow of the Nazarites being undertaken, shaved the hair in Cenchreae, the port of the Corinthians;[14] and that the same [was] done, not long after, at Jerusalem, by Paul, at the exhortation of James the Apostle, together with very many other disciples of Christ.[15]

◊ 12. Right margin: Numbers 6:18.

◊ 13. Right margin: Ezekiel 5:1.

◊ 14. Right margin: Acts 18:18.

◊ 15. Right margin: Acts 21:24, 26.

Moreover, that this very thing was established by Ecclesiastical sanctions from the very beginning of the nascent Church, Isidore, bishop of Hispalis [Seville], is witness, in the second book On Ecclesiastical Offices, chapter four, thus writing: "The use of the ecclesiastical tonsure — arisen, if I err not, from the Nazarites — was introduced into the Church by the Apostles, that those who, dedicated to divine worship, should be consecrated to the Lord as Nazarites (that is, saints of God), might be renewed with the hair cut off." Which sentence of Isidore, that it is true, the epistle of Anicetus the pontiff [pope] confirms — written not long from the times of the Apostles to the bishops of Gaul — in which also these things, among the rest, are had: "Prohibit, brethren, throughout all the Churches of your regions, that Clerics — who ought to be an example of virtue, honesty, chastity, and gravity to the laity and the simple, and prudently to exhibit themselves, as a sign of a purer life, to the ruder [sort] for imitation — should, according to the Apostle, not nourish the hair [long], but should shave the head above in the manner of a sphere: because, as they ought to be set apart in [their] manner of life, so also in the tonsure, and in every habit, ought they to appear set apart." There is extant also, in the fourth Council of Carthage — which, in the year of our salvation 416," →

[…continues on folio 611 (PDF p. 428): the Fourth Council of Carthage and the rest of the tonsure argument (Annotatio CCXLIV).]

---

(printed folio 611 [PDF p. 428]. Annot. CCXLIV (continued) (Ezekiel 44:20): the tonsure defense concludes — the Councils (Carthage IV, Toledo IV) and Isidore's four causes of the tonsure (the "royal priesthood," 1 Pet 2:9); Bede on the shaven beard as a memorial of humility; then Sixtus's two classes of proof-texts — those binding only the Nazarites and Levites, and those condemning only pagan-imitating or effeminate shaving (Caesar, Otho) → folio 612.)

(folio 611, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXLIV (continued)

"The priests shall not shave their head." — Ezekiel 44:20

(the Fourth Council of Carthage, held in the year of our salvation 416, continues:) was collected [held], the canon numbered forty-fourth, in these words:[1] "Clerics shall neither nourish the hair, nor the beard." It is had likewise, in the fourth synod of Toledo (celebrated a thousand years ago from now), another canon, forty-second in order, prescribing the form and figure of the ecclesiastical tonsure in this manner: "Let all clerics, or readers, like the levites and priests, the head being shorn entirely above, leave below only the crown of a circle [the ring]; not as hitherto the readers in the parts of Galicia are seen to do, who, with prolix [hair], like laics, shear a slight little circle only on the top of the head. For this rite hitherto in the Spains was of the heretics; whence it behooves that, for cutting off scandal from the Churches, this sign of dishonor be taken away, and that there be one tonsure, or habit, as is the use of all Spain. But he who shall not have kept this shall be guilty [of an offense] against the Catholic faith."

◊ 1. Left margin: What was the form and figure of the ecclesiastical tonsure.

Isidore of Hispalis [Seville], in the book which we just now cited, referring the causes of the ecclesiastical tonsure, says that the Church instituted this in the first place,[2] that, as clerics ought to be distinct from the laics in the manner of living, and conspicuous among them by probity of life, so by a certain distinct cultivation of the head it behooved them to be discerned from the rest of the seculars — which also the decree of Anicetus openly indicates, saying, "that, as they ought to be distinct from others in [their] conversation, so let them be distinct in the tonsure and habit."

◊ 2. Left margin: The cause of the ecclesiastical tonsure.

Secondly, that clerics by this external symbol of the shorn head might be taught that they should bear within, in the mind (whose seat the head is said to be), that which it would be right [to bear] — that is, to cut away the superfluous cares of the flesh (which the superfluity of the hairs adumbrates) together with the hairs; and to cast away crimes [sins] with the tresses; and to lay aside the carnal and womanish mind together with the carnal and womanish hair; and to impose a new and virile mind, virilely, upon the shorn head.

Thirdly, that in the Clerics the insignia of each dignity — namely, the royal and the sacerdotal — might be beheld. For as in the old Law the Priests placed upon the head the tiara (that is, a little cap having the figure of a half-sphere), but the kings girded [their] temples with a golden crown: so now the upper portion of the head, shorn to the likeness of a hemispherical tiara, displays the sacerdotal dignity; but the garland of hairs, led round the temples in the manner of a crown, represents the likeness of royal majesty — so that plainly that sentence of Peter may suit the clerics: "You are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood."[3]

◊ 3. Left margin: 1 Peter 2:9.

Fourthly, Germanus, bishop of Constantinople, in the explanation of the divine Liturgy, and Bede the presbyter in [his] history, add a fourth cause of a rite of this kind: that, when the Jews, in contumely of the Christian name, had shaved Peter — preaching at Antioch — in the upper part of the head, the later pontiffs and bishops, imposing upon their own heads, for the sake of humility, the ignominy inflicted upon Peter, changed it into an ornament and glory of the Christian priesthood. And these, they report, were the causes of the shearing of the head.

The reason for shaving the beard, Bede, in the commentaries on Ezra, says was instituted for the recollection of humility[4] — namely, lest men dedicated to God should be extolled into pride by the magnitude or multitude of their virtues. For since the beard, which is [a mark] of the virile sex and of age, signifies the right hand, fortitude, prudence, and the other virtues worthy of a perfect man — therefore holy men are bidden to cut it off, or shave it away, that from this they may understand that they ought to cast away all confidence in their own virtue, and to remember that their virtues, howsoever great and many, are mingled with vices, and that accordingly they are few and small, or almost none, if they be examined by the scrutiny of the divine equity — David saying: "Enter not into judgment with thy servant, O Lord, because no living [man] shall be justified in thy sight";[5] and Job: "If I wish to justify myself, and to show myself innocent, God will prove me depraved."[6] From these, therefore, it is manifest that the tonsure is not only approved by the Divine and Ecclesiastical Laws, but is even enjoined for many and just causes.

◊ 4. Left margin: Why priests shave the beard.

(left column continues into the right column)

◊ 5. Right margin: Psalm 142:2.

◊ 6. Right margin: Job 9:20.

But, that we may respond to those [testimonies] which seem to shake this determination, it must be known that those [things] which Hortensius brought against us are distinguished in a twofold order. In the first are placed the testimonies of Scripture, which do not interdict shaving or shearing to all persons, and everywhere, and always, but to certain persons, places, and times — that is, only to the Nazarites, until they should fulfill [their] vow, or only to the Levites, until they should tarry in the holy land, and while the temple at Jerusalem stood, in which alone they could sacrifice, and exercise the other things pertaining to the sacrifice. For there, and for that time, and to the priests alone, God commanded that they should not shave the head and beard, that they might be as far as possible from the superstition of the neighboring nations — whose priests, as is read in the epistle of Jeremiah,[7] with head and chin shaven, sacrificed to the idols. But now neither do the priests of the Jews, cast out of Palestine, abstain from shaving, nor are the Christian priests prohibited from it — whom Christ, by his death, freed from the laws of the ancient priesthood. To this order, therefore, pertain [those things] which God imposed upon the Nazarites in the book of Numbers,[8] and commanded concerning shaving to the priests, whether through Moses, or through Ezekiel, or through the other prophets.

◊ 7. Right margin: Baruch 6:30.

◊ 8. Right margin: Numbers 6:5.

In the second order are the oracles of the Scriptures and the sayings of the covenant, which seem to prohibit shearing and shaving — when nevertheless they forbid neither, but only restrain the perverse intention, and the depraved custom of those shearing and shaving: of whom some, persuaded by a vain superstition, shaved themselves in imitation of the gentile priests; others, led by a certain womanish softness, shaved the beard, that they might make themselves effeminate — as Suetonius relates concerning certain Roman Emperors: that Julius Caesar shaved the beard with such diligence and fastidiousness that he even plucked out the hairs, not without reproach; but that Otho daily shaved the face, and smeared [it] with moist bread, and instituted this from the first down [of youth], that he might never be bearded. Such an impious use, therefore, and the wicked custom of shaving and shearing, Jerome, Clement, Epiphanius, and the apostolic — nay, the divine — law condemn: [the law] cited by Epiphanius from chapter 19 of Leviticus: "You shall not shear the hair round, nor shave the beard."[9] For thus does Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus [Cyrrhus], explain it, in question 28 on Leviticus, saying: "Certain [interpreters] — that which the Seventy rendered, 'You shall not make a σισόην [sisoe, a curl] out of the hair of your head, nor…'" → ◊ 9. Right margin: Leviticus 19:27.

[…continues on folio 612 (PDF p. 429): Theodoret's explanation of Leviticus 19:27 and the rest of the tonsure argument (Annotatio CCXLIV).]

---

(printed folio 612 [PDF p. 429]. Annot. CCXLIV (concl.)–CCXLV (Ezekiel 44:20–Daniel 1:1): the tonsure annotation closes — Theodoret and Cardinal Cajetan on the Hebrew of Leviticus 19:27 (only the pe'ot, not shaving as such). Daniel begins — Jerome's preface on the apocryphal appendices (Susanna, the Hymn, Bel and the Dragon) and the Jewish teacher's cavils; Daniel ranked among the Hagiographa; then Rufinus's three charges and Jerome's reply from the Invectives → folio 613.)

(folio 612, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXLIV (concluded)

"The priests shall not shave their head." — Ezekiel 44:20

(Theodoret continues:) "'...corrupting your face [with] your beard' they have interpreted [as] 'the hairs made curly of set purpose.' But I think that something else is interdicted by the law: for it is the custom among the Greeks, in boys, not to shear the extremities of the hairs, but to let the hairs grow long, and some time after to dedicate them to the Demons. They were wont also to shave the beard when they mourned someone, and to cut the cheeks in honor of the dead; and moreover they pierced some parts of the body with a needle, and clothed [themselves] in black in reverence of the Demons. These things, therefore, are interdicted by the divine law."

But Thomas, the presbyter Cardinal [Cajetan], thinks that no mention of the tonsure is made here; for thus he writes in the commentaries: "In the Hebrew is had לא תקפו פאת ראשכם [Lo thakkiphu peath roschem], that is, 'You shall not round the corner of your head.' Nothing is said of shearing, but of rounding; and I would believe that the superstition of the garlands is restrained, which garlanded the heads of those celebrating the sacred [rites] of the Gods: for, crowned with a circle of the ivy sacred to Bacchus, they celebrated [them], as the book of Maccabees relates. Nor 'shalt thou shave the beard' — in Hebrew ולא תשחית את פאת זקנך [Ve lo thaschid eth peath zechanecha], that is, 'And thou shalt not destroy the corner of thy beard.' There is interdicted, to the letter, the total shaving of the corners of the beard; and there are called 'corners of the beard,' as the Hebrews testify, the uppermost parts of the beard, which are joined to the temples; and to this day the Hebrews keep these corners hairy, although they shave the rest of the beard."

Annotation CCXLV [contents]

"In the third year of the reign of Joachim," etc. — Daniel 1:1

On the Appendix of Daniel.

Jerome, in the preface of the translation on Daniel, giving [his] opinion concerning the parts of the book of Daniel, thus writes: "These things I therefore relate, that I might show you the difficulty of Daniel — which, among the Hebrews, has neither the history of Susanna, nor the hymn of the three children, nor the fables of Bel and the dragon; which we, because they are dispersed throughout the whole world, having prefixed a spit [obelus], and stabbing them through, subjoined [appended], lest we should seem, among the unskilled, to have cut off a great part of the volume. I heard, therefore, a certain one of the teachers of the Jews, when he derided the history of Susanna, and said that it had been fabricated by some Greek or other, to object that which the African [Julius Africanus] also opposed to Origen: [namely] that these etymologies — ἀπὸ τοῦ σχίνου, σχίσαι [from the mastic-tree, to split], and ἀπὸ τοῦ πρίνου, πρῖσαι [from the holm-oak, to saw][1] — descend from the Greek speech; of which matter we can give this understanding to our [readers]: that, for example, we might say concerning the holm-tree [ilex] that [the judge] said to him, 'Straightway mayest thou perish' [ilico pereas], and 'from the mastic [lentisco] into a lentil [lentem] may the Angel crush thee'; or, 'Mayest thou not perish gently, or slowly [lentus]' — that is, 'flexible mayest thou be led to death'; or something else suiting the name of the tree. Then he cavilled that there was only so much leisure to the three children,[2] that in the furnace of the raging fire they should sport in meter, and in order provoke all the elements to the praise of God; or [cavilled] what a miracle, and token of divine inspiration, it was, either that the dragon was slain by a lump of pitch,[3] or that the contrivances of the priests of Bel were detected — [things] which were perpetrated rather by the prudence of a shrewd man than by a prophetic spirit. But when he came to Habakkuk — [reading] that he was snatched from Judaea into Chaldaea to carry the dish [of pottage] — he sought an example, where we might have read, in the whole Old Testament, that any of the saints had flown with [his] heavy body, and in a point of an hour had crossed such spaces of lands.[4] To whom, when a certain one of ours, prompt enough for speaking, had brought Ezekiel into the midst, and said that he had been translated from Chaldaea into Judaea, he laughed at the man, and, from the very volume, demonstrated that Ezekiel had seen himself transposed in the spirit.[5] Finally, [he objected] that even our Apostle — namely, as a learned man, and one who had learned the law from the Hebrews — had not dared to affirm that he was snatched away in the body, but had said, 'Whether in the body, or out of the body, I know not; God knoweth.'[6] By these and such arguments he argued the [tales] in the book of the Church [to be] apocryphal fables. Concerning which matter, leaving the judgment to the arbitration of the reader, I admonish this: that Daniel is not had among the Hebrews among the Prophets, but among those who wrote the Hagiographa. For all Scripture is divided by them into three parts — into the Law, into the Prophets, and into the Hagiographa — that is, into five, and eight, and eleven books; concerning which it is not of this time to discourse. But what things Porphyry objects out of this Prophet — nay, against this book — Methodius, Eusebius, and Apollinarius are witnesses, who, answering his madness with many thousands of verses, [I know not] whether they have satisfied the curious reader."

◊ 1. Left margin: Daniel 13:54. [The Greek word-plays of the Susanna story — σχῖνος/σχίσαι and πρῖνος/πρῖσαι — cited by Julius Africanus as proof it was composed in Greek.]

◊ 2. Left margin: Daniel 3:51–52, etc. [The Hymn of the Three Children.]

◊ 3. Left margin: Daniel 14:26. [Bel and the Dragon — the dragon killed with cakes of pitch.]

◊ 4. Left margin: Daniel 14:35. [Habakkuk carried by the angel to Babylon.]

◊ 5. Left margin: Ezekiel 8:3. [Ezekiel lifted up "in the spirit."]

◊ 6. Right margin: 2 Corinthians 12:2–3.

(left column continues into the right column)

These things Jerome; whom Rufinus, presbyter of Aquileia, in the book of the Invectives, criminates especially on account of three [things]. First, that, at the exhortation of Baraba the Jew, his teacher, he cast out from the volume of Daniel the history of Susanna — which for almost four hundred years the Church had read for the instruction of chastity — and that by a certain rhetorical craft, under another's person, he brought in arguments against it. Second, that he removed from its place, and cut off, the hymn of the three children, which the Church especially chanted on solemn days. Third, that he said Daniel was not to be held among the Prophets.

Meeting these charges, Jerome, in the first book of the Invectives against Rufinus, responds to him in this manner: "Concerning Daniel, however, I will briefly respond: that I did not deny him [to be] a Prophet — whom I straightway, at the front of the prologue, confessed to be a Prophet — but [wished] to show what the Hebrews said, and by what arguments they strove to prove their opinion; and I taught the reader that the Churches of Christ read this Prophet according to Theodotion, and not according to the Seventy translators. Of which [editions], if in that book I said the [Septuagint] edition to differ much from the truth, and to be reprobated by the right judgment of the Churches of Christ, it is not my fault, [I] who said [it], but theirs who read [it]. There are at hand four editions — of Aquila, Symmachus, the Seventy, and Theodotion. The Church reads Daniel according to Theodotion. What have I sinned, if I followed the judgment of the Churches? But when I report what the Hebrews are wont to say against the history of Susanna, and the hymn of the three children, and the fables of Bel and the dragon — which are not had in the Hebrew volume — he who criminates me [as] a fool proves himself a slanderer [sycophant]: for I explained not what I myself thought, but what they are wont to say against us; whose opinion if I did not answer in the prologue, studying brevity, [it was] lest I should seem to write not a preface, but a book. I said, therefore, that I straightway subjoined [it]: for I said, 'concerning which it is not of this time to discourse.' Otherwise also, from that which I asserted — that Porphyry said many things against this prophet, and I called as witnesses of this matter Methodius, Eusebius, and Apollinarius, who answered his madness with many thousands of verses — he will be able to accuse me [and ask] why I did not, in the little preface, write against the books of Porphyry. He who pursues trifles of this sort, and will not receive the truth from the Hebrew Scripture, let him hear [me] freely proclaiming: No one is compelled to read what he does not wish; I wrote for those seeking [it], not for the fastidious; gratis, not for the envious; for the studious, not for the yawning. And yet I wonder how [he could call] Theodotion a heretic —" →

[…continues on folio 613 (PDF p. 430): the rest of Jerome's reply to Rufinus on Daniel and Theodotion (Annotatio CCXLV).]

---

(printed folio 613 [PDF p. 430]. Annot. CCXLV (concl.)–CCXLVII (Daniel 1:1–3:18): Jerome on Theodotion closes; the fourth kingdom of iron is Rome (Jerome answers the charge of dishonoring the empire); and CCXLVII opens the great image controversy — the Anabaptist Balthasar Hubmaier's iconoclast dossier (Jerome; Epiphanius's Anablatha-veil letter and a second letter; Eusebius to Constantia; Ambrose; the Council of Elvira; the iconoclast council) → folio 614.)

(folio 613, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXLV (concluded)

"In the third year of the reign of Joachim," etc. — Daniel 1:1
(Jerome's reply to Rufinus concludes:) "…[a heretic] whom he both reads as judaizing, and [yet] disdains the translation of whatsoever Christian sinner."

Read these things more fully in book 8, in the confutation of the sixth heresy.

Annotation CCXLVI [contents]

"And the fourth kingdom shall be as iron," etc. — Daniel 2:40
On the kingdom of the Romans.

Jerome so expounds this clause in the commentaries on Daniel: "The fourth kingdom, which plainly pertains to the Romans, is the iron which crushes and subdues all things; but its feet, and the toes, [are] partly of iron and partly of clay — which at this time is most manifestly proved: for as in the beginning nothing was stronger and harder than the Roman empire, so in the end of things nothing [is] more feeble, when both in civil wars, and against the diverse nations of other barbarous peoples, we need [outside] aid." There were not lacking, of old, [those] who accused Jerome on account of these things — that he had treated the majesty of the Roman empire, then defended by a most Christian Emperor, with too little honorific words. To whom he, answering, in the preface of the eleventh [book] of the commentary on Isaiah, thus says: "If, in the exposition of the statue, and of its feet, and the discrepancy of the toes of iron and clay over the Roman kingdom, I interpreted that which perhaps [was] first [strong], then feeble, [as] the Scripture portends — let them not impute [it] to me, but to the Prophet. For neither is it so to be flattered to Princes, that the truth of the holy Scriptures be neglected; nor is a general disputation an injury to one person." These things the divine Jerome.

Annotation CCXLVII [contents]

"We do not worship thy gods, and the statue which thou hast set up we do not adore." — Daniel 3:18
Whether the sacred Images are to be venerated.

Jerome, for the elucidation of this clause, uses these words: "The worshippers of God ought not to adore images: therefore let the judges and princes of the world, who adore the statues and images of the Emperors, understand themselves to do that which the three children, unwilling to do, pleased God. And the property [distinction] is to be noted: they say that God is worshipped, [but] the image adored — which neither [of the two] suits the servants of God."

Balthasar Hiemairus [Hubmaier] — who, on account of the pertinacity of heresy, was burned at Vienna in the year of the Lord 1528 — in the book which he inscribed against the worshippers of images, abuses these words of Jerome for the protection of his error, a testimony being added after that very [passage] from the epistle of Epiphanius to John, bishop of Jerusalem, translated and approved by Jerome himself, in these words: "When I had come to the villa which is called Anablatha, and, passing by, had seen there a lamp burning, and had asked what place it was, and had learned that it was a Church, and had entered in to pray — I found there a veil hanging in the doors of that same Church, dyed and painted, and having an image as it were of Christ, or of some saint; for I do not sufficiently remember whose the image was. When, therefore, I had seen this — that, in the Church of Christ, against the authority of the Scriptures, the image of a man was hanging — I tore it, and rather gave counsel to the keepers of that place that they should wrap [in it] and carry out some poor dead [person]. But they, murmuring against [me], said: If he wished to tear [it], it was just that he should give another veil, and change [it]. When I had heard this, I promised that I would give [one], and that I would send [it] straightway; but now I have sent what I was able to find, and I pray that thou command the presbyters of that same place to receive the veil from the bearer, which has been sent by us; and henceforth [give order] to command, in the Church of Christ, that veils of this sort — which come against our religion — be not hung up: for it becometh thy reverence rather to have this solicitude, that it take away the scrupulosity which is unworthy of the Church of Christ, and of the peoples who are entrusted to thee."

(left column continues into the right column)

Again, in another epistle, which is cited in the acts of the seventh synod, the same author thus writes: "Be ye mindful, beloved sons, not to bring images into the Church, nor to place them in the cemeteries of the saints, but always carry God about in your hearts; nay, let them not even be tolerated in a common house: for it is not lawful for a Christian to be held [in suspense] through the eyes, but through the engagement of the mind." These things Epiphanius; to which the author of the book [Balthasar] annexes the opinion of Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea.

He, in the epistle to Constantia Augusta — who was asking from him an image of Christ — so wrote: "Since thou hast written to me concerning an image of Christ, that I should send [it] to thee, I would that thou signify to me which image of Christ thou thinkest [of] — whether that true and incommutable [one], bearing the characters [features] of his nature, or this [one] which, for our sake, he assumed, putting on for us the servile form. But indeed concerning the divine form I do not think that thou thyself art solicitous, since thou hast been taught by him that no one has known the Father except the Son, nor that anyone has worthily known the Son himself, except him who begot him, the Father." And after other [things]: "But if thou altogether requirest an image of the form, and of the flesh, which for our sake he put on — this too we have learned to be commingled with the glory of his deity, and [to be] passible, and mortal." And after a few [words]: "Who, therefore, could portray with dead and lifeless colors, and with shadowy painting, the shining and coruscating splendors of glory and of dignity of this sort? — since not even his divine disciples were able to contemplate him on the mountain, [but], falling on their face, confessed that they could not behold a spectacle of this kind. If, therefore, in the figure of his flesh he received such power from the divinity dwelling in it, what must one say [of it] then, when — having put off mortality, and washed away corruption — he transferred the form of a servant into the glory of the Lord and of God? [namely] after the victory of death; after the ascension into the heavens; after being seated with the Father on a royal throne, at the right hand; after rest in the ineffable and unnamable bosoms of the Father — into which, as he ascended and took his seat, the heavenly powers acclaimed him with blessed voices, saying: 'Princes, lift up your gates; be ye lifted up, O heavenly gates; and the King of glory shall enter in.'"[1] Thus far Eusebius.

◊ 1. Right margin: Psalm 23:7–9. [Vulgate Psalm 23 = Psalm 24 in the Hebrew numbering.]

To whom Balthasar subjoins the authority of Ambrose, from the funeral oration on Theodosius, where thus is read: "Helena, therefore, found the cross of the Lord — [and] adored the King, not indeed the wood; because this is a gentile error, and a vanity of the impious: but she adored him who hung on the wood — inscribed in the title of the cross."

At length, after many explanations of these opinions, he [Balthasar] concludes his narration with two decrees. Of these, that which is the more ancient is contained in canon 36 of the Council of Elvira [Eliberitanum], celebrated in the year of the Lord 320. Its words are these: "It has pleased [us] that pictures ought not to be in the Church, lest that which is worshipped or adored be painted on the walls." But the other [decree] was published much later, about the year of the Lord 730, under Leo and Constantine his son, Augusti, in the third Ephesine council, published in these words: "If anyone [presume] to figure the figure of the incarnate Word of God, and the ideas of all the saints," →

[…continues on folio 614 (PDF p. 431): the rest of the iconoclast decree, and Sixtus's refutation of Balthasar (Annotatio CCXLVII).]

(printed folio 614 [PDF p. 431]. Annot. CCXLVII (continued) (Daniel 3:18): Sixtus refutes the iconoclasts — Jerome meant pagan idols, not Christian images; Ambrose affirms the cross is to be adored (the honor referred to Christ); the Nicaea II rhymed couplet; John Damascene's threefold answer to Epiphanius; the Council of Elvira as a temporary remedy; and emperors receive the Church's laws, they do not impose them → folio 615.)

(folio 614, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXLVII (continued)

"We do not worship thy gods, and the statue which thou hast set up we do not adore." — Daniel 3:18

(the iconoclast decree concludes:) "…[if anyone presume to figure the incarnate Word of God, and the ideas of all the saints] in lifeless and mute images, with material colors, since they bring no use at all — let him be anathema. For it is a vain excogitation, and a diabolical invention of insidious plotting." After the promulgation of which decree, the same Emperors commanded all images and statues to be taken away from the temples, and burned.

By these, and by other testimonies of the Fathers and of the divine Scripture — forcibly wrested, and wrongly expounded — the impious Balthasar strives to demolish the cult of the holy Images. To whom we respond briefly, and as much as the brevity of the present undertaking permits: that he, in the first place, most ineptly accommodates to the venerable images of the saints [those things] which Jerome had written concerning the statue of the king of the Assyrians, and concerning the other images of the gentiles[1] — which they placed not only to their gods (that is, to their demons), but also to their kings and princes, living and dead, and impiously adored. These [Jerome] said were not to be adored — not, however, those which we Christians consecrate to the true God, and to his blessed friends and servants. Nor less insipidly does he bring Ambrose into the midst: who, although he says that Helena did not adore the cross, because to adore the wood is a gentile error and vanity, nevertheless does not deny that the cross is to be adored;[2] whose adoration, a little after the proposed words, he confirms, saying: "Wisely did Helena, who raised the cross upon the head of kings, and placed [it there], that the cross of Christ might be adored in kings. This is not that insolence, but piety, which is paid to the sacred redemption." And then, some words being interposed, concerning the adoration of the nail by which the feet of our Savior were transfixed, he says: "By the iron of the feet of Christ are kings inclined [bowed] — do kings adore, and do the Photinians deny his divinity? The emperors prefer the nail of his cross to their diadem — and do the Arians diminish his power?" By which sayings Ambrose prudently admonishes that we should not worship the cross with a gentile superstition — that is, thinking that wood to be God, or some numen of deity — but that we should adore it with a pious and Christian cult, as a symbol of human redemption, and a monument of those things which for us our redeemer

Christ endured upon it, referring to him whatsoever of honor and reverence we exhibit to his cross. In this order, therefore, and with this scope, we venerate also the other sacred images, according to the formula handed down in the second Nicene synod — which [formula], as Sabellicus, in book 8 of the eighth Ennead, is witness, the Latin Fathers, in the times of Charlemagne, concluded [expressed] in these two verses, translated from the Greek, under a little rill of rhythm's consonance [i.e., with rhyme], with which that age had then first begun to be delighted:

◊ 1. Left margin: The heretics wrest, against the images of Christ and of the saints, [those things] which are written concerning idols and the statues of impious men.

◊ 2. Left margin: The cross, in the judgment of St. Ambrose, is not to be adored with a gentile superstition, so that the wood be thought to be God.

This is God, which the image teaches — but the image itself is not God; this thou mayest look upon, yet worship with the mind that which thou discernest in it. (Hoc Deus est, quod imago docet: sed non Deus ipsa. / Hanc videas, sed mente colas quod cernis in ipsa.)

But to that which is opposed from the epistles of Epiphanius, John Damascene, almost eight hundred years ago from now, responded, in the first book against the Iconomastigi [the Image-scourgers], in this manner:[3] "But if thou objectest that that eminent and admirable Epiphanius openly interdicted the cult of them [images]: first indeed I would respond that that doctrine — related perhaps from a marginal annotation into the text, and so being spurious — did not likewise proceed from his lucubration, [but] is rather of another, who was called by the same name, lest [we do] that which many are wont to do. Then, in the second place, if thou opposest [it] — we know that the blessed Athanasius forbade the relics of the saints to be placed in little caskets or coffers, or rather commanded that they be buried in the earth, for this [reason]: because he desired by all means to abrogate the absurd custom of the Egyptians, who did not cover the cadavers of their [dead] with earth, but deposited [them] on beds and biers. Perhaps also Epiphanius, that eminent [man], wishing to recall some such thing to rectitude, provided by law that images should not be painted — that we may also grant it to have been his opinion. For, [seeing] that this was not his purpose, to remove them, the Church, by the testimony of this blessed Epiphanius, is even unto our times adorned in every part with images.[4] Thirdly I would respond: it is not infrequent, nor rare, [that] some [newly] found thing is a law handed down to the Church; for neither does one swallow make the spring — as it seems to Gregory the Theologian, and to truth itself — nor can one opinion demolish from the foundations the tradition of the whole Church, and pull [it] up from the boundary of the earth even to the extreme limit." Thus far Damascene.

◊ 3. Left margin: Response to the authority of Epiphanius against Images.

(left column continues into the right column)

◊ 4. Right margin: The Church, in the time of blessed Epiphanius, was — [on Damascene's testimony] — adorned with images. See what I have written on the matter in book 2 of the Disputations, chapter 27.

From whose second response the reason can easily be rendered why the provincial Council of Elvira [Eliberitanum] — held in Spain by only nineteen bishops — forbade images to be painted in the temples of that province:[5] namely, that it might extinguish idolatry by this remedy. For although the fathers of that synod knew that the cult of the sacred Images confers the greatest utility upon the now-adult [mature] Church, nevertheless, since they had observed that those nations — lately coming to Christ from the superstition of the idols — were still inclined to their former idolatry, and were paying divine honors to the images painted in the churches of the Christians, as if there were in them something of divinity, they judged that the present disease could not otherwise be healed than by the interdiction of images. Accordingly, since now the Christian people is not, as those Spaniards of old were, prone to idolatry, no cause appears why Images should be taken away from the Church; for although one or another, deceived by a certain simplicity, may err in the worshipping of Images, the Images are not, for the sake of those [few], to be altogether abolished, but their simplicity is to be instructed: for laws provide not for the number of the few, but for the greater multitude of the peoples.

◊ 5. Right margin: On the decree of the Council of Elvira, the author's judgment.

Moreover, to the Council of Ephesus, and the edicts of the two Emperors pronounced against the venerable Images, it pleases [me] to respond nothing else than that which the same Damascene, in the second volume of the same work, said: "In the dogmas and dispositions ecclesiastical, it is not for Emperors[6] to impose laws, but to receive [them]; but to the pastors and doctors of the Church is it committed, that they prescribe the order of the ecclesiastical matter not according to the arbitration of the Emperors, but according to the norm of the right faith — the Apostle saying, 'In the Church God has placed certain ones: first the Apostles, secondly the Prophets, thirdly the Pastors and Doctors' [1 Cor 12:28], making no mention of emperors among these. Wherefore those Emperors, who invaded the apostolic and pastoral function, and, a synod being violently forced together in Blachernae near Ephesus, commanded impious canons to be made, according to their [own] lust, by the bishops — deservedly, as robbers and brigands, were they condemned by the Catholics." And some of the bishops who had been present at that detestable council, afterward repenting, abjured that canon — published against the blessed images — in the presence of three hundred →

◊ 6. Right margin: An excellent opinion.

[…continues on folio 615 (PDF p. 432): the abjuration of the iconoclast canon and the rest of Sixtus's defense of images (Annotatio CCXLVII).]

(printed folio 615 [PDF p. 432]. Annot. CCXLVII (concl.)–CCL (Daniel 3:18–13:1): the image controversy closes (the 350 Fathers of Nicaea II; Eusebius's letter rejected); the world's-end error (Judas the Syrian, Lactantius); the calumny that Jerome cited too many opinions on the seventy weeks; then CCL opens the question of Susanna's authenticity — Julius Africanus's letter to Origen with eight arguments that the story is a Greek fabrication → folio 616.)

(folio 615, left column → right column)

Annotation CCXLVII (concluded)

"We do not worship thy gods, and the statue which thou hast set up we do not adore." — Daniel 3:18

Eusebius's epistle against Images is condemned.

(the abjuration concludes:) [they abjured that canon] in the presence of three hundred and fifty Fathers, in the second Nicene synod, in whose first action [session] the palinode [recantation] of the penitent bishops is still read. There remains the epistle of Eusebius of Caesarea, to which it is superfluous to respond: for it is established, from the sixth action of the same synod, that it was reprobated by the common consent of all the Fathers, and — [being] among the impious writings not retracted by its own author — was rejected.

Annotation CCXLVIII [contents]

"Seventy weeks are abbreviated [shortened]." — Daniel 9:24

On the time of the world's destruction.

Judas the Syrian [Judas Syrus], explaining this chapter in his commentaries, Jerome, in the catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers, notes with these words: "Judas disputed most fully concerning the seventy weeks in Daniel, and produced their chronography, through the times of former [ages], down to the tenth year of Severus; in which he is convicted of error, because he said that the coming of Antichrist would be about his own times — that is, in the two-hundredth year after Christ: but this [he said] for this reason, because the magnitude of the persecutions portended the end of the present world." These things he [Jerome]. For the same cause, long before, those faithful were led into the same error, whom Paul, admonishing in the second epistle to the Thessalonians, says:[1] "We beseech you, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, that you be not quickly moved from your [right] sense, nor terrified, as if the day of the Lord were at hand." There were also many other not ignoble authors in nearly the same opinion — among whom Lactantius Firmianus defined the space of two hundred years, from his own age even to the end of the world.

◊ 1. Left margin: 2 Thessalonians 2:2.

Return to Annotation 187.

Annotation CCXLIX [contents]

"Seventy weeks are abbreviated." — Daniel 9:24

On the calumny imposed upon St. Jerome.

To Jerome, expounding the seventy weeks, it was imputed as a fault by [his] rivals that in recounting the opinions of the Jews and of certain heretics he was excessive [too copious]; and that, [these] authors in many things receding from the purity of the faith, he called [them] masters of the Church. To whom he, responding, in the preface of the eleventh commentary on Isaiah, thus writes: "In the little commentaries of Daniel I studied brevity, except [for] the last and the penultimate vision — in which it was necessary for me, on account of the magnitude of the obscurity, to extend [my] discourse, especially in the exposition of the seven, and sixty-two, and one weeks; in the treating of which — what Africanus the writer of times [the chronographer], what Origen and Eusebius of Caesarea, Clement also, presbyter of the Alexandrian church, and Apollinarius of Laodicea, and Hippolytus, and the Hebrews, and Tertullian thought — I briefly comprehended, leaving to the arbitration of the reader what he should choose out of the many. And so, that which I did with the modesty of judging, and for the honor of those who were about to read, displeases certain ones, who desire to know not the opinions of the ancients, but our [own] opinion: to whom [there is] an easy response — that I was unwilling so to receive [adopt] one [opinion], that I might seem to condemn others; and certainly, if [the work] of so great and so erudite a man displeases fastidious readers, what will they do to me, who lie exposed to the bites of the envious for the slenderness of [my] little talent? But if I named the aforesaid men masters of the Church — let them understand this: that I do not approve the faith of all [of them], who certainly are contrary among themselves; but [I cited them] for the distinguishing of Josephus and of Porphyry, who disputed very many things concerning this question." These things Jerome.

(left column continues into the right column)

Annotation CCL [contents]

"And there was a man dwelling in Babylon, and his name [was] Joachim." — Daniel 13:1

Whether the history of Susanna is to be received.

Julius Africanus, when he doubted concerning the truth of the history of Susanna, refuted Origen in a brief epistle, in which he embraced, most tersely, eight conjectures inferring to him[self] a suspicion of falsity. The copy of the epistle thus reads:

"Hail, from Africanus, to my lord, and son, and most honored of all men, Origen. When thou wast holding a sacred disputation with that friend of thine, and wast making mention of the prophecy [uttered] by Daniel in [his] youth, I was, at that time, as was fitting, embracing [it]. [1.] But I wonder by what means it has escaped thee that this part of the book is spurious; for this segment of the book, though it is indeed otherwise a pleasing little work, is nevertheless a little work which is shown by many [tokens], and is convicted, to be of a modern manner, and fabricated in Greek by a Greek author.[2] [2.] First indeed, because, when Susanna had been ordered to die, the Prophet, seized by the spirit, cried out that the sentence had been unjustly brought forth — whereas Daniel prophesies in another mode through the whole time, namely by visions, and dreams, and the apparition of an Angel, but not by prophetic inspiration. [3.] Then afterward, when he had spoken so admirably, he uses toward the people and the elders that kind of confutation which would be most remote from the common expectation, and which not even that Philistine mime would have used: inasmuch as, not content with the rebuke effected through the spirit, he interrogates each of the two, separated from the other, apart, in what place he had seen her committing adultery; and when the one had said 'under a holm-oak' [prinos], he answered that it would come to pass that the Angel would saw [seco] him; likewise threatening cutting to the other, who had answered that he had seen her under a mastic-tree [schinos]. [4.] For in the Greek words such [words] have the same sound — παρὰ τὴν πρῖνον, πρῖσαι [from the holm-oak, to saw], and παρὰ τὴν σχῖνον, σχίσαι [from the mastic, to split]; but in the Hebrew tongue they have an altogether different sound. Moreover, from the Hebrew are translated to the Greeks whatsoever words are reported of the old Testament. [5.] Besides, by what means — since they were captives among the Chaldaeans in Babylon, and the slain were thrown out into the streets unburied (as the histories narrate concerning the first captivity of Israel), and their sons were torn away to be made eunuchs, and their daughters concubines, as the Prophets had foretold — do these [elders] pronounce [capital] judgment?[3] [6.] And — what thou mightest wonder at more — against Joachim, the king of those very [people], whom the king of the Babylonians had made assessor to himself? But if this is not that Joachim, but some other one of the people, whence [came] this captive dwelling? whence to him [that] spacious garden? [7.] But before all these things, this particle of this book, with the other two particles which are at the end of Daniel, is not similar to [the] Daniel which is received by the Hebrews; nay, even the character of the diction differs. [8.] But to all these let it be added, that — although so many Prophets have preceded — [none] thenceforth used the testimony of another, inasmuch as their truthful speech begged [borrowed] from nowhere else; but here the one, threatening the other, alludes to the Lord saying, 'The innocent and just thou shalt not slay.'[4] From all these things I judge that this segment of the book was added. I have knocked; do thou, writing back, instruct [me]. Salute all my lords; and thee also all the learned [men] salute; and I pray thee to be well, together with thy company — and this I pray from [my] heart."

◊ 2. Right margin: The first argument of Africanus against the history of Susanna. [The margin numbers each of Africanus's eight arguments in turn — "1. Argumentum," "2. Argumentum," … "8. Argumentum" — matching the bracketed [1.]–[8.] in the text.]

◊ 3. Right margin: 2 Kings [4 Kings] 25. He understands the history of Bel and the Dragon.

◊ 4. Right margin: Exodus 23:7.

To this epistle Origen responded with a learned and magnificent epistle; which, since, on account of its prolixity, it would not be fitting, into this →

[…continues on folio 616 (PDF p. 433): Origen's reply to Africanus in defense of the history of Susanna (Annotatio CCL).]

(printed folio 616 [PDF p. 433]. Annot. CCL (concl.)–CCLI (Daniel 13:1–Amos 5:2): Origen's eight answers to Africanus defending Susanna (its deuterocanonical parity, the tree-puns, Solomon's judgment, captive courts, prophets citing prophets), closing with his wish to write a full encomium; then CCLI (Amos 5:2) — whether the fallen, after penance, may be restored to their former dignity (Strabus and the Council of Lérida seem to deny it) → folio 617.)

(folio 616, left column → right column)

Annotation CCL (concluded)

"And there was a man dwelling in Babylon, and his name [was] Joachim." — Daniel 13:1

Solution of the first argument of Africanus. [The margin flags each of Origen's eight solutions in turn — "Solutio 1/2/3 … argumenti."].

(Origen's reply, since it would not be fitting to stuff his whole long letter into this place, is given only in the summary of its solutions to Africanus's arguments:)

First, as to that which he says — that the little work of Susanna is neither genuine, nor written in Hebrew, but in Greek, and by a modern author — it is [held as] uncertain; and it will be more credible that it was of old written by its author either in Hebrew or in Syriac, and preserved among the books stored apart by the studious lovers of truth, [and] then translated by a Greek interpreter. But even if we should grant [it] to be the work not of a Hebrew but of a Greek writer, it is nevertheless not on that account to be repudiated as spurious and fabricated — especially since credit is not withheld from those [pieces] among the Hebrews — lest, by the same reasoning, we be compelled to cast away many scriptures of the same kind received by the Church, and mingled among the sacred volumes: such as are the Prayer of Sidrach, Misac, and Abdenago [Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego]; the Hymn of the three children in the book of Daniel; the Prayer of Esther, and the Prayer of Mardochaeus [Mordecai]; the Epistle of Aman [Haman], and the Epistle of Mardochaeus in the book of Ezra; and other things similar to these, which our fathers received for the edification of the Church, whose bounds, constituted for us, we ought by no means to transgress.

Second, when he says that Daniel nowhere prophesied [being] seized by prophetic inspiration, but only by dreams, and visions, and angelic apparition, he seems to have too little observed that [saying] of Paul,[1] "In many ways and in many manners God spoke of old to the Prophets" — for nothing hinders but that one and the same Prophet may, together with dreams, visions, and Angelic apparitions, obtain also the prophetic inspiration: as in the old Scripture innumerable examples of this matter may everywhere be seen in the Prophets.

◊ 1. Left margin: Hebrews 1:1.

Third, he does too little gravely, when he compares the writer of this book to the Philistine mime, because Daniel — according to the counsel of human prudence — interrogated the elders, separated apart, each of the two severally, as if it were not enough that the spirit had, by its breath, so admirably rebuked them: for by this reasoning it will be permitted to deride that admirable example of judging, similar to this, which the divine Scripture relates that Solomon employed in judging the cause of the two harlots concerning the surviving little infant of the litigants.[2] Wherefore it is to be believed that, as it was not enough, for persuading the people, that Solomon — although breathed upon by the divine spirit — should say, "Give to this [woman] the living [infant], for she is its mother," but it behoved that he [proceed] to command the infant to be divided into two parts, that all the people, by the experiment of maternal charity, might recognize the true mother of the infant: so it was not enough for Daniel to rebuke the elders, unless he had moreover received [a means] whence he might convict them out of their own mouth before the universal multitude.

◊ 2. Left margin: 1 Kings [3 Kings] 3:27.

Fourth, as to what he says — that the Greek allusion of πρῖνος to πρῖσις, and of σχῖνος to σχίσις, is not had among the Hebrews, but [that they are] altogether diverse words — it is dissolved in three ways. First, because it is uncertain whether the words which among the Hebrews signify the same which among the Greeks πρῖνος and πρῖσαι, and σχῖνος and σχίσαι [signify], so differ among themselves that they have no similitude of sound; since indeed, in the sacred volumes of the Hebrews, no mention is ever made of the plants which are signified by the names πρῖνος[3] and σχῖνος,[4]

◊ 3. Left margin: Σχῖνος is a small shrub — the lentisk [mastic] — whence mastic-gum is gathered.

◊ 4. Right margin: Πρῖνος is a small tree, from which the scarlet [kermes] is born.

(left column continues into the right column)

[so that] no one of the Hebrews can affirm with certainty how these [words] allude in Hebrew, whose Hebrew names are unknown. Then, it is also credible that Daniel used, for the Hebrew tongue, Syriac words, which had such a consonance of denomination [a like wordplay]. Finally, perhaps it happened that, when the Greek interpreter wished to express — as the matter demanded — the force of the Hebrew allusion, and could not [do so directly], he, according to a certain dispensation [licence] conceded to interpreters, found the names of other plants which among the Greeks should have a similar derivation, and [thus] more lucidly explain the proposed sentence of Daniel.

Fifth, when he doubts by what means the captives had the right of bringing judgment concerning death, he ought not to wonder if the Jews obtained from the king of Babylon the power of living under their own laws and judgments — since he sees that, in his own time, the same [Jews] received from the Roman Emperors, under whose captivity they live, the right of life and death over their own [people].

Sixth, [it] is eluded with the same facility, that which he asks — whence, to the captive Joachim, a man of private condition, [there was] a magnificent house and garden:[5] for neither is this to be wondered at, since in the sacred letters we read that Mardochaeus, Nehemiah, and very many others were rich captives, and prosperous in their captivity.

◊ 5. Right margin: Esther 2; Nehemiah [2 Esdras] 2.

Seventh, as to what he says — that this segment does not have similitude with the volume of Daniel, and that the character [style] of each is diverse — he seems to have pronounced [this] from his own judgment and taste:[6] for if anyone attentively examine both, he will find no very great dissimilitude in the two.

◊ 6. Right margin: Solution of the seventh argument.

Eighth, when he asserts that no one of the Prophets was wont to use the sayings of another Prophet, he is deceived: for very frequently the one uses the testimonies of the other in the same sense, and in nearly the same words — as may be seen in Micah, saying,[7] "And it shall be in the last days, the mountain of the Lord [shall be] prepared," etc. — which words are written in Isaiah.

◊ 7. Right margin: Micah 4:1; Isaiah 2:2.

These things we have briefly touched upon from the Origenic epistle, in the close of which Origen himself thus inferred: "These things I would say for the defending of the history of Susanna; and would that I could celebrate the Scripture of Susanna with an encomium — especially after the accusations [made against it] — both by dwelling upon each of its words, and by showing [its] exquisite senses; which [is] a thing that anyone who has studiously and abundantly meditated in the divine [Scriptures] could privately compose."

Annotation CCLI [contents]

"She is fallen, and shall no more rise, the virgin of Israel." — Amos 5:2

Whether the fallen, after penance, are to be restored to their former dignity.

Strabus, in the glosses of this passage, seems to be in the opinion of those who think that sinners, after penance, cannot be restored into their former dignity. For thus he says: "The Prophet does not deny that Israel can rise again; but 'it shall not rise,' he says, 'the virgin of Israel'; because [Israel], once going astray, even if it be carried back on the shoulders of the shepherd, has not so great a glory as [that] which never erred." This opinion the canon of the Council of Ilerda [Lérida] seems to confirm, which is cited by Gratian in the fifteenth distinction of the decree, in these words: "They who serve the holy altar, if suddenly, by the frailty of the flesh to be bewailed, they are corru-" →

[...continues on folio 617 (PDF p. 434): the canon of Lérida and Sixtus's resolution on the restoration of penitents (Annotatio CCLI).]

(printed folio 617 [PDF p. 434]. Annot. CCLI (concl.)–CCLIII (Amos 5:2–Jonah 1:12): Aquinas resolves the "fallen virgin" (sonship restored, innocence not); whether the soul's post-mortem liberty means "only two places" (Peter of Crete: it is contemplative, not physical); and whether one may take one's own life to preserve chastity — Jerome allows it only where chastity is imperilled, Ambrose counts Pelagia's death a martyrdom → folio 618.)

(folio 617, left column → right column)

Annotation CCLI (concluded)

"She is fallen, and shall no more rise, the virgin of Israel." — Amos 5:2

St. Thomas, [Summa Theologica] third part, question 89, article 3.

(the canon of Lérida concludes:) "...are overtaken, and, the Lord looking upon [them], have worthily done penance — let them so receive the places of their offices that they cannot be promoted further to higher offices." St. Thomas, in the third volume of the Theological Summa, explaining the sayings of these [authorities], says that a twofold dignity is lost by sinners: the one before the Church, the other before God; and that this [former] is double — one chief and primary, by which the just, by the gift of divine grace, are numbered among the sons of God; and this is restored to penitents, of which the proof is that prodigal son, to whom, [when] returning to his senses, the father commanded the stole of the lost dignity to be given back.[1] But he says that the other, before God, is a secondary dignity — that is, innocence, which no one, however penitent, can recover; although sometimes he may be able to attain far greater honors, just as Gregory, in the homily on the hundred sheep, shows by the example of a soldier who, after flight, bravely returning to the battle, deserved greater praise and more excellent rewards from his leader than he who neither ever gave [his] back [in flight], nor ever did anything boldly. Concerning the glory, therefore, of this latter dignity, the words of Strabus are to be interpreted.

◊ 1. Left margin: Luke 15:22.

There is also, after these two, an ecclesiastical dignity, concerning which Thomas thinks that the canon of the aforesaid Council is to be understood — by which the higher grades of honors are denied, not to all penitents simply, but only to those who have done public penance. For also to Peter, as Arnobius on psalm 38 says, after the threefold denial a greater grade is restored to the penitent than had been taken away from the denier; and it was given to him by Christ, that he should be the bishop of all bishops.

Annotation CCLII [contents]

"If they descend even unto hell, thence my hand shall bring them out." — Amos 9:2

Whether [there are] only two places after this life.

Jerome, in book 3 of the commentaries on Amos, among the other things which he heaped up for the exposition of this passage, has these: "When the Soul, loosed from the corporeal bonds, shall have the liberty of going whither it wills, or whither it is compelled to go — either it is led to the infernal [places], concerning which it is written, [a] 'Let the sinners be turned into hell, all the nations that forget God,[2] and, [b] 'In hell who shall confess to thee?[3] and, 'Thy glory descends into hell'; or certainly it will be lifted up to the heavenly [places]." Peter, archbishop of Crete, in book 4 of the Sentences, distinction 21, question 1, where he discourses concerning Purgatory, proposes this saying, for the sake of disputing, under the person of those who assert that after this life [there are] only two Places, to which the Souls, loosed from bodies, are borne — namely heaven, and hell. But then, opening the ambiguity of this saying, he says that Jerome does not speak concerning the loosing of the Soul which is made through nature, corporeal death coming on, but concerning the voluntary and spiritual loosing of the soul from the body through speculation and contemplation — in which the Soul is so separated from the body that the body is not separated from the Soul. And this sense the following words of Jerome openly show, when he says: "...or certainly it will be lifted up to the heavenly [places], where are the spiritual wickednesses in the heavenly [places]," etc.

◊ 2. Left margin (a): Psalm 9:18.

◊ 3. Left margin (b): Psalm 6:6.

Annotation CCLIII [contents]

"Take me up, and cast me into the sea." — Jonah 1:12

Whether, for the sake of preserving chastity, it be licit to die by one's own hand.

Jerome, in the commentaries upon Jonah, so expounds this saying of the Prophet offering himself voluntarily to death, that he seems to hold it licit, in persecutions, for the sake of preserving chastity, to inflict death upon oneself with one's own hand. His words are these: "It is not ours to snatch at death, but willingly to receive [death] inflicted by others; whence also in persecutions it is not licit to perish by one's own hand, except where chastity is imperilled — but [it is licit] to submit the neck to the striker." Of the same mind Ambrose is thought to have been: for he, in the third book On Virgins, responding to Marcellina his sister, inquiring of him concerning this matter, judges that the deaths of those women who — that they might safeguard their chastity — laid violent hands upon themselves, were martyrdoms; and he demonstrates this by the example of Pelagia, the virgin of Antioch, and of her two sisters, and their mother: of whom she [Pelagia], throwing down first the altars of the idols, slew herself with the sword; but the [mother and sisters] plunged themselves together into a river. But it is worthwhile to set down here the mind of Ambrose — although expressed in a somewhat more prolix narration — both for the elegant gravity of the sentences, and for the sharp little arguments by which he seems to persuade his assertion under the person of another:

(left column continues into the right column)

"Now, to [thee] spreading the sails toward the end of the oration, thou askest, holy sister, what is to be thought concerning the merits of those who cast themselves down from a height, or plunged themselves into a river, lest they should fall into the hands of the persecutors — since the divine Scripture forbids a Christian to inflict violence upon himself. And indeed, concerning virgins placed in the necessity of guarding [chastity], we have a clear assertion, since there is extant an example of martyrdom.[4] Saint Pelagia was once, at Antioch, about fifteen years [old], a sister of virgins, and herself a virgin: she, at the first trumpet of the persecution shut up at home, when she saw herself beset by the robbers of [her] faith or of [her] modesty — [her] mother and sisters being absent, [she] void of protection, but the more full of God — 'What do we,' she says, 'unless captive virginity look to itself? Both [my] vow is [to die], and [my] fear is to die; because death is not [merely] received, but is taken up [freely]: let us die, if it be licit; or if they will not allow it to be licit, let us die. God is not offended by [this] remedy, and faith washes away the deed. Certainly, if we consider the very force of the name — what violence [is this]? a voluntary one? That is the more [truly] violence: to wish to die, and not to be able. Nor do we fear the difficulty; for who is there who wishes to die, and cannot, since there are ways so ready to death? For now I will overthrow the sacrilegious altars, cast down headlong, and extinguish the kindled hearths with [my] blood: I fear not lest [my] right hand, failing, strike not the blow, nor lest [my] breast withdraw itself from the pain; I will leave no sin to the flesh: I fear not lest a sword be lacking: we can die by our own arms, we can die without the executioner's service.' On [her] mother's bosom she is said to have adorned [her] head, to have put on the nuptial garment, so that thou wouldst say [she was going] not to death, but to a bridegroom. But when the detestable persecutors saw the prey of [her] modesty snatched from them, they began to seek the mother and sisters; but they, by that spiritual flight, already held the field of chastity, when suddenly — the persecutors here pressing, and there [the way] being excluded from flight by a rushing torrent — shut up unto the crown [of martyrdom], 'What do we fear?' they say: 'Behold water! Who forbids us to be baptized?[5] And this is the baptism by which sins are forgiven, and the kingdoms [of heaven] are sought; and this is the baptism after which no one falls away. Let the water receive us, which is wont to regenerate; let the water receive us, which makes virgins; let the water receive us, which opens heaven, covers the weak, hides death, renders [us] martyrs. We pray thee, O Creator of things, that the water hold not the lifeless spirit" →

◊ 4. Right margin: Pelagia, and the death of the [mother's] daughters.

◊ 5. Right margin: Acts 8[:36]. [The virgins' cry "Behold water! who forbids us to be baptized?" echoes Acts 8:36; the printed "Act. 8, 8" is imprecise.]

[…continues on folio 618 (PDF p. 435): the rest of Ambrose's narration, and Sixtus's resolution on suicide for chastity (Annotatio CCLIII).]

(printed folio 618 [PDF p. 435]. Annot. CCLIII (concluded) *(Jonah 1:12): the suicide-for-chastity question — Eusebius on the Antiochene mother, her daughters, and the Roman matron Sophronia, all honored as martyrs; Augustine (*City of God I) counters that suicide is never licit (bodily chastity is not lost while the soul stays pure); Sixtus resolves that their deaths were peculiar dispensations of the Holy Spirit, not to be imitated (cf. Razis) → folio 619.)

(folio 618, left column → right column)

Annotation CCLIII (concluded)

"Take me up, and cast me into the sea." — Jonah 1:12

The Antiochene virgins laying hands upon themselves.

(Ambrose's narration of Pelagia's family concludes:) "…or the body; let not the wave disperse [them], lest death separate the corpses of those whose life affection did not separate: but let there be one constancy, one death, and also one burial.' Having said these things, and having tucked up [their garments] a little, the bosom being girt, that they might cover [their] modesty and not impede the step — [their] hands joined together as though they led choruses — they advance into the midst of the channel; and there where the wave [was] more torrential, where the depth [was] broken off, directing [their] steps thither, no one drew back [her] foot, no one checked [her] gait, no one hesitated where she should fix [her] step, anxious when the ground met [her], the ford dashed against, glad in the deep. Thou wouldst see the pious mother, tightening the knot of [her] hands, rejoice over [her] pledge, fear the chance, lest the flood should carry away from her the one or the other of the daughters. 'These victims,' she says, 'O Christ, I immolate to thee — guardians of virginity, leaders of chastity, companions of [thy] passion.' But who could by right wonder that there was so great a constancy in the living, since even in death they vindicated an immovable posture of the body? The wave stripped not the cadavers, nor did the swirls of the rapid current disturb [them]; nay, even the holy mother, although void of sense, still preserved the embrace of piety, and loosed not by death the religious knot which she had tightened: so that she might merit — by piety [as] heir — what she had owed to religion; for those [daughters] whom she had joined to martyrdom, she claimed even unto the tomb."

These things Ambrose: before whom Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, shows himself to have been of the same opinion, who, among many martyrdoms of holy virgins described in the eighth book of the ecclesiastical history,[1] persuaded the same by the example — either the same, or a not-dissimilar one — of an Antiochene mother and daughters, in these words: "There was a certain admirable woman, noble by birth, comely alike in beauty and in modesty, who had two virgin daughters, nourished to the rule of maternal modesty — rivals in beauty and likewise in morals, contending among themselves in probity. These, absent for the sake of avoiding the persecution, the soldiers sent for this very purpose compel to come to Antioch; but when, the soldiers urging [them] on, being set in a vehicle they journeyed, the religious and modest mother uses such words to [her] daughters: 'You know, most sweet daughters to me, in what discipline of God I have educated you: you know that, from [your] infancy, God has been to you father, God nourisher, God instructor; and that you have loved, equally with me, the good of modesty and chastity, so that not even your eye ever — as I am witness to you — was stained with a too-wanton look. What, therefore, do we now do? You see that all this violence studies either to [tear] us from God, or to separate [us] from [our] chastity. Shall the members, then, be prostituted to the public brothels — [members] which the almost public air itself has held unknown [kept hidden]? Nay, I pray, daughters: for neither is [our] faith in God so small to us that we should dread death, nor [is our] chastity so dejected that we should desire to live even with baseness; nay rather, if it please [you], [that] which you hold in all things, follow in this also the mother's example: let us forestall the impure hands of the executioners, and snatch away [ourselves from] the assaults of the unchaste, and let us condemn, by a pure and modest death, this world, which would compel us to an impure and unchaste [life], and would drag [us] on.' And when, by such exhortations, she saw [her] daughters kindled to a like purpose, they came to a certain river set in [their] way; where, when they had pretended to have gone down for the cause of human necessity, and the guards had withdrawn a little (natural reverence compelling [them]), their garments being diligently drawn together here and there, they cast themselves into the threatening rapid streams of the river. But also two other virgins, sisters, noble by birth, admirable in life, in the first flower of age, beautiful enough, but more beautiful in soul, adorned more with morals than with necklaces, exceedingly approvable in [their] pursuits, not bearing the violence to their chastity by public edicts and laws, plunged themselves into the sea-waves."

◊ 1. Left margin: Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, book 8, chapter 24.

(left column continues into the right column)

And again, in chapter 27 of the same volume, persisting in the same narration and opinion, he adds these: "I think it not to be passed over in silence concerning that most noble woman in the city of Rome, Sophronia — admirable [in her deed] — whose husband, prefect of the city of Rome, lived under Maxentius the tyrant: who, when he had learned of the aforesaid woman's beauty (as was his custom), sending the ministers of debauchery, ordered the woman to be brought to him; she referred the matter to [her] husband, who, when he had discovered [it], revolving much with himself, at last groaning more deeply, 'And what,' he says, 'shall we do, by which these things must either be tolerated, or [our] life laid down?' Then she, when she saw [her] husband terrified by fear of death [seeming] to have betrayed her chastity, 'A little while,' she says, 'wait, [ye] who were sent, until, composed as is fitting, and adorned, I may come forth.' Thereupon, having entered [her] chamber, when first, on bended knees, she had prayed, as one about to immolate her chastity to God, she transfixed [her] breast and vitals with a seized dagger — sending, by the maidservants standing by, messengers of this sort to the tyrant: 'Such,' she says, 'is the woman that would please the tyrant.'" Thus far Eusebius; whose opinion the whole Church of the Christians willingly seems to embrace — [the Church] which decreed for the aforesaid virgins, in testimony of [their] precious death, the perpetual honors of martyrdom.

But Augustine, in the first book On the City of God, treating this argument with a long discourse, established that there is absolutely no case in which it is licit to lay hands on oneself,[2] but [that] he becomes so much the more guilty who kills himself, as he was the more innocent in that cause for which he thought he must kill himself. But if thou say that this is licit, lest the integrity of virginity and chastity be lost, he responds that the chastity of the body, the chastity of the Soul remaining, is not lost:[3] because, since the chastity of the Soul is a virtue which is not numbered among the goods of the body (as are health and beauty), it follows that, the body of the woman being oppressed and violated, [the woman] whose mind remains incorrupt, her chastity does not perish. Accordingly, she who kills herself, that she may avoid the violence of another's lust, chooses a greater crime, that she may avoid a lesser sin. Finally, meeting those who opposed to him the aforesaid examples of holy women, he thus speaks in chapter 26 of the same book: "But certain holy women, they say, in time of persecution — that they might escape the persecutors of their chastity — threw themselves into a river to be swept away and killed, and in this manner departed; and their martyrdoms in the Catholic Church are celebrated with most thronged veneration. Concerning these I dare judge nothing rashly. For whether the Church, by certain trustworthy testimonies, so honors their memory [as] the divine authority may have persuaded [it], I know not; and it could be that it is so. For what if they did this not humanly deceived, but divinely commanded — not erring, but obeying? — as concerning Samson[4] it is not licit for us to believe otherwise. When, moreover, God commands, and signifies himself to command without any ambiguities, who shall call obedience into crime? who shall accuse the dutifulness of piety?" Thus far Augustine; from which, inferring that the voluntary deaths of these virgins were peculiar economies [dispensations] of the divine will — not to be imitated by all, but by those only to whom it was singularly commanded by the certain and undoubted command of the Holy Spirit. See what we have written concerning Razias [Razis], killing himself, in book 8, in the confutation of the 12th heresy, argument 6.

◊ 2. Right margin: For no cause is it licit to bring death upon oneself.

◊ 3. Right margin: The chastity of the body, the chastity of the soul remaining, is not lost.

◊ 4. Right margin: Judges 16:30.

[…folio 619 (PDF p. 436) opens a new annotation (catchword "AN—"): Annotatio CCLIV.]

(printed folio 619 [PDF p. 436]. Annot. CCLIV–CCLVI (Jonah 3:4–Micah 6:1): the LXX's "three days" for the Hebrew "forty days" (Jerome; Theophylact excuses it); the gourd-versus-ivy controversy — Rufinus derides Jerome for turning κολοκύνθη into "ivy," and Jerome answers with the kikaion plant and his letter to Augustine on the Oea riot; and whether the guardian angels of nations are judged at the last day → folio 620.)

(folio 619, left column → right column)

Annotation CCLIV [contents]

"Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown." — Jonah 3:4

A passage badly translated by the Seventy.

The Seventy Interpreters, for that which in Hebrew is read ארבעים יום (Arbaim yamim), that is, "forty days," translated τρεῖς ἡμέραι, that is, "Three days": which Jerome so much wonders at — that they so rendered [it], when in Hebrew there is no community either of syllables, or of accents, or of the words [themselves], and the ternary number does not suit penitence, to which the number forty is more accommodated according to the sacred letters. Hence it happened that Chrysostom, and very many of the Greek expositors who followed the Septuagint edition, said various things upon this ternary number of days, [things] pertaining nothing to the truth of the Hebrew Scripture. Theophylact, in the commentaries upon Jonah, civilly excuses the error of the Septuagint interpreters in these words: "It is to be observed here, that the other interpreters said forty days for three, and received it as a fitting number — [reading it thus,] since in three days he first went round the whole city, then they offered that laborious Penitence of Nineveh to God, [and] afterward the Prophet, sitting before the gates of the city, awaited the end of his prophecy: whence also they say the space of forty days to be the truer [reading]. And yet it is likely that the Seventy first put forty days, and that those who at the beginning transcribed erred, and that afterward the error was diffused into all the copies. Nevertheless see, that neither to those taking [it as] three days does anything absurd befall: for neither was it necessary for the Prophet to go round the whole city, but, having at the same time set out on the journey of one day, preaching, that this preaching might be carried to all, and might reach even to the king himself, and that this grave and anxious penitence of the Ninevites might be shown, and received by God — there sufficed, after the preaching, [some] days, whether we posit those three, or two: since indeed one day would have been enough to show that men had genuinely repented, and had put on a better mind.*" Thus far Theophylact.

Annotation CCLV [contents]

"And the Lord God prepared an ivy [a gourd]." — Jonah 4:6

On the ivy of Jonah.

Jerome, in the translation of this passage, was noted [criticized] by very many of the ancients, because, for that which the LXX interpreters translated κολοκύνθη, that is, "a gourd," he turned "ivy." Rufinus, in the second book of the Invectives, deriding him, says: "After the world has grown old, and all things are urged toward the end, let us write even upon the sepulchres of the ancients — that they too may know, who here read otherwise — that Jonah did not have the shade of a gourd, but of ivy; and again, when the lawgiver shall have willed [it], not even ivy, but [the shade] of a shrub." Augustine, in the third [letter] to Jerome, jokes with an inserted fable. To each Jerome, rendering like for like, responds to Rufinus (his name being changed) thus, in the commentaries on Jonah: "Canthelius — that is, a huge ass, slow and dull, of the most ancient race of the Cornelii, or, as he himself boasts, of the stock of Asinius Pollio — is long since said, at Rome, to have accused me of sacrilege, because for 'gourd' I translated 'ivy.' He feared, forsooth, lest, if for gourds ivy should be born, he might not have whence he might occultly and darkly drink; and in very truth, in those little gourd-vessels — which the common [people] call saucomariae [drinking-cups] — the [companions] of the Apostles are wont to shadow forth images: whence also he took to himself a name not his own. But if vocables are so easily changed, that for 'Cornelii, seditious tribunes,' [one may write] 'Aemilii, consuls' — I wonder why it be not licit for me to translate 'ivy' for 'gourd.' But let us come to serious matters. For 'gourd,' or 'ivy,' we read in Hebrew קיקיון (kikaion), which also in the Syriac and Punic tongue is called elkeroa. It is, moreover, a genus of shrub, or a little tree, having broad leaves in the manner of a vine-tendril, and a most dense shade, sustaining itself by its own trunk; which in Palestine grows most frequently, and especially in sandy places; and, in a wonderful manner, if thou cast the seed into the ground, it quickly, being nourished, springs up into a tree, and within a few days [that] which thou hadst seen a herb, thou findest a little tree. Whence also we, at the same time in which we were interpreting the Prophets, wished to express the name itself in the Hebrew tongue, because the Latin speech did not have this species of tree; but we feared the grammarians, lest they should find licence for caviling, and feign either beasts of India, or mountains of Boeotia, or certain portents of this sort: and so we followed the old translators, who also themselves interpreted 'ivy,' which in Greek is called κισσός; for they did not have whence they might say [it] otherwise."

(left column continues into the right column)

These things Jerome, to Canthelius; but to Augustine, in the epistles, he writes back this passage in this manner: "In an epistle of thine of this kind thou weavest a fable. A certain [bishop], our brother and fellow-bishop, when he had appointed thy interpretation to be read in the Church over which he presides, [something] put down far otherwise than it was — inveterate in the sense and memory of all, and chanted through so many successions of ages — [and thereupon] there was made so great a tumult in the people, especially the Greeks arguing and crying out the calumny of falsity, that the Bishop (for that city was Oea) was compelled to demand the testimony of the Jews. Whether these, by unskillfulness or by malice, responded that this was [so] in the Hebrew codices which the Greeks and Latins had, and were saying, is uncertain. Why [say] more? The man was compelled to correct [it] as though a lie, wishing, after the great peril, not to remain without a congregation. Whence also it seems to us that sometimes, in some things, thou too couldst be deceived. Thou sayest that I translated something badly in the prophet Jonah, and that, by a sedition of the people crying out on account of the dissonance of one word, the Bishop almost lost his priesthood. And what that is which I badly interpreted, thou withdrawest, taking away from me the occasion of my defense — lest, whatever thou shouldst say, it be dissolved by my responding: unless perhaps, as [it was] very many years ago, the gourd comes into the midst, [thou] asserting that in those times Cornelius and Asinius Pollio [charged] that I had translated 'ivy' for 'gourd,' upon which matter, in the commentary on the prophet Jonah, we have more fully responded. I ask, at the end of the epistle, that thou compel not a resting old man, and once a veteran, to militate again, and again to be imperilled concerning [his] life. Thou, who art young, and constituted in the pontifical summit, teach the peoples, and enrich the Roman households with the new fruits of Africa: it suffices me, with a hearer and a poor little reader, to whisper in a corner of the monastery."

Annotation CCLVI [contents]

"Arise, contend in judgment against the mountains," etc. — Micah 6:1

Whether the Angels are to be judged on the day of judgment.

Jerome, opening the understanding of this clause, seems to imitate Origen, asserting that the Angels set over the care of men can err in their administration, and accordingly that they are to be set before the judge on the day of judgment, that, according to the merit of the care performed, they may [receive] punishments or →

[...continues on folio 620 (PDF p. 437): the rest of Jerome on the judgment of the guardian angels (Annotatio CCLVI).]

---

(printed folio 620 [PDF p. 437]. Annot. CCLVI (concl.)–CCLVIII (Micah 6:1–Zephaniah 3:4): the "mountains" of Micah 6:1 are the angels over the nations, arraigned at the judgment; whether God has providence over the least creatures (Jerome, reconciled by Peter of Poitiers); and unworthy priests and the sacraments — the errors an objector draws (a wicked priest cannot consecrate) plus Calvin's fourth, answered by Gratian → folio 621.)

(folio 620, left column → right column)

Annotation CCLVI (concluded)

"Arise, contend in judgment against the mountains," etc. — Micah 6:1

(Jerome continues:) [that, according to the merit of the care performed, they may receive] punishments or rewards. His words, in the second commentary on Micah, thus read: "Arise, and contend in judgment against the mountains — which [mountains] I think to signify no others than the Angels, to whom the administration of human affairs has been committed[1] — the Canticle of Deuteronomy agreeing in this very thing: 'When the Most High divided the nations, when he disseminated the sons of Adam, he constituted the bounds of the peoples according to the number of the Angels of God.' These are administering spirits, sent for ministry for the sake of those who shall possess the inheritance of salvation.[2] And contend in judgment, that whether the mountains or the hills [higher or lower angels] shall have been found not worthily to have administered the peoples — either it may seem to be mine [my fault], who set such ones over [them], or the fault may be taken away from the people and referred to the princes. Let us read the Apocalypse of John the Apostle,[3] in which are praised and accused the Angels of the Churches for the virtues and vices of those over whom they are said to preside: for as it is sometimes the Bishop's fault, sometimes the people's, and often the master sins, often the disciple, and sometimes it is the father's fault, sometimes the son's — whether they be well or badly instructed: so in the judgment of God, [it will be] that the crime shall be referred to the Angels, if they have not done all the things which pertained to their office, or to the people, if — those [angels] doing all things — they have contemned to hear them." Thus far Jerome, who, although in many places he often assails this error, at present wrote these things from the mind of Origen — [Origen's name] being suppressed for modesty, as is his custom, under the Origenic name: which also can be discerned from those things which not much below he added.

◊ 1. Left margin: Hebrews 1[:14]; Deuteronomy 32:8. [The quoted "he constituted the bounds of the peoples according to the number of the Angels of God" is Deuteronomy 32:8 (Septuagint); the printed "Deut. 3, 8" is a misprint for 32:8.]

◊ 2. Left margin: Hebrews 1:14.

◊ 3. Left margin: Revelation 2:2.

Thou wilt find Origen's opinion on this matter above, Annotation 126.

Annotation CCLVII [contents]

"Thy eyes are clean, that thou mayest not behold evil." — Habakkuk 1:13

Whether God has knowledge and providence of the least things.

Jerome, on the first chapter of the prophet Habakkuk, seems to affirm that God does not have a singular providence of irrational [creatures], and a peculiar and certain knowledge of each particular little animal, but bears the care of them only in general, and in the species. For thus he speaks: "In the other animals we can indeed understand the general disposition and order of God, and the courses of things: for example, in what manner the multitude of fishes is born, and lives in the waters; in what manner reptiles [and] quadrupeds arise on the earth, and by what foods they are nourished. But it is absurd to draw down the majesty of God to this — that he should know, through single moments, how many gnats are born, [and] how many die; what is the multitude of bugs, and fleas, and flies on the earth; how many fishes swim in the water; and which of the smaller ought to fall as prey to the greater. Let us not be such foolish flatterers of God that, while we draw down his providence even to the lowest things, we be injurious to ourselves — saying that the providence of rational and of irrational [creatures] is the same."

But that this was not Jerome's [true] mind, the same [author's] explanation on Matthew chapter 10 shows,[4] where, expounding that, "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing, and one of them shall not fall upon the ground without your Father?" he says: "The sense is: If small and vile animals do not fall without God [as] author, and in all things there is always providence, and [those things] which are to perish among these do not perish without the will of God — you, who are eternal, ought not to fear that you live without the providence of God." And a little after: "When it is said, 'Fear not therefore; you are of more value than many sparrows' — more manifestly the sense of our exposition is expressed, that we ought not to fear: because, if without God's knowledge small animals do not die, how much more [shall not] man? But as to what he says, 'The very hairs of your head are all numbered' — it shows the immense providence of God toward men, and signifies [his] ineffable affection: that nothing of ours lies hidden from God; even small and trifling things do not flee his knowledge."

◊ 4. Left margin: Matthew 10:29.

(left column continues into the right column)

Peter of Poitiers, bishop, in the first book of the Sentences, distinction 39, demonstrates that Jerome's sayings are to be interpreted in a twofold manner. First, that he understand [Jerome to mean] that God does not so — alternately, particularly, and through the diverse moments of times — foresee all the least things, as [if], through various moments, some of them fail, [and] some begin; but by a single, indivisible, and sempiternal gaze knows all things at once and singly, however small — knows the number of gnats, and fleas, and flies, both being born and perishing, at each single moment. Secondly, that he wish it to be understood that God does not have the knowledge and providence of men and of brutes in the same and equal manner:[5] for to men he has given both precepts, and Angels for [their] custody; but to brutes [he administers] only those things which are of the body.

◊ 5. Right margin: He does not have altogether the same manner of providence of mute animals and of men.

Annotation CCLVIII [contents]

"Her priests have polluted the sanctuary." — Zephaniah 3:4

On the power of the priesthood.

Jerome applies such an exposition to this sentence: "The priests who serve the Eucharist, and divide the blood of the Lord to his people, act impiously in the law of Christ, thinking that the Eucharist [is made] by the imprecation of words, not by [the] life [of the priest], and that only a solemn prayer is necessary, and not the merits of the priests — of whom it is said: 'And the priest in whom there shall be a blemish shall not approach to offer the oblation to the Lord.'" And a little after, expounding the same, he says: "The priests who give Baptism, and at the Eucharist invoke the coming of the Lord, make the oil of chrism, impose hands, instruct catechumens, constitute Levites and other priests — let them not be indignant at us thus expounding, but let them act carefully, lest they be counted of the [number of] priests who violate the holy things of the Lord."

From these words of Jerome, the Scholastics and canonists have deduced three [errors], from the person of the opponent [that an objector might draw]: of which the first is, that the Sacrament of the Lord's body cannot be consecrated by a wicked Priest; the second, that it is lawful for any Priest [whatever] to confect the holy chrism of confirmation, and to impose hands on those who are confirmed; the third, that it is in the power of any Priest [whatever] to confer the sacred orders. A fourth error also, besides these, Calvin the heretic gathers, in chapter eighteen of his Institution — namely, that the Eucharist is to be exhibited to the laity under both species, from that [passage] where Jerome said: "The priests divide the blood of the Lord to the peoples."

Gratian, in the Collectanea of the decrees, Cause 1, question 1, says that Jerome, in the first proposition, wished to signify that the life and merits of the Priest are necessary — not indeed to the consecration, but to the effect of the consecration. For although an impure and unworthy priest, by the virtue of the divine word, may complete the consecration of the sacrament most perfectly, yet he does not obtain the grace and virtue of the consecration, but rather prepares for himself judgment and condemnation; and in this manner also he admonishes that it is to be understood, that the Roman Pontiff Gelasius →

[…continues on folio 621 (PDF p. 438): Gelasius and the resolution on the power of unworthy priests (Annotatio CCLVIII).]

---

(printed folio 621 [PDF p. 438]. Annot. CCLVIII (concl.)–CCLXII (Zephaniah 3:4–Malachi 1:1): unworthy priests (Gelasius, Aquinas); Origen's Trinity reading of the two olive-trees; whether Christians may swear (Jerome); whether Abraham's bosom and the hell of the damned are one (Jerome, Augustine, and Aquinas — one enclosure divided by the χάσμα); and whether an Angel wrote Malachi (Origen, rejected by Jerome) → folio 622.)

(folio 621, left column → right column)

Annotation CCLVIII (concluded)

"Her priests have polluted the sanctuary." — Zephaniah 3:4

Gelasius wrote concerning this matter to Elpidius, saying: "For the invoked celestial Spirit will not come to the consecration of the mystery, if the priest who prays him to be present be proved full of criminous actions." The divine Thomas, in the third part of the Summa of theology, question 82, article 5,[1] says, in these words, that the error of certain priests is reproved, who from this cause alone — that they are Priests — think that they rightly and worthily perform the consecration of the Eucharist, even though they be unclean with the filth of sins; and according to this sense he interprets a not-dissimilar sentence of Dionysius the Areopagite, writing to Demophilus the monk, in these words: "Perfectly has he fallen from the sacerdotal order who is not illuminated; and rash indeed does such a one seem to me, laying [his] hand upon the sacred rites, and [who] dares to pronounce impure infamies (for I will not say prayers) over the divine symbols in a Christ-like manner." Peter, bishop of Crete, in the fourth book on the Sentences, distinction 13, thinks that Jerome, in the second [and] third proposition — by "Priests who consecrate the oil of chrism, impose hands, and constitute priests and Levites" — understood Bishops; because from the sacrament of order they differ not from [simple] Priests, although in jurisdiction and dignity they are far distant.

◊ 1. Left margin: Article 5. [St. Thomas, Summa Theologica III, question 82, article 5.]

Concerning the fourth proposition, see Annotation 268 of the sixth book.

Annotation CCLIX [contents]

"What are these two olive-trees, on the right of the candlestick, and on its left?" — Zechariah 4:3, 4

On the Trinity.

Origen, in the commentaries on Zechariah, interprets the two olive-trees [as] the Son and the Holy Spirit, and the lamp, or candlestick, which is in the midst of them, [as] God the Father. Jerome, in book 1 on Zechariah, confesses that he knows not how, without blasphemy, the Son and the Holy Spirit — the one on the right, the other on the left — may be so said.

Annotation CCLX [contents]

"Love not a false oath." — Zechariah 8:17

Whether it is licit for Christians to swear.

Jerome, in book 2 on Zechariah, on the occasion of this precept, seems to affirm that absolutely every oath is interdicted to Christians; for he speaks in this manner: "'Love not a lying oath,' he says: the Lord in the Gospel commanding, 'But I say to you, that you swear not at all; but let your speech be, Yea, yea, Nay, nay':[2] for whosoever shall not have sworn will never be able to perjure. In precepts which pertain to life, and are manifest, we ought not to seek an allegory: lest, according to the comic [poet], we seek a knot in a bulrush." John Arboreus annotated this passage in [his] Theosophia.

◊ 2. Left margin: Matthew 5:34, 37.

See below, Annotation 26 of the following book.

Annotation CCLXI [contents]

"Thou also, in the blood of thy testament, hast sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit, in which there was no water." — Zechariah 9:11

Whether the bosom of Abraham and the hell of the damned are the same.

Jerome, in the second commentary on Zechariah, is thought to have placed the bosom of Abraham in the hell of the damned, and to have thought both [to be] the same; for there he put these words: "'Thou also, in the blood,' etc. — which is thus understood: 'In the blood of thy passion [thou hast freed] those who were bound in the prison,

(left column continues into the right column)

in which there is no mercy — by thy clemency thou hast freed [them].' And a little after: 'In the prefiguration of this pit, which did not have water, both Joseph was sent by [his] brothers into the pit, and Jeremiah [was cast] by the Chaldeans — not into the water of the pit, but into the mud; and into the mire the pit was sunk down, which could suffocate rather than refresh. Whence in the psalm it is written, 'I am fixed in the mud of the deep, and there is no footing.[3] In this pit of hell tarried that rich man once clothed in purple,[4] whose boastful tongue was burned with the burnings of punishments; and to such a degree he had no refreshment of the punishments, that he demanded the refreshment of the extreme finger of the poor man, dipped in water."

◊ 3. Right margin: Psalm 68:3. [Vulgate Psalm 68 = Psalm 69 in the Hebrew numbering.]

◊ 4. Right margin: Luke 16:24.

The divine Augustine — [in] epistle 57 to Dardanus, epistle 99 to Evodius, and in book 12 On Genesis to the Letter — seems to refute this opinion for a twofold cause: first, because in the Gospel there is said to be a vast chaos, and a deep and impassable gulf set between the bosom of Abraham (where Lazarus enjoyed solace) and Hell (where the rich man burned in torments); then, because, since in the sacred Letters nowhere is the name of the infernal [places] found to be taken in a good sense, it is not credible that that rest, in which Lazarus with the other souls of the holy Fathers rejoiced, was among the Infernal [places]. The Scholastic theologians teach that the bosom of Abraham and Hell are the same in situation, [but] differ in quality; [being] moreover enclosed by the same enclosure of a subterranean place — as Jerome rightly holds — each is comprised together, yet so that they are distinguished into a supreme and a lowest region by some interval. But the quality of each region is so diverse, that there [in the one] were of old the refreshments of pious souls, but here [in the other] are the perpetual punishments of the impious; and that [gulf], moreover, [is] χάσμα, that is, an immense gap, lying between each region — whether Augustine understood it corporeally, or spiritually, as a most firm law of God, as [it were] by a certain impermeable abyss prohibiting the commingling of these and those. Nothing prohibits but that the bosom of Abraham and Hell are comprehended in the same circuit of the earthly cavity.[5] But to that which Augustine says — that nowhere is Hell called in a good sense — Thomas, in the fourth volume of the Sentences, distinction 45, question 1, responds plainly in these words: "The place and state of the holy Fathers, as to that which it had of good, was called the bosom of Abraham; but as to that which it had of defect, was called hell: and so neither is the bosom of Abraham taken in an evil sense, nor hell in a good sense — although in a certain manner they are one."

◊ 5. Right margin: In what manner the bosom of Abraham and Hell differ.

Annotation CCLXII [contents]

"The burden of the word of the Lord to Israel, by the hand of Malachi," etc. — Malachi 1:1

Whether an Angel was the author of the book of Malachi.

Origen, following the edition of the LXX — who, for that which in Hebrew is put בְּיַד־מַלְאָכִי (Be-yad Malachi), translated ἐν χειρὰ ἰγγέλου, that is, "By the hand of the angel" — asserted that the author of this book was an incarnate Angel; which Jerome, who thinks that the author of the volume was Ezra, indicated in the preface of Malachi in these words: "Origen wrote three volumes upon this book, but he touched not the history [literal sense] at all; and, after his manner, being wholly occupied in the allegorical interpretation, he made no mention of Ezra, but, thinking [it] to have been an Angel who wrote [it] — according to that [saying] which we read concerning John,[6] 'Behold, I send my angel before thy face' — which we altogether do not" →

◊ 6. Right margin: Matthew 11:10.

[…continues on folio 622 (PDF p. 439): the rest of Jerome against Origen on the authorship of Malachi, and the end of Liber Quintus (Annotatio CCLXII →).]

(printed folio 622 [PDF p. 439]. Annot. CCLXII (concl.)–CCLXIV — the end of Liber Quintus (Malachi 1:1–2 Maccabees 7:41): Origen's fancy that John the Baptist, Malachi, and Haggai were incarnate Angels (rejected by Jerome); whether election and reprobation spring from foreknowledge of merits (Jerome vs. the Pelagians); and CCLXIV, the 264th and final annotation — whether the Maccabees' mother died of joy (Marius Victorinus's verse) or was martyred by Antiochus (Josephus, the Fathers' view). The Fifth Book here ends: "QVINTI LIBRI FINIS. F. Sixtus.")

(folio 622 — the last folio of Liber Quintus; left column → right column)

Annotation CCLXII (concluded)

"The burden of the word of the Lord to Israel, by the hand of Malachi," etc. — Malachi 1:1

(Jerome against Origen concludes:) "...[which we] altogether do not receive, lest we be compelled to admit the falls of Souls from heaven." And in the commentaries on Haggai, chapter 1, repeating the same more fully, he says: "Certain [persons] think that John the Baptist, and Malachi (which is interpreted 'Angel of the Lord'), and Haggai were Angels, and, by the dispensation and command of God, assumed human bodies, and were conversant among men — nor [is it] a wonder that this was believed concerning Angels, since for our salvation even the Son of God assumed a human body. And for this cause also they furnish testimony from the apocrypha, where it is said that Jacob (who afterward was called Israel) was an angel, and that on that account he supplanted [his] brother in the womb of his mother; and that John, too, exulted at the voice of the mother of the Lord in the womb of Elizabeth; and that there is one nature of all rational [beings]; and that for this cause men who have pleased God are made equal to the Angels. Let those [persons] hold this opinion: but we [hold] otherwise." This passage is had in Origen, volume 2 on the Gospel of John, and in book 3 of the Peri Archon.

Annotation CCLXIII [contents]

"I have loved Jacob, but Esau I have hated." — Malachi 1:2, 3

Whether election and reprobation are from the foreknowledge of merits.

Jerome, in the commentary on Malachi, explaining this, seems not to be far from the opinion of the Pelagians, saying that election and reprobation arise from the foreknowledge of merits, since indeed he writes in this manner: "Moreover, the love and hatred of God arises either from the foreknowledge of things to come, or from works: otherwise we know that God loves all things, and hates nothing of those [things] which he created; but properly he vindicates to his love those who are enemies of the vices, and rebels [against them]; and, on the contrary, he hates those who desire to build up again the [things] destroyed by God."

See below, Annotation 251 of book 6.

Annotation CCLXIV [contents]

"But last of all, after the sons, the mother also was consumed," etc. — 2 Maccabees 7:41

Whether the mother of the Maccabees died of joy.

Marius Victorinus, the preceptor of St. Jerome, in the book on the Maccabees which he composed in heroic verse, expressing the sense of that word "Consumpta est" [she was consumed] — for which in the Greek is had ἐτελεύτησεν [she died] — seems to indicate that the mother of the Maccabees did not perish, slain by the hands of the executioners, but that, after the slaughter of the last and younger son, [she died] the amplitude of joy and gladness being exhausted [i.e., overcome by an excess of joy]: since, on account of the triumphs obtained over death by [her] seven sons, she had conceived [so great a joy]; which sentiment he not inelegantly expressed in these verses:

(left column ends; the right column concludes:)

While the boy bears these things, the joys undid the mother. And now, as she was, unstrung by [her] woes, now with voice failing, Sighing, and collapsed amid the hands of her own, She fell down lifeless, and [her] loosened limbs grew still. So she too, with [her] sons, was received into the portion of the saints. (Dum puer ista gerit soluerunt gaudia matrem. / Iamque, ut erat laxata malis, iam voce negata / Suspirans, interque manus collapsa suorum, / Concidit exanimis, resolutaque membra quierunt. / Sic ipsa, & nati sanctorum in parte recepta est.)

This sense, although the historical record does not reject it (for Livy also has handed down to memory that, after the noble battle at Trasimene, two mothers, their sons being received back unexpectedly, were extinguished by excessive joy)[1] — nevertheless all ecclesiastical writers hand down that she was killed by the lictors with various tortures and torments, according to Polybius of Megalopolis, who writes these things concerning her: "Last of all, her single sons being consumed, the admirable parent of such great champions, in the cruel butchery of punishments, suddenly, [her] knees being bent, besought from God the dissolution of the body: for [she had drawn out the time] not by desire of living, but had prolonged so much time only for the sake of [her] sons. Antiochus, therefore, gnashing [in his throat], orders the noble mother to be afflicted; she is snatched away tyrannically, is stripped in [her] tender limbs, [her] hands are bound aloft, the old woman is struck with scourges, she mourns with wounded breasts; and, condemned to the frying-pan of flame, she of her own accord accompanies her burnt sons into the punishments, and, extended in prayer, and [her] hands raised up as though for child-bearing mothers, being poured out [prostrate], she poured forth [her] chaste spirit." This opinion of Josephus all the Christian Fathers receive, as it is said, with open arms.

◊ 1. Right margin: The mother of the Maccabees was killed by the lictors.

QVINTI LIBRI FINIS.

[THE END OF THE FIFTH BOOK.]

— F. Sixtus [Senensis]

BIBLIOTHECA SANCTA — BOOK VI

Annotations and Censures on the interpreters & expositors of the New Testament

---

(printed p. 429 [PDF p. 434], recto — the end of Book V (not translated), then the Book VI title-block, prefatory paragraph, and Ann. I–III, on Matthew 1. Read order: left column, then right.)

BIBLIOTHECA SANCTA — BOOK VI

By Friar Sixtus of Siena, of the Order of Preachers: On the ANNOTATIONS AND CENSURES upon the interpreters & expositors of the divine volumes of the New Testament — [being] of the Bibliotheca Sancta (the Holy Library)

(full-width prefatory paragraph:)

Although in the preface of the preceding book I had promised to comprise all the annotations upon the expositors of both Testaments together in a single volume — lest I should sunder matters joined by the affinity of one and the same kind, and rashly multiply the number of books — nevertheless, when I observed that the annotating labor I had begun was swelling to a magnitude far greater than my expectation, and was exceeding the measure of the other volumes, it seemed good [to me] to divide the work into two books, and to embrace in this sixth book of the Library the Annotations and Censures which pertain to the expositors of the New Testament: so that by a partition of this kind I might, so far as could be done, preserve the equality [balance] among the volumes, and might breathe [rest] for some few days from the unremitting weariness of reading and writing.

(the two-column Annotations begin — left column:)

Annotation I [contents]

"The book of the generation of JESUS CHRIST." — Matthew 1[:1]

[margin: Sacred reading.]

Chrysostom, homily 2 on Matthew — in which he expounds the beginning of this Gospel — not far from the end asserts that the reading and study of divine Scripture pertains more to secular [laypeople] than to monks, and is more necessary to the former than to the latter. See what we have annotated on this below, at Annotation 152.

Annotation II [contents]

"And Judas begat Phares and Zara of Thamar." — Matthew 1[:3]

[margin: Thamar.]

Chrysostom, homily 3 on Matthew, accuses Thamar as a harlot — whom elsewhere he defends from the charge of fornication. You should be mindful of the things that were said in the preceding volume, at Annotation 114 of the fifth book [the print gives "113", an error of the press: the Thamar annotation is the 114th].

(right column:)

Annotation III [contents]

"Jacob begat Joseph, the husband of Mary." — Matthew 1[:16]

[margin: On the marriage of Mary and Joseph.]

Jerome, in the first book of [his] commentaries on this passage of Matthew, says: "When you hear 'husband,' let no suspicion of nuptials [marital intercourse] steal over you, but recall the usage of the Scriptures — that betrothed men are called 'husbands' and betrothed women 'wives.'" The same [Jerome], alluding to this same sense in his book Against Helvidius, says that Joseph was rather the guardian of Mary than her husband. The scholastic theologians make use of this passage when, for the sake of disputation, they undertake to show that between Mary and Joseph there was no true sacrament of matrimony. Meeting [answering] them, St. Thomas, in the third volume of the Summa, question 29, says that Jerome, by the word "husband" and "married man," signified him who has already entered upon [taken to himself] his spouse; but by "nuptials," the nuptial intercourse of bridegroom and bride — of which Mary and Joseph were wholly without experience, content with the sole and indivisible union of [minds…]

[…the sentence runs on to p. 430 (PDF 435): "…of minds — which [union] is the first, and…"]

(printed p. 430 [PDF p. 435], verso — end of Ann. III and Ann. IIII–VI, on Matthew 1 (the Opus imperfectum against marriage). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation III from p. 429:)

…[content] with the sole and indivisible union of minds — which is the first and chief dignity of true and holy matrimony, and its most essential form.

Annotation IIII [contents]

"When his mother Mary was betrothed." — Matthew 1[:18]

[margin: On Matrimony.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum on Matthew, in the first homily, expounding this passage, seems to slip into the error of Marcion, Tatian, and Montanus, who condemn marriage. For he says that matrimony is by its very nature a sin, but permitted by God for necessity's sake, and consequently that it neither pleases God nor has any reward. And he sets forth this opinion in these words:

> "The marital union, as regards the nature of the thing itself, is a sin; but by God's concession a license has been granted. A license, I say, has been granted — not a righteousness. For although, by reason of the necessity of the thing, it has ceased to be a sin, yet it has not merited to be a righteousness. And so to those who use it, though it inflicts no penalty, yet it yields no reward; though it does not kill, yet it does not save. Whence the prophet — looking not to the indulgence of God, but to the foulness of the act itself — said, 'Behold, I was conceived in iniquities, and in sins did my mother conceive me' [Ps. 50:7]: that is, what wonder if I have sinned, who am born of sin? For the nature of sin has attended its own begetting. For if matrimony itself were pleasing to God, never would a glorious crown be promised to those who abstain from it; nor would those who hate it be so loved by God. For he is not rewarded who flees the good, but he who flees the evil.
>
> "Do you wish to know how matrimony is lawful? — how once it was even lawful to have sisters as wives? how Cain and Abel had [them]? These are the names of the daughters of Adam, whom he had in the beginning after Cain and Abel — Risam and Edoclam — and they did not sin, because the scarcity of men and necessity excused that fault. Afterward, as the number of men grew, that evil returned into its own nature and began to be a sin; yet it remained in use, so that one man was allowed to have several wives. Then, the world being enlarged, this evil too resumed its own nature and began to be a sin; yet it remained in use, so that one man should have one wife. But now, after the fullness of time has come and the world has grown old, we know what the counsel of God is, and what he wills, and what is pleasing before him. Yet we have not dared to say [it outright], on account of incontinent men — in whose body the soul does nothing, but blood wholly possesses them, and that most filthy vapor proceeding from that insane fire.
>
> "Finally, when the angel commanded Tobias, at his nuptials, that before they came together according to that human custom they should first rise and pray, and say thus: 'Lord, thou knowest that not for lust have I taken a wife, but for the sake of procreating children' [Tob. 8] — for had he prayed otherwise, his prayer would not have been pleasing to God — see, therefore, that only the sake of children excuses that most base work of the flesh. But now, the world being multiplied, the occasion for creating men is extinguished; now not the multitude of men, but the charity of the saints, delights God. Behold, there is one lust which begets fornication, and [another] which supplies the marital use. But just as the shores set a boundary for the sea, saying, 'Thus far shalt thou come, and here shalt thou be constrained' — so marriage set a boundary for carnal lust, that coming just so far, it might there restrain itself. As therefore the sea, if it overpass its shores, transgresses, so also a man, if he transgress the marital license. If therefore the lust in married men and in adulterers is one and the same, how can it come about that one and the same thing should for one half be righteousness and for the other half be sin? For either it is wholly sin or wholly righteousness, since it is one thing; but it is true that lust is not righteousness — therefore it is wholly sin. Yet the penalty of that sin is not imputed, until this hateful and corruptible world pass away." — Thus far, in the first homily.

Again, in homily 82, on that passage of Matthew 19 ("Moses, on account of [your] hardness," etc.), speaking of second marriages, he says: "Even the Apostles enjoined [people] to enter upon second marriages on account of the incontinence of men. For to take a second [wife] is according to the Apostle's precept; but according to the standard of truth, it is truly fornication. Yet while it is committed publicly and licitly, God permitting, it becomes an honorable fornication."

(right column:)

Annotation V [contents]

"Fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife." — Matthew 1[:20]

[margin: Joseph in doubt.]

Hilary, in the first canon on Matthew, says: "But most depraved men presume from this [passage] that our Lord is recorded to have had several brothers — who, if they had been Mary's, and not rather begotten of Joseph by a former marriage, [she] would never at the time of the Passion have been assigned as mother to John the Apostle." See what we remark on these things below, at Annotation 64.

Annotation VI [contents]

"For that which is born in her is of the Holy Ghost." — Matthew 1[:20]

[margin: On the Holy Spirit.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum on Matthew, in homily 1, explaining this passage, seems to assert that the Holy Spirit was, in Christ's conception, in place of seed — speaking thus: "The Only-begotten God being about to enter the Virgin, the Holy Spirit went before, so that — the Holy Spirit going before — Christ might be born in sanctification according to the body, the divinity entering in place of seed." This opinion Augustine, in Sermon 191 On the Season, seems to attack in these words: "We do NOT say — as certain most wicked men suppose — that the Holy Spirit was in place of seed, but [that the conception was] wrought by the power and virtue of the Creator." St. Thomas, in the third part of the Summa Theologica, question 32, article 2 — citing the former opinion under the name of Chrysostom, but the latter under the name of Jerome — reconciles the two thus: he says that Chrysostom, by the term "seed," did not understand the substance of seed (which is wont to be transmuted in the conception of a fetus, and which in Christ's conception Jerome deservedly abhors), but wished to signify the agent power of the Lord's incarnation — which was the Holy Spirit himself — the angel saying to Mary, "The power of the Most High shall overshadow thee" [Luke 1:35].

[catchword "An-" → Annotation VII, on p. 431 (PDF 436).]

(printed p. 431 [PDF p. 436], recto — Ann. VII–X, on Matthew 2 (the Magi; Origen and the magic art; astrology begins). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column:)

Annotation VII [contents]

"Magi come from the East." — Matthew 2[:1]

[margin: Whether angels are living beings.]

Gregory, in the tenth homily on the Gospels, at its beginning — inquiring why an angel appeared to the shepherds, but a star to the Magi — answers that to the Jews, as [people] using reason, a rational animal (that is, an angel) ought to make the proclamation. St. Thomas, in part 1 of the Summa Theologica, question 51, notes that this passage is appealed to by those who hold that angels are living beings composed of soul and body. Refer back, above, to Annotation 8 of book 5.

Annotation VIII [contents]

"The Magi, seeing the star," etc. — Matthew 2[:2]

[margin: Whether the magic art is evil.]

Origen, in the fifth treatise on Matthew — expounding the history of the Magi, as Polychronius reports [in his commentary] on Ezekiel — commended the magic art in the highest degree. And Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, the perpetual enemy of Origen's name, censuring this more sharply than was fair, in the second Paschal book inveighs against Origen thus: "Let Origen be confounded, who — among the other kinds of outrages that he fabricates, lending patronage to the magic arts as well — spoke in his Treatises in these words: 'The magic art does not seem to me to be the name of anything that subsists; but, even if it does exist, it is not [a thing] of evil operation, nor such as can be held in contempt.' By saying this he shows himself, at all events, a partisan of Elymas the magician — who withstood the Apostles — and of Jannes and Mambres, who resisted Moses by the magic arts, etc." — But since Origen so often, in his writings, detests the sorceries of the magicians — and especially in the 23rd homily on Numbers, where in a long discourse from the divine testimonies he lays low the magi, the sorcerers, and every kind of enchanter — there is no ground why we should suspect such things of Origen.

And, lest anyone be moved by the aforesaid testimonies of Polychronius and Theophilus, it must be known that Magic is twofold: the one — everywhere condemned by Origen — which, entered into by pacts with demons, works either truly or in appearance; the other — praised by Origen — which pertains to the practice of natural philosophy, teaching that admirable things are wrought by the mutual application of natural powers acting and being acted upon one another. This division Jerome embraces in the first book of [his] commentaries on Daniel, on those words of chapter 2, "The king commanded that the soothsayers, and the magi, and the sorcerers, and the Chaldeans be summoned" — where, noting why Daniel distinguished the magi from the sorcerers, soothsayers, and Chaldeans, he writes thus: "Those whom we have rendered 'soothsayers,' the rest [have rendered] epaoidous — that is, 'enchanters' — seem to me to be those who accomplish the matter by words; the magi, those who philosophize about particular things; the sorcerers [malefici], those who use blood and victims and often touch the bodies of the dead. Moreover, by 'Chaldeans' I think the genethliaci are meant, whom common usage calls 'mathematicians' [astrologers]. But common custom takes 'magi' for 'sorcerers,' though they are held otherwise among their own nation, in that they are the philosophers of the Chaldeans; and to the science of this art kings too, and the princes of that same nation, devote everything. Whence also, at the nativity of the Lord and Savior, they were the first to understand his birth; and coming into holy Bethlehem, they adored the child, the star showing him from above." The same [Jerome], in the second book against Jovinian, says: "Eubulus, who wrote the history of Mithras in many volumes, relates that among the Persians there are three kinds of magi, of whom the first — who are the most learned and most eloquent — take, besides meal and vegetables, nothing further as food."

(continuing in the right column:)

This [says] Jerome: before whom Justin, philosopher and martyr, had approved the same distinction in the book of Questions [put forward by the gentile nations], questions 24 and 26 — in which, discussing what difference there is between the miracles of the Egyptian magicians and [those] of Moses, and between the miracles of Christ and [those] of Apollonius of Tyana, the philosopher or magician, he speaks thus: "Those miracles which were performed by Moses were divine works performed — namely, through a change of the nature of the water, which was carried over into the nature of that which was being effected. But those which the magicians performed were works of demons performed, who brought it about that the eyes of those who beheld [it] seemed to see a serpent, blood, and frogs — which did not [really] exist. And Apollonius indeed, a man endowed with knowledge of natural faculties, and of the harmonies and contrary affections which are in them, out of that art produced his operations — not by divine authority. And so in all [his] accomplishments he needed the taking up of a suitable material; by whose help he completed what was being brought about. But our Savior Christ, performing marvelous and unwonted works by his own divine authority and right, nowhere required matter, but [only] a command."

Annotation IX [contents]

"We have seen his star." — Matthew 2[:2]

[margin: Whether the prophecy of Numbers 24 is to be understood of the star seen by the Magi.]

Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa [Conza], in the second book of [his] Annotations, refutes Thomas Cajetan; because, examining this passage, [Cajetan] denied that that Balaamic prophecy of Numbers 24 — "A star shall arise out of Jacob," etc. — signified the rising of the star which pointed out Christ's birth: against the authority of all the holy fathers, among whom Jerome, in the first commentary on Matthew, says: "For the confounding of the Jews — that they might learn Christ's nativity from the gentiles — a star arises in the East, which Balaam (whose successors [the Magi] were) had known by prophecy would come to be. Read on this the book of Numbers." This [says] Jerome.

Annotation X [contents]

"We have seen his star." — Matthew 2

[margin: Whether Christ's nativity could be foreknown from genethliacal [astrological] divinations.]

Peter d'Ailly (Petrus Aliacus), cardinal-priest — disputing in his 30th Question on Genesis, and in the book On Laws and Sects, concerning the star seen by the Magi in the East — shows that those Magi, being most skilled in the science of the stars, could from astrological contemplations have foreknown the coming nativity and life of Christ; yet not with that certainty by which they afterward recognized Christ's birth when the new star pointed it out.

[signature "Nn 2"; catchword "nam" → continues on p. 432 (PDF 437).]

(printed p. 432 [PDF p. 437], verso — Ann. X cont., on Matthew 2 (d'Ailly's astrology; a nativity-horoscope figure; Augustine contra). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation X:)

…For although Christ's conception and nativity exceed all the powers of the heavens and all the faculties of nature in most respects, yet in some [respects] the virtues of the heavens and stars — like handmaids serving their lord — most abundantly furnished to the newborn Christ the friendly lights and benign influences which they had received from Christ. For that reason it was possible for the Magi, besides this appearance of the recent star, to have foreknown by two other indications that a man distinguished in religion, empire, and glory was to be born:

First, from a certain great conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn — which, in the sixth year before our Savior's birth, came together in the sign of Cancer, all the astronomers of those times predicting that a great change of religions was portended.

Second, from observation of the configuration of the heaven which Christ's nativity itself had. It fell in the 42nd year of Octavian Augustus, on the eighth of the Kalends of January [25 December], before midnight; and in it the ascendant was the eighth degree of Virgo (which signifies changes of religion); and at the midheaven [was] Saturn, the Sun holding the nadir, and the other planets arranged in that order which the following astronomical diagram represents to you — drawn for the latitude of the city of Jerusalem, distant thirty-six degrees from the Equator.

> [Figure] — caption: "The configuration of the planets shining upon the nativity of our Savior Jesus Christ."
>
> A square (diamond-in-square) horoscope chart, centrally titled "FIGURE OF THE HEAVEN AT THE TIME OF THE NATIVITY OF CHRIST." The twelve houses carry zodiac signs and degrees with planetary symbols — legible among them: Leo 15°, Cancer, Saturn (♄) 15° and Jupiter (♃) near the midheaven, Virgo 8° (ascendant region), Scorpio 8°, Sun (☉) 1°, Aquarius 15°, with the lunar nodes and Mars, Venus, and Mercury distributed around the remaining cusps.

This is d'Ailly's opinion; which long before, Albert [the Great] — great in his own age — had professed. In the book to which he gave the title Speculum [The Mirror], reporting the description of the sign Virgo handed down by the astronomer Albumasar, he left it written thus: "Albumasar, in his greater Introductorium, treatise six, says: There ascends, in the first face [decan] of that sign [Virgo], a Virgin beautiful and honorable, holding in her hand two ears of grain, and she nurses a boy — and a certain nation calls that boy JESUS; and the star of Virgo ascends with her." Thus he. But we know that our Lord Jesus Christ was born under the ascendant of that same Virgo — together with this, that the equation of the motion of the eighth sphere at the time of the same [nativity] was eight degrees and thirty minutes, according to a most certain calculation; and that it was then to be subtracted from the places of the planets found by the canons [tables]. Not because [the Creator] is subject to the motion of the stars, or most desirous of judging the newborn by them — he who had created the stars themselves — but because, when he stretched out the heaven like a skin, forming the book of the universe, he did not wish its lettering to be missing from among these things which, according to his providence, are written in the book of eternity; [nor missing] that most elegant [sign] from nature, that [Christ] should be born of a Virgin — so that assuredly by this it might be signified [that here was] a real and fleshly man who was not being born in the natural way: not that the figure of the heaven was the cause why he should be born, but rather a signification; nay, and more truly, he himself was the cause why the manner of his admirable nativity should be signified through the heaven. Thus far Albert — or someone else under his name; for that book is denied by the learned to be Albert's.

(right column:)

Augustine disproves this opinion in the fifth book of The City of God, chapter 1. There, after refuting those who say that the stars are efficient causes, in infants' birth-charts, and distribute to each one being born his lots and fates, he then also confutes those who teach that the positions of the stars at infants' births are not causes but only signs — signs which signify the future life, character, and fortune of the one being born — writing thus:

> "If it be said that the stars rather signify these things than effect them, so that their position is, as it were, a kind of utterance foretelling the future and not producing it (for this was the opinion of no mean men) — as, for example, that Mars so placed signifies a murderer but does not make a murderer — how comes it that the astrologers could never say why, in the life of twins (in their actions, events, professions, arts, honors, and the other things pertaining to human life, and in death itself) there is often so great a diversity that, as far as these matters are concerned, many strangers are more alike to them than the twins are to each other? — twins separated at birth by the tiniest interval of time, yet conceived by one act of intercourse and sown in one and the same moment."

And below, in the third chapter of the same book, he refutes those who, from the response of Nigidius Figulus, referred that disparity of twins to the whirling of the celestial rotation — which, by the swiftness of both births, would change each infant's horoscope in a tiny moment of time. He speaks thus:

> "In vain is that famous conceit of the potter's wheel brought forward, which they say Nigidius — disturbed by this question, whence he was called Figulus [the Potter] — gave in answer. For when he had spun a potter's wheel with all the force he could, he struck it twice with ink, as it ran, as though at one and the same spot, with utmost speed. Then, when the motion had stopped, the marks he had made were found on the rim of that wheel separated by no small interval. So, he says, given the great rapidity of the heavens, even if one twin be born after another with as much speed as I struck the wheel twice, [that interval] amounts to a very great distance in the space of the heavens. Hence come, he says, all those most dissimilar things reported in the characters and fortunes of twins." — This fabrication is more fragile than the vessels which are shaped by that rotation. For if there is so great a difference in the heaven, which by the constellations is compre-

[margin: Suetonius writes that Nigidius, having ascertained the hour of Octavian's birth, foretold that a lord of the world had been born.]

> [catchword "pre-" → "comprehended…" continues on p. 433 (PDF 438).]

(printed p. 433 [PDF p. 438], recto — Ann. X cont., on Matthew 2 (astrology condemned at Trent; the Saravallius affair). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation X:)

…be comprehended, such that to one of two twins the inheritance falls and to the other it does not — why do they dare, concerning others who are not twins, once they have inspected their constellations, to pronounce such things as pertain to that secret which no one can grasp, and to record [them] by the moments of those being born? etc.

From these words of Augustine it is clear that the divination of those who, from the significations of the horoscoping stars, foretell the future outcomes of birth-charts is false and empty — both because there are in the stars no such significations of contingent things, and because, even were they granted to be present, they could be grasped by no human ingenuity. It is likewise plain that the excuses of the recent astrologers are cold and worthless. Of these, some defend their superstition by saying that they ascribe to the stars no efficient force that compels by producing [effects] and imposes necessity, but only a force that inclines; others, consulting for themselves by a more honorable evasion (as they think), say that they deny to the constellations even that very faculty of inclining, and profess in them only a certainty of signifying and forewarning.

Accordingly, the holy Synod of Trent, desiring utterly to overthrow whatever defenses these men make, counted all the judgments of the genethliac art — nay, of the imposture — among the other impieties of sacrilegious divination; and, drawing no distinction between the astromancers who divine either from the efficiency or from the signification of the stars, condemned indiscriminately all their studies and writings, whatever they be, in these words: [margin: In the Index of books condemned by the Synod of Trent, Rule 9.]

"All books and writings of geomancy, hydromancy, aeromancy, pyromancy, onomancy, chiromancy, necromancy — or in which are contained sortileges, sorceries, auguries, auspices, incantations of the magic art — are utterly rejected. And let the bishops diligently see to it that the books, treatises, and indexes of judiciary astrology be not read or kept — [those] which dare to affirm that something will certainly come to pass concerning future contingent outcomes, or fortuitous chances, or those actions which depend on the human will."

You have what pertains to this argument in book 5, Annotations 15 and 81, and in book 2, under the heading Of Curious Arts.

While I was preparing these things, a certain Saravallius — a theologian not unlearned, but marvelously addicted to the vanity of judiciary [astrology] — fell in with a venal copyist to whom I had given this work to transcribe. And, with that man's connivance and unbeknownst to me, having read through a great part of the volume at his place, and having read this annotation among the rest, a little later he tore my name to shreds in a company of learned and noble men — clamoring that I was an enemy of the good arts, [I] who affirm that astrology is not an art but a detestable deception and imposture; whereas on the contrary (he said) the divine Thomas — whose very doctrine I profess — approves astrological divinations in many places, and all the learned confess the science of astrology to be most true and excellent; and that it, if rightly understood and handled by those who know it well, presents most useful and admirable predictions of the future. He added also, from the most approved historians, for the confirmation of his opinion, a long catalogue of astrologers who most certainly foretold [things] concerning the births, life, death, reigns, wars, victories, and the other outcomes — both fortunate and unfortunate — of kings and emperors. Finally, after a lengthy enumeration of examples, he inferred that I, driven by some hidden force of the truth I was assailing, had myself gone over to the astrologers' opinion — since, in the fourth book of this work, I wrote that certain poets, [gifted] for illustrating Christian poesy and singing sacred poems, were born under a most happy star. [margin: pp. 352 & 398.]

(right column:)

When certain friends had reported these things to me, and had warned that the accuser's complaints were not to be neglected (by which even some of those noble men seemed moved), I resolved to meet the adversary's accusations with words of peace [as far as I could], and to satisfy my friends' desire.

First, then: when he grieves that astrology is called by me not an art but an imposture and a fraud, I confess — and freely declare — that it is so, provided the word "astrology" signify astromancy, or genesiology, or genethliomancy — that is, the profession of nativity-divination, which from the birth-stars of mortals conjectures the whole course of [a person's] life. For who, unless he be utterly mad, would dare to call this insane deception an "art," or reckon it a "science" — one confirmed by no solid reason, resting on no certain experiment, proved by no authority of the wise; but which the philosophers hiss off the schools' stage as a mockery, the imperial laws condemn, the decrees of the pontiffs and the synodical sanctions forbid, the divine Scripture detests, and the judgments of all theologians reprove? [margin: Divination is reproved in the sacred writings — Deut. 18; Isa. 47; Jer. 10; Gal. 4; and in the Decretum, cause 26, q. 7; in the Council of Trent, Index Rule 9; likewise in the Code of Justinian, under the title "On Astrologers," the law "Nemo."]

But he says: "If the study of such astrologers is vanity and an empty fiction, how comes it that they, from the configuration of the stars shining upon nativities, predict many true things?" Indeed, this is that singular and chief demonstration of the diviners, on which — as on an immovable foundation — they rest the whole edifice of their divination. But how slippery and weak it is, Basil, Chrysostom, Augustine, and other ancient doctors have openly uncovered, in various disputations published against the astrologers; in which they excellently demonstrated that the truth of those predictions is not to be referred to observations of the constellations (which are mere dreams), but to four other, more powerful and more evident causes — namely, to chance, to pacts [with demons], to the prudence of those consulted, and to the folly of those consulting.

First, indeed, the planetary [astrologers] utter most true things not by the art of the inspected stars, but by chance — chance, I say, understood according to the pious definition of the theologians: that is, from the hidden disposition of divine providence. Which (as Augustine says in the fourth and seventh [books] of the Confessions) sometimes so stirs the blind and wicked minds of those consulted, by a certain hidden instinct, that unwittingly they utter what those consulting ought to hear — whether from their own deserts or from the abyss of [God's] just judgment. So it once befell among the pagans, that while some, from the poems of a poet who was singing and intending something far different, [drew lots and found]

[signature "Nn 3"; catchword "sor-" → "chance…" (the sortes Virgilianae) continues on p. 434 (PDF 439).]

(printed p. 434 [PDF p. 439], verso — Ann. X cont., on Matthew 2 (the four causes of true astrological predictions). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation X:)

…[some, consulting] lots, chanced upon verses wonderfully consonant with their present or future affairs — as [befell] Alexander Severus, who, while still a youth and not [yet] hoping for the empire, was searching the Virgilian lots, and verses came out of the sixth [book] of the Aeneid which portended to him the future empire, in these words:

"Thou, O Roman, remember to rule the peoples with [thy] sway

(these shall be thine arts), and to impose the custom of peace, to spare the subjected and to war down the proud."

But if, at the nod of the divine lot, responses have sometimes come forth from songs of this kind as different from the thoughts of their own authors as they were congruous with the outcomes of those consulting — what wonder if, from an astrologer who knows nothing of what he says, true prognostications occasionally fall out? — his tongue being governed by him who drew most true oracles of the future not only from the mouth of Balaam, the soothsayer and false prophet, but even from the mouth of the ass on which that diviner sat.

Secondly, many things said by the astrologers — and, as foretold, coming to pass — [happen] not from the astromantic discipline (which is nothing), but from a fellowship and pacts established between them and the demons; concerning which Augustine, in the fifth book of The City of God, chapter 7, speaks thus: "All these things being considered, it is not without reason believed that, when astrologers give many marvelously true answers, this comes about by the hidden instinct of spirits that are not good — whose care it is to insinuate and confirm in human minds these false and noxious opinions about astral fates; and not [by any] horoscope observed and inspected by some art, which is nothing." And in the second book On Genesis according to the Letter, chapter 17, explaining the same thing more fully, he says: "It must be admitted that, when true things are told by them, they are told by a certain most hidden instinct which human minds unknowingly undergo. And since this is done to deceive men, it is the operation of seducing spirits — to whom it is permitted to know certain true things about temporal matters: partly by the keenness of a subtler perception, partly because they thrive in subtler bodies, partly by a shrewder experience owing to their great length of life, partly [by information] from the holy angels — since the demons themselves learn from omnipotent God, the angels revealing [it] to them at his command, [God] who distributes human deserts with the sincerity of a most hidden justice. But sometimes those same nefarious spirits also foretell, as if divining, the very things which they themselves are about to do." Wherefore a good Christian must beware of the astrologers — or of any who impiously divine, especially when they tell true things — lest, by fellowship with demons, they ensnare the deceived soul by a kind of pact of association.

Thirdly, the prognostications of the astromancers are very often fulfilled even without any consideration of the stars, from the mere foresight of moral prudence — to which it belongs not only to recall the past and behold the present, but also to look ahead to the future and to foresee, long beforehand, what is to come. For there are certain men so prudent, both by nature and by practice, that from men's temperaments, inclinations, virtues, and vices — and from their friendships and enmities, means, affairs, pursuits, and opportunities — they foreknow much that will befall them, and utter it with such constancy of assertion that they are rarely deceived. Thus Hannibal, a most prudent general — having perceived the rashness and inexperience of Terentius Varro, the Roman consul — predicted with great confidence victory for the Africans and disaster for the Romans; the prediction being confirmed a little later by the outcome of the battle, most disastrous for the Romans fighting at Trasimene. And — that I may not fetch examples from abroad — so, in recent years, when our Sienese republic was ablaze with implacable civil discord, seditions, and internecine wars, there were not lacking very many excellent citizens who, destitute of all knowledge of the stars, foretold the present calamity of the ruined republic and city: and that not from astrological outcomes, but from the judgment of civil prudence, whose most certain canon is this — THAT THE DISCORDS OF SEDITIOUS CITIZENS PORTEND INEVITABLE RUIN TO STATES. By this reasoning, then, it comes about that sometimes the planetary [astrologers], knowledgeable of political affairs, foretell many most true things even against the astrological canons — for example, that a prince raging tyrannically against his citizens will be slain by his own [people]; that a man living by continual theft and robbery will perish by the hanging of the gallows; that a despiser of religion and mocker of the saints will be burned in the flames — because, from a prudence confirmed by very many experiences, they know that such crimes prepare such penalties for those [who commit them].

(right column:)

The fourth and last cause, for which divinations of this kind hit their foreseen marks, is the folly of those consulting — or [their] foolish credulity, by which the inquirers easily believe from their consultants those things which they themselves either most eagerly pursue or flee. For that credulity is wont to inject into the credulous minds of the consulters either the hope of happiness promised by the diviner, or the fear of calamity announced by him. And these two affections frequently bring it about that human affairs attain their foretold ends. For just as hope and confidence boldly undertake difficult tasks and complete them successfully and splendidly, so dread and fear begin things timidly and carry through what is begun basely and unsuccessfully. And hence it sometimes happens that some greedy or ambitious inquirer — believing and hoping that he will easily attain the riches or honors promised by the astromancer — applies a mind steeled with great confidence, and all his powers and pursuits, to attaining that man's promises. And since it does sometimes happen that what is sought with unremitting labor and utmost diligence is found, it follows too that occasionally the pursuers of riches and honors attain (God permitting) those resources and dignities which the astrologer had foretold them — by a response indeed fortuitous, and produced by no art of the consultant, but so received by the consulter and stored up in his mind as if it were an oracle of most certain authority and undoubted trustworthiness. We have an example of this in the Roman armies: among whom, as Livy writes, when the auguries and auspices — secretly inspected by their keepers — threatened an unlucky and mournful expedition, the augurs, lest they should dismay the soldier setting out to war with a deadly announcement, turning [it] into the con-

[catchword "con-" → "contrary…" continues on p. 435 (PDF 440).]

(printed p. 435 [PDF p. 440], recto — end of Ann. X, on Matthew 2 (physical vs. fictitious astrology; Aquinas). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation X:)

…[turning it] into the contrary interpretation of the auspices, they lied that all things — favorable and triumphal — were shown by the gods. By which lie the soldiers, usefully deceived, fought with such alacrity and courage of spirit that they routed those very enemies to whom the Roman auguries were [in fact] promising victory against the Romans themselves. On the contrary, when an eclipse of the Moon fell on the night on which the fleet of the Athenians was attempting flight from the harbor of Syracuse, its commander Nicias — ignorant that this happens from the entry of the lunar globe into the earth's shadow — suspected that by that failure of light was signified the shipwreck of the fleet and the drowning of the soldiers, should he sail from there that night. Fallen, therefore, from this false suspicion into a vain trepidation, when he had abstained from the intended voyage (in which there was most certain safety), a little later he fell into the enemy's power. From these causes, then, it comes about that not a few things are foretold by the judiciary [astrologers] which we often see fulfilled — without any marking of the stars — either by chance, or by pact, or by prudence, or by folly.

But as to what he says — that I, against the principles of St. Thomas (by which I am bound by my scholastic profession), disapprove astrological prognostics — I answer that there are two kinds of divinatory astrology, the physical and the fictitious, which are distinguished from one another by a threefold difference: namely, by observation, by application, and by foreknowledge.

First, by observation: because physical divination observes only the physical influences and impressions of the stars, which subsist not by mere imaginative contrivance but truly, in reality, among the works of nature, and are demonstrated by both sense and physical reason — such as the light and motions of the wandering stars, and especially of the solar star, from whose approach and recession to us the generations and corruptions of things proceed. On the contrary, fictitious divination, neglecting the physical influences, observes certain imaginary and made-up outflowings of the constellations — that is, certain sidereal "breathings" which neither exist anywhere, nor can be detected by any demonstration or certain experiment, but are introduced solely by the vanity of the astromancers and received by the credulity of foolish men. Of these are those peculiar, occult properties which of old the inventors of this madness — out of the dullness of their brains, and as it seemed [good] to each — ascribed to the various stars: to Venus a breath of lust; to Mars an outflow of anger and fury; to the Moon an influx of madness; to Capricorn a force that makes those born under it kings; to Andromeda unlucky irradiations that bring exiles, captivity, and prisons; to Orion rays that produce a hunter; to Canopus beams that engender fishermen; to the star of Medusa a venomous influence that brings unexpected and sudden destruction — and other things like these, feigned and refeigned out of the fictions of the poets.

Secondly, they differ especially in this: that the physical diviners so apply the actions of the sidereal impressions to bodies that they assert the energy and force of the stars to be impressed first, of themselves, directly, and necessarily upon bodies alone, but upon souls by no means — except accidentally, and quite indirectly and contingently: that is, insofar as human wills, of their own accord, consent to bodily passions [that have been] stirred by the physical outflow of the stars. As when the traveler's body, drained by the solar rays, drags the mind — neither resisting nor gainsaying — into the vice of tippling and drunkenness. But the fictitious diviners apply the forces of the stars first, of themselves, and necessarily, no less to the soul than to the body; and they drive the whole man at once by these fictitious "breathings," and from their force decree for him journeys, voyages, wars, imprisonments, slaughter, and other such events, which he must suffer even unwilling and resisting.

(right column:)

Thirdly they differ, because the discipline of physical divination abstains from any certain and determinate prediction of the singular and (especially) contingent events of each individual man, but pronounces about human actions only generally and universally, with no fixed determination of the thing predicted. For example: that when the star of Aries rises, men will be livelier — because then, as the Sun returns to us and brings back the loveliness of spring, all things are made more cheerful; but when the Pleiades rise, men will be sadder — because the Sun, receding from our regions, leaves behind wintry colds, rainy days, and the sad darkness of longer nights. The planetary [astrologers], on the contrary, foretell for each person his particular acts, events, and outcomes — fortunate and unfortunate — with a certain and determinate assertion.

These divinations, then, being thus distinguished, if anyone should ask me what St. Thomas thought of each, in a single word I answer: the physical foreknowings are accepted and approved by him, but the fictitious (such as that querulous astro-theologian peddles to silly little men) are utterly rejected and refuted in many writings of his theology. Let the prudent reader read the first part of his Theological Summa, question 115, article 4; and the Secunda Secundae, question 95, article 1; and the opusculum On the Judgments of the Stars — and he will find that what I say is true. Thus far on behalf of the opinion of St. Thomas, whose sanctity I adore and whose doctrine I embrace with [my] whole heart.

It remains that, at the end of this Annotation, I answer what that astro-theologian added in the last place — that I too assented to the genethliac tenets when I wrote that certain poets were born under happy stars. I confess, indeed, that this was said and written by me — yet not in the sense in which he trifles, but so that, by the common form of speech, I might designate perfect and accomplished poets. For the common run of men is wont to say that those things are done "by favorable auspices" or "under propitious stars" which are on every side happily accomplished; nor do I think it should be counted a fault in me if what the common people have taken up into everyday speech from the vanity of the astrologers, I have applied to Christian poets — since even the divine Scriptures have transferred to the stars of heaven the names of Orion, Arcturus, the Hyades, and the Pleiades, borrowed from the poetic and astrological fables of the pagans. And let these things, said in answer to the astro-theologian's complaints, be enough.

[signature "Nn 4"; catchword "An-" → Annotation XI, on p. 436 (PDF 441).]

(printed p. 436 [PDF p. 441], verso — Ann. XI–XIII, on Matthew 3 (John's baptism; the dove at Christ's baptism). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column:)

Annotation XI [contents]

"John the Baptist came, preaching and saying: Do penance," etc. — Matthew 3[:1–2]

[margin: Whether John's baptism conferred grace.]

John Calvin, in chapter 17 of his Institutes, accuses Chrysostom — [in] homily 10 on Matthew, explaining these words — because, treating of John's baptism, he affirmed that it did not confer the remission of sins, against the authority of Luke, who writes that John preached a baptism of penance for the remission of sins. But it is truly strange why this rash man does not [likewise] charge with the same crime also Paul the Apostle, and John the Baptist himself, who plainly preached the very same things that Chrysostom taught from their opinion and from the Catholic Church's sanctions. For Paul, when at Ephesus he ordered those to be rebaptized who had received John's baptism, showed that that washing had not brought the grace of the Holy Spirit, but had been preparatory to obtaining the grace to be obtained in the baptism of Christ. And on that account, meeting those who thought John's baptism, once received, sufficed for them, he said: "In what, then, were you baptized?" John baptized the people with a baptism of penance, saying [they should believe] "in him who was to come" — as if he had said: John's baptism was nothing but a certain preparation, leading the penitent to the baptism of Christ; and therefore you must be baptized again in the name of Christ. And the Baptist himself, recognizing this, cried out: "I indeed baptize in water unto penance; but he who is to come after me is mightier than I: he will baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire" — that is, I baptize not with a life-giving spirit that affords health and remission of sins, but in water; namely, that by this symbol of washing I may admonish you that, having taken the road of penance, you may hasten to the baptism of Christ, who — cleansing you by the water of his grace and purifying you by the fire of his Spirit — will carry you up to eternal happiness. Therefore, just as it is impious to think that Paul and John disagree with Luke's judgment, so it is of the utmost impudence to affirm that Chrysostom opposes the same Evangelist — [Chrysostom] who, in that very passage which Calvin condemns, showing in what sense Luke declared that John preached a baptism of penance for the remission of sins, says that this is to be understood not of a present remission of crimes granted in John's baptism, but of a future forgiveness of offenses to be obtained in the baptism of Christ. By which words Chrysostom plainly showed that neither does Luke disagree with Paul and John, nor does he himself (as Calvin wickedly lies) contend with Luke, but thinks and teaches things consonant with both.

Annotation XII [contents]

"I indeed baptize you in water, but he shall baptize you in the Spirit." — Matthew 3[:11]
[margin: Whether the Holy Spirit is conferred in baptism.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 3 — enumerating four kinds of baptism (that is, of the Word, of Water, of the Spirit, and of Temptation [trial/martyrdom]) — asserts that in the baptism of water past sins are washed away and remitted to the penitent, but that their soul is neither sanctified nor receives the Holy Spirit. His words run thus: "The baptism of water avails, because it does wash away the sins which have already gone forth into act — and this, if [the man] has repented; but it does not sanctify the soul, nor does it forestall the concupiscences of the heart or evil thoughts, nor repel them, nor even restrain the carnal concupiscences. Whoever, then, has not been so baptized as [that one should reckon] him to receive the Holy Spirit, is indeed baptized in body, and his sins are pardoned, but in soul he is [still] a catechumen. For thus it is written: 'Because whoever has not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his' — on account of which his flesh will afterward sprout worse sins for him, since he has not in himself the Holy Spirit to preserve him, but the house of his body is empty. Therefore that [unclean] spirit, finding the house empty and swept clean of the doctrines of faith (as if with brooms), enters and dwells there sevenfold." This [is from] the fourth homily; concerning which the fifth homily too, not far from its beginning, makes mention.

(right column:)

Annotation XIII [contents]

"He saw the Holy Spirit descending like a dove." — Matthew 3[:16]
[margin: Whether the dove sitting upon Christ was a real animal.]

Chrysostom, homily 12 on Matthew — refuting the Arians, who twist this passage toward an inequality of the Son and the Holy Spirit — seems to assert that the dove in which the Holy Spirit was seen did not have the nature of a dove, but only its figure and appearance, in these words: "I hear some saying: As great as is the difference between a man and a dove, so great is the distance between Christ and the Holy Spirit — because the one was seen in our very nature, the other in the appearance of a dove. What, then, can be answered to such things? — except that the Son of God assumed the nature of man, but the Holy Spirit did not assume the nature of a dove. Therefore the Evangelist said 'like a dove' — not in the nature, but in the appearance, of a dove; for then only was he seen in this figure." Agreeing with him, Ambrose, in the first book On the Sacraments, chapter five, says: "And behold, [it was] as a dove [that] the Holy Spirit — not a dove — descended, but as if a dove. Remember what I have said: Christ took on flesh, not as [apparent] flesh, but the reality of that flesh; but the Holy Spirit descended from heaven not in the reality of a dove, but in the appearance of a dove." With both agrees Procopius of Gaza, in his commentaries on Genesis, chapter 18, saying: "God, in the Old Testament, was beheld in a bodily form; yet that body did not have the property of a mortal body, for it consisted of neither flesh nor blood. In the same way the Holy Spirit came into our sight in the appearance of a dove; yet it was not a dove, because it did not have the property which a dove has." The same thing Thomas Cajetan held, in his explanation of this chapter. But against this opinion Augustine protests, in the book On the Christian Combat, chapter 22, writing thus: "Nor do we say this in such a way as to say that the Lord Jesus Christ alone had a true body, but that the Holy Spirit

[catchword "sanctum" → "the Holy Spirit [appeared falsely]…" continues on p. 437 (PDF 442).]

(printed p. 437 [PDF p. 442], recto — end of Ann. XIII and Ann. XIIII–XVIII, on Matthew 3–5 (censures of the Opus imperfectum*; rebaptism; whether Christ begged). Read order: left column, then right.)*

(left column — continuing Annotation XIII:)

…[Augustine: nor that] the Holy Spirit appeared deceptively to the eyes of men; rather, we believe that both those bodies [Christ's flesh and the dove] were real. Almost all the scholastic theologians follow Augustine's opinion — especially St. Thomas, in the third volume of the Theological Summa, question 39, article 7.

Annotation XIIII [contents]

"I saw the Spirit of God, like a dove." — Matthew 3[:16]
What Thomas Cajetan wrote on this passage, see at the preceding Annotation.

Annotation XV [contents]

"He saw the Holy Spirit, like a dove." — Matthew 3[:16]
[margin: On the Trinity.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum must be read cautiously — homily 4, near the end — where in the Arian manner he hands down that the three divine persons are altogether unequal among themselves, in these words: "In what mystery Christ was born, in this mystery he also received the Holy Spirit. For, the Son of God receiving baptism and the Spirit descending, the one [the Father] stood in human form, the [third] was descending in the appearance of a dove; while [the Father], neither standing in human form nor descending in the appearance of a dove, was heard only in a voice coming down from above." — But this is the confession of foolish heretics. The more prudent heretics do not say that the three are one God, but that the three have the same substance — which Macedonius confesses rather than the homoousion [consubstantial]. "Let us see, then, to whom [the Spirit] is equal. [The Father] did not say 'This is our beloved Son,' lest, like God [the Father], the Holy Spirit too should seem to have been the Father of Christ. For if they are equal in all things — just as [the Father] is honored with fatherhood, so too the Holy Spirit [would be]. But if God is Father because he has a Son, while the Holy Spirit is not Father because he has no Son — is he equal in all things? Nor was it said 'These are our beloved Sons,' lest the Holy Spirit, together with Christ, be thought a son. For if he is equal to Christ in all things, he too is a son, just as Christ. But if not a son, as Christ [is], but a faithful minister of Christ — is he not [then] unequal to Christ?"

Annotation XVI [contents]

"Jesus was led into the desert by the Spirit," etc. — Matthew 4[:1]
[margin: On the Trinity.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, at the beginning of homily 5, writes that Jesus was led into the desert by the Holy Spirit — not as a lesser by the command of a greater, but as a greater by the exhortation of a lesser. Which is an Arian dogma. In the same place, a little later, he seems to favor the Lutheran heretics, who affirm that original sin does not depart from the baptized except at death. For he says: "What sin is remitted at death, he knows who understands for what sin death was introduced. For if a man dies on account of sin, doubtless that on account of which he dies is [only then] loosed."

(right column:)

Annotation XVII [contents]

"And then Jesus began to preach." — Matthew 4[:17]

[margin: Whether those baptized by heretics are to be rebaptized.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, in homily 6, not far from the end, judges that those who have been baptized by heretics, or by [persons] not baptized, have not obtained the sacrament of baptism, and therefore need a second baptism. He writes thus: "From then Jesus began to preach — from when [after] he had been baptized in water by John, but in Spirit by the Father, so that of himself he might be able to baptize others (I speak according to [his] humanity): because had he not been baptized, he could not baptize others. For how shall a naked man clothe a naked man, or how shall a beggar make another rich? So too, he who is not baptized — how can he give baptism to another? According to this we say also of heretics: where faith is, there is the Church; where the Church, there a priest; where a priest, there baptism; where baptism, there a Christian. But where faith is not, there neither is the Church; where the Church is not, [there is] no priest; where a priest is not, [there is] no baptism; where baptism is not, [there is] no Christian. Why then does he rebuke, as [needing] a second baptism, one who does not understand what the first is?" — Thus far I have recounted the author's words: which indeed we can piously interpret, saying that they hold [only] when the Catholic form of baptizing is not preserved. For the 47th canon of the Apostles decreed that such persons were to be rebaptized; and the 19th canon of the Nicene Synod decrees the same concerning those baptized by the Paulianists. For these — stemming from Paul of Samosata — undermined the divinity of Christ; which impiety Arius, and especially Aetius, afterward spread more widely — [Aetius] who, as Epiphanius reports, baptized under this form of words: "In the name of the uncreated God, and in the name of the created Son, and in the name of the sanctifying Spirit — [the Spirit] created by the created Son." Since, then, by these words the whole faith was overturned, it was necessary that those so baptized be baptized again, as [being] not baptized.

Annotation XVIII [contents]

"Blessed are the poor in spirit." — Matthew 5[:3]

[margin: Whether Christ and the apostles begged (were mendicants).] [margin: John 4; John 13.]

Thomas, Cardinal Cajetan, while explaining these things in his commentaries, proposed a question in these words: "Why does JESUS call the 'poor in spirit' blessed, when he himself — the exemplar of all perfection — was not a beggar according to the truth of the matter, but rather [one] giving alms to beggars, as is clear from John 13, when it was supposed that Jesus had ordered Judas (who held the purse) to give something to one in need? For from this it is clearly established that he did not number himself and his own among beggars. And the same is plain when the disciples went into the city, not to beg but to buy food; and in several other Gospel passages the same is found." — I answer that Jesus was not a beggar, because he is nowhere read to have asked [anything] except from the Samaritan woman a drink of water — which is agreed not to be, properly, [an act] of beggars, since it can befall anyone of higher station. (Although elsewhere, following others, we may have written otherwise.) But he was, in a moderate

[catchword "medio-" → "moderate [poverty]…" continues on p. 438 (PDF 443).]

(printed p. 438 [PDF p. 443], verso — end of Ann. XVIII and Ann. XIX–XXI, on Matthew 5 (the mendicant orders; free will; peacemakers). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation XVIII:)

…a moderate [poverty] of beggars — because he had nothing at all of his own, except clothes, from the time he began to preach. But he lived not on begged things, but on things offered by devout persons — according to that [passage] of John 13: "Judas held the purse, and carried the things that were given." And Luke 8 clearly says that women ministered to Christ, as he went about preaching, out of their own means. Thus far Cajetan.

Whom Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa, attacked in the second book of [his] Annotations, in a sharp and lengthy digression — maintaining that these things do the greatest injury to the mendicant orders, and are diametrically opposed to the doctrine of the saints and to the ecclesiastical decrees. And he shows, from several testimonies of divine Scripture and opinions of the fathers, that the Apostles were truly beggars, and that Christ — of whom it is said in the Psalm, "But I am a beggar" [Ps. 39/40:18] — lowered himself of his own accord to the state of mendicancy for two reasons: first, that he might make abundant satisfaction for our pride and wantonness. For we arrogantly seized food not our own, but forbidden (which we do continually); but he, [asking for] what was his own, humbly and lowlily, as if it were another's, asks [for it] as a favor. Then, that he might give us an example of humility and subdue our pride, he begged the place where he might celebrate the Passover with the disciples; he begged the ass on which he rode into the holy city; he begged lodging from Zacchaeus, and likewise food from the women who are read to have ministered to him out of their means.

But to the things which Cajetan brought forward to confirm his opinion, he [Catharinus] responds thus: First, Cajetan argues: "The disciples went into the city to buy food; therefore they were not begging." Good God, what is this worth? — as if we, who continually beg, do not also buy food with what we have begged! Secondly he argues: "Judas carried the purse and received from devout persons what was given there; therefore the disciples were not begging." Who would not marvel at the argument? — whence one ought rather to have concluded, "Therefore they were begging." For so do we too beg, sending one of our number with a purse, that he may thus ask, and receive, and bring back what is given there. Thirdly he argues that Christ gave to the needy. But this the state of mendicancy required — that what was left over be given out to the poor; for so did the blessed men Dominic and Francis, and so they commanded it to be done. Fourthly, what he adds about the women who ministered to him is rightly turned back against himself — even on his own authority, since [Cajetan], thinking more correctly elsewhere, said that Christ, inasmuch as [he was] a beggar, had brought them in for this [purpose]. Finally, Ambrose infers that this opinion of Cajetan was of old condemned by the Church in [the person of] William of Saint-Amour, who first — out of hatred of the mendicant friars — taught that neither Christ nor the apostles ever begged, and that those who beg by choice are unworthy of the fellowship of Christians.

Annotation XIX [contents]

"Blessed are they that mourn," etc. — Matthew 5[:5]

(right column:)

[margin: Whether the wicked sin under the devil's compulsion.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 9, explaining this [verse], seems to hint that there are some who sin under the devil's forcing and compelling — which certainly overturns the liberty of the human will. For thus we read in him: "The saints, so long as they are in the world — not knowing the providence of God nor fully understanding [it], who fall under the devil's compulsion, and who do not love evils out of an evil purpose — all, [as] sinners, mourn, thinking that all are circumvented and compelled by the devil." I judge that he used the words "forcing" and "compelling" hyperbolically — not to [assert] a liberty of the will already destroyed (which elsewhere he even exalts more than is fair), but to express the vehement temptation of the devil, which can scarcely, and only with difficulty, be resisted.

Annotation XX [contents]

"Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the sons of God." — Matthew 5[:9]
[margin: Whether man can attain to an impeccable perfection.]

Augustine, in the first book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, chapter 9, so expounded this passage that he afterward retracted it, in the first book of the Retractations, chapter 19, in these words: "In the first volume, on account of that which is written, 'Blessed are the peacemakers,' etc., I said: Wisdom befits the peacemakers, in whom all things are now set in order, and no motion is in rebellion against reason, but all things obey the man's spirit, since he himself obeys God. This rightly raises the question of how I could have said [it]; for it cannot befall anyone in this life that the law [of the members], warring against the law of the mind, should be wholly absent from the members — since, even if the man's spirit should so resist it that it slipped into no consent, it would nonetheless not fail to war [against him]. Therefore, this that was said — that there is no motion rebellious against reason — can rightly be taken now of the peaceable [nations], [as a thing reached] by taming the concupiscences of the flesh, so that one may at length come to that fullest peace. And so, whereas in another place, repeating the same evangelical saying, when I had said 'Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the sons of God,' I added, saying, 'And these things indeed can be fulfilled in this life, as we believe them to have been fulfilled in the Apostles' — this is to be understood thus: not that we should think that in the Apostles, living here, no motion of the flesh warred against the spirit, but that these things can be fulfilled here [only] to the extent that we believe them to have been fulfilled in the Apostles — that is, by that measure of human perfection, as great as perfection can be in this life. For it was not said, 'These things can be fulfilled in this life,' for we believe them to have been fulfilled in the Apostles; but it was said thus, 'as we believe them to have been fulfilled in the Apostles,' so that they may be fulfilled just as they were fulfilled in them — that is, by a certain perfection of which this life is capable — not [in the way] that those things are to be fulfilled which we hope for in fullest peace, when it shall be said, 'O death, where is thy strife?'"

Annotation XXI [contents]

"Whoever shall say, 'Thou fool,' shall be liable to the fire of Gehenna." — Matthew 5[:22]
[margin: On the Eucharist.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 11, seems to allude to the heresy of those who deny the true [body] of Chri-

[catchword "Chri-" → "...of Christ" continues on p. 439 (PDF 444).]

(printed p. 439 [PDF p. 444], recto — end of Ann. XXI and Ann. XXII–XXV, on Matthew 5 (real presence; remarriage; divorce; oaths). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation XXI:)

…[those who deny the true body] of Christ to be in the sacrament of the altar — when he says: "To transfer sanctified vessels to private uses is a sin and a danger, as Belshazzar teaches us, who, drinking from the consecrated cups, was cast down from his kingdom and from his life. If, then, to transfer to private uses these sanctified vessels — in which is not the true body of Christ, but the mystery of Christ's body is contained — is so dangerous, how much more [to profane] the vessels of our body, which God prepared for himself as a dwelling." Nor does he diverge from this opinion when, in homily 17, not long before the end, he calls the Eucharist "blessed bread"; and in homily 19, almost at the beginning, calls [it] "the sacrifice of bread and wine."

Annotation XXII [contents]

"Whoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a bill of divorce." — Matthew 5[:31]

[margin: On the degrees of consanguinity.]

Augustine corrected the exposition he had brought to this passage in the first book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, chapter 25, in the first book of the Retractations, chapter 19, thus: "Likewise, what I said — 'This is to be understood both of father and mother and of the other bonds of blood, that in them we should hate that which the human race has drawn by lot in being born and dying' — sounds as if these necessities would not exist if, no sin of human nature preceding, no one died: which sense I have already above disapproved. For there would assuredly be thoughts and kinships, even if — no original sin existing — the human race grew and multiplied without death. And therefore the question is otherwise to be resolved — why the Lord commanded that enemies be loved, while elsewhere he commands that even parents and children be held in hatred — not as it is [here] resolved, but as we have often resolved it afterward: that is, that we should love enemies [so as] to win them for the kingdom of God, and hate [them] in [our] kinsfolk if they hinder [us] from the kingdom of God."

Annotation XXIII [contents]

"Whoever puts away his wife, except for the cause of fornication, and marries another, commits adultery." — Matthew 5[:32]

[margin: Whether adultery dissolves the sacrament of matrimony.]

Hilary, in canon 4 on Matthew, elucidating these things, is believed to be of the opinion of those who teach that it is lawful to cast off a wife guilty of adultery and to marry another. Read below, Annotation 81. — Chrysostom is thought to hand down the same as Hilary, in homily 17 on the fifth chapter of Matthew. See below, in the same place. — Theophylact, in his commentary on the fifth chapter of Matthew, seems to write the very same. See below, in the same place. — Euthymius, in his commentary on the same passage, presents the same. See below, in the same place. — Chromatius, in his commentary on the fifth chapter of Matthew, [says] the same. Wherefore see below, in the same [place].

Annotation XXIIII [contents]

"Everyone who puts away his wife, except for the cause of fornication, makes her commit adultery." — Matthew 5[:32]

[margin: On divorce.]

Augustine, in the first book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, chapter 26, inquiring how far in this passage

(right column:)

"fornication" is to be understood, seems to be of this opinion: that he thinks it lawful for a divorce to be made on account of any sin whatever, whether of the husband or of the wife. For he writes thus: "From which it is understood that, on account of unlawful concupiscences — not only those committed in debaucheries with other men or women, but absolutely any whatever, which make the soul (misusing the body) stray from the law of God, and which perniciously and basely corrupt [it] — both a man may without crime dismiss his wife, and a wife her husband. Because the Lord makes the cause 'fornication,' which fornication (as was mentioned above) we are compelled to understand generally and universally — that is, that [fornication] of which it is said, 'Thou hast destroyed all who fornicate away from thee' [Ps. 72(73):27]." These words Augustine, in the first book of the Retractations, chapter 19, approves — referring the reader to what he wrote later on this question, especially in the two books On Adulterous Marriages, in which he determines that divorce is not lawful except on account of the carnal fornication which is [committed] in debaucheries.

Likewise, in the same book and place, he affirms that a divorce from the [marriage-]bed on account of carnal debaucheries is permitted, [but] not commanded. Which statement he condemns, in the same book and chapter of the Retractations, as contrary to the opinion of Solomon, who says, "He who keeps an adulteress is foolish and impious." See below, Annotation 81.

Annotation XXV [contents]

"But I say to you, not to swear at all." — Matthew 5[:34]

[margin: Whether an oath is a sin.] [margin: Gen. 42.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 12, interpreting this precept, teaches three things at variance with the common consensus of the theologians: first, that to swear rightly by God is a sin; second, that to swear rightly by creatures is a sin; third, that to swear rightly by creatures is a more execrable sin than to swear rightly by God. And he comprises these in these words: "Behold the fourth commandment, which the covetous think the least [important] — who do not think that to swear rightly is a sin, without which the mandate of the law cannot stand," etc. And after he had discoursed much about the sin of oath-taking, he finally concluded: "These things are said of those who swear by God; but of those who swear by the elements, the iniquity is more execrable. For God created heaven and earth and the rest for his own service, not for men to swear by," etc. — As for how the first and second of these propositions can be expounded, see the following Annotation. But the third proposition is to be understood of those who swear by creatures for this reason: because they believe them either to be gods, or that some [portion] of divinity is in them. For these sin most gravely, because they show to creatures the worship of latria, which befits God alone. But those who swear by creatures — not because they believe them gods, but because they see the divine truth shining forth in them — swear rightly, after the example of Joseph, who swore "by the safety [life] of Pharaoh": venerating in Pharaoh (as Augustine says) nothing other than God, from whom Pharaoh's power was.

Hilary, in canon 4 on Matthew, seems to forbid to Christians every oath whatsoever. See the following Annotation.

[catchword "Hil-" → "Hilary…" continues on p. 440 (PDF 445).]

(printed p. 440 [PDF p. 445], verso — Ann. XXVI, on Matthew 5:34 (Chrysostom's rigorism on oaths). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing the catena from Annotation XXV:)

Jerome, in [his] commentary, has the same. See the following Annotation. — Chromatius, in [his] commentary, the same. Read the following Annotation. — Theophylact, in [his] commentary, the same. Consult the following Annotation. — Euthymius, in [his] commentary, the same. Read the following Annotation.

Annotation XXVI [contents]

"But I say to you, swear not at all." — Matthew 5[:34]

[margin: Whether every oath, even in a true and just cause, is a sin.] [margin: Gen. 22; Jer. 4.]

Chrysostom seems to hold — not only in the present passage, but in almost innumerable other places — that an oath is a most evil thing, and so forbidden to Christians that it is nowhere lawful for them to swear, not even in a just cause. He plainly pronounces this opinion, homily 15 on Genesis, in these words: "Let a Christian flee oaths in every way, hearing the sentence of Christ which says, 'It was said to the ancients, Thou shalt not forswear thyself; but I say to you, there is to be no swearing at all.' Let no one, therefore, say, 'I swear in a just cause'; for neither in a just matter nor in an unjust one is it lawful to swear." And in homily 9 on the Acts of the Apostles, he decrees that those are impious and deserve to be barred from the Church, who in forensic actions, contracts, and sureties either swear or exact an oath from others. Again, assigning the causes for which it is not lawful to swear, he reckons among others this — that an oath is an utterly diabolical crime. For thus he speaks, in the homily on the fifth Psalm: "To swear is from the devil, since Christ says, 'For whatever is more than these is from evil.'" And in homily 19 to the people of Antioch: "You have heard the wisdom of Christ, saying that not only to forswear, but even to swear in any way whatsoever, is diabolical and wholly the contrivance of the evil one." And in the first book Against the Detractors of the Monastic Life: "If to swear is found to be diabolical, with what punishment must those be smitten who forswear?" And in the first book On Compunction of Heart: "If truly to swear is a crime and a transgression of the commandment, where shall we place perjury?" Nor content with these [alone], Chrysostom also refutes the reasons of the theologians that cry out against his opinion.

Of which the first is: that if an oath were of itself evil, God — who cannot do evil — would not have sworn, saying to Abraham, "By my very self have I sworn, says the Lord"; and in Psalm 109, "The Lord has sworn, and he will not repent."

The second is: if to swear were a crime, God would not have commanded us, through the prophet Jeremiah, "Swear by the true God."

The third is: that since an oath is most necessary for settling civil and ecclesiastical controversies, it is not to be refused by a good man, but — as often as a just necessity presses — most promptly to be rendered.

Meeting these, Chrysostom responds to the first reasoning that God in no way swears; and that if the divine Scriptures sometimes testify that God has sworn, an oath is ascribed to God not properly and according to the human manner of swearing, but improperly and metaphorically, insofar as the oath signifies a pledge and a sure promise. For thus he writes, in the homily on the hundred-and-ninth Psalm, expounding that [verse], "The Lord has sworn," etc.: "But when you hear 'oath,' do not think it is [truly] an oath. For just as anger in God is not [passionate] anger, but is the right of punishing and not a perturbation of mind, so also [is] the oath. For God does not swear, but declares what is certainly to be." And in homily 47 on Genesis, and on the eleventh [chapter] of the Epistle to the Hebrews, explaining God's oath to Abraham, he asserts that the words by which God seems to swear are not oaths but promises — which nonetheless God calls "oaths" in the human manner, condescending to human infirmity; and that he may adapt himself to it, he regards not his own dignity, but — to persuade men — taking up words unworthy of himself, he calls his pledges "oaths" after the manner of men, who, when they wish things to be believed without any doubt, promise that they will do them with an oath added.

(right column:)

Next, he satisfies the second argument in homily 17 on Matthew, where, explaining that [saying], "Let your speech be Yea, yea; Nay, nay; for whatever is beyond these is from evil," he questions himself thus: "If an oath is from evil, how then was it commanded in the Law?" And a little later he answers: "An oath, in the Old Law, was not commanded, but only permitted — just as also divorce [was permitted] — on account of the infirmity of those who received the Law, lest they should either worship idols or swear by idols. Wherefore, just as divorce, once conceded, is now judged adultery, so an oath, once permitted in the Law, is now — in the evangelical law, after such great arguments of virtue — believed to be from evil, and doubtless has very much of evil in itself."

Finally, rejecting the third reason too, in homily 8 to the people of Antioch: "What then," he says, "if a necessity of swearing be present? I answer: Where there is transgression, there is no [true] necessity; for it is possible not to swear at all." And in homily 17 on Matthew, repeating the same: "What then," he says, "if someone exacts an oath, and imposes the necessity of swearing? I answer: Let the fear of God be more forcible to you than any necessity; for if you are always willing to bring forward occasions of this kind, you will keep nothing of what is commanded." Thus far Chrysostom. It remains that — to avoid a superfluous repetition of this argument — I set down here the opinions of the fathers who are thought to agree with Chrysostom, with their "antidotes" added, so that they may be read without any offense.

Origen, treatise 35 on Matthew: "It behooves not that a man who wishes to live according to the Gospel should put another under oath. For similar is that which the Lord himself says in the Gospel, 'But I say, swear not at all' — [and therefore] adjure not at all. For if to swear is not lawful, as regards Christ's evangelical commandment, it is true [also] that neither is it lawful to adjure another."

Athanasius, in the sermon On the Passion and Cross of the Lord: "If, therefore, there is faith and truth in the one who has sworn — what use is an oath? But if there is no faith in him — why do we take on so much impiety as, for the sake of poor mortal men, to invoke as witness God, who is above men? What, then, is to be done?"

[catchword "dum?" → "...to be done?" continues on p. 441 (PDF 446).]

(printed p. 441 [PDF p. 446], recto — Ann. XXVI cont., on Matthew 5:34 (a father-catena on the lawfulness of oaths). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation XXVI:)

[margin: Gen. 22; Ps. 109.]

…[what is to be done? — nothing more] than that our "yes" be "yes," and our "no," "no"; and, in sum, that we not lie. For thus we shall be seen to imitate God. — But perhaps someone might object thus: "If an oath is forbidden to men, and by not swearing one imitates God, how is it that God himself is reported in the sacred Scriptures to swear? For he even swore to Abraham himself; and in the Psalms it is written, 'The Lord has sworn, and he will not repent.' For these things seem either to conflict with the foregoing, or else hereby the faculty of swearing is conceded to men." But this is not so; nor let anyone think it. For God swears by no one, but is said to swear [only] as speaking to men — and this too in the human manner. For as an oath confirms men's speech, so also the things God speaks are, on account of the firmness and immutability of his will, to be reckoned as oaths. Therefore God does not swear after the manner of men; nor ought we, from this, to be led to the making of oaths.

Epiphanius, in the first book of the Panarion, disputing against the Ossenes, says thus: "First, then, one ought not to swear — neither by the Lord himself, nor by any other oath. For to swear belongs to that evil one, namely the devil."

Hilary, in canon 4 on Matthew: "The Law had appointed a penalty for perjury, that the sacredness of the oath might restrain the deceit of liars; but faith removes the practice of oaths, establishing the affairs of our life in truth. Therefore, for those living in the simplicity of faith, there is no need of the religion of swearing — with whom what is, always 'is,' and what is not, 'is not'; and by this their action and all their speech is in truth.

'Neither shalt thou swear by heaven,' etc. — He does not merely forbid us to render oaths to God (since all the truth of our word and deed is to be maintained by simplicity); but he condemns the superstition of the old obstinacy. For with these names of the elements the Jews had a [false] religion — to swear by heaven and earth, by Jerusalem, and by their own head — by which, to the reproach of God, they paid to the oath the veneration [due to God]."

Ambrose, in the exposition of Psalm 118, on [the verse] "I have sworn and determined": Therefore the Lord — who came to teach the little ones, to instruct the new, to form the perfect — says in the Gospel, "There is to be no swearing at all," because he was speaking to the weak. And indeed he was speaking not to the Apostles alone, but to the crowds. For he wished you not to swear, lest you forswear. And he added, "Swear not, neither by heaven, nor by earth, nor by Jerusalem, nor by thy head" — namely, by those things which are not subject to thy power. "The Lord has sworn, and will not repent." Let him, then, swear, who cannot repent of his oath. And what did the Lord swear? That "Christ is a priest for ever." Is what the Lord swore uncertain? is it impossible? could it be changeable? Do not, then, usurp the example of an oath, you who have not the power of fulfilling the oath.

Chromatius, bishop of Aquileia, in the fifth chapter of [his] commentaries on Matthew: "'But I say to you, swear not at all,' etc. — [this comes] through the grace of the evangelical doctrine. The Law, given through Moses, received [its] perfection [from the Gospel]. In the Law it was commanded that one should not forswear; but in the Gospel, that one should not [even] swear. And this same thing the Holy Spirit commanded through Solomon, foretelling, saying, 'Accustom not [thy mouth] to swearing'; and again, 'As a slave, constantly scourged, is not [freed] from bruising, so everyone who swears will not be purged from sin' — whence it is by no means fitting for us to swear. For what need is there for each of us to swear, since it is not at all lawful for us to lie — [we] whose words, being always so true, ought to be so trustworthy that they be held [as good] as an oath? And therefore the Lord forbids us not only to forswear, but even to swear."

(right column:)

Jerome, in chapter 5 of [his] commentaries on Matthew: "'Swear not at all,' etc. The Jews were permitted to swear by God — not because they did this rightly, but because it was better to render this to God than to demons. But the evangelical truth does not admit an oath, since every faithful speech is [as good] as an oath." And in chapter 4 of [his] commentary on Jeremiah, expounding "Thou shalt swear in truth, says the Lord," etc., he speaks thus: "If the Lord says 'Swear in truth,' how does the Gospel forbid us to swear? I answer: here 'Thou shalt swear' is said for confession, and for the condemnation of the idols by which Israel used to swear." Likewise, in the commentaries on the eighth chapter of Zechariah, he says: "'Love not an oath' — the Lord commanding in the Gospel, 'But I say to you, that you swear not at all.' In the precepts which pertain to [right] living, and are clear, we ought not to seek allegory — lest, as the comic poet [says], 'we seek a knot in a bulrush.'"

The author of the Opus imperfectum on Matthew, attributed to Chrysostom: "Hear, O clerics, who hold out the holy gospels to those swearing oaths: how can you be secure from that oath, you who give the occasion of perjury? If to swear rightly were just, you would justly say, 'We gave them the Gospel that they might swear, not forswear.' But now, since you know that even to swear rightly is a sin, how can you be guiltless, you who give the occasion of sinning against God?" These things are said of those who swear by God; but of those who swear by the elements, the iniquity is more execrable.

Theophylact, in the fifth chapter of [his] commentary on Matthew: "To swear," he says, "and to add anything further — even 'yes' or 'no' — is from the devil. But if you should say, 'Then the Law of Moses too will be evil, since it commands swearing' — learn that then it was not evil to swear; but after Christ it is evil, just as also to be circumcised, and, in sum, whatever is Jewish. For to suck [milk] befits a boy, but a grown man by no means." (the verb is "sugere," to suck: an oath is the milk of spiritual infancy — Sixtus quotes and glosses this same line on p. 443 / PDF 448.)

Oecumenius, in the fifth chapter of [his] commentary on the Epistle of James, on "Above all, my brethren, swear not," etc., speaks thus: "But someone will say, 'If one is compelled to swear, what is to be done?' We say that the fear of God will be stronger than the necessity that brings force to bear. But someone might also doubt: since the old Law reckons him who swears by the name of the Lord worthy of praise, how does grace [the Gospel] forbid doing this? We say that the old Law — drawing the Jews away, lest they swear by idols — commanded them to swear by God; just as it also commanded them to sacrifice to God, drawing them away lest they sacrifice to idols. But when it had sufficiently taught the worship of God, then it also rejected the sacrifices as useless."

Euthymius, in the fifth chapter of [his] commentary on Mat-

[signature "Oo"; catchword "thaeum" → "...Matthew" continues on p. 442 (PDF 447).]

(printed p. 442 [PDF p. 447], verso — end of Ann. XXVI, on Matthew 5:34 (Sixtus's resolution on oaths, vs. the Anabaptists). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation XXVI, Euthymius:)

…[on Mat]thew: "If an oath is from the devil, how did the old Law permit it? Because the sacrifices too were from evil, and by [means of] the deception of idols — yet the Law permitted these on account of the infirmity of the Hebrews. For since they were gluttons and gormandizers, they loved the meats offered to idols; and thus, being unbelievers, they also loved swearing. But that they might neither sacrifice to idols nor swear by idols, the Law indeed permitted [them] to sacrifice and to swear [by God], and whatever else is similar — but transferred all things to God. And it was to come to pass that, in the course of time, it should cut away even these things by a loftier legislation. And to suckle [with milk] is useful for infants, but for grown men quite unfitting; and therefore we concede this to [people] living in the manner of infants. What, then, is to be done, if someone demands an oath — nay, compels [one] to swear? Let the fear of God be more forcible to you than this necessity; and choose to suffer all things, rather than transgress the precept."

These and such-like authorities of the saints have been used by the heretics who have forbidden to Christians every kind of oath whatsoever — such as the Waldenses, the Albanenses, the Wycliffites, the Pseudo-apostles, and recently the Lutherans and Anabaptists. Against whose wicked dogma all the schools of theologians and the sanctions of the pontiffs cry out, establishing that an oath is a thing venerable, sacrosanct, and excellent — both from its origin and from its end [purpose]. [margin: Aquinas, Summa II-II q. 89.] From its origin, indeed, because an oath has its rise from the reverence which we show to God — showing what estimation we have of him: namely, that he knows those things about which there is controversy among us, and that he is truthful and cannot lie; and on that account, when swearing, we invoke God as witness of what we say. Wherefore an oath is rightly placed among the first parts of that supreme worship which by the Greek word is called latría — God saying, in the fifth book of the Law, "The Lord thy God shalt thou adore, and him alone shalt thou serve; and by his name shalt thou swear." [margin: Deut. 6.] And from its end, they say an oath is excellent, because it is necessary for verifying men's actions and for ending inextricable controversies which cannot be resolved by human judgment. Whence, when in the fourth [session of the] Ecumenical Synod of Ephesus the fathers had decreed that Nestorius should sing the palinode of his heresy, and did not sufficiently trust his words, they exacted from him an oath in these words: "It is fitting also that you confess by oath that you anathematize your polluted and profane dogmas, and that you hold and teach what we believe and hold." And in the same synod, a certain Victor, a friend of Cyril — falsely accused — could not be cleared until, with hands lifted up to heaven, he had sworn himself innocent by holy baptism and the venerable mysteries of Christ. And in the Council of Constance, after — among the other heresies of Wycliffe — the article which abolishes all oaths had been condemned, it was decreed by the fathers that, for the confirmation of the treaty which the kings of the Romans [the Empire] and of Aragon had entered upon for the overthrow of the schism, an oath should be demanded from all then present in the council — which was there and then fulfilled, all swearing.

But as far as pertains to the aforesaid opinions [of the fathers], if with a fair mind we weigh the intent and scope of the authors who put them forth, we shall recognize that they did not wish to take away from Christians the duty of swearing, but wished chiefly to forbid three things concerning the rite of the oath.

(right column:)

First, that no one should in any way swear blasphemously and impiously by creatures — as if reckoning that something of divinity lies hidden in them, and paying to them the worship owed to the Creator — but [that one should swear] only by the Creator. Because Christ especially forbade this when he said, "Swear not at all, neither by heaven, nor by earth," etc. In which sense, indeed, Epiphanius and Jerome are to be interpreted; for both testify that Christ, by these words, wished to remove the depraved custom of swearing by the elements.

Second, that no one should swear by God easily and without necessity — lest from facility they descend to habit, and from habit to contempt of the oath and the practice of perjury. For, looking to this, Christ said, "Let your speech be Yea, yea; Nay, nay; for whatever is beyond these is from evil" — that is, either from the evil habit of him who, even unasked and without any necessity, swears by God; or from the evil of him to whom [the oath] is sworn, who is unwilling to trust another's words without an oath. To this end especially are to be referred the things which Chrysostom brought forth against oaths, by an excess of speech and out of the ardor of rebuke, desiring to root out utterly the inveterate license of the Greeks — who (as he himself complains in various homilies), in workshops, at crossroads, and in the marketplace, for ten obols, for a pair of shoes, and for any most trivial things whatever, were not afraid to exact and render untimely oaths. That Athanasius, Chromatius, and Oecumenius also had this in view, the words plainly show which they add a little after the quoted opinions, condemning those who incessantly, and without any discernment, run of their own accord to oaths. But Athanasius is so far from a prohibition of a just oath that he himself, in the apology to the Emperor Constantius, offers an oath from the divine oracles, and exacts [one], in these words: "To your Piety, with a great and clear voice and with hand outstretched — as I learned from the Apostle — I call God to witness upon my own soul, and (as is written in the books of Kings) I take an oath: let the Lord be witness, and his Christ [be] witness, that I never made mention of you for evil before your brother Constans Augustus, nor stirred him up against you." And a little below: "I could wish that this man, whoever he is, were present here, that — an oath being tendered — I might question him about these things under attestation of the truth. For the things we wish to be said and heard as if in God's presence, we Christian men are wont to express under this formula of an oath."

Third, those most weighty men wished to warn that no one of those who profess the highest state of Christian perfection should — for any cause, even a just one — swear by God in controversies arising among the perfect themselves; because Christ, among the counsels of surpassing perfection, gave this counsel too: that the perfect, in their own causes and when dealing among the perfect, should abstain altogether from every oath. Which was also observed of old by the Essenes, [who]

[catchword "per-" → continues on p. 443 (PDF 448).]

(printed p. 443 [PDF p. 448], recto — end of Ann. XXVI and Ann. XXVII–XXX, on Matthew 5–6 (non-resistance; sin unto death; public prayer). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation XXVI:)

…[the Essenes, who] profess the most perfect life among the Hebrews. For these (as Josephus and Philo write) shunned an oath as [they would] perjury, reckoning that among perfect men oaths are neither to be exacted nor rendered — both because it ought [to hold] that whatever is declared by perfect men has the force of an oath; and because he would seem convicted of lying who would not be believed without God as witness. Therefore it is agreed that Hilary, Ambrose, Theophylact, and especially Euthymius spoke according to this sense — when [Euthymius] says, "To suckle is useful for infants, but unfitting for grown men; therefore we concede this (namely, the oath) to those living in the manner of infants." From whom Theophylact does not much differ, saying: "To suck befits a boy, but grown men by no means" — hinting by this metaphor that an oath befits beginners and the still-imperfect, but the perfect by no means. (This is the line printed a touch ambiguously on p. 441/PDF 446 — the verb is "sugere," to suck.)

Annotation XXVII [contents]

"But I say to you, resist not evil." — Matthew 5[:39]

[margin: Whether it is lawful to seek redress for an injury in court.]

Chrysostom, homily 18, expounding this sentence, says: "What then — ought we not to resist evil? We ought indeed, but not in that manner in which the Law commanded, but in that which he [Christ] enjoined: namely, that we offer ourselves to the suffering of injuries. For fire is not ever [quenched] by fire, but fire is quenched by water," etc. This passage Bodius, in [his] Collectanea, reckons among those by which the Lutherans persuade [people] that it is not lawful for Christians in any way to demand back redress for an injury inflicted, nor retaliation of a loss, in court. Which error Jacobus Faber [Lefèvre d'Étaples] and Erasmus followed, in expounding this same law. But it is strange that these men — most sharp-sighted in many things — did not see that both Christ and Chrysostom counsel this as an evangelical counsel, which touches the perfect alone, and does not bind all by the obligation of a precept.

Annotation XXVIII [contents]

"Love your enemies." — Matthew 5[:44]

[margin: On the unforgivable sin.]

Augustine, in the first book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, chapter 43, discoursed certain things about the sin unto death, which he corrected in the nineteenth chapter of the first book of the Retractations, with these words: "In another place I judge a brother's sin to be 'unto death' when — after the acknowledgment of God through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ — someone attacks the brotherhood and, against that very grace by which he was reconciled to God, is driven by the firebrands of envy. This I did not firmly affirm, since I said that I 'thought' this; but yet it had to be added: if he ends this life in such wicked perversity of mind. For concerning any [however] evil person while set in this life, one must certainly not despair; nor is prayer imprudently [made] for him of whom one does not despair."

Again, in chapter 44 of the same book, he seems to assert that the sin of those attacking the brotherhood is so exceedingly pernicious that no one can rise again from it. For he says: "The stain of that sin is so great that it cannot submit to the humility of praying [for pardon], even if, by an evil conscience, one is forced both to acknowledge and to declare his sin."

(right column:)

The divine Thomas, in the third part of the Summa, question 86, mitigating this saying, says it is to be understood in the way in which we are wont to say that he "cannot be healed" who cannot easily be healed. For although this sin is by its own nature most difficult to cure, it can nevertheless easily be cured by the help of divine grace — which, according to David's saying, sometimes even turns [dries up] the depth of the sea.

Annotation XXIX [contents]

"But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy chamber," etc. — Matthew 6[:6]

[margin: On vocal prayer.]

Chrysostom, homily 19 on Matthew, brought forward, toward the exposition of this passage, certain things concerning vocal prayer, which the heretics of our times abuse against the prayers and supplications which are wont to be publicly read or chanted by priests in the churches of the Christians. But the very course of Chrysostom's words plainly proves that he does not condemn the vocal and public prayers of the Church — to which he exhorts the people in almost all his sermons — but that he speaks against certain vain and foolish show-offs, who preferred vocal prayer to spiritual, and on that account prayed in the church with disordered, immoderate, and unseemly gestures and shoutings, so as to be more conspicuously marked off from the rest — not without the admiration of the onlookers. These men Chrysostom, recalling them from ostentation and immodesty to modesty and humility, [addresses thus]: "Let us, therefore, render the vows of our prayers not by gestures of the body, nor by clamors of the voice, but by the best intention of the will — not with the sound of the mouth and its noise, not for such importunate ostentation and boasting, but with all modesty," etc.

Annotation XXX [contents]

"Thy kingdom come," etc. — Matthew 6[:10]

[margin: Whether Christ is to be called "the Lordly man" (homo dominicus).]

Augustine, in the second book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, wrote here that Christ is a "Lordly man" (homo dominicus), saying that the only-begotten Son of God would come from heaven, in the Lordly man, to judgment. This same thing he retracted in the second book of the Retractations, chapter 19, saying: "Wherever I said this, I could wish I had not said it; for since Christ Jesus is by nature Lord, he cannot be called a 'Lordly man.'" On which matter St. Thomas, in the 16th question of the third part, brings this reason: that since this word "Lord" is said of the Son of God according to [his] essence, it ought not to be predicated of him according to a denomination [derived name], and as though [it were] something accessory.

[signature "Oo 2"; catchword "Anno-" → Annotation XXXI, on p. 444 (PDF 449).]

(printed p. 444 [PDF p. 449], verso — Ann. XXXI–XXXIII, on Matthew 6 (supersubstantial bread; forgiving injuries; the monastic habit). Read order: left column, then right.)

Annotation XXXI [contents]

"Our supersubstantial bread," etc. — Matthew 6[:11]

[margin: Whether the bread we ask for in the Lord's Prayer is corporeal.]

Jerome, in the first book of [his] commentaries on Matthew, seems to disapprove those who think that by this petition a corporeal bread is to be asked for, in this manner: "What we have rendered as 'supersubstantial,' in the Greek is epiousion, which word the Seventy [LXX] very frequently render periousion. We considered, therefore, in the Hebrew; and wherever they expressed periousion, we found Segula — which Symmachus translated exaireton, that is, 'chief' or 'excellent' — although in a certain place he interpreted it as 'peculiar' [one's own]. When, therefore, we ask that God grant us a 'peculiar' or 'chief' bread, we ask for him who says, 'I am the living bread, who came down from heaven.' In the Gospel called 'According to the Hebrews,' for 'supersubstantial bread' I found Machar, which is called 'of tomorrow'; so that the sense is, 'Give us today our tomorrow's' — that is, future — bread. We can also understand 'supersubstantial' bread otherwise — [as that] which is above all substances and surpasses all creatures." Explaining this same thing more clearly, in [his] commentary on the second chapter of the Epistle to Titus, he says: "That which in the Gospel, according to the Latin translators, is written, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' is better [rendered] in the Greek, 'Our bread epiousion' — that is, 'chief, excellent, peculiar' — namely, him who, coming down from heaven, said, 'I am the living bread, who came down from heaven.' Far be it, indeed, that we — who are forbidden to think about tomorrow — should be commanded, in the Lord's prayer, to ask about that bread which, after a little, is to be digested and cast out into the privy."

Nor does John Cassian think otherwise, in the ninth Conference, where he determines that those gravely offend God who, in this petition as in the rest of the Lord's Prayer, demand from God anything corporeal and temporal. His words run thus: "'Give us this day our epiousion — that is, supersubstantial — bread'; which [word] another Evangelist called 'daily,' [and it] signifies the quality of its nobility and substance — namely, that it is above all substances, and that the sublimity of its magnificence and sanctification surpasses all creatures." And after this, some things being interposed, as if he wished to give a reason for such an explanation, he added: "You see, then, what kind of form of prayer has been set before us by him who, [as] judge, is to be prayed to through it — in which no mention is contained of corporeal or temporal life. For the Founder of eternity wishes nothing perishable, nothing temporal, to be begged of him. And so whoever — the everlasting petitions here being passed over — shall have preferred to ask of him something transitory and perishable, will do the greatest injury to [God's] magnificence and munificence, and will incur rather the offense than the propitiation of his Judge, by the [self-serving] 'usefulness' of his prayer." This [says] Cassian.

(right column:)

John Chrysostom disagrees with this opinion, in homily 20 on Matthew, where he shows that this petition is to be understood corporeally, in these words: "What is 'our epiousion' — that is, 'daily' — bread? Because he had said, 'Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth' — but he was speaking to men surrounded by the frailty of the flesh, and subject meanwhile to the necessity of nature, not having the same impassibility which the angels enjoy. By [his] precept he commands [things] to be done by us as they are said to be fulfilled even by those [angels]; but he condescends to the frailty of [our] nature, as if he said: 'The same diligence of conduct I demand of you; yet I do not require impassibility, for the very frailty of nature does not permit it, since it needs to be sustained by necessary food.' But do you consider how even to carnal things very much of the spiritual is joined. For not for the sake of riches and delicacies, but only for daily bread, did he command prayer to be poured out — and for daily bread indeed, that we should not be anxious for the morrow." Augustine too, in the letter to Proba, laid down that everything can be asked of God which may lawfully be desired; and temporal things, insofar as they conduce to virtue, may lawfully be desired — therefore also prayed for.

I should believe that Jerome and Cassian, in writing such things, wished to warn [us] not to ask for temporal and perishable things for their own sake, but only that through them we may preserve this body of ours in the service of the spirit as it aspires to eternal happiness.

Annotation XXXII [contents]

"For if you forgive men their sins," etc. — Matthew 6[:14]

[margin: On the forgiveness of injury.]

Thomas Cajetan, in [his] commentaries, says that if anyone forgives injuries from the heart for God's sake, even if he persists in fornication, God will at length convert him to penance and pardon him all [his] offenses. Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa, condemns this opinion in the second book of [his] Annotations, because it affords an occasion of fornicating and of persisting in fornication.

Annotation XXXIII [contents]

"Be not made sad, like the hypocrites." — Matthew 6[:16]
[margin: On the dress of monks.]

Augustine, in the second book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, chapter 19, writes some things which St. Thomas, in the Secunda Secundae, question 187, cites as spoken in the character of those who disparage the cheap and abject dress of the monastic profession. And these are they: "In this chapter it must most especially be observed that there can be boasting not only in the mere splendor and pomp of corporeal things, but also in their mournful squalor itself — and [boasting] the more dangerous, in that it deceives under the name of the service of God." To these words of Augustine he [Aquinas] adds the testimonies of Jerome and Strabo; of whom the former [Jerome], writing to Nepotian, says: "Dark [drab] garments are to be shunned equally with white; finery and squalor are to be avoided in like manner, because the one

[catchword "terum" → "the other…" continues on p. 445 (PDF 450).]

(printed p. 445 [PDF p. 450], recto — end of Ann. XXXIII and Ann. XXXIIII–XXXV, on Matthew 6 (whether any creature is incorporeal). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation XXXIII:)

…[because] the one [drab garb] smacks of self-indulgence, the other [white] of vainglory. And Strabo, on that [verse] from the sixth chapter of the Apocalypse, "Behold a pale horse," etc., says: "The devil, seeing that he can profit neither by open tribulations nor by open heresies, sends ahead false brethren, who under the habit of religion take on the nature of the black and red horse by perverting the faith." St. Thomas says that by these authors the poor, unadorned, and lowly dress of monks — and of other pious men, who use abject clothing for the exercise of humility and penance, out of contempt of worldly glory, and that by their example they may turn others from the vanity of the age — is not disapproved; but that the hypocrisy, pride, and iniquity of those is condemned who delight in the filth and squalor of their garments, either to draw upon themselves the eyes and mouths of all, or to cover a wolfish mind under sheep's clothing, to the ruin of those whom they desire to deceive.

Annotation XXXIIII [contents]

"No one can serve two masters." — Matthew 6[:24]
[margin: Whether anyone can hate God. Ps. 73.]

Augustine, in the second book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, chapter 22, expounding this, says: "Scarcely anyone's conscience can hate God." This same thing he retracted, in the same book and chapter of the Retractations, as contrary to divine Scripture — which says of many, "the pride of those who hate thee."

Annotation XXXV [contents]

"Is not the soul more than food, and the body more than raiment?" — Matthew 6[:25]
[margin: Whether no creature is incorporeal.]

Hilary, in the fifth canon, in the exposition of this passage, writes that no creature is incorporeal, in these words: "There is nothing which is not, in substance and in creation, corporeal; and the elements of all things — whether in heaven or on earth, whether of visible or invisible things — have been formed [as bodies]. For the kinds of souls too — whether of those possessing bodies, or of those exiled from bodies — nevertheless obtain a corporeal substance of their own nature, because everything created must be in some [place]."

Claudianus [Mamertus], bishop of Vienne, refutes this opinion, in the second book On the State of the Soul, saying: "Hilary of Poitiers, among several of his lofty disputations, thinking something amiss, discoursed these two things contrary to the truth: one, that he said nothing created is incorporeal; the other, that Christ felt nothing of pain in the Passion — and if his passion was not real, our redemption too could not be real. But since the blessed Hilary abolished the fault of this opinion by the virtue of [his] confession [of faith], he so bears the pen of rebuke that he suffers no loss of [his] merits. Wherefore it is fitting that trust be given to the expositors of the divine Scriptures, so long as they accord with it in the tenor of truth."

But as for what Claudianus condemns in Hilary, I find that it so pleased the ancients that it was received among the catholic rules and the synodical sanctions.

(right column:)

Among the works of Augustine, in the book On Ecclesiastical Dogmas — said to be by Gennadius — in chapter eleven there is read an ecclesiastical canon in these words: "Nothing is to be believed incorporeal and invisible by nature, except God alone — that is, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Every creature is corporeal; the angels and all the heavenly Virtues are corporeal, although they do not subsist in flesh."

John Cassian, writing on this matter, in the thirteenth chapter of the seventh Conference, says: "Although we may declare that certain natures are spiritual — such as the angels, archangels, and the other Virtues, and our very soul, or certainly this subtle air — yet they are by no means to be reckoned incorporeal. For they have, according to themselves, a body by which they subsist, though far more tenuous than our bodies — according to the Apostle's saying: 'And [there are] heavenly bodies and earthly bodies'; and again, 'It is sown an animal body, it rises a spiritual body.' By which it is manifestly gathered that nothing is incorporeal, except God alone." Jerome seems at times to allude to this opinion; for when, on the tenth chapter of Matthew, he had said that the soul is incorporeal, he straightway added, "I mean, in comparison with the grosser substance of our body" — by that form of speech indicating that the soul is incorporeal not simply, but [only] in comparison with our body.

Tertullian, in the book On the Soul, chapter two, speaks thus: "The corporeality of the soul shines out in the Gospel. For in the underworld the soul of a certain [man] grieves, and is punished in the flame, and is tormented in [its] tongue, and implores from the finger of a happier soul the solace of dew. Do you think that outcome — of the poor man rejoicing and the rich man mourning — [only] a figure? And what is the name 'Lazarus' doing there, if the matter is not in reality [true]? But even if it is to be believed a figure, it will [still] be a testimony of the truth. For if the soul had no body, the image of the soul would not receive the image of a body; nor would Scripture lie about corporeal members, if they did not exist. Therefore, if the soul perceived anything of torment or of solace in the fire, or in Abraham's bosom, the corporeality of the soul will be proved. For incorporeality suffers nothing, having nothing through which it can suffer; or if it has [something], this will be a body. For insofar as everything corporeal is passible, to that same extent everything passible is corporeal." [margin: Luke 16.]

But since St. Augustine, in the tenth book On Genesis according to the Letter, disapproves this opinion in Tertullian, and all the scholastic theologians reject the same, it may be believed that those ancient theologians, when they declared the soul corporeal, did not think it to be a body by its own nature and in itself, but with regard had to God — in comparison with whom there is nothing that can be called altogether incorporeal, as God [is]: seeing that he neither needs a body, nor is circumscribed by place, nor enclosed by bounds, but is everywhere and fills all things. But creatures, however spiritual they be, are applied to certain bodies (which they animate) or to corporeal places (in which they exist). Read Annotation 142 of the preceding book.

[signature "Oo 3"; catchword "Anno-" → Annotation XXXVI, on p. 446 (PDF 451).]

(printed p. 446 [PDF p. 451], verso — Ann. XXXVI–XL, on Matthew 6–7 (preaching for a living; sin in the Church; Ferus on faith and works). Read order: left column, then right.)

Annotation XXXVI [contents]

"Seek first the kingdom of God." — Matthew 6[:33]

[margin: Whether it is lawful for preachers to preach the Gospel for the sake of a livelihood.]

Augustine, in the second book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, chapters 24 and 25, pursues this passage in a lengthy exposition; from which the Master of the Sentences [Peter Lombard], seizing a handle for disputation, maintains that it is not lawful for evangelical preachers to set themselves two ends of preaching — one primary, for the kingdom of God, the other secondary, for bodily sustenance. This patchwork of him [Augustine] is gathered in the second book of the Sentences, distinction 38, thus: "We ought not to preach the Gospel in order to eat, but to eat in order to preach the Gospel — so that food is not the good which is sought, but the necessary [thing] which is added, that this may be fulfilled: 'Seek first the kingdom of God, and all these things shall be added to you.' He did not say, 'First seek the kingdom of God, and then seek these things, although they too are necessary,' but he says, 'All these things shall be added to you' — that is, these will follow, if you seek those; [take heed] lest, while seeking these, you be turned away from thence; or lest you set up two ends, so as to desire both the kingdom of God for its own sake and these necessary things for its sake. Therefore we ought to do all things only for the sake of the kingdom of God — not, even along with the kingdom of God, to have in view a bodily reward." — Thus far Augustine's words; by which the Master shows that preachers are not absolutely forbidden to set themselves two ends, but only [forbidden to set] two ends tending in different directions, of which the one is not referred to the other. But if they desire the kingdom of God first, and for its own sake, and then, in the second place, seek food, clothing, and lodging for the sake of that same kingdom — they in no way stray from the evangelical scope, because they subordinate all ends to one only end, which is God.

Annotation XXXVII [contents]

"Sufficient for the day is its own trouble." — Matthew 6[:34]

[margin: On bodily human food.]

Augustine, in the second book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, expounding this, thought that by the name of "trouble" [malice] Christ wished to signify the food and drink which men need — because they are penal to us, pertaining to this frailty and mortality which by sinning we have deserved. This same opinion he retracts in the first book of the Retractations, [chapter] 19, as incautiously said, since he did not take heed that food had been given to the first men too in paradise, before they deserved, by sinning, this penalty of death.

Annotation XXXVIII [contents]

"Hypocrite, cast out first the beam," etc. — Matthew 7[:5]

[margin: Whether there is sin in the Church.]

Augustine, in the second book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, seems to agree with the Lutheran heretics who teach that there is no sin in the Church of God — when he says: "God chose for himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle."

(right column:)

But he declares this same thing [more clearly] in the first book of the Retractations, chapter 19, showing that that opinion is to be understood not of this Church militant — mixed of good and bad — but of the glorious and triumphant Church.

Annotation XXXIX [contents]

"Do they gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" — Matthew 7[:16]
[margin: On the Trinity.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 19, judges those to be heretics who confess the most holy Trinity. For thus he expounds this passage: "And it is true indeed that he called all wicked heretics 'thorns' and 'thistles'; yet perhaps the Lord — knowing that this heresy would prevail above all — called them 'thistles,' as it were professors of the Trinity, bearing a 'triangular' wisdom in their perfidy." (a sneer of the Arian-leaning author: he puns on tribulus, the three-pointed thistle/caltrop, to brand the Trinitarians.)

Annotation XL [contents]

"Every good tree makes good fruits; but a bad tree makes bad fruits." — Matthew 7[:17]
[margin: Whether all works apart from grace are sins.] [margin: Gen. 8; Isa. 9, 53.]

John Ferus [Johann Wild], in the first book of [his] commentaries on Matthew, narrating this passage, uses these words: "From this it follows that no work is good and pleasing to God apart from faith; nay, only the faithful do good works. The reason is that, without faith and grace, a man is nothing but an unfruitful and bad tree, and therefore cannot bear good fruits. The virtues of the philosophers, therefore, are not good — because, although they have the appearance of good, they do not come forth from a good tree; for they proceeded either from love or hope of praise, or from fear of blame. And not only can our nature not bear good fruits without grace, but it also produces bad ones — according to that [saying], 'The sense and thought of man is prone to evil'; likewise, 'All are hypocrites, and every mouth has spoken lying'; likewise, 'All are vain, vain their works, and all their counsels vain'; likewise, 'We have all erred, everyone into his own way,' etc. You see, therefore, that whatever is done apart from faith is not merely not-good, but evil."

These words of Ferus are similar and akin to the words often repeated by the same author in his commentary on John, and in the book of Annotations which Dominic Soto published against Ferus, with [certain passages] noted and condemned — which indeed are found in the places [treated] below. In the explanation of that saying of John, from the first chapter, "the life was the light of men," he says: "Reason is indeed a light given by God, by which we know that good is to be done and evil fled; yet for the most part — nay, always — it is deceived in [its] choice, unless the divine light be present. We are admonished, therefore, by this word, that we should obey not our reason, but the word of God, which is the true light." Likewise, on that [verse] of the same chapter, "Who [are born] not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh," etc.: "By this word, therefore," he says, "he condemns wholly the old birth, and thereby also all the powers of nature, which by [their] natural

[catchword "turali" → continues on p. 447 (PDF 452).]

(printed p. 447 [PDF p. 452], recto — end of Ann. XL and Ann. XLI, on Matthew 7 (grace and good works, Trent; the pain of loss vs. gehenna). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation XL, Ferus's statements:)

…[all the powers of nature] which by their natural propagation are transfused into [their] offspring.

Again, on that [verse], "Of whose fullness we have all received," these things are read written: [margin: John 1.] "Accursed are not only the things which we do, but also the things which are done in us; accursed is the thought of our heart, [our] reason, mouth, hands, feet; accursed to us are all contingent things, whether joyful or sad. Hence it is that in joys we swell up, in sorrows we are broken and despair."

And below, on the words "The Law was given through Moses," it is written thus: "Although the Law itself is good in itself, yet if grace be not present, it produces nothing but hypocrites."

Again, on that [verse] of John 3, "The Light came into the world," etc.: "Christ," he says, "first makes manifest that all our things are mere darkness and sins."

These, and passages of this kind of this author, Dominic Soto judges are to be avoided, because they seem to favor the Lutheran heretics — who teach that human nature, without the special help of justifying grace, can choose and do nothing but evil, and on that account that all the actions of unbelievers, and even their very virtues, are sins; and that all the works of Christians, however good, are — if they be done without the good of a special gratifying grace — evil and hypocritical. But this error the holy Synod of Trent detests, in the sixth session, canon seven, in these words: "If anyone shall say that all works which are done before justification, in whatever manner they be done, are sins — or that the more vehemently one strives to dispose himself for grace, the more gravely he sins — let him be anathema."

Michael Medina, in the Apology which he wrote in defense of Ferus, defending these opinions against Soto's censures, says: first, that the author, when he said that works done without grace are evil and sins, did not have regard to the dogma of the Lutherans, but to the phrase and manner of speaking customary with the ancient fathers — who called all works done apart from the help of divine grace not merely "not good," but very frequently termed [them] "evils," "vices," "sins," and "darkness" — not that they believed them truly and simply evil and sins, but because they knew that these [works] neither avail for acquiring Christian righteousness, nor conduce to obtaining the good of eternal happiness, and on that account did not deign to reckon them among good [works]. Likewise he says that what was said by Ferus — that all things done by us, and in us, are "accursed and damned" — is not to be so understood as if he thought that all things done naturally by the judgment of right reason are outrages worthy of damnation and cursing; but is to be interpreted of the affections, passions, and propensities to evils, arising from the impulse of our corrupt nature. By which form of speech the Apostle said, [margin: Rom. 7.] "I know that there dwells not in me — that is, in my flesh — any good; but sin dwells in me." In like manner, [as to] what the author says — that without divine help the human intellect can neither know the good, nor the will choose the good — he wishes it to be expounded not of the moral and human good, which is subject to our knowledge and choice, but of the highest and everlasting good — which without the revelation of the divine light cannot be known and chosen — under that aspect by which it is the goal of the beatitude to be hoped for, and the way of the spiritual life leading to eternal happiness. See Annotation 255 of this book.

(right column:)

Annotation XLI [contents]

"Every tree that does not make [good] fruit shall be cut down and cast into the fire." — Matthew 7[:19]

[margin: Whether the privation of the divine glory is a graver gehenna.]

Chrysostom, homily 24 on Matthew, discoursing (on the occasion of this saying) about gehenna, says that the lack of the divine vision is a greater punishment than all the torments of gehenna. And he expresses this opinion in these words: "I know that very many dread gehenna alone; yet I say that the loss of that glory is a far more bitter punishment than gehenna itself." And below: "Intolerable indeed is that thing, and horrible that punishment; yet if someone should set before me a thousand gehennas, he will say nothing such as it is to be repelled from the honor of that blessed glory." And in the first exhortation to the fallen Theodore, he says: "There are some of an absurd judgment; these merely love to have escaped gehenna. But I, on the contrary, affirm that there is a certain torment much harsher than gehenna — that is, not to have attained so great a glory, and to have fallen away from it. Nor do I think that one should mourn over the evils of gehenna with as great a grief as it is necessary to bewail [our] fall — that we have fallen from the heavens — which is doubtless the harshest torment of all."

St. Bonaventure (in the second book of the Sentences, distinction 33, question 3) and Richard of Middleton (on distinction 50 of the fourth [book] of the Sentences, in the last question) observed that this opinion seems to differ from the universal definition of the theologians, who lay down that the punishment of infants — lacking the divine vision alone — is the mildest of all punishments, as Augustine taught in chapter 55 of the Enchiridion to Laurentius. St. Thomas, in the Disputed Questions, in the question on the punishment of original sin, article one — and the same Bonaventure and Richard — say that Chrysostom's assertion is most true in [the case of] adults, but by no means in infants; and that the cause of this difference is that the former [adults] see themselves expelled from eternal happiness by the wickedness of their own will, but the latter [infants] know that they lack the heavenly glory not by their own [fault], but by the fault of the first parent.

But Prudentius — although he was an adult, and already worn with old age — nevertheless seemed to have thought the punishments of hell more grievous, and more to be dreaded by him, than the loss of eternal happiness; when, at the end of his Hamartigenia — choosing rather to be thrust out of heaven than thrust down into gehenna — he prayed to Christ in these verses:

> "In the Father's treasuries there is much dwelling, O Christ,
>
> divided among unequal places; I do not ask [for] a blessed
>
> home in the [heavenly] region — let the holy throngs of the pious be there;
>
> but for me it is enough, if no face of an infernal minister
>
> meet me, nor the greedy flame of gehenna
>
> devour this soul, plunged in the lowest furnaces."
>
> [signature "Oo 4"; catchword "Anno-" → Annotation XLII, on p. 448 (PDF 453).]

(printed p. 448 [PDF p. 453], verso — Ann. XLII–XLV, on Matthew 7–9 (Ferus's "faith = fiducia"; priestly absolution; Trent). Read order: left column, then right.)

Annotation XLII [contents]

"He built his house upon the rock." — Matthew 7[:24]

[margin: On the Church.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 20: "The Church," he says, "which Christ built upon the rock, cannot perish. Nor is it contrary [to this] that certain [persons] fall away from the Church; for those were never Christians." Henry of Andernach, on the first [book] of the Sentences, distinction 40, question 2, citing these words under the name of Chrysostom, says that by them it is signified that those who have finally fallen from the Church were not Christians according to the grace of eternal righteousness, but only according to the grace of present righteousness.

Annotation XLIII [contents]

"Say only by a word, and my servant shall be healed." — Matthew 8[:8]

[margin: On justifying faith, and on unformed faith.]

John Ferus, in the second book on Matthew, expounding this clause, seems to allude to the error of those who teach that justifying faith is nothing else than a confidence of the divine mercy remitting sins for Christ's sake — and that unformed faith is nothing else than a historical and empty opinion. For thus he speaks: "Not always is [true] faith what we [commonly] call faith. We call 'faith' [merely] to assent to those things which are set forth in the divine histories, and which the Church proposes to be believed. This the scholastics [call] 'unformed,' and James calls a 'dead' faith. But what sort [of faith] is that which is dead, and lacks its own substantial form? Assuredly it is not faith, but an empty opinion. Far otherwise does Scripture speak of faith; for according to Scripture, faith is nothing else than confidence of the divine mercy promised in Christ. And below: Of this faith mention is made in the Gospel. 'Whoever believes in the Son of God,' says Christ, 'is not judged.' He speaks here not of historical or unformed faith, but of confidence of the mercy to be shown through Christ; for the highest faith, which Scripture commends, is nothing else than to trust in the gratuitous mercy of God. This is the true faith by which the just man lives; this one [faith] God requires of us," etc. "You have an example of this faith in this Centurion; for you do not read that he recited the articles of faith, but you read that he approached God with great confidence. Whence it was said, 'I have not found so great faith in Israel'; and likewise, 'Go, and as thou hast believed, be it done to thee.'"

Dominic Soto, in [his] Annotations against Ferus, writes that this same definition of faith is also inculcated by the same author in [his] commentaries on John — especially on that [verse] from the third chapter of John, "The man believed the word which Jesus spoke, and he went [his way]"; in which place words of this kind are read: "We are taught what the nature of faith is — namely, to conceive a confidence about God, that he will save us; but how, and when, and through what afflictions, in no way pertains to us." Examining this opinion, Soto disapproves Ferus, because, contrary to the catholic definition of the theologians, he does not say that faith is the whole assent to those things which God has revealed, or [assent] to the articles of faith, but [makes it] a confidence of the promises — which the Lutherans say suffices for justification, and which the holy Synod of Trent condemned in the sixth session, canon twelve, in these words: "If anyone shall say that justifying faith is nothing else than a confidence of the divine mercy remitting sins for Christ's sake, or that it is that confidence alone by which we are justified — let him be anathema."

(right column:)

Annotation XLIIII [contents]

"For I too am a man set under authority." — Matthew 8[:9]

[margin: On the Trinity.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 22, here adds an altogether Arian exposition, by which he destroys the equality of the Son and the Father, in these words: "See in what way — the Spirit suggesting [it] — he [the centurion] depicted in himself the mystery of the Father and the Son. Was it not enough, for confessing Christ's power, to say only this: 'And I am a man having soldiers under me; and I say to this one, Go, and he goes; and to another, Come, and he comes'? — since Christ too has under him angels, to whom he gives the command of going and returning. What need, then, was there to add, 'And I too am a man set under authority,' except that he might most fully show Christ's dignity in himself? — that is: 'I am under the authority of another; yet I have the authority of commanding those who are under me. For I am not hindered from commanding inferiors because I am [myself] under superiors; but I am commanded by those under whom I am, while I command those who are under me. So you too, although you be under the Father's authority, yet have the authority of commanding your angels; nor are you hindered from commanding inferiors because you [yourself] have a superior. For you are commanded by the Father as a lesser, yet you command the angels as a greater.'" — But perhaps the heretic says, wishing to show the Father and the Son [to be] one or equal: "This passage is not to be understood thus, but so: If I, set under authority, can command those under my authority, how much more can you, who are under no one's authority, command those whom you have in [your] authority?" But the text does not admit this perverse interpretation; for he did not say, "If I, a man, [were] in authority," but thus: "For I too am a man under authority." He made no difference of comparison between himself and Christ, but introduced a relation of likeness.

Annotation XLV [contents]

"…God who gave such power to men." — Matthew 9[:8]

[margin: Whether priests [truly] absolve, or only pronounce [people] absolved.]

John Ferus, in the second book of [his] commentaries on Matthew, interpreting these [words], speaks of the sacramental absolution of sins in such a way that some have suspected him to assert that the power of remitting sins, handed to priests, is not a power of truly and properly remitting sins, but only a faculty of pronouncing, declaring, attesting, and certifying that the sins of penitents have been remitted and loosed by God. Which error is reproved in the fourteenth session of the Council of Trent, canon 9, in these words: "If anyone shall say that the sacramental absolution of the priest is not a judicial act, but a bare ministry of pronouncing and declaring that sins are remitted to the one confessing — let him be anathema."

But the words of Ferus are these: "Who would not praise God…

[catchword "-det" → continues on p. 449 (PDF 454).]

(printed p. 449 [PDF p. 454], recto — end of Ann. XLV and Ann. XLVI–XLVII, on Matthew 9 (vocation and foreseen merits; suffrages for the dead). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation XLV, Ferus's words:)

"[Who would not praise God] that he has now given such power to men, and to our brother Christ — nor to Christ alone, but also to others through Christ? [margin: John 20 (21); Isa. 43; Apoc. 1.] 'Whose sins,' he says, 'you shall have remitted, they are remitted to them,' etc. — not that a man properly remits sin, but that he shows and certifies [it] to have been remitted by God. For absolution, which you receive from a man, is nothing else than as if he said: 'Behold, my son, I certify to you that your sins are remitted; I announce to you that you have God propitious; and whatever Christ promised us in his baptism and Gospel, he now announces and promises to you through me. Of this you shall have me as witness. Go in peace, and in quiet of conscience.'" Again, in the same volume of commentaries, on that sentence of the eleventh chapter, "Come to me, all you who labor," etc., he seems to confirm this same teaching, speaking thus: "What else does the priest do in absolving, than [what] the Gospel preaches? Is it not the Gospel and the good news, when he says, 'By the virtue of Christ's passion I absolve thee, and I judge thee free from thy sins, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit'? For what else does he wish [to convey] by these or like words, than if he said: 'Behold, my son, you tremble because of your sins: but fear not. God has now become to you a kindly father, and has remitted your sins; and whatever Christ, by the virtue of the keys of binding the obstinate and loosing the penitent, promised in baptism or the Gospel, he has now secretly fulfilled in your heart, and truly announces this to you through me. Take me as witness of it: go, therefore, in peace and tranquillity of conscience, and sin no more.'"

These things [says] Ferus — whom, on this article, the things written down by him in the third book of these commentaries plainly show to have thought and taught piously and holily. There, on that saying of the Savior to Peter, "I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven," there is a sure and undoubted opinion of this author concerning the power of the keys and the faculty of absolving, in these words: "From what has already been said, the question is easily resolved which torments some — namely, how priests can remit sins, since that belongs to God alone (according to that word, 'I am he who blots out thy iniquities'), and since Christ alone has the keys of death and hell. To which it is usually answered thus: that God alone remits sins, because the Apostles and their successors employ those [means] through which God remits sins and gives grace — such as the word of God and the sacraments; therefore they too are said to remit sins and to open heaven, for no other reason than that they employ the means. So Paul says, 'You are God's tillage and building, but we are God's helpers.' In sum, the keys of the Church are nothing else than the power of binding and loosing, of remitting and retaining sins," etc. From these words of Ferus, we can easily suspect that the aforesaid words which are at variance with these were corrupted by Lutheran corrupters after the author's death, or thrust in here from elsewhere out of the commentaries of heretics. You have things pertaining to this article in Annotation 62 of the fifth book, and in Annotations 71 and 202 of this book.

(right column:)

Annotation XLVI [contents]

"He saw a man sitting at the toll-booth, Matthew by name." — Matthew 9[:9]

[margin: Whether [our] calling comes from merits, or from [merits] foreseen by divine foreknowledge.]

Chrysostom, at the beginning of homily 31 on Matthew, discoursing about the calling of Matthew, seems to indicate that the calling of this [man] and of the other Apostles had its occasion from the foreknowledge, in the divine prescience, of their own good will and faith. For thus we read there: "For what reason did he not call him at the same time as Peter and John and the other disciples? Certainly, just as he then came to those [others] and called [them] when he knew they would obey, so now he called Matthew too, when he saw [him] subdued by the fame of [his] miracles, [and that he] would in no way resist. For which cause he also 'fished for' Paul after the resurrection. For he who searches hearts and beholds the hidden things of minds was not ignorant of when each one was ready to obey. Therefore, not beginning immediately, when he was harder [more resistant], but after a thousand miracles and [his] notable and widespread fame, he called [him now] as more fit for obeying." See below, Annotations 87 and 251.

Annotation XLVII [contents]

"The girl is not dead, but sleeps." — Matthew 9[:24]

[margin: Whether the suffrages made for the departed profit both the blessed and the damned.]

Chrysostom, in homily 33 on Matthew — when, narrating this passage, he treated of the care to be taken for the dead — fell in a certain way into the opinion of those who think that the suffrages and prayers which are here performed in the church profit both those who are damned in hell and those who enjoy eternal glory. For there he relates such things: "For if many barbarous nations are wont to burn the goods of the dead together with the dead, how much more fitting is it that you, [when your] son is dead, can hand over his own [goods] — not that they be reduced to ashes, but that they may render him more glorious. Do you think he departed stained with spots? Give his own [goods for him], that he may wipe himself clean of those spots. Do you think he died in righteousness? Offer your [goods] for him, for an increase of [his] reward and recompense." And in the liturgy of the divine sacrifice published by him — and approved by the same [author] in various homilies — he composed a formula of praying and offering for all the faithful departed, and especially for the souls of the blessed, in these words: "We offer to thee this rational worship for those resting in the faith — the fathers, patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, the heralds and evangelists, martyrs, confessors, and every soul initiated in the faith."

Nor does Gregory, the Roman pontiff, seem far from this opinion, in the book of the Sacraments [Sacramentary], where, in the sacred mysteries of the Mass, he appointed [us] to pray in these words: "We have received, O Lord, the divine mysteries; [grant that,] as they profit thy saints unto glory, so, we beseech, they may avail us unto healing."

Again, [as to the point] that prayers and oblations [profit] some-

[catchword "quid" → continues on p. 450 (PDF 455).]

(printed p. 450 [PDF p. 455], verso — Ann. XLVII cont., on Matthew 9 (the dossier on prayer for the dead). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation XLVII:)

…[that prayers and oblations profit some]thing of refreshment to those who have departed without penance — the same Chrysostom seems to indicate, in the third homily on the Epistle to the Philippians, where he addresses those who mourn the dead beyond [what is] fitting, thus: "Bewail those who have died in [their] riches and procured no consolation for their own souls out of their riches — who, when they had received the power of washing away their sins, would not. Let us weep for these, but with the modesty of decorum. Let us weep for these, let us help them with [our] strength, let us procure for them some aid — little indeed; yet let us help them. How, and by what means? By praying, let us exhort others too to pray for them; and let us unceasingly give alms to the poor for them. This thing has no little consolation. For not in vain was it ordained by the Apostles that, in the celebration of the venerable mysteries, memory should be made of those who have departed hence. They know that much profit accrues to them from this, much benefit. But this indeed we say of those who have departed in the faith; but the catechumens are not reckoned worthy even of this consolation, but are destitute of all such aid, except one only. And what is that? It is permitted to give to the poor in their name, whence some little refreshment accrues to them."

John Damascene, in the sermon On Aiding the Dead, confirms these words of Chrysostom, adducing several examples which openly show that the suffrages of the faithful profit, in some part, even the unbelieving and impious [who are] damned to eternal punishment. And first he brings forward Falconilla, a woman who, as long as she lived, was a worshiper of idols and alien to the religion of Christ — whom Thecla the protomartyr, while still living among us, rescued from the underworld by her prayer. He likewise brings forward, from the sacred history of Palladius [dedicated] to Lausus, Macarius the Great, praying assiduously for the dead: to whom, anxiously inquiring whether his prayers profited the departed, a certain dry skull of an idolater which happened to lie in the road, bursting forth into speech at the divine command, said: "When, O Macarius, you offer prayers for the dead, we meanwhile feel some [degree of] relief." He adds also, among other examples, the deed of Gregory, the Roman pontiff, who, when he earnestly prayed to God for the salvation of Trajan Augustus (who had died nearly five hundred years before his time), heard a voice divinely brought, saying: "I have heard your prayers, and I give pardon to Trajan; but do not you henceforth offer me a sacrifice for an impious [man]." From this opinion Augustine seems not to have altogether shrunk — especially in the Enchiridion to Laurentius, chapter 110, where he set down these things: "When the sacrifices, whether of the altar or of any alms whatsoever, are offered for all the baptized dead, for the very good they are thanksgivings; for the not-very-bad they are propitiations; for the very bad, even if they are no aids to the dead, they are some kind of consolations to the living. And those to whom they profit, [profit] either to this — that there be full remission — or at least that the damnation itself become more tolerable." And below, permitting the mitigation of the damnation to be believed, he says: "I judge the punishments of the damned, at certain intervals of time, if it please [i.e. if it be found acceptable to hold this], to be somewhat mitigated — provided it be understood that the wrath of God (that is, the damnation itself) remains in them: in which [damnation] God, his wrath remaining, does not nevertheless withhold his compassions; not by ending the eternal punishments, but by applying [some] relief, or interposing [it amid] the torments." This [says] Augustine.

(right column:)

But also Aurelius Prudentius, in the hymn On the New Light of the Paschal Sabbath, relates that the lost souls of the guilty rest from torments on the Paschal vigil — which of old all Christians were wont to bring about [for them] by prayers and sacrifices. And he sings in this manner:

> "There are also, for the harmful spirits, oft-recurring holidays of their punishments, famous under the Styx, > on that night when the sacred God returned to the upper world from the Acherontic pools.
>
>
> Tartarus grows slack with milder punishments,
>
> and exults in the leisure of its prison.
>
> The people of the shades [are] free from the fires,
>
> and the rivers seethe not with their wonted sulphur."

In these, and in other such sayings of illustrious fathers, the scholastic theologians have variously interpreted [them], especially in those [passages] which speak of alleviating the punishments of the damned. For just as they did not dare to condemn the opinion of the saints, so neither did they think it safe to embrace it — lest by that assertion they should gradually be driven into Origen's error, [namely] that the punishments of hell will someday be ended. For they foresaw that those torments, by the multiplication of the prayers and alms of the pious, could be so far mitigated and diminished that at length they would sometime cease to be torments. Therefore, lest they be dashed against this rock, they searched out various paths of escape.

Prepositinus [of Cremona], a priest of the church of Liège, wrote in the compendium of his theology that so great a multitude of suffrages could be heaped upon the damned that, in the progress of time, they would be stripped of all punishments — yet not forever (as Origen had thought), but until the resurrection, in which — their bodies being resumed — they would again be thrust into eternal punishments, every hope of refreshment and solace being utterly cast off.

Gilbert [of Poitiers], bishop of Poitiers, in the book of Theological Questions, thought that by the prayers and oblations of the faithful the punishments of the reprobate are taken away — without their consumption [i.e. without ending them] — in that manner in which infinite proportional parts are wont to be taken away from a line: from which, although it be not itself infinite, yet infinite parts can be subtracted without any consuming of it.

William [of Auxerre], bishop of Auxerre, at the end of [his] Summa Theologica, judges that the aids of the living give suffrage to the damned, not toward the diminution or interruption of the torment, but toward the comforting and strengthening of the sufferer: as if someone should refresh with food a man weighed down by a huge burden, or drench [him] with cold water — he will indeed render him stronger for bearing the load, yet will not diminish the load even a tiny bit.

Rupert [i.e. the bishop of Lincoln — Robert Grosseteste], not far from the end of [his] Theological Summa, handed down that the punishments of the damned are neither taken away, nor interrupted, nor diminished,

[catchword "-cia" → continues on p. 451 (PDF 456).]

(printed p. 451 [PDF p. 456], recto — end of Ann. XLVII and Ann. XLVIII–LI, on Matthew 10–11 (prayer for the dead; John the Baptist's "doubt"; pre-Christian faith). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation XLVII:)

…yet some occasion of a graver misery is withdrawn from them, while they perceive that by these — who extend suffrages [to them] — they are not utterly cast off, but find among the living some commiseration for their present evils.

St. Thomas, on the fourth [book] of the Sentences, distinction 45, question 2 — the opinions of these [scholars] being refuted — decrees that our suffrages profit neither the blessed nor the damned in anything: the former, because — abounding in all abundance of goods — our aids can confer nothing on them; the latter, because — sunk in the utmost depth of all evils — no effect of redemption, however slight, may be hoped for [them]. But as for those things which chiefly Chrysostom and Gregory advise concerning prayers pertaining to the blessed, he says that the sayings of both are not to be so understood as that we should think the glory of the blessed, in the blessed themselves, is increased and receives an accession from our prayers and oblations; but that we should believe their glory grows in us who pray and offer, and brings to us many and great increases of virtues for attaining that same glory of theirs. Just as when we praise God, we acquire by these praises no increase of glory for his divinity; but the glory of his majesty is rendered more and more conspicuous in us.

But to those things brought forward from Chrysostom and other fathers in the case of the damned: St. Thomas, in the first place, notes that the name "damnation" is extended also to the punishments of purgatory; and that, according to this signification, Augustine said that the damnation of some — namely, of those existing in purgatory — is made more tolerable by the aids of the faithful.

In the second place he observes that that kind of consolation and refreshment, which is sometimes related to have reached the souls of the damned from the prayers of the saints, brought them no diminution of torment, but a certain empty appearance of a deceptive joy, and a pleasing illusion of the mourning mind — such as they say is [found] in the demons, who, when they have drawn men into sinning, are so affected by a certain false and imaginary gladness that nothing of their punishments is [thereby] decreased.

Lastly, to that which Damascene relates — that the souls of Falconilla and Trajan were aided by the prayers of Thecla and Gregory — he answers that helps of this kind were special dispensations, granted to each by a singular privilege; and that those things conceded to some, outside the common law, by [special] grace, are not to be drawn into a precedent for the rest.

Consult what we have touched upon below, at Annotation 311, concerning catechumens who have died — on the opinion of Chrysostom, drawn in here from the Epistle to the Philippians.

Annotation XLVIII [contents]

"Fear not those who kill the body, but cannot kill the soul." — Matthew 10[:28]
[margin: Whether the soul alone is the man.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 25, seems to hint that the soul alone is the man, but that the body is its garment, created by God to this end, that with perpetual and natural hatred it might war against the soul. His words are these: "Fear not those who kill the body: for the substance of man is not the body, but the soul; and the body is the garment of the soul." And below: "But I will say what I think more truly: the flesh was created not only to be the soul's garment, but rather for its temptation — as a domestic and natural enemy — [and to it] it has been coupled," etc. The former part of this error was followed, in earlier years, by Francesco Giorgio [Veneto], whom we confuted in Annotation 26 of the fifth book; but the latter part — alleged under the name of Chrysostom — Johannes of Mechelen noted, on the second [book] of the Sentences, distinction 32, saying that it is to be understood [as applying] in the state of [fallen] nature deprived [of grace]. Read Annotation 26 of the fifth book.

(right column:)

Annotation XLIX [contents]

(the print reads "Annotation LXIX," evidently a misprint for XLIX)

"Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing?" — Matthew 10[:29]
[margin: On Pilate.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 25, brings forth here a harsh and awkward proposition, saying: "Pilate wished to release Christ, but could not, because God was handing him over [to death]."

Annotation L [contents]

"Art thou he who is to come, or do we look for another?" — Matthew 11[:3]
[margin: On the doubt of John the Baptist.]

Gregory, in book 40 of the Homilies, homily six, seems to charge John the Baptist with doubting about two articles of the Christian faith — namely, whether Christ would die, and whether he would descend to the underworld. See below, Annotation 144.

Annotation LI [contents]

"Go, and tell John: The blind see," etc. — Matthew 11[:5]
[margin: Whether before Christ's coming faith in Christ was necessary for salvation.]

Chrysostom, homily 37 on Matthew, disputing on these [words], seems to opine that for the Gentiles and Jews living well before Christ's coming, no faith in Christ, no knowledge of Christ, was necessary for salvation. For there he relates such things: "Men who died before Christ's coming could then be saved even without having confessed him. For the worship of Christ, who had not yet come, was not required of them; but that — the worship of idols being spurned — they should know the one only God, the Founder of all. 'For the Lord,' he says, 'thy God is one Lord.' [margin: Deut. 6.] Therefore the Maccabees are [objects] of admiration, who chose to die rather than betray the Law. We greatly admire also those boys, and several others among the Jews, who lived well and most excellently, and preserved this measure of knowledge inviolate — of whom nothing further was required; for then, as we said, it sufficed to know the one only God. But now it is not so; rather, the knowledge of Christ is necessary for salvation." And below: "But [as to the fact] that those who died before Christ, and therefore did not know him — if they withdrew from the worship of idols and adored God alone, [and] if besides [they behaved well toward] men…

[catchword "ho-" → "men…" continues on p. 452 (PDF 457).]

(printed p. 452 [PDF p. 457], verso — end of Ann. LI and Ann. LII–LIV, on Matthew 11 (pre-Christian faith; reprobation; whether angels see God). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation LI:)

…[if besides they behaved well toward men and] passed their life honorably, they will attain eternal goods and beatitude. Hear what Paul says: "Glory, and honor, and peace to everyone who works good — to the Jew first, and to the Gentile." Again, in the first sermon on Lazarus, he indicates that the just who preceded the time of the evangelical preaching had no faith in a future resurrection, writing thus of the beggar Lazarus: "Lazarus could not so much as philosophize about the resurrection, but believed that the affairs of this life were ended with the end of this life; for he was of the number of those who preceded the grace of the Gospel," etc. Thus far Chrysostom — whose opinion certain very ancient writers had professed many years before him. Of whom Justin Martyr, in the book of Questions posed by the gentiles, question eight, says: "Those who lived according to reason are Christians, even if they were thought not to have known God — such as, among the Greeks, Socrates, Heraclitus, and others like [them]," etc. And Clement of Alexandria, in the fifth and sixth book of the Stromata, says that those who lived before Christ and lived honorably were made just, either by the law or by philosophy, but that they lacked only faith in Christ; wherefore in hell they awaited the coming of Christ and the apostles, and by their preaching there were converted, so that they believed in Christ, and thus at length were saved.

Against this assertion the other theologians seem to protest — before others, Augustine, who in the 157th letter, to Bishop Optatus, writes thus: "Let that faith be preserved [sound] in us, by which we believe that no one of men — whether of greater age, or of however tender and recent an age — is freed from the contagion of the ancient death and from the obligation of the sin which he contracted by [his] first birth, except through the one mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus; by the most salutary faith in whom — the same [being] man and God — even those just [ones] were made saved, who believed, before he came in the flesh, that he would come in the flesh. For the faith is the same, both ours and theirs; since they believed that would be, which we believe has been done." And below: "Accordingly, since all the just — whether before Christ's incarnation or after — have neither lived nor live except by faith in Christ's incarnation, in whom is the fullness of grace: assuredly that which is written, that there is no other name under heaven in which we must be saved, avails for saving the human race from that time [onward] from which the human race was corrupted in Adam." This [says] Augustine.

I should believe that Chrysostom, in his words, wished to allude to that knowledge and faith which the Scholastics call explicit — that is, an open and distinct knowledge of the singular mysteries of Christ — which not all the just before the Savior's coming attained. For it sufficed for the simpler and lesser Jews to have [only] the knowledge of the human redemption, wrapped up under the veils and coverings of the sacrifices and ceremonies. But for the Gentiles — if any attained salvation without knowledge of the Mediator — it was enough to have the same faith enclosed within a belief in the one God: that is, to believe that God was the Savior of the human race, according to an order hidden in his admirable providence, and revealed by a special privilege [to some of their own seers and Sibyls]. See below, the passage bearing on this, Annotation 151.

(right column:)

Annotation LII [contents]

"Yea, Father, for so it was pleasing before thee." — Matthew 11[:26]

[margin: Whether reprobation is from God's pure good pleasure.]

The commentary of Thomas Cajetan runs thus: "By these words he renders the reason — first [in intention] and last in resolution — of the hiding [of these things] from the prudent and their revelation to the little ones: [namely] the divine will. Do not, therefore, dispute about the cause of election and reprobation — why, that is, God chose those and not these; for here you have the first, supreme, and last cause: 'Because so it was pleasing to God.'" Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa, appended to this passage such a censure: "What he here says, in respect of reprobation, is false and impious; because God reprobates no one from [his] pure good pleasure, but from [de]merits. For reprobation and rejection presuppose the fault of the one reprobated and rejected. For God wills all men to be saved, and drives no one to sin." Read below, Annotation 248.

Annotation LIII [contents]

"All things are delivered to me by my Father." — Matthew 11[:27]

[margin: Whether the angels see God.]

Athanasius of Alexandria, in a sermon published on this passage, hints in a certain way that the angels do not see God, saying: "Men truly bold and proud, who do not tremble at that glory into which the angels desire to gaze, bent and bowed down — although they are by far more sublime than [men] in nature and order! For what is nearer [to God] than the Cherubim and Seraphim? They do not gaze upon this majesty, nor hold themselves erect on [their] feet; nay, they do not even leave [their own] face bare, but — it being veiled — they extol the glory and majesty of God with lips that never cease." See below, Annotation 182.

Annotation LIIII [contents]

"Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you." — Matthew 11[:28]
[margin: On the Law of Moses.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 28, calls the Law of Moses unjust, cruel, and proud, saying: "Do you see that the Law is unjust and burdensome? Therefore Christ exhorts men to come out from under the weight of the Jewish law, and to attain to the delightful grace, saying, 'Come to me, all you.' And below: Therefore the law was harsh; because whatever it commanded, it commanded in its wrath — not that it might save, but that it might punish. Likewise the law is proud: for it forbids every man to approach the holy things, except the high priest; it forbids a one-eyed man, or one weak in any member, to perform the priesthood. You see how the law is proud." [margin: Lev. 21.] These words are not to be understood simply, as they are written, but are to be referred to the dignity of the evangelical law and grace — whose righteousness, gentleness, and humility are such that, in comparison with it, the Mosaic law, although just, mild, and humble, may seem to be unjust, proud, and harsh. In which sense also God, speaking in the prophet Ezekiel about the laws which he had given the Jews through Moses, says: "I gave them precepts [that were] not [margin: Ezek. 20.]

[catchword "non" → "...not good," Ezek. 20:25, continues on p. 453 (PDF 458).]

(printed p. 453 [PDF p. 458], recto — end of Ann. LIV and Ann. LV–LVIII, on Matthew 11–12 (the sin against the Holy Spirit; the Virgin's alleged vainglory). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation LIV:)

…[precepts] not good, in which they cannot walk" — that is, precepts less good than the evangelical precepts themselves.

Annotation LV [contents]

"Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened," etc. — Matthew 11[:28]
[margin: Absolution.]

John Ferus, in the second book of [his] commentaries on Matthew, illustrating this sentence by an exposition, seemed to affirm that priests, in sacramental absolution, do not remit sins, but only pronounce and attest that they have been remitted by God to the penitent. See above, Annotation 45 of this book.

Annotation LVI [contents]

"Whoever shall speak a word against the Son, it shall be forgiven him; but whoever shall speak against the Holy Spirit, it shall not be forgiven him." — Matthew 12[:32]
[margin: On the sin against the Holy Spirit.]

Origen, in the Tomes on Matthew, expounding this, left it written thus: "The Father penetrates into all things and contains all things — animate, inanimate, rational, irrational; but the power of the Son extends itself over the rational alone, insofar as they are [rational]. Among which rational [beings] are the pagans, who blaspheme, faith not yet [being] received. But the Holy Spirit unfolds himself over those alone who have been made partakers of him by the grace of baptism. When, therefore, the pagans sin by blasphemy, they sin against the Son, because he is in them; yet they can obtain pardon. But when the baptized — upon whom the gift of regeneration has been conferred — sin, an iniquity of this kind extends itself against the Holy Spirit: because, since they were contained in the Holy Spirit, they commit an offense, and therefore their fault is unpardonable." Athanasius, in the book which he wrote on this passage, disapproves these things on two counts: both because the external works of the Trinity are so far undivided that wherever the Father is, there are the Son and the Holy Spirit; and because these [statements] incline toward the inhuman dogma of Novatus.

Theognostus, in the book on the same words of the Gospel published by him, following Origen, himself also taught that those who sin against the Son are those who offend before baptism, and are therefore worthy of pardon, because they have not yet received the grace of the Holy Spirit; but that those who sin after baptism receive no expiation, because — since they have received the gift of the Holy Spirit — no excuse or plea for pardon is left them. Athanasius, in the same volume, hisses off this opinion — as favoring the Novatianists — from the catholic assertions.

Annotation LVII [contents]

"Whoever shall speak a word against the Holy Spirit," etc. — Matthew 12[:32]
[margin: On the sin against the Holy Spirit.]

Thomas Cajetan, in the commentaries on this passage, has thus: "What is signified by 'the Holy Spirit' is not clear; yet the subject matter suggests that by the name 'Holy Spirit' is signified God — according to that whereby he exercises the office of the Holy Spirit, that is, whereby he makes the souls of men spiritual and holy. So that to speak a word against the Holy Spirit is by words to assail God who sanctifies men. For this is directly and by intention to speak against the Holy Spirit, inasmuch as 'Holy Spirit' is an essential name of God — not regarding, as far as this text is concerned, [the name] insofar as it is proper to the third person in the Trinity." Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa, in the fourth book of [his] Annotations, refutes Cajetan, because he denied that this passage pertains to the person of the Holy Spirit.

(right column:)

Annotation LVIII [contents]

"Behold thy mother and thy brethren," etc. — Matthew 12[:47]
[margin: Whether the Virgin Mary was guilty of vainglory.]

Chrysostom, homily 45 on Matthew, expounding this clause, seems to attribute to the Virgin Mary something of ambition and vainglory, in these words: "From the mother's action, some importunity accrued. Consider the importunity both of the mother and of the brethren; for whereas they ought to have entered and heard together with the crowds, or at least awaited outside the end of the discourse, and then approached — moved by a certain ambition and ostentation, they called him outside, in the presence of all, that they might be seen easily, and with great power, to command Christ. Whence it is plain that they were moved by a certain vainglory, thinking as yet nothing great about him" — and the rest that follows. And again, in homily 46 on Matthew, praising the prudence of Christ's disciples, who awaited the opportune time to question the Master, he says: "So [Mary] too, and the brethren, would he have taught to act — not to call [him] outside openly for the sake of ostentation." The same [Chrysostom], narrating the miracle of the water turned into wine, in homily 20 on John, even more clearly ascribes to her some affection of pride, saying: [margin: John

7.] "For she wished the miracle to be done, that she might conciliate to herself the favor of men, and that she herself might be made more illustrious by [her] son's grace; and perhaps she was affected by some human affection, just as also his brethren [were], when they said, 'Show thyself to the world,' desirous of gaining fame for themselves by his miracles." And a little later, [saying] the same: "(Since indeed she did not yet have the due opinion of him,) but after the manner of mothers, Mary thought she might by right command her son in all things — when it was [rather] fitting to worship and revere [him] as [her] Lord."

This passage Euthymius noted among the Greeks, in his commentaries, and did not dare to disapprove [it]; but among the Latins, Thomas [noted it], in the third volume of the Summa Theologica, question 27 — where, civilly excusing Chrysostom, he says that he exceeded out of the impulse of speaking (as sometimes happens to orators and preachers); and that his words can also be so expounded, he says, that we understand Christ to have checked an affection in [his] mother — not one that really was in her, but one which others might perhaps have supposed to be in her. Which excuse we most gladly accept, lest we defraud the Virgin Mother of God of that signal privilege of her integrity, which the appended canon of the Synod of Trent attributes to her: "If anyone shall say that a man once justified can no longer sin, nor lose grace — and therefore that he who falls and sins was never truly justified; or, on the contrary, that he can, throughout [his] whole life, avoid all sins

[signature "Pp"; catchword "omnia" → "...all [sins]," continues on p. 454 (PDF 459).]

(printed p. 454 [PDF p. 459], verso — end of Ann. LVIII and Ann. LIX–LXI, on Matthew 12–13 (may obstinate heretics be executed?; Ps. 77 of Christ). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the Tridentine canon quoted at the end of Annotation LVIII:)

…all [sins], even venial ones — unless by a special privilege of God, as the Church holds concerning the Blessed Virgin — let him be anathema."

Theophylact, in the interpretation of this sentence, following the sayings of Chrysostom, must be read with caution in these words: "The mother wished to show something human — namely, that she had power over [her] son; for she did not yet understand anything great about him. For this reason, while he was still speaking, she wished to draw him to herself, as [one] somewhat ambitious, [having] so great a son subject to her. What, then, [did] Christ [do]? Since he knew her intention, hear what he says: 'Who is my mother?' — not affecting [his] mother with injury did he say this, but correcting her mind, [which was] greedy of glory and human." Consult on these [matters] Annotations 103 and 151 of the fifth book, and Annotations 138, 139, 140, and 185 of this book.

Annotation LIX [contents]

"Who are my brethren?" — Matthew 12[:48]

[margin: On Joseph.]

Euthymius, in [his] commentaries, hands down that Joseph, the husband of Mary, had sons and daughters, and that these were called the "brethren" of Christ. See below, Annotation 64.

Annotation LX [contents]

"Let both grow together until the harvest." — Matthew 13[:30]

[margin: Whether heretics unwilling to repent are to be put to death.]

Chrysostom, homily 47 on Matthew, examining this passage, has certain words which Hermann Bodius, in his Collectanea, adduces under the heading "On heretics," in order to maintain that heretics — however pertinacious they may have been in [their] heresy — are not to be punished with the penalty of death. And these are they: "Christ does not forbid that the conventicles of heretics be broken up, [their] mouths be stopped, [their] freedom of speaking be cut off; but he forbids [that they] be killed and slaughtered. And see how gentle he is: for he not only forbids [it], but expounds the reason why he forbids [it], saying that the tares must be spared as long as they are in the field together with the wheat, because they can be changed into the condition of wheat." This indeed is the opinion of Chrysostom — in which, since Augustine had once been [of the same mind], he afterward testifies that he changed it, in Letter 48 to Vincentius, the champion of the Rogatian heresy, writing thus: "My opinion at first was that no one is to be compelled to the unity of Christ; that [the matter] must be conducted by word, [that one] must fight by disputation, must conquer by reason — lest we should have as counterfeit catholics those whom we had known [to be] open heretics. But this opinion of mine was overcome, not by the words of gainsayers, but by [the] examples of those pointing [it] out. For first there was set against me my own city, which, whereas it was wholly on the side of the Donatists, was converted to catholic unity by the fear of the imperial laws — [the city] which we now see so detest the ruin of that [sect] that it might be believed never to have been in it. So too many others, which were named to me one by one, so that by the very facts I recognized that in this matter too there could rightly be understood that which is written: 'Give an occasion to a wise man, and he will be the wiser.'" Thus far Augustine — who, in the book against the epistle of Parmenian, explaining the mind of Christ saying "Let both grow together until the harvest," says that these words are to be observed only in that case, when the tares cannot be uprooted without the uprooting of the wheat — — that is, when the heretics cannot be killed and extinguished unless the catholics too are slaughtered along with them. But when this fear is not present, and their crime is notorious and execrable, and they do not have such defenders through whom a schism could arise: then severity is to be exercised against them. For if emperors punish thefts and murders, why should they not punish heresies and sacrileges? Nor does Chrysostom disagree from this opinion of Augustine, as his own words openly show, prefixed to the aforesaid words, in this manner: "The Lord forbids the tares to be plucked up, lest perchance together with the tares the wheat-plant also be plucked up; for it was fitting that he should forbid wars and the effusion of blood: for if the heretics were then slaughtered, [it] would bring an atrocious and irreconcilable war upon the world."

(right column:)

Euthymius, in the exposition of this sentence, following Chrysostom's explanation, writes thus: "'Let both grow together until the harvest.' By 'harvest' he means the consummation of the world. He commands, therefore, that men of both kinds — that is, heretics — be allowed to live, growing and increased in number in the world, up to the consummation. For it is likely that before that time many heretics will be converted; and yet on this account one ought not to be mingled with them. For this world is spacious; and they ought to live by themselves — not taken away, indeed, but separated, lest by teaching they corrupt what is sown [as] wheat." This passage was added, for the defense of heretics, by the Lutherans in Bodius's work already cited. But moreover, from the words which immediately precede this period, it appears that Euthymius thought the same as Chrysostom; for he says: "He forbade the heretics to be taken away, lest the orthodox too be equally taken away — for it would come to pass that wars and slaughters should arise."

Annotation LXI [contents]

"I will open my mouth in parables." — Matthew 13[:35]

[margin: That the prophecy of Psalm 77, cited by Matthew, is to be understood literally of Christ.]

Thomas Cajetan, elucidating this prophecy of the psalm in [his] commentary on Matthew, speaks in this manner: "Transumptively Matthew drew the prophetic word from Psalm 77; for to the letter that text speaks of a similitude of deeds [done]. But the Evangelist, using a mystical sense, applies [it] to metaphorical similitudes. For both agree in the common notion of a parable, or similitudinary speech." Against this explanation, Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa, in book 2 of [his] Annotations, is found [inveighing] with these words: "These things are false and dangerous. False, I say, because they suppose those words to be verified to the letter of that Asaph. But what was he, that it should befit him according to the letter to say, 'Attend, my people, [to] my law'? — what people did he himself have under him, or what law could he prescribe to anyone? And with what face does he say that this passage is drawn transumptively to Christ, when the Evangelist testifies [it] to be fulfilled in him — [a thing] which, according to truth, must be understood of those parables which the Lord was uttering, which were not something really done? But whereas he says that similitudes of things really done agree, in the notion of a parable, with metaphorical and fictitious similitudes, [that] is true only very equivocally. Likewise, unfittingly would one thing said precisely [of the one] be drawn to the other, even if they agreed in a generic notion. For speech —

[catchword "enim" → "...for [speech]," continues on p. 455 (PDF 460).]

(printed p. 455 [PDF p. 460], recto — end of Ann. LXI and Ann. LXII–LXIV, on Matthew 13 (Joseph's craft; the "brethren of the Lord"). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation LXI, Catharinus still speaking:)

— for [speech], spoken precisely of the ass, would be unfittingly drawn to man, on account of that [generic] agreement, because man and ass agree in the notion of animal. In Christ, therefore, that passage is verified to the letter, as all catholics have received [it]; because the Evangelist attests this, and the words themselves [attest it]. For he himself is the true Asaph, who came that he might gather together the scattered [things]; to him a people was given to be instructed; he, finally, brought forth his own law by his own mouth, and taught [it]. Beware, then, if you are wise, pious reader, of this doctrine, which so manifestly fights against the sense of the doctors and against most assured truth." This [says] Ambrose [Catharinus].

Annotation LXII [contents]

"Is not this the carpenter's son?" — Matthew 13[:55]

[margin: What kind of smith's craft Joseph practiced.]

Hilary, in canon 14 on Matthew, writes that Joseph, the father of Christ, was a blacksmith, in these words: "Plainly this [Christ] was the son of a smith — [a smith] who conquers iron by fire, decocts every strength of the age by [his] judgment, and forms the mass into every work of human usefulness," etc. Nor does Bede seem to think otherwise, in [his commentary] on Mark, book 2, saying: "For although human [things] are not to be compared with divine, yet the type is entire, because the father of Christ works by fire and by breath. Whence also, concerning him — as of a smith's son — his forerunner says: 'He shall baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire'; because [God], by softening the vessels of wrath with the fire of his Spirit, changes [them] into vessels of mercy." Thus Bede, alluding to those three [things] which blacksmiths chiefly use to tame iron — namely, fire, breath, and water. St. Thomas, in the commentary on Matthew, specially noted that Joseph did not practice the iron-craft, but the wood-craft [carpentry]; and to this subscribe Peter [de Natalibus] of Equilio, bishop, in book 3 of On the Lives of the Saints; James of Genoa [Jacobus de Voragine], bishop, in the book of Fasti; Nicholas of Lyra; and nearly the whole consensus of the scholastics. Nor does the most ancient custom of ecclesiastical painting disagree from this opinion, representing Joseph [as] an old man, together with the boy Jesus handling wooden boards. Thomas Cajetan says it is uncertain what kind of smith-craft Joseph practiced, since "smith" (faber) is a generic name, embracing goldsmiths, silversmiths, blacksmiths, carpenters, and stonemasons — whose judgment the Greek word of Matthew favors: ὁ τοῦ τέκτονος υἱός, that is, "the carpenter's son." For τέκτων, as Suidas indicates, is common to stonemasons, blacksmiths, and carpenters.

Annotation LXIII [contents]

"To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of heaven." — Matthew 13[:11]

[margin: [The error that] faith is given to us from preceding merits.]

The author of the* Opus imperfectum*, homily 31, indicates that the knowledge of the mysteries of faith and of the kingdom of heaven is given to those who use the natural light well, as a reward for good will — which opinion Augustine, having followed [it] before [his] episcopate, afterward, once made bishop, retracted. The author's words run thus: "The Lord gives general grace, that is, the understanding of good and evil, to all, by the necessity of nature; because we do not even seem to be men created to the image of God, unless we have divine understanding. But to the more worthy he gives special grace — such as, of knowing the mysteries — not by the necessity of nature, but for the reward of good will, or of good works. See, therefore, how he says, 'To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of heaven.' He did not say, 'It is given to you, [or] to anyone, who has the knowledge of good and evil.' If, then, there is someone who does not have the grace of the knowledge of good and evil, it is not the fault of the man not having [it], but of God not giving [it]. But if all men understand good and evil, yet not all have the grace of knowing the mystery of the kingdom: it is not the fault of God not giving, but of the man not seeking, nor hastening, nor laboring, to merit to receive [it]. For if you had gone through that general knowledge of good and evil — that is, if you had used [it] well — you would justly have merited this special knowledge of knowing the mystery."

John Driedo, in the book On the Concord of Free Will and Divine Predestination, chapter 3, receiving this passage under the name and authority of Chrysostom, elucidates it with these words: "Chrysostom, when he says that that general knowledge of the commandments — which each one received when he was created — is a grace by which, if he used [it] well, he would merit the special knowledge by which he might know the mystery of the heavenly kingdom (concerning which the Savior [says], 'To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God,' etc.) — says [it] indeed most truly; but he does not mean that general knowledge of the commandments to be a grace of God as [our] Redeemer, but of God as [our] Founder. If anyone uses the gifts of nature well, he without doubt merits [thereby]; but no one avails to use these well without the grace of a merciful God, and without certain beginnings of faith. The example is plain in Cornelius the Centurion, and in the Apostles; whom, for their good wills, God — by a certain grace of prevenience and of humbling — deigned to set forth and to reveal the mysteries of Christ the Redeemer."

Annotation LXIV [contents]

"Is not his mother called Mary, and his brethren James, and Joseph, and Simon, and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all with us?" — Matthew 13[:55–56]

[margin: Whether Joseph was twice-married.]

Theophylact, in the commentary on Matthew, appended to this text an exposition of this kind: "The Lord had brethren and sisters, sons of Joseph, whom he begot from the wife of his brother Cleophas. For, Cleophas having died without children, Joseph, according to the [levirate] law, took his wife, and begot six children — four males and two females: Mary, who was called the daughter of Cleophas according to the law, and Salome." This same [thing] he repeats at chapter 27 on Matthew, where he also writes that the mother of Christ was the stepmother of Joseph's sons. To this opinion assent most of the Greek fathers — in the first place Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, in book 2 of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 1, where he writes that James the Just, bishop of Jerusalem, called the "brother of the Lord," was the son of Joseph by another wife, before he was betrothed to Mary. Euthymius, in the chapter on Matthew 12, says that Joseph had sons and daughters. Oecumenius, in the commentary on the epistle to the Galatians, chapter 2, and on Acts, chapter 2, relates that the sons of Joseph doubted about Christ — about whom their father Joseph himself never doubted. Epiphanius, in book 3 of the Panarion, disputing against the Antidicomarianites, narrates that

Joseph had a first wife of the tribe of Judah, and took up from her six children — among whom the firstborn was James, surnamed the Just, born about the fortieth year of [his] father's age; then, this wife having died, when he was passing his eightieth year, [Joseph] married Mary the mother of Christ. Origen, when in the Tomes on

[signature "Pp 2"; catchword "per" → "...[su]per [Matthaeum]," continues on p. 456 (PDF 461).]

(printed p. 456 [PDF p. 461], verso — end of Ann. LXIV and Ann. LXV–LXVII, on Matthew 14–15 (angels and the daughters of men; Origen's "symbolic" Eucharist). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation LXIV, Origen still under discussion:)

…discoursing on this passage through Matthew, indicated that this opinion had proceeded from the gospel entitled According to Peter, or from the gospel which is called of James, and that it pleased him wonderfully — because it is also consonant with reason that Jesus was the first-fruits of male virginity, and Mary of female [virginity]; nor is it plausible to ascribe the first-fruits of virginity to any others besides these. This same [thing], among the Latins, Hilary professes, in canon 1 on Matthew; Ambrose, in the commentary on the epistle to the Galatians, chapter 2; Thomas Cajetan, in the expositions of the same epistle and chapter. From the opinion of these [men] Jerome dissents, in book 2 on Matthew, writing thus: "Some suspect the brethren of the Lord to be sons of Joseph by another wife, following the ravings of the apocrypha, and inventing [them] out of a certain little woman [named] Escha. But we — as is contained in the book which we wrote against Helvidius — understand the brethren of the Lord [to be] not sons of Joseph, but cousins of the Savior, the children of Mary, the maternal aunt of the Lord, who is said to be the mother of James the Less and Joseph and Jude, whom in the gospel we read [to be] called the brethren of the Lord; and that 'brethren' are called 'cousins,' all Scripture demonstrates." Augustine, in sermon 14 on the Nativity of Christ, ascribes to Joseph the privilege of virginity in these words: "Have, therefore, O Joseph, in common with Mary thy spouse, the virginity of [thy] members, because from virgin members is born the virtue of angels. Let Mary be the spouse of Christ, [her] virginity being preserved in her flesh. And with these [gifts] be thou too, O father of Christ — [with] the care of chastity and the honor of virginity. Rejoice, therefore, O Joseph, because through the merit of virginity thou art so separated from the bed of [thy] wife that thou art called the father of the Savior."

Annotation LXV [contents]

"Herod held John, and beheaded [him] in prison." — Matthew 14[:3,10]

[margin: Whether the angels fell from heaven on account of love of women.]

Chrysostom, in the homily delivered on the beheading of John the Baptist — which is extant outside the homilies of the commentaries on Matthew — seems to indicate that the angels of God, allured by the love of women, fell from [their] heavenly glory. For thus he speaks: "O supreme evil, and sharpest dart of the devil — woman! Through a woman [the devil] laid Adam low in Paradise; through a woman he thrust the most chaste Joseph into prison; through a woman he cut off by the head that lamp of the whole world, John. And what shall I say of men? A woman laid low not only men, but even angels from heaven." Someone — I know not who — corrected this last clause, the words being changed and expounded in this manner: "through a woman he cast down angels from heaven — that is, holy men, who were pressing on toward heaven." Alcuin [Albinus], in the Homiliary of the Yearly Festivities, inserting this homily among the other sermons collected by him, acknowledges the former reading as genuine; and it may be that this correction was first appended in the margin by some studious [person], and thereafter — as usually happens — transferred by the copyists into the text. See what we have noted above, Annotation 73 of book 5.

Annotation LXVI [contents]

"Not what enters the mouth defiles the man." — Matthew 15[:11]

[margin: On the Eucharist.]

Origen, in the Tomes on Matthew, in the explanation of the present chapter, making mention of the sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord, calls it a typical and symbolic body, and likewise the bread of the Lord, which — entering into the mouth of those eating — passes into the belly and is cast out into the privy. His words run in this manner: "But someone, falling upon this passage, might say that, just as what enters into the mouth does not defile the man — even if it be thought defiled by the Jews — so what enters into the mouth does not sanctify the man, even if it be believed by the simpler [folk] to sanctify — namely, that which is called the bread of the Lord. And it is, unless I am mistaken, a saying not to be despised, and one therefore desiring a lucid exposition, which to me indeed seems to be such: Just as it is not the food, but the conscience — with the hesitation [doubt] of the one eating — that defiles the eater (inasmuch as he who hesitates, if he eats, has been judged [condemned], because [he eats] not from faith); and just as nothing is impure of itself, [but only] to the polluted and unbelieving [person], yet on account of his own uncleanness and unbelief: so that which is sanctified through the word of God and through supplication does not by its own nature sanctify the user. For if it were so, it would sanctify also him who eats unworthily; nor would anyone, on account of this eating, have become weak or sick, or have fallen asleep [in death]. For Paul demonstrates some such thing, when he says: 'For this cause many among you are weak and sickly, and many sleep.' [margin: 1 Cor. 11.] Accordingly, in the bread of the Lord too there is a usefulness of eating [only] then, when with unpolluted mind and pure conscience one partakes of that bread. So, as far as concerns the eating in itself: neither on this account — because we do not eat of the bread sanctified by the word of God and through supplication — are we defrauded of any good; nor by eating do we abound in any good. Since indeed the cause of defect is malice and sins, and the cause of abundance is righteousness and right deeds: so that it is such as is said in Paul in these words: 'Neither if we eat shall we abound, nor if we eat not shall we have less.' But if whatever enters into the mouth passes into the belly and is cast into the privy: that food also, which is sanctified through the word of God and through supplication, as regards what it has [that is] material, passes into the belly and is cast into the privy. But as regards the prayer which has been added to it, it becomes useful in proportion to faith, effecting that the mind become clear-sighted, looking to that which is useful. Nor is it the matter of the bread, but the word spoken over it, that profits him who eats it not unworthily of the Lord. And these things indeed [are said] concerning the typical and symbolic body. Many things, moreover, could also be said of the Word himself — who was made flesh and true food; whom whoever shall eat shall altogether live forever; whom no evil [man] can eat. For if it could come to pass that one who still persists evil should eat the Word made flesh — since he is the Word and the living bread — it would by no means have been written, 'Whoever shall eat this bread shall live forever.'" Erasmus of Rotterdam first of all noticed this passage, and in the scholia on the Origenic fragment translated by him, brought it forth to be weighed by the judgment of readers. I, to pronounce my opinion freely, suspect the passage to have been corrupted by heretics.

(right column:)

Annotation LXVII [contents]

"When Jesus had passed thence, he came beside the sea of Galilee." — Matthew 15[:29]

[catchword "Chry-" → "Chry[sostom]…," continues on p. 457 (PDF 462).]

(printed p. 457 [PDF p. 462], recto — end of Ann. LXVII and Ann. LXVIII, on Matthew 16 (the rock of the Church — Christ and Peter). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation LXVII:)

Chrysostom, in homily 53 on Matthew near the end, speaking about restitution, openly asserts that it is not enough for robbers, for the expiation of the crime, to restore just as much as they plundered; but that it is needful that they render more than tenfold. Which opinion he supports also by two arguments — namely, by reason of the insult which, beyond the loss, [the robber] inflicted, and by reason of the evangelical law, which in this matter exacts more from its own [followers] than the Mosaic law, [which was] content with fourfold restitution.

[margin: Whether restitution ought to exceed the [thing] plundered.]

His words express this sense thus: "Do not tell me, 'If I have taken away from another, to this [other] I have [merely] given the same amount.' For this is certainly the worst [thing]. Do not believe it possible, by giving in the same measure by which you plundered, to heal that wound which through avarice was inflicted by you. For he who plundered a mina will not have [done] enough for himself as a remedy for this ulcer, if — struck by penitence — he mercifully gives [back] a mina; but he will need a talent — on which account [one] condemned of theft restores fourfold. Since, then, the plunderer is much worse than the thief, and since that [thief] restores fourfold: tenfold, nay rather much more, this [plunderer] ought to restore; and would that even so we might wholly wipe away the filth of plunder. For I do not think that this is that [true] mercy, for which a great heap of merits is reserved. Wherefore Zacchaeus was saying: [margin: Luke 19.] 'If I have defrauded anyone of anything, I will give fourfold, and I will offer the half part of my goods to the needy.' But if fourfold is rendered in the time of the [Mosaic] law, how much more under grace? And if a thief must restore only as much [as he stole], [how much more] the plunderer? For, beyond the loss, plundering is an insulting thing. Wherefore, even if you give a hundredfold, you have scarcely rendered the whole. Not rashly, therefore, did we say that a talent is to be offered, if a mina has been plundered from you."

All the schools of the theologians seem to protest against this opinion — in which it is decreed that no one is to be compelled, by reason of the thing taken away, to restore more than he took; because the aim of restitution is to recall to equality that which was unequally taken away. I think that the interpretation of these words is to be taken not from the nature of the thing taken away, but from the manner of the seizing. For, if we regard the thing taken away, the theologians rightly define that the justice of restitution demands back nothing further from the robber than what he plundered, and as much as he plundered. But if we look to the insult and injury which one inflicted on him whom he despoiled, it is not enough to restore just as much; but, when he shall have been condemned, he ought to restore as much as an equitable judge shall have pronounced must be restored by reason of the unjust taking away — whether that be tenfold, or more than tenfold. And this sense, unless I am mistaken, the words of Chrysostom exhibit.

Annotation LXVIII [contents]

"Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church." — Matthew 16[:18]

[margin: Whether the Church was built upon [the] Rock [Peter].]

Augustine, in the sermon On the Words of the Lord according to Matthew, sermon 13, so expounds this passage as to say that the Church is not founded upon petra [the rock] — that is, upon Peter — but upon the Rock, which is Christ, speaking thus: "Thou art therefore," he says, "Peter; and upon this rock, which thou hast acknowledged [saying, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God'], I will build my Church. Upon me I will build thee, not me upon thee." The same [thing] he also has in Tractate 124 on John, on these words: "'Upon this rock,'" he says, "'I will build my Church.' For the rock was Christ, upon which foundation Peter himself also was built. For [margin: 1 Cor. 3.] no one can lay another foundation than that which is laid, Christ Jesus."

(right column:)

The heretics of our times deride us, because — expounding the proposed sentence of Christ, "Thou art Peter" — we say that Peter is the rock upon which the Church is founded, against Augustine's explanation and against the voice of Paul, who lays no foundation besides Christ. To whom we reply that we embrace the present exposition of Augustine with [our] whole heart, and also firmly retain our own interpretation, as received from the same Augustine. For he, in the first [book] of the Retractations, chapter 21 — approving both, and preferring neither to the other — uses these words: "I said, in a certain place, concerning the apostle Peter, that upon him, as upon a rock, the Church is founded — which sense is also sung by the mouth of many in the words of the most blessed Ambrose, where, concerning the cock, he says:

'At this, the very Rock of the Church, but I know that I have afterward very often so expounded what was said by the Lord, 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church,' that by 'this rock' should be understood [him] whom Peter confessed, saying, 'Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God.' But which of these two opinions is the more probable, let the reader choose." Thus Augustine — whom, as we do not contradict, so neither do we lay any other primary foundation besides Christ. For we believe, and with sure faith confess, that Christ is the first and chief foundation of the whole ecclesiastical edifice; but upon this foundation we also assert that other stones are superimposed — namely Peter and the rest of the Apostles, whom John in the Apocalypse names the twelve foundations of the heavenly Jerusalem, [margin: Apoc. 21.] upon which we do not doubt that the remaining parts of the ecclesiastical structure are built.

[the cock] crowing, washed away [his] fault' —

Nor are there lacking, among the ancient fathers, those who interpret this response of Christ to Peter as [said] of Peter — among whom Clement of Rome, in the first epistle to James, [says]: "Simon Peter, by the merit of [his] true faith and on the strength of [his] upright preaching, was by Christ appointed to be the foundation of the Church." Origen, in book 5 on the epistle to the Romans, says: "When to Peter the summit of affairs was handed over for the feeding of the sheep, and upon him — as upon [firm] earth — the Church was founded, no other virtue is required of him except charity." And on Matthew, chapter 16: "Christ in truth was saying to Peter, 'Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God' — in which [confession] he was both beatified, and by promise merited to become the foundation of the Church." Basil, in the second book against Eunomius: "Peter, because he excelled in faith, took up in his very self the building of the Church." Theophylact, in the explanation of this passage: "The Lord rewards Peter, giving him a great reward — that upon him he built the Church." In the same manner interpret [it] Jerome, in book 3 on Matthew,

[signature "Pp 3"; catchword "&" → continues on p. 458 (PDF 463).]

(printed p. 458 [PDF p. 463], verso — end of Ann. LXVIII and Ann. LXIX–LXXI, on Matthew 16 (the rock; the gates of hell; the keys). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation LXVIII's catena:)

…and Chrysostom, chapter 16 on Matthew.

Hilary, in canon 16 on Matthew, expounds these words in the same manner — although Erasmus strives to drag his words into another sense, adding in the margin a scholium of this kind: "The foundation of the Church is faith"; by which words he wished to interpret Hilary, as if he [Hilary] held faith and the rock, and not Peter, to be the foundation. Yet Hilary speaks most openly of Peter, as is manifest to one reading his words. But — [even] to grant to Erasmus that Hilary's mind in this place is not easily grasped — what will he [Erasmus] say to those [words] which the same [Hilary] writes on this matter in the exposition of Psalm 103, in these words, clearer than the noonday light? "When Jesus had spoken certain things about his passion to the disciples, and Peter had detested this as unworthy of the Son [of God] — Peter, to whom [Jesus] had earlier given the keys of heaven, upon whom he was about to build the Church, against whom the gates of hell should have no power, and whatever [things] he should have loosed or bound on earth, those should remain in heaven loosed or bound — him, therefore, detesting this sacrament of the passion, [Jesus] met with such a reviling [and] such a response: 'Get behind me, Satan; thou art a scandal to me.' [margin: Matt. 16.] For so great was his devotion to suffering for the salvation of the human race, that he named Peter — the first confessor of the Son of God, the foundation of the Church, the door-keeper of the heavenly kingdom, and, in the earthly judgment, the judge of heaven — with the reviling [name] of 'Satan.'" See below, Annotation 206.

Annotation LXIX [contents]

"Upon this rock I will build my Church." — Matthew 16[:18]

[margin: Whether the Church was built upon each and every one of the faithful.]

Origen, in the Tomes on Matthew — in the first of those [treatises] which we now have — has this: "A rock is everyone who is an imitator of Christ; and upon all such the Church of God is built. But if you think the whole Church to be built upon that one Peter [alone]: what do you say of James, and John, and the sons of thunder, or of the individual Apostles?" John Bonderius, in [his] Contestations against the Heresies of This Age, title 31, article 4, cites this passage among those which the Lutherans bring forward against the primacy of Peter, saying that the Church is not founded primarily upon Peter, but upon each and every one of the faithful. And to these [things] he adds that Origen's exposition is typical, and according to allegory — [an allegory] which is not wont to be adduced for confirming dogmas; and that this is clear from the fact that Origen interprets the "gates of hell" [as] sins, [and] the "keys of the kingdom of heaven" [as] virtues.

Annotation LXX [contents]

"The gates of hell shall not prevail against it." — Matthew 16[:18]

[margin: Whether the priestly power is lost through any [and every] sin.]

Origen, in the first of those treatises which now survive on Matthew, seems to allude to the error of the Hussites — [who say] that the power of the supreme pontiff and of the bishops so depends on the imitation of Peter's sanctity, that as often as they lose sanctity by sinning, they lose also Peter's power. The very words are written in this manner: "Since those who claim for themselves the place of the bishops use this saying — that, like Peter, they too have received from the Savior the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and teach that the [things] which have been bound by them, that is, condemned, are likewise bound also in heaven, and again that the [things] which have been loosed by them are likewise loosed also in heaven — it must be said that they speak rightly [only] if they also have the deeds on account of which it was said to him who was Peter, 'Thou art Peter'; and if they be such that upon them the Church may be built by Christ, and that [saying] can rightly be referred to them. But the gates of hell ought not to prevail against him who wishes to bind and to loose. But if he is bound fast by the ropes of his own sins, in vain does he bind or loose. If, therefore, anyone — since he is not Peter, nor has those [qualities] which are here spoken of, as Peter had [them] — believes that he will bind on earth so that what he binds is bound also in heaven, and that he will loose upon earth so that what he looses is loosed in heaven: this [man] is puffed up, not understanding what the Scriptures mean; and, swollen [with pride], he has fallen into the ruin of the devil." This error is condemned by the authority of the Council of Trent, in whose fourteenth session there is a canon, number ten, in these words: "If anyone shall say that priests who are in mortal sin do not have the power of binding and loosing — let him be anathema." Consult Annotation 101 of this book.

Annotation LXXI [contents]

"To thee I will give the keys of the kingdom of heaven." — Matthew 16[:19]

[margin: Whether the power of binding and loosing resides in priests.]

Jerome, in book 3 of the Commentaries on Matthew, expounding this, seems to hand down that priests have no power of loosing and binding, and that nothing else was granted to them by Christ except that they may show and pronounce sinners [to be] bound or loosed. Which opinion he embraces in these words: "Bishops and presbyters, not understanding this passage, assume to themselves something of the pride of the Pharisees — so as either to condemn the innocent, or to think that they loose the guilty — whereas before God not the sentence of the priests, but the life of the accused, is inquired into. We read in Leviticus concerning lepers, where they are bidden to show themselves to the priests, and, if they have leprosy, then to be made unclean by the priest — not that the priests make [them] lepers and unclean, but that they may have the knowledge of the leper and the non-leper, and may be able to discern who is unclean and who [clean]. In what way, then, the priest there makes the leper clean or unclean: so here too the bishop or presbyter binds or looses — not those who are innocent or guilty [as such], but, by [virtue of] his office, when he has heard the varieties of sins, he knows who is to be bound and who to be loosed."

Peter [Lombard], bishop of Paris, explaining Jerome's words more clearly, in book 4 of the Sentences, distinction 18, speaks thus: "Various [things] are handed down by the doctors on these [matters]; and in this so great variety, we can indeed say and hold this — that God alone forgives sins and retains [them]. And yet he conferred on the Church the power of binding and loosing; but he himself looses or binds in one way, the Church in another. For he alone by himself forgives sin, [he] who both cleanses the soul from [its] interior stain and looses [it] from the debt of eternal death. But this he did not grant to the priests, to whom nevertheless he gave the power of loosing and binding — that is, of showing men [to be] bound and loosed. Whence the Lord first by himself restored the leper to health, and then [sent him] to the

[catchword "sacer-" → "...to the priests," continues on p. 459 (PDF 464).]

(printed p. 459 [PDF p. 464], recto — end of Ann. LXXI and Ann. LXXII, on Matthew 16 (the keys and papal temporal power; Ferus and Bernard). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Peter Lombard's citation in Annotation LXXI:)

…[the Lord sent him] to the priests, by whose judgment he might be shown [to be] cleansed. So too he presented Lazarus, now brought back to life, to the disciples to be loosed [unbound]: because, even if someone is loosed before God, yet he is not held loosed in the face of the Church except through the judgment of the priest. In loosing faults, therefore, or in retaining [them], the evangelical priest so operates and judges as of old the legal [priest did] concerning those who were defiled by leprosy, which signifies sin. And this manner of binding and loosing Jerome noted above." Thus far Peter [Lombard].

There have emerged from this explanation of Jerome two errors. The former and older is that of certain scholastics, asserting that an excommunication unjustly imposed is of no force, and therefore is not to be feared — the handle for which assertion they took from the fact that Jerome said that the bishops who suppose themselves to condemn the innocent and to loose the guilty assume [this] from the pride and haughtiness of the Pharisees, condemned by the testimony of Christ.

[margin: Whether an excommunication unjustly imposed is of any force.]

Meeting these [errorists], St. Thomas, in [book] 4 of the Sentences, distinction 18, question 4, says that Jerome spoke as far as concerns guilt, not punishment. For no innocent [person] can be bound in [his] sins by priests, nor can anyone deliberately persisting in sins be absolved from [his] sins; but in ecclesiastical punishments, sinners can be bound even by unjust pastors excommunicating [them] out of anger and hatred.

The latter and more recent error is that which Martin Luther here and there twisted [out of it], teaching that in no way can sins be retained or loosed by priests. Refuting his madness, Alphonsus de Castro, in the first book Against Heresies, elucidates the present passage of Jerome in this manner: "But that Luther adduces Jerome for his own opinion proceeds from a depraved understanding; wherefore these words must be well discussed, that their clearer sense may appear. First, then, it must be observed [what] Jerome said — namely, that the priest, by [virtue of] his office, when he has heard the varieties of sins, knows who is to be bound and who to be loosed; but he did not say, 'He knows who has been bound, or who has been loosed,' as he had previously said of the priest of the old law, that he discerns who is clean and who is unclean. From which words it is most plainly proved that blessed Jerome placed some distinction between the priest discerning about leprosy and the evangelical priest absolving from sin. For the priest of the old law did not cleanse the leper, but only judged that he had been cleansed; whereas the evangelical priest judges the penitent, who confesses his sins before him, through the key of knowledge and discretion, [as to] whether such a one is worthy of absolution or not — yet he is not as yet absolved before the priest utters the words of absolution; just as the leper, after cleansing has been obtained, is truly clean before the priest judges him clean. Wherefore blessed Jerome, speaking of the priest of the new law, did not say, 'He knows who has been bound, or who has been loosed,' but said, 'He knows who is to be bound, or who to be loosed'; because from the knowledge of the sins, and from the disposition of the penitent himself, he recognizes whether he ought to absolve or to bind. For if he knows the sinner to be obstinate in evil, such that he suspects him to be in a purpose of returning to his vomit, he judges him unworthy to receive absolution. Since, therefore, Jerome said of the priest that 'he knows who is to be bound, or who to be loosed,' he intimated plainly enough that after the priest's inspection — that is, after the hearing of the sins — something still remains that is to be done by the priest concerning the penitent himself, namely to bind or to loose. And as to what Jerome said, that before God not the sentence of the priests, but the life of the accused, is inquired into — [this] is to be understood not as though the life of the accused alone is inquired into, but that it is inquired into more principally, as the foundation of the whole structure, on which whatever the priest shall afterward do somehow rests. For if the sinner be in a resolve of sinning, however much the priest may utter the words of absolution, the sinner will never be absolved. Something more, therefore, the evangelical priest does concerning the penitent than of old the priest of the old law used to do concerning the leper." See above, Annotation 62 of book 5, and Annotation 45 of this book, and below, Annotation 202.

(right column:)

Annotation LXXII [contents]

"To thee I will give the keys of the kingdom of heaven." — Matthew 16[:19]

[margin: Whether the supreme pontiff has the power of secular rule.]

John Ferus, in the third book of the Commentaries on Matthew, coming to the explanation of this passage, seems to take away from Peter, and from his successors, all power of earthly principate, and [all] dominion over temporal things, when he writes thus: "Thirdly, this too is to be observed — that he expressly says, 'To thee I will give the keys of the kingdom of heaven.' He does not say, 'of the kingdom of the earth.' These words regard nothing of earthly power — which, nevertheless, [some] strive to establish from these words, asserting that Peter received the plenitude of power not only in spiritual [matters], but also in external [ones]. Which [claim] Bernard, in the first book On Consideration to Eugene, manifestly refutes: 'In crimes,' he says, 'not in possessions, is your power; since for the sake of the former, and not for the sake of the latter, you received the keys of the kingdom of heaven.' And there follows: 'Which power seems to you the greater — [that] of remitting sins, or [that] of dividing estates? These earthly and lowest [matters] have their own judges — the kings and princes of the earth. Why do you invade others' boundaries? Why do you extend your sickle into another's harvest? Why do you wish to be greater than the Lord? — who, being interpellated by a certain [man] saying, "Tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me," answered, "Who appointed me a judge over you?" [margin: Luke 12.] — and so forth.'" These [things] from Bernard, [reports] Ferus, adding a little below these [words]: "You have heard that it was said to Peter, 'To thee I will give the keys.' These keys, as I said, are not material, but metaphorically signify power. Power, therefore, Peter received — not any earthly [power], such that he might, namely, give, take away, [or] alienate kingdoms, principalities, etc.; nor such a power that it should be lawful for him to do whatever he pleased (which most [men] dream); but he received the power of binding and loosing, of remitting sins and retaining [them], of opening and closing — and that not at his own pleasure, but as a minister, fulfilling the will of the Lord."

Thus far Ferus — or rather some other [person] under the name of Ferus. For there are not lacking trustworthy witnesses who assert for certain that his commentaries on Mat-

[signature "Pp 4"; catchword "thaeum" → "...on Matthew," continues on p. 460 (PDF 465).]

(printed p. 460 [PDF p. 465], verso — Ann. LXXII cont., on Matthew 16 (papal temporal power; the "two swords"; Torquemada) [running head misprinted "47·"]. Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation LXXII, on the doubtful authenticity of Ferus's text:)

[his commentaries on] Matthew were, after the author's death, before they were printed, corrupted by heretics — especially in this passage. John Calvin, the heresiarch of our times, in that impious Institution of his, chapter 8, abuses the same testimony of Bernard against the pontifical dignity — which [testimony], however, if — private hatreds laid aside — it be considered with an even mind, does not infer that which Calvin wrongly gathers from it, namely, that the Roman pontiff has no right in secular kingdoms. For to whom would it be credible that Bernard held such [views] — [Bernard] who, writing to the same pontiff, and in the same books, ascribes to him the true power of both spiritual and temporal [things], and girds him with each sword — the ecclesiastical, namely, and the royal? In the third volume of the work already cited he freely confesses, and clearly pronounces, that there is in the Roman bishop not only the pontifical majesty of Aaron the high priest, but also that jurisdiction of political principate which of old was in Samuel the judge, in Moses the leader, in Melchizedek the king and priest. For thus he addresses Pope Eugene: "Come, let us investigate yet more diligently who thou art — that is, what character thou bearest for the time in the Church of God. Who art thou? A great priest, the supreme pontiff. Thou [art] the prince of bishops, thou the heir of the apostles; thou in primacy [art] Abel, in governance Noah, in patriarchate Abraham, in order Melchizedek, in dignity Aaron, in authority Moses, in judgeship Samuel, in power Peter, in unction Christ." And in the fifth book of the same volume, speaking of both swords, he addresses the pontiff in these words: "Why dost thou attempt anew to usurp the sword, which thou wast once bidden to put into [its] sheath? — which [sword], nevertheless, whoever denies to be thine seems to me not sufficiently to attend to the word of the Lord, who says thus: 'Put up thy sword into the sheath.' It, then, is also thine own — to be drawn, perhaps, at thy nod, though not by thy hand. Otherwise, if it in no way pertained to thee, when the apostles said, 'Behold, [there are] two swords here,' [margin: Luke 22.] the Lord would not have answered, 'It is enough,' but, 'It is too much.' Both swords, therefore, are the Church's — the spiritual, namely, and the material; but the one [is to be wielded] for the Church, the other also by the Church: the one by the hand of the priest, the other by the hand of the soldier — yet, to be sure, at the nod of the priest and the command of the emperor. And of this [I have spoken] elsewhere." These [things says] Bernard — from which it is clear that he did not take away from the Roman pontiff the dominion of a temporal kingdom, but rather conferred [it].

But you will say: How, then, are his premised words — which seem contrary to these — to be understood? John of Torquemada, cardinal-priest, in the second book of the Summa on the Church, chapter 113, weighing Bernard's words, says that the power over temporal things is twofold — the monarchical, namely, and the pastoral. Now he calls "monarchy" that [power] which constitutes a man the monarch of the universe — that is, which so makes him the supreme and singular lord of all lands, that it is lawful for him not only to claim for himself the right and name of monarch, but also to take up subjects of his own dominion into [the governance of] principalities, kingdoms, and empires, howsoever it seem [good] to him; and to depose those [thus] taken up, even without cause, from those same kingdoms, and to transfer those kingdoms from one [person] to another at the discretion of his own will. This kind of power, therefore, he judges that the Roman pontiff cannot, by the right of the pontificate, usurp to himself.

(right column:)

Since indeed, whereas he is himself the successor of the apostolate of Peter, he cannot by apostolic right arrogate to himself that which Christ forbade to Peter and the Apostles, when — as they were disputing among themselves about the monarchy of a temporal kingdom — he said to them: "The kings of the nations lord it over them, and those who are greater exercise power upon them. It shall not be so among you; but whosoever will be greater among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be first among you, shall be your servant: [margin: Matt. 20.] even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister," etc. Nor do the Roman pontiffs deny this — who, in their decrees, distinction 96, chapter Cum ad verum, confess that it is not lawful for them to snatch the titles and rights of emperors, and to usurp the secular dominions of princes.

But the pastoral power over temporal things is that which it befits the ecumenical pastor of the whole Christian world to have, from the office of pastoral care, for the preservation of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and for the administration and dispensation of the spiritual goods of the Church. This [power] indeed the Roman pontiff is bound to have by apostolic right and evangelical precept. For since it was commanded him by Christ that — as the pastor of the universal Christian sheepfold — he should feed the whole flock of Christ, and to him the keys were given, by which, as the doorkeeper and key-bearer of the heavenly kingdom, he might bring the sheep entrusted to him into eternal felicity: it is necessary that he take care of princes, kings, and emperors — who are the chief sheep of the Christian flock — and strive with the utmost diligence that their dignities, empires, kingdoms, and other earthly advantages may serve for the illustration of Christ's glory, for the propagation of the worship of the Christian religion, for the strengthening of the Church's peace, and for the attaining of the beatitude of the eternal kingdom — to which, as to the mark and ultimate end of ruling, all the kingdoms of Christian kings look. It is necessary also that he himself employ a huge and assiduous solicitude, lest through the negligence or malice of secular princes heresies, schisms, dissensions, wars, and other things like these arise among the sheep committed to [his] apostolic care; and, if they have arisen, it is his part first to admonish paternally the princes who are disturbers of ecclesiastical peace, and to correct and rebuke [them] according to the law of Paul and of Christ; then, if they neglect the admonitions, to coerce them with ecclesiastical animadversions and censures. But if, perchance — given over to a reprobate sense — they despise these too: then the pontiff (if, nevertheless, he shall know it to be expedient for ecclesiastical tranquility) will be able to absolve the peoples from the oath of obedience by which they had bound themselves to those lords, while [the latter] still ruled justly. It will also be lawful for him to deprive those lords themselves — as incorrigible and rebels against the Church — of the jurisdiction of their principalities, and to transfer their rights to other orthodox princes; summoning also, if need be, the military aids of pious dukes and kings for the correction of the rebelling sons. Which [thing] the gravest writers testify was of old, and often, and by right, done by the Roman pontiffs — among whom Innocent, pontiff, the first of that name, on account of the unjust expulsion of John Chrysostom, marked with anathema Arcadius Augustus; whose father, Theodosius the Great, Augustus, St. Ambrose — on account of the slaughter of certain inno-

[catchword "inno-" → "...innocents [perpetrated]," continues on p. 461 (PDF 466).]

(printed p. 461 [PDF p. 466], recto — end of Ann. LXXII and Ann. LXXIII–LXXV, on Matthew 17 (popes who deposed emperors; the "six days" = 6000 years; Moses at the Transfiguration; clerical tax-immunity). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation LXXII's catalog:)

[on account of the slaughter of certain] innocent Christians, not long before had expelled from the Church. Gelasius the First bound Anastasius the Emperor — [who] thought not rightly concerning religion — with the bond of excommunication. Zacharias the First cast down Carloman, king of the Franks, from the royal dignity, because he was useless in administering the kingdom, Pippin — his brother, and the father of Charlemagne — being substituted in his place. Hadrian the First compelled Desiderius, king of the Lombards, hastening to the sacking of the city of Rome, by pontifical edict to return into Insubria; and, Charlemagne, king of the Franks, being summoned, shook off the Lombard yoke from the neck of Italy. Gregory the Third interdicted the emperor Leo the Third from the communion of the faithful, because he had caused all the sacred images to be cast out of the churches. Leo the Third, pontiff, when he saw the care of the Christian commonwealth neglected by the Greek emperors, transferred the rights of the Roman empire from Constantine, son of Irene, to Charlemagne, king of the Franks; and conferred on him the title of Augustus and the insignia of emperor. Leo the Eighth again, for just causes, transferred the empire from the Franks to the Germans, and named Otto, duke of the Saxons, the first emperor from Germany; and not long after, Gregory the Fifth granted to the German princes the perpetual right of electing the Caesars — the authority of confirming those whom they should have elected being nevertheless reserved to himself and to his successors. Gregory the Seventh interdicted the emperor Henry the Third [IV], rebelling against the Apostolic See, from all sacred [things], and deposed [him] from the empire; nor did he restore him to his former dignity except [when] begging pardon for [his] error. Alexander the Third permitted the emperor Frederick Barbarossa — ensnared with anathema and cast down from the imperial majesty, because he assailed the Roman Church with an unjust war — not to be recalled to the empire before he, [as] a suppliant, should beg that his fault be forgiven him. I pass over, for the sake of brevity, Urban the Second, by whose edict, standard, and watchword that holy and memorable war against the Saracens was accomplished, by which the kingdoms of Jerusalem and Syria were again received [back] by the Christians. I omit Gregory the Fourth, Leo the Fourth, Nicholas the First, John the Eighth, and very many other pontiffs, who by warlike expeditions vindicated into liberty Italy, Sicily, and various shores of Spain, snatched from the servitude of the Saracens. All which [things], indeed, since neither they themselves could bring to effect without a certain procuration, administration, and jurisdiction over temporal things, nor can other pontiffs fulfill such offices of the pastoral duty without that same jurisdiction: it is manifest that the supreme prelate of the Christian religion has, over the earthly resources of the whole Christian commonwealth, a certain pastoral, administrative, and dispensatory power and authority — such as it befits the ecumenical pastor of the Christian world to have.

These [things], therefore, being weighed in this way, to those [objections] which John Calvin and John Ferus raise from Bernard, we reply that that blessed man [Bernard] did not write such [things] with the intent of taking away from the Roman pontiff the pastoral power of administering and dispensing temporal things — [a power] which he himself proved, as we have now shown, by most abundant testimony; but that he [wrote them] to admonish the Roman pontiff not to usurp to himself, by apostolic right, the monarchical domination over secular possessions — [a domination] forbidden to the apostles by Christ. Which [thing] he himself indicated not obscurely, when, in the second book of the aforesaid work — after he had discoursed much about the pontiff's authority — he at last added: "The apostolic form, therefore, is this: domination is forbidden, ministration is enjoined."

(right column:)

Subscribing to whom, St. Thomas, in the Secunda Secundae, question 100, article 1, says: "Although the goods of the Church belong to the Pope as the chief dispenser, yet they are not his as [their] lord and possessor."

Annotation LXXIII [contents]

"And after six days Jesus took," etc. — Matthew 17[:1]
[margin: On the duration of the world.]

Hilary, in canon 17 on Matthew, elucidating allegorically this number of six days, indicates that the universal resurrection, and the renovation of the whole age [world], will be [when] six thousand years from the creation of the world have been completed, saying thus: "When, after six days, the appearance of the Lord's glory is shown — [that is,] the time of six thousand years having rolled by — the honor of the heavenly kingdom is prefigured." Ambrose, explaining the present passage of the gospel, disapproves this opinion — in which, nevertheless, were once Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Lactantius, Jerome, Cyril, and Augustine. Consult Annotation 190 of book 5.

Annotation LXXIV [contents]

"And behold, there appeared to them Moses and Elijah." — Matthew 17[:3]
[margin: On Moses, appearing in the Transfiguration of Christ.]

Jerome, in the third book of the Commentaries on Matthew, hints that Moses had risen again from the lower regions, and in his own body was present to our Savior transfiguring himself, saying these [words]: "To the scribes and Pharisees tempting him and demanding signs from heaven, he refused to give [them], but confuted [their] depraved demand with a prudent reply. But here, to increase the faith of the Apostles, he gives a sign from heaven — Elijah descending thence, whither he had ascended, but Moses rising again from the lower regions." This same [thing] the author of the work On the Marvels of Divine Scripture confirms, book 3, chapter 10. St. Thomas, in the third volume of the Summa, question 45, says that this opinion is not to be so taken, as though the soul of Moses had resumed its [own] body; but that his soul, some other body being assumed, appeared in that manner in which angels render themselves visible in assumed bodies. An observation similar to this you have below, Annotation 145.

Annotation LXXV [contents]

"The kings of the earth — from whom do they receive tribute?" etc. — Matthew 17[:24]
[margin: Whether clerics are immune from the tributes of secular princes.]

Jerome, expounding these [words] in the third book on Matthew, Erasmus of Rotterdam noted in his Annotations with these words: "It seemed [good] to note this in passing — even if it does not properly pertain to this undertaking: [namely] that it is not sufficiently understood by me what he means, [that] which Jerome writes on this passage — 'Our Lord was, both according to the flesh and according to the spirit, the son of a king, [being] begotten either from the stock of David, or [as] the word of the omnipotent Father. Therefore tribute, as [catchword "quasi" → "...as [free ones exempt we do not owe]," continues on p. 462 (PDF 467).]

(printed p. 462 [PDF p. 467], verso — end of Ann. LXXV and Ann. LXXVI–LXXIX, on Matthew 17–19 (clerical taxes; guardian angels; the excommunicated; lawful marriage-unions). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the Erasmus citation and Sixtus's reply in Annotation LXXV:)

[tribute], as though the son of kings, he did not owe; but he who had assumed the humility of the flesh was bound to fulfill all righteousness. We unhappy [ones], who are reckoned by the name of Christ, do nothing worthy of so great a majesty. He, on account of [his] surpassing charity, for us endured even the cross, and paid tribute; [yet] we, for his honor, do not pay tribute, and — as though sons of a king — are immune from taxes. Since indeed Jerome seems to attribute this to arrogance — that ecclesiastics are burdened to pay tribute to princes — whereas today it is held [to be] the highest piety to fight tooth and nail, by every means, for the immunity of clerics." This [says] Erasmus. To whom — lest for [his] stings I return stings — we briefly reply, with evangelical modesty preserved, that Jerome does not speak of that tribute which their subjects owe to the princes of this world, but of that tribute which we all owe to Christ: [Christ] who, being such and so great, paid taxes for us; "why, then," says Jerome, "do we, wretched [ones], who profess ourselves to be the servants of Christ, not render to his majesty the due tribute of servitude?"

Annotation LXXVI [contents]

"Therefore the sons are free." — Matthew 17[:26]

[margin: Whether Christians ought to pay tributes to their [own] princes.]

Augustine, in the book of Evangelical Questions, question 23, expounds this passage thus: "What he said — 'Therefore the sons are free' — is to be understood [thus]: that in every kingdom the sons of the kingdom are free, that is, are not subject to tax. Much more, then, ought the sons of that kingdom, under which are all the kingdoms of the earth, to be free in any earthly kingdom [whatsoever]." Erasmus noted this passage as seemingly flattering those who think that no Christian owes taxes to his princes — on the ground that all Christians are sons of the kingdom, and all sons of the kingdom are free. I judge Augustine's exposition to be mystical, and that in it the matter treated is the tribute of carnal and diabolical servitude (from which the sons of the kingdom, called into the liberty of the spirit, wherever they live, ought to be free) — and not [the tribute] of external and political [nature], which, according to the precept of Paul and of our Savior, must be paid to princes. For the liberty of Christ does not free the sons of the evangelical kingdom from external debts, but from those interior debts, from which we daily ask to be absolved, saying, "Forgive us our debts."

Annotation LXXVII [contents]

"Their angels always see the face of the Father." — Matthew 18[:10]

[margin: Whether to individual men individual angels are assigned for [their] guard.]

Thomas Cajetan [says]: "Note well that he does not say, 'Their individual angels,' but says, 'Their angels.' For from this text it is not had that individual men, or even the individual little ones believing in Christ (of whom the text literally speaks), have individual angels; but only that they have blessed angels — for the verification of which it is not required that there be individual angels of individuals, but it suffices that there be many angels of them, that is, of their multitude." Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa, in the second book [of his Annotations], disapproves this thus: "I confess that the words do not compel [it]; but since they are not repugnant, but rather agree [with it]; and since reason favors [it]; and since the theologians take this dogma from here; and since it has now been persuaded to all [men]; and since it moves toward edification — exciting charity toward God, and calling forth from us thanksgivings toward God himself for his so great providence over us, and toward the angels themselves for their peculiar care over us, and not [merely] a common [care]; and since Scripture also elsewhere favors [it], which hints that a peculiar angel was the guardian of Peter — which Cajetan himself also noted: [this dogma] ought not in any way to be called into doubt."

(right column:)

Annotation LXXVIII [contents]

"Let him be to thee as a heathen and a publican." — Matthew 18[:17]
[margin: Whether those speaking and eating with the excommunicated sin.]

Thomas Cajetan's exposition is this: "I would gladly see this sentence — defined by Jesus Christ — observed, and the penalty of those not hearing the Church; namely, that it would suffice for them to be held as heathens — that is, that they themselves indeed, by force of excommunication, should be held as heathens and publicans; and that other innocent [persons] should not be involved [in it] by speaking with them, who incur no sin [by] speaking and eating with heathens." Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa, in the first book of [his] Annotations, disapproving these [things], says: "This too displeases [me], that he carps at the Church — [saying] that in imposing sentences of excommunication [the Church] has departed from the tradition of Christ; whereas, nevertheless, the Church observes nothing other than what Christ taught. For to be held as a heathen and a publican is nothing other than to deny to him [social] intercourse, companionship, and familiar conversation. For this the Jews observed toward heathens and publicans; and therefore they accused Christ, because he ate with publicans."

Annotation LXXIX [contents]

"For this cause a man shall leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife." — Matthew 19[:5]
[margin: On the marriage-unions lawful by the law of nature.]

Thomas Cajetan, in the commentaries on Matthew, seems to hold that all marriage-unions between [persons] joined by blood and affinity are lawful, except between mother and son, [and] father and daughter. For thus he left [it] written on this passage: "God instituted not only marriage, but instituted persons apt for marriage — by exempting from marriage [only] father and mother; [for] it is against the divine and natural law that a man be joined in marriage with [his] father or mother. And therefore it is said that a man shall leave [for the sake of] marriage — a daughter [her] father, and a son [his] mother — and shall cleave not to [any] woman, but to a wife; not to any [wife] whatever, but to his own. By this signifying that all other persons are apt to be spouses. For from the fact that he excluded only father and mother, he signified the rest — namely brothers and sisters, nephews and nieces — [to be] free to be husbands and wives." Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa, explaining these [things], in the fifth book of [his] Annotations, attacks Cajetan with a prolix disputation, because by these words he openly denied that unions between [blood-]related persons are unlawful by natural and divine law, except that which is between father and daughter, [and] mother and son. Which opinion the same bishop detests as unchaste. Cajetan wrote copiously on this matter in the commentaries on the Secunda Secundae of St. Thomas, question 154, article 9, where the curious reader will be able to read what impelled him to this assertion.

[catchword "Anno-" → "Anno[tatio LXXX]," continues on p. 463 (PDF 468).]

(printed p. 463 [PDF p. 468], recto — Ann. LXXX–LXXXI, on Matthew 19 (second marriages; remarriage after adultery — a father-catena). Read order: left column, then right.)

Annotation LXXX [contents]

"Moses, because of the hardness of heart, permitted you to dismiss [your] wives." — Matthew 19[:8]
[margin: On second marriages.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 32, in the exposition of this sentence, is believed to have condemned second marriages in these words: "The Apostles enjoined [men] to enter second marriages on account of the incontinence of men. For to take a second [wife] is, according to the precept of the Apostle, [lawful]; but according to the reckoning of truth, it is truly fornication. Yet since, with God permitting, it is committed publicly and lawfully, it becomes an honorable fornication."

Annotation LXXXI [contents]

"Whoever dismisses his wife, except for fornication, and marries another, commits adultery." — Matthew 19[:9]

[margin: Whether it is lawful to repudiate an adulterous wife, and to marry another.]

Thomas Cajetan, in the commentaries, so discusses the present passage that he seems to decree that it is lawful to repudiate an adulterous wife and to marry another. For he uses these words: "I understand, therefore, from this law of the Lord Jesus Christ, that it is lawful for a Christian to dismiss [his] wife on account of the carnal fornication of the wife herself, and that he can marry another wife — the definition of the Church always being safe[guarded], which hitherto does not appear. For the pontifical Decretals on this matter are not definitions of faith, but judicial [rulings] of fact. And the pontiffs themselves profess, as is plain — in chapter 4 On Divorces, and in the chapter Licet, On the Betrothed of Two — that the Roman pontiffs have sometimes erred in these judgments of marriages. Nor from these [things] should you understand that a wife also can dismiss a fornicating husband; because Jesus, who is true God, did not grant this — nor is the reasoning equal, as is plain; nor even in the old law could a wife repudiate [her] husband. Nor am I the first who [thus] understood the text of the gospel; since, a thousand years ago, blessed Ambrose, understanding [it] thus, taught the same on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, chapter 7." Thus Cajetan — in whose opinion very many of the ancient fathers are thought to have been, whose testimonies (usurped partly by catholics, partly by heretics, for the confirmation of this dogma) are these.

Ambrose, on the seventh chapter of the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, expounding that [text] — "I command — not I, but the Lord — that a husband not dismiss [his] wife," etc. — says: "But there is understood [the exception], 'except for the cause of fornication'; and therefore he did not add, as [he did] concerning the woman, that 'if she departs, [she should] so remain' — because it is lawful for a man to marry [another] wife, if he has dismissed a sinning wife; for he is not bound by the law in the same way as the woman [is]. For the head of the woman is the man." The same [Ambrose], speaking a little earlier of the woman, says: "But if she cannot contain herself, because she is unwilling to fight against the flesh, let her be reconciled to [her] husband. For it is not permitted to a woman to marry [again], if she has dismissed her own husband for the cause of fornication or of apostasy — or if, an unlawful wantonness impelling [her], she seeks the [conjugal] use [with another]; because the inferior [party] does not use this law in every respect, by which the superior [does]. If, however, the husband apostatizes, or seeks to pervert the [conjugal] use of the wife: the woman still cannot marry another, nor return to him."

Tertullian, in the fourth book Against Marcion, elucidating that sentence of Matthew from chapter 5, teaches that Christ forbade the Mosaic divorce not altogether and wholly, but conditionally. For thus he writes: "I say that Christ now made the prohibition of divorce conditionally — that is, if someone dismisses [his] wife for this [reason], that he may marry another. 'Whoever,' he says, 'dismisses [his] wife and marries another, has committed adultery'; and he who marries a woman dismissed by [her] husband is equally an adulterer, and for the same cause by which it is not lawful to dismiss [her] that another be married — [he,] taking as un-dismissed a woman unlawfully dismissed. For the marriage remains, which has not been duly dissolved: while the marriage remains, to marry [again] is adultery. So, if he prohibited conditionally to dismiss [one's] wife, he did not prohibit [it] wholly; and what he did not prohibit wholly, he permitted. You have, therefore, Christ [as] a champion of the justice of divorce."

(right column:)

Hilary, in canon 4 on Matthew, explaining that [text], "Whoever dismisses his wife," etc., speaks thus: "Whereas the [Mosaic] law had granted the liberty of giving a bill of divorce by the authority of a document, now the evangelical faith has enjoined upon the husband not only the will of peace, but has even imposed [the burden] of a wife forced into adultery — if, by the necessity of [her] departure, she is to be married to another — prescribing no other cause for keeping [her] from [a new] marriage than that which would pollute the husband by the fellowship of a prostituted wife."

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 32 on Matthew, has thus: "As he is cruel and unjust who dismisses a chaste [wife], so he is foolish and unjust who retains a harlot. For he is the patron of her turpitude who conceals the crime of [his] wife. We ought, therefore, to be imitators of God — that, as he deals with the Church, so we may deal with [our] spouse. For he will never forsake [her], unless she voluntarily pass over to heathenism and heresy. So too let the husband indeed dismiss a harlot; but otherwise let him chastise and keep a badly-behaved [wife]."

Chrysostom, homily 17 on Matthew, meeting those who complain that this law is burdensome, says: "Christ made this law light and easy. For he left to the husband one mode of expulsion, by saying, 'except for the cause of fornication'; otherwise all [things] would return again into the same turpitude. For if he had commanded that a wife defiled with many [men] should nevertheless be retained by the husband, he would again have turned the whole business into a license for adultery." Again, in the homily On Divorce, on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, chapter 7, he so condemns divorce as to except the cause of adultery, saying: "For when a husband has dismissed [his] wife without the cause of fornication, [and] when another has married [the woman] cast out while the husband lives, [that second husband] shall be punished together with that ejected [woman]."

Euthymius, the abbreviator of Chrysostom, on Matthew chapter 5, on that [text], "Whoever repudiates [his] wife," etc., speaks thus: "Moses commanded [a man] to give a bill of divorce, lest afterward he might again lay hold of [a woman] now married to another man, as [if she were] his own — and hence would arise disturbances and seditions. But Christ, instructing them more gently by the aforesaid words, commands that they not repudiate [their] wife, except for the cause of fornication. And by 'fornication' he here means adultery. For he who repudiates his [wife] apart from the cause of fornication makes her to be an adulteress, when she unites with another man; and he who marries [a woman] thus repudiated by another commits adultery with another['s wife]."

[catchword "Theo-" → "Theo[phylactus]," continues on p. 464 (PDF 469).]

(printed p. 464 [PDF p. 469], verso — Ann. LXXXI cont., on Matthew 19 (remarriage after adultery; Trent sess. 24, canon 7). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — the catena continuing:)

Theophylact, on the 16th chapter of Luke, brings in Christ speaking thus: "For behold, concerning the dissolution of marriage the [Mosaic] law gave precept on account of the murderousness of the Jews. I, training [my] hearers toward more perfect [things], forbid divorce without a reasonable cause — not teaching [things] contrary to that [law], but rather perfecting its will." And on Matthew chapter 5: "Christ did not abolish the Mosaic [law], but corrects [it], terrifying the man, that he may not without cause hold [his] wife in hatred. For if he has dismissed her for a just cause — namely, [as] fornicating — he is liable to no condemnation; but if without the cause of fornication, he is condemned. For he compels her to commit adultery. But also he who takes her [in marriage] is an adulterer. For unless he had taken [her], she would surely have returned, and been made subject to [her] husband."

Augustine, in the book On Faith and Works, chapter 19, testifies that it is not manifest from the divine Scriptures whether he who, after dismissing an adulterous wife, has married another, is an adulterer. His words are these: "Whoever dismisses a wife caught in adultery and marries another does not seem to be equated with those who dismiss and marry apart from the cause of adultery. And in the divine sentences themselves it is so obscure whether even this [man] — to whom, indeed, without doubt it is lawful to dismiss an adulteress — is nevertheless to be held an adulterer if he marries another; that, as far as I judge, one errs [only] venially [in this matter]."

Chromatius, bishop of Aquileia, in the commentaries on Matthew chapter 5, when he was explaining that [text], "Whoever dismisses [his] wife, except for the cause of fornication," etc., says: "By saying 'except for the cause of fornication' — [that] it is not lawful to dismiss a wife — he plainly shows how grave a crime of damnation before God they incur, who, through the unbridled pleasure of lust, wish — their wives dismissed without the cause of fornication — to pass over into other marriages. But just as it is not right to dismiss a wife living chastely and purely, so also it is permitted to dismiss an adulteress; because she has made herself unworthy of the husband's fellowship — she who, by sinning against her own body, has dared to violate the temple of God."

Zacharias, the first pope [of that name], decreed that a wife — [her] husband being rejected, who had defiled her sister — might marry another man, if she was unwilling to contain [herself]. And Gratian relates this decree in Cause 32, question 7, in these words: "Hast thou lain with the sister of thy wife? If thou hast done [so], mayst thou have neither. And if she who was thy wife was not conscious of the crime — [and] if she is unwilling to contain herself — let her marry in the Lord whom she will; but do thou, and the adulteress, remain without hope of marriage." There is extant, in the same Gratian, in the same question a little before, a not dissimilar decree, which is believed [to be] of the Council of Elvira, permitting a husband — his wife, who mingled herself with the husband's brother, being cast off — to marry another, in these plain words: "A certain [woman] slept with her husband's brother; it is decreed that the adulterers never be coupled in marriage; but to him whose wife was defiled, lawful marriages are not to be denied."

In the councils of Mainz and Tribur, as Gratian writes in the same place, there is another decree of the same kind, by which a man who has dismissed a wife married [by him after she had been] deflowered by [his] stepson is permitted to take another spouse. The words of the edict are these: "If anyone has slept with his stepmother, neither [of them] can attain to marriage; but her husband can, if he wishes, take another, if he cannot contain himself."

(right column:)

Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa, in the commentaries on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, and especially in the fifth volume of [his] Annotations, contends with many arguments that it is lawful for a husband, after repudiating an adulteress, to marry another wife; saying that it seems to him an exceedingly hard and unjust thing that an innocent man — meanwhile flourishing in age and prone to venery — through no fault of his own (nay, rather from another's fault, and from an injury inflicted upon himself) should be compelled to change [his] state and to lead a perpetually celibate and mournful life, joined with the burning of lust and the affliction of childlessness — whereas it is neither lawful to be joined with an adulteress, nor to seek another.

And these are the [testimonies] which I have read among catholic authors [as] worthy of note. But among heretical writers, Philip Melanchthon, in the Appendix of [his] Commonplaces, writes that in the ancient Church there was a custom that, after a divorce, it was lawful for the innocent party — the [other] spouse [still] surviving — to marry another. And, citing as a witness of this matter first of all Justin the philosopher and martyr — who, in the first Apology for the Christians to the Emperor Antoninus, praises a Christian woman who, when she had a husband seeking out every kind of lust, even against the laws of nature, resolved to be separated from the marriage; and when she was being drawn away from that purpose by her [friends], who urged that there was hope that at some time her husband would change [his] life and morals, doing violence to herself, she remained in the [married] life; but afterward, when she heard that her husband, having set out for Alexandria, was committing [things] much more foul still, deeming it wicked and impious to be held [bound] to so impure a spouse, sent him a bill of divorce and wholly severed herself from him, from the right of marriage and the bond of nuptials. To Justin he [Melanchthon] joins Origen, who in the seventh treatise on Matthew testifies that certain bishops were known to him who permitted wives who had made a divorce with [their] husbands to marry other men, lest something worse should follow thence. To these he wove in that noble Fabiola, celebrated in Jerome's epitaph, who — her husband of monstrous lust being repudiated — passed to a second marriage.

But against all these stands the immovable faith of the Church, by whose authority it is established that a marriage, once it has been consummated, can in no way be dissolved, except by the death of one [party]. Which opinion, indeed, all theologians ancient and more recent have taught, the decrees of the pontiffs have approved, and at last the most holy Tridentine Synod, in the twenty-fourth session, confirmed — a new canon being promulgated in these words: "If anyone shall say that the Church errs, when she taught and teaches, according to evangelical and apostolic doctrine, that on account of the adultery of one of the spouses the bond of marriage cannot be dissolved; and that both [parties] — or even the innocent one, who gave no cause for the adultery — cannot, the other spouse [being] alive, contract another marriage; and that he commits adultery who, the adulteress being dismissed, marries another, and she who, the adulterer being dismissed, marries another — let him be anathema."

Therefore, lest any scruple from the adduced sentences of the fathers — which seem to be opposed to this canon — settle in the reader's mind: it is to be known that the catholic authors are distinguished in a twofold order. Of these, the former em-

[catchword "com-" → "...em[braces]," continues on p. 465 (PDF 470).]

(printed p. 465 [PDF p. 470], recto — end of Ann. LXXXI and Ann. LXXXII, on Matthew 19 (divorce resolved; whether polygamy is forbidden by natural law). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation LXXXI:)

[the former order] embraces [those] who indeed grant, counsel, and sometimes enjoin husbands to cast out of the house adulterous wives — especially incorrigible [ones] — and to repudiate [them]; but neither persuade nor permit [them] to take another spouse. It embraces also those who separate husbands from the bed and cohabitation of an adulterous spouse, but absolve no married [person], the other [being] alive, from the right of matrimony, from the covenant of nuptials, and from the bond of the sacrament. In this series are Hilary, Chrysostom, Chromatius, the author of the Opus imperfectum, Euthymius, Theophylact, and especially Augustine — who, in the book On Adulterous Marriages, and in very many other places, openly affirms that it is lawful for any chaste man (nay, even fitting) to cast out an adulterous wife; but that, she surviving, to enter a second marriage is never lawful for anyone.

In the latter order are placed those who teach a divorce of both kinds — that is, [both] from cohabitation and from the marriage-bond. And these too are divided into three classes: of which the first contains those who propose this position not as a sentence of firm determination, but as a probable opinion, to be sifted by the disputations of the learned, and to be judged by the authority of the Church — such as, in our age, were Thomas Cajetan, cardinal-priest, and Ambrose [Catharinus], archbishop of Compsa. The second holds those who permitted such repudiations, and sometimes commanded [them], sanctions and decrees being promulgated on these [matters] — not indeed general and perpetual [ones], but for a time; and that for certain nations and peoples, and only in [cases of] incest and certain other atrocious crimes — lest far worse and fouler [things] be perpetrated by those who could not tolerate such foul marriages. In the number of these are to be placed those bishops who, in the time of Origen, granted repudiations; likewise Pope Zacharias the First, and all those fathers who, in the provincial synods of Elvira, Mainz, and Tribur, established the same for their [own] provincials for that time. The third class, finally, comprises those who, by a certain and indubitable assertion, approved the license of both [kinds of] repudiation — such as Tertullian and Ambrose; although the Master of the Sentences, in the fourth book, distinction 35, judges Ambrose's commentaries in that place to have been corrupted by forgers.

Let these [things], said in reply to those [testimonies] which are brought forward from catholic writers, suffice. But to those which have been adduced by the heretics, we reply very briefly: that Origen does not praise that deed of the bishops — nay, he says that they did [it] against the precept of divine Scripture, even though they permitted it lest worse [things] should follow. Justin, moreover, praises that woman because she made a divorce; but he does not say that she married another, the former husband [being] still alive — which was what Philip [Melanchthon] had to prove from that same author. Jerome, too, so far from approving Fabiola's boldness, expressly professes that she acted against the law of Paul, nay of Christ — [in] that, ignorant of the vigor of the gospel, she married another, and was therefore guilty of sin. For he says: "But why do I linger among abolished and ancient [matters], seeking to excuse the fault of Fabiola, which she herself confessed by public penance?" Let these [things], said concerning divorce, suffice.

(right column:)

Annotation LXXXII [contents]

"Whoever dismisses [his] wife, except for the cause of fornication, and marries another, commits adultery." — Matthew 19[:9]

[margin: Whether plurality of wives is prohibited by natural or by divine law.]

Thomas Cajetan is accused by Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa, [on the ground] that in the commentaries on Matthew, sifting this passage, he hints that a plurality of wives at the same time was never forbidden either by natural law or by the divine laws. And the words which afford such a suspicion are these: "Observe that from this [passage] Innocent the Third — [in the Decretals] Extra, On Divorces, chapter Gaudeamus — takes it that it is not lawful to have several wives. For if it were lawful to have several wives, [then] he who, without dismissing a fornicating [wife], took another, would not commit adultery, but would [merely] use marriage with the second [wife]. But in the text it is said that he commits adultery. And unless Mark had added 'against her,' Innocent's argument would lack [its] scruple."

Ambrose [Catharinus], in the fifth book of [his] Annotations, charging against Cajetan that elsewhere too he professed this dogma more clearly, defends Innocent's argument, writing in this manner: "The argument of Pope Innocent the Third — a most holy and most learned man — is unconquerable. For he, condemning the plurality of wives, and forbidding [it] even to converted pagans (who, before they came to the faith, were thus joined [to several wives] according to their own laws), says thus: 'This seems dissonant, and hostile to the Christian faith, since from the beginning one rib was turned into one woman, and Scripture testifies, "For this cause a man shall leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and they shall be two in one flesh." He did not say "Three, or More," but "Two"; nor did he say "He shall cleave to [his] wives," but "to [his] wife."' And below: 'Nor was it ever lawful for anyone to have several wives at once, except when it was granted by divine revelation (which custom is then reckoned to be lawful) — through which, just as Jacob [is excused] from lying, the Israelites from theft, and Samson from homicide, so too the patriarchs and other just men, who are read to have had several wives at once, are excused from adultery. Truly this veracious sentence is proved also by the testimony of the Truth, testifying in the gospel: "Whoever dismisses his wife and marries another commits adultery." But if, [his] wife being dismissed, another cannot lawfully be married, [then] much more [is it so] with her [still] retained. By which it evidently appears that plurality is to be reproved in each sex, since they are not judged [to be] on unequal terms.' These [things says] he in the chapter Gaudeamus, On Divorce. Nor does it avail that the Cardinal [Cajetan], meeting this argument, says that what Matthew says — 'He commits adultery' — is absolutely completed by Mark, who says, 'He commits adultery against her.' But what [is] this to the matter? Does he, I ask, who commits adultery against his [own] wife, therefore not commit adultery? Or does he who commits adultery not commit adultery against his wife? This was the nerve of Innocent's argument: that if it were lawful to have several wives, surely he who — the first being dismissed — married another, would not commit adultery, nor would he commit adultery against her, because he would be using his own right, even if he did evil to her by dismissing her. Efficacious, therefore, is Innocent's argument, and burdensome [inadequate] is the reply of the most reverend [Cajetan] — as the Philosopher said concerning Melissus." These [things says] Ambrose [Catharinus].

[signature "Qq"; catchword "Libet"(?) → continues on p. 466 (PDF 471).]

(printed p. 466 [PDF p. 471], verso — end of Ann. LXXXII and Ann. LXXXIII–LXXXVI, on Matthew 19 (Christian warfare; death-bed suffrages; religious vows). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation LXXXII:)

It is worth noting here in passing that, when I searched among ecclesiastical authors — especially those who wrote on heresies — [to find] who among Christians had been the author of the aforesaid dogma [of polygamy], I found no one who asserted it except the one emperor Valentinian: who, as Socrates relates in the fourth book of the Ecclesiastical History, although he thought rightly about the Trinity and held catholic opinions on the rest, yet in this [matter] declined from the rectitude of the faith. For, whereas he had a wife Severa — or, as others read, Serena — from whom he had begotten Gratian Augustus, now a youth, he, retaining her, married also Justina, the daughter of Justus, captivated by the beauty of the maiden — a law being passed too, that it should be lawful for anyone to have two wives at once. And from this Justina was born Valentinian the Younger, who afterward reigned as Augustus together with the Augusti Gratian and Valens.

[margin: Julius Caesar caused a law to be made, by which it was lawful — for the sake of begetting children — to take as many wives as each wished to marry.]

Annotation LXXXIII [contents]

"He who can take [it], let him take [it]." — Matthew 19[:12]

[margin: Whether it is lawful for Christians to wage war.]

Origen, in the seventh treatise on Matthew — [of those] which we now have — writes thus: "Jesus answered, 'He who has not, let him sell his garment and buy a sword.' If, therefore, anyone, wishing to regard the letter and not understanding the will of the words, should sell [his] bodily garment and buy a sword — such a one, taking [Christ's] word against the will of Christ, will perish. But of what sword he speaks, it is not [the business] of this place to expound." Erasmus, in the Annotations on chapter 22 on Luke, quite wrongly maintains that Origen was of the opinion that it is in no way lawful for Christians to wage war; and he says that Origen held this also in the second book Against Celsus. But of these [matters], see below, Annotation 156.

Annotation LXXXIV [contents]

"For of such is the kingdom of heaven." — Matthew 19[:14]

[margin: Whether every corporeal thing is evil.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 32, at the end writes thus: "The reason why foods are to be sanctified is this — that the whole world is placed in [the power of] the evil one. Therefore also every corporeal thing, since it is a part of the world, is placed in [the power of] the evil one, and it too must be sanctified." Peter, bishop of Crete, in the second [book] of the Sentences, in the question On Evil, says that this passage is wont to be adduced, under the name of Chrysostom, by those who — according to the dogma of Mani — asserted this world to be by nature evil and founded by an evil principle. And he adds that this saying is to be interpreted not according to the nature of the world (which is good, and proceeds from a good author), but according to the malignity of those who use the goods of the world badly.

Annotation LXXXV [contents]

"The young man says to him, 'All these I have kept from my youth.'" — Matthew 19[:20]

[margin: Whether it is lawful to procure for oneself, from the goods left at [one's] death, suffrages after this life.]

Basil, at the end of the sermon which he delivered on this passage, seems to explode the custom of those who, dying, prescribe that, from the goods left at [their] death, suffrages be made for them after death. For thus he speaks: "Do not err; God is not mocked. What is dead is not brought to the altar: bring [rather], he says, thy living victim. He who offers from the surplus is not admitted. Superfluous and rejected [things], if they be offered, lack grace.

(right column:)

But wilt thou offer to thy benefactor [the things] that shall be left over to thee after thy whole life [is done]? If thou darest not to receive distinguished men with the leavings of [thy] table, how darest thou to appease God with leavings?" John Damascene noticed this passage, and disclosed its right understanding in the sermon On the Care to be Taken for the Dead, writing in this manner: "Well does that great Basil both speak and teach; but see to whom — namely, to the avaricious, to plunderers, to those who have known neither covenant nor mercy — as he himself testifies, saying: 'We are speaking to a stony heart; and as long as thou wast alive, thou wast given over to delights and pleasures, and thou didst overflow [with them], not bearing that the poor should so much as look upon thee; [now] that thou art dead, what reward, thinkest thou, [is due]? What fruit shall be given to thy work?' And again: 'The neighboring house makes mine dark; and the avaricious [man] neither reveres time, nor knows bounds, but, like fire, invades and lays waste all things, and, like a rapid torrent rushing with force, drags [things] cast [before it] along with itself.' And other [things] like these, known to all who diligently attend to that most holy book of his. From which [it is] clear that the discourse was elaborated against those who have no care for the poor." These [things says] Damascene on Basil's behalf — [Basil] whom I too believe not to have wished, by these words, to take away the force of the suffrages which the faithful shall have arranged to be made for them after death, but rather to have wished to commend those [good works] which each does for himself while he lives.

Annotation LXXXVI [contents]

"Go, and sell all that thou hast," etc. — Matthew 19[:21]

[margin: On monastic vows.]

Thomas Cajetan, in the explanation of this passage, Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa, confutes — [on the ground] that he thought ill concerning the vows of religious. For thus he writes, in the second book of [his] Annotations: "I judged that [statement] to be altogether disapproved and exploded, which Cajetan says on Matthew chapter 19: 'Attend, prudent reader, that no vow is enjoined by Jesus upon one wishing to attain the perfection of life; because the attainment of perfection consists not in the bonds of vows, but in works.' On Luke also, chapter 14, he writes thus: 'To renounce all that we possess is commanded by Christ, as [to those] professing the perfection of the apostolic life; and I understand "to renounce" [to mean] by deed — whatever be [the case] concerning a vow. For that is the true renunciation which we read of in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the holy ancient fathers — Ambrose, Antony, Paul, Benedict.'" These same [things] he confirms there and elsewhere — [things] which manifestly assist the Lutheran and Erasmian doctrine; wherefore they are to be utterly overthrown. First, then, against these [stands] the opinion of Augustine, who writes thus of the Apostles: "For those powerful [men] had said, 'Behold, we have left all and followed thee.' This vow they had vowed most powerfully; but whence [came] this to them, except from Him of whom it is said just here, '[He who] gives the vow to the one vowing'?" Gregory, on Ezekiel, teaches thus: "When anyone vows to almighty God all that he lives [by], all that he tastes [of], it is a holocaust"; and [he says] that this pertains to those who forsake the present world. Whoever, therefore, denies that the Apostles did this, denies also that they forsook the world.

[catchword "An-" → "An[notatio LXXXVII]," continues on p. 467 (PDF 472).]

(printed p. 467 [PDF p. 472], recto — Ann. LXXXVII–XCI, on Matthew 20 (the vineyard laborers; grace vs. debt; Moses not yet dead). Read order: left column, then right.)

Annotation LXXXVII [contents]

"He went out early in the morning to hire laborers into his vineyard," etc. — Matthew 20[:1]
[margin: Whether those called by God are called on account of [their] merits.]

Chrysostom, homily 56 on Matthew, asking why [the householder] did not hire all the laborers into the vineyard immediately from the beginning, so answers the question that he seems to ascribe the grace of the divine calling — which is given freely — to the will and faith of those called, in these words: "He would indeed have hired all from the beginning, but from the will of the called this difference resulted. Therefore some are called at the [first] morning [hour], some at the third, some at the sixth, some at the ninth, some at the eleventh hour — because then they were about to obey. Which Paul also plainly signified, saying: 'But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb.' [margin: Gal. 1.] But when did it please him? Assuredly, when [Paul] was about to obey. For [God] would have [called him] even from [his] first infancy; but because he knew that he would resist, he willed [it] then, when he knew that the calling would penetrate his mind. So too, when he afterward called the thief, he could have called him earlier; but that [thief], [if] called, would not have obeyed. For if Paul had not obeyed from the beginning, much less would that thief [have]."

This same solution of the question — very often repeated by Chrysostom, with almost the same examples and words — Augustine once employed, in the book of Six Questions against the Pagans, question 2. Where, answering Porphyry — [who was] asking why Christ did not come in the earlier ages to call all men to the way of salvation and to the truth — he says thus: "Let us say only this, for brevity's sake, in the solution of this question: that Christ willed then to appear to men, and his doctrine to be preached among them, when he knew, and where he knew there to be, those who were going to believe in him. For in those times and in those places in which the gospel was not preached, he foreknew that all [men] would be, in [the case of] its preaching, such as many were in his bodily presence — who were unwilling to believe in him, even [when] the dead were raised by him."

Afterward reproving this response, Augustine, in the book On the Good of Perseverance, chapter 9, and in the second book of the Retractations, chapter 31, [in reference] to the second question, says: "What I said, I did not say as though anyone was worthy of the calling from his own merits; but, as the Apostle says, [that] it was said 'not from works, but from Him who calls' — [margin: Rom. 9.] 'The elder shall serve the younger.'"

Which calling he asserts pertains to the purpose of God — not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace; and whence he likewise says: "We know that to those who love God all things work together for good — [to those] who, according to [his] purpose, are called [to be] holy." [margin: Rom. 8.] Concerning which calling he says: "That he may hold you worthy of his holy calling." Wherefore, [see] below the elucidation of Chrysostom's sentence, Annotation 251.

Annotation LXXXVIII [contents]

"The lord says to his steward," etc. — Matthew 20[:8]

[margin: On the Trinity.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 34 on Matthew, writes that the Father and the Son are neither of the same dignity nor of the same substance, in these words: "He says to his steward. To what steward? Without doubt the Son says [it] to the Holy Spirit. And, if you wish, I grant to you that the Father says [it] to the Son. I do not inquire whether the Son is the Father's steward, or the Holy Spirit the Son's; but this I say — that a steward of the house and the householder cannot be of the same substance, nor be one person, nor [of] equal dignity. If, therefore, the one is [the] householder, the other the householder's steward: how can your 'Trinity' have place? But if this [steward] is of the same substance, and is [yet] less, he does injury to the substance; but if [there is] not equal dignity, where is [there] one substance?"

(right column:)

Annotation LXXXIX [contents]

"Call the laborers, and pay them their wage." — Matthew 20[:8]

John Ferus, in the third book of the commentaries on Matthew, after the exposition of this passage, brought in these words: "This parable teaches that whatever is given to us by God is grace, not a debt. For all our righteousnesses [are] as a menstruous cloth; nay, not even the sufferings of this time are worthy of the future glory. But if you sometimes hear a reward promised, know that it is due for no other reason than that, by [his] divine promise, he freely promised [it] and freely renders [it]. If, therefore, you desire to preserve the grace and favor of God, make no mention of your [own] merits." Jerome, bishop of Verona, in the commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, censures Ferus, [on the ground] that in this and in this [passage], and in very many other places, he overthrows the merits of good works, and those two modes of meriting — of which St. Thomas, in the Prima Secundae, question 114, article 3, calls the one "of congruity," the other "of condignity." I judge that Ferus's words can be bent to that sense in which above — from the doctrine of the same St. Thomas — we expounded certain sentences of Augustine, Basil, and Bernard. Consult Annotations 195, 199, and 217 of book 5.

Annotation XC [contents]

"The first shall be last," etc. — Matthew 20[:16]

[margin: The fruition [beatific vision] of the blessed.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, at the end of homily 34, seems to hint that the souls of the saints do not yet enjoy the vision of divine felicity, speaking thus: "Or [is it] for this [reason that] he says the first shall be last," etc. See below, Annotation 345.

Annotation XCI [contents]

"The mother of the sons of Zebedee came to him." — Matthew 20[:20]

[margin: Whether Moses died.]

Hilary, in canon 20 on Matthew, hands down that Moses is not yet dead, but lives until the time of Antichrist — in whose [time] he will be slain together with the prophet Elijah. His words run thus: "Christ, having taken Peter and James and John, appeared with the appearance of his glory, Moses and Elijah accompanying [him] on the mountain. And we understand these same two prophets, [who were] preceding his [Antichrist's] coming, [to be those] whom John's Apocalypse says are to be slain by Antichrist — although the opinions of very many have arisen variously, whether concerning Enoch or concerning Jeremiah, that the other of them, like Elijah, must die. But we cannot corrupt the truth of the faith, which the Lord revealed by the three above-mentioned witnesses, by the opinion of our own [private] sense —

[signature "Qq 2"; catchword "cor-" → "...cor[rupt]," continues on p. 468 (PDF 473).]

(printed p. 468 [PDF p. 473], verso — end of Ann. XCI and Ann. XCII–XCVI, on Matthew 20–21 (Arian Opus imperfectum censures; John the Evangelist martyred?; Christian trade; "Hosanna"). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation XCI, Hilary on Moses:)

— nor think that others are to come than those who have been seen to come to the pledge of faith. And although it is not necessary to opine beyond the evangelical truth: yet if anyone diligently considers the condition both of the death and of the sepulcher of Moses — [and] if he has obtained knowledge of the secret [hidden] Scriptures, according to the authority of the Apostle — he will understand that all [these things] were so treated [handled] that Moses could now [already] have been seen. That Ambrose thought this same [thing] is clear from those [passages] which were noted above, Annotation 61 of book 5.

Annotation XCII [contents]

"And on the third day he shall rise again." — Matthew 20[:19]

[margin: On the Son of God.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 35, seems to embrace the dogma and expressions of Arius, calling the Son of God "unbegotten God from unbegotten God." His words are these: "But also, after three days he shall rise again in the souls of those believing in him, when three days have been completed in them. The first day [is] the Father, the second day the Son — according to what is said in the prophet: 'Announce from day to day his salvation.' But what is [meant by 'one] day from [another] day,' except unbegotten God from unbegotten God? Consequently the Holy Spirit too is the third day; since by these three the hearts of believers are illuminated."

Annotation XCIII [contents]

"You shall indeed drink my cup." — Matthew 20[:23]

[margin: On the death of John the Evangelist.]

Chrysostom, homily 66 on Matthew, relates that John the Evangelist — whom many very grave authors have written to be still alive — died, slain by a violent death. For thus he introduces Christ speaking to the sons of Zebedee: "You shall indeed drink my cup. Great goods do I foretell to you: for you shall obtain the crown of martyrdom, and by a violent death, as I too, you shall depart from life, and in these [things] you shall have communion with me." And in the homily on the Epistle to the Hebrews 27, on that word, "Others were stretched out," etc., describing the kind of martyrdom and death of both, he says: "In this passage he seems to me to signify John and James. For 'distention' is said [to mean] beheading — unless perhaps by 'John' he understood the Baptist, beheaded by Herod." Certainly Euthymius, in [his] commentaries, testifies that Chrysostom taught — not only in the present homily, but also in the first and second homily on the gospel of John — that the Evangelist was slain in Asia. George of Trebizond, citing this passage from the homily on Matthew, in [his] book On John [being] still alive, says that Chrysostom speaks of the martyrdom and violent death which John — preaching penance at the end of the age together with Enoch and Elijah — will suffer under the last persecution of Antichrist.

Annotation XCIV [contents]

"It is not mine to give to you." — Matthew 20[:23]

[margin: On the Trinity.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 35 on Matthew, denies that the Son is coequal and consubstantial with the Father, in these words: "What then — did Christ lie, saying, 'It is not mine [to give]'? No. For everyone who has power, if he has [it] received from another, [that power] truly belongs to him who gave [it]. For what did the Son have as his own, since he himself was not his own, but the Father's? Therefore between him and [the one] whose [the power] is not, [there is] neither one person, nor equal power. For if [there is] one God — both Father and Son — either assuredly he can, or assuredly he cannot [do a thing]. Who has [ever] seen such a one heavenly God worshipped — [one] who in half is powerful, and in half powerless? Or who would think those equal, whose power is not equal?"

(right column:)

Annotation XCV [contents]

"And he cast out those selling and buying." — Matthew 21[:12]

[margin: Whether it is lawful for Christians to exercise trade.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 38, judges that all merchants are to be cast out of the Church — and especially those who buy things, not that they may exercise a craft upon them, but that they may sell them more dearly. And he speaks in this manner: "No Christian ought to be a merchant; or, if he wishes to be [one], let him be cast out of the Church." And below: "I will show you who is not a trader — that you may understand that all who are not [conformed] to this rule are traders: that is, whoever purchases a thing, not that he may sell the thing itself whole and undefiled, but that he may make a work out of it, he is not a trader. For he who purchases for himself material to work with, from which to make a work — he does not sell the thing itself, but rather his own craftsmanship: that is, he who sells a thing whose valuation is not in the thing itself, but in the craftsmanship of the work — that is not trading. For instance, a smith buys iron and makes a tool; but that tool has not as much of iron as it is worth, but is priced according to the work of the tool. But he who buys a thing that he may profit by giving [selling] it whole and unchanged — he is the merchant who is cast out of the temple of God." St. Thomas, in the Secunda Secundae, question 77, noting this passage as [being] Chrysostom's, says that it is not to be understood of every kind of merchant, but only of those who set the ultimate end of the whole business in gain. For gain itself too can be lawfully sought by merchants — not as the ultimate end, but for the sake of another necessary and honorable end. And to this sense also, he says, is to be referred what Cassiodorus brought forth against traders, in the exposition of Psalm 70. See above, Annotation 187 of book 5.

Annotation XCVI [contents]

"Hosanna to the son of David." — Matthew 21[:9]

[margin: What "Hosanna" signifies.]

Jerome, in the little book to Damasus, faults Hilary — who expounds this [word] in canon 21 on Matthew — because, through inexperience of the Hebrew tongue, he interpreted "Hosanna" [as] "Redemption of the house of David": whereas among the Hebrews the word written pheduth (פדות) means "redemption," and "house" [is] beth (בית), while "David" is the same word among the Hebrews as among the Greeks and Latins. And [Jerome] indicates that this passage is taken from Psalm 117 [118], in which, besides other [things] which are found manifestly said of Christ, this too is read: "O Lord, save me; O Lord, prosper [me] well: blessed [is] he who comes in the name of the Lord." Moreover, for that which is [rendered] in the Septuagint translators [as] "O Lord, save me," in the Hebrew is read Anna Yehovah oshi'ah-na (אנא יהוה הושיעה נא) — which [Jerome] interpreted more clearly — is Symmachus, saying, "I beseech [thee], O Lord, save me." For oshi'ah (הושיעה), "save," signifies [that]; and na (נא), "na," is an interjection among the Hebrews, as of one earnestly demanding or imploring. Ambrose interprets "Hosanna" in almost the same way as Hilary. Euthymius expounds [it as] "a hymn," or "praise"; and he says that "Hosanna to the son of David" is the same as if you should say, "A hymn to the son of David."

[catchword "est" → "...[interpreted] more clearly," continues on p. 469 (PDF 474).]

(printed p. 469 [PDF p. 474], recto — end of Ann. XCVI and Ann. XCVII–CI, on Matthew 21–22 (grace subtracted?; the Jews' knowledge of Christ's deity; love of neighbor and Pelagianism). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation XCVI, on "Hosanna":)

Annotation XCVII [contents]

"And he went abroad." — Matthew 21[:33]

[margin: On the subtraction of grace.]

Ambrose [Catharinus], reproving Thomas Cajetan's exposition in the second book of [his] Annotations, says: "That which he expounds in the parable of the vineyard — that the 'going abroad' is a subtraction of the gratuitous help which preserves them from evil — I judge false and dangerous: because, if [God] did this, he would unjustly demand fruit. And in other parables, although the lord [has] gone abroad, they nevertheless render him the gain of the talents and the minae — which would not be [so], if such a 'going abroad' signified that, namely, a subtraction of the divine help."

Annotation XCVIII [contents]

"This is the heir." — Matthew 21[:38]

[margin: Whether the Jews recognized the deity of Christ.]

Strabo, in the [ordinary] Gloss, expounds the present clause thus: "It is plain from these words of the Jews that the princes crucified the Son of God not through ignorance, but through envy. For they understood him to be that [one] to whom the Father says through the prophet, 'Ask of me, and I will give thee the nations for thine inheritance.'" St. Thomas, in the third part of the Summa, question 47, article 5, notes this passage — adduced under the name of Jerome — as repugnant to the Apostle, saying to the Corinthians, "If they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory." Then, removing a repugnance of this kind, he writes thus: "It must be said that those words, 'This is the heir,' are said not in the person of the whole people of the Jews, but in the person of the tenant-farmers of the vineyard — by whom are signified the rulers of that people, who knew him to be the heir, inasmuch as they knew him to be the Christ promised in the Law. But against this response it seems [to stand] that those words of the psalm, 'Ask of me, and I will give thee the nations for thine inheritance,' are said to the same [one] to whom it is said, 'Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee.' [margin: Ps. 2.] If, therefore, they knew him to be the [one] to whom it was said, 'Ask of me, and I will give thee the nations for thine inheritance,' it follows that they knew him to be the Son of God." Chrysostom too, in the same place, says that they knew him to be the Son of God. Bede also, on that [text] of Luke 23, "For they know not what they do," says: "It is to be noted that he does not pray for those who preferred to crucify [him] whom they had understood to be the Son of God, rather than to confess [him]." But to this it can be answered that they knew him to be the Son of God not by nature, but by the excellence of [his] singular grace. We can, however, say that they are also said to have known [him to be] the true Son of God, because they had evident signs of this thing — to which, nevertheless, they were unwilling to assent, on account of hatred and envy, so as [not] to acknowledge him to be the Son of God.

(right column:)

Annotation XCIX [contents]

"Many are called, but few chosen." — Matthew 22[:14]

[margin: Whether election is from merit.]

Theophylact, explaining this, is noted [censured] by the heretic Oecolampadius, his translator — [on the ground] that he ascribed to the merits of the elect the election of God, which Paul attributes to divine grace alone, in these words: "Many are called, but few chosen. For [there are] few who are saved, and who [are] worthy to be chosen by God: so that to call [is] indeed God's [part]; but to become elect, or not, is ours." He shows, therefore, that the parable was spoken on account of the Jews: who were indeed called, but not chosen, because they did not hear [obey]. See below, Annotation 251.

Annotation C [contents]

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God." — Matthew 22[:37]

[margin: On the Trinity.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 42, shows that the Son is not the first God, as the Father is, in these words: "The first commandment [is], and [is] great, to love God the Father; but the second, like to it, is to love the Son of God — that is, to acknowledge [him]. Therefore the Son of God is great, as the Father [is]. For whatever the Father can [do], the Son too can [do]. For the Father loves the Son, and has given all things into his hands. But because the Son can [do] all things — the Father giving [the power] — as the Father [can]: therefore the Father [is] great God, and first; but the Son [is] indeed great God, yet not first — as [Paul] says, 'Awaiting the coming of the great God, and of our Savior Jesus Christ.'"

Annotation CI [contents]

"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." — Matthew 22[:39]

[margin: Whether the precepts of the second table can be fulfilled without the grace of God.]

Ambrose [Catharinus], in the second book, disapproves Thomas Cajetan's exposition as Pelagian, in these words: "The commandment concerning [the] neighbor — of which the Lord [speaks], 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself' — he [Cajetan] says is not to be understood of love from charity. And he proves [it thus]: because this precept presupposes proper [self-]love, which can be fulfilled without charity, as is plain in those keeping all the precepts of the second table without charity; and so it does not presuppose love from charity. Therefore love of neighbor from charity is not commanded [here]." Thus he [Cajetan], firstly. But it is false, what he assumes as [if] granted — namely, that the precepts of the second table can be fulfilled without charity and the grace of God; nay, according to Augustine's opinion, it is Pelagian. For nothing would prevent [that] even without charity the precepts of the first table too could be fulfilled — which Cajetan himself also admits. And so, without grace and charity, the whole Law and the Prophets could be fulfilled, and Christ would abound to us superfluously. But this is the very dogma of Pelagius. He adds a second argument, and says: "Here love of neighbor is commanded from the example of proper [self-]love, [which is] certain and indubitable — that is, 'as thou dost in fact love thyself'; but love of neighbor from charity is not certain and indubitable." Thus he. And this too, which he assumes, is most false: because love of neighbor is not commanded us [to be] as we in fact love ourselves, but as we are reasonably bound to love our-

[signature "Qq 3"; catchword "metipsos" → "...our[selves]," continues on p. 470 (PDF 475).]

(printed p. 470 [PDF p. 475], verso — end of Ann. CI and Ann. CII–CIV, on Matthew 23–24 (wearing gospels/crosses; the Nicene homoousios*; the marks of the true Church). Read order: left column, then right.)*

(left column — concluding Annotation CI, Sixtus refuting Cajetan:)

— ourselves: for so ought the words of the law to be interpreted; lest otherwise, if anyone perversely loves himself in fact — as are those who willingly work iniquity — they should even receive the commandment of loving [their] neighbor thus; which it is insane to admit. For that [saying] too, "Whatever you wish that men do to you," is not understood [as] "whatever you wish in fact," but "whatever you ought reasonably to wish, by [right] estimation" — as Cajetan himself there expounds, and rightly. And as for what he adds in the third [place] — that love of neighbor from charity is not commanded [here] because it would be superfluously commanded, since it is implicitly contained in the first commandment concerning the love of God — this, in truth, elegantly overturns his own exposition. For if in the first commandment is contained the commandment of love of neighbor from charity, then it is superfluous to command that [the neighbor] be loved not from charity, since it is enough — nay, more [than enough] — to love [him] from charity. For grace does not destroy nature, but perfects [it]. Add [too] that if the first commandment concerning the love of God is understood [to be] from charity, and this second is said [to be] "like to it," as the Lord says: certainly it too ought to be understood [as] from charity in like manner; otherwise it would be very unlike, and would differ [as far] as darkness differs from light.

See, then, how he is deceived everywhere, and errs, as is said, at the very doors [threshold]. For these are the principles of our faith. For he too, writing on Deuteronomy chapter 6, holds that both these precepts, handed down there — "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," etc. — are not [to be] understood [as] from charity. But if this is true, then it would be false [that] the Lord [says] that this was the greatest commandment. For it would not be the greatest, since a far greater [one] would be given — namely, to love from charity. Likewise, [Christ] would falsely have promised eternal life to the one doing it — for thus he said, "Do this, and thou shalt live." And it would be false that on this [depend] the whole Law and the Prophets. And [it would be] false that it was greater than all holocausts, etc.

Annotation CII [contents]

"For they enlarge their phylacteries, and magnify [their] fringes." — Matthew 23[:5]

[margin: Whether it is lawful to hang gospels and crosses on the neck.]

Jerome, in the fourth book on Matthew, seems to condemn the custom of those who, out of a pious affection of mind, carry divine words and sacred things hung on the neck, saying thus: "The Pharisees did not understand that these [things] are to be carried in the heart, not on the body; otherwise both cupboards and chests have books, and [yet] do not have the knowledge of God. This, among us, superstitious little women — with tiny gospels, and with the wood of the cross, and things of this kind, which have indeed a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge — do to this day, straining out a gnat and swallowing a camel." The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 44, in the exposition of the same sentence, seems to agree with Jerome, in these words: "Many, by the example of the scribes and Pharisees, invent certain Hebrew names of angels, and write [them], and bind [them] on themselves — which to those not understanding the Hebrew tongue seem, as it were, [things] to be feared. But some [bind on themselves] a written part of the gospel. Tell [me], foolish priest: is not the gospel read daily in the church, and heard by men? To whom, then, the gospels placed in [his] ears profit nothing — how shall [they], suspended around [his] neck, be able to save him? Then, where is the power of the gospel — in the figures [shapes] of the letters, or in the understanding of the meanings?

(right column:)

If in the figures, [then] you rightly suspend [it] around [your] neck; but if in the understanding, then [the gospels], placed in the heart, profit more than [when] suspended around the neck." St. Thomas notices this passage, in the Secunda Secundae, question 96, article 4, saying that by these words are not condemned those who, for the sake of piety and religion, carry the divine Scriptures, the relics of the saints, and other sacred things; but [rather] those who look more to the [written] characters of Scripture than to the understanding of Scripture — and those especially who, either led by vain superstition or puffed up by ambition, carry these [things] about. Those, therefore, who carry things and words of this kind out of trust in God and reverence for the saints, are in no way to be accused. For we read that blessed Cecilia always carried the gospel-codex in [her] bosom; and that Constantine Augustus carried the nail of Christ about in [his] diadem; and that the Apostle Barnabas cured the sick by the touch of the gospel-writing.

Annotation CIII [contents]

"Nation shall rise against nation." — Matthew 24[:7]

[margin: On the Homoousion [consubstantial].]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 48, says that the assertion of the catholics — who teach the Son [to be] "homoousion" with the Father, that is, consubstantial — is a heresy which is opposed to the Church of Christ. "The heresy," he says, "of the Homousians is opposed not only to the Church of Christ, but also to all the heresies not wise in like manner." Therefore Christ says, "Nation shall rise against nation."

Annotation CIV [contents]

"When you see the abomination," etc. — Matthew 24[:15]

[margin: Whether the true Church can be recognized by certain marks, and by which.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 49, writes that the Church cannot be known [as to] whether it is the true [one] — neither from [its] bishops, nor from miracles, nor from sacraments, nor from good morals; but only from the divine Scriptures. The words expressing such an opinion are these: "For those wishing to know which is the true Church of Christ, there is no other way than through the Scriptures. Why? Because all these [things], since they belong properly to Christ in truth, those heresies too have in [their] schism — likewise churches, likewise the divine Scriptures themselves, likewise bishops and the other orders of clergy, likewise baptism, likewise the Eucharist, and all other [things], and then Christ himself. Whoever, therefore, wishes to know which is the true Church of Christ — whence should he know [it], amid so great a confusion of likeness, except only through the Scriptures? Likewise, formerly [true and false Christians] were recognized also by signs — who were true Christians and who false — in what way? The false either could not do [signs] as the true Christians [did], or could not [do] such [signs] as the true Christians: but they did empty [ones], producing admiration indeed, but having no usefulness, as we have frequently explained. But the [true] Christians did full [signs], not only producing admiration, but also having every usefulness. And by these it was recognized who were true Christians, [and] who false. But now the working of signs is altogether removed [ceased]: nay rather, feigned [signs] are found to be done even among those who are false Christians. And, as Peter expounds in [the writings of] Clement, to Antichrist too the power of doing full signs is to be given. Likewise, from the morals themselves the Church of Christ was formerly known, when the conversation [way of life] of Christians —

[catchword "aut" → continues on p. 471 (PDF 476).]

(printed p. 471 [PDF p. 476], recto — end of Ann. CIV and the start of Ann. CV, on Matthew 24 (Scripture and tradition — the Vincentian canon and Augustine; Christ's "ignorance" of the day). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the Opus imperfectum citation of Annotation CIV:)

[the way of life of Christians] was holy — either of all, or of many — which was not [found] among the impious. But now Christians have become either such [as], or worse than, the heretics or the gentiles are. And still greater continence is found among those [heretics], although they are in schism, than among [the] Christians. Whoever, then, wishes to know which is the true Church of Christ — whence should he know [it], except only through the Scriptures?" This passage, under the name of Chrysostom, the heretics of our age usurp — who, the judgment of the fathers and the definition of the councils being scorned, contend that one must rely only on the divine Scriptures, and that the knowledge of the true Church must be sought from these alone.

But how miserably these unhappy [men] are deceived, that most holy — and, among the fathers who flourished nearly twelve hundred years ago, most learned and most eloquent — Vincent of Lérins most clearly demonstrated, in a truly golden little book published [by him], which all lovers of catholic piety ought to turn over with assiduous hand, as a handbook, or a soldier's little dagger against the profane innovations of all heresies. He, then, among other [things] which he disputed concerning the method of discerning the true Church and faith from the false church and faith of the heretics, brought forward three rules — beyond and after the divine Scripture — by which the difference of the two churches may most certainly be detected. And these are: the Universality, the Antiquity, [and] the Consent of ecclesiastical tradition. But it is better to report these in his most elegant words, which are had almost at the beginning of the same little work in this manner: "Often, inquiring with great zeal and the utmost attention from very many men outstanding in sanctity and doctrine, in what way I might be able — by a certain fixed, and as it were general and regular, way — to discern the truth of the catholic faith from the falsehood of heretical depravity: I always received a response of this kind from almost all, that whether I, or anyone [else], wished to detect the frauds of the rising heretics, and to avoid [their] snares, and to remain sound and whole in a sound faith, he ought — the Lord helping — to fortify his faith in a twofold manner: first, namely, by the authority of the divine law [Scripture], and then next by the tradition of the catholic Church.

Here perhaps someone may ask: Since the canon of the Scriptures is perfect, and of itself more than sufficiently suffices for all things — what need is there that the authority of ecclesiastical understanding be joined to it? [I answer:] because, namely, on account of its very depth, not all receive Sacred Scripture in one and the same sense; but one and another interprets its utterances in one way and another way, so that almost as many opinions seem able to be drawn thence as there are men. For Novatian expounds it one way, Sabellius another, Donatus another, Arius, Eunomius, [and] Macedonius another; Photinus, Apollinaris, [and] Priscillian another; Jovinian, Pelagius, [and] Coelestius another; and lastly Nestorius another. And therefore, on account of so great [and] so various windings of error, it is very necessary that the line of prophetic and apostolic interpretation be directed according to the norm of the ecclesiastical and catholic sense. And within the catholic Church itself, great care must be taken that we hold that which has been believed everywhere, always, and by all. For this is truly and properly 'catholic' — as the very force of the name, and its reasoning, declares — [that name] which comprehends all things truly [and] universally. But this [we shall achieve] only thus, if we follow Universality, Antiquity, [and] Consent. And we shall follow Universality in this way, if we confess this one faith to be true which the whole Church throughout the world confesses; but Antiquity thus, if we in no way depart from those senses [interpretations] which it is manifest our holy elders and fathers celebrated; and Consent likewise, if in that very antiquity we follow the definitions and opinions of all — or at least of almost all — the priests and teachers alike. What, then, shall a catholic Christian do, if some little part of the Church has cut itself off from the communion of the universal faith? What, indeed, but that he prefer the health of the whole body to a pestilent and corrupt member? What, if some novel contagion tries to defile not now a small portion only, but the whole Church equally? Then likewise he will provide to cleave to antiquity, which now cannot in any way be seduced by any fraud of novelty. What, if in that very antiquity an error of two or three men, or certainly of one city, or even of some [one] province, be detected? Then he will altogether take care that, over against the rashness or ignorance of a few, he prefer — if there are any — the decrees of a universal council [made] universally of old. But if any such thing should emerge, where nothing of this kind is found: then he will take pains to consult, and to interrogate, the collated opinions of the elders — of those only who, though [living] at diverse times and places, yet remaining in the communion and faith of the one catholic Church, stood forth as approved teachers; and whatever he shall recognize that not one or two only, but all alike, with one and the same consent, openly, frequently, [and] perseveringly held, wrote, [and] taught — let him understand that this too is to be believed by him without any doubt." Thus far Vincent.

(right column:)

But Augustine, compressing the same marks of the true Church into fewer words, and showing that these very [marks] are found in the Roman Church, speaks thus in the book Against the Letter of Mani, chapter 4: "There are many [things] which most justly hold me in the bosom of the Church. The consent of peoples and nations holds me; the authority holds [me] — begun by miracles, nourished by hope, increased by charity, [and] confirmed by antiquity; the succession of priests holds me — from the very see of Peter the Apostle (to whom, after his resurrection, the Lord commended his sheep to be fed) down to the present episcopate; lastly, the very name of 'catholic' holds [me] — which, not without cause, this [Church] alone has obtained amid so many heresies."

Annotation CV [contents]

"But of that day and hour no one knows, not even the Son of man." — Matthew 24[:36]
[margin: Whether Christ was ignorant of the day of judgment.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 50, seems to place in Christ an ignorance of the day and hour of judgment, speaking thus: "Those considering this passage ought not to blush to be ignorant of anything of the mysteries of God, since they read that he himself did not blush to confess his ignorance in answering — [namely] that 'of that day and hour no one knows, neither the angels, nor the Son' — especially since there is a great depth of the mysteries of God; nor yet does he lie, since what he himself knows, he received from the Father. Deservedly he denies [his own] knowledge, — [that knowledge] which was not from himself; just as elsewhere too, when he was good, he denied himself [to be] good, because his goodness was from the Father; and lest, on account of the human dispensation, he be thought to have denied that he knew [it], he did not say, "Neither the Son of man" — because he would have said [it] according to [his] divinity, not according to [his] human nature. For between the Son of God and the Son of man there is no difference.

[signature "Qq 4"; catchword "qua" → continues on p. 472 (PDF 477).]

(printed p. 472 [PDF p. 477], verso — end of Ann. CV and Ann. CVI–CVIII, on Matthew 24–25 (Christ's "ignorance" of the day; almsgiving; the virgins' oil and the saints' merits). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CV, the Opus imperfectum still speaking:)

But St. Augustine reproves this opinion — that in Christ there was an ignorance of the day and hour of judgment — teaching that it was said for this reason, that not even the Son himself knows the day of judgment: because he did not know that day in such a way as to be about to reveal it to others. Jerome, elucidating this passage in [his] commentary, affirms that in the Greek codices — especially those of Adamantius [Origen] and Pierius — that clause, "nor the Son of man," is not had; and Euthymius testifies the same. But Ambrose, in book 5 On the Faith, chapter 8, asserts that this same clause was formerly not written even in Mark, but was craftily added by the Arians. For he says: "'It is written,' say the Arians, 'But of that day and hour no one knows, neither the angels of heaven nor the Son, but the Father alone.' First, the ancient Greek codices do not have [the clause] 'nor the Son knows'; but [it is] no wonder if they falsified this too — [they] who interpolated the divine Scriptures. And by what reasoning it seems to have been added is disclosed, since it is drawn out to the interpretation of so great a sacrilege." However, Origen, treatise 30 on Matthew; Chrysostom, homily 78 on Matthew; Hilary, canon 26 on Matthew; and Augustine, homily 21 On the Words of the Lord, on Matthew — had in this passage "nor the Son"; and they expounded [it] according to the aforesaid understanding.

Annotation CVI [contents]

"The lord of that servant will come on a day when he does not expect." — Matthew 24[:50]
[margin: Whether fasting and chastity without almsgiving are of any avail.]

Chrysostom, at the end of homily 78, seems to teach that fasting, prayer, chastity, and virginity, without almsgiving, profit nothing, saying: "Prayer takes [its] strength and wings from almsgiving. And not prayer alone, but fasting too is strengthened thence. For if you fast without almsgiving, this is not even reckoned [as] fasting; since [such a one] is worse than a slave of the belly and a drunkard who [still] fasts thus — and so much the worse, as cruelty is more wicked than [self-]indulgence. Why do I speak thus of fasting, when chastity itself and virginity, lacking almsgiving, is cast out from the bridechamber of the Bridegroom? For although virginity is indeed a great thing, yet, unless almsgiving accompany it, it is cast out." These words are to be interpreted not of the external distribution of alms itself — which can neither always, nor by all, be done — but of the very affection and zeal of almsgiving, that is, of mercy and charity, without which no work is so excellent that it is worthy of the eternal reward. But if anyone should contend that Chrysostom speaks also of the external bestowal of alms, I would not much resist — provided only that these very words be granted to be said only of those who are so far devoid of fraternal charity that they refuse to bring aid to needy brethren even in [their] extreme necessities.

Annotation CVII [contents]

"Lest perhaps there be not enough for us and you." — Matthew 25[:9]
[margin: Whether we can be helped by the merits of others.]

(right column:)

Hilary, in canon 27 on Matthew, says: "They answer that they cannot give oil, because it is necessary for each one to buy oil for his own lamp" — and [that] no one is to be helped by the works and merits of others. Erasmus, in the scholia on Hilary published by him, noted this passage in the margin, as though pointing with [his] finger to a staff on which the heretics may lean — [those] who in these times deride the merits, intercessions, and suffrages of the saints. Bodius too, in his Collectanea, casts this opinion in the teeth of catholics who implore the prayers and helps of the saints — not noticing that Hilary speaks not of those who, at the opportune time and from a sincere affection of charity, earnestly beg the help of the blessed; but of those who, having neglected their [own] salvation in this life, at last after death flee to the saints, when no faculty of truly repenting and meriting remains.

Annotation CVIII [contents]

"But he who received the one [talent], going away, dug in the earth," etc. — Matthew 25[:18]
[margin: Whether bad priests are [true] priests.]

The author of the Opus imperfectum, homily 53, indicates that bad priests and deacons are not ordained by God, but by men; and that, although they are held by men [to be] priests, yet as regards God they are not priests. This opinion is read in him in this manner: "To deacons and teachers, according to his providence, God seems to enjoin the ministry of the diaconate — or of the presbyterate — [upon] those who are just; but those who are found unjust, men seem to have ordained, not God. Therefore from the outcome of the matter it is known who has been ordained by God, and who by men. For he who shall have well completed his ministry, [it] appears that he had been ordained from God; but he who shall not have well completed his ministry, has been ordained from men. And in what way certain priests are ordained from men is plainly stated in the eighth book of the Canons of the Apostles. But he who has been ordained from men, as regards God is not a deacon or a priest. Therefore, among the priests indeed [and] the deacon, he is not found who loses the talents — [namely one] who is ordained by God according to [his] foreknowledge. But among the common people it happens, just as [it also happens] that one who is going to be a sinner has received from God the grace of faith. According to these [things], then, which we have said: if a presbyter or deacon is found [to be] a sinner — since, as regards the foreknowledge of God (as we have already said), he seems to have been made a presbyter or deacon not from God, but from men — he is found, like a layman, among those who received the one talent of faith. And through this, no one ordained by God sins, except [him] who received the one talent from God. And therefore the grace of faith is bestowed by God on all, but the grace of the clerical state not on all, but on the worthy: because in the former [faith] is the cause of salvation, but in the latter [is] the dispensation of the ministry."

John, bishop of Ostuni, the interpreter and scholiast of the Constitutions of St. Clement, explaining the Apostolic canon adduced by this author (and noted by Clement in the eighth book of the Constitutions, chapter 1), admonishes readers not to slip, on the occasion of this opinion, into the error of the Hussites — who teach that bishops or presbyters bound by mortal sin are no longer bishops and priests,

[catchword "sacer-" → "...[and] priests," continues on p. 473 (PDF 478).]

(printed p. 473 [PDF p. 478], recto — end of Ann. CVIII and Ann. CIX–CX, on Matthew 26 (how many women anointed Christ; the Greek–Latin leavened/unleavened bread controversy). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CVIII, John of Ostuni's gloss:)

[are no longer] priests. And he says that Clement's opinion is not to be so taken, as though he wished those who are bad to lose the power which they received in ordination; but that he denies them to be bishops and priests inasmuch as the offices and functions which they discharge are not pleasing and acceptable to God — nay, their election is not even ascribed to Him, but to men: as if he should say that they are bishops as to [their] dignity, but not as regards God; because their institutions and offices, which they afterward exercise, are not approved by God. He adds also that, according to this sense, the sayings of this author are to be understood — and likewise those words which Jerome wrote in the commentaries on the epistle to the Galatians, asserting that those are ordained by men who, unworthily, by the favor of the people, despising the patience of the Lord, are ordained to the divine priesthood against [their] merit. For these, although by force of sacred ordination they have the power divinely conferred upon them, yet, by the depraved administration of [their] office, are not priests such as God requires and desires.

Annotation CIX [contents]

"A woman came to him, having an alabaster [box] of ointment." — Matthew 26[:7]
[margin: On the three Magdalenes.]

Origen, treatise 35 on Matthew, asserts that there were three Marys Magdalene — or [three] women — who anointed Christ: the first, a harlot, who anointed the Lord in the house of the Pharisee, of whom Luke writes in chapter 7; the second, who anointed his feet six days before the Passover in Bethany in [her] own house — and this was Mary the sister of Lazarus, having an approved and admirable life, whom John mentions in chapter 12; the third, who two days before the Passover poured ointment upon the head of Jesus in Bethany in the house of Simon the leper, of whom Mark chapter 14 and Matthew chapter 26 speak. With Origen agree Theophylact, in the commentaries on chapter 7 on Luke, and Euthymius, in the explanation of chapter 26 on Matthew. John [Fisher], bishop of Rochester, attacked this opinion — defended by James, bishop of Vienne — in three volumes.

There are [others] who posit only two women anointers of the Lord: one, the harlot, who anointed first the feet at the Pharisee's [house] and then the head of Christ in the house of Simon the leper; the other, the sister of Lazarus, anointing the feet of the Lord as he supped at her house. Of this number is Chrysostom, homily 81 on Matthew and homily 61 on John; and Bernard, in the sermon on the Magdalene, mentions two, but somewhat differently.

There are others who assert only one Magdalene, the sister of Lazarus — [who], in the house of the Pharisee, in the house of Simon the leper, and in the house of Lazarus, twice anointed the feet [and] once the head. Among these are held Augustine, book 2 On the Agreement of the Evangelists, chapter 9; Gregory, in the homily on the Magdalene; Bede, book 3 of the commentary on Luke; Christian Druthmar, chapter 26 on Matthew; Rabanus, on Luke 7; and very many others. Following whose opinion, Odo, abbot of Cluny, in the hymn which the Dominican church now uses, sang thus:

> Mary, the sister of Lazarus, > who committed so many crimes,
> from the very jaws of Tartarus > returns to the threshold of life.

(right column:)

St. Ambrose, in book 6 on Luke, says that it can be said both that there was one [woman], and [that there were] several.

Annotation CX [contents]

"And when evening was come, he reclined with the twelve." — Matthew 26[:20]
[margin: Whether Christ celebrated the Passover on the fourteenth [day of the] moon. / Whether Christ consecrated in unleavened [bread].]

Euthymius, explaining this passage in the commentaries on Matthew, hands down two [things] foreign to the rite of the Latin Church. The first is that Christ celebrated the Passover and completed the last supper on the thirteenth day of the lunar month, but suffered and was crucified on the fourteenth. The second is that Christ, in the last supper, after the legal eating of the lamb, used leavened bread, and that in it he instituted the sacrament of his body and blood. These indeed fight diametrically with the decrees of the Latin Church and of the Roman faith; which first asserts that Christ ate the paschal lamb on the fourteenth [day of the] moon, as did the other Jews also — because, as Chrysostom says, he always kept the law until death — but suffered on the fifteenth [day of the] moon. Then [the Latin Church] affirms that in that supper no other bread was set out than unleavened; because Matthew, Mark, and Luke testify that the time of the supper was the first day of unleavened bread, on which it was not lawful to eat leavened [bread]; and accordingly that Christ confected the sacrament of his body from unleavened [bread], and left us an example of consecrating in unleavened [bread].

The more recent Greeks defend Euthymius's opinion from the gospel of John — in which it is read that Christ supped with the disciples before the feast day of the Passover, [margin: John 13.] that is (as they expound), on the thirteenth [day of the] moon, when leavened bread was still in the houses. It is also had, in the same gospel, that Christ was slain on the day of the Preparation [parasceve], John saying: "And they themselves did not enter into the praetorium, lest they be defiled, but that they might eat the Passover"; [margin: John 18.] and again below, "Now it was the Preparation"; and, a little after, "There they laid him, because of the Preparation of the Jews." [margin: John 19.] Which words, according to their interpretation, show that Christ was slain on that day on which the lamb was slain — that is, on the fourteenth [day of the] moon, on which was the Preparation, that is, the preparation of the Passover: for on its evening the lamb was immolated, and the eating of the unleavened [bread] began. They say also that Christ, by [way of] dispensation, anticipated the legal supper by one day, and completed the Passover before the lawful time, lest the passion of the cross should take from him the opportunity of eating the mystical lamb with his disciples. For he knew that he would be slain on the fourteenth [day of the] moon — so that on that day on which the figurative lamb was immolated, the true Lamb also might be immolated, and the truth might in this way correspond to the figure.

But since the present altercation of the Latins and Greeks took its beginning from that [seeming] controversy which appears to be between John and the other evangelists: it is to be known that that day is the same [day] which the three Evangelists called "the first [day] of unleavened bread," and which John named "before the feast day of the Passover" — that is, the fourteenth [day of the] moon, in whose evening the solemnity of unleavened bread, or of the Passover, began, and the lamb was immolated, and with it the unleavened [loaves] were eaten, when no more leaven was found in the houses of the Jews, the Law so commanding in the volume of Exodus. Nor

[catchword "neque" → continues on p. 474 (PDF 479).]

(printed p. 474 [PDF p. 479], verso — end of Ann. CX and Ann. CXI, on Matthew 26 (unleavened bread; the words of consecration; the Greek epiclesis). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CX:)

Nor does that fight with these [things] which John wrote — that the Jews were unwilling to enter Pilate's praetorium, lest they be defiled, but [that they wished to] eat the Passover. For in that place "Passover" does not signify the paschal lamb — for the Jews had already eaten it the past night, on which Christ supped with his disciples (which is gathered from Matthew, [margin: Matt. 26.] who says: "And on the first day of unleavened bread, when they immolated the Passover," etc.) — but it signified the unleavened loaves, which had to be eaten for seven continuous days, of which the first and most celebrated was that day on which Christ was slain — namely, the fifteenth [day of the] moon, beginning (as has already been said) from the evening of the fourteenth. But that which John adds — that on that day was the Preparation — is not to be interpreted of the parasceve of the Passover, on which the Jews prepared themselves for the eating of the lamb (which was to be immolated toward the evening of the fourteenth [day of the] moon), but of the parasceve of the following Sabbath, which was called "the Sabbath of the Passover," because it had fallen within the paschal week, and was therefore held more celebrated than other sabbaths — as the Evangelist indicates, [margin: John 13.] saying: "For that day of the Sabbath was a great [day]." Wherefore, since that day was festive by a twofold right — both on account of the Sabbath, and on account of the paschal week (which was wholly festive) — there was need also of a great preparation for its celebration. From these [things], then, it is established that Christ completed the supper on the fourteenth day of the month, toward the evening of the Passover — that is, on the fifth day of the week — and instituted the sacrament of his body in that kind of bread on which it was then lawful to feed at the tables of the Jews, namely unleavened, and without any leaven. Preserving which rite, the catholic Church of the Latins, by best right, commands that unleavened bread be consecrated in the sacred mysteries.

Annotation CXI [contents]

"Jesus took bread, and blessed [it]." — Matthew 26[:26]

[margin: With what words Christ consecrated the Eucharist.]

Thomas Cajetan, in the commentary, appends to these words such an elucidation: "Jesus took bread, and blessed [it] with a blessing of praise, not with a blessing of consecration. Which is plain from the fact that both Luke and Paul, in place of 'blessing,' put 'thanksgiving,' which is a blessing of praise." Ambrose [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa, in the first edition of his Annotations, suspects that Cajetan brought this forth because he was uncertain and ambiguous about the form of consecration — that is, by what words Christ consecrated. And he brings forward two causes of [his] suspicion: one, that Cajetan was unwilling that these words be understood of the blessing of consecration, as St. Thomas and very many celebrated doctors have expounded; the other, that although he has so often in his commentaries explained that sentence "This is my body," he has nowhere made even the least mention of the form of consecration which is included in it. Edward Lee condemned this same thing in Erasmus — [namely] that in the Annotations on the New Testament he wrote that it is not to be pertinaciously asserted by what words Christ consecrated, and by what words the priest confects [it], since this is nowhere expressly read; and that those words, "This is my body," seem to be rather [the words] of one handing over bread already consecrated, than of one consecrating the bread.

Mark of Ephesus, bishop; Nicholas Cabasilas, bishop of Thessalonica; and certain other more recent Greeks, who have published explanations on the Liturgy of the Greek Church — although they do not deny that the aforesaid words, "This is my body," are necessary for the sanctification and consecration of the Lord's body — nevertheless deny that these alone suffice for the perfect transmutation of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, unless to these be added certain prayers and blessings handed down by the holy fathers, which, through the invocation of the Holy Spirit, have the power of transmuting the bread and wine into the body and blood of the Lord. Which opinion they also strive to demonstrate from the sacred Liturgies of the holy fathers — namely of James, Basil, and Chrysostom — in which, after the recitation of the Lord's saying "This is my body," there are superadded prayers which, through the imploring of the Divine Spirit, in act complete and perfect the consecration and transmutation of the bread and wine — which had already received, from the utterance of Christ's words, the disposition and power [to that end] — so that by the following supplication of the priest they might be sanctified and turned into the Lord's body. And the formulas of prayers of this kind are these.

(right column:)

James the Apostle, in the Liturgy — or Mass — published by him, prescribed the rite of confecting the Eucharist in this order: "Our Lord Jesus Christ, taking bread into his holy and immortal hands, looking up to heaven and showing [it] to thee, God and Father, giving thanks, sanctifying, breaking, gave [it] to us his disciples and his apostles, saying: 'Unto the remission of sins, and unto eternal life, take and eat: this is my body, which is broken for you, and given for the remission of sins, Amen.' In like manner, after he had supped, taking the cup and mingling [it] of wine and water, and looking up to heaven and showing [it] to thee, God and Father, giving thanks, sanctifying, blessing, filling [it] with the Holy Spirit, he gave [it] to us his disciples, saying: 'Drink ye all of this: this is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for you and for many, and is given for the remission of sins. Do this in my commemoration.'" And after these [words]: "Being therefore mindful, we also sinners, of his life-giving sufferings, offer to thee this awesome and unbloody sacrifice, praying thee, O Lord, that thou send down thy most holy Spirit upon us and upon these holy gifts set forth, that, coming upon [them], he may by his holy and glorious presence sanctify [them], and may make this bread the holy body of thy Christ, Amen; and this cup the precious blood of thy Christ, Amen."

Clement, the third pontiff after Peter, in his Liturgy has [it] in this manner: "The Lord Jesus, on the night in which he was betrayed, taking bread into his holy and immaculate hands, and lifting up [his] eyes to thee, God and his Father, broke [it] and gave [it] to his disciples, saying: 'Take, eat of it: this is my body, which is broken in pieces for many unto the remission of sins.' In like manner also the cup, tempered with wine and water, he sanctified and gave to them, saying: 'Drink ye all of it: this is my blood, which is shed for many. Do this in my commemoration.' Being therefore mindful of his passion, according to his institution we beseech thee, that thou vouchsafe to send thy Holy Spirit upon this

[catchword "hoc" → "...this [sacrifice]," continues on p. 475 (PDF 480).]

(printed p. 475 [PDF p. 480], recto — end of Ann. CXI and the start of Ann. CXII, on Matthew 26 (the words of consecration; the epiclesis harmonized; Druthmar). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CXI, the liturgy of Clement concluding:)

[send thy Holy Spirit upon] this sacrifice, that he may make this bread the body of thy Christ, and this cup the blood of thy Christ."

Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, also — relating in what manner the sacred host is consecrated — writes these [things] in the fifth Mystagogical Catechesis: "We pray the most benign God that he send forth the Holy Spirit upon those [gifts] set forth, that he may make the bread indeed the body of Christ, and the wine the blood of Christ. For altogether, whatever the Holy Spirit touches, this is sanctified and transmuted."

Basil too, in [his] Liturgy, sets down the words of consecration thus: "Christ, on the night on which he delivered himself for the life of the world, taking bread into his holy and immaculate hands, and showing [it] to thee, God and Father, giving thanks, blessing, sanctifying, breaking, gave [it] to the Apostles, saying: 'Take, and eat: this is my body, which is broken for you unto the remission of sins, Amen.' In like manner also the cup, etc." And after these [words]: "Therefore we pray that thy Holy Spirit come upon us, and upon these gifts set forth, and bless them, and sanctify [them], and make this bread indeed the honorable body of the Lord God and our Savior Jesus Christ; but that which is in this cup, the very blood of the Lord God and our Savior Jesus Christ, which was shed for the life of the world."

Chrysostom likewise, after the recitation of the Lord's word "This is my body," uses such a deprecatory [petitionary] consecration: "We pray, we beseech, and we implore that thou send thy Holy Spirit upon us, and upon these gifts set forth; and make this bread indeed the precious body of thy Christ, and that which is in this cup the precious blood of thy Christ, changing [them] by thy Holy Spirit, Amen." From these [things], then, those Greeks maintain that the words of the Lord's consecration, without the prayers of the fathers, do not suffice for the transmutation of the bread and wine into the body of Christ.

But that the mind of the Latins and of the ancient Greeks is one and the same on this matter, Chrysostom clearly demonstrates in the homily On Judas the Traitor, where — teaching that the conversion of the mysteries is accomplished by the word of Christ alone, uttered by the priest — he writes thus: "It is not man that makes the body and blood of Christ, but he who was crucified for us, Christ. The words of Christ are uttered by the mouth of the priest, and by the power and grace of God the [gifts] set forth are consecrated. 'For this,' he says, 'is my body.' By this word the [gifts] set forth are consecrated. And just as that voice which said, 'Increase and multiply, and fill the earth,' was indeed said [but] once, yet through all time it obtains its effect for generation, nature operating [it]; so too that voice [of Christ] was said [but] once, yet through all the tables [altars] of the Church, up to the present day, and up to the coming of Christ, it gives firmness to the sacrifice." To this opinion of Chrysostom accedes the decree of the ecumenical Synod of Florence — received by the consent of all the Latins and Greeks — in these words: "We decree that the Armenians conform themselves to the whole Christian world, and that their priests, in the oblation of the cup, mingle a little water with the wine; using the form of this sacrament, which is the words of the Savior, by which this sacrament is confected. For by the power of these very words the substance of the bread is converted into the body of Christ, and the substance of the wine into the blood — yet in such wise that the whole Christ is contained under the species of bread, and the whole under the species of wine."

(right column:)

But to those [things] which the bishops Mark and Nicholas bring forward, I find a threefold response among the Latins.

First, Gentianus Hervetus, in the preface to the work of Cabasilas translated by him, says that when in the Masses of the Greek fathers, after the utterance of the words of Christ, there is added "Let it become the body, let it become the blood," etc. — it is not to be believed that the conversion then first takes place (which was already made a little before), but that it is [thereby] shown that, although the word of Christ has passed away in [its] utterance, yet the effect of the consecration remains under the symbols, or species, of bread and wine. And he says that a similar manner of speaking is found in Mark, concerning the woman laboring with an issue of blood: who, after she had been healed by Christ through faith and by the touch of the fringe of his garment, nevertheless hears from Christ, "Be [thou] healed of thy plague" — though she had already been healed; that it might be signified that, although the effect of the touch of the fringe had passed, yet the [effect] obtained thence persevered.

Second, John, bishop of Ostuni, in the scholia on Clement, thinks — unless I am mistaken — that these [words] are to be taken by the figure of πρωθύστερον [hysteron-proteron, the latter put first]: that is, that we should understand the Holy Spirit to be invoked then as the operator of a consecration already accomplished and of a conversion already perfected.

Third, Bessarion, Patriarch of Constantinople, expounding these [things], says that the Lord's body is twofold — the true, namely, and the mystical — and that the former is perfectly confected by the words of the Lord himself, whose body it is; but the latter (which is [what] we ourselves are) is completed by the superadded prayers of the fathers, in which, after the transmutation of the bread and wine into the very body of Christ, the priests pray that those standing by the mysteries may, through the worthy reception of the sacrament, be made one body with Christ. Which interpretation those prayers confirm which, immediately after the consecration of the Eucharist, Basil and Chrysostom append in these words: "That we all, who partake of the one bread and cup, may be united together into the communion of the one Holy Spirit; and mayst thou make [us] to receive thy holy body, that we may find mercy and grace in the assembly of all the saints."

Annotation CXII [contents]

"Take, and eat: this is my body," etc. — Matthew 26[:26]

[margin: On the Eucharist.]

Christian Druthmar is reckoned by the Sacramentarian heretics into the number of the ancient fathers, whom they falsely and impudently boast to be defenders of their impiety — because, in the commentary on Matthew, he so declares this sentence that he seems to assert that the Body of Christ is present in the sacrament of the altar no otherwise than in figure. For he writes in this manner: "He gave his disciples the sacrament of his body, unto the remission of sins, and unto the preservation of charity, that, mindful of that deed, they might always do this in figure [as a memorial] of what he was about to do for them; and, that they might not forget this charity, [he said,] 'This is my body' — that is, in the sacrament." And a little after: "As if someone, departing on a journey, leaves to those who love him a certain bond of love, to this end, that they do these [things] every day, that they may not forget him:

[catchword "ita" → "...so [too]," continues on p. 476 (PDF 481).]

(printed p. 476 [PDF p. 481], verso — end of Ann. CXII and Ann. CXIII–CXV, on Matthew 26 (Druthmar vindicated; wine and water in the chalice; Gethsemane; may Christians war?). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the Druthmar citation of Annotation CXII:)

so the Lord commanded us to do — spiritually transferring [his] body into the bread, [and] into the wine [his] blood — that by these two [things] we might commemorate what he did with his body and blood, and might not be ungrateful for so most-loving a charity." Know, Christian reader, that this passage has been shamefully and dangerously mutilated and corrupted — whether by the ignorance of copyists, or by the negligence of printers, or by the fraud of heretics; which I detected not by empty conjecture, but from the genuine and entire reading of a most ancient codex, which I inspected at Lyon, [in] manuscript, in the Library of the Franciscans. For in place of what the codices printed in Germany have — "This is my body, that is, in the sacrament" — the Lyon exemplar has more: "This is my body, that is, truly subsisting in the sacrament." Again, where in the printed volumes we read, "spiritually transferring [his] body into the bread, [and his] blood into the wine," in the Lyon [manuscript] it reads: "transferring the bread into [his] body, and the wine into [his] blood." I am not unaware that the words of this author, even as they have been published by the printers, can most easily be vindicated from the usurpation of the heretics. But since they themselves, restored to their integrity, most clearly show that the pious mind of the author abhors the madness of these [heretics], I have judged [it] superfluous to bring forward here any other interpretation.

Annotation CXIII [contents]

"I will not drink of this fruit of the vine." — Matthew 26[:29]

[margin: Whether wine — or water — alone is to be used in the sacred mysteries.]

Chrysostom, homily 83, in the exposition of that sentence, brings forward these words: "For what reason did Christ drink, after the resurrection, not water, but wine? He wished to pluck up by the roots a certain pernicious heresy — [of those] who use water in the mysteries; so that he might show that, both when he delivered this mystery, he delivered wine, and when after the resurrection he used wine at the bare table of the mystery. And he says 'of the fruit of the vine,' which certainly produces wine, not water." From these words, badly understood, the Armenian heretics used wine alone in the mysteries. Against whom the universal council — surnamed "in Trullo," celebrated under Justinian — in canon 32 decrees thus: "Since we have learned that in the region of the Armenians they offer only wine on the sacred table, not mingling water with it — [they] who perform the unbloody sacrifice, pretexting the doctor of the Church, John Chrysostom, on account of these words in the interpretation of Matthew, 'For what reason did Christ [drink] not water, but wine,' etc.; by which words they think that Christ forbids the oblation of water in the holy sacrifice — [therefore], that these may be freed from [their] ignorance, we open up the mind of that father orthodoxly, saying that he wished to subvert the ancient and depraved heresy of the Hydroparastatae [water-offerers], who used water alone instead of wine in the sacrifice. If, therefore, any bishop or presbyter does not offer wine mingled with water in the sacrifice, let him be deposed."

Annotation CXIV [contents]

"He began to be sorrowful and heavy." — Matthew 26[:37]

[margin: Whether Christ truly feared for himself, and truly prayed for himself.]

Hilary, canon 31 on Matthew, hints that Christ neither truly feared for himself, nor truly grieved [nor truly prayed for himself], but for his own [disciples]. And he uses these words:

(right column:)

"And having taken Peter, James, and John, he began to be sorrowful. Therefore he is not sorrowful before he takes [them], and all the fear began to be for them, [they] being taken up; and thus the sadness arose not from him, but from those whom he had taken up. And below: Finally he says, 'My soul is sorrowful even unto death.' Does he say, 'My soul is sorrowful on account of [my] death'? Certainly not so. For if there was fear about death, it ought surely to be referred to that [death] through which it existed. But it is one thing to fear up to a point, another to fear on account of it. Again, a little after: The whole fear, therefore, was over those who were about to suffer. And therefore, because it is not possible that he should not suffer, he prays for those who were about to suffer after him, saying, 'Let the cup pass from me' — that is, as it is drunk by me, so let it be drunk by these without distrust of hope, without sense of pain, without fear of death." The Master of the Sentences interprets this passage, book 3, distinction 17; whose interpretation, seek above, Annotation 186 of book 5.

Jerome, book 4 on Matthew, expounding the beginning of chapter 26, seems to subscribe to Hilary, when he says: "Let them blush who think that the Savior feared death, and out of dread of the passion said, 'Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me.'" See Annotation 183 of book 5.

Annotation CXV [contents]

"Put back thy sword into its place." — Matthew 26[:52]

[margin: Whether it is lawful for Christians to make war.]

Euthymius, in the exposition of this passage, seems to affirm that no right of war — not even for the defense of the Christian religion — is granted to clerics, saying: "When he had rebuked him — namely Peter — he taught that the sword must not be used, even for defending God. And by 'the sword' he forbade all arms."

John Ferus, in the fourth book of the commentary on Matthew, following the same opinion, writes that all faculty of making war is forbidden not only to clerics, but even to laymen, in these words: "By this word Christ teaches three [things]. First, that the gospel is to be defended not by secular arms, not by human help, but that its defense is to be committed to God. Thus Paul: 'The weapons of our warfare are not carnal.' [margin: 1 Cor. 10.] Thus Christ used no sword. Secondly, in Matthew he says: 'You have heard that it was said, An eye for an eye; but I say to you, Love your enemies.' [margin: Matt. 5.] Thirdly, here he specially forbids to the Apostles the external sword. For they have, and ought to have, the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God. [margin: Eph. 6.] Hence Isaiah foretells that the battle of the Apostles will be as in the day of Midian — that is, as Gideon conquered the Midianites not by arms, but by trumpets and the crashing of pitchers: [margin: Isa. 9; Judg. 7.] so the Apostles were about to do, spiritually."

John Henten, the translator and scholiast of Euthymius, judges that Euthymius speaks not of the public, but of the private person. For it is lawful for no one — except the magistrate and his ministers — to use the sword by right. But as for those [things] which Ferus reasons for the assertion of his dogma, see what we have written below, Annotation 156.

[catchword "An-" → "An[notatio CXVI]," continues on p. 477 (PDF 482).]

(printed p. 477 [PDF p. 482], recto — Ann. CXVI–CXIX, on Matthew 26 ("buy swords"; adjuring demons; Peter's denial; the Novatian error). Read order: left column, then right.)

Annotation CXVI [contents]

"They who take the sword shall perish by the sword." — Matthew 26[:52]
[margin: On war.]

Chrysostom, homily 85 on Matthew, [says]: "That they might more easily believe that he was [to be] betrayed, he therefore said to them, 'Buy swords' — not encouraging [them] to strike, but that he might set the prediction before [their] eyes." Erasmus, in the annotations on Luke, uses these words for the confirmation of his dogma — by which he teaches that every kind of war is forbidden to Christians. The refutation of which error you have below, Annotation 156.

Annotation CXVII [contents]

"I adjure thee by the living God," etc. — Matthew 26[:63]
[margin: Whether it is lawful for exorcists to adjure demons.]

Origen, treatise 35 on Matthew — [of those] which we have — narrating this, seems to explode from the Church of Christ the rite of the exorcists, who adjure demons with sacred conjurations. For he speaks in this manner: "Someone will ask whether it is fitting to adjure demons. He who looks to the many who have dared to do such [things], will say that this is done not without reason. But he who looks to Jesus — not only commanding the demons, but also giving power to his disciples over all demons, and to heal infirmities — will say that to adjure demons is not according to the power given by the Savior: for it is a Jewish [thing]." St. Thomas, in the Secunda Secundae, question 90, article 2, observing this passage, says that there are two kinds of adjuration: one deprecatory, by which malefactors and enchanters allure demons to their wishes by prayers and sacred ceremonies — and this Origen rightly condemns, because it requires benevolence and a close bond with the demons; the other kind is compulsive, by which — through the power of the divine name — Christian exorcists, every superstition and malice being set aside, adjure demons and expel [them] from possessed bodies. You have, in this very treatise, a little before the sentence [just] adduced, certain words which seem to take from Christians every faculty of swearing; concerning which see above, Annotation 26.

Annotation CXVIII [contents]

"He began to curse and to swear, [saying,] I know not the man." — Matthew 26[:74]
[margin: Whether Peter denied that Christ is God.]

Hilary, canon 31 on Matthew, on that sentence — "My soul is sorrowful even unto death" — speaking of Peter's denial, seems to signify that he did not deny God, but [only] man. For thus he says: "Christ knew that the disciples would be terrified, put to flight, [and] would deny him. But because the blasphemy of the Spirit is remitted neither here nor in eternity, he feared lest they deny [him to be] God — [him] whom they were about to behold beaten, spat upon, and crucified. Which reasoning was preserved in Peter: who, when he was about to deny, denied thus: 'I know not the man' — because 'anything said against the Son of man shall be forgiven.'" [margin: Matt. 12.] And below, in canon 32, expounding that [saying] "I know not the man," the same [Hilary] more clearly repeats [it] in this manner: "But it must be carefully considered under what condition Peter denied — although this has been treated above. For first he says that he does not understand what [the accuser] means; in the next [denial], that he did not adhere to him; but in the third, that he does not know the man. And truly he was now almost without sin denying [to be] a man [him] whom he had, as the first, acknowledged [to be] the Son of God: yet because, from the infirmity of the flesh, he had shown himself even ambiguous, he wept most bitterly — recalling the fault of that trepidation, and that he had not been able to avoid [it] even [though] forewarned." Again, in the exposition of Psalm 52, he so excuses Peter as to say that in this denial he did not lose faith, but preserved the firm and unshaken constancy of believing. This same [thing] Ambrose seems to hold, in the commentaries on Luke; and Pope Leo, Sermon 9 On the Lord's Passion; and Bernard. Read above, Annotation 183 of book 5.

Annotation CXIX [contents]

"And immediately the cock crew; and going out, he wept bitterly." — Matthew 26[:74–75]

[margin: Whether it is possible that those who have denied Christ should return to repentance and obtain pardon.]

(right column:)

Origen, treatise 35 on Matthew, discoursing on these words, seems to maintain that it is impossible that those who — after receiving the grace and faith of the evangelical preaching — have denied Christ, should again return to repentance and obtain pardon of [their] offense. Which error was condemned in the Novatians. His words are read in this manner: "But perhaps all men too, when they deny Jesus — in such wise that the sin of their denial may receive healing — are seen to deny him before cockcrow, the Sun of justice not yet having risen for them, nor his rising drawing near to them. But if, after the rising of such a Sun to the soul, we sin willingly, after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there no longer remains for us a sacrifice for sin, but a terrible judgment, and the zeal of fire, which shall consume the enemies. [margin: Heb. 10.] And in Peter, indeed, then denying, it was not fitting to say, 'How do you not think that they deserve worse punishments, who have trodden under foot the Son of God, and have esteemed the blood of the testament — by which they were sanctified — [as] common, and have done injury to the Spirit of grace?' [margin: Heb. 10.] For Peter had not yet been sanctified by the blood of Christ, which was the blood of the New Testament; nor did he do injury to the Spirit of grace, which he had not from the beginning even received: since Jesus had not yet been glorified, nor was the Holy Spirit [yet] in men. [margin: John 7.] But if in us this impious sin of denial should be committed, it is fitting to say all these [things]; since we too have been sanctified in the blood of the testament, and have received the Spirit of grace. Therefore, to esteem [as] common the most precious blood of the testament, and to do injury to the Spirit of grace, is worse than all sins — so that we can receive remission neither in this world nor in the [world] to come, if we deny the Son of God. Since, therefore, the night has gone before us, and the day has drawn near, and the sign of the day — the cockcrow — has sounded for us: therefore let us stand, striving against sin even unto blood, and for the sake of charity; let us bear all [things], never falling away, that with the perfect we may obtain the inheritance therein. And attend to this: that before cockcrow, and before the Holy Spirit, in the time of the deep night, even if one has frequently denied, he can [still] live — which is manifest from the fact that Peter denied thrice. But if, after cockcrow, [even] once, being set in any danger, one has denied: it is impossible for him to be renewed unto repentance, [margin: Heb. 6.] so as again to crucify to himself the Son of

(printed p. 478 [PDF p. 483], verso — end of Ann. CXIX and Ann. CXX–CXXI, on Matthew 27 (Judas's death; clerical possessions). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the Origen citation of Annotation CXIX:)

to himself the Son of God." Thus far Origen — who is believed to have drunk in this error from the school of Clement of Alexandria, his teacher. For he [Clement], in the second book of the Stromata, seems to admit only two penances throughout the whole of life — one before baptism, the other after — but by no means more. However, it is credible that both Clement and Origen did not wish to deny penance to the lapsed, but wished to deter [men] from sinning by relapse, by these sayings. But to those [things] which Origen brings forth from the epistle to the Hebrews against a repeated penance, you have the response in book 7, in the confutation of the eighth heresy, objection 2.

Annotation CXX [contents]

"And going away, he hanged himself with a noose." — Matthew 27[:5]
[margin: Whether Judas died by hanging in a noose.]

Euthymius, in the commentaries on Matthew, asserts that Judas did not die by hanging in a noose, but that — before he was choked — he was taken down by certain [persons] who recognized him; and that he at last, after some time, perished, burst by a fall, his intestines poured out — the conjecture [being] taken from the fact that Luke, in the first chapter of Acts, writes that Judas possessed a field from the reward of iniquity, and that, being made prone [falling headlong], he burst asunder in the middle, and his bowels were poured out — which kind of death does not pertain to one hanged. The contrary opinion Origen, Chrysostom, Augustine, Bede, and all the Latins hold, who write that Judas was choked by the noose. Read below, Annotation 222.

Annotation CXXI [contents]

"And they took the thirty pieces of silver, and gave them for the potter's field." — Matthew 27[:6–7]
[margin: Whether it is lawful for clerics to have possessions of temporal things.]

Chrysostom, homily 86 on Matthew, taking occasion from these words, seems to deplore, with a long complaint, the calamity of the prelates and pastors of the Church — that they possess villas, houses, possessions, and wealth of gold and silver; which, he says, it would have been much better [for them] to be retained by laymen than by clerics; because priests and bishops cannot follow Christ unless — the possessions of the churches being left [behind] — they are freed from all secular care. His words run thus: "Let it come into your mind that eight thousand Levites were wont to feed [support] the Jews, and with these the widows and the orphans deprived of parents; but now [they possess] fields, houses, rentals of buildings, vehicles, horses, mules, and many other such [things] on your account; and the Church possesses [them] to your reproach. For it behooved you to retain this treasure of the Church, and [for] the Church to obtain no small fruits from your devotion. But now two evils are committed: for both you, as though you ought to give nothing, contribute nothing; and the priests of God handle [things] foreign to the priesthood. Could not houses and fields be possessed by the Church even in the time of the Apostles? For what reason, then, did they [the faithful], selling [them], offer the money? Because that was assuredly much better. And below: That evangelical [word], 'Go, and sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor, and follow me,' etc., [margin: Luke 18.] can now opportunely — and deservedly — be said to the presidents of the Church, on account of the broad possessions of the Church. For we cannot follow Christ otherwise, unless we are devoid of all grosser and secular care. But now — alas for the grief! — the priests of God attend to the vintage and the harvest, and to the selling and buying of the fruits," etc.

(right column:)

This same opinion he repeats more lucidly in homily 15 on the first [epistle] to Timothy, where it reads thus: "It behooves that necessary sustenance be abundantly furnished to the teachers, lest they fail, or be dissolved [in spirit], nor — occupied with the least [things] — deprive themselves and others of the great [things]; so that they may work spiritual [things], having no account of secular [matters]. Of this kind were the Levites — who had no care of secular things, as the laity [do]. To these laity too the care of the Levites was committed, and by the law revenues were established for them — tithes, gold, first-fruits, vows, and very many other [things]. But those [things] were deservedly permitted to them by the law, [as] seeking only present and earthly [things]. But I would boldly say that the prelates of the Church ought to have nothing beyond food and clothing, lest [their] desires be drawn to those [things]." Thus far Chrysostom.

To whom Jerome seems to subscribe, in the little book On the Life of Clerics to Nepotian, saying thus: "Let the cleric, who serves the Church of Christ, first interpret his own name; and, the definition of the name being set forth, let him strive to be what he is called. For if cleros in Greek is called 'lot' in Latin: therefore they are called 'clerics' — either because they are of the lot [portion] of the Lord, or because the Lord himself is the lot, that is, the portion of the clerics. But he who is either himself the portion of the Lord, or has the Lord [as his] portion, ought so to show himself that he both possesses the Lord and is possessed by the Lord. He who possesses the Lord, and says with the prophet, [margin: Ps. 72.] 'The Lord is my portion,' can have nothing outside the Lord. But if he shall have anything else besides the Lord, the Lord will not be his portion. For example, if [he have] gold, if silver, if possessions, if varied furniture: with these portions, the Lord will not deign to become his portion. But if I am the portion of the Lord, and the measuring-cord of his inheritance, I do not receive a portion among the other tribes; but, like a Levite and priest, I live from the tithes; and, serving the altar, I am sustained by the oblation of the altar: having food and clothing, with these I will be content; and, naked, I will follow the naked Cross." Thus Jerome. The more recent heretics object and cast these words in our teeth, and by them at the same time animate and inflame avaricious princes to reduce the plundered possessions of the Church and the goods of the clerics into the Treasury, and turn [them] to their own uses.

But if, all hatred removed, they would weigh the sayings of both authors with a pious mind, they will recognize that Chrysostom did not condemn the possession of riches in clerics, but rather the cause on account of which bishops and clerics were compelled to possess and administer riches. This was the inclemency and cruelty of the rich of that age; who, in order to free themselves from the assiduous and burdensome solicitude of finding, providing, handling, and distributing those [things] which would suffice for the daily uses of the clerics and for the other necessities of the poor, had assigned to the prelates of the Church certain estates and farms, and had driven them to procure, from the care and administration of these, the necessaries of life for themselves and for the other poor of the people. This indignity Chrysostom deservedly reprehends —

[catchword "sto-" → "Chryso[stom]," continues on p. 479 (PDF 484).]

(printed p. 479 [PDF p. 484], recto — end of Ann. CXXI and Ann. CXXII, on Matthew 27 (clerical possessions; whether Calvary is Adam's tomb). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CXXI, Sixtus expounding Chrysostom:)

[Chrysostom], judging it unjust that clerics should be compelled, on account of temporal ministries and the bodily care of the poor, to relinquish the offices of spiritual and sacerdotal functions. Which the Apostles too once complained of, saying, "It is not right for us to leave the word of God, and to serve tables." [margin:

Acts 6.] But if that blessed pontiff [Chrysostom] therefore blames the rich of his time — not because they had given riches to the Church, but because they had given with a mind too little benevolent and grateful, [and] with this end, namely, to free themselves from the tedium and irksomeness of feeding the clerics and the poor — with what mind, with what tongue, with what words do you think he would have deplored, and at the same time detested, if he had lived in this our age, the most wicked princes and tyrants of the heretical factions? — who, to fill the desire of their insatiable avarice, have despoiled the temples of the saints of their treasures, [and] plundered the wealth of the Church (which of old catholic princes had given to the bishops and clerics, either for [their] necessity or for the honor of [their] life), and have reduced the ecclesiastical caretakers to misery and extreme want. But this is not the place for deploring such [things]: we are writing annotations, not declaiming.

But as regards Jerome: St. Thomas, in the latter part of the second volume of the Summa Theologica, question 185, sifting his words, says that he pronounced these [things] not against clerics who use the possession of riches rightly, but against those who abuse the possession of them — so cleaving to their wealth that they neglect the pursuit of piety, and abandon the worship of God and the care of spiritual [things], which ought to be the chief and prior solicitude of all bishops and clerics. There are also [those] who think that Jerome, by these words, gave the clerics not a precept, but a counsel; and that, in exaggerating this counsel, he strove to draw the clerics to that side [of possessing nothing], so that they might at least settle in the middle, and be content with a moderate use of riches — speaking after the manner of those who demand the extremes in order to obtain the moderate; and following the example of those who violently twist to the right a tree bent to the left, so that it, thence returning of its own accord to the middle, may rise up into the straight height of the trunk. Nor do I think it should be passed over here [what] St. Thomas, in the place mentioned above, noted — that there were of old [those] who thought that it is not lawful for clerics, and especially for bishops, to possess riches, on account of the height of supreme perfection which they profess; whom he, rejecting [them] as inept, says [that] it is not necessary that, where there is greater perfection of life, there [too] be greater poverty — since at the very summit of perfect sanctity there can be the greatest opulence. For Abraham — to whom it was said by God, "Walk before me, and be perfect," etc. — and very many other most perfect men flourished in a great affluence of riches. To this Annotation are to be recalled certain words of Origen from homily 15 on Leviticus, together with the sayings of Hilary from the exposition of Psalm 118, which seem to exclude clerics from the possession of secular things. These you have [in] Annotation 200 of book 5.

(right column:)

Annotation CXXII [contents]

"They came to the place called Golgotha, which is the place of Calvary [the Skull]." — Matthew 27[:33]

[margin: Whether Adam was buried on Mount Calvary.]

Origen, treatise 35 on Matthew, seems to refer the cause why that place was called "of Calvary" to the skull of Adam, the first parent, buried there; concerning which he brings forth this: "The place of Calvary is said to have [this] dispensation — that there should die [he] who was about to die for men. For a certain tradition of this kind has come to me: that the body of Adam, the first man, is buried there, where Christ was crucified — so that, as in Adam all die, so in Christ all may be made alive: that in that place, which is called 'the place of Calvary,' that is, 'the place of the head,' Adam, the head of the human race, may find resurrection, together with the whole people, through the resurrection of the Savior, who there suffered and rose again." Epiphanius, at the end of the first book against heresies, explaining this matter more fully, wrote thus: "One may wonder that our Lord Jesus Christ was crucified in Golgotha, and nowhere else than where the body of Adam lay. For, having gone out from Paradise, he [Adam] afterward departed thither, and, in this place — namely of Jerusalem — paying the debt of nature, was there buried in the place [of] Golgotha. Whence it deservedly had the surname 'of Calvary,' because the skull and relics of Adam, the first-formed man, were there. Christ, therefore, in a riddle showed forth our salvation, when — crucified there — he began with his blood to besprinkle the relics of the first father from the beginning of the human mass [race], that he might show us the besprinkling of his blood made unto the cleansing of the whole human defilement. Wherefore here too was fulfilled that which was said, 'Rise, thou that sleepest, and rise again from the dead, and Christ shall enlighten thee.'" Very many embrace this ancient narration as most true — among others especially Athanasius, in the book On the Lord's Passion; Cyprian, in the sermon On the Resurrection; Ambrose, in book 5 of the Letters, letter 19, and on Luke chapter 23; Theophylact, on Matthew chapter 27, and on Mark chapter 15, and on Luke 23, and on John chapter 19; Euthymius too, on chapter 27 of Matthew; and many others, whom for brevity's sake I pass over. Jerome, exploding this kind of tradition as fabulous, spoke thus in the fourth book on Matthew: "I have heard someone expound the place of Calvary [to be that] in which Adam was buried, and [that] it was so called because the head of the ancient man was buried there; and that this is [what] the Apostle says, 'Rise, thou that sleepest, and rise from the dead, and Christ shall enlighten thee.' A favorable interpretation, soothing the ears of the people, yet not true. For outside the city, and beyond the gate, are the places in which the heads of the condemned are cut off; and therefore the Lord was crucified there, that where before was the ground of the condemned, there the standards of martyrdom might be raised. But if anyone shall wish to contend that he was crucified there so that his blood might trickle upon the tomb of Adam: let us ask him why the other thieves too were crucified in the same place. From which it appears that Calvary is not the sepulcher of the first man, but signifies the place of the beheaded; that where sin abounded, grace might super-abound. But Adam we read to have been buried near near Hebron and Arbee, in [the book of] Joshua, son of Nun, we read." Thus far Jerome — who repeats the same in book 3 of the commentary on the epistle to the Ephesians.

[signature "Rr 2"; catchword "ta" → "...near [Hebron]," continues on p. 480 (PDF 485).]

(printed p. 480 [PDF p. 485], verso — end of Ann. CXXII and Ann. CXXIII–CXXVII, on Matthew 27 (the darkness; the lance before death?; the divinity's withdrawal; Mary of James). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the Jerome citation of Annotation CXXII:)

Annotation CXXIII [contents]

"And they gave him wine to drink mingled with gall." — Matthew 27[:34]
[margin: On the oath.]

Athanasius, in the treatise On the Passion of the Lord, expounding these [words], seems to take away from Christians the faculty of swearing, in whatever cause, even a just one. You have this noted above, Annotation 26.

Annotation CXXIV [contents]

"But from the sixth hour there was darkness over the whole earth, until the ninth hour." — Matthew 27[:45]
[margin: Whether the darkness, at Christ's death, happened over the whole world.]

Origen, treatise 35 on Matthew, reports that the darkness which happened while Christ suffered was not made over the whole globe of the lands, but only over the whole land of Judaea; and, again, that that darkness was not an eclipse, but an obscuration and hiding [of the sun] by clouds set before the Sun. This opinion he expresses in these words: "As the other signs, which were made in the Passion of the Lord, were made only in Jerusalem, so also the darkness was made only over the whole land of Judaea, until the ninth hour. But [as to] what I say, that in Jerusalem only these [things] were done — that the veil of the temple was rent, that the earth quaked, that the rocks were split, that the tombs were opened: for neither outside Judaea were rocks split, nor other tombs opened, save only those which were in Jerusalem, or perhaps in the land of Judaea. Nor did any other land tremble then, save the land of Jerusalem. For it is not related anywhere that every element of the earth trembled in that time, so that they should feel [it] — for example, those who were in Ethiopia, and in India, and in Scythia. And if it had been done, without doubt it would be found in some of the histories of those who wrote in [their] chronicles any new events." And a little after he adds: "The darkness was not made by a failing [eclipse] of the Sun then over all Judaea; for the Evangelists did not name the Sun in this place, but only [say] that darkness was made, the Sun not being named. It is consequent [therefore] to understand that certain most dark clouds ran together over the land of Judaea to cover the rays of the Sun."

Bede the Younger [Bede of the Nativity], in the volume of his Annotations, condemned this opinion in Erasmus, as adverse to the judgment of Augustine and of Dionysius the Areopagite — of whom the former, in book 2 On the Marvels of Divine Scripture, relates that in the earthquake of the Lord's Passion eleven cities in Thrace fell; but the latter, in the epistle to Polycarp, testifies that he, at Heliopolis, a city of Egypt, together with the philosopher Apollophanes, beheld, at midday of the Lord's Passion, horrible darkness poured around the globe of the Sun.

Annotation CXXV [contents]

"Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?" — Matthew 27[:46]

[margin: Whether Christ was struck by the lance before he was dead.]

Chrysostom, homily 89 on Matthew, after the exposition of these words, subjoins the following words of Matthew in this manner: "'For they thought,' he says, 'that Elijah was being called by him; and they at once gave him vinegar to drink; but another, coming near, with a lance

(right column — continuing Annotation CXXV:)

opened his side.' Then, having set forth the explanation of these words, he again subjoins from the same Evangelist: 'But Jesus, crying with a great voice, gave up the spirit.'" A certain uncertain [anonymous] scholiast of Cornelius Agrippa abuses this reading of Chrysostom for the confirmation of a detestable error, which the same Cornelius left written in the book On the Vanity of Sciences, chapter 100 — affirming that Matthew the Evangelist erred, when he said that Christ was struck by the lance before he expired, against the authority of John, who related that he was pierced with the lance after death. Wishing to defend this vanity of Agrippa, that scholiast builds [the claim], from the adduced reading of Chrysostom, that the present passage stood thus in the codices of Matthew, and that Chrysostom read and expounded it in this manner. But since this reading is nowhere found in Matthew — neither in the exemplars of the Greeks, nor of the Latins — nor did any of the ancient expositors make any mention of this matter, it must be admitted that these words, together with the exposition of Chrysostom, were transposed by the carelessness of copyists; especially since the author himself, in this very place, asserts that the side of Christ, [when] entirely dead, was wounded; and repeats this same [thing] in homily 84 on John, explaining that [text], "One of the soldiers with a lance opened his side." I suspect that Agrippa — most zealous for heretical dogmas — took the occasion of this rash assertion not from the Gospel of Matthew, where no mention of this matter exists, but from the ravings of Peter John the Minorite [Olivi]; who — as Guido, bishop of Elne, is witness in the book Against Heresies — first published this error with foolish zeal. For he, when he was expounding the Passion and death of Christ in a public sermon, feigned that Christ, while still living, was wounded by the lance — that, by the amplification of Christ's sufferings, he might stir up the people more and more to mercy and weeping. And since he afterward persevered in obstinately defending this opinion, he was at last condemned in the Council of Vienne. The condemnation of this error stands in the first book of the Clementine sanctions, title 1.

Annotation CXXVI [contents]

"My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" — Matthew 27[:46]

[margin: Whether the divinity was separated from the humanity of the dying Christ.]

Hilary, canon 33 on Matthew, seems to write that the divinity withdrew from the humanity of the dying Christ, when he says: "But the cry to God is the voice of the body, attesting the separation of the Word of God departing from it. Finally, why he is forsaken, he cries out, saying, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' But he is forsaken because he was a man, to be brought through even to death." In this opinion Ambrose too is reckoned to be, in book 10 of the commentaries on Luke. Consult Annotation 164 of this book.

Annotation [unnumbered] [contents]

"Mary [the mother] of James, and the mother of Joses, etc." — Matthew 27[:56]

[margin: Whether she who is called by the Evangelist the mother of James and Joses was the mother of Christ.]

Chrysostom, homily 89 on Matthew, in certain exemplars — both Greek and Latin — has, in the exposition of this passage, some words signifying that Mary, who here by the Evangeli-

> [the heading is printed "ANNOTATIO □ □" — two cross-marks where the numeral should stand, a compositor's lapse; since the next annotation is printed "CXXVII," this one is left effectively unnumbered in the print. Catchword "geli-" → "...Evangeli[st]," continues on p. 481 (PDF 486).]

(printed p. 481 [PDF p. 486], recto — end of the (cross-marked) Mary-of-James annotation and Ann. CXXVII–CXXVIII, on Mark (the Apostles' fishing; monastic traditions — Cajetan vs. Catharinus). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the (cross-marked) annotation on Mary of James and Joseph:)

by the Evangelist is called the mother of James and Joses, is Mary the mother of Christ. But since this opinion can easily be bent toward the heresy of Helvidius — who asserts that Mary, after the birth of Christ, bore other sons — I judge those exemplars [to have been] corrupted by heretics; although there are not lacking [those] who defend these words of the homily, saying that Mary is called mother of James and Joses not according to truth, but according to dispensation [economy] — because these were the sons of Joseph, the spouse of Mary, by another wife. Chief among these is Theophylact, who in the commentaries on this passage speaks thus: "But he calls Mary the Mother of God the mother of James and Joses. For James and Joses were sons of Joseph by his former wife; yet, because the Mother of God was called the wife of Joseph, [she was called] mother — that is, stepmother." He repeats this same [thing], expounding Mark chapter 15, Luke 24, and John 19. But Euthymius, in the commentaries on the gospels, refutes a defense of this kind, writing thus: "Since there were many [women], he enumerates the more notable. Certain [people], then, say that the Mother of God is she who among the Evangelists is now indeed named mother of James and Joses, but sometimes 'Mary of James,' and at times 'Mary of Joses.' For these were the sons of Joseph; and just as their father was called her husband, on account of the dispensation, so again these [are called] sons of the Virgin. But this saying seems absurd. For, first, what forbade [him] to call her mother of Jesus? — especially since in the preceding narrations he had for the most part so called her. Then it would also be absurd that, in the following passages, Magdalene should everywhere be set before her, and that she [Magdalene] should be shown to have been more fervent than the Mother of God. Whence we suspect that this was some other Mary, who was mother of James the Less and of Joses — not of the sons of Joseph, but of others, who were of the seventy disciples; for there were many of such similar name among the Jews. But it is likely that the Mother of God then stood nearer to the cross than the other women — and that by the burning of [her] heart [bowels] overcoming fear; and perhaps also she went about, since on account of the goads of nature she could not remain in the same place; and afterward she remained by the sepulcher, and beheld each thing. But if we accept this, it must be asked why the Evangelists did not mention her. Because it was known concerning her that she was present, and did what belongs to mothers; and therefore they did not [even] write of her lamentation — for they amply satisfied [us] by declaring that she followed the Son as he taught. But it behooves [us] both to know this and that, and to accept what is more conformable to nature." Jerome, in the book Against Helvidius, discourses at length upon this saying of Matthew, against that same Helvidius, who abused the testimony of the Evangelist.

Annotation CXXVII [contents]

"He saw Simon and Andrew casting their nets into the sea, etc." — Mark 1[:16]
[margin: The fishing of the Apostles.]

The author of the explanation on Mark ascribed to Chrysostom, expounding this in homily 4, is censured by Godefridus Tilmannus, because he asserted that it is not written in the gospel that the Apostles, fishing before the Passion of the Lord, ever caught anything; whereas nevertheless it is read in Luke chapter 5 that the disciples, before the death of Christ — at the command of the (right column — continuing Annotation CXXVII:)

Lord — took so great a multitude of fish that the nets were breaking.

Annotation CXXVIII [contents]

"He commanded them that they should take nothing on the way." — Mark 6[:8]
[margin: On monastic traditions.]

Thomas Cajetan, when in explaining he had come to this passage, brought forward these [things]: "It is discordant with the whole evangelical doctrine to give commands about food, drink, clothing, beard, hair, and the like, which are indifferent [things] — as being a matter unworthy of so great and so eminent a Teacher; and [so] that by this we may recognize him to be God, who made all things, whom all things serve, to whom none of these [things] is displeasing, who gave to all the nations in the whole world laws suited to each and all, burdensome to none, nowhere and at no time in need [of exception]." Ambrose [Ambrosius Catharinus], in the second book of the Annotations, inveighs against these [statements] thus: "These, to speak most sparingly, are assuredly false, and consonant with the pernicious dogmas of heretics. For if these [things] are indifferent, and are not of care to God: why did God from the beginning command Adam that he should abstain from it [the tree]? and why is John praised for [his] contempt of foods? And if these indifferent [things] stand apart from evangelical doctrine: why did the Lord in the gospel so greatly extol John concerning the rough manner of [his] clothing, obliquely censuring the softer [sort], when he said, 'Behold, they that are clothed in soft [garments] are in the houses of kings'? If the Lord is not solicitous about dress: why does he blame the rich man who clothed himself in purple and fine linen? [margin: Matt. 7; Matt. 19.] why does Paul praise those who were covered with sheepskins? and command women not to adorn themselves with braided hair, gold, pearls, and precious clothing? He added also that the Lord commanded nothing about beard and hair: but the chiefs of the Apostles mentioned this — of whom the one blames outward hairdressing, the other braided locks, and asserts it a reproach for a man to nourish [long] hair. It is credible that it came from the traditions of the Apostles that clerics are shorn, and the hair shaved on the crown. Therefore these [things] do not so greatly differ from the evangelical doctrine which evangelical and apostolic men so greatly cared for. Yet I confess that Jesus was unwilling to make explicit discourse about those [things] which could more conveniently be taught by his disciples, and be determined by special traditions. But what is it that he says — that the Lord did not give such precepts, so that we might recognize him to be God, who made all things, whom all things serve? As though God were not, even to that degree, known in the Old Testament — [God] who commanded many such [things], and baser [ones], and without doubt indifferent. And what is it that he adds — 'to whom none of these [things] is displeasing'? nay, we see [them] to be displeasing. And what also is it that he added — that he gave laws burdensome to none? Not, then, is the way narrow that leads to life! The disciples call the law of marriage hard, even with Christ himself approving [it]; and Christ himself says [it] is difficult for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven; [margin: Acts 14.] and Paul, 'Through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God.' And now we have heard [that] the laws of the Lord are burdensome to none. It is true — yet indeed to those who love God, to whom nothing is so difficult and arduous but that it becomes easy and passable, the laws of Christ are not burdensome. Nor is that true which he perniciously subjoined — that all the commandments of the Lord suit all men. For Jerome says:"

[margin: Read Annotation 244, book 6. Signature "Rr 3"; catchword "ait" → "Jerome says," continues on p. 482 (PDF 487).]

(printed p. 482 [PDF p. 487], verso — end of Ann. CXXVIII and Ann. CXXIX–CXXXII, on Mark (pseudo-Chrysostom slips; the "third hour"; the last chapter of Mark). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CXXVIII, the Jerome citation adduced by Catharinus:)

says: "It is not commanded to all, that they should not have two tunics, nor food in a wallet, money in [their] belts, a staff in [their] hand, a sandal on [their] feet — [but rather] that they should sell all [things], and give to the poor. And Peter not rashly asks: 'Lord, dost thou speak this parable to us, or to all?' — knowing that the same [things] are not commanded to all, on account of the diverse states and offices." Although the modern heretics wickedly and impiously confound these [things].

Annotation CXXIX [contents]

"And after six days, Jesus took Peter, etc." — Mark 9[:2]

The author of the exposition on Mark, which is called Chrysostom's, homily 10, warns that in the gospel according to Matthew it is written, "And it came to pass on the eighth day"; but in Mark, "After six days" — which is certainly not so. For what he says is had in Matthew, that [rather] stands in Luke chapter 9. This error — of whatever kind, whether arisen from a lapse of the author's memory, or from the carelessness of the copyist — Godefridus Tilmannus, the scholiast of this author, noted.

Annotation CXXX [contents]

"When he had entered into the temple, he began to cast out those selling and buying." — Mark 11[:15]

[margin: On the history of those selling in the temple.]

The author of the narration on Mark, bearing the title of Chrysostom, at the beginning of homily 13, affirms that the history of the casting-out of the sellers, described by Mark, is the same as that which we read in John. Godefridus Tilmannus annotated this passage with these words: "If you compare this very history according to Mark with John — namely, chapter 2 — it will easily become clear to you, looking a little more deeply, that there was not only one casting-out, but two. For twice the Lord is read to have gone up to Jerusalem for the celebration of the Passover: once indeed, John the Baptist not yet delivered to prison for the truth by Herod — that is, in the first year of the gospel preached by our Lord, of which John too, chapter 2, makes mention; and again, hastening to accomplish the mystery of human redemption. Of this [latter] Mark here makes mention, with whom Matthew chapter 21 also agrees. In each of these [times of] going up to Jerusalem, the Lord is read to have expelled from the inner precincts of the temple those selling and buying. But this rough and dilemmatic passage can somehow be resolved, if you say that the author speaks of the account of the time at which he went up to Jerusalem, not of how often."

Annotation CXXXI [contents]

"And it was the third hour, and they crucified him." — Mark 15[:25]

[margin: Whether Christ was crucified at the third hour.]

Thomas Cajetan, explaining these [words], is refuted by Ambrose of Compsa [Ambrosius Catharinus] in book 1 of the Annotations with these sayings: "Cajetan thinks the text here is faulty, and that it ought to be read, 'the sixth hour'; nor does he notice that a little after there follows, 'and the sixth hour being come,' etc. How much more prudent, then, was it to acquiesce in the sound distinction of others, who said, for the concord of the Evangelists, that at the third hour he was crucified by the sentence and acclamation of the Jews, as Mark says; but at the sixth hour by the deed itself, as the other Evangelists testify. For both the accuser, and the judge, and the executioner are rightly said to have killed the accused — the one [the accuser] by accusing and proving the crime, the judge by condemning, the executioner by carrying out the sentence. This passage could also be expounded otherwise: that what is said, 'It was the third hour,' be referred to the [things] above — namely, when he was handed over to be crucified; and what follows, 'And they crucified him,' is to be understood [as done] afterward, at the sixth hour." These [things] Ambrose [says] against Cajetan. For whose excuse it is worth noting here that Jerome long ago held this same [view], in the explanation of Psalm 77, where he uses these words: "It is written in Matthew and John that our Lord was crucified at the sixth hour. Again it is written in Mark that he was crucified at the third hour. This seems to be different, but it is not different. It was an error of the copyists. For many thought that the Greek episēmon [ϛ] was Γ [gamma]." By which words St. Jerome indicates that a copyist put "the third" in place of "the sixth" hour, deceived by the similarity of the numeral characters which he found in the Greek codices. For indeed the episēmon [ϛ], which is the mark of six, is so like the letter Γ, which is the sign of three, that it was easy for a copyist to slip from the one into the other, and, in place of the episēmon [ϛ], which denoted the sixth hour, to substitute Γ gamma, which signifies the third. Nor does Theophylact dissent from Jerome — except that he thinks the fault of the arithmetical figure happened not in Mark, but in John, where the error of the copyists, Γ being changed into [ϛ], made the sixth hour out of the third.

(right column — continuing Annotation CXXXI:)

Annotation CXXXII [contents]

"But Jesus, rising early on the first [day] of the week." — Mark 16[:9]

[margin: Whether the last chapter of Mark is of solid authority.]

Thomas Cajetan is here censured by Ambrose [Catharinus] with such a rebuke: "Cajetan says that the last chapter of Mark is not of solid authority for establishing the faith, as the other undoubted [chapters] of Mark are, for the reason that some have at some time suspected that it was added. Therefore Scripture ought to waver at the suspicion of any men whatever! If the matter stands thus, what now will be firm concerning it? Besides, if this chapter is not proper to the gospel of Mark, it follows that the Church of Christ has the gospel of one Evangelist mutilated — and that indeed in the part which was most important, where the resurrection was treated, the narration of which most befitted Mark, who on account of the victory of the resurrection is designated by the lion. Who, unless he be a fool, would approve these [things]? Add [further] that this chapter, which these [men] call into doubt, the Church recites with a clear voice on two most solemn feasts — that is, on the holy day of Easter — and chants in the sacred temples under the title of Mark; and [as for] those who dare to say that [the Church] errs in such a matter, there is nothing which they cannot either assert or deny, as it pleases [them]. Wherefore they are rather to be despised than to be deemed worthy that you should contend with them."

[catchword "AN-" → "AN[NOTATIO CXXXIII]," continues on p. 483 (PDF 488).]

(printed p. 483 [PDF p. 488], recto — Ann. CXXXIII–CXXXVI, on Luke 1–2 ("full of grace"; Christ's soul and omnipotence; guardian angels judged; Mary's purification). Read order: left column, then right.)

Annotation CXXXIII [contents]

"Hail, full of grace." — Luke 1[:28]

[margin: Whether the Virgin Mary is rightly called "full of grace."]

Bernard, in homily 3 on the history of the Lord's Annunciation, narrating these [things], Erasmus censures in his annotations — because he philosophizes wrongly and beside the point in these words, as though it peculiarly belonged to Mary to be called "full of grace," whereas it was not said by Luke, "full of grace," but κεχαριτωμένη [kecharitōmenē], that is, "graced [favored]"; and this expression is found promiscuously attributed to many [persons] in the sacred writings. For indeed of John the Baptist it is read, "He shall be filled with the Holy Spirit"; and of Elizabeth, "She was filled with the Holy Spirit"; and Stephen is called "full of grace." Certainly I do not see why Erasmus thinks Bernard is to be censured in this matter, since all the Latin fathers through so many successions of ages have read "full of grace," and St. Ambrose, skilled in the Greek tongue, judged that this epithet rightly agrees with Mary — because she is second to none in [her] graces. Jerome too — or Sophronius, familiar with Jerome (for each was excellently versed in the Greek tongue) — in the sermon On the Assumption, explaining this praise-title, says: "Well [is she called] 'full of grace,' because grace is bestowed on the rest in parts [piecemeal]: but into Mary the whole plenitude of grace poured itself at once. Truly 'full of grace,' through whom every creature has been overflowed with the abundant shower of the Holy Spirit." Moreover Theophylact, the Greek author, recognizing both readings — both "gracious" and "full of grace" — reads [thus], saying: "For this is to be gracious, or full of grace: that she found grace with God. For many others also found grace before God; but that she conceived the Son of God in [her] womb — this [was] singular to her, which was granted to no other." This same [thing] St. Athanasius most clearly proclaims in the sermon On the Most Holy Mother of God, speaking in this manner: "The Holy Spirit descended into the Virgin with all his essential virtues [powers], imbuing her with grace, that she might be gracious in all [things]; and therefore she was surnamed 'full of grace,' because by the infilling of the Holy Spirit she abounded in all graces." And below: "For it is fitting that thou be surnamed mother, regeneratrix, lady, and mistress — because from thee came forth the King, the Lord, and our God — [thou] standing beside him, to us indeed terrible [awesome], but to thee sweet, and bestowing every grace: for which cause it came to pass that thou art called 'full of grace' — inasmuch as thou didst abound in every grace." From the words of these authors it is easily washed away [refuted], what Erasmus says: that in the sacred writings other saints too are called "full of grace." For although we confess the saints [to be] full of grace, yet we believe — as Sophronius says in the same sermon — that the mother of Christ has so great a plenitude of grace as no [other] of mortals has received. For God made her such and so great that he himself willed to be born through no [other] creature than through her.

(At the foot of the left column stands the lemma of Annotation CXXXIV; its exposition follows at the head of the right column:)

Annotation CXXXIV [contents]

"He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Most High." — Luke 1[:32]

[margin: Whether the soul of Christ has omnipotence equal with God.]

Ambrose, in the commentaries on Luke — as the Master of the Sentences reports — seemed to attribute to the soul of Christ omnipotence equal with God: which the theologians do not accept, lest they equate the creature with the Creator. For indeed, when he was interpreting this passage, he wrote thus: "'Not for this [reason],' says the angel, 'will he be great — because before the Virgin's childbearing he was not great; but because the power which the Son of God has naturally, the man was to receive in time, so that the man and God may be one person.'" The Master of the Sentences, book 3, distinction 14, resolving the ambiguity of this saying, says that it is to be understood of the person — not inasmuch as [he] is [the person] of God, but inasmuch as [he] is [the person] of man: for although the person of the Son of God and of the son of man is one, yet inasmuch as [he] is the person of God, he always and naturally had omnipotence; but inasmuch as [he] is [the person] of man, he did not always have [it], because he did not always exist. And according to this — that [he] was going to be the person of man — [the man] was to receive in time the power which naturally and always he had had inasmuch as [he was] the person of God. This passage, which almost all the scholastics allege from Ambrose's commentaries on Luke, we — although we have long and much searched in all the Ambrosian works — have nevertheless not yet found. William Opembacchius and Henry Hayton, on the third [book] of the Sentences, cite the same from the commentaries of Bede on Luke: but neither in those does it stand. These [things] it pleased [me] to note on account of those who, content with mere anthologies, are loath to unroll the very writings of the authors. We meanwhile — since we are compelled to turn over the fathers with nightly and daily hand — if perhaps we shall come upon this passage, and others like it, wrongly adduced, will restore [them] to their authors with unbroken fidelity.

Annotation CXXXV [contents]

"And on earth peace to men of good will." — Luke 2[:14]

[margin: Whether the angels are to be judged on the day of judgment.]

Origen, in homily 13 on Luke, writes that the angels — appointed for our guardianship — will be judged on the day of judgment, and will receive rewards and punishments according to the account of the governance [they have] performed. His words run thus: "Since this is so, let us beseech Almighty God that both the angels, and men — the bishops of the churches — may be a help to us; and let us know that both are judged by the Lord on our behalf. But if they shall have been judged, and the fault and sin be found not in their carelessness but in our negligence: we shall be accused and punished. For, while they do all [things] and strive for our salvation, we nonetheless [must] be free from sins. Moreover it frequently happens that, while we labor, they do not fulfill their office, and are in faults." We have said abundantly about this in Annotation 124 of book 5.

Annotation CXXXVI [contents]

"After the days of purification were fulfilled, etc." — Luke 2[:22]

[margin: Whether Mary needed purification after childbirth.]

Origen, in homily 14 on Luke, indicates that the Virgin Mary needed purification after childbirth, in these words: "When now the days of pur-

[signature "Rr 4"; catchword "pur-" → "...of pur[ification]," continues on p. 484 (PDF 489).]

(printed p. 484 [PDF p. 489], verso — end of Ann. CXXXVI and Ann. CXXXVII–CXXXVIII, on Luke 2 (Mary's purification; virginitas in partu*; the sword through Mary's soul). Read order: left column, then right.)*

(left column — concluding Annotation CXXXVI, the Origen citation and Sixtus's gloss:)

of their purification, according to the law of Moses, they brought him to Jerusalem." "On account of their purification," he says. Of which "their"? If it were written, "On account of her purification" — that is, Mary's, who had given birth — no question would arise: and we would boldly say that Mary, who was a human being, needed purification after childbirth. Perhaps Origen understands [this] not of a purification from the uncleannesses and defilements of childbirth — to which there is no doubt Mary was not liable — but of the rites and ceremonies by which Moses had commanded women in childbed to be purified. These it was necessary [that] be observed by his mother, [by him] who had come to fulfill the law, not to destroy [it]. Arnobius, in the exposition of Psalm 14, seems to attribute certain stains to Mary, from which, on Christ's entering into her womb, she was cleansed. Of which opinion you have the explanation in book 5, Annotation 156 [the print gives "153", an error of the press: the annotation on Arnobius and the sanctification of the Virgin is the 156th].

[margin: The purgatorial fire.]

In the same homily you must beware of what Origen says — that we, after the day of resurrection, need purification — in these words: "I think that even after the resurrection from the dead we [shall] need a sacrament washing and purifying us (for no one will be able to rise again without defilements); nor can any soul be found which is at once free from all vices," etc. You have these [matters] treated more accurately and at greater length in Annotations 170 and 171 of book 5.

Annotation CXXXVII [contents]

"Every male opening the womb shall be called holy to the Lord." — Luke 2[:23]

[margin: On Mary giving birth.]

Ambrose, in book 2 of the commentaries on Luke, expounding this passage, seems to hold that the womb of the Virgin Mary was opened in [the] birth, and the enclosures of [her] virginity loosed. Which indeed conflicts with the definition of all the theologians, who teach that Christ came forth without the striving, pain, and defilements of one giving birth — the Virgin's womb [remaining] closed — through the intact enclosures of [her] virginity, like a ray of the sun sent through the solidity of glass without any injury to the glass. But he [Ambrose] writes in this manner: "He who had said to the prophet, [margin: Jer. 1.] 'Before I formed thee in the womb, I knew thee, and in the womb of [thy] mother I sanctified thee' — and who sanctified another's womb, that a prophet might be born a prophet — this is he who opened the womb of his [own] mother, that he might go forth immaculate." St. Thomas, in the third volume of the Summa, question 28, says that Ambrose, by the word "opening," did not signify that laying-open of the womb which happens to other [women] giving birth, but that going-forth of the offspring which did not violate the enclosures of virginal modesty. But lest the words of the law, adduced by the Evangelist, cast a scruple upon anyone, it is worth bringing here the opinion of Bernard at the beginning of the third sermon On the Purification of Mary, writing in this manner: "In the law it was written, that a woman who, having received seed, had borne a son, should be unclean seven days, and on the eighth day the boy should be circumcised; thereafter, intent on the washing and purification, she should abstain from entering the temple for thirty-three days. These being fulfilled, she should offer the son to the Lord with gifts. But who does not notice, at the very beginning of this statute, the mother of the Lord [to be] free from this precept? For do you think that Moses, about to say that a woman who had borne a son is unclean, did not fear to incur the crime of blasphemy against the mother of the Lord — and therefore prefaced 'having received seed'

(right column — continuing the Bernard citation of Annotation CXXXVII:)

— otherwise, unless he had foreseen a virgin about to give birth without seed: what necessity was there to make mention of 'received seed'? It is clear, therefore, that this law does not include the mother of the Lord, who — no seed being received — bore a son."

Origen, homily 14 on Luke, treating this very clause of Luke, asserts that the womb of Christ's mother was opened in [the] birth, in these words: "Of all women, [it is] not the birth of the infant, but the intercourse of a man, [that] opens the womb; but the womb of the Lord's mother was opened at that time in which also the birth was brought forth, because a male in no way touched, before the nativity of Christ, that holy womb, worthy of all veneration." Tertullian too, touching the present passage in the same manner, at the end of the book On the Flesh of Christ, brought in thus: "This, in fine, is the womb on account of which it is also written concerning others, [margin: Exod. 13.] 'Every male opening the womb shall be called holy to the Lord.' Who [is] truly holy, save the Son of God? who properly opened the womb, save he who laid open the closed [one]? but for [all] others, marriage lays [the womb] open. Therefore [hers] was the more opened, because it was the more closed. Assuredly she is rather to be called not-a-virgin than a virgin — at least in a certain way [she was] a mother before [she was] a bride. And what further is to be reconsidered about this? Since the Apostle, by this reasoning, pronounced the Son of God brought forth not from a virgin, but from a woman, he acknowledged the nuptial travail of the opened womb." As the words of these authors are consonant with the sayings of Ambrose, so they receive the same understanding.

Annotation CXXXVIII [contents]

"And a sword shall pierce through thy own soul." — Luke 2[:35]
[margin: Whether Mary suffered a defect of faith at Christ's death.]

Origen, in homily 17 on Luke, hands down that, when Christ was dying, a sword of scandal [stumbling] and unbelief pierced the soul of Mary. And he expresses this opinion in this discourse: "What is that sword, which pierced through not only the heart of others, but even of Mary? It is openly written that at the time of the Passion all the Apostles were scandalized, the Lord himself also saying, 'All you shall be scandalized in this night.' Therefore all were scandalized so far, that Peter too, the chief of the Apostles, denied [him] thrice. What do we think — that, the Apostles being scandalized, the mother of the Lord was immune from scandal? If she suffered no scandal in the Lord's Passion, Jesus did not die for her sins. But if all have sinned, and lack the grace of God, [being] justified by his grace and redeemed: assuredly Mary too was scandalized at that time. And this is what Simeon now prophesies, saying: 'And through thy own soul (thou who knowest that thou didst bear a virgin [child] without a man — thou who didst hear from Gabriel, "The Holy Spirit shall come upon thee, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee") there shall pass the sword of unbelief, and thou shalt be struck with the point of doubt, and thy thoughts shall tear thee in divers ways, when thou shalt see him — whom thou hadst heard [to be] the Son of God — crucified, and dying, and at the last tearfully complaining, and saying, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"'" These [things] Origen [says]; with whom Chrysostom, in the explanation of Psalm 13, writes plainly in words consonant with these: "When Christ was crucified, there was none who did good. The disciples all fled: John withdraws stripped: Peter denies. The soul of Mary his mother the sword

[catchword "gladius" → "the sword [pierced]," continues on p. 485 (PDF 490).]

(printed p. 485 [PDF p. 490], recto — end of Ann. CXXXVIII and Ann. CXXXIX–CXLII, on Luke 2–3 (Mary's "doubt"; Christ's growth in wisdom; Origen on angels). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CXXXVIII, the Chrysostom citation and the further witnesses:)

[pierced through] — the sword of doubt pierced through. Augustine agrees with both, whose words in the book Questions on the Old and New Testament, question 73, are these: "But what he added, saying, 'And a sword shall pierce through thy own soul, that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed' — this assuredly signified that Mary too, through whom the mystery of the Savior's incarnation was accomplished, would doubt at the death of the Lord — yet in such wise that she would be confirmed at the resurrection. For who would not waver, seeing him, who called himself the Son of God, so humbled that he descended even unto death?" Nor does Theophylact differ from these, writing thus in the commentaries on Luke: "But perhaps he calls 'sword' also the grief which she bore in the Passion; and perhaps also the scandal by which Mary was offended. For seeing [him] crucified, perhaps she was thinking: how [is it that] he who was born without seed, who did miracles, who raised the dead, is crucified, spat upon, dead? But what he says, 'That the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed' — this signifies that the thoughts of many, who are scandalized, will be revealed and made manifest, and, being reproved, will find a sudden remedy; just as thou too, O Virgin, wilt be revealed and made manifest [as to] what thou thinkest of Christ, and thereafter wilt be confirmed in faith in him; likewise Peter too will be revealed, when he shall have denied, but the power of God will be [thereby] demonstrated, which received him back through penance."

St. Thomas, in the third volume of the Summa, question 27, article 4, weighing the opinion of Augustine which we cited above, says that it is to be understood not of that kind of doubt which proceeds from unbelief, but of the hesitation of stupor [amazement] which is wont to accompany a great wonder. Nor does what Augustine said differ from this — that all doubted, by a certain stupor, at the death of the Lord. Whether these [things] can be accommodated to the foregoing sayings of Origen and Theophylact, let others see: for concerning the opinion of Chrysostom we have written above, in Annotations 104 and 156 of book 5.

Annotation CXXXIX [contents]

"And his parents knew [it] not." — Luke 2[:43]

[margin: Whether Mary always recognized Christ to be God.]

Euthymius, in the commentaries on Luke, expounds this passage thus: "According to divine providence this happened, lest Joseph and his mother should hinder him as [being] a boy and unlettered." Noting these words, the scholiast of Euthymius writes this: "From these words, and at the same time from those which are had a little after upon that word, 'And seeing him, they were astonished,' it appears that the author holds that the Virgin at this time did not know Jesus to have been God." Yet he [Euthymius] does not hold so — which is clear from his exposition of that saying, "And his mother kept all these words, pondering [them] in her heart," which follows a little after the aforesaid. Read the following Annotation.

Annotation CXL [contents]

"And they understood not the word which he spoke to them." — Luke 2[:50]

[margin: Whether Mary always knew the divinity of [her] Son.]

Origen, in homily 20 on Luke, seems to hint that Mary, while Christ was still a boy, did not have full faith of his divinity — for he says thus:

(right column — continuing the Origen citation of Annotation CXL:)

"Then, therefore, they did not understand the word which he spoke to them. And at the same time attend to this: that Joseph and Mary did not yet have full faith. Therefore they could not remain above with him." I think that Origen, by the phrase "full faith," understood full knowledge of all the mysteries of the divinity and humanity of Christ — which the Virgin Mary did not yet have at that time, although she held all those [things] which she then knew of Christ with a most certain and unshaken faith. See below, Annotation 185.

Annotation CXLI [contents]

"Jesus advanced in age and wisdom." — Luke 2[:52]

[margin: Whether Christ advanced in wisdom.]

Peter, bishop of Crete, alleges the authority of Ambrose from the expositions on Luke, in [his commentary on] the third [book] of the Sentences, in the person of those who, for the sake of disputation, maintain that Christ, inasmuch as he was man, advanced in learning and wisdom according to the increase of age. These are the words of Ambrose: "Jesus advanced in age and wisdom. How he advanced in wisdom, let the order of the words teach thee. For therefore he put 'age' before, that thou mightest believe [it] said according to the man. For age is [a property] not of divinity, but of the body. Therefore, as he advanced in the age of the man, so he advanced in the wisdom of the man." Know, excellent reader, that these words are nowhere had in the commentaries of Ambrose on Luke — in which there is no mention at all of this evangelical passage. But they are had in Ambrose['s book] On the Sacrament of the Lord's Incarnation, chapter 7 — whence also they are cited by the Master of the Sentences, who, elucidating them in book 3, distinction 14, says that they are not to be taken so as [that] we should think the boy Jesus acquired for himself anything of wisdom through the increases of age; but that, by the expression and showing-forth of his wisdom, he advanced daily more and more, and, according to the estimation of men, his wisdom seemed to grow and advance from day to day.

Annotation CXLII [contents]

"And there came also publicans, to be baptized." — Luke 3[:12]

[margin: On the instruction, errings, and penance of the angels.]

Origen, in homily 23 on Luke, brings forth four [things] beside the common opinion of the theologians, from the workshop of his own dogmas. Of these the first is, that the angels are instructed by men, and also learn from them. The second is, that the bishops of the seven churches — whom John in the Apocalypse, by reason of [their] office, calls "Angels" — were truly angels, and had the true nature of angels. The third is, that those angels were liable to sins, and were reproved for these by John. The fourth is, that Christ came into this world to preach penance not only to men, but also to angels. These opinions he expresses in these words: "The Prophets and Apostles preach all that they proclaim not only to men, but also to angels. For thou wilt find, in very many places, and especially in the Psalms, that discourse is made even to the angels — power being given to a man, namely to him who has the Holy Spirit, that he may address the angels. Of which [places] I will set down one example, that we may know that the angels too are instructed by human voices. It is written in the Apocalypse of John: 'To the Angel of the church of the Ephesians write: I have somewhat

[catchword "aliquid" → "I have somewhat [against thee]," continues on p. 486 (PDF 491).]

(printed p. 486 [PDF p. 491], verso — end of Ann. CXLII and Ann. CXLIII–CXLIV, on Luke 3 & 7 ("of Cainan" and a superfluous generation; did John the Baptist doubt?). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CXLII, the Origen citation and Sixtus's gloss:)

against thee'; and again, 'To the Angel of the church of Pergamum write: I have somewhat against thee.' Certainly he is a man who writes to the angels, and commands something. For I do not doubt that there are angels — not only generally for every church, but also individually; concerning whom the Savior says, 'Their angels always see the face of the Father.' And below: 'These [things] we have said for this [reason], that we might show that the publicans too are taught by John. For not John and a [mere] prophet only came, but also the Savior himself, to preach saving penance both to men, and to angels, and to the other Powers — that in the name of Jesus every knee may bow, of [things] heavenly, earthly, and infernal.'" These [things] Origen [says]; whose first proposition can be piously interpreted according to the sense of what Paul, writing to the Ephesians, said — that the wisdom of God became known to the Principalities and Powers through the preaching of the Church. You have this more clearly explained below, in Annotations 195, 182, and 298.

Annotation CXLIII [contents]

"Who was [the son] of Cainan." — Luke 3[:36]

[margin: Whether the generation of Cainan is superfluous in the genealogy of Christ.]

The exposition of Thomas Cajetan, Ambrose [Catharinus], in book 1, annotated with these words: "This I judged must be noted as intolerable — that he admitted, as though a possible thing, that Luke in the genealogy of Christ added one superfluous generation. But he excuses him, [saying] that he followed the Seventy, who were of great authority. Very well. Do, then, the authors of sacred Scripture follow [mere] interpreters? and do those who found the sea — whence the streams flow out — receive from the streams, so as to create the sea? He adds: 'And thus the Holy Spirit provided, lest it be imputed to the holy doctors that they expounded the text of sacred Scripture according to the commonly received interpretation — since it was permitted to the Evangelist to have done the same without an error of his own.' These [things] he [says] toward the excusing of Luke: but it would then be necessary also to excuse the Holy Spirit — that he permitted his amanuensis to be led by the authority of men, or even, [being] led, to err, and thus by a remarkable providence to leave an error in the gospel. Besides, was Luke devoid of the Hebrew tongue, so that he had need to follow the Septuagint? And even if he had been, [were] at least the Apostles, who saw and approved this gospel — were they too ignorant of the tongue, so as not to see this error? But if the Apostles did not approve this gospel, then, according to Cajetan's doctrine, it does not have the authority of Scripture." These [things] Ambrose [Catharinus says].

This passage once so vehemently tormented the mind of Bede the presbyter, that in the preface to the Acts of the Apostles he wrote thus: "I especially wonder — and, struck with the most vehement stupor on account of the slowness of my wit, I know not [how] to search out — by what reasoning [it is] that, whereas in the Hebrew Verity ten generations are found from the Flood to Abraham, Luke himself — who, the Holy Spirit ruling [his] pen, could in no way write a falsehood — chose rather to put eleven generations, according to the Seventy interpreters, Cainan being added, in the gospel." See what we have written about this matter in book 7, heresy 4, and in book 5, Annotation 88.

(At the foot of the left column stands the lemma of Annotation CXLIV; its exposition fills the right column:)

Annotation CXLIV [contents]

"Art thou he that is to come, or do we look for another?" — Luke 7[:19–20]

[margin: Whether John the Baptist doubted concerning the death of Christ.]

Bede, in book 2 on Luke, interpreting this, seems to impute to John the Baptist that he doubted concerning the death of Christ — namely, whether he was to die for the salvation of the human race — speaking thus: "'Art thou he that is to come?' The sense is: Tell me — because I am to be killed by Herod, and to descend to the nether regions — whether I ought to announce thee to those below too, [I] who have announced [thee] to those above; whether it be not fitting for the Son of God to taste death, and whether thou wilt send another for these mysteries."

Jerome, in book 1 of the commentaries on Matthew, writes the same opinion in the same words: and there is no doubt that Bede took it thence.

Eusebius of Emesa, in the homilies marked with his name, reports that John doubted concerning Christ's descent to the nether regions, saying thus: "'Art thou,' he says, 'he that is to come? I indeed go to the patriarchs and prophets, I descend into hell: but wilt thou too come thither? Ought I to announce to them that thou art to come thither, as I announced to the world that thou hadst come? Wilt thou descend thither in thine own person, or do we look for another from thee? For I fear to believe this of thee, unless this be made certain to me by thee. Greatly indeed hast thou humbled thyself — or perhaps wilt thou humble thyself more? What shall I say to them, what shall I announce?'"

Pope Gregory, in the book of 40 Homilies, homily 6, seems to ascribe to John both hesitations — both concerning Christ's death, and concerning his descent into hell — with these words: "John therefore says, 'Art thou he that is to come, or do we look for another?' — as if he plainly said: As thou hast deigned to be born for men, [say] whether thou also deignest to die for men and to descend to the nether world; make [it] known, that I who [am] the forerunner of thy nativity may become also the forerunner of [thy] descent, and may announce thee as about to come in hell, [thee] whom I have already announced as having come to the world."

Chrysostom, in homily 38 on Matthew, and Theophylact, and Euthymius, assail both opinions, as ridiculous and false, in a long discourse — because it is not credible to them that so great a prophet, and more than a prophet, who was greater than all the prophets, was ignorant of what the other prophets had foretold concerning the death, burial, and descent to the nether world of Christ, and which he himself had preached. There are [some] of ours who say that John most steadfastly believed that Christ would penetrate hell by the efficacy of his power, and thence snatch away the patriarchs, but that he was in doubt whether he [Christ] would go down to the nether regions according to the substance of [his] soul. Which, however — Theophylact being witness — Gregory the Theologian [Nazianzen] disapproves, affirming that John knew that he [Christ] was to come to hell with [his] soul, that he might there save the believers. It must therefore be said that John asked this not as though ignorant of it, but so that his disciples — still rude and incredulous — being sent with this question to Christ, might, from Christ's response, come to know and believe the majesty of Christ, not yet [by them] recognized. Or, according to Ambrose, it can be said that John was in doubt concerning the death of Christ — not by a doubt of incredulity, but by the hesitation and stupor of a mind wondering, and considering, how it could come to pass that men should dare to kill him who raised the dead and produced such great miracles of power.

[catchword "ANNO-" → "AN[NOTATIO CXLV]," continues on p. 487 (PDF 492).]

(printed p. 487 [PDF p. 492], recto — Ann. CXLV–CXLVII, on Luke 9–10 (Moses and Elijah at the Transfiguration; "seventy-two" vs. "seventy" disciples; the Apostles begging). Read order: left column, then right.)

Annotation CXLV [contents]

"And Moses and Elijah were seen in majesty." — Luke 9[:30–31]

[margin: Whether Moses and Elijah truly appeared at Christ's transfiguration.]

The Postil of Hugh of Saint-Cher [Hugo Carensis] on Luke reports that Moses and Elijah were present and appeared at Christ's transfiguration not truly, but imaginarily: and it cites as witness of this Ambrose, in a certain gloss, saying thus: "It must be known that not the bodies, nor the souls, of Moses and Elijah appeared there, but that those bodies were formed in a subject creature [an underlying substance]. For it can be believed that this was done by angelic ministry, so that the angels assumed their persons." These [things are] in Hugh's Postil: whence they are taken, I know not. Certainly, so far as I know, they are nowhere found in Ambrose. I suspect that in this place the name of Ambrose was rashly added by some smatterer; who, with no reckoning of the times, also inserted there the name and opinion of John Scotus [Duns Scotus], who wrote almost sixty years after the death of Hugh. St. Thomas, in the last part of the Summa, question 45, article 3, refuting this kind of opinion as absurd and false, reports that by some it is believed these words were taken from the work On the Marvels of Sacred Scripture; which, since it is falsely inscribed to Augustine, its authority is not received. And yet [it is] so far [from being the case] that the words of this gloss were sought from the work On the Marvels of Sacred Scripture, that in the third book of the same volume, chapter 10, an entirely contrary opinion is affirmed in these plain words: "But since Elijah, remaining in the body, had come to such a meeting; what is to be said of Moses? — whether he was present in the body again for this showing; or whether, simulated from air, as Samuel was seen, he feigned a semblance: even if he came clothed in his own body, did he on this occasion complete his resurrection, which for the rest is to be [only] at the last [day]?" Concerning which question the authors, having brought forth one and the same opinion, say without difference that, while the Lord is not doubted to have met with his three disciples and Elijah — not with imagined, but with true bodies — Moses too seems [to have been present] in his own true body, resumed from the sepulcher. But the Lord Jesus, the firstborn of the dead, is rightly believed to have again, after this vision, committed the body of Moses to burial, that he might be hoped to assume it at the last day, when the dead shall rise. See above, Annotation 74 of this book.

Annotation CXLVI [contents]

"The Lord appointed also other seventy-two." — Luke 10[:1]

[margin: On the number of Christ's disciples.]

Erasmus judges that the Vulgate edition of the Latin translator is redundant in this place, because in it the particle "TWO" [duos] is read superfluously: and he strives to establish this by the authority of the Greek codices, in which only "Seventy" is written; and he says that Ambrose, Jerome, Cyril, Theophylact, and Eusebius (in the first volume of the Ecclesiastical History) agree in the same number. Augustine opposes this opinion, in book 2 of the Evangelical Questions, asserting that the number seventy-two aptly fits the disciples of the Lord — because, as in twenty-four hours the whole world is bathed with the light of the Sun, so the splendor of the most holy Trinity is borne to the whole world through thrice twenty-four disciples — that is, seventy-two. Bede, on Luke, book 3, recognizing the same reading, says that the number of seventy-two disciples bears the figure of the seventy-two presbyters, etc. But because Erasmus insists that Augustine and Bede had faulty codices, and that the truth of the Greek exemplars is to be consulted:

(right column — continuing Annotation CXLVI:)

it is worth here subscribing the reading of Epiphanius, a very ancient author among the Greeks, who at the end of the first tome Against Heresies brings forth these [things] concerning the number of seventy-two disciples: "And Christ sent forth also other seventy-two to preach: of whose number were the seven set over the widows — Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, and Nicolaus, and before these Matthias, who was numbered in the place of Judas among the Apostles; and after these seven, and Matthias before them, Mark, Luke, Justus, Barnabas, Apelles, Rufus, Niger, and the rest of the seventy-two; and after these, then, all [of them], Paul the Apostle — whom we find that holy Luke, being of the number of the seventy-two, made his follower." These [are] the words of Epiphanius: which, lest anyone should suspect [them] badly translated, in Greek run thus: "ἀπέστειλε δὲ καᾶ ὶλλους ἑβδομήκοντα δύο κηρύττειν, ἐξ ὧν ἦσαν οἑ ἱπτά, οἑ ἱπὶ τῶν χηρῶν τεταγμένοι, Στέφανος, Φίλιππος, Πρόχορος, Νικάνωρ, Τίμων, Παρμενᾶς, καὶ Νικόλαος, πρὸ τούτων ἢ Ματθίας, ἀ όντἸ ìούδα συμψηφισθεὶς μετὰ τῶν Ἀποστόλων· μετὰ τούτους ἢ τοὺς ἑπτὰ καὶ Ματθίαν τὸν πρὸ αὐτῶν, Μάρκον, Λουκᾶν, Ἰοῦστον, Βαρνάβαν, καἈ ìπελλῆν, Ῥοῦφον, Νίγερα, καὶ τοὺς λοιποὺς ἑβδομήκοντα δύο· μετ' αὐτῶν ἢ πάντας Παῦλον τὸν Ἀπόστολον, ὃς εὑρίσκεται τὸν ἅγιον Λουκᾶν τῶν ἑβδομήκοντα δύο ἀκόλουθον ἑαυτῷ ποιήσας." Clement, the third pontiff after Peter, agrees in this number, in book 2 of the Apostolic Constitutions, chapter 59. A Greek codex of the Apostolic [Vatican] Library, bearing a wonderful antiquity, corroborates these [readings]. Nor does the authority of the ancient fathers — on which Erasmus chiefly relies — stand against these. For it is likely that those writers, for the sake of brevity, cited "seventy" for "seventy-two": which we also see done in the first interpreters of the Mosaic Law; who, though they were seventy-two — namely six chosen from each of the twelve tribes — are alleged by all ancient writers under the title of "the Seventy." So too the Romans, from a zeal for brevity, called their hundred-and-five Judges — three chosen from each of the thirty-five tribes — "the Hundred Men" [Centumviri].

Annotation CXLVII [contents]

"In the same house remain, eating and drinking such things as are with them." — Luke 10[:7]
[margin: Whether the Apostles begged [were mendicants].]

Theophylact, according to the ancient translation which St. Thomas uses in the Catena Aurea, expounds this passage thus: "See, therefore, how he taught the disciples to beg, and willed that they should have their nourishment for a price." In place of which John Oecolampadius, the new translator of Theophylact, renders thus: "See, therefore, how he instructs the disciples unto want, saying, Have food for [your] wage." Alphon-

[catchword "Alphonsus" → "Alphon[sus]," continues on p. 488 (PDF 493).]

(printed p. 488 [PDF p. 493], verso — end of Ann. CXLVII and Ann. CXLVIII–CXLIX, on Luke 12 (private property — Basil and Ambrose; guardian angels). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CXLVII, on whether the Apostles begged:)

Alphonsus [de Castro], in book 10 Against Heresies, suspects that Oecolampadius purposely changed the word "to beg," because it seemed to bring support to the pious mendicancy of the monks — which he pursued with many insults, as the chief plague of the Church. To me, noting these [things], since a Greek codex of Theophylact was lacking, it was not permitted to investigate Alphonsus's suspicion. You have what pertains hither in Annotations 118 and 317 of this book.

Annotation CXLVIII [contents]

"I will gather together all things that are grown to me, and my goods, etc." — Luke 12[:18]
[margin: Whether it is lawful for a Christian to have anything of his own.]

Basil, in the sermon On the Rich Man whose field brought forth abundant fruits, is thought to hold that it is lawful for no one to possess any thing as his own. For he uses such words as these: "'To whom,' [says] the rich man, 'do I do injury, if I retain and keep what is mine?' Tell me, what [things are] 'thine'? Whence, having received [them], didst thou bring [them] into life? Just as if someone, in a theater, the place for spectating being [already] occupied, should then forbid [others] entering — judging that to be his own property which is set forth in common for the use of all: such are the rich. For, seizing beforehand the common [goods], they make them their own by anticipation, and think them to be theirs. Whereas, if each one, taking what [suffices] for the solace of his own need, would leave to the needy what is superfluous, no one would be rich, no one poor. Didst thou not fall naked from the womb? shalt thou not return naked again into the earth? But whence are the present [things] thine? If thou sayest [they came] by spontaneous chance: thou art impious, not acknowledging the Creator. But if thou confessest [they are] from God: tell us the reason for which thou hast received [them]. Is God unjust, who distributed to us unequally the things necessary for life? Why art thou rich, but that one needy?" And below: "Art thou not a plunderer? — thou who makest thine own those [things] which thou hast received to be dispensed? It is the bread of the hungry which thou withholdest; it is the cloak of the naked which thou keepest in [thy] wardrobe; it is the silver of the needy which thou hast buried. Wherefore thou doest injury to as many men as thou couldst give to," etc.

Ambrose, the translator of Basil, in the eighty-first sermon published on this passage, subscribes to Basil's opinion with these words: "'What is unjust,' thou sayest, 'if — since I do not invade another's [goods] — I keep my own more diligently?' O shameless saying! Thou callest [them] 'thine own.' What [things]? From what hidden stores didst thou bring [them] into this world? When thou didst enter this light, when thou camest forth from the mother's womb — with what resources, I ask, and with what supplies begirt, didst thou enter? Learn thy coming into this world from the Apostle Paul, saying: [margin: 1 Tim. 6.] 'For we brought nothing into the world; nor indeed can we take anything away. But having food and clothing, let us be content with these.' The earth was given in common to all men; let no one call 'his own' that which, taken from the common [store] beyond what would suffice, has been violently gotten." And a little after: "Is God unjust, in not distributing to us equally the supports of life — that thou shouldst be affluent and abounding, but to these it should be lacking, and they be in want? It is the bread of the hungry which thou withholdest; it is the clothing of the naked which thou lockest away; the redemption and release of the wretched is the money which thou buriest in the earth. Know, therefore, that thou seizest as many goods as thou couldst bestow, as many as thou wilt."

(right column — continuing Annotation CXLVIII:)

These passages of Basil and Ambrose are to be prudently inspected, lest we slip into the error of the Apostolics: concerning whom Augustine, in the book On Heresies, to Quodvultdeus, chapter 40, relates these [things] from the second book of Epiphanius Against Heresies: "The Apostolics, who most arrogantly called themselves by this name, because they did not receive into their communion [those] using marriage and possessing things of their own — such as the Catholic Church has, and very many monks and clerics. But these are heretics for this [reason]: that, separating themselves from the Church, they think that those have no hope who use these things which they themselves lack. These are like the Encratites: for they are also called Apotactites — that is, 'extraordinary,' or 'renouncers.'"

St. Thomas, in the Secunda Secundae, question 66, articles 1 and 2, sifting the sayings of both authors, says that the right of possessing things of one's own can signify two [things], among others. First, indeed, the power of procuring and dispensing external goods delivered to one by God; in which manner it is certainly lawful for each to possess things of his own; nor do the aforesaid opinions of the fathers disapprove the possession of this kind of property. Secondly, [it can signify] a certain peculiar and singular use of a thing, assigned to its possessor alone; by which arrangement it is lawful for no one to possess external things as though proper to himself alone. And this is what Basil and Ambrose chiefly condemn in the rich, who — spending nothing on the needy — draw all things into their own uses. But it is worth here subscribing the words of Thomas himself, since they have something more than I have expressed: "To the second argument, from Basil, it must be said that he who, coming beforehand to the spectacles, seized a place before others, would not act unlawfully; but he acts unlawfully in this — that he forbids others. And similarly the rich man does not act unlawfully if, seizing beforehand the possession of a thing which from the beginning was common, he also shares [it] with others; but he sins if he indiscriminately forbids others from the use of that thing. Whence Basil says in the same place: Why art thou rich, but that one begs — unless that thou mightest obtain the merits of good stewardship, and he be crowned with the rewards of patience? To the third it must be said that when Ambrose says, 'Let no one call his own that which is common,' he speaks of property as regards use. Whence he adds: 'Taken beyond what would suffice, it has been violently gotten.'"

Annotation CXLIX [contents]

"When thou goest with thy adversary to the ruler, etc." — Luke 12[:58]

[margin: On the guardian angels.]

Origen, in homily 35 on Luke, hints that some of the angels — appointed for our guardianship — do not yet see God, and are still uncertain concerning their own salvation. His words are these: "At the same time inquire whether the angels of the little ones in the Church always see the face of the Father, and [whether] the angels of others do not have the freedom to behold the countenance of the Father. For it is not to be hoped that the angels of all see the face of the Father who is in heaven. If I shall be of the Church — however least I be — my angel has the freedom and confidence always to see the face of my Father who is in heaven. But if [I be] outside, and not of that Church which has no spot, or wrinkle, or anything of that kind of that kind, and by the very fact I am proved to be a stranger to such a congregation. My angel does not have confidence to look upon the face of my Father who is in heaven." For which cause the angels are solicitous for the good, knowing that if they govern us well, and bring [us] through unto salvation, they too shall have confidence to see the face of the Father. For as, if by their care and industry salvation is procured for men, they always behold the face of the Father: so, if by their negligence a man has fallen, they are not ignorant that the matter is [one] of their own peril also. And as a good bishop, and the best steward of the Church, knows [it] to be [a matter] of his merit and virtue, if the sheep of the flock entrusted to him have been guarded: so understand also concerning the angels. It is a disgrace to an angel, if a just man has been entrusted to him, and he [the man] has sinned; as, on the contrary, it is a glory to an angel, if [the one] entrusted to him has been, at least, the least in the Church. For they will see, not sometimes, but always, the face of the Father who is in heaven, whereas others do not always see [it]. For according to the merit of those whose angels they are, the angels will contemplate the face of God either always, or never, or little, or more.

[catchword "usmo-" → "of that ki[nd]," continues on p. 489 (PDF 494).]

(printed p. 489 [PDF p. 494], recto — end of Ann. CXLIX and Ann. CL–CLII, on Luke 15–16 (angels' vision and free will; Chrysostom on Scripture-reading begins). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the Origen citation of Annotation CXLIX:)

Annotation CL [contents]

"Son, thou art always with me." — Luke 15[:31]

[margin: Whether the good angels can be bent to virtue and vice.]

Jerome, in the exposition of the parable of the prodigal and thrifty sons, to Damasus, explaining this, writes thus: "'In thy sight shall no living [one] be justified' — he does not say, 'shall not every man be justified,' but 'every living [one]' — that is, not an evangelist, not an apostle, not a prophet; ascending to greater [things], not the angels, not the Thrones, not the Dominations, not the Powers, and the other Virtues. God alone is [he] into whom sin does not fall. The rest, since they are of free will — according to which man too was made to the image and likeness of God — can bend their will to either side." Peter Lombard, in book 2 of the Sentences, distinction 7, says that from these words, not well considered, it could be gathered that the good and the bad angels, since both have free will, can be bent as much to good as to evil — which is certainly rejected by all theologians. Accordingly, he warns that Jerome's opinion ought to be taken according to the state in which man and angel were first created. For both man and angel were so created that they could be bent to either [side]. But afterward the good angels were so confirmed by grace that they cannot sin; and the bad [angels] so hardened in vice that they cannot become good: and yet both have free will — because both the good, by no compelling necessity, but by their own and spontaneous will (aided indeed by grace), choose the good and reject the evil; and the bad, likewise, by [their] spontaneous will, destitute of grace, shun the good and follow the evil.

Annotation CLI [contents]

"There was a certain beggar, named Lazarus." — Luke 16[:20]

[margin: Whether those who preceded the preaching of Christ hoped for the resurrection.]

Chrysostom, in the first sermon on Lazarus, not far from the end, asserts that Lazarus could hope nothing concerning the resurrection: because those who preceded the time of evangelical grace had no knowledge of the resurrection. And he expresses this in these words:

(right column — continuing the Chrysostom citation of Annotation CLI:)

"I can add yet another [thing] to all these — namely, that Lazarus could not even reason anything about the resurrection; but he believed the affairs of this life to be bounded by the end of this life. For he was of the number of those who preceded the grace of the gospel. But if now, in these times — after so great a knowledge of God, after the excellent hopes of resurrection, after the punishments there laid up for sinners, after the goods prepared for those who have lived rightly — there are some so cast down in mind, and wretched, that not even by the expectation of these [things] are they corrected: what, in fine, must be thought to have befallen Lazarus, destitute even of this anchor? For he could never reason any such thing, because the time of such doctrines had not yet come." You have an observation akin to this passage above, in Annotation 51 of this book.

Annotation CLII [contents]

"Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus." — Luke 16[:24]

[margin: Whether anyone can attain salvation without the reading of the Divine Scripture.]

Chrysostom, in the third sermon on Lazarus, and in very many other homilies, exhorting his hearers to the reading of the sacred volumes, uses several sentences by which the heretics of our times try to persuade [people] that the holy Scriptures ought to be translated into all the languages of all peoples, so that they may be read by the rude people without any distinction, and understood without labor. For they say that nothing is a hindrance to the divine Scriptures being understood by all, even the unlearned, save ignorance of a foreign tongue. Now the propositions culled by the heretics from Chrysostom are chiefly three. The first is read in the third sermon on Lazarus, in these words: "Let us extinguish from afar the darts of the devil as they come, and drive [them] away by assiduous reading of the Scriptures. For it cannot be — it cannot be, I say — that anyone attain salvation, unless he be perpetually engaged in spiritual reading." And this proposition he urges by a twofold argument: first, indeed, from the necessity of instruments in any art whatever, saying thus in the same place: "Dost thou not see the coppersmiths, the goldsmiths, the silversmiths — in short, those who practice any art whatever — have all the instruments of [their] art ready [at hand]? With this same disposition it behooves us too to be endowed. For, as their instruments of art are the hammer, the anvil, the tongs; so for us the instruments are the books of the apostles and prophets, and every Scripture divinely inspired. And as they, by those instruments, accomplish whatever they undertake to do: so indeed we too by these fashion, correct our soul, and renew [it grown] old." Secondly, he establishes the same from this — that by divine precept each one ought to be prepared to render an account of his faith to whoever asks. His words, in the sixteenth homily on John, are these: "If the pagans watched so diligently to speak against our religion, what pardon shall we deserve, unless we know how to repel assaults of this kind against us? This Peter commands us. For he says: [margin: 1 Pet. 3.] '[Be] always ready to give satisfaction to everyone that asks you a reason of that hope which is in you.' And Paul: [margin: Col. 3.] 'Let the word of Christ dwell in you abundantly.'" [margin: Prov. 10.] But what [our theologians] answer to these [things]

[signature "Ss"; catchword "fucis" → continues on p. 490 (PDF 495).]

(printed p. 490 [PDF p. 495], verso — Ann. CLII cont., on Luke 16:24 (the three Chrysostom proof-texts the heretics cull for lay Scripture-reading). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing the Chrysostom citations of Annotation CLII, from the catchword "fucis" of the previous page:)

— [replies] more foolish than [their own] pretenses? "Blessed is every simple soul: and he who walks simply walks in confidence." For this indeed is the cause of all evils — that not many know how to adduce the testimonies of the Scriptures in seasonable matters. For "simple," in that place, is not to be understood as [meaning] "foolish," and as one who knows nothing; but as [meaning] not-evil, not-crafty. For if it were so understood, it would have been superfluous to say, [margin: Matt. 10.] "Be prudent as serpents, and simple as doves."

[margin: Whether the reading of the Scriptures pertains more to clerics than to laymen.]

The second proposition is, that the reading of the divine Scripture pertains not only to theologians, and clerics, and monks, but also, and much more, to laymen — especially merchants and craftsmen. And this he shows in the third sermon on Lazarus, writing thus: "Let no one say to me: I am fastened to lawsuits; I conduct public business; I ply a craft; I have a wife; I bear the care of a household; I am a worldly man; it is not for me to read the Scriptures, but for those who have said 'Farewell' to the world, who have occupied the mountain-tops, who lead such a life continually. What sayest thou, man? It is not thy business to unroll the Scriptures, because thou art distracted by innumerable cares? Nay, it is thine more than theirs. For they do not need the aid of the Scriptures in like manner as we, tossed in the midst of the waves of business. For the monks, indeed — free from the forum and forensic affairs, and who have fixed their little huts in the desert, and have commerce with no one, but philosophize in that quiet tranquillity with all security, and, sitting as it were in a harbor, enjoy things exceedingly safe — but we, on the contrary, tossing as in the midst of the sea, and, will we or not, bound by innumerable sins, always have need of the perpetual and continual solace of the Scriptures." Again, in the second homily on Matthew, confirming this same [thing], he says: "But is there at last any defense of these faults? 'I am not,' he says, 'a monk; I have a wife and children, and bear the care of a household.' This indeed is that which corrupts all [things] as by a certain single plague — that you think the reading of the divine Scriptures pertains only to monks, whereas it is much more necessary for you than for them. For those who are engaged in the midst [of the world], and daily receive wounds, need the medicine the more," etc.

[margin: Whether occupation, want, or ignorance excuse anyone from the reading of the Divine Scripture.]

The third proposition, which is completed in three parts, is: That no one can be excused from the reading of the divine Scriptures, either by the occupation of business, or by the want of books, or by the obscurity of the divine eloquence. The first and second parts of this proposition he urges in the tenth homily on John, in these words: "What, then, do we demand of you? That on one of the days in the week — at least on the Lord's day — you make it your care to read the evangelical lessons; to have them in hand before these sermons, to repeat them frequently at home, diligently to search out their sense; to note what is clear, what obscure in them; what may seem to conflict, though it does not conflict — all [these] being thoroughly examined, [that] you may show yourselves most attentive to these sermons. But if there are [some] who plead business and occupations: first, in this they err not a little — that they are so always fastened to secular affairs that they bestow not even the least study on those [things] which are most necessary.

(right column — continuing Annotation CLII:)

Then, moreover, they bring forward a frivolous excuse of no moment — [that] in worthless matters, every excuse being rejected, they can apply diligent study, but toward the divine [things] think that not even the least care is to be imposed. And in what way are those who feel such [things] worthy to breathe, or to behold the Sun?" There is also another inept excuse of these drowsy [sluggards] — namely, the want of books. And to the rich it is indeed ridiculous to respond to this. But since I judge that many poor use an excuse of this kind, it pleases [me] to jest a little with these, and thus to question them: Have they not all the instruments of their [own] craft? And if they are much hindered by poverty in procuring these: is it not, then, absurd — here not to plead poverty, but where they would obtain so great a benefit, to bewail [their] occupations and want? The third and last part of this proposition he pursues thus, in the sermon on Lazarus already cited: "'What, then,' they say, 'if we do not understand the [things] which are contained in the sacred books?' Very [much profit], indeed: even if thou understandest not the [things] hidden there, yet from the very reading much holiness is born. Although it cannot be that thou be ignorant of all [things] equally. For therefore the grace of the Spirit dispensed and tempered those [things] — so that publicans, fishermen, tent-makers, shepherds, the unlearned and illiterate apostles, might be made safe through these books — lest any of the unlearned could flee to this excuse of difficulty: that the [things] which are said might be easy to the sight of all, that both the craftsman, and the servant, and the widow, and the woman, and the most unlearned of all men might carry off from the heard reading some gain and profit. For not for empty glory, as the pagans [did], but for the salvation of the hearers, did they compose these [things]. The philosophers, not seeking what profits the common [good], but looking to this — that they themselves be [held] in admiration — even if they said anything useful, this too their accustomed obscurity hid in a certain fog of wisdom: but the apostles and prophets did the contrary. They set forth all [things] manifest and clear, expounded [them] to all, as common teachers of the world, so that each might be able to learn by himself, from the reading alone, the [things] which are said." Again, in the third homily on the latter epistle to the Thessalonians, he indicates that the Scriptures are so clear that those who read them do not need the explanation of preachers and doctors. His words run thus: "But thou sayest, Why do I go into the church, if I hear no one preaching there? This has ruined and corrupted all [things]. For what need is there of a preacher? Through our negligence has this necessity been made. For why is there need of a sermon? All [things] are clear and plain from the divine Scriptures: whatever [things] are necessary are manifest. But because you are dainty hearers, hunting for delight in listening, therefore you seek preachers. But I am ignorant, thou sayest, of the [things] which are set down in the divine Scriptures. Why? [Are they] uttered in Hebrew? in Latin? in some other foreign tongue? Are they not spoken in Greek? But obscurely, thou sayest. What is that obscurity, tell [me], I pray? Are they not histories? Thou knowest the [things] which are clear, [seeing] that thou askest about the obscure [ones]. There are a thousand histories in the Scriptures. Tell me one of them. But thou wilt not say [one]. These are pretexts, and empty words."

[catchword "HAEC" → "These [things Chrysostom said]," — Sixtus's reply to the three propositions continues on p. 491 (PDF 496).]

(printed p. 491 [PDF p. 496], recto — Ann. CLII cont., on Luke 16:24 (Sixtus's reply on vernacular Bibles; Trent's Rule 4). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Sixtus's reply, from the catchword "HAEC" of the previous page:)

These [things], then, have been said by Chrysostom on this matter, from which the heretics draw three errors: first, that the reading of the divine Scripture is necessary for all, the learned as much as the unlearned; second, that the divine Scripture is by its own nature most clear, and so easy of understanding that it can be most plainly understood by any rude and simple little fellow, if the impediment of a foreign tongue be absent; third, that the divine letters ought to be translated into the peculiar and proper languages of each people — so that, this one obstacle of an unknown tongue being removed, all the nations of the whole world may read and understand the sacred volumes; which of old, too, it is agreed was done with great profit to the Christian world by the ancient fathers of the Church — of whom, as very many ecclesiastical writers testify, Chrysostom translated the New Testament and the Davidic Psalms into the Armenian tongue; Jerome, both Testaments into the Dalmatian [Slavonic] tongue; Ulphilas [Wulfila], bishop of the Goths, all the sacred Bible into the Gothic tongue; and in Chrysostom's times all the Greek church read the divine books, either published or translated, in the vulgar tongue.

Against errors of this kind it behooves [us] to remember — what we have also often warned elsewhere — that the words of preachers are not always to be taken with that rigor with which they first come to the ears of the hearers. For many declaimers frequently pronounce and inculcate [things] by hyperbole — whether led by the occasion of places, times, and persons, or carried away by the impulse of the affections and the course of [their] discourse. This sometimes befell Chrysostom, and [befell him] especially [when] speaking on this argument. For indeed, when he noticed that the multitude of the Greeks — intent on theaters, spectacles, stage-plays, and the fables of the poets — utterly despised the divine Scriptures; he, bearing grievously so great a sloth and ignorance of his flock, desired that all, if it could be done, might be theologians and teachers; by which spirit Moses of old, [being] inspired, said, [margin: Num. 11.] "Who will grant that all the people may prophesy, and that the Lord give them his spirit?" And on account of this he exhorted all indiscriminately to the divine reading — as though it pertained promiscuously to all, and no access of salvation lay open to [anyone] who did not read the sacred volumes.

[margin: In what way the reading of Divine Scripture is necessary for all.]

Accordingly, when we read in him that the study of the divine Scripture is necessary for all, and that the reading of the Scriptures pertains more to laymen than to monks: his words are not to be so taken as if he means [that] craftsmen, fishermen, farmers, and illiterate men of this kind — who neither know letters, nor have learned to read — cannot be saved unless they unroll and read the sacred codices (for this would be to close the kingdom of heaven to the foolish and the rude, which Christ willed to be open no less to the unlearned than to the learned); but it is credible that he understood, by "the reading of the Scriptures," that knowledge to which the supreme heads of the whole divine Scripture are referred — such as are the precepts of the Decalogue, and the sentences of the Christian Creed; which, being utterly unknown, it is certain that no one attains eternal life.

[margin: In what way the Divine Scripture is easy, or difficult.]

But as to what he says — that the divine Scriptures are so clear that they can be understood by anyone, however unskilled — [this] is to be referred not to the whole, but to [some] parts. For Chrysostom distinguishes the divine writings into two classes: of which one contains the hidden and abstruse mysteries of a higher wisdom, neither accessible to all, nor necessary for all to know — such as are, for the greater part, the epistles of Paul: concerning which Peter, speaking, says: [margin: 2 Pet. 3 (printed "1 Pet. 3").] "Our most dear brother Paul, according to the wisdom given to him, wrote epistles, in which are certain [things] hard to understand, which the unlearned and unstable pervert — as also the other Scriptures — to their own destruction." The other class is open and clear, embracing the first and highest principles of the things to be believed, and the chief precepts and examples of living well, easy to understand — such as are the moral sentences, and certain sacred histories, useful for the forming of morals; concerning which almost all the exhortations of Chrysostom are to be understood.

(right column — continuing Sixtus's reply:)

[margin: Whether the Divine Scriptures ought to be translated into the mother tongues of each people.]

But to that which the heretics contend — that the divine letters ought to be translated into the mother tongue of each nation, because of old this very thing was done with great benefit to the Church — it is answered that an argument of this kind is inept: for many [things] have at other times been instituted for the common utility of the commonwealth, which, when afterward they brought inconvenience and danger, were abrogated. There were once held, by the institution of the Church, great night-vigils at the tombs of the martyrs, with a great throng of holy virgins, of monks, and of secular men: but when thence, little by little, many foul and base wickednesses began to issue forth, they were entirely abolished by the sanction of the Council of Elvira. There was once given — as is clear from book 6 of the Eusebian History, chapter 33, and from the fifth volume of Theodoret, chapter 18 — the sacrament of the Eucharist into the hands of the faithful; but, when many were detected who handled it unworthily, and who carried it off secretly home, hidden, for magical vanities, that custom was abolished. [margin: Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, in the 5th Mystagogical oration: "Approaching," he says, "to communion — not with the palms of the hands spread out, nor with the fingers apart, but make thy left hand a kind of throne beneath the right, which is about to receive so great a King; and with hollowed hand receive the body of Christ, saying 'Amen.'"] We ourselves, therefore, confess that formerly the sacred books, rendered into the vulgar tongue, [were spread] with great propagation of the Christian faith. But now it is not altogether expedient that this same be done — since by most certain experience we have learned that a very great crowd of the simple has, from this occasion, fallen into detestable and irremediable errors, while every cobbler, fuller, and tanner, relying on a vernacular translation of the Scriptures, dares in this insolent age rashly to discourse of the obscure difficulties of the divine Scripture, and to judge, according to his own madness, of the chief dogmas of the faith. Therefore so great an abundance and license of vulgar versions is to be restrained — both for the reverence of the divine Scripture, and for the salvation of souls — lest, against the Savior's precept, the holy [thing] be given to be eaten by dogs, and the pearls be trampled by swine. And as a certain prudent and pious moderation is to be applied in this matter — that translations of the sacred volumes of this kind be not forbidden to all, lest the unlearned (as Chrysostom says) be entirely deprived of the instruments of their art: so care must be taken that the divine letters be not everywhere published to all indiscriminately, but only to those who are endowed with a right faith toward God and with approved morals; even as the sacrosanct Synod of Trent, in the Index of Prohibited Books, Rule 4, decreed in these words: "Since it is manifest by experience that, if the sacred Bible in the vulgar tongue be permitted everywhere without distinction, more harm than utility arises thence, on account of the rashness of men: in this matter let it be [committed] to the judgment of the bishop, or [of the] inquisi-

[signature "Ss 2"; catchword "inquisi-" → "inquisi[tor]," continues on p. 492 (PDF 497).]

(printed p. 492 [PDF p. 497], verso — end of Ann. CLII and Ann. CLIII–CLVI, on Luke 16–22 (confession to God alone?; "buy a sword" and Christian warfare begins). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CLII, the text of Trent's Rule 4, from the catchword "inquisi-":)

-tor — that, with the counsel of the parish priest or confessor, they may grant the reading, in the vulgar tongue, of Bibles translated by catholic authors, to those whom they shall understand able to receive from such reading not harm, but an increase of faith and piety: which faculty they are to have in writing. But he who without such faculty shall have presumed to read or to have these [Bibles], let him not be able to receive absolution of [his] sins unless he have first returned the Bibles to the ordinary. And the booksellers who shall have sold, or in any other way granted, Bibles written in the vulgar tongue to one not having the aforesaid faculty, let them lose the price of the books — to be converted by the bishop to pious uses — and let them be subject to other penalties, according to the quality of the offense, at the judgment of the same bishop. But regulars may not read or buy these [Bibles] except with a faculty had from their prelates.

Annotation CLIII [contents]

"If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they hear if one rise from the dead." — Luke 16[:31]

[margin: Confession.]

Chrysostom, in the fourth homily on Lazarus, narrating these [things], speaks of confession in such a way that from his words it could be gathered that one is to confess to God alone: for he speaks thus: "Why, I ask, art thou ashamed, and dost thou blush to tell thy sins? For beware lest thou tell [them] to a man, lest he reproach thee: for neither dost thou confess to a servant, that he may bring [them] out into public," etc. See above, Annotation 175 of book 5.

Annotation CLIV [contents]

"Go, and show yourselves to the priests." — Luke 17[:14]

[margin: What sins are to be confessed.]

Bede, in book 5 of the commentaries on Luke, chapter 68, expounds this passage thus: "The Lord is found to have sent to the priests none of those on whom he bestowed these bodily benefits, except the lepers: because, namely, the priesthood of the Jews was a figure of the future royal priesthood which is in the Church. And whosoever — whether by heretical depravity, or by gentile superstition, or by Jewish perfidy, or even by fraternal schism, as if steeped in a varied color [of disease] — shall have lacked the grace of the Lord: it is necessary that he come to the Church, and show the true color of the faith which he has received. But the other vices — as [diseases] of the health, and as it were of the members of the soul and of the senses — the Lord heals and corrects inwardly, by [the man] himself, in conscience and in [his] understanding." Beatus Rhenanus, addicted to the Lutheran sect, in the Annotations which he published on Tertullian's book On Penance, perversely gathers from these words that only in the crime of schism, heresy, and infidelity must one confess to priests; but in the other sins it suffices to confess to God alone. But Bede's mind is to show by these words a twofold kind of confession: one, which is part of public and solemn penance — and this he says is necessary for heretics, schismatics, and infidels; the other is the kind of clandestine and secret confession, which he asserts to suffice in the other offenses for those who bring forth the secrets of the breast, to God alone, into the ear of the priest, and accuse [their] sins.

(right column:)

Annotation CLV [contents]

"God, be merciful to me a sinner." — Luke 18[:13]

[margin: On confession.]

Chrysostom, in the homily On the Publican and the Pharisee, in the explanation of this sentence, seems to be content with confession alone, which is made secretly before God, when he says: "Therefore I advise that thou confess assiduously. For I do not lead thee to the theater of thy fellow-servants; nor do I compel thee to declare thy sins to men; lay open thy conscience to God: to him show [thy] deeds and wounds, and from him seek medicine: show [thyself] to one not reproaching, but healing," etc. See above, Annotation 175 of book 5.

Annotation CLVI [contents]

"He that hath a purse, let him take it, and likewise a scrip: and he that hath not, let him sell his tunic, and buy a sword." — Luke 22[:36]

[margin: Whether it is lawful for a Christian to wage war.]

Hugh of Saint-Cher, expounding this passage in the Postil on Mark, is censured by Erasmus with a twofold charge: first, indeed, that most shamelessly twisting the saying of Christ, he asserted that he [Christ] warned the Apostles by these words that, when the storm of persecutions rushed on, they should fortify themselves with two things — namely, provisions and the defense of arms; then, that he made Chrysostom the author of so absurd a wresting — [Chrysostom] who everywhere rejects this fabrication. Erasmus condemns these [things] in the Annotations on the third chapter and on the twenty-second chapter of Luke, where, digressing from his purpose in a prolix discourse, he deplores, with almost tragic complaints, the judgment of the school-theologians; who, by their insipid (as he says) fabrications and frigid little distinctions, subvert the evangelical doctrine — teaching that the right of warring is not forbidden to Christians, but that it is lawful for Christians to wage war. Their opinion, indeed, he attacks, as impious, with a great number of testimonies — that those whom he cannot overcome by the weight of witnesses, he may at least overwhelm by [their] multitude. Among these the weightier are, that Christ in the gospel commanded his own [margin: Matt. 5.] not to resist evil, but to love [their] enemies; to pray for those who calumniate [them], to seek the peace of persecutors, to do good to enemies, to offer the other cheek to those who strike, and, to those who take away the tunic, to leave the cloak also besides; and, [margin: Rom. 12.] according to Paul's precept, to burn up [their] adversaries with the flames of love and of kindnesses. To these he adds the authority of many ancient fathers, but first of all of Origen; who, in the seventh treatise on Matthew, explaining the present passage, pronounces that Christ's discourse about buying a sword is pestilent, if it be taken to the letter. Then he compares Ambrose to Origen; whose explanation upon these words of Christ is read in the tenth commentary on Luke in this manner: "O Lord, why dost thou bid me buy a sword, [thou] who forbiddest me to strike? why dost thou command [me] to have [that] which thou forbiddest to be drawn forth? — unless perhaps that a defense be prepared, [and] vengeance not [be] necessary; and [that] I may seem to have been able to avenge [myself], but to have been unwilling. Yet the Law does not forbid me to strike back: and therefore perhaps, to Peter offering two swords, 'It is enough,' he says — as though it were lawful up to the Gospel, so that in the Law there be the instruction of equity, in the Gospel the perfection of goodness." To many this

[catchword "hoc" → "this [saying]," continues on p. 493 (PDF 498).]

(printed p. 493 [PDF p. 498], recto — Ann. CLVI cont., on Luke 22:36 (whether a Christian may wage war — Erasmus's witnesses and Sixtus's reply). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CLVI, from the catchword "hoc":)

this [saying] seems unjust; but the Lord [is] not unjust, who, when he could avenge himself, chose rather to be sacrificed. To these he also joins Chrysostom, cited from the Catena Aurea of St. Thomas; who narrates this very discourse of Christ thus: "'He that hath not, let him sell his garment, and buy a sword.' What now [is] this? Does he arm the disciples — he who says, 'If anyone strike thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also'? — [margin: Matt. 5.] he who commanded that we bless those who assail us with reproaches, [that] we bear with [those] invading [us], [that] we pray for [our] persecutors — does he now arm [them]? and arm [them] with one sword only? And how are these [things] consonant with reason? For if there were altogether need of arms, [it ought] not [to be] with a sword alone; but he ought to have armed [them] also with a shield, and a helmet, and greaves. And indeed, if he had wished to dispense and act in these [matters] after the human manner, this precept was ridiculous. For, although they had possessed six hundred [countless] arms of that kind against the ambushes and assaults of peoples, tyrants, cities, nations: how would eleven [men] have been reckoned the stronger? Why, then, does he say these [things]? He wished to indicate the ambushes of the Jews — and [to do so] manifestly, and not by riddles, lest again they be confounded [confused] along with him." Sulpicius Severus is put [as witness] in the last place, who, in the Life of Martin, brings him in refusing Caesar's donative — which was wont to be paid out to the soldiers — with these words: "Hitherto, O Caesar, I have soldiered for thee: now permit that I may soldier for God. Let him who is about to fight receive thy donative: I am a soldier of Christ; it is not lawful for me to fight." At last, after many [things], he [Erasmus] infers that a Christian man must fight not with bodily and iron arms, but with the spiritual and evangelical panoply with which Paul equips the soldier of Christ — that is, with the helmet of salvation, the shield of faith, and the sword of the spirit: which [thing], he says, Ambrose too openly declared, in the book On Widows, when he says: "The arms of the Church are faith; the arms of the Church are prayer, which conquers the adversary."

These [things] Erasmus [says]: who, as in those [things] which he brought forth against the scholastic theologians he is vehemently deceived, so in that which he casts up against Hugh of Saint-Cher he is utterly mistaken. For, since here two [things] are numbered by Christ — namely, the fitting [provision] of the purse and scrip alike, and the buying of a sword — Hugh, expounding the first of these in the first place, says that Christ, by the admonition about the purse and scrip, granted the Apostles license that thereafter they might prepare for themselves certain [things] necessary for [their] sustenance, [things] which are signified by the name of "purse and scrip." And he uses, for the confirmation of this interpretation, the testimony of Chrysostom, cited in truncated form for the sake of brevity. Which, lest anyone suspect [it to have been] falsely adduced, I will subscribe here the entire opinion of Chrysostom, from the homily on that [text] of the epistle to the Romans, "Salute Prisca and Aquila," etc. — where, dissolving the question, why the Apostles, to whom Christ had by a law forbidden the purse, the scrip, shoes, and doubled tunics, used all these after Christ's resurrection — he speaks in this manner:

"What, then, shall we say to these [things]? Christ did not wish the Apostles to be always bound by the necessity of this law, but he absolved them from this law, when he was now about to go to the saving cross. And whence is this clear? From the Savior's discourses. For, about to undertake the Passion, having called them, he said: 'When I sent you without purse and scrip, was anything lacking?' But they, answer-

(right column — continuing the Chrysostom citation of Annotation CLVI:)

-ing said, 'Nothing.' But he said to them: 'But now he that hath a purse, let him take it, and a scrip; and he that hath not, let him sell his garment, and buy a sword.' [margin: Luke 22.] Now perhaps someone will say [that] the Apostles [are] by these words absolved from the charge. But further it is asked, why Christ commanded contrary [things]. For at one time he says, 'Possess not a scrip'; but at another, 'He that hath not a purse, let him take it, and a scrip.' Why did he do this? Certainly he did these [things] very worthily, according to his wisdom and the care which he bore for the disciples. For from the beginning of [their] calling he did this — that the disciples might make trial of their [own] courage; and thereafter, [being] about to go out into the world, [that] animated by this example they might trust the more in him. But when they now began to recognize their own power, he willed that they themselves should furnish among themselves some specimen of virtue; and he permitted them to bear their own temptations — namely, lest they should sit perpetually idle, and be carried like children even to the end. For at the beginning he suffered them to endure nothing, but everywhere was present, fortifying and entrenching them about, and making all [things] flow to them abundantly: but when it was time that they themselves should declare their own manliness, he withdrew [his] benefit for a while, commanding them that they too should accomplish many [things] by themselves. And for this cause, when they had no shoes, nor girdle, nor staff, nor money, nothing was lacking to them. For he says, 'Was anything lacking to you?' and answering they said, 'Nothing.' But at the time when he permitted them to have a purse, and a scrip, and shoes, they were found both hungering, and thirsting, and going naked. Whence [it is] clear why he suffers them everywhere to be endangered and afflicted — namely, that they may have some reward. And just as birds, cherishing their young, sit so long in the nest until their feathers grow; and when they have seen [these] to have grown, they first teach them to flutter about the nests, then wholly leave them to their own support: so also did Christ. For in Palestine he nourished the disciples as in a nest, and taught them to fly, [being] present and carrying [them]: at last he permitted them to fly into the whole world, a command being given them, that they should not fail themselves."

These words of Chrysostom [were] summarily culled by Hugh — not, however, as Erasmus charges, falsely and corruptly cited. Agreeing with which, Theophylact, in the exposition of the same passage, writes thus: "At the beginning of the preaching, indeed, the Lord, sending the Disciples into the towns and cities, sent [them] without the necessaries; nor did he give [them the things] of which they had need, nor did he wish them to bear [such] care — and in these [things] it was fitting that they learn his power. For, having care of them as of the weak, he made all necessaries flow to them abundantly, apart from their own care. But now he commands the contrary — not [being] contrary to himself, but showing them that up to this time he had carried them as little children, and had not made them solicitous about anything. But now it is needful for them that they attend to the [things] which are of grown men, and provide for themselves. 'For I,' he says, 'your father, having care of you, now depart. From this time be prepared, and bear yourselves the care of your own affairs, and cast not all care upon me. For your works will not be so easy, and free from labor; but you will be subject to hunger, thirst, and many adversities. For these [things] are intimated by the purse and the scrip.'" From these

[signature "Ss 3"; catchword "his" → "From these [things]," continues on p. 494 (PDF 499).]

(printed p. 494 [PDF p. 499], verso — Ann. CLVI cont., on Luke 22:36 (Christian warfare — Sixtus's positive case; Augustine). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CLVI, from the catchword "his":)

From these [things], then, it is clear that Hugh was unworthily condemned by Erasmus in this part.

There follows a second charge of Erasmus, accusing Hugh — that against the opinion of Christ he affirmed that Christ granted to the Apostles the power of warring, and the use of the sword, when he exhorted them that, [their] garment being sold, they should buy a sword; and again, that he ascribes this violent interpretation to Chrysostom, [who] manifestly disapproves it. Of which accusations the latter, indeed, is so far from the truth that in this part which pertains to the sword no mention of Chrysostom is found in Hugh. But the former accusation contains an open calumny. For although Hugh writes that Christ, by that discourse, gave the Apostles license to use the sword, yet he did not by this saying wish to signify what Erasmus imputes to him — namely, that Christ commanded the disciples to descend into battle girt with the sword, about to fight it out with their own hand against enemies: but he wished it to be understood that Christ granted to the Apostles the just use of the sword — not, indeed, in their own person, nor for that time, but in the person of the whole Church, and for the future time; because, at the outset of the nascent Church, the use of arms would be least fitting.

But lest anyone perhaps suspect that these [things] are fabricated by me either out of hatred of Erasmus, or in favor of Hugh, the very words of Hugh run thus: "Note, that although the Lord spoke specially to the primitive Church, yet the primitive Church did not have the sword, nor was it fitting for it to fight it out with the sword. For as long as the Church was new, it behooved that it be planted by two [things] — namely, by sufferings and miracles. But after, by the process of time, the Church was grown, those two are no longer necessary. But since the sword does not belong to the primitive Church: why did he command the Apostles to take up the sword in the time of persecution? — that it might appear that the faculty of defense was not lacking to them; and thus [that] the Lord was shown to come willingly to the Passion. And this is what follows in the Gloss of Bede: 'He bids [them] either to take up a sword [already] had, or, if not had, to buy [one] — that readers may know that the faculty of resisting was not lacking to the disciples, but rather that in the Master there was the love of suffering.' Likewise in the Gloss of Ambrose: 'Why dost thou bid [me] buy a sword, [thou] who forbiddest [me] to strike? why dost thou command [me] to have [that] which thou forbiddest to be drawn forth? — unless perhaps that a defense be prepared, [and] vengeance not [be] necessary; and [that] I may seem able to avenge [myself], but to have been unwilling,' etc." Thus far Hugh.

There remains the last complaint of Erasmus against the more recent theologians — that against the evangelical and Apostolic philosophy they teach that it is lawful for Christians to soldier and to wage wars. Which complaint, indeed, is so unjust — not to say Manichaean and impious — that the accuser himself manifestly betrays himself an adversary of the evangelical discipline, and a subverter of the Christian polity, while he takes from Christians the rights of just defense — instituted by the laws of nature, and confirmed by the common consent and authority of all nations. For if war were altogether forbidden by the evangelical law, John, to the soldiers asking what would be expedient for them unto salvation, [margin: Luke 3.] would have said, "Cast away [your] arms, desert this soldiery; strike no one" — but he did not say this. But he only admonished [them] that, content with their pay, they should abstain from calumny — being also, moreover, about to prohibit the exercise of warring, if he had thought it unlawful. Again, when the Centurion tried to show the authority of Christ from the command which he himself had over his soldiers, [margin: Matt. 8.] Christ, having praised the soldier's faith, did not command him the desertion of [his] soldiery — [Christ] who without doubt would have forbidden [it], if war were in no way lawful. Likewise to the Herodians asking whether it were lawful to give tribute to Caesar, [margin: Matt. 22.] he answered, "Render to Caesar the [things] that are Caesar's." Now for this cause tributes are rendered — that thence pay may necessarily be paid to the soldier for the preservation of peace. For thus says Paul, when he treats of the obedience to be shown to the prince: [margin: Rom. 13.] "Therefore be subject of necessity, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake. For therefore also you pay tributes: for they are the ministers of God, serving unto this very thing." Rightly, therefore, St. Augustine, in the fifth letter to Marcellinus, treating of Christian war, spoke thus: "For if Christian discipline blamed all wars, this counsel would rather be given in the gospel to those seeking salvation — that they should cast away arms, and withdraw themselves altogether from soldiery. But it was said to them: 'Do violence to no one. Be content with your pay.'" To whom he commanded that pay ought to suffice, [and so] soldiering he certainly did not forbid. And in the letter to Count Boniface — which is number fifty — exhorting him to coerce the Donatists by war, he says: "Do not think that no one can please God who serves in the arms of war. Among these was holy David, to whom the Lord gave so great a testimony. Among these was that holy Centurion, who said to the Lord, 'I am not worthy that thou shouldst enter under my roof.' This, then, first consider, when thou art armed for battle: that thy valor, even the very bodily [strength], is a gift of God. For if thou wilt think of [it as] the gift of God, thou wilt not act against the Lord. For faith, when it is promised, must be kept even to the enemy against whom war is waged: how much more to the friend for whom [one] fights. To have peace is [a matter] of the will: but war ought to be [a matter] of necessity — that God may free [us] from necessity, and preserve [us] in peace. For peace is not sought that war may be exercised, but war is waged that peace may be acquired. Be therefore, [even] in warring, peaceful — that those whom thou overcomest, thou mayest, by conquering, lead to the peace of unity."

(right column — continuing Annotation CLVI:)

But, that I be not longer, I pass over what the same Augustine wrote on the right of Christian war in almost innumerable places — especially in book 22 Against Faustus, from chapter 74 up to 79 — and what Gregory, Bernard, and very many other ancient Fathers said in favor of Christian soldiery. But I come to those [things] which Erasmus opposes. First, from the Evangelical and Apostolic writings, by which we are forbidden to resist evil, are commanded to remit injuries, to love enemies, to seek peace with these, to pray well for those who curse [us], to do good to persecutors, to offer the right [cheek] also to be struck to [him who] strikes the left, and other [things] like these, which seem to explode the rights of warring. To this objection we answer: [that] of those [things] which have been enumerated, some are precepts, but some counsels. But it is indeed a precept, in a certain way and in general [in the disposition of the heart], to love enemies, to love foes, not to forsake the persecutors of the help of prayer, to wish and seek their peace and good will. Which precepts, indeed, [do not take away] the right and facul-

[catchword "facul-" → "the right and facul[ty of warring]," continues on p. 495 (PDF 500).]

(printed p. 495 [PDF p. 500], recto — end of Ann. CLVI and Ann. CLVII–CLX, on Luke 22 (Christian warfare concluded; "two swords"; the angel in Gethsemane; Peter's denial). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CLVI, from the catchword "facul-":)

-ty and exercise of fighting — [these precepts] neither take [them] away, nor always hinder [them]. For those wars are just and truly Christian which are waged by peaceful warriors — that is, by those seeking peace — with love of the enemies, for the defense of justice and the attainment of peace, according to that rule of Augustine: "War is waged, that peace may be acquired. Be therefore, in warring, peaceful — that those whom thou overcomest, thou mayest, by conquering, lead to the benefit of peace." Moreover, among these [things] are counsels: not to resist evil, not to defend oneself, to render good for evil, to offer even the left [cheek] to [him who] strikes the right, to let go the cloak also, besides, to [him who] snatches the tunic, to follow with a doubled number of paces [him who] drags [thee] one mile, and very many other [things] of that kind; which, apart from the crisis of necessity — as Augustine says — are not precepts of the deed, but of the disposition, to be kept in the preparation of the mind: that we may, namely, be always ready not to resist evil, but to conquer evil with good, and to repay a kindness for a wrong, if that be needful. But if it be otherwise expedient — whether for the common good, or for the benefit of those who assail us — then, as Augustine writes in the letter to Marcellinus, many [things] must be done, even the unwilling being chastised with a certain benign severity. For he from whom the license of iniquity is taken away is usefully conquered: "Since nothing is more unhappy than the good fortune of sinners, by which penal impunity is nourished, and the evil will, as an interior enemy, is strengthened."

But to that which Erasmus objects — that the Christian must fight with prayers and supplications — we confess indeed that to the just warrior prayers and supplications, poured out to God with the whole heart, are necessary first of all: because, as that noble Maccabee said, "the victory of war is not from the multitude of the army, but strength is from heaven." But after these [things], even if necessity press, arms must be taken and battle entered: since, while Moses prayed on the mountain, the army of the Amalekites is overcome by Joshua fighting.

Lastly, to those [things] which are brought forward by Erasmus from the fathers: first I answer to the passage of Ambrose, that his words are not to be so taken as if he means war to be unlawful to all these who profess the gospel — but [only] to those men (according, however, to the common rule) who have given themselves wholly to the divine worship, and hold a more eminent perfection of goodness, placed in the observance of the counsels: which Ambrose himself not obscurely indicates, saying, "that there may be in the gospel the perfection of goodness." To the same sense, too, are to be referred the words of Chrysostom. For indeed, since the Apostles stood on the highest summit of evangelical purity, it was not lawful for them to put on arms, to gird [themselves] with the sword, to lay [their] hand on the sword, and to be besprinkled with another's blood. Whence Origen deservedly said that Christ's discourse, exhorting to the sword, is pestilent to those who understand it according to the letter — that is, to those who think that Christ, by that saying, commanded his Apostles to arm themselves for battle; whereas that would not befit men holding the citadel of all perfection. Nor does the answer of Martin depart from this aim, who declined soldiery not only for this cause, but also for another far graver — namely, because he judged [it] a wickedness that a Christian soldier should soldier under an impious and apostate Emperor.

(right column — concluding Annotation CLVI:)

For Julian, having openly deserted the religion of Christ, had fallen away to paganism.

These [things], perhaps, [have been] said at greater length than would suit the present purpose, [but] out of a zeal for piety, against Erasmus — whom, lest I seem to have utterly stripped him of his defense, I will not be silent [in noting] that he, after a long and pernicious digression by which he wounded the reader's mind, at last, at the end of the discourse, added: "And we wish these [things] to be held as matters disputed, not as [things] asserted" — namely, that by such a paint [pretense] he might provide for himself, and, as it is said in the adage, might hide his hand, the stone [having been] cast.

From those [things] which have been said in this Annotation, [those things] are most easily refuted which John Ferus wrote against the Christian right of warring, in the Commentaries on the twenty-sixth chapter of Matthew. These read above, Annotation 115.

Annotation CLVII [contents]

"Lord, behold here [are] two swords." — Luke 22[:38]
[margin: War.]

Nicholas of Lyra Erasmus derides, because in this place, following the opinions of Hugh [of Saint-Cher], he wrote that Christ commanded the Apostles that, when the time of persecution threatened, they should prepare provisions, and make ready arms for defense. Consult the preceding annotation.

Annotation CLVIII [contents]

"But he said to them, It is enough." — Luke 22[:38]
[margin: War.]

Ambrose, in book 10 on Luke, so interprets this passage that he seems to hold that the right of warring is forbidden by the evangelical law. Which opinion Erasmus and Oecolampadius abuse for the overthrow of Christian soldiery. Read what is had above, Annotation 156.

Annotation CLIX [contents]

"There appeared an angel of the Lord, strengthening him." — Luke 22[:43]
[margin: The consoling apparition of the angel.]

Thomas Cajetan, interpreting these [words], Ambrose [Catharinus] refutes, in book 3, with these words: "Cajetan notes that Jerome does not think this apparition of the angel altogether certain: which is most false. Nay, he proves and cites [it] as certain — although he says [it] is absent in many codices. But this does not prove that Jerome did not hold [it] as certain." Concerning this we have written in book 1, section 2.

Annotation CLX [contents]

"But he denied him, saying, Woman, I know him not." — Luke 22[:57]
[margin: Whether Peter denied the Godhead of Christ.]

Ambrose, in book 10 of the commentaries on Luke, excusing Peter's denial, says that he did not deny him [Christ] to be God, but denied [knowing] him [only] as a mere man. For he speaks thus: "The first voice is that of Peter denying — by which, however, he seems not to deny the Lord, but to have separated himself from the treachery of the woman. But consider what he denied: that he was assuredly of those who were with Jesus the Galilean, or, as Mark put [it], with Jesus the Nazarene. Did he deny that he had been with the Son of God? This is to say: 'I know not the Galilean, I know not the Nazarene' — [him] whom I know [to be] the Son of God. Let men have the names of places: [his] native region cannot name the Son of God, whose majesty [the place] whose majesty no place includes," etc. This same [thing] Hilary held, in canon 2 on Matthew. Jerome, in book 4 on Matthew, disapproving this opinion, says: "I know that some, out of pious affection toward the Apostle, so interpreted this passage as to say that Peter denied not God, but man; and that the sense is, 'I know not the man, because I know [him to be] God.' How frivolous this is, the prudent reader understands. Thus they defend the Apostle so as to make God guilty of a lie. For if he did not deny [him], then the Lord lied, who had said: [margin: Matt. 26.] 'Amen I say to thee, that this night, before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice.' Observe what he says: 'Thou shalt deny me, not the man.'" These [things] Jerome [says]; to whom Theophylact, in the commentary on this passage, subscribes much more freely with these words: "Certain [men] feign I know not how foolish a defense for Peter, boldly saying that Peter denied, but said, 'I know not the man' — that is, 'I know not [him as] a mere man, but [as] God made man.' Their foolish argument I will leave to others: for they make the Lord a liar, and are contrary to the context of the gospel, and can in no way make the sequence of the narrative cohere; and, moreover, why did Peter weep, if he did not deny?"

[signature "Ss 4"; catchword "locus" → "whose majesty [no] place [can hold]," continues on p. 496 (PDF 501).]

(printed p. 496 [PDF p. 501], verso — end of Ann. CLX and Ann. CLXI–CLXII, on Luke 22–23 (Peter's denial and tears; "weep not over me"). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the Ambrose citation of Annotation CLX, from the catchword "locus":)

Annotation CLXI [contents]

"And going forth, Peter wept bitterly." — Luke 22[:62]

[margin: Whether penance profits without confession and satisfaction.]

Ambrose, in the tenth commentary on Luke, so expounds this passage that he seems to exclude confession and satisfaction from true penance. For he uses these words: "Peter grieved and wept, because he erred as a man. I do not find what he said: I find that he wept. I read his tears; I do not read [his] satisfaction. But what cannot be defended, the tears wash away the offense — [that] which it is a shame to confess with the voice, the weeping provides for [both] pardon and modesty. Tears speak the fault without horror. Tears confess the crime without offense to modesty; tears do not ask for pardon, but merit [it]." The same opinion, and in almost the same words, he repeats in the sermon On the Penance of Peter — which is number 46 — where it is read thus: "Peter burst into tears, praying nothing with the voice. For I find that he wept: I do not find what he said. I read his tears: I do not read [his] satisfaction. Rightly, indeed, did Peter weep, and keep silence — because what is wont to be wept over is not wont to be excused; and what cannot be defended can be washed away. For a tear washes away the offense which it is a shame to confess with the voice. Tears, therefore, provide alike for modesty and for salvation; nor do they blush in asking, and they obtain in entreating. More profitable are the prayers of tears than of speech: because speech, in praying, perhaps deceives; a tear deceives not at all."

This same [thing] Maximus, bishop of Turin, has in the sermon On Penance.

Gratian annotated this passage, in the first distinction On Penance, and Peter, bishop of Paris [Lombard], in book 4 of the Sentences, distinction 17. But each of them says that the words of Ambrose and Maximus are to be referred to public penance — for it is not necessary to disclose by public confession and satisfaction that which is hidden; but it suffices, by hidden tears and secret con-

(right column — continuing Annotation CLXI:)

-fession, to accuse the offense to the priest alone — that [offense] which it shames us to confess publicly. But as to what Ambrose wrote — that he read the tears of Peter, [but] did not read [his] confession and satisfaction — the Master of the Sentences says that [Ambrose] does not [thereby] explode either confession or satisfaction, because many [things] were done which are not written; and because, perhaps, the secret confession which we now use had not yet been instituted. Read above, Annotations 16 and 174 of book 5.

Annotation CLXII [contents]

"Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not over me, etc." — Luke 23[:28]

[margin: Whether the death of Christ is to be mourned.]

Theophylact, elucidating this clause, says: "Women, indeed, are a kind of people easily weeping and wailing; as though something grievous had befallen the Lord, they weep, showing forth great compassion, and lamenting the injustice. But he does not approve, but rather rebukes them. For he was suffering voluntarily. And it is not fitting to lament him who suffers willingly and for the salvation of all: but it is congruous that he should rather be extolled and celebrated with praises. For through the cross both death was destroyed, and hell made captive. For laments, for those who suffer willingly, bring no consideration [do not befit them]. Therefore the Lord rebukes those who were mourning him." Erasmus, from these words, gathers that it is not lawful for a Christian man to weep over the Passion of Christ, and to follow his death with tears; because Christ willed his death to be not mournful, but glorious, and did not wish [it] to be deplored, but adored — as [a death] which was undertaken willingly for the salvation of the whole world.

He confirms this opinion by the testimony of Bede, who in book 6 of the commentaries on Luke writes thus: "'Do not lament me,' says Christ, 'as about to die — [me] whose swift resurrection can dissolve death, whose death is about to destroy both all death, and the very author of death.'" Again he joins Ambrose to Bede; who, although he passes over this discourse of the Lord to the women, yet at the mention of the cross at once bursts into triumphal, not mournful, words: "But now let the victor raise his trophy," he says. And then, "Now, since we have already seen the trophy, let the triumpher mount his chariot," etc. This opinion of Erasmus the Faculty of the Paris theologians, in the censures which it published on the works of Erasmus, orders to be held among the impious and heretical dogmas. It indicates also that the aforesaid authorities of the fathers are to be taken in that sense in which Christ said to the mourning women: "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not over me, but weep over yourselves."

By which words, indeed, he did not forbid himself to be wept over by the women of Jerusalem — [wept over] prudently and becomingly, out of a certain pious affection of charity. For it is not credible that Christ, in these [women], either forbade or reproved what the feeling of a compassionate nature suggests, [what] the reasoning of friendship urges, and [what] the divine oracles of the prophets had foretold would be. For — to omit the rest — the sword of grief, according to Simeon's prophecy, [margin: Luke 2.] pierced through the soul of Mary [his] mother at the death of the Son: and let no one believe that her grief and tears were condemned by Christ, unless he be utterly foolish. Therefore Christ forbade to the daughters of Jerusalem another kind of weeping — namely, some blind and undue [weeping] of the little women

[catchword "inde-" → "and undue [weeping]," continues on p. 497 (PDF 502).]

(printed p. 497 [PDF p. 502], recto — end of Ann. CLXII and Ann. CLXIII–CLXVI; the series crosses from Luke into John (do the saints see glory before Judgment?; the divinity's withdrawal; Origen on star-souls). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CLXII, from the catchword "inde-":)

—an undue and unseemly mourning: [these women] — not yet recognizing the divine power of the Son of God, and [his] ineffable charity — [seeing] that he, willing and gladly, of his own accord hastened to death for the salvation of his own, wept over him as [over] an infirm and feeble man, suffering dire and unworthy [things] with an unwilling mind, and not able to defend himself from hostile injuries. Restraining this kind of unworthy weeping, Christ admonishes [them] that they rather weep, by this manner of mourning, over themselves and their sons — over whom [there] hung an ineluctable calamity, and the inevitable destruction of the city. From these [things] it is clear that Christ did not forbid, nor condemn, the pious and religious custom of mourning by which the Christian Church every year concelebrates the memory of the Passion and death of Christ with mournful pomp and tearful ceremonies. For the Church, taught by the Spirit of Christ, knows [it] to be fitting that her sons — who are members of Christ — be conformed to Christ [their] head, grieving and suffering, condoling and compassionating. And accordingly she instituted this kind of weeping-rite, in which she commanded, chiefly and most of all, that our sins be mourned — the expiation of which drove Christ into death. This the prophet Zacharias too especially admonished, saying: [margin: Zech. 11.] "All the tribes of the earth shall wail over him." For he did not say only, "They shall wail [over] him," but "They shall wail over themselves, over him" — that is, [because of] their own crimes, laid upon him who by his own death paid the penalty of them.

Annotation CLXIII [contents]

"This day thou shalt be with me in paradise." — Luke 23[:43]

[margin: Whether the saints yet enjoy the divine glory.]

Theophylact, in the explanation of this sentence, seems to hand down that the souls of the saints, before the day of judgment, do not enjoy the divine glory — [saying] in these words: "The saints, although they do not yet enjoy the perfect goods, yet already dwell in bright and fragrant places, and beautiful tabernacles — even if they do not yet attain the distribution of the royal goods; so also the thief was in paradise, even though he has not yet received [it] perfectly, lest he be made perfect without us. And this I think the truest of all — not to say that the graces of the saints, in the daily workings of miracles, are deservedly called 'Paradise'; and [that] all the saints, as many as have been made partakers of spiritual gifts, and have the pledge of the Spirit, are in Paradise — even if they are not yet perfect, and have received the kingdom, as Paul says in the epistle to the Hebrews — even if they have not yet received the promises. For by saying 'promise,' he meant the entire felicity." Alphonsus de Castro, in book 3 Against Heresies, reckons this passage among those which agree with the errors of the Greeks and Armenians. Read Annotation 345 of this book. Euthymius, in the commentaries, at the exposition of the present passage, follows this same opinion of Theophylact — expressed also in clearer words; you have it below, Annotation 345, where the sayings of Theophylact too are annotated.

Annotation CLXIV [contents]

"And saying this, he expired." — Luke 23[:46]

[margin: Whether the Godhead was separated from the humanity of Christ through death.]

Ambrose, in book 10 on Luke, teaching how our Redeemer expired, seems to hold that the humanity of the dying Christ was divided from the divinity of the Word — writing thus:

(right column — continuing the Ambrose citation of Annotation CLXIV:)

"I will not blush to confess that Christ did not blush to profess with a loud voice, attesting the withdrawal of the divinity and the body. For thus it stands: Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, [margin: Matt. 27.] 'God, my God, look upon me; why hast thou forsaken me?' The man cried out, about to die by the separation of the divinity. For since the divinity is free from death, death assuredly could not be, unless life departed — because life is the divinity." In the same opinion — as we noted above, Annotation 126 — Hilary is believed to have been, in canon 33 on Matthew. The Master of the Sentences, book 3, distinction 21, elucidating the sayings of both doctors, says that the separation of which both speak is to be so understood as the forsaking signified by those words, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" — that is, not according to the loosing and division of the union of God and man, but according to the withdrawal of protection; by which the divinity, laying aside for a time the patronage of the humanity, deserted that man in torments, pains, and death, [as one] separated from the [divine] defense, not divided from the union. Read Annotation 126 of this book.

Annotation CLXV [contents]

"In the beginning was the Word." — John 1[:1]

[margin: Whether the angels learned anything from the evangelical writings.]

Chrysostom, in the first homily — or in the preface of the homilies — on John, hints that the angels learned much from the preaching of John the Evangelist, which they were before ignorant of: for he writes thus: "John utters to us nothing human, but out of the deep and hidden treasures of the Holy Spirit [utters] all [things] — which not even the angels knew before he said [them] here; for they too learned along with us, through the voice of John, and through us learned what we came to know. Which the blessed Paul also signified by these words: 'That the manifold wisdom of God may now be made known to the Principalities and Powers in the heavenly [places] through the Church.' If, then, it plainly appears that the Principalities and Powers, the Cherubim and Seraphim, learned these [things] through the Church, [it appears] that the angels themselves showed themselves hearers of it with the greatest attention — for on this account we obtain no small honor, that the angels learned along with us [things] which they knew not." He confirms this same [thing] in the fourth homily Against the Anomoeans, saying: "There are certain dispensations which those Powers understood along with us — [things] which, before we understood [them], were utterly unknown [to them]; and [they understood them] not only along with us, but even through us [they] themselves understood [them]," etc. Of the same opinion is Origen, homily 23 on Luke, and Theodoret in [the dialogue] The Unchangeable. See below, Annotations 182, 299, and 320.

Annotation CLXVI [contents]

"In the beginning was the Word." — John 1[:1]

[margin: The imprisonment of souls.]

Origen, in the first tome on John, in the exposition of the present clause, hands down that the soul of the devil, and the souls of the Sun and of the other stars, [were] bound to bodies on account of their fall into sins. His words run thus: "It must necessarily be known — since the saints were passing a life devoid of all matter and body in beatitude — whether he who was called the dragon, after he fell from the pure life, worthy

[catchword "dignus" → "worthy," continues on p. 498 (PDF 503).]

(printed p. 498 [PDF p. 503], verso — end of Ann. CLXVI and Ann. CLXVII–CLXXI, on John 1:1 (the Word as "form"; ensouled stars; Cajetan's "toward God"; Origen's Arian article-argument). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the Origen citation of Annotation CLXVI, from the catchword "dignus":)

was fit to be bound, before all [others], in matter and body — so that for this cause the divine oracle [Scripture, speaking] through wind and clouds says [of him], "this is the beginning of the fashioning of the Lord, made to be mocked by his angels." [margin: Job 40.] It could indeed be that the dragon was not altogether the beginning of the Lord's fashioning: but since many [things] were made, that they might be mocked by the angels, it behooved that this one be the beginning of such [beings] — because certain [beings] could be [present] in a body [but] not in this manner. For indeed the soul of the Sun is in a body, and [so is] every creature, of which the Apostle says: [margin: Rom. 8.] "Every creature groans, and is in labor even until now." And perhaps that [saying] of the same [Apostle] is understood of the same [matter]. Read Annotation 182 of book 5.

Annotation CLXVII [contents]

"In the beginning was the Word." — John 1[:1]

[margin: Whether God is the form of things.]

Augustine, in the sermon On the Words of the Lord 38, narrating this clause, has certain words which those are wont to use who, for the sake of disputation in the schools, argue that God comes into the composition of things after the manner of a form. They are: "The Word of God is a certain form — a form not formed, but the form of all formed [things]." St. Thomas, in the first volume of the Summa, says that this saying is to be taken of the exemplary form — that is, that the Word of God is the exemplary form, but not the form which is a part of a composite.

Annotation CLXVIII [contents]

"The Word was." — John 1[:1]

[margin: The stars ensouled.]

Origen, in the first tome on John, touching on his own peculiar dogma concerning the ensoulment of the stars, writes thus: "The firstborn of all creation, on account of the greatest honor which he attributed to man, was made a man indeed — not, however, any [one] of those living beings which are in heaven: but that star which appeared in the East was made both second, and minister, and servant to Jesus — either like the other stars, or perhaps even more excellent, since it was the sign of him who is more excellent than all." Consult the preceding book, Annotation 108 [the print gives "107", an error of the press: the annotation on the stars as living beings is the 108th].

Annotation CLXIX [contents]

"And the Word was with God." — John 1[:1]

[margin: Whether the Word [was] "to God" or "with God."]

The interpretation of Thomas Cajetan, Ambrose [Catharinus] reprehends, in book 1 of the Annotations, writing thus: "That [reading] displeased [me] vehemently — that he so changes what follows, 'And the Word was with God' [apud Deum], into 'And the Word was toward God' [ad Deum], commending to us here a certain loftier interpretation. For, he says, 'to be' of the Word is 'to be toward God' — that is, [the Word] is referred to God — which can be said of no [created] substance." These [things] he [Cajetan says], but utterly falsely. For neither is the being of the divine substance said to be "toward," nor is the being of the Word said [to be referred] "to God," but "to the speaker," according to the proper expression of relation. For the son too is called son of the father, not of the man, or of Socrates: or otherwise, if the relative be sought in divine [matters], Christ is called not "Son of God," but "Son of the Father": and thus the Word is fittingly called not "the Word of God," but "the Word of the speaker." In which place I wonder at the man who, from Aristotle's Categories, did not notice this.

(right column:)

Annotation CLXX [contents]

"And the Word was with God." — John 1[:1]

[margin: Whether Christ suffered for the angels.]

Origen, in the first tome on John, writes that Christ suffered not only for men, but also for the angels, and for the stars — in these words: "Since, therefore, he who has so great [things], and is [our] advocate, has had compassion on our infirmities, because he was tempted in all human [things] by [our] likeness, and [yet] without sin — he is a great high priest, since not for men alone, but for every [being] that is partaker of reason, [as] a victim once offered, he offered himself. For, 'except God, he tasted death for all,' as it is placed in certain copies of the epistle to the Hebrews, 'by the gift and grace of God.' But whether 'except God he tasted death for all' — [then] not only for all men did he suffer death, but also for the rest [of beings] which use reason; or [whether] 'by the grace of God he tasted death for all' — [then] for all except God he bore death. For 'by the grace of God he tasted death for all.' For indeed it is absurd to say that he died for human sins, but not also for some other [being] which, besides man, was in sin — for example, for the stars — since not even the stars are altogether clean before God, as we read in Job: [margin: Job 25.] 'But the stars are not clean before him' — unless perhaps this was said hyperbolically." See Annotation 117 of book 5, and below, Annotation 296.

Annotation CLXXI [contents]

"And the Word was God." — John 1[:1]

[margin: On the equality of the Father and the Son.]

Origen, at the beginning of the second tome on John, seems to have furnished a certain seedbed for the Arian heresy: for when he examined the cause why the Word in this place is called "God" without the addition of the Greek article ὁ, he says that this was done to show the difference of the Father and the Son. For the Father, because he is God by his own nature, is called, the article being added, ὁ Θεός ["the God"]; but the Son, because he is God by participation in his [the Father's] divinity, is called, without the article, Θεός ["God"]. His words are these: "With great observation — not as [though] ignorant of Greek subtlety — John in one place used the articles, in others he was silent about them: to the name, indeed — that is, to 'Word' [λόγῳ] — adjoining the ὁ; but to the word 'God' in one place adjoining [the article], in another taking [it] away. For he applies the article when the name 'God' is said of the unbegotten cause of all [things]; but does not apply the same, when the Word is named 'God.'" Then a little below, rendering the reason of this variety, he says: "It must be said that he who is God through himself is τὸν Θεόν — that is, God himself, as the Savior said in his prayer, [margin: John 17.] 'that they may know thee the only true God'; but everything which, besides God himself, is made God by participation in his divinity, is more properly called not τὸν Θεόν — that is, 'God himself' — but Θεός." And again, after a little: "The true God, therefore, is ὁ Θεός — that is, God himself; but those who are formed and fashioned after him are Θεοί — that is, gods, and are images of the first form and exemplar."

Chrysostom, in homily 3 on John, refutes this interpretation, the author's name being suppressed, re-

[catchword "re-" → "re[futes]," continues on p. 499 (PDF 504).]

(printed p. 499 [PDF p. 504], recto — end of Ann. CLXXI and Ann. CLXXII–CLXXIII, on John 1:1–3 (Chrysostom refutes the article-argument; creation "through" the Word; the John 1:3–4 punctuation dispute). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the Chrysostom citation of Annotation CLXXI, from the catchword "re-":)

-futing [it], demonstrates that it is of no moment — because both the Son in the sacred writings is sometimes called "God" with the article, and the Father is sometimes called "God" without the article. And he writes in this manner: "But someone will say [that] the Father is set [named] with the addition of the article, [and] the Son without the article. What, then? — when the Apostle says, [margin: Tit. 2.] τοῦ μεγάλου Θεοῦ, that is, 'of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ.' And again, [margin: Rom. 9.] ὢ ὀν ἐπὶ πάντων Θεός, that is, 'Who is over all, God,' without the article. Likewise, writing of the Father to the Philippians, [margin: Phil. 2.] ὃς ἐν μορφῇ Θεού ὑπάρχων, οὐχ ἁρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο τὸ εἶναι ἴσα Θεῷ, that is, 'Who, when he was in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God.' And to the Romans, [margin: Rom. 1.] 'Grace to you and peace ἀπὸ Θεοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν, from God our Father, and [from] the Lord Jesus Christ' — he neglected the article. For it is superfluous to prefix it everywhere, especially since above he had frequently used it. For just as, speaking of the Father, he says, [margin: John 4.] πνεῦμα ὁ Θεός, 'God is a spirit'; and [just as], although he does not add the article to 'spirit,' we do not on that account deny that God is incorporeal: so in this place, although the article is not prefixed to the Son, not on that account is the Son a lesser God than the Father. Since, therefore, he calls both this one and that one 'God,' he makes for us no difference of divinity of either, but altogether the contrary." Consider, prudent reader, whether the sayings of Origen can be benignly interpreted from those [things] which we have brought forward below, Annotation 175.

Annotation CLXXII [contents]

"All things were made through him." — John 1[:3]

[margin: On the Son, and the Holy Spirit.]

Origen, in the second tome on John, seems to draw two errors from this clause: first, that the totality of creation was not made through the Word, except as through an instrumental cause, and through a lesser [being]; second, that the Holy Spirit is a thing made of the Word itself. For he expresses both thus: "The [phrase] 'through which' never holds the first place, but always the second: as in the epistle to the Romans Paul says, [margin: Rom. 1.] 'through whom we have received grace'; and, 'which he had before promised through the prophets.' And in the epistle to the Hebrews, [margin: Heb. 1.] 'he has spoken to us in [his] Son, through whom he also made the ages' — teaching us that God made the ages through the Son, [namely] that through the only-begotten (who has that 'through which') the ages were made. So, then, in this place also, if all things were made through the Word itself, they were not made by the Word itself, but by [one] higher and greater than the Word is. And who is this, but the Father? But it must be considered — this being true, 'All things were made through him' — whether the Holy Spirit too was made through him. And I think it necessary that he who concedes the Spirit to have been made, and confesses that 'All things were made through him' is true, [should] concede and prove that the Holy Spirit was made by the Word, which [is] more ancient than it. But he who is unwilling to concede that the Holy Spirit was made through Christ, it follows that he says [the Spirit] was not made — [if] he judges that the [things] which are written in this gospel are true." And below: "These [things] have been much and long proved for those who would see more plainly and openly, that, if all things were made through him, the Spirit too was made through the Word — [the Spirit] who, [as] one of all things, is understood [to be] inferior to him through whom [it] was made — even if certain words seem to draw us to the contrary side."

(right column:)

Annotation CLXXIII [contents]

"And without him was made nothing." — John 1[:3]

[margin: On the true punctuation of the clause, "Without him was made nothing."]

Chrysostom, in the fourth homily on John, weighing this passage, seems to condemn as heretical the reading of those who read, "Without him was made nothing"; and then, a final period being placed, undertake another clause, saying, "What was made, in him was life." For he says: "When we shall have said, 'Without him was made nothing,' let us not mark it with a full period, as the heretics think. For these, since they wish the Spirit to be a creature, thus read: '[that] which was made, in him was life.' But by no reasoning at all can this sentence be understood."

Theophylact, in the commentaries, agreeing with Chrysostom, explains the names of the heretics who use this reading, with these words: "The Pneumatomachi [Spirit-fighters], who deny the Holy Spirit to be God, so read this clause: 'And without him was made nothing.' Then, a point being made in this place, they read, as [beginning] from another beginning, '[That] which was made, in him.' And they interpret that passage according to their own mind, saying that in this place the Evangelist speaks of the Holy Spirit, saying, '[That] which was made in him — that is, the Holy Spirit — was life.' Now this the Macedonians say, trying to show that the Holy Spirit is a creature, and to number him among those [things] which were made. But we [read] not thus: but, a point being made, after he said '[that] which was made,' we read a new beginning, 'In him was life.'"

Euthymius, subscribing to both, renders the reason why that reading is not to be received; he uses these words: "Those who resist the Holy Spirit, and diminish his nature, place a distinction [stop] after that which is said, 'Without him was made nothing'; then read together what follows, '[That] which was made in him was life' — that they may show the Holy Spirit to have been made. For they say [the Evangelist] speaks of him by such a word. But they are easily refuted: first, because that part, '[That] which was made,' being set indistinctly, indicates everything that was made; then, because 'life' too is said to be 'light' — for he adds that 'the Life was the light of men.' And a little after, speaking of John, 'He came for a testimony, that he might bear witness of the light.' But it is manifest that John bore witness not of the Holy Spirit, but of the Son — as we find in what follows."

These [things] Euthymius, Theophylact, and Chrysostom [say]; from whose words it is not to be inferred that those are heretics who place a period after the word "Nothing," but [only] those who do it to this end — that they may deny the divinity of the Holy Spirit. For among the Greeks Cyril, and among the Latins Augustine, a point being placed after the word "Nothing," undertake a new sentence, saying: "[That] which was made, in him was life." And this reading all the Latin Church follows, which to me too seems true and genuine. For it agrees with the peculiar style of this Evangelist to begin, as it were, each [following] member from the end of the preceding member: "was made nothing" is the end of the upper clause; "[That] which was made" is the beginning of the other. Of which form are also those [phrases]: "In the beginning was the Word"; and "the Word was with God"; and "God was the Word." The phrase, ending

[catchword "finiens" → "the phrase, ending," continues on p. 500 (PDF 505).]

(printed p. 500 [PDF p. 505], verso — end of Ann. CLXXIII and Ann. CLXXIV–CLXXV, on John 1:3–5 ("nothing" = sin/idol/devil?; whether the Son is less than the Father — Cyril's Thesaurus*). Read order: left column, then right.)*

(left column — concluding Annotation CLXXIII, from the catchword "finiens":)

[the phrase] ending the prior clause begins the following. In the fourth [member] he repeats the beginning of the first: "This was in the beginning"; and thus he completes the period. Again, in this which follows — "[That] which was made, in him was life; and the life was the light of men; and the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not" — always the step of the following [member] is taken from the nearest [preceding] member.

Annotation CLXXIV [contents]

"And without him was made nothing." — John 1[:3]

[margin: Whether sin is nothing.]

Augustine, in the first tractate on John, weighing that word "NOTHING," asserts that by "NOTHING" can be understood malice and sin, likewise also the sinful man, and the idol, and the devil — which indeed were not made by God. And he explains this interpretation with these words: "See, do not so think, as though 'nothing' were something. For many, ill understanding 'Without him was made nothing,' are wont to think that 'nothing' is something. Sin, indeed, was not made through him, because sin is nothing, and men become nothing when they sin. And the idol was not made through the Word. It has, indeed, a certain human form: but the man himself was made through the Word (for the form of man in the idol was not made through the Word); [margin: 1 Cor. 8.] and it is written, 'We know that an idol is nothing.' Therefore these [things] were not made through the Word."

Jerome, in chapter 2 on Micah, explaining that [text], "On account of the uncleanness of the corrupt, you have fled from the corruption, no one pursuing," etc. — seems in a certain way to explode this exposition as forced, saying: "I know that I have read, in the commentaries of a certain [author] expounding the beginning of John the Evangelist — 'All things were made through him, and without him was made nothing' — [that] this [word] which is said, 'nothing,' he referred to malice; and again, that he interpreted malice itself [to be] the devil, and by this step, as it were, understood that itself, which was made without Christ — 'Nothing' — [to be] the devil. If, then, malice, or the devil, is nothing; and those who are corrupted with corruption have fled: no one — that is, 'Nothing' — pursuing, the devil pursued them into nothing." But if to anyone this seems too forced, and set forth against the simplicity of Scripture rather by an artifice of eloquence than by a true interpretation, let him follow another exposition. These [things] Jerome [says].

There are [some] who think that Augustine too recognized this, and therefore expounded this passage otherwise, in the book On the Nature of the Good, against the Manichaeans, chapter 25 — where, the tropological understanding (which he followed here) being omitted, and embracing the genuine literal sense, he interprets "that 'Without him was made nothing' is worth just as much as if you say, 'Whatever was made, was not made without him'; or, 'Whatever subsists among created things, was made by him.'"

Annotation CLXXV [contents]

"The life was the light of men, and the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not." — John 1[:4–5]

[margin: Whether the Son, as regards the divinity, is less than the Father.]

Origen, in the second tome on John, elucidating this clause, seems to have pronounced that the Son, as regards the divinity, is less than the Father, and divided from the paternal essence — speaking in this manner:

(right column — continuing Annotation CLXXV:)

"Since in this place the Savior is simply called 'light,' but in the catholic epistle of John himself [margin: 1 John 1.] God is said to be 'light'; a certain [author] thinks that hence it is gathered that the Father is not distinct in essence from the Son. But he who observes more diligently, and speaks more rightly, will say that by nature the 'light which shineth in the darkness, not apprehended by the darkness itself' is not the same as the 'light in which there is in no way any darkness.'" And below: "This light is called 'the true Light,' by which the Father, the God of truth, is ampler [more] than the Word; and greater than the truth; and, because he is the Father of wisdom, is better and more excellent than wisdom itself, and by this reasoning the true Light excels [it]," etc.

In these Origenic words, two [things] are to be inspected: first, that Origen does not deny the Son to be of the same substance or essence with the Father — which he openly affirms in many places, and most constantly proclaims; but he says [that] it cannot be gathered from this passage so plainly as some think. Then it is to be observed that the Greek fathers do not shrink from this Origenic manner of speaking, by which the Son is asserted [to be] less than the Father — not, indeed, in substance, but in origin. According to which reasoning, very frequently among the Greek theologians the Father is said to excel the Son by the dignity, authority, and majesty of [being the] principle [source]. But if to anyone it seems that faith is not to be given to me [in this], let him read Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, in book 1 of the Thesaurus, chapter 10 — where, explaining that [text] from John's gospel, "The Father is greater than I," he writes thus: "In a certain place Christ says, [margin: John 14.] 'The Father is greater'; and of him again we read, [margin: Phil. 2.] 'He thought it not robbery to be equal with God': it must be diligently investigated how he is at once both equal, and has a greater Father — for these seem mutually to conflict. But we, weighing them piously, will neither deny the Son to be equal, because the Father is greater; nor say the Father not to be greater, because the Son is equal; but by a pious interpretation we will confirm both. Since, then, the nature of the divinity is simple and uncomposed, it could never have been distinguished in thought into Father and Son, unless a certain difference were applied — not in the essence itself, but extrinsically — by which each person, remaining in its own hypostasis, might be joined, on account of the same nature of both, in one divinity, so that no confusion or commingling of the Father and the Son should be made. Which indeed would happen, if the persons of the Father and the Son — on account of [their] exquisite likeness, which would not allow those twin [persons] to be seen [as distinct] — should run together into one hypostasis. For hence some have suspected that the Father and the Son are the same, and not two distinct persons. Therefore it behooved us to recognize both the begetting nature, and the hypostasis begotten from it. On this account Scripture set before us the names of 'Father' and 'Son,' that we might understand [them as] 'light from light,' and both in their own hypostasis, and the same essence in both. But, imitating our custom, does it call the Father 'greater,' that on every side we may recognize the persons [as] distinct, and the one from the other? — yet it attests the same equality, lest we should suspect any dissimilarity of the essence of the Father and the Son. The Son, therefore, since by reason of essence he is equal to the Father, and in all [things] like [him], calls him 'greater' as [being] the principle without principle — that he may declare that he [the Son] is from him [the Father], although he has one and the same [nature] with him he has one and the same nature with him." These [things] Cyril [says]; with whom Chrysostom agrees, in homily 74 on John, where, expounding that [text], "The Father is greater than I," he says: "If anyone should call the Father greater than the Son, inasmuch as [he is the] principle of the Son, neither would we contradict this: yet this does not make the Son to be of another substance." Nor does Hilary dissent from these, in book 9 On the Trinity: where, expounding the same passage of John, he says that the Father is greater than the Son by the authority of generation, [but] that the Son, nevertheless, is not less than the Father by the nature of the divinity. In the same manner St. Thomas notes, in the book Against the Errors of the Greeks, that Basil said [that] the Son is second to the Father in dignity, and the Holy Spirit second to the Son in dignity — that is, in the dignity of hypostasis, not of nature.

[catchword "illo" → "with him," continues on p. 501 (PDF 506).]

(printed p. 501 [PDF p. 506], recto — end of Ann. CLXXV and Ann. CLXXVI–CLXXIX, on John 1:5–9 ("greater" by origin not nature; Origen's pre-existence errors; Ferus on faith). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CLXXV, from the catchword "illo":)

Observe these [things] carefully, reader, that thou mayest be able to interpret piously all passages of this kind, in which Origen, on account of the unusual form of [his] words, seems to have thought ill of the Homoousion [consubstantial] Son of God. But in the other passages, which cannot be defended by an interpretation of this kind, remember that Origen was most wickedly corrupted by the Arians, especially in this topic — as very many and most luminous testimonies of his concerning the consubstantial and coeternal deity of the Son and the Father, cited in the Apology of Pamphilus the Martyr, show more clearly than the light.

Annotation CLXXVI [contents]

"The light shineth in darkness." — John 1[:5]

[margin: On the Son, and the Holy Spirit.]

Origen, in the second tome on John, seems in a certain way to number the Son and the Holy Spirit among those [things] which were made, when he says: "If anyone should consider the multitude of the contemplations which are in God, and of the knowledge which cannot be comprehended by human nature — and perhaps by the others which were made, besides Christ and the Holy Spirit — he will understand that darkness surrounds God."

Annotation CLXXVII [contents]

"This man came for a testimony, that he might bear witness of the light." — John 1[:7]
[margin: The soul of John the Baptist existing before [his] body.]

Origen, in the second tome on John, narrating this clause, brings forth three [things] beside the common opinion of the theologians.

The first is, that the soul of John the Baptist was more ancient than his body — in these words: "For he who observes that nothing is done unjustly, nor by chance, nor by lot, [for him] it is necessary to approve that the soul of John [is] more ancient and prior to [his] body; and that this same soul — since it previously cohered [existed] and was — was sent unto the ministries of testimony concerning the truth."

The second is, that many angels were of old incarnated, and that perhaps one of these was John the Baptist. Which position he explains thus: "Since we are engaged in a discourse about John, we will conveniently add our opinion which we hold about him. For since we read this prophecy about him — [margin: Mal. 3.] 'Behold, I send my angel before thy face, who shall prepare thy way before thee' — let us consider whether he, [being] one of the holy angels, is sent to the ministry [as] the forerunner of our Savior. Nor is it a wonder if, when the firstborn of all creation had, out of his love toward the human race, put on a body, there were some rivals and imitators of Christ, who wished, with a like body, to minister to his benignity among men; but that a certain [one] did not imitate [him], who venerated [him], leaping with joy, even when he was in the womb — as though surpassing the common nature of men. But if anyone accepts also the prayer of Joseph, ascribed among the mysteries [apocrypha] which are current among the Hebrews, he will take thence a dogma and decree like to this — namely, that those who were from the beginning, since they had something special beyond other men, and were much better than the rest in [their] souls, descended from the nature of angels into the nature of men. For Jacob says: 'For I speak to you, [I] Jacob and Israel: I am the angel of God, and a chief spirit; and Abraham and Isaac were created before every work.'"

(right column — continuing Annotation CLXXVII:)

The third is, that Jacob and Esau were reckoned worthy of God's hatred and love for this [reason] — that their souls acted in heaven before they descended into bodies. This opinion he embraces in these words: "Consider whether that common and celebrated saying about Jacob and Esau has [this] explanation: [margin: Rom. 9.] 'When they had not yet been born, or done anything good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand — not of works, but of him that calleth — it was said to her: The elder shall serve the younger, as it is written, Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated. What, then, shall we say? Is there injustice with God? By no means.' But if, when they had not yet been born, or done anything good or evil, [and yet] 'that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth,' it was said [thus] — and if we do not run to works which precede this life — how is that true, that there is no injustice with God [in] the elder serving the younger, and being held in hatred before he did the [things] worthy both of servitude and of hatred?" [margin: The cause of the election of Jacob, and the reprobation of Esau.] Read Annotation 182 of the preceding book.

Annotation CLXXVIII [contents]

"That all might believe through him." — John 1[:7]

[margin: Whether faith alone suffices for those to be saved.]

John Ferus, in the commentaries, expounding this sentence: "You see," he says, "that John came for our sake; but he does not say, 'that they might believe in him': for faith is to be referred to God alone. But if John was sent for no other [reason] than that we might believe through him: therefore faith is the sum of Christian justice — as also elsewhere it is said, 'The just [man] lives by faith.'" Domingo de Soto, in his Annotations, gathers from these words that Ferus holds, with the Lutherans, that faith alone is sufficient for the salvation of the soul, and that the works of charity are not necessary. See below, Annotation 212.

Annotation CLXXIX [contents]

[the print misnumbers this "ANNOTATIO LXXIX," dropping the leading C]

"It was the true light." — John 1[:9]

[margin: Whether faith is lost through [mortal] sin.]

John Ferus, in the exposition of this passage: "He, therefore," he says, "who acts impiously — fearing that he would be tormented by hunger if he lived piously — does not believe Christ to be God." Domingo de Soto, disapproving these words in his Annotations against Ferus, says: "He seems to reckon all who are in mortal sin [as] acting impiously; for he appears to bring forward examples of those who, lest they be tormented by hunger, fal-

[the heading is printed "ANNOTATIO LXXIX" — the "C" of CLXXIX dropped; signature "Tt"; catchword "-tati" → the word begun "fu-" (perhaps fu[rati sunt], "have stolen") continues on p. 502 (PDF 507).]

(printed p. 502 [PDF p. 507], verso — end of Ann. CLXXIX and Ann. CLXXX–CLXXXII, on John 1:14–18 (faith lost through mortal sin?; whether God's essence can be seen — Chrysostom, Theodoret). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CLXXIX, from the catchword completing "fu-":)

steal; and of those who, succumbing to another disease [vice], perpetrate another evil. But to say that all delinquents of this kind do not believe Christ to be God, is an error condemned at Trent — namely, that faith is lost through any [kind of] mortal offense, since it is not lost except through unbelief." These [things] he [Soto says]. Michael Medina, refuting this kind of censure in his Apologeticum, says: "In confuting these [things], many [things] would indeed have to be said by us, by which we might assail his petty reasonings, did we not fear the increase of a large volume, and were we unwilling to exceed Christian modesty. Only so much is to be brought forward by us in this part [as shows] how far Soto departs from the Christian manner of speaking, [Soto] who condemns the very first elements of the words of God. Who — a Christian [even] of three months old — is ignorant that it is rightly and most Christianly said that sinners, whoever they be, lose the Christian faith, especially in that part in which they most obstinately sin? Not that that barren faith — to which the vice of idolatry, or of unbelief, is opposed — vanishes when a mortal sin is committed (for this the Lutherans have foolishly held, being ignorant of the phrase of the Scriptures, which calls 'faith' only that [faith] which, joined to charity, produces the glorious fruits of works); but that, by the plain manner of speaking which sacred Scripture always observes, that languid and nerveless credulity, from which altogether contrary acts are derived, is judged unworthy of the name of 'faith.' [margin: Titus 1.] 'They confess,' says the Apostle, 'of certain [men], that they know God, but by [their] deeds they deny [him]; being abominable, and incredulous, and reprobate to every good work.' Behold, here the Apostle calls unbelievers [those] sinners who, although they confessed with the mouth, yet by [their] deeds produced works contrary to faith. And elsewhere, [margin: 1 Tim. 5.] 'If anyone has not care of his own, especially of his household, he has denied the faith, and is worse than an unbeliever.' Not that in these passages the Apostle Paul means that unformed faith vanishes through a mortal offense; but that he does not believe entire faith to stand together with a perverse perseverance in enormous offenses — which [entire faith] alone Christ and the sanction of the evangelical law demand."

Annotation CLXXX [contents]

"And the Word was made flesh." — John 1[:14]

Chrysostom, in the tenth homily on John, seems to except no one from the reading and study of the divine Scripture. Read what is written above, Annotation 152 of this book.

Annotation CLXXXI [contents]

"Of whose fullness we all have received." — John 1[:16]

[margin: Whether works [done] apart from grace are sins.]

John Ferus, in the commentaries on John, explaining this, Domingo de Soto, in the Annotations published against the same [Ferus], reprehends — because he broke out into these words: "Cursed are not only the [things] which we do, but also the [things] which are done upon us: cursed is the thought, the reason, the mouth, the hands, the feet of our heart; cursed are all [things] that befall us, whether joyful or sad," etc. See above, Annotation 40.

(right column:)

Annotation CLXXXII [contents]

"No man hath seen God at any time." — John 1[:18]

[margin: Whether the essence of God can be beheld by any creature.]

Chrysostom, in the fourteenth homily on John, seems to gather two [things] from these words. The first, that the nature, substance, and essence of God cannot be beheld by any creature by an intuitive vision of the mind, but is known only by an abstraction of thought and imagination. And this he sets forth in these words: "That which God is, not only did the prophets not see, but neither the angels nor the archangels. For if thou shalt question them, thou wilt hear nothing from them about the substance of God, but only, [margin: Luke 2.] 'Glory to God in the highest.'" And a little after he adds: "But if all nature is created, by what reasoning will it be able to see the uncreated? For if we cannot manifestly behold an incorporeal power, however begotten [created] — and this has often been shown in the angels — much less [can we behold] the incorporeal and unbegotten substance. Wherefore Paul says, 'Whom no one has ever seen, nor can see.'" And below, meeting the objection which seems to stand against these [things], he says: "What, then, is that saying, [margin: Matt. 18 & 5.] 'Their angels see the face of my Father who is in heaven'; and 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God'? For [that] thought and imagination which, according to our strength, we conceive of God — that he calls 'vision.' Nor is it to be understood otherwise of the angels, on account of their pure nature, subject to no sleep, since they ever ponder in [their] mind nothing else than God."

[margin: Whether the Son of God was invisible to the angels before the incarnation.] The second [point] deduced from this evangelical clause is, that the Son of God, before he put on a body, was invisible to the angels; but then, after he put on flesh, [was] seen by the angels. And he expresses this opinion in this manner: "Paul says of the Son, [margin: 1 Tim. 3.] 'Who was manifested in the flesh' — but the manifestation through the flesh is not according to [his] substance. For [to show] that he is invisible not only to men, but also to the supernal Powers, when Paul had said [he was] 'manifested in the flesh,' he added, 'seen by angels.' Therefore, from [the time] when he put on flesh, then was he seen by the angels: but before, he was not so seen, since to them too his substance was invisible." Thus far Chrysostom.

Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, seems to explain the former proposition of Chrysostom more openly, teaching that God is seen by the angels not in [his] substance and essence, but through certain likenesses, in the manner in which of old he was seen by the prophets. But it is better to bring here his words from the dialogue, which is entitled The Unchangeable: in which the Orthodox and Eranistes are brought in speaking in this manner. ERANISTES: How shall we understand that "their angels always see the face of the Father"? ORTHODOX: As we are wont to understand those [things] which are said of the men who are reckoned to have seen God. ER.: Speak more plainly; for I did not understand. ORTH.: Can God be seen by men? ER.: By no means. ORTH.: And yet we hear the divine Scripture saying, [margin: Gen. 18.] "God was seen by Abraham at the oak of Mambre"; and Isaiah saying, [margin: Isa. 6.] "I saw the Lord sitting upon a throne high and lofty." And of Moses the history says, [margin: Exod. 33.] "The Lord spoke to Moses face to face, just as a man speaks to his friend." Nay, more-

[catchword "-tiam" (etiam) → "Nay, moreover," continues on p. 503 (PDF 508).]

(printed p. 503 [PDF p. 508], recto — end of Ann. CLXXXII and Ann. CLXXXIII–CLXXXIV, on John 1:18–38 (God seen only through likenesses; Chrysostom's "Pelagian" reading; Cassian's semi-Pelagianism). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the Theodoret citation of Annotation CLXXXII, from the catchword "-tiam":)

Nay, moreover, the God of all [things] himself also says, [margin: Num. 12.] "Mouth to mouth will I speak to him in [open] sight, and not through riddles." What, then, shall we say — that they saw the divine nature? ER.: By no means. For God himself said, "No one shall see my face, and live." ORTH.: Do they lie, then, who said they had seen God? ER.: By no means: for they saw those [things] which could be seen by them. ORTH.: God, then, measures [his] revelations by the powers of those who see. ER.: Most certainly. ORTH.: And this he made manifest through the prophet, saying, [margin: Isa. 6.] "I have filled visions, and in the hands of the prophets I have been likened" — he did not say, "I was seen," but "I was likened." But a likening does not signify the same nature of him who is seen. For neither does the image of a king show the very nature of the king, even if it reproduces the express and evident features of the king. ER.: This is obscure, and not sufficiently plain. ORTH.: Therefore neither did those who contemplated those revelations see the substance of God. ER.: But who would be so mad as to dare to say this? ORTH.: Yet it was said that they saw [him]. ER.: It was said. ORTH.: But we, both using pious reasonings, and believing the divine sentences, which openly cry out, "No man hath ever seen God," say that they did not see the divine nature, but certain visions which suited their faculty, and did not exceed its measure. ER.: So we say. ORTH.: So, then, let us understand of the angels, hearing that "they see the face of the Father." For they do not see the divine substance, which can neither be circumscribed, nor comprehended, nor perceived by the mind, and which comprehends all [things], but a certain glory which answers to their powers, and is measured out to them. ER.: That these [things] are so, is confessed. These [things] Theodoret [says].

Theophylact seems to follow the same opinion; in whose commentaries, at the exposition of this passage, it is read thus: "But here perhaps someone will say: How do we learn in this place that no one has seen God, when the prophet says, [margin: Isa. 6.] 'I saw the Lord'? The prophet did indeed see God — but not the substance itself, but a certain likeness and appearance, as he was able to grasp [it]. And another again saw [him] in another figure, and another in another. Whence, namely, they did not see the very Truth: for they would not have seen in diverse figures that [Truth] which is simple and unfigurable. Nay, neither do the angels see the substance of God, although they are said to see his face. For this indicates that God always appears to them. The Son, therefore, alone of all men always sees the Father." Thus far Theophylact.

Euthymius, agreeing with these, says in the commentaries: "No creature sees God — not only [no] material [one], but also [no] immaterial [one]. For even to the immaterial Powers themselves God is invisible in his own nature — although, as [far as] is granted to them, they [do] see God."

St. Thomas, in the first volume of the Theological Summa, and in the fourth [book] of the Sentences, question 1, article 2, weighing the adduced opinion of Chrysostom, sets forth a rule from Augustine's book On Seeing God, most apt for explaining sentences of this kind. For he says they are to be interpreted in a threefold way. The first, that we understand [it to mean that] no one has ever seen, or will see, the divine essence with bodily eyes; secondly, that no one, while he lives in this mortal flesh, will see the nature of the divine substance with the spiritual eye of the mind; thirdly, that no one has ever seen, or will ever see, the substance of God by the vision of comprehension — by which, namely, God knows himself, and he alone comprehends his own substance, of what quality and how great it is. And in this way [Aquinas] holds that Chrysostom is to be understood: and he says that [Chrysostom] manifestly signifies this in the following words, when he says: "Many of us know God: yet the substance itself, of what quality it is, his only-begotten alone knows — [he] who has a certain notion, and sight, and comprehension [of it], such as it is fitting the Son should have of the Father." These [things] Thomas [says]; to whose interpretation thou canst recall the sayings of Theodoret, Theophylact, and Euthymius. And let these [things] concerning the first proposition of Chrysostom suffice.

(right column — concluding the Aquinas rule of Annotation CLXXXII:)

Concerning the second proposition we have touched on some [things] above, in Annotations 142 and 165, and below, Annotation 299.

Annotation CLXXXIII [contents]

"I saw, and gave testimony." — John 1[:34]

Chrysostom, in the sixteenth homily on John — what he said about the reading of holy Scripture, [as] necessary for the salvation of all — thou hast above, Annotation 152.

Annotation CLXXXIV [contents]

"But Jesus turning, and seeing them following, said to them, What seek ye?" — John 1[:38]

[margin: Whether the beginning of our salvation is from us.]

Chrysostom, in the seventeenth homily on John, expounding these [words], is thought to be of this opinion — that the beginning of our salvation is so implanted in us by nature that, without the help of prevenient grace, we can by our own powers attain justification. Which savors of the dogma of the Pelagians. For thus he left [it] written in that place: "Hence we can be admonished that God does not, by his benefits toward us, forestall our wills, but that a beginning must be made by us: but when we show ourselves, with a prompt and prepared mind, ready to receive grace, then he offers us many occasions of salvation."

John Cassian, a disciple of Chrysostom, placing himself in the middle between those who, with the catholics, affirm that we are prevented [forestalled] by the grace of God, and those who, with the Pelagians, assert that we forestall the grace of God, taught that some [men] anticipate the divine grace by their own will, but that the wills of some are anticipated by the divine grace. His words, in the thirteenth book of the Conferences, chapter 11, run thus: "Among many [it] is debated with a great question: whether God has mercy on us because we have furnished a beginning of good will; or [whether] because God has mercy, we obtain a beginning of good will? For many, believing these [things] singly, and asserting [them] more than is just, have been entangled in various and mutually contrary errors. For if we shall say that the beginning of good will is ours: what was there in the persecutor Paul, what in the Publican Matthew — of whom the one, brooding over the blood and torments of the innocent, the other over violences and public robberies, is [nonetheless] drawn to salvation? But if [we shall say] that the beginning of good will is always inspired by the grace of God

[signature "Tt 2"; catchword "prin-" → "the begin[ning]," continues on p. 504 (PDF 509).]

(printed p. 504 [PDF p. 509], verso — end of Ann. CLXXXIV and Ann. CLXXXV–CLXXXVII, on John 2–3 (Cassian's semi-Pelagianism; Mary's "vainglory" at Cana; the 46-year temple; the Filioque begins). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding the Cassian citation of Annotation CLXXXIV, from the catchword "prin-":)

—the beginning [of good will], what shall we say of the faith of Zacchaeus, what of the piety of that thief on the cross — who, by their [own] desire bringing a certain violence upon the heavenly kingdoms, forestalled the special admonitions of [their] calling?" etc.

Prosper, bishop of Riez, disputed against the opinion of Cassian in a particular volume, entitled On Free Will; Gennadius, however, taking [it] ill — who, in the catalogue of illustrious writers, complains that the little works of Cassian, which the Church of God approves as salutary, were unworthily defamed by Prosper. What is to be thought concerning the opinion of Chrysostom, thou hast above, Annotation 101 of book 5.

Annotation CLXXXV [contents]

"The wine failing, she says [to him], They have no wine." — John 2[:3]
[margin: Whether Mary always had a becoming opinion of Christ.]

Chrysostom, in the twentieth homily on John, seems to assert that the Virgin Mary did not always have a becoming opinion of Christ's divinity, and that on that account she, at the wedding in Cana of Galilee, out of a certain human affection of empty glory, unseasonably asked a miracle of [her] Son. For thus we read in him: "It is worth inquiring in this place whence it came into the mother's mind to conjecture something great about [her] Son: for he had as yet done no sign. For this he did [as] the beginning of signs. [His divinity] had already begun to be manifested, both by John's testimony, and from those [things] which he had foretold to the disciples; and, before all these, the nativity itself, and the [things] which had happened at that time, had stirred up the greatest opinion about the boy. For she heard, he says, all [things], and kept [them] in her heart. Therefore, when she had heard that John had come to bear testimony about him, and now saw the disciples, she began to dare [to hope]. And, the wine failing, she says, 'They have no wine' — for she desired both now to win the favor of men, and that she herself might be made more illustrious by the [display of the] Son's grace. And perhaps she was affected by some human feeling — just as also his brethren, when they said, [margin: John 2 (cf. John 7).] 'Show thyself to the world,' being desirous of gaining fame for themselves by his miracles. On that account he answered rather harshly, 'What is it to me and to thee, woman? My hour is not yet come.' For that he reverenced [his] mother, [margin: Luke 2.] Luke attests — [in saying] that he was subject to [his] parents; and this Evangelist [attests] how great care he had for [his] mother at the time of the Passion. For where the parents would in no way hinder the divine mysteries, [and] would give no offense, it is fair and necessary for the Son to obey, nor can he refuse without great peril. But on the contrary, when they ask something unseasonably, and hinder [his] spiritual discourse, it is not safe to comply with them — on that account here too he answers thus. And elsewhere again, he said, 'Who is my mother, and [who are] my brethren?' For they did not yet have a due opinion of him, but, after the manner of mothers, Mary judged that she might by right command all [things] to [her] Son — whereas it was fitting to worship and reverence [him] as Lord; therefore he answered in this manner. Consider how unseemly it was — the whole people standing by, and hanging [in suspense] to hear him and his doctrine — [for] her, coming forward into the midst, to hinder the public benefit, and to hold discourse about private matters, and to call [him] away from such an assembly." The same thou hast above, Annotation 58 of this book.

(right column:)

Theophylact writes here the same as Chrysostom. Euthymius likewise the same.

Annotation CLXXXVI [contents]

"Forty and six years was this temple in building." — John 2[:20]

[margin: Whether the body of Christ was first formed in the womb before it was assumed by the deity.]

Augustine, in the book of 83 Questions, question 56, so expounds this passage that he seems to affirm that the body of Christ was conceived in the womb of [his] mother before it was assumed by the divinity — saying thus: "Human conception is said to proceed and be perfected thus: that in the first six days it has, as it were, a likeness of milk; in the following nine days it is converted into blood; then in twelve days it is solidified; in the remaining eighteen days it is formed, up to the perfect lineaments of all the members. Forty-five days, then, with one added — which signifies the sum: for six, and nine, and twelve, and eighteen, brought together into one, make forty-five; one being added, therefore, as has been said, they make forty-six. Not absurdly, then, is the temple said to have been built in forty-six years — [the temple] which signifies his body: so that, as many years as there were in the building of the temple, so many days there were in the perfecting of the Lord's body."

Peter Lombard, in the third book of the Sentences, distinction 3, sifting this interpretation of Augustine, writes thus: "On the occasion of these words, certain [men] have presumed to say [that] the form of the Lord's body [was] perfected in so many days, after the manner of other bodies, and distinguished by the lineaments of [its] members; and [that] then the Word is said to have united to itself flesh and soul: and in this manner they say that that number befits the perfection of the Lord's body. But there was another reason for that saying, from which a sound understanding of the word arises. For Augustine did not say that [as though denying] that, as soon as that flesh — sanctified by the working of the Holy Spirit, and separated from the rest — was united to the Word of God together with a soul (so that [he] might be perfect and true God, [and] perfect and true man): but [he said it] because the distinction of the members of that Lord's body, in the very moment of the conception and of the union of God and man, was so slight and small that it could scarcely be submitted to human sight; but in those days which Augustine mentions, it was perfected and made conspicuous."

Annotation CLXXXVII [contents]

"For God giveth not the Spirit by measure." — John 3[:34]

[margin: Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father alone.]

Theophylact, in the commentaries, expounding this clause, teaches that the Holy Spirit proceeds not from the Father and the Son, but from the Father only — with these words: "It will not be unseasonable to say in this place how the Son has the Spirit, and how [the Spirit] is called the Spirit of the Son. For the Apostle too says, 'He sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father'; and again, 'But if anyone has not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.' Truly the Latins, expounding these [things] badly, and understanding [them] less rightly, say that the Spirit also proceeds from the Son. But we say this first of all to them: that it is one thing to be from someone, and another to be [someone's]

[catchword "tu-" → "to be [someone's own]," continues on p. 505 (PDF 510).]

(printed p. 505 [PDF p. 510], recto — Ann. CLXXXVII cont., on John 3:34 (the Filioque — Theophylact vs. Sixtus; the Greek fathers; Council of Florence). Read order: left column, then right. NB: this page had heavy ink show-through; it was collated word-for-word against a clearer parallel edition (printed pp. 494–495) and confirmed correct.)

(left column — continuing the Theophylact citation of Annotation CLXXXVII, from the catchword "tu-":)

—[another thing to be] someone's own: as the Spirit is indeed the Spirit of the Son, without doubt, and approved by all Scripture; but that [the Spirit] is from the Son no Scripture attests — lest we introduce two principles of the Spirit, [namely] the Father and the Son. "Assuredly," he says: "for [Christ] both breathed on the disciples, and said, 'Receive the Holy Spirit.' O folly! if he then gave the disciples the Spirit, when he breathed [on them]: how did he afterward say to them, 'You shall receive the power of the Holy Spirit coming upon you, not after many days'? Or how do we believe the descent of the Spirit to have been made at Pentecost, if indeed he gave him on the evening of the day of resurrection? For then he breathed [on them]. But these [things] are indeed very ridiculous. For it is manifest that he did not then give them the Holy Spirit, but one gift of the Holy Spirit — namely, the remission of sin. For at once he adds, 'Whose sins you shall remit.' But the Son has the Spirit substantially, as consubstantial to himself — not [as one] from whom he receives operation, as the prophets [do]. And [the Spirit] is called the Spirit of the Son inasmuch as [he is] truth, and power, and wisdom. But the Holy Spirit is described by Isaiah as the Spirit of truth, and of fortitude, and of wisdom. And otherwise [he is called the Spirit of the Son], because through the Son he is given to men: on that account he is called [the Spirit] of the Son. Believe thou, therefore, that the Spirit indeed proceeds from the Father, but is given to the creature through the Son; and let this be to thee the canon of orthodox doctrine."

This opinion of Theophylact, John Damascene, Euthymius, and very many other more recent Greeks approve — though the ancient fathers of the Eastern and Western church cry out against [it], who most clearly testify that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son. [margin: John Damascene, bk. 1 On the Faith, ch. 11, says: "'from the Father' we say, but 'from the Son' we do not say [it] of the Holy Spirit." Yet the same [author], in the history of the two soldiers of Christ (Barlaam and Josaphat), not far from the middle, says: "Know [the Spirit as] one, proceeding from the Father and the Son, perfect God and life-giving." — John 15.] But because Theophylact charges the Latin defenders of this opinion with a twofold argument — namely, that they have no testimony of this assertion in the divine Scripture, and that they set up two principles of the Holy Spirit, namely the Father and the Son — therefore, refuting both, we say, first, that we have in the sacred writings the testimony of Christ, who, speaking of the Holy Spirit in John, says: "When he shall come, that Spirit of truth, he will teach you all truth; for he shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear, he shall speak; he shall glorify me, because he shall receive of mine, and shall announce [it] to you. All things whatsoever the Father hath are mine. Therefore I said, that he shall receive of mine, and shall announce [it] to you." From these words it is clear that the Holy Spirit is produced from the Son; for [in] that he says, "He shall receive of mine," it is just as if he said: As he shall receive subsistence from me by production, so also [he shall receive] all knowledge. For as the Son had said elsewhere that he had heard from his Father, so now he says that the Holy Spirit hears from him. And how [the Spirit] hears, he declares, adding, "Because he shall receive of mine" — that is, "Because he is, and is [being] produced, and shall be produced, of my substance, and from me. And that I said he would receive from me — do not wonder: because, as he receives from the Father, so he receives from me. For all [things] which the Father has are mine. If, then, he receives of the substance of the Father, he must [also] receive of mine." If, therefore, the Spirit receives of my substance, it cannot be but that he also proceeds from me.

And lest anyone suspect that this passage was understood otherwise by the ancient fathers of the Eastern church, it is worth bringing forward here the interpretations of certain illustrious fathers of Greece — among whom Didymus, in book 1 On the Holy Spirit, Jerome [being] the translator, writes thus: "The Savior, who is also the Truth, says of the Spirit, [margin: John 15.] 'He shall not speak of himself' — that is, not without me, and without what is mine, and the will of the Father; because he is inseparable from my will and the Father's: because he is not of himself, but is of the Father and of me. For this very [thing], that he subsists and speaks, is to him from the Father and from me. I speak the truth — that is, I inspire — [the things] which he speaks: since indeed he is the Spirit of truth." Epiphanius too, bishop of Salamis, in the book which is entitled Ancoratus, expounds this same testimony of Christ with these words: "'He shall glorify me, because he shall receive of mine, and shall announce [it] to you.' If, then, he proceeds from the Father, and 'shall receive of mine,' says the Lord — just as no one knows the Father, save the Son, and no one [knows] the Son, save the Father — I dare indeed to affirm that no one knows the Spirit, save the Father and the Son, from whom he proceeds, and shall receive." And below: "The Spirit is of the Father, and the Spirit of the Son — not according to any composition, as in us the soul and body [are], but in the midst of the Father and the Son, [proceeding] from the Father and the Son." Athanasius likewise, writing to Serapion, interprets thus: "The Spirit receives from the Son, according to the Lord's word, 'He shall receive of mine, and shall announce [it] to you.' For the Spirit has such an order and nature toward the Son as the Son [has] toward the Father." These [things are] to the first objection of Theophylact.

(right column — continuing Annotation CLXXXVII:)

But as to what he adds in the second place — that we deduce the Holy Spirit from two principles — [it] is so far from the truth that we even execrate those who hold so, as is clear from the anathematisms of various synods, but especially of Lyons and of Florence. For in the eighth session of the general Council of Florence it is read thus: "Since the Greeks suspect that we profess two principles, or two causes, in the holy consubstantial Trinity, therefore [those] holding this opinion, or professing such [things], we mark with an anathema. [margin: The Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit.] Since we ourselves believe that the operation and power of the Father and the Son [is] the one single cause of the Holy Spirit — so that the Son is not a principle different from the Father, from which the Holy Spirit proceeds and has [its] being. For we profess the Father to be the one cause, and root, and fount of the divinity; yet not so as to confound the persons of the Father and the Son [as arising] from it, [merely] because we believe their operation to be one (for that would be impious to believe); but [we profess] that there exist two persons, of the Father and of the Son, but one operation, and one power of theirs of sending [the Spirit]; and, in fine, that there is one [Spirit] which is sent from their substance and hypostasis. And on this account we say that the divine Creed was declared and elucidated by our elders — lest anyone, doubting whether the Son is a cause of the Holy Spirit, should fall into some heresy. For those believing that the Holy Spirit in no way proceeds from the Son must [necessarily] understand that the Spirit proceeds from the Father alone, and consequently [that] there is no Son. But those who assert that the Spirit proceeds from the person of the Father alone — these without doubt separate the substance from the hypostasis, and imagine a partition of the divine substance — which [the Council] piously believes to be very alien from reason and from faith."

I pass over, consulting brevity, the anathematisms of the Council of Lyons and of the Lateran, [directed] both a-

[signature "Tt 3"; catchword "-uersus" (adversus) → "both a[gainst]," continues on p. 506 (PDF 511).]

(printed p. 506 [PDF p. 511], verso — end of Ann. CLXXXVII and Ann. CLXXXVIII–CXCI, on John 3:34–4:53 (Filioque concluded; Origen's subordinationism and angels forming bodies; Ferus on faith). Read order: left column, then right. NB: the right column suffered heavy ink show-through; Ann. CXCI, illegible here, has been restored in full from a clearer parallel edition (printed p. 496).)

(left column — concluding Annotation CLXXXVII, from the catchword "-uersus" (adversus):)

—both a[gainst] those who assert that the Holy Spirit [proceeds] from two principles, and against those who deny that he proceeds from the Son. I omit likewise the sentences of Athanasius, Basil, Epiphanius, Chrysostom, Cyril, and Maximus, which teach the same [thing]. Whoever desires to see these [things] more fully treated, let him read the seventh and eighth sessions of the Council of Florence.

Annotation CLXXXVIII [contents]

"God is a Spirit." — John 4[:24]

[margin: Whether the Son and the Holy Spirit are inferior to the Father.]

Origen, in the thirteenth tome of the commentaries on John, seems to make the Son and the Holy Spirit inferior to the Father, with these words: "We say that the Son, and the Holy Spirit, excel all [things] which are begotten — not by comparison, but by an eminent pre-eminence — [the Son] who is surpassed by the Father by as much, or by a greater, pre-eminence, as [that] by which he himself, and the Spirit, surpass the rest [of things], and [those] not any [common] ones. For he is the image of his goodness, and a splendor — not of God, but of his glory, and of his eternal light; and a vapor, not of the Father, but of his power; and a pure emanation of his most sovereign glory; [margin: John 14.] through which mirror [as] Paul and Peter, and [those] like [them], see God: [he] who says, 'He that seeth me, seeth also my Father who sent me.'"

Annotation CLXXXIX [contents]

"I sent you to reap that whereon you have not labored; others have labored, and you have entered into their labors." — John 4[:38]

[margin: Whether the angels insert souls into bodies.]

Origen, in the same thirteenth tome, expounding this passage, said that it is the ministry of the angels to insert into bodies the souls of the men over whose guardianship they preside, and to form the very bodies in the womb — and that this is "the labor of others," into which the Apostles entered. And he speaks thus: "It must be considered whether, since the angels have been set over the sowing [scattering] of the seed of men, the Apostles — [as] helpers of the perfecting of those [things] which have been sown — enter into the labors of others, [and] reap. And if the matter stands thus, it must also be seen whether the ministry and office of the angels in inserting souls into bodies be not troublesome and full of labor — since they bind together two [things] contrary by nature into one tempering [blend], and at a certain and appointed time begin to apply the care which pertains to each [soul], and bring forth into the light, to bear fruit, him who was before fashioned." But someone, wishing to oppose these [things], will say that God himself is said to form and fashion [man], in that passage, [margin: Job 10.] "Thy hands made me, and fashioned me"; and in that [other], [margin: Jer. 1.] "Before I formed thee in the womb, I knew thee." To which it must be answered, that it can be [the case] that, even [with] the angels [being] set over the birth of men, God says that he himself fashions him in the womb.

(right column — concluding Annotation CLXXXIX, then CXC–CXCI:)

Annotation CXC [contents]

"The man believed the word which Jesus said to him, and went his way." — John 4[:50]

John Ferus, in the commentaries on John, narrating this pericope: "We are taught," he says, "what the nature of faith is — namely, to conceive a confidence [fiducia] concerning God, that he will save us. But how, [and] when, and through what afflictions, in no way pertains to us," etc. What Domingo de Soto admonished must be guarded against in these words, thou hast above, Annotation 43 of this book.

Annotation CXCI [contents]

"Himself believed, and his whole house." — John 4[:53]

Michael Medina, defending against Soto's reprehensions the exposition of John Ferus adduced here, writes thus: "HERE Ferus, after many [things] excellently noted, had taught that a certain mystery lies hidden here — [namely] that the Evangelist, narrating the faith of the ruler [centurio], related nothing of the faith of the rest of the Capernaites; just as, after the miracle of the turning of water into wine, the faith of the disciples alone is related, when it is said, 'And his disciples believed in him.' He judges that in these passages the fewness of the true faithful is intimated, and that it is taught [that] true faith is [only] a settled [rata] [faith]. 'The greater part,' he says, 'even if it see and hear, yet remains in sin.'" These words Dominic Soto interprets (as is his wont) [as] a Lutheran error, and believes the Author here approves [the notion] whereby it is said that no sinner truly believes; and so he says: "He seems here to repeat the error [namely] that no one of those who is in sins truly believes — assuredly, since he explains the fewness of those who truly believe in no other way than by saying that there are [those] who, even if they see and hear, yet remain in sins, as if he should say [that] therefore they do not believe, because they remain in sins." Thus far he [Soto].

But what faith is called the true faith of Christ and of all Christians, we have shown in the preceding [pages] by manifold reasoning. For the true faith is [the faith] of Christian truth, of which we Christians always speak, which — since it consists together with a fervent and efficacious love — always, if it can, goes forth into works, and, in fine, [is] that [faith] which Paul calls the [faith] working [margin: Gal. 5:6.] through love. Hence the Christian reader gathers that sinners, who, remaining obstinate, do not live by the Christian discipline, in no way have true faith — since they are destitute of love, which is the other part of Christian faith. As, therefore, they are not true Christians, so neither do they possess in themselves the true Christian faith, which not only shuns sins, but produces the fruits of eternal salvation. But lest that barren faith which is called "demonic" be retained whole by these [men]: for obstinate and hardened sinners do not seem to have any reckoning of the other life, nor to believe for certain that God's justice will be severe against sinful men. For they do believe, but with a certain languid and nerveless faith which — as we have said in the preceding — in men of this sort degenerates into the nature of [mere] opinion. For assuredly it belongs to the nature of faith [to have] the certitude of the divine promises and threats — which certitude such sinners have little of, or none. But the un-evident knowledge which remains in them, being destitute of certitude, passes over into the nature of opinion, as we said in the preceding — not that I teach that a barren and unformed faith is formally extinguished by sin (which the Lutheran madness teaches), but that, by the obstinacy of sins (which sometimes grows languid, and is turned into a worse opinion), nay sometimes, quite pressed down by the magnitude of sins, [it comes] to vanish. Therefore, even if the Author had openly said that none of those who is in sins truly believes, he would have wounded nothing of the catholic decrees of faith — although he would wound Soto, who [thereby] betrays that he is ignorant of these Christian manners of speaking; and it ought to have been marked that the Author was speaking of these obstinate [sinners], since he did not say [absolutely that] whoever is in sin does not truly believe, but [of those] in sins — according to the manner of speaking by which we understand many [men to be] defiled by the filth of sins.

[In this edition Ann. CXCII ("Labor not for the food," John 6:27) follows next; in the scan followed here CXCI's last lines and the start of CXCII fall at the top of p. 507 (PDF 512).]

(printed p. 507 [PDF p. 512], recto — end of Ann. CXCI and Ann. CXCII–CXCIIII, on John 6 ("labor not for the food"; "believe, and thou hast eaten"; whether faith is from us). Read order: left column, then right. NB: the top of the left column (the end of Ann. CXCI) was destroyed by show-through; CXCI is given complete on p. 506 (PDF 511), restored from a clearer parallel edition.)

(left column — the top continues and concludes Annotation CXCI (the final sentence, "Therefore, even if the Author had openly said that none of those who is in sins truly believes…" through "…defiled by the filth of sins"). In the scan followed here this column is destroyed by ink show-through; the annotation is given complete, restored from a clearer parallel edition, on p. 506 (PDF 511). CXCII begins immediately below.)

Annotation CXCII [contents]

"Labor not for the food which perisheth, but for that which endureth unto life everlasting." — John 6[:27]

The commentaries of John Ferus have this exposition of the present passage: "Christ does not forbid laboring for the body's food; nay, this is enjoined upon all: 'In the sweat,' he says, 'of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread.' [margin: Gen. 3; Ps. 127; 2 Thess. 3.] And David: 'The labors of thy hands thou shalt eat.' And Paul: 'He that laboreth not, let him not eat.'" Domingo de Soto disapproves this doctrine of Ferus, because he seems to teach that bodily labor is a precept [binding] on all without any distinction — which indeed seems to condemn the institution of the mendicant monks, who, having omitted the labor of the hands, provide sustenance for themselves by begging alone. Michael Medina's Apologia refutes this with these words: "Here there is no reason why Soto should torture himself with suspicions. For 'precept' is not always taken for 'law': for sometimes 'precept' is taken for doctrine, counsel, or persuasion. By which reasoning Plutarch calls conjugal precepts 'doctrine,' or 'matrimonial counsels.' By which reasoning also we call military and paternal precepts the institutions of soldiers or of sons — concerning which Solomon: [margin: Prov. 6; Prov. 7.] 'KEEP, my son, the precepts of thy father,' and afterward in the following chapter he says, 'MY SON, keep my words, and lay up my precepts with thee.' We call [it] a 'precept,' then, in the plain manner of speaking, whatsoever is enjoined upon anyone by way of an imperative, even if it does not induce the obligation of sin; in which manner we call a 'precept' that benediction which God imparted to the first parents and to all living creatures at the first beginning of things, saying, [margin: Gen. 1.] 'INCREASE, and multiply, and fill the earth.' By which manner also the divine maledictions, twisted into the form of an imperative, are likewise called precepts — such as that first one inflicted on the woman, [margin: Gen. 3.] 'IN sorrow shalt thou bring forth thy children'; and this one, which the author adduces in this place, [margin: Gen. 3.] 'IN the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread.' Nay, and besides this looser acceptation of 'precept,' the Apostolic precept also — according to the proper notion of precept — about working with the hands, [is directed to] those who from elsewhere have not whence to sustain [their] life, [and] is enjoined by Paul the Apostle upon certain [men] (who were walking inordinately), commanding: [margin: Eph. 4.] 'LET him that stole steal no more, but rather let him labor with his own hands'; and elsewhere, 'He that will not labor, let him not eat.' That this precept is divine and natural is not to be doubted. Therefore the author sinned in nothing: who, in order to show by those words, 'Labor not for the food that perisheth,' etc., that bodily labor is not forbidden, said [that] the same [labor] is [enjoined] through a precept enjoined — as if he should say [that] it was not only not forbidden, but is the matter of a precept. Of a precept, I say, taken in that larger signification, or in the stricter [one], by which it induces the obligation of sin, if we regard [those] who wander and walk inordinately. And so Calepinus should rather have been consulted, before the author [were] accused in this part." These [things] Michael Medina [says]. Thou hast [things] pertaining hereto below, Annotation 317.

Annotation CXCIII [contents]

"This is the work of God, that you believe." — John 6[:29]

[margin: On the Eucharist.]

Augustine, in tract 25 on John, elucidating this, says: "THIS is therefore to eat the food which perisheth not, but which endureth unto life eternal. Why dost thou make ready teeth and belly? Believe, and thou hast eaten." The Sacramentarians abuse these words for the confirmation of their heresy: what is to be answered to them, see below, Annotation 196.

Annotation CXCIIII [contents]

"No man can come to me, except my Father draw him." — John 6[:44]

[margin: Whether faith is from us. Rom. 10.]

The exposition of Augustine, which is had in tractate 26 on John upon this saying, the Master of the Sentences noted, in the second book [of the Sentences], distinction 26, with these words: "It is not to be ignored that Augustine elsewhere seems to signify that faith is from the will; upon that word of the Apostle, [margin: Rom. 10.] 'With the heart it is believed unto justice,' thus treating upon John: 'Therefore the Apostle did not simply say "it is believed," but "with the heart it is believed" — because a man can [do] the other [things] unwilling, [but] can believe [only if] willing: he can enter the church, and approach the altar, [while] unwilling, but not believe.' Likewise upon Genesis, where Laban and Bathuel said, 'Let us call the girl, and ask her will,' etc., the expositor says: 'Because faith is of the will, not of necessity.' To which, answering, we say that these [things] are not to be so taken as [that] faith be understood to come forth from the will of man — since it is properly the gift of God, as the Apostle says, and from it the good merits of man begin. For through this [faith], as Augustine says upon Psalm 67, 'the impious is justified' — that is, 'of an impious [man] a pious [man] is made' — so that thereafter faith itself begins to work through love: whence all good merits begin. But rather these [things] are said thus for this [reason], that there is no faith except in him who wills to believe — whose good will faith precedes not in time, but in cause and nature. Whence Augustine above congruently said that good will is in those gifts which it does not precede: and it itself [grace] helps those whom it helps, [those] whom it forestalls, while it consents with them unto the effect of good; and it is in them, because in time it is not preceded by them."

Theophylact, expounding this passage in the commentaries,

[signature "Tt 4"; catchword "-nens" (exponens) → "expounding," continues on p. 508 (PDF 513).]

(printed p. 508 [PDF p. 513], verso — end of Ann. CXCIIII and Ann. CXCV–CXCVI, on John 6 (Theophylact's magnet simile; venial sins and the Eucharist; the great real-presence annotation — Bertram/Ratramnus). Read order: left column, then right. NB: the ink-spotted opening of Ann. CXCVI was collated against a clearer parallel edition (printed p. 497) and confirmed correct.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CXCIIII (Theophylact), from the catchword "-nens" (exponens):)

—expounding [this passage], he too seems to think that the gift of faith and grace is forestalled by us, and is acquired from the preparation of good will: for there he speaks thus: "The Father draws those who have an aptitude of will; but those who do not make themselves fit, he does not draw to faith — for just as the magnet [attracts] not all [things], but attracts iron alone, so also God indeed makes himself accessible to all, but draws those who [are] more fit and who show forth a familiarity toward him." Again, at the end of the commentary on Mark, expounding those words, "They went forth [and] preached everywhere, the Lord cooperating," etc., he says: "See — everywhere our [part] first, then God's help: for when we work, and shall have given the beginning, the Lord cooperates; and likewise, if we shall not have given [him] occasion, he will not cooperate." These words of Theophylact, excerpted from various sayings of Chrysostom, ought to be understood in the same manner as those [things] which were expounded by us in [our] comments, Annotation 101 of book 5.

Annotation CXCV [contents]

"Your fathers did eat manna." — John 6[:49]

[margin: Whether venial sins impede the effect of the Eucharist for those receiving [it].]

Augustine, in tract 26 on John, explaining this, says: "SEE, brethren, eat the heavenly bread spiritually, carry innocence to the altar. [As for] sins — even if they be daily, or [even if] they be not deadly — before you approach the altar, take heed [to] what you say: 'Forgive us our debts.'" St. Thomas, in the third part of the Summa, question 79, article 8, reckons this passage among those by which the scholastics are wont to demonstrate, for the sake of exercise, that venial sins do not impede the salutary power and effect of the Eucharist for those who receive [it]. And he dissolves the objection, saying that by venial faults the effect of the sacrament is not utterly and altogether impeded, but only in some part. For although venial delinquencies by no means take away the acquisition of ampler grace and charity, yet they take away a certain taste of spiritual sweetness, which the exactly-purified experience when the sacrament of the Lord's body is received.

Annotation CXCVI [contents]

"I am the bread of life." — John 6[:48]

[margin: Whether the Eucharist contains the true body of Christ.]

The exposition of Augustine set to this passage, Bertram the priest — or someone else under his name — in the book On the Body and Blood of the Lord, twists to the heresy of the Sacramentarians, who assert that the Eucharist is nothing else than the substance of bread and wine, which bears the figure, likeness, and name of the body of Christ — [a body] which is not corporally and truly in the sacrament, but only spiritually and mystically. And the words of Augustine, cited from tract 26 on John, are of this sort:

1. "PHINEHAS also ate, and many there ate, who pleased God, and did not die. Why? Because they understood the visible food spiritually, spiritually hungered, spiritually tasted, that they might be spiritually satisfied. For we too receive a visible food; but the sacrament is one thing, the power [virtue] of the sacrament another. Likewise in the later [words], 'This is the bread which came down from heaven.' This bread the manna signified; this bread the altar of God signified: those were sacraments; in the signs they are diverse, in the reality which is signified they are alike. Hear the Apostle Paul: [margin: 1 Cor. 10.] 'I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and all in Moses were baptized in the cloud and in the sea, and all ate the same spiritual food, and all drank the same spiritual drink.' The same spiritual [food], assuredly, [though] the bodily [was] another — because [for] them [it was] manna, [for] us another [thing]; but a spiritual [food] the same as [ours]. And he adds, 'And all drank the same spiritual drink.' Another [thing for] them, another [for] us — but in visible appearance, which yet would signify this same [thing] by spiritual power. For how did they drink the same drink from the spiritual [rock] following [them]? 'And the rock was Christ.' The rock [was] Christ in a sign, the true Christ in the word, and in the flesh."

2. Thus far Augustine's words; to which Bertram, in the same volume, added also other sayings of the same author, violently distorted to the confirmation of his error. For, when he wished to show that it is a crime to believe that the true flesh of Christ is contained in the Eucharist, he usurped from the third book of Augustine's On Christian Doctrine, chapter 16, these words: "IF a preceptive expression forbids either a shameful deed or a crime, or enjoins [some] utility or beneficence, it is not figurative; but if it seems to enjoin a shameful deed or a crime, or to forbid [some] utility or beneficence, it is figurative. [margin: John 6.] 'Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you' — [this] seems to enjoin a crime or a shameful deed; it is, therefore, a figure, prescribing that [we] must communicate in the Lord's passion, and sweetly and profitably lay up in memory that for us his flesh was crucified and wounded," etc.

3. Likewise, when he was about to demonstrate that the sacrament of the Eucharist is called the body of Christ not because it is [it], but because it signifies Christ's body, he used a testimony from epistle 23 to Boniface the bishop — in which Augustine seems to intimate that the sacrament of the altar is called the body of Christ according to the common form of speaking, by which we are wont to call the day of the commemoration of the Lord's passion "the passion of Christ," because it has a likeness to that day on which of old Christ's passion was once accomplished. The words of the epistle run thus: "OFTEN we so speak that, as Easter approaches, we say that tomorrow, or the day after, is the Lord's passion — although he suffered [it] so many years before, nor was that passion done at all except once. Indeed, on the Lord's day itself we say, 'Today the Lord rose again,' although so many years have passed since he rose. Why is no one so foolish as to charge us, speaking thus, with having lied — except because we name these days after the likeness of those [days] on which these [things] were done? So that the [present] day is called that very [day], which is not the same, but is like it by the revolution of time; and it is said to be done on that day, on account of the celebration of the sacrament — [that] which was done not on that day, but already of old. Was not Christ once immolated in himself, and yet is he immolated for the peoples in the sacrament, not only through all the solemnities of Easter, but every day? Nor does he lie who, being asked, answers that he is immolated. For if the sacraments did not have a certain likeness of those things of which they are sacraments, they would not be sacraments at all: and from this very —[likeness] they [the sacraments] often now take even the name of the very things [they signify]. As, therefore, according to a certain manner, the sacrament of the body of Christ is the body of Christ, [and] the sacrament of the blood of Christ is the blood of Christ; so the sacrament of faith is faith," etc.

[catchword "ipsa" → "from this very [likeness]," continues on p. 509 (PDF 514).]

(printed p. 509 [PDF p. 514], recto — Ann. CXCVI cont., on John 6:48 (real presence — Bertram's and Berengar's abused Augustine passages). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CXCVI, from the catchword "ipsa":)

4. AGAIN, to show that in the sacrament there is nothing else than the substance of bread and wine, and a representation of the mystical body, he takes a fragment from Augustine's sermon On the Sacrament, to the Infants [newly baptized], at the altar, in these words: "THIS, which you see on the altar of God, you saw also [when] the night was past; but what it was, what it meant, how great a thing the sacrament contained, you have not yet heard. That, then, which you see is bread and a cup, which your very eyes also report to you; but [as to] that which your faith requires to be instructed [about] — the bread is the body of Christ, the cup is the blood of Christ. Briefly indeed has this been said, which may perhaps suffice for faith; but faith desires instruction. For the prophet says: 'Unless you believe, you shall not understand.' You can, then, say to me: 'You have bidden [us] believe; expound, that we may understand.' For such a thought can arise in anyone's mind: We know whence our Lord Jesus Christ took flesh — namely, from the Virgin Mary; as an infant he was suckled, was nourished, grew, was advanced to youthful age, suffered, was slain, was buried, on the third day rose again, ascended into heaven, there raised up his body, and is there now, sitting at the right hand of the Father: how, then, is the bread his body? And the cup, or what the cup holds, how is it his blood? These [things], brethren, are on that account called sacraments, because in them one thing is seen, another understood. What is seen has a bodily appearance; what is understood has a spiritual fruit. If, then, you wish to understand the body of Christ, hear the Apostle saying to the faithful: [margin: 1 Cor. 12.] 'You are the body of Christ, and members.' Your mystery is placed on the table; you receive the mystery of God. To that which you are, you answer 'Amen,' and by answering you subscribe [to it]. You hear, then, 'the body of Christ,' and you answer 'Amen.' Be a member of the body of Christ, that your 'Amen' may be true."

5. BERENGAR, deacon of the church of Angers — who nearly two hundred years after Bertram renewed the same heresy in the year of the Lord 1160, when, [as] a heretic, he impiously composed an Apologia for his dogma against Humbert the Burgundian, a catholic man — brought forward, besides these, also other testimonies of Augustine, of which the more notable are these: AUGUSTINE, on the third Psalm: "Christ admitted Judas to the banquet, in which he commended and delivered to the disciples the figure of his body and blood."

6. THE SAME AUGUSTINE, on Psalm 98: [margin: John 6.] "THE SPIRIT is what quickens; the flesh profits nothing. When the Lord had commended this, and had spoken of his flesh, and had said, 'Unless anyone eat my flesh, he shall not have eternal life in himself' — certain of his disciples were scandalized, nearly seventy; and they said, 'This is a hard saying'; and departed from him. For it seemed hard to them, what he said, 'Unless anyone eat my flesh, he shall not have eternal life.' They received it foolishly; they thought of it carnally; and supposed that the Lord was going to cut off for them particles from his body, and to give [them] to them. But when the twelve disciples had remained with him, [the others] departing, he instructed them, and said: 'It is the Spirit that quickens; the flesh profits nothing. The words which I have spoken to you are spirit and life.' Understand spiritually what I have spoken. It is not this body which you see that you are going to eat, nor are you to drink that blood which they who will crucify me are going to shed. I have commended to you a certain sacrament, [which,] spiritually understood, will quicken you. Even though it must needs be celebrated visibly, yet it must be understood invisibly."

7. THE SAME [Augustine], in tract 25 [26] on John: "This is to eat the food, not that which perisheth, but that which endureth unto life eternal. Why dost thou make ready tooth and belly? Believe, and thou hast eaten." By these sentences Berengar persuaded [himself] that in the sacrament there is only a sign of the body of Christ, but not the very body of Christ; which also he contended cannot be in heaven and on the altar at once — the words of Augustine being brought forward for this from epistle 57 to Dardanus, which run thus:

(right column — continuing Annotation CXCVI:)

8. "DO NOT doubt that the man Christ Jesus is now there, whence he is to come [again]; and by memory recall, and faithfully hold, the Christian confession: that he rose from the dead, ascended into heaven, sits at the right hand of the Father, and from nowhere else than thence is to come to judge the living and the dead — in the same form and substance of flesh, to which indeed he gave immortality, [but] did not take away its nature. According to this form he is not to be thought diffused everywhere. For it must be guarded against, lest we so build up the divinity of the man that we take away the truth of the body. For [it is] one person [that] is God and man, and each is one Christ Jesus; everywhere by [reason of] that [by] which he is God, but in heaven by [reason of] that [by] which he is man."

9. THUS FAR [the passages] which Bertram and Berengar collected from Augustine. Now it pleases [me] to add two other passages, the former of which Bertram dragged to his cause from the book of St. Ambrose to those who are initiated in the mysteries [On the Mysteries]; in whose eighth and tenth chapters these words are read, here and there and pieced together: "THIS food which thou receivest, this living bread which came down from heaven, supplies the substance of eternal life; and whosoever shall eat this bread, shall not die forever: and it is the body of Christ." And below: "THE word of Christ, who was able to make out of nothing that which was not — cannot [that word] change the things which are into that which they were not? For it is not greater to give new things [being] than to change natures." And a little after: "WHY dost thou here seek the order of nature in Christ's body, since the Lord Jesus himself is [born] beyond nature, brought forth of a virgin? Truly indeed it is the flesh of Christ, which was crucified, which was buried. Truly, therefore, this is the sacrament of his flesh. The Lord Jesus himself cries out, 'This is my body.' Before the benediction of the heavenly words, another species is named; after the consecration, the body of Christ is signified." And below: "WHAT we eat, what we drink, the Holy Spirit has expressed to thee elsewhere through the prophet, saying: [margin: Ps. 33.] 'Taste, and see, that the Lord is sweet: blessed [is] the man that hopeth in him.' In that sacrament is Christ, because it is the body of Christ; therefore [it is] not bodily food, but spiritual. Whence the Apostle says of its type: 'Because our fathers ate spiritual food, and [drank the same spiritual]

[catchword "potum" → "drink," continues on p. 510 (PDF 515).]

(printed p. 510 [PDF p. 515], verso — Ann. CXCVI cont., on John 6:48 (real presence — Calvin named; Lanfranc and Peter Lombard's three Rules). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CXCVI, from the catchword "potum":)

—"[they drank the same spiritual] drink. For the body of God is a spiritual body; the body of Christ is the body of the divine Spirit — which Spirit is Christ, as we read, [margin: Lam. 4.] 'The Spirit before our face, Christ the Lord.'" By these words Bertram said it is manifest that, although the substance of bread and wine after the consecration remains the same as it was before, yet it is inwardly changed, by the power of the word of God, into the sacrament, the likeness, and figure of the true body of Christ — which feeds the souls of the faithful, and supplies the nourishment of eternal life.

10. THIS interpretation of Bertram, Berengar confirmed, adducing another testimony under the name of Ambrose from the book On the Sacraments, in these words: "AFTER the consecration of the altar, the bread and wine become the sacrament of religion — not so that they cease to be what they were, but [so] that they be what they were, and be changed into another [thing]." These, then, are the sayings of Augustine and Ambrose, which of old Bertram and Berengar — but most recently John Calvin, in the seventh chapter of his Institutes, and other Sacramentarian heretics — have wrongly abused against the truth of this most holy sacrament.

THE most pestilent error of these [men], Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, most stoutly refuted, in the book On the Sacrament, against Berengar; and after him Peter Lombard, bishop of Paris, in book 4 of the Sentences. These, then, admonish [us] that, for the exact elucidation of these passages, three [things] must be observed, and held as rules.

[margin: Three rules.]

THE FIRST rule will be, that in the Eucharist three [things] must be regarded: one, which is a sacrament, or sign, and not a reality [res]; another, which is a sacrament, or sign, and [also] a reality; a third, which is a reality, and not a sign or sacrament. Now the sacrament-and-not-reality is the species of bread and wine, and the visible form — which two signify, namely, the body and blood of Christ, the true food and drink of the soul, lying hidden in the Eucharist; and the unity of the ecclesiastical body, which is gathered out of many faithful no otherwise than [as] one bread out of many grains, and the same wine out of many berries. The sacrament-and-reality is the proper flesh and blood of Christ. It is indeed a reality, because it is that same body which — born, dead, and revived — sits at the right hand of God. But it is a sacrament and sign, because, just as this very [body] consists of many most pure and immaculate members, so the mystical body of the glorious Church consists of many faithful [who are] free from the filth of crimes. The reality-and-not-sacrament-nor-sign is the unity of the Church in the predestined, the called, the justified, and the glorified. [margin: The Master in Sentences bk. 4, dist. 8.]

THE SECOND rule teaches that there are two modes of eating and drinking the flesh and blood of Christ — namely, the sacramental and the spiritual. The sacramental is that by which we receive the true body of Christ, not according to the customary manner of eating — by which we press with the mouth the visible flesh of slain animals cut into morsels, grind [it] with the teeth, and send [it] down into the stomach for the body's nourishment — but by a sacramental rite, by which we receive the Lord's body, not in a visible form, nor cut into parts to satisfy the body's hunger, but for the soul's nourishment, invisibly, under the species of bread and wine, whole and impassible, living, and divine, [thus] we eat [it]. But the spiritual [mode], which befits only the good and pious, is that by which we receive not only the body of Christ, but also the power flowing from it — that is, the life of the soul. Speaking of the former mode, the Savior said, "The flesh profits nothing"; but of the latter, "It is the Spirit that quickens." I here pass over, for brevity's sake, the twofold variety of this spiritual eating — of which the one befits not only us, but also the angels, and the ancient fathers of the Old Testament, whom Paul and Augustine admonish [us] to have eaten the same spiritual food as we; but the other befits us alone, by which we receive the true body of Christ, and the efficacy of its power.

(right column — continuing Annotation CXCVI:)

THE THIRD rule indicates that a twofold presence can be considered in Christ's body: namely, a conspicuous and visible [presence], by which of old he was seen on earth, and conversed with men; and an invisible and hidden presence, according to which he is invisibly present in the sacrament of the altar, covered by the form of bread and wine. These [things] being established in this manner, there is an easy approach to the plain understanding of the objected passages.

THE FIRST passage, then — from tract 26 on John — so speaks of the spiritual eating of the body of Christ, according to the second rule, that it does not reject the sacramental eating of the same; [and] it so mentions the sign, or sacrament, that it does not exclude the reality and power of the sacrament — nay, connecting both together at once, it says: "FOR we today have received a visible food; but the sacrament is one thing, the power of the sacrament another. The rock [is] Christ in a sign; the true Christ [is] in the word and in truth."

THE SECOND passage — from the third book On Christian Doctrine — is not to be so taken as if Augustine determined that that saying of Christ cannot be interpreted of the sacramental eating of the body of Christ. For he did not mean this; but he signified that Christ's saying is not to be understood according to the hard and savage understanding of the Capernaites, who supposed that the flesh of Christ must be eaten cut into morsels, and torn with the teeth, after the manner of the Laestrygonians and the Anthropophagi [man-eaters], who feed on human flesh. Removing this inhuman interpretation, Augustine says that that expression, [taken] from the precept of the second Rule, must be understood figuratively — that is, not of the eating of a lifeless and mangled corpse, but of the sacramental and spiritual eating of the living and life-giving flesh of Christ.

THE THIRD passage — from the epistle to Boniface — does not have [that] which Bertram lyingly gathered from it, namely, that the sacrament of the altar is called the body of Christ not from this, that it has the very body of Christ in itself, but only from this, that it bears a likeness of it. Far be it that Augustine should assert this! But what he [does] show is this: [that] the body of Christ, truly and essentially existing in the sacrament, is itself also, according to a certain manner, a sacrament and sign of the body of Christ — namely, of the mystical [body] — in that manner in which it was set out in the first Rule. And this mystical body is called "the body of Christ" according to a certain likeness, by which very often the things signified are wont to be named by the term of the things signifying. By which reasoning likewise the Lord's own sacra-

[catchword "-menti" (sacramenti) → "the Lord's own sacra[ment]," continues on p. 511 (PDF 516).]

(printed p. 511 [PDF p. 516], recto — Ann. CXCVI cont., on John 6:48 (real presence — the three Rules applied; Sixtus's Ambrose and Augustine catena). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CXCVI, from the catchword "-menti" (sacramenti):)

—the species of the Lord's sacrament are, in a certain manner, called "the body of Christ," since they are signs of the body of Christ, [and] because it is contained hidden in them.

THE FOURTH passage — from the sermon to the newly-baptized — is to be understood, according to the reasoning of the first Rule [canon], of the mystical body, which is signified not only by the true body of Christ, but also by the very species of bread and wine, which Augustine there calls "bread" and "wine" according to the common manner of speaking, by which we are wont to leave to things the names of those things which they themselves formerly were.

THE FIFTH passage — from the third Psalm — the first Rule opens up. For although in that Psalm the sacrament of the Eucharist is named "a figure of the Lord's body," yet the very body of the Lord is not thereby banished from the Eucharist.

THE SIXTH passage — from Psalm 98 — is to be referred to the third Rule, so that according to it we understand the words that were said, "It is not this body which you see that you are to eat, nor to drink that blood which they who will crucify me are to shed," [as meaning] this: you will not have to eat a body of this kind in a visible form, in a passible and mortal manner, in that manner by which the flesh of cattle is chewed with the teeth; but you will eat, invisibly, under the form of bread and wine, a glorious and impassible body.

THE SEVENTH passage — from tract 25 on John — the second Rule elucidates.

IN THE EIGHTH passage — from the epistle to Dardanus — we will apply the third Rule, understanding [him to mean] that Christ's body is in one place only according to the visible presence — namely, in heaven, where it appears visibly in human form; but invisibly, and according to its invisible presence, it is on every altar, wheresoever the mysteries of the Eucharist are celebrated.

THE NINTH — the Ambrose passage — is to be interpreted partly by the first, partly by the second Rule. For [that] which is subjoined at once after those words, "Whosoever shall eat this bread, dies not forever" — namely, "And it is the body of Christ" — understand, by the first Rule, of the mystical body. But [that] which he adds, "Therefore it is not bodily food, but spiritual," is thus expounded by the second Rule: that the flesh of Christ is not bodily food — that is, [not] of the number of the bodily foods which we daily consume for the body's nourishment — but spiritual food, in which, without its consumption and diminution, the true body of Christ is received sacramentally and spiritually.

THE TENTH passage, Lanfranc asserts to exist nowhere in Ambrose, but to have been impudently and impiously fabricated by Berengar, so that by its authority credence might be built up for his impious dogma.

Let it suffice to have said these [things] briefly on the proposed sentences of Ambrose and Augustine. But, lest any of the heretics complain that they have been expounded by us far from the true and genuine sense of their authors, it is needful to subjoin here some passages of the same fathers, by which it may become clear that they held [it] as we have expounded, and that they taught, concerning the truth of the most holy sacrament, those [things] which the catholic and apostolic Church teaches and preaches.

Ambrose, book 4, On the Sacraments, chapter 4:

(right column — continuing Annotation CXCVI:)

"THOU perhaps sayest, 'My bread is ordinary.' But this bread is bread before the words of the sacraments; when the consecration has been added, of bread it becomes the flesh of Christ. This, then, let us establish: how can [that] which is bread be the body of Christ? By the consecration. But the consecration — by what words is it, and by whose discourses? [By those] of the Lord Jesus. For [as to] all the rest which are said, praise is offered to God, [and] by prayer petition is made for the people, for kings, for the rest. But when [the priest] comes to consecrate the venerable sacrament, then the priest [uses] no longer his own discourses, but uses the discourses of Christ. Therefore the discourse of Christ confects this sacrament."

Again, in the same place: "Therefore thou hast learned that out of bread is made the body of Christ. And [as to] the wine and water [that] is put into the chalice — it becomes blood by the consecration of the heavenly word. But perhaps thou sayest, 'I do not see the appearance of blood.' But it has a likeness. For as thou hast taken up the likeness of [his] death, so also thou drinkest the likeness of [his] precious blood — that there be no horror of gore, and yet the price of redemption may work [its effect]. Thou hast learned, therefore, that what thou receivest is the body of Christ."

The same, in the same book, chapter 5: "WHO, the day before he suffered," he says, "took bread in his holy hands. Before it is consecrated, it is bread; but when the words of Christ have been added, it is the body of Christ. Finally, hear him saying: 'Take, and eat ye of it; for this is my body.' And before the words, the chalice is full of wine and water; when the words of Christ have worked, there the blood is made [effected], which redeemed the people. See, then, by how many kinds [of things] the word of Christ is powerful to change all [things]. Then the Lord Jesus himself testifies to us that we receive his body and blood. Ought we to doubt of his assurance and testimony?"

The same, book 5, On the Sacraments, chapter 4: "MINDFUL of my discourse, when I was treating of the sacraments, I told you that before the words of Christ, that which is offered is called bread; [but] when the words of Christ have been brought forth, it is no longer called bread, but is named the body," etc. "This is not that bread which goes into the body, but that bread of eternal life, which supports the substance of our soul."

The same, book 6, On the Sacraments, chapter 1: "AS our Lord Jesus Christ is the true Son of God — not in the manner of men, by grace, but as a Son from the substance of the Father — so [it is] true flesh, as he himself said, which we receive, and [it] is a true drink," etc.

Augustine, on Psalm 98: "The only-begotten Son of God took earth from earth, because flesh is of earth; and of the flesh of Mary he received flesh. And because in this same flesh he walked here, and gave this same flesh to us to be eaten unto salvation — but no one eats that flesh unless he has first adored [it]: it has been found out in what manner such a footstool of the Lord's feet may be adored; and [that] not only do we not sin by adoring, but we [would] sin by not adoring."

The same, book 3 On the Trinity, chapter 4: "WE call the body and blood of Christ that which, taken from the fruits of the earth, and consecrated by the mystical prayer, we duly receive unto spiritual salvation, in memory of the Lord's passion for us. Which, when by the hands of men it is brought to that visible species, is not sanctified so as to become so great a sacra-

[catchword "-mentum" (sacramentum) → "so great a sacra[ment]," continues on p. 512 (PDF 517).]

(printed p. 512 [PDF p. 517], verso — end of Ann. CXCVI and Ann. CXCVII–CCI, on John 6–8 (real presence concluded; Cajetan censured by Catharinus on sacramental eating, on doubting the adulteress pericope, and on "principium"; Origen on the remission of blasphemy). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CXCVI (the Augustine On the Trinity citation), from the catchword "-mentum":)

—[so great a sacra]ment, except by the Spirit of God working invisibly — since God works all these [things] which are done in that work through bodily motions.

The same, tract 84 on John: "It is read in the Proverbs of Solomon, [margin: Prov. 23.] 'If thou sit to sup at the table of a ruler, considering, understand what is set before thee; and so put forth thy hand, knowing that thou oughtest to prepare such [things].' For what is the table of the ruler, but that from which is taken the body and blood of him who laid down his soul for us? And what is it to sit at it, but to approach humbly? And what is it to consider and understand what is set before thee, but worthily to ponder so great a grace?"

The same, on Psalm 33: "A man can be carried by the hands of others; by his own hands no one is carried; but Christ was carried in his own hands, when, commending his own body, he said, 'This is my body.' For he was carrying that body in his own hands." He says the same in the second sermon on the same psalm.

The same, to Julian, epistle 111: "Let everyone, before he receive the true body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, prove himself, and, according to the Apostle's precept, 'So let him eat of that bread, and drink of the cup.' For he who unworthily eats the body and blood of the Lord, eats and drinks judgment to himself, not discerning the body of the Lord. For when we ought to receive him, we ought beforehand to have recourse to confession and penance, and to discuss all our acts more carefully; and if we have felt [any] harmful sins in us, let us quickly hasten to wash [them] away through confession and true penance — lest, concealing the devil within us together with the traitor Judas, we perish."

Thou wilt do well, best reader, to recall to the rules set down in this annotation all the passages of Origen, Chrysostom, and other authors pertaining to the Eucharist, which we have left undiscussed in this work. These are had at Annotations 120, 121, 152, 164, [and] 194 of book 5, and at Annotations 21, 66, 112, 193, and 206 of this book.

Annotation CXCVII [contents]

"Except you eat the flesh of the Son of man." — John 6[:53]

[margin: On the eating of the sacrament.]

Cardinal Cajetan, expounding these [words] in the commentaries, Ambrosius [Catharinus] — refuting [him] in a prolix treatise in the fifth book of the Annotations — marks with a twofold fault: first, that against the common opinion of the holy [fathers] he tried by empty arguments to show that the present passage does not pertain to the sacramental eating of the body of Christ; secondly, that he dared to ascribe to the holy doctors this interpretation, which is peculiar to Luther and Oecolampadius — whereas it is certain that Cyril, Augustine, Cyprian, Chrysostom, and other fathers, as well ancient as more recent, interpreted this passage of the sacramental eating of the body of Christ.

Annotation CXCVIII [contents]

"But Jesus went unto the Mount of Olives." — John 8[:1]

(right column — the body of Annotation CXCVIII:)

[margin: Whether the beginning of the eighth chapter of John is authentic.]

Thomas Cajetan, entering upon the exposition of the present chapter: "TAKE NOTICE," he says, "that this first part of this chapter, with the whole history of the adulteress, is not altogether authentic: since it is not established that it is a part of the Gospel," etc. Ambrosius [Catharinus], in the third book, marked this opinion of Cajetan with a censure of this kind: "Concerning the history of the adulteress — that it should be irrational to cut it off from the Gospel, or to assert [it] not authentic (and this only because in some codices it was formerly not found), when for so many centuries it has been received by all the holy doctors, and preached, and celebrated in the discourses of churchmen as true and evangelical — I do not think it [belongs] to a pious, and at the same time prudent, heart to suppose [it inauthentic], much less to teach [so]. But as to what he added, to press this point — that there is no continuation of the following history with this one — it truly moved my stomach; nay, this interposition of this history made the matter itself marked [notable] to us, without which the narrative would be maimed. For in the preceding chapter it is said that every one of them returned to his own house; but in this [chapter] it is said of Jesus that he went to the Mount of Olives, and afterward that he came into the temple, and that then, out of malice, some of the malevolent [men] brought to him that adulteress, to hinder his teaching; but the Lord eluded them, and consequently there arose an occasion of teaching: and it well follows, [margin: John 8.] 'Again therefore he spoke to them' — so that here thou mayest see the discourse so chained together that, if thou omit anything, without doubt it would appear maimed, or at least a discourse not connected, but having its own [separate] beginning."

Annotation CXCIX [contents]

"Whither I go, you cannot come." — John 8[:21]

[margin: Whether [some] sins are at some time to be remitted.]

Origen, in the eighteenth tome on John, while he was expounding this passage, speaking incidentally of the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, said that although that sin is not remitted either in this age or in the [age] to come, yet in the ages which will follow the [age] to come, it will at some time be remitted. This same dogma — reprobated by the catholics — he holds in very many places, but especially in the first volume of the Periarchon [On First Principles].

Annotation CC [contents]

"If you continue in my word," etc. — John 8[:31]

Chrysostom, in the fifty-second homily on John, narrating this, judges that the reading of the divine Scripture is necessary for all unto salvation. Read what has been written about this, Annotation 152.

Annotation CCI [contents]

"The beginning, who also speak to you." — John 8[:25]

[margin: "Beginning" [principium].]

Thomas Cajetan is here reproved by Ambrosius [Catharinus], because, for the particle which in Greek is read τὴν ἀρχὴν, and in the Vulgate edition is rendered principium [beginning], he himself — having changed not only the word "beginning," but also the sense of the same word — reads "In the first place" [In primis]; and expounds it not as a noun, as Ambrose and Augustine expounded [it], but as an adverb, in the manner in which Erasmus reads [it]. This very [thing] he [Catharinus] condemned in E[catchword "-rasmo" (Erasmo) → "in Erasmus," continues on p. 513 (PDF 518).]

(printed p. 513 [PDF p. 518], recto — end of Ann. CCI and Ann. CCII–CCVI, on John 8–12 (do priests remit sins? — Theophylact; Origen's soul-pre-existence and his "dream" about Thomas at Lazarus's raising; Augustine on Peter's keys, abused by Calvin). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCI, from the catchword "-rasmo":)

—[condemned this] in Erasmus [did] Edward Lee, in the Annotations and censures published against the same Erasmus; whose reasons, studying brevity, I omit.

Annotation CCII [contents]

"Everyone that committeth sin is the servant of sin." — John 8[:34]

[margin: Whether priests have the power of remitting sins.]

Theophylact, in the commentaries, interpreting this, says: "But the servitude of sin is heavier, from which God alone can free [one]. For to remit sins belongs to God alone. Therefore he says, 'Everyone who commits sin is the servant of sin': you therefore also are servants, because [you are] sinners." Moreover, because it was likely that they would say, "Although we are liable to such servitude, yet we have priests who will purge us from [our] sins," he says that they too are servants: [margin: Rom. 3.] "For all have sinned, and need the glory of God. And your priests, since they too are servants, have not the power of remitting sins to others." Which Paul too says more manifestly: [margin: Heb. 5.] "The priest has need to offer for himself, as [well as] for the people, because he too is liable to infirmity." This passage is cited everywhere by the Lutherans; and in the Collectanea of Bodius it is reckoned among those [passages] which are objected by the same heretics against the authority which priests have of remitting sins. And yet Theophylact's words plainly show that he speaks not of the evangelical priests, but of the Mosaic — of whom Paul too said [margin: Heb. 10.] that they could not remit sins. But our priests, having obtained a nobler dignity, have the right of loosing and binding, and truly remit sins — not as the principal authors of such remission (for God alone, who alone is Creator, in this manner pardons offenses by justifying grace), but as ministers and dispensers of the divine indulgence. See above, Annotation 62 of book 5, and 71 of this book.

Annotation CCIII [contents]

"I know that you are the children of Abraham." — John 8[:37]

[margin: [Origen:] souls, coming into the world, bring with them seminal reasons.]

Origen, in the beginning of the twentieth tome on John, on the occasion of this clause, teaches that souls, coming into this life, bring with them diverse seminal reasons, as well just as unjust. And he writes thus: "But SINCE from [their] morals and deeds the sons of Abraham are judged, I know not whether those who are the seed of Abraham ought to be designated, and as it were delineated, by certain reasons of seed which are scattered and sown in certain souls, as I judge. For if — just as, a reckoning being had of the body, not all men are the seed of Abraham — so from those [things] which were just now explained concerning who indeed are the seed of Abraham, it is clear that not all men come into the life of men with the same seminal reasons which are scattered and sown in their souls. But the cause of these [things] — [proceeding] from the great judgments, both such as can hardly be set forth, and such as are discerned by those who have received the sense and mind of Christ, that they may know the [things] which have been given them by God — few can comprehend: [those] who, with great diligence and care, have explained, concerning each [soul], the [things] which happen before [its] birth and in [its] birth."

(right column:)

Annotation CCIIII [contents]

"I came not of myself, but he sent me." — John 8[:42]

[margin: Whether the soul of Christ was in heaven before [it was] in the flesh.]

Origen, in the 20th tome of the commentaries on John, so interprets this passage as to intimate that the soul of Christ was first blessed in heaven, and then sent by the Father into the womb of Mary, that thence it might assume flesh. His words are these: "Nor is the disputation concerning the soul to be passed over in this place. For perhaps the soul of the Son, when it was in its perfection, was in God, and in [His] fullness; and, having set out thence, by this very [fact] that it was sent by the Father, it assumed a body from Mary. But other souls are not so perfected by God — that is, they are not sent, nor permitted, by the will of God."

Annotation CCV [contents]

"Let us also go, that we may die with him." — John 11[:16]

[margin: On Thomas's exhortation to [his] fellow-disciples.]

Origen, narrating this passage in the Tomes, Theophylact derides in the commentaries, with these words: "But Origen tells a certain dream about Thomas. For Thomas, when he had heard the prophecies about Christ, and had learned that he was to descend even with [his] soul into hell to liberate souls — after he heard Christ saying, 'I go, that I may awaken Lazarus' — thought that he could be raised in no other way (that is, his soul liberated) unless he himself also, having laid down [his] body, descended into hell. Therefore, as a true disciple of Christ, and unwilling to be torn from [his] master in this [matter], he wishes both himself and his fellow-disciples to lay down their bodies, that they may descend with Jesus — who was about to lay down his soul, as he [Thomas] supposed, to bring back from hell the soul of [his] friend." This ridiculous narration I have set down, that I might confound with shame those who commend Origen's [teachings].

Annotation CCVI [contents]

"The poor you have always with you, but me you have not always." — John 12[:8]

[margin: Whether Peter received the keys in his own person.]

Augustine, in the fiftieth tract on John, sifting the present clause, has two passages unjustly usurped by the heretics of our times: one for the overthrow of the primacy of Peter, the other for the abolishing of the truth of the most sacred Eucharist.

The FIRST passage seems to intimate that Christ gave the keys to Peter not in his own person, but in the person of the whole Church — as if all the good who are in the Church have the keys, and a power of the keys equal to Peter's. His words are these: [margin: Matt. 16.] "'I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: whatsoever thou shalt loose,' etc. If this was said to Peter only, the Church does not do this; but if it also takes place in the Church — that what [things] are bound on earth are bound in heaven, and what [things] are loosed on earth are loosed in heaven — [then] if this takes place in the Church, Peter, when he received the keys, signified the holy Church. Thus in the person of Peter the good in the Church were signified," etc. This passage John Calvin adduces against the primacy of the Roman Pontiff, in chapter 8 of his Institutes.

The SECOND passage, which seems to exclude the true body of Christ from the Eucharist, is had in these

[signature "Vu"; catchword "verbis" → "these words," continues on p. 514 (PDF 519).]

(printed p. 514 [PDF p. 519], verso — end of Ann. CCVI and Ann. CCVII–CCIX, on John 12–14 (Augustine's "the poor you have always" applied to the Eucharist and to Peter's keys, vs. Calvin; whether Philip the Apostle = Philip the deacon; Euthymius and the Filioque*; Ferus on baptism and remaining sin, defended by Medina against Soto). Read order: left column, then right.)*

(left column — concluding Annotation CCVI (the second Augustine passage), from the catchword "verbis":)

—[these] words: "'THE POOR you shall always have with you, but me you shall not always have.' Christ was speaking of the presence of his body. For according to his majesty, according to [his] providence, according to [his] ineffable and invisible grace, that is fulfilled which was said by him, 'Behold, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the age.' But according to the flesh, which the Word assumed — according to that [by] which he was born of a virgin, [by] which he was seized by the Jews, [by] which he was fastened to the wood, [by] which he was taken down from the cross, [by] which he was wrapped in linens, [by] which he was laid in the sepulchre, [by] which he was manifested in the resurrection — 'You shall not always have me with you.' Why? Because he conversed, according to the presence of [his] body, forty days with his disciples, and, they escorting him by seeing [him], not by following, he ascended into heaven, and is not here. For there he sits at the right hand of the Father, and [yet] he is here — for the presence of [his] majesty did not depart. Otherwise, according to the presence of [his] majesty, we always have Christ; [but] according to the presence of the flesh, it was rightly said to the disciples, 'Me you shall not always have.' For the Church had him according to the presence of the flesh for a few days: now it holds [him] by faith, [and] does not see [him] with the eyes."

TO THE FIRST passage it must be answered to the heretics that, although the keys were given to Peter in the person of the whole Church, yet it does not follow thence that all who are in the Church have the keys, and a power of the keys equal to Peter's — of which there would surely be no use, if all had [them]. But the sense of the words is that the keys were given not to Peter alone, but to Peter in the person of the Church — that is, not for the use, dignity, and advantage of Peter alone, but that Peter might use them for the profit and benefit of the whole Church, lest, looking out for himself alone, he should turn the power of the keys into a tyrannical dominion. Read Annotations 68 and 231 of this book.

[margin: On the Eucharist.] The SECOND passage is to be interpreted of the mortal and visible presence of the body of Christ, according to which we no longer have Christ — whom yet, according to the glorious and (to us) invisible presence of the same body, we have in the sacrament of the altar, in that manner which was explained above, Annotation 196.

Annotation CCVII [contents]

"These therefore came to Philip." — John 12[:21]

[margin: On Philip.]

Thomas Aquinas, in the commentaries on John — [those] which are said to be his — affirms that Philip the Apostle, who led the Gentiles to Christ, is the same [Philip] whom Luke, in the eighth chapter of Acts, reports to have preached to the Samaritans, and to have baptized the eunuch of Queen Candace. Eusebius opposes this opinion, in book 2 of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 1; [and] Chrysostom, in the 18th homily on Acts, saying that he [Philip] was one of the seven deacons, the second after Stephen. The same Oecumenius confirms in the Collectanea, asserting that he conferred baptism on the Samaritans, but by no means the Holy Spirit — because this office pertained not to the deacons, but to the Apostles, by whom afterward Peter and John were sent, who bestowed on the Samaritans the Spirit of confirmation by the imposition of hands, which Philip, because he was not an Apostle, could not furnish. This same [thing] Bede approves in the commentary on the Acts of the Apostles.

(right column — concluding Annotation CCVII:)

Annotation CCVIII [contents]

"I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Paraclete." — John 14[:16]

[margin: Whether the Holy Spirit [is] from the Father alone.]

Euthymius, interpreting these [words] in the commentaries, John Henten — the scholiast and translator of the same [Euthymius] — charges with the dogma of the more recent Greeks concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father alone; a conjecture being taken from this, that the author [Euthymius], expounding this passage, used this form of speaking: "The Holy Spirit is given by the Father, inasmuch as proceeding from him; but is sent by the Son, as it were co-operating, and not contrary." And again, in the exposition of the fifteenth chapter, he repeats the same, saying: "The Holy Spirit proceeds, therefore, from the Father, as [being] of his substance; therefore he knows the [things] which are the Father's, as also the Son [does]," etc. But how much such a conjecture is to be esteemed, and whether on its account Euthymius is to be dragged into the error of the Greeks, let others more learned than I judge. See Annotation 187 of this book.

Annotation CCIX [contents]

"He that is washed needeth not, but to wash his feet, but is clean wholly." — John 13[:10]

[margin: Whether after baptism original sin, and after justification other sins too, remain.]

John Ferus, explaining these [words] in the commentaries, Domingo de Soto on that account warns is to be shunned — because he seems to think, in the Lutheran manner, that sins are altogether taken away neither by baptism nor by any other way, but that after justification original guilt and actual sins always remain, yet on account of faith are not imputed. And he says that this error is contained in the following words of Ferus: "But it might move someone, that Christ adds, 'But he is clean wholly.' For how [is he] 'clean wholly,' who is still bidden to wash [his] feet? Nay, how [is he] 'clean wholly,' who has been baptized — since Scripture everywhere asserts that no one is without sin? And indeed it is most true that no one is without sin; nevertheless it is [also] most true that whoever has been purified through faith is 'clean wholly.' For he, because he has been grafted into the body of Christ, participates in and possesses, through faith, the holiness and purity of Christ. Hence Paul says to believers, [margin: 1 Cor. 6.] 'You are washed, you are sanctified, through the name of the Lord Jesus.' And again, [margin: Rom. 8.] 'There is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus.' Hence the same [believers], grafted into Christ, are called holy, on account of the faith, the name, and the blood of Jesus Christ. Yet meanwhile in themselves they are nothing but sinners, and have indeed much of sin still, but nothing of condemnation, because before God they are reckoned clean on account of faith in Christ. Hence Paul says, 'With the mind I serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin.'" These [things] the author [Ferus says]. Whose patronage Michael [Medina] taking up, thus speaks against Soto: "Who does not see that from these words the heretical sense is far off, by which offenses are said to remain in the sinner? For what the author here intimates is assuredly this: that even when the laver of baptism has been received, if we consider ourselves and our nature, we are nothing

[catchword "-liud" (aliud) → "nothing else," continues on p. 515 (PDF 520).]

(printed p. 515 [PDF p. 520], recto — Annotation CCIX continued, on John 13:10 (Medina finishes defending Ferus against Soto; then Sixtus adduces Ambrose — On the Sacraments 3 and On the Mysteries 6 — teaching that foot-washing after baptism removes hereditary sin, and begins to refute it). The whole page is one annotation. Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CCIX (Michael Medina's defense of Ferus), from the catchword "-liud":)

—[nothing else] than sinners, if [our] offenses be not destroyed and made to vanish by true and Christian faith. For Christian faith is the sole snare [aucupium] of the divine love, by which alone — otherwise foul and abominable — we please the divine will. We sin, therefore, daily, even when baptism has been received; but through the faith of Christ [our] offenses are pardoned to us, so that the [things] which otherwise would condemn us to eternal fire effect nothing of condemnation in us — Christ saying: [margin: John 5.] 'He who believes in him who sent me has eternal life, and comes not into judgment, but shall pass from death to life.' And so Christian faith, since it includes the whole business of Christian justice, includes in itself also the penance for those offenses which we commit by the frailty of the flesh — not only in the [work of the] author [Ferus], but in Paul, who a thousand times repeats that we acquire justice through faith. Otherwise, how could the author of this error be accused, who, in the same context of words, speaks so catholically of penance, saying that through it our feet are to be washed daily — since it cleanses the daily sins after baptism, and [margin: Isa. 1.] since it is the second plank after shipwreck, adducing the divine precept, 'BE WASHED, be clean, take away the evil of your thoughts from my eyes,' etc.? Who could be held suspect of the Lutheran dogma of the permanence of offenses, who in so many places so piously enjoins the satisfaction of sins? For truly those who are infected with this Lutheran dogma reject penance, exclude satisfaction, [and] judge the mere assent of faith, and the compliance of the understanding, to be the most sufficient medicine of sins. Does he who believes that daily offenses are cleansed and washed away through penance [really] believe the permanence of offenses in the sinner — especially [given] the metaphor taken from the washing of feet, where it was manifest that in the very washing the filth is wiped off? Why, then, did he not disclose, in that place, the difference between the bodily and the spiritual washing, if he believed that spiritual filth remains in the soul of the sinner, but that the defilements of the feet are wiped off after the washing? But what evil [is there]? He who most openly believes, from the prophecy of Isaiah, that evils are taken away from [our] hearts (that is, from the soul) through penance — is he to be reckoned to prove, with the Lutherans, the permanence of offenses? But nothing is so well and exactly said, but that to certain [men] born for this a burrow of calumniating [may] lie open." Thou hast [things] pertaining hereto below, Annotation 216.

There comes back to my memory, [suggested by] the proposed passage of the Gospel and the occasion of the present annotation, certain words of Ambrose concerning original sin — [namely] that it still remains after the washing of the sacred font; which if I shall add here, I judge I shall do nothing alien from [my] purpose.

[margin: Whether the washing of the feet after baptism is necessary for salvation.]

Ambrose, bishop of Milan, expounding the aforesaid clause of the Gospel, seems to determine that the washing of the feet, after the emersion from the font of baptism, is so necessary that no baptized [person] can be saved without it — because, just as by a certain immersion of the font actual sins are not remitted, so without the washing of the feet original sin is not relaxed. His words, in the third book On the Sacraments, are these: "Thou hast ascended from the font; what followed? Thou heardest the reading. The priest was girded — although indeed presbyters too may have done [it], yet the beginning of the ministry is from the highest priest. Girded, I say, the highest priest washed thy feet: what [is] this mystery? Thou hast indeed heard that the Lord, when he had washed the feet of the other disciples, came to Peter, and Peter said to him, 'Dost thou wash my feet?' See all justice, see humility, see grace, see sanctification. 'Unless I wash thy feet,' he says, 'thou shalt not have part with me.'

(right column — continuing the Ambrose citation:)

We are not ignorant that the Roman church does not have this custom — whose type and form we follow in all [things]; yet it does not have this custom, that [the priest] should wash the feet: see, then, whether perhaps on account of the multitude it has declined [it]. Yet there are [some] who say, and try to excuse [it], that this is to be done in a mystery, not in baptism, not in regeneration, but as [if] the feet of a guest are to be washed. One thing belongs to humility, another to sanctification. Finally, hear that it is a mystery and a sanctification: 'Unless I wash thy feet, thou shalt not have part with me.' This I say, not that I may reprehend others, but that I may commend my own duties. In all [things] I desire to follow the Roman church, but yet we too are men, [and] have judgment. Therefore [in] that which is elsewhere more rightly observed, we too rightly keep [it]. We follow the Apostle Peter himself; we cleave to his devotion. To this, what does the Roman church answer? Assuredly Peter the Apostle himself is the author of this assertion to us, who was the priest of the Roman church. Peter himself said, 'Lord, not only [my] feet, but also [my] hands and head.' See the faith. That he before excused himself, was of humility; that afterward he offered himself, was of devotion and of faith. The Lord answered him, because he had said 'hands and head': 'He who is washed has not need to wash again, except to wash [his] feet.' Why this? Because in baptism all guilt is washed away. Guilt, therefore, recedes; but because Adam was supplanted by the Devil, and venom was poured out upon him above the feet, therefore thou washest the feet — that in that part in which the serpent lay in wait, a greater help of sanctification may come, so that afterward he cannot supplant thee: thou washest, therefore, [thy] feet, that thou mayest wash away the venoms of the serpent." The same opinion he more clearly approves in the book On those who are initiated in the mysteries [On the Mysteries], chapter 6, writing thus: "Thou hast ascended from the font; remember the evangelical reading. For the Lord Jesus washed the feet of his disciples; and when he came to Simon Peter, Peter said, 'Thou shalt not wash my feet forever.' To whom the Lord answered, 'If I wash not thy feet, thou shalt not have part with me.' Which having been heard, Peter [said]: 'Lord, not only [my] feet,' he says, 'but also [my] hands and head.' The Lord answered: 'He who is washed has not need except to wash [his] feet, but is clean wholly.' He was clean wholly, but he had to wash the sole [of his foot]: for he had, from the succession of the first man, sin, when the serpent supplanted him and persuaded [him to] error; therefore his sole is washed, that hereditary sins may be taken away — for our own [sins] are relaxed through baptism." Thus far he [Ambrose]. This opinion is exploded by the inveterate custom of all the churches, [and] by the common assent of the theologians, to whom it is agreed that all sins are remitted at once, in the same moment of time, and that, one being dismissed, the other cannot remain. Because both the discourse and the action of Christ plainly show that he washed the feet of the disciples not to this end, that [it should be] a sacrament of bap-

[signature "Vu 2"; catchword "baptis-" (baptismi) → "of baptism," continues on p. 516 (PDF 521).]

(printed p. 516 [PDF p. 521], verso — end of Ann. CCIX and Ann. CCX, on John 13–14 (Sixtus reconciles Ambrose's foot-washing doctrine with original sin; then Ferus on the Spirit as pledge → whether all believers are certain of grace: Soto's three objections and Medina's scholastic taxonomy of certitude — of evidence, of faith, and moral). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCIX (Sixtus's reply to Ambrose), from the catchword "baptis-":)

—[a sacrament] of baptism, which he had before conferred on them entirely and absolutely, as if he were completing, by a new washing of the feet, [something] not yet completed; but that he might set before them, to be imitated, an example of his eminent humility. And to this tends that last epilogue of Christ's words: "If I, [your] Lord and master, have washed your feet, you also ought to wash one another's feet; for I have given you an example, that as I have done, so you also may do." But [as to] what had before been said by the Savior, "He who is washed has not need except to wash [his] feet," it is not to be referred to the bodily washing of the feet, but — as it pleases Augustine — to the spiritual cleansing of the human affections, by which we continually cleave to the ground and are defiled by the filth of the earth. But, that we may interpret the Ambrosian sayings kindly, as is fitting: it is likely that Ambrose, by that sin which he calls hereditary from the succession, and [which] he calls the venom of the serpent poured upon the feet of Adam, did not signify the guilt of original sin, but the tinder [fomes] of the same sin, which — the guilt being blotted out — still remains in the baptized. For this too Paul frequently designates by the appellation of "sin," especially when, [speaking] of himself as already regenerated and sanctified, he repeats again and again, "I know that sin dwells in me." It is also credible that he [Ambrose] thought the washing of the feet to be necessary [as a sequel] from baptism, and not to be received for that sanctification which is given in baptism, but for the protection and increase of the sanctification already received in baptism; nor does the author himself seem to reject this sense, when he says, "In baptism all guilt is washed away; guilt, therefore, recedes," and the other [things] which follow thereafter.

Annotation CCX [contents]

"And he will give you another Paraclete." — John 14[:16]

[margin: Whether all believers are certain that they are in grace.]

John Ferus, in the commentary on this passage, weighing for what reason the Holy Spirit is called Paraclete, among other [things] which he had brought forward to this sense, had also assigned that cause: that he [the Spirit] certifies believers, as a pledge and earnest [arrhabo]. Which assertion Domingo de Soto reprehends, as flattering the Lutherans, who assert that all believers are certain that they are in grace. But Michael [Medina] refutes his reprehension with the following confutation:

"THIS opinion our Censor [Soto] calls a 'Lutheran perversion' — as if he would not have used a milder word (one which would not, by its novelty, express [his] zeal) in judging the opinion of a catholic man, whatever it might be. But such is, of old, the disposition of man, that before he understands a matter, he rushes headlong into the worse opinion. But now hear the reasons by which [Soto], to be triumphed over, insults the author: 'ALTHOUGH,' he says, 'as many as have faith may have some testimony that they are the sons of God, yet not a certainty. SECONDLY, heretics think themselves more securely to be in grace than some just [men do], although they are deceived. THIRDLY, finally: since — although the Holy Spirit, Paul being author, bears testimony to our spirit that we are the sons of God — yet whether that testimony be from an angel of Satan, who sometimes transfigures himself into an angel of light, we know not.' These [things] Soto [says]. But by us it must first be discussed in how many ways certitude is distinguished, and then, indeed, of what certitude Paul and the author [Ferus] speak.

(right column — continuing Annotation CCX (Medina's taxonomy of certitude):)

SINCE, therefore, certitude is nothing else than a certain firmness of mind, by which the cognitive powers, adhering to their knowables, are rendered stable — from the threefold means by which this is wont to be done, the wise have found a threefold certitude. [margin: Certitude of evidence.] For there is a certain [certitude] which, because it is sought from evidence, they have called the certitude of evidence. Which they then distinguished [as] threefold: namely, of a principle, of a conclusion, and that which is derived not from the evidence of reason, but from a rightly-disposed sense. The first they say [is] such as is had concerning this principle, 'Every whole is greater than its part.' The second, such as [the certitude] which is possessed, after reasoning, from this conclusion (derived from that principle), 'The whole world is greater than the earth.' The third, finally, they say [is] that which is produced from a sensible [object] duly brought near — as that the wall is white, which I see close [at hand], or the iron [is] hot, which I touch. [margin: Certitude of faith.] Of the second kind is the certitude which — because it descends from belief, or from the evidence of the thing — it has pleased our theologians to call the certitude of faith. For this [certitude] is not, like the others, produced first from the knowledge of the thing, then from adhesion, but immediately from adhesion — by which the mind, compelled by credible authority, adheres [to what is believed]. And this too they established [as] twofold, from a twofold faith: one which descends from divine authority, another which [descends] from human. Of the first they bring forward, [as] an example, the certitude which is had by Christians concerning the articles of faith. Of the second, that which is possessed concerning the existence of Rome, on account of the authority of a trustworthy man. [margin: Moral certitude.] There is, finally, a certitude of the third kind, which they call moral and human certitude — which, although it is much more imperfect and weaker than the preceding [kinds], is yet called certitude, because in its own kind it confirms and establishes the mind in the knowable. For in mortal [i.e. earthly] things that exact certitude cannot be had which is either produced from the perfect knowledge of the thing, or flows from the very constitution and firmness of the mind, such as the preceding [kinds] are held [to be]. But this moral certitude — by as much as natural things excel moral things in constancy and invariability — by so much is it inferior to the certitude of evidence, which flows from them [natural things]. And it is altogether inferior to the certitude of faith, since between the mean of each certitude there is no proportion. Assuredly natural and moral certitude are as far distant from each other as [are] moral and natural evidence, from which they are immediately born. But the certitude of faith, since it is not derived from evidence, nor depends on any natural principle by reason of which it might be comparable [to them], is in no way comparable to it. [margin: Moral certitude [is] twofold.] But this moral certitude is divided into that which descends from the strongest arguments and the firmest testimony (which, retaining the generic name, is called 'moral evidence'), and into that which is derived from apparent indications [indicia]. Of the first [kind], we are certain that adultery is evil — because both by human reasoning and by the authority of the human race its perniciousness and malice is proved. But of the second, we are certain that a man was slain by Socrates after inveterate hatreds — because, although the same

[catchword "eundem" → "the same [man]," continues on p. 517 (PDF 522).]

(printed p. 517 [PDF p. 522], recto — Annotation CCX continued, on John 14:16 (Medina answers Soto: Scripture calls a firm persuasion "certitude" — Judith, 2 Tim. 1, Gal. 4 "Abba Father," Rom. 8; the believer discerns the Spirit's cry as a lamb its mother's bleat; Augustine, Theophylact, and Pope Liberius). The whole page is one annotation. Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CCX (Medina on certitude), from the catchword "eundem":)

—although we did not see the same Socrates attacking [him], yet we saw Socrates stand near the newly-prostrated corpse with a drawn sword.

[margin: Of which certitude the author speaks.]

And let these [things] be said concerning the first [point]. From which, with little labor, the second is had: of which certitude, I say, the author [Ferus] and holy Scripture speak in this matter, and as often as they attribute to us a certitude concerning our predestination, or concerning the obtaining of the divine friendship on account of some works of ours. For that certitude of evidence — since it descends from sense, or from evident reasoning, which have no place in [things] to be believed — is doubtless far from the opinion of the author and of Paul; for that [certitude] is proper to those things which reason alone measures. But neither can we, in this [present] state, be certain, by that [certitude] which is called the certitude of faith, that we have obtained justice, or the divine sonship. For concerning this it is most truly handed down that a man knows not whether he be worthy of hatred or of love [margin: Eccl. 9.] — against the perfidy of the German heretics. And elsewhere, "If I shall be innocent," said Job, "this very [thing] my soul shall not know." [margin: Job 9.] Finally, that species of moral certitude which rests not on conjectures, but on arguments and reasons — although it is otherwise most usual, and most frequent in holy Scripture — yet by it we cannot be certain that we have the Spirit of God in us, because of this [there] are no arguments worthy of faith, nor testimonies, by which it might be established in the mind of man. Whether, therefore, Paul [said] that the Holy Spirit bears witness, etc., or Peter handed down that we are certified through the Holy Spirit concerning the divine sonship — [it is] because the just, by a certain internal inspiration, perceive the presence of the Holy Spirit, and a certain special instinct of divine sonship, not by trifling conjectures. But that a most probable conjecture and persuasion of mind (such as this is) is called "certitude" in the Scriptures [margin: A persuasion [drawn] from probable conjectures, and from holy Scripture, and from the human manner of speaking, is called "certitude."] — [this] the Censor seems not to have sufficiently understood, [as] is gathered from many passages both of the Old and of the New Testament. But let it suffice to have adduced a few for [the] many, since the human custom of speaking too makes this manifest. That wise Judith, therefore, about to deceive Holofernes, thus making words concerning the Bethulians, said before him: "And since the children of Israel know that they have offended their God, thy trembling is upon them. Moreover, famine also has invaded them, and by the dryness of water they are already reckoned among the dead. Finally, they ordain this, that they should kill their cattle, and drink the blood of them, and the holy [things] of the Lord their God, which God commanded not to be touched, in the corn, the wine, and the oil." And thereupon: "THEREFORE, since they do these [things], it is certain that they will be given over to destruction." Moreover, the Apostle, writing to Timothy, "I give thanks," he says, "to my God, whom I serve," etc., and afterward: [margin: 2 Tim. 1.] "Being mindful of thy tears, that I may be filled with joy, receiving the remembrance of that unfeigned faith which is in thee, which also dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois and thy mother Eunice; but I am certain that [it is] in thee too." In these passages, doubtless, "certitude" is called a certain conjecture, which is derived not from natural evidence, nor from a firm adhesion of the mind through faith, but from a probable conjecture. From these [things], thus, it will now be lawful to rise up against the Censor. That firmness and adhesion of mind which flows from probable conjectures is, by the catholic manner of speaking, called "certitude." Therefore [that] which contributes probable signs of the salvation to be obtained, certifies concerning the obtaining of the same salvation. But the Holy Spirit gives us those signs and conjectures: therefore he certifies us concerning the divine sonship, and that we shall obtain salvation — which the author taught. And what? Does not the Apostle everywhere insinuate this? Assuredly to this tends [that] which he says to the Galatians: [margin: Gal. 4.] "God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father." And [that] which the Censor had brought forward from the same apostle, "For the Spirit itself renders testimony to our spirit, that we are the sons of God" — for what else is it, [that] the Spirit of the Son is sent into our hearts, crying, "Abba, Father," than that, by a certain internal paternal whisper, a certain filial confidence is begotten in us, [namely] that we are called into the lot and inheritance of the sons? "We would not dare," says Jerome upon these words, "to say, 'Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name,' except from the consciousness of the Spirit dwelling in us." And again, what else is it, [that] the Spirit bears witness to our spirit that we are the sons of God, than that, by a certain hidden insinuation, by a certain divine foretelling [prælagium], we conjecture ourselves to have been summoned into the divine sonship and the heavenly inheritance (which is the lot of the sons)?

(right column — continuing Annotation CCX:)

BUT, SAYS THE CENSOR, a man is not certain whether that testimony be from an angel of Satan. But he thought far otherwise who said, [margin: John 21.] "We know that his testimony is true." And how, I ask, shall the creature not recognize the loving speech of its creator? Or how shall the sheep of Christ not hear the voice of their shepherd, and [his] internal whistling? or in what way does a son not recognize the speech of [his] most dear parent? Assuredly, in John, Christ cried out: [margin: John 10.] "He who is of God hears the words of God." Those, therefore, to whom the Spirit bears witness that they are the sons of God, will hear the internal cry of God, [and] will discern his testimony from a Satanic murmur, just as a lamb discerns the bleating of its bleating mother from the bleating of the other sheep. Nay, and to this, without doubt, seems to look [that] which Paul, with apostolic confidence, boasted — that he was certain that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, etc., could move him from, and disjoin him from, the charity of Christ. For from these affections, which — crucified together with Christ — he experienced in himself; from that most close conjunction of mind with the same [Christ]; from that admirable and divine metamorphosis, by which he had been wholly converted and transformed into Christ; and finally from the growing-old and death of the old man, which he most certainly experienced in himself — so great a certitude of the divine adoption and of the salvation to be obtained flowed [in him], that it thrust him into these stupendous hyperboles. And in this sense Augustine expounds this passage, in the book On the Morals of the Church, and Theophylact, in the commentary on the same words — saying that these [things] came forth from the highest love of Christ, which he experienced in himself. Into our sense, indeed, the same words of the apostle Pope Liberius uses, in the epistle to all the faithful, transferring the same [words] to himself and to others, and at the same time expounding the apostle, when he says: "But WE ARE CONFIDENT concerning you, most dear brethren, of better [things], and [things] nearer to salvation; because neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor [things] present, nor [things] to come, nor power, nor height, nor any other creature (the teacher of the nations teach-

[signature "Vu 3"; catchword "-cente" (docente) → "teaching [it]," continues on p. 518 (PDF 523).]

(printed p. 518 [PDF p. 523], verso — end of Ann. CCX, then Ann. CCXI–CCXIIII, on John 15–17 (Euthymius/Filioque cross-ref; "faith alone" — Ferus/Soto/Medina; whether Christ "began to be," with Aquinas on the Arian danger; whether only the predestined believe). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCX (Medina, citing Pope Liberius), from the catchword "-cente":)

—[the teacher of the nations] teaching [it]) could separate you from the charity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and from the right faith which is in him." Thus far Liberius. Where thou seest a passage of the apostle to the Hebrews adduced to the same opinion. And no wonder: for the sense of both is the same, except that to the Romans the Apostle was speaking of himself, but to the Hebrews of others; for the word πείθω, which is placed in both passages, is the same as "I am confident, I am certain," etc. And [that] thou mayest see the apostle making words concerning this moral certitude, he at once subjoins the cause why he had persuaded himself of this: "For God," he says, "is not unjust, that he should forget your work, and labor, and love — [you] who have ministered to the saints, and [still] minister." From the rectitude of the divine justice, doubtless, the apostle was persuaded that the Hebrews possessed [things] near and close to salvation — which are those [things] which dispose us toward the state of perpetual salvation. But if it was lawful for the apostle to pronounce this of a whole people, why shall it not be lawful, without the suspicion of Lutheran perversion, for a catholic man to say of the just that they are certified through the Spirit concerning the divine sonship — especially with the support of apostolic doctrine? etc. Thus far Medina.

Annotation CCXI [contents]

"The Spirit of truth, who proceedeth from the Father," etc. — John 15[:26]

Euthymius — what he is thought to have held in this place concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father alone — see above, Annotation 187.

Annotation CCXII [contents]

"Of sin indeed, because they believed not," etc. — John 16[:9]

[margin: Whether faith alone suffices for salvation.]

John Ferus, in the commentaries, elucidating these words: "By the merits of Christ ALONE," he says, "are we saved; and of these merits we are made partakers through faith alone." In this opinion, Domingo de Soto admonishes that that particle, "THROUGH FAITH ALONE," is to be guarded against, because from it [it] could be gathered that faith alone suffices for salvation — which is the error of the Lutherans. Meeting this censure, Michael [Medina] thus writes: "But how catholic this phrase is, we have brought to light in the preceding [pages], from many authors. Whence, [as to the fact] that he concludes, from the saying of the author, that we are saved through faith alone — we willingly grant [it], so long as we speak of the Christian faith, which includes love and works — [the faith] concerning which he sees, even unwilling, that the author always speaks, [and] understands [him to mean] this. But the Lutherans speak not of this faith, but of an unfruitful and unformed credulity, when the heretics attribute justice, or the obtaining of felicity, to faith [alone]. Nay, and the author, as is gathered from his words, teaches that we are made partakers of the merits of Christ through faith alone in this sense: that the participation of the same [merits] befalls [us] neither by nature, nor by any other [thing] besides the faith of Christ. For it is the faith of Christ alone through which, grafted into Christ and made one with him, we participate in his power and merits. Which sense, although it is most plainly gathered from the author's words, I know not by what means it could be stained with Lutheran suspicion. He then carps at another saying of the author, by which he had taught that unbelief makes all [things], even [those] good in appearance, unpleasing [to God] — as if he should say that all the works of unbelievers are sins. For [they] are called unpleasing, whatever [things] are not produced from the Christian faith — not because they displease God (which is required for the notion of sin), but because they do not please, according to that [saying]: [margin: Heb. 11.] 'Without faith it is impossible to please God.'"

(right column:)

Annotation CCXIII [contents]

"Glorify thou me, Father, with the glory which I had before the world was." — John 17[:5]

[margin: Whether Christ began to be.]

Augustine, in tract 105 on John: "Before the world was," he says, "neither were we, nor [was] he himself, the mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus," etc. St. Thomas, examining this passage — drawn by the scholastics for the sake of disputation — in the third volume of the Summa, question 16, article 9, says that the proposition which certain [men] build up from these words — namely, "This man" (Christ being pointed out) "began to be" — abhors from Christian piety, if nothing be added to it, and savors of the Arian dogma; because, when we say "Christ," we designate his eternal hypostasis, to whose eternity "to begin to be" is repugnant. He judges, therefore, that Augustine's opinion is to be understood with some addition — so that we say [that] the man Christ Jesus was not, before the world was, according to [his] humanity.

Annotation CCXIIII [contents]

"I have manifested thy name to men." — John 17[:6]

[margin: Whether only the predestined believe.]

John Ferus, in the commentary, teaches that by these words of Christ it is insinuated that not all men would believe, but those only who had been chosen by eternal predestination. Michael Medina, vindicating the present exposition from the reprehensions of Soto, writes thus in the Apologeticum: "This doctrine — whether it be taken of unformed credulity, or of faith working through love — Domingo de Soto pronounces [to be] no less than a manifest heresy, since the reprobate too are very often in the grace and charity of God, from which afterward, having fallen, they go to perdition. But to condemn this is openly to condemn the doctrine of Paul, [margin: 2 Thess. 3.] who, writing to the Thessalonians, thus says: 'For the rest, brethren, pray for us, that the word of God may run, and be glorified, as [it is] among you, and that we may be delivered from importunate and evil men — for not all have faith.' [margin: St. Thomas, in the commentary on the same epistle to the Thessalonians.] This passage, doubtless, is understood of evil Christians who — although they seem (as blessed Thomas says on this passage) to have faith — yet do not have [it]. Nay, and in the same sense he adduces there that [passage] to the Romans, 'Not all believe the gospel'; and that which Paul there brings forward from Isaiah, 'Lord, who has believed our report?' And so, since the author speaks, with a perpetual tenor, of the true faith [and] of Christian truth, and by this truth only that is judged [to be] true faith which has the efficacy of obtaining salvation (according to that [saying], 'He who believes in me has eternal life, and comes not into death,' etc.), he could rightly say that the predestined alone would believe — because they alone will believe with a true and stable faith. For by this truth (which, however, is most frequent in the plain and theological manner of speaking), the faith which is for an hour [temporary], even if [it be] a mutable and in-—[the faith formed by an in]constant love (such as is the faith of the reprobate) is not called true faith. True faith assuredly consists of true love; but that love is called "true" only by moral truth, which has perseverance and permanence. Therefore, only the faith of the elect will be called true faith. The reprobate believe, I confess, but for an hour; for at the time of temptation they withdraw that faith — inasmuch as it has not driven [down] roots. Holy Scripture does not call [it] true faith; and it belongs also to the nature of true faith to produce fruit. But the fruit — Christ teaching — is one thirtyfold, another fiftyfold, another sixtyfold, [margin: Matt. 13.] by which difference the diverse degrees of beatitude are signified. The faith, therefore, which produces not the fruit of glory, will not be a true faith toward Christ. Finally, for this reason the reprobate are accused of unbelief in holy Scripture — because, although according to the outward face they may seem to have believed, yet they truly did not believe, because they either lacked true love, or constancy, which (as we have said) is so connected with true faith that in Scripture "faith" is taken for "faithfulness." "Behold," says the apostle Peter, [margin: 1 Pet. 2.] "I will place in Sion a chief cornerstone, approved, elect, precious: and he who believes in him shall not be confounded. To you, therefore, who believe, [is] honor and glory; but to the unbelieving, the stone which the builders rejected, this is made the head of the corner, and a stone of offense, and a rock of scandal, to those who stumble at the word, and do not believe." Here, certainly, "faith" is taken not for any [kind of] faith, but for that which effectively confers the reward of eternal felicity. For [that] which he says, "He who believes in him shall not be confounded," cannot be understood of any other [faith]; for sinners believing with an hourly [temporary] faith are at last confounded. And the same [thing] he then teaches more openly, when he says, "To you, therefore, who believe, honor and glory." For to a temporary faith honor and glory is by no means owed, but to a constant and faithful [faith], according to that [saying], "Be faithful unto death, and I will give thee the crown of glory." To believe, therefore, absolutely, or "faith" absolutely — since it is taken for "to believe perfectly," or [for] a constant faith — will belong only to those who by the divine decree are summoned to heavenly beatitude. For even if the reprobate sometimes believe, or love, yet, because they do not believe or love unto the end, they are said not to believe truly, or to love truly. Whence it is rightly subjoined, "But to the unbelieving, the stone which they rejected," etc. He calls those "unbelieving" to whom Christ was made a stone of offense and a rock of scandal — [those] who are, without doubt, the reprobate. Paul too, [margin: 2 Tim. 2 (in the print; but the passage quoted is 2 Thess. 2:8–11).] writing to Timothy concerning certain reprobate, says: "And [the Lord] shall destroy [him] by the brightness of his coming — [him] whose coming is according to the working of Satan, in all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and in all seduction of iniquity to those who perish, because they received not the charity of the truth, that they might be saved. Therefore God shall send them the operation of error, that they may believe a lie, and that all may be judged who believed not the truth, but consented to iniquity." Those who believe not the truth, who consented to iniquity, the apostle here calls the same [reprobate]; and this [is what] he calls "the reprobate." And finally the apostle Jude: [margin: The [canonical] epistle of Jude.] "I wish to admonish you," he says, "knowing all [things] once [for all], that Jesus, saving the people out of the land [of Egypt], secondly destroyed those who believed not."

[catchword "con-" (inconstanti) → "inconstant [faith]," continues on p. 519 (PDF 524).]

(printed p. 519 [PDF p. 524], recto — Ann. CCXIV concluded, then Ann. CCXV–CCXVI, on John 17–19 (only the elect have "true faith"; whether believers are certain of grace — Medina vs. Soto, and precisely what Trent condemned; Ferus on "it is finished"). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CCXIV (Medina on true faith), from the catchword "con-":)

(right column — concluding Annotation CCXIV:)

Here assuredly he speaks of the reprobate, whom yet he pronounces not to have believed absolutely. And so it would here have to be asked of Soto whether that conviction of the Holy Spirit, of which Christ speaks in John, [margin: John 16.] saying, "He shall convince the world of sin, because they believed not in me," is to be taken of all sinners. And if it is to be so taken, then sinners, Christ being witness, believe not in Christ. Then it would have to be asked whether he be called "faithful," or "a friend," who had been joined to him by an hourly friendship or faith. And if he would not be [so] called — since it belongs to the nature of true faith and true charity to have permanence and constancy — then those [who are] truly believing in Christ will not be called sinners. But the man [Soto] certainly labors under the same disease — namely, [from] a defect of human phrasing; for he confounds all [things] by a physical or metaphysical [manner of] speaking. There is not, therefore, in this part, a manifest heresy in the author's doctrine, but the express sentence of Christ and of the apostles.

Annotation CCXV [contents]

"They were thine, and thou gavest them to me." — John 17[:6]

[margin: Whether all believers are certain of grace.]

John Ferus, narrating this passage in the commentaries: "DO NOT [trust] thyself in God," he says, "but in Christ; in whom, if thou find thyself by faith and love, be certain that thou art predestined by God." Michael Medina thus refutes Soto, [who was] condemning these words: "Soto in this place accuses Ferus of the error concerning the certitude of grace, condemned in the Council of Trent. But since here the author speaks — after his manner, and [that] of all who speak humanly — of a moral certitude, which depends on the acts which we experience in ourselves, there is no reason why that error should be imputed to him, unless it be also imputed to all [those] whom we have already shown to have used this phrase in many [places]. Nay, unless the whole human race is to be condemned, because it calls those [things] 'certain' which are apprehended from human conjectures: it is assuredly true that, from the living faith which we experience in ourselves, we can know, through conjectures, that we are partakers of the eternal reward — since we know [it was] said by the truthful master, [margin: John.] 'He who believes in the Son has eternal life'; and 'he who loves me shall be loved by my Father, and we will come to him.' But that we can know in ourselves true love and faith, there is no one who doubts — although we cannot [with certainty] apprehend that we are pleasing to God, or that we have infused grace in us. And so, the error condemned at Trent is not that we can, by conjectures and human reasonings, know that we have divine love or grace, or that we presume concerning divine predestination, the divine promises encouraging [us]; but [the error is] that anyone of men could, by the certitude of faith — divine revelation being excluded — be certain of divine grace or predestination." [margin: What the error condemned at Trent is.]

Annotation CCXVI [contents]

"When therefore Jesus had received the vinegar, he said, It is finished." — John 19[:30]

To John Ferus, expounding this passage in the commentaries, Domingo de Soto imputes the error of the Germans — namely, that he taught that sin remains after justification, yet is not imputed.

[signature "Vu 4"; catchword "id" → "this [error]," continues on p. 520 (PDF 525).]

(printed p. 520 [PDF p. 525], verso — end of Ann. CCXVI, then Ann. CCXVII–CCXIX, on John 19–21 (Ferus on remaining sin, defended by Medina; faith and human reason — Gregory/Aquinas; auricular confession — Catharinus vs. Cajetan, with Trent sess. 14 canon 6; "Feed my sheep" — whether Peter's care is over the predestined alone). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CCXVI (Ferus on remaining sin, defended by Medina), from the catchword "id":)

—this [error], indeed, he [Soto] conjectures from these sayings of the author: "SO also our salvation is consummated — not by full right, but in hope. For the man has begun to be justified and healed; yet meanwhile, while he is justified and healed, [that] which remains of sin in the flesh is not imputed to him, on account of Christ — who, since he is without any sin, [and] now made one with the man, intercedes for him before the Father." These [things] Ferus [says]; for whose defense Michael Medina refuted Soto with these words: "How far the author is from this calumny, we have long since shown. He assuredly calls 'sin,' in the Pauline manner, in the singular number, that natural lust of sinning which daily impels us to sin — which [lust] he [Soto] would complain is called 'sin' and 'not the effect of sin'; [he would complain] of Paul, who first introduced that manner of speaking: [margin: Rom. 7.] 'But if I do that which I will not, [it is] now not I that do it, but the sin that dwells in me.' Perhaps Paul did not know that the tinder of sinning and carnal concupiscence is to be called 'not sin, but the effect of sin'! Now, [as to the fact] that he [Soto] confirms his suspicion of him because the author uses the word 'impute' — by the same reasoning he will make the Holy Spirit suspect to him, [the Spirit] who, through the mouth of David, pronounces [that man] 'blessed,' [margin: Ps. 31.] to whom the Lord imputed not sin; and, through Ezekiel, [margin: Ezek. 33.] promises to [the man] doing penance and executing judgment and justice that [his] sins shall not be imputed. Nay, why should not Paul be suspect to him — from whom he [the author] took these words — [margin: Rom. 7.] since he says that until the Law sin was in the world, but was not imputed? Now let Soto infer that the permanence of sin is proved from Paul, from David, [and] from Ezekiel after justice is received — and we shall forthwith hold them [to be] heretics! And so it will always be lawful for catholic men to use a catholic phrase." These [things] Medina [says]. See above, Annotation 109 of this book.

Annotation CCXVII [contents]

"When it was late that same day, the first of the sabbaths." — John 20[:19]

[margin: Whether the mysteries of faith are to be proved by human reasons.]

Pope Gregory, in the beginning of the twenty-seventh homily on the gospels: "FAITH," he says, "has no merit, for which human reason furnishes proof." This proposition — usurped by those who denied that human reasons are to be brought in for the confirmation of divine [things] — St. Thomas, in the Secunda Secundae, elucidates with these words: "GREGORY, saying this, speaks in that case when a man has not the will to believe those [things] which are of faith except on account of a reason adduced. But when a man has the will to believe those [things] which are of faith from the divine authority alone, [and] if he has a demonstrative reason for some of them — as, for instance, for this, that God exists — the merit of faith is not on that account taken away, or diminished."

Annotation CCXVIII [contents]

"Receive the Holy Spirit: whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose you shall retain, they are retained." — John 20[:22–23]

[margin: Whether auricular confession was instituted by Christ.]

To Thomas Cajetan, explaining this sentence in the commentaries, Ambrosius [Catharinus], in the fifth book of the Annotations, imputes two errors, writing these [things] against him: "Cajetan CONFESSES that in John, chapter 20, confession was instituted by the Lord — yet not auricular [confession]; but that this [was] left to the arbitration of the Church, whether it should be made into the ear [privately], or publicly. Which is most absurd. For that is not left to the arbitration of the Church which reason and Scripture teach [must] be observed in a certain [determined] manner. For the Church could not decree that everyone should publicly disclose [his] hidden sins, on account of the innumerable scandals which would arise thence. Therefore, confession being instituted by the Lord, of its own accord [there] comes also the institution of the manner of confessing — namely, that public [sins be confessed] publicly, [and] hidden [sins] secretly; and it is peevish to wish all [things] to be [explicitly] set out in the Scriptures. For if the Lord instituted confession, it is credible that he also taught the manner of confessing — and no other than that which has always been observed, and which reason itself persuades: namely, that public [sins] should be confessed publicly, and hidden [sins] secretly. This too did not please [me]: that, although he confesses that confession was instituted by the Lord, yet he does not confess that it is enjoined [as a precept].

(right column — concluding Annotation CCXVIII:)

But I, from the very institution, interpret [it] also [as] enjoined — lest we say that so great a remedy was instituted in vain. And since everyone is bound to seek his own salvation, and this is the manner instituted by the Lord, and (as Jerome says) the second plank after shipwreck — namely, that through confession the sinner is absolved by the priest — how can it be said not to be enjoined? Will it, then, be lawful to despise the goodness and grace of God, and one's own salvation, without crime? Far be it from the minds of the faithful, that these absurdities be believed." These [things] Ambrosius [Catharinus says]; to whose opinion is to be added the canon of the Council of Trent against both errors. It is had in session 14, canon 6, in these words: "IF anyone shall deny that sacramental confession was either instituted, or is necessary to salvation, by divine right; or shall say that the manner of confessing secretly to the priest alone — which the catholic Church has always observed from the beginning, and [still] observes — is alien from the institution and mandate of Christ, and is a human invention: let him be anathema."

Annotation CCXIX [contents]

"Feed my sheep." — John 21[:17]

[margin: Whether the care of the predestined alone was committed to Peter.]

The exposition of Thomas Cajetan, Ambrosius [Catharinus], in the third book, chastises with this censure: "CONCERNING the care given to Peter, Cajetan says thus: 'Although the care of all Christians is understood to be committed to Peter, yet the predestined alone — who alone are the lambs and sheep of Jesus Christ — are set forth as to be fed and ruled by Peter; for to this tends the institution of the pastoral office.' Thus he [Cajetan] — which [words] I doubt not to be both false and dangerous. For if the care is not committed to Peter by the Lord except over the predestined, then assuredly he will not have [it] over others — which is false and heretical. Moreover, we should be ignorant — nay, he himself would have been ignorant — over whom the care was committed to him; for he [Peter] did not know who were predestined, which it is foolish to confess. Moreover, the care of the angels is [exercised] indifferently for all, even the non-predestined; because to each one an angel is given for salvation — for they are ministering spirits, that we may obtain the inheritance of salvation. Moreover, if it was committed to him only over the predestined, he would not have had the power of binding, as [well as] of loosing, so that [things] should be bound also in heaven — which yet was explicitly given to him by the Lord — lest the Most Rever-

[catchword "-dissimus" (Reverendissimus) → "the Most Reverend [Cajetan]," continues on p. 521 (PDF 526).]

(printed p. 521 [PDF p. 526], recto — end of Ann. CCXIX, then Ann. CCXX–CCXXII, on John 21 & Acts 1 (Peter's care over all, not the elect only; the SIC/SI Greek variant at John 21:22 — Valla vs. Erasmus vs. Augustine, and George of Trebizond; "Follow thou me" and Peter's keys vs. the Lutherans; then the series crosses into Acts — Judas's death). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCXIX (Catharinus on "Feed my sheep"), from the catchword "-dissimus":)

—[lest the Most Rever]end [Cajetan] be able to say [that] what he perhaps meant [was] that over the non-predestined he had care [only] indirectly, or implicitly. Moreover, Peter is the perfect Vicar of Christ; but Christ had from God power over all flesh — thus over Judas, as [well as] over Peter; and with the same doctrine and care he fed both. But that Judas did not repent was effected by his own malice, not by the Lord's negligence or dereliction (which I shudder even to say). So, therefore, Peter received the care over my [sheep], so that, if anyone were lost through his negligence or sloth, his blood should be required at his hand — as the Lord threatens in Ezekiel. [margin: Ezek. 34.] For, by the mandate of the Lord, Peter owes care and vigilance to all without difference — as much to the non-predestined as to the predestined. But vain, and scandalous, are meditations of this kind, [being] built upon a false foundation."

Annotation CCXX [contents]

"So I will him to remain, till I come." — John 21[:22]

[margin: Whether it is to be read SIC ["so"] or SI ["if"].]

Augustine, narrating this period [passage] in tract 124 on John, Lorenzo Valla, in the Annotations on the New Testament, assailed with harsh reproaches — because, the truth of the Greek source being neglected, he [Augustine] had falsely thrust into the Gospel the particle "SIC," reading "SO [Sic] I will him to remain," for [that] which the genuine copies of the Greeks have, "ἀἘν αὐτὸν θέλω μένειν," "IF [Si] I will him to remain." Erasmus, in the Annotations on the New Testament, against Valla, takes up the patronage of Augustine — but in such a way that Erasmus's defense is far more odious than Valla's accusation. For he so defends him as to say that pardon must be given to the man's inexperience and simple credulity; who, although he was a holy man, upright, and endowed with a keen genius, was nevertheless credulous, and destitute of the aid of languages — without which the divine Scriptures cannot, as is fitting, be handled. To these [things] he adds that he came late to Christianity, and, soon, as a young man, was snatched to the episcopal office, so that he was compelled to learn by teaching what he taught, and to learn by writing what he wrote; and that, therefore, he is to be tolerated, if somewhere he does not attain what he aims at.

I cannot but greatly wonder that Erasmus, a man most learned in his own estimation, could think that Augustine had here slipped from ignorance of the Greek language — as if he were so devoid of Greek literature that, reading the Greek Gospel of John, he could not distinguish ἀὲν from ὄντως — since so many of his writings attest that he was not altogether ignorant of Greek letters. Nay, he himself, in the first volume of the Confessions, confesses that he learned Greek grammar while still a boy, and sang the songs of Homer in the literary school. I find also some sentences of Chrysostom, corrupted by the Pelagians, restored by him to their Greek integrity. Also the seven volumes of the Locutions of the Old Testament, in which he emends the sacred locutions to the Greek reading, and the Categories of Aristotle, translated by him into Latin, plainly show that he was not so destitute of Greek letters but that he could know that ἀὲν signifies "IF." [margin: Whether it is to be read SI or SIC.]

George of Trebizond, a Greek, and most erudite in the Greek language, in the book which he wrote on this passage of John to Pope Eugenius, shows that Augustine and the other Latin fathers translated ἀ῾Εν [as] "SIC" not from ignorance, but from design — because, just as the particle "SI" among the Latins, so the same [particle] among the Greeks, when joined to an indicative verb, is taken affirmatively; but with a subjunctive [verb], suspensively and dubitatively. But since ἀ῾Εν is here joined to an indicative, therefore the Latin fathers interpreted [it] not "SI" but "SIC" — lest, namely, the particle "SI" should trouble those [but] half-learned in the Latin and Greek tongues, on account of its double force. But by affirming "SIC," they said [it] expressly, so that no one should doubt that that Greek particle too was there placed not otherwise than affirmatively. There are also [those] who think that Augustine read and wrote "SI," and not "SIC," but that it happened by the fault of the copyists that "SIC" was put for "SI"; and this they endeavor to persuade from Augustine's own context.

(right column — concluding Annotation CCXX:)

Annotation CCXXI [contents]

"Follow thou me." — John 21[:19]

[margin: Whether Peter had the keys in his own person.]

Augustine, narrating this in tract 124 on John, says: "This the Church does, in blessed hope, in this toilsome life — of which Church Peter the Apostle, on account of the primacy of his apostolate, bore the person by a figured generality. For [as to] that which properly pertains to himself, by nature he was one man, by grace one Christian, by a more abundant grace one and the same [person, namely] Peter the Apostle: but when it was said to him, 'I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind,' etc., then he signified the whole Church." This passage the Lutherans adduce, to show that when Christ said, [margin: Matt. 16.] "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church," etc., he spoke to Peter not as to his particular person, but to the whole Church, whose figure he bore — just as when he spoke to all the Apostles by a response directed to Judas.

Meeting these [Lutherans], John Bunderius, in the book of the Concertationes, thus says: "IF the Lord had directed the discourse to the Apostles, he would have enunciated [it] in the plural number — just as when, to Peter alone asking, 'Behold, now we have left all things; what therefore shall there be for us?', the Lord soon, directing [his] words to all the Apostles, says: 'You, who have followed me,' etc. But now, to Peter, on account of his singular dignity, he directed the discourse: 'I will give thee the keys,' etc." Examining which, Augustine, in the same place, says: "He first of the Apostles received the keys of the kingdom of heaven." Nor do we deny that the keys are given to the Church: for the Church is the end [purpose] of the gift; for [they] are given on account of the Church's utility. And this Augustine affirms, tract 124 on John, saying: "The Church, which is founded on Christ, received from him the keys of the kingdom of heaven in Peter." By this figure we say that the empire is among the Germans — not because the individual Germans [have it], but because one of them is distinguished with the title of the empire. [The keys] are, therefore, in Peter authoritatively, in the Church finally [as to their end]. See [things] pertaining to this argument in Annotations 68 and 206 of this book.

Annotation CCXXII [contents]

"Being hanged, he burst asunder in the midst: and all his bowels gushed out." — Acts 1[:18]

[catchword "OECY-" (Oecumenius) → the annotation on Judas's death begins; continues on p. 522 (PDF 527). This is the first annotation on the Acts of the Apostles — the series has now passed out of the Gospel of John.]

(printed p. 522 [PDF p. 527], verso — end of Ann. CCXXII, then Ann. CCXXIII–CCXXV, on Acts 1–6 (Judas's death — Oecumenius, quoting Papias's lurid account, which Sixtus rejects for the hanging, with poems from Juvencus and Arator; Chrysostom on oaths, twice; whether the seven of Acts 6 were true deacons — Cajetan vs. Catharinus). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCXXII (Judas's death), from the catchword "OECY-":)

[margin: Whether Judas died by hanging.]

Oecumenius, in the Collectanea on the Acts of the Apostles, affixed to this passage such an explanation: "JUDAS did not depart from life by hanging, but survived. For he was cast down before he was choked; and this the Acts of the Apostles indicate — that, [falling] forward, he burst asunder in the midst. But this Papias, the disciple of the Apostle John, wrote more plainly, saying: 'Judas remained in this world as a great example of impiety. For he was so swollen in body that he could not pass through where a chariot easily passes; and when a chariot was passing by in an easy course, he was crushed by the chariot, so that his bowels gushed out.' IN ANOTHER MANNER [he tells it]: 'For he was so swollen in body that he could not go forward where a chariot passed in an easy course — nay, not even the swelling of [his] head alone [could pass]. For they say that even the eyelids of his eyes were so swollen that he could not see the light at all, and his eyes could not appear even with the dioptra [physicians' instrument]: with so great a depth were they separated from the outer view. But his genital member exceeded all obscenity and magnitude. Furthermore, gore and worms, flowing together disgustingly, were borne out of his whole body, going out through the secret places alone. But after many torments and punishments, when he had died in his own field (as they say), on account of the stench that field remained deserted and uninhabited to this day; nor even to this present time can anyone pass by that place except with nostrils stopped by the hand.'" These [things] Oecumenius [says] — from whose narration Theophylact, expounding chapter 27 of Matthew, seems not to have altogether recoiled. The common consensus of all the Fathers rejects this opinion, [the Fathers] writing that Judas perished, according to the evangelical sentence, by the choking of the noose. Nay, and Oecumenius himself, reporting these [things] from the records of others, testifies that Judas perished by hanging immediately after the betrayal was done. Which also Juvencus, a most ancient poet, comprehended in these verses in the fourth book of the Evangelical History:

But the traitor Judas, after he sees such [things] —

[sees] that the received price of [his] crime has made [him] frenzied — unhappy, condemning his own deeds with sick complaints, and blaming the silver, cast [it] into the sacred temple;

and, having begun to take punishment on himself by the noose, he snatched a shapeless death from the top of a fig-tree.

And Arator the deacon, in the first book of the Apostolic History, described the manner of the same death more fully in these verses. So the venerable [man] says:

> You know that the mad traitor
>
> paid himself the wages of [his] crime; he himself dreaded
>
> the loathsomeness of his own [guilt], choking the voice in [his] throat —
>
> the example [Christ] no longer [being present] to answer for the guilty [deed]; he who deserved > to be slain in [that] part in which the fault lay, and, revising [his] crime,
>
>
> by such a token committed [his] limbs to frenzy
>
> in the midst of the air, so that — hating both heaven and earth —
>
> he might set, for the common enemy, the due place of punishment.
>
> Between the two he perishes. His burst bowels fall, > to be buried in no sepulchres; and, slipped away into the thin airs,
>
>
> [his] ash flees from the world, etc.

(right column:)

Annotation CCXXIII [contents]

"That every one may convert himself from his wickedness." — Acts 3[:26]
[margin: On the oath.]

Chrysostom, in the ninth homily on Acts, narrating this, detests those who — in forensic judgments, in contracts, in suretyships, and in public or private acts of this kind — either offer or exact oaths, whether just or unjust. Consult Annotation 26 of this book.

Annotation CCXXIIII [contents]

"We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard." — Acts 4[:20]
[margin: On the oath.]

Chrysostom, in the tenth homily on Acts, inculcating [his] dogma about the oath — peculiar to himself alone — intimates that every oath is against the evangelical law, which entirely forbids to Christians the custom of swearing [once] allowed to the Jews of old. See Annotation 26 of this book.

Annotation CCXXV [contents]

"They chose Stephen, and Philip, and Prochorus." — Acts 6[:5]
[margin: Whether the seven [of Acts 6] were true deacons.]

Ambrosius [Catharinus], bishop of Compsa [Conza], is gravely indignant at Thomas Cajetan, because — against the tradition of all the saints — he wrote, in the Commentaries on Acts, that the seven men whom the Apostles set over the tables were not truly deacons and ministers of the sacred altar. I, more diligently inquiring into this matter, found among ecclesiastical writers grave authors and witnesses on both sides. For Thomas [stand] almost all the Greek Fathers; among whom Chrysostom, in the fourteenth homily on Acts, speaking of these seven men: "HOW GREAT a dignity these had," he says, "and what ordination they received [as] necessary, it will [be hard] to say. Was it, perchance, that which is of the deacons? And assuredly this is not [so] in the churches; but this dispensation is [that] of the presbyters. And yet [at that time] there was as yet no bishop, but the Apostles alone. Whence I think this [office] to be the name neither of the deacons nor of the presbyters." Oecumenius, in the Collectanea of the explanations on Acts, explaining this more clearly, writes thus: "The Apostles created the elect [not as] deacons according to the grade which is now in the Church, but [as] διακόνους [diakónous], that is, 'ministers' [servants] — so that, with all diligence and not negligently, they might distribute to the widows and orphans together those [things] which had been laid up for [their] nourishment; and this, especially, to the widows and orphans, on account of whom chiefly the murmur had arisen. And he calls the daily ministry 'alms,' as being both a medicine to those who do [it], and an honor to those affected by its benefit. But it was not of malice that the widows were despised, but of the sloth of many. Therefore also, when it seemed fitting that care should be applied, the grief of mind was soothed. Or they also call [it] a 'public administration'; for this the name διακονία [diakonía] wishes to signify — since indeed the Greeks call a public store [that] into which each one strives, with great zeal, to contribute liberally, toward the common expense, [the things] which abound to him [privately]." In the opinion of Ambrose [that they were true deacons] I find nearly all the Latins; of whose number Arator the deacon, in the first book of the Apostolic History, expressed the office of these deacons in these verses:

> The rights of the ministry, fit for the sacred altars, > they established in seven men, whom — chosen from every side —
>
>
> it pleases [us] to call Levites, [at the time] when the Church, splendid, began > to shine with a hand [ministry] which [bore] the cups of life,
>
>
> [catchword "Mi-" → the Arator verse continues, on p. 523 (PDF 528).]

(printed p. 523 [PDF p. 528], recto — end of Ann. CCXXV, then Ann. CCXXVI–CCXXXI, on Acts 9–17 & Romans 1 (the seven deacons concluded, with Bede; "kick against the goad" — the Greek text vindicated against Cajetan/Erasmus; suffrages for the dead; James of Jerusalem; Dionysius the Areopagite and the Pseudo-Dionysius question; then the series enters Paul — Origen on predestination and foreknowledge [Rom. 1:1]; Chrysostom on not scrutinizing the divine mysteries [Rom. 1:17]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCXXV (Arator's verses on the deacons), from the catchword "Mi-":)

> [the Church began to shine with a hand which] mixes, and offers the liquids [water and wine] with the blood of the Lamb.
>
> The honor conferred by this number [seven] carries with it sublime
>
> sacraments, through which the measure of [my] road [i.e. brevity]
>
> does not permit me to go further, etc.

The presbyter Bede, subscribing to Arator the deacon: "HENCE now," he says, "the Apostles, or the successors of the Apostles, decreed [that there be], throughout all the churches, seven deacons, who should be of a more sublime grade than the rest, and, as [it were] the nearest columns of the altar, should stand by around the altar — and not without some mystery of the septenary number."

Annotation CCXXVI [contents]

"It is hard for thee to kick against the goad." — Acts 9[:5]
[margin: On the true reading of this passage.]

Thomas Cajetan, in this place, following the judgment of Erasmus, says that in the Greek text this sentence is not had — "It is hard for thee to kick against the goad" — nor likewise the clause which follows, "And trembling and astonished, he said, Lord, what wilt thou have me do?" But that this is false, all the Greek copies printed [by the press] convince, in which these [words] are thus read: "Σκληρόν σοι πρὸς κέντρα λακτίζειν. Τρέμων τε καὶ θαμβῶν εἶπεν, κύριε, τί με θέλεις ποιῆσαι" [It is hard for thee to kick against the goads. And trembling and amazed he said, Lord, what wilt thou have me do?]. And that words of this kind ought to be placed in this passage, the very narration of Paul, in the 26th chapter of Acts, confirms — where the Apostle, narrating what happened to him on the road to Damascus, thus says: [margin: Acts 26.] "When we had fallen to the ground, I heard a voice speaking in the Hebrew tongue, 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? It is hard for thee to kick against the goad.'" Thus exactly the narration of Luke squares with the narration of Paul; for if he [Luke] had passed over these words, he would not have fully narrated the words of God to Paul.

Annotation CCXXVII [contents]

"It came to pass that he tarried many days in Joppa." — Acts 9[:43]

[margin: Suffrages for the dead.]

Chrysostom, at the end of the 21st homily on Acts, seems to allude to the opinion of those who think that the oblations, alms, and suffrages of the living profit even the saints, and those who have finished life, toward the increase of glory. See Annotation 47 of this book.

Annotation CCXXVIII [contents]

"James answered, saying, Men [and] brethren." — Acts 15[:13]

Oecumenius, in this place, writes that James — bishop of Jerusalem, and brother of the Lord according to the flesh — was the son of Joseph, the spouse of the Virgin Mary. See Annotation 59 of this book.

Annotation CCXXIX [contents]

"Among whom was also Dionysius the Areopagite." — Acts 17[:34]

[margin: Who Dionysius the Areopagite was.]

Bede, in the commentaries on Acts, explaining this, hands down that this Dionysius was that bishop of the Corinthians who wrote notable volumes for the utility of the Church. But Eusebius, in the 6th book of the Ecclesiastical History, plainly shows that the Dionysius who was bishop of Corinth (who wrote many [things]) was another [person]. And there he also cites the authority of this Dionysius, bishop of Corinth; who, in a certain epistle which he wrote to the Athenians, showed that Dionysius the Areopagite, converted by Paul, was the first bishop of Athens, [and] instituted by the same Apostle. Moreover, [there is] a constant report that this Dionysius the Areopagite is the same who, at Lutetia of the Parisians [Paris], crowned with martyrdom, fell asleep. Whose also are thought to be the books which are now had On the Hierarchies and On the Divine Names — concerning which Thomas Cajetan, and very many others, doubt whether they are his by whose title they are inscribed, on this account, that Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men, made no mention of this Dionysius. But concerning these [things] it has been said in this work, in the second book, under "Dionysius."

(right column — concluding Annotation CCXXIX:)

Annotation CCXXX [contents]

"Separated unto the gospel of God." — Romans 1[:1]

[margin: On the cause of predestination.]

Origen, in the first book of the commentaries on the epistle to the Romans, inquiring into the causes of this separation, is thought to assert that the foreknowledge of merits is the cause of eternal predestination — which indeed seems to furnish an occasion to the Pelagian error. His words run thus: "BUT WE say that Paul was chosen neither by chance, nor by a natural difference, but that He — who knows all [things] before they come to be — gave to him the causes of his own election in himself. Therefore Paul, [in] that he is said [to be] 'separated unto the gospel,' and separated from the womb of his mother — the causes and merits, by which he ought to have been separated, He saw, from whom the heart is not hidden. For he foresaw that [Paul] would labor more abundantly than all the rest in the gospel; that he would preach the gospel in hunger and thirst, in cold and nakedness — lest perhaps, while he preached to others, he himself should be made reprobate. These [things], therefore, and [things] like these, and many others concerning him, Jesus, foreseeing [them] in the womb of [his] mother, separated him for these [reasons] unto the gospel. Which also Paul himself, discoursing more fully in what follows, says: [margin: Rom. 8.] 'Because whom he foreknew, he also predestinated to be made conformable to the image of his Son,' etc. — evidently showing that those whom God foreknew would be such [as] to conform themselves to Christ in [his] sufferings, those same [ones] he also predestinated [to be] conformable and like to his image, and to [his] glory. The foreknowledge of God, therefore, precedes — by which they are known who are going to have in themselves labors and virtues; and thus predestination follows. Nor, again, will the foreknowledge be thought the cause of predestination. For [that] which, among men, the merit of each is weighed from past deeds — this, with God, is judged from future [deeds]." See below, Annotation 251.

Annotation CCXXXI [contents]

"For the justice of God is revealed therein, from faith unto faith." — Romans 1[:17]

[margin: Whether those who scrutinize the divine mysteries are to be condemned.]

Chrysostom, near the end of the second homily on the epistle to the Romans: "BUT IF it is dangerous to investigate those [things] which God has commanded, and the utmost punishment awaits curious men: what defense, in the end, will those have who presume to scrutinize [things] far more hidden than these, and more to be reverenced? — that is, in what way, and by what reason, God begot [his] Son, and what is his substance." And in the eighth homily on the epistle to the Romans: "BUT IF, scrutinizing and searching out these lower [things], we give not honor to God, we

[catchword "damu-" (damus) → "we give," continues on p. 524 (PDF 529).]

(printed p. 524 [PDF p. 529], verso — end of Ann. CCXXXI, then Ann. CCXXXII–CCXXXV, on Romans 1–5 (Lucian the Monk vs. the scholastics; Chrysostom on circumcision; Origen on "faith alone" reconciled with James and Trent session 6 [with the canons on justification]; Chrysostom on Abraham's faith; Anselm and Peter Lombard — is the charity of Rom. 5:5 the indwelling Holy Spirit himself?). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCXXXI, from the catchword "damu-":)

—we give [honor to God]: much more, investigating the origin of the Lord with superfluous curiosity, shall we suffer the extreme [punishment], as [those] who have affected God with contumelies. For if it is impious to scrutinize the figure of the resurrection, much more [impious to scrutinize] those hidden [things], dreadful and full of reverence." Lucian the Monk — wholly devoid of scholastic theology, and on that account the perpetual enemy of the scholastic name — in the Annotations upon Chrysostom (reprobated by the Council of Trent), on the occasion of these words, harasses the scholastic theologians, and accuses [them] of temerity, because they dare to enter the innermost recesses of the most sacred Trinity, and to define with fixed assertion in what [respects] each person differs from the others, [and] in what [respects] it agrees. Nor does this inept and miserable manikin observe that Chrysostom's words are aimed especially at those who search out [things] of this kind with an ambitious and empty curiosity, and with arrogant haughtiness — not against the pious and catholic theologians, who investigate these [things] with humble and reverent study, for the glory of God, for the defense of the faith, and for the overthrow of the heretics.

Annotation CCXXXII [contents]

"For circumcision profits indeed, if thou keep the law." — Romans 2[:25]

[margin: Whether circumcision confers grace.]

Chrysostom, in the seventh homily on the epistle to the Romans, makes this passage plain by such an exposition: "IT WAS ALLOWED to Paul to exclude circumcision otherwise, and to say: 'What is circumcision? Is it [any] merit of him who has had it? Is it [any] demonstration of a good mind and purpose? For indeed it is done in an immature age; and [those] who lived in the wilderness remained uncircumcised for many years; and from other [sources], by many arguments, it can be shown that it is not very necessary.' Nevertheless, he does not repudiate it from that [argument], but from where it most behooved [him] — namely, from Abraham himself. For this is an excellent victory: to show [a thing] easily to be contemned from that [source] whence it seemed chiefly to be venerated. Although he could also have said that the Jews too are called 'uncircumcised' by the prophets. But this is not yet a fault of circumcision, but of him who has it [only] by [outward] desert. But what is sought is this: namely, that it be shown [that circumcision] has no force even in the best life. This, therefore, he now sets about [to prove]." Lucian the Monk, in the Annotations upon Chrysostom condemned by the Council of Trent, gathers from these words that Chrysostom was of the opinion that circumcision brought no grace to the circumcised, and profited them nothing toward salvation. He also inveighs against the scholastics, because they determine otherwise about this article. But in what way the sayings of Chrysostom are to be understood, we admonished above, Annotation 96 of book 5.

Annotation CCXXXIII [contents]

"Where is thy boasting?" — Romans 3[:27]

[margin: Whether faith alone justifies.]

Origen, in the third book on the epistle to the Romans, narrating this, shows by a long digression that sinners are justified by faith alone, without any works. A fragment of this digression is cited in the Collectanea of the Lutherans, against the decree of the Council of Trent — by which it is established, according to the sentence of the Apostle James, that a man is justified not by faith alone, but by works also.

(right column — concluding Annotation CCXXXIII:)

But it must be observed that Origen speaks of the first justification, not of the second — or, of the beginning and origin of justification, and not of the progress and increase of justification. For the catholics hand down that the very increase of justification, through perseverance and consummation, is obtained not by faith alone, but by the labors of the cooperating man — in that manner in which the Apostle James said: [margin: James 2.] "Wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is idle? Was not Abraham our father justified by works, offering up his son upon the altar? Thou seest that faith cooperated with his works, and by works faith was made perfect?" Therefore, [as to the fact] that Origen says [that] sinners are justified by faith alone, without any works — that assuredly looks to this: that works which are meritorious of justification be excluded [as its cause]. For if [it were] of works, grace would not be grace. But not that he would reject the free cooperation and preparation of man toward justifying grace, or the increase of justification already obtained — concerning which the sacrosanct Council of Trent, [margin: Sess. 6.] session 6, decrees in this manner: "IF anyone shall say that the impious [man] is justified by faith alone — so as to understand that nothing else is required to cooperate toward obtaining the grace of justification, and that it is in no way necessary that he be prepared and disposed by the motion of his own will: let him be anathema." And, in the twenty-fourth canon: "IF anyone shall say that the justice received is not preserved, and also not increased before God through good works, but that the works themselves are only the fruits and signs of the justification obtained, and not also the cause of its increase: let him be anathema."

Annotation CCXXXIIII [contents]

"And he was not weak in faith." — Romans 4[:19]

The exposition of Chrysostom applied to this passage, Lucian the Monk, in the Annotations, twists against the scholastics — because they dare to distinguish the divine persons, one from another, by certain relations. See above, Annotation 231 of this book.

Annotation CCXXXV [contents]

"The charity of God is poured forth in our hearts by the Holy Spirit, who is given to us." — Romans 5[:5]

[margin: Whether the charity by which we love God is the indwelling Holy Spirit.]

Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, in the commentaries on the epistle to the Romans, sifting this passage, affirms that the charity poured forth in our hearts — by which we love God and neighbor — is not any gift of the Holy Spirit created in us, but the very person of the Holy Spirit dwelling in us. Which [thing] Peter Lombard, in the commentaries on the same epistle, and in the first book of the Sentences, distinction 17, most constantly confirms, many testimonies of Augustine being adduced — of which the chief, and looking most of all to this clause of the Apostle, is had in book 15 On the Trinity, chapter 16, in these words: "GOD the Holy Spirit, who proceeds from God, when he shall have been given to a man, kindles him in the love of God and of neighbor; and the Holy Spirit himself is love. For a man does not have [that] whence he may love God, except from God. Whence the Apostle Paul [says]: 'Love [is]

[catchword "dile-" (dilectio) → "Love [is from God]," continues on p. 525 (PDF 530).]

(printed p. 525 [PDF p. 530], recto — end of Ann. CCXXXV, then Ann. CCXXXVI, on Romans 5 (Chrysostom's three opinions on original sin, held to be foreign to the common teaching: [1] Adam's sin passed to posterity as punishment, not guilt; [2] its penalty is bodily death, not the soul's damnation; [3] it brought us gains, not harm — documented from homilies 10 & 17 on Romans, 39 on 1 Cor., 24 on Ephesians, and the homily To the Neophytes*; and abused by Julian of Eclanum, Lucian the Monk, Erasmus, and Faber). Read order: left column, then right. NB: minor ink-blotting in the top margin; text intact.)*

(left column — concluding Annotation CCXXXV (Anselm/Lombard on charity), from the catchword "dile-":)

—"'Love,' he [Paul] says, 'of God is poured forth in our hearts, by the Holy Spirit, who is given to us.' And below: 'Love, therefore, which is from God, and is God, is properly the Holy Spirit, through whom the charity of God is poured forth in our hearts, through which the whole Trinity inhabits us. Wherefore most rightly the Holy Spirit, since he is God, is also called "the gift of God." Which gift, properly, what is it, but charity — [that] is to be understood — which leads through to God, and without which any other Gift of God does not lead through to God?'" To this opinion nearly all the scholastic theologians cry out against, with unanimous consent, teaching that the Holy Spirit does indeed glide into our souls, according to the substance of his deity, or the hypostasis of his person — yet is distinguished, by a long interval, from the gift of charity by which we are kindled into the love of God and neighbor.

Annotation CCXXXVI [contents]

"As by one man sin entered into the world," etc. — Romans 5[:12]

[margin: Whether the sin of Adam passed to posterity not [as] guilt, but [as] punishment.]

Chrysostom, expounding this passage and other passages akin to it, seems to hold three [things] concerning original sin, foreign to the common opinions of the theologians. The first of which is, that the sin of Adam passed to [his] posterity not [as] guilt, but [as] punishment — because, although one sometimes pays penalties for the offense of another, yet no one becomes a sinner from another's sin, but each one is made wicked from his own crime only. The second is, that the punishment of this sin is not the damnation of the soul, but only the infirmity, corruption, and death of the body — since the death of the soul follows only those who, by free choice, sin voluntarily; but the death of the body comprehends both those who sin and those who do not sin. The third is, that the sin of the first parent brought us no detriment, but the greatest gains.

The first and second assertion he seems to build up [in] homily 10 on the epistle to the Romans, with these words: "WHAT, then, does this mean, 'In whom all have sinned'? It is answered, that, he [Adam] having fallen, those also who did not eat of the tree were made, from that time, all mortal." And a little below, in the exposition of that sentence, "By the disobedience of one man many were made sinners," etc., he speaks in this manner: "IT SEEMS indeed to have no small question — [namely] that which is said, that many were made sinners on account of the disobedience of one. For, he [Adam] having sinned and been made mortal, [that] those also who were born of him should be such is nothing absurd. But that from his disobedience another should be made a sinner — what congruity and consequence, I beseech [you], has this? For it is found thus, that he who was [made] such would not even owe [any] penalties, since he became not a sinner from himself. What, then, does this word 'SINNERS' signify in this place? To me it seems to signify just as much as [to be] 'liable to punishment, and guilty of death' — [namely] that, furthermore, Adam having died, all were made mortal." Again, in the exposition of the first epistle to the Corinthians, homily 39, explaining those words of the 15th chapter, "As in Adam all die, so in Christ all shall be made alive," he seems to confirm the same, saying thus: "WHAT then? Tell me, did all in Adam die by the death of sin? How then was Noah a just man in his generation? [margin: John 15.] how Abraham, how Job, how, in fine, many others? And how, tell me, shall all be made alive in Christ — and these especially, who are to be led away into gehenna? And so, if we wish this to be said of the body, the discourse will stand; but if of justice and sin, by no means." And [in] homily 17 on chapter 6 of the same epistle [Romans], showing that the death of the soul happens not from the guilt of the first parent, but only from the actual sins of each, he speaks thus: "WHAT, then, shall I do,' thou sayest, 'do I perish on account of him — namely, Adam?' By no means on account of him; for neither didst thou remain without sin. And if [it be] not the same sin, yet thou hast committed another." And [in] homily 24 on the epistle to the Ephesians, expounding the last words of the final chapter, he relates the same more openly, saying: "CORRUPTIBLE is our body, but incorruptible the soul: let us not, therefore, corrupt it also. This [is what] that first sin (that is, of the first man) did. But [that] which, after the laver [of baptism], can corrupt even the soul, and make [it] susceptible of the immortal worm [...]." To this also pertains [that] which, in the homily entitled To the Neophytes, he is thought to hand down — namely, that little infants, before baptism, are neither liable to any guilt, nor baptized for the remission of any guilt, but are baptized only for the sake of obtaining justification and inheritance. His words run thus: "THOU SEEST how many are the bounties of baptism? But to many, indeed, it seems that the grace of baptism consists only in the remission of sins; but we have already reckoned up ten honors of baptism. For this cause we baptize little infants too, although they are not defiled by sin — namely, that to them may be added holiness, justice, adoption, inheritance, and the brotherhood of Christ, that all [of them] may be his members, and [that they] may become a habitation of the Spirit." From these sayings, therefore, Chrysostom seems to have shown the two former propositions.

(right column — continuing Annotation CCXXXVI:)

The third proposition also he persuades with these words: "THAT, moreover, Adam having died, we were all made mortal, he showed openly and by many [arguments]. But what falls into question is: for what cause was this done? And if any of you should seek to learn [it], we shall say this: that not only have we received no harm from a death and condemnation of this kind, if we are wise, but — [being] made mortal — we have even made a gain: first, this, namely, that in a mortal body we may not sin; then, that we may have infinite arguments for philosophy [the moral life]. For both present and awaited death persuades [us] to keep measure, and to be composed and calm [as] temperate [men], and likewise [to be] freed from all viciousness. But together with these, or rather before these very [things], it brought many other goods," etc. Thus far Chrysostom.

[margin: Whether there is any original sin.]

From whose authority Julian, bishop of Eclanum [Celanensis], the chief champion of the Pelagian sect, at the end of the four books which he published against original sin, contended that Chrysostom was of the opinion of those who believe that there is no sin of origin transfused from the parents into the children. Which [opinion], in our age too, Lucian the Monk attributed to the same [Chrysostom], in the Annotations upon Chrysostom reprobated by the Council of Trent; and Erasmus of Rotterdam, in the Annotations on the fifth chapter of [the epistle] to the Romans; and Jacobus Faber, bishop of Vienne, in this

[signature "Xx"; catchword "parte" → "in this part," continues on p. 526 (PDF 531).]

(printed p. 526 [PDF p. 531], verso — Annotation CCXXXVI continued, on Romans 5 (Sixtus refutes the Pelagian misreading of Chrysostom — his own words show baptism plucks out "radical sin"; Augustine's defense of Chrysostom against Julian; the resolution that the posterity sinned "in Adam" as in a root; the To the Neophytes homily corrupted by the Pelagians, with the true Greek text; and Gregory's felix culpa*). The whole page is one annotation. Read order: left column, then right. NB: minor ink-blotting in the top margin; text intact.)*

(left column — continuing Annotation CCXXXVI, from the catchword "parte":)

—[in this] part a follower of Pelagius, [does the same] in the Apologia of his commentaries on Paul: in which, from the aforesaid testimonies of Chrysostom, he strives to defend that which he himself, in the exposition of the fifth chapter [of the epistle] to the Romans, had wrongly written concerning original sin — affirming that original sin is nothing else than an obligation of the human race to bodily death, contracted from the offense of the first parent.

BUT that Chrysostom did not so think, appears from those [things] which he left written here and there concerning the infection of human nature, corrupted in the first parents — especially [in] homily 12 on the epistle to the Romans, in which these words are had: "WHEN Adam sinned, then his body too was made mortal and passible, very many vices of nature being received, and, moreover, a heavier and unbridled horse [the flesh] being rendered [unruly]. But Christ, when he came, made that [horse] lighter for us through baptism, rousing up the same by other spirit[ual aids]." And [in] homily 11 on the same epistle, pursuing the same more fully, he says: "OUR BODY, before the coming of Christ, was easily conquered; for together with death a great swarm, as it were, of affections had entered in. And so the same body was not very agile for that course which leads to virtue; for neither was there [the] Spirit to bring help, nor baptism, which could mortify [it]; but it ran after the manner of an unbridled horse, and went astray." And again, [in] homily 13 on the same epistle, inculcating the same with words a little altered, he says: "INTO man, together with death, there entered a throng of affections. For when the body was made mortal, then at last it necessarily admitted both concupiscence, and anger, and grief, and all the rest [of the passions], which needed very great constancy and wisdom, lest the force of the flooding heat, and the tempest, should overwhelm reason in us — [reason] plunged into the whirlpool of sin. For those affections were by no means sin; but the immoderateness of them, [being] unbridled, effected sin." Again, [in] homily 40 on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, he manifestly pronounces that in the regeneration of baptism original sin is taken away — which he himself calls προέρριζον ἁμαρτίαν [proérrizon hamartían], that is, "radical sin," inasmuch as [it is] drawn from the root of the first parent — saying thus: "GOD, in the laver of regeneration, touches the mind with grace, plucks out the radical sin, and makes the man such as he was of old, when he was created — nay, [makes him] more illustrious."

FROM THESE [things] it is most clearly gathered that, according to Chrysostom's opinion, from the sin of Adam there passed to [his] posterity not only the punishment of bodily corruption and death, but also the languor of the now-vitiated soul, and a certain immoderate heat of unbridled concupiscence — leading the soul away from the path of virtue, and dragging [it] to the deadly enticements of pleasures, and to the death of the spirit. Wherefore Augustine, refuting Julian — because from the aforesaid sayings of Chrysostom he strove to overthrow the transmission of original sin — writes these [things] in the first volume against him, in defense of Chrysostom: "DOST THOU dare thus to oppose to us the words of the holy bishop John [Chrysostom]? Far be it — far be it to believe or say this evil of so great a man! Far be it, I say, that John of Constantinople, speaking of the baptism of little ones (who have the liberation of the paternal bond through Christ), should resist so many and so great fellow-bishops of his — and most of all the Roman Innocent, the Carthaginian Cyprian, the Cappadocian Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, [and] the Milanese Ambrose. For what those held, this John held, this he believed, this he taught." These [things] Augustine [says].

(right column — continuing Annotation CCXXXVI:)

ACCORDINGLY, when Chrysostom says that no one is constituted a sinner from the sin of the first parents, and excluded from the kingdom of heaven, and made liable to eternal damnation — he did not simply and altogether take away the sin of the human race, contracted from the first transgression of our fathers; but, unless I am mistaken, he meant to signify that Adam's posterity are not sinners for this reason [only], that the first parents [alone] actually sinned, but that the posterity themselves also sinned in Adam, and together with Adam himself — inasmuch as all, by [reason of their] participation in the human species, are one and the same man with [their] progenitor Adam, and, as they participate [in] the same nature, so [they participate in] the vice of the same corrupted nature. For unless they too had transgressed in the first parent (in whom, as in a root, they were of old virtually contained), assuredly they would not be sinners from Adam's sin. For no one (as Chrysostom rightly said) is made wicked both from a crime that is another's and not participated in by himself.

BUT to that [point] which Chrysostom brought forward in the homily To the Neophytes — namely, that infants are neither defiled by sin, nor baptized for the remission of sins — Augustine, answering in the book already cited, noted that this sentence of John had been corrupted by the Pelagians, or badly translated. For they, in place of [that] which Chrysostom said, "Infants do not have sins," put — with the words a little changed — "Infants are not defiled by sin," so that he might seem to speak rather of that one sin transmitted from Adam than of others. But the uncorrupted reading of the Greek codices runs thus: "Διὰ τοῦτο καὶ τὰ παιδία βαπτίζομεν, καίτοι ἁμαρτήματα οὐκ ἔχοντα" — that is, "For this reason we baptize infants too, although not having sins." By which words, as Augustine says, John does not deny that little ones are defiled by sin, but [only that they] have sins — that is, he does not deny that little ones are defiled by the sin of the first parent, and are baptized for the purgation of this sin; but he asserts that they have neither actual and proper sins, nor are baptized on account of proper and actual sins. And let these [things] be said for the elucidation of the first and second proposition of Chrysostom.

There now remains the third proposition of the same [Chrysostom], affirming that no detriment befell us from Adam's condemnation, but innumerable and most ample benefits. To which opinion Augustine, and the rest of his followers, seem diametrically opposed — [they] who hold that from the sin and condemnation of Adam alone the whole human race is damned to eternal punishment. Chrysostom's words, therefore, are to be taken so that we understand him to speak not of the spiritual condemnation of the soul to eternal death, but of the condemnation of bodily death — which brought forth for us all the gains already enumerated by him. But if anyone contend that these very words look also to the damnation of the soul, we shall say that they are to be interpreted in that sense in which the blessed pontiff Gregory pronounced the fault of the first parent to have been "happy" [felix], because it merited to have so great a Redeemer. These [things] for Chryso-

[catchword "-sosto-" (Chrysostomo) → "for Chrysostom," continues on p. 527 (PDF 532).]

(printed p. 527 [PDF p. 532], recto — end of Ann. CCXXXVI, then Ann. CCXXXVII–CCXXXVIII, on Romans 5 (Ambrose on the twofold "second death" and the Limbo of unbaptized infants, abused by Servetus; Theodoret's four-step "by occasion" account of original sin, and that the pre-Law saints escaped it; then the pseudo-Jerome commentary's near-Pelagian teaching that Adam's sin passed by imitation, not propagation). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCXXXVI (Ambrose on death), from the catchword "-sosto-":)

[These things] for the defense of Chryso[stom] I judge to be enough. Now it pleases [me] to subjoin certain words of St. Ambrose pertaining to this argument — but wrongly usurped by the heretics.

Ambrose, explaining this same pericope of Paul in the commentaries: "DEATH," he says, "is the dissolution of the body, when the soul is separated from the body. There is also another death, which is called the second, in gehenna — which we suffer not by the sin of Adam, but [which] is acquired, on its occasion, by one's own sins; from which the good are immune, only [in] that they were in hell [the underworld], but a higher [one], as [if] in a free [place], because they could not ascend to heaven." Servetus the Anabaptist, in his Commonplaces, gathers from these [words] that Ambrose held that Adam, by his sin, brought upon [his] posterity only the death of the body, not of the soul. But [the things] which Ambrose asserts — not only in very many other places, but in the immediately preceding and following words — openly contradict this opinion: [namely] that the whole human race was corrupted in Adam sinning, and that in him, as in a mass [lump], all men were seized by the death of sin; writing thus: "IT IS MANIFEST, therefore, that in Adam all sinned, as [it were] in a mass. For he himself, [being] corrupted through sin — those whom he begot, all were born under sin. From him, therefore, [are] all sinners, because from him we all are." And again, after the aforesaid words adduced by Servetus, he adds: "BY the sentence [given] in [the case of] Adam, all were held [bound] — [the sentence] whose bond [chirograph], [written] in the decrees, was blotted out by the death of Christ. But the sentence of the decree was, that the body of the one man should be dissolved upon the earth, but that the soul, held by the bonds of hell, should suffer perdition." Thus far he [Ambrose]. It must be known, therefore, that the second death is twofold: the one, by which the lower hell separates the soul from God, and binds [it] to the punishments of gehenna; the other, by which the upper hell disjoins the soul from God, whether forever or for a time — as of old, before Christ's death, it detained the souls of the saints in the bosom of Abraham; and still, after Christ's death, it holds in Limbo the souls of infants departing without baptism, perpetually lacking the vision of God. Ambrose, therefore, denies that that former species of the second death follows from Adam's sin, but teaches that it happens from the proper and actual offenses of each — which nearly all the theologians also approve. But the latter [species], which separates souls only from the divine vision, he plainly confesses to be inflicted on the human race by Adam's sin. Read the following annotation.

Annotation CCXXXVII [contents]

"In whom all have sinned." — Romans 5[:12]

[margin: Whether the sin of Adam passed to [his] posterity not [as] guilt, but only [by] occasion.]

Theodoret, in the commentaries on the epistle to the Romans, elucidating the present passage, seems to intimate that the sin of the first parent did not pass over into [his] posterity according to guilt, but according to the occasion of sinning alone — so that the sin of Adam transfused into us is nothing else than a certain occasion and incitement to sinning, which leads us, as [it were] through four steps, to sin, in this order. First, the sin of Adam induces upon all born of him passibility, corruption, and the mortality of the body. Then mortality brings the indigence and privation of all things which are necessary [and useful] for the manner of life of mortal life. In the third place, indigence and privation begets the appetite and concupiscence of acquiring and handling the things profitable to mortal life. Finally, the handling and use of things persuades [to] the excess of the mean [i.e. immoderation]. To which persuasion whoever consents, at once sins, and is condemned by spiritual death. And in this way, each one is punished spiritually not on account of Adam's sin, but on account of his own sin. Theodoret's words, which seem to convey a sense of this kind, are these: "WHEN God had fashioned Adam, he gave him a precept. He, being deceived, transgressed the command. Since, therefore, on account of this, he had been made liable to the decree of death, thus he begot Cain, and Seth, and others. But all these, inasmuch as [they were] begotten of him, had a mortal nature. And [a nature] of this kind needs many [things] — food, and drink, and clothing, and habitation, and diverse arts. But the use of these often incites to the exceeding of the mean. And the exceeding of the mean generates sin. The divine Apostle says, therefore, that when Adam had sinned, and had been made mortal on account of sin, both came to the race: for upon all men death passed, inasmuch as all have sinned. For each one takes upon himself the decree of death not on account of the first parent's sin, but on account of his own." These are Theodoret's words, with which agree those [things] which he wrote about this matter in the exposition of Psalm 50, upon that [verse], "Behold, in iniquities I was conceived" — [things] observed by us above, in book 5, Annotation 179. To this also looks [that] which, in the Epitome of Divine Decrees [Doctrines], chapter 13, the same author teaches — namely, that there were many holy men who, living in the law of nature from the beginning of [its] founding, were not liable to Adam's sin. And he expresses a sense of this kind in these plain words: "AS by the disobedience of one man many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one, many shall be made just." And very necessarily did the Apostle place that [word] "many" in both [clauses]: for indeed, when Adam had sinned, and very many had transgressed the divine laws, [yet] some remained in the decrees of nature, and took care of virtue — as Abel, Enoch, and Noah, and the patriarchs, and the prophets, and very many others, not only among the Jews, but also among other nations; of whom the Apostle said: "For when the Gentiles, who have not the law, do by nature the things that are of the law; they, having not the law, are a law to themselves." For that cause did he place that [word] "MANY," both in the exemplar [type] and in the image [antitype]. Refer thyself to the preceding Annotation, and hither also thou wilt recall the sayings of Arnobius to this effect: which thou wilt find in book 5, Annotation 177.

(right column — continuing Annotation CCXXXVII:)

Annotation CCXXXVIII [contents]

"In whom all have sinned." — Romans 5[:12]

[margin: Whether the sin of Adam passed to posterity not by propagation, but by imitation.]

The author of the commentaries on Paul which are inscribed with the name of Jerome [pseudo-Jerome], in the interpretation of this chapter, is believed to be not far from the error of Pelagius. For he teaches that the sin of the first parents emanated to [their] posterity not by the propagation of [their] corrupted origin, but only by [their] example and imitation — and not indeed to all, but only to those who sinned after the likeness of the prevarication of

[signature "Xx 2"; catchword "Adæ" → "of Adam," continues on p. 528 (PDF 533).]

(printed p. 528 [PDF p. 533], verso — end of Ann. CCXXXVIII, then Ann. CCXXXIX, on Romans 5 & 7 (pseudo-Jerome's near-Pelagian reading — that sin comes "by example," dead in infants — refuted and condemned by the African Council chapter 77 and the Council of Trent, session 5, canon 2 [full text]; then Chrysostom, hom. 12 on Romans, that the gospel's demands [no anger, no lustful look, no oath, love of enemies] are urgent precepts, not counsels — abused by Lucian the Monk, and the scholastics' three grades of oath-prohibition, with Bernard and Christian Druthmar). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCXXXVIII, from the catchword "Adæ":)

—[of Adam] sinned of their own accord. Which assertion the author himself expressed in these words: "THEREFORE into this world sin entered, and through sin death, by example or pattern [form]. And so death passed into all men, while they thus sin and die in like manner. For it did not remain [i.e. hold sway] in Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob — of whom the Lord says, 'They all live.' But here [Paul] therefore says that all [are] dead, because in so great a multitude of sinners, the few just [men] will not be excepted. As [it says] there: 'There is none that doeth good, there is not even to one'; and, 'Every man [is] a liar.' Or, [death] passed into all those, because they lived by a human, not a heavenly, rite [manner of life]. Again, the Apostle here, by death, signifies the death of the soul, by which Adam, prevaricating, died — as the prophet says: 'The soul that hath sinned, itself shall die.' And then the Apostle adds, 'In whom all have sinned' — that is, in that [respect] that all have sinned, they sin after the example of Adam." These [things] the author has in the exposition of the fifth chapter. But afterwards, in the exposition of the seventh chapter of the same epistle, upon that [verse], "Without the law sin was dead," he descends more openly into the same opinion, writing thus: "LIKEWISE, if, when the law was not, sin was dead, they rave [are mad] who assert that sin comes to us from Adam by propagation [per traducem]. Therefore he says here, 'Sin is dead,' because in infants, who are without law, it does not live — that is, it is committed with impunity. For when an infant reviles [his] parents, it seems to be sin, yet not living, but dead. For although a boy sin, the sin is dead in him, because he is not subject to the law." This error too, and this interpretation of the apostolic sentence, are condemned by the decree of the African Council, which in chapter 77 of its definitions is had in these plain words: "WHOSOEVER shall say that little ones draw nothing of original sin from Adam, which is to be expiated by the laver of regeneration — whence in them the form of baptism unto the remission of sins is understood [to be] not true, but false — let him be anathema. For [that] which the Apostle says is not to be understood otherwise — 'By one man sin entered, and through sin death, and it passed into all men, in whom all have sinned' — save as the catholic Church, everywhere diffused, has always understood [it]." To this decree subscribes the sacrosanct Synod of Trent, session five, canon 2, whose words are these: "IF ANYONE asserts that the prevarication of Adam harmed himself alone, and not his offspring; and [that] the sanctity and justice received from God, which he lost, he lost for himself alone, and not for us also; or [that] he, defiled through the sin of disobedience, transfused into the whole human race the death and the punishments of the body only, and not also sin, which is the death of the soul: let him be anathema — since he contradicts the Apostle, saying, 'By one man sin entered into the world, and through sin death, and so death passed into all men, in whom all have sinned.'"

Annotation CCXXXIX [contents]

"That we may serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter." — Romans 7[:6]
[margin: Whether abstinence from an oath, and love of an enemy, are counsels or precepts.]

Chrysostom, [in] homily 12 on the epistle to the Romans, in the exposition of this passage, put such words: "AT the time when Adam sinned, then his body was made mortal and passible; and thence it received very many diseases, whence the horse [the flesh] was rendered both heavier and more unbridled. But Christ, coming, restored it to us more moderate through baptism, lightening the same with the wings of the Spirit: whence neither are the same courses [stadia] set before us [as before the ancients], because [now] the course would not be so easy [to run].

(right column — continuing Annotation CCXXXIX:)

Wherefore also he demands of us not only that we be clean from slaughter, as he demanded of them, but that we be not even angry. And he bids us beware not only of adultery, but even of a lustful look. And he forbids us not only perjury, but any oath whatsoever; and he enjoins [us] to love, together with friends, [our] enemies too. And so in all other matters he has appointed longer courses for us; and unless we obey, he has threatened gehenna — showing that these very [things] are not [matters] of the magnificence or liberality of those competing [for a prize], as virginity and poverty [are], but that they altogether ought to be fulfilled. For they are urgent and necessary; and whosoever shall not have done them, is to pay the utmost penalties."

Lucian the Monk, in the Annotations upon Chrysostom (condemned by the Council of Trent), having seized from these words a handle for biting the scholastic theologians, charges them [with this]: that among the evangelical counsels they have placed abstinence from an oath, and the love of enemies — which Chrysostom thus demonstrates to be necessary and urgent precepts, so that he who shall not have performed them is to pay the utmost punishments. But it appears that he [Lucian] fell into this opinion out of ignorance of scholastic theology, which he had not even saluted from the threshold [i.e. never so much as approached]. For no scholastic ever taught that the interdiction of an oath is altogether and in every part a counsel; nay rather, three grades are established by them in the prohibition of a true oath. Of these the first is, that we in no way — not even truly, nor in a just cause — swear by creatures, as [if] exhibiting divine reverence to them, lest we seem to reckon creatures among the gods. The second is, that we — [being] doubtful and ambiguous — swear not easily and lightly and rashly, even truly, and in a lawful matter. The third is, that those who profess the highest state of Christian perfection in no way swear in cases arising among themselves. The scholastics confess that the two former grades have the force of a precept; the third they enumerate among the counsels, delivered to the perfect — led by the authority of certain Fathers of no contemptible name, who referred this last grade of not-swearing to the counsels.

Of whose number is St. Bernard, who, in sermon 65 on the Canticle of Canticles, inveighing against certain heretics — [who] say that it is not lawful to swear, yet that it is lawful to forswear [commit perjury], lest the secrets of their sect be known by others — thus says: "IT IS PLAIN that you both superstitiously scruple concerning an oath, and wickedly presume concerning perjury. O perversity! [That] which was counseled for caution — namely, not to swear — this these [men] contentiously observe in the stead of a command; and [that] which was sanctioned by an immovable right — namely, that one must not forswear — this they dispense [with], as [if] indifferent, according to [their own] will." Into the same opinion, before Bernard, had [come] Christian Druthmar, in the commentaries on the fifth chapter of Matthew, saying: "LEST the Jews should swear by the names of idols, the Lord permitted them to swear by [his own] na-

[catchword "no-" (nomen) → "name," continues on p. 529 (PDF 534).]

(printed p. 529 [PDF p. 534], recto — end of Ann. CCXXXIX, then Ann. CCXL–CCXLII and the head of CCXLIII, on Romans 7 (the scholastics' threefold grade of love-of-enemies, and Calvin's abuse of a De tempore sermon on counsel vs. precept; pseudo-Jerome again, that original sin is not "by propagation"; Augustine's retracted exposition of "I am carnal, sold under sin"; Chrysostom, hom. 13 on Romans & hom. 18 on Genesis — whether the natural passions were in man before the Fall, with Lucian the Monk's misuse). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCXXXIX, from the catchword "no-":)

—[his own] name. Nor did he even forbid [it] to us, but taught us perfection, etc.

IN THE SAME MANNER too the scholastics distinguish the law concerning the loving of enemies by a threefold grade: namely, into a common love [dilection], to be shown indifferently to all friends and enemies, and at every time; into a particular love, to be shown to enemies in [their] time of necessity; and into a particular love, to be shown to enemies apart from the crises [emergencies] of necessity. The first and second grade they place among the precepts; the last they set among the counsels. And according to this distinction a certain passage of Chrysostom, in the first book On Compunction of Heart, is to be interpreted — where that author says that the love of enemies is not [a matter] of exhortation, but of injunction [command]. Which passage indeed John Calvin, [in] chapter 3 of his Institutes, opposes to the opinion of the scholastics. Likewise, by this distinction is resolved that saying of Augustine which the Lutherans allege against the scholastics, from his sermon On the Season [De tempore], 61 — where it is thus read: "THE LORD, in the gospel, [in commanding] that we ought to love [our] enemies, gave not a counsel, but a precept. One [thing] is a counsel, another is a precept. A counsel is given, that virginity be preserved, that one abstain from wine and flesh, that all [things] be sold, and disbursed to the poor. A precept is given, that justice be kept, that every man turn aside from evil, and do good. And thus the Lord commanded, 'Love your enemies, and do good to them that hate you,' etc." [margin: Matthew 5.] Return to Annotations 26 and 27 of this book.

Annotation CCXL [contents]

"Without the law sin was dead." — Romans 7[:8]

[margin: Whether original sin [comes] by propagation.]

The author of the Hieronymian commentary [pseudo-Jerome] on the epistle to the Romans asserts that those [men] rave who think that the sin of Adam passed over to us by propagation [per traducem]. Then he adds that the sins of boys who revile [their] parents merit no punishment, but are committed with impunity — because as yet they are without law, and, until they grow up, are not subject to the law. See Annotation 238.

Annotation CCXLI [contents]

"We know that the law is spiritual." — Romans 7[:14]

[margin: The exposition of this passage retracted.]

Augustine, in the book of Propositions from the epistle to the Romans, expounding these words — "We know that the law is spiritual; but I am carnal, sold under sin. For that which I work, I understand not. For it is not the good that I will, that I do; but the evil that I hate, that I do" — down to that passage, "Unhappy man that I am," etc. — judged that that [man in the text], who was spiritual, is to be taken not from the person of the Apostle, but from the person of a man placed under the law, and not yet constituted under grace, who, willing to do well, [being] conquered by concupiscence, does ill. Augustine reviewed this passage [in] the first [book] of the Retractations, chapter 23, wishing these words of the Apostle to be expounded better and more rightly, if they be understood of the person of a man constituted under grace — on account of the body of flesh, which is not yet spiritual, and on account of the concupiscence of the flesh, of whose motions the saints in this life are not free, although they resist them, and consent not to them unto evil.

(right column — Annotation CCXLII:)

Annotation CCXLII [contents]

"But I am carnal, sold under sin." — Romans 7[:14]

[margin: Whether the natural passions were in man before sin.]

Chrysostom, [in] homily thirteen on the epistle to the Romans, seems to hint that the affections of the concupiscible and irascible faculty — natural [as they are] — were not in man before sin, but entered into man immediately after sin, by necessity of mortality. For thus he declares: "INTO man, together with death, there entered in also a throng of affections. For when the body was made mortal, then at last it necessarily admitted both concupiscence, and anger, and grief, etc. — all [things] which needed exceeding great constancy and wisdom, lest the violence of the flooding heat, and the tempest, should overwhelm reason in us, [reason] plunged into the whirlpool of sin. For those affections were by no means sin; but the unbridled immoderateness of them effected this [sin]." To the same [point] looks [that] which he wrote [in] homily 18 on Genesis — [namely] that the concupiscence of the venereal thing [sexual desire] stole into man after sin, whereas before there had been none. His words run thus: "BEFORE [their] disobedience, the first parents imitated the angelic life, and there was no talk of the venereal thing. For how could there be, since they were not even liable to bodily necessities? And so from the beginning virginity received the palm of primacy: but after sin entered in through sloth, and access was opened to those [things] which are of sin, that [virginity] indeed flew away, inasmuch as [it fled] from those who had been made unworthy of so great a magnitude of virtue. But the law of the venereal thing stole in." And below: "FOR after sin entered in through disobedience, and the sentence made them mortal, consequently the omnipotent God — governing, according to his wisdom, the duration of the human race — granted that our race should be increased through coition." These sayings of Chrysostom are to be understood not of the natural affections themselves — which were in man even before sin, as [being] implanted in man himself in the first condition of [his] nature — but of the perturbation and excess of the affections, which followed sin. Whence prudently Chrysostom said not that after sin the affections entered in, but the throng of affections — that is, the perturbation and excess. These very words can also, in some part, be referred to the use and exercise of the natural passions. For it is agreed that both the use of the venereal thing, and the goads of anger, and the sense of pain, began after Adam's fall.

Lucian the Monk, in the condemned Annotations upon Chrysostom, sifting the aforesaid words from the thirteenth homily — namely, "Those affections were by no means sin," etc. — charges Chrysostom [with this]: that, against the common definition of the theologians, he taught that the disordered affections of mortals, and the innate concupiscence of sin, are not sin. But he wrongly expounded the saying of the holy man — which indeed is to be referred not to the affections of mortal man, corrupted after Adam's fall, but to those affections, [still] whole [and intact], which man had received in his first formation.

Annotation CCXLIII [contents]

"The grace of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord." — Romans 7[:25]

[signature "Xx 3"; catchword "CHRY-" (Chrysostomus) → continues on p. 530 (PDF 535).]

(printed p. 530 [PDF p. 535], verso — end of Ann. CCXLIII, then Ann. CCXLIIII–CCXLV, on Romans 7–8 (Chrysostom, hom. 13 — that the Mosaic law gave lesser precepts than the law of nature, with the Greek scholion Pagninus wrote in the Lyons codex; pseudo-Jerome on whether Christ's flesh had an inclination to sin, corrected by Henry of Hesse; Chrysostom, hom. 14 — whether the heavens and elements were made corruptible by Adam's fall, and shall be renewed for man's sake). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCXLIII, from the catchword "CHRY-":)

Chrysostom, [in] homily thirteen on the epistle to the Romans, in the narration of this clause, says that so great was the indulgence of God, that in the Mosaic law he gave lesser and lighter precepts than in the law of nature. Which opinion he demonstrates by a double argument in these words: "GOD, in the written law, did not draw men on to the highest polity [manner of conduct]; but permitted them to enjoy monies, not forbidding [them] to use several wives, and to gratify anger, so far as [it was] just, and to have the use of moderate pleasures. In fine, so great was [his] indulgence, that the written law exacted even lesser [things] than the natural law would dictate. For the law of nature commanded that one living man be content with the custom [companionship] of one woman. Which also Christ, indicating, says: 'He who from the beginning made [them], made them male and female.' But the law of Moses forbade neither that this [wife] be repudiated, nor that another be admitted in place of the repudiated one; nor did it prohibit two [wives] from being had at the same time. But besides this thou mayest see that those who lived before the law of Moses, instructed under the natural law, performed more [things] than were contained in the law of Moses."

[margin: Whether the law of Moses commands lesser [things] than the law of nature.]

In a Greek codex of Chrysostom, which Sanctes Pagninus — a most learned man — placed in the Library of the Preachers [Dominicans] at Lyons, we read in the margin of this passage a Greek scholion, thus inscribed by Pagninus's own hand: "Σκληρὸν τοῦτ' ἐστι, καὶ παρὰ τὰ τῶν Σχολαστικῶν δόγματα" — that is, "This is hard, and beside [contrary to] the tenets of the scholastics."

Annotation CCXLIIII [contents]

"God, sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh," etc. — Romans 8[:3]
[margin: Whether the flesh of Christ had an inclination to sinning.]

The author of the commentaries of Jerome [pseudo-Jerome] on Paul, elucidating this, seems to hint that in the flesh of Christ there was an inclination to sinning, saying: "THE SON of God, [his] flesh assumed — [flesh] which would be [otherwise] more prone to sinning — nevertheless himself assumed it without sin. And therefore he is said to have come 'in the likeness of sinful flesh,' [his] flesh assumed, and to have condemned sin in that same flesh — since the flesh which he had assumed he kept harmless from all contagion of sin." Henry of Hesse [Henricus Hassius], on the third book of the Sentences, distinction 3, says that these words are not so to be taken as though the Son of God assumed a flesh prone to sinning; but [rather] because that flesh, which the Son of God assumed immune from all inclination to sin, he assumed from the mass of flesh which was [otherwise] more prone to sinning.

Annotation CCXLV [contents]

"The creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly." — Romans 8[:20]
[margin: Whether the heavens were made corruptible and dissoluble on account of Adam's sin.]

Chrysostom, [in] homily fourteen on the epistle to the Romans, explaining the proposed sentence, seems to hold that the bodies of the elements and of the heavens, on account of the fall of the first man into sin and death, were made liable to old age, corruption, and destruction; and that again, for man's sake, they shall receive incorruption and immortality, when, in the last resurrection, men shall be gifted with the immortality of a glorious body. His words are these: "WHAT does this mean — 'The crea—ture is subject to vanity'? 'It was made corruptible,' he says. For the sake of what [thing], and wherefore? 'On account of thee, [O] man.' For after thou madest thy body mortal and passible, the earth too was subjected to a curse, and brought forth thorns and thistles. But that the heaven also, growing old together with the earth, is at last to be transferred into a better state — hear the prophet, saying: [margin: Psalm 101.] 'In the beginning thou, O Lord, didst found the earth; and the heavens are the works of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou remainest: and they all shall grow old as a garment; and as a vesture thou shalt change them, and they shall be changed.' Isaiah too asserts the same, saying: [margin: Isaiah 51.b] 'Look up to the heaven, and look down upon the earth: the heaven shall vanish like smoke; the earth shall grow old like a garment:

(right column — continuing Annotation CCXLV:)

but they that dwell therein shall perish after the manner of these.' Dost thou see how the universe [universal frame] serves vanity? and in what manner it is to be freed from corruption? For he [the Psalmist] says, 'As a garment thou shalt change them, and they shall be changed'; and Isaiah says, 'But they that dwell upon the earth shall perish after the manner of these' — signifying [that they are] not to be utterly abolished (for not thus shall those who dwell upon the earth, that is, men, perish), but that their destruction shall be temporary; through which also they shall pass over unto immortality; even as [shall] all created nature — [all] which indeed he set forth at once in that [word] which he says, 'After the manner of these'; as Paul too will say in what follows. But now he discourses so far concerning its servitude, [only] that he may open to us for what cause it was made of such a kind: which cause he asserts to be us. What then? Was the world unjustly affected [wronged], sustaining these [things] by another's fault? By no means; for it was made on account of me [too]. And if it was made on account of me: how is it said to suffer injury, sustaining these [things] for my correction? Otherwise, neither the reason of the just nor of the unjust is to be sought in these things, which lack soul and senses. But Paul afterward — after he had once fashioned a person for the world — willed to use none of those things which I have set down, hastening by a certain other reason, as [by] an addition [makeweight], to relieve [uplift] the reader. But by what reason? 'What sayest thou?' he says. 'The whole [universe] was ill-treated for thy sake, and made dissoluble?' But it suffers no injury; for again it shall be made indissoluble on account of thee. For this is [that] which he says 'in hope.' But [as to that] which he said, 'It was made subject not willingly' — he said [it] not for this [reason], that he might make the world itself lord [master] of its own judgment, but that thou mightest understand that the whole matter is carried on by the providence of Christ, not by its [the world's] own power. But what that hope is, he subjoined, when he says: 'Because the very [creature-]nature also shall be delivered.' What is 'itself'? 'Not thou alone,' he says, 'but also [that] which is worse than thee; [that] which is not capable of reason, and lacks senses. This same [thing], I say, shall be partaker of those good things. It shall be delivered,' he says, 'from the servitude of corruption' — that is, it shall no more be corrupted, but shall imitate the nature of thy body. For as, it [thy body] being corrupted, [the creature] was at the same time corrupted: so also, [it] being made incorruptible, [the creature] shall follow it. Indicating which thing, he says, 'Into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God' — that is, on account of [their] liberty. For as a nurse, who has reared a royal boy, together with him enjoys good things when he is raised to the paternal throne: so also the world, he says, shall enjoy those good things. Dost thou perceive that man everywhere excels — for whose sake also all things were made? Dost thou see in what man-

[catchword "ad-" (quemadmodum) → "in what manner," continues on p. 531 (PDF 536).]

(printed p. 531 [PDF p. 536], recto — end of Ann. CCXLV, then Ann. CCXLVI–CCXLVII, on Romans 8 (Chrysostom concludes — the heavens grow old and shall be renewed for man [with his tenth homily to Antioch]; then Sixtus's counter: the scholastics hold the heavens incorruptible, but Ambrose, Hexaemeron 1.6, and nearly all the Greek Fathers hold heaven corruptible by nature yet preserved by God; Augustine's Retractations on whether Adam lost God's image; and the head of CCXLVII, Chrysostom on the privation of eternal glory). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCXLV, from the catchword "quemad-":)

—in what manner it consoles the [one] struggling; and at the same time shows the ineffable benignity of God toward us? "Why grievest thou," he says, "in adverse things? But thou sufferest not for thine own sake alone: [is] not the whole world [made] for thy sake?" And he not only consoles the struggler, but even makes worthy of belief the [things] which have been said. For if the world itself hopes, he says, and trusts — [the world] which was founded on account of thee, and made [with] all things — much more oughtest thou too to nourish hope, thou for whose sake the world shall enjoy those good things. So also parents are wont to do, when a son is to be beheld in a higher rank: for they clothe [their] servants with new and more splendid garments, unto his glory. So therefore God too shall clothe this fabric [frame of the world] with immortality, unto the liberty of the glory of the sons [of God].

THUS FAR the discourse of Chrysostom: consonant with which are [the things] which the same [author] wrote [in] the tenth homily to the people of Antioch, in these words: "GOD made the world wondrous and great, but also corruptible and fading [withering]; and he mingled many demonstrations of its weakness. For David, demonstrating that although [it is] beautiful and great, yet it is corruptible, thus says: [margin: Psalm 101.] 'In the beginning thou, O Lord, didst found the earth, and the heavens are the works of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou remainest; and they all shall grow old like a garment; and as a covering thou shalt change them, and they shall be changed.' And again, concerning the Sun, the same [author] says: [margin: Psalm 18.] 'As a bridegroom coming forth from his bride-chamber, [the sun] has exulted as a giant to run the way.' Hast thou seen its beauty? hast thou seen its magnitude? See also the demonstration of its weakness. For indeed, demonstrating this too, the wise man said: [margin: Ecclus. 17.] 'What is brighter than the Sun? and this shall fail.' Again from the scriptures I will demonstrate to you that not only the Sun, but the whole world is corruptible: but since, by reason of our slenderness [of understanding], this discourse is too lofty, come, let us — leading ourselves to the sweet fountain of the scriptures — soothe our ears. For we will not speak to you of heaven and earth severally, but of every creature alike; and we will show you the Apostle himself demonstrating this very [thing], thus manifestly saying: [margin: Romans 8.] that every creature now serves corruption, and why it serves, and when it shall be changed, and into what end it shall pass over. For after he had said, 'The sufferings of the present time are not worthy [to be compared] to the future glory that shall be revealed in us,' he inferred that 'the expectation of the creature waiteth for the revelation of the sons of God; for the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but on account of him who subjected it in hope.' But [that] which he says is of this kind: 'The creature was made corruptible' — for this it is [that it was] 'made subject to vanity'; and it was made corruptible, God so commanding. But God so commanded on account of our race. For since he was to nourish [feed] a corruptible man, [the creature] too had to be of this kind: for it was not fitting that corruptible bodies should use an incorruptible creature. 'But,' he says, 'it does not, however, remain such: but the creature itself also shall be delivered from the servitude of corruption.' Then, demonstrating when this shall be, and through whom, he inferred: 'into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God.' For when, he says, at the resurrection we shall have taken up incorrupt bodies, then also the body of the heavens, and of the earth, and of the whole world, shall be incorrupt and unfading." Thus far I have recounted the words of Chrysostom.

(right column — continuing Annotation CCXLV:)

To this opinion the whole school of the recent theologians is opposed — but especially in those [things] which regard the heavenly bodies. For they show these [heavenly bodies] to be perpetual and incorruptible for this reason: because they have a substance diverse from the substance of the four elements, and devoid of every foreign impression [i.e. incapable of being acted upon from without]; and because, through the lapses of so many ages, they have thus remained incorruptible, that they have given no indication of growing old, and have consumed nothing of their magnitude or beauty by the injury of time. But St. Ambrose, [in] book 1 of the Hexaemeron, chapter 6, refuting those who posit the heavens [to be] incorruptible, and consisting of a certain fifth substance, thus writes: "OTHERS have thought the body of the heaven and of the stars to be ethereal — introducing a certain fifth nature of body, in order that they might think the substance of the heaven would remain long-enduring. But this opinion could not withstand the prophetic sentence, which the divine majesty of our Lord Jesus Christ, [our] God, also approved in the gospel. For David said: [margin: Psalm 101.] 'In the beginning thou, O Lord, didst found the earth, and the heavens are the works of thy hands. They shall perish,' etc. Which the Lord so approved in the gospel, that he said: [margin: Luke 21.] 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away.' They therefore accomplish nothing, who, for the asserting of the heaven's perpetuity, thought a fifth ethereal body was to be introduced." Thus Ambrose: with whom nearly all the Greek Fathers agree, affirming the heaven [to be] by its own nature corruptible and perishable, yet not to be corrupted — [being] preserved by the providence and grace of God. Things akin to these thou hast below, Annotation 340.

Annotation CCXLVI [contents]

"And the creature itself also shall be delivered from the servitude of corruption," etc. — Romans 8[:21]

[margin: Whether Adam, by sinning, lost the image [of God].]

Augustine, in the book of 83 Questions, question 67, seems to have said two [things]: one, that the first man, by sinning, lost the image of God; the other, that the lowest angels live "animally" [after the manner of animals]. Both he retracted [in] the first book of the Retractations, chapter 26, in these words: "WHEN I was expounding [that] which is written, 'And the creature itself also shall be delivered from the servitude of destruction,' I said: 'And the creature itself, that is, man himself — the seal of the image being lost on account of sin — remained only a creature.' Which is not so to be taken, as though man lost the whole [of that] which he had of the image of God. For, if he had lost [it] altogether, there would be nothing on account of which it might be said: [margin: Ephesians 4.e] 'Be ye reformed in the newness of your mind'; and, 'we are transformed into the same image.' But, again, if he had lost the whole, nothing would remain whence it might be said: 'Although man walk in [the] image, yet he is vainly disquieted.' Likewise, [as to] that which I said — that the highest angels live 'spiritually,' but the lowest 'animally' — [that] was said too boldly of the lowest [angels], [more] than it can be shown either by the holy scriptures or by the things themselves: for although perhaps it can [be shown], it can [be shown only] most difficultly."

Annotation CCXLVII [contents]

"He asketh for the saints according to God." — Romans 8[:27]

[margin: The privation of eternal glory.]

Chrysostom, not far from the end of homily 14 on the epistle to the Romans, [coming] to a sen-

[signature "Xx 4"; catchword "sen-" (sententiam) → "sentence," continues on p. 532 (PDF 537).]

(printed p. 532 [PDF p. 537], verso — end of Ann. CCXLVII, then Ann. CCXLVIII–CCL, on Romans 8 (Chrysostom — the privation of divine glory graver than any gehenna; then "Ambrose, bishop of Compsa" [= Ambrosius Catharinus, abp. of Conza] on predestination — a doctrine Sixtus himself once preached across Italy from age 20 to 30, then abandoned as disapproved, and which Domingo de Soto refuted; Origen on whether future things cause God's foreknowledge, harmonized by Augustine On the Trinity 15.13 and Aquinas; and Jacobus Sadoletus on election from foreseen works). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCXLVII, from the catchword "sen-":)

—recurring to a sentence peculiar to himself, says: the privation of the DIVINE glory [to be] graver than any gehenna, and the alienation from the eternal rest [to be] worse than any punishments whatsoever. See above, Annotation 41 of this book.

Annotation CCXLVIII [contents]

"We know that to them that love God all things work together unto good, to such as, according to purpose, are called saints." — Romans 8[:28]

[margin: Whether all men are chosen and destined to eternal life.]

Ambrose, bishop of Compsa, treats this whole passage through to the end of the present chapter, and expounds it point by point according to the doctrine of the dogma On Foreknowledge and Predestination: which he himself, first of all men (unless I am mistaken), devised, and published in a peculiar [special] volume. But the sum of the dogma is [this]: that God, from eternity, by his gratuitous goodness, foreknew, loved, chose, [and] destined all men — none of them excluded — and in time called [them] to eternal life; yet not in the same manner and order. For God distinguished the whole race of men into two parts, or classes: in the former and more excellent of which he took up those whom thou mightest rightly call the foreknown, the fore-beloved, the fore-elected, the predestined, and the fore-called — because God, by a certain excellent prerogative of love, loved them before others, chose them before others, destined them before others, and, by a certain singular privilege, called [them] more and more strongly than the rest: such as are the Virgin Mary, the Apostles, Paul, and others, whom God endowed with so great a gift of grace, and equipped with so great safeguards unto salvation, that — [their] freedom of will remaining even safe [intact] — they cannot fall from salvation, [seeing that] they, by a certain immutable and infallible decree of divine providence (the free arbitrament of the will always standing), have been predestined to eternal life. But in the second class God arranged the remaining multitude of the human race; which he willed to be saved not by a fixed and inevitable decree, but under a certain mutable condition; and on that account he neither deemed them worthy of so great an affluence of graces, nor aided [them] with so many and such helps toward attaining beatitude. Ambrose therefore, referring to the first class of those-to-be-saved whatsoever [things] are recounted at the end of this chapter, says [that] to it pertain those whom Paul writes to have been "called according to purpose"; to whom "all things work together unto good"; whom "God foreknew" — that is, knew before the rest, and knew with the knowledge of approbation; whom "God predestined" — that is, destined before all and before others to the conformity of the image of his Son; whom he "justified" more purely than others, called more powerfully, magnified more splendidly; whom "no one can accuse, no one condemn, no one separate from the charity and glory of Christ" — because they are immovably predestined to glory, and their number can neither be augmented nor diminished; in whom, finally, there is so great a certitude of future glory and present grace, that each one of them, together with Paul, can most confidently say: "For I am certain that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor any creature shall be able to separate us from the charity of God, which is in Christ."

THIS opinion of Ambrose, my teacher, I myself once believed to be so true, and judged so apt for plucking up certain hard and atro-

(right column — continuing Annotation CCXLVIII:)

—cious opinions concerning predestination, wherewith the heretics of our times had filled the minds of the simple with despair, that I expounded it — from the twentieth to the thirtieth year of my age — in many and chief cities of Italy, in [public] preaching, not without the applause of the hearers, and with fruit to disturbed minds. But afterward, when I had noticed that an assertion of this kind is pressed by not a few difficulties and straits, and on that account is not approved by very many learned and pious theologians, I judged [it] better to desist from preaching it, than to teach [things] disapproved by the pious judgment of the learned. Dominic Soto of Segovia wrote against this opinion in the commentaries which he published on the epistle to the Romans, chapter nine. Read below, Annotation 251.

Annotation CCXLIX [contents]

"Whom he foreknew, and predestinated." — Romans 8[:29]

[margin: Whether future things are the cause of the divine foreknowledge, or the contrary.]

Origen, [in] the seventh book of the commentaries on the epistle to the Romans, seems to hand down that the foreknowledge of God is not the cause of future things, but that future things are the cause of God's foreknowledge — writing thus: "For although we think of Foreknowledge according to the common understanding, [yet] not on that account will a thing be [future] because God knows it [to be] future; but because it is future, it is known by God before it comes to be. For although, for example's sake, we feign that God does not foreknow something, [that thing] without doubt would [still] be future — as, for instance, Judas was made a traitor: and the prophets foretold that this would thus be. Not, therefore, because the prophets foretold [it], did Judas on that account betray [Christ]: but because he was going to be a traitor, the prophets foretold those [things] which he, out of the wickedness of his [own] purpose, was going to do." Augustine is thought to be opposed to this opinion, [in] book 15 On the Trinity, chapter 13, saying: "[God knew] ALL creatures, both spiritual and corporeal, not because they are, [and] therefore knew [them]: for he was not ignorant of [the things] which he was going to create. Because, therefore, he knew, he created; not because he created, [did he] know; nor did he know [them] created otherwise than [he knew them] to be created. For nothing accrued to his wisdom from them; but, they existing as it behooved, and when it behooved, that [wisdom] remained as it was. Whence [it is said] in Ecclesiasticus: 'Before they were created, all things were known to him; so also after they were completed.'" St. Thomas, in the first volume of the Summa, question 14, article 8, says that Origen speaks of the knowledge of simple cognizance, to which the approbation of the will is not yet joined; but that Augustine spoke of the knowledge [to which] the purpose of the will [is] joined. But [as to that] which was said by Origen — that God foreknows some [things] for this [reason], because they are future — he [Aquinas] says [it] is to be understood according to the cause of consequence, and not according to the cause of being. For it follows, if some [things] are future, that God foreknew them: yet future things are not the cause that God knows [them].

Annotation CCL [contents]

"Whom he predestinated, them he also called." — Romans 8[:30]

[margin: Whether election and reprobation are from the foreseeing of works.]

Jacobus Sadoletus, bishop of Carpentras, illustrating this by [his] exposition [in] the second book of the commentaries on the epistle to the Romans, says that God elects or reprobates no one from the arbitrament of the divine will alone, but elects this [man] because he foreknew him

[catchword "eum" → "him," continues on p. 533 (PDF 538).]

(printed p. 533 [PDF p. 538], recto — end of Ann. CCL, then Ann. CCLI, on Romans 9 (Sadoletus: God elects/reprobates from foreseen response, not good-pleasure alone, refuting Augustine at length; then "Jacob I loved, Esau I hated" — a large Chrysostom catena [homilies on Rom. 9, Eph. 1 & 2, Matthew 31 & 56, Psalm 113] all deriving predestination and calling from foreseen merits/obedience; then Origen [bk. 7 & bk. 1 on Romans] on the potter and clay — Jacob's soul had cleansed itself). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCL, from the catchword "eum":)

—that he would not spurn the divine calling, and would not turn away from the light of faith: but he reprobates that [other man], because he foresaw that he himself would set an obstacle against the divine calling, and would repudiate the divine grace. Which opinion he pursues with a prolix treatise, confuting Augustine's sentence on predestination and reprobation from the good pleasure of God alone. See the next following Annotation.

Annotation CCLI [contents]

"Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated." — Romans 9[:13]

[margin: Whether predestination is from the merits of the predestined foreseen by God.]

Chrysostom, [in] the homily on the epistle to the Romans, treating this passage, seems to indicate that the eternal love, election, and predestination of God toward his own, and [his] temporal calling, arise from the merits of the elect — foreseen from eternity in the divine foreknowledge. For thus he writes: "FOR WHAT cause, then, was Jacob held in love, but Esau in hatred? for what cause did this one serve, but that one rule? Because indeed this one was evil, but that one was good — although, they being not yet born, the one was honored, but the other condemned. For while they were not yet born, God had said, 'The elder shall serve the younger.'" And below, comparing the divine election to the election of craftsmen, who choose the materials which they know [to be] more apt for their use, he says: "MANY seemed to be better than Matthew, by the apparent argument of works; but he who knows hidden things, and who can prove the aptitude of the thought [mind] — he knew also the pearl lying in the mire; and, the others being passed over, admiring the beauty of this one, he chose him: and, when he had joined his grace to the nobility of [Matthew's] will, he pronounced him approved. For if, in these frail arts, those who are able to judge choose not from those arguments by which the unskilled cast their reckoning, which are set before them, but from those [things] which they themselves rightly know — and the tamers of horses very often do this same [thing] in [choosing] horses, and those who are appraisers of precious stones, and those who are craftsmen of the other arts — much more [will] God, [who is] benign, who alone knows all things openly, cast the reckoning about all [men] from his own wisdom. On that account, indeed, he chose the publican, and the robber, and the harlot: but the priests, and the elders, and the magistrates he reprobated and cast out."

AND [in] the first homily on the epistle to the Ephesians, speaking of election, he says: "IF men, when they choose, select the best for themselves — much more [does] God. For to be chosen is a token both of the divine benignity, and of the virtue of those who are chosen."

AGAIN, [in] the second homily on the Ephesians: "HE altogether chose the predestined according to [his] free choice and purpose — that is, he predestined those whom he had selected for himself, according to [that] which he saw us [to be] before we were taken into the lot."

LIKEWISE, [in] the 31st homily on Matthew, ascribing the cause of the calling of Matthew, and of Paul, and of the other Apostles to the obedience which God had foreseen [would be] future in them, he brings forth these [things]: "FOR WHAT cause did he not call Matthew himself together with Peter and John and the other disciples? Certainly [it was] in the manner in which then he approached them and called [them], when he knew [they would] obey-

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLI:)

—[knew] they were going [to obey]: so also he called Matthew then, when he saw [he] would least resist. For which cause also he fished for [caught] Paul after the resurrection. For he who scrutinizes hearts was not ignorant even [of] when each one was prepared to obey."

AND [in] the 56th homily on Matthew, he attributed the calling of the laborers to their vineyard to their good will, in these words: "HE would indeed have willed to hire all from the beginning, but this difference resulted from the will of the called. Therefore some are called in the morning, some at the third, some at the sixth, some at the ninth, some at the eleventh hour — because they were then about to obey. Which Paul too openly signified, saying: 'But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb.' But when did it please him? Certainly when [Paul] was about to obey. For [God] would have willed [it] even from his first cradle [infancy]: but because he knew that [Paul] would resist, he willed [it] then, when he was not ignorant of the calling [that would] penetrate his mind. So also he called the Robber afterward. He could have called him before, but that [man], [if] called, would not have obeyed. For if Paul from the beginning did not obey, much less [would] the Robber himself."

LIKEWISE, [in] the homily on Psalm 113, speaking of the calling of the Centurion, confirming this same [thing], he says: "IF the Father draws, the Son leads, the Spirit illumines; [then] what fault [is it] of those who are neither drawn, nor led, nor illumined? Because they do not offer themselves worthy to receive that illumination. See, therefore, that this came to Cornelius: for neither did he find this at home with himself, but [only] when God called [him] — since he himself, forestalling [it, made] himself worthy. For although it belongs to [God] to draw and to lead in; yet he requires a soul that complies, and then he applies his own help. Wherefore elsewhere Paul says: [margin: Rom. 8.] 'To the called according to purpose.'"

THUS FAR Chrysostom: in whose opinion very many of the ancient fathers seem to have been; whose individual testimonies it pleases [me] to insert here, lest it be needful for me hereafter to return to this very argument.

Origen, [in] the seventh book on the epistle to the Romans, expounding that [text], "Has not the potter power over the clay?" etc., wrote these [things]: "THAT which he proposed a little before concerning Jacob and Esau is more openly explained. For [take it] that Jacob [was] a vessel sanctified unto honor, and useful to the Lord, prepared for every good work: his soul had cleansed itself; and God, seeing his purity (for [God], having power to make from the same mass another [vessel] unto contumely) made Jacob indeed — who, as we have said, cleansed himself — a vessel unto honor; but Esau, whose [margin: Genesis 25.d] soul he saw not so pure, nor so simple, he made from the same mass a vessel unto contumely. But that thou mayest know that Jacob was made a vessel unto honor for the purity and simplicity of [his] soul, hear what testimony of simplicity the divine scripture bears to him. 'And Jacob was,' it says, 'a simple [plain] man.' [margin: Malachi 1.a] Therefore, for this reason the Apostle says of them — because, before he was born, it is said of them, 'Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated.'" The same [Origen], [in] book 1 on the epistle to the Romans, relating the cause for which Paul was chosen by God, speaks in this manner: "But we say, that neither

[catchword "neque" → "neither," continues on p. 534 (PDF 539).]

---

*(printed p. 534 [PDF p. 539], verso — Annotation CCLI continued (the great patristic catena for predestination-from-foreseen-merits): Origen (bk. 1 on Romans, Paul foreseen to labor), Ambrose, Jerome (to Hedibia q.10, on Galatians 1, on Malachi 1), the pseudo-Jerome commentator, Augustine (Propositions on Romans,* 83 Questions q.68, Six Questions against the Pagans q.2 answering Porphyry), Theodoret, and Sedulius. The whole page is one annotation. Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CCLI, from the catchword "neque":)

—that neither was Paul chosen by chance, nor by a natural difference, but that He — who knows all things before they come to be — gave to him [Paul] the causes of his own election in himself. Therefore Paul — in that he is said [to be] "separated unto the gospel," and separated from the womb of his mother — the causes in it [that womb], and the merits, by which he ought to have been separated, He saw, from whom the mind is not hidden. For he foresaw that [Paul] would labor more abundantly than all the rest in the gospel; that he would preach the gospel in hunger and thirst, in cold and nakedness — lest perhaps, while he preached to others, he himself should be made reprobate. These [things], therefore, and [things] like these, and many others in him, Jesus, foreseeing [them] from the womb of [his] mother, separated him for these [reasons] unto the gospel. Which also Paul himself, discoursing more fully in what follows, says: "Because whom he foreknew, he also predestinated to be made conformable to the image of his Son" — evidently showing that those whom God foreknew would be such [as] to conform themselves to Christ in [his] sufferings, those same [ones] he also predestined [to be] conformable and like to his image, and to [his] glory. The foreknowledge of God, therefore, precedes — by which they are known who are going to have in themselves labors and virtues; and thus predestination follows. Nor, again, will the foreknowledge be thought the cause of predestination. For [that] which, among men, the merit of each is weighed from past deeds — this, with God, is judged from future [deeds].

Ambrose, in the commentaries on the epistle to the Romans, explaining that [text], "To those who according to purpose are called": "THEY," he says, "are called according to purpose whom, believing, God foreknew — so that before they believed, they were [fore]known. For those whom he foreknew would be devoted to him, those same he chose unto eternal rewards." Likewise, declaring that [text], "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy," he writes thus: "THEREFORE I will have mercy," he says, "on him on whom I shall have had mercy" — that is, "I will have mercy on him of whom I was foreknowing that I would give mercy, knowing that he would turn [to me] and would remain with me. And I will show mercy to him to whom I shall have shown mercy" — that is, "I will give mercy to him whom I foreknew would return to me with a right heart after [his] error." This is, to give to him to whom [it is] not [to be] given, and not not to give to him to whom [it] is to be given — [so] that he may call him whom he knows will obey, but not call that other, whom he knows will by no means obey.

