Jerome, [in] the tenth question to Hedibia, expounding that [text], "Is there iniquity with God?": "the VESSELS," he says, "of mercy are not only the people of the Gentiles, but also these, who out of the Jews willed to believe. From which it is shown [that] not nations are chosen, but the wills of men." And [in] the first book on the epistle to the Galatians, upon that [text], "But when it pleased him who separated me," etc., he says thus: "IT COMES to pass from the foreknowledge of God, that whom he knows [will be] just in the future, he loves before he rises from the womb: and whom he hates [as] a sinner before he sins — not that in [his] love, and in [his] hatred, there be iniquity of God; but because he ought not to hold otherwise those whom he knows [will be] either sinners or just in the future. We, as men, judge only of present [things]: He, to whom future things are already done [as good as done], bears sentence from the end of things, not from [their] beginnings."

Likewise, in the commentary on Malachi, chapter one, expounding that [text], "Jacob I loved, Esau I hated": "MOREOVER," he says, "the love and hatred of God is born either from the foreknowledge of future things, or from works. Otherwise we should not —hold that God loves all things, and hates nothing of those [things] which he has created: but that he properly vindicates to his charity those who are enemies and rebels of vices; and, on the contrary, hates those who desire to build up again [the things] destroyed by God."

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLI:)

The author of the commentaries bearing the inscription of Jerome [pseudo-Jerome], elucidating that [text], "He predestined [them] to be made conformable to the image of his Son": "TO PREDESTINE," he says, "is the same as to foreknow. Therefore those whom he foresaw would be conformable in life, he willed [them] to be made conformable in glory." And a little after: "WHOM he foreknew would believe, these he called. For the calling gathers the willing, not the unwilling." And again, upon that [text], "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy," he says: "This, in the right sense, is thus understood: I will have mercy on him whom I foreknew could merit mercy — so that already then I have had mercy on him."

Augustine, in the book of Propositions from the epistle to the Romans, upon that [text], "Jacob I loved," affirms that God chose Jacob from the faith which he foresaw in him, in these words: "GOD did not, therefore, choose the works of anyone in [his] foreknowledge, but he chose faith in foreknowledge — so that he chose the very [man] whom he foreknew would believe in him; to whom he would give the Holy Spirit, so that, by working good [deeds], he might attain even eternal life. The same God who works all things and in all: but nowhere is it said, 'God believes all things in all.' [That] which, therefore, we believe, [and that] good which we work, is his." The same [Augustine], in the book of 83 Questions, question 68: "'On whom he will,' he says, 'God has mercy; and whom he will, he hardens.' But this will of God cannot be unjust. For it comes from the most hidden merits; because even the sinners themselves did not, on account of [their] general sin, make one mass; yet there is a certain diversity among them. Something, therefore, precedes in the sinners, whereby, although they are not yet justified, they may be made worthy of justification: and the same precedes in other sinners, whereby they may be worthy of blunting [hardening]." Again, in the book of Six Questions against the Pagans, question 2, he refers the cause of the divine calling to the faith of the called, foreseen by God. For there, answering the question of Porphyry — who asks why Christ did not come in earlier ages to call all men to the way of salvation — he writes thus: "THIS ONLY, for brevity's sake, let us say in the solution of this question: that Christ then willed to appear to men, and his doctrine to be preached among them, when he knew, and where he knew, there were [those] who would be going to believe in him. For in those times, and in those places, in which the gospel was not preached, he foreknew that all, in its preaching, would be such [as] many were in his corporeal presence, who would not believe in him even when the dead were raised by him."

Theodoret, in the commentaries on the epistle to the Romans, upon "Jacob I loved": "GOD," he says, "when he had foreknown the purpose of Esau and Jacob, foretold the difference of both. For the election of God accords with the purpose of men." And in the exposition of the eighth chapter of the same epistle: "WHOSE purpose," he says, "God foreknew, them he predestined from eternity."

Sedulius, in the Collectanea on the epistle to the Romans, upon that [text], "To those who according to purpose are called,"

[catchword "sunt" → "are [called]," continues on p. 535 (PDF 540).]

---

*(printed p. 535 [PDF p. 540], recto — end of the Annotation CCLI catena (Sedulius, Theophylact [Rom. & Matt. 22], Oecumenius, Theodulus, Sadoletus — all ascribing predestination to foreseen faith), then Sixtus's resolution: this "predestination from foreseen merits" was condemned in Pelagius; Augustine himself once held it but retracted it (*Retractations *1.25); Sixtus reconciles via Aquinas (*Summa 1 q.23) — the twofold cause (meritorious, final) and the grades before/after gratifying grace: foreseen works are NOT the meritorious cause of the earlier grades [election, predestination, vocation], but ARE the cause of the later grades and of "final" predestination. Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CCLI, from the catchword "sunt":)

—are called, says: "THOSE whom he foreknew would be devoted to him, those same he chose to seize the promised rewards." And below: "THOSE whom he foreknew would believe, these he called. For the calling gathers the willing." It is one thing to foreknow, another to predestine. Foreknowledge foreknows [the things] to be done; afterward predestination describes [the things] to be repaid: the former foresees the merits, the latter predestines the rewards. And below: "JACOB and Esau, who are of one coition of [i.e. by] Rebecca, before they were born, were separated by the merit of faith, that the purpose might already remain [stand]. So therefore also now, [those] whom he foreknew, of the Gentiles, would believe, he chose, and out of Israel he rejected the unbelieving."

Theophylact, in the commentaries on the epistle to the Romans, explaining that [text], "Whom he foreknew and predestined," speaks thus: "GOD FOREKNOWS, or knows beforehand, those who are worthy of the calling; then thus he predestines. Foreknowledge, therefore, is prior; afterward predestination follows. But by predestination thou wilt understand the unchangeable will of God. He foreknew, therefore, that Paul was worthy of the calling, and so he predefined, or predestined [him] — that is, he unchangeably decreed, and so determined to call him." The same [Theophylact], on chapter 22 of Matthew, when he expounded that [text], "Many are called," etc.: "FEW indeed," he says, "are they who are saved, and who are worthy to be chosen by God; so that it belongs to God indeed to call, but that we be made elect, or not, is ours."

Oecumenius, in the Collectanea of explanations on Paul, expounding that [text], "But whom he predestined": "UNDERSTAND [as implied]," he says, "everywhere, 'who according to purpose are called.'

For [those] whom he foreknew, these he also predefined; because they are according to purpose: but [those] whom he predefined, these he also called; because they are according to purpose: and [those] whom he called, the same he also justified; because they are according to purpose. And let nothing absurd occur, if to some God does good, but to others not. For when 'according to purpose' is subjoined, the virtue of those is established, who according to their own purpose believed: and thus God is freed from the respect of persons [partiality]."

Theodulus, in the Collectanea on the epistle to the Romans, expounding this same [thing], repeats almost the same, saying: "EVERYWHERE understand [as implied], 'who according to purpose are called.' For an absurdity is gathered, if God conferred a benefit on some, but did not confer [it] on others. But if 'according to purpose' be understood [as implied], the virtue of them is established, and God is freed from the respect of persons."

Jacobus [Sadoletus], bishop of Carpentras, [in] the second book of the commentary on the epistle to the Romans, making plain that [text] from the eighth chapter of the same epistle, "Whom he predestined, them he also called," persuades by a long discourse that God chooses not any [men] from the arbitrament of his own will, but because he foreknew that they would neither spurn the divine calling, nor reject the offered grace of God.

THESE, then, are the sayings of the fathers, from which it seems to be gathered that the foreknowledge of merits is the cause of divine predestination — which opinion indeed was condemned in Pelagius.

St. Augustine, when he had first constantly adhered to this dog—ma, at last — the matter being more diligently examined — retracted the opinion in almost innumerable places, especially [in] the first book of the Retractations, chapter twenty-five: in which place he testifies that he would never have said this, if he had known that election, without any preceding merits, is from grace alone, and that faith itself is found among the gifts of GOD which are given through the Holy Spirit. For although to believe and to work are both ours, on account of the free arbitrament of the will, and because they are done [only] by us willing [them]: yet both are the gift of GOD, who furnishes both to believe, and to will, and to accomplish.

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLI:)

BUT, lest I sift the fathers' opinions [that have been] set forth more loftily and prolixly than [befits] the manner of an annotation, and involve both myself and the minds of the readers in a matter so abstruse, and implicated in such labyrinths of disputations, I judge it more than enough to suffice, if I annotate that one [thing] which St. Thomas admonished [us] to observe from the doctrine of Augustine, in the first volume of the Theological Summa, and in the twenty-third question, namely: that in the works of the elect, foreseen by the divine foreknowledge, a twofold reason of cause can be regarded — [the] Meritorious, namely, and [the] Final. First, then, if we have looked to the meritorious cause, it must be known that the order of divine providence toward the elect is distinguished by a twofold variety of grades: of which some precede the reception of gratifying [sanctifying] grace — such as are Dilection [love], Election, Enrollment [Conscription], Predestination, Vocation, [and] the inception of Justification; but others follow the reception of gratifying grace — such as are the increase of Grace, the increment of justice, and the attainment of eternal felicity. If, therefore, it be asked whether the foreseeing of our works is the meritorious cause of the preceding grades: it must be flatly denied; lest we seem to connive with the Pelagians, who say that God chose our merits in his foreknowledge. And according to this opinion all the fathers are to be interpreted who define the eternal election and predestination of God to be from the grace of God alone, no merits foreseen. But if anyone should ask whether the following grades of the divine order have a meritorious cause in the divine foreseeing: without doubt it must be answered that God from eternity decreed that he would give increments of ampler justice to those who would use well the first gift of justifying grace, and then, on account of the merits of well-preserved justice, would render to them the crown of perpetual beatitude. And to this sense we shall endeavor, so far as it can be done, to accommodate some of the aforesaid opinions of the fathers, which seem to ascribe election and predestination to the foreseeing of merits — that is, [to ascribe to it] the completion of predestination and election, or the following and posterior grades of the divine order; because the fathers sometimes, denominating the whole from the part, called [it] Election, or Predestination.

AGAIN, if we turn ourselves to the contemplation of the final cause, we shall rightly indeed be able to affirm that the foreseeing of works, [and] the subsequent reception of divine grace, is the cause of election and of final predestination. For God, as Paul says, chose us before the constitution of the world, and predestined us

[catchword "nos" → "us," continues on p. 536 (PDF 541).]

(printed p. 536 [PDF p. 541], verso — end of Ann. CCLI (Sixtus's conclusion: foreseen works are the final*, not the meritorious, cause of predestination; "candid reader, use a better [account] if you have it"), then Ann. CCLII, on Romans 9:18 (the* opposite catena — reprobation from God's good pleasure alone: Augustine's Questions to Simplician 1.2, Hypognosticon 6, and Soliloquies 28 [the great "from the same clay, some vessels unto honor, some unto contumely" passage]; Sixtus notes this displeased many ancient fathers; and Prosper of Riez and Hilary of Arles writing to admonish Augustine on behalf of the monks of Marseilles). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCLI, from the catchword "nos":)

—us, that we should be holy and immaculate before him, unto the praise of the glory of his grace. That is, he took us to himself from eternity among his own, and prepared for us the grace of vocation and of justification — to this end, namely, that we might use it well, and, from its good use, might attain the glory of everlasting felicity. Nor is there doubt that some of the aforesaid fathers, according to this manner of speaking, pronounced that our works, foreseen by God, are the cause of divine predestination — the final [cause] indeed, but not the meritorious. These are the [things], candid reader, which we judged were here to be briefly annotated: thou, if thou hast any [things] more apt than these for explaining the opinions of the fathers, use [them]; and take these [things] of ours, whatsoever they be, in good part.

Annotation CCLII [contents]

"On whom he will, he hath mercy; and whom he will, he hardeneth." — Romans 9[:18]

[margin: Whether God reprobates any from the purpose of his will alone.]

Augustine, [in] the first book of Questions to Simplician, the second question, when in the exposition of this passage he was speaking of the cause of Predestination and Reprobation, seemed to assert that, when God had foreknown the whole human race in Adam sinning — [as] lost and dead in a certain mass, [as it were,] of iniquity and perdition — he snatched out some thence, and predestined [them] to eternal life, not from their foreseen merits, but from the good pleasure of his will, unto the showing-forth of his mercy. But the rest he left in the same mass, reprobated from the heavenly kingdom — not from their singular demerits foreseen, but from the good pleasure of his will — forsaking [them as] lost, unto the showing-forth of the divine justice, [and leaving them] in their perdition by a just judgment. Which opinion he expressed in these words: [margin: Romans 3.e] "ALL men, therefore, are (since indeed, as the Apostle says, in Adam all die — from whom the origin of the offense of God is drawn into the universal race of men) a certain one mass of sin, owing punishment to the divine and highest justice; which [punishment], whether it be exacted or remitted, there is no iniquity. But from whom it should be exacted, and to whom it should be remitted, the debtors proudly [presume to] declare." This same [thing] he pronounces more clearly [in] the sixth book of the Hypognosticon, in this manner: "NOW, therefore, let us discourse more openly [as to] how God — in whom there is no iniquity — generally uses his foreknowledge and predestination toward the human race. For to the mass of the human race, which in Adam and Eve, by [their] prevarication, was made damnable and mortal — not by the divine condition [i.e. not by how God created it], but from debt — punishment and the torment of gehenna is owed: but pardon is conferred not by merit, but by the largess of the mercy of God, the just Judge. But because the Lord, [being] just and merciful, and foreknowing of future things, out of this damnable mass — not by acceptance of persons, but by the irreprehensible judgment of his equity — those whom he foreknows, he prepares by his own gratuitous mercy, that is, he predestines to eternal life; but the rest (as I said before) he punishes with due punishment — whom he therefore punishes because he foreknew what they would be; yet he himself did not make [them], nor predestine [them] to be punished, but only (as I said) foreknew [them] in the damnable mass."

AGAIN, in the book of the Soliloquies, chapter 28, expressing this same [thing] in more open words, he wrote these [things]: [margin: Isaiah 64.b] "WE ALL, coming as [it were] a menstruous cloth from the corrupt and unclean mass, bring —the stain of our uncleanness — which we cannot conceal even from thee at least, who seest all things. For we carry [it] on our foreheads, since we cannot be clean, unless thou hast cleansed [us], who alone art clean. But thou cleansest, out of us the sons of men, those in whom it has pleased thee to dwell: whom, by the inaccessible deep secrets of the incomprehensible judgments of thy wisdom — [judgments] always just, though hidden — without their merits, thou hast predestined before the world, called out of the world, justified in the world, and thou magnifiest them after the world. But these [things] thou dost not do for all: which all the wasting-away wise men of the earth marvel at. And I, O Lord, considering this, am affrighted, and am stupefied at the height of the riches of thy wisdom and knowledge — to which I do not attain — and [at] the incomprehensible judgments of thy justice, since from the same clay thou makest some vessels indeed unto honor, but others unto everlasting contumely. Those, therefore, whom thou hast chosen for thyself out of the many into thy holy temple, those thou cleansest, pouring out upon them clean water: whose names and number thou knowest, who alone numberest the multitude of the stars, and callest them all by name: who [are] also written in the book of life: who can in no way perish, to whom all things work together unto good, even [their] very sins. For when they fall, they are not dashed to pieces: because thou puttest under thy hand, keeping all their bones, that not one of these be crushed. [margin: Psalm 33.d] And yet the death of sinners is most evil: of those, I say, whom — before thou madest heaven and earth, according to the deep abyss of thy hidden judgments (yet always just) — thou hast foreknown unto eternal death: whose numbering of names and of depraved merits is with thee, [thou] who hast numbered the number of the sand of the sea, and hast measured the depth of the abyss; whom thou hast left in their uncleannesses: to whom all things work together unto evil: and their very prayer is turned into sin: so that even if they ascend up to the heavens, and set their nest among the stars of heaven, they shall perish in the end like a dunghill."

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLII:)

THIS is Augustine's opinion; which of old seems to have vehemently displeased very many of the ancient fathers.

Prosper, bishop of Riez, admonished Augustine concerning this matter by a letter, in these words: "MANY of the servants of Christ, who abide in the city of Marseilles, in the writings of thy holiness which thou hast composed against the Pe-lagian heretics, think [it] contrary to the opinion of the fathers and to the ecclesiastical sense, whatsoever in them thou hast disputed concerning the calling of the elect according to the purpose of God. For this purpose of the calling of God — by which, either before the beginning of the world, or in the very founding of the human race, the discretion [separating] of those-to-be-chosen and those-to-be-rejected is said [to have been] made, so that, according to what pleased the Creator, some are created vessels of honor, others vessels of contumely — they say both takes away from the fallen the care of rising again, and brings to the saints an occasion of torpor: on the ground that on either side the labor is superfluous, if neither the rejected [man] can by any industry enter [in], nor the elect [man] by any negligence fall out."

Hilary, bishop of Arles, signifying the same matter to Augustine by a letter, writes thus to him: "Most blessed Lord, and with all affection to be de—sired [longed for]. These are the [things] which are bandied about at Marseilles, or also in other places in Gaul: that it is [something] new and useless to preaching, that certain [men] are said to be chosen according to the purpose of God." And below: "AND they testify that they prove this not only by the testimonies of other catholics, but also by the more ancient disputation of thy holiness [i.e. Augustine's own earlier writings]."

[catchword "side-" (desiderande) → "de[sired]," continues on p. 537 (PDF 542).]

(printed p. 537 [PDF p. 542], recto — end of Ann. CCLII, then Ann. CCLIII–CCLV, on Romans 9–14 (the reprobation debate concluded — Hilary of Arles, Faustus of Riez [attacking Augustine's "mass of perdition" as pagan-flavored], Ambrose of Compsa's 25 objections; then Sixtus's resolution mirroring the last page — reprobation's eternal grades [Hatred, Neglect, Deletion, Reprobation] have no cause but God's will, its temporal grades [dulling, blinding, hardening, damnation] have the reprobates' own unbelief as meritorious cause [Hosea 13:9]; then Chrysostom on Paul's dignity [Germain de Brie]; Origen's "expiatory fire for all" error; and whether the whole life of unbelievers is sin — Anselm of Laon, Anselm of Canterbury, Ambrose, pseudo-Origen on Job, Ferus, Aquinas). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CCLII, from the catchword "side-":)

Faustus, bishop of the Gauls [of Riez], the name of Augustine suppressed, assails his opinion [in] the second book On the Grace of God, and the Arbitrament of the Human Mind, chapter six, in these words: "It was said, not from works, but from the caller: 'Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated.' In these words the impiety of the gentile [pagan] persuasion wishes this to be understood: that God — without any examination of a moderator between good and evil, [acting] not by the order of one ruling, but by the right of one domineering — renders that one worthy of [his] affection, this one [worthy] of hatred; receives that one with zeal, excludes this one by [his] command [sovereign power]. And between two lost [men] let there be no consideration of labor, none of devotion: but let the one, without reason, be taken up (his duties ceasing — i.e. though he has done nothing), the other, without discretion, be damned. And thus, while in either [case] there exists the matter neither of merit nor of fault, the cause of the future judgment is altogether taken away."

Ambrose, bishop of Compsa, although he professes that he greatly venerates Augustine, and attributes to him as much as he would dare to concede to any of the illustrious doctors of the Church: yet he assails this opinion concerning the mass of perdition — first devised by Augustine himself (as he [Ambrose] says) — with five-and-twenty objections: which, if anyone desires to know, let him read his Commentaries on the ninth chapter of the epistle to the Romans, where he has reduced into a compendium [the things] which he had earlier written against this opinion in a prolix volume.

FOR the understanding of these and of passages of this kind, it is worthy of notice that — even as we said in the preceding Annotation, [that] the order of divine providence toward those-to-be-blessed is distinguished by a twofold distinction of grades, the former, namely, and the latter — so now we say [that] the order of divine providence toward the reprobate is comprised by a twofold variety of grades: of which some are prior and eternal, such as Hatred, Neglect, Deletion [blotting-out], and Reprobation; which are diametrically opposed to the prior grades of the divine order — that is, to Dilection, Election, Enrollment [Conscription], and Predestination. These indeed have no cause in the divine foreknowledge, except the mind of God so willing, [and] looking-forward to the showing-forth of the divine justice. And in this sense, as I judge, are to be understood the opinions of the Fathers which establish no cause of Reprobation. But others are the posterior and temporal grades of the same Post-position [setting-behind] or Repulsion — namely, Obtusion [dulling], Blinding, Hardening, and eternal damnation: whose meritorious cause is the reprobates' unbelief, iniquity, and obstinacy; which, when God had foreknown [them] from eternity, he rightly appointed for them the due punishments — namely, Obtusion, Blinding, Obduration [hardening], and the damnation of eternal punishment. According to the consideration of which [grades] it was said by very many fathers that evil works foreseen are the meritorious cause of the divine Reprobation and Repulsion — that is, of the posterior effects of the divine Post-position, which are produced only from the evil merits of the reprobate — the prophet

(right column — concluding Annotation CCLII, then Ann. CCLIII–CCLV:)

—saying: [margin: Hosea 13.b] "Thy perdition [is] from thyself, O Israel; only from me [is] thy help."

Annotation CCLIII [contents]

"For I also am an Israelite." — Romans 11[:1]

[margin: Whether Paul was equal to Peter in dignity.]

Chrysostom, [in] the eighteenth homily on the epistle to the Romans, in the exposition of the present clause: "FOR neither," he says, "if God had been about to repel his people, would he have chosen Paul for himself out of the Israelites — to whom he would grant all preaching, to whom the affairs of the world, all the mysteries, and the universal dispensation." Germain de Brie [Germanus Brixius], the interpreter [translator] of Chrysostom's homilies on Paul, annotating this passage in the margin, says: "SEE what Chrysostom attributes to Paul." Read below, Annotation 269.

Annotation CCLIIII [contents]

"The remnant, according to the election, are made safe [saved]." — Romans 11[:5]

[margin: Expiatory fire.]

Origen, [in] the eighth book on the epistle to the Romans, interpreting these [words], seems to be of that opinion, that all — the good as well as the evil — are to enter, after this life, the fire of gehenna. For he has these words: "YET the end shall press hard upon all [things], and those indeed who are blessed, whether they [be] of Israel, or of the Gentiles," etc. See above, Annotations 170 and 171 of the fifth book.

Annotation CCLV [contents]

"All that is not of faith is sin." — Romans 14[:23]

[margin: Whether the whole life of unbelievers is sin.]

Anselm of Laon [Laudunensis], in the Glossa ordinaria, explaining this clause, seems to hint that all the works of unbelievers are sins, and that nothing can be done by them which is good. And he uses these words: "THE WHOLE life of unbelievers is sin: and nothing [is] good without the highest Good, where the acknowledgment of eternal truth is lacking: [it is] false virtue even in the best morals. The works which seem probable [commendable], apart from faith, are thus: as great strength [powers], and a most swift running, off the road." To this opinion — which is taken word for word from Augustine — Anselm, bishop of Canterbury, agrees, [and] in the commentaries on this passage repeats these very words: "AMBROSE accords with these [things, in] the first book On the Calling of the Gentiles, chapter 3, saying: 'Without the worship of the true God, even [that] which seems [to be] virtue is sin, nor can anyone please God without God.' Nor does the author of the commentaries of Origen on Job dissent from these: who, [in] the first chapter, writes thus: 'That I may say [it] briefly, and boldly: All [things], whatsoever men shall do — whether in virginity, or in abstinence, or in the chastity of the body, or in the distribution of their goods — they do all in vain [for nothing], if they shall not have done [them] in faith. For all severity, and all justice, which anyone shall do outside the true faith of God, he does in vain, he does unto perdition; it profits him not, it helps him not in the day of wrath. To which Paul is witness, saying: "All that is not of faith is sin."'" Thus he [Anselm]. John Ferus followed the words and sense of these, in the commentaries on Matthew — even as was noted above, [in] the fortieth Annotation of this book. St. Thomas, in the second [part] of the second [part], question 10, article 4, discour-

[signature "Yy"; catchword "rens" (disserens) → "discoursing," continues on p. 538 (PDF 543).]

(printed p. 538 [PDF p. 543], verso — end of Ann. CCLV, then Ann. CCLVI–CCLIX, on Romans 16 & 1 Corinthians 1–3 (Aquinas on whether unbelievers' works are all sin; Chrysostom's separate homily on Rom. 16:3 abused by Erasmus against just war; whether the divine precepts can be fulfilled by natural powers alone — Chrysostom, hom. 3 on 1 Cor., on the gentile philosophers, flagged by Augustine On Heresies 88 as a Pelagian error, answered via hyperbole / external-act-only [Cassian, Conferences 13]; then the purgatory texts — Theodoret's testimony cited by Aquinas but absent from the extant Theodoret; and whether Chrysostom acknowledged purgatory — he reads "saved as by fire" of eternal gehenna, and Mark of Ephesus used this at Basel against purgatory). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCLV, from the catchword "rens":)

—coursing [on] the proposed passage of Anselm, says [that] it can be understood in two ways, that is: either [in the sense] that the life of unbelievers cannot be without sin, since sins are not taken away without faith; or because whatsoever they do out of unbelief is sin. Whence in the same place it is subjoined, that everyone living or acting in unbelief sins vehemently. But hence it does not follow that unbelievers sin in every [single] work, since in them that natural goodness of reason — which pleads toward the best [things] — is not utterly extinct and abolished. See below, Annotation 178.

Annotation CCLVI [contents]

"Salute Prisca and Aquila." — Romans 16[:3]

[margin: War.]

Chrysostom, in the homily which he published separately on this passage, has certain words which Erasmus abuses against the right and equity of a just war — contending that it is not lawful for Christians to fight by any reason [in any way]. Read Annotation 156 of this book.

Annotation CCLVII [contents]

"I beseech you by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." — 1 Corinthians 1[:10]

[margin: Whether the precepts of the divine law can be fulfilled by natural powers alone.]

Chrysostom, [in] the third homily on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, narrating this, seems to hold that many of the gentile philosophers, aided by natural reason alone, not only fulfilled the precepts of the divine law, but even transcended [them]. For thus he declares: "DID not God give a law, both written and natural? Did he not send [his] Son? Did he not work signs? Did he not promise the kingdom of heaven? Are not his precepts so light [easy], that many, by philosophical reason alone, have exceeded them?" This assertion Augustine, in the book On Heresies, chapter 88, seems to place among the first and chief errors of the Pelagians, saying: "THE PELAGIANS are enemies of the grace of God, which is poured forth in our hearts, to such a degree that they believe man can, without it, do all the divine commands." There are [those] who judge Chrysostom's words [to have been] uttered by hyperbole — as by one who, by the example of the diligence of the gentiles, wished to confound the sloth of Christians, and to provoke their idle minds to the execution of the evangelical law. We can also interpret these very words thus, that we say [that] the philosophers indeed [fulfilled] not all, but some, of the divine precepts, both fulfilled and even surpassed [them] — as far only as the very action of the work, and the sole external execution of the deed [is concerned]. For many Gentiles chose voluntary poverty, riches being utterly cast off; and many so kept virginity, that they preferred to be slain than to betray it. But if we consider these same works according to the internal manner of acting, and the right scope [aim] of working, which is required of us according to the rule of Christian charity: it must be denied that any of the gentiles fulfilled the precepts of the law by philosophical reason alone — much less surpassed [them]. For, as John Cassian, the disciple of John Chrysostom, writes in the thirteenth volume of the Conferences, it must by no means be believed that the philosophers attained such a chastity of mind as is required of us — to whom it is enjoined, that not —only fornication, but not even uncleanness, be named among us. For they had a certain μερικήν [merikḗn] — that is, a little portion — of chastity; that is, an abstinence of the flesh, [such] that they restrained lust only from coition: but this internal and perfect purity of body — [that is, of] the mind — they could attain not only [not] in body, but not even in thought. Thou hast [things] alluding to this in the hundred-and-first Annotation of the fifth book.

(right column — concluding Annotation CCLVII, then Ann. CCLVIII–CCLIX:)

Annotation CCLVIII [contents]

"But if any man build upon this foundation," etc. — 1 Corinthians 3[:12]
[margin: Purgatory.]

Theodoret's testimony for the purgatorial fire, from the exposition of the epistle to the Corinthians, St. Thomas adduces in the book Against the Errors of the Greeks and Armenians, in these plain words: "THE APOSTLE says, 'He shall be saved' — thus, as [it were] through a smelting fire, purging whatever has intervened through the incaution of [his] past life, from the dust at least of the feet of the earthly sense [affection], in which [fire] he remains so long, until whatever of grossness and of earthly affection has cleaved [to him] be purged — for whom mother Church devoutly offers victims and peaceful gifts [i.e. the Mass]." These words, indeed, are nowhere extant — neither in the Latin nor in the Greek commentaries of Theodoret. It can be believed [that] they were either withdrawn by certain Greeklings hostile to purgatory, or taken by St. Thomas from some other work, where Theodoret thus expounded this passage.

Annotation CCLIX [contents]

"But he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire." — 1 Corinthians 3[:15]
[margin: Whether Chrysostom acknowledged purgatory.]

Chrysostom, [in] the ninth homily on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, explaining this passage — of the perpetual fire of gehenna, and of those who shall be punished with the eternal punishment of fire — writes thus: "'BUT he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire.' This signifies that he himself shall not so perish as [his] works, going [back] into nothing, but shall remain in the fire. Salvation, therefore, he calls this matter not simply [absolutely]: on that account he added, 'As by fire.' For indeed there is with us a custom of saying that [those things] are 'safe' [saved] in the fire, which are not burned up, nor turned into ash. Do not, therefore, when thou hearest 'fire,' think [that they are] burning [and] going back into nothing. But if he calls such a punishment 'salvation,' marvel not. For [Scripture] is wont, in badly-signifying [pejorative] matters, to use good names, and in well[-signifying matters, bad names]. As, for example, the name of 'captivity' seems a name of bad signification: but in a good [sense] Paul uses it in these words: [margin: 1 Cor. 10.b] 'Bringing into captivity every understanding unto the obedience of Christ.' Contrariwise, in an evil matter he uses an illustrious [noble] word: [margin: Romans 5.] 'Sin reigned.' And yet the name of 'reign' is more laudable. Likewise in this place, when he says, 'He shall be saved,' it signifies nothing else than an increment of punishment: as [if] he should say, 'He himself shall remain perpetually in punishment.'"

Mark, bishop of Ephesus, in the Apologia which he presented on behalf of the Greeks — [who] reject purgatory — in the Council of Basel, examining these words of Chrysostom, asserts that he [Chrysostom] never either expressed in words, or thought, anything of purgatory (to which the Latins apply the present passage of Paul) — Chrysostom crying out against [it], who [interpreted] it of the everlasting fire of gehenna,

[catchword "igne" → "fire," continues on p. 539 (PDF 544).]

(printed p. 539 [PDF p. 544], recto — end of Ann. CCLIX, then Ann. CCLX, on 1 Corinthians 3 & 7 (Sixtus refutes Mark of Ephesus, proving Chrysostom did teach a purgatory — a catena of homilies on Matthew 32, 1 Cor. 41, Philippians 3 / Antioch 69, and Hebrews 4, all on suffrages and alms for the dead; then his verdict that Chrysostom's "saved as by eternal fire" reading of 1 Cor. 3:15 is hard and violent, probably aimed at Origenists who thought hell would end; then Ambrosiaster on 1 Cor. 7:10 — two Church-rejected opinions: that a man may dismiss an adulterous wife and remarry, and that a wife may not do likewise to an adulterous husband). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CCLIX, from the catchword "igne":)

—[of gehenna] truly, and quite genuinely, expounded [it]. But since the Ephesian's [Mark's] reproof has two parts — one, by which he asserts that Chrysostom never brought forth anything of purgatory in [his] writings, or [ever] thought [of it]; the other, by which he prefers Chrysostom's exposition to the Latins' exposition — I shall show [that] the man both errs in this part, and impudently lies in that. For there are had, in Chrysostom, very many passages, from which it is clear that that blessed man believed [that] after this life there is a place where [those] stained with spots are purged; where, outside the eternal rest, they suffer tribulation; where they receive refreshment from our suffrages and prayers; where the angered Judge is appeased for them: which place the Latins call purgatory. That this is so, as we say, the passages written below, culled from his homilies, most openly demonstrate.

[In] homily 32 on Matthew: "WHY, after [thy kinsman's] death, dost thou call together the poor of thy [kin]? Why dost thou beseech the presbyters, that they may be willing to pray for him? I am not ignorant that thou wilt answer: that the deceased may attain rest, that he may find the Judge propitious." And below: "FOR if many barbarous nations are wont to burn the goods of the dead together with the dead: how much more justly oughtest thou to hand over thy [goods] for thy deceased son — not that they be reduced to ash, but that thou mayest render him more glorious. Thou thinkest that he departed, stained with spots: give him his own [goods, as alms], that he may wipe [himself] clean of the spots by them."

[In] homily 41 on the [epistle] to the Corinthians: "LET US therefore aid our deceased brethren, [and] make memory for them. For if a father's victim [sacrifice] purged the children of that Job, why dost thou doubt that, if we too offer [something] for the sleeping [dead], some [portion] of solace will accrue to them? God is wont to be gracious to some for the sake of others," etc.

[In] the third homily on the epistle to the Philippians, and [in] the 69th homily to the people of Antioch: "LET US bewail these dead, let us aid them according to [our] powers, let us procure for them some [thing] of help — a little, indeed, yet let us aid them. How, [and] by what reason? Praying, let us exhort others also, that they pray for them; and let us give alms unceasingly for them to the poor. This matter has no little of consolation. Hear, indeed, what God says: [margin: 2 Kings 19.] 'I will protect this city for my own sake, and for the sake of David my servant.' If the memory only of a just [man] availed so much, when [his descendants'] works also live [avail] for such a one: what shall [prayers and works] not be able [to do]? Not in vain was it sanctioned by the Apostles, that in the celebration of the venerable mysteries memory be made of those who have departed hence. They know [that] much emolument accrues to them thence, much of utility. For, the whole people standing, extending [their] hands to the heavens, and the priestly assembly likewise, and the awful sacrifice being set forth, how should we not appease God, praying for these [dead]? But this indeed we say of those who departed in the faith: but the Catechumens we deem not worthy even of this solace, but they are destitute of all help of this kind, one only excepted. Which one? It is lawful to give in their name to the poor, whence some [portion] of refreshment accrues to them," etc.

[In] the fourth homily on the epistle to the Hebrews: "TELL me, what mean (at a funeral) those festive lamps? Do we not lead them forth (the deceased) as [it were] athletes? What too [mean] the hymns? [Is it] not that we may glorify God, —and give him thanks? [Is it not] that he has now crowned the departed [one], that he now holds with himself [one] led [forth], freed from labors, from servitude? [Are] not the psalms and hymns for this [reason]? [Is] not the psalmody for this [reason]? All these are [the acts] of [those] rejoicing," etc. And after a few [words]: "WHY dost thou chant at that time, [margin: Psalm 114.] 'Return, O my soul, into thy rest, for the Lord hath done well to thee. I will not fear evils, since thou art with me'? And again, [margin: Psalm 31.] 'Thou art my refuge from the tribulation that encompasses me'? Dost thou understand what these psalms mean?" etc. And again: "FOR what reason, tell me, dost thou call the presbyters and the chanters? [Is it] not that thou mayest receive consolation? [Is it] not that thou mayest honor the departed [one]?"

(right column — concluding Annotation CCLIX, then Ann. CCLX:)

FROM these, therefore, and from other passages — which, lest the volume rise to a greater bulk, I of set purpose omit — let it be evident that Chrysostom held the very same [things] concerning Purgatory which we [hold].

BUT now, as to that [second charge] which the Ephesian adds — that Chrysostom's interpretation contradicts the exposition of the Latins, and truly and sincerely expresses the mind of Paul — it is certainly not mine to sift out and decide who understood Paul's sentence more rightly: whether, of the Greeks, Chrysostom, whom no pious [man] despises, or, of the Latins, Augustine, whom all the learned approve. Let his own honor remain, as far as pertains to me, to each. Yet this — by the leave of so great a man — I would dare to teach: that Chrysostom's interpretation is hard and violent [forced]. For who ever spoke thus, as to say, "he shall be saved, but so, as [it were] by fire," for [meaning] this, "he shall be tormented by eternal fire, nor ever consumed by it"? What, then, does that exception "But so" accomplish — which sounds [as if it means] that he shall be safe [saved] in some manner, yet not without torment? To me it becomes probable that Chrysostom in this place abused [the text] — not to contradict the exposition of the Latins (which perhaps he had not [even] seen), but to seize hence an occasion of deterring certain [men] who, at that time, believed — according to the dogma of Origen — that the punishments of gehenna would at some time have an end.

Annotation CCLX [contents]

"I command — not I, but the Lord — that the wife depart not from the husband; but if she depart, that she remain unmarried." — 1 Corinthians 7[:10-11]

[margin: Whether it be lawful for a husband to repudiate an adulterous wife, and for a wife an adulterous husband.]

Ambrose, bishop of Milan [Ambrosiaster], in the commentaries, sifting this passage, has two opinions not received by the Church: the first, that it is lawful for a man to dismiss an adulterous wife, and, while she lives, to take another; the second, that the rights of matrimony are unequal, and on that account it is not lawful for a wife to dismiss an adulterous husband, nor to depart from him. Both propositions he expresses in these words: "IT IS NOT permitted to a woman to marry [again], if, for the cause of [her husband's] fornication or apostasy, or if — lasciviousness illicitly impelling [him] — he seek the use of [his] wife [in an unnatural way]: because the inferior [the wife] does not altogether use this law [right], which the superior [the husband uses]. If, however, the man apostatize, or seek to invert [pervert] the use of [his] wife: the woman can neither marry another, nor return to him. And [that] 'the husband [is] not to dismiss the wife' — but there is understood [as implied] 'except for the cause of fornication.' And therefore he did not subjoin, as concerning the woman, 'But if he depart, let him remain thus [unmarried]': because it is lawful for a man to take a wife, if he has dismissed a sinning [adulterous] wife;

[signature "Yy 2"; catchword "quia" → "because," continues on p. 540 (PDF 545).]

(printed p. 540 [PDF p. 545], verso — end of Ann. CCLX, then Ann. CCLXI–CCLXIII, on 1 Corinthians 7–14 (Jerome's Epitaph of Fabiola and Augustine reject the divorce double standard; Cajetan and Ambrose of Compsa follow Ambrosiaster, whose first opinion Trent 24.7 condemned; then whether confession is necessary before communion — Cajetan says self-examination suffices, refuted by Ambrose of Compsa and condemned by Trent 13.6 [full text]; whether only apostle-written scriptures are canonical — Cajetan yes, Ambrose objects; and whether the Mass and public prayers should be in the vernacular — Cajetan for it, Ambrose of Compsa condemns it as a "Lutheran, nay diabolical" tradition, with Basil beginning a catena). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCLX, from the catchword "quia":)

—because he [the husband] is not so bound by the law as the woman [is]." Of these opinions, the one which is the latter [second], Jerome reproves in the Epitaph of Fabiola, saying: "THE LORD commanded that the wife be not dismissed, except for the cause of fornication; and, if she has been dismissed, [that she] remain unmarried. Whatsoever is commanded to husbands, this consequently redounds to wives. For an adulterous wife is not to be dismissed [while] an adulterous husband is to be retained. For with us [in the Christian law], [that] which is not lawful for women is equally not lawful for men; and the same servitude is reckoned by an equal condition." The same [thing] Augustine holds, [in] the first book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, chapter 26. Following whose authority, the pontiffs, and all the scholastic theologians, decree that in the cause of divorce the condition of husband and wife is equal. The former opinion, too, was lately condemned in the ecumenical Council of Trent, session 24, canon 7 — concerning which we have written copiously above, [in] Annotation 81 of this book.

Thomas Cajetan, in the exposition of this passage, follows the former opinion of Ambrose [Ambrosiaster]. See [there] in the same place.

Ambrose, bishop of Compsa, in the commentaries, expounding these [words], embraces the same opinion. See [there] in the same place.

Annotation CCLXI [contents]

"But let a man prove himself, and so let him eat of that bread." — 1 Corinthians 11[:28]

[margin: Whether before communion it is necessary to confess [one's] sins.]

Thomas Cajetan, in the commentaries on this passage: "PAUL," he says, "by saying 'And so,' signifies that, for taking the Eucharist not unworthily, it suffices that a man have proved himself." And hence an argument is drawn: that it is not necessary, simply and absolutely, that a man be proved [approved] by a confessor to this [end], that he take the Eucharist not unworthily. Ambrose of Compsa, [in] the fifth book of the Annotations, reproves the man [Cajetan], because both here he hinted, and in the Summula on Sins wrote more openly, that it is not necessary that one conscious to himself of mortal sin confess it before the reception of the Eucharist, even if he have the opportunity of a confessor. Which assertion the same Ambrose refutes by a long disputation, as a matter too dangerous. But the Synod of Trent, session 13, canon six, condemns the same error in these words: "LEST so great a sacrament be taken unworthily, and therefore unto death and condemnation, the holy synod itself establishes and declares, that for those whom the conscience of mortal sin burdens — however much also they may esteem themselves contrite — the opportunity of confession being had, sacramental confession must necessarily be premised [made beforehand]. But if anyone shall have presumed to teach, preach, or pertinaciously assert the contrary, or even to defend [it] by disputing publicly: let him, by that very [fact], be excommunicate."

Annotation CCLXII [contents]

"God has set in the Church first apostles." — 1 Corinthians 12[:28]

[margin: Whether only the scriptures approved by the apostles are canonical.]

Thomas Cajetan, in the commentaries: "As the SUPREME members," he says, "he explains the Apostles. For to them looks the universal governance of the Church, not only by word and action, but also by scripture. Whence —only [those things] written by the Apostles, or approved by them, have the authority of sacred scripture." Ambrose [of Compsa], [in] the first book of the Annotations, says that the last part of this opinion is opposed to the authority of the Church — which receives, as canonical, certain scriptures which it is not established were either published by the Apostles, or ever approved by them, and places [them] among the sacred volumes.

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLXII, then Ann. CCLXIII:)

Annotation CCLXIII [contents]

"If I pray in a tongue, my spirit prays, but my mind is without fruit. But how shall he who supplies the place of the unlearned say 'Amen' to thy blessing? — since he knows not what thou sayest." — 1 Corinthians 14[:14-16]

[margin: Whether the Mass and public prayers ought to be said in the vernacular tongue.]

Thomas Cajetan, in the commentaries: "FROM THIS doctrine of Paul," he says, "it is held that it is better for the edification of the Church that the public prayers, which are said in the hearing of the people, be said in a tongue common to the clerics and the people, than [that they] be said in Latin." This opinion Ambrose of Compsa, [in] the book of Annotations, condemns in these words: "I MARVELED that Cajetan was not deterred by the fruit [outcome] of a tradition of this kind — which was first devised by Luther, nay by the devil, speaking in Luther; who, by this cunning, has now made plebeian and rude men [into] theologians, and has so far advanced [it], that those who, in their [own] ignorance, were easily upheld in the faith of the Church, have now, in that wisdom of their own, miserably fallen from the bosom of Christ. That this counsel, therefore, comes not from the Spirit of truth, this was argument enough — that it proceeded from those who are driven by the spirit of error. But [as to] that which the Apostle desires — that [those things] which are brought forth in the churches be understood — he does not compel [us] to believe that they must be understood by all: for there is no detriment [in the fact] that individuals cannot answer 'Amen' upon the blessing. For the Church wisely provides, that the ministers answer in the stead of the whole people: nay, this is [that] which the Apostle there says, when he subjoins, 'How shall he who supplies the place of the unlearned, or the untaught, say "Amen" upon thy blessing?' Behold, [it means] that there were [those] who supplied the place of the common folk, and answered — [those] who had to understand the [things] which were being said. That, therefore, was rather to be blamed: that not only they who supply the place of the unlearned, for the most part understand not what is prayed; but also, very often, not even the presbyters themselves, or the deacons, who pray or read [understand]. But here there is an abuse, and [something] contrary to that which the ecclesiastical canons too enjoin — which [abuse] certainly ought to be amended."

THESE [things] Ambrose [says] against the opinion of Cajetan: to whom Basil, Chrysostom, and Theophylact seem, in a certain manner, to have said similar [things], in the subjoined opinions.

Basil, in the book of Questions from various passages of Scripture, question 278, speaks thus: "HOW does the spirit of someone, as Paul says, pray, but the mind is fruitless? I answer: this was said of those who utter prayers in a tongue unknown to the hearers. For since the words of the prayer are unknown to those present, the mind of the one praying is fruitless, since no one takes utility [profit from it]: but when those present have understood the

[catchword "ratio-" (orationem) → "prayer," continues on p. 541 (PDF 546).]

(printed p. 541 [PDF p. 546], recto — end of Ann. CCLXIII, then Ann. CCLXIIII, on 1 Corinthians 14–15 (Chrysostom hom. 35 = Basil, and Theophylact; Sixtus's defense of the Latin liturgy — Basil and Chrysostom speak of preaching, not the Mass; "the unlearned" [idiota] = the minister who answers "Amen" for the illiterate church [with the Greek], so the vernacularists cannot use these fathers to overturn the ancient tradition; the Church keeps the apostolic languages for reverence and against profanation; see Eck; then whether souls are blessed before judgment day — Chrysostom, hom. 39 on 1 Cor. & hom. 28 on Hebrews, seems to fall into the Armenian/Anabaptist error that the saints' souls do not yet enjoy heavenly beatitude but wait, crowned all together at the end, in Abraham's bosom). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CCLXIII, from the catchword "ratio-":)

—prayer, able to profit the hearers; then he who prays has fruit, in that those who take utility are rendered better."

Chrysostom, [in] the thirty-fifth homily on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, writes [things] consonant with Basil, saying: "BY 'the UNLEARNED [idiota]' he calls the promiscuous [common] people, and shows [that] it is no light inconvenience, if [one] cannot say 'Amen.' But [that] which he says is of this kind: If thou give thanks in a foreign tongue, which thou thyself neither understandest, nor interpretest to the rest — the plebeian [common man] cannot subjoin 'Amen': and, hearing that 'unto the ages of ages,' which is the end of the prayers, he will not say 'Amen.'"

Theophylact, in the commentaries, repeats these same words of Chrysostom.

THOSE who maintain that the sacred masses, psalms, hymns, and other prayers are to be recited in the churches in the vernacular tongue of each nation — that they may be understood by the whole multitude of the people — are wont to use these authorities. To whom it must be answered [that] Basil speaks not of those who recite psalms, or prayers, or masses in the temple [church], but of those who, in the church, hold [give] orations to the people, and make words concerning sacred matters. For this, with him, is "to pray": [namely] also "to speak to the assembly." So also Chrysostom, by that [one] whom Paul calls "the unlearned," understands not the promiscuous [common] people, as the Latin interpreter [translator] renders [it], but the ecclesiastical minister, who supplies the place of the unlearned [and] not-understanding [people], and answers "Amen" for the whole church of the illiterate. This [minister] Chrysostom calls "layman" — that is, "of the people," or "plebeian" — saying: Ἰδιώτην ἢ ... Λαϊκὸν λέγει ["He says 'unlearned,' or rather 'layman'"]. Since, therefore, from the opinions of these authors it cannot be gathered that the sacred liturgies, and the other divine praises, are to be pronounced in the peculiar [particular] speech of each nation, [those] are justly to be condemned who, on the authority of those [fathers], endeavor to overturn and abrogate the most ancient tradition of the Church — not only received by long custom, but also confirmed by prudent reason. For it seemed [good] to the pastors of the Church, that the offices of the masses and of the divine praises be celebrated especially in those languages in which they were first published by their authors — namely, by the holy Apostles, and their disciples and successors — both on account of the exceptional observance [reverence] which is owed to them, and on account of the greater veneration of the sacred mysteries: lest profane and impure men be able, in the marketplace and at the crossroads, to deride the oracles of the divine scripture and the mystical words of the sacraments — [things] worthy of all reverence and silence — and to turn [them] into mockery. But if anyone, not content enough with these, should desire to know still other causes of this matter, John Eck [Ecckius] is to be read by him, [in] title 37 of the Commonplaces.

Annotation CCLXIIII [contents]

"If in this life only we are hoping in Christ, we are more miserable than all men." — 1 Corinthians 15[:19]

[margin: Whether souls are blessed before the day of judgment.]

Chrysostom, [in] the 39th homily on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, seems to slip into the error of the Armenians and the Anabaptists — who say that no soul, before the day of judgment, will be blessed with that felicity of beatitude which is placed in the intuition [vision] of the divine essence. For there, weighing the inference,

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLXIIII:)

—the ratiocination proposed by the Apostle, he says that it takes its force from this: that it is necessary that the soul, as long as it has been separated from the body, remain outside the felicity of heavenly glory. His opinion, expressed word for word, is this: "WHAT sayest thou, [O] Paul? Would trust [confidence] alone survive, if the body be not raised up? Or would the mind not survive? It would: and [would be] immortal indeed. But although it be six-hundred-times [thoroughly] immortal, as indeed it is: yet without the flesh itself it will not enjoy those admirable goods, even as neither will it be punished with punishments. For all things shall be made manifest before the tribunal of Christ, Paul says, that each one may bear [receive that] which he has done through the body, whether good or evil. For if the body rise not, our soul will lie uncrowned, and will be outside the heavenly beatitude. Which indeed, if we concede [it], we shall then enjoy nothing at all there."

THIS opinion the same author delineates, with a longer compass of words and examples adduced, [in] homily 28 on the epistle to the Hebrews. Where, when he unfolded that clause from the eleventh chapter — [margin: Hebrews 11.g] "These received not the reward [promise], lest without us they should be consummated [perfected]," etc. — he brought forth these [things]: "'NOT YET,' says the Apostle, 'have they received the reward, but they still remain; and, thus dead, and in so great tribulation, they have not yet received the reward. So much time have they, since they conquered; and yet they have not received [it]. But you, set in the contest, are affected with grief. Understand, you also, of what kind and how great [a thing] it is [for] Abraham to sit, and to await the Apostle Paul — until thou too art consummated, that they may then be able to receive the reward. For unless we too have come thither, the Savior foretold to them that he would not give the reward. As a good father, a lover of [his] children, says to [his] upright and genuine children, who are finishing [their] work, that he will not give [them] to eat, unless the other brethren too have come. But art thou anxious, because thou dost not yet receive the reward? What, then, shall Abel do, who conquered before us, and yet sits without a crown? What Noah? what the rest of those times, who await thee and the others who are to be after thee? Seest thou that in this we surpass them? For concerning us, Paul says, God provided better, lest they should seem to have anything more than us, if they were crowned first, before us. He defined one time of all the crowns: and he who conquered so many years before, shall receive the crown together with thee. Dost thou contemplate the divine care and love? He did not say, "Lest without us they should be crowned," but, "Lest without us they should be consummated." They forestalled these [later ones] in the contests; but they shall not forestall [them] in the crowns. Nor did God on that account do them injury, but honored us: for the brethren themselves also gladly await us. For if we are all one body, the more is the joy of the body made from this — when it is crowned together and in common, and not by parts [piecemeal]. For indeed the just are, even in this, admirable: that, as over [their] own goods, so they rejoice also over the goods of [their] brethren. Wherefore also in them this proceeds according to [their] wish: that they be crowned with [their] brethren. For to be glorified together is a great joy,'" etc.

THESE [things] Chrysostom [says] concerning the state of the holy souls without the body. But concerning the place in which those souls, not yet crowned, are detained, the same [Chrysostom], in the commentaries on Paul, seems to indicate that this is the

[signature "Yy 3"; catchword "sinum" → "bosom [of Abraham]," continues on p. 542 (PDF 547).]

(printed p. 542 [PDF p. 547], verso — end of Ann. CCLXIIII, then Ann. CCLXV, on 1 Corinthians 15 (Chrysostom's texts placing the saints' souls in the "bosom of Abraham" / holy vestibule until the general resurrection — abused by Cornelius Agrippa [Anabaptist] to deny the beatific vision before judgment day, but Sixtus answers with the other Chrysostom texts [Wisdom 5, Antioch 69, Rom. 16 & 32, Phil. 4, the homily on the cross and the Good Thief] showing the saints see God "face to face" at once — the reconciliation deferred to Ann. 345; then whether all men are to die — Chrysostom, hom. 42, reads the Greek variant "we shall not all sleep, but all be changed," joined by a catena of Greek fathers). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CCLXIIII, from the catchword "sinum":)

—[of Abraham's] bosom. Since indeed [in] the seventh homily upon that [text] from the fifth chapter to the Hebrews, "Let us therefore draw near with confidence," etc., he thus declares: "LET no one now despair of himself. Then will be the time of despair, when the bridal-chamber has been closed, when the King has entered to see those reclining [at table], when they have come to the bosom of Abraham who have been made worthy of it. But now the contest still remains, still the palm hangs [in the balance]." And [in] the thirty-third homily to the people of Antioch, he says: "ALMSGIVING does not permit us to fall down thither, where that rich man [is], nor to hear those dreadful words; but leads us down into the bosom of Abraham." And [in] homily 53 on Matthew: "MERCY," he says, "does not suffer us to be thrust down thither, where that rich man is tormented; but leads [us], by a sure road, into the bosom of Abraham." And [in] the fortieth homily on Genesis: "HEAR," he says, "that all the just, from that time of Abraham until now, and until the consummation of Abraham himself, do the work of prayer, that they may meet [Abraham] in the bosom of the patriarch." Nay, in others of his sermons he is wont sometimes to call the same place τῶν ἱερῶν προθύρων [tôn hierôn prothýrōn] — that is, "the holy vestibule," or "the vestibules of the saints" — this appellation being taken, as the Greeks believe, from the occasion of this: that souls tarry there after the likeness of those who, before the doors of princes, in the vestibules of the palaces, wait to be admitted into the inner [parts] of the palaces, to the sight of the prince. Whence also [in] homily 24 on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians he thus pronounces: "IF we migrate hence fortified by the sacrifice of the Eucharist, we shall ascend the holy vestibule with the greatest confidence, as [if] covered on every side with golden garments."

BY these testimonies of Chrysostom, Cornelius Agrippa, a follower of the Anabaptists, [in] the third book On the Occult Philosophy, endeavors to build up [the notion] that the pious souls of the dead lack the vision of the Godhead until the day of judgment. Which [notion], how far it stands off from the mind of Chrysostom, the subjoined passages of the same holy man testify — which most openly proclaim that the souls of the saints, immediately when they have migrated from this life, obtain the glory of the divine sight [conspectus].

[In] the homily upon that [text of] the fifth [chapter] of Wisdom, "The souls of the just are in the hand of God," etc.: "THE JUST," he says, "translated into another life, are blessed — because they have gone to Christ, and nearer to the King, not by [an act of] approach and by faith, but face to face." And [in] the 69th homily to the people of Antioch: "THE JUST," he says, "when they have migrated hence, are altogether happy: for they have passed over to Christ. There they are with the King; and there [they are] more, and more nearly [present], not through an entering-in, not through faith, but face to face." [In] homily 16 on the epistle to the Romans: "DEATH," he says, "does not separate us from Christ, but rather joins [us] to that choir which is with Christ, and makes [us] obtain that glory." And [in] homily 32 on the epistle to the Romans: "LET US hear the voice of Paul: that, after we have departed hence, we may merit to see this athlete. For there we shall altogether see him — though not standing near [him]: yet we shall see [him] near to the resplendent royal throne, where the Cherubim glorify God, where the Seraphim fly: there we shall see Paul, existing in the choir of the saints; and we shall enjoy there a genuine love." [margin: Philippians 1.] [In] the fourth homily to the Philippians upon that [text], "What I should choose I know not," etc., he writes thus: "WHAT sayest thou, [O] Paul? When, departing hence, [thou art] about to migrate into —heaven itself, and to be with Christ, art thou ignorant what thou oughtest to choose?" And [in] the homily on the cross and the thief he speaks in this manner: "PARADISE, closed to us for five thousand years and more, Christ this day laid open, and led the Thief into paradise, and showed the pleasant places of it; and at one time we have seen two benefits granted — one, that paradise was laid open; the other, that the Thief merited to be led into it. This present day has restored to us [our] ancient fatherland, has shown [us our] paternal city, has given back [our] former home." And, lest thou think Chrysostom to be speaking of the earthly paradise, he added these [things] after some [others]: "IT was no injury to Christ, entering [his] sacred fatherland, to make the Thief a partaker of his entrance: for he led him along with himself — not defiling paradise by the treading feet of the thief, but conferring honor on paradise. For when he led in publicans and fornicators to the kingdom of the heavens, he did not defame the kingdom of the heavens; but rather amplified [it] with [greater] honors — showing that such a one is the Lord of the kingdom of the heavens, who has made even unworthy persons to be so far bettered, that they merited even the glory of that dignity." And a little below he adds: "THOU hast seen the thief, and the thief: both of a thievish life; but a like outcome does not rule over [befall] them: the one merited, by hereditary right, the beatitude of heaven; the other was being sent to gehenna, and to punishment."

(right column — concluding Annotation CCLXIIII, then Ann. CCLXV:)

THE interpretation of the passages of Chrysostom which disagree [dissent] from these last passages, seek below, [in] Annotation 345 — where thou hast a catalog of the authors who, on this article, have brought forth ambiguous [conflicting] opinions.

Annotation CCLXV [contents]

"We shall all indeed rise, but we shall not all be changed." — 1 Corinthians 15[:51]

[margin: Whether all men are to die.]

Chrysostom, [in] homily 42 on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, reads this passage in an almost contrary sense, in this manner: πάντες μὲν οὐ κοιμηθησόμεθα, πάντες δὰ ἐλλαγησόμεθα — that is, "We shall not all indeed sleep [die], but we shall all be changed." Which sentence he so expounds, that he asserts [that] not all are to die, writing these [things]: "WE shall not all die, yet we shall all be changed — even those who do not die: for although [they are] mortal. Lest, therefore, if it happen [thee] to die," he says, "thou be terrified on that account, as [one who is] not going to rise again: for there are certain [men], there are [those] who will even escape this [dying]: for whom, however, this will not suffice unto that resurrection, but it will nonetheless be needful that those bodies, [though] not yet dead, be also changed, and attain incorruptibility."

Theodore, bishop of Heraclea, in the little commentaries on the Apostle, applies the same exposition in this place.

Diodore, bishop of Tarsus, in the explanation of this epistle, has the same.

Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea, in the commentaries on the Apostle, explains [it] in the same manner.

Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, has this same [thing].

Theophylact, bishop of Bulgaria, [has] the same.

[catchword "OECV-" (Oecumenius) → continues on p. 543 (PDF 548).]

(printed p. 543 [PDF p. 548], recto — end of Ann. CCLXV, then Ann. CCLXVI, on 1 Corinthians 15:51 (Oecumenius; the contrary "we shall all sleep, but not all be changed" [Vulgate] reading — Origen, Acacius of Caesarea, Didymus, Ambrosiaster, Augustine City of God 20.20, Ambrose of Compsa; both readings ruled catholic, Jerome leaving the choice to the reader; then whether the writings of heretics may be read — Jerome's defense ["test all, hold the good"; the money-changer], the heretics' [Oecolampadius's] appeal to Jerome, Theophilus of Alexandria [Socrates, HE], and Dionysius of Alexandria, and Sixtus's reply: never absolutely forbidden, only without a superior's leave — especially for the unlearned — the 4th Council of Carthage canon 17 permitting learned faithful bishops). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCLXV, from the catchword "OECV-":)

Oecumenius, in the Collectanea of explanations on Paul, writes similarly.

On the contrary, there are other ancient commentators who read this sentence of Paul thus: πάντες μὲν κοιμηθησόμεθα, ἀλλὰ οὐκ πάντες ἀλλαγησόμεθα — that is, "We shall all indeed sleep [die], but not all shall be changed." Which reading, indeed, differs little from the scripture of the Vulgate of our edition — nay, renders the same sense; because, if all shall sleep, all also shall rise. But those who, according to this reading, assert that all are to die, and afterward to rise again, are these, namely:

Origen, in the third volume [book] on Paul's epistle to the Thessalonians, expounding that [text], "We who are alive, and who remain."

Acacius, bishop of Caesarea, in book 4 of the Select Questions.

Didymus of Alexandria, in the commentary on the first epistle to the Corinthians.

Ambrose, bishop of Milan [Ambrosiaster], in the same place.

Augustine, On the City of God, book twenty, chapter 20.

Ambrose of Compsa, in the commentary on the present epistle, writes that Chrysostom — deceived by a false reading, since he had not exactly considered the matter — adhered to the former opinion, which he [Ambrose] says is both false and dangerous, and can be upheld only perversely. But, among the Greeks, Oecumenius, and among the Latins the author of the book On Ecclesiastical Dogmas [Gennadius], and Augustine, [in] the third question to Dulcitius, pronounce [that] those are equally catholic who follow either that reading and opinion or this. Jerome, in the epistle to Minervius and Alexander, sets [it] in the arbitrament [choice] of the reader, that he choose of these [readings] whichever he himself shall prefer.

Annotation CCLXVI [contents]

"We shall all indeed rise, but we shall not all be changed." — 1 Corinthians 15[:51]
[margin: Whether the writings of heretics are to be read.]

Jerome, in the epistle to Minervius and Alexander, when he had brought forward several expositions of the ancients for the explanation of this clause, at last, excusing himself — because in these he had enumerated even the opinions of heretics, and had read their condemned writings — added these [things]: "IF anyone murmurs [complains], why I read the explanations of those with whose dogmas I do not acquiesce; let him know that I gladly hear that [word] of the Apostle, [margin: 1 Thess. 5.d (printed "2 Thess.")] 'Test all things: [that] which is good, retain'; and the words of the Savior, saying, 'Be ye approved money-changers' — so that if any coin is adulterate, and has not the [right] figure, nor is stamped with the public mint, it be rejected; but [that coin] which bears the face of Christ with a clear light, be laid up in the purse of our heart. [margin: Matthew 22.b] I profess, both in adolescence and in extreme [old] age, that both Eusebius and Origen were most learned men, but erred in the truth of [their] dogmas: which we can say also of Theodore, Acacius, and Apollinaris: and yet all left us a monument of their sweat [toil] in the explanations of the scriptures. In the earth gold is sought, and from the beds of rivers the shining gravel is brought forth. And Pactolus [the golden river] is richer in mire than in stream. Why do my friends tear me; and against [me who am] silent do the coarse swine grunt? My purpose is to read the ancients, to test each thing, to retain the [things] which are good, and not to depart from the faith of the catholic Church."

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLXVI:)

FROM these words of Jerome, Oecolampadius, and very many other heretics of our times, gather that the reading of the volumes of heretics was unjustly forbidden by the Roman pontiffs, against the judgment of many most grave fathers, who held that the lucubrations [writings] of heretics are to be read — both for the understanding of the scriptures, and on account of the varied erudition of many matters which is not had among the catholics. And among other fathers they bring forward Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria; who, although in the synod of the Hebdomon, together with the other bishops who were present, he had damned all the volumes of Origen, and, by writings also published, had publicly confuted [them]: yet never left off the reading of them. And when he was asked by [his] friends why he again embraced those books which he had before rejected, Socrates, in [his] book of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 17, relates that he answered in this manner: "The books of Origen are like a meadow adorned with flowers of every kind. And so, if I find anything good in them, I excerpt it: but if anything thorny appear, this I pass over as [something] prickly."

To this testimony of Theophilus they add the authority of Dionysius the martyr, and bishop of the same church [Alexandria]; who, long before him, concerning the reading of heretics' books, had written thus, word for word, in an epistle to Philemon, a Roman presbyter: "BUT I, indeed, have read even the commentaries and traditions of heretics — defiling my mind, for a little [while], with their most impure thoughts; yet taking thence this [much] of utility, that I may refute them before my own [judgment], and abominate [them] much more. And when I was forbidden by a certain brother presbyter, who feared lest I should be wrapped up in the mire of the malice of those writings, whence my soul might perish — [and] who, as I perceived, spoke truly: a certain vision was divinely offered to me, which strengthened me; and a discourse [word] made to me plainly commanded, saying: 'Read all things which come into thy hands. For thou shalt be able to weigh and to prove all things. And hence there was given to thee, at the beginning, an occasion [of confirming thy] faith.' I accepted this vision as conformable to the Apostolic voice, saying to the [more] powerful, 'Be ye approved dispensers.'" These, then, are the [things] which are brought forward by Oecolampadius for the defense of the reading of heretics.

TO WHICH we answer, that it was neither by the Roman pontiffs, nor ever by any synod, altogether and utterly forbidden, that the writings of heretics be read; but [only forbidden] that they be read without the concession [permission] of superiors — but especially by the unlearned, who could easily be deceived by their reading, and even by the learned, whom no necessity of reading of this kind pressed. For the Fourth Council of Carthage, [in] canon 17, grants to bishops conspicuous for erudition and faith the reading of heretics' volumes — that they may the more easily recognize their snares, and more forcibly confute [them].

Wherefore all — whether unlearned or learned — sin most gravely, who, without the knowledge and authority of superiors, read the books rejected by the Church, but especially [those] led to it by no necessity. Nor do the sayings and examples of Dionysius, Theophilus, and Jerome in any way excuse them, since on both sides the case between those [fathers] and these [heretics] is far unequal. For those were men everywhere learned, and most constant in the sincerity of the faith. Today Chri-

[catchword "Chri-" (Christiani) → continues on p. 544 (PDF 549).]

(printed p. 544 [PDF p. 549], verso — end of Ann. CCLXVI, then Ann. CCLXVII, on 1 Corinthians 15–16 (Sixtus concludes the "reading heretics" question — today's Christians are mostly unlearned and easily misled, unlike the early Church which read heretics from necessity; now we have abundant orthodox commentaries, and Trent forbids all heretical writings under anathema [the Index]; then whether the living or the dead may be anathematized — Chrysostom's homily On the Anathema seems to forbid anathematizing anyone, even heretics, but Sixtus reconciles it: Chrysostom aimed it at rash unlearned laymen who anathematize what they don't understand, not at the Church's lawful anathema — and answers the heretics' two-horned dilemma against excommunication). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCLXVI, from the catchword "Chri-":)

—the common crowd of Christians is, for the greater part, unlearned, and is turned about by every wind of new doctrine. Those [ancients], since they were not far distant from the beginning of the nascent Church and from the Apostolic school, were compelled — on account of the scarcity of catholic interpreters — to consult the commentaries of heretics, that thence they might draw explanations of many parts of the divine scripture which the orthodox doctors had either not yet attempted, or not yet touched happily [successfully] enough. But we, since we abound with so many innumerable pious and most learned commentaries of ancient and recent doctors, and in these have all and each of the parts of both testaments explained far more truly, more learnedly, and more elegantly than in the books of heretics — of what pardon shall we be worthy, if, the purest fountains of doctrine being left, we search after the marshy and deadly waters of the heretics? Those [ancients], in fine, were kept back from the reading of heretics' volumes by no sanction of a general synod: [but] we, by the authority of many councils, and lastly by the decree of the ecumenical Synod of Trent, under the animadversion [penalty] of anathema, are commanded to abstain altogether from all heretical writings. See some [things] which pertain to this argument, [in] book 2, under the entry [dictio] "Curious Arts," and under the entry "Sennacherib," and [in] book 4, under "Julian, bishop of Eclanum."

Annotation CCLXVII [contents]

"If any love not our Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema." — 1 Corinthians 16[:22]
[margin: Whether it is lawful to strike either the living or the dead with anathema.]

Chrysostom, in the homily which is inscribed On the Anathema, on the occasion of this sentence, seems to assert, and by a long discourse to demonstrate, that neither the living nor the dead are to be struck with anathema, even if they have been heretics. His words are these: "THE APOSTLES were exceedingly diligent in refuting and casting out heresies, but in applying this penalty of anathema to none of the heretics. Moreover, the Apostle brings forth this word in two places only, as [it were] compelled, nor even does he aim it at a certain and determinate person. For to the Corinthians he writes, 'If any love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema.' [margin: Galatians 1.b] And, 'If anyone shall have evangelized to you beside that which you received, let him be anathema.' Why, therefore, dost thou dare to do [that] which none of those who received the power dared either to do or to declare — [thou], plainly an adversary of the Lord's death, and forestalling the judgment of the King?" And below: "'HE has been made a heretic,' they say, 'he has an indwelling devil, [margin: 2 Tim. 2.d] he speaks injustice against God, he leads away many into the deep of perdition by the efficacious persuasion and deception of his eloquence.' Surely Paul, refuting these [men], says, 'Teach in mildness, instructing those who resist; if perhaps God may give them repentance to acknowledge the truth, that they may recover [themselves] from the snares of the devil, [by whom they are] held captive at his will.' Extend the net of charity, that the halting [one] be not subverted, but rather be healed." And below: "HE whom thou hast decreed to anathematize either lives, and still survives in this mortal life, or is dead. But if he still survives, thou actest impiously, who cruelly cuttest off him who can turn himself from evil to good; if he is dead, thou art much more cruel. Why so? Because he stands or falls to his own Lord, being no longer under human right." And after a few [words]: "FOR this cause I beseech you, lest these words fall away —from your mind. For it behooves [us] to refute and anathematize the dogmas — [those] which have proceeded from heretics: but men are to be spared, and prayer [is to be made] for their salvation."

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLXVII:)

THESE sayings of Chrysostom seem to fight against the power of the apostolic Church, which by the authority of Christ inflicts the penalty of excommunication not only on the living, but sometimes even on the deceased — especially heretics: concerning whose excommunication after death there is extant a determination of the fifth Synod of Constantinople, in the pontifical decrees, causa 24, question 2, the last chapter. Moreover, since in so many places Chrysostom defends the authority of ecclesiastical excommunication, it is not probable that, [his] sentence being changed, he willed to condemn it in this place. But this is rather to be believed: that he brought forth this homily against certain rash and unlearned [men], who — although they were neither pastors of the Church, nor had any power of excommunicating — yet, led by hatred and contention, rashly damned dogmas not understood by them, together with their authors, and marked [them] with anathema. This the very words of Chrysostom sufficiently openly indicate, [margin: See Chrysostom, hom. 5 on Timothy, hom. 15 on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, and hom. 4 on Hebrews.] being in this manner: "BEHOLD, I watch men who hold no genuine sense from the sacred letters — nay, nothing at all of the sacred letters; and, to pass over most [things], I do not blush to call [them] furious, trifling, contentious, who neither know [the things] which they say, nor [the things] concerning which they affirm — bold in this one [thing] only, that they set up dogmas, and declare anathema on those [things] which they most ignore. Hence it is that we are a mockery to outsiders, and to the enemies of our faith." And below: "HO! who [art] thou of such authority, who usurpest to thyself so great a power of anathematizing? Why dost thou assume so great a dignity, which was communicated to the Apostles only, and to those who are fit successors of them?" etc.

BUT there still remains that dilemma of Chrysostom, which the heretics of our times object against the ecclesiastical discipline of anathema: namely, Either he whom thou anathematizest lives, or has died: if he lives, thou actest impiously, who cuttest off from the body of the Church him who can be converted: but if he has died, thou art much more cruel, who strivest to inflict a penalty upon him who is not under human right. To the former part of the dilemma, therefore, it must be answered that Chrysostom, by that saying, condemns not the penalty of anathema, by which the Church coerces the living, but the impious mind of those who perverted the pious and ecclesiastical end of anathema. For since the Church uses excommunication with a certain pious affection, as [with] a salutary medicine — that he who is marked with that ignominy may acknowledge his fault, and, [as] a suppliant, return to the Church whence he had been cast out — those cruel men anathematized the living to this end: that they might cast them out of the Church irrevocably, [as] not to be received unto repentance any further. Rightly, therefore, Chrysostom, refuting cruelty of this kind, says, "Thou actest impiously, who cruelly cuttest off him who can turn himself from evil to good."

TO the other part of the dilemma it is answered similarly: that Chrysostom refutes those same impious and unlearned [men], because they anathematized the dead, with a sense and intention plainly diverse from the ecclesiastical tradi-

[catchword "tione" (traditione) → "tradition," continues on p. 545 (PDF 550).]

(printed p. 545 [PDF p. 550], recto — end of Ann. CCLXVII, then Ann. CCLXVIII, and the head of CCLXIX, on 2 Corinthians 8 & Galatians 1 (the anathema of dead heretics only declares them already-excommunicate, denying burial to deter the living; then whether the Eucharist must be given under both species to the laity — Chrysostom hom. 18 on 2 Cor., Calvin, Jerome on Malachi, and Gelasius's Comperimus*, all abused by the Lutherans; Sixtus's threefold distinction and the condemnations — Basel sess. 30, Constance sess. 13, and Trent sess. 21 canons 1–3 [full text]; then whether Peter was superior in dignity to Paul — Jerome on Galatians). Read order: left column, then right.)*

(left column — concluding Annotation CCLXVII, from the catchword "tione":)

—[from the ecclesiastical] tradition. Since indeed the pastors of the Church, when they pronounce anathemas upon those who have departed from this life in heresy, do not act [as] if they then for the first time willed to excommunicate, and to exclude the souls of heretics from the communion of the faithful souls resting in Christ. For those [souls], already before — both when they lived in [their] bodies, and when they migrated from [their] bodies — had been bound by the same bond of anathema by which the Church of God has bound all heretics; and immediately, when they went out from the body, they were delivered into the kingdom and power of the devil. When, therefore, the pastors of the Church anathematize heretics after death, they do not then for the first time excommunicate their souls, but — because they migrated in the pertinacity of error — pronounce them already excommunicated, and excluded from the assembly of the faithful souls; and their corpses and ashes, for the more evident demonstration of that matter, they keep far from ecclesiastical burial — not that they may harm those who have died, but that, by that aspect of demonstration, they may deter the living from heresies. This ecclesiastical rite of anathematizing the dead, therefore, Chrysostom does not disapprove; but he accuses those unskilled and raging [men], who — as [if] they had a right even over the dead — thought that by their anathemas they dislodged the souls of the deceased from the place of rest and the state of salvation, and cast [them] down into the place of eternal damnation. Restraining the insane fury of these, Chrysostom says that they are the crudest of all, because they desired to exercise savagery even upon those who were not under human right.

Annotation CCLXVIII [contents]

"Show ye, therefore, the demonstration which is of your charity." — 2 Corinthians 8[:24]
[margin: Whether it is necessary to exhibit the Eucharist under both species to the laity.]

Chrysostom, [in] homily 18 on the second [epistle] to the Corinthians, seems to indicate that the Eucharist is to be exhibited to the laity under both species of bread and wine, saying thus: "BUT there is [a case] where the priest differs in nothing from the subject [layman] — as when the dreadful mysteries are to be enjoyed: for similarly all of us are deemed worthy to receive those [mysteries], not as in the old law, where the priest indeed ate part, but the people [another] part, and it was not lawful for the people to be partaker of those [things] of which the priest was partaker: but now [it is] not so; rather, one body is set before all, and one cup." John Calvin, [in] chapter 18 of his Institutes, strives to build up, by this sentence of Chrysostom, the dogma of the recent Greeks and Lutherans, who assert that the Eucharist under both species is necessarily to be delivered to all Christians. He confirms this also by a saying of Jerome: who, in the commentary on Malachi, chapter 2, says: "PRIESTS, who confect the Eucharist, and distribute the blood of the Lord to the people." To these he adds a decree of Pope Gelasius, which in the decrees of the pontiffs, distinction 2, chapter "Comperimus," is adduced in these words: "WE HAVE FOUND [Comperimus], that certain [persons], having taken only a portion of the sacred body, abstain from the chalice; who, without doubt (since they seem bound by I know not what superstition), let them either receive the whole [entire] sacraments, or be kept from the whole. For the division of this mystery is not admitted without grave sacrilege," etc. These, then, are the fathers of the Church whom Calvin has brought forward for the approval of a condemned dogma: who, although at first sight they seem to favor the recent —Greeks and the heretics of the new Lutheran sect, yet differ from both by a threefold distinction. For, first, [that] which Gelasius and very many other pontiffs enjoined — [namely] the taking of both portions of the sacrament — upon priests only, these [heretics] will [have] to be commanded to the laity also: [though] the title of his decree, in which priests only are comprehended, resists [this]; and some historians contradict [it], among whom Philip, author of the Supplement of the Chronicle, relates a sanction passed by Gelasius, by which it was provided that priests should neither consecrate the Eucharist under one species only, nor distribute [it] to the people under both species. Secondly, [that] which Chrysostom, Jerome, and certain other pastors of the churches conceded to the people out of indulgence and benign dispensation, these [heretics] have turned into a precept and obligation. Thirdly, [that] which those [fathers] either permitted or conceded before the Church had determined otherwise concerning that matter, these [heretics] — even after synodal and ecumenical prohibitions — so make necessary, that they define and decree, from God's precept and from necessity of salvation, that both species of the Eucharist are to be taken by all the faithful, and that they sin gravely who take one without the other. Wherefore these heretics were rightly condemned by the Council of Basel, session 30; the Council of Constance, session 13; and lately by the Council of Trent, session 21, canon first, second, and third, in these words:

(right column — concluding Annotation CCLXVIII, then Ann. CCLXIX:)

1. "If anyone shall say that, from God's precept, or [from] necessity of salvation, all and each of the faithful of Christ ought to take both species of the most holy sacrament of the Eucharist: let him be anathema.

2. "If anyone shall say that the holy catholic Church was not led by just causes and reasons that the laity, and also the clerics not confecting [the sacrament], should communicate under the species of bread only, or [shall say] that she erred in it: let him be anathema.

3. "If anyone shall deny that the whole and entire Christ, the fountain and author of all graces, is taken under the one species of bread — because (as indeed they falsely assert) [Christ] is not, according to his own institution, taken under both species: let him be anathema."

Annotation CCLXIX [contents]

"Paul, an Apostle, not from men, neither through man," etc. — Galatians 1[:1]
[margin: Whether Peter was superior in dignity to Paul and the rest of the apostles.]

Jerome, beginning the commencement of the commentaries on the epistle to the Galatians from the exposition of this title [heading], seems to hold that Peter was not superior to Paul in authority and dignity, writing thus: "IT can be taken obliquely against Peter and against the rest, that the gospel was handed to him [Paul] not by the Apostles, but by Jesus Christ himself, who had chosen both them and the Apostles. And all this he prepares for this [reason], that no one may be able to object to him — [as he is] disputing, against the burdens of the law, for the grace of the gospel — 'But Peter said this, but the Apostles established this, but thy predecessors decreed otherwise.' Which indeed, now preluding in what follows as [it were] by a hidden discourse, he makes more manifest, when he reckons that nothing was conferred on him by those who seem to be something. And he writes that he resisted Peter himself to the face, saying that he was compelled by no necessity, that he might not yield to the hypocrisy of the Jews." And below, expounding that [text], "The gospel I received not from man,"

[catchword "accepi" → "I received," continues on p. 546 (PDF 551).]

(printed p. 546 [PDF p. 551], verso — end of Ann. CCLXIX, then Ann. CCLXX–CCLXXI, on Galatians 1 (Jerome's texts seeming to equalize Peter with the apostles — the Galatians commentary, pseudo-Jerome, Against Jovinian*, the epistle to Evagrius — abused by Calvin against the papacy vs. the Council of Florence's primacy definition; Sixtus's resolution via a* threefold power in Peter [Order, Apostolate, Kingdom/Rule]: in Order and Apostolate all the apostles/bishops are equal, but in the power of Rule Peter alone is head; then Jerome on election/reprobation from foreseen merits; and Chrysostom on Paul's modesty in going up "to see Peter" as to a greater and elder). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — continuing Annotation CCLXIX, from the catchword "accepi":)

—[I received], nor did I learn [it]," etc. — the same he repeats, saying: "IT CAN, moreover — as we said in the beginning, when we were expounding, 'Paul, an Apostle, not from men' — so also in the present place, be taken obliquely against Peter, and against the rest [who are] his predecessors, [namely] that he is moved by the authority of no one as [by] a law, [he] who has Christ alone [as] the preceptor of [his] gospel." Likewise, in other commentaries inscribed with his name, upon that [text] from chapter 2, "For he who wrought in Peter unto the apostleship," etc., speaking under the person of Paul, he says: "I am in nothing inferior to Peter, because we are both, by one God, ordained in [the] ministry." Again, [in] the first book against Jovinian, he seems to indicate that Peter is not greater than the rest of the Apostles, but has power equal with the rest, in these words: "THE CHURCH — although it be founded upon all the Apostles, and all receive the keys of the kingdom of the heavens, and the strength of the Church be established equally upon them — yet, on that account, one is chosen among the twelve, that, a head being constituted, the occasion of schism may be taken away. But why was John not chosen, [who was] a virgin? Deference was made to age [seniority]: because Peter was the elder; lest [one] still an adolescent, and almost a boy, should be preferred to men of advanced age. And the good Master, who ought to have removed the occasion of quarrel from [his] disciples, would seem to furnish a cause of envy against the adolescent [John] whom he had loved." Again, in the epistle to Evagrius, he seems to take away from the successors of Peter the power over other bishops, and to equal any bishop whatever to the Roman pontiff, writing in this manner: "THE Church of the city of Rome is not to be esteemed one [thing], [and] that of the whole world another. And the Gauls, and the Britains, and Africa, and Persia, and the East, and India, and all the barbarous nations, adore one Christ, observe one rule of truth. If authority is sought, the world [orbis] is greater than the city [urbs]. Wheresoever there shall have been a bishop — whether at Rome, or at Gubbio, or at Constantinople, or at Rhegium, or at Alexandria, or at Tanis — he is of the same merit, of the same priesthood. The power of riches, and the humility of poverty, makes [a bishop] either more sublime or lower; but otherwise all are successors of the Apostles." These sayings of Jerome Calvin abuses, and the heretics of our times, against the primacy of Peter, and the primary power of the apostolic see and the Roman Church — the definition of the Ecumenical Council of Florence crying out against [them], whose decree, received by the common consent of all the Latins and Greeks, and promulgated in the last Session, runs thus: "We define that the holy apostolic see, and the Roman pontiff, hold primacy over the whole world; and that the Roman pontiff himself is the successor of blessed Peter, prince of the apostles, and the true vicar of Christ, and head of the whole Church."

BUT if anyone unrolls the writings of Jerome, he will find that he, with a free and constant asseveration, preferred the faith, authority, and sentence of Peter and of his apostolic see to the judgment of all the churches — and that especially in the epistle to Pope Damasus, whose beginning is "Since the East," etc.; in the epistle to Pammachius; in the epistle to Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria; in the invective against Rufinus; and in the dialogue against the Luciferians.

WHEREFORE, lest anyone judge that he wrote [things] fighting among themselves, it must be known that there was a threefold power in Peter — namely, of Order, of Apostolate,

(right column — concluding Annotation CCLXIX, then Ann. CCLXX–CCLXXI:)

—and of the Kingdom [Rule]. If we regard the Apostolate — that is, the office of teaching, and the care of evangelical preaching — Jerome rightly said, in the commentaries on the Galatians, that Paul was not inferior to Peter; because Paul was chosen for the evangelical office not by Peter, but by God, equally as Peter, that he himself might evangelize among the gentiles, as that one [Peter] among the Jews. But if we look to the power which is conferred in the sacrament of Order, Jerome skillfully pronounced, against Jovinian, that all the Apostles equally received the keys and established the foundations of the Church. Most truly also he wrote to Evagrius that all bishops are equal: because all the Apostles were equal in the same order of priesthood, and in the same excellence of the sacrament; and all bishops [are] their successors — whether of Gubbio, or of Tanis, or of any lowlier little town — [and] are equal to the bishop of the city of Rome, namely in the order of the sacrament, and in the spiritual power of that same order. Finally, if the discourse be of the power of the Kingdom [Rule], and of that primary authority over all bishops and churches, Jerome most excellently wrote — against Jovinian, and against the Luciferians, and elsewhere — that Peter alone was chosen among the twelve Apostles, and constituted head of all, that by his supreme authority, and [his] power more eminent than the rest, the contentions of the Church might be settled, and every occasion of schisms taken away. We have annotated [things] akin to this argument further on, [in] Annotation 271.

Primasius, in the Collectanea on the first chapter of the epistle to the Galatians, excerpted from the commentaries ascribed to Jerome this period: "HE who wrought in Peter unto the apostleship, wrought also in me among the gentiles. I am not inferior to him, because we are both, by one [God], ordained unto one ministry." The sense of this clause is plain from [the things] which have been said.

Annotation CCLXX [contents]

"But when it pleased him who separated me," etc. — Galatians 1[:15]
[margin: Election and reprobation from merits.]

Jerome, [in] the book on the epistle to the Galatians, [chapter] 1, upon these words, seems to hold that God neither chooses nor reprobates anyone except from the foreknowledge of merits, saying: "This comes to pass from the foreknowledge of God, that whom he knows [will be] just in the future, he loves before he rises from the womb: and whom he hates [as] a sinner before he sins — not that [there be iniquity] in [his] love," etc. See above, Annotation 251.

Annotation CCLXXI [contents]

"Then, after three years, I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter." — Galatians 1[:18]
[margin: Peter superior to the other apostles.]

Chrysostom, in the commentary on the epistle to the Galatians, explaining this: "WHAT," he says, "could be more modest than the mind of Paul? After so many and such benefits [done], although he had no need of Peter, nor stood in want of him, but was equal [to him] in honor (for I will say nothing more here) — yet he went up as [it were] to a greater and elder [one]; and the sight of Peter alone moved him to set out thither." To the same sentence Chrysostom seems to allude [in] homily 18 on the epistle to the Romans, saying: "FOR neither, if God had been about to repel his people, would he have chosen Paul for himself out of the Israelites — to whom he would grant all preaching, to whom the affairs of the world, all the mysteries, and the universal dispensation." Germa-

[catchword "Germa-nus" (Germanus Brixius) → "Germain [de Brie]," continues on p. 547 (PDF 552).]

(printed p. 547 [PDF p. 552], recto — end of Ann. CCLXXI, then Ann. CCLXXII–CCLXXIIII and the head of CCLXXV, on Galatians 1–2 (Germain de Brie and Erasmus caution against these Chrysostom texts, but Sixtus answers that they concern the honor of apostolate, not primacy [Peter's monarchy in hom. 55 on Matthew]; James the Lord's brother = son of Joseph; Ambrosiaster on the Acts 15 precepts — only three genuine, "things strangled" added by Greek corrupters [Irenaeus 3.12]; then the famous Jerome–Augustine controversy on Galatians 2:11 — whether Peter and Paul only simulated the Antioch dispute: Origen's two opinions and the great catena of Greek/Latin fathers who hold the simulation view, against Augustine, who insists the rebuke was real and even treats Peter harshly). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCLXXI, from the catchword "Germa-nus":)

—Germain de Brie [Germanus Brixius], the interpreter [translator] of Chrysostom's homilies on Paul, and Erasmus, the interpreter of the Chrysostomian commentary on the epistle to the Galatians, admonished [us] that these passages are to be read cautiously — judging, as I think, that from these the supreme power of Peter over all the Apostles is undermined [weakened]. But the very sense of the words, and the occasion, openly prove that Chrysostom here speaks not of the primary authority and jurisdiction of Peter over all the Apostles, and over the whole Church; but of the honor of the apostolate and the dignity of evangelical preaching, in which Paul was in nothing inferior to Peter. For, making mention of Peter's monarchy, [in] the 55th homily on Matthew, he says: "THE pastor and head OF THE CHURCH — which, so many and so great billows breaking in, remains immovable — is a fisherman-man." Hither pertain [the things] which thou hast [in] Annotation 269 of this book.

Annotation CCLXXII [contents]

"But [I saw none of the apostles], except James, the brother of the Lord." — Galatians 1[:19]

Ambrose [Ambrosiaster], in the commentaries on the present chapter, asserts that James the brother of the Lord was the son of Joseph. See above, Annotation 64 of this book.

Annotation CCLXXIII [contents]

"Lest perhaps I should run, or had run, in vain." — Galatians 2[:2]

[margin: On the four precepts of the apostles to those who [are] of the gentiles.]

Ambrose [Ambrosiaster], in the commentaries, under the exposition of this period, touching in passing upon that passage of Acts 15 — where it is read that the Apostles commanded the gentiles to abstain from four [things], namely, from things offered to idols, from fornication, from blood, and from what is strangled — admonishes that by the Apostles there were not prescribed [any] but three, and that the fourth was added by the Greek corrupters of that passage. His words run thus: "IN FINE, these three commands are found [to have been] given by the Apostles and the elders — [things] which the laws of the Romans are ignorant of: that is, that they keep themselves from idolatry, and from blood, as Noah [did], and from fornication. Which [three] the sophists of the Greeks, not understanding — yet knowing that [one] must abstain from blood — adulterated the scripture, adding a fourth command, that [one] must also abstain from what is strangled. Which [addition], I think, they will now, by God's nod, understand [to be superfluous], because it had already been said above [in the third precept, on blood] that which they added." How much is to be attributed to Ambrose in this part, let others see: certainly Irenaeus, [in] the book against heresies, the third, chapter 12, relates this passage, and does not add [any] mention of things strangled.

Annotation CCLXXIIII [contents]

"But when Cephas came to Antioch, I withstood him to his face, because he was reprehensible." — Galatians 2[:11]

[margin: Whether Peter and Paul used simulation, and whether by simulating they sinned.]

Origen, in the commentaries on the epistle to the Galatians, and in the tenth volume of the Stromata, sifting this passage, left two opinions, agitated by [his] successors with a long disputation. The former of these is, that Peter and Paul contended against one another with the greatest concord of mind — not by a true, but by a simulated [feigned] dissension — for the utility of the disciples: that, while Peter, rebuked by Paul's simulated reproof concerning the simulation of the legal [observances], does not contradict, but keeps silent as [if] acknowledging his fault, those who thought the legal [observances] were to be kept might come to their senses, and might cease from the observance —of the legal [observances]. The other opinion is, that neither of them sinned by simulating; because it is lawful — nay, even fitting — to use simulation in many matters, out of a pious zeal of helping. Both opinions of Origen all the below-written fathers follow:

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLXXIIII, then Ann. CCLXXV:)

Theodore, bishop of Heraclea, in the commentary on the epistle to the Galatians. Eusebius, bishop of Emesa, in the commentary on the epistle to the Galatians. Didymus of Alexandria, in the commentary on the epistle to the Galatians. Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea, in the commentary on the epistle to the Galatians. Chrysostom, in the commentary on the epistle to the Galatians, and [in] book 1 On the Priesthood. Jerome, [in] the book on the epistle to the Galatians, [chapter] 1, and in the epistle to Augustine. Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, in the commentary on the epistle to the Galatians. Theophylact, in the commentary on the epistle to the Galatians. John Cassian, [in] book 17 of the Conferences. Oecumenius, in the Collectanea of explanations on the Galatians.

These, then, are they who, in both opinions, agree with Origen.

Augustine, dissenting from these, affirms that Peter was reprehended by Paul not feignedly, but truly and justly — because the simulation, which he [Peter] had assumed as a remedy for his own nation [the Jews], was pressing toward the scandal and ruin of the Gentiles. Concerning this matter, although Augustine wrote learnedly and piously in three epistles to Jerome, and in other places also: yet he seems sometimes to treat Peter more harshly than is fair, hinting that Peter, by a certain superstitious and depraved simulation, willed to impose the legal burdens on the gentiles. For thus he declares in the commentaries on the epistle to the Galatians: "PETER, moreover, when he had come to Antioch, was rebuked by Paul — not because he kept the custom of the Jews, in which he had been born and brought up (although among the gentiles he did not keep it) — but he was rebuked because he willed to impose it on the gentiles." And in the book On the Christian Combat, chapter 30, mixing this simulation of Peter among his grave crimes, he says: "THE Catholic Church ought gladly to pardon her corrected children, because we see that pardon was granted to Peter himself — [Peter] bearing his [own] person — when he wavered in the sea; and when he carnally called the Lord back from the passion; and when he cut off the servant's ear with the sword; and when he thrice denied the Lord himself; and when he afterward lapsed into a superstitious simulation." And below, he says: "THESE the Catholic Church receives in [her] maternal bosom — as Peter, after the weeping of the denial, admonished by the crowing of the cock, or as the same [Peter], after the depraved simulation, corrected by the voice of Paul." I pass over, for the sake of brevity, the reasons and arguments brought forward on both sides by the defenders of either opinion. But whether it is lawful for a good man, for the sake of helping, either to lie or to simulate, thou hast above, [in] Annotation 107 of the fifth book.

Annotation CCLXXV [contents]

"I said to Cephas before all, If thou, being a Jew," etc. — Galatians 2[:14]

[catchword "OECV-" (Oecumenius) → continues on p. 548 (PDF 553).]

(printed p. 548 [PDF p. 553], verso — Ann. CCLXXV and CCLXXVI, on Galatians 2–3 (whether the Cephas rebuked by Paul was Peter the Apostle — Oecumenius, from Eusebius and Clement, says [no, one of the seventy], but Jerome strongly affirms it was Peter and warns against inventing a new Cephas to please Porphyry; then whether witches can bewitch infants [fascination / the evil eye] — Jerome and Virgil on the vulgar belief, Cornelius Agrippa's charge that the witch-inquisitors invented the calumny, and Sixtus's defense of the scholastic account [a natural mode and a demonic mode], with a poem of Vida of Alba on a deadly-gazing old man, and Chrysostom [hom. 8 on Colossians] mocking the superstition while condemning those who flee to enchantresses). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCLXXV, from the catchword "OECV-":)

Oecumenius, in the Collectanea of explanations, in this place writes — from the opinion of Eusebius of Caesarea in the first [book] of the Ecclesiastical History, and of Clement of Alexandria in the fourth volume of the Dispositions [Hypotyposes] — that this Cephas, to whom Paul withstood to the face, was not Peter the Apostle, but some other of the seventy disciples of Christ, who had the same name as the prince of the Apostles. Which opinion Oecumenius approves by this argument: that there was no need for Peter to withdraw himself from the banquet on account of the intervention [coming] of the Jews, since much before he had satisfied all [who were] expostulating [complaining] that he had had commerce [dealings] with the uncircumcised Cornelius — and had so satisfied [them], that they, the matter being known, concordantly gave thanks to God; especially since no mention of this matter is made in the Acts of the Apostles. But this opinion, as invented and frigid, Jerome strongly rejects — since the matter itself teaches that this whole discourse pertains to Peter and his colleagues. And he denies that any Cephas is known to us except the Apostle, who in the language of the Syrians is called Cephas, because with them "Cephas" sounds the same as "Peter" [does] to the Greeks and to us. Then [he says] it is no wonder if Luke omitted this, by whom so many other [things] besides are passed over — as that [thing], that Peter first sat at Antioch, [and] then transferred his see to Rome. Finally, [he says] that Porphyry the sycophant ought not to be of so great [account] to us, that for his sake we should feign a new Cephas: otherwise, if we should try to erase from the scriptures whatever is liable to the calumnies of heretics, many other [things] would have to be erased.

Annotation CCLXXVI [contents]

"O senseless Galatians, who has bewitched you?" — Galatians 3[:1]

[margin: Whether witches [Striges] can bewitch little infants.]

Jerome, [in] the first book on the epistle to the Galatians, applies to this passage such an exposition: "FASCINATION [the evil eye] is said properly to harm infants, and the little age, and those who do not yet fix [their] step with a firm footprint. Whence also a certain one of the Gentiles said: [margin: Virgil, Eclogue 3.] 'I know not what eye bewitches [fascinates] my tender lambs.' Whether this be true or not, God shall see: for it can happen that even demons serve this sin, and turn away from good works whomsoever they have known either to have begun or to have advanced in the work of God. But now this is the point [in question]: that we think the example is taken from the opinion of the common folk — that, as the tender age is said to be harmed by fascination, so also the Galatians, newly born in the faith of Christ, and nourished with milk, were, as [it were] by a certain fascinator [bewitching thing], harmed; and, the stomach of [their] faith nauseating, vomited up the food of the Holy Spirit. But if anyone contradicts [this], let him expound how [the following] are taken from common opinion: [margin: 1 Kings 23 (= 2 Sam. 5).] the 'vale of the Titans' in the books of Kingdoms; the 'Sirens' and 'Onocentaurs' in Isaiah; 'Arcturus,' and 'Orion,' and the 'Pleiades' in Job; etc. — [things] similar to these, which surely have the vocabulary, causes, and origins of the fables of the Gentiles."

Cornelius Agrippa, a heretical man, in the book against the inquisitors of the Lamiae [witches] published by him, seizing occasion from these words to tear the inquisitors of heretical pravity, accuses them, that among other [things] they invented also this kind of calumny —against simple and harmless little women, whom they call Striges [witches] — namely, that these bewitch boys by the obtrusion [presenting] of the face, and corrupt [them] by the gaze of the eyes. Which matter, as he himself says, Jerome, in the commentaries on the epistle to the Galatians, and Chrysostom, in the homilies on the epistle to the Colossians, explode as a fable proceeding from the superstition of the Gentiles. But if anyone sincerely inspects the opinion of the scholastics, he will openly recognize that Cornelius lies iniquitously and impudently: for the scholastics hold that Fascination happens in two modes — that is, by animal [natural] power, and by the maleficence of a demon. And [some] indeed say [it] happens by animal power, when from the eyes of animals certain noxious spirits and malignant exhalations proceed to the things seen. In which manner, surely, the natural philosophers hand down that a bronze mirror is fouled with an almost indelible stain by the gaze of a menstruous woman; and that the air is infected by the diseased and wasting eyes of certain old men; that the flowers of plants are corrupted, and certain delicate little animals are killed by their gaze — even as Jerome [Vida], bishop of Alba, in the second volume of the Bombyces [Silkworms], expressed in these most elegant verses:

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLXXVI:)

Since I remember that I myself, on the high rock of Tuscan Viterbo,

Saw a savage old man, whose dreadful face was rigid,

And [whose] heavy eyes were suffused round about with blood,

And [whose] brow was foul with squalor, and shaggy [hoary] with white hairs on [his] crown.

He, with fierce gaze (so [it is reported]), used to kill every kind —

Of creeping things, [and] slender souls [insects], and small flying [creatures].

Nay, even if ever he entered the gardens, when the new year,

Its cycle completed, had put off [its] ugly old age,

And here and there through the fields the tree had grown white [with blossom],

He gave slaughter to the gardens, and ruin to the trees;

And the mournful farmers wept the fallen hope of the year.

For wheresoever he had directed [his] horrible gaze, there one could See the flowers, suddenly blasted, grow faint [wither].

By this reasoning, therefore, the scholastics judge that infants can be so harmed by the aspect [gaze] of wicked old women, that they gradually waste away and perish. The other mode of bewitching, and worse than the former, is when the same most wicked women make those effluxions emitted from the eyes more pestilent by the imprecation and cooperation of demons, and render [them] more potent for killing. This opinion of the scholastics, therefore, Jerome does not disapprove — nay, he confirms [it], when he says it can happen that demons serve this sin. Nor does Chrysostom dissent from Jerome, [while] mocking fascination [the superstition]; but he condemns those who, in the sicknesses of their infants — the help of Christ, and the remedies of the medical art, being abandoned — flee to enchantress-women: against whom, speaking in the homily cited by Cornelius (it is the eighth on the Colossians), he thus says: "CHRIST is cast out, and a drunken and trifling old woman is brought in; the mystery of the cross is trampled, and the seduction of the devil dances [triumphs]. But why should I mention the other ridiculous [things]? — ashes, salt, soot, and again an old woman brought into the midst? Truly [it is] ridiculous, and a disgrace. 'And some eye,' thou sayest, 'bewitched the boy.' How long [these] Satanic [things]? How will the Greeks not laugh at us — when we tell them that the power of the cross is great, [while] they see us needing those [things] which they themselves deride? Did not God give physicians and medicines?" These [things] Chrysostom [says].

[catchword "ANNOTA-" → continues on p. 549 (PDF 554).]

(printed p. 549 [PDF p. 554], recto — Ann. CCLXXVII and CCLXXVIII, on Galatians 3 (whether Scripture ever says God "cursed" anyone — Luther reproves Jerome, but Ambrose of Compsa clarifies that Jerome only meant the form "cursed by God" never occurs; a possibly-interpolated Jerome period; then whether free will without grace can do good — Augustine [sermon 13, the letter to Hilary of Syracuse, On Predestination*,* On the Spirit and the Letter*], Gregory of Rimini, and Luther's abuse [Compendium art. 36, the Eck disputation]; Sixtus's reply with John Fisher's distinction between* beatifying works [impossible without grace] and ordinary moral works [possible], confirmed by Trent sess. 6 canon 7). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCLXXVII:)

Annotation CCLXXVII [contents]

"Cursed [is] everyone who shall not continue in all [things] which are written in the book of the law." — Galatians 3[:10]

[margin: Whether it is read in the sacred letters that God cursed anyone.] [margins: Genesis 3. Genesis 4. Malachi 2. 2 Kings 2.]

Luther reproves Jerome — [who,] in the commentaries on the epistle to the Galatians, [was] sifting these words — because he so boldly denies that anyone is found in the scriptures [to have been] cursed by God, and [that] the name of God [is] never joined with a cursing: since [Luther] had read in Genesis that God cursed the serpent; and [that] the earth was cursed by God in the work of Adam; and [that] Cain was struck with a divine curse; and [that] God, in Malachi, says, "I will curse your blessings"; and [that] Elisha cursed the boys of Bethel in the name of the Lord. Ambrose, bishop of Compsa, [in] the fifth book against Luther, refuting his calumny, says [that] Jerome did not deny [that] which Martin builds up from the divine letters — namely, that God curses, or has cursed, or [that] holy men uttered a cursing in the name of God: but affirmed only this, that the name of God is nowhere found joined to the verb of cursing. For although in the sacred scriptures we read that God cursed some, and that some [were] cursed by God: yet nowhere is the divine cursing expressed under this form of words, "God cursed this [one]," or, "This [thing] was cursed by God." And that this was the opinion of Jerome, the same Ambrose approves from the same Hieronymian explanation, whose words run thus: "WITH bold foot, therefore, I proceed into this contest, that I appeal to the sacred books, [that] in no place is it written that anyone was cursed by God; and wheresoever a cursing is set down, never is the name of God joined. 'Cursed [art] thou from [above] all beasts,' is said to the serpent; and [to] Adam, 'Cursed [is] the earth in thy works'; and to Cain, 'Cursed [art] thou upon the earth'; and elsewhere, 'Cursed [is] the boy Canaan'; and also, in another place, 'Cursed [is] the fury of them, which [was] bold [audacious].' It would be long, if I should enumerate all the cursings which are written in Leviticus, and in Deuteronomy, and in Joshua [Jesus Nave]: and yet in none of them is the name of God added." These [things] he [Jerome]. There are [those] not lacking who affirm that this period, together with some following lines, is not Jerome's, but passed, by the fault of copyists, from the margin into the context [main text]; to whom I neither say nay nor yea. Read the [things] which are written concerning this passage of Jerome, [in] book 8 of this work, in the confutation of the second heresy.

Annotation CCLXXVIII [contents]

"For if a law had been given which could vivify," etc. — Galatians 3[:21]

[margin: Whether our liberty [free will] without grace can do good.]

Augustine, in the thirteenth sermon on the words of the Apostle, expounding these [words]: "IF the help of the Holy Spirit be utterly lacking," he says, "thou wilt be able to do nothing good: thou dost indeed act — that [help] not aiding — by free will, but ill. Thy will, which is called free, is fit for this; and, by acting ill, it becomes a damnable handmaid." Gregory of Rimini, [in] the second [book] of the Sentences, distinction 26, hence elicits that the mind [meaning] of Augustine is, that without a peculiar [special] help of grace no work morally good according to virtue, and consonant to right reason, can be done

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLXXVIII:)

—from the liberty of human arbitrament. This same [thing] he confirms from his [Augustine's] epistle to Hilary of Syracuse: where it is thus read: "FREE will, therefore, avails, if it be divinely aided — which is done by humbly seeking and doing: but, deserted by the divine help, however much it may excel in any knowledge of the law, it will in no way have the solidity of justice, but the inflation of impious pride, and a pernicious swelling." Likewise in the little book On the Predestination of God, in which it is thus written: "THE FREE will which we have from God flows, by [its] fall, to wickedness; and, since — the help of God deserting [it] — it can [do] nothing apt for [toward] every kind of virtue, it subsists false [counterfeit] in virtue." Martin Luther, in the compendium of his articles, article 36, presses this same sentence more sharply upon Augustine, from the sayings which are had in him [in] the third chapter of the book On the Spirit and the Letter, in these words: "FOR neither does free will avail [for] anything but for sinning, if the way of truth lie hidden: and when [that] which is to be done, and toward which [one] must strive, has begun not to lie hidden — unless it also delight and be loved, it is not done, it is not undertaken, one does not live well." Again, the same Luther, in the disputation against Eck, says: "SAINT Augustine, in the third book against the Pelagians, chapter eight, says: 'Free will, [being] captive, avails not but for sinning; but for justice it avails not, unless divinely freed and helped.'" But far be it that Augustine held this [in the sense] which is imposed on him by Luther. For if — that general influx of divine help being granted, by which God aids every nature — man could [do] nothing at all of good according to moral virtue, it would seem to follow that he, in his works, however evil, never sins. Because, as Augustine says, "To say that anyone is held guilty of sin because he did not do what he could not do, is [a thing] of the highest iniquity, and of insanity." Wherefore the same doctor, in many places, manifestly demonstrates that even the worst men, without justifying grace, can avoid certain sins, and do certain good works — as it is permitted to see [in] the book On the Spirit and the Letter, chapter 28, where he says: "AS certain venial sins — without which this life is not led — do not hinder the just [man] from eternal life: so certain good works — without which the life of any of the worst men is very hardly found — profit the impious [man] nothing unto eternal salvation." John [Fisher], bishop of Rochester, in the book which he published against the Lutheran articles, says that all the passages proposed, and [those] like these, which seem to take away from men not yet justified by grace every faculty of doing good works, are to be understood of beatifying works — that is, [works] worthy of eternal beatitude: which indeed, without gratifying [sanctifying] grace, can in no way be either begun or completed. But concerning all the other moral works, not so [it is otherwise]. For it is in the power of man — even [one] destitute of justifying grace — to perform certain moral goods: as experience itself demonstrates. And this sentence the sacrosanct Synod of Trent seems to confirm, [in] session six, canon seven, in these words: "IF anyone shall say that all works which are done before justification — in whatever way they be done — are truly sins, or merit the hatred of God; or [that] the more vehemently one stri-

[signature "Zz"; catchword "niti-" (nititur) → "strives," continues on p. 550 (PDF 555).]

(printed p. 550 [PDF p. 555], verso — end of Ann. CCLXXVIII, then Ann. CCLXXIX–CCLXXXI and the head of CCLXXXII, on Galatians 4–5 (Trent 6 canon 7; then whether abbots may be called "Fathers" — Jerome on Gal. 4:6 seems to forbid it, but Sixtus thinks that period interpolated, since Jerome on Matthew 4 *plainly allows "father by courtesy"; whether the saints' Old-Testament sins may be allegorized — pseudo-Jerome and Augustine [*Against Faustus 22, on Lot's daughters]: the deed is prophecy in Scripture but a crime in their lives; whether those under grace are impeccable — Augustine's retracted reading of "the spirit lusts against the flesh"; and whether the damned are ever saved — Jerome and Origenism). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCLXXVIII, from the catchword "niti-":)

—strives to dispose himself to grace, the more gravely he sins: let him be anathema." See above, Annotation 40 and 255 of this book.

Annotation CCLXXIX [contents]

"God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father." — Galatians 4[:6]

[margin: Whether it is lawful to call the prefects of monasteries abbots or fathers.]

Jerome, [in] book 2 on the epistle to the Galatians, in the explanation of this comma [clause], is believed to have disapproved the pious custom of the monks, who, for honor's sake, call their prefects Abbots and Fathers. But besides this, he also seems to take away from Christians the right of swearing. For he has in that place words of this kind: "SINCE, moreover, 'Abba, Father' is said in the Hebrew and Syriac tongue, and our Lord in the gospel commands that no one be called father except God: I know not by what license, in the monasteries, we either call others by this name, or acquiesce in being [so] called. And certainly he commanded this, who had said that we must not swear, [namely] if we do not swear; let us not even name any [man] father. If we shall interpret [the matter] of 'father' otherwise, we shall be compelled also to think otherwise concerning swearing." These [things] he [Jerome]. I judge this period was written on the front [top] of the page by some seditious little monk, and thence afterward translated [carried over] into the context [main text] by yawning [careless] copyists. And that I am not deceived, [those things] are argument, which Jerome, with a plainly contrary opinion, and professedly, wrote [in] the fourth book on Matthew, where, inquiring how that command of the Savior is to be understood — "Be not called masters," and "Call no [man] father to you upon the earth," etc. — he thus says: "IT IS ASKED, why, against this precept, the Apostle called himself the Teacher of the Gentiles; or how, in common speech — especially in the monasteries of Palestine and Egypt — they call one another fathers? Which is thus resolved: [that] it is one thing to be a father, or master, by nature; another by indulgence [courtesy]. If we call a man father, we defer honor to age; we do not show [him] the author of our life. Master too is said from consortship with the true Master. And, not to run through infinite [instances]: as one [being] God by nature, and one Son, does not prejudice the rest, [so] that they be [not] called gods and sons by adoption: so also one father, and master, does not prejudice the others, [so] that they be called fathers and masters abusively [in a transferred sense]."

Annotation CCLXXX [contents]

"Which things are said by allegory." — Galatians 4[:24]

[margin: Whether it is lawful to bend the sins of the saints to pious senses.]

The author of the commentaries of Jerome [pseudo-Jerome] on Paul, explaining this, taxes those who distort certain vices of the saints of the Old Testament into pious allegories, and by allegorical reasons defend those sins, to signify that the future mysteries of the Church were permitted in the Old Testament. And he writes thus: "THE APOSTLE gave, in this place, a rule of understanding allegorical reasons — namely, that, the truth of the history remaining, we expound the figures of the Old Testament. And he did this same [thing] there, where some honest deeds of the saints are related: not where sins are noted. But to call offenses [sins] mysteries is to accuse God either of impossibility or of ignorance — [as if] he could not otherwise show his sacraments, or certainly [as if he,] pu-

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLXXX, then Ann. CCLXXXI–CCLXXXII:)

—[nishing], reckoning to himself the sins of certain [men] necessary — let him [rather] first condemn those [sins] generally, but then also, by reproving and vindicating [avenging], let him show that those were not willed to be done for the sake of their mysteries." Augustine judges that the sins of the saints which are recounted in the Old Testament are to be expounded, according to the allegorical law, of the future mysteries of the Church: because in those saints not only virtues, but also vices, contained a figure and prophecy of things to come — yet so [warns he] that, in treating these [allegorically], allegory must be used [in such a way] that we confess the crimes of the saints to have been truly crimes, not committed by God commanding, [margin: Isaiah 51.b] but permitted by God not hindering, unto the signification and premonstration of things to come. By this rule Augustine, [in] book 22 against Faustus, drawing several errata [faults] of the ancient fathers to the figure and prediction of the coming Church, among other [things] also expounded allegorically, in this manner, the incest of the daughters of Lot with their father: "IN Lot, when [his] daughters lay with him, something was figured. For he seems to have borne the person of the future law — which indeed those procreated from it, and placed under the law, by [their] ill understanding in a manner intoxicating [it], and by not using [it] lawfully, bring forth the works of infidelity: yet we do not on that account justify this deed either of Lot himself, or of his daughters. Because it signified something, which would foreannounce the future perversity of certain [men]. For those [daughters] intended one thing, that they might do this: God, who permitted this to be done, [intended] another — that thence also he might demonstrate something — right judgment remaining over the sin of the men then present, and his providence watching for the signification of things to come. Therefore that deed, when it is narrated in holy scripture, is prophecy; but when it is considered in the life of those who committed it, is a crime [flagitium]."

Annotation CCLXXXI [contents]

"The spirit fights against the flesh." — Galatians 5[:17]

[margin: Whether those who live under grace are impeccable [free from sin].]

Augustine, in the exposition of the epistle to the Galatians, discoursing on this, asserted that those are under the law, and not under grace, whose spirit so lusts against the flesh, that they do not do the [things] which they will — that is, do not hold themselves unconquered in the charity of justice — but are conquered by the flesh lusting against them. Augustine excuses this sentence [in] the 24th chapter of the first book of the Retractations, saying that he said this because he had not yet understood that these words fit also those who are under grace; because they too have concupiscences of the flesh, against which they lust by [their] spirit, being unwilling to have them, if they could: and therefore they do not do whatsoever they will; because they will to lack them [the concupiscences], and cannot — but they will not have them then, when [they will] not [have] corruptible flesh [either]. A very similar [thing] Augustine retracted [in] the book of Propositions on the epistle to the Romans, chapter 7, and out of the book of 83 Questions, question 66.

Annotation CCLXXXII [contents]

"But the fruit of the Spirit is charity." — Galatians 5[:22]

[margin: Whether the damned are ever to be saved.]

Jerome, [in] the fifth book of the commentaries on the Galatians, declaring this, seems to allude to the Origenist dogma concerning the damned [being] at some time [eventually] to be saved

[catchword "in" → continues on p. 551 (PDF 556).]

(printed p. 551 [PDF p. 556], recto — end of Ann. CCLXXXII, then Ann. CCLXXXIII–CCLXXXV and the head of CCLXXXVI, on Galatians 5–6 & Ephesians 1 (Jerome on the lover's joy; whether the departed saints can pray for us — Jerome speaking ironically against Vigilantius; whether all men are to be loved with equal charity — Augustine [Gal. exposition, On Christian Doctrine 1.28, On the Trinity 8.8] vs. the order of charity, reconciled by the Master of the Sentences 3.29; Chrysostom on election from foreseen merits [Eph. 1:4], a Pelagian-savouring reading; and Origen's pre-existent-souls dogma [souls created before the world and thrust into bodies for their sins], reported by Jerome). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCLXXXII, from the catchword "in":)

—in these words: "IT IS TO BE NOTED, that after love [dilection] joy follows. For he who loves someone always rejoices in his felicity. And if he sees him deceived by some error, and fallen into the slippery [ways] of sins, he will grieve indeed, and will hasten to rescue [him]: but he will not be able to change joy into sadness, knowing that none of the rational creatures perishes perpetually with God." Annotation 131, and 225, and 229 of the preceding book are to be seen by thee.

Annotation CCLXXXIII [contents]

"Every one shall bear his own burden." — Galatians 6[:5]

[margin: Whether the saints departed can pray for us.]

Jerome, [in] the third book on the epistle to the Galatians, subjoins to this saying such an exposition: "OBSCURELY, [though,] we are taught by this little sentence a new dogma, which lies hidden — [namely] that, while we are in the present age, we can help one another mutually, whether by prayers or by counsels; but when we shall have come before the tribunal of Christ, neither Job, nor Daniel, nor Noah can pray for anyone: but each one bears his own burden." This exposition seems to suffer no little of difficulty; for if it is true that the saints, after this life, cannot pray for us: why does he mark this assertion by the appellation of a "new," and "lying-hidden," or "suspect" dogma? and if the dogma is new and suspect: why does he make Paul the author and teacher of a suspect dogma? It is probable that Jerome uttered these words by antiphrasis and ironically, against the new dogma of Vigilantius, who, in his hiding-places, taught that the saints who have migrated from this life can help no one by their prayers. For the words of this passage also seem to allude to the words of Vigilantius, which Jerome, in the declamation against Vigilantius, reports from that man's [own] book, saying: "THOU sayest in thy little book, that while we live, we can pray mutually for one another; but after we shall have died, no one's prayer is to be heard for another — especially since the martyrs, begging the vengeance of their blood, have not been able to obtain [it]."

Annotation CCLXXXIIII [contents]

"Let us work good toward all, but especially toward the domestics of faith." — Galatians 6[:10]

[margin: Whether all men are to be loved with an equal affection of charity.]

Augustine, in the exposition of the epistle to the Galatians, seems to hint that all men are to be loved with an equal affection of love, although in effect — that is, in the exhibition of service — a distinction is to be kept. "For to all," he says, "eternal life is to be wished with equal love, although the same offices of love cannot be exhibited to all." Which sentence, expressing more clearly [in] the first book On Christian Doctrine, chapter 28, he says: "ALL men are to be loved equally: but since thou canst not be of profit to all, those especially are to be consulted [cared for] who, by the opportunities of places and times, or of any matters, are more closely joined to thee, as [by] a certain lot." And [in] the eighth book On the Trinity, chapter 8, affirming that all are to be loved equally as ourselves, he says: "NOR let that question move [us], how much we ought to spend upon the charity of a brother, how much [upon that] of God — incomparably more to God than to ourselves; but to a brother, as much as to ourselves." To this sentence seems opposed [that] of Origen,

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLXXXIIII, then Ann. CCLXXXV–CCLXXXVI:)

—and the definition of nearly all the theologians, establishing, in the order of charity, [that] first God is to be loved, secondly [our] parents, then [our] children, but afterward [our] domestics [household]. The Master of the Sentences, [in] book 3, distinction 29, discussing these passages, writes these [things]: "[THAT which] Augustine says — that all are equally to be loved, and eternal life is to be wished for all with equal love — can be so taken, that the equality be referred not to the affection, but to the good which is wished them: because by charity we ought to wish for all, that they may merit equal goods, as the Apostle says, 'I wish all men to be as [I am] myself.' For the perfection of the greater [ones] is to be wished for the lesser, that they themselves may be made perfect, and so may merit an equal beatitude: or 'with equal love,' that is, with the same love, all are to be loved. Likewise [that] which he says, 'that we love [our] brethren as much as ourselves,' can be so understood — that is, that we love [our] brethren unto as much good as [we love] ourselves: that we wish them as much good in eternity, as [we wish] for ourselves; although not with so great an affection. Or there [in the word] 'as much' [there] is [a matter] of similitude, not of quantity."

Annotation CCLXXXV [contents]

"He chose us before the constitution of the world." — Ephesians 1[:4]

[margin: Whether election [is] from foreseen merits.]

Chrysostom, [in] the first homily on the Ephesians, says that, as men choose the best [things] for themselves, so much more does God choose the best [things] for himself. And [in] the second homily on the Ephesians, upon that [text], "He predestined us," he adds: "HE PREDESTINED, or predefined, men according to the works which he foresaw in them, whom he had chosen. Whence the grace of election is not only from God, but is [also] from us." Which sentence seems to savor somewhat of the Pelagian. But concerning the understanding of these [sayings] it has been said by us [in] Annotation 251.

Annotation CCLXXXVI [contents]

"He chose us before the constitution of the world." — Ephesians 1[:4]

[margin: Whether souls [were] created before the world, and thrust into bodies for their offenses.]

Origen, [in] the first book of the commentaries on the Ephesians, narrating this clause, taught that souls were created before this visible world, and then, on account of their sins, were thrust into bodies. Which sentence Jerome, the name of Origen being suppressed, recounts in the first commentary on the Ephesians in these words: "ANOTHER, indeed, who tries to show God just — [namely] that he chooses each one not from the prejudgment of his [own] knowledge, but from the merit of the elect — says [that] before the visible creatures — heaven, earth, seas, and all [things] which are within them — there were other, invisible creatures; among which [were] also souls, which, for certain causes known to God alone, were cast down below into this vale of tears, into the place of our affliction and pilgrimage: in which the holy man, [being] placed, prayed to return to [his] pristine seat, saying: [margin: Psalm 119.] 'Woe is me, that my sojourning is prolonged; I have dwelt with the inhabitants of Cedar; my soul has much been a pilgrim.' And in another place: [margin: Romans 7.] 'Wretched man that I am, who shall free me from the body of this death?' And, [margin: Philippians 1.] 'It is better to return, and to be with Christ.' And elsewhere, [margin: Psalm 113.] 'Before I was humbled, I sinned': and other [things] similar to these. And so, before-

[signature "Zz 2"; catchword "quàm" → "than [i.e. before]," continues on p. 552 (PDF 557).]

(printed p. 552 [PDF p. 557], verso — end of Ann. CCLXXXVI, then Ann. CCLXXXVII and the head of CCLXXXVIII, on Ephesians 1 (the full Origenist pre-existence account concluded [souls cast into the "vale of tears," the Babylonian-captivity analogy, Ps. 89; confuted from Cyril in bk. 5 Ann. 185]; then Rufinus's long invective charging that Jerome, in his Ephesians commentary, cunningly taught Origen's error "under another's person" [eight passages listed], and Jerome's fourfold self-defense from his Apology against Rufinus*; then whether penance may again be given to the lapsed — Chrysostom, hom. 2 on Ephesians, seeming to side with the Novatians). Read order: left column, then right.)*

(left column — concluding Annotation CCLXXXVI, from the catchword "quàm":)

—than the souls, they say, were precipitated into the world, and the world was made out of souls — [God] himself [being] cast down into the lowest [place] with its [own] inhabitants — God chose Paul, and those like him before his [sight], who were holy and immaculate. But no one is chosen except from many: and where there are some baser [ones], there election is perpetrated. But [just] as in the Babylonian captivity, when the people were led away by Nebuchadnezzar into Chaldaea, prophets were sent — Ezekiel, Daniel, the three boys, Haggai, Zechariah — not because they too had merited the captivity, but that they might be for the solace of the captives: so also in that casting-down of the world, those who, before the world was made, had been chosen by God, were sent for the erudition and mastership of the sinful souls; that, at their preaching, they might return to that place whence they had fallen. And that this is [that] which is said by Moses in the eighty-ninth psalm: [margin: Psalm 89.a] 'Lord, thou hast been made a refuge for us, from generation and into generation. Before the mountains were made firm, and the earth was made, and the round world' — that is, before the world was made, and the universal generation took [its] beginning, God was a refuge to his saints." This, then, is the Origenist opinion; which, as Jerome reports, the same Origen confirmed, and explained more fully, upon that [text] Eph. 1, "According to the good pleasure of his will"; and upon that Eph. 1, "Unto the praise of the glory of his grace"; and upon that Eph. 1, "That we may be unto the praise of his glory"; and upon that Eph. 1, "The eyes [of your heart] illumined in the knowledge of him"; and Eph. 3, upon that, "I Paul, bound in the Lord"; and Eph. 6, upon that, "For which I perform an embassy in a chain." The confutation of this error, from Cyril, thou hast [in] the fifth book, Annotation 185.

Annotation CCLXXXVII [contents]

"He chose us in him before the constitution of the world." — Ephesians 1[:4]

[margin: Whether souls [were] created before the world, and afterward cast into bodies for their [own] faults.]

Rufinus chides Jerome with a long and bitter invective, because in the commentaries on the epistle to the Ephesians he followed the error of Origen — affirming that all souls were created before this corporeal world, in the invisible world, and, after the founding of this visible world, were cast down into that vale of tears, and thrust into bodies — some indeed for the punishment of the sins which they had committed before, but others not on account of their offenses, but for the erudition and mastership of the sinful souls. And the passages, in which Rufinus complains that Jerome wrote these [things], are these:

The FIRST, upon those words of Eph. 1, "He chose us before the constitution of the world." The SECOND, upon that [text] of Eph. 1, "According to the good pleasure of his will." The THIRD, upon that [text] of Eph. 1, "Unto the praise of the glory of his grace." The FOURTH, upon that [text] of Eph. 1, "That we may be unto the praise of his glory, who before hoped." The FIFTH, upon that [text] of Eph. 1, "The eyes of our heart illumined in the knowledge of him." The SIXTH, upon that [text] of Eph. 3, "For this cause I, Paul, [am] bound in the Lord."

(right column — continuing Annotation CCLXXXVII, then Ann. CCLXXXVIII:)

The SEVENTH, upon that [text] of Eph. 6, "For which I perform an embassy in a chain." The EIGHTH, upon that [text] to Philemon, "Epaphras, my fellow-captive, salutes thee."

In all these passages Rufinus asserts that Jerome cunningly taught an error of this kind under the figure of another, unnamed person, in imitation of the rhetoricians — who, when they either fear to offend some, or desire to decline [avoid] odium, then, by a certain rhetorical artifice, bring forth their own opinion under the person of another. And he builds this up by four indications: first, that he does not name the author of that opinion, but only says, "Another," he says, etc. Secondly, because he does not express whether that "other" is contrary to himself, or concordant [in agreement]; nor shows whether he himself is discordant or concordant with him. Thirdly, because he does not destroy his sayings, nor impugn [them], nor reprehend the author himself; but praises him, and calls [him] "diligent." Fourthly, because the opinion set forth under another's person he not only does not refute, nor condemn; but fortifies [it] with strong reasons, and with many testimonies of the divine scripture.

THIS accusation of Rufinus, Jerome, confuting [it] in the first Apology against him, answers: to the first conjecture, that he did not put down the names of the authors of that error, because it was superfluous to put, at each of the Apostle's sayings, the names of those expositors, whom he had already named abundantly in the preface of the whole work. To the second suspicion he satisfies, saying that at the end of the chapter he showed sufficiently openly that he disagreed [was discordant] with that opinion which he had reported under another's person, and had in that same place refuted [it]. The third conjecture he thus dissolves, [saying] that he refrained, out of zeal for modesty and Christian shamefastness, from reprehending those authors — because, since he was performing the office of a commentator, he ought not to carp at those whom he was partly imitating, and whose opinions he was translating into the Latin tongue; and that, if he praised them for diligence, calling [them] "diligent," this matters little: since even thieves are wont to be called "diligent." To the fourth conjecture he says that, together with the Origenist errors, he also brought forward the reasons and arguments upon which those errors leaned — that, opening to the readers all the opinion of Origen, and omitting nothing said by him, he might avoid the calumnies of the malevolent: lest they should say that Jerome had kept silent [the things] which had been forcibly said by Origen, and that he [Origen] argued more robustly in the Greek.

Annotation CCLXXXVIII [contents]

"Unto the praise of the glory of his grace." — Ephesians 1[:6]

[margin: Whether penance is again to be given to the lapsed.]

Chrysostom, [in] the second homily on the Ephesians, seems, together with the Novatians, to deny penance to the lapsed — saying thus, in the beginning of the moral exhortation: "GOD advances to salvation those who, once they have been made his friends, persevere. But if they run back again to [their] former enmities, all [is] in vain and to no purpose. For a second laver of regeneration is not granted; nor does a secondary reconciliation remain over [again]; but a certain terrible expectation of judgment, and jealousy of fire, which shall consume the adversaries." And a little after: "HE SHOWS thee

[catchword "tibi" → "thee," continues on p. 553 (PDF 558).]

(printed p. 553 [PDF p. 558], recto — end of Ann. CCLXXXVIII, then Ann. CCLXXXIX and the head of CCXC, on Ephesians 1 (Chrysostom on the lapsed — read of the ancient non-repeatable solemn *penance, not private penance; then the Eucharist — Bertram/Ratramnus abuses Jerome and Clement of Alexandria [*Paedagogus 2.2] on the "twofold blood and flesh," resolved by the Master of the Sentences 4.8 via sacramentum/res; then whether the punishments of the damned are to be ended — Rufinus charges Jerome with the Origenist apocatastasis, and the Anabaptist Stanislaus Pannonius abuses Jerome's Isaiah-commentary and Against the Pelagians passages, though Jerome himself in the Apology insists even damned Christians are never freed from hell). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCLXXXVIII, from the catchword "tibi":)

—the true light. But if, that being expelled, thou again incur darkness: what place of excuse is left to thee? what pardon canst thou hope? Not even one is to be hoped for thenceforth." And a little below: "IF thou sufferest a necessity of sinning, or force, thou wilt indeed obtain pardon; but if thou fallest through cowardice [sloth] or torpor, not so." Which words are not to be understood of private penance — to which Chrysostom so frequently invites sinners, [and] for which, as we admonished [in] Annotation 173 of the preceding book, he was gravely reproved by the Novatians — but are to be expounded of the solemn penance, which, according to the ancient laws, was not iterated [repeated], as Augustine is witness, in the epistle to Macedonius, 54, lest the medicine, iterated many times, should grow cheap; and the same is had in the decrees, On Penance, distinction 3.

Annotation CCLXXXIX [contents]

"In whom we have redemption through his blood." — Ephesians 1[:7]
[margin: On the Eucharist.]

Bertram [Ratramnus] the presbyter usurps Jerome's interpretation from this passage, in the book On the Body and Blood of the Lord, to show that in the Eucharist there is neither the true and real flesh of Christ, which was crucified for us, nor that true blood which was shed for us, but a mystical blood, and spiritual and typical flesh, set forth not in truth, but in figure. The words of Jerome run thus: "IN A TWOFOLD manner is the blood of Christ and [his] flesh understood: either that spiritual and divine [flesh], of which he himself said, 'My flesh is truly food, and my blood is truly drink,' and, 'Unless you eat my flesh, and drink my blood, you shall not have eternal life'; or the flesh and blood which was crucified, and which was shed by the soldier's lance. According to this division, a diversity of blood and of flesh is taken also in his saints — so that there is one flesh, which shall see the salvation of God; [and] another flesh and blood, which cannot possess the kingdom of God." This sentence of Jerome seems to allude to those [things] which Clement of Alexandria wrote, [in] book 2 of the Paedagogus, chapter 2, in these words: "TWOFOLD is the blood of the Lord: for one is carnal, by which we are redeemed from destruction; but the other spiritual, by which, namely, we are anointed. And this is to drink the blood of Jesus — to be partaker of the incorruption of the Lord. For the strength of the Word is the spirit, as the blood [is] of the flesh. By a moderate proportion, therefore, and fittingness, wine is mingled with water, but the spirit with man. And the tempered wine indeed, as concerns faith, is received at the banquet; but the spirit is led to incorruption. But the mixture of both — namely, of the drink and of the Word — is called Eucharist; of which those who are partakers by faith are sanctified in body and soul." The Master of the Sentences, [in] book 4, distinction 8, says that Jerome's words are to be interpreted by the rule of "the sacrament and the reality of the sacrament," by which we are taught that the flesh of Christ is twofold: the one contained and signified by the Eucharist, which was crucified and dead, and after death, revived, ascended into heaven; but the other signified by the Eucharist and not contained, which is the unity of the Church in the predestined and the glorified. And according to the same rule the sayings of Clement are to be taken. This argument has been treated more copiously [in] Annotation 196 of this book.

(right column — Annotation CCXC:)

Annotation CCXC [contents]

"That we may be unto the praise of his glory, who before hoped in Christ." — Ephesians 1[:12]
[margin: Whether the punishments of the damned are to be ended.]

Rufinus objects to Jerome, that in the commentaries on the epistle to the Ephesians, expounding these [words], he asserted that the punishments of the damned are to be ended, and that the devil, and his angels, and all sinners and unbelievers, after the day of judgment — some ages of years being completed — will not only receive pardon of [their] offenses, but will also attain the heavenly rewards. This same [thing] he writes that he [Jerome] held in the exposition of the second chapter to the Ephesians, upon that [text], "That he might show in the ages to come," etc.; and upon that [text] from the fourth chapter to the Ephesians, "From whom the whole body, compacted and knit together," etc. Stanislaus Pannonius [of Hungary], a minister of the Anabaptist sect, in the book On Divine Philanthropy, in which he defends the error of Origen, among other [things] which he brings for its defense, uses also the authority of Jerome — affirming that he, in this matter, partly denied to Origen, but partly assented. And that he first indeed denied [it], because he believed that the torments both of the demons and of the unbelieving impious would be eternal; but assented, because he thought that the sins of the wicked and damned faithful [Christians] would not be punished eternally with eternal punishments, but, out of divine clemency, would be pardoned after a certain measure of penalties. And this he [Pannonius] says is evident from those [things] which he [Jerome] wrote at the end of the commentaries on Isaiah, in these words: "ALL which [things] those desiring to assert the restoration [of all] — [saying] that after tortures and torments there will be future refreshments, which are now to be hidden from those to whom fear is useful, that, while they dread the punishments, they may cease to sin — [these things] we ought to leave to the knowledge of God alone: whose not only mercies, but also torments, are in weight [measured]; and [who] knows whom, in what manner, or how long, he ought to judge. And let us only say [that] which befits human frailty: [margin: Psalm 6.a] 'Lord, rebuke me not in thy fury, nor chastise me in thy wrath.' And, as of the devil, and of all the deniers, and impious, who said in their heart, [margin: Psalm 13.] 'There is no God,' we believe eternal torments: so of sinners, and impious, and yet Christians, whose works are to be tried and purged in the fire, we judge a moderate sentence of the judge, and [one] mingled with clemency." These [things] Jerome [says]. To which the same Pannonius subjoins another testimony of the same, from the first book against the Pelagians, where it is thus written: "IN FINE, Isaiah, from whom thou placest a testimony — 'The sinners and the wicked shall be burned together,' he says, [but] did not add, 'For ever'; and, 'those who forsake God shall be consumed' — he speaks this properly of heretics, who, forsaking the right path of faith, shall be consumed, if they will not return to the Lord." And after many [things] he adds: "IF Origen says that all rational creatures are not to be lost — what is that to us? who say both that the devil and his satellites, and all the impious, perish perpetually; but that Christians, if they have been overtaken in sin, are to be saved after penalties." These [things] Pannonius [alleges] concerning Jerome: whose imposture and impudent lie Jerome himself, refuting [it] in the Apology against Rufinus, and in very many other writings, most constantly confesses that even damned Christians are never [freed] from the punish-

[signature "Zz 3"; catchword "sup-" (suppliciis) → "punishments," continues on p. 554 (PDF 559).]

(printed p. 554 [PDF p. 559], verso — end of Ann. CCXC, then Ann. CCXCI–CCXCV, on Ephesians 1–2 (Jerome's five arguments against the Origenist apocatastasis, and that his "Christians saved after penalties" means purgatory; then a series of short annotations on Origenist errors reported by Jerome and reproved by Rufinus — whether souls' knowledge is reminiscence [Eph. 1:17, with the Greek]; the ascents/descents [increments and decrements] of angels [Eph. 1:21]; whether the stars are rational and purged by Christ's blood [Eph. 1:22]; the bodies of demons [Eph. 2:2 — Cajetan's "aerial spirits" rejected by Ambrose of Compsa]; and whether the demons are ever saved [Eph. 2:7]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCXC, from the catchword "sup-":)

—to be freed from the punishments of hell; and [that] the opinion of those who think otherwise is to be utterly detested, and cast out from the minds of Christians — he proves by many arguments, out of which, in the commentary on the third chapter of Jonah, he touches upon these summarily.

FIRST, because the divine scripture nowhere teaches this opinion of the ending of the punishments of the damned.

SECONDLY, because in the gospel [the fire] is called eternal fire, and eternal punishment; and in Isaiah, "Their worm shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched."

THIRDLY, because this opinion utterly overturns the fear of God, while men easily slide into vices, thinking that all the wicked are at some time, after penalties, to be saved.

FOURTHLY, [because] if, after a long circuit of ages, a restoration of all things be made, so that there be one dignity of souls, there will be no distance [difference] between a virgin and a brothel-woman; between the mother of the Lord, and the victims of public lusts; Gabriel will be the same [as] the devil; the Apostles [as] the demons; the same [dignity for] the prophets, and the false prophets; the same [for] the martyrs, and the persecutors.

FIFTHLY, [because] if the end of all is alike, imagine infinite ages of torments — all the past is [reckoned] for nothing: because we do not ask what we once were, but what we shall always be.

FROM THESE [things], therefore, it appears that Jerome — an enemy of this dogma — reported [the things] which he wrote in the commentary on the Ephesians, not from his own, but from the opinion of others. But [that] which, at the end of the commentaries on Isaiah, and against the Pelagians, he asserts — that Christians are to be saved after penalties and the torments of fire — is to be referred not to the eternal fire of hell, but to the temporal fire of purgatory; in which, when souls have been purged for a time, they shall be saved. See [the things] regarding this, [in] Annotations 126 and 128 of the fifth book.

Annotation CCXCI [contents]

"May he give you the spirit of wisdom and of revelation in the knowledge of him." — Ephesians 1[:17]

[margin: Whether the knowledge of souls is from reminiscence.]

Origen, in the commentaries, elucidating this passage, said that the knowledge by which they [souls] now know God is a certain reminiscence of the divine knowledge which they of old had in heaven, before they descended into bodies. This opinion Jerome, the name of Origen being suppressed, brought forth in his commentaries in these words: "[THAT] which Paul says, 'in the knowledge [agnitione] of him,' that is, ἐπιγνώσει αὐτοῦ [epignṓsei autoû], some understand thus: that between γνῶσις [gnôsis] and ἐπίγνωσις [epígnōsis] — that is, between 'notion' and 'recognition' — there is this difference: that 'notion' is of [things] which we did not before know, and afterward began to know; but 'recognition' [is] of [things] which, having before known, we then ceased to know, and afterward remember them — and suspect a certain former life in the heavenly [places]: after [that], being cast down into these bodies, and having forgotten God the Father, we have now come to know him through revelation, according to that [text]: 'All the ends of the earth shall remember, and shall be converted to the Lord,' and [they] repeat other [things] similar to these." These [things] Jerome [says]: whom Rufinus reprehends, because this Origenist opinion

(right column — continuing Annotation CCXCI, then Ann. CCXCII–CCXCV:)

—he inserted in his commentaries without any confutation of it [himself].

Annotation CCXCII [contents]

"Above all principality, and power, and virtues." — Ephesians 1[:21]

[margin: The increments and decrements of angels.]

Jerome is taxed in this place by Rufinus, because, following Origen, he posited in the angels advances and honors, ascents and descents, increments and diminutions. Refuting this accusation, Jerome says that by these words he did not signify those ascents and descents by which Origen feigns [that] angels descend to the nature of men and of demons, and, vice versa, men and demons are raised up into the nature of angels; but that he wished to express, by these sayings, the diverse offices of the angels, and [their] dignities, according to the understanding of ecclesiastical doctrine.

Annotation CCXCIII [contents]

"And he subjected all things under his feet." — Ephesians 1[:22]

[margin: Whether the stars are rational living beings, and purged by the blood of Christ.]

To Jerome Rufinus turns [it] for a fault, because, interpreting this passage, he affirmed that the stars are rational living beings, and capable of offense [sin], and [that] Christ also purged their sins, when he wrote these [things]: "BUT why all things — that is, angels, thrones, dominations, powers, and the other virtues, which were never contrary to God — are subjected under his feet, seems obscure. It can therefore be answered, that no one is without sin; and [that] the stars themselves are not clean before God; and [that] every creature fears the coming of the Creator. Whence also the cross of the Savior is reported to have purged not only those [things] which are on earth, but those which are in the heavens." He speaks, as has already been said, from the opinion of Origen.

Annotation CCXCIIII [contents]

"According to the prince of the power of this air, [the] spirit." — Ephesians 2[:2]

[margin: The bodies of demons.]

Thomas Cajetan, in the commentaries: "I WOULD believe," he says, "that the demons are aerial spirits; and that this is consonant to the reason of true philosophy: [namely] that, as the vegetative is found without the sensitive, and without the locomotive [that moves according to place]; and the intellective without the locomotive; so there may be found a locomotive without the sensitive — which is to posit aerial spirits of this kind, consisting of the intellective and the locomotive." Ambrose of Compsa, [in] the fourth book of the Annotations, rejects this opinion, because it was of old condemned by the fathers in Origen. Read Annotation 8 of the fifth book.

Annotation CCXCV [contents]

"That he might show in the ages to come." — Ephesians 2[:7]

[margin: Whether the demons are ever to be saved.]

Jerome is taxed by Rufinus, because to this passage he appends the exposition of Origen — saying that the demons, in the future age, shall receive benefits from the saints, and shall be under their care — the name of the author being passed over, and without any disapproval of the error. It has been answered above, [in] Annotation 290 of this book.

[catchword "AN-" → continues on p. 555 (PDF 560).]

(printed p. 555 [PDF p. 560], recto — Ann. CCXCVI–CCCI, on Ephesians 2–4 (all creatures, men and angels, purged by Christ's blood [Eph. 2:17]; the body as the soul's prison [Eph. 3:1]; whether the demons are to be restored — Ambrose's exposition and the anonymous Origen-scholiast [Eph. 3:10]; whether the angels knew the mystery of redemption before Christ's passion — Jerome, Sedulius, and Peter Lombard reconciling Jerome with Augustine via Haymo [Eph. 3:10]; bishops and presbyters the same [Eph. 4:11]; and whether one who cannot teach may be made a bishop [Eph. 4:11]). Read order: left column, then right.)

Annotation CCXCVI [contents]

"Coming, he evangelized peace." — Ephesians 2[:17]

[margin: Angels purged.]

Jerome, in this place, is reprehended by Rufinus, because, imitating Origen, he affirmed that all creatures, as well men as angels, were purged by the blood of Christ, saying: "The cross of the Lord profited not only the earth but also heaven; not only men but angels: and every creature of its Lord has been purged by his gore." See Annotations 170, 293, and 302 of this book.

Annotation CCXCVII [contents]

"Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ." — Ephesians 3[:1]

[margin: The soul's prison.]

Rufinus fastens [it] upon Jerome, that in this place he handed down [taught] the body to be the prison of the soul. Avoiding which calumny, Jerome says that he wrote it not from his own, but from Origen's, mind.

Annotation CCXCVIII [contents]

"That [it] might be made known to the principalities, and powers." — Ephesians 3[:10]

[margin: Whether the demons are to be restored.]

Ambrose, in the commentaries, elucidating this clause, writes thus: "SO WELL did God think concerning this [man], namely Paul, that he not only gave this master to the nations, but also that through him the truth of Christ might be made known to the spirits in the heavenly [places], who are principalities and powers. [They are called] 'powers,' therefore, because they are more powerful among the other spirits; but 'principalities,' because they hold princedom over the powers — that, recognizing through the Church (which has been drawn to life in manifold [ways]) the mystery of the one God to abide in Christ, they may cease from error. For this is the [thing] transacted: that the ecclesiastical preaching may profit even these, and [that] they may forsake the assent of the tyranny of the devil, wherewith it armed itself, with impious presumption, against the faith of the one God. Which sense is prescribed [set down beforehand] in the twenty-third Psalm: where God, the lord of the universe, is shown, the Spirit of God saying through David: [margin: Psalm 23] 'The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof, the round world, and all who dwell in it.' And among the [things] following: 'Lift up the gates of your prince, and be lifted up, ye eternal gates, and the king of glory shall enter in. Who is this king of glory? The Lord of hosts, he is the king of glory.' It is said, therefore, to these princes, who are in error in the heavenly [places], or to his [the devil's] ministers on earth, that they take away the gates of their prince — that is, of the devil — from their minds, through which the error of asserting many [false things] entered in." An anonymous scholiast of Origen, in the scholia on the first book of the Peri Archon, noted that Ambrose in this place does not dissent from the dogma which Origen wrote in the sixth chapter of the same book — affirming that certain angels, who are not irremediably removed from the state of beatitude, can again be recalled to their pristine felicity, and restored, through ecclesiastical preachings and salutary admonitions. But this dogma the Catholic Church condemns.

(left column ends with the head of Annotation CCXCIX; its body continues in the right column.)

Annotation CCXCIX [contents]

"That now [it] might be made known to the principalities, and in the heavenly [places], through the Church, the manifold wisdom of God." — Ephesians 3[:10]

[margin: Whether the angels, before the passion of Christ, knew the mystery of redemption.]

(right column:)

Jerome, [in] the second book on the epistle to the Ephesians, expounding these [words], seems to think that the angels, before the passion and resurrection of Christ, did not know the mystery of the incarnate Word, and the sacrament of human redemption. For thus indeed he speaks: "THE CROSS of Christ opened, not only to us, but also to the angels, and to all the virtues in heaven, a sacrament which before they knew not. Finally, they marvel at [him] returning to heaven with [his] body, and say, [margin: Psalm 93.a; Psalm 23] 'Who is this, who ascends from Edom, his tawny garments out of Bosor?' And in another place, 'Who is this king of glory?'" Thus he.

Sedulius, agreeing with Jerome, [in] the Collectanea on this passage writes thus: "FROM WHICH we understand that the cross of Christ profited not only us, but also the angels; because it opened a sacrament which before they knew not. Whence they ask, 'Who is this king of glory?'"

Peter Lombard, [in] the second book of the Sentences, distinction 11, animadverting on this passage, writes thus: "AUGUSTINE seems to contradict Jerome, saying, upon the same passage of the epistle, 'The mystery of the kingdom of heaven was not hidden from the angels — which was revealed at an opportune time for our salvation. To them, therefore, the aforementioned mystery was made known from the ages [a saeculis]: because every creature is not before the ages, but from the ages.' Attend, reader, because illustrious doctors seem to dissent in this sentence. And therefore, that all repugnance may be taken out of the midst, following Haymo let us so determine the aforesaid words: that by those angels, who are of greater dignity, and by whose ministry those [things] were announced, [these things] were in part known from the ages — as [being] familiars and messengers; but by those, who are of lesser dignity, we say they remained unknown, until they were fulfilled and preached through the Church: and then they were perfectly known by all the angels. It is agreed, therefore, that all the angels have advanced in the knowledge of the divine mysteries according to the process of time. Whence not incongruously these same [doctors] say that the knowledge and beatitude of the angels is increased even unto the future consummation — when, in knowledge and beatitude, they shall be so most perfect, that it is neither increased further, nor diminished." See Annotations 165 and 182 of this book.

Annotation CCC [contents]

"And he himself indeed gave some [to be] apostles." — Ephesians 4[:11]

Ambrose, in the commentaries, expounding this particle [clause], intimates that bishops and presbyters are the same — concerning which matter see below, Annotation 324.

Annotation CCCI [contents]

"And others indeed [to be] pastors and masters [teachers]." — Ephesians 4[:11]

[margin: Whether he is to be constituted a bishop, who cannot teach.]

Jerome, [in] the second book on the epistle to the Ephesians, explaining these particles, seems to affirm that no one is to be constituted a bishop and pastor of the Church, who cannot teach those whom he feeds; nor is anyone to be called by the name of "pastor," who does not instruct the subject people: because the offices of a pastor and of a master are the same. His words run thus: "NOR truly is it to be thought, that, as in the [things] above he said some [to be] apostles, some prophets, some evangelists: so in the pastors and masters he set down diverse offices. For he does not say,

[signature "Zz 4"; catchword "alios" → "others," continues on p. 556 (PDF 561).]

(printed p. 556 [PDF p. 561], verso — end of Ann. CCCI, then Ann. CCCII–CCCVII, on Ephesians 4–5 (a pastor must be able to teach — but legitimate impediments excused, and teaching by fit ministers suffices [Eph. 4:11]; whether Christ's blood profited angels and demons [Eph. 4:10]; the restoration of all into one body [Eph. 4:16]; whether song is to be used in the divine praises — Jerome, with Aquinas and Augustine's Confessions 10 [Eph. 5:19]; whether sinners are members of the Church — the Lutheran abuse answered by the distinction of the militant and triumphant Church [Eph. 5:24]; the Origenist transformation of women into men [Eph. 5:28]; and the sacrament of matrimony — Ambrose of Compsa against Cajetan's "mystery, not sacrament" [Eph. 5:32]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCCI, from the catchword "alios":)

"—others indeed [to be] pastors, and others masters: so that he who is a pastor, ought also to be a master. Nor, in the churches, however holy he be, [ought anyone] to assume to himself the name of pastor, unless he can teach those whom he feeds — or else otherwise [understand it]: that one and the same [man], president of the church, be pastor and doctor. For the pastor of the sheep is the master of men. And below: 'IF anyone, therefore, does not instruct the people subject to him, that out of the subject people the Church of Christ may be built up: he is to be called neither apostle, nor prophet, nor evangelist, nor pastor, nor master.'" These words of Jerome THERE ARE [some] who admonish are not to be so taken, that we believe no one to be a bishop and pastor of the Church, who does not teach, or cannot teach. For there are many true and excellent bishops, who, detained by legitimate impediments, are unable to teach. But it is to be judged, that he who takes care to teach neither by himself, nor by another, is unworthy of the dignity and name of pastor. But if he himself be not able to instruct the people, [yet] instructs his people in the doctrine of the Lord through fit ministers, he is to be judged to have satisfied the office of the pastoral care. For Theophylact also, expounding this passage, affirms that by "pastors" can be understood bishops, but by "doctors [masters]" deacons and the ministers of bishops, who instruct the people in the word of God.

Annotation CCCII [contents]

"He who descended, he it is who also ascended." — Ephesians 4[:10.b]

[margin: On the angels, and the demons.]

Jerome, [in] the second book on the epistle to the Ephesians, upon this sentence seems not to stand far distant from the dogma of Origen, [who] thinks the passion of Christ profited not only men, but also angels and demons; for he says: "THE Son of God, therefore, descended into the lower [parts] of the earth, and ascended above all the heavens, that he might fulfil not so much the law and the prophets, but also certain other hidden dispensations, which he alone knows with the Father. For neither can we know in what manner the blood of Christ profited both the angels, and those who were in hell; and yet, that it did profit, we cannot but know." And this Rufinus condemned in Jerome, in the place cited above — namely, Annotations 170, 292, and 296.

Annotation CCCIII [contents]

"From whom the whole body [is] compacted." — Ephesians 4[:16.b]

Jerome is arraigned by Rufinus, because in the explanation of this sentence he wrote that all things are to be restored into one body of the same nature — men, angels, and demons. The response is above, Annotations 290 and 298.

Annotation CCCIIII [contents]

"Singing, and making melody in your hearts." — Ephesians 5[:19]

[margin: Whether song is to be used in the divine praises.]

Jerome, [in] the third book on the epistle to the Ephesians, expounding these [words], seems to think, that in the temples the divine praises are not to be sung with musical voice; for he says: "LET THE young men hear these [things]; let those hear, whose office it is to make melody in the church, that [they must sing] to God not with the voice, but with the heart; nor are the throat and jaws, after the manner of tragedians, to be smeared with sweet medicament, so that theatrical (right column:) strains and songs be heard in the church." This sentence is reported in the Collectanea of the decrees, distinction 92, chapter 1: which the divine Thomas [Aquinas], in the Secunda Secundae, question 91, examining, thus says: "JEROME does not simply blame song, but reprehends those who sing in the church in a theatrical manner — not to excite devotion, but for the sake of ostentation, or to provoke delight. Whence Augustine, in the tenth [book] of the Confessions, says: 'WHEN it befalls me, that the singing move me more than the thing which is sung, I confess that I sin penally; and then I would rather not hear the singer.'"

Annotation CCCV [contents]

"But as the Church is subject to Christ." — Ephesians 5[:24]

[margin: Whether sinners are members of the Church.]

Jerome, [in] the third book on the epistle to the Ephesians, seems to think that no sinner is of the Church of Christ, while he says: "THE Church of Christ is glorious, not having spot, nor wrinkle, or any such thing. He, therefore, who is a sinner, and stained with some filth, cannot be called [a member] of the Church of Christ, nor be said [to be] subject to Christ. But it is possible, that, as the Church, which before had had wrinkle and spot, was afterward restored to youth and cleanness: so also the sinner may run to the physician, and his wounds be cured, and he be made [a member] of the Church, which is the body of Christ." This passage is usurped by the Lutherans, hence building up that the true Church consists of the predestined and the elect of God alone, to whom sins are not imputed. But Jerome does not speak of this earthly and militant Church, which daily prays, "Forgive us our sins"; but of the heavenly Church, triumphant and glorious, which, free from all sins, has neither wrinkle nor spot.

Annotation CCCVI [contents]

"He who loves his wife, loves himself." — Ephesians 5[:28]

[margin: The transformation of women.]

Origen, [in] the third book of the commentaries on the epistle to the Ephesians, in this place wrote that in future ages women are to be changed back into men, and human bodies into souls. Rufinus chides Jerome, that he transfused this heresy — without the author's name, and without confutation — into his commentaries.

Annotation CCCVII [contents]

"This is a great sacrament." — Ephesians 5[:32]

[margin: On the sacrament of matrimony.]

Thomas Cajetan, expounding these [words] in the commentaries, Ambrose of Compsa, [in] the fourth book of the Annotations, reprehends with these words: "CAJETAN here notes that matrimony is not held by Paul to be a sacrament. For Paul does not say, 'This sacrament is great,' as the interpreter [Cajetan] expounded, but, 'This mystery is great.' Who would not marvel [at this]? Could Paul, writing in Greek, have said sacramentum, which is a Latin word — whereas, saying in Greek mystery, he certainly said in Greek that which in Latin signifies sacrament? For Cyril, and Chrysostom, and Basil, and Dionysius before these, also—

[catchword "etiam" → "also," continues on p. 557 (PDF 562).]

(printed p. 557 [PDF p. 562], recto — end of Ann. CCCVII, then Ann. CCCVIII–CCCX, on Ephesians 5–6 and Philippians 1 (Ambrose of Compsa's continued critique of Cajetan on matrimony as "mystery"/sacrament [Eph. 5:32]; Jacob's wrestling with the angel not corporeal [Eph. 6:12]; original sin brings bodily death, actual sin the soul's [Chrysostom, Eph. 6:24]; and whether the saints are to be invoked — Chrysostom's "De profectu Evangelii" homily abused by the Lutherans as their "Achilles," answered from many passages that he condemns only sloth, not intercession [Phil. 1:18]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCCVII, from the catchword "etiam":)

"—they also call the Eucharist a 'mystery,' and so [name] the other [things] which we call sacraments. But if Paul had said 'sacrament,' there would still be a question, whether he took it thus, as that word is restricted by the theologians. But if we agree as to the thing — namely, that matrimony is a sacrament, as that word is taken strictly — and Paul, speaking in Greek, calls it a 'mystery,' which is that which in Latin is 'sacrament': why, then, did not Paul understand such a sacrament, and express [it] by that word, as we also confess it to be? But attend to this also, I pray, good reader: [namely] what Cajetan subjoined for the declaring of this mystery. For thus he says: 'This mystery is great; and truly [it is] a mystery of these words: For this cause shall he leave, etc. For they contain the indivisibility of wedlock, as the Lord explained in Matthew; [the words] contain also the right of nature abhorring [forbidding] marriage with father and mother; they contain also the debt owed by the husband more to the wife than to father and mother; and this, which Paul has just declared, [namely] that the wife is the flesh of the husband. Thus he'" — and [it is one of] the great mysteries. "Paul says, 'This' — that is, matrimony itself — 'is a great mystery.' And the Cardinal [Cajetan] expounds [it]: 'the mystery of these words, For this cause shall he leave, etc., is great.' Paul declares in what way this mystery is great — that is, in Christ and the Church: but the Cardinal, [says it is great] because those words contain the right of abhorring marriage with father and mother — which is also false, as we shall say in its place. Which, however, if it were [so], how great and admirable a mystery would it be, which no nation, however fierce and savage, ever was ignorant of! The indivisibility, too, of wedlock, and the most close bond of the married, is not worthy to be called a 'mystery,' since it is persuaded even by natural reason. That, therefore, is truly the great mystery which is signified in matrimony — namely, Christ and the Church, the bridegroom and the bride: for so the Apostle declares himself. Why, therefore, do we still seek an alien interpretation?"

Annotation CCCVIII [contents]

"Our wrestling is not [against flesh and blood]." — Ephesians 6[:12]

[margin: Jacob, and the wrestling of the angel.]

Jerome, in the commentaries, thinks those to be ridiculous who deem that Jacob contended with the angel by a corporeal wrestling. See above, Annotation 111 of the preceding book.

Annotation CCCIX [contents]

"Who love the Lord Jesus Christ in incorruption." — Ephesians 6[:24]

[margin: The punishment of original sin.]

Chrysostom, [in] the 24th homily on the Ephesians, narrating this, hints that the sin of Adam, in which we are born, brings to us the death of the body; but actual sins, after baptism, bring to us the death of the soul. For thus he speaks: "TO US the body is corruptible, but the soul incorruptible: therefore, lest we corrupt it also, this [is what] that first sin did. But that which is committed after the laver [of baptism] can corrupt also the soul, and render [it] easy in the taking to the immortal worm." The sense of these words see above, Annotation 236 of this book.

Annotation CCCX [contents]

"Whether by occasion, or by truth, Christ is announced." — Philippians 1[:18]
(right column:)

[margin: Whether the saints are to be invoked.]

Chrysostom, at the end of the homily which is written out of the order of the others upon this passage, and which is inscribed On the Advancement of the Gospel [De profectu Evangelii], seems to explode [reject] the intercessions and patronages of the saints, writing thus: "MOREOVER, thou hast no need of patrons with God, nor of much discourse, that thou mayest flatter others: but although thou be alone, and lack patrons, and pray to God through thyself, thou wilt nonetheless be altogether the possessor of thy wish. For neither does God assent so easily when others pray for us, as when we ourselves pray — even if we be full of very many evils." And a little after: "DOST thou wish to learn, that even we ourselves, praying to God, effect more than when others pray for us? The Canaanite woman cried out; and, as the disciples came, they say, 'Send her away, because she cries after us.' And to them indeed he said, 'I am not sent except to the sheep of the house of Israel.' But when she herself approached, and persevered crying, 'Lord, even the whelps eat of the crumbs from the table of their masters': then he gave the benefit, and said, 'Be it done to thee as thou wilt.' Thou seest in what manner he repelled [her], when others prayed: but when she herself cried out for the gift, he assented."

This passage the Lutherans, as [it were] the Achilles of Zeno, oppose to the Catholics against the invocation of the saints. But it appears that Chrysostom brought these [things] forth not against the imploring of the saints — which everywhere he most keenly defends — but rather against certain slothful [men], who so commit themselves to the patronage of the saints, that meanwhile they, idle, cast themselves wholly into sins, and, sleeping, will do nothing for their own salvation. That to these the prayers of the saints profit nothing, Chrysostom affirms in almost innumerable places — but especially [in] the 8th homily on Matthew, saying: "IF we be negligent and slothful, we cannot be saved even by the merits of others, etc. But these [things] we say, not that we deny that the saints are to be supplicated for sinners; but lest we resolve [dissolve] ourselves into idleness and sloth, and, sleeping ourselves, commit the care of our [affairs] to others only." And [in] the 5th homily on Matthew he says: "EVEN if the patriarch Abraham supplicate for those who, by remaining in their vices, are incurably sick, God will depart, forsaking the one who asks, lest he hear the voice of the one interceding for such [men], etc." Not therefore, as if yawning and slothful, are we to depend upon the merits of others; (right column, lower:) for the prayers and supplications of the saints have a force on our behalf — and indeed a very great one — but then truly, when we too ask this same [thing] through penance, and flee to better pursuits. And [in] the 43rd homily on Genesis he says: "WHEN [that] which is from us we bring at the same time, and the intercession of the saints is added, it profits us very much. But if we ourselves be negligent, and place the hope of our salvation in them alone, it profits us nothing further. Not because the just are weak, but because through our own sloth we destroy ourselves." And [in] the 1st homily on the first epistle to the Thessalonians he says: "'WHAT need have I,' sayest thou, 'of the prayers of others, when I myself shall have been diligent?' Never say this, O man. There is need, and need of much prayer, etc." And after he has by many arguments demon-

[catchword "demon-" (demonstrat) → continues on p. 558 (PDF 563).]

(printed p. 558 [PDF p. 563], verso — end of Ann. CCCX, then Ann. CCCXI–CCCXII, on Philippians 1 and Colossians 1 (Chrysostom's close on the invocation of the saints [Phil. 1:18]; whether prayer is to be made for catechumens who die without baptism — Chrysostom, the First Council of Braga's canon on the damned, Gennadius of Marseilles, and Ambrose's oration at Valentinian's funeral, with Aquinas reading Gennadius via purgatory [Phil. 1:23]; and whether scripture attributes "patience" to God — Chrysostom's distinction of ὑπομονή [endurance] from μακροθυμία [longsuffering], with Augustine On Patience [Col. 1:11]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCCX, from the catchword "demon-":)

—demonstrated the intervention of the saints to be exceedingly necessary to us, at length he concludes the discourse with these words: "THESE [things], therefore, being known, let us neither contemn the prayers of the saints, nor cast [our] whole [selves] upon them: this indeed, lest we be rashly overwhelmed by [their] snares; but that, lest we fall away from much gain and advancement — but let us also pray that they may pray for us, and reach out a hand; and let us ourselves cleave to the pursuit of virtue, that we may be able to attain the goods promised to those who love God, etc."

Annotation CCCXI [contents]

"Having a desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ." — Philippians 1[:23]

[margin: Whether prayer is to be made for catechumens departing without baptism.]

Chrysostom, [in] the third homily on the epistle to the Philippians, seems to indicate that for catechumens departing without baptism, prayer is not to be made. For thus he writes: "WE APPEASE God, praying for the dead. But this we say indeed of those who died in the faith; but catechumens we do not deem worthy even of this solace, but they are destitute of all help of this kind — one indeed being excepted. What is that? It is permitted to give to the poor in their name [as alms]; whence some refreshment accrues to them." I would believe these [things] are to be understood not of private and secret prayers, but of public and solemn supplications — that is, of the singing of psalms, and the sacrifices of masses, wherewith the funerals and obsequies of Christians are wont to be celebrated. For when the ancient fathers had observed that certain catechumens, out of laziness and sloth, deferred the sacrament of baptism even to the last day of life, they took away from them the honor of ecclesiastical burial and the public oblation of the divine sacrifice — that, deterred by fear of this ignominy and detriment, they might hasten to baptism as soon as possible. Whence in the first Council of Braga there is extant a canon "On the punishment of the damned [de supplicio damnatorum]," decreeing the same [kind of] funeral for catechumens of this sort, and for those who inflict death upon themselves, or who, on account of crimes committed, are put to death by public execution, in these words: "LIKEWISE it has been decreed, that for those who inflict death upon themselves either by the sword, or by poison, or by a precipice [fall], or by hanging, or in any manner of violence, no commemoration be made for them in the oblation, nor be their bodies led to their burial with psalms. Likewise it has been decreed to be done concerning those who are punished for their crimes. Likewise it has been decreed, that for catechumens who die without the redemption of baptism, in like manner neither be commemoration made in the oblation, nor the office of psalm-singing be expended."

Gennadius, presbyter of Marseilles, in the book On Ecclesiastical Dogmas (which is wrongly inscribed to Augustine), reckons among the Christian dogmas a decree which seems to exclude all catechumens — except those who died in martyrdom — not only from the ecclesiastical suffrages, but also from the felicity of eternal life, in these plain words: "WE BELIEVE the way of salvation to be for the baptized only; but we believe no catechumen — although he has died in good works — to have eternal life, martyrdom excepted, wherein the whole sacrament of baptism is fulfilled." The divine Ambrose, whom all the theologians follow especially in this passage, judges that for all catechumens, migrating [dying] even without baptism and without martyrdom, (right column:) the entrance of perpetual beatitude lies open — provided that the will of baptism, and the zeal of living piously, have not been lacking to them. For indeed, in the oration which he delivered at the funeral of Valentinian Augustus, he addresses his sisters, the queens, with these sayings: "BUT I hear that you grieve, because Valentinian did not receive the sacraments of baptism. Tell me, what else is there in you but the will, but the petition [asking]? And yet he also had long ago this vow, that before he came into Italy he might be initiated, and he signified that he would shortly be baptized by me. Has he not, then, the grace which he desired? He has not [that] which he asked for? And where is that [text]: 'The just man, by whatever death he be overtaken, his soul shall be in refreshment'? And a little below: 'Or is it this that moves [you], that the mysteries were not solemnly celebrated? Then neither are the martyrs crowned, if they be catechumens; for they are not crowned, if they be not initiated. But if they are washed in their own blood, then his piety and his will have washed him also.'" Thus Ambrose. The divine Thomas [Aquinas], in the third volume of the Summa, question 68, thus interprets Gennadius: that he says catechumens are not by that decree utterly barred from the kingdom of heaven, but for a while retarded from its entrance, until they be expiated in the purgatorial [fire] of the flames, and freed from the filth and the penalties of past crimes — which, in the baptized, the water of baptism washes away; but in the unbaptized martyrs, the shedding of blood cleanses.

Annotation CCCXII [contents]

"Unto all patience, and longanimity." — Colossians 1[:11]

[margin: Whether the sacred letters attribute patience to God.]

Chrysostom, [in] the second homily on the epistle to the Colossians, at the exposition of this clause, says that nowhere in the sacred letters is patience attributed to God, but frequently longanimity [longsuffering]. His words are these: "WE ARE LONGANIMOUS toward those whom we are able to avenge ourselves upon; but patient toward those whom we cannot avenge ourselves upon. Therefore patience indeed is never attributed to God, but longanimity very often — as here this same blessed [Paul], writing elsewhere, says: [margin: Rom. 2.4] 'Or dost thou despise the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and longanimity?'" There seem to gainsay this assertion very many testimonies of divine scripture, which call God "patient," and commend his patience — as in Psalm 85, [margin: Psalm 85] where it is read, "And thou, Lord God, [art] patient, and of much mercy, and true"; and [in] Psalm 144, [margin: Psalm 144] "The Lord [is] patient, and of much mercy." But concerning his patience it is written [in] Ecclesiastes 8, [margin: Eccl. 8] "A hundred times the sinner does evil, and is awaited by God through patience"; and to the Romans 9, [margin: Rom. 9] "God SUSTAINED, in much patience, the vessels fitted for destruction"; and [in] the first of Peter, the third [chapter], [margin: 1 Pet. 3] "They awaited the patience of God in the days of Noah." It is to be known that the word "patience" signifies two [things] in the sacred letters: namely, the virtue by which adversities are bravely borne — which he calls ὑπομονήν [hypomonḗn] — which is not ascribed to God, in whom there is no calamity to be borne; and a certain expectation, called by the Greeks μακροθυμίαν [makrothymían], by which the erring are wont to be awaited a long time unto repentance — which is properly attributed to God. Both significations of patience Augustine, comprehending in the book On Patience, said: "THE PATIENCE of God is preached, not in this — that ma-

[catchword "ma-" → continues on p. 559 (PDF 564).]

(printed p. 559 [PDF p. 564], recto — end of Ann. CCCXII, then Ann. CCCXIII–CCCXVII, on Colossians 1–3, 2 Thessalonians 2–3 (the Hebrew and Greek terms behind God's "longanimity" not "patience" [Col. 1:11]; whether individual men have individual guardian angels — Chrysostom vs. Jerome, with the theologians following Jerome [Col. 1:20]; a cross-reference on bewitchment [Col. 3:15]; whether the common/vernacular Bibles are to be read by all — Chrysostom bidding all lay people acquire Scripture, abused by the Lutherans [Col. 3:16]; all things in Scripture clear and plain [2 Thess. 2:5]; and whether monks must earn their bread by manual labor — Augustine's On the Work of Monks answering the four monastic excuses [2 Thess. 3:10]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — concluding Annotation CCCXII, from the catchword "ma-":)

—suffer some evil, but in this — that he awaits the wicked, that they may be converted." Chrysostom, therefore, regarding the former signification, rightly noted that nowhere in the sacred books is the name of ὑπομονή [hypomonḗ] — that is, "patience" — attributed to God. For in these [passages], wherever God is called "patient," it is read in Hebrew אֶרֶךְ־אַפַּיִם, Erech aphaim, "long of anger" [the print glosses "longus iris"] — that is, slow to anger; but in Greek Μακρόθυμος [Makróthymos], that is, "longanimous [long-suffering]." Likewise, wherever mention is made of the divine patience, among the Hebrews there is had תִּקְוָה; thikuath [tiqwāh], that is, "expectation"; but among the Greeks Μακροθυμία [makrothymía], that is, "longanimity," or ἀνοχή [anochḗ] — which word, according to the testimony of Ammonius, properly signifies a truce, which, a treaty being struck, is granted to enemies in war, that they may pass to and fro to treat of peace. Both words Paul used to the Romans, in the second chapter, when he was speaking of the divine patience, saying: ἢ τοῦ πλούτου τῆς χρηστότητος αὐτοῦ, καὶ τῆς μακροθυμίας καταφρονεῖς; — that is, "Or dost thou despise the riches of his goodness, and of [his] forbearance [truce], and of [his] longanimity?"

Annotation CCCXIII [contents]

"Making peace through the blood of his cross, [both] the [things] which are on earth, and the [things] which are in the heavens." — Colossians 1[:20]

[margin: Whether to individual men individual angels are deputed.]

Chrysostom, [in] the third homily on the Colossians, seems to indicate that individual angels are not deputed to individual men for [their] guardianship, but only to the faithful who believe in Christ. For thus he speaks: "AT FIRST, according to the number of the nations, were the angels; but now not according to the number of the nations, but according to the number of the faithful. Whence is it plain? Hear Christ saying, 'Their angels always see the face of my Father, who is in the heavens.' For indeed every one of the believers has an angel. For also from the beginning each of the famous and approved men had an angel — as Jacob says: 'The angel, who feeds me, and who delivered me from my youth.'" But Jerome, expounding that passage, "Their angels, etc.," cited from Chrysostom, judges that individual men have individual angels as guardians, saying: "GREAT is the dignity of souls, that each one has, from the rising of nativity [birth], an angel delegated for its guardianship." And the consent of all theologians follows this opinion.

Annotation CCCXIIII [contents]

"And let the peace of God abound in your hearts." — Colossians 3[:15]

[margin: Fascination [bewitchment].]

Chrysostom, [in] the eighth homily on the epistle to the Colossians — what he pronounced concerning the fascination [bewitchment] of old women bewitching boys, see above, Annotation 276 of this book.

Annotation CCCXV [contents]

"Let the word of Christ dwell in you." — Colossians 3[:16]

[margin: The common [vernacular] Bibles are to be read by all.]

Chrysostom, [in] the ninth homily on the epistle to the Colossians, says: "HEAR, I beseech [you], all ye seculars [laity]: procure for yourselves Bibles, the medicines [pharmaka] of the soul; if you wish nothing else, at least acquire the New Testament, the Acts of the Apostles, the gospels. Pore over these — nay, not only pore over [them], but take up (right column:) all, and retain them with the mind." The Lutherans object this passage to the Catholic bishops, who do not grant to all the reading of the vernacular Bibles, which Chrysostom admonishes to be bought by all the laity. See above, Annotation 152 of this volume.

Annotation CCCXVI [contents]

"When I was yet with you, [I told you these things], etc." — 2 Thessalonians 2[:5]

Chrysostom, [in] the third homily on the latter [epistle] to the Thessalonians: "All [things]," he says, "in the divine scriptures are clear and plain." See above, Annotation 152 of this book.

Annotation CCCXVII [contents]

"He who will not work, let him not eat." — 2 Thessalonians 3[:10]

[margin: Whether monks are to be compelled to provide for themselves a living by the labor of [their] hands.]

Augustine, in the book On the Work of Monks, which he almost wholly consumed [spent] on the exposition of this period [passage], thus interprets this sentence of the Apostle, that he seems to teach that all monks are to be driven [compelled] to acquire for themselves, by the labor of [their] hands, the [things] necessary for their sustenance, and at the same time [that they are] to be forbidden to seek their living from the alms of the faithful. For in many places of his book, but especially in chapter 17, he refutes the monks who, being unwilling to work with [their] hands, were saying that the aforesaid precept of Paul neither pertained to them, nor could be observed by them. But he confutes them with these words: "I DESIRE to know what those do who are unwilling to work bodily — to what thing they are at leisure. 'We are at leisure,' they say, 'for prayers, and psalms, and reading, and the word of God.'" Then, rejecting these four excuses as invalid — first, against that [excuse] concerning prayer, he says: "WHY do they not set aside some parts of the times for working, according to the apostolic precepts, since the prayer of one obeying is sooner heard than [that] of a thousand contemners?" Secondly, against that [excuse] concerning the occupation of psalm-singing, he says: "BUT they can easily sing the divine songs even while working with [their] hands, and console the very labor as with a divine rowing-chant [celeuma]. Or are you ignorant of the craftsmen — upon what vanities of theatrical fables they bestow their hearts and tongues, while [their] hands recede not from work? What, then, hinders the servant of God, working with [his] hands, from meditating in the law of the Lord and singing psalms — so indeed, that for the learning of those [things] which he would recall from memory, he have set-apart times?" Thirdly, to those alleging the assiduity of reading, he says: "BUT those who say they are at leisure for reading — do they not find there [in Scripture] that which the Apostle enjoins? What, then, is that perversity — to be unwilling to obey the reading, while one wishes to be at leisure for it; and, that what is good may be the longer read, for that reason to be unwilling to do what is read?" Fourthly, those who defend themselves by the exercise of divine preaching he thus convicts: "IF a discourse [sermon] is to be dispensed to someone, and he is so occupied that he cannot work with [his] hands: can all in the monastery do this? Why do all wish to be at leisure under this pretext? Although even if all could [preach], they ought to make [take] turns by vicissitude — not only that the rest might labor at the necessary [tasks] in the manner [aforesaid], but also because it suffices that one speak while many hear."

John Calvin, [in] chapter four of the Heretical Institution,

[catchword "quarto," → continues on p. 560 (PDF 565).]

(printed p. 560 [PDF p. 565], verso — Ann. CCCXVII continues (whether monks must earn their bread by manual labor): Calvin's fourth-chapter abuse of Augustine, shared earlier by William of Saint-Amour, Wycliffe, and Luther; the Council of Constance (session 8) condemning Wycliffe's 24th article; then Augustine's own four classes of monks who may by evangelical right live without manual labor — preachers of the word [Luke 10; 1 Cor. 9; Gal. 6], ministers of the altar [1 Cor. 9], the sick, and the delicately-reared — and Augustine's true target, the idle Psallian/Euchite/Massalian monks who wholly refused work [2 Thess. 3:10]. Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXVII continued, from the catchword "quarto,":)

—[chapter] four, gathers from these sayings of Augustine that it is not lawful for monks to procure their living from anywhere but from mechanical crafts, even if they be assiduous in prayers, psalmodies, and sacred studies. Which error, even before Calvin, William of Saint-Amour, John Wycliffe, and Luther professed: for these also asserted that monks who, work of the hands being omitted, procure a living for themselves by begging, are to be coerced, as enemies of the divine law, which says: [margin: Deut. 15.a] "There shall by no means be a needy man and a beggar among you." This error of theirs the Council of Constance, in the eighth session, in the condemnation of Wycliffe, condemned in these words:

"The 24th article of Wycliffe thus says: 'Let the brothers [friars] be bound to acquire a living by the labors of [their] hands, and not by begging.' The first part of this article is scandalous, and presumptuously asserted, inasmuch as it speaks so generally and indistinctly; and the second [is] erroneous, inasmuch as it asserts that begging is not lawful for the brothers." Thus the Council.

But the divine Augustine is so far from the opinion which the heretics preposterously gather from his sayings, that in the same volume he demonstrates — both by many reasons and by testimonies of divine scripture — that there are four kinds of monks to whom, by evangelical right, it is lawful to lead life without the labors of [their] hands, and to be sustained by the aids and oblations of others. Of these, [margin: [Augustine,] Book On the Work of Monks, ch. 6 & 7] in the first place he sets those who devote themselves to the preaching of evangelical doctrine, and teach the word of God; because to these Christ gave the power to take the [things] necessary for sustenance from the means of [their] hearers, when, sending the apostles to preach, he says: [margin: Luke 10] "Remain in their house, eating and drinking the [things] which are among them. For the laborer is worthy of his hire." And Paul, approving the same, in the former epistle to the Corinthians says: [margin: 1 Cor. 9.b] "The Lord ordained for those who announce the gospel, to live by the gospel." And again: "Who ever serves as a soldier at his own charges? Who plants a vineyard, and does not eat of its fruit? Who feeds a flock, and does not eat of the milk of the flock? If we have sown spiritual [things] for you, is it a great [thing] if we reap your carnal [things]?" And in the epistle to the Galatians, imposing the same law on hearers, he says: [margin: Gal. 6.b] "Let him who is catechized in the word communicate to him who catechizes him, in all good [things]." In the second place he sets those who serve the altar, or distribute the sacraments, or are detained by other ecclesiastical ministries and occupations; because concerning these Paul wrote in the same epistle to the Corinthians: [margin: 1 Cor. 9.b] "Know you not that those who work in the sacred [precinct] eat the [things] which are of the sacred [precinct]? and those who serve the altar partake with the altar? For so the Lord ordained." The third place he assigns to sick monks, laboring either with continual or with frequent sickness; concerning whom, in the 16th chapter of that book: "On account of bodily infirmities (he says), which by no means can be lacking, the Apostle not only permits the needs of the saints to be supplied by the good faithful, but even most wholesomely exhorts [it]." In the fourth place, finally, he subjoins certain monks, delicately and splendidly reared by [their] parents, who, the world being forsaken — and [their] riches either expended upon the poor, or conferred for the support of the monastery — have chosen the monastic life. These, because, being more softly nourished, they cannot bear labor, he exempts from the exercises of craftsmen; thus writing in chapter 25 of the same (right column:) work: "THOSE who, having relinquished — or distributed among the poor of Christ, with pious and wholesome humility — an ample or any kind of opulent means, have willed to be numbered [among the poor]: if they are strong in body, and are free from ecclesiastical occupations, although — [they] bringing so great a proof of their mind, and the needs of that same society [receiving] from those things which they had either very much or not a little — the common thing itself and fraternal charity owes them, in turn, the sustaining of their life; nevertheless, if they too work somewhat with [their] hands, that they may take away the excuse from the lazy who come from a humbler life [and] on this account [claim exemption from] the exercise, they act far more mercifully than when they divided all their [goods] among the needy. Which indeed, if they be unwilling [to do], who would dare to compel [them]? etc." Again, in the 21st chapter of the same book, more briefly touching upon these four conditions of monks in few words, he speaks after this manner: "OUR brothers, if they are evangelists, if ministers of the altar, if dispensers of the sacraments, do not arrogate this to themselves, but plainly vindicate [claim] the power of not laboring. If at least they had something in this world, whereby they might easily, without craft [-labor], sustain that life — which, being converted to God, they distributed to the needy — then their infirmity is to be believed, and to be borne. For such [men] are wont, not (as many think) better, but — which is true — being more feebly reared, to be unable to sustain the labor of bodily works." THUS Augustine: from which it appears clearer than light that he opposes the heretics, who, without any distinction, compel all the orders of monks to the labor of the hands, and forbid those who refuse to be aided by the alms of the pious.

BUT, lest the sayings of Augustine, brought forth by Calvin and other heretics, disturb anyone, it is to be known that he does not by these words impose upon all monks indiscriminately the necessity of laboring, but refutes a certain idle throng of monks, who — although with unimpaired strength they were rightly strong, and were free from the preaching of the word of God, and from the dispensation of the sacraments, and from all ecclesiastical service — nevertheless so shrank from labor that they even said it was not lawful for the servants of God, especially monks, to apply [themselves] to the works of the hands, and to be exercised in bodily crafts; but that they ought, without any cause of acquiring a living, to rest in prayers, readings, and songs alone, and to expect the necessaries of life from God, and to receive [them] from the friends of God, after the manner of the birds of heaven, and the flowers of the earth, which Christ set before his disciples to be imitated when he said: [margin: Matt. 6] "Be not solicitous what you shall eat, or wherewith your body shall be clothed. Regard the birds of heaven, for they neither sow, nor reap, nor gather into barns, and your heavenly Father feeds them. Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow: they labor not, neither do they spin. Be not, therefore, solicitous, saying, What shall we eat, or what shall we drink, or wherewith shall we be clothed? For all these things the nations seek." Therefore, against idle monks of this kind — who at that time in Africa were fostering this error, sprung from the Psallian, Euchite, and Massalian heretics — Augustine composed the book On the Work of Monks, in which he demonstrated three [things] especially. FIRST, that it is by no reason to be borne, that monks who, by no evangel-

[catchword "gelico" (evangelico) → continues on p. 561 (PDF 566).]

(printed p. 561 [PDF p. 566], recto — end of Ann. CCCXVII, then Ann. CCCXVIII–CCCXXI, on 2 Thessalonians 3 and 1 Timothy 3–5 (Augustine's three demonstrations against the idle monks concluded, and the two pious readings of Deut. 15 [Aquinas and Thomas Waldensis] answering the heretics' attack on religious mendicancy [2 Thess. 3:10]; whether a "bigamist" may be made a bishop — Jerome's affirmative vs. the "Cainan heresy," rejected by Pope Innocent I's decree [1 Tim. 3:2]; almost no difference between bishop and priest [1 Tim. 3:8]; whether God was seen by the angels before the Incarnation — Theodoret [1 Tim. 3:16]; and whether clerics may own anything beyond food and clothing [1 Tim. 5:18]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXVII concluded, from the catchword "gelico":)

—[by no] evangelical business, and [being] occupied by no ecclesiastical care, should pass an idle and inert life without any labor of the hands; since Paul, in the latter epistle to the Thessalonians, takes away from men of this kind the power of eating, [margin: 2 Thess. 3.e] saying: "When we were with you, this we declared to you: that if anyone will not work, neither let him eat. For we have heard that certain [people] among you walk disorderly, working nothing, but acting curiously [as busybodies]; but to those who are of this sort we declare, and beseech [them] in the Lord Jesus Christ, that, working with silence, they eat their own bread." SECONDLY, he shows that to monks — even [those] occupied with the ministry of the church and the office of preaching — the crafts of artificers are not forbidden by Christ; but that they can, if they will, and if it so be expedient for the salvation of souls, sometimes procure for themselves by some craft the [things] necessary for a living, after the imitation of Paul — who, although (as he himself writes in the former [epistle] to the Corinthians) [margin: 1 Cor. 9] he had the power of living by the gospel without the labor of the hands, nevertheless testifies in the second [epistle] to the Thessalonians that he was unwilling to use that power, but lived by mechanical work, that he might present himself as an example of laboring voluntarily. For thus in that epistle he addresses them: "You yourselves know how it behooves [you] to imitate us: since we were not in idleness among you, neither did we eat bread of anyone for nothing, but in labor and fatigue, working night and day, lest we should burden any of you: not as if we had not the power, but that we might give ourselves as a pattern to you for imitation." [margin: Book On the Work of Monks, ch. 26] THIRDLY, he rejects the excuses of idle monks, painted over [disguised] with a perverse interpretation of the scriptures. For [as] to that which they say — that our Savior commanded the apostles to live after the manner of the birds, without any solicitude — Augustine shows that it was not said by Christ for this reason: to lead away his disciples from honest labor of the hands to idleness and sloth, the seed-bed of all evils; but that he might instruct them, lest by the solicitude of acquiring a living they should forsake the evangelical vocation — [they] fearing lest, being detained in the apostolic ministry, the providence of the most high Father should be lacking to them; who, since he feeds the birds — [which] work nothing at all — for nothing, why should he not nourish his sons, laboring in the work of God? The aim, therefore, of Augustine in the book On the Work of Monks is not that which the heretics boast — namely, that monks be relegated to the workshops of craftsmen — but that idle monks, and those who think the labors of artificers forbidden to them, be recalled from base idleness to honest business. Thus far concerning the labor of the hands.

THERE REMAINS now that passage cited from Deuteronomy — namely, [margin: Deut. 15.a] "There shall not be a needy man and a beggar among you" — which the heretics, with wrenched neck [violently], drag against religious mendicancy. To this two Thomases brought two pious explanations: [Thomas] Aquinas, and [Thomas] Waldensis. Of these, the latter [Waldensis], in the work which he inscribed On the Doctrine of the Ancient Faith, in the fourth book of the second tome, says that those words are not prohibitory, but promissory — that is, that by these God does not forbid begging, but promises to the Jews (if, however, they keep the law) so great an affluence of riches, that no one among them will be needy and a beggar. Which exposition those promises prove to be true, which Moses immediately sub- (right column:) joins to the aforesaid words, saying: "The Lord will bless thee, as he has promised. Thou shalt lend to many nations, and thyself shalt take a loan from none. Thou shalt rule over very many nations, and no one shall rule over thee, etc." But the divine Thomas [Aquinas], in the Secunda Secundae, question 187, article 5, more aptly and (as I judge) more genuinely elucidating the same passage, holds that by that sentence a pious and just begging is not forbidden, but that the rich are restrained, lest they be so tenacious of their riches that, for that cause, the poor be reduced to extreme want, and driven to compelled beggary. See above, Annotations 18, 147, and 192.

Annotation CCCXVIII [contents]

"A bishop must be the husband of one wife." — 1 Timothy 3[:2]

[margin: Whether it is lawful to constitute a bigamist a bishop.]

Jerome, in the epistle to Oceanus, expounding the present passage, affirms that those can be created bishops who had two wives — one before baptism, and, she being dead, another after baptism; and the opinion of those who deny this he calls the Cainan heresy [Cainam haeresim]. This same [thing] he has in the exposition of the first chapter to Titus. This opinion is rejected in the decrees of the pontiffs, cause 28, question 3, where the decree of Pope Innocent the First is had in these words: "WHOEVER before baptism had one [wife], and after baptism another, is judged a bigamist [digamus]; and although he be strong in the merit of [his] life, and in the knowledge of industry, nevertheless he cannot be ordained a bishop." Sedulius Scotus, in the explanation of the third chapter of the former epistle to Timothy, embraces the opinion of Jerome. See below, Annotation 225.

Annotation CCCXIX [contents]

"Deacons in like manner chaste, etc." — 1 Timothy 3[:8]

[margin: Bishop, and presbyter.]

Chrysostom, [in] the eleventh homily on the former [epistle] to Timothy, asserts that between a bishop and a priest [sacerdotem] there is almost no difference. The Author of the commentaries [ascribed to] Jerome writes the same in this place. See below, Annotation 324.

Annotation CCCXX [contents]

"He appeared to angels, he was preached to the nations, etc." — 1 Timothy 3[:16]

[margin: Whether God, before the incarnation of Christ, was seen by the angels.]

Theodoret, in the commentaries, expounding this passage, intimates that God, before the flesh assumed by Christ, was not seen by the angels, but afterwards was seen through the flesh of Christ, as through a veil. For thus he says: "HE was seen by angels. For the nature of the divinity, which falls not under sight, not even the angels themselves saw; but the incarnate [God] they saw." This same [thing] he teaches more openly and copiously, by a long narration, in the dialogue whose title is IMMUTABILIS [The Immutable]. This thou hast above, Annotation 182 of this book.

Annotation CCCXXI [contents]

"The laborer is worthy of his hire." — 1 Timothy 5[:18]

[margin: Whether clerics ought to possess anything beyond food and clothing.]

Chrysostom, [in] the former [epistle] to Timothy, homily 15: "To the Levites," he says, "there had been rendered, constituted by law, tithes, gold, first-fruits, vows, and very many other [things]. But to them, by the law, these [things] by right per-

[signature "Aaa"; catchword "per-" → continues on p. 562 (PDF 567).]

(printed p. 562 [PDF p. 567], verso — end of Ann. CCCXXI, then Ann. CCCXXII–CCCXXIIII, on 1 Timothy 5 and Titus 1 (clerics ought to have nothing beyond food and clothing [1 Tim. 5:18]; the punishment of blasphemers — Chrysostom's fierce "strike the blasphemer's mouth" petition, excused as zealous hyperbole [1 Tim. 5:23]; angels created long before the visible world — Jerome on Titus [Titus 1:2]; and the great question whether a bishop is greater than a presbyter — Jerome's identification of the two [flagged by Augustine as Aerius's error], with Ambrosiaster and Chrysostom nearly agreeing [Titus 1:5]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXXI concluded, from the catchword "per-":)

—were permitted [to them], [namely] to those seeking only present and earthly [things]. But I would boldly say that the prelates of the church ought to have nothing beyond food and clothing, lest they be drawn to those [things] by desire." These [things] have been observed [in] Annotation 121 of this book.

Annotation CCCXXII [contents]

"Use a little wine." — 1 Timothy 5[:23]

[margin: The punishment of blasphemers.]

Chrysostom, [in] the first homily to the people of Antioch, when, after the exposition of this passage, he had diverted to a discourse on blasphemy, brought forth, among other [things], this petition against blasphemers: "BUT after words have been made by us concerning blasphemy, I wish to ask one retribution [recompense] from you all for this assembly and sermon: that you chastise for me those who blaspheme in the city; and if you hear anyone at the crossroads and in the marketplace blaspheming God, approach, rebuke [him]; and if it be needful to inflict blows, refuse not: strike his face with the palm, bruise his mouth, sanctify thy hand by the striking. And if any accuse [thee], and if they drag [thee] to prison" — there follows — "and if the judge demand penalties before the tribunal, say with freedom [boldness], that he blasphemed the king of the angels. For if it behooves that one blaspheming an earthly king be punished, much more [must one punish] him who afflicts that [heavenly king] with contumely."

THERE ARE [some] to whom this petition of Chrysostom seems harsh, and little worthy of the modesty of an evangelical doctor. But they excuse [it], because a burning zeal of the divine honor, and a most keen hatred of blasphemy, compelled the man of God — flagrant [ablaze] with charity — to exceed the mark, and, according to the old proverb, to ask much, that he might at least obtain a little, and sometimes to demand unjust [things], that he might receive just [things].

Annotation CCCXXIII [contents]

"Which God promised before the ages of the world." — Titus 1[:2]

[margin: Angels existing long before the world.]

Jerome, in the commentary on the epistle to Titus, explaining this, teaches that the angels were founded [created] before this visible world, saying: "SIX thousand years of our world are not yet fulfilled: and how many eternities before — how many times, how many origins of ages — is it to be thought there were, in which the angels, thrones, dominations, and the other virtues served God, and, without the vicissitudes of times and measures, subsisted at God's bidding?" Inspect [look at] Annotation five of the fifth book.

Annotation CCCXXIIII [contents]

"That thou mayest constitute presbyters throughout the cities." — Titus 1[:5]

(The printed running-head cites "Tim. 1," but the annotation expounds the epistle to Titus.)

[margin: Whether a bishop is greater than a presbyter.]

Jerome, in the commentary on the epistle to Titus, elucidating this period, is believed to be of the opinion of those who teach that a bishop is not superior to a simple priest [sacerdote], but that both are the same. Which opinion Augustine, in the book On Heresies, chapter 53, numbers among the condemned errors of Aerius. The words of Jerome are these: "LET US diligently attend to the words of the Apostle, saying, 'That thou mayest constitute presbyters throughout the cities.' For the same is a presbyter who [is] a bishop; and before, by the devil's instinct, partisanships in religion came to be, and it was said among the peoples, [margin: 1 Cor. 1.b] 'I am of Paul, I of Apollo, but I of Cephas,' the churches were governed by the common counsel of presbyters. But after each one thought those whom he had baptized to be his own, not Christ's, it was decreed in the whole world that one chosen from the presbyters should be set over the rest, to whom the whole care of the church should pertain, and the seeds of schisms be taken away. Does anyone think this to be not the scriptures', but our own opinion — [namely] that a bishop and a presbyter are one, and that the one [word] is of seniority, the other a name of office? Let the words of the Apostle to the Philippians be re-read, saying: [margin: Phil. 1.a] 'Paul and Timothy, to the saints who are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons, grace and peace.' Philippi is one city of Macedonia; and certainly in one city there could not be more bishops, as they are [now] named. But because at that time they called the same [men] bishops and presbyters, therefore he spoke indifferently of bishops, as of presbyters. Still, [lest] this seem ambiguous to anyone, unless it be proved by another testimony: in the Acts of the Apostles it is written, that when the Apostle came to Miletus, he sent to Ephesus, and called the presbyters of that same church, to whom afterward, among other [things], he thus spoke: [margin: Acts 20.b] 'Take heed to yourselves, and to the whole flock, in which the Holy Spirit has placed you bishops.' And here diligently (right column:) observe, in what manner he called the presbyters of one city, Ephesus, afterward the same [men] bishops. These [things] we said for this reason, that we might show that among the ancients the same were presbyters whom [they called] also bishops; but by little and little, that the seed-plots of dissensions might be plucked up, all the solicitude was deferred [transferred] to one. As, therefore, the presbyters know that they, by the custom of the church, are subject to him who shall have been set over them: so let the bishops know that they are greater than the presbyters more by custom than by the truth of the Lord's disposition, and that they ought to rule the church in common." These [things] Jerome.

Ambrose [Ambrosiaster] is thought to favor the opinion of Jerome in the commentaries on the fourth chapter of the epistle to the Ephesians, thus saying: "NOT in all [things] do the writings of the Apostle agree with the ordination which now is in the church, because these were written in the very beginnings. For he also calls Timothy — created a presbyter by himself — a bishop, because the first presbyters were called bishops; so that, he departing, the next might succeed to him. Finally, in Egypt the presbyters consecrate [seal], if a bishop be not present. But because the following presbyters began to be found unworthy to hold the primacies, the method was changed — the council [taking] foresight, that not order [seniority], but merit, should create a bishop, constituted by the judgment of many priests; lest an unworthy [man] should rashly usurp [it], and be a scandal to many."

Chrysostom seems not to differ much from both [parties], [in] the fifteenth homily on the former [epistle] to Timothy, thus writing: "AFTER he had spoken of bishops, the order of presbyters being omitted, he passes to the diaconate. Why that, I ask? Because, namely, between a bishop and a presbyter there is almost no difference. For to the presbyters also the care of the church has been committed; and [the things] which he said of bishops agree also to presbyters. For by ordination alone are they superior to those; and in this only do they seem to have more than presbyters."

The Author of the commentaries on Paul, which are inscribed to Jerome, in the explanation of the third chap-

[catchword "tis" (capitis) → continues on p. 563 (PDF 568).]

---

(printed p. 563 [PDF p. 568], recto — end of Ann. CCCXXIIII, then Ann. CCCXXV–CCCXXVIII, on Titus 1–2 and Hebrews 1 (the bishop-vs-presbyter question concluded — the Author on Jerome, Sedulius, Anselm, Thomas Waldensis, Alfonso de Castro admitting Jerome erred, the sacramental-order reading, and Trent session 23 canon 7 on holy orders; whether a "bigamist" may be chosen bishop — Jerome's answer [Titus 1:6]; the "daily bread" as spiritual food [Titus 2:11]; whether Hebrews is Paul's — Ambrose of Compsa vs. Cajetan [Heb. 1:1]; and whether the Father is the "cause" of the Son — Aquinas on Theodoret, defended via the Greek "principle/principiate" usage and Gregory of Nyssa [Heb. 1:3]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXXIIII concluded, from the catchword "tis":)

—[the third chap]ter of the former [epistle] to Timothy, handing down almost the same [things], thus speaks: "IT IS ASKED, why he made no mention of presbyters, but comprehended them under the name of bishops? Because [the presbyterate] is the second, nay almost one [and the same] grade; as [he shows when] he writes to the Philippians [addressing] bishops and deacons, [margin: Phil. 1.a] since one city cannot have several bishops. And in the Acts of the Apostles, gathering the presbyters of the church [as he was] about to go to Jerusalem, he says among other [things]: [margin: Acts 20.b] 'See to the flock, in which the Holy Spirit has ordained you bishops.'"

Sedulius Scotus, in the Collectanea on the epistle to Titus, gathered this same opinion, excerpted from the commentaries of Jerome on Titus, [and] repeated in [the same] words.

Anselm, bishop of Canterbury, in the commentaries on Titus, expounds the present clause of the Apostle in almost the same manner.

Thomas, bishop [i.e. Thomas Waldensis], writing against Wycliffe the heresiarch — who from the authority of Jerome equated a priest with a bishop — says that it is indeed had from Jerome that bishops are presbyters; but that between bishops and presbyters there is no distinction of grade, that cannot be deduced from his words. But because the sayings of Jerome plainly convict him of making priests equal to bishops, therefore Alfonso de Castro, in the sixth book Against Heresies, does not fear to confess that Jerome in this part erred; and, responding to those [things] which are brought by him from the epistle to the Philippians and from the Acts of the Apostles, says that it is true that at that time presbyters were also called bishops, because the distinction of the words had not yet been made; but that from this it is not gathered that presbyters and bishops were altogether the same. There are [some] who think that Jerome equated a presbyter with a bishop, and pronounced both the same — not indeed in the power of jurisdiction, in which certainly a bishop is far greater than a presbyter, but in the sacrament of order, in which indeed a presbyter differs nothing from a bishop, nor has a priest anything more than a bishop. For the sacrament is the same to both, and the same force of the sacrament — the character, and the grace — is in both. To this sense likewise they judge the sayings of Ambrose, Chrysostom, Anselm, and the Anonymous author are to be interpreted — especially since Ambrose [Ambrosiaster], on the former [epistle] to Timothy, chapter 4, opening his mind, expresses this same understanding in these words: "A BISHOP and presbyters are one ordination (for each is a priest); but the bishop is first, so that every bishop is a presbyter, yet not every presbyter a bishop. For he is a bishop, who is first among the presbyters." Thus Alfonso: to whose opinion it pleases [us] to subjoin the canon which is had concerning this matter [in] session 23 of the Council of Trent, in these words:

"IF ANYONE shall say, that bishops are not superior to presbyters; or that they have not the power of confirming and ordaining; or that [the power] which they have is common to them with the presbyters; or that orders conferred by them are invalid without the consent or calling of the people, or of the secular power; or that those who have neither been rightly ordained by ecclesiastical and canonical power, nor sent, but come from elsewhere, are lawful ministers of the word and of the sacraments: let him be anathema."

(right column:)

Annotation CCCXXV [contents]

"If any is without crime, the husband of one wife." — Titus 1[:6]

[margin: Whether a bigamist is to be chosen for bishop.]

Jerome, in the commentary on the epistle to Titus, thus expounds this passage: "MANY, more superstitiously than truly, think that even those who, when they were gentiles, had one wife — she being lost [dead], [they] after the baptism of Christ took another — are not to be chosen [legendos] in the priesthood; whereas surely, if this is to be observed, those rather ought to be barred from the episcopate who, before, exercising a wandering lust through harlots, received one wife [only after being] regenerated [baptized]. And [it is] much more detestable to have fornicated with many, than to be found a bigamist. For in the one [there] is the infelicity of matrimony; in the other, a lasciviousness prone to sin." Anselm, bishop of Canterbury, repeats almost the [same] in this place. See above, Annotation 318 of this book.

Annotation CCCXXVI [contents]

"The grace of God has appeared." — Titus 2[:11]
[margin: Daily bread.]

Jerome in this place affirms that the petition of daily bread, which we ask in the Lord's Prayer, is not to be understood of corporeal bread, but of spiritual food only. Read Annotation 31 of the present book.

Annotation CCCXXVII [contents]

"In many portions, and in many manners." — Hebrews 1[:1]
[margin: Whether the epistle to the Hebrews is Paul's.]

Ambrose of Compsa chides Thomas Cajetan, [in] the first book of the Annotations, because in the preface of the epistle to the Hebrews he taught that the author of that same epistle is not Paul the Apostle, but another — a writer of uncertain name, unskilled in the Hebrew tongue — who wrote some [things] against the truth of the old scripture, and wrested certain testimonies from it to Christ, which cannot pertain to Christ. Thou hast this argument treated more than enough [satis superque] in the following book, in the confutation of the eighth heresy.

Annotation CCCXXVIII [contents]

"Who, since he is the splendor of glory." — Hebrews 1[:3.a] [margin: Whether the Father is the cause of the Son.]

The divine Thomas [Aquinas] notes Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, in the book Against the Errors of the Greeks, because in the commentaries on the epistle to the Hebrews he wrote that the Father is the cause of the Son. Which locution the Latin Church abhors, lest it afford an occasion that the Son be understood [as] "caused" and "made," according to the understanding of the philosophers — among whom the same is "caused" as "made." But he [Aquinas] admonishes that this is a custom peculiar to the Greek fathers, that they use the name of "cause" and "caused" in divine [matters], yet not with this end, that they introduce a diversity of nature into the divine persons, and show the Son [to be] a making [factura] of the Father; but that by these words they explain that which we signify by the name of "principle" and "principiate [that-which-is-from-a-principle]." This Gregory of Nyssa openly testifies, saying: "BUT saying 'cause' and 'caused,' we do not signify nature by these names. For neither [do] these names, in place of essence [essen-

[signature "Aaa 2"; catchword "essen-" (essentiae) → continues on p. 564 (PDF 569).]

(printed p. 564 [PDF p. 569], verso — end of Ann. CCCXXVIII, then Ann. CCCXXIX–CCCXXXII, on Hebrews 1–4 (the Greek "cause/caused" defended as "principle/principiate" [Heb. 1:3]; whether there are two persons in Christ — Chrysostom's "God and man" suspected corrupt for "God and God," with Theophylact [Heb. 1:9]; whether the celestial bodies are to be burned up — Ambrose of Compsa's two school-rejected opinions, deferred to Ann. 340 [Heb. 1:11]; whether Christ was "lessened" from God — Ambrose of Compsa's sharp attack on Cajetan's substantial/personal distinction [Heb. 2:7]; and whether laity and monks are held equally — Chrysostom that all the same law binds both, only marriage excepted [Heb. 4:16]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXXVIII concluded, from the catchword "essen-":)

—[do we give these names, in place] of essence, or by way of nature; but we demonstrate how [the relation] stands — namely, that the Son is not unbegotten, and that we do not show the Father [to be] from anyone by any generation."

Annotation CCCXXIX [contents]

"God, thy God, has anointed thee." — Hebrews 1[:9]

[margin: Whether in Christ there are two persons.]

Chrysostom, [in] the third homily on the epistle to the Hebrews, seems to place two persons in Christ, divine and human — which the theologians judge it unlawful [nefas] both to say and to think. For thus he speaks: "WHAT is [that] which he says, 'God, thy God'? Here he struck the Jews, and Paul of Samosata, and the Arians, and Marcellus, and Sabellius. In what manner? The Jews indeed, by showing them two persons, God and man." I suspect this passage in the Greek codices also to be corrupted [depraved]; and, for that which in them is written Θεὸν καᾶ ὶνθρωπον [Theòn kaì ánthrōpon], that is, "God and man," [I suspect] it is to be read Θεὸν καὶ Θεὸν [Theòn kaì Theòn], that is, "God and God." Occasion of the suspicion is afforded by a twin conjecture. Of these the former is, that Theophylact, reporting these same words of Chrysostom — the mention of "man" being omitted, and the name of God being placed twice — thus writes: "This fights against the Jews, and Sabellius, and Marcellus, as indicating two persons, God and God." The other conjecture is, that the reduplication of the particle "God" fits most aptly with the proposed sentence of Paul, in which, by the twin name of God, it is said, "God, thy God, has anointed thee" — [namely] for the expression of two persons, the Jews, Sabellius, and Marcellus gainsaying, who acknowledge only one person of the deity. But if anyone urge that the reading of the Greek codices is entire [sound], and that it is to be read, "Two persons, God and man," we shall not much resist — provided that we understand by "man" to be signified the person of Christ, God and man at once; but by "God," the person of the Father, or of the Holy Spirit.

Annotation CCCXXX [contents]

"The heavens themselves shall perish, but thou shalt remain; and all, like a garment, shall grow old." — Hebrews 1[:11]

[margin: Whether the celestial bodies are to be burned up.]

Ambrose of Compsa, in the commentaries on the epistle to the Hebrews, explaining this versicle, brings forth two opinions, not received by the schools of theologians: of which the former is, that the heavens are to be set aflame by fires at the end of the world, and thereafter, as by a certain re-fusion [remolding], are to obtain a far better state; the latter is, that the earth, renewed by the same fires, will be the perpetual habitation of those men who shall be found worthy neither of heaven nor of hell. Both assertions he confirms in the commentary of the latter epistle of Peter, where thou shalt find these [things] more amply annotated, Annotation 340.

Annotation CCCXXXI [contents]

"Thou hast lessened him a little less than the Angels." — Hebrews 2[:7]

[margin: Whether Christ was diminished from God.]

Thomas Cajetan, explaining these [words] in the commentaries, Ambrose [of Compsa], [in] the fourth book of the Annotations, accuses with these words: "NEW, and unheard-of, and unspeakable [is that which] he teaches in this place — namely, that Christ (right column:) is a little diminished from God according to substantial being; because he is God personally. But God is God both naturally and personally. Therefore he is a little diminished from God, because he is indeed God according to personal being (which is agreed to be substantial), but not according to nature. Thus he." But what theologian ever spoke thus, and in the same person separated these — namely, person and essence? Falsely, then, did the most holy synod and the whole church acclaim the homoousion — that is, consubstantial or co-essential! Besides, whatever is less than God in any manner whatsoever is not "a little less," as he teaches, but is infinitely less than He. I pass over [the fact] that he destroys his own self: for if personal being is substantial being, as he says, then to be God according to personal being is to be God according to substantial being. Let the learned, therefore, see to these [things] — whether they be to be approved, or to be eliminated — which so clearly fight with the celebrated profession of our faith.

Annotation CCCXXXII [contents]

"Let us therefore approach with confidence to the throne of grace." — Hebrews 4[:16]

[margin: Whether the laity and monks are equal — [their] obligations and offenses [being] equal.]

Chrysostom, [in] the seventh homily on the epistle to the Hebrews, seems to think, that to the laity [saecularibus] nothing more is lawful than to monks, except to have a wife; but in the rest they are held to live equally; nay, that — fornication excepted, which is graver in monks — the sins of the laity are as grave as [those] of monks. His words are these: "BUT what [have] labors, readings, vigils, fasts to do with us (sayest thou), who are not monks? These [things] thou sayest to me; say [them] to Paul when he says, [margin: Col. 4.a] 'Watching in all patience and prayer'; when he says, [margin: Rom. 13.d] 'Make not provision for the flesh in [its] concupiscences.' For he wrote thus not to monks only, but to all who were in the cities. For a secular man ought not to have anything more than a monk, except to cohabit with a wife only. For in this he has pardon, but in others by no means; but he ought to do all [things] equally as a monk." This same [thing], in the third book against the vituperators of the monastic life, more clearly and fully explaining, he thus writes: "BUT (thou wilt say) it is not of the same crime, for him who is addicted to the world to sin, and [for] him who once, and utterly, has devoted himself to God, to fall from the purpose of religion. For neither do both fall from the same height, so neither indeed do they receive the same wounds. Thou deceivest thyself utterly, and beguilest [thyself], if thou thinkest one [thing] to be required from secular men, another from monks. For this is almost the sole difference in either kind of life: that they [laymen] indeed bind themselves with the bonds of matrimony, but these [monks] endure free from these. But in the rest a common, and the same, method of the whole life is required from both; and to the same, for [their] faults, one [and the same] penalty is owed to all. For he who is angry at his brother without cause — whether he be a secular or a monk — offends God equally. And he who looks upon a woman, and covets her — in whatever state of life he be — is smitten with the same penalty of adultery. Nay rather (that we may dare to add something from ourselves, which may seem consonant to reason), he will sin more, without any hope of pardon, who from the world [secular life] has committed that crime. For neither [is it an equal misdeed] to commit—

[catchword "tere" (committere) → continues on p. 565 (PDF 570).]

(printed p. 565 [PDF p. 570], recto — end of Ann. CCCXXXII, then Ann. CCCXXXIII–CCCXXXVII, on Hebrews 4–12 and James 1 (Chrysostom's laity-vs-monks parity concluded, with Aquinas's twofold distinction of monastic sin [Heb. 4:16]; the beginning of salvation from the human will with grace preventing [Heb. 7:10]; heaven neither mobile nor spherical — Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact [Heb. 8:2]; whether the saints' souls yet enjoy the divine vision before judgment [Heb. 11:37]; confession to God alone vs. to a priest [Heb. 12:17]; and whether the epistle of James is canonical — Ambrose of Compsa vs. Cajetan, with Jerome affirming James's authorship [James 1:1]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXXXII concluded, from the catchword "tere":)

—[to] commit [an equal misdeed], it seems, [for] him who, propped by the solace of a wife, is entangled by the comeliness of the woman, and [for] him who, destitute of such help and remedy of [his] infirmity, is nevertheless sometimes seized by this plague [of lust]." Thus far Chrysostom.

THERE ARE [some] who think that the monks of whom Chrysostom speaks were different from those whom the church now has — bound by monastic vows and by the constitutions of their founders and leaders — but were so like to seculars, that, beyond the voluntary institute of celibacy, they had no obligation of profession which bound them more than seculars. There are also [some] who think that Chrysostom uttered such [things] by hyperbole, to drive away the slothful and dull opinion of certain seculars, who thought that prayers, fasts, and vigils were imposed by Christ upon monks only. The divine Thomas [Aquinas], in the Secunda Secundae, question 186, discerning monastic sins by a twofold distinction, says that some are done either against the vows of profession, or from contempt of the offense, or with scandal of neighbors — and these he judges far graver and worse than crimes of the same kind committed by seculars; but others are admitted from frailty, or ignorance, without transgression of the vow and scandal of the neighbor — which indeed he shows to be lesser and lighter, at least for this reason: that they are absorbed by the many good works which the monk does, and are much more easily forsaken by him. And that Chrysostom regarded these [things] can be an argument [from the fact] that he says, "The secular will sin more, without any hope of pardon, [in] that he looks upon a woman and covets [her], than the monk. For neither does he seem to commit an equal misdeed, who, propped by the solace of a wife, is entangled by the comeliness of the woman, and he who, destitute of such help and remedy of [his] infirmity, is nevertheless sometimes seized by this plague."

Annotation CCCXXXIII [contents]

"For he was yet in the loins of [his] father." — Hebrews 7[:10]
[margin: Whence the beginning of salvation.]

Chrysostom, [in] the twelfth homily on the Hebrews, explaining this, seems to attribute the beginning of our salvation to the human will, [with] the divine grace preventing [going before], while he says: "IT BEHOOVES us, namely, first to choose the [things] which are good, and then he himself introduces the [things] which are his own. He does not precede our wills, lest free will be injured; but when we shall have chosen, then he brings us much assistance." This same [thing] he repeats in very many places. See above, Annotation 101 of the fifth book, and Annotation 184 of this book.

Annotation CCCXXXIIII [contents]

"Of the true tabernacle, which God fixed, and not man." — Hebrews 8[:2]
[margin: The state and figure of heaven.]

Chrysostom, [in] the fourteenth homily on the Hebrews, hints that heaven is neither mobile nor spherical. Theodoret, in the commentaries, follows the same opinion. Theophylact, in the commentaries: "HENCE (he says) observe, according to the divine John Chrysostom, that heaven is neither round, nor (right column:) mobile: for both [these things] he takes away, [by] that which he says, 'God fixed [it].'" See Annotations three and nine of the fifth book.

Annotation CCCXXXV [contents]

"They went about in sheepskins [melotae], in goatskins." — Hebrews 11[:37]
[margin: Whether the souls of the saints are yet blessed.]

Chrysostom, [in] the 28th homily on the epistle to the Hebrews, narrating this, indicates that the souls of the saints, before the day of judgment, do not enjoy the divine vision. Read above, Annotation 264 of this book, and below, 345. Theodoret writes this same [thing] in this place. See there [ibidem]. Theophylact brings the same opinion hither. See there. Oecumenius similarly expounds. See the same Annotations.

Annotation CCCXXXVI [contents]

"He found no place of penance." — Hebrews 12[:17]
[margin: Confession.]

Chrysostom, [in] the 31st homily on the epistle to the Hebrews, alludes to the dogma of those who think that sins are to be confessed to God alone, and not to a priest [sacerdoti], for he says: "I DO NOT tell thee, that thou betray thyself in public, that thou accuse thyself before others, etc." See Annotation 175 of the preceding book.

Annotation CCCXXXVII [contents]

"James, [servant] of God and of our Lord Jesus Christ." — James 1[:1]

[margin: Whether the epistle of James is canonical.]

The exposition of Thomas Cajetan applied to this passage, Ambrose of Compsa, [in] the first book of the Annotations, confutes, writing these [things]: "I HAVE noted, moreover, concerning the epistle of James, those words which he [Cajetan] writes: 'It is not altogether certain whether this epistle be of James, the brother of the Lord — Jerome saying, in the book On Illustrious Men: "James, the brother of the Lord, wrote only one epistle, which is of the seven canonical" — which itself also is asserted [to be] by some other under his name, although by little and little, with time proceeding, it obtained authority. The salutation is so pure [plain], that it is conformable to no salutation of any other apostolic epistle. For it sounds nothing of God, nothing of Jesus Christ, nothing of grace [or] of peace, but [gives a] salutation after a profane manner; nor does he name himself an Apostle, but only a servant of Jesus Christ; from which, joined together at once, the author is rendered less certain.' Thus he [Cajetan]. But I have marveled, first, that he elicits from the words of Jerome that the author of this epistle is not certain — since Jerome so expressly says (and not as one doubting, but as one asserting) that James, the brother of the Lord, wrote this epistle; and asserts that it is one of the seven canonical, and that, with time proceeding, it obtained authority. And to Paulinus he thus says: 'JAMES, Peter, John, Jude — [these] seven wrote epistles, as mystical, so succinct — brief and long; brief in words, long in sentences [meanings]: so that rare is he who does not go blind [caecutiat] in the reading of them.' But as to what Cajetan adds — that the salutation is conformable to no salutation of any other apostolic epistle — it has nothing of moment. For John too is like to none in this—

[signature "Aaa 3"; catchword "hoc" → continues on p. 566 (PDF 571).]

---

(printed p. 566 [PDF p. 571], verso — end of Ann. CCCXXXVII, then Ann. CCCXXXVIII–CCCXL, on James 1, 5 and 2 Peter 3 (the canonicity of James concluded — Cajetan's "profane salutation" argument would condemn the whole apostolic council [James 1:1]; whether Christians may swear at all — Oecumenius [James 5:12]; whether extreme unction may be ministered by any layman — Bede and Pope Innocent I, then Cajetan denying James speaks of the sacrament, refuted by Ambrose of Compsa and by Trent session 14 canon 1 [James 5:14]; and whether the heavens are to be burned in the world-conflagration — Ambrose of Compsa's two school-rejected opinions [2 Pet. 3:10]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXXXVII concluded, from the catchword "hoc":)

—this, [John,] who, having no salutation at all, at once bursts into that [text], "That which was from the beginning, etc." That is altogether marvelous, that he [Cajetan] says there is nothing of Jesus Christ in this salutation, since it begins from here, "James, servant of Jesus Christ." Then, [as to] that which he notes as though profane — [namely] to say "greeting [salutem]" thus baldly — he condemns not so much this Apostle as, at once, all [the apostles], and the whole apostolic council, who with these words saluted those to whom they sent the epistle: "The apostles and elder brethren, to those who are at Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia, the brethren from among the gentiles, greeting." Read the following book, in the confutation of the ninth heresy, objection first, second, third, and fourth.

Annotation CCCXXXVIII [contents]

"Before all things, my brethren, swear not." — James 5[:12]
[margin: Oath.]

Oecumenius, in the Collectanea, in this place seems to forbid the right of swearing altogether to Christians. See Annotation 26 of this book.

Annotation CCCXXXIX [contents]

"Is anyone sick among you? Let him bring in the presbyters of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with holy oil." — James 5[:14]
[margin: Whether extreme unction can be ministered by any layman whatsoever.]

Bede the presbyter, in the commentaries on the epistle of James, elucidating this saying, seems to think that the sacrament of extreme unction can be conferred not only by presbyters, but also by any layman [a quouis laico]; for he says: "THIS also we read the Apostles to have done in the Gospel; and now the custom of the church holds, that the sick be anointed with consecrated oil by presbyters, and healed with accompanying prayer. Nor [is it lawful] to presbyters only, but — as Pope Innocent writes — it is even lawful for all Christians to use the same oil in anointing, in their own or their [household's] necessity. Which oil, however, it is not lawful to confect [prepare] except by bishops. For [as to] that which he says, 'With oil in the name of the Lord,' it signifies oil consecrated in the name of the Lord." The words cited by Bede are extant in the epistle of Pope Innocent the First to Decentius, bishop of Gubbio [Eugubium].

Thomas Cajetan, in the commentaries, examining this passage, thus writes: "NEITHER from the words, nor from the effect, do these words speak of the sacramental unction of extreme unction, but rather of an unction which the Lord Jesus instituted in the gospel to be exercised upon the sick, etc. For the text does not say, 'Is anyone sick unto death?' but absolutely, 'Is anyone sick?' And it says the effect [is] the alleviation of the sick; and of the remission of sins it speaks only conditionally. Since extreme [unction] is not given except on account of the point of death, and directly (as its form sounds) tends to the remission of sins — besides this, [namely] that James commands many presbyters to be called to one sick man, both praying and anointing, which is alien from the rite of extreme unction." This opinion of Thomas [Cajetan], Ambrose [of Compsa], [in] the fifth book, confutes with these words: "I GRIEVE vehemently, that he has attempted to take away from us the testimonies of the sacred unction, which are received from Mark, and from James the Apostle. [margin: Mark 6.b] For [as to] that which Mark testifies of the disciples — that they anointed the sick with oil — he denies that this can be understood of the sacrament which the church uses. But why it cannot be so under-(right column:) stood, he proves no otherwise than by this: 'He himself said [it]' — which was [the manner] of the Pythagoreans — 'is to be observed toward him' — especially since Bede and Thomas and many others contradict [him]. Similarly, concerning that which the blessed James says, 'Is anyone sick among you,' he thus judges: 'Neither from the words, nor from the effect, do these words speak of the sacramental unction of extreme unction, but rather of an unction which the Lord Jesus instituted to be exercised upon the sick, etc.' But these [things], as they are surely ineptly [said] (for what is it that he says, 'the unction of extreme unction'? what is 'the unction of an unction'?), so are they also falsely said. For why do the words not agree? 'Because,' says he, 'it is not there said, "If anyone is sick unto death."' Likewise, because the effect of that unction is the alleviation of the sick. But does this repugn to that sacrament? Nay, it agrees [with it], as Thomas teaches, and others. Add, that of the remission of sins he speaks only conditionally: but that condition — namely, 'if he be in sins' — is tacitly present. For does he wish sins to be forgiven to those who wholly lack them? He added, that James bids many presbyters to be called to one sick man, both praying and anointing — which is alien from the rite of extreme unction. But the Apostle commanded that for solemnity, not for necessity; which, if it also were observed, would rightly be done. Which is even observed by the regulars [religious], that many pray, although one anoints; but the others also seem to anoint through him. Therefore, although I have grieved that these [things] are taught by this man, and against the doctrine of Augustine and the divine Thomas, and the tradition and persuasion of other doctors and of the church: nevertheless I have rejoiced, that he brought these reasons, which it will be no trouble to refute. Whereby it comes to pass, that while they strive to obscure the truth, they rather in fact illustrate [it]. But I do not wish to be superfluous in the allegations, and tiresome to a reader skilled and learned from the books of other Catholics." These [things] Ambrose against the error of Cajetan, lately rejected in the Council of Trent, session 14, canon 1, in these words: "IF ANYONE shall say, that extreme unction is not truly and properly a sacrament instituted by Christ our Lord, and promulgated by the blessed James the Apostle, but only a rite received from the fathers, or a human figment: let him be anathema" [the print reads "Anathesima," for Anathema].

Annotation CCCXL [contents]

"But the day of the Lord will come, in which the heavens shall pass away with great violence." — 2 Peter 3[:10]

[margin: Whether the heavens are to be burned by the fire of the world-conflagration.]

Ambrose, bishop of Compsa, in the commentary of the latter epistle of Peter, elucidating this clause, professes two [things] against the opinion of all the theologians of the schools: the first is, that the heavens are to be burned up by the fires of the world-conflagration, and thereafter to be re-fused [remolded], and renewed into a better form; the second is, that the earth, by the final burning of the world, is to be renewed, and adorned with greater pleasantness, that there may be in it a perpetual habitation of those men who are worthy neither of heaven, nor of hell. The former assertion he explains with almost these words: "I ADMONISH the reader, [that] elsewhere the exposition of the Scholastics is too constrained [forced], who wished the heavens to suffer nothing, but only to cease from motion. Since certainly by these words of blessed Peter, and [those] of the ancient prophecies [vatici-

[catchword "vatici-" (vaticiniorum) → continues on p. 567 (PDF 572).]

(printed p. 567 [PDF p. 572], recto — Ann. CCCXL continues (the world-conflagration, 2 Pet. 3:10): Ambrose of Compsa's proof that Peter speaks properly of the heavens [not the air], with the scriptural catena [Apoc. 21, Isa. 51/65, Matt. 24] for a real fiery alteration of the heavens; his second opinion — that the renewed earth will be the eternal dwelling of those worthy neither of heaven nor hell [e.g. unbaptized children]; then Sixtus's own survey of the three patristic opinions on the heavens' dissolution — Clement's Recognitions [Peter vs. Simon Magus, the eggshell analogy], embraced by Hilary and reported by Jerome on Isaiah. Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXL continued, from the catchword "vatici-":)

—[of the ancient] prophecies, it [the Scholastic reading] is repugnant. But that he [Peter] speaks properly of the heavens, and not of the air, is plain. For after he had said, 'In which the heavens shall be dissolved with great violence,' he added, 'But the elements shall be dissolved with heat' — which seems to pertain to the air and to the water, which are to be dissolved by fire. But of the earth he says particularly, 'and the earth, etc.' And the passage in which this author says he indicated these [things] elsewhere is had in the Commentaries on the epistle to the Hebrews, where, examining that [text] from the first chapter of the same epistle, 'The works of thy hands are the heavens: they shall perish, etc.,' he writes these [things]: 'THEY shall perish; but thou shalt remain: and all, like a garment, shall grow old. In what manner shall the heavens perish? Most say, as regards local motion. But this is not to perish, nor to grow old. For that which tends to destruction is (as the Apostle says) lower [inferior]; and that which grows old is near destruction.' Besides, blessed Peter, in the second epistle, left this testimony concerning the heavens: 'The day of the Lord will come as a thief; in which the heavens shall pass away with great violence, but the earth, and the works which are in it, shall be burned up. Since, therefore, all these [things] are to be dissolved: what manner [of men] ought you to be in holy conversations, awaiting the coming of the day of the Lord, through which the burning heavens shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with the heat of fire? But we await new heavens and a new earth, according to his promise.' Besides these, the Beloved [John], in the Apocalypse: [margin: Apoc. 21.a] 'I saw a new heaven and a new earth. For the first heaven, and the first earth, passed away.' And Isaiah: [margin: Isaiah 51] 'Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look down beneath the earth: for the heavens shall melt like smoke; and the earth shall be worn away like a garment; and its inhabitants shall perish like these.' And again: [margin: Isa. 65] 'Behold, I create new heavens, and a new earth.' And our Lord himself: [margin: Matt. 24] 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away.' From these testimonies of the scriptures, therefore, unless we altogether wish to do violence to the words, we are compelled to confess that there will truly be some great alteration of the heavens by fire, and not merely a cessation of motion alone: by which alteration the heavens shall in a certain manner be founded [anew], and shall become far more beautiful than they now are." Thus far concerning the former assertion of Ambrose — which also Lucian, a Benedictine monk, in his Annotations on Chrysostom (reproved by the Council of Trent), not only defends, but even strives to draw Chrysostom into the same opinion.

The latter assertion — concerning the earth, [as] to be inhabited by men after the judgment — he declares with these words in the same commentary on Peter: [margin: Whether the earth, after the day of judgment, is to be inhabited by men.] "PETER says, 'But we await new heavens, and a new earth.' But for what use [is] a new earth, if no one is to inhabit it? Therefore it is most fittingly believed by many, that those who by their own sin will not merit hell, nor yet have been received in Christ through grace (such as children departing without baptism), shall possess this new, much more beautiful earth, pure from all defilement and corruption, where they shall perpetually praise God." And in the commentaries on the epistle to the Hebrews, in the passage adduced above, confirming this same [thing] more certainly, he says: "BUT if thou ask, for what use, then? This certainly needs a longer inquiry — or, more truly, a special revelation — unless indeed we wish piously to say, that there shall be (right column:) certain men upon this new and most pleasant earth, who shall be found worthy neither of heaven, nor of hell: as certain [authors] hand down, not without great reasons; and I indeed have accepted [it], and believe [it] not unwillingly." Thus Ambrose.

But I, re-reading the writings of the ancient fathers, find in their monuments a threefold opinion concerning the final dissolution of the heavens.

The FIRST is that of the divine Clement, who, in the second volume of the Recognitions, introduces Peter the Apostle teaching two heavens: one higher and invisible, perpetual and eternal, which the blessed spirits inhabit; the other lower [and] visible, distinguished by various stars, corruptible, and to be dissolved at the consummation of the age, and utterly abolished — that, the veil of its corpulence [material bulk] being removed, that higher heaven may appear to those who are worthy of its sight. Then, in the third book of the same work, bringing in Simon Magus objecting to Peter's opinion, he thus writes: "BUT Simon says, 'Answer me, and tell [me]: if this visible heaven (as thou wilt) shall be dissolved, why was it made from the beginning?' Peter answered: 'This present life was made for the sake of men, that there might be a certain interjection and division; lest perhaps anyone unworthy should see the habitation of the heavenly [ones], and the seat of God himself — which are prepared to be seen by those alone who are pure of heart. But now, that is, in the time of the contest [agon], it has pleased [God] that those [things] be invisible, which are destined as a reward to those who conquer.' And Simon says, 'If the Founder is good, and the world is good: how shall the Good [one] at some time dissolve good [things]? But if he dissolves and destroys [it] as if [it were] evil, how shall he not seem evil, who made evil?' Peter to these [things]: 'Hear: this heaven, which is visible, also passes away. If indeed it had been made for its own sake, it would perhaps have something of the reason which thou sayest, because it ought by no means to be dissolved. But if it was made for the sake of something else, and not for its own sake, it will necessarily be dissolved, that that [thing], for which it seems to have been made, may appear. As, for example, I might say, the shell of eggs, although it seem made and diligently formed, must nevertheless be broken and dissolved, that from it the chick may come forth, and that [thing] may appear, for [the sake of] which the form of the whole egg seems to have been expressed. So, therefore, this state also must needs pass away, that that more sublime state of the heavenly kingdom may shine forth.'" Thus far the opinion of Clement.

Embracing which, Hilary, [in] canon 4 on Matthew, says: "We judge the heaven and earth, [the] greatest elements, to be dissolved"; and in the exposition of Psalm 122, explaining the same more amply, he says: "This heaven, which lies subject to our sight through its matter — which took both nature and name as [it were] a solidified smoke of the firmament — shall pass away, and shall not be. But the seat of the Lord — namely, the heaven in which God dwells — remains for ever." This opinion of Hilary and Clement, Jerome, in the fourteenth book on Isaiah, reports to have been approved by certain [authors] by the present testimony of Peter, [margin: 2 Pet. 3; 1 Cor. 7 (the print reads "2 Cor. 7")] "The heavens which now are, and the earth, are reserved unto fire, and the burning elements shall be dissolved." And likewise by the authority of Paul, saying, "The figure of this world passes away — [with] us contemplating not the [things] which are seen, but [those] which are not seen. For the [things] which are seen are temporal; but the [things] which are not seen, eternal." And again, by the prophecy of Isaiah crying——[of Isaiah] crying, "The heavens shall melt like smoke" — which Aquila and Symmachus rendered, "The heavens shall be broken into nothing, and shall be ground to the manner of salt, and shall vanish." Jerome also notes that this was the opinion of certain philosophers, who thought that all [the things] which we behold would perish by fire. Eusebius, [in] the 15th [book] of the Evangelical Preparation, writes that this was the doctrine of the Stoics — among whom the most ancient of all, Zeno, Cleanthes, and Chrysippus, handed down that all things, after long circuits of ages, are to be dissolved into ethereal fire.

[signature "Aaa 4"; catchword "man-" (clamantis) → continues on p. 568 (PDF 573).]

(printed p. 568 [PDF p. 573], verso — end of Ann. CCCXL, then Ann. CCCXLI, on 2 Peter 3 (Sixtus's survey of the three patristic opinions on the heavens' dissolution concluded — the Stoic parallel [Eusebius, Zeno, Cleanthes, Chrysippus]; the second opinion [purification not abolition — Oecumenius, Gennadius]; and Augustine's [only the aerial heavens burned, the starry heavens untouched — City of God 20.24], which the Scholastics followed; the twofold "change" [decay vs. betterment], with Ps. 8, Isa. 30, and the infant-to-old-man analogy; then whether air and water shall be wholly dissolved — Bede's "four elements" [2 Pet. 3:10/12]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXL continued, from the catchword "man-":)

The SECOND opinion is of those who believe that the heavens shall neither perish nor be abolished, but shall nevertheless be purified by the burning of the flames — that, purged from [their] inborn corruption, they may from corruptible become incorruptible and immortal. Among these, Oecumenius, examining the proposed passage of Peter in his Collectanea, left [this] thus written: "MOREOVER, that a corruption of this universe should take place seems [true] not only to Christians, but also to the wise men of the Greeks — as to Heraclitus of Ephesus, and Empedocles of Etna. But someone will say: And what was the reason that it should be founded, if it had to be reduced again to nothing? And we say, that the world will not tend wholly to corruption, but to renewal — just as we are wont to melt certain corporeal things by fire, not that we attribute an absolute destruction to them, but that we may afford them purity and sincerity."

Thus far Oecumenius, with whom Gennadius agrees, in the book On Ecclesiastical Dogmas, chapter 70, saying thus: "Let us not believe the elements, heaven and earth, [to be] abolished by fire, but changed for the better; and [that] the figure also of the world — that is, [its] image, not [its] substance — shall pass away."

The THIRD is the opinion of Augustine, asserting that the higher heavens are neither to be purged by that final burning, nor even to be touched by the fires, but only the aerial heavens, and the elements alone, are to be renewed by the conflagration of fire. He, in the twentieth book On the City of God, chapter 24, expounding the testimony of Peter taken up concerning the burning of the aerial heaven, sets forth these [things]: "IN the epistle of Peter the Apostle — where the world, which then was, is said to have perished, flooded by water — it is clear enough both what part of the world is signified by 'the whole,' and in what sense it is said to have perished, and which heavens are 'laid up, reserved unto fire' for the day of judgment and of the perdition of the impious. And in that [text] which he says a little after, 'The day of the Lord will come as a thief, in which the heavens shall pass by with great violence, but the burning elements shall be dissolved, etc.,' those heavens can be understood [as] about to perish, which he says are 'laid up, to be reserved unto fire'; and those elements [can be] taken [as] about to burn, which subsist, stormy and turbulent, in this lowest part of the world — in which he said those same heavens were laid up, those higher [heavens] remaining safe and in their integrity, in whose firmament the stars are constituted."

This opinion of Augustine the Scholastics have followed, as [being] more reasonable, and more consonant to the words of Peter; who, explaining himself, shows that he speaks not of the starry heavens, but of the heavens and earth which once perished by the flood's inundation, saying: "The heavens formerly, and the earth, perished by water." And according to this understanding of the aerial heaven, they have expounded that which, in the premises, was said by the oracles of divine scripture — (right column:) [namely] that the heavens grow old, are worn away, melt, are dissolved, are changed, pass away, fail, and perish. Nor does it stand against this interpretation, that Lucian objects that never in the sacred letters are "heavens," in the plural number, taken for "air." For this he [Sixtus] shows to be most false — [seeing] that in the eighth Psalm, and elsewhere most frequently, is read [margin: Psalm 8] צִפּוֹר שָׁמָיִם, zipur sciamaim [tsippor shamayim], that is, "the birds of the heavens." But if anyone press more sharply, that these [things] are to be understood of the higher heavens, which David said grow old, are changed, and perish: we shall answer, that there is a twofold change — old age and destruction: the one, by which mortal things are corrupted and abolished, of which there is none in the heavens; the other, [merely] by way of likeness, which — according to Didymus — designates a cessation from [their] former use, and — according to Jerome — a change for the better. They shall therefore grow old and perish, not by that oldness by which animals and plants tend to destruction, but by a cessation of use — by which (as Didymus says) their use shall cease. For, men being taken up from the earth into eternal felicity, there will no longer be any use of the heavenly motion, of light, and of heat, by which the life of mortals is fostered. Or they shall also perish by the destruction of change and renewal — in that manner in which Jerome, [in] the eighteenth book on Isaiah, expressed [it] with these words: "THEY shall perish; but thou shalt remain; and all, like a garment, shall grow old; and like a mantle thou shalt fold them, and they shall be changed." In which it is plainly demonstrated, that "perdition" and "destruction" sound not an abolition into nothing, but a change for the better. For neither does that which is written in another place — [margin: Isa. 30] "The moon shall shine as the sun, and the sun shall receive sevenfold light, etc." — signify a destruction of the former [luminaries], but a change for the better. That this may be understood, let us set examples from our own condition. An infant, when it grows into a boy, and the boy into a youth, and the youth into a man, and the man into an old man, by no means perishes through the several ages. For he is the same who before was, but is little by little changed, and is said to have perished to [his] former age. Which understanding, Paul the Apostle also spoke: "FOR the figure of this world passes away." Let us consider what he said: the figure passes away, not the substance. This same [thing] Peter also signifies, saying: "THIS is hidden from them, willing [it so]: that the heavens were from the beginning, and the earth [was] out of water, and through water, by which the former world perished in the flood. But the heavens which now are, and the earth, are by the same reason kept unto fire." In what sense this is to be taken, he afterward teaches: "But we shall see new heavens and a new earth." He did not say, "We shall see other heavens and another earth," but the old and ancient [ones] changed for the better. See certain [things] pertaining to this argument [in] the third book of the Method of Exposition, which is called Ethnic Rhapsody, and Annotation 245 of this book.

Annotation CCCXLI [contents]

"But the elements shall be dissolved with heat." — 2 Peter 3[:10]

[margin: Whether air and water at the end of the world shall be wholly dissolved.]

Bede, in the commentary of the second epistle of Peter, explaining this, affirms that two elements — namely, air and water — are to be wholly consumed by the fires of the final conflagration, saying: "FOUR are the elements of which this world consists — fire,

[catchword "ignis" → continues on p. 569 (PDF 574).]

(printed p. 569 [PDF p. 574], recto — end of Ann. CCCXLI, then Ann. CCCXLII–CCCXLV, on 2 Peter 3, 1 John 5, Jude, and Revelation 6 (Aquinas on which two elements are consumed [2 Pet. 3:10]; the Johannine Comma — Cajetan doubting whether "There are three who give testimony in heaven" is genuine [1 John 5:7]; whether impugning the brotherhood is an irremissible sin — Bede from a passage Augustine later retracted [1 John 5:16]; the canonicity of Jude — Ambrose of Compsa vs. Cajetan [Jude 1]; and whether the saints' souls see God before judgment — Bernard of Clairvaux seeming to fall into the Armenian/Anabaptist error, All Saints sermons 4 and 3 [Rev. 6:9]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXLI concluded, from the catchword "ignis":)

—fire, air, water, and earth. All of which that greatest fire shall consume; nor yet will it consume all so far, that they be utterly not [i.e. annihilated]; but two it will consume wholly, and two it will restore to a better face [form]." The divine Thomas [Aquinas], in the fourth [book] of the Sentences, distinction 47, question 2, elucidates this passage with these words: "THAT [which is said], that the fire will consume two wholly, is not to be understood [to mean] that two elements will be destroyed according to substance, but that two will be more removed from the property which they now have. Which two are said by some to be fire and water, which exceed most in active qualities — namely, in heat and cold, which are chiefly the principles of corruption in other bodies. And because there will then be no action of fire and water, which are most active, they will seem to be most changed from the power [virtue] which they now have." Read the preceding Annotation.

Annotation CCCXLII [contents]

"There are three who give testimony in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one." — 1 John 5[:7]

[margin: Trinity.]

Ambrose [of Compsa] reprehends Thomas Cajetan, [in] book 1, because he doubted whether these words — containing the clearest testimony of the divine Trinity — are of the context [genuine text] of the epistle of John. See the seventh book, in the confutation of the ninth heresy, objection seven.

Annotation CCCXLIII [contents]

"There is a sin unto death: not for that do I say, that anyone should ask." — 1 John 5[:16]

[margin: Whether the impugning of the brotherhood is an irremissible sin.]

Bede the presbyter, in the commentaries, explaining this, seems to think that the sin of those who impugn the brotherhood [fraternity] is altogether irremissible; thus saying: "A GREAT question is born here, because blessed John openly shows that there are certain brethren for whom we are not commanded to pray — since the Lord commands us to pray even for our persecutors. Which cannot otherwise be solved, unless we confess that there are certain sins in the brethren which are graver than the persecution of enemies. The sin of a brother, therefore, is unto death, when, after the knowledge of God (which was given through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ), someone impugns the brotherhood, and is agitated by the firebrands of envy against that very [brotherhood] by which he was reconciled to God." This opinion, taken by Bede in almost the same words from the first book of Augustine's On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, Augustine retracted in the first book of the Retractations.

Annotation CCCXLIIII [contents]

"Jude, servant of Jesus Christ." — Jude [1]

[margin: Whether the epistle of Jude is canonical.]

The exposition of Thomas Cajetan, Ambrose chastised with this censure: "I HAVE noted," he says, "that he says the epistle of Jude is not certainly canonical, because Jerome does not have this as certain — from that which he says: 'Jude, the brother of the Lord, wrote indeed a small epistle, which is of the seven canonical.' Who here would not be stupefied, that thence it is gathered from Jerome that this epistle is not certainly canonical — when he himself says [it is] one of the seven canonical? Nor truly [is it uncertain] because he adds, 'by some (right column:) rejected, in that it takes testimony from apocrypha' — [and] therefore he too is to be thought to reject [it], or not to receive [it]: [Jerome,] who at once, on the contrary, added — namely, that it merited authority by antiquity and use, and is computed among the sacred scriptures." Read the seventh book, in the confutation of the ninth heresy, objection seven.

Annotation CCCXLV [contents]

"I saw under the altar of God the souls of the slain." — Apocalypse 6[:9]

[margin: Whether the souls of the saints see God before the day of judgment.]

Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, narrating this passage, seems to be rolled down [devolve] into the error of the Armenians and Anabaptists, who teach that the souls of the saints, before the resurrection of the body, cannot enjoy the glory of the divine vision. For in the fourth sermon of the festival of All Saints he asserts, that the souls of the saints rest under the altar of God until the day of judgment — that is, in the sole vision of the humanity of Christ, until the time come, in which the Son of God, after the universal resurrection, shows himself to them in the form of God, together with the Father and the Holy Spirit. Which opinion he expresses with these words: "INTO this place, then (that is, the bosom of Abraham), the Savior, descending, broke the brazen gates, and, the bound being led out from the house of the prison, placed them then indeed under the altar of God, hiding them in the hidden [place] of his tabernacle, until the time come in which they may go forth — the number of the brethren being now completed — and receive the kingdom prepared from the origin of the world." And a little after he adds: "BUT of the altar of God, of which our discourse is, I judge, according to my [capacity], [it to be] nothing else than the very body of the Lord Savior; of which it was said in the gospel, 'Wheresoever the body shall be, there shall the eagles be gathered together.' Meanwhile, therefore, under the humanity of Christ the saints happily rest — into which surely even the holy angels desire to look — until the time come, when they shall now not be placed under the altar, but exalted above the altar. But what have I said? Can anyone attain — not to say surpass — the glory of the humanity of Christ, [the glory] not of men [only], but even of the angels? In what manner, therefore, did I say that those who now rest under the altar are to be exalted above the altar? By vision surely, and by contemplation, not by prelation [precedence]. For then the Son shows himself to us, as he promised, not in the form of a servant, but in the form of God. He shows to us also the Father, and the Holy Spirit — without which vision surely nothing would suffice us: since this is life eternal, that they know thee, the true God, and [him] whom thou didst send, Jesus Christ, [margin: John 17.a] and in them (which is not doubtful) also the Spirit of both." Again, in the third sermon of the same feast, explaining by the way [obiter] that Davidic [text], [margin: Psalm 83.a] "How beloved [are] thy tabernacles, O Lord: my soul concupisceth in the courts of the Lord, etc.," he says [there are] three states of souls: the first in the tabernacles, the second in the courts, the third in the house of God — that is, in beatitude, into which it is not entered without bodies. His sermon runs thus: "YOU have perceived, unless I err, from those [things] which were said in the preceding sermon, that there are three states of holy souls: the first, namely, in the corruptible body; the second, without the body; the third, in consummated beatitude: the first, in fine, in the taber-

[catchword "nacu-" (tabernaculis) → continues on p. 570 (PDF 575).]

---

*(printed p. 570 [PDF p. 575], verso — Ann. CCCXLV continues (Rev. 6:9, whether the saints' souls see God before judgment): Bernard's opinion concluded [the blessed enter God's house neither without us nor without their bodies]; Alfonso de Castro notes it is condemned, but Sixtus excuses Bernard by the great number of earlier fathers who seemed to teach the same — and assembles their testimonies in chronological order: the Liturgy of St James, Irenaeus [*Against Heresies *5], Justin Martyr [*Questions *76 & 60], Tertullian [*Against Marcion 4, On the Soul — souls held in Abraham's bosom / the underworld until judgment], and Clement of Rome's Hypotyposes [which Sixtus candidly admits he found only in the heretic Cornelius Agrippa's Occult Philosophy*, likely lifted from Irenaeus]. Read order: left column, then right.)*

(left column — Annotation CCCXLV continued, from the catchword "nacu-":)

—[in the] tabernacles, the second in the courts, the third in the House of God." And after a few [words] he subjoins: "Into that most blessed House of God the souls shall enter neither without us, nor without their [own] bodies: that is, neither the saints without the people, nor the spirit[s] without the flesh."

Alfonso de Castro, [in] the third book Against Heresies, admonishes that this opinion of Bernard is condemned — which I too do not deny; but the author, nevertheless, I judge is to be excused with a grateful and benign affection, on account of the vast number of illustrious fathers of the church who, before him, seemed to lend authority to this dogma by their testimony. Whose opinions — collected according to the series of the times in which they flourished — it pleases [me] to set down here; that, in the running-over of a single page, the reader may, without long delay, briefly recognize which authors are, in this part, prudently to be read by him, and benevolently (when it can be done) to be interpreted.

James the Apostle, in the Liturgy of the divine sacrifice, prays thus for the souls of the saints resting in Christ, so as to indicate that they have not yet arrived at the place of the awaited beatitude. And the form of the prayer is of this kind: "O Lord our God, be mindful of all the orthodox, and [those] rightly thinking concerning the faith, from Abel the just even unto the present day: make them to rest in the region of the living, in thy kingdom, in the delights of Paradise, in the bosom of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, our holy fathers: whence grief, sadness, and groaning are exiled: where the light of thy countenance presides, and perpetually shines forth."

Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons, at the end of the fifth book Against Heresies, thus says: "FOR since the Lord went away into the midst of the shadow of death, where the souls of the dead were, and afterward rose again corporeally, and after the resurrection was taken up: it is manifest that the souls of his disciples also — for whose sake the Lord wrought these [things] — shall go away into an invisible place defined for them by God, and there shall abide until the resurrection; awaiting the resurrection, then receiving [their] bodies, and rising again perfectly — that is, corporeally, as Christ rose again — and so shall come to the sight of God."

Justin, philosopher and martyr, in the book of Questions set [posed] by the gentiles, question 76: "IF before the resurrection there are no rewards of works, what fruit was there to the thief, when his soul was introduced into his [Christ's] Paradise — especially since Paradise falls under sense, but the essence of the soul is not perceived by the senses? Answer: This the thief obtained, when he entered into Paradise, that he knew in the very thing the emolument and fruit of faith; because he was held worthy of the assembly of the blessed, in which he is guarded unto the day of resurrection and remuneration. And he has a sense of Paradise by the sense of the intelligence — which is [that] by which souls both see themselves, and the [things] which are beneath them, and moreover the angels and demons." And again, question 60: "TO NO ONE (he says), before the resurrection, is a reward rendered from those [things] which he did in life."

Tertullian, [in] the fourth book Against Marcion, says: "WHENCE it appears to every wise [man] who has ever heard of the Elysian fields, that there is some local determination which is called the bosom (right column:) of Abraham; and that the souls of his sons are to be received, even from the nations — [Abraham] namely [being] the father of many nations, to be reckoned to the census of Abraham, and out of the same faith by which Abraham also believed God, under no yoke of the law, nor in the sign of circumcision. That region, therefore — the bosom, I say, of Abraham — even if not heavenly, [is] nevertheless higher than the lower regions [inferi], meanwhile about to afford refreshment to the souls of the just, until the consummation of things achieves the resurrection of all by the plenitude of reward — this [region] about to appear by the heavenly promise, to which Christ builds an ascent into heaven, where is the eternal place." Likewise, in the book On the Soul, in the antepenultimate chapter: "TO NO ONE (he says), before the resurrection, is a reward rendered from those [things] which he did in life." The same again, in the book On the Soul, in the antepenultimate chapter: "IF Christ, having discharged the form of human death among the lower regions, did not ascend into the higher [parts] of the heavens before he descended into the lower [parts] of the earth, that he might there make the patriarchs and prophets partakers of himself: thou hast [ground] also to believe [there is] a subterranean region of the lower world, and to push away by the elbow [thrust aside] those who, arrogantly enough, think not the souls of the faithful worthy of the lower regions — [as] servants [scorning to be] above [their] lord, and disciples [scorning to be] above [their] master, if perchance in Abraham's bosom they should snatch the solace of the consolation of the resurrection to be awaited." And a little below: "TO NO ONE is heaven open, the earth being yet safe [intact] — not to say closed. For [only] with the transaction [passing away] of the world shall the kingdoms of the heavens be unlocked." And after some [words] he adds: "THOU hast also, concerning Paradise, a little book from us, in which we have established that every soul is sequestered among the lower regions unto the day of the Lord." Finally, in the last chapter of the same work, he inferred these [things]: "ALL souls, therefore, are held among the lower regions, wilt thou or wilt thou not; and [there are] punishments there already, and refreshments: thou hast [the example of] the poor man and the rich. For why shouldst thou not think that the soul is both punished among the lower regions meanwhile, under the expectation of the twofold judgment? What then shall be done in that time? Shall we sleep? But souls do not sleep even in the living: for sleep is of bodies. The soul knows, even among the lower regions, both to rejoice and to grieve without the flesh: since even in the flesh, [when it is] unharmed, it grieves if it will, and [when] harmed, it rejoices if it will. If this be from its own choice in life, how much more from the judgment of God after death."

Clement of Rome, [in] the second book of the Hypotyposes [ὑποτυπώσεων], out of the opinion of Peter says these [things]: "AS our master Christ did not at once fly away and depart, but, awaiting the time of his resurrection defined by the Father — which was made manifest also through Jonah — after three days, rising, was taken up: so we too ought to await the time of our resurrection and glory, foretold by the prophets; and so, rising again, to be taken up into heaven. But meanwhile the souls must patiently await the future glory, outside heaven, until the day of judgment." Know well, good reader, that I have not taken this testimony from the very work of Clement (whether it be now found anywhere, I know not), but from the third book of the Occult Philosophy of Cornelius Agrippa — a heretical man, and, in this article especially, thinking perversely. Who, unless my suspicion deceive me, transcribed these [things] from the fifth book of Irenaeus: at the end of which this opinion is had word for word, except that last clause, "But meanwhile the souls must, until the day of judgment, [remain] out-

[catchword "tra" (extra coelum) → continues on p. 571 (PDF 576).]

(printed p. 571 [PDF p. 576], recto — Ann. CCCXLV continues (Rev. 6:9, whether the saints' souls see God before judgment): Sixtus's chronological catena of fathers who seemed to hold that the blessed await their reward — Origen [hom. 7 on Leviticus, Peri Archon *2 & 4], Lactantius [*Divine Institutes 7.21], Victorinus of Pettau [on the Apocalypse — the golden and bronze altars], Prudentius [two hymns quoted as verse — the Cathemerinon funeral hymn and the Peristephanon *on the eighteen martyrs of Zaragoza], Ambrose [*On Cain and Abel 2.2, On the Good of Death 10], and Chrysostom [hom. 39 on 1 Corinthians]. Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXLV continued, from the catchword "tra":)

—[the souls must] patiently await the future glory "out[side] heaven" — which indeed it is probable that Cornelius [Agrippa] added of his own, as [being] favorable to his [own] dogma.

Origen, [in] the seventh homily on Leviticus: "NOT YET (he says) have the saints received their joy, nor even the Apostles: but they too await, that I may become a partaker of their joy. For neither do the saints, departing hence, at once obtain the whole rewards of their merits, but they await us also — though we linger, though we be slothful. For their joy is not perfect, until they grieve for our errors, and mourn our sins — as Paul says: 'They have not yet obtained the promises, God providing something better for us, lest without us they should attain perfection.' Thou seest, then, that Abraham still awaits, that he may attain the [things] which are perfect; Isaac and Jacob also await; and all the prophets await us, that with us they may perceive the perfect beatitude." The same, [in] the second book of the Peri Archon, not far from the end, speaking of the place to which the souls of the saints tend after death: "I THINK (he says) that all the saints, departing from this life, remain in some place set on the earth, which the divine scripture calls Paradise — as in a certain place of erudition, and (so to say) of assistance, or [a] school of souls: in which they may be taught concerning all those [things] which they had seen on the earth; and receive also certain judgments concerning the [things] to come and future — as, being placed in this life also, they had conceived certain [notions] of the judgment of future [things], though through a glass in a riddle, yet in some part — which are more manifestly and lucidly revealed to the saints in their [own] places and times. If indeed anyone be pure of heart, and purer in mind, he shall ascend thence to the place of the air, and shall arrive at the kingdoms of the heavens." Again, [in] book 4 of the Peri Archon, making mention of the place of holy souls, but somewhat more diversely, he says: "THOSE who depart from this world according to that common death are dispensed [assigned] according to their acts and merits, as they shall have been judged worthy — some indeed to the place which is called hell [infernus], others to the bosom of Abraham, through diverse mansions."

Lactantius, [in] book 7 of the Divine Institutions, chapter 21: "NOR let anyone think that souls are judged immediately after death. For all are detained in one common custody, until the time come, in which the greatest Judge shall make examination of merits. Then, those whose justice shall have been approved, these shall receive the reward of immortality; but those whose sins and crimes shall have been detected shall not rise again, but shall be hidden away with the impious into the same darkness, destined to certain punishments."

Victorinus the Martyr, bishop of Pettau [Petabio], in the commentaries on the Apocalypse, explaining that [text], "I saw under the altar of God, etc.": he says that he saw the souls of the slain "under the altar [ara]," that is, under the earth. For an "altar" is called both heaven and earth; as the Law says, which had made two altars — one golden within, and one of bronze without. As, therefore, by the golden altar (which was the inner one, to which the priests entered once a year) heaven is understood: so also by the bronze altar the earth is understood, under which is hell, a region remote from penalties and fires, and the rest of the saints — in which indeed the just are seen and heard by the impious, and yet [the impious] cannot pass over thither. "That these souls of the slain, then, seek (right column:) the avenging of their blood — that is, of their body — upon those dwelling on the earth, He willed us to know, who sees all things. But because in the last time the perpetual remuneration of the saints, and the coming damnation of the impious, is [to be]: it was said to them, 'Wait'; and for the solace of their body they received (he says) white robes — that is, the gift of the Holy Spirit."

Prudentius, in his poems, seems now to place the souls of the pious, departing from the body, in the bosom of Abraham, now in the terrestrial paradise, now under the altar of God — as he does in the hymn for the obsequies of the departed, where he sings in this manner:

In what region wilt thou bid the pure soul to rest?
Hidden in the bosom of the holy old man
it shall recline, as is Eleazar [Lazarus].
Whom, hedged about on all sides with flowers,
the rich man from afar beholds, burning.
We follow thy words, O Redeemer,
by which, triumphing over black death, thou biddest the companion of the cross, the thief,
to go in thy footsteps.
Behold, the bright way of the ample paradise now lies open to the faithful:
and it is permitted to man to enter that grove, which the serpent had taken away.

And in the hymn of the eighteen martyrs of Caesaraugusta [Zaragoza], indicating in what place that throng of Martyrs rests, he says:

This throng, placed beneath the eternal altar, prays pardon for our lapses [sins] — the throng which the creatrix of the purple nobles [i.e. she who brings forth the crimson-robed martyrs] preserves.

Ambrose, bishop of Milan, [in] book 2 On Cain and Abel, chapter 2: "THE soul (he says) is loosed from the body, and after the end of this life; yet still it is held suspended by the ambiguities of the future judgment." And in the book On the Good of Death, chapter 10: The scripture of Esdras names the dwellings of souls "storehouses [promptuaria]"; and, meeting the human complaint — [namely] that the just who have gone before seem, even to the day of judgment (for the most part, that is, of time), to be defrauded of the remuneration owed to them — he wonderfully says that the day of judgment is like a crown. For the day of the crown [contest] is awaited by all, that within the same day both the conquered may blush, and the victors may obtain the palm of victory. Therefore, while the plenitude of time is awaited, the souls await the remuneration owed: for some [there] remains penalty, for others glory. And a little below, in the same chapter, the place which all souls, stripped of [their] bodies, seek, he calls "hell [infernus], which is not seen."

John Chrysostom, [in] homily 39 on the former [epistle] to the Corinthians, examining the force of that Pauline argumentation — namely, "If in this life only we are hoping, then we are more miserable than all living things" — he says: "WHAT sayest thou, Paul? Would confidence alone survive [remain over], if the body be not raised? Or would the soul not survive? It would — and immortal indeed: yet although it be six hundred times over immortal (as surely it is), nevertheless without the flesh it will not itself enjoy those admirable goods, just as neither will it be punished with penalties. For all their [things] shall be made manifest at the tribunal of Christ (says Paul), that each one may bear the [things which he did] through [his] body—

[catchword "corpu" (corpus) → continues on p. 572 (PDF 577).]

(printed p. 572 [PDF p. 577], verso — Ann. CCCXLV continues (Rev. 6:9): the catena on the saints awaiting their reward — Chrysostom concluded; the Author of the Opus imperfectum [hom. 34, all crowned together, the "crown/circle" image from Esdras]; Augustine [on Ps. 36, On Genesis literally 12.9]; Theodoret, Arethas of Caesarea, Oecumenius, Theophylact, Euthymius Zigabenus [all on Heb. 11 / Luke 23 — the saints not yet crowned]; then Pope John XXII*'s controversial view [that purged souls lack the facial vision of God before judgment — reported via Ockham's* Ninety Days' Work and Adrian VI], and Sixtus's turn: these testimonies, taken at face value, seem to carry the Armenian error condemned by Innocent III, Benedict XI, and the Council of Florence decree. Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXLV continued, from the catchword "corpu[s]":)

—[the things which he did] through the body, whether it did good or evil. For if the body rise not, our soul will remain uncrowned, and will be outside the heavenly beatitude." And there are also many other opinions in Chrysostom akin to this, which will occur to thee, above, Annotation 264.

The Author of the Unfinished Work [Opus imperfectum] on Matthew, homily 34, upon that [text], "The first shall be last, and the last first, etc.," showing that all shall receive the denarius of eternal beatitude at the same time, thus says: "OR he therefore says that the first shall be last, and the last first, not that the last be worthier than the first, but that they be made equal. For the prophet Esdras — wishing to show that the vocation of all the saints is one, and that there is no difference among them by reason of time — says that the number of all the saints is, as it were, a crown [circle]. For as in a crown, since it is round, thou findest nothing which may seem to be a beginning or an end: so among the saints, as regards the time in that age, no one is called last, no one first. Therefore, to those to whom it was given to be born first, [reward] is rendered last; because the saints, as [it were] a crown, are all equal: the last-born are rewarded first, that those, having that glory, [and] these being made equal to them through it."

Augustine, in the exposition of Psalm 36, says: "AFTER this life thou shalt not yet be [there], where the saints shall be, to whom it will be said, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, receive the kingdom, which was prepared for you from the origin of the world.' That thou shalt not yet be there, who knows not? But thou canst already be there, where that proud rich man, in the midst of torments, saw that once ulcerous poor man resting far off. In that rest, surely, thou shalt securely await the day of judgment." And [in] book 12 On Genesis according to the Letter, chapter 9, he says: "THAT part of the city of God, which is to be joined to the immortal angels [and] is gathered out of mortal men, now either travels [as a pilgrim] mortally on the earth; or, in those who have died, rests in the secret receptacles and seats of souls." Other passages of Augustine, akin to these, thou shalt review above, Annotation 169 of the fifth book, and elsewhere.

Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, in the commentaries on the eleventh chapter to the Hebrews: "OF the saints, then (he says), there were so many and so great contests: but these, nevertheless, have not yet received [their] crowns. For the God of all awaits the contests of the others; that, the stadium [race] being finished, he may at once pronounce victors all who shall have obtained the victory, and reward [them]."

Arethas, bishop of Caesarea, in the commentaries on the Apocalypse (collected out of the monuments of Andreas, bishop of Caesarea), when he was expounding that [text], "How long, O Lord, dost thou not avenge our blood, etc.," says: "BY these [words] the saints appear to seek the consummation of the world: therefore they are bidden to await with longanimity [patience], until the consummation of the brethren — lest they be consummated [perfected] without them, according to the divine Apostle. But the white robes designate the splendor of virtues, flourishing in them, wherewith they are clad — although they have not yet carried off the promises. By the hope, therefore, of these [things], which they contemplate through the understanding as [it were] in a mirror — being freed from all grossness — they justly rejoice, resting in the bosoms of Abraham. For this has been said by many of the saints: that each (right column:) cultivator of virtue is allotted a worthy place, whence he even attains a certain sure conjecture concerning his future glory."

Oecumenius, on the eleventh chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews: "ALL the saints (he says), having merited the testimony that through faith they pleased God, have not yet obtained the goods promised to the just — God providing something better concerning us, lest they should have anything more than we in this, that they were crowned first. He defined one time, that we too may be crowned together with them. And this is for our sake: they never sit unrewarded, awaiting our administration [the completion of our course]." "(Lest they be consummated without us)": he did not say, "Lest they be crowned," but — which has a greater emphasis — "Lest they be consummated" — that is, receive the term of goods, for which all the effort and fatigue of him who is endowed with virtue labors.

Theophylact, bishop of Bulgaria, on the Hebrews, [chapter] 11: "THE saints (he says) have not yet obtained anything of the heavenly promises. Although it is agreed that some were affected [endowed] with these goods of the earth, as David the king: yet we do not here inquire after these present [things], but after those promises which are in heaven, more sure and more true." This same [thing] he has in the commentaries on the 23rd chapter of Luke, expounding that [text], "Today thou shalt be with me in Paradise." See above, Annotation 163 of this book.

Euthymius Zigabenus, in the commentaries on the 23rd chapter of Luke, expounding the promise of Christ to the Thief, "Today thou shalt be with me in Paradise," wrote these [things]: "CHRIST, knowing the Thief's intention, promised that which seemed most desirable to him. For the thief knew Paradise from the Mosaic doctrine. And then indeed he gave him a converse [dwelling] in Paradise, as [it were] the pledge [earnest] of his kingdom — which is the fruition of the ineffable and eternal goods, which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor have they ascended into the heart of man. For not yet has any of the just received the promise, as the great Paul taught; but afterward he will deliver this also, [namely] the kingdom, at the time of the universal resurrection."

John, Roman pontiff, the twenty-second of that name, is said to have subscribed to the opinion of these, and to have sanctioned by decree that it was so to be believed. Witnesses of this decree are William of Ockham, in the work of the Ninety Days, and Pope Adrian the Sixth — whose words, in the 4th book of the Sentences, at the end of the question On the Sacrament of Confirmation, are these: "LASTLY, it is reported concerning John XXII, that he publicly taught, declared, and commanded to be held by all, that the purged souls, before the final judgment, do not have the robe, which is the clear and facial vision of God: and he is said to have induced the University of Paris to this — [namely] that no one could obtain a degree in theology in it, unless he first swore that he would defend this error, and perpetually adhere to it."

These testimonies of the fathers, if they be inspected according to the simple utterance of the words, seem to bear before them the error of the Armenians — condemned in the decretal epistles of Innocent the Third, and of Benedict the Eleventh, Roman pontiffs, and by the decree of the ecumenical Council of Florence, whose words are these: "WE DEFINE, that the souls of those who, after baptism received, have incurred no stain of sin at all, in-

[catchword "cur-" (incurrerunt) → continues on p. 573 (PDF 578).]

(printed p. 573 [PDF p. 578], recto — end of Ann. CCCXLV, then Ann. CCCXLVI–CCCXLVII, on Revelation 6, 11, 20 (the intermediate-state annotation concluded: the Council of Florence decree, and Sixtus's resolution — two states of beatitude, the soul-without-body vision before judgment [called by many patristic names] and the fuller consummated state after the resurrection; plus Benedict XI's decretal that John XXII, prevented by death, decreed nothing [Rev. 6:9]; whether Jeremiah is one of the two witnesses and not yet dead — Victorinus's view, refuted [Rev. 11:3]; and whether there are two resurrections and a golden thousand-year age between — Victorinus and the Chiliast/millenarian error, which Jerome ascribes to him [Rev. 20:6]). Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXLV concluded, from the catchword "cur-":)

—[have] incurred [no stain of sin at all]; those also which, after the stain of sin contracted, have been purged — whether in their [own] bodies, or, stripped of those bodies, as was said above — [we define] to be soon received into heaven, and to behold clearly the very Lord, three and one, as he is; yet, according to the diversity of merits, one more perfectly than another. But the souls of those who depart in actual mortal sin, or in original [sin] alone, [we define] to descend soon to hell, [there] to be punished, however, with unequal penalties."

THUS FAR the decree of the council: to whose definition thou canst easily reduce some of the aforesaid opinions of the fathers, if thou observe that, of the blessed who enjoy the divine vision, there are two states of beatitude. The one, of the soul without the body, until the universal judgment; which the ancients, describing by various names, called the Bosom of Abraham, the Paradise taken away from the first parents, the Outer Altar, "Under the altar of God," the Vestibule of the saints, the Courts of God, the Storehouses of souls, the Hidden receptacles, the Custody of souls, the Rest of security, the Pledge [earnest] of the kingdom, the White Robe, the Obtained promises, and other [names] of this kind. But the other is the state of the soul, the body being resumed, after the judgment; which likewise they named by diverse appellations — the House of God, the Inner Altar, "Above the altar," the Higher [parts] of the heavens, the Consummation of glory, the Glory of the resurrection, Perfect joy, the Reward of immortality, the Term of all goods, the whole [entire] rewards of merits, the Reward yet awaited, the Promises not yet received, the Future glory, the Time of the crowns, the Kingdom of fruition, and the rest like to these. Accordingly, when among the ancient doctors of the church thou readest that the souls of the just live either in the bosom of Abraham, or in the grove of Paradise, or under the altar of God, or in the hidden receptacles, and there await the rewards of the future glory: do not at once suspect that the souls of the saints lack the glory of the divine sight; but understand that they do not yet possess that perfect and consummated felicity, which they await after the resurrection of the body. For thus we too have interpreted the opinions of Ambrose, Augustine, and Chrysostom, which thou hast above, Annotations 64 and 169 of book 5, and 264 of this book, and elsewhere.

But if there be any sayings of the holy authors which cannot bear an interpretation of this kind: remember, at least, that this error nothing hinders [detracts from] the erudition and piety of such illustrious fathers — since the church, in their times, had not yet established anything certain to be believed in this article.

FINALLY, lest any scruple reside in thy mind on account of the decree of Pope John XXII (whom we mentioned above to have assented to this error), know that it is not, among approved writers, in every way certain, [that] which Ockham — hostile to that same pontiff, and, in this [matter], condemned by the Council of Trent — wrote concerning him. Nay, there are not lacking authors of the greatest authority and faith who relate otherwise. Among these, Benedict XI, pontiff of the same name, in his decretal epistle, put on record that he [John XXII] could decree nothing concerning this matter, being prevented by death; thus speaking: "SOME TIME ago, in the time of John XXII, our predecessor of happy memory, among certain masters also of the theolog-(right column:) ical faculty, there arose a matter of question concerning the vision of the souls of just men after their death — whether they see the divine essence before the general judgment — and concerning certain other [matters]. And when the same our predecessor was preparing himself for the decision of contentions of this kind, in his public consistory — enjoining more strictly both upon his brethren, the cardinals of the Holy Roman Church (of whose number we then were), and upon the prelates and masters in theology, of whom many were present, that upon the aforesaid matter of the vision each one, deliberately, should say what he thought — nevertheless, prevented by death, as it pleased the Lord, he was unable to accomplish it."

Annotation CCCXLVI [contents]

"And I will give to my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy 1,260 days, clothed in sackcloth." — Apocalypse 11[:3]

[margin: Whether Jeremiah is dead.]

Victorinus the Martyr, in the commentaries on this book, elucidating these [words], affirms that Jeremiah the prophet is not yet dead, [but] lives in Paradise, that thence, at the end of the world, he may come to preach penance, and be slain by Antichrist. His words are these: "MANY think that one of these witnesses is Elijah, or Elisha, or Moses: but these are [all] dead. But the death of Jeremiah is not found, [margin: Jerem. 1] because all our ancients handed down that he is [the] Jeremiah [meant]. For the very word which was made to him testifies, saying to him: 'Before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee; and before thou camest forth from the womb, I sanctified thee, and I set thee a prophet among the nations.' But among the nations he was not a prophet. And therefore the truthful word of the Lord necessarily has [it], that [what] he promised he should exhibit, [namely] that among the nations he should be a prophet." Hilary condemns this opinion, in the canon on Matthew 20. And the conjecture of Victorinus is frivolous. For [as to] that which God says, "I set thee a prophet among the nations," it is not so to be taken, as if God were about to send him outside Judaea to prophesy and preach in the regions of the nations; but that he should prophesy concerning the deeds of the nations. For he foretold the victories of the Assyrians against Israel, and the destruction also of their [own] kingdom.

Annotation CCCXLVII [contents]

"Blessed [is he] who has part in the first resurrection. In these shall be priests of God, and of Christ, and they shall reign with him a thousand years." — Apocalypse 20[:6]

[margin: Whether there are to be two [future] resurrections, and a golden age of a thousand years between the two.]

Victorinus of Pettau, expounding these [words] in the commentaries on the Apocalypse, is believed to have approved the error of the Chiliasts [Millenarians]: who say that there are to be two future resurrections of the flesh — the first, of the good; but the second, of the bad, after a thousand years; and that Christ, from the first even to the second resurrection, will remain on the earth, and there for a thousand years will reign with his saints and elect in the greatest peace, with an incredible felicity of all earthly delights flowing on every side. This the divine Jerome attributes to him in various places, but especially in a certain little preface, which [he set before] the commentaries on the Apo-

[signature "Bbb"; catchword "poca-" (Apocalypsim) → continues on p. 574 (PDF 579).]

---

(printed p. 574 [PDF p. 579], verso — Ann. CCCXLVII concluded, on Revelation 20:6, and the end of Liber Sextus. Jerome's preface [to Anatolius] naming the ancient millenarians [Papias, Nepos, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Lactantius, Apollinaris, Severus, Sulpicius, Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho*]; then Sixtus's own investigation — the extant Victorinus commentary actually* refutes Chiliasm [closing against Cerinthus], so either it is not Victorinus's, or the Jerome-titled preface is forged, or the absurd chiliast passage was removed and the present one substituted; and finally Sixtus's spiritual resolution of Rev. 20 — the two deaths, the two resurrections, and the thousand years = the whole age of evangelical grace from Christ's resurrection to the last day [cross-ref Ann. 233 of bk. 5]. Read order: left column, then right.)

(left column — Annotation CCCXLVII concluded, from the catchword "poca-":)

—[to the commentaries on the] Apocalypse of this author he affixed [it], where he thus wrote to Anatolius: "DIVERS mishaps befall those crossing over the perils of the sea. If the throng of the winds be more vehement, there is dread: if the more moderate breeze ruffle the surfaces of the lying [calm] element, they [still] dread ambushes. So it seems to me in this — [namely] the volume thou hast sent, which, in the explanation of the Apocalypse, seems to contain [the work] of Victorinus: it is both perilous, and open to the barkings of detractors, to judge concerning the little works of an excellent man. For the earlier [author] Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, and Nepos, a bishop in the parts of Egypt, thought concerning the reign of a thousand years just as Victorinus [did]." Thus Jerome: who, in the preface of the eighteenth book on Isaiah, and in the fourth book on Jeremiah, reports that Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons, Tertullian, Lactantius, Apollinaris, Severus, Sulpicius, and a great multitude of catholic men, were in the opinion of Victorinus: in which I find also to have been Justin, philosopher and martyr, who, in the disputation held with Trypho, writes many [things] concerning the restoration of the terrestrial Jerusalem, and concerning the age of a thousand years — which, studying brevity, I pass over.

BUT as regards the opinion of Victorinus: when I myself had once and again pertinaciously unrolled the little commentary which now is circulated under his name on the Apocalypse, to search out this error, so far [is it] from [being the case] that I found [that] which Jerome fastens upon him, that I even, at the end of the little work, fell upon an open confutation of this very error; in which, when the author had catholicly discoursed [on] the proposed chapter of John, at last he concluded his commentary with these words: "THEREFORE they are not to be heard, who affirm that the reign of a thousand years is earthly — who think with Cerinthus the heretic." It is probable, either that the work is not Victorinus's, and that the preface prefixed to the volume under the title of Jerome is falsified [forged]; or that the absurd explanation of Victorinus was thence removed — whether by Jerome, or by some other friendly reader — and, in place of it, that which now is had was substituted. BUT howsoever it happened, it appears that these most weighty men were deceived out of the foregoing words of the Apocalypse, wrongly understood by them; in which, concerning the twin resurrection, and the thousand years between the two, it is thus read: (right column:) "I SAW the souls of those beheaded for the word of God; and they lived, and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest [of the] dead lived not, until the thousand years be consummated. This is the first resurrection. Blessed [is] he who has part in the first resurrection. In these the second death has no power: but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years. And after a thousand years Satan shall be loosed, etc. And I saw the dead standing in the sight of the throne: and the dead were judged according to their works, etc. And this is the second death, etc." The obscurity of these words — which afforded so many and so great men an occasion of erring — will be illustrated by the clearest light, if we observe those three [things] here mentioned: namely, the twofold death, the twofold resurrection, and the space of a thousand years.

And so, the first death is the separation of the divine grace from the soul through sin. The second death [is] the exclusion of the soul from the life of eternal felicity, and [its] damnation to perpetual punishments. The first resurrection is the passage from the death of sin to the life of grace, and from the life of grace to the life of his [i.e. that eternal] glory — which souls, stripped of [their] bodies, shall possess until the day of judgment. The second resurrection is that universal re-formation of the whole human flesh, in which souls, [their] bodies being resumed, shall fully enjoy the doubled joy of felicity. The space of a thousand years — which often in the sacred letters is taken for an indefinite multitude of number — is the time of evangelical grace, from the resurrection of Christ even to the day of the last resurrection. The sense, therefore, of this revelation is: that the souls of the saints, for a thousand years — that is, until the day of judgment — shall reign with God in the first resurrection (namely, in the vision of the divine glory), their own bodies not yet received; and that they shall not be liable to the second death, which brings with it eternal punishments: but that at last, in the second universal resurrection, they shall be judged, together with all mortals, in the sight of the throne. And then, the judgment being completed, the souls of the saints, clothed with their [own] bodies, shall receive a doubled beatitude. But the wicked, in whom the first resurrection of grace and glory had no place, shall be punished with the second death — that is, with the perpetual torments of hell. To this pertain the [things] which we wrote copiously above, in Annotation 233 of the fifth book.

THE END OF THE SIXTH BOOK.

SUBJECT INDEX

Both books, in one taxonomy. Each annotation appears under every theme it touches; 5· numbers are Book V (Old Testament), 6· numbers Book VI (New Testament). All are clickable.

GOD, TRINITY, CHRIST

Christ — person & work 5·XCIX, 5·CII, 5·CXVII, 5·CXIX, 5·CXLIII, 5·CLX, 5·CLXI, 5·CLXII, 5·CLXV, 5·CLXXXII, 5·CLXXXVI, 5·CCIX, 5·CCXX, 5·CCXXIII, 5·CCXXXIV

Christology (Christ's person, natures, soul, body) 6·X, 6·XIII, 6·XVIII, 6·XXX, 6·LI, 6·LXI, 6·LXXIV, 6·XCII, 6·XCVIII, 6·CV, 6·CX, 6·CXI, 6·CXIV, 6·CXVIII, 6·CXIX, 6·CXXIV, 6·CXXV, 6·CXXVI, 6·[unnum.], 6·CXXXI, 6·CXXXIV, 6·CXXXVIII, 6·CXXXIX, 6·CXLI, 6·CXLIII, 6·CXLIV, 6·CXLV, 6·CXLVI, 6·CLI, 6·CLX, 6·CLXII, 6·CLXIV, 6·CLXX, 6·CLXXXV, 6·CLXXXVI, 6·CXCVI, 6·CCI, 6·CCIV, 6·CCXIII, 6·CCXVIII, 6·CCXLIV, 6·CCXCIII, 6·CCXCIX, 6·CCCXX, 6·CCCXXIX, 6·CCCXXXI

God & the Holy Trinity 5·I, 5·II, 5·VII, 5·XVIII, 5·C, 5·CXXX, 5·CXXXIV, 5·CXXXV, 5·CXLIII, 5·CXLIV, 5·CXLVI, 5·CLVIII, 5·CLXVIII, 5·CXCVI, 5·CCXXII, 5·CCLVII, 5·CCLIX

Knowledge of God; divine attributes & the mysteries 6·CLXVII, 6·CLXXXII, 6·CCXVII, 6·CCXXXI, 6·CCCXII

Procession of the Holy Spirit / Filioque 6·CLXXII, 6·CLXXV, 6·CLXXVI, 6·CLXXXVII, 6·CLXXXVIII, 6·CCVIII, 6·CCXI, 6·CCCXXVIII

The Trinity; equality of the divine persons 6·VI, 6·XIV, 6·XV, 6·XVI, 6·XXXIX, 6·XLIV, 6·LXXXVIII, 6·XCIV, 6·C, 6·CIII, 6·CLXIX, 6·CLXXI, 6·CCXXXV, 6·CCCXLII

CREATION & THE COSMOS

Creation & the cosmos 5·II, 5·III, 5·IV, 5·IX, 5·X, 5·XI, 5·XII, 5·XIII, 5·XIV, 5·XV, 5·XIX, 5·XXII, 5·XXIII, 5·XXIV, 5·LXIX, 5·LXXX, 5·LXXXI, 5·CV, 5·CVIII, 5·CXV, 5·CXLVII, 5·CCXII, 5·CCXIII, 5·CCXLII

GRACE, JUSTIFICATION, PREDESTINATION

Adam, Eve, the Fall & original sin 5·XX, 5·XXI, 5·XXVII, 5·XXIX, 5·XXXI, 5·XLIII, 5·XLIV, 5·XLV, 5·XLVI, 5·XLVII, 5·XLIX, 5·L, 5·LI, 5·LII, 5·LIII, 5·LIV, 5·LXIII, 5·LXXV, 5·LXXVI, 5·LXXVII, 5·CLXXVII, 5·CLXXVIII, 5·CLXXIX, 5·CLXXX

Free will; the beginning of salvation 6·CLXXXIV, 6·CCLXXVIII, 6·CCCXXXIII

Grace, free will, merit & predestination 5·VI, 5·CI, 5·CXXXII, 5·CXXXVIII, 5·CXLV, 5·CLIX, 5·CLXVII, 5·CLXXXI, 5·CLXXXIII, 5·CXCII, 5·CXCIII, 5·CXCV, 5·CXCVII, 5·CXCVIII, 5·CXCIX, 5·CC, 5·CCXVII, 5·CCXXXII, 5·CCXXXV, 5·CCXL, 5·CCLXIII

Justification; faith & works; 'faith alone' 6·XLIII, 6·LI, 6·CLXXVIII, 6·CLXXIX, 6·CXC, 6·CXCI, 6·CXCII, 6·CXCIV, 6·CC, 6·CCIX, 6·CCX, 6·CCXII, 6·CCXV, 6·CCXVI, 6·CCXXXII, 6·CCXXXIII, 6·CCXXXIV

Merit; grace, nature & impeccability 6·XX, 6·XL, 6·XLVI, 6·LXIII, 6·LXXXVII, 6·LXXXIX, 6·XCVII, 6·XCIX, 6·CI, 6·CVII, 6·CLXXXI, 6·CCLI, 6·CCLV, 6·CCLVII, 6·CCLXX, 6·CCLXXXI, 6·CCLXXXV

Original sin 6·CCIX, 6·CCXXXVI, 6·CCXXXVII, 6·CCXXXVIII, 6·CCXL, 6·CCXLII, 6·CCXLV, 6·CCCIX

Predestination, reprobation & foreknowledge 6·XLVI, 6·LII, 6·XCIX, 6·CCXIV, 6·CCXIX, 6·CCXXX, 6·CCXLVIII, 6·CCXLIX, 6·CCL, 6·CCLI, 6·CCLII, 6·CCLXX, 6·CCLXXXV

CHURCH, MINISTRY, AUTHORITY

Bishop, presbyter & holy orders 6·CCXXV, 6·CCC, 6·CCCI, 6·CCCXVIII, 6·CCCXIX, 6·CCCXXIV, 6·CCCXXV

Clergy: temporal power, immunity & possessions 6·XXXVI, 6·LXXII, 6·LXXV, 6·LXXVI, 6·XCV, 6·CXXI, 6·CXLVIII, 6·CCCXXI

Heresy: coercion, excommunication & anathema 6·LX, 6·LXXVIII, 6·CCLXVII

Papal primacy (Peter & Paul) 6·LXXII, 6·CXVIII, 6·CLX, 6·CCVI, 6·CCXXI, 6·CCLIII, 6·CCLXIX, 6·CCLXXI, 6·CCLXXIV, 6·CCLXXV

The Church, clergy & discipline 5·CXVIII, 5·CXXII, 5·CLXXVI, 5·CCIII, 5·CCXLIII, 5·CCXLIV, 5·CCLVIII

The Church: its nature, marks & members 6·XXXVIII, 6·XLII, 6·LXVIII, 6·LXIX, 6·CIV, 6·CCCV

The power of the keys; priestly absolution 6·XLV, 6·LV, 6·LXX, 6·LXXI, 6·CVIII, 6·CCII

SACRAMENTS

Baptism; rebaptism; unbaptized catechumens 6·XI, 6·XII, 6·XVII, 6·CCIX, 6·CCCXI

Extreme unction 6·CCCXXXIX

Matrimony as a sacrament 6·IV, 6·XXIII, 6·CCCVII

Penance, confession & the remission of sins 6·XXVIII, 6·LVI, 6·LVII, 6·CXIX, 6·CXLII, 6·CLIII, 6·CLIV, 6·CLV, 6·CLXI, 6·CXCIX, 6·CCII, 6·CCXVIII, 6·CCLXI, 6·CCLXXXVIII, 6·CCCXXXVI, 6·CCCXLIII

Sin, penance, confession & the keys 5·XVI, 5·LXII, 5·CLXXIII, 5·CLXXIV, 5·CLXXV, 5·CCV, 5·CCXLI, 5·CCLI

The Eucharist; communion under both kinds 6·XXI, 6·LXVI, 6·CXI, 6·CXII, 6·CXIII, 6·CXCIII, 6·CXCV, 6·CXCVI, 6·CXCVII, 6·CCLXVIII, 6·CCLXXXIX

The sacraments 5·LXXXV, 5·XCVI, 5·XCVII, 5·CXX, 5·CXXI, 5·CLII, 5·CLXIII, 5·CLXIV, 5·CXCIV, 5·CCLVIII

THE LAST THINGS

End of the world; the state & conflagration of the heavens 6·LXXIII, 6·CCXLV, 6·CCCXXX, 6·CCCXXXIV, 6·CCCXL, 6·CCCXLI

Hell, purgatory, limbo & the purging fire 5·XXXIX, 5·XLII, 5·XCIII, 5·CXXXI, 5·CXXXVII, 5·CXLI, 5·CLXV, 5·CLXX, 5·CLXXI, 5·CLXXXVIII, 5·CCII, 5·CCXIV, 5·CCXXV, 5·CCXXIX, 5·CCXXX, 5·CCLII, 5·CCLXI

Hell; eternity of punishment; apocatastasis 6·XLI, 6·CCXLVII, 6·CCXLVIII, 6·CCLXXXII, 6·CCXC, 6·CCXCV

Purgatory & the expiatory fire 6·CCLIV, 6·CCLVIII, 6·CCLIX

Resurrection of the body; whether all die; the millennium 6·XCI, 6·CLI, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCCXLVI, 6·CCCXLVII

The end of the world & millenarianism 5·CXC, 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCXLVI, 5·CCXLVIII

The intermediate state; whether souls see God before judgment 6·XC, 6·CCLXIV, 6·CCCXXXV, 6·CCCXLV

The vision of God & the state of souls after death 5·XL, 5·XLI, 5·LXIV, 5·LXXVIII, 5·CXXVII, 5·CXXVIII, 5·CXXXIX, 5·CXL, 5·CLXIX, 5·CCXXI, 5·CCXXVIII

ANGELS, DEMONS & THE SOUL

Angels & demons 5·V, 5·VIII, 5·XVII, 5·LVII, 5·LVIII, 5·LX, 5·LXX, 5·LXXI, 5·LXXII, 5·LXXIII, 5·LXXVII, 5·XC, 5·XCV, 5·CII, 5·CXXVI, 5·CXLII, 5·CXLVII, 5·CCXV, 5·CCXVI, 5·CCXXIV, 5·CCLVI, 5·CCLXII

Angels (nature, orders, guardian angels) 6·VII, 6·LIII, 6·LXV, 6·LXXVII, 6·CXXXV, 6·CXLII, 6·CXLIX, 6·CL, 6·CLIX, 6·CLXV, 6·CLXX, 6·CLXXXIX, 6·CCXCII, 6·CCXCVI, 6·CCXCIX, 6·CCCII, 6·CCCVIII, 6·CCCXIII, 6·CCCXX, 6·CCCXXIII

Demons (their bodies; whether restored or saved) 6·XIX, 6·CXVII, 6·CCXCIV, 6·CCXCV, 6·CCXCVIII, 6·CCCII

The human being: body, soul & bodily goods 6·XXXV, 6·XXXVII, 6·XLVIII, 6·LXXXIV

The human soul 5·XXVI, 5·XXVIII, 5·XXX, 5·XXXII, 5·XCV, 5·CVIII, 5·CXLII, 5·CXLVIII, 5·CLXXXIV, 5·CLXXXV, 5·CLXXXIX, 5·CCVIII, 5·CCIX, 5·CCX, 5·CCXXXVI, 5·CCXXXVII

ORIGENIST ERRORS

Pre-existence & imprisonment of souls 6·CLXVI, 6·CLXXVII, 6·CLXXXVI, 6·CCIII, 6·CCIV, 6·CCLXXXVI, 6·CCLXXXVII, 6·CCXCI, 6·CCXCVII

Restoration of all (apocatastasis) 6·LXVII, 6·CCCIII, 6·CCCVI

Stars ensouled; God the 'form' of things; sin as 'nothing' 6·CLXVII, 6·CLXVIII, 6·CLXXIV, 6·CCXCIII

SAINTS, MARY, VENERATION

Invocation, intercession & merits of the saints 6·XLVII, 6·LXXXV, 6·CLXIII, 6·CCXXVII, 6·CCLXXX, 6·CCLXXXIII, 6·CCCX, 6·CCCXXXV, 6·CCCXLV

Mariology; the Holy Family; the 'brethren of the Lord' 6·II, 6·III, 6·V, 6·LVIII, 6·LIX, 6·LXII, 6·LXIV, 6·[unnum.], 6·CXXXIII, 6·CXXXVI, 6·CXXXVII, 6·CXXXVIII, 6·CXXXIX, 6·CXL, 6·CLXXXV, 6·CCXXVIII, 6·CCLXXII

Relics, images & amulets 6·CII, 6·CCXLVI

The Virgin Mary, the saints & sacred images 5·CIV, 5·CLIII, 5·CLIV, 5·CLVI, 5·CCXLVII

SCRIPTURE

Canon & canonicity 6·CCLXII, 6·CCCXXVII, 6·CCCXXXVII, 6·CCCXLIV

Clarity vs. obscurity of Scripture 6·CCCXVI

Reading heretical books; the Index 6·CCLXVI

Scripture — canon, authorship & the sense of Scripture 5·LV, 5·CXXIX, 5·CXLIV, 5·CXLIX, 5·CLVII, 5·CXCI, 5·CCXI, 5·CCXVIII, 5·CCXIX, 5·CCXXXVIII, 5·CCXLV, 5·CCXLIX, 5·CCL, 5·CCLXII, 5·CCLXIV

Scripture — text & translation 5·LXV, 5·LXVI, 5·LXVII, 5·LXVIII, 5·LXX, 5·LXXIV, 5·LXXIX, 5·LXXXII, 5·LXXXIII, 5·LXXXIV, 5·LXXXVIII, 5·CIII, 5·CVI, 5·CIX, 5·CX, 5·CXII, 5·CXVI, 5·CXXV, 5·CXXXIII, 5·CXXXVI, 5·CL, 5·CLI, 5·CLV, 5·CCI, 5·CCVI, 5·CCVII, 5·CCXX, 5·CCXXIII, 5·CCXXVI, 5·CCLIV, 5·CCLV

Text-criticism, authenticity & punctuation 6·LXI, 6·CXXIX, 6·CXXXII, 6·CXLIII, 6·CLXXIII, 6·CXCVIII, 6·CCXX, 6·CCXXVI, 6·CCXLI, 6·CCXLV, 6·CCLXXVII

Vernacular Bible reading; who may read Scripture 6·I, 6·CLII, 6·CLXXX, 6·CLXXXIII, 6·CCLXIII, 6·CCCXV

MORALS, DISCIPLINE, SOCIETY

Blasphemy & its punishment 6·CCCXXII

Christian ethics: love, injury & forgiveness 6·XXVII, 6·XXXII, 6·XXXIV, 6·CCLXXXIV

Magic, astrology & superstition 6·IX

Magic, witchcraft, astrology & the evil eye 6·VIII, 6·IX, 6·X, 6·CCLXXVI, 6·CCCXIV

Marriage, divorce & impediments 6·XXII, 6·XXIV, 6·LXIV, 6·LXXIX, 6·LXXX, 6·LXXXI, 6·LXXXII, 6·CCLX

Monastic life, manual labor & mendicancy 6·XVIII, 6·XXXIII, 6·LXXXVI, 6·CXXVIII, 6·CXLVII, 6·CCLXXIX, 6·CCCXVII, 6·CCCXXXII

Moral, practical & historical questions 5·XXV, 5·XLVIII, 5·LIX, 5·LXI, 5·LXXXVI, 5·LXXXVII, 5·LXXXIX, 5·XC, 5·XCI, 5·XCII, 5·XCIV, 5·XCVIII, 5·CVII, 5·CXI, 5·CXIII, 5·CXIV, 5·CXVI, 5·CXXIII, 5·CXXIV, 5·CLXVI, 5·CLXXII, 5·CLXXXVII, 5·CCIV, 5·CCXXVII, 5·CCXXXI, 5·CCXXXIX, 5·CCLIII, 5·CCLX

Oaths & swearing 6·XXV, 6·XXVI, 6·CXXIII, 6·CCXXIII, 6·CCXXIV, 6·CCXXXIX, 6·CCCXXXVIII

Prayer, liturgy & worship 6·XXIX, 6·XXXI, 6·XCVI, 6·CCCIV, 6·CCCXI, 6·CCCXXVI

The Law: Mosaic & natural 6·LIV, 6·LXXIX, 6·CI, 6·CCXLIII, 6·CCLXXIII

War, the sword, trade & almsgiving 6·LXXXIII, 6·XCV, 6·CVI, 6·CXV, 6·CXVI, 6·CLVI, 6·CLVII, 6·CLVIII, 6·CCLVI

BIBLICAL HISTORY, PERSONS & REALIA

Gospel history, persons & antiquities 6·XLIX, 6·L, 6·LXII, 6·XCII, 6·XCIII, 6·CIX, 6·CXX, 6·CXXII, 6·CXXIV, 6·CXXVII, 6·CXXX, 6·CXLIII, 6·CXLIV, 6·CXLV, 6·CXLVI, 6·CCV, 6·CCVII, 6·CCXXII, 6·CCXXIX

The earthly Paradise 5·XXXIII, 5·XXXIV, 5·XXXV, 5·XXXVI, 5·XXXVII, 5·XXXVIII, 5·LVI

INDEX OF PERSONS

Fathers, Doctors, interpreters, and adversaries discussed in either book. 5· = Book V (Old Testament), 6· = Book VI (New Testament).

Agrippa, Cornelius 5·LXXIII · 6·CXXV, 6·CCLXIV, 6·CCLXXVI, 6·CCCXLV

Alcuin 6·LXV

Ambrose of Compsa (Catharinus) 5·I, 5·IV, 5·VII, 5·XXXVI, 5·LIX, 5·LXI, 5·C, 5·CLVII, 5·CLXVIII, 5·CXCVI · 6·IX, 6·XVIII, 6·XXXII, 6·LII, 6·LVII, 6·LXI, 6·LXXVII, 6·LXXVIII, 6·LXXIX, 6·LXXXI, 6·LXXXII, 6·LXXXVI, 6·XCVII, 6·CI, 6·CXI, 6·CXXVIII, 6·CXXXI, 6·CXXXII, 6·CXLIII, 6·CLIX, 6·CLXIX, 6·CXCVII, 6·CXCVIII, 6·CCI, 6·CCXVIII, 6·CCXIX, 6·CCXXV, 6·CCXLVIII, 6·CCLII, 6·CCLX, 6·CCLXI, 6·CCLXII, 6·CCLXIII, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCLXXVII, 6·CCXCIV, 6·CCCVII, 6·CCCXXVII, 6·CCCXXX, 6·CCCXXXI, 6·CCCXXXVII, 6·CCCXXXIX, 6·CCCXL, 6·CCCXLII

Ambrose of Milan 5·I, 5·II, 5·IV, 5·V, 5·VII, 5·XXIV, 5·XXXV, 5·XLIX, 5·LVIII, 5·LIX, 5·LXI, 5·LXII, 5·LXIV, 5·LXX, 5·LXXVII, 5·XCII, 5·XCIV, 5·XCVIII, 5·C, 5·CV, 5·CXIV, 5·CXXXI, 5·CXXXIV, 5·CXLVII, 5·CLVII, 5·CLXVIII, 5·CLXXI, 5·CXC, 5·CXCVI, 5·CCIV, 5·CCV, 5·CCXL, 5·CCXLVII, 5·CCLIII · 6·XIII, 6·XXVI, 6·LXXIII, 6·CV, 6·CIX, 6·CXXXIV, 6·CXXXVII, 6·CXLVIII, 6·CLVI, 6·CLVIII, 6·CLX, 6·CLXI, 6·CLXII, 6·CLXIV, 6·CXCVI, 6·CCIX, 6·CCXLV, 6·CCCXI, 6·CCCXLV

Ambrosiaster (pseudo-Ambrose) 6·LXXXI, 6·CCXXXVI, 6·CCLI, 6·CCLX, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCLXXII, 6·CCLXXIII, 6·CCXCVIII, 6·CCC, 6·CCCXXIV

The Anabaptists (Balthasar Hubmaier) 5·CLXIX, 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCXLVII · 6·XXVI, 6·CCLXIV, 6·CCCXLV

Anatolius 6·CCCXLVII

Anselm 6·CCXXXV, 6·CCCXXIV, 6·CCCXXV

Anselm of Laon 6·CCLV

Apollinaris 5·CXXIII, 5·CCXXXIII · 6·CIV, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCLXVI, 6·CCLXXIV, 6·CCCXLVII

Aquinas, Thomas 5·V, 5·VIII, 5·IX, 5·XIV, 5·XV, 5·XX, 5·XXIV, 5·XXX, 5·XXXII, 5·XXXVIII, 5·XL, 5·XLVII, 5·XCII, 5·XCIV, 5·XCVI, 5·CVIII, 5·CXXXVII, 5·CXXXIX, 5·CXLI, 5·CLXI, 5·CLXIII, 5·CLXVI, 5·CLXXVI, 5·CLXXXVII, 5·CLXXXVIII, 5·CCV, 5·CCVIII, 5·CCXII, 5·CCXXV, 5·CCXXVII, 5·CCXL, 5·CCXLI, 5·CCLVIII · 6·III, 6·VI, 6·VII, 6·X, 6·XIII, 6·XXVI, 6·XXVIII, 6·XXX, 6·XXXIII, 6·XLI, 6·XLVII, 6·LXII, 6·LXXI, 6·LXXII, 6·LXXIV, 6·LXXIX, 6·LXXXIX, 6·XCV, 6·XCVIII, 6·CII, 6·CXI, 6·CXVII, 6·CXXI, 6·CXXXVII, 6·CXXXVIII, 6·CXLV, 6·CXLVII, 6·CXLVIII, 6·CLVI, 6·CLXVII, 6·CLXXV, 6·CLXXXII, 6·CXCV, 6·CCVII, 6·CCXIII, 6·CCXIV, 6·CCXVII, 6·CCXLIX, 6·CCLI, 6·CCLV, 6·CCLVIII, 6·CCCIV, 6·CCCXI, 6·CCCXVII, 6·CCCXXVIII, 6·CCCXXXII, 6·CCCXXXIX, 6·CCCXLI

Arator 6·CCXXII, 6·CCXXV

Arethas 6·CCCXLV

Arnobius 5·CLVI, 5·CLXXVII, 5·CXCVII, 5·CCLI · 6·CXXXVI, 6·CCXXXVII

Athanasius 5·I, 5·VIII, 5·CLVIII, 5·CCXI, 5·CCXLVII · 6·XXVI, 6·LIII, 6·LVI, 6·CXXII, 6·CXXIII, 6·CXXXIII, 6·CLXXXVII

Augustine 5·I, 5·II, 5·III, 5·V, 5·VI, 5·VII, 5·VIII, 5·X, 5·XIII, 5·XIV, 5·XV, 5·XX, 5·XXI, 5·XXII, 5·XXIV, 5·XXV, 5·XXVII, 5·XXVIII, 5·XXX, 5·XXXI, 5·XXXIV, 5·XXXVI, 5·XL, 5·XLI, 5·XLII, 5·XLIII, 5·XLIV, 5·XLV, 5·XLIX, 5·L, 5·LI, 5·LII, 5·LVIII, 5·LXVI, 5·LXVIII, 5·LXX, 5·LXXIII, 5·LXXVII, 5·LXXXV, 5·LXXXVII, 5·LXXXIX, 5·XCI, 5·XCII, 5·XCIV, 5·XCVI, 5·XCVIII, 5·CIV, 5·CV, 5·CVII, 5·CVIII, 5·CXIV, 5·CXX, 5·CXXX, 5·CXXXI, 5·CXXXII, 5·CXXXIV, 5·CXXXVII, 5·CXXXIX, 5·CXLI, 5·CLII, 5·CLX, 5·CLXII, 5·CLXIII, 5·CLXV, 5·CLXVI, 5·CLXVII, 5·CLXIX, 5·CLXX, 5·CLXXI, 5·CLXXXIII, 5·CLXXXVI, 5·CLXXXVIII, 5·CXC, 5·CXCI, 5·CXCIII, 5·CXCIV, 5·CXCV, 5·CXCVII, 5·CCV, 5·CCVIII, 5·CCXI, 5·CCXIII, 5·CCXVII, 5·CCXVIII, 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCXL, 5·CCLIII, 5·CCLV, 5·CCLXI · 6·VI, 6·X, 6·XIII, 6·XX, 6·XXII, 6·XXIV, 6·XXV, 6·XXVIII, 6·XXX, 6·XXXI, 6·XXXIII, 6·XXXIV, 6·XXXV, 6·XXXVI, 6·XXXVII, 6·XXXVIII, 6·XLI, 6·XLVII, 6·LI, 6·LX, 6·LXIII, 6·LXIV, 6·LXVIII, 6·LXXIII, 6·LXXVI, 6·LXXXI, 6·LXXXVI, 6·LXXXVII, 6·LXXXIX, 6·CI, 6·CIV, 6·CV, 6·CIX, 6·CXX, 6·CXXIV, 6·CXXXVIII, 6·CXLV, 6·CXLVI, 6·CXLVIII, 6·CLVI, 6·CLXVII, 6·CLXXIII, 6·CLXXIV, 6·CLXXXII, 6·CLXXXVI, 6·CXCIII, 6·CXCIV, 6·CXCV, 6·CXCVI, 6·CXCVII, 6·CCI, 6·CCVI, 6·CCIX, 6·CCX, 6·CCXIII, 6·CCXX, 6·CCXXI, 6·CCXXXV, 6·CCXXXVI, 6·CCXXXIX, 6·CCXLI, 6·CCXLVI, 6·CCXLIX, 6·CCL, 6·CCLI, 6·CCLII, 6·CCLV, 6·CCLVII, 6·CCLIX, 6·CCLX, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCLXXIV, 6·CCLXXVIII, 6·CCLXXX, 6·CCLXXXI, 6·CCLXXXIV, 6·CCLXXXVIII, 6·CCCIV, 6·CCCXI,

6·CCCXII, 6·CCCXVII, 6·CCCXXIV, 6·CCCXXXIX, 6·CCCXL, 6·CCCXLIII, 6·CCCXLV

Augustine, Bishop of Kissamos 5·IV, 5·XXXVI, 5·LII, 5·LXV, 5·LXVI, 5·LXXXIII, 5·CXVI, 5·CXXIII, 5·CXXIV, 5·CXXV, 5·CXXX, 5·CXXXIII

Basil 5·II, 5·V, 5·VII, 5·VIII, 5·XI, 5·XVII, 5·XXIV, 5·XXXIV, 5·CVIII, 5·CXLVII, 5·CLXXI, 5·CXCIX, 5·CCXII, 5·CCXXIV, 5·CCXLIII · 6·X, 6·LXVIII, 6·LXXXV, 6·LXXXIX, 6·CXI, 6·CXLVIII, 6·CLXXV, 6·CLXXXVII, 6·CCXXXVI, 6·CCLXIII, 6·CCCVII

Beatus Rhenanus 6·CLIV

Bede 5·XXXIV, 5·XXXVIII, 5·LXVIII, 5·XCVI, 5·CCXL, 5·CCXLIV · 6·LXII, 6·CIX, 6·CXXIV, 6·CXLIII, 6·CXLIV, 6·CXLVI, 6·CLIV, 6·CLXII, 6·CCVII, 6·CCXXV, 6·CCXXIX, 6·CCCXXXIX, 6·CCCXLI, 6·CCCXLIII

Bernard 5·VIII, 5·XCVI, 5·CXIX, 5·CXCII, 5·CCXV, 5·CCXVI, 5·CCXVII · 6·LXXII, 6·LXXXIX, 6·CIX, 6·CXVIII, 6·CXXXIII, 6·CXXXVII, 6·CLVI, 6·CCXXXIX, 6·CCCXLV

Bertram 6·CXCVI, 6·CCLXXXIX

Bodius 5·CXVIII, 5·CXX, 5·CLII, 5·CXCV, 5·CCXXXII, 5·CCXXXV · 6·XXVII, 6·LX, 6·CVII, 6·CCII

Boniface 6·CLVI, 6·CXCVI

Brie, Germain de 6·CCLIII, 6·CCLXXI

Bucer, Martin (Bodius) 5·CXVIII, 5·CXX, 5·CLII, 5·CXCV, 5·CCXXXII, 5·CCXXXV

Bunderius, John (Bonderius) 5·CXL, 5·CCXIV · 6·LXIX, 6·CCXXI

Cajetan, Thomas de Vio 5·I, 5·V, 5·VII, 5·XLVI, 5·XLVII, 5·C, 5·CVIII, 5·CXX, 5·CLVII, 5·CLXI, 5·CLXVIII, 5·CXCVI, 5·CCI, 5·CCXLIV · 6·IX, 6·XIII, 6·XIV, 6·XVIII, 6·XXXII, 6·LII, 6·LVII, 6·LXI, 6·LXII, 6·LXIV, 6·LXXVII, 6·LXXVIII, 6·LXXIX, 6·LXXXI, 6·LXXXII, 6·LXXXVI, 6·XCVII, 6·CI, 6·CXI, 6·CXXVIII, 6·CXXXI, 6·CXXXII, 6·CXLIII, 6·CLIX, 6·CLXIX, 6·CXCVII, 6·CXCVIII, 6·CCI, 6·CCXVIII, 6·CCXIX, 6·CCXXV, 6·CCXXVI, 6·CCXXIX, 6·CCLX, 6·CCLXI, 6·CCLXII, 6·CCLXIII, 6·CCXCIV, 6·CCCVII, 6·CCCXXVII, 6·CCCXXXI, 6·CCCXXXVII, 6·CCCXXXIX, 6·CCCXLII, 6·CCCXLIV

Calvin, John 5·CLXVII, 5·CLXXIV, 5·CLXXV, 5·CXCII, 5·CCXVII, 5·CCLVIII · 6·XI, 6·LXXII, 6·CXCVI, 6·CCVI, 6·CCXXXIX, 6·CCLXVIII, 6·CCLXIX, 6·CCCXVII

Cassian, John 5·VIII, 5·LXXIII, 5·CVII, 5·CLXXV · 6·XXXI, 6·XXXV, 6·CLXXXIV, 6·CCLVII, 6·CCLXXIV

Castro, Alfonso de 5·XXIX, 5·LXXXVII, 5·XCI · 6·LXXI, 6·CXLVII, 6·CLXIII, 6·CCCXXIV, 6·CCCXLV

Cerinthus 5·XVII, 5·CCXXXIII · 6·CCCXLVII

Christian Druthmar 5·XIII, 5·XV, 5·XVIII, 5·XXXVI, 5·XLVIII, 5·LII, 5·CVII, 5·CXVIII, 5·CXX, 5·CXXX, 5·CLXVI, 5·CXC, 5·CXCVIII, 5·CCIV, 5·CCVI, 5·CCXI, 5·CCXVIII, 5·CCXXIX, 5·CCXXXII, 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCXLIV, 5·CCXLVI, 5·CCXLVII, 5·CCLIII, 5·CCLX, 5·CCLXIV · 6·X, 6·XIII, 6·XVII, 6·XVIII, 6·XXV, 6·XXVI, 6·XXVII, 6·XXIX, 6·XL, 6·XLII, 6·XLVII, 6·L, 6·LI, 6·LXXII, 6·LXXVI, 6·LXXXI, 6·LXXXII, 6·LXXXIII, 6·XCV, 6·CIV, 6·CIX, 6·CXI, 6·CXII, 6·CXV, 6·CXVI, 6·CXVII, 6·CXXIII, 6·CXLVIII, 6·CLII, 6·CLVI, 6·CLVIII, 6·CLXII, 6·CLXXVIII, 6·CLXXIX, 6·CXCI, 6·CXCVI, 6·CCIX, 6·CCX, 6·CCXII, 6·CCXIII, 6·CCXIV, 6·CCXIX, 6·CCXX, 6·CCXXI, 6·CCXXIV, 6·CCXXXIX, 6·CCLVI, 6·CCLVII, 6·CCLX, 6·CCLXVI, 6·CCLXVIII, 6·CCLXXIV, 6·CCLXXIX, 6·CCLXXXIV, 6·CCLXXXVII, 6·CCXC, 6·CCCXI, 6·CCCXXXVIII, 6·CCCXXXIX, 6·CCCXL

Chromatius 6·XXIII, 6·XXV, 6·XXVI, 6·LXXXI

Chrysippus 6·CCCXL

Chrysostom, John 5·II, 5·III, 5·VII, 5·VIII, 5·IX, 5·XIV, 5·XVI, 5·XVII, 5·XX, 5·XXIV, 5·XXVII, 5·XXXIV, 5·XLVI, 5·XLVIII, 5·LVIII, 5·LXIII, 5·LXXII, 5·LXXIII, 5·LXXV, 5·LXXVII, 5·LXXVIII, 5·LXXXIV, 5·LXXXV, 5·LXXXVII, 5·LXXXIX, 5·XCIV, 5·XCVI, 5·XCVIII, 5·CI, 5·CIV, 5·CVII, 5·CXII, 5·CXIII, 5·CXIV, 5·CLIII, 5·CLIV, 5·CLXIV, 5·CLXXIII, 5·CLXXIV, 5·CLXXV, 5·CLXXVIII, 5·CLXXX, 5·CXC, 5·CXCVIII, 5·CC, 5·CCXXI, 5·CCXXIII, 5·CCXLII, 5·CCXLIV, 5·CCLIV · 6·I, 6·II, 6·VI, 6·X, 6·XI, 6·XIII, 6·XXIII, 6·XXVI, 6·XXVII, 6·XXIX, 6·XXXI, 6·XLI, 6·XLII, 6·XLVI, 6·XLVII, 6·XLVIII, 6·LI, 6·LVIII, 6·LX, 6·LXIII, 6·LXV, 6·LXVII, 6·LXVIII, 6·LXXII, 6·LXXXI, 6·LXXXIV, 6·LXXXVII, 6·XCIII, 6·XCV, 6·XCVIII, 6·CIV, 6·CV, 6·CVI, 6·CIX, 6·CX, 6·CXI, 6·CXIII, 6·CXVI, 6·CXX, 6·CXXI, 6·CXXV, 6·[unnum.], 6·CXXVII, 6·CXXIX, 6·CXXX, 6·CXXXVIII, 6·CXLIV, 6·CLI, 6·CLII, 6·CLIII, 6·CLV, 6·CLVI, 6·CLXV, 6·CLXXI, 6·CLXXIII, 6·CLXXV, 6·CLXXX, 6·CLXXXII, 6·CLXXXIII, 6·CLXXXIV, 6·CLXXXV, 6·CLXXXVII, 6·CXCIV, 6·CXCVI, 6·CXCVII, 6·CC, 6·CCVII, 6·CCXX, 6·CCXXIII, 6·CCXXIV, 6·CCXXV, 6·CCXXVII, 6·CCXXXI, 6·CCXXXII, 6·CCXXXIV, 6·CCXXXVI, 6·CCXXXIX, 6·CCXLII, 6·CCXLIII, 6·CCXLV, 6·CCXLVII, 6·CCLI, 6·CCLIII, 6·CCLVI, 6·CCLVII, 6·CCLIX, 6·CCLXIII, 6·CCLXIV, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCLXVII, 6·CCLXVIII, 6·CCLXXI, 6·CCLXXIV,

6·CCLXXVI, 6·CCLXXXV, 6·CCLXXXVIII, 6·CCCVII, 6·CCCIX, 6·CCCX, 6·CCCXI, 6·CCCXII, 6·CCCXIII, 6·CCCXIV, 6·CCCXV, 6·CCCXVI, 6·CCCXIX, 6·CCCXXI, 6·CCCXXII, 6·CCCXXIV, 6·CCCXXIX, 6·CCCXXXII, 6·CCCXXXIII, 6·CCCXXXIV, 6·CCCXXXV, 6·CCCXXXVI, 6·CCCXL, 6·CCCXLV

Cleanthes 6·CCCXL

Clement (of Alexandria) 6·CXI, 6·CXLVI, 6·CCCXL

Clement of Rome 6·LXVIII, 6·CCCXLV

Cyril 5·VIII, 5·XXVII, 5·LXXIII, 5·CLXXXV, 5·CXC · 6·XXVI, 6·LXXIII, 6·CXI, 6·CXLVI, 6·CLII, 6·CLXXIII, 6·CLXXV, 6·CLXXXVII, 6·CXCVII, 6·CCLXXXVI, 6·CCCVII

Didymus of Alexandria 5·XXVII, 5·LXXIII, 5·CXXXI, 5·CLXXXV, 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCXLIV, 5·CCXLIX · 6·VIII, 6·LI, 6·LIII, 6·LXXXI, 6·CXIX, 6·CLXXV, 6·CLXXXVII, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCLXVI, 6·CCLXIX, 6·CCLXXIV, 6·CCLXXV, 6·CCLXXXIX

Edward Lee 6·CXI, 6·CCI

Epiphanius 5·XI, 5·XVIII, 5·XXXIII, 5·XLIX, 5·LIII, 5·LVIII, 5·LXVIII, 5·XC, 5·CXLVI, 5·CXLVII, 5·CXLVIII, 5·CLVIII, 5·CLXXXV, 5·CCXLIV, 5·CCXLVII · 6·XVII, 6·XXVI, 6·LXIV, 6·CXXII, 6·CXLVI, 6·CXLVIII, 6·CLXXXVII

Erasmus of Rotterdam 5·CXXXI, 5·CXXXIV, 5·CL, 5·CLVI, 5·CCIII · 6·XXVII, 6·LXVI, 6·LXVIII, 6·LXXV, 6·LXXVI, 6·LXXXIII, 6·CVII, 6·CXI, 6·CXVI, 6·CXXIV, 6·CXXXIII, 6·CXLVI, 6·CLVI, 6·CLVII, 6·CLVIII, 6·CLXII, 6·CCI, 6·CCXX, 6·CCXXVI, 6·CCXXXVI, 6·CCLVI, 6·CCLXXI

Eusebius 5·XIV, 5·XV, 5·XVIII, 5·LXVIII, 5·LXX, 5·LXXVII, 5·LXXXIX, 5·CIII, 5·CXII, 5·CLVIII, 5·CCXXIII, 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCXLV, 5·CCXLVII, 5·CCXLIX, 5·CCLIII · 6·LXIV, 6·CXLIV, 6·CXLVI, 6·CCVII, 6·CCXXIX, 6·CCLXVI, 6·CCLXXIV, 6·CCLXXV, 6·CCCXL

Eusebius of Emesa 5·XIV, 5·CIII · 6·CXLIV, 6·CCLXXIV

Euthymius Zigabenus 5·XX, 5·CLXVIII, 5·CLXXX · 6·XXIII, 6·XXV, 6·XXVI, 6·LVIII, 6·LIX, 6·LX, 6·LXIV, 6·LXXXI, 6·XCIII, 6·XCVI, 6·CV, 6·CIX, 6·CX, 6·CXV, 6·CXX, 6·CXXII, 6·[unnum.], 6·CXXXIX, 6·CXLIV, 6·CLXIII, 6·CLXXIII, 6·CLXXXII, 6·CLXXXV, 6·CLXXXVII, 6·CCVIII, 6·CCXI, 6·CCCXLV

Ferus, John 6·XL, 6·XLIII, 6·XLV, 6·LV, 6·LXXII, 6·LXXXIX, 6·CXV, 6·CLVI, 6·CLXXVIII, 6·CLXXIX, 6·CLXXXI, 6·CXC, 6·CXCI, 6·CXCII, 6·CCIX, 6·CCX, 6·CCXII, 6·CCXIV, 6·CCXV, 6·CCXVI, 6·CCLV

Gennadius 5·LIV, 5·LVIII, 5·LXXVI, 5·CXXXVII · 6·XXXV, 6·CLXXXIV, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCCXI, 6·CCCXL

George of Trebizond 6·XCIII, 6·CCXX

Gilbert 6·XLVII

Giorgio, Francesco (Veneto) 5·XXVI, 5·XXIX, 5·XXXIV, 5·XXXVII, 5·XLV, 5·LI, 5·LIV, 5·LXIX, 5·LXXXVI, 5·XCVII, 5·CIX · 6·XLVIII

Godefridus Tilmannus 6·CXXVII, 6·CXXIX, 6·CXXX

Gratian 5·LXII, 5·CLXIII, 5·CCXL, 5·CCLI, 5·CCLVIII · 6·LXXXI, 6·LXXXII, 6·CLXI

Gregory 5·V, 5·XX, 5·XXIV, 5·XL, 5·CXXX, 5·CXXXVII, 5·CXXXVIII, 5·CXXXIX, 5·CXL, 5·CXLI, 5·CXLIII, 5·CXLV, 5·CLXXX, 5·CCVIII, 5·CCXXVIII, 5·CCXL, 5·CCXLI, 5·CCXLVII · 6·VII, 6·L, 6·CIX, 6·CLVI, 6·CCXXXVI

Gregory of Nyssa 5·XX, 5·XXIV, 5·CXXX, 5·CCVIII · 6·CCCXXVIII

Gregory of Rimini 5·CXXXVII · 6·CCLXXVIII

Gregory the Theologian 5·V, 5·CXXX, 5·CLXXX, 5·CCXLVII · 6·CXLIV, 6·CCXXXVI

Henry Hayton 6·CXXXIV

Henry of Andernach 6·XLII

Henry of Hesse 5·LXXXI · 6·XLII, 6·LXXII, 6·CXXXIV, 6·CCXLIV

Hilary of Poitiers 5·V, 5·VIII, 5·LXI, 5·CXII, 5·CXLIX, 5·CL, 5·CLXXI, 5·CLXXXI, 5·CLXXXII, 5·CLXXXIII, 5·CLXXXVI, 5·CXC, 5·CCI, 5·CCII, 5·CCIII, 5·CCVI, 5·CCVII, 5·CCVIII · 6·V, 6·XXIII, 6·XXV, 6·XXVI, 6·XXXV, 6·LXII, 6·LXIV, 6·LXVIII, 6·LXXIII, 6·LXXXI, 6·XCI, 6·XCVI, 6·CV, 6·CVII, 6·CXIV, 6·CXVIII, 6·CXXI, 6·CXXVI, 6·CLX, 6·CLXIV, 6·CLXXV, 6·CCLII, 6·CCLXXVIII, 6·CCCXL, 6·CCCXLVI

Hugh of Saint-Cher 6·CXLV, 6·CLVI

Irenaeus 5·XC, 5·CXC, 5·CCXXXIII · 6·LXXIII, 6·CCLXXIII, 6·CCCXLV, 6·CCCXLVII

Jacobus Faber 5·CXXXI, 5·CCXIX · 6·XXVII, 6·LXII, 6·CCXXXVI, 6·CCL, 6·CCLI

Jacobus Sadoletus 6·CCL, 6·CCLI

James the Apostle 6·CXI

Jerome (of Stridon) 5·V, 5·XI, 5·XII, 5·XVIII, 5·XXIII, 5·XXXIV, 5·XXXVII, 5·LVIII, 5·LXV, 5·LXVI, 5·LXVIII, 5·LXX, 5·LXXII, 5·LXXIV, 5·LXXV, 5·LXXXI, 5·LXXXVIII, 5·XC, 5·XCVIII, 5·CIII, 5·CVI, 5·CVII, 5·CVIII, 5·CIX, 5·CX, 5·CXI, 5·CXII, 5·CXIV, 5·CXVI, 5·CXVII, 5·CXXIV, 5·CXXV, 5·CXXVI, 5·CXXIX, 5·CXXXI, 5·CXXXIII, 5·CXXXVI, 5·CXLI, 5·CXLII, 5·CXLIX, 5·CLI, 5·CLV, 5·CLIX, 5·CLXI, 5·CLXXI, 5·CLXXVI, 5·CLXXXI, 5·CLXXXV, 5·CLXXXVI, 5·CLXXXIX, 5·CXC, 5·CXCI, 5·CCI, 5·CCVI, 5·CCVII, 5·CCVIII, 5·CCXII, 5·CCXIII, 5·CCXIV, 5·CCXIX, 5·CCXX, 5·CCXXII, 5·CCXXIII, 5·CCXXV, 5·CCXXVI, 5·CCXXVII, 5·CCXXVIII, 5·CCXXIX, 5·CCXXXI, 5·CCXXXII, 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCXXXIV, 5·CCXXXV, 5·CCXXXVI, 5·CCXXXVII, 5·CCXXXVIII, 5·CCXLIV, 5·CCXLV, 5·CCXLVI, 5·CCXLVII, 5·CCXLVIII, 5·CCXLIX, 5·CCLII, 5·CCLIII, 5·CCLIV, 5·CCLV, 5·CCLVI, 5·CCLVII, 5·CCLVIII, 5·CCLIX, 5·CCLX, 5·CCLXI, 5·CCLXII, 5·CCLXIII, 5·CCLXIV · 6·III, 6·VI, 6·VIII, 6·IX, 6·XXV, 6·XXVI, 6·XXXI, 6·XXXIII, 6·XXXV, 6·LXIV, 6·LXVIII, 6·LXXI, 6·LXXIII, 6·LXXIV, 6·LXXV, 6·LXXXI, 6·LXXXIX, 6·XCVI, 6·XCVIII, 6·CII, 6·CV, 6·CVIII, 6·CXIV, 6·CXXI, 6·CXXII, 6·[unnum.], 6·CXXVIII, 6·CXXXI, 6·CXXXIII, 6·CXLIV, 6·CXLVI, 6·CL, 6·CLII, 6·CLIX, 6·CLX, 6·CLXXIV, 6·CLXXXVII, 6·CCX, 6·CCXVIII, 6·CCXXIX, 6·CCXXXVIII, 6·CCXL, 6·CCXLIV, 6·CCLI, 6·CCLX, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCLXVI, 6·CCLXVIII, 6·CCLXIX, 6·CCLXX, 6·CCLXXIV, 6·CCLXXV, 6·CCLXXVI, 6·CCLXXVII, 6·CCLXXIX, 6·CCLXXX, 6·CCLXXXII, 6·CCLXXXIII, 6·CCLXXXVI, 6·CCLXXXVII, 6·CCLXXXIX, 6·CCXC, 6·CCXCI, 6·CCXCII, 6·CCXCIII, 6·CCXCV, 6·CCXCVI, 6·CCXCVII, 6·CCXCIX, 6·CCCI, 6·CCCII, 6·CCCIII, 6·CCCIV, 6·CCCV, 6·CCCVI, 6·CCCVIII, 6·CCCXIII, 6·CCCXVIII, 6·CCCXIX, 6·CCCXXIII, 6·CCCXXIV, 6·CCCXXV, 6·CCCXXVI, 6·CCCXXXVII, 6·CCCXL, 6·CCCXLIV, 6·CCCXLVII

John Damascene 5·VIII, 5·XX, 5·CVIII, 5·CXLI, 5·CLXXXVI, 5·CCXLVII · 6·XLVII, 6·LXXXV, 6·CLXXXVII

John Driedo 6·LXIII

John Henten 6·CXV, 6·CCVIII

John of Torquemada 5·CLXXVI · 6·LXXII

John Wycliffe 6·XXVI, 6·CCCXVII, 6·CCCXXIV

Justin 5·CLXXXVI, 5·CXC · 6·VIII, 6·X, 6·LI, 6·LXXIII, 6·LXXXI, 6·LXXXII, 6·CXIII, 6·CCCXLV, 6·CCCXLVII

Juvencus 6·CCXXII

Lactantius 5·III, 5·VIII, 5·XIII, 5·LXVIII, 5·LXX, 5·LXXV, 5·LXXVII, 5·CLXXI, 5·CXC, 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCXLVIII · 6·LXXIII, 6·CCCXLV, 6·CCCXLVII

Lanfranc 6·CXCVI

Lombard, Peter (Master of the Sentences) 5·I, 5·VIII, 5·LXII, 5·CXLIII, 5·CLXII, 5·CLXVII, 5·CLXXV, 5·CLXXXVI, 5·CXCIV, 5·CCIX, 5·CCXXVIII, 5·CCXL · 6·XXXVI, 6·LXXI, 6·LXXII, 6·LXXXI, 6·CXIV, 6·CXXXIV, 6·CXLI, 6·CL, 6·CLXI, 6·CLXIV, 6·CLXXXVI, 6·CXCIV, 6·CXCVI, 6·CCXXXV, 6·CCLXXXIV, 6·CCLXXXIX, 6·CCXCIX

Lorenzo Valla 6·CCXX

Lucian the Monk 6·CCXXXI, 6·CCXXXII, 6·CCXXXIV, 6·CCXXXVI, 6·CCXXXIX, 6·CCXLII, 6·CCCXL

Luther, Martin 5·LXXIII, 5·CI, 5·CXXXIV, 5·CXXXVIII, 5·CXL, 5·CXLV, 5·CLIII, 5·CLXVII, 5·CLXXV, 5·CXCV, 5·CCXIV, 5·CCXXXII, 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCXXXV · 6·XVI, 6·XXVI, 6·XXVII, 6·XXXVIII, 6·XL, 6·XLIII, 6·XLV, 6·LX, 6·LXIX, 6·LXXI, 6·LXXXVI, 6·CLIV, 6·CLXXVIII, 6·CLXXIX, 6·CXCI, 6·CXCVII, 6·CCII, 6·CCIX, 6·CCX, 6·CCXII, 6·CCXXI, 6·CCXXXIII, 6·CCXXXIX, 6·CCLXIII, 6·CCLXVIII, 6·CCLXXVII, 6·CCLXXVIII, 6·CCCV, 6·CCCX, 6·CCCXV, 6·CCCXVII

Mark of Ephesus 5·CCXLVII · 6·XI, 6·XXVI, 6·CXI, 6·CCLIX, 6·CCCXXIV, 6·CCCXL

Maximus 6·CLXI, 6·CLXXXVII

Medina, Michael 6·XL, 6·CLXXIX, 6·CXCI, 6·CXCII, 6·CCIX, 6·CCX, 6·CCXII, 6·CCXIV, 6·CCXV, 6·CCXVI

Nepos 6·CCCXLVII

Nicholas Cabasilas 6·CXI

Nicholas of Lyra 5·XII, 5·XL, 5·CLXV · 6·LXII, 6·LXXII, 6·CXI, 6·CLVII

Oecolampadius 5·CI, 5·CLXIV

Oecolampadius, John 6·CXLVII, 6·CCLXVI

Oecumenius 5·CXI · 6·XXVI, 6·LXIV, 6·CCVII, 6·CCXXII, 6·CCXXV, 6·CCXXVIII, 6·CCLI, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCLXXIV, 6·CCLXXV, 6·CCCXXXV, 6·CCCXXXVIII, 6·CCCXL, 6·CCCXLV

Origen 5·II, 5·V, 5·VII, 5·VIII, 5·XI, 5·XIV, 5·XV, 5·XXVI, 5·XXXII, 5·XXXIII, 5·XXXIV, 5·XXXV, 5·XLIX, 5·LIII, 5·LIV, 5·LXVI, 5·LXVIII, 5·LXXVI, 5·XC, 5·XCIII, 5·CII, 5·CIV, 5·CVII, 5·CVIII, 5·CXI, 5·CXVII, 5·CXVIII, 5·CXIX, 5·CXX, 5·CXXI, 5·CXXII, 5·CXXVI, 5·CXXVII, 5·CXXVIII, 5·CXXXI, 5·CXXXIV, 5·CXXXV, 5·CXLI, 5·CXLIII, 5·CXLIV, 5·CXLVI, 5·CXLVIII, 5·CL, 5·CLIX, 5·CLX, 5·CLXX, 5·CLXXI, 5·CLXXXIV, 5·CLXXXV, 5·CLXXXIX, 5·CCVI, 5·CCVIII, 5·CCX, 5·CCXI, 5·CCXII, 5·CCXIII, 5·CCXXII, 5·CCXXV, 5·CCXXIX, 5·CCXXX, 5·CCXXXIV, 5·CCXXXV, 5·CCXXXVI, 5·CCXXXVII, 5·CCXLII, 5·CCXLIII, 5·CCXLIV, 5·CCXLV, 5·CCXLIX, 5·CCL, 5·CCLVI, 5·CCLIX, 5·CCLXII · 6·VIII, 6·XXVI, 6·XLVII, 6·LVI, 6·LXIV, 6·LXVI, 6·LXVIII, 6·LXIX, 6·LXX, 6·LXXXI, 6·LXXXIII, 6·CV, 6·CIX, 6·CXVII, 6·CXIX, 6·CXX, 6·CXXI, 6·CXXII, 6·CXXIV, 6·CXXXV, 6·CXXXVI, 6·CXXXVII, 6·CXXXVIII, 6·CXL, 6·CXLII, 6·CXLIX, 6·CLVI, 6·CLXV, 6·CLXVI, 6·CLXVIII, 6·CLXX, 6·CLXXI, 6·CLXXII, 6·CLXXV, 6·CLXXVI, 6·CLXXVII, 6·CLXXXVIII, 6·CLXXXIX, 6·CXCVI, 6·CXCIX, 6·CCIII, 6·CCIV, 6·CCV, 6·CCXXX, 6·CCXXXIII, 6·CCXLIX, 6·CCLI, 6·CCLIV, 6·CCLV, 6·CCLIX, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCLXVI, 6·CCLXXIV, 6·CCLXXXII, 6·CCLXXXIV, 6·CCLXXXVI, 6·CCLXXXVII, 6·CCXC, 6·CCXCI, 6·CCXCII, 6·CCXCIII, 6·CCXCIV, 6·CCXCV, 6·CCXCVI, 6·CCXCVII, 6·CCXCVIII, 6·CCCII, 6·CCCVI, 6·CCCXLV

Papias 5·CCXXXIII · 6·CCXXII, 6·CCCXLVII

Peter d'Ailly 5·LXXXI · 6·X

Philip Melanchthon 6·LXXXI

Philo 5·II, 5·VIII, 5·XVI, 5·XVII, 5·XIX, 5·XXIII, 5·XXIV, 5·XXXII, 5·XXXV, 5·XLIII, 5·LXVIII, 5·LXX, 5·LXXI, 5·LXXVII, 5·XCIII, 5·XCV, 5·CV, 5·CVIII, 5·CXII, 5·CXV, 5·CLXXVI, 5·CCVIII, 5·CCXIX · 6·XXVI, 6·LXXXII, 6·CCLXIV, 6·CCCXLV

Pope Adrian the Sixth 6·CCCXLV

Pope Alexander the Third 6·LXXII

Pope Benedict XI 6·CCCXLV

Pope Gelasius the First 6·LXXII

Pope Gregory 6·CXLIV, 6·CCXVII

Pope Gregory the Fifth 6·LXXII

Pope Gregory the Fourth 6·LXXII

Pope Gregory the Seventh 6·LXXII

Pope Gregory the Third 6·LXXII

Pope Hadrian the First 6·LXXII

Pope John the Eighth 6·LXXII

Pope John XXII 6·CCCXLV

Pope Leo the Eighth 6·LXXII

Pope Leo the Fourth 6·LXXII

Pope Leo the Third 6·LXXII

Pope Liberius 6·CCX

Pope Nicholas the First 6·LXXII

Pope Urban the Second 6·LXXII

Pope Zacharias 6·LXXXI

Pope Zacharias the First 6·LXXII

Prepositinus 6·XLVII

Primasius 6·CCLXIX

Procopius of Gaza 5·III, 5·XIII, 5·XIV, 5·XV, 5·XX, 5·XXIV, 5·XLIV, 5·LVIII, 5·LX, 5·LXIII, 5·LXX, 5·LXXX, 5·XCIX, 5·CXI, 5·CXIII · 6·XIII

Prosper 6·CLXXXIV, 6·CCLII

Prudentius 5·CLXXXI · 6·XLI, 6·XLVII, 6·CCCXLV

Rabanus 5·XII · 6·CIX

Rufinus 5·CXVII, 5·CXXXI, 5·CLI, 5·CCVIII, 5·CCXXIX, 5·CCXXXVIII, 5·CCXLV, 5·CCLV · 6·CCLXIX, 6·CCLXXXVII, 6·CCXC, 6·CCXCI, 6·CCXCII, 6·CCXCIII, 6·CCXCV, 6·CCXCVI, 6·CCXCVII, 6·CCCII, 6·CCCIII, 6·CCCVI

Rupert 6·XLVII

Sanctes Pagninus 6·CCXLIII

Sedulius Scotus 6·CCLI, 6·CCXCIX, 6·CCCXVIII, 6·CCCXXIV

Servetus 6·CCXXXVI

Severus 6·CCCXLVII

Socrates 5·CLXXIII · 6·LI, 6·LXXXII, 6·CLXIX, 6·CCX, 6·CCLXVI

Soto, Domingo de 6·XLIII, 6·CLXXVIII, 6·CLXXIX, 6·CLXXXI, 6·CXC, 6·CXCII, 6·CCIX, 6·CCX, 6·CCXII, 6·CCXIV, 6·CCXVI, 6·CCXLVIII

Stanislaus Pannonius 6·CCXC

Strabo 5·XLV, 5·CXXXVI, 5·CLXIII, 5·CLXXXVIII, 5·CCXXVII · 6·XXXIII, 6·XCVIII

Sulpicius 6·CLVI, 6·CCCXLVII

Sulpicius Severus 6·CLVI, 6·CCCXLVII

Tertullian 5·XVIII, 5·XXXIX, 5·CXLIX, 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCXLIX · 6·XXXV, 6·LXXXI, 6·CXXXVII, 6·CLIV, 6·CCCXLV, 6·CCCXLVII

Theodoret 5·V, 5·VII, 5·XVII, 5·XVIII, 5·XXIII, 5·LV, 5·LVIII, 5·LXXVI, 5·CXIII, 5·CXIV, 5·CXXX, 5·CLXXIX, 5·CCXLIV · 6·CLII, 6·CLXV, 6·CLXXXII, 6·CCXXXVII, 6·CCLI, 6·CCLVIII, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCLXXIV, 6·CCCXX, 6·CCCXXVIII, 6·CCCXXXIV, 6·CCCXXXV, 6·CCCXLV

Theodulus 6·CCLI

Theognostus 6·LVI

Theophylact 5·XCVIII, 5·CIV, 5·CCLIV · 6·XXIII, 6·XXV, 6·XXVI, 6·LVIII, 6·LXIV, 6·LXVIII, 6·LXXXI, 6·XCIX, 6·CIX, 6·CXXII, 6·[unnum.], 6·CXXXI, 6·CXXXIII, 6·CXXXVIII, 6·CXLIV, 6·CXLVI, 6·CXLVII, 6·CLVI, 6·CLX, 6·CLXII, 6·CLXIII, 6·CLXXIII, 6·CLXXXII, 6·CLXXXV, 6·CLXXXVII, 6·CXCIV, 6·CCII, 6·CCV, 6·CCX, 6·CCXXII, 6·CCLI, 6·CCLXIII, 6·CCLXV, 6·CCLXXIV, 6·CCCI, 6·CCCXXIX, 6·CCCXXXIV, 6·CCCXXXV, 6·CCCXLV

Ulphilas 6·CLII

Victorinus 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCLXIV · 6·CCCXLV, 6·CCCXLVI, 6·CCCXLVII

Vida, Marco Girolamo (of Alba) 6·CCLXXVI

Vincent of Lérins 6·LX, 6·CIV

Waldensis, Thomas 6·CCCXVII, 6·CCCXXIV

William 6·XLVII

William of Ockham 6·CCCXLV

William of Saint-Amour 6·CCCXVII

William Opembacchius 6·CXXXIV

Zeno 6·CCCXL

INDEX OF COUNCILS & CANONS

Church councils and synods cited in either book.

Council of Trent 6·X, 6·XL, 6·XLI, 6·XLIII, 6·XLV, 6·LVIII, 6·LXX, 6·LXXXI, 6·CLII, 6·CLXXIX, 6·CCXIV, 6·CCXV, 6·CCXVI, 6·CCXVIII, 6·CCXXXI, 6·CCXXXII, 6·CCXXXIII, 6·CCXXXVI, 6·CCXXXVIII, 6·CCXXXIX, 6·CCLX, 6·CCLXI, 6·CCLXVI, 6·CCLXVII, 6·CCLXVIII, 6·CCLXXVI, 6·CCLXXVIII, 6·CCCXXIV, 6·CCCXXXVII, 6·CCCXXXIX, 6·CCCXL, 6·CCCXLV

African Council 5·XXXVI, 5·LII · 6·CCXXXVIII

Council of Ancyra 5·LXXIII

Council of Basel 6·CCLV, 6·CCLIX, 6·CCLXVII, 6·CCLXVIII

Council of Carthage 5·CCXLIV · 6·CCLXVI

Council of Chalcedon 5·LVIII

Council of Constance 6·XXVI, 6·CCLXVII, 6·CCLXVIII, 6·CCCXVII

Council of Constantinople 5·LVIII · 6·CCLXVII

Council of Elvira 5·CCXLVII · 6·LXXXI, 6·CLII

Council of Ephesus 5·CCXLVII · 6·XXVI

Council of Florence 6·CXI, 6·CLXXXVII, 6·CCLXIX, 6·CCCXLV

Council of Ilerda 5·CCLI

Council of Laodicea 5·CXVIII

Council of Nicaea 5·CLVIII · 6·XVII, 6·CI

Council of Vienne 5·XXVI · 6·CXXV

First Council of Braga 6·CCCX, 6·CCCXI

Fourth Council of Carthage 6·CCLXV, 6·CCLXVI

Lateran Council 5·V, 5·VIII · 6·CLXXXVII

INDEX OF HERESIES & CENSURED OPINIONS

Heretical sects, heresiarchs, and censured opinions refuted or corrected in either book. 5· = Book V (Old Testament), 6· = Book VI (New Testament).

Albanenses 6·XXVI

Anabaptists 5·CLXIX, 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCXLVII · 6·XXVI, 6·CCXXXVI, 6·CCLXIII, 6·CCLXIV, 6·CCLXXXVIII, 6·CCXC, 6·CCCXLI, 6·CCCXLV

Anthropomorphites / Audians 5·XVIII, 5·XLVI, 5·XLVII

Arians 5·XLVI, 5·XLVII, 5·CXXX, 5·CXXXIV, 5·CLVIII, 5·CCXLVII · 6·XIII, 6·XV, 6·XVI, 6·XVII, 6·XXXIX, 6·XLIV, 6·XCI, 6·XCII, 6·CIV, 6·CV, 6·CLXVI, 6·CLXXI, 6·CLXXV, 6·CCX, 6·CCXIII, 6·CCCXXIX

Armenians (on the beatific vision) 5·XXI, 5·LXXVIII, 5·CLXIX · 6·CXI, 6·CXIII, 6·CLII, 6·CLXIII, 6·CCLVIII, 6·CCLXIII, 6·CCLXIV, 6·CCCXLI, 6·CCCXLV

Bertram / Ratramnus (on the Eucharist) 6·CXCIV, 6·CXCVI, 6·CCLXXXVIII, 6·CCLXXXIX

Calvin 5·XVI, 5·XVIII, 5·CLXVII, 5·CLXXIV, 5·CLXXV, 5·CXCII, 5·CCXVII, 5·CCLVIII · 6·XI, 6·LXXII, 6·CXCVI, 6·CCI, 6·CCVI, 6·CCXXXIX, 6·CCLXVII, 6·CCLXVIII, 6·CCLXIX, 6·CCCXVII

Cerinthus 5·XVII, 5·XVIII, 5·CCXXXIII · 6·CCCXLVII

Chiliasts / Millenarians 5·CCXXXIII · 6·LXXIII, 6·LXXXI, 6·CCLXIV, 6·CCCXXIII, 6·CCCXLV, 6·CCCXLVII

Cornelius Agrippa (censured) 5·LXXIII · 6·CXXV, 6·CCLXIV, 6·CCLXXVI, 6·CCCXLV

Donatists 6·LX, 6·CLVI

Ebionites 5·CCXX

Erasmus (censured) 6·XXVII, 6·LXVI, 6·LXXV, 6·LXXVI, 6·CXI, 6·CXVI, 6·CXXIV, 6·CXXXIII, 6·CLVI, 6·CLXII, 6·CCI, 6·CCXIX, 6·CCXX, 6·CCXXXVI, 6·CCLV

Errors of Cajetan (censured) 6·IX, 6·XIII, 6·XVIII, 6·XXXII, 6·LII, 6·LVII, 6·LXXVIII, 6·LXXXI, 6·LXXXII, 6·LXXXVI, 6·XCVII, 6·CI, 6·CXI, 6·[unnum.], 6·CXXVIII, 6·CXXXI, 6·CXXXII, 6·CXLIII, 6·CLIX, 6·CLXIX, 6·CXCVI, 6·CXCVII, 6·CXCVIII, 6·CCI, 6·CCXVI, 6·CCXVIII, 6·CCXIX, 6·CCXXII, 6·CCLX, 6·CCLXI, 6·CCLXIII, 6·CCXC, 6·CCXCIV, 6·CCCVII, 6·CCCXXIV, 6·CCCXXVII, 6·CCCXXVIII, 6·CCCXXXI, 6·CCCXXXVII, 6·CCCXXXIX, 6·CCCXLI, 6·CCCXLII, 6·CCCXLIV

Hussites 6·LXX, 6·CVIII

Lutherans / Luther 5·LXXIII, 5·CI, 5·CXXXIV, 5·CXXXV, 5·CXXXVIII, 5·CXL, 5·CXLV, 5·CLIII, 5·CLXVII, 5·CLXXV, 5·CXCV, 5·CCXIV, 5·CCXXXII, 5·CCXXXIII, 5·CCXXXV · 6·XVI, 6·XXVI, 6·XXVII, 6·XXXVIII, 6·XL, 6·XLIII, 6·XLV, 6·LX, 6·LXIX, 6·LXXI, 6·LXXXVI, 6·CLIV, 6·CLXXVIII, 6·CLXXIX, 6·CXCI, 6·CXCVII, 6·CCII, 6·CCIX, 6·CCX, 6·CCXII, 6·CCXIX, 6·CCXXI, 6·CCXXXIII, 6·CCXXXIX, 6·CCLX, 6·CCLXIII, 6·CCLXVII, 6·CCLXVIII, 6·CCLXXVI, 6·CCLXXVII, 6·CCLXXVIII, 6·CCCI, 6·CCCV, 6·CCCVII, 6·CCCX, 6·CCCXII, 6·CCCXV, 6·CCCXVII

Macedonians (pneumatomachi) 6·XV, 6·CIV, 6·CLXXIII, 6·CCLXXXVIII, 6·CCCXXIV

Manichaeans 5·L, 5·CI, 5·CLX, 5·CLXII · 6·CLVI, 6·CLXXIV

Marcion / Marcionites 6·IV, 6·LXXXI, 6·CCCXLV

Novatians 5·CLXXIII, 5·CLXXIV · 6·LVI, 6·CIV, 6·CXV, 6·CXIX, 6·CCLXXXVI, 6·CCLXXXVIII

Origenism (see also Origenist errors under Subjects) 5·XXXIV, 5·LIV, 5·CL, 5·CCVIII, 5·CCXI, 5·CCXXIX · 6·XLVII, 6·CCLIX, 6·CCLXXXII, 6·CCLXXXVI, 6·CCLXXXVII, 6·CCLXXXVIII, 6·CCXC, 6·CCXCI, 6·CCCI, 6·CCCII

Paul of Samosata 6·XVII, 6·CCCXXIX

Pelagians 5·VI, 5·XXXVI, 5·L, 5·XCVIII, 5·CI, 5·CXXXVII, 5·CXLI, 5·CLIX, 5·CLXXXIII, 5·CXCV, 5·CCXXXV, 5·CCLIII, 5·CCLXIII · 6·XCVI, 6·CI, 6·CIV, 6·CLXXXII, 6·CLXXXIV, 6·CCXX, 6·CCXXX, 6·CCXXXVI, 6·CCXXXVIII, 6·CCLI, 6·CCLV, 6·CCLVII, 6·CCLXXVIII, 6·CCLXXXII, 6·CCLXXXV, 6·CCLXXXVIII, 6·CCXC

Priscillianists 5·LXXXIX, 5·CVII, 5·CCVIII · 6·CIV

Sabellius / Sabellians 5·CCXLVII · 6·CIV, 6·CCCXXIX

Sacramentarians 5·CXXI, 5·CXCIV · 6·CXII, 6·CXCIII, 6·CXCVI

Stanislaus Pannonius (Anabaptist) 6·CCLXXXVIII, 6·CCXC

Vigilantius 6·CCLXXXII, 6·CCLXXXIII

Waldenses & Wycliffites (John Wycliffe) 6·XXVI, 6·CCCXVII, 6·CCCXXIV

Witchcraft, malefic women & the magical arts (censured) 5·LXXIII, 5·CLXVI · 6·VIII, 6·IX, 6·X, 6·CCLXXVI, 6·CCCXIV

Zwingli / Oecolampadius 5·XVI, 5·CI, 5·CLXIV · 6·XCIX, 6·CXLVII, 6·CLVIII, 6·CXCVII, 6·CCLXVI

INDEX OF SCRIPTURE PASSAGES

The lemma of every annotation, in canonical order — where Sixtus treats each passage of Scripture.

Genesis

Genesis 1:1 — 5·I
Genesis 1:1 — 5·II
Genesis 1:1 — 5·III
Genesis 1:1 — 5·IV
Genesis 1:1 — 5·V
Genesis 1:2 — 5·VI
Genesis 1:2 — 5·VII
Genesis 1:6 — 5·VIII
Genesis 1:6 — 5·IX
Genesis 1:6 — 5·X
Genesis 1:7 — 5·XI
Genesis 1:8 — 5·XII
Genesis 1:9 — 5·XIII
Genesis 1:17 — 5·XIV
Genesis 1:17 — 5·XV
Genesis 1:19 — 5·XVI
Genesis 1:26 — 5·XVII
Genesis 1:26 — 5·XVIII
Genesis 1:26 — 5·XIX
Genesis 1:27 — 5·XX
Genesis 1:28 — 5·XXI
Genesis 1:29 — 5·XXII
Genesis 2:2 — 5·XXIII
Genesis 2:2 — 5·XXIV
Genesis 2:2 — 5·XXV
Genesis 2:7 — 5·XXVI
Genesis 2:7 — 5·XXVII
Genesis 2:7 — 5·XXVIII
Genesis 2:7 — 5·XXIX
Genesis 2:7 — 5·XXX
Genesis 2:7 — 5·XXXI
Genesis 2:7 — 5·XXXII
Genesis 2:8 — 5·XXXIII
Genesis 2:8 — 5·XXXIV
Genesis 2:8 — 5·XXXV
Genesis 2:8 — 5·XXXVI
Genesis 2:8 — 5·XXXVII
Genesis 2:8 — 5·XXXVIII
Genesis 2:8 — 5·XXXIX
Genesis 2:8 — 5·XL
Genesis 2:8 — 5·XLI
Genesis 2:8 — 5·XLII
Genesis 2:17 — 5·XLIII
Genesis 2:18 — 5·XLIV
Genesis 2:20 — 5·XLV
Genesis 2:21 — 5·XLVI
Genesis 2:21 — 5·XLVII
Genesis 2:24 — 5·XLVIII

Genesis 3:7 — 5·XLIX
Genesis 3:15 — 5·L
Genesis 3:15 — 5·LI
Genesis 3:19 — 5·LII
Genesis 3:21 — 5·LIII
Genesis 3:21 — 5·LIV
Genesis 3:21 — 5·LV
Genesis 3:24 — 5·LVI
Genesis 3:24 — 5·LVII
Genesis 3:24 — 5·LVIII
Genesis 3:24 — 5·LIX
Genesis 3:24 — 5·LX
Genesis 4:1 — 5·LXI
Genesis 4:1 — 5·LXII
Genesis 4:1 — 5·LXIII
Genesis 4:1 — 5·LXIV
Genesis 4:7 — 5·LXV
Genesis 4:8 — 5·LXVI
Genesis 4:12 — 5·LXVII
Genesis 5:7 — 5·LXVIII
Genesis 5:29 — 5·LXIX
Genesis 6:2 — 5·LXX
Genesis 6:2 — 5·LXXI
Genesis 6:2 — 5·LXXII
Genesis 6:2 — 5·LXXIII
Genesis 6:3 — 5·LXXIV
Genesis 6:3 — 5·LXXV
Genesis 6:4 — 5·LXXVI
Genesis 6:4 — 5·LXXVII
Genesis 6:9 — 5·LXXVIII
Genesis 7:11 — 5·LXXIX
Genesis 7:11 — 5·LXXX
Genesis 7:11 — 5·LXXXI
Genesis 8:4 — 5·LXXXII
Genesis 8:7 — 5·LXXXIII
Genesis 8:11 — 5·LXXXIV
Genesis 8:21 — 5·LXXXV
Genesis 9:20–21 — 5·LXXXVI
Genesis 11:1 — 5·LXXXVII
Genesis 11:11 — 5·LXXXVIII
Genesis 12:13 — 5·LXXXIX
Genesis 14:18 — 5·XC
Genesis 14:18 — 5·XCI
Genesis 14:23 — 5·XCII
Genesis 16:2 — 5·XCIII
Genesis 16:3 — 5·XCIV
Genesis 16:11 — 5·XCV
Genesis 17:10 — 5·XCVI
Genesis 17:12 — 5·XCVII
Genesis 17:17 — 5·XCVIII
Genesis 18:2 — 5·XCIX
Genesis 18:3 — 5·C
Genesis 18:16 — 5·CI
Genesis 22:12 — 5·CII

Genesis 22:13 — 5·CIII
Genesis 25:21 — 5·CIV
Genesis 26:18 — 5·CV
Genesis 26:32 — 5·CVI
Genesis 27:19 — 5·CVII
Genesis 28:12 — 5·CVIII
Genesis 30:14 — 5·CIX
Genesis 30:42 — 5·CX
Genesis 32:24 — 5·CXI
Genesis 32:28 — 5·CXII
Genesis 37:2 — 5·CXIII
Genesis 38:16 — 5·CXIV

Exodus

Exodus 28:4 — 5·CXV
Exodus 34:29 — 5·CXVI

Leviticus

Leviticus 1:5 — 5·CXVII
Leviticus 8:4 — 5·CXVIII
Leviticus 10:9 — 5·CXIX
Leviticus 10:14 — 5·CXX
Leviticus 16:13 — 5·CXXI
Leviticus 25:32 — 5·CXXII

Numbers

Numbers 12:1 — 5·CXXIII
Numbers 17:6 — 5·CXXIV
Numbers 24:3 — 5·CXXV
Numbers 25:4 — 5·CXXVI
Numbers 26:53 — 5·CXXVII
Numbers 33:1 — 5·CXXVIII
Numbers 34:2 — 5·CXXIX

Deuteronomy

Deuteronomy 6:4 — 5·CXXX

Joshua

Joshua 8:28 — 5·CXXXI

1 Kings

1 Kings [1 Samuel] 11:6 — 5·CXXXII

3 Kings

3 Kings [1 Kings] 10:1 — 5·CXXXIII

Job

Job 1:1 — 5·CXXXIV
Job 1:17 — 5·CXXXV
Job 1:21 — 5·CXXXVI
Job 9:17 — 5·CXXXVII
Job 9:28 — 5·CXXXVIII
Job 14:21 — 5·CXXXIX

Job 17:12 — 5·CXL
Job 20:26 — 5·CXLI
Job 25:5 — 5·CXLII
Job 38:12 — 5·CXLIII
Job 38:29 — 5·CXLIV
Job 42:16 — 5·CXLV

Psalm

Psalm 1:1 — 5·CXLVI
Psalm 1:1 — 5·CXLVII
Psalm 1:5 — 5·CXLVIII
Psalm 2:1 — 5·CXLIX
Psalm 2:8 — 5·CL
Psalm 2:12 — 5·CLI
Psalm 3:2 — 5·CLII
Psalm 4:2 — 5·CLIII
Psalm 13:3 — 5·CLIV
Psalm 13:3 — 5·CLV
Psalm 14:2 — 5·CLVI
Psalm 15:1 — 5·CLVII
Psalm 15:2 — 5·CLVIII
Psalm 15:7 — 5·CLIX
Psalm 18:5 — 5·CLX
Psalm 21:3 — 5·CLXI
Psalm 21:3 — 5·CLXII
Psalm 21:30 — 5·CLXIII
Psalm 22:5 — 5·CLXIV
Psalm 30:11 — 5·CLXV
Psalm 30:16 — 5·CLXVI
Psalm 31:1 — 5·CLXVII
Psalm 32:6 — 5·CLXVIII
Psalm 36:10 — 5·CLXIX
Psalm 36:14 — 5·CLXX
Psalm 36:15 — 5·CLXXI
Psalm 46:3, 8 — 5·CLXXII
Psalm 50:3 — 5·CLXXIII
Psalm 50:3 — 5·CLXXIV
Psalm 50:5 — 5·CLXXV
Psalm 50:6 — 5·CLXXVI
Psalm 50:7 — 5·CLXXVII
Psalm 50:7 — 5·CLXXVIII
Psalm 50:7 — 5·CLXXIX
Psalm 50:7 — 5·CLXXX
Psalm 52:4 — 5·CLXXXI
Psalm 53:5 — 5·CLXXXII
Psalm 64:5 — 5·CLXXXIII
Psalm 65:11 — 5·CLXXXV
Psalm 65:12 — 5·CLXXXIV
Psalm 68:2 — 5·CLXXXVI
Psalm 70:15 — 5·CLXXXVII
Psalm 71:14 — 5·CLXXXVIII
Psalm 89:1–2 — 5·CLXXXIX
Psalm 89:4 — 5·CXC

Psalm 90:1 — 5·CXCI
Psalm 90:14 — 5·CXCII
Psalm 98:5 — 5·CXCIII
Psalm 98:5 — 5·CXCIV
Psalm 102:4 — 5·CXCV
Psalm 103:30 — 5·CXCVI
Psalm 108:18 — 5·CXCVII
Psalm 109:4 — 5·CXCVIII
Psalm 114:7 — 5·CXCIX
Psalm 115:1 — 5·CC
Psalm 118:1 — 5·CCI
Psalm 118:20 — 5·CCII
Psalm 118:57 — 5·CCIII
Psalm 118:106 — 5·CCIV
Psalm 118:137 — 5·CCV
Psalm 126:4 — 5·CCVI
Psalm 127:2 — 5·CCVII
Psalm 129:2 — 5·CCVIII
Psalm 138:6 — 5·CCIX
Psalm 141:8 — 5·CCX

Proverbs

Proverbs 1:1 — 5·CCXI

Ecclesiastes

Ecclesiastes 1:6 — 5·CCXII
Ecclesiastes 1:9 — 5·CCXIII
Ecclesiastes 11:3 — 5·CCXIV

Canticle

Canticle 1:1 — 5·CCXV
Canticle 1:1 — 5·CCXVI
Canticle 2:10, 14 — 5·CCXVII

Wisdom

Wisdom 1:1 — 5·CCXVIII
Wisdom 1:1 — 5·CCXIX

Isaiah

Isaiah 2:22 — 5·CCXX
Isaiah 6:1 — 5·CCXXI
Isaiah 6:3 — 5·CCXXII
Isaiah 9:6 — 5·CCXXIII
Isaiah 13:7 — 5·CCXXIV
Isaiah 14:19 — 5·CCXXV
Isaiah 15:2 — 5·CCXXVI
Isaiah 16:14 — 5·CCXXVII
Isaiah 65:16 — 5·CCXXVIII
Isaiah 66:24 — 5·CCXXIX

Jeremiah

Jeremiah 2:22 — 5·CCXXX
Jeremiah 4:2 — 5·CCXXXI

Jeremiah 13:12 — 5·CCXXXII
Jeremiah 19:11 — 5·CCXXXIII
Jeremiah 22:30 — 5·CCXXXIV
Jeremiah 23:28 — 5·CCXXXV
Jeremiah 24:5 — 5·CCXXXVI
Jeremiah 28:13 — 5·CCXXXVII
Jeremiah 29:22 — 5·CCXXXVIII

Lamentations

Lamentations 4:6 — 5·CCXXXIX

Ezekiel

Ezekiel 1:12 — 5·CCXL
Ezekiel 3:11 — 5·CCXLI
Ezekiel 14:13 — 5·CCXLII
Ezekiel 16:16 — 5·CCXLIII
Ezekiel 44:20 — 5·CCXLIV

Daniel

Daniel 1:1 — 5·CCXLV
Daniel 2:40 — 5·CCXLVI
Daniel 3:18 — 5·CCXLVII
Daniel 9:24 — 5·CCXLVIII
Daniel 9:24 — 5·CCXLIX
Daniel 13:1 — 5·CCL

Amos

Amos 5:2 — 5·CCLI
Amos 9:2 — 5·CCLII

Jonah

Jonah 1:12 — 5·CCLIII
Jonah 3:4 — 5·CCLIV
Jonah 4:6 — 5·CCLV

Micah

Micah 6:1 — 5·CCLVI

Habakkuk

Habakkuk 1:13 — 5·CCLVII

Zephaniah

Zephaniah 3:4 — 5·CCLVIII

Zechariah

Zechariah 4:3, 4 — 5·CCLIX
Zechariah 8:17 — 5·CCLX
Zechariah 9:11 — 5·CCLXI

Malachi

Malachi 1:1 — 5·CCLXII
Malachi 1:2, 3 — 5·CCLXIII

2 Maccabees

2 Maccabees 7:41 — 5·CCLXIV

Matthew

Matthew 1:1 — 6·I
Matthew 1:3 — 6·II
Matthew 1:16 — 6·III
Matthew 1:18 — 6·IV
Matthew 1:20 — 6·V
Matthew 1:20 — 6·VI
Matthew 2 — 6·X
Matthew 2:1 — 6·VII
Matthew 2:2 — 6·VIII
Matthew 2:2 — 6·IX
Matthew 3:1–2 — 6·XI
Matthew 3:11 — 6·XII
Matthew 3:16 — 6·XIII
Matthew 3:16 — 6·XIV
Matthew 3:16 — 6·XV
Matthew 4:1 — 6·XVI
Matthew 4:17 — 6·XVII
Matthew 5:3 — 6·XVIII
Matthew 5:5 — 6·XIX
Matthew 5:9 — 6·XX
Matthew 5:22 — 6·XXI
Matthew 5:31 — 6·XXII
Matthew 5:32 — 6·XXIII
Matthew 5:32 — 6·XXIV
Matthew 5:34 — 6·XXV
Matthew 5:34 — 6·XXVI
Matthew 5:39 — 6·XXVII
Matthew 5:44 — 6·XXVIII
Matthew 6:6 — 6·XXIX
Matthew 6:10 — 6·XXX
Matthew 6:11 — 6·XXXI
Matthew 6:14 — 6·XXXII
Matthew 6:16 — 6·XXXIII
Matthew 6:24 — 6·XXXIV
Matthew 6:25 — 6·XXXV
Matthew 6:33 — 6·XXXVI
Matthew 6:34 — 6·XXXVII
Matthew 7:5 — 6·XXXVIII
Matthew 7:16 — 6·XXXIX
Matthew 7:17 — 6·XL
Matthew 7:19 — 6·XLI
Matthew 7:24 — 6·XLII
Matthew 8:8 — 6·XLIII
Matthew 8:9 — 6·XLIV
Matthew 9:8 — 6·XLV
Matthew 9:9 — 6·XLVI
Matthew 9:24 — 6·XLVII
Matthew 10:28 — 6·XLVIII
Matthew 10:29 — 6·XLIX

Matthew 11:3 — 6·L
Matthew 11:5 — 6·LI
Matthew 11:26 — 6·LII
Matthew 11:27 — 6·LIII
Matthew 11:28 — 6·LIV
Matthew 11:28 — 6·LV
Matthew 12:32 — 6·LVI
Matthew 12:32 — 6·LVII
Matthew 12:47 — 6·LVIII
Matthew 12:48 — 6·LIX
Matthew 13:11 — 6·LXIII
Matthew 13:30 — 6·LX
Matthew 13:35 — 6·LXI
Matthew 13:55 — 6·LXII
Matthew 13:55–56 — 6·LXIV
Matthew 14:3,10 — 6·LXV
Matthew 15:11 — 6·LXVI
Matthew 15:29 — 6·LXVII
Matthew 16:18 — 6·LXVIII
Matthew 16:18 — 6·LXIX
Matthew 16:18 — 6·LXX
Matthew 16:19 — 6·LXXI
Matthew 16:19 — 6·LXXII
Matthew 17:1 — 6·LXXIII
Matthew 17:3 — 6·LXXIV
Matthew 17:24 — 6·LXXV
Matthew 17:26 — 6·LXXVI
Matthew 18:10 — 6·LXXVII
Matthew 18:17 — 6·LXXVIII
Matthew 19:5 — 6·LXXIX
Matthew 19:8 — 6·LXXX
Matthew 19:9 — 6·LXXXI
Matthew 19:9 — 6·LXXXII
Matthew 19:12 — 6·LXXXIII
Matthew 19:14 — 6·LXXXIV
Matthew 19:20 — 6·LXXXV
Matthew 19:21 — 6·LXXXVI
Matthew 20:1 — 6·LXXXVII
Matthew 20:8 — 6·LXXXVIII
Matthew 20:8 — 6·LXXXIX
Matthew 20:16 — 6·XC
Matthew 20:19 — 6·XCII
Matthew 20:20 — 6·XCI
Matthew 20:23 — 6·XCIII
Matthew 20:23 — 6·XCIV
Matthew 21:9 — 6·XCVI
Matthew 21:12 — 6·XCV
Matthew 21:33 — 6·XCVII
Matthew 21:38 — 6·XCVIII
Matthew 22:14 — 6·XCIX
Matthew 22:37 — 6·C
Matthew 22:39 — 6·CI
Matthew 23:5 — 6·CII
Matthew 24:7 — 6·CIII

Matthew 24:15 — 6·CIV
Matthew 24:36 — 6·CV
Matthew 24:50 — 6·CVI
Matthew 25:9 — 6·CVII
Matthew 25:18 — 6·CVIII
Matthew 26:7 — 6·CIX
Matthew 26:20 — 6·CX
Matthew 26:26 — 6·CXI
Matthew 26:26 — 6·CXII
Matthew 26:29 — 6·CXIII
Matthew 26:37 — 6·CXIV
Matthew 26:52 — 6·CXV
Matthew 26:52 — 6·CXVI
Matthew 26:63 — 6·CXVII
Matthew 26:74 — 6·CXVIII
Matthew 26:74–75 — 6·CXIX
Matthew 27:5 — 6·CXX
Matthew 27:6–7 — 6·CXXI
Matthew 27:33 — 6·CXXII
Matthew 27:34 — 6·CXXIII
Matthew 27:45 — 6·CXXIV
Matthew 27:46 — 6·CXXV
Matthew 27:46 — 6·CXXVI
Matthew 27:56 — 6·[unnum.]

Mark

Mark 1:16 — 6·CXXVII
Mark 6:8 — 6·CXXVIII
Mark 9:2 — 6·CXXIX
Mark 11:15 — 6·CXXX
Mark 15:25 — 6·CXXXI
Mark 16:9 — 6·CXXXII

Luke

Luke 1:28 — 6·CXXXIII
Luke 1:32 — 6·CXXXIV
Luke 2:14 — 6·CXXXV
Luke 2:22 — 6·CXXXVI
Luke 2:23 — 6·CXXXVII
Luke 2:35 — 6·CXXXVIII
Luke 2:43 — 6·CXXXIX
Luke 2:50 — 6·CXL
Luke 2:52 — 6·CXLI
Luke 3:12 — 6·CXLII
Luke 3:36 — 6·CXLIII
Luke 7:19–20 — 6·CXLIV
Luke 9:30–31 — 6·CXLV
Luke 10:1 — 6·CXLVI
Luke 10:7 — 6·CXLVII
Luke 12:18 — 6·CXLVIII
Luke 12:58 — 6·CXLIX
Luke 15:31 — 6·CL
Luke 16:20 — 6·CLI

Luke 16:24 — 6·CLII
Luke 16:31 — 6·CLIII
Luke 17:14 — 6·CLIV
Luke 18:13 — 6·CLV
Luke 22:36 — 6·CLVI
Luke 22:38 — 6·CLVII
Luke 22:38 — 6·CLVIII
Luke 22:43 — 6·CLIX
Luke 22:57 — 6·CLX
Luke 22:62 — 6·CLXI
Luke 23:28 — 6·CLXII
Luke 23:43 — 6·CLXIII
Luke 23:46 — 6·CLXIV

John

John 1:1 — 6·CLXV
John 1:1 — 6·CLXVI
John 1:1 — 6·CLXVII
John 1:1 — 6·CLXVIII
John 1:1 — 6·CLXIX
John 1:1 — 6·CLXX
John 1:1 — 6·CLXXI
John 1:3 — 6·CLXXII
John 1:3 — 6·CLXXIII
John 1:3 — 6·CLXXIV
John 1:4–5 — 6·CLXXV
John 1:5 — 6·CLXXVI
John 1:7 — 6·CLXXVII
John 1:7 — 6·CLXXVIII
John 1:9 — 6·CLXXIX
John 1:14 — 6·CLXXX
John 1:16 — 6·CLXXXI
John 1:18 — 6·CLXXXII
John 1:34 — 6·CLXXXIII
John 1:38 — 6·CLXXXIV
John 2:3 — 6·CLXXXV
John 2:20 — 6·CLXXXVI
John 3:34 — 6·CLXXXVII
John 4:24 — 6·CLXXXVIII
John 4:38 — 6·CLXXXIX
John 4:50 — 6·CXC
John 4:53 — 6·CXCI
John 6:27 — 6·CXCII
John 6:29 — 6·CXCIII
John 6:44 — 6·CXCIV
John 6:48 — 6·CXCVI
John 6:49 — 6·CXCV
John 6:53 — 6·CXCVII
John 8:1 — 6·CXCVIII
John 8:21 — 6·CXCIX
John 8:25 — 6·CCI
John 8:31 — 6·CC
John 8:34 — 6·CCII

John 8:37 — 6·CCIII
John 8:42 — 6·CCIV
John 11:16 — 6·CCV
John 12:8 — 6·CCVI
John 12:21 — 6·CCVII
John 13:10 — 6·CCIX
John 14:16 — 6·CCVIII
John 14:16 — 6·CCX
John 15:26 — 6·CCXI
John 16:9 — 6·CCXII
John 17:5 — 6·CCXIII
John 17:6 — 6·CCXIV
John 17:6 — 6·CCXV
John 19:30 — 6·CCXVI
John 20:19 — 6·CCXVII
John 20:22–23 — 6·CCXVIII
John 21:17 — 6·CCXIX
John 21:19 — 6·CCXXI
John 21:22 — 6·CCXX

Acts

Acts 1:18 — 6·CCXXII
Acts 3:26 — 6·CCXXIII
Acts 4:20 — 6·CCXXIV
Acts 6:5 — 6·CCXXV
Acts 9:5 — 6·CCXXVI
Acts 9:43 — 6·CCXXVII
Acts 15:13 — 6·CCXXVIII
Acts 17:34 — 6·CCXXIX

Romans

Romans 1:1 — 6·CCXXX
Romans 1:17 — 6·CCXXXI
Romans 2:25 — 6·CCXXXII
Romans 3:27 — 6·CCXXXIII
Romans 4:19 — 6·CCXXXIV
Romans 5:5 — 6·CCXXXV
Romans 5:12 — 6·CCXXXVI
Romans 5:12 — 6·CCXXXVII
Romans 5:12 — 6·CCXXXVIII
Romans 7:6 — 6·CCXXXIX
Romans 7:8 — 6·CCXL
Romans 7:14 — 6·CCXLI
Romans 7:14 — 6·CCXLII
Romans 7:25 — 6·CCXLIII
Romans 8:3 — 6·CCXLIV
Romans 8:20 — 6·CCXLV
Romans 8:21 — 6·CCXLVI
Romans 8:27 — 6·CCXLVII
Romans 8:28 — 6·CCXLVIII
Romans 8:29 — 6·CCXLIX
Romans 8:30 — 6·CCL
Romans 9:13 — 6·CCLI

Romans 9:18 — 6·CCLII
Romans 11:1 — 6·CCLIII
Romans 11:5 — 6·CCLIV
Romans 14:23 — 6·CCLV
Romans 16:3 — 6·CCLVI

1 Corinthians

1 Corinthians 1:10 — 6·CCLVII
1 Corinthians 3:12 — 6·CCLVIII
1 Corinthians 3:15 — 6·CCLIX
1 Corinthians 7:10-11 — 6·CCLX
1 Corinthians 11:28 — 6·CCLXI
1 Corinthians 12:28 — 6·CCLXII
1 Corinthians 14:14-16 — 6·CCLXIII
1 Corinthians 15:19 — 6·CCLXIV
1 Corinthians 15:51 — 6·CCLXV
1 Corinthians 15:51 — 6·CCLXVI
1 Corinthians 16:22 — 6·CCLXVII

2 Corinthians

2 Corinthians 8:24 — 6·CCLXVIII

Galatians

Galatians 1:1 — 6·CCLXIX
Galatians 1:15 — 6·CCLXX
Galatians 1:18 — 6·CCLXXI
Galatians 1:19 — 6·CCLXXII
Galatians 2:2 — 6·CCLXXIII
Galatians 2:11 — 6·CCLXXIV
Galatians 2:14 — 6·CCLXXV
Galatians 3:1 — 6·CCLXXVI
Galatians 3:10 — 6·CCLXXVII
Galatians 3:21 — 6·CCLXXVIII
Galatians 4:6 — 6·CCLXXIX
Galatians 4:24 — 6·CCLXXX
Galatians 5:17 — 6·CCLXXXI
Galatians 5:22 — 6·CCLXXXII
Galatians 6:5 — 6·CCLXXXIII
Galatians 6:10 — 6·CCLXXXIV

Ephesians

Ephesians 1:4 — 6·CCLXXXV
Ephesians 1:4 — 6·CCLXXXVI
Ephesians 1:4 — 6·CCLXXXVII
Ephesians 1:6 — 6·CCLXXXVIII
Ephesians 1:7 — 6·CCLXXXIX
Ephesians 1:12 — 6·CCXC
Ephesians 1:17 — 6·CCXCI
Ephesians 1:21 — 6·CCXCII
Ephesians 1:22 — 6·CCXCIII
Ephesians 2:2 — 6·CCXCIV
Ephesians 2:7 — 6·CCXCV
Ephesians 2:17 — 6·CCXCVI

Ephesians 3:1 — 6·CCXCVII
Ephesians 3:10 — 6·CCXCVIII
Ephesians 3:10 — 6·CCXCIX
Ephesians 4:10.b — 6·CCCII
Ephesians 4:11 — 6·CCC
Ephesians 4:11 — 6·CCCI
Ephesians 4:16.b — 6·CCCIII
Ephesians 5:19 — 6·CCCIV
Ephesians 5:24 — 6·CCCV
Ephesians 5:28 — 6·CCCVI
Ephesians 5:32 — 6·CCCVII
Ephesians 6:12 — 6·CCCVIII
Ephesians 6:24 — 6·CCCIX

Philippians

Philippians 1:18 — 6·CCCX
Philippians 1:23 — 6·CCCXI

Colossians

Colossians 1:11 — 6·CCCXII
Colossians 1:20 — 6·CCCXIII
Colossians 3:15 — 6·CCCXIV
Colossians 3:16 — 6·CCCXV

2 Thessalonians

2 Thessalonians 2:5 — 6·CCCXVI
2 Thessalonians 3:10 — 6·CCCXVII

1 Timothy

1 Timothy 3:2 — 6·CCCXVIII
1 Timothy 3:8 — 6·CCCXIX
1 Timothy 3:16 — 6·CCCXX
1 Timothy 5:18 — 6·CCCXXI
1 Timothy 5:23 — 6·CCCXXII

Titus

Titus 1:2 — 6·CCCXXIII
Titus 1:5 — 6·CCCXXIV
Titus 1:6 — 6·CCCXXV
Titus 2:11 — 6·CCCXXVI

Hebrews

Hebrews 1:1 — 6·CCCXXVII
Hebrews 1:3.a — 6·CCCXXVIII
Hebrews 1:9 — 6·CCCXXIX
Hebrews 1:11 — 6·CCCXXX
Hebrews 2:7 — 6·CCCXXXI
Hebrews 4:16 — 6·CCCXXXII
Hebrews 7:10 — 6·CCCXXXIII
Hebrews 8:2 — 6·CCCXXXIV
Hebrews 11:37 — 6·CCCXXXV
Hebrews 12:17 — 6·CCCXXXVI

James

James 1:1 — 6·CCCXXXVII
James 5:12 — 6·CCCXXXVIII
James 5:14 — 6·CCCXXXIX

2 Peter

2 Peter 3:10 — 6·CCCXL
2 Peter 3:10 — 6·CCCXLI

1 John

1 John 5:7 — 6·CCCXLII
1 John 5:16 — 6·CCCXLIII

Jude

Jude 1 — 6·CCCXLIV

Apocalypse

Apocalypse 6:9 — 6·CCCXLV
Apocalypse 11:3 — 6·CCCXLVI
Apocalypse 20:6 — 6·CCCXLVII

Sixtus of Siena, O.P.

BIBLIOTHECA SANCTA — BOOK VII

On those who have assailed the volumes of the New Testament (against the destroyers of the new Scripture)

English translation — Bibliotheca Sancta, BOOK VII

TABLE OF HERESIES

The 10 heresies confuted in this book, in order, with the parts of each. The page number is the page of this English translation.

Page 4: OF THE NEW TESTAMENT IN GENERAL — Heresy the First (De Novo Testamento in universali haeresis prima)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 4
- The Refutation — p. 5
- The Objections of the Heretics — p. 7
- The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 9

Page 12: OF THE GOSPEL OF MATTHEW — Heresy II (De Evangelio Matthaei haeresis II)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 12
- The Refutation — p. 13
- The Objections of the Heretics — p. 13
- The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 18

Page 28: OF THE GOSPEL OF MARK — Heresy III (De Marci Evangelio haeresis III)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 28
- The Objections of the Heretics — p. 28
- The Dissolution — p. 30

Page 32: OF THE GOSPEL OF LUKE — Heresy IV (De Lucae Evangelio haeresis IIII)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 32
- The Confutation — p. 36

Page 39: OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN — Heresy V (De Evangelio Ioannis haeresis V)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 39
- The Refutation — p. 39
- The Objections of the Heretics — p. 40
- The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 42

Page 45: OF THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES — Heresy VI (De Actis Apostolorum haeresis VI)

Page 46: OF THE EPISTLES OF PAUL THE APOSTLE IN GENERAL — Heresy VII (De epistolis Pauli Apostoli in universali. Haeresis VII)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 46
- The Objections of the Heretics — p. 47
- The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 49

Page 51: OF THE EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE HEBREWS — Heresy VIII (De epistola Pauli ad Hebræos hæresis VIII)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 51
- The Refutation — p. 51
- The Objections of the Heretics — p. 54
- The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 56

Page 61: OF THE CANONICAL OR CATHOLIC EPISTLES — Heresy IX (De Canonicis siue Catholicis Epistolis. Hæresis IX)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 62
- The Refutation — p. 62
- The Objections of the Heretics — p. 64
- The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 66

Page 69: OF THE APOCALYPSE OF JOHN THE EVANGELIST — Heresy X (De Apocalypsi Ioannis Euangelistæ hæresis X)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 69
- The Refutation — p. 70
- The Objections of the Heretics — p. 71
- The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 73

(printed p. 575 [PDF p. 580] — Book VII title-block, Praefatio, and Catalogue of heresies.)

BIBLIOTHECA SANCTA — BOOK VII

Of Friar Sixtus of Siena, of the Order of Preachers: On those who have assailed the volumes of the New Testament, or, Against the destroyers of the new Scripture (De his, qui novi Testamenti volumina oppugnarunt, sive adversus novae scripturae destructores) — the Seventh Book of the Bibliotheca Sancta

PRAEFATIO [Preface]

Since in the foregoing books I have set in order the labors and all the monuments whereby the illustrious writers of the Church have illustrated the holy letters of the blessed Scripture, it has seemed good, in the two books that follow, to confute the errors and heresies brought forth by those who, from the ascension of Christ even unto this day, have attempted to obscure the glory of the sacred volumes, and — God's grace favoring — to overthrow their impious endeavors against the holy writings. But since I perceived that my own exceedingly slender powers were far unequal to the labor marked out, I judged it best to approach the matter not with my own defenses, but with greater and far stronger ones. Accordingly, out of the various writings of the ancient fathers of the Church I first gathered the accusations, argumentations, and fallacious objections with which sundry heretics, in divers ages, have hostilely assailed the divine books of both Testaments; and then, to each several objection of the heretics, I subjoined the responses, solutions, and confutations of the fathers. And in collecting these I have, wherever I could and so far as I could, amassed the authors' very words, sayings, and entire sentences and periods with the utmost fidelity and integrity — setting down, either within the body of the text or without, in the margins over against each sentence, not only the authors' names but also the titles of their books, citing the chapters by number: so that whatever was taken from any author's work, and from what place, might be denoted the more clearly, and as it were with a pointing finger. In those matters, however, whose confutations I could not find in the monuments of the ecclesiastical fathers, I have attempted, out of my slender poverty, to supply some things as best I might. And that each matter might be the more lucid and perspicuous, I have undertaken in the first place the defense of the New Testament in this seventh volume, purposely reserving the apology for the Old Instrument to the eighth volume. For although the writings of the New Instrument are, in the succession of time and in the order of things done, later than the Old Instrument, I have nevertheless judged that the beginning should be made from them, as from those which, in order of doctrine, in the constancy of their demonstrations, and in the excellence of their subject narration, far precede all the books of the Old Testament.

Now in refuting each several heresy I shall follow chiefly this order: first, I shall set forth, as briefly as may be, the depraved and pernicious assertions of the heretics, with the names of their assertors indicated; then, bringing to bear, on behalf of the Catholic truth, the reasonings of the ancient fathers, together with those testimonies of divine Scripture which the heretics themselves accept as certain and undoubted, I shall overturn the assertions they propose from their very foundations, as the saying is; in the third place, I shall bring forward the crafty arguments of the heretics according to a numbered series; lastly, repeating the same sequence of numbers, I shall dissolve their argumentations and, God favoring, lay prostrate all their assaults. These things therefore being thus disposed, and duly, as I judge, made ready, it remains that, divine grace assisting, I descend into the field and begin to join battle with the impious destroyers of the New Testament.

CATALOGUE OF THE HERESIES which are confuted in this seventh book
(Haereseon, quae hoc septimo libro confutantur, Catalogus)

Of the New Testament in general	Heresy 1
Of the Gospel of Matthew	Heresy 2
Of the Gospel of Mark	Heresy 3
Of the Gospel of Luke	Heresy 4
Of the Gospel of John	Heresy 5
Of the Acts of the Apostles	Heresy 6
Of the Epistles of Paul in general	Heresy 7
Of the Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews	Heresy 8
Of the Canonical Epistles	Heresy 9
Of the Apocalypse of John the Apostle	Heresy 10

(printed p. 576 [PDF p. 581] — Heresy I begins.)

OF THE NEW TESTAMENT IN GENERAL — Heresy the First (De Novo Testamento in universali haeresis prima)

Since the New Testament was not written by the Apostles of Christ, there is no need to believe all the things that are contained in it, but [one may] accept certain of them, and reject certain others as fallaciously brought in by falsifiers.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

[1] The chief heresy of the Manichaeans is this, which Faustus, bishop of the Manichaeans, defended fiercely beyond the other Manichaeans; concerning which he himself speaks thus in Augustine: "It is agreed that the New Testament was written neither by Christ nor by his Apostles, but a long time afterward by certain men of uncertain name, who — lest no credit should be given to them writing things they did not know — set upon the fronts [title-pages] of their writings partly the names of the apostles, partly the names of those who seemed to have followed the apostles, asseverating that they had written according to them." And in another book, in the same Augustine, yet more plainly: [2] "Many words," he says, "have been inserted by your forefathers into the utterances of our Lord, which, though marked with his name, do not agree with his faith — written neither by Christ nor by his Apostles, but discovered, long after their assumption [death], by I know not whom, half-Jews even discordant among themselves, out of rumors and opinions; who nevertheless, referring all these same things to the names of the apostles, or of those who seemed to have followed the apostles, lied that they had written their own errors and falsehoods according to them." And what those things were that had been falsely thrust into the New Testament and were repudiated by the Manichaeans, the same Faustus taught in many places, asserting that two kinds of lies had been inserted into the New Testament: [3] first, all the testimonies of the Old Testament which are found in the New Testament; secondly, all those scriptures in which it should be read that Christ was truly a man and truly suffered human things. These two being excluded, the rest, which pertained to the divinity of Christ, the Manichaeans willingly accepted and confessed to be most true. Helvidius also, in those same times, affirmed that the Greek exemplars of the New Testament had been falsified in many places, as St. Jerome left attested in the book which he wrote against him. But in our own times, in which all things are called back into doubt, the execrable Anabaptists and Servetians have — to the great harm of the Church — restored this error so often routed, confessing indeed that some books of the New Testament were written by the apostles, but that they were afterwards falsified by heretics and contaminated with many errors, and that these same errors have endured in the New Testament even to this day.

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

Among the nefarious and pernicious heresies which in this our age have revived by the work of the Anabaptists, none surely is more pestilent than this one. For whereas all other heresies can be confuted out of the sacred letters, this one alone cannot be overcome by the arms of holy Scripture: for whatever from the sacred scriptures shall have been brought forward by Catholics to prove the sincerity [integrity] of the sacred volumes, the heretics will at once answer that it was said neither by Christ nor by the Apostles, but written under their name by falsifiers and corrupters. Yet although this detestable heresy cannot be conquered by the arms of holy Scripture, it can easily be stormed by other forces — namely, by the authority of the holy fathers, of the sacred councils, and of the apostolic Church. For this, as Augustine says, is the one and only engine (machina) of religion, which has once for all abolished all heresies, by the help of Christ, who promised her: "I am with you even unto the consummation of the age." [4] From the authority, therefore, of this Catholic Church the [following] arguments are drawn.

1. First, against Faustus it is most evidently demonstrated that the Apostles were the authors of the New Testament, the continued succession of all the apostolic churches consenting in this. [5] And this rule of succession, as it pleases Augustine, is wont to be observed not only in judging the sacred books, but also in discerning the authors of secular writings. "For whence," says Augustine, "is it agreed that the books now current are those of Hippocrates, the most noble physician, except that the series of succession has so commended them, from the very time of Hippocrates down to this time, that to doubt of them would be [the mark] of a madman? Likewise the books of Plato, of Aristotle, of Cicero, of Varro, and of other authors of that sort — whence have men known that they are theirs, except by the same continuous attestation of times succeeding one another? Wherefore, if it be asked of us whence we know these letters to be the apostles', we answer briefly: From the most well-founded attestation of the Church, carried down by sure successions from the times of the apostles even to these times; which [Church] has always believed the New Testament to have been written by the apostles and evangelists, and has set it forth to be believed."

2. Next, that the books of the New Testament have in no wise been falsified or corrupted is shown by the reading of it in the Church, always the same and continued after the same manner. Augustine uses this argument in the book On the Profit of Believing, saying: [6] "By no exemplars extant in so recent a memory can it be proved that the divine scriptures have been falsified. For if we speak of the New Testament, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Origen, Cyprian, and the other fathers who followed one another in the Church through the series of times succeeding each other, cite and read it in the same manner. But that all these together were deceived, and that along with them the whole succession of the Catholic Church was through so many years so deluded that she read corrupted and falsified [texts] for uncontaminated ones — who would ever say this, unless one utterly impious?"

3. To this is added moreover both the dignity and the merit of the Church: since Christ, the highest truth, promised her that he would be with her perpetually, it is not to be believed that he was unwilling to preserve for his spouse her scriptures intact and inviolate — seeing he has granted this to so many writings of the gentiles, that they should be kept inviolate. [7] For who is blinded with such fury — unless he be subverted by consenting to the malice and fallacy of the demons' lying — as to say that the church of the apostles could not have de-

[1] Augustine, in the book against Faustus, ch. 3 (Aug. lib. contra Fau. c. 3).
[2] Augustine, book 33 against Faustus, ch. 3 (Aug. lib. 33 contra Faust. cap. 3).
[3] Augustine, book 33 against Faustus, ch. 7 (Aug. lib. 33 contra Faust. cap. 7).
[4] Matthew 28 (Matth. 28).
[5] Augustine, book 33 against Faustus, ch. 6 (Aug. lib. 33 contra Fau. cap. 6).
[6] Augustine, On the profit of believing, ch. 3 (Aug. de utilitate cred. c. 3).
[7] Augustine, book 33 against Faustus, ch. 6 (Aug. lib. 33 contra Fau. cap. 6).

(printed p. 577 [PDF p. 582] — Heresy I continues: arguments 4–7; the heretics' objections begin.)

served [could not have merited] that the church of the apostles — so faithful, so numerous a concord of brethren — should faithfully convey their writings to posterity, seeing that it has preserved their chairs (cathedras) by a most certain succession even to the present bishops; and seeing that this comes to pass with such felicity for the writings of men of whatever sort, whether outside the Church or within the Church itself?

4. Moreover, if anything in the New Testament, however least, be said to be falsified, all the credit and authority of the New Instrument is taken away. For just as it will be permitted to suspect the corruption of one part, so it will be permitted to opine the same of its other parts, since there is no weightier reason why this part rather than that ought to have been preserved uncontaminated. Whence Augustine, writing to Jerome, says: [1] "To me it seems that it is most ruinously believed that any lie is contained in the holy letters — that is, that those men by whom they were written lied in anything; for if once some officious [well-meant] lie be admitted into so lofty a summit of authority, no particle of those books will remain which — as it shall seem to each man — being either difficult as to morals or incredible as to faith, may not by the same most pernicious rule be referred to the design and office of a lying author."

5. But not only is all the authority of holy Scripture abrogated if either the name of the writer or the context [text] of the Scripture be believed falsified; rather, all the writings of all nations will also be rendered doubtful, uncertain, and suspect of falsity and lying, as regards their authors and the things set down in them. [2] "For what letters will ever have any weight of authority, if the evangelical and apostolic letters have none? Of what book will it be certain whose it is, if it be uncertain whether those letters be the apostles' which the Church — propagated from the apostles themselves and declared with such eminence throughout all nations — declares and holds to be the apostles'?"

6. Besides these things, if it be permitted to each man according to his own caprice to approve or to reject whatever he will out of the New Testament, not only will all scriptures, divine as much as human, be subverted, but even our whole faith. For our faith will no longer be faith — that faith, namely, which, the intellect being made captive, and the judgment of human reason and of carnal prudence being renounced, commits itself wholly to the divine words and to the authority of the Church — but a certain empty conjecture of one's own fancy, and a certain foolish opinion emerging out of the murky darkness of our blind reason; and we shall believe the holy scriptures not on account of their venerable authority, but on account of the foolish persuasion of our insane reason — which ought to be so absurd in the eyes of a faithful man that nothing could be more absurd. Whence Augustine, casting the deformity of this absurdity in the teeth of the Manichaeans, says: [3] "You see, therefore, that you are aiming at this: that all authority be removed from the midst of the scriptures, and that each man's own mind be the author [judge] of what to approve and what to disapprove in each scripture — that is, that he be not subjected to the authority of the scriptures unto faith, but subject the scriptures to himself: not that a thing therefore pleases him because it is read written in that sublime authority, but it seems rightly written because it pleased him."

7. Finally, while the heretics press too hard upon the overthrow of our doctrines, they hurl themselves headlong by their own impulse, and utterly destroy all their own scriptures and all their own heresies. [4] For if our Gospel codices are falsified and lack credit — codices which, from the very times of Christ's presence, through the dispensations of the apostles and the other successions of bishops from their sees, have come down to these times, kept, commended, and made illustrious throughout the whole world — how shall the furtive codices of the heretics, lately hammered out by them in their lurking-holes, be able to find any credit among men? Next, if our evangelical scriptures are falsified, whence, O wretched and unhappy men, will you prove your perverse doctrines, and whence will you assert the things you say? [5] You will answer that you prove them from the Gospel. From what Gospel — you who do not accept the whole of it, since you say it has been falsified? For who would himself first say that his own witness has been corrupted by falsity, and then produce him for testimony? For if we believe him in what you wish, and do not believe him in what you do not wish, then we shall be believing not him, but you. But if we were willing to believe you, we should not demand a witness from you. Therefore either you are compelled to confess those codices truthful, if you wish to establish your heresies from their authority; or to affirm them deceitful — and then you have overturned all your own heresies.

OBIECTIONES HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

1. First: the scriptures of the New Testament are so dissonant among themselves and so various, so stuffed with contrarieties of narrations as well as of sentences, that neither does the one agree with the other, nor the same with themselves; and if these be attributed to the apostles, what else is that but to calumniate good men, and to summon the concordant company of Christ's disciples to the charge of discord? [6] And that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John conflict with the other apostles and among themselves, whoever shall have compared the histories of the four Evangelists with one another will easily know of himself; and we too shall show this very thing when we speak particularly of each of their histories.

2. And that it is lawful for us to accept and believe certain things in the New Testament, and neither to accept nor believe certain others, we demonstrate by your own example: you who, since you do not accept so many things of the Old Testament, and think they are to be cast away as unworthy of faith, [7] admonish us to do the same likewise in the New Testament according to the same rule. For how would you compel us to accept all the things that are inserted in the monuments of the New Testament, when you neither believe nor accept so many things of the Old Testament — which nevertheless you affirm to be equal in sanctity to the New? For you do not believe what is said in the Old Testament, namely: that he is accursed who has not raised up seed in Israel (since that would comprehend all virgins too); or that he shall utterly perish from his race who has not been circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin [8] (since this too would pertain to every Christian); or that he who has broken the sabbath is to be put out [stoned to death] with stones; or that he is not to be spared who has violated any single commandment of the Old Testament; or that God is to be appeased with sacrifices, offerings, and immolations (as seems good to Moses); or that the Pasch is to be cele-

[1] Augustine to Jerome, epistle 8 (Aug. ad Hieronymum epist. 8).
[2] Augustine, book 33 against Faustus, ch. 6 (Aug. lib. 33 contra Faust. cap. 6).
[3] Augustine against Faustus, book 32, ch. 19 (Aug. contra Faust. lib. 32 cap. 19).
[4] Augustine, book 33 against Faustus, ch. 9 (Aug. lib. 33 contra Fau. cap. 9).
[5] Augustine, book 32 against Faustus, ch. 16 (Aug. lib. 32 contra Faust. cap. 16).
[6] From Augustine, book 32 against Faustus, ch. 2 (Ex Aug. lib. 32 contra Fau. c. 2).
[7] From Augustine, book 32 against Faustus, chs. 3 & 5 (Ex Aug. lib. 32 cont. Fau. cap. 3 & 5).
[8] Genesis 17 (Gen. 17).

(printed p. 578 [PDF p. 583] — Heresy I continues: objections 2–4; the Dilutio begins.)

brated with a lamb and the eating of unleavened bread, and that for seven days one must beware of leaven; or that one must not abstain from the foods prohibited in the Law. And since these things are in no wise believed by you — seeing that you do not observe them — but are repudiated as alien, far removed from the Christian rite, and in no part to be believed or observed, why should it not be lawful for us to do the same in the New Testament? — especially in those things which agree neither with the gravity of the writers nor with the Christian faith, but discolor the beauty and grace of the Gospel itself, and diminish the honor and praise of the majesty of Christ: as that Christ was born of a woman shamefully, circumcised Jewishly, sacrificed after the manner of the gentiles, baptized humbly, led about by the devil through the deserts, and by him most wretchedly tempted. All which things we think are deservedly to be rejected, as written imprudently by unskilled men, or wickedly inserted by enemies.

3. For this same cause we also reject all the testimonies of the prophets and of the old Law which are found in the New Testament — not only because they have been falsely and wrongly inserted into the New Testament, but because they are brought in superfluously and beside the point, and lead the reader to suspicion rather than to faith: as though the majesty of the Son of God, his authority, the testimonies of his works, and his miracles were not sufficient to confirm and establish the authority of the Gospel; but these arguments were so invalid and infirm that, casting them aside, it should be necessary to summon foreign witnesses from this side and that, and — for the strengthening of the Gospel's stability — to beg from the Jews, even our enemies, the doubtful, uncertain, and suspect testimonies of our foes. Thus far Faustus. [1]

4. But the Anabaptists strive to show, out of the testimonies of many fathers, that the codices of the New Testament, Latin as well as Greek — even those which the Catholic Church used — were falsified of old. And first, concerning the falsified exemplars of the Latins: Ambrose, say they, bringing in against the heretics that testimony of Paul, "We serve by the Spirit of God," speaks thus: [2] "But if anyone contends about the variety of the Latin codices, some of which the perfidious have falsified, let them inspect the Greek codices, and observe that it is written: οἱ πνεύματι θεῷ λατρεύοντες [they who worship God in the Spirit]." [3] And Jerome, in the preface to the four gospels addressed to Damasus, asserts that the greatest variety is found in the Latin exemplars, and that there are as many Latin exemplars as codices; adding that the New Testament in our tongue is discordant, and that therefore he wished to correct the New Testament to the Greek truth, and to emend in it whatever things had either been badly put forth by faulty translators, or more perversely emended by unskilled presumers, or added or changed by drowsing copyists. But in what way Jerome could have restored the Latin New Testament to its integrity by a collation made with the Greek codices does not appear, since the Greek codices in his age were much more depraved than the Latin, and much more divergent — as he himself confesses upon the fifth chapter of [the epistle to] the Galatians; and in the preface to the Pentateuch he writes that the Latin exemplars are more correct than the Greek. And the divine Ambrose, in the exposition of the fifth chapter of the epistle to the Romans, speaking of the diversity and discrepancy of the Greek exemplars, says: "The Greeks have divers codices, which through zeal for contention disagree with one another." And this discrepancy of the Greek codices is shown by Jerome's very translation, which the Church now has; which, since in many things (as is manifest) it disagrees with the truth [text] of the Greek codices which the Church now holds, it remains either that Jerome did not translate the New Testament faithfully, or, if he translated faithfully, that he had other Greek exemplars greatly divergent from these, which at that time were read in the church as sincere and uncontaminated, and that from those, as from the true fountain, he translated the New Testament — those Greek codices which are now found being rejected as vitiated and by no means entire. Nor are there wanting those who judge that the Greek codices which we now have were vitiated by the Greeks after they separated themselves, on account of their contentions, from the Roman Church. Yet we know that even long before those discords of the Greek and Latin Church, down to the times of Origen, the Greek codices of the New Testament disagreed much among themselves; and that Origen himself, though laboring diligently, could not reduce that dissension into concord. For Origen himself affirms this in the eighth homily upon Matthew, in which he sets down these words: "We have found much difference among the exemplars. In the exemplars of the Old Testament indeed, whatever things were consonant we were able, God assisting, to fit together, using the judgment of the other editions. For those things which seemed doubtful in the Seventy because of the consonance of exemplars, making a judgment from the remaining editions, we kept what agreed; and certain things we marked as not set down in the Hebrew, not daring to remove them altogether; and certain things we added with asterisks, that it might be manifest that we added, in agreement with the Hebrew, from the other editions the things not set down in the Seventy. But in the exemplars of the New Testament I did not think I could do this very thing without peril; I judged it not unreasonable that I ought only to set forth suspicions and reasonings, and the causes of the suspicions." By which words Origen most clearly shows that the Greek codices of the New Testament in his age were various among themselves, and that this variety could not be removed by applying asterisks and obeli, as had been done by him in the Old Testament. Now an irreconcilable variety and dissension is an argument of falsity.

DILVTIO OBIECTORVM [The Dissolution of the Objections]

1. Since the heretics, with a certain general and indefinite calumny, accuse the evangelical scriptures as discordant and fighting among themselves, and yet do not prove it, promising that they will do so hereafter, therefore for the present we shall answer them with nothing but a certain general response: namely, that this variety of the evangelists, which the heretics object in place of falsity, is with us the greatest argument of truth — as the most eloquent Chrysostom excellently demonstrated when, against the heretics, he wrote on behalf of the evangelical diaphony [discord] in the preface on Matthew after this manner: [4] "But, you will say, there is no truth in the Evangelists, because they are found divergent from one another in many things;

[1] Augustine against Faustus, book 12, ch. 1, and book 32, ch. 7 (Aug. contra Faust. lib. 12 cap. 1 & lib. 32 cap. 7).
[2] Ambrose, in the book On the Holy Spirit (Amb. lib. de Spiritu sancto).
[3] Philippians 3 (Phil. 3).
[4] Chrysostom, in the preface upon Matthew (Chrysost. in praef. super Matth.).

(printed p. 579 [PDF p. 584] — the Dilutio of Heresy I continues: responses 1–4.)

and dissonant. Nay rather, this very thing is the greatest testimony of truth. For if they agreed entirely and in all things, and if with excessive diligence and care their words ran together equally, down to the times, all the places, and the very single words, no enemy would ever have believed but that they, gathered by a common counsel to deceive, had composed the Gospel as it were by a certain human contrivance; for they would judge that so anxious a consonance was not [the mark] of simplicity. But as it is, that seeming dissonance in small matters defends them from all suspicion, and clearly enough protects the reputation of the writers. If, however, they have spoken variously of times and places, that in no way prejudices the truth of the things said. Yet nevertheless, as God shall grant, proceeding onward we shall attempt to declare what this [variety] is; after this asking what we have said [before] — that you note diligently that in those principal matters, in which both our life and the sum of the preaching consist, no one of them is found to differ even in the least. And what are these? That God was made man; that he worked marvels; that he was crucified; that he was buried; that he rose again; that he ascended into heaven; that he is to be judge; that he established saving precepts; that he brought in no law contrary to the former; that he is the Son of God; that he is only-begotten; that he is of the same substance with the Father — and whatsoever things are of this kind. For in all these we find their concord to be greatest. But if, in the choosing of the marvels [to relate], not all have said all the same things, but this one narrated those and another others, let it not disturb you at all. For if any one of them had said everything, the number of the rest would have been superfluous; and if they had all written things divergent among themselves and all new, no proof of their agreement could have appeared. For this reason they have both said many things in common, and nonetheless each has written down something proper and special to himself; and lest anything should seem added superfluously and unseasonably, [each so wrote] that neither would nothing new be added, nor — had he said everything different — would the whole credit of the matters be called into doubt." Let these words of the divine John [Chrysostom] suffice for now. But when the heretics begin to produce by name passages of the gospels [allegedly] fighting with one another, we too shall answer each one appositely, according to the series of their objections, so far as can be done.

2. Now let us pass to Faustus's comparison, whereby he claims it is lawful for him not to believe certain things of the New Testament because we do not believe many things of the Old Testament — those, namely, which we do not observe out of it. This comparison is indeed null, because it is one thing to believe the things Faustus mentions from the Old Testament, and another to observe them. For if we speak of faith and belief, we believe all the things contained in those books, and we praise, accept, and approve them as written most truly and most profitably for eternal life, and we defend them with the firmest reason of truth. [1] But if the discourse is about the observance of the same, we say that we do not observe with bodily operation the things commanded in them; because we know that they were most rightly commanded, suitably to that time and to that people; and we have learned that they were a shadow of things to come, and we now know that they are being fulfilled. And hence, whoever at that time failed to observe, even in deed, the things commanded to be done for signification, paid by God's most righteous judgment the divinely appointed penalties — just as now, if anyone should dare with sacrilegious temerity to violate the sacraments of the New Testament, distinct [from the old] according to the reckoning of the time. [2] We believe, therefore, and accept all things — whether those we observe, that we may live rightly, or those we do not observe, that we may now see fulfilled the things which then were commanded and observed in figure and prophecy. Faustus lies, therefore, in saying that we do not believe many things of the Old Testament because we pass over their bodily observance, since nevertheless we accept all those things within the number of things to be believed.

3. Concerning the testimonies of the Old Testament, which he rejects as false or superfluous, our response is this: they can be neither false nor superfluous. [3] False — by no means: since Paul, whom the Manichaeans venerate most of all, and profess to have entire [uncorrupted], testifies in many places that all the evangelical mysteries were promised by God in the holy scriptures through the mouths of the Prophets. And superfluous — not at all; nay, they are necessary in the highest degree: not indeed that we believe the testimony of Christ to need the authority of external testimony for its stability, or that we prefer the testimonies of the prophets to him; but lest, unmindful of the benefit received, we be ungrateful to the prophets, extinguishing the oracles of the prophets, by whose attestation the apostles demonstrated to us that their preaching was true, and by their authority invited [men] to the faith of Christ. Likewise, that we may have the means whereby to invite all unbelievers, Hebrews as well as gentiles, to the faith of Christ, if they do not resist; or whereby to defend that same faith of Christ against them, if they contradict — showing to both that the things which are now fulfilled in Christ and in the Church were foretold by the prophets so long a time before, that no one, unless wholly devoid of reason, can deny them.

4. But to that which the Anabaptists object concerning the corruption of the Greek as well as the Latin codices, we say: it is not lawful to infer, from the particular depravation of some codices, a universal and general corruption of all codices. For from the fact that Ambrose, Jerome, and Origen said either that some Latin codices had been falsified by certain perfidious men, or that there is much variety in the Greek exemplars, one may not conclude that all the codices of the Catholic Church together were vitiated. Just as neither from the particular negligence of certain unskilled men, or the malice of falsifiers, is it lawful to deduce what Faustus and the Anabaptists have perniciously deduced — namely, that our forefathers, to mock the simple and rude Christians, corrupted all the evangelical codices on purpose. Since (as Augustine says) [4] even if all the fathers had conspired in this — to deprive themselves and others of the truth of the scriptures (which cannot be imagined) — yet they could not have falsified all the codices everywhere, which were by now worn by the hands of Christians throughout the whole world; because as soon as they had begun to do it, with all Christians everywhere crying out against them, they would have been convicted and confuted as falsifiers out of the truth of the ancient codices — especially since [the scriptures were] now not in one language

[1] Augustine, book 32 against Faustus, ch. 13 (Aug. lib. 32 contra Faust. cap. 13).
[2] Augustine, book 16, ch. 15 (Aug. 16. cap. 15).
[3] Augustine against Faustus, book 13, chs. 10 & 14 (Aug. co. Fau. lib. 13 ca. 10 & 14).
[4] Augustine, book 32 against Faustus, ch. 16 (Aug. lib. 32 co. Fau. c. 16).

(printed p. 580 [PDF p. 585] — end of Heresy I; Heresy II, on the Gospel of Matthew, begins.)

but the Gospel was contained in many languages. But even if we should grant to the heretics that all the codices were corrupted in some part, and that the several exemplars of the Catholic Church were vitiated in certain particular places, it will nevertheless not follow that all the codices together were corrupted in the same places, parts, sentences, and words; but some were corrupted in some, others in other parts, sentences, and words — in such wise that the things which in certain exemplars had been depraved, whether by chance or by malicious industry, remained in certain others entire and inviolate. And in this manner indeed the truth of the evangelical text, which in the single and particular codices of the church had been varied according to the diversity of times and of copyists, remained always entire and incorrupt in all the exemplars collected together — God so willing: that the integrity of the true reading, which the malice or negligence of men had corrupted in parts, should be preserved at least in the whole universality of the churchly codices; lest the church of Christ should for any time lack the integrity of the divine scriptures; and that pious and erudite men might always have the means to correct and emend whatever the ignorance of the unskilled or the perfidy of the wicked had vitiated, a collation of many exemplars with one another being made. From which it is now plain whence the Latin New Testament could be emended (a thing that seems impossible to the heretics): namely, from the collation of the Latin codices with the Greek exemplars, and of the Greek likewise among themselves.

Nor does it stand in the way that Ambrose and Jerome say the Greek codices were more depraved than the Latin. For Ambrose does not speak universally — that all the Latin codices are more correct than those of the Greeks — but particularly of certain ones which the simplicity of the times preserved incorrupt. And Jerome, in the preface to the Pentateuch, said not by way of assertion that the Latin are more correct than the Greek, but brought forth those words as something impossible (adynaton) or absurd, saying: "If the Latin [copies] are more correct than the Greek, and the Greek more than the Hebrew…" Whence the same [Jerome], in the epistle to Sunnia and Fretela, affirms that one must have recourse to the Greek codices as the more correct, in these words: "In the New Testament, if ever a question arises among the Latins, and there is variety among the exemplars, we run back to the fountain of the Greek speech, in which the New Testament was written." And this Jerome certainly observed when he restored the New Testament to the Greek truth. It remains, therefore, that there were always among the Greeks certain codices entire and faithful, from which the Latin codices could be emended. And even if it be conceded that some faultiness could befall these too through the fault of copyists, they could nevertheless easily be restored to their pristine integrity: because from several exemplars corrupted by chance, when collated into one, the true reading is very often detected; for it frequently happens that what has been depraved in one codex by the carelessness of scribes is found entire in another codex.

But when the heretics subjoin that either the Greek codex which the church now commonly has is not the one Jerome used in translating, or that Jerome did not translate rightly and faithfully, we say: that the Greek codex which is now read in the church is that very same one which the Greek church used in the times of Jerome, and long before, even to the times of the apostles — true, sincere, faithful, and contaminated by no fault of falsity; [1] as the continued reading of all the Greek fathers most lucidly shows, they all reading always one and the same tenor of the scripture: Dionysius, Justin, Irenaeus, Melito, Origen, Africanus, Apollinarius, Athanasius, Eusebius, Basil, Chrysostom, Theophylact, and other fathers before and after the times of Jerome. Nor is it likely that the Greek fathers vitiated their own codices to the detriment of the Latins; for if they had done this out of hatred of the Western church, they would have depraved them chiefly in those places about which there was fighting and dissension between them and the Latin church; and since those places endure still entire and inviolate, and the Greeks have not vitiated them, much less is it to be believed that they vitiated others. Nor is Jerome for this reason to be believed to have translated the New Testament badly — because our vulgate edition, which is said to be Jerome's, differs in many things from the Greek truth. For (as we have said abundantly elsewhere, when we treated of the translations of holy Scripture) the vulgate edition of the New Testament which we now use is not purely Jerome's from Greek into Latin, but a certain mixed edition, gathered partly from the old vulgate edition, partly from a certain new castigation [revision] of Jerome upon the New Testament. For it is not altogether certain whether he translated the whole

New Testament from the Greek, or corrected it as already translated before by others — which latter he may be conjectured rather to have done, from many of his writings, especially from the preface to the four gospels, where he says: "Thus in this emendation we have tempered our pen, that, correcting only those things which seemed to change the sense, we permitted the rest to remain as they had been." But although this edition be not Jerome's, and many things in it do not answer to the Greek truth, yet one ought not to assail it with calumnies as false and by no means sincere and entire, as the heretics do: because even if there be many things in it which do not agree thus exactly (adamussim) with the Greek, nevertheless no evangelical precepts nor mysteries of our faith have been omitted in this our vulgate edition, or translated so obscurely that they cannot be understood, or turned into a sense divergent from and contrary to our doctrines; nor do they — whether in the things that regard faith or in the things that pertain to morals — contain anything less than is read in the Greek. But concerning the integrity of this edition we have spoken elsewhere, in the treatise on Translations, as much as was fitting. Now let us proceed to the other heresies.

OF THE GOSPEL OF MATTHEW — Heresy II (De Evangelio Matthaei haeresis II)

To cut out of the Gospel according to Matthew — which was falsely composed by an uncertain author under the name of Matthew — certain things badly inserted by the fault of corrupters.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

The first authors of this heresy (as Epiphanius relates) were the Ebionites, [so named] from Ebion, [2]

[1] Matt. 4 (Matth. 4).
[2] Book 1, Heresy 30 (Lib. 1, Haer. 30).

(printed p. 581 [PDF p. 586] — Heresy II: assertors continued; the Impugnatio and the heretics' objections begin.)

[from Ebion] so named, not long after the preaching of the Apostles; who, just as they held divers opinions concerning the nativity of Christ, so brought forth divers judgments concerning the gospel of Matthew. Accordingly it must be known that, as Eusebius in the third book of the Ecclesiastical History [1] and Epiphanius affirm, the Ebionites were divided in two around [the question of] Christ's nativity: those of them who followed the error of their teacher Ebion said that Christ was pure man, procreated by common nativity of man and woman; but those who departed from their teacher in this asserted that Christ was neither true man nor born according to the flesh. But because they saw that Matthew, in the very beginning of his gospel, ran counter to this error of theirs, and most openly attested that Christ was man and had a father and mother on earth, therefore — the genealogies being cut off, that is, the first and second chapter of this gospel, in which the generations of Christ are enumerated — they took the beginning of this gospel from its third chapter; yet with many words adulterated and changed, partly added, partly mutilated, after this manner: "It came to pass in the days of Herod, King of Juda, that John came baptizing with the baptism of penance in the river Jordan; who was said to be of the stock of Aaron the priest, son of Zachary and Elizabeth; and all went out to him." And after they had said many things, they added: "The people being baptized, Jesus also was baptized by John; and when he had come up out of the water, the heavens were opened, and he saw the Spirit of God in the form of a dove, descending and entering into him. And a voice was made from heaven, saying: Thou art my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased; and again: I this day have begotten thee. And straightway a great light shone round about the place; and when John had seen it, he said to him: Who art thou, Lord? And again a voice from heaven to him: This is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased. And then John, falling down before him, said: I beseech thee, Lord, baptize thou me. But he forbade him, saying: Suffer it, for thus it is fitting that all things be fulfilled." Thus they. But those who said Christ was born of the seed of man kept this genealogy entire, that from it they might convince [men] that Christ had a father no less than a mother after the flesh; and on account of this sole genealogy — the other gospels being cast aside — they used the gospel of Matthew alone, though with the genealogy alone entire, the remaining parts mutilated, truncated, and corrupted. And among these the chief were Cerinthus, Merinthus, and Carpocras, as Irenaeus, Epiphanius, and Philastrius attest. [2] But Marcion, after these, rejected the gospel of Matthew entirely, as Epiphanius witnesses. After him the Manichaeans took up the patronage of the same dogma; and before the rest, most of all Faustus the Manichaean, who — as appears from the books of the divine Augustine against the same Faustus, namely the second, third, and seventh — endeavored with many arguments to show that the Gospel according to Matthew was written not by Matthew, but by some other of uncertain name and uncertain authority, composed under the name of Matthew; which moreover he judged should be divided into two parts, namely into the Genealogy and the Gospel. And the Gospel indeed he would have to be that [part] which contains only the preaching of the Son of God after John was shut up in prison; but whatever was narrated before John's chains, he said, pertained not to the gospel but to the falsely fabricated Genealogy, and therefore that it was deservedly to be repudiated as a mere genealogy, which is not gospel. Then, turning to that part which he himself called the gospel, he taught that not all things out of it were to be received, but that many were to be repudiated as false and fabricated — but especially he rejected all the testimonies of the Law and the Prophets which are inserted in various places of this gospel, as brought in over and above by rash depravers. Finally the Anabaptists and Servetians in our times have called back into the light this same error, now extinct for so many ages, asserting that many vaticinations of the prophets have been falsely and violently wrested to Christ, and sewn wrongly into this gospel, as into the others, to prove the divinity of Christ.

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

In the confutation of the preceding heresy above, we showed by very many arguments that there is nothing in the New Testament either mendaciously written, or maliciously depraved, altered, falsified, superadded, or subtracted. Wherefore, lest repeating the same thing twice we be compelled to take up again, in confuting the particular heresies of the New Testament, the same arguments which we have already employed in reproving the universal heresies of the whole New Testament, we will not bring a new impugnation here; but we remit the reader to the impugnation of the preceding heresy, which, as a common engine (machina), we oppose to this as much as to the other similar heresies of this kind.

OBIECTIONES HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

Now first of all, that the gospel inscribed with the name of Matthew is not the evangelist Matthew's own, the Manichaeans as well as the Anabaptists strive to show by some arguments — plainly contemptible ones. And first of all Faustus the Manichaean speaks thus:

1. That Matthew did not write this gospel, but some other unknown man under his name, the oblique narration of the very text of Matthew teaches. [3] For what does it say? "And when Jesus passed by, he saw a man sitting at the receipt of custom, Matthew by name, and he called him. And he, forthwith rising up, followed him." [4] And who, then, writing of himself, would say: "He saw a man, and called him, and he followed him," and would not rather say: "He saw me, and called me, and I followed him" — unless because it is evident that Matthew did not write these things, but some other unknown one under his name?

2. But the Anabaptists contend from the language of the author of this gospel that it is not Matthew's. For Matthew was a Hebrew, and is recorded to have written his gospel for the Hebrews in the Hebrew language and letters, as Eusebius relates out of Papias, [5] and Jerome asserts in the book On Illustrious Men. But this gospel, which is now had under the name of Matthew, seems to have been written by its author not in the Hebrew but rather in the Greek tongue. For this the interpretations of the Hebrew names, which are read scattered in very many places of this gospel, manifestly demonstrate;

[1] ch. 27 (cap. 27).
[2] Irenaeus, book 1, ch. 26; Ebion: [Epiphanius] book 1, heresies 28, 30 & 42; Philastrius, ch. 36 (Iren. lib. 1 cap. 26. Ebi. lib. 1 her. 28 et 30 & 42. phil. cap. 36).
[3] Augustine, book 17 against Faustus, ch. 1 (Aug. lib. 17 contra Faust. cap. 1).
[4] Matthew 9 (Matt. 9).
[5] Eusebius, book 3, ch. 39 (Eus. lib. 3 c. 39).

(printed p. 582 [PDF p. 587] — Heresy II: objections 2–7 continue.)

as in the first chapter, where it is said: "His name shall be called Emmanuel, which is interpreted, God with us"; [1] and in the twenty-eighth chapter [rather, the twenty-seventh], where it is written: "Heli, Heli, lamazabatani, which is interpreted: God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Now if Matthew wrote the whole gospel in the Hebrew tongue, then one rightly wonders in what tongue, or in what words, and for the sake of what, he interpreted sentences of this kind; and whether in their interpretation he used words of his own or of a foreign tongue. For if he interpreted Hebrew words with Hebrew words, he incurs the vice of superfluity, expounding things known by things equally known, without any necessity; but if he expressed his own native words with foreign words, then the interpretation of the words will be more obscure than the words themselves. Next, why should he have interpreted these words of his gospel rather than others, since all were of equal facility or difficulty among the Hebrews? Wherefore, to avoid the inept superfluity of this interpretation, we are compelled to say, first, that the author of this gospel wrote not in Hebrew but in Greek; and because he inserted some Hebrew words of the Greek scripture which contained a mystery, he therefore translated them into Greek, lest the reader be defrauded of the understanding of them. But if anyone shall say that those expressions were superadded not by the author but by a Greek interpreter [translator], and that they are not had in the Hebrew codex of Matthew, then it follows that this gospel is rendered suspect in every part. For just as the interpreter brought in these words out of his own head beyond necessity, so it is likely that he either added, or could have added, many other things at his own pleasure. Nor does it stand in the way that this gospel is now found written in Hebrew letters — just as Jerome of old found this very thing written in Hebrew in the library of Caesarea; since it could have been turned from Greek into Hebrew speech by anyone skilled in the Hebrew tongue, as was done with the gospel of John, which Epiphanius writes was of old translated from the Greek tongue into Hebrew, [2] and kept in the treasuries (gazophylacia) of the Hebrews at Tiberias even to his own times.

3. It is rendered uncertain, moreover, whether Matthew wrote any gospel at all; because concerning the time at which Matthew wrote it there is divers opinion among the ecclesiastical writers. Eusebius of Caesarea relates in the Chronicles that Matthew first of all wrote a gospel in Judaea while Peter ruled the church of Antioch, in the third year of the empire of Caligula; but Irenaeus, in the third book Against Heresies, chapter one, hands down that Matthew wrote his gospel when Peter and Paul were evangelizing at Rome.

4. But whether this gospel was composed by Matthew or by some other, it matters little (as Faustus says). [3] It is enough that many things have been craftily inserted into it by certain depraved tamperers. Among which the first place is held by that genealogy of the Savior set before the beginning of the gospel — which many reasons show was neither written by a good man, nor is a part of the gospel, nor pertains to the gospel at all. And first, the very definition of the gospel teaches that this genealogy stands far from the gospel: for the gospel is the very preaching of Jesus Christ the Son of God; for so it is read in Matthew 4: [4] "Jesus went about all Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom." And since this preaching began after John was shut up in prison — as is had in the 4th chapter of Matthew, where it is said, "From that time Jesus began to preach and to say: Do penance, for the kingdom of heaven shall draw near" — it follows that whatever is narrated before Christ's preaching is not gospel, but is all genealogy, up to the prison of John. For also in the second chapter of Matthew a star is brought in, after the profane custom of the gentiles, seen in the East by the Magi — as it were a certain fatal constellation under whose influence the fortune of the newborn boy was constituted.

5. This same thing appears from the inscription of his genealogy, [5] which Matthew himself did not dare to call a gospel, but inscribed it: "The Book of the Generation of Jesus Christ, the Son of David." For what hindered Matthew from setting down "The Gospel of Jesus Christ the Son of David," except that he thought it wicked to call a genealogy a gospel? Whence we too may rightly name those first two chapters a "Genesidium" [a little Genesis] rather than a Gospel.

6. To this is added that Mark, who was Matthew's follower and abbreviator, rejected this genealogy from the gospel of Matthew as spurious (notham): [6] because, since he had undertaken to write the gospel only, he passed over the writing of that generation as in no wise pertaining to the gospel, beginning his gospel from the preaching of the Son of God, which is the true gospel; and to show that the beginning of the gospel is rightly to be taken not from the generation but from the preaching of Christ, he began thus: "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God"; [7] and immediately, Christ's generation being passed over, he subjoined the preaching of John and of Christ.

7. Moreover, the very dissension of the evangelists in recounting the generation of Christ is so interminable and inexplicable that, if one of them wrote truly, it is necessary that the other of them lie. [8] For John and Mark do not write that God was born of man, nor do they bring in Mary and Joseph as Christ's parents; but John indeed says that in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God — signifying, namely, Christ; [9] while Mark says, "the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God" — as though reproaching Matthew, who set down "the Son of David." But Luke and Matthew contend with each other about this generation even much more. For Luke in the third chapter writes that Christ was the son of Joseph, who was [the son] of Heli, who was of Mathat, who was of Levi, who was of Melchi, who was of Janne, who was of Joseph, [10] who was of Mathathias, who was of Amos, who was of Nahum, who was of Hesli, who was of Aggai, who was of Maath, who was of Mathathias, who was of Semei, who was of Joseph, who was of Juda, who was of Joanna, who was of Resa, who was of Zorobabel, who was of Salathiel, who was of Neri, who was of Melchi, who was of Addi, who was of Thesan [Cosan], who was of Telmadan [Elmadan], and the rest that follow. But Matthew, deducing the generation of Christ from parents, grandsires, great-grandsires, and forefathers far divergent [from these], says that Christ was begotten of Mary, who was the wife of Joseph, sprung

[1] Matthew 1; Matthew 28 (Matth. 1; Matth. 28 — i.e., ch. 27).
[2] Book 1, heresy 50 (Lib. 1 her. 50 — i.e., 30).
[3] Augustine, book 2 against Faustus, ch. 1 (Aug. lib. 2 co. Fau. c. 1).
[4] Matt. 4 (Matt. 4).
[5] Augustine, in the same place; Matthew 1 (Aug. ibidem; Matt. 1).
[6] Augustine, in the same place (Aug. ibid.).
[7] Mark 1 (Marc. 1).
[8] Augustine against Faustus, book 3, ch. 10 (Aug. co. Fau. lib. 3 ca. 10).
[9] Matt. 1; Julian the apostate, in Cyril, book 8 against Julian (Matt. 1; Iulia. apost. apud Cyril. lib. 8 con. Iulianum).
[10] Luke 3 (Luc. 3).

(printed p. 583 [PDF p. 588] — Heresy II: objections 7–12 continue.)

from Jacob, sprung from Mathan, sprung from Eleazar, sprung from Eliud, begotten of Achim, begotten of Sadoch, begotten of Azor, begotten of Eliachim, begotten of Abiud, begotten of Zorobabel, begotten of Salathiel, begotten of Jeconias, begotten of Josias, begotten of Amon, begotten of Manasses, begotten of Ezechias, begotten of Achaz, begotten of Joathan, begotten of Ozias, begotten of Joram, begotten of Josaphat, begotten of Asa, begotten of Abia, begotten of Roboam, begotten of Solomon, begotten of David — and the rest. Since therefore these two evangelists disagree so greatly between themselves about this generation of Christ that Matthew makes Joseph, [Christ's] father, the son of Jacob and grandson of Mathan, his descent deduced from the stock of David through Solomon, while Luke makes him the son of Heli, grandson of Mathat, great-grandson of Levi, deduced from the stock of David not through Solomon but through Nathan — it follows that either both of them lie, or at least one of them. [1] Nor can that solution be brought forward in this place which Augustine also condemns in the second book of Evangelical Questions, chapter five: namely, that the same man — as is wont to happen frequently not only among the Jews but among all nations — had two names. For they who think this are easily refuted by the rest of the series of the generation, as Augustine says. For what will they say of Christ's grandsires, great-grandsires, and the rest of his ancestors, of almost all of whom the several evangelists have woven diverse names, each into his own narration?

8. This Genealogy is furthermore to be cast off from the gospel because in the whole context of this generation, up to the baptism of Christ — in which he was declared by the voice of the Father to be the Son of God — no mention is ever made that Christ is the Son of God, but only the son of David, and born of men: [2] as if Matthew, together with the Ebionites, had believed that Christ was then first made the Son of God in his baptism, when the heavens were opened and the Holy Spirit descended upon him, but before the baptism was pure man — which is nowhere found in the whole gospel. For Christ never said that he had a father, or a mother, or a lineage on earth; but rather the contrary: that he was not of this world, that he proceeded from God the Father, that he descended from heaven, that none are mothers and brethren to him save those who shall have done the will of his Father who is in heaven. Therefore to ascribe this genealogy to Matthew is to thrust a calumny upon him — as though he had shut up the Son of God in the womb of a woman.

9. Again, this Genealogy cannot be true: because if Christ is the son of David according to the flesh, as it is the writer's purpose to show, then Christ drew his flesh from the seed of David either from Joseph or from Mary. [3] But from Joseph by no means: for you deny that he was seeded from Joseph as father. Therefore you must needs confess that he is not even the son of David: since the generation is deduced from Abraham to David, and from David to Joseph — through all the fathers, namely, of the Hebrews. From which — since Jesus was not conceived, as you say — he will not be David's son. Accordingly neither could he draw the flesh of David from Mary: because the origin of the virgin herself was not of the same tribe with David — that is, not of the tribe of Juda, from which the kings of the Jews are, but of the tribe of Levi, whence the priests [come]. And this very thing is manifest: both because Luke in the first chapter says she was the kinswoman of Elizabeth, whom he calls of the daughters of Aaron; [4] and because it is agreed that this same [Mary] had for father a certain priest by the name of Joachim — of whom, however, in this generation no mention is anywhere made. How then shall Mary be said to pertain to this lineage of Davidic kindred, in which you see she has neither father nor husband? And hence neither will he be David's son, whoever is born of her, unless you so join Joseph to this his mother that she be proved either his daughter or his wife.

10. And furthermore, those very men who ascribe these Genealogies to Christ knew Jesus neither before his nativity nor immediately after his nativity — so that it might be believed that they wrote the things they had seen done with their own eyes concerning him — but they were joined to him when he was now a young and mature man, that is, of about thirty years. [5] Wherefore, since in every testimony of truth this is always wont to be asked — whether one heard or saw [what he attests] — but these men neither confess that they heard the order of this generation from [Jesus] himself (since he had assuredly [already] been born), nor that they saw it with their eyes (since they came to know him long afterward, that is, after his baptism): to me, and to every right-judging man, it seems as foolish to believe this as if one should call a blind man and a deaf man into judgment [as witnesses]. And these are the causes for which Faustus rejects this Genealogy from the gospel.

11. After these, the wicked Anabaptists, other arguments having been devised, themselves also rise up against the same Genealogy, rashly accusing Matthew. First, because he imprudently deduced the Genealogy of Christ from the kings of Juda and the stock of David through Jeconias by Salathiel, making Salathiel the son of Jeconias and father of Zorobabel; whereas nevertheless it is evident from the sacred letters that Jeconias died in the Babylonian captivity without sons, and that in him the whole royal stock was extinguished, according to that vaticination of the prophet Jeremias pronounced concerning him: [6] "Thus saith the Lord: Write this man barren and childless (sterilem & orbum)." Which words openly show that Jeconias departed wholly bereft of children, and that he had neither Salathiel nor any other son. Next, because Matthew disagrees in the number of these generations as much with Luke the evangelist as with himself: seeing that Luke enumerates from David to Christ forty-three generations, while Matthew enumerates from David to Christ twenty-eight, or twenty-seven. And he differs from himself: because, whereas he says there are three tessaradecades [sets of fourteen] of generations from Abraham to Christ, and affirms that he has placed fourteen generations in each of them, yet in the last tessaradecade he has fitted together not fourteen but only thirteen generations — which is most clear to those who run through the generations of the last tessaradecade, whose first generation is that of Salathiel himself, the second Zorobabel, the third Abiud, the fourth Eliachim, the fifth Azor, the sixth Sadoch, the seventh Achin, the eighth Eliud, the ninth Eleazar, the tenth Mathan, the eleventh Jacob, the twelfth Joseph, the thirteenth Christ's. Thus far the Anabaptists.

12. But Faustus, not content with this alone — that he has cut away that Genealogy — also [assails] other passages [7]

[1] Matth. 1 b.
[2] Augustine against Faustus, book 7, ch. 1, and book 23, chs. 1 & 2 (Aug. co. Fau. lib. 7 cap. 1 & lib. 23 c. 1 & 2).
[3] Augustine, book 23 against Faustus, chs. 3 & 4 (Aug. lib. 23 contra Faust. c. 3 & 4).
[4] Luke 1 (Luc. 1).
[5] Augustine, book 10 against Faustus, ch. 1 (Aug. lib. 10 cotra Faust. cap. 1).
[6] Jeremias 22 (Hier. 22).
[7] Augustine, book 17 against Faustus, ch. 1 (Aug. lib. 17 cotra Faust. cap. 1).

(printed p. 584 [PDF p. 589] — Heresy II: objections 12–14; the Dissolutio begins.)

he casts away from the same gospel as supposititious. Of which the first is that of Matthew 5, where Christ says: [1] "Do not think that I am come to destroy the law, but to fulfill it." This sentence of Christ — because it seemed to confirm the Law, which the Manichaeans deny — Faustus, in Augustine, book seventeen, rendered suspect with these words: "Who attests," says he, "that Jesus said this? Matthew. Where does he say he said it? On the mount. In the presence of whom? Of Peter, Andrew, James, and John — of these four only; for he had not yet chosen the rest, nor Matthew himself. Did one of these four, then — that is, John — write it in his gospel? So [you say]. Does he anywhere mention this himself? Nowhere. How then did Matthew write what John does not attest, who was on the mount — [Matthew] who followed Jesus at a long interval after he came down from the mount? And hence it is doubtful on this very point whether Jesus said any such thing: because the fit witness is silent, and one less fit speaks — one who was not there at all when Jesus was speaking these things on the mount."

13. Faustus likewise assails another sentence of Christ, out of the eighth chapter of Matthew, [2] because in the words of this sentence Christ approves the Patriarchs of the Old Testament, whom Faustus pursues with execrable calumnies as most flagitious men. The sentence is that which Christ brought forth against the Jews, saying: [3] "Many shall come from the East and the West, and shall recline with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven." And Faustus attempts to explode it after this manner: "That of which it cannot certainly be established where or when it was said, nothing forbids us even not to believe that it was said — just as now happens with this sentence, which the very variety of the writers renders doubtful and uncertain. For whereas the two evangelists Matthew and Luke narrate alike concerning the Centurion whose son [servant] was sick, and on whose account Jesus, admiring his faith, is seen to have said this same thing, yet Matthew alone has added that Jesus, after his admiration, went on to say: 'Amen I say to you, that many shall come from the east and the west, and shall recline with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven; but the sons of the kingdom shall be cast into the outer darkness.' But Luke makes no mention there of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. And if anyone say that he therefore passed it over because it had already been said by Matthew — why then does he commemorate the deed itself concerning the Centurion and his servant, which had already been sufficiently intimated to us by Matthew's care? Nor yet did Luke keep silence about this saying in every way — reconsidering, I suppose, lest perchance it might be true; but he changes the place, and applies it to a certain other occasion far dissimilar: that is, where Jesus says to his disciples: [4] 'Strive to enter by the narrow gate: for many shall come seeking to enter, and shall not be able.' And a little after: [5] 'When you shall see Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, enter into the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out; and they shall come from the east and the west, and the south, and the north, and shall recline in the kingdom of God.' Wherefore, since it is not established when, where, or for what cause this was said, if we should believe that it was not said, it matters nothing." These things Faustus calumniates, as brought into the gospel of Matthew by falsifiers.

14. But the Anabaptists, they too, together with Faustus and the other Manichaeans, amputate from this gospel certain histories along with some vaticinations of the prophets: as the history of the Magi coming to Christ with gifts, and the slaughter of the infants perpetrated by Herod. This they pronounce an addition: both because no one of the evangelists except Matthew has remembered this deed; and because Josephus — who was most diligent in recounting the cruelties of Herod, and spent three whole books in describing the life of Herod, namely the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth books of the Hebrew Antiquities — wrote nothing anywhere of this slaughter of the boys which Matthew commemorates. And concerning the vaticinations falsely inserted into this gospel, they bring forward first that which is read in Matthew's second chapter: [6] "For he shall be called a Nazarene" — which they say is nowhere written in the Old Testament; and that which is noted in the same chapter: [7] "Out of Egypt have I called my son," the words of which sentence are found nowhere in the Old Testament — as not only the edition of the Seventy interpreters attests, in which they are read neither in Osee, where these words are believed to be, nor elsewhere; but Jerome himself also, as if doubtful and uncertain where they were written in the Old Instrument, [8] says now that they are had in the eleventh of Osee, now in Numbers, the twenty-fifth chapter, Balaam saying: "Out of Egypt have I called him." And however that may be, it is enough that these words, even if they were found in the Old Testament, were violently wrested to Christ: since neither Balaam nor Osee then spoke of Christ, but of the people of Israel, whom the Lord called back from Egypt by the hands of Moses and Aaron, and asserted into liberty; which the words of Osee liquidly indicate, saying: [9] "As the morning passeth, so hath the king of Israel passed: for Israel was a child, and I loved him; and: Out of Egypt have I called my son." In like manner also that which in the same chapter is read from the thirty-first chapter of Jeremias [10] has been dragged by the teeth (mordicus) to the murder of the infants, namely: "A voice was heard in Rama, Rachel bewailing her sons, and she would not be consoled, because they are not." That this is not to be understood of the killing of the infants, but of Rachel weeping for the sons of Israel led away into captivity, the words of the prophet immediately following themselves declare. For he adds directly after the aforesaid words: "Thus saith the Lord: Let thy voice rest from weeping, and thine eyes from tears; for there is a reward for thy work, saith the Lord, and they shall return from the land of the enemy, and shall return to their own borders." Wherefore, since these places have been thrust into this gospel partly falsely, partly violently, it is likely that many other vaticinations of the Old Testament also, with the like licence, were sent in by rash writers according to their purpose. And these are the things which the heretics declare against the holy gospel of Matthew. Now let us pass to their dissolution.

DISSOLVTIO OBIECTORVM [The Dissolution of the Objections]

1. How elegant a thing Faustus seemed to himself to say, when he would have it that Matthew did not write these things for this reason — that, speaking of his own election [calling], he says not: [11] "He saw me, and said to me, Follow me,"

[1] Matth. 5.
[2] Augustine, book 33 against Faustus, chs. 1 & 2 (Aug. lib. 33 cotra Faust. cap. 1 & 2).
[3] Matth. 8.
[4] Luke 13 (Luc. 13 e).
[5] Luke 13 (Luc. 13 f).
[6] Matth. 2 d.
[7] Matth. 2 e.
[8] Jerome, in his commentary upon Matthew, ch. 2; Numbers 25 — i.e., 23/24 (Hier. in com. super Matth. cap. 2; Num. 25).
[9] Osee 11 (Ose. 11).
[10] Jeremias 18 — i.e., 31 (Hier. 18).
[11] Augustine against Faustus, book 17, ch. 4; Matth. 9 (August. con. Fau. lib. 17 cap. 4; Matth. 9).

(printed p. 585 [PDF p. 590] — Heresy II: Dissolutio, responses 1–5.)

but, "He saw Matthew, and said to him, Follow me." And I know not whether he said this from the error of ignorance or from the custom of fallacy [deceit]. But I could not think him so unskilled as never to have read or heard that writers of things done, when they come to their own person, are wont so to weave the narration as though they narrated of another what they narrate of themselves — as did John, whom Faustus accepts, when toward the end of his book he spoke of himself: [1] "Peter, being turned about, saw the disciple whom Jesus loved, who also reclined at supper upon his breast, and had said to the Lord: Who is it that shall betray thee?" and a little after: "This is that disciple who giveth testimony of these things; and we know that his testimony is true." And Christ, when he spoke of himself, said of himself in oblique speech: [2] "When the son of man cometh, thinkest thou he shall find faith on the earth?" and, [3] "The son of man came eating and drinking"; and, "The hour shall come when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God." Since Faustus has heard these things so often, I judge rather that he wished — not as an unskilled man, but as among the unskilled — to pour out fog, hoping that he would capture the more, who did not know these things.

2. But the Anabaptists, we do not doubt, are deceived through unskilfulness when they say this gospel is not Matthew's because it does not appear to have been written in Hebrew, but in Greek — as the aforesaid interpretations of Hebrew names show. For they do not understand that interpretations of this kind were added by the interpreter who turned Matthew into the Greek tongue. Nor is the interpreter rendered suspect on this account — that by like example he added very many other things within the context of Matthew: for if it be permitted to suspect this of Matthew's interpreter, the same also, for the same cause, will be permitted to be suspected of those most ancient and most holy interpreters of the Old Testament — which would surely be impious, since the Apostles by their attestation have approved their interpretation to us. For they themselves also frequently interpret names of this kind: as in Genesis they expound the name Galaad, saying: "Therefore was the name of it called Galaad, that is, the heap of witness"; [4] and in the same book: "His mother called his name בן אוני ben oni, that is, the son of my sorrow; but his father called him בן ימין bin iamin, that is, the son of the right hand"; [5] and in Exodus: "For it is פסח Pesach, that is, the passage of the Lord." [6] This very thing also, as Jerome attests in the book On the Best Manner of Interpreting, the apostles and evangelists sometimes did — as we read in Mark, who, when he had brought in Christ [coming] to the dead girl, saying, "Thabitha cumi," immediately subjoined: "which is interpreted: Girl, I say to thee, arise" — in the interpretation of which sentence he added of his own two words, namely "I say to thee," which are not in Christ's Hebrew [Aramaic] utterance, that he might express more clearly and strongly the sense of the one calling and commanding. If therefore the Anabaptists' argument concludes anything, by the same reasoning it follows that neither the book of Genesis nor of Exodus was written by Moses in the Hebrew speech — against the judgment of all ecclesiastical writers. Matthew, therefore, set forth the evangelical history in Hebrew speech and letters, as both Irenaeus attests, book 3, chapter 1, and Eusebius, from the judgment of Papias, [7] relates in the third book of the Ecclesiastical History; the same [Eusebius] confirming it in the fifth book from Pantaenus, and in the sixth book from Origen.

3. The third argument is most futile, which is taken from the difference of time. For if those two fathers be rightly inspected, they disagree in nothing between themselves. For what Eusebius says — that Matthew first wrote his gospel in Judaea — in no wise fights with what Irenaeus says, that Matthew put forth his gospel, written in his native tongue, into the light much later. [8] For both can easily be [true]: both that Matthew first preached in Judaea his gospel, already written by himself in his own tongue, as Eusebius relates; and that long after this he put it forth into the light and published it to be read by all, according to Irenaeus, when he had removed from Judaea to the gentiles. For thus Eusebius narrates of him in the third book of the History, chapter 24: "Matthew first preached the gospel to the Hebrews. But when he was preparing to pass over to the gentiles, he set down the scripture in his native tongue, and, comprehending in it the things he had preached, he left a memorial of them to those from whom he was setting out, that he might preach to the gentiles."

4. Now, returning to Faustus, we say that he lies impudently when he says that the generation of Christ does not pertain to the gospel. [9] For from the doctrine of Paul, which he himself accepts, it is most certain that the generation of Christ according to the flesh, from the seed of David, regards the gospel. For thus he says, writing to Timothy: [10] "Be mindful that Christ Jesus rose again from the dead, of the seed of David, according to my gospel"; and writing to the Romans [11] he says he was called and set apart unto the gospel of the Son of God, who was made to him of the seed of David according to the flesh. And what was the gospel of the apostle Paul, this also is the gospel of Matthew and of the rest of the apostles and of the faithful. But when in the definition of the gospel he concludes only those things which were done by the preaching of Christ, this proceeds from his own error. For all who know Greek even slightly interpret εὐαγγέλιον as good news or a good announcing. And if that is so, why should that not be gospel which is narrated of this generation, since such good things are announced to us — namely, that the Son of God, for our salvation, that he might make us divine, was made man, his flesh deduced through so many generations from the seed of David? [12] And to that which he calumniates about the "fatal star," as though brought in after the manner of the gentiles, we answer: that we place no man's generation under the fate of the stars, so that we may vindicate the free choice of the will — by which one lives either well or ill — from every bond of necessity, on account of the just judgment of God; [13] much less, therefore, do we believe the temporal generation of him to have been made under the condition of the stars, who is the eternal creator and lord of all things. For that star did not rule over Christ unto decree, but did service unto testimony; nor did it subject him to its command, but indicated [him] by its homage; nor was the star fate to Christ, but Christ was fate to the star: for he brought to it, not it to him, the cause of [its] arising.

5. But as for that — who would not laugh at what he adduces about the inscription of this Genealogy? — as though this genealogy did not pertain to the gospel because Mat- [14]

---

[1] John 21 (Ioan. 21).

[2] Luke 18 (Luc. 18).

[3] Matt. 11; John 5 (Matt. 11; Ioan. 5).

[4] Gen. 31.

[5] Gen. 35.

[6] Exod. 12.

[7] Marc. 9 — i.e., Mark 5.

[8] Eusebius, book 3 of the History, chs. 24 & 39; book 5, ch. 10; book 6, ch. 18 (Eus. li. 3 hist. c. 24 & c. 39 & lib. 5 c. 10 & lib. 6 ca. 18 — i.e., 25).

[9] Augustine, book 2 against Faustus, ch. 2 (Augu. lib. 2 cont. Faust. cap. 2).

[10] 2 Tim. 2.

[11] Rom. 1.

[12] Augustine against Faustus, book 2, ch. 6 (Aug. contra Faust. lib. 2 cap. 6).
[13] Augustine against Faustus, book 2, ch. 5 (August. cont. Faust. lib. 2 cap. 5).
[14] Augustine, book 2 against Faustus, ch. 6 (?); Matt. 1 (Aug. lib. 2 cot. Fau. c. 6; Mat. 1).

(printed p. 586 [PDF p. 591] — Heresy II: Dissolutio, responses 5–7; Africanus on the two genealogies.)

Matthew did not begin in such wise as to say, "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ," as Mark says, but "The Book of the generation of Jesus Christ." [1] At this rate neither will John be said to have written a gospel, since he says not "The beginning of the gospel," nor "The book of the gospel," but "In the beginning was the Word." Unless perchance Faustus was so elegant a coiner of words that he would name this exordium a "Verbidium" [a little Word-book] on account of the "Word," just as he dared to call the other a "Genesidium" on account of the "genesis." [2]

6. Nor did Mark, Matthew's abbreviator, pass over the writing of this genealogy because he thought it either superfluous or repugnant to the evangelical doctrine, but because he had seen that it had already been described fully and abundantly enough by Matthew the evangelist.

7. The seventh argument — which, long before Faustus, Celsus the Epicurean, first of all, objected against the Christians in the book which he entitled Of the True Discourse (Verus sermo), and after him Porphyry, and Julian Augustus [the Apostate] took it up again after both [3] — the divine Augustine, writing against Faustus, dissolved after this manner. First: that there is no contradiction between John and Mark [on one side], and Luke and Matthew [on the other], because these say the Son of God was born of a virgin, while those say he was born of God; for both are most true: namely, that the Son of God was begotten of God the Father from eternity, and in time was born on earth, according to his humanity, of a woman — not losing the form of God, but taking the form of a servant. But as to what he says — that Luke and Matthew are implacably discordant between themselves — there is nothing to be wondered at, that Joseph has one father according to Matthew and another according to Luke, and one grandfather according to this one and another according to that one, and so on upward as far as David, through so many generations, some being numbered by this one, others by that one. For the whole question lies in this: how Joseph could have two fathers. If it be demonstrated that this could be done, there is no cause at all why any of those evangelists should be believed to have spoken falsely in enumerating divers generations. For if [he could have] two fathers, it will now be neither wonderful nor contrary that there could also be two grandsires and two great-grandsires, and whatever is above, as far as David — of whom both were sons — both Solomon, who pertains to the order which Matthew has obtained [followed], and Nathan, who is in the series which Luke has set forth. For some attend to these things and see that a man cannot be begotten by two men through the commingling of the flesh, and therefore they think this question cannot be dissolved; [4] nor do they observe what is most certain and most easy: that a man's father is said to be not only he by whom he was begotten, but also he by whom he was adopted. For neither was the bond of adoption alien from the customs of the ancients, since we find that even women adopted to themselves sons not born of their own womb — as Sara from Agar, and Lia from her handmaid, and Pharao's daughter adopted Moses; and Jacob himself adopted his own grandsons, the sons of Joseph. Thus far Augustine.

But because he, writing in this place against Faustus, did not explicate how this series of adoption is to be fitted in the genealogy of Christ, therefore the same blessed Father, in the second book of Retractations, excused himself concerning this, [5] saying that it had been passed over by him because, when he was writing against Faustus, he had not yet read Julius Africanus, who discourses more fully of the series of this generation. Wherefore, since Augustine in this matter remits [us] to the judgment of Africanus, and that judgment is somewhat divergent from Augustine's aforesaid judgment, it will not be beside the point if I subjoin the words of Africanus himself, writing to Aristides On the consonance of the gospels, out of Eusebius. They are these:

"Among the nation (inquit) of Israel, the names of the generations were enumerated now according to nature, now according to the law: [6] according to nature indeed are had the successions which descend from the truth of seed or blood; but according to the law, when someone, another begetting, is substituted as a son under the name of a brother deceased without children. For since among them the hope of the resurrection had not yet been received, they imitated by these means a certain image of the resurrection — lest the name of the race should be abolished by the fault of sterility. Since therefore orders of generations of this kind were kept among them — so that some, begotten from the very stock, others [begotten] by others through substitution, were reckoned sons to others by benefit of the law — the succession of both modes has been commemorated by the several evangelists: that is, so that the one of them set forth him who had [actually] begotten, and the other set forth him who seemed as it were to have begotten. And so it comes to pass that neither gospel lies, while the one follows the order of nature, the other the rule of the law. For the stock is joined to itself mutually — both that [deduced] through Solomon and that which is deduced through Nathan — by the legal substitutions which were made for those who died without children, and nonetheless by second marriages, whereby one and the same man, begotten of some parents, seemed to be the son of others. And so it comes to pass that each narration of the generations is deduced down to Joseph by most true lines — designated indeed in a diverse, but sufficiently ascertained order. But that what is said may become clearer, we will narrate the sequences of the generations themselves from David through Solomon. The generation which Matthew numbers makes Mathan the third from the end, who is said to have begotten Jacob the father of Joseph; but Luke, weaving the order of the generations from David through Nathan, made Melchi the third of the same place; [7] for he says: 'Joseph, who was of Heli, who was of Melchi.' It lies upon us therefore to show how Joseph, according to Matthew, had Jacob for father, who is deduced through Solomon, but according to Luke, Heli, who is deduced through Nathan; and how these two, that is Jacob and Heli, were two brothers — having, the one Mathan, the other Melchi, for father, coming of a diverse race — and how they [Mathan and Melchi] may be seen to be Joseph's grandsires. The manner, then, is this. Mathan and Melchi, at diverse times, procreated each a son of one and the same wife, Estha by name: because Mathan, who descends through Solomon, first took her to wife, and, one son by name Jacob being left, died. After his death — since the law does not forbid a widow to marry another man — Melchi, who draws his race through Nathan, being of the same tribe but not of the same race [line], took the widow left by Mathan (relictam Mathae); of whom he too received a son, by name Heli; through which — the race of their fathers being diverse — Jacob and Heli are made uterine brothers [brothers by the same mother]. Of whom the one, that is Jacob, [his] brother Heli having died without children,

[1] Matth. 1 a; Matth. 1 (Matth. 1. a; Matth. 1. e).

[2] Augustine, in the same place (Aug. ibidem).

[3] Origen, book 2 against Celsum; Jerome, in the commentary on Daniel and Matthew; Cyril, book 8 against Julian, book 3, chs. 2 & 3 (Origines li. 2 con. Celsum. Hier. in co. Dan. et Mate. Cyrillus li. 8 con. Iulianum libr. 3 cap. 2 & 3).

[4] Augustine, book 2 On the Consensus of the Evangelists, ch. 3 (Augu. lib. 2 de cons. eua. cap. 3).

[5] Book 2 of the Retractations, ch. 7 (2. Retr. c. 7).

[6] Ecclesiastical History, book 1, ch. 6 — i.e., 7 (Hist. ecc. lib. 1 cap. 6).

[7] Luke 3 (Luc. 3).

(printed p. 587 [PDF p. 592] — Heresy II: Dissolutio, responses 7–9 continue.)

taking his wife by the command of the law, begat Joseph — by nature indeed the son of his own stock, on which account also it is written, "But Jacob begat Joseph"; but according to the precept of the law he is made the son of Heli: [1] for Jacob, because he was his brother, had taken [Heli's] wife to raise up his brother's seed. And hereby the generation is found valid (rata) and entire — both that which Matthew enumerates, saying, "But Jacob begat Joseph," [2] and that which Luke designates with fitting observance, saying, "who was thought to be the son of Joseph." Now these things have not been found by us at random, or commemorated without authors; but the very kinsmen of our Savior according to the flesh — whether from zeal to demonstrate so great a discourse, or from [desire] to teach — have handed down the things that were done according to the truth. These are the words of Africanus. From which it appears that he solved this question by another way than Augustine did. For what Augustine had distinguished — that Joseph had two fathers, one according to nature, the other according to adoption — Africanus, discoursing otherwise, said that Joseph had two fathers, one according to nature, namely Jacob, the other legal, according to the substitution of the law, namely Heli. And this judgment John Damascene also, in the fourth book [On the Orthodox Faith], chapter six [i.e., in fact ch. 14], and Jerome in the commentaries upon Matthew, have followed.

But perhaps someone will oppose to us, against this solution of Julius Africanus, that Augustine in the second book of Evangelical Questions says that this solution seems weak: [3] because, whenever anyone among the Jews raises up offspring from the wife of a deceased brother or kinsman, that which is born is wont to receive the name of the deceased. For so it is written in Deuteronomy: [4] "When brethren dwell together, and one of them shall die without children, the wife of the deceased shall not marry another; but his brother shall take her, and shall raise up the seed of his brother, and shall call the first-born son of her by his name, that his name be not blotted out of Israel." Joseph, therefore, does not seem to have been born of the surviving wife of the deceased Heli; because, according to the order of the law, he ought to have been called not Joseph but by the name of the deceased Heli, whose seed his brother Jacob had raised up.

To whom we answer that the same Augustine, when he retracted this judgment of his in the second book of his Retractations, dissolved the present objection in these words: [5] "In the second book," says he, "of Evangelical Questions, wishing to expound how Joseph — whose spouse the virgin Mary is called — could have two fathers, I said that what is related, that a brother took the deceased brother's wife to raise up seed for him according to the law, was weak [as an explanation]: because the law would command him who was born to receive the name of the deceased — which is not true. For the law commands the 'name of the deceased,' of which it speaks, to avail for this — that he be called his son — not for this, that he be called by his very name (hoc quod ille vocaretur)."

8. Moreover, in that Faustus thinks this Genealogy is to be cast away because nowhere in it, up to the baptism, has Matthew said that Christ is the Son of God, but only the son of man — he lies most imprudently, after his fashion. [6] For where first the evangelist enumerated the parents of our Savior, he straightway adds that he whom he had called the son of David was conceived and born of the virgin Mary by the Holy Spirit — applying also to this saying the testimony of Esaias: [7] "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and his name shall be called Emmanuel, which is interpreted, God with us." And in that he says that Christ, in the whole gospel of Matthew, never confesses that he has a mother or a lineage on earth, he proceeds from the same impudence. But since the whole book of Matthew cannot be inserted into this discourse of mine, let him read who will, and see how Matthew leads him whom he called the son of David — while he enumerated his parents — even to the passion and resurrection in his narration, so that he makes him always God and man. [8] And if he therefore thinks that he had no mother or lineage on earth because he said, "Who is my mother, or who are my brethren?" [9] — it remains also that he affirm that his disciples, to whom he offered this example in himself, that they might contemn the tie of earthly kindred for the kingdom of heaven, had no fathers, because he said to them: "Call no man your father upon earth; for one is your father, God." [10] What therefore he taught them concerning fathers, this he himself did first concerning his mother and brethren — not denying his mother and brethren as to his humanity, but contemning them [in comparison] for the kingdom of heaven.

9. Now as to that dilemma of Faustus — which that most nefarious Jew also used, the author of the book Nizahon [Nizzahon], namely: if Christ is of the tribe of Juda, the son of David according to the flesh, it is asked from whence he deduces that filiation from David according to the flesh — from Joseph, or rather from Mary? [11] — we shall answer: From both. Because both are placed by the evangelist in the series of Christ's progenitors — [Christ having been conceived] of the Holy Spirit, yet without human intercourse. For he is called, and truly also is, the son of David according to the flesh from Joseph: because Joseph is the man and husband of Mary, having her as wife not by intercourse but by affection, not by conjunction of bodies but by the copulation (which is dearer) of souls, and by the confederation of a chaste mind. For so says the angel: "Joseph, son of David, fear not to take Mary thy wife." [12] And therefore Joseph is the father of Christ because he is the husband of the parent of Christ. Then, he is the son of David according to the flesh from the virgin Mary, without human seed, since Mary draws her origin from the stock of David. And this we believe for this reason: that, since the scriptures say Christ is of the seed of David according to the flesh, and say the same [Christ] was procreated through the virgin Mary of the Holy Spirit, it follows that Mary was of the kindred of David. And what Faustus says — that Mary does not pertain to the consanguinity of David, alleging that she had a father of the tribe of Levi, a certain priest by name Joachim — does not constrain me, because it is not canonical. But even if I believed this, I should rather say that Joachim himself in some way pertained to the blood of David, and in some way was adopted from the tribe of Juda into the tribe of Levi — either he himself or some progenitor of his; or certainly that he was so born in the tribe of Levi that he drew some consanguinity from the stock of David. This therefore, or some such thing, I should rather believe — even if I were held by the authority of that apocryphal scripture where Joachim is read as the father of Mary — than that the gospel lies, in which it is written that our Savior

[1] Matth. 1.
[2] Matth. 1; Luc. 3.
[3] Book 2, ch. 5 (Lib. 2 ca. 5).
[4] Deut. 25.
[5] Augustine, Retractations book 2, ch. 12 (August. 2 li. retr. cap. 12).
[6] Augustine, book 23 against Faustus, ch. 5 (Aug. lib. 23 cotra Faust. c. 5).
[7] Isa. 7 (Esa. 7).
[8] Augustine against Faustus, book 7, ch. 1 (Aug. co. Fau. lib. 7 cap. 1).
[9] Matt. 12.
[10] Matt. 23.
[11] Augustine, book 23 against Faustus, chs. 8 & 9, and book 2 On the Consensus of the Evangelists, ch. 1 (Aug. lib. 23 cotra Faust. cap. 8 & 9 & lib. 2 de cons. eua. cap. 1).
[12] Matt. 1.

(printed p. 588 [PDF p. 593] — Heresy II: Dissolutio, responses 9–11; the Anabaptists' three-part argument answered.)

was procreated of the seed of David according to the flesh, and through the virgin Mary. Thus far Augustine. And lest anyone should suppose, on account of the aforesaid words, that he so believed Mary to have been of the stock of David as in no way to have believed she was [also] of the stock of Levi, it has seemed good to add the certain and undoubted judgment of this father, in which he confesses that Mary was of both stocks, of David and of Levi. For thus he says in the second book On the Consensus of the Evangelists: [1] "That Mary drew some consanguinity from the stock of David we assuredly ought not to doubt. And since the priestly race of this woman is not passed over in silence — Luke insinuating that her kinswoman was Elisabeth, whom he says was of the daughters of Aaron — it is to be held most firmly that the flesh of Christ was propagated from both races: namely, of the kings and of the priests; in which persons, among that people of the Hebrews, the mystical unction also was prefigured — that is, the chrism, whence the name of 'Christ' shines forth, signified so long before by that most evident token."

10. As to what he says at last — that the apostles are not to be believed concerning this genealogy because they joined themselves to Christ when he was already mature, and did not see [his birth], nor ever said that they heard it from him — this recoils upon himself. [2] For why does he believe John, saying, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was God," etc. — words which please him, though he understands them not? Let him say where John saw this, or where he said he heard it from the Lord himself. For whatever he may say as to whence John could know this, thence we believe that all the announcers of Christ's nativity could know it also. Next, if Matthew could not know that Christ was born, because he joined himself to him when already a young man, whence could Manichaeus — born after so many years — know that Christ was not born? They will say: he knew this by the Holy Spirit, who was in Manichaeus. But why do we not rather believe this of the disciples of Christ — who adhered to him bodily, and gathered the whole origin of Christ according to the flesh — than of the sacrilegious Manichaeus, who, since he has said so many false things, could not have the Holy Spirit?

11. I come now to the argument of the Anabaptists, which has three parts: the first, that the genealogy of Christ is wrongly deduced from the stock of David out of Jeconias through Salathiel; the second, of the dissonance of the generations between him [Matthew] and Luke; the third, of this — that though he said he had placed fourteen generations in each set of fourteen (quartodenario), he has set only thirteen in the last set of fourteen. To the first of these it is answered that Salathiel was the son of Jeconias, whom he begat in Babylon after being led out of prison. For Philo the Jew writes of him in the second book of the Chronography after this manner: "At the end of the seventh year, Euilmerodac held in honor Joachim, surnamed Jeconias, led out of prison; and the people surnamed him Neri (lucerna), because the lamp of David, which was feared extinguished, had shone forth. Soon, Neri being freed, a son was given him by God, Mesezebeel, surnamed Salathiel, who in the seventeenth year before the loosing of the captivity begat Barachias, who in the seventeenth year after the loosed captivity was leader of the people, and from that leadership called Zorobabel, in the eighty-first year from the transmigration, and the seventieth from the desolation." And nothing stands against this judgment from the words of Jeremias: since he speaks not of sterility and bereavement of offspring, but of the bereavement of the kingdom — because Joachim left himself no successor of the kingdom. And this the following words of Jeremias show most clearly: [3] for immediately after those words, "Write this man barren," he adds: "Who in his days shall not prosper; nor shall there be of his seed any man who may sit upon the throne of David, and have power any more in Juda." And that Mesezebeel, surnamed Salathiel, was the father of Zorobabel, as Matthew writes, the book of Esdras, in the second and third chapters, and likewise the book of Nehemias in the third chapter, abundantly attest.

To the second part of the argumentation Augustine gives satisfaction in the second [book] On the Consensus of the Evangelists, in these words: [4] "Therefore the number of the generations in Matthew and in Luke is diverse, because each, under a diverse person of Christ, wove a diverse genealogy. Matthew indeed, who had undertaken to insinuate the royal person in Christ, enumerates the natural generations of Christ from the kings of the Jews; but Luke, wishing to show the priestly person in Christ, runs through the generations of the adoption of Christ. In the generations of Matthew, according to nature, is signified the taking-up of our sins by Christ; in the generations of Luke, according to adoption, is signified the abolition of our sins by Christ. And therefore the latter narrates them descending, the former ascending. And therefore on both sides the number of the generations with them is diverse, because the series of the generations is diverse."

To the third part of the argument — which Porphyry of old had objected against the Christians — Augustine answers one way, Jerome another. Augustine, looking to allegory, says that we ought to enumerate Jeconias twice, that the number of fourteen generations may be filled out; [5] and he rightly says that Jeconias is numbered twice, because from him was made a certain deflection into foreign nations — namely, when the transmigration was made into Babylonia. Now where an order is bent from straightness, so as to go off in a diverse direction, it makes as it were an angle; and that which is in the angle is numbered twice — namely, at the end of the former order and at the head of the deflection itself: so also that Jeconias, who makes the angle, is enumerated twice. But Jerome, coming closer to the sense of the letter, says that no generation is lacking in this genealogy: [6] because under the name of Jeconias — which seems to signify only one person and to embrace only one generation — two kings, and two generations of them, are contained. For there were two kings, father and son, each named Joachim and surnamed Jeconias, of whom it is read in the latter book of Paralipomenon. [7] And they differ between themselves: because the former is the son of Josias, of whom mention is made in the beginning of Daniel under the name Ioakim, which is written with קים Kim; but the latter is the son of Ioakim and grandson of Josias, who is placed in the beginning of Ezechiel, [and his name] is written not with קים Kim but with כין Chin. [8] The second tessaradecade [set of fourteen], therefore, ends in Ioakim the son of Josias; and the third begins from Ioachin the son of Ioakim — each of whom was surnamed Jeconias. Ignorant of this, Porphyry builds up a calumny against the Church, showing his own unskilfulness, [1] Augustine, book 2 On the Consensus of the Evangelists, ch. 2 (Aug. lib. 2 de cons. eua. cap. 2).

[2] Augustine against Faustus, book 7, ch. 2 (Aug. co. Fau. lib. 7 cap. 2).
[3] Jer. 22 (Ier. 22).
[4] Augustine, book 2 On the Consensus of the Evangelists, chs. 3 & 4 (Aug. lib. 2 de cons. euan. cap. 3 & 4).
[5] Augustine, book 2 On the Consensus of the Evangelists, ch. 4, and in Questions on the New Testament, q. 5 (Aug. li. 2 de con. Eu. c. 4 & in quest. no. test. q. 5).
[6] Jerome on Matthew, ch. 1, and on Daniel, ch. 1 (Hier. in Mat. cap. 1 & in Daniel c. 1).
[7] 2 Par. 36; Dan. 1.
[8] Ezech. 1.

(printed p. 589 [PDF p. 594] — Heresy II: Dissolutio, responses 12–14; the Magi, the slaughter of the infants, and the prophetic testimonies.)

while he strives to convict the evangelist Matthew of falsity.

12. For the rest, if what Faustus says is valid — that Matthew, testifying of Christ, is not to be believed, because he was not present; and he who was not present does not speak the truth — it follows that no one today speaks true things of Christ, since no one of those who are today has seen and heard him present. [1] Further, if today true things are said of him by his faithful for this reason — that those who heard or saw disseminated them, whether by preaching or by writing — why could not Matthew hear true things of Christ from the mouth of John his fellow-disciple, where the latter was present and he himself was not present? To this is added that the Lord himself also could narrate to Matthew what he had done, before he called him, with those whom he had called earlier. But [says Faustus] John ought to have put this very thing in his own gospel, if he had heard this said by the Lord — he who was present when it was said. As if it could not be that, since he could not write all the things he had heard from the Lord, among the other things he passed over, he passed over this too, being intent on writing other things. Did he not himself so conclude his gospel, saying: [2] "These and many other things indeed Jesus did, which are not written in this book; which if they were written one by one, I think that not even the world itself could hold the books that should be written"? Here at any rate he shows that he knowingly passed over many things.

13. He adds moreover that that sentence of Christ which is read in Matthew, chapter eight, has little credit, [3] because Matthew and Luke write that it was said by Christ not at the same time, not on the same occasion and place, but at plainly divers ones between them — Luke, after the interrogation made by the disciples about the fewness of those to be saved; Matthew, after the Centurion's faith was heard. [4] But an argument of this kind is most trifling. For why could it not come to pass that Christ repeated the same sentence once and again in divers places and times, and applied it also to divers causes and occasions? As it is also possible and likely that what Matthew said, Luke passed over; nor is that absurd — that what one has narrated, another has omitted, whether purposely or howsoever. For who, ever, reading two historians writing of one matter, judged that both of them, or either of them, must either deceive or be deceived, if one of them said what the other passed over? or if the one, embracing it more briefly, yet keeping the same sentence safe and entire, has set it forth, while the other has digested all things as it were limb by limb (membratim), so as to intimate not only what was done but also how it was done? — just as Faustus wished from hence to calumniate the truth of the gospels: because Matthew said something which Luke, though narrating the same thing, passed over in the telling — as though Luke denied that Christ said what Matthew wrote that he said.

14. There remains the last argument of the Anabaptists, whereby they induce suspicion concerning the vaticinations of the prophets falsely adduced, and concerning the coming of the Magi and the slaughter of the infants — because of this history the other evangelists have said nothing. Which argumentation surely, if it avails anything, it follows that the very history also of the resurrection of Lazarus — which John alone writes, and which the Anabaptists themselves dare not deny to be true — is false, because the other evangelists have remembered nothing of it. And they therefore passed it over, God so disposing, that (as Chrysologus says) so grand a miracle — than which none in Judaea was more illustrious — might be left to be described by John, the supreme [latest] of all the evangelists. And John, and Luke, and Mark therefore wrote nothing of the coming of the Magi and of the slaughter of the infants, because they had seen that Matthew had spoken abundantly of both, as much as was needful. But if Josephus, among the other savageries of Herod, did not recount this cruelty of the slain infants, that ought to move a Christian man nothing: especially since Josephus has passed over other things almost innumerable, of much greater moment even, and much more illustrious, whether by oblivion, or by carelessness, or rather by malice — as Hegesippus, that most ancient historian, accuses him: that willing and knowing he kept silence about the divine resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ and very many of his divine works. Nay more — the authority of the gospel hangs upon the authority of the Holy Spirit and of the Catholic Church, and not upon the testimony of Josephus or of any other profane writer, however approved. And yet even among those most ancient writers the testimony of this deed would not be altogether lacking, if we had need of the testimony of infidels in this matter. For Philo the Jew, in the third little book of his Chronography, enumerating among the other cruelties of Herod this slaughter of the infants, writes thus of Herod: "Herod the Ascalonite, in the thirtieth year of his tyrannical princedom, destroyed the Sanhedrin out of the house of David, and substituted a certain Annalaeus [Ananel], and other [members of the] Sanhedrin from proselytes, who seemed exceedingly erudite in the law; then he slew both Salome his sister and her husband, of the tribe of Juda, and likewise his own son, whom he had received of the same man's wife — because it was said that the Christ promised in the law was [already] born." With whom Macrobius, a celebrated author among the Ethnics [pagans], agreeing — likewise concerning the son, and the boys slain within the two-year age (intra bimatum) — speaks thus in the second book of the Saturnalia: "Augustus, when he had heard that among the boys whom Herod the king ordered slain in Syria within the two-year age, his own son also was killed by him, said: It is better to be Herod's pig (porcum) than his son (filium)" — alluding, namely, to this: that the Jews out of religion do not kill pigs. Of which saying Dion Cassius of Nicaea, the Greek author, also made mention in the life of the same Augustus. Likewise of the apparition of the star made to the Magi at Christ's nativity, Chalcidius writes in his second book on the Timaeus of Plato: that that star announced not death and diseases, but the coming of a venerable God, for the grace of human consummation [salvation] and of mortal affairs; which star, when the wise men of the Chaldaeans had beheld it in the night season, they said it signified the recent birth of a God.

But concerning the testimonies of the prophets which are complained of as falsely and violently sent into this gospel, we shall meet each one in order. And first, to that: "For he shall be called a Nazarene" — we answer that Jerome does not say that Matthew cited that from any particularly determined prophet, but indeterminately and indefinitely from "the prophets." For he [Matthew] did not say, "that it might be fulfilled what was said through the prophet," but in the plural number, "through the prophets"; [5] intimating hereby that he took from the scriptures not the words but the sense

[1] Augustine, book 17 against Faustus, ch. 3 (Aug. lib. 17 cotra Faust. cap. 3).

[2] John, in the last chapter (Io. vlt.).

[3] Matth. 8.

[4] Augustine, book 23 (i.e., 33) against Faustus, ch. 5 (Augu. lib. 23 cotra Faust. cap. 5).

[5] Jerome on Matthew, ch. 2 (Hier. 2 c. in Matth.).

(printed p. 590 [PDF p. 595] — end of Heresy II; Heresy III, on the Gospel of Mark, begins.)

that he took. For thus the very words of Jerome have it: "If he had set a fixed example from the scriptures, he would never say, 'What was said through the prophets,' but simply, 'What was said through the prophet.' But now, calling the prophets in the plural, he shows that he took from the scriptures not the words but the sense. For 'Nazarene' is interpreted holy; and that the Lord would be holy, all scripture commemorates." We can also say otherwise: that this is written in those same words, according to the Hebrew truth, in Esaias: [1] "There shall come forth a rod out of the root of Jesse, and a Nazarene [branch, netser] shall ascend out of his root." Now concerning those words passed over by the Seventy interpreters, namely "Out of Egypt have I called my son," there is no doubt that they are in Osee, in the eleventh chapter. [2] And they were passed over (as Jerome attests) by the Seventy interpreters by prudent counsel — as also other places like these, which speak of Christ the Son of God — lest Ptolemy and the other gentiles should be scandalized, thinking that God had a son, and hence should suppose there are two Gods; or for other causes indicated by us when we treated of the translations of holy scripture. And as to their saying that Jerome was in doubt where those words might be read in the Old Testament, it is most false; since he himself, in the commentaries on Osee, openly asserts that these words are contained, according to the Hebrew truth, in the eleventh chapter; and in the same place he refutes Julian Augustus — overturning this passage long before the Anabaptists — in these words: [3] "This passage, in the Seventy's volume, Julian Augustus — who vomited [wrote] against us Christians — calumniates, and says: What was written of Israel, Matthew the evangelist transferred to Christ, that he might mock the simplicity of those of the gentiles who believed. To whom we shall answer briefly: first, that Matthew put forth his gospel in Hebrew letters, which none could read except those who were of the Hebrews; therefore he did not do it to mock the ethnics. But if he wished to mock the Hebrews, he was either foolish or unskilled: foolish, if he feigned an open lie; unskilled, if he did not understand of whom these things were said. But his folly the volume itself excuses, seeing it is prudently and ordinately composed; and we cannot call him unskilled, whom we know from other testimonies of the scriptures to have had knowledge of the law. It remains therefore that we say this: that the things which precede typically (τυπικῶς) in others [in the type] are referred to Christ according to the truth and the fulfillment." Thus far Jerome — whose last words can be so fitted to that vaticination which the Anabaptists oppose to us out of Jeremias, that we may say: the things which of old were said to the letter concerning the captivity of the sons of Israel, over Rachel, [4] those same things, according to the mystical fulfillment of the figure, are referred to the slaughter of the infants.

OF THE GOSPEL OF MARK — Heresy III (De Marci Evangelio haeresis III)

That the Gospel of Mark, which the church now reads, does not lack suspicion of depravation and falsity.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

This is a heresy of the Anabaptists of our time, who in this dissent from Ebion, Cerinthus, and Merinthus, and from Marcion: that those cast away this gospel of Mark entirely, while these, though they confess that they receive it, yet according to their own caprice take up some things out of it, and reject other things — those that fight against their own dogmas — as sent in by falsifiers; affirming that this is therefore lawful for them, because it is certainly established that the gospel of Mark was ill handled by corrupters, some perverting the order of the history, others superadding many things which before were not in it — as is shown by their arguments subjoined.

OBIECTIONES HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

1. In the very exordium it straightway appears that this gospel has been contaminated by corrupters, in those words: [5] "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ the Son of God, as it is written in Esaias the prophet: Behold, I send my angel [messenger], who shall prepare thy way before thee." [6] These words were prefixed to this gospel not by Mark the Evangelist, but by some inept depraver, little versed in the scriptures of the Old Testament, who wished this exordium to agree with the unrecognized testimony of the prophet. For it is not at all likely that Mark was so devoid of the divine scriptures as not to know that this was written not by Esaias but by the prophet Malachias. Nor does that solution avail — namely, that Mark attributed to Esaias what was Malachias's because, if not the words, yet the sense may be found in Esaias; for if this were admitted, it would matter nothing under what title anything is cited from the sacred letters, since the same senses are found almost everywhere, under divers words, in the sacred volumes. Whence Jerome, seeing that the evangelist, if he had written this, could not be vindicated from the calumny of unskilfulness, in the commentaries upon Matthew, the third chapter, threw this error back upon falsifiers, saying: "We however think the name of Esaias was added by the fault of copyists; which we could prove also in other places." But let us grant that Mark cited the name of Esaias for the name of Malachias because, as he wrote, another name did not then occur to him: yet it is not credible that he was so unskilled as not to know that Malachias spoke not of John the Baptist but of the prophet Elias (Helia) — as his words below, in the fourth chapter, pronounced to the same purpose, attest, namely: "Behold, I will send to you Elias the prophet, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come; [7] and he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the sons, and the hearts of the sons to their fathers." Which words show that the prophet spoke not of the coming of John — who is read to have come at the first coming of Christ in the flesh — but of the coming of the prophet Elias on the last day of judgment, which in the scriptures is called the great and terrible day of the Lord.

2. And lest perchance the end of this gospel should disagree with its own exordium, the depravers of the scriptures therefore added at its heel (in calce) all that which is now read in the last chapter of this gospel concerning the resurrection and ascension of the Lord. And that this chapter was not written by Mark can be known from this: first, because in it things contrary to the other evangelists are related concerning the resurrection and apparition of Christ;

[1] Isa. 11 (Esa. 2 — recte 11).

[2] Osee 11; Jerome in the prologue to the Pentateuch (Ose. 11; Hier. in prol. pentateu.).

[3] Jerome, in the commentary upon Osee, ch. 11, and in the commentary upon Matthew, ch. 2 (Hier. in com. super Os. cap. 11 & in co. super Matth. cap. 2).

[4] Jer. 31 (Hier. 31).

[5] Mar. 1.

[6] Mal. 3.

[7] Mal. 4 (Mal. 4).

(printed p. 591 [PDF p. 596] — Heresy III: objections 2–3 end; the Dilutio begins.)

secondly, because, as Jerome hands down in the third Question to Hedibia, that last chapter is found in none of the ancient Greek codices; thirdly, because Jerome and many of the ancient fathers reject the testimony of this chapter as of uncertain authority. For thus Jerome writes of this last chapter of the gospel in the aforesaid place: "We do not receive this testimony of Mark, which is related in rare gospels — almost all the books of Greece not having this chapter at the end — especially since it seems to narrate things diverse from and contrary to the other evangelists."

3. And the things which are placed between the beginning and the end of this gospel are related so preposterously, confusedly, and inordinately, that what Matthew the evangelist writes as said or done earlier, this one commemorates as though done later; and contrariwise, what Matthew narrates as having happened much later, this one places long before — no account being kept of times or of things done. Whence it is easily judged that this gospel was not first digested in this order by Mark, but rather according to the order and disposition of Matthew, whose abbreviator Mark was — as Augustine attests in the books On the Concord of the Evangelists — and whose gospel he contracted into a compendium, with the style of Matthew imitated so closely that Erasmus, in his Apology against Albert, Prince of Carpi, wrote that the writer of both was the same — namely, of the Gospel of Mark and of Matthew; but that afterward, after some time, by the negligence of copyists or the malice of heretics, it was tossed up and down and heaped together without any order. Thus far the Anabaptists.

DILVTIO [The Dissolution]

1. Answering them, we say first that their argument is not new, but was objected to the Christians many ages ago by Porphyry, and noted in the fourteenth book of his volumes; [1] whom the divine Jerome meeting, says the argument can be dissolved in two ways (bifariam): in one way indeed, that — according to the judgment of the ancient ecclesiastical [writers] — we say Mark therefore attributed that testimony to Esaias, because immediately after it there followed that other testimony of Esaias, taken from his fortieth chapter, namely: [2] "The voice of one crying in the desert: prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight his paths." Wherefore, since Mark had made one body out of those two testimonies, he cited the whole of it under the name of Esaias. Which Paul also, writing to the Romans, once did: in which place, when he had woven that testimony out of Deuteronomy, and the thirteenth psalm, and certain other places of scripture — "All have turned aside, they are together become unprofitable," down to that place, "there is no fear of God before their eyes" — he cited the whole as if from the psalm; [3] although those words from the verse "Their throat is an open sepulchre" as far as the verse "There is no fear of God before their eyes" are not had in the Hebrew. And in the other way it can be solved thus: that we say the name of Esaias was added by the fault of copyists, since previously it was not there. For it is likely that unskilled copyists, by the nearness of the two testimonies — which were two — could easily be deceived into believing that there was only one testimony, and hence set upon them the name of Esaias, perhaps better known to them. Nor yet does it follow from this that the whole Gospel of Mark is suspect of corruption and contamination because a single word was added from the imprudence of copyists: for [a word] added or subtracted diminishes nothing of the truth of the text. Whence also the Greek codices read the citation of this testimony diversely: some, namely the more recent, the name of Esaias being removed, read ὡς γέγραπται ἐν τοῖς προφήταις, "As it is written in the prophets"; but the more ancient — as Epiphanius cites, in the second book Against Heresies [4] — read ὡς γέγραπται ἐν τῷ Ἠσαίᾳ προφήτῃ, "as it is written in Esaias the prophet." With whom also agrees the most ancient Greek exemplar of the Vatican Library, written out in majuscule letters.

Now as to what the wicked Anabaptists subjoin — that the testimony of Malachias is to be understood not of John the Baptist but of Elias — it is a comment [fabrication] and fable of the Jews of our time, who understand by "the angel [messenger] sent before the face" that same angel whom immediately after Malachias calls "the angel of the testament," or of the covenant. [5] Him the Jews think to be Elias, because he had zeal for the covenant of circumcision; and hence, whenever they circumcise a boy, at every circumcision they adorn "Elias's chair," thinking that the spirit of Elias goes before the face of the boy to be circumcised, as one zealous for the testament and covenant of circumcision. The Jews also in the time of Jerome interpreted the first part of that vaticination — namely, "Behold, I send my angel before thy face" — of Elias; [6] but the following words — "And presently the Lord the ruler shall come to his temple, and the angel of the testament whom you desire" — they referred to their ἠλειμμένον [anointed one] (that I may use Jerome's word), that is, to their Christ, whom they believed, and still believe, would come at the last time. But Christ our redeemer teaches of whom this prophecy is to be understood — namely, of his own precursor John the Baptist, who played the angel [messenger] in the dignity of his office and in the sanctity of his life — saying: "This is he of whom it is written: Behold, I send my angel before thy face, who shall prepare thy way before thee." Nor does it stand in the way that the Anabaptists, together with the circumcised (recutitis) Jews, say that the prophet Malachias himself declares below that he speaks of Elias, when he says: "Behold, I send to you Elias the prophet" — since the angel in Luke, and Christ in Matthew, expound the same words of John the Baptist. [7] "If you will know it," says Christ, "he himself is Elias who is to come" — [John being] called Elias by similitude, because he came in the power and spirit of Elias; that is, having an equal measure of the Holy Spirit, or grace, or merit, and the same austerity of life and rigor of mind. And as to what is added — that Elias shall come before "the great and terrible day" — it ought to move no one, as though it could not be fitted to John, who came not at the second but at the first coming of Christ: since in the sacred letters "the great and terrible day of the Lord" is wont to be understood not only of the second coming of Christ unto judgment, in which Elias shall come, but also of the first coming of Christ in the flesh, which John preceded. For the first coming of Christ according to the flesh is called the day of the Lord

[1] Chrysostom, in the first chapter of Mark (Chrys. in primum c. Marci); Jerome, on ch. 3 upon Matthew (Hier. 3 c. super Matth.).
[2] Mar. 1; Isa. 40 (Esai. 40).
[3] Rom. 3; Psal. 13.
[4] Haer. 2 (Her. 2).
[5] Mala. 3.
[6] Jerome, book 3 (i.e., commentary) upon Malachias, ch. 3; Matt. 11; Luke 7 (Hier. 3 super Mal. cap.; Matt. 11; Luc. 7).
[7] Luc. 1; Matt. 11.

(printed p. 592 [PDF p. 597] — end of Heresy III; Heresy IIII, on the Gospel of Luke, begins.)

great and terrible — whether on account of the blinding and the terrible ruin of the Hebrews wrought in it, or (as Bede says) on account of the day of the nativity and of the passion of Christ, which by Peter the Apostle, out of the testimony of the prophet Joel, is called "the great and manifest day of the Lord": [1] seeing that when Christ was born a new star shone forth, and when he was crucified the sun was darkened, the moon gave no light, the earth quaked, the rocks were rent, the tombs were opened, and many bodies of the saints that had slept were seen — to the great terror of the onlookers — to run about through the city.

2. As to what pertains to the last chapter of this Gospel: the Anabaptists, as is the custom of heretics, produce Jerome's sentence truncated — the particle "Aut [Either]," which is read at the beginning of his sentence, being removed. For Jerome brought it forth not by way of assertion, but distinguishing the judgment of others from his own, saying: "Either we do not receive the testimony of Mark… or this is to be answered" — namely according to our [his own] judgment. For Jerome could not reject the scripture of this chapter, which he had translated from the Greek, had given to the church to be read, and had approved, a peculiar exposition being even applied to it. And what Jerome subjoined — that this chapter of old was not in the Greek exemplars, and for that reason was rejected by some, because it seemed to contain things contrary to the other Evangelists — he understood not of the whole scripture of this chapter, but of certain apocryphal periods [sentences] of this chapter, sent into certain codices by uncertain authors; which, because they seemed either doubtful or contrary to the other Evangelists, were therefore withdrawn from the Greek codices by the fathers. And this the divine Jerome himself declares, in the second book against the Pelagians, in these words: "In certain exemplars, and chiefly in the Greek codices according to Mark, at the end of his Gospel it is written: [2] 'Afterwards, when the eleven were at table, Jesus appeared to them, and upbraided their incredulity and hardness of heart, because they had not believed those who had seen him rising again; and they gave satisfaction, saying: This age is the substance of iniquity and incredulity, which suffereth not, through unclean spirits, the true virtue of God to be apprehended: therefore even now reveal thy justice.'" These words, so cited by Jerome, are now had neither in the Greek nor in the Latin codices. And what the Anabaptists adjoin out of Jerome — that this chapter contains things contrary to the other Evangelists concerning the resurrection of the Lord — the same Jerome solves in this manner: [3] "Concerning the apparent contradiction between Matthew and Mark, it is to be answered that both spoke truly: Matthew [speaks of the time] when the Lord rose — on the evening of the sabbath; Mark, when Mary Magdalene saw him — that is, early on the first day after the sabbath (mane primo sabbati). For thus it is to be distinguished:

'When he had risen' — and, the breath being restrained a little, there is to be added — 'early on the first day of the sabbath he appeared to Mary Magdalene'; so that he who, according to Matthew, had risen on the evening of the sabbath, himself, according to Mark, appeared to Mary Magdalene early on the first day after the sabbath. Which indeed John the Evangelist also signifies, demonstrating that he was seen early on the other day." One ought not, therefore, on account of such most trifling causes, to call back into doubt this chapter, which is read in all codices, both Greek and Latin, and which the church, every year in the sacred mysteries, chants concerning the most holy resurrection and ascension.

3. As to what they oppose about the transposed order of things done, and the rash conjecture of Erasmus — namely, that the author of the gospels of Matthew and of Mark is the same — it is most false. For that Matthew wrote his own Gospel in Hebrew has been proved above; but that Mark also wrote his own, Irenaeus, Clement, Eusebius, and very many other fathers attest — but especially Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men, writes thus of Mark: "Mark, Peter's son in baptism and disciple and interpreter in the divine word, who — according as he had heard Peter relating — being asked by the brethren, wrote a brief Gospel; which when Peter had heard, he approved it, and by his own authority published it to be read by the church, as Clement writes in the sixth book of the ὑποτυπώσεων [Hypotyposes]."

But concerning the order, we say that this Gospel was written by Mark in the same series of narration in which it is now read: for he cared not for the order of times, but only for the truth of the narration — even as Papias, the disciple of John the Apostle, attests in the books of the Explanation of the Lord's Words; whose words Eusebius recites in the third book of the Ecclesiastical History in this manner: [4] "Mark was the interpreter of Peter, and whatever he remembered as said by him he wrote down; yet he did not digest in order the things that were said or done by the Lord: because he himself was neither a hearer of the Lord nor a follower, but at the last, as I said, adhered to Peter — [who taught] for the use and ministry of preaching, not for the writing-out of the Lord's discourses. And so Mark sinned nothing in this, that he wrote certain things thus, as one who seemed to recall things heard piecemeal (sparsim). And this alone he took sufficient care of: to omit nothing of what he had heard, nor to write anything false." This defense by Papias, on behalf of the order not kept by Mark, is enough to stop the profane mouths of the heretics, who bark against the order passed over by Mark.

OF THE GOSPEL OF LUKE — Heresy IIII (De Lucae Evangelio haeresis IIII)

To withdraw from the Gospel of Luke certain things added by falsifiers; and to restore certain things subtracted by the same.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

This is the heresy of Cerdon, of Marcion, and of the Anabaptists; in which indeed Marcion and Cerdon so differ from Cerinthus, Merinthus, and Carpocrates, that as those cast away the Gospel of Luke entirely, so these — the other Gospels being rejected wholly — receive the Gospel of Luke alone. For so Irenaeus in book 1, Tertullian in the book On Heresies, Philastrius in the Catalogue, and Epiphanius relate of them. [5] But Marcion and Cerdon, though they profess this Gospel alone, yet do not accept it entire, but everywhere adulterated, mutilated, amputated — having neither beginning, nor middle, nor end — most like a garment gnawed by moths. Whose depravations, additions, subtractions, and other vices of this kind Epiphanius, in a very long digression which he calls the Pavement (Pavimentum), most broadly [6]

[1] Joel 2; Acts 2 (Ioel. 2; Act. 2).

[2] Mark, last chapter (Mar. vlt.).

[3] Jerome to Hedibia, question 3 (Hier. ad Heldibiam q. 3).

[4] Book 3 of the Ecclesiastical History, ch. 39 (Lib. 3 hist. eccle. c. 39).

[5] ch. 45; book 1, heresy 42 (Cap. 45; li. 1 her. 42).
[6] Book 1, heresy 42 (Lib. 1 adu. her. 42).

(printed p. 593 [PDF p. 598] — Heresy IIII: the catalogue of Marcion's depravations of Luke; the Anabaptists' objections begin.)

has set out, confuting in it whatever things had been adulterated and changed by Marcion. That digression, reduced into a compendium more briefly and more distinctly, we have judged should be inserted in this place — not indeed because it much matters to know depravations of Marcion of this sort, but so that the studious of the divine letters may understand, from the confutations of Epiphanius which we have set beside each depravation of Marcion according to the order of the numbers, by what way and with what craft adulterated and corrupted scriptures may be detected [as distinct] from the sincere and uncontaminated ones, and by what arguments depravers of the scriptures of this kind — very like to the Marcionists and the Anabaptists — may be refuted. And they are these, which are here subjoined through the order of the chapters of the gospel:

THE PLACES DEPRAVED BY MARCION IN LUKE (Loca a Marcione in Luca depravata)

1. In the first chapter of Luke he straightway rejected the proem at the beginning, together with those things which are contained in the whole first and second chapter: of Zacharias and Elisabeth, of the conception of John the Baptist, of the nativity of Mary, of Christ's nativity in Bethlehem, of the circumcision of Christ and his presentation in the temple, and his finding in the temple in the midst of the Doctors. All these he cut away, the beginning of the gospel being made from the exordium of the third chapter: [1] "In the fifteenth year of the empire of Tiberius Caesar"; and according to the series of the gospel he so persevered as far as the beginning of the eighth chapter, with few and almost no words changed.

2. In the eighth chapter he has not: "And there came to him his mother and his brethren," and, "My mother and my brethren are they who hear the word of God, and do it."

3. In the tenth chapter, where it is said, "I confess to thee, Lord, Father of heaven and earth," he has neither "Father" nor "of earth."

4. In the eleventh chapter the history of Jonas, Ninive, the Queen of Saba, and Solomon is rejected.

5. Likewise concerning the same [chapter]: the judgment of God being passed over, he has "the vocation [calling] of God."

6. In the same place he has not "therefore said the Wisdom of God, I will send to them prophets," nor [the words] concerning the blood of Zacharias, of Abel, and of the prophets.

7. In the twelfth he has not: "Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is set in oblivion before God?"

8. In the same place, for "I will confess him before the Angels of God," he reads "before God."

9. In the same place he has not: "God clothes the grass, which is cast into the oven."

10. In the same place, for "your Father," he reads "Father," "your" being cast away.

11. In the same place, for "the second and third watch," he has "the evening watch."

12. From the thirteenth chapter he cut away that: "There came certain men, telling him of the Galilaeans, whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices," as far as where he says, "of the ten and eight, upon whom the tower fell in Siloa."

13. Likewise from the same chapter he cut off: "When you shall see Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God"; and for this he put: "When you shall see all the just in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves cast out" — he made it — "held out of doors: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

14. Likewise he cut away: "They shall come from the East and the West," and what remains of that chapter as far as the end.

15. From the fifteenth chapter he cut off the whole parable of the prodigal son.

16. In the seventeenth chapter he amputated that: "Say: we are unprofitable servants."

17. In the eighteenth chapter, where it is said, "None is good but God alone," he added "the Father"; and for "thou knowest the commandments (Mandata nosti)," he made "I know (novi)."

18. Likewise he amputated: "When Jesus had taken the twelve, he said: Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and all things shall be consummated which were written through the prophets concerning the son of man; for he shall be delivered up, and shall be killed, and the third day he shall rise again."

19. In the nineteenth chapter he cut away the history of the Ass and Bethphage, and of the destruction of the city and of the temple, as far as the end of the chapter.

20. From the twentieth chapter he cast away the parable of the vineyard let out to husbandmen.

21. Likewise, in the same place, he amputated this: "But that the dead rise again, Moses also showed, saying: the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob."

22. From the twenty-first chapter he cut away: "Then let those who are in Judaea flee to the mountains," and the rest, as far as, "that the things which have been said may be fulfilled."

23. From the twenty-second chapter he drew off that: "For I say to you, I will not eat it hereafter, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God."

24. Likewise that: "When I sent you without purse, and scrip, and shoes, was anything wanting to you?"; and this which is written: "that which is written must yet be accomplished [in me], namely: And he was reckoned with the wicked."

25. Likewise he cut off the deed of Peter amputating the ear of the servant.

26. From the twenty-third chapter, to that which it says — "We have found this man perverting the nation" — he added, "and destroying the law and the Prophets"; and after that, "forbidding tribute to be given to Caesar," he set in besides, "and turning away the women and children."

27. Likewise that: "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise."

28. From the twenty-fourth chapter he changed what was said to the disciples: "O foolish and slow of heart to believe all the things which the prophets have spoken — ought not Christ to have suffered these things?"; and for that which it says, "which the Prophets have spoken," he made, "which I have spoken to you." These are the things which Marcion corrupted out of the gospel of Luke, the rest remaining with him entire and without any depravation.

But the Anabaptists of our time — they too babble something or other against this gospel of Luke: namely, that it has fallen away from its ancient sincerity, and now stands otherwise than it once stood — moved by certain frivolous indications, scarcely worthy to be related, of which:

1. The first is: that whereas Moses numbers ten generations from the deluge, or from Noe, as far as Abraham, [2] yet in the third chapter of this gospel eleven generations — the generation of Cainan being added — are related from the deluge to Abraham. Which indeed is to be believed to have happened not by the fault of the evangelist, but by the vice of a falsifier.

2. The second is taken from a certain testimony of Epiphanius, who, in the first book, in the forty-second heresy, speaking of those words which are contained [3]

[1] Luc. 3.
[2] Gen. 11.
[3] Luke 20 f (the book-name is ink-blotted in the print; the passage cited is Luke 20).

(printed p. 594 [PDF p. 599] — Heresy IIII: the Anabaptists' indications; the Rules for detecting falsified scriptures; the Confutatio begins.)

in the twentieth chapter of this gospel — namely, "But that the dead rise again, Moses also showed beside the bush, when he says: the Lord God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; for God is not the God of the dead but of the living: for all live to him" — says that in the codices of the Catholic church these words are replicated twice in the same chapter. Yet these words are now read only once, in our vulgate edition, Greek as well as Latin: from which it appears that those words were subtracted either by Marcion himself — as Epiphanius charges upon him — or by some other corrupter. And the same Epiphanius, in the book which he entitled Ancoratus, commemorating that place of Luke in the nineteenth chapter, "Jesus, seeing the city, wept over it," [1] hands down that that word, "wept over it," was removed from the text by catholics, as being doubtful and not agreeing well.

The third indication is deduced from certain words of Jerome — that he, in the second book against the Pelagians, seems to signify that the history of the angel appearing in the garden for Christ's consolation, which is had in the 22nd chapter of Luke, was not in the ancient exemplars of the church. For Jerome says in that book: "In certain codices, Greek as well as Latin, there is found, Luke writing: There appeared to him an angel from heaven, comforting him" — no doubt, the Lord the Savior. Which words, had they been in all the exemplars of the church, Jerome need not have said that those words are read in certain codices, but in all. And Hilary, in book X On the Trinity, affirms much more openly that not only the consolation of the Angel, but also the history of Christ sweating blood, is not had in the gospel — in these words: "Nor indeed must we be ignorant that in very many codices, both Greek and Latin, nothing is found written of the angel coming, or of the bloody sweat. It being therefore in doubt whether this be wanting in the various books or superfluous, this remains uncertain to us from the diversity of the books." By these most trifling conjectures the fanatical Anabaptists are led.

Before we meet them, it remains that we see in what manner it can be shown that the aforesaid places of Marcion were falsified by him — so that from the confutation of these, the other falsifiers of the scriptures may be convicted concerning the corruption of any codex whatever. And that this may be done more conveniently, we shall set down certain rules, exceedingly necessary for the discerning of falsifiers, which we have briefly collected, scattered as they were through the many and long confutations of Epiphanius. And they are these:

Rules whereby sincere scriptures may be detected from the adulterated scriptures of heretics, and the latter refuted (Regulae, quibus syncerae scripturae ab adulteratis haereticorum scripturis deprehendantur, ac redarguantur)

1. RULE. If any things exist in the codices of the heretics beyond those which are in the catholic codices, and those very things fight either with the antecedent or with the subsequent words preserved in the heretics' codices, it is necessary that they were added or altered by the heretics.

Expositio [Exposition]. As in that place of Luke, chapter 24: "O foolish and slow of heart to believe all things which the prophets have spoken" — in which Marcion's exemplar, for that which we read, "which the prophets have spoken," has: "which I have spoken to you." It manifestly appears that it was altered by falsifiers, from the repugnance of the words to what precedes and follows: in which it is said that Christ did not offer himself to be recognized by the disciples on the way until he had arrived in Emmaus. Christ therefore could not say, "which I have spoken to you," since neither had he yet revealed himself to them, nor did they recognize him for Christ except in the breaking of bread — as Marcion's own codex attests.

2. RULE — the converse of the foregoing. If certain of the things which our codices have are lacking in the exemplars of the heretics, and they follow necessarily upon the preceding, or [connect] with the subsequent — so that without them the later things cannot be knit to the earlier — the consequence is that they were drawn away by the heretics. Or if the things that are lacking have the same sense or the same argument [as the retained context], let the judgment be the same.

Expositio. As when Marcion drew off from his exemplar, out of the 12th chapter of Luke, those words: "Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is in oblivion before God?" — he is refuted from the antecedents and consequents preserved in his own codex. For if he concedes the antecedents — that God has care of all things — and the sequents — that the hairs of our head are numbered — he is compelled also to confess that the sparrows fall under divine providence, which is of the same argument.

3. RULE. If anything in the codices of the heretics either abounds that favors their dogmas, or is lacking that fights against the same, it appears that it was either superadded by the heretics as propitious to their dogmas, or drawn away as contrary and hostile to the same.

Expositio. As when in Marcion's codex, in the 13th chapter of Luke, that is not found: "when you shall see all the prophets in the kingdom of God" — it is plain that this was drawn off by Marcion, because it stands against him, who reprobates all the patriarchs and prophets. Similarly, when there is found added in Marcion that [saying] concerning Christ, namely, "destroying the law and the prophets," it appears that this was done by that impostor in support of this same error of his.

4. RULE. If, a collation of exemplars being made, the codices of the heretics are found in no wise to agree with the codices of the catholic church, it appears that the codices of the heretics are not sincere.

Expositio. Than this last rule, among catholics and the pious, none can be more certain and more safe; and it alone can suffice to confirm a sincere and pious mind. Nevertheless, because the heretics contemn the codices of the catholic church with the same facility with which they contemn the church herself, therefore against them one must proceed also by the three preceding rules. We shall set about, therefore, according to the aforesaid rules, to refute the impostures of Marcion according to the assigned series of the numbers.

CONFVTATIO [The Confutation]

First, from the third rule it is openly known that the two first chapters of Luke were cut away on purpose:

[1] Luc. 19 g.

(printed p. 595 [PDF p. 600] — Heresy IIII: the Confutatio of Marcion's 28 depravations; answer to the Anabaptists begins.)

because in them the authority of the old law is confirmed — namely, in Zacharias, Elisabeth, John the Baptist, the circumcision of Christ, the purification of Mary, and the bringing of the boy into the temple — all which things destroy the dogma of Marcion, who denies the Law and the Prophets.

The second place is refuted from the second rule: because, since he has conceded the genealogy of Christ's progenitors, he is compelled also to concede that Christ had a mother on earth, and could also have brethren. But Marcion seems to have scraped away (abrasisse) these words because he thought some absurdity was contained in them — which is not so. For although Christ, in the words immediately following, may seem to be displeased with those who had announced that his mother and brethren stood without, yet he said this not as denying his mother and brethren according to the flesh, but as turning aside the unseasonable speech of him who said this while so great a crowd stood around, poured out toward his saving doctrine, and he himself was occupied about preaching and healings. For he who said, "Behold, thy mother and thy brethren stand without," seemed to call Jesus away from the business he had undertaken. [1]

Thirdly, when he casts away that word "Father," he is confuted by the same rule: because immediately below he has: "even so, Father, for so it was well-pleasing before thee." And when he cut off that word, "of earth," he is convicted from the third rule: because he denies that God, the Father of Christ, is the founder of heaven and earth.

The fourth, fifth, and sixth places are detected as falsified from the third rule: inasmuch as they confirm the authority of the Old Testament, reprobated by Marcion.

The seventh is refuted from the second rule: because in the antecedents and consequents he confesses that divine providence is extended even over the hairs of our head.

The eighth, ninth, and tenth places are refuted from the fourth rule: because it is not so read in the exemplars of the catholic church.

The eleventh place is refuted from the first rule: for the watches are not of the day but of the night, having their progress from evening to morning, and not from morning to evening.

The twelfth is reprobated from the third rule: because Christ, consenting to the judgment of Pilate, shows himself to be the judge of all — which Marcion denies.

The thirteenth and fourteenth places are confuted from the third rule: for they destroy Marcion's dogma, [being] contrary to the law and the prophets.

The fifteenth place is refuted from the fourth rule: because that parable is read in the codices of the catholic church.

The sixteenth place is reconvicted from the second rule: because it teaches the rule of humility, lest the faithful, through elation of mind, lose the reward of their works; and such rules are read everywhere in Marcion's own gospel codex.

The seventeenth is argued from the fourth rule.

The eighteenth is refuted from the second rule: because from the consequents of his own codex he admits that Christ was crucified; he is compelled therefore to confess that it is not false which we have in our exemplars — that Christ, going up to Jerusalem, foretold to his disciples his passion and death.

The nineteenth is overturned from the third rule: because Christ there, against the dogma of Marcion, approves the temple and the worship of the old law, saying: "My house shall be called the house of prayer."

The twentieth is cast down from the third rule: because Christ in the parable of the Vineyard attests that the fathers of the Hebrews were the church of God, and cites the testimony of the psalms out of the Old Testament — all which things subvert Marcion's dogma concerning the Old Testament.

The twenty-first is convicted from the third rule: because it favors the patriarchs of the Old Testament, reprobated by Marcion.

The twenty-second is driven off from the third rule: because it favors the prophets, whom Marcion denies.

The twenty-third is confuted from the second rule: because a little below, in Marcion's own text, there is read: "I dispose to you, that you may eat and drink at my table."

The twenty-fourth is detected from the third rule: because it is against his dogma concerning the reprobation of the Old Testament.

The twenty-fifth is rejected from the fourth rule: because the catholic codices have it.

The twenty-sixth is exploded from the third rule: for he set this beside [the text] because it favored his dogma of the reprobation of the law.

The twenty-seventh is confuted from the fourth rule.

The twenty-eighth is argued from the first rule: because if Christ had not yet revealed himself to his disciples, how can he say, "which I have spoken to you"?

Let these things be said against Marcion. Now, passing to those petty indications of the Anabaptists, we answer briefly: that from one or two places — and those changed only as to the words, and not as to the sense — it must not be concluded that the gospel of Luke which the church now holds embraces anything of falsity or of perverse alteration. For what does it harm either faith or morals, if the words cited by Epiphanius are related either once only, or twice, in the same chapter? Surely nothing: for the same testimony of Christ, expressed once, has the same force and efficacy as if it were repeated twice, and thrice, and even a thousand times. Nor is it any wonder if our exemplar has once what in the codex of Epiphanius was read twice; for it is possible that it so stood in the codex of Epiphanius, and in certain others also, as he himself relates — which perhaps was not had in other Greek codices. It is credible, moreover, that those fathers to whom the office of revising the scriptures (recognoscendi scripturas) was committed by the catholic church judged that this place had not been written down twice by the evangelist, but had been repeated once and again through the imprudence and carelessness of a copyist (as very often happens); and accordingly that they removed this place set down the second time, as superfluous, so that thereafter it should be read only once in this chapter. Similarly, of that place also concerning the weeping of Christ, the same Epiphanius attests that it was not taken away from all the codices by catholics, but was always retained in the corrected exemplars; and by the divine Irenaeus, in the books against he-

[1] Matth. 12.

(printed p. 596 [PDF p. 601] — end of Heresy IIII; Heresy V, on the Gospel of John, begins.)

resies, [that place] is cited — although some unskilled catholics rashly (inconsulto) drew it out of certain codices, being ignorant of the end and force of that word.

But as regards the other indication, we answer that although in certain codices the words of the angelic consolation were not present, and Jerome and Hilary, or some other one of the fathers, was uncertain about them, yet the truth of this history is not now on that account to be doubted. For we know that the canonical scriptures are not only those of which the fathers never doubted, but those also concerning which there was once controversy in the churches, and which afterward — the matter being more diligently examined — were received by the common authority of the whole church. Of which number is the present history; which, though it was once somewhat doubted of among the ancients, at length was received by the unanimous assent of all the churches, and those rejecting it were condemned with anathema — as may be seen in Athanasius, book 6 On the Beatitude of the Son of God, where among the rest this anathematism also is read: "If anyone shall deny that the true man whom the Son of God assumed sweated blood, anathema to him." And Epiphanius brings in and expounds this whole history against the heretics in the book Ancoratus.

Finally, to that concerning the added generation of Cainan, we say that the evangelist himself added it out of the edition of the Seventy, although it was not had in the Hebrew truth. But why he did this, it is better reverently to admire than anxiously to inquire — after the example of Bede, writing in the preface of the Acts of the Apostles in this manner: "Most of all (says he) do I marvel, and, on account of the slowness of my wit, stricken with the most vehement stupor, I know not how to search out, for what reason — whereas in the Hebrew truth ten generations are found from the deluge to Abraham — Luke himself, who with the Holy Spirit guiding his pen could in no wise write what is false, preferred to set down in the gospel eleven generations according to the Seventy interpreters, Cainan being added." But if an admiration of this kind by Bede should not quite satisfy anyone, at least the judgment of Aloysius [Lippomano], bishop of Verona, will not be despised by him; who, writing on this matter in the Catena upon Genesis, says it could have come to pass that Moses, moved by instinct of the divinity, passed over the generation of Cainan — which Luke set down in the gospel, and the Seventy received into the catalogue of the posterity of Sem, Genesis chapter 11 — and for a reason hidden from us passed by the name of Cainan in silence; just as the Evangelist Matthew also wrapped in taciturnity the names of certain men in the Genealogy of our Savior. And let these things about the gospel of Luke be enough.

OF THE GOSPEL OF JOHN — Heresy V (De Evangelio Ioannis haeresis V)

That the Gospel which is carried about according to John, for the very reason that it is in no wise John's, is not to be received; or, if it is to be received as John's, it must be believed that it is contaminated in many places by falsifiers.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

The first part of this heresy is counted by Philastrius among the anonymous heresies. For thus he writes in his Catalogue: [1] "After these there are heretics who do not accept the gospel Κατὰ Ἰωάννην [according to John] and his Apocalypse; and since they do not understand the virtue of the scripture, nor desire to learn, they remain in heresy, perishing — so that they even dare to say that it is Cerinthus the heretic's; and likewise that the Apocalypse is not of the blessed John the evangelist and apostle, but of Cerinthus the heretic." And Augustine, in the book On Heresies, chapter thirty, says that these heretics were once called Alogi — that is, "without the word" (for λόγος in Greek means "word") — because they would not receive the gospel of John, in which the Word of God is described. And Epiphanius first imposed this name upon them; who, writing against them, speaks of them thus: [2] "The Alogi therefore say — that is, those brutish men, and lacking the word (for I impose this appellation on them, and from this day they shall be so called, and thus, O dearest ones, let us impose the name on them): since they do not receive the word preached by John, they shall be called Alogi, that is, without the word." And in the very next words he adds that these Alogi affirm that the gospel of John which we now have was put forth by Cerinthus under the name of John. After these Alogi, as Epiphanius relates in the same book, [3] Theodore of Byzantium, the leather-worker (coriarius), succeeded in the same error, who defended the first part of this heresy. But the second part of this heresy Faustus of old with his Manichaeans, and now the Anabaptists of our times, defend — denying that the gospel of John is had among us entire, inviolate, and intact, such as its first author once wrote it; and this by the fault of falsifiers, who, since they had nothing whence they might conciliate credit to their own dogmas, mixed those things into this gospel, that under the name of John they might find credit with readers.

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

But it is not very difficult to confute the defenders of the first assertion — the Alogi. For how (as Epiphanius says) shall this gospel be Cerinthus's, [4] which utterly overturns the whole doctrine of Cerinthus? For Cerinthus preaches Christ as a recent and bare man; but John preaches him as the sempiternal Word, God always existing with God, and at the last born temporally according to the flesh. Again — what cause could or should have moved Cerinthus to inscribe a gospel written by himself with another's name, whereby he would defraud himself of the honor of his own labor and honor another for his own works? — and especially John the apostle, his enemy, with whom he had implacable enmities, and to whom he knew himself to be so hateful on account of his heresy that John could not bear even the sight and presence of him. For John (as Irenaeus writes), [5] when he had entered the baths at Ephesus for the sake of washing, and had seen Cerinthus there, straightway leapt out unwashed, saying: "Let us flee hence, lest the very baths fall in, in which Cerinthus, the enemy of the truth, is bathing." Finally, why should he inscribe his own gospel with the name of John — he who [strove] utterly [to destroy] John's

[1] ch. 60 (Ca. 60).
[2] Book 2, heresy 51 (Lib. 2 her. 51).
[3] Book 2, heresy 54 (Lib. 2 her. 54).
[4] Book 2, heresy 51 (Lib. 2 her. 51).
[5] Book 3, ch. 3 (Lib. 3 cap. 3).

(printed p. 597 [PDF p. 602] — Heresy V: the Impugnatio ends; the heretics' objections 1–5.)

gospel he denies, and besides the Gospel of Matthew — which he called "according to the Hebrews" — rejected every other Gospel, as we have said above? From these things, therefore, the Alogi are convicted. And as for the Anabaptists, they will be sufficiently refuted by us if, when they have produced the things which they calumniate as adulterated in this Gospel, we show those same things to be entire and in every part intact.

OBIECTIONES HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

1. First then (as it is had from Epiphanius), the Alogi said this Gospel was unworthy to be read in the church, because it is insufficient, diminished, disordered (incompositum), and having no [orderly] sequence of things done. [1] Its author, Cerinthus, passed over — as if through ignorance or forgetfulness, or through malice — many things which pertain to the truth of the history. For when he had recounted the eternal generation of the Son of God, saying, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was made flesh," he immediately added that John the Baptist, crying aloud in the desert, proclaims: "This is he of whom I said to you: Behold the lamb of God," and the rest. [2] But he passes over the conception and birth of John the Baptist, and the annunciation of Christ, and his temporal nativity in Bethlehem, his circumcision, and the purification of Mary, the coming of the Magi with gifts to Christ, the boy's flight into Egypt, the slaughter of the infants, the return of Jesus out of Egypt to Nazareth, the exercise of his boyhood under his parents, the Baptism of John together with his sermons (concionibus), and Christ's fast and the diabolical temptations in the desert, and the other things of this sort of which the other evangelists have spoken.

2. But neither does he say things consonant with the other evangelists. [3] For he writes that the first of Christ's miracles was done in Cana of Galilee, when, the wine failing at the marriage, water was turned into wine (for this, says he, is the beginning of the signs of Jesus in Cana of Galilee); [4] whereas Luke recounts another miracle done long before this one, by Christ while yet a boy, when in the twelfth year of his age he displayed his divine wisdom, sitting in the midst of the Doctors and disputing, to the great stupor of all that heard. Again, John relates that the second miracle was put forth by Christ when he healed the paralytic son of the Centurion; [5] but Luke describes many other miracles done by Christ before this. Thus the Alogi.

3. But Faustus asserts that this Gospel is vitiated in various places, but chiefly in the fifth chapter, in which he judges that those words of Christ to the Jews were added by falsifiers: [6] "There is one who accuseth you, Moses, in whom you hope; for if you believed Moses, you would believe me also: for he wrote of me." And Faustus is moved to this judgment of his by these conjectures. First: because if Christ, when the matter seemed more to demand it, did not use the testimony of Moses before the Jews, much less is it to be believed that he called in Moses as witness when he had no need of his patronage. For when he had called himself the light of the world, and the Jews, indignant, cried out against him — "Thou givest testimony of thyself; thy testimony is not true" — then most of all the place demanded that he should say that Moses had prophesied of him; [7] which nevertheless he did not do, but, as having no testimony from Moses, answered as a stranger [to him]: "In your law it is written that the testimony of two men is true. I am one who give testimony of myself, and he who sent me giveth testimony of me." [8] Why then did he pass over the testimony of Moses, which above all would have been more opportune to that cause? Secondly: it is not likely that the Jews could have kept silence when Christ said that Moses had written of him, but that straightway — being, as they were, malignant and astute — they would have asked what that might be which he thought was written of him by Moses. Whence this taciturnity of theirs signifies that Jesus said no such thing. Thirdly — what moves more — is this: that in Moses there is found no vaticination or testimony concerning Christ. For if Moses wrote anything of Christ, certainly it is that (as we [Manichaeans] say): "A Prophet will I raise up to them from the midst of their brethren, like unto thee." [9] But that these things in no wise regard Christ is manifest, because Christ is not a prophet like Moses: seeing that the one was man, the other God; the one a sinner, the other holy; the one born of coition, the other — according to you — of a virgin; the one, his God being offended, is slain on the mountain, while the other, well-pleasing to the Father, suffers of his own will. Since therefore Moses foretold nothing of Christ, the consequence is either to pronounce that chapter false, or to judge — which is impious (nephas) — that Jesus, the author of truth, lied. Thus Faustus.

4. After him the Anabaptists complain that many things have been superadded in this same Gospel; and among the rest, the history of the adulterous Woman taken in adultery, written in the eighth chapter of John — which many ancient fathers attest was formerly by no means in this Gospel. And first of all Eusebius, in the third book of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 39, speaking of Papias, has these words: "Papias subjoins a certain history concerning an adulterous woman, who was accused by the Jews before the Lord. Moreover, this parable is had written in the Gospel which is called 'according to the Hebrews.'" These words show that not only in the times of Papias, but long after, this history was not in the Gospel of John, but in a certain apocryphal Gospel "according to the Hebrews"; otherwise Eusebius would not have called it "a certain [history] out of the Gospel according to the Hebrews," as signifying it little known to him — rather he would have pronounced it certain and undoubted, of the Gospel of John. Jerome likewise, in the second book against the Pelagians, sets down these words concerning this history: "In the Gospel according to John, in many codices both Greek and Latin, there is found [the history] of the adulterous woman, who was accused before the Lord" — signifying by these words that there were many Greek and Latin exemplars which did not have this history. Which the commentaries of the Greeks upon John also indicate: in which, while the other chapters of John are found explained, of this history no mention — much less exposition — is found in them. Whence it is well enough established that it was translated into this Gospel by some audacious fellow out of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which Epiphanius, book 2, attests was composed by Tatian the heresiarch. [10]

5. And the Anabaptists say that the comment [fabrication] of the same audacious man was that history of the sick man lying at the Probatic pond, which the passage in which

---

[1] Epiphanius, book 2, heresy 51 (Epiph. lib. 2 her. 51).
[2] Ioan. 1.
[3] Epiphanius, in the same place (Epiph. ibide.).
[4] Ioan. 2; Luc. 2.
[5] Ioan. 4.
[6] Augustine, book 16 against Faustus, ch. 2; John 5 (Aug. lib. 16 contra Faust. cap. 2; Ioan. 5).
[7] Ioan. 8.
[8] Deut. 17.
[9] Augustine, in the same place, ch. [4]; Deut. 18 (Aug. ibid. c.; Deut. 18).
[10] Epiphanius, book 2, heresy 45 (i.e., 46); Ioan. 5 (Epiph. lib. 2 Her. 45; Ioan. 5).

(printed p. 598 [PDF p. 603] — Heresy V: objection 5 ends; the Dilutio, responses 1–3.)

John writes that it was done renders altogether suspect of falsity: both because in the Old Testament nothing whatever is recorded of this pond with five porches; and because Josephus — the most diligent writer of the Hebrew antiquities, and especially of the three constructions of the temple, namely under Solomon, Zorobabel, and Herod — writes nothing either of the pond or of the water frequently and divinely troubled by an angel. Nor is it likely that Josephus, favoring his own Hebrews beyond measure, would have passed over so signal a favor of the divine goodness toward his fatherland — he who in other matters of lighter moment, and which seemed to make less for the beauty and glory of his city, wrote even to superfluity — if the miracle of so great a thing had taken place, and that in his own time and on his own natal soil. And this suspicion the very explicators of this history increase, while they adorn it the more with certain fabricated appendices, seeking out many things about the place, about the virtue of the place, and the cause of the virtue. Some write that this pond was in the courtyard of the temple; whereas that is read neither in the books of Kings, nor in the books of the sacred Annals [Chronicles], or of Esdras, in which the structure of the earlier as well as of the later temple is described. Others, placing it beside the walls of the city, and contending among themselves about the cause of its virtue, add much more uncertain narrations: of whom Petrus Comestor, the author of the Scholastic History, affirms that the healing virtue was put into the water from the presence of the wood from which afterward the Lord's cross was fabricated; which wood, as it lay in the bottom of this pond, an angel, moved with reverence for that wood, descended from heaven and troubled (agitabat) the water. Now Solomon (he says) had ordered that wood to be sunk in that pond many ages before, the queen of Saba admonishing it, who had foreseen that from that wood the final ruin threatened the city of Jerusalem. But the author of the history of the Lord's cross adds certain fabulous things about Adam and Seth, who first planted this wood, being warned by God that in it the sin of them [both] should be blotted out through Christ. Others again, laughing at the fable of this wood, hand down that this virtue was planted in the water not from the wood of the cross, but from the sacred hosts and victims, which, before they were burned on the altar, were washed by the priests in that pond — against that which is written in the fourth chapter of the second of Paralipomenon: that the victims were wont to be washed not in a pond, but in ten bronze basins (conchis) constructed for that work by Solomon. Narrations so various and so uncertain seem to call this whole history back into doubt.

DILVTIO OBIECTORVM [The Dissolution of the Objections]

1. "They are ignorant (says Epiphanius), erring and blinded in mind, the Alogi — of how John, who wrote fourth and last after the other Evangelists, now an old man and an octogenarian, did not care to put forth the things which before him had been honestly (probe) expounded by others, but wished to insist chiefly upon those things which had not been related by them. [1] Wherefore, since he had seen that the eternal generation of the Son of God and the divine colloquies of Christ had not been sufficiently explicated by the others, therefore — his temporal nativity being passed over, together with the other things which the Alogi commemorate — he bent himself wholly to this one thing: to describe Christ, the Son of God, [begotten] from eternity, equal in all things to the Father, against the impious doctrine of Ebion and Cerinthus — beginning his Gospel from the eternal generation of the Word." But perhaps the demented Alogi will say: If he passed over the writing of these things because they had already been abundantly explicated by the other Evangelists, why did he not by the same reasoning pass over many other things also which he wrote of Christ, since of these too the Evangelists before him had treated fully and more than enough? To whom we answer: that this was done, God willing it, for the certitude of the faith and for our salvation — [God] who would not grant to the individual Evangelists that each one of them should recount all things both universally and singly, but so distributed to each of them, in proportion of writing, through parts, that sometimes one would say those same things which another Evangelist had already narrated — so that, from the things which two, or three, or four had said consonantly and equally, they might show that they had received from one and the same fountain of truth; and sometimes one would pass by certain things in silence and leave them, which another by explication would supply — lest perchance, if we had all the things that are written of Christ in one or two Evangelists, we should disdain the other Evangelists as repeating the same things superfluously, and, embracing only those who had written out everything, should neglect the labor of the other Evangelists as useless and superfluous. And in this manner that holy four-horsed chariot (quadriga) of the Evangelists would be dissolved, which the Lord willed to be indissoluble. Therefore, that it might remain indissoluble, he so tempered the harmony of the Gospels themselves that the narration of one cannot stand without the narration of another, but from all joined together at once there results the most consonant and most perfect history of our salvation. In vain therefore do the irrational Alogi complain of the things which by John — through the will of the Spirit — were passed over, or were narrated together with the other Evangelists.

2. But it is ridiculous and futile what they oppose to John — that he writes things contrary to the other Evangelists — since there is no contradiction between him and Luke. For John does not say that that miracle of the marriage was absolutely the first of all Christ's miracles, but the first sign which Jesus did after his baptism and the taking-up of his disciples; [2] meanwhile not denying that many miracles were also done by Christ before his baptism — of which Luke described that one which was done by Christ, yet a boy, in the temple, together with many others — for the confuting of the heresy of those who deny that Jesus was God before his baptism, but affirm that he was then first deified when, he being baptized, the Spirit, the heavens being opened, with the paternal voice attesting, descended upon him. In like manner is solved what they object about the Centurion's boy: that John did not say this was the second miracle of Christ after the disciples were taken up, but the second after he had removed from Judaea into Galilee — the Evangelist himself saying: "This again is the second sign that Jesus did, when he was come from Judaea into Galilee." [3]

3. Further, not less feeble and nerveless is the argument which Faustus brings against the fifth chapter of John, saying that Christ ought then to have used the testimony of Moses — if he had known anything attested of himself by Moses — when the Jews objected to him that he [4]

[1] Epiphanius, book 2, heresy 51 (Epiph. lib. 2 her. 51).
[2] Ioan. 2.
[3] Ioan. 4.
[4] Ioan. 5.

(printed p. 599 [PDF p. 604] — Heresy V: Dilutio, responses 3–5; the Probatic pond defended.)

gave testimony of himself. For if we diligently inspect what Christ then answered the Jews, we shall see that he brought forth a grand testimony about himself out of Moses. [1] For when he said, "In your law it is written that the testimony of two is true; I am one who give testimony of myself, and there giveth testimony of me the Father who sent me" — what else did this sound like, to those who understood rightly, than that that number of witnesses was consecrated in the law of Moses by the prophetic spirit, and commended by Moses, that even thus the future revelation of the Father and of the Son might be fore-announced — of whom the Spirit is, in that inseparable Trinity, the Holy Spirit? [2] But as to what [Faustus] adds — that it is not to be believed that Christ said Moses wrote of him, because if he had said this, the Jews could not have restrained themselves from straightway asking what that might be which was written of him — it is puerile. For just as it could come to pass that, after the miracles they had beheld, the hard infidelity of the Jews remained, so it could come to pass that, when Christ said Moses had written of him, they — fearing in their malignant astuteness whence they might be convicted — would not seek to hear at all what Moses had written of him. [3] And when he subjoins that no testimony is found in Moses which Christ could have produced for himself — because that testimony of Deuteronomy speaks nothing of Christ [4] — he lies most impudently. For there are such and so many testimonies of Christ in the books of Moses (as we shall show in the following book) that Moses plainly wrote nothing which is not referred to Christ as to the last end of the whole law. Nor does that pretty Antithesis avail anything at all, with which he wished as it were to paint and color his muddy discourse, while, comparing Christ to Moses, he strives to show him unlike: as though, when something is called "like," it must be understood as like in every part and in every manner, so that no unlikeness at all should remain between the things that are alike — as happened in Christ, who, the unlikeness of divinity being reserved to himself from Moses, is in this called like Moses: because he was man; because he was made in the likeness of flesh, born of a woman; because he was sent to free the people of God — not from Egypt, but from the captivity of sins; not from Pharao, but from the power of darkness. Like again, because he died by a true death on the mount [of Calvary]; but unlike, because [he was] God, born of the Holy Spirit from a virgin, dead on the mount not for his own sins, but that he might placate the wrath of God, offended by us, bearing the crimes of men in his own body.

4. But let the Anabaptists rave as much as they will: since Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and most of the Greeks attest that this history [of the adulteress] always stood in the ancient codices of the Greeks, just as it now stands in these; and the catholic Church has bestowed on it authority equal with the other chapters of John the Evangelist. Nor, because Papias cited it out of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, is it to be believed that it was not written in the Gospel of John, or that the same is not true because it is read in the Gospel according to the Hebrews: otherwise nothing in the sacred books will be true that is found written in the other scriptures of the nations. Vain are these arguments, and unworthy of response. But they press on: the history is rendered suspect for this reason — that it is produced out of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which is the work of Tatian the heresiarch. But these unskilled men are deceived out of ignorance of the histories. For the Gospel according to the Hebrews cited by Papias, and the Gospel commemorated by Epiphanius, differ much between themselves. For Eusebius, writing of both, says that the Gospel which Papias remembers was of old, in that primeval church, in great authority, and that — although it was not in the canon — the Jews converted to Christ were accustomed to use it; [5] but the other, which Epiphanius relates, put forth by Tatian the heretic, he says was altogether exploded by the church.

But as for that which the same heretics bring forward to shake the credit of the history — namely, that the Greeks do not have this history in their commentaries — I know not whence they could know it, since there are extant in the present age no entire commentaries of the Greeks upon John except those of Chrysostom alone, and of Theophylact and Euthymius, his abbreviators; in which, though that history is not explicated, yet it is not repudiated by them; and it is possible that Chrysostom did expound that history, and that that exposition was afterward drawn out of the codex of Chrysostom by some heretic whom either the history itself, or the explanation of the history, did not please. Concerning the words of Jerome, there is nothing else I care to answer except what we have said elsewhere: that those consecutions are ridiculous — from a particular affirmative to a particular negative — namely: "this history is in many volumes: therefore in many volumes it does not exist." These things are certainly cheap and elementary, unworthy to be answered; but we are to be excused, in that the improbity of the heretics compels us to descend to this pettiness.

5. But who would not laugh at the madness of those men, in that they refuse to believe the history of the languid man at the pond for this reason — that they have read it neither in the Old Testament nor in Josephus? [6] As though the Miracles of Christ were not to be believed by us because Josephus did not write them! "But nothing," say they, "is written of this pond in the Old Testament." We concede that nothing is openly affirmed of it in the Old Testament — but neither is it openly denied. Nay, if we diligently consider the things which are written in the second book of Paralipomenon, the fourth chapter, we shall gather by necessary consecution that there was a certain pond, or receptacle of waters, at Jerusalem in the region which by John is named Probatica [the Sheep-place]. [7] For thus in Greek, says he: ἔστι δὲ ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις ἐπὶ τῇ προβατικῇ κολυμβήθρα ["Now there is at Jerusalem, by the Sheep-gate, a pond"]. This pond perhaps had been built at the lowest roots of the mount which sustained the temple, so that into it might flow all that force of waters which was daily poured out, as much from the brazen Sea in which the priests washed as from the ten basins in which the holocausts were washed. For — to say nothing of the basins — the Sea alone, as is read in the same chapter, held three thousand measures (metretas). It was needful, therefore, that there be certain grand receptacles of waters into which so many vessels might be discharged. With which reasoning the testimony of Aristeas, a most ancient writer, also seems to consent: for he, concerning water-receptacles of this kind serving the temple of Jerusalem, speaks in this manner in the book On the Seventy Interpreters,

[addressed] to Philocrates:

[1] Augustine, book 16 against Faustus, ch. 6 (Aug. lib. 16 contra Faust. cap. 6).
[2] Deut. 17.
[3] Augustine, book 16 against Faustus, ch. 13 (Aug. lib. 16 co. Fau. c. 13).
[4] Deut. 18.
[5] book of the Ecclesiastical History, ch. 25; book 4, ch. 29 (lib. hist. eccl. cap. 25; lib. 4 ca. 29).
[6] Ioan. 5.
[7] 2 Par. 4.

(printed p. 600 [PDF p. 605] — Heresy V concluded; Heresy VI (Acts of the Apostles); Heresy VII (Epistles of Paul) begins.)

(the quotation of Aristeas, begun on the previous page, continues:)

> The receptacles of the waters — which [water] is poured out in great abundance for washing away the blood of the slaughtered victims — are hidden in convenient places. For on feast days many thousands of victims are slain; and indeed so great is the continual flux of the waters led in, that you would think a perennial fountain was overflowing. But more marvelous, and almost unspeakable, is the magnitude of the subterranean reservoirs, which penetrates everything round the whole circuit of the temple for as much as five stadia; and leaden pipes descend to them everywhere through the walls and the floor of the temple, by which all things are washed away and made clean. There are also at the base of the Altar frequent apertures, unknown to all except those who minister, by whose influx and rush all the gore from the multitude of victims is purged. Now the multitude of the waters received we conjectured in this manner: for when they had led us four stadia beyond the city to a certain place, they bade us listen to the sound of the waters flowing together beneath — which to me indeed seemed the confluence of great vessels.*

Thus far Aristeas. From whose words I conjecture that it could easily have come to pass that those waters flowed through hidden pipes into this pool, and again out of it were poured forth through other channels outside the city. But that no mention of this pool was made in the Old Testament is not to be wondered at: because that place, at that time, was not so celebrated as to seem worthy of a particular narration. But after that, in the last times of the Hebrews, it had been made illustrious by the nobility of the miracle, it is verisimilar that the place itself was then first adorned with five porches, for the convenience of the languishing who lay beneath them, awaiting the motion of the water. Wherefore nothing ought to derogate from the faith of the Evangelical history, if the aforesaid authors dissent somewhat among themselves about the site and the virtue of the place — especially since the author of the Scholastic History, in that he reports out of the opinion of others what concerns the wood of the cross, does not himself assert it, but only writes it as a thing learned by fame, and not by certain truth. For us it is enough that this history of the languid man has always stood in all codices, as well Greek as Latin; that it was expounded by the Greek and by the Latin fathers; and that it has been approved by the authority of the whole Church through so many ages. Wherefore there is no cause why we should hereafter call it back into doubt on account of certain empty conjectures of dreaming Anabaptists. And concerning John, thus far.

OF THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES — Heresy VI (De Actis Apostolorum haeresis VI)

Not to receive the Acts of the Apostles.

This heresy Eusebius, in the fourth book of the Ecclesiastical History, attributes — out of the opinion of Irenaeus — to Tatian and to Severus, from whom the Severian heretics were named. [1] Philaster likewise, in his Catalogue, ascribes it to Cerinthus. [2] Augustine, in the book On the Utility of Believing, to Honoratus, assigns the same heresy to the Manichaeans, [3] who for this reason would not accept this book: because its author wrote that the Spirit, the Paraclete, promised by Christ, came on the day of Pentecost — long before the times of Manichaeus, whom they believed to have been that Paraclete Spirit promised by Christ. "But since that book" (says Augustine) "has in itself so many things similar to those which the Manichaeans accept and believe concerning the divine scriptures, it seems to be a mark of great folly that they do not believe and accept this one also." Jerome, in the Catalogue of Illustrious Men, writes that this book was of old corrupted by a certain Asiatic presbyter, saying thus: "Therefore the periodoi [travels] of Paul and of Thecla, and the whole fable of the baptized lion, added to the book of the acts of the apostles, we reckon among the apocryphal scriptures. But Tertullian also, near to the times of the apostles, relates that a certain presbyter in Asia, a σπουδαστὴν [zealous devotee] of the Apostle Paul, was convicted before John of being the author of the book, and confessed that he had done this for love of Paul." In the confutation of this error, therefore, no labor need be expended by me: because, since I have found among no writers any reasons on account of which the heretics cast this book away, there is no need that we make them any answer — save that this heresy of theirs is condemned by the long-continued use of the church, by the approbation of all the fathers, and by the authority of all the Councils — especially that of Laodicea, the third of Carthage, and, last of all, that of Trent — in whose catalogues this book is recounted among the other divine scriptures.

OF THE EPISTLES OF PAUL THE APOSTLE IN GENERAL — Heresy VII (De epistolis Pauli Apostoli in universali. Haeresis VII)

To repudiate the Epistles of Paul the Apostle.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

Under this nefarious heresy there are many errors of heretics. Some reject all the epistles of Paul; and their leader and standard-bearer, as Irenaeus and Eusebius write, [4] was Ebion, poor in understanding (for so his name sounds to the Hebrews); who — since he taught that the whole old law, together with the new, was to be observed by Christians, and perceived that Paul most vehemently cried out against him in this — cast away his epistles altogether, and (as Epiphanius relates) called the Apostle himself, by way of contumely, now "the Tarsian," now "the Greek," now "the Apostate of the law": [5] accusing him that, whereas he was a Greek, and of a Greek father, he went up to Jerusalem; and when he had remained there for some time, he desired to take the daughter of a priest to wife, and for her sake was made a proselyte and likewise circumcised; and then, when he had not obtained the girl, stirred up with wrath, he wrote against circumcision and against the law. To this Ebion there succeeded in error the Helcheseite heretics, in the time of Philippus Augustus, the first Christian Emperor; [6] who, Eusebius being witness, repudiated all the epistles of Paul entirely. There were other heretics who did not dare to reject all the epistles of Paul, but only those which they had recognized as most hostile to their own dogmas: such as the Encratites, the Severians, the Marcionites, the Manichaeans, the Arians, the Aerians, the Anabaptists, and very many other heretics. Of whom the Encratites — whose prince was Tatian, once the hearer of Justin the martyr — rejected the epistles to Titus and to Timothy; [7] Arius, the epistle to the Hebrews;

[1] ch. 29 (cap. 29).
[2] ch. 36 (cap. 36).
[3] ch. 2 (cap. 2).
[4] book 1 against heresies, [ch.] 2; book 3 of the Ecclesiastical [History], ch. 27 (lib. 1 adu. her. 2; lib. 3 eccl. cap. 27).
[5] book 1, heresy 30 (li. 1. hær. 30).
[6] book 6, ch. 27 (lib. 6. ca. 27 — the final digit is ink-clogged; the passage is Eusebius, Hist. eccl., bk. 6, on the Helkesaites).
[7] Eusebius, book 4 of the [Ecclesiastical] History, ch. 29 (Eus. li. 4. hi. cap. 29).

(printed p. 601 [PDF p. 606] — Heresy VII: the assertors continued; the heretics' objections 1–3.)

Marcion, moreover, of Pontus, by fatherland a Sinopean, cast away entirely four out of the fourteen epistles of Paul which the Church has: namely, the two to Timothy, one to Titus, and the other to the Hebrews. [1] Now of those who [receive] some epistles of Paul: some accept those which they receive as entire and incorrupt; but others contend that even those which they receive have been falsified and vitiated in many places — as Marcion, who held those ten epistles of Paul which he accepted to be adulterated in numerous places, mutilated, truncated, and interlarded with very many foreign additions (ascititiis additamentis). And he compacted out of them a certain volume, which he called the Apostolic book; at the end (in calce) of which he added also a certain epistle to the Laodiceans, inscribed with the name of Paul. But those who keep certain epistles uncorrupted and uncontaminated (although they believe them to be Paul the Apostle's, and confess that they have come down to us entire), yet do not accept all the things that are written in them, but reprobate some altogether: as a certain anonymous disciple of Fabritius, against whom Augustine, under the name of "the adversary of the law and the prophets," put forth two books. [2] This man, as the same Augustine relates, said that Paul, according to the qualities of men's wits, spoke under five diverse persons: of which the first was that of the Jews; the second, of those who are under the law; the third, of those who are not under the law; the fourth, of the infirm; and the fifth, of the perfect; and that in the four first persons he said many things which ought not to be received by the perfect. The Aerians also, as Epiphanius notes, [3] distinguishing the sayings of Paul, asserted that he said and wrote certain things full of the Holy Spirit, and that these were to be received without any contradiction; but that some things the same Paul spoke as a bare man, destitute of the Holy Spirit, and these they judged were to be cast away. But since the aforesaid heretics render no causes why they cast away all the Pauline epistles, or why they accept some and spurn others, or why in these epistles these sayings rather than others have been falsified, or why these things were said by Paul according to man rather than according to the Spirit, nothing occurs for us to say against them, except what Jerome writes against these rash men in the preface of the commentaries on Titus: "If they rendered causes" (says he) "why they did not think these epistles to be the Apostle's, and worthy of the Apostle, we should attempt to answer them somewhat, and perhaps satisfy the reader. But now, since they pronounce by heretical authority, and say, 'that epistle is Paul's, this is not,' let them understand themselves to be refuted, for the truth's sake, by that same authority by which they themselves do not blush to counterfeit falsehoods." In like manner we too can speak against all the aforesaid heretics — especially since elsewhere in this work we have shown that there is nothing in the divine scriptures which the holy men of God did not write from the breathing (afflatu) of the Holy Spirit, and that there is nothing in them which can be marked with any suspicion of falsity.

OBIECTIONES HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

1. Faustus contends that the epistles of Paul have been falsified in all those places in which it is read that Christ was made of the seed of David according to the flesh, as is written in the beginning of the epistle to the Romans. [4] "For it is not credible," says he, "that the Apostle of God could write things contrary to himself, and hold now this, now that opinion concerning Christ — so that, writing to the Romans, he should say that Christ was the son of David according to the flesh, [5] and afterward, writing to the Corinthians, should correct that opinion as false, or rather reject it, saying: 'We know no man according to the flesh; and if we have known Christ according to the flesh, yet now we know him no longer.' [6] Wherefore, since there is so great a difference between these two passages (capitula) — that the one affirms Christ to be known according to the flesh, the other not known — it remains either that Paul erred in the first passage, and then in the second, making progress, changed his opinion; or that the epistle of Paul was corrupted by the falsity of those who inserted that first place, and others like it, into the epistles of Paul. But since it is not lawful [to hold] that the Apostle of God destroys what he once built up, it is better to say that the epistle of Paul was vitiated by the depravity of another than that it was made vicious by his own error."

2. But that unnamed disciple of Fabritius added to this calumny of Faustus a much graver blasphemy, saying that there are many things in these epistles to be rejected, in which Paul, accommodating himself to the infirmity of his hearers, brought forth an opinion other than what he really thought. [7] "For it is well known that the Apostle spoke in five persons, according to the qualities of men's wits: for, insinuating the things of God to a people as yet rude, he ought not to have begun from the more perfect things, and — excluding from them their long-accustomed usage (consuetudinem vetustatis) — to commence from the more difficult, lest he should disturb those yet new to the faith with perfect doctrine. Which is proved out of the Apostle's own words, when he says: 'For whereas I was free as to all, I made myself the servant of all, that I might gain the more: and I became to the Jews as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; and to those who are under the law, as if I were under the law, that I might gain those who are under the law; and to those who were without the law, as if I were without the law (though I am not without the law of God), that I might gain those who are without the law. I became to the infirm, infirm, that I might gain the infirm. I became all things to all men, that I might gain all.' [8] To which four persons — namely, one of the Jews; another of those who are under the law; a third of those who are not under the law; a fourth of the infirm — he added also a fifth, the person of the perfect, saying: 'We speak wisdom among the perfect'; [9] indicating by these words that he spoke many things in favor of those whose persons he had assumed, concerning which he thought far otherwise in his heart; and that he often feigned himself to be something other than he was."

3. The Aerians next, and certain other unnamed heretics, whom Jerome recounts in the preface of the commentaries on Titus, [10] contemn many things in the epistles of Paul as said by Paul humanly (humanitus), and not divinely; and among the rest they cast away even the whole epistle of Paul to Philemon — because, even if it be Paul's, yet it has nothing that can edify, since it was written only in the office of a familiar communication, and not for the sake of teaching. They say that the Apostle did not always speak all things with Christ speaking in him; because his human weakness could not have borne always the same tenor of the Spirit; but that there was at times a season in which Paul spoke and acted as a common man, and either spoke something of the necessities of his own poor body (corpusculi),

[1] Jerome, in the preface [of the commentaries] on Titus; Epiphanius, book 1, heresy 42 (Hier. in præ. ad Titum; Epiph. lib. 1. Hær. 42).
[2] book 2 against the adversary of the law, ch. 2 (li. 2. co. adu. legis cap. 2).
[3] book 3, heresy 76 (li. 3. hær. 76).
[4] Augustine, book against Faustus, 11, ch. 1 (Aug. lib. con. Fau. 11. ca. 1).
[5] Roma. 1.
[6] 2. Cor. 5.
[7] Augustine, against the adversary of the law and the prophets, book 2, ch. 2 (Aug. con. ad. leg. & pro. li. 2. cap. 2).
[8] 1. Cor. 9.
[9] 1. Cor. 2.
[10] Jerome, in the preface of the commentaries on Titus (Hier. in præ. com. ad Titu).

(printed p. 602 [PDF p. 607] — Heresy VII: objection 3 concluded; the Dilutio, responses 1–2.)

or acted [as a common man] — as when he arranged a meal, when he took food, was hungry, was filled, digested what he had eaten and evacuated what was spent, and either asked from others the things necessary for his body, or commanded others [to provide them]. For at such times Paul, being as the rest of men, would not have dared to say: "Do you seek a proof of him who speaketh in me, Christ?" and, "I live, now not I: but Christ liveth in me." [1] Nor did they think it any wonder (they added), if Paul at times lived and spoke as a common man, without the Spirit of God, since this is read to have happened in the prophets also: as the scripture says of Ezechiel and the other prophets — "The word of the Lord was made to Ezechiel" [2] — who, after the vaticination was completed, returning again into himself, became a common man out of a prophet; and, except in our Lord Jesus Christ, the Holy Spirit remained permanently in no one — which sign John the Baptist also had received, that upon whomsoever he should see the Holy Spirit descend, and remain upon him, he should know that this was he. [3] From which it is shown that the Holy Spirit indeed descends upon many, but that this is the proper ensign of the Savior — that he remains in him. Therefore in the epistles of Paul (they say) many things were written by him when, destitute of the Holy Spirit, he spoke as a pure man — as those passages indicate which are found scattered throughout them: namely, to the Galatians, "Would that they were even cut off who trouble you"; [4] and to Timothy, "The cloak which I left at Troas, with Cyprus [sic — the print reads apud Cyprum for the Vulgate's apud Carpum, 'with Carpus'], bring with thee when thou comest, and likewise the books and the parchments"; [5] and to Philemon, "Prepare me a lodging," etc. [6] — examples of this sort of human weakness: in which, since no proof of Christ speaking in Paul is recognized, it will be lawful (they say) at one's own judgment either to receive them or to cast them away.

DILVTIO OBIECTORVM [The Dissolution of the Objections]

1. "Something, says Faustus, has been falsified in Paul: because both cannot be true — both what he writes in the epistle to the Romans, and what in the epistle to the Corinthians. [7] Let us then demonstrate that both can be true, and that these two are not contrary to one another. For that one of them is not Paul's we can in no wise say, since in that place the authority of the codices nowhere varies. For although in certain Latin exemplars there is read not FACTVS ['made'] but 'born of the seed of David' — since the Greek [books] have FACTVS, whence the Latin interpreter wished to translate not word for word but according to the sense, saying 'born' — nevertheless, that Christ is of the seed of David according to the flesh, the authority of all books and all tongues agrees. [8] But that Paul at some time erred in this, and afterward, making progress, changed his opinion — far be it from us to say. Neither passage, therefore, is dissonant from the other; but both agree soundly in the same rule of faith. [9] For that the Son of God was made of the seed of David, the same Apostle says in more places than one, and the other holy scriptures most openly proclaim. And as to what he says — 'and if we have known Christ according to the flesh, but now we know him no longer' — the very circumstance of that place of scripture sufficiently shows what the Apostle is speaking of: for after his own manner [he speaks of] our future life, which is already completed in the man Christ himself, the mediator, our head, now risen again; so that with sure hope it is meditated upon, as though it were already present, and held as a thing at hand — which life assuredly will not be according to the flesh, even as the life of Christ is not according to the flesh. For by 'flesh' in this place he wishes to be understood not the very substance of our body — which the Lord even after his resurrection calls flesh, saying: 'Handle and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as you see me to have' [10] — but the corruption and mortality of the flesh, which will not then be in us, as it is now no longer in Christ. We knew Christ, therefore, according to the flesh — that is, according to the mortality of the flesh — before he rose again; but now we no longer know him according to the quality of carnal corruption: because, as the same Apostle says, 'Christ, rising from the dead, now dieth no more, and death shall have dominion over him no longer.' [11] We knew him according to the flesh while he was yet to die; for there was in his body a mortality, which the Apostle properly calls flesh. But now we know him [thus] no more: for that mortal part of him has now put on immortality; whence, according to its former mortality, it can no longer be called flesh. But if Faustus holds himself to the propriety of the words, then Paul lied when he said, 'We knew Christ according to the flesh' — if Christ, as Faustus says, never existed according to the flesh. For no one ever knew what was not. And he did not say, 'we thought Christ according to the flesh,' but, 'we knew.' Nevertheless, not to press upon a word — lest anyone should affirm that the Apostle spoke by abuse [of language], so that for 'we thought' he said 'we knew' — this I marvel that blind men do not attend to (or rather I marvel not that the blind do not see): that if Christ therefore had no flesh because the Apostle said that he now no longer knew Christ according to the flesh, then neither did those men have flesh of whom he says in the same place: 'Therefore henceforth we know no man according to the flesh.' 'Henceforth,' says he, 'we know no man according to the flesh' — that is, we hold so certain a hope of our future incorruption and immortality that henceforth, in the very contemplation of immortality, almost forgetting all the corruption of mortality, we rejoice. 'Henceforth we know no man according to the flesh' is understood not yet in fact (in re), but in hope: because our hope is in Christ, because in him is already completed what we hope for as promised to us."

2. Next, the disciple of Fabritius rises up against Paul; who turns what the Apostle said out of the affection of one suffering-with (compatientis affectu) into a detestable deceit. [12] "But how openly this impious fellow blasphemes, who does not see? For if the Apostle had feigned himself such as this madman barks — namely, without the law among the gentiles, who were without the law — he would not have proposed to them, with such great praises (præconiis), the faith of Abraham for imitation: [Abraham] whom they knew not, being a foreigner, the father of the Hebrew nation, far removed from their manners, far from their rites and kinships; rather he ought to have found some prince, whether of the Romans or of the Greeks, or some one of the Philosophers, whom he might set before them for imitation. Likewise, if to those who were under the law — the Jews — he had deceitfully become as one under the law, why did he say that they are not heirs by the law? and, 'The law worketh wrath'? and, 'The law is a ministration of death'? and, [13]

[1] 2. Cor. 13. a; Gal. 2. d.
[2] Ezech. 1. a.
[3] Ioan. 1. d.
[4] Gal. 5. b.
[5] 2. Tim. 4. c.
[6] Philem. 1.
[7] Augustine, against Faustus, book 11, ch. 4; Roma. 1 (Au. co. Fau. lib. 11. cap. 4; Roma. 1).
[8] 2. Cor. 5.
[9] Augustine, in the same place, ch. 7 (Aug. ibi. c. 7).
[10] Luc. 24.
[11] Rom. 6. b.
[12] Augustine, book 3 against the adversary of the law and the prophets, ch. 9 (Aug. lib. 3. co. adu. legis & pro. cap. 9).
[13] Rom. 4. c; Gala. 3. c.

(printed p. 603 [PDF p. 608] — Heresy VII: Dilutio 2–3 concluded; Heresy VIII, on the Epistle to the Hebrews, begins.)

'The law was set in place because of transgressors'? — things which those who gloried in the law could not bear with an even mind. Never, therefore, did Paul put on diverse persons out of a zeal to deceive; but keeping always the same person of a teacher, as well among the gentiles as among the Jews, he preached the same God, the same law and prophets, and the same gospel, to Israelites, gentiles, the infirm, and the perfect. But someone will say: In vain, then, did the Apostle say, 'I was made all things to all men'; and, 'I could not speak to you spiritual things, but as it were to carnal men I gave you milk, and not meat.' [1] But far be it from us to think that the Apostle did these things so as to deceive some men by feigning to be others. He was made all things to all men, not by the cunning of a deceiver, but by the affection of one who suffers-with (compatientis affectu), coming to the aid of the diverse diseases of souls with diverse affections of mercy: giving, namely, to the little ones little things — not false things — milky things, not noxious; nourishing, not destructive; that is, the first rudiments of the faith; but to the perfect, grander mysteries: accommodating to each what was healthful according to his capacity."

3. For the rest, the Aerians err greatly, together with the other heretics their followers, if they think that Paul did not have the Holy Spirit when he spoke of the necessities of human weakness, or that he was destitute of the Holy Spirit when he was fulfilling the needs of the body: thinking that to buy food, to prepare a lodging, to procure garments, is sin, and that the Holy Spirit is put to flight from us if we serve for a little while the necessities of our poor body. [2] For the Holy Spirit is saddened and driven from us not by the ministries of this life, but by unclean works and by many vices; which when the Prophet had set out in order, he brought in at the end: "In all these things thou didst sadden me." But to offer a cup of cold water, to wash feet, to sacrifice a calf, to prepare a meal — so far are these from being sins, that we read that by these things certain men were adopted as sons of God. Accordingly, it is by no means to be believed that Paul was at any time destitute of the Holy Spirit on account of things of this kind; but it is to be held most firmly that, from that day on which the Apostle of Christ was made Paul out of Saul — and, out of a vessel of contumely, a vessel of election and of grace, that he might carry the name of Christ among the nations — the spirit of Christ never failed in him for any space of time; by which spirit all the things that he wrote were marvelously dictated.

OF THE EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE HEBREWS — Heresy VIII (De epistola Pauli ad Hebræos hæresis VIII)

That the epistle to the Hebrews is neither Paul's, nor to be numbered among the canonical scriptures.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

Philastrius, in his catalogue of heresies, recounts this error among the anonymous heresies, saying: "There are some who do not assert that the epistle of Paul to the Hebrews is his, but say that it is either the Apostle Barnabas's, or Clement's, bishop of the city of Rome." [3] But Epiphanius, in the first [book] against heresies, writes that the author of this error was Marcion, [4] who rejected the present epistle, together with the epistles to Titus and to Timothy, as unworthy of the apostle. Tatian, Eusebius being witness, succeeded him in the same error. [5] Then after these (as Epiphanius, Theodoret, and Jerome narrate), Arius, the Aerians, and the Ariomanites, seeing that this epistle was most repugnant to their dogma, denied it to be Paul's, and on that account cast it out of the canonical scriptures as adulterine and suspect. [6] Whose perfidy the fanatical Anabaptists and the atheist Servetians, imitating, have repudiated it for the same cause. But Luther, as also Calvin, and others out of their workshop, although they do not exclude it from the canon, yet deny it to be the apostle Paul's, saying that it is worthy neither of the spirit of Paul nor of the majesty of an Apostle; whence, as often as it befalls them to cite some testimony out of this epistle, always passing over the name of Paul, they adduce in his place "the Author of the epistle to the Hebrews."

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

Since this heresy asserts two things — namely, both that this epistle is not Paul's, and that it is not Canonical — therefore each must be confuted by us particularly. Beginning, then, from the author of the epistle, we show first that this most holy epistle is the apostle Paul's, from the testimony of Blessed Peter: who, himself also writing to the Hebrews dispersed through Galatia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia, discloses at once the name of the author of this epistle and its intention, while he exhorts the Hebrews to patience and longanimity, mention being made of the things which are contained in this most sacred epistle; saying thus: "Wherefore, dearest, expecting these things, be diligent that you may be found immaculate and inviolate before him in peace; and count the longanimity of our Lord Jesus Christ as salvation — even as our dearest brother Paul, according to the wisdom given him, hath written to you." [7] Which Paul had assuredly done throughout this whole epistle, ever bent wholly upon this one thing: to lead them to the toleration of present afflictions, and to a firm and certain hope of future rewards. For as Theophylact says, explicating the argument of this epistle: "Paul proves two things in this epistle: both that whatever things befall are to be borne manfully, and that rewards for labors are to be expected. For the Lord will not neglect those whom from eternity he has destined to holiness." And although Paul pursues this most amply through the whole epistle, yet he treated it more ardently and more vividly in the tenth, twelfth, and thirteenth chapters.

Secondly, it manifestly appears that neither Luke, nor Clement, nor Tertullian, as some have thought, were the authors of this epistle, but Paul himself; and this from the words placed at the end (in calce) of the epistle, in which the author exhorts the Hebrews to pray to God for his welfare, that he may the more quickly return to them. For thus he says: "The more do I beseech you to do this, that I may the sooner be restored to you." [8] These words cannot suit Clement, who was a Roman, and had never been away from Rome, nor had lived among the Hebrews; nor yet Barnabas — for although Clement, in his itinerary (which is reckoned among the apocryphal scriptures), writes that he was at Rome, yet the greater part of writers denies that he came into Italy. Whence [these words] indicate that this epistle was written by Paul,

[1] Augustine, in the same place, ch. 2 (Aug. ibid. cap. 2).

[2] Jerome, in the preface of the commentaries on Titus (Hier. in præ. com. ad Titum).

[3] ch. 89 (cap. 89).

[4] book 1, heresy 42 (lib. 1. hær. 42).

[5] book 3 of the History, ch. 29 (lib. 3. hist. cap. 29 — so printed; the passage is Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 4.29).

[6] Epiphanius, book 2, heresy 69; Theodoret, in the preface of the epistle to the Hebrews; Jerome, in the preface of the epistle to Titus (Epiph. li. 2. hæresi 69; Theod. in præfat. epist. ad Hebr.; Hier. in præfat. epist. ad Titum).

[7] 2. Pet. 3.

[8] Heb. 13. c.

(printed p. 604 [PDF p. 609] — Heresy VIII: the Impugnatio continued — Pauline authorship and canonicity of Hebrews.)

the subscription of the epistle itself, which is had in the Greek codices: ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Ἰταλίας, διὰ Τιμοθέου — that is, "written from Italy by Timothy"; and Chrysostom attests that it was written at Rome, and sent thence to the Hebrews by Timothy. But neither can those words be fitted to Tertullian: both because before the times of Tertullian there are found in the writings of the Fathers many testimonies taken out of this epistle; and because Tertullian himself, as Jerome notes in the book On Illustrious Men, brought forth his own opinion concerning the author of this epistle. To this is added that the author, among other things, making mention also of his own chains, writes thus in the tenth chapter according to the Greek truth: καὶ γὰρ τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου συνεπαθήσατε — that is, "For you also had compassion on my chains." Which words do not seem to suit Clement. And the same [author] asserts at the end of the epistle that he delivered this epistle to Timothy to be carried to the Hebrews; which surely is a great indication that Paul wrote it, and gave it to be borne by Timothy his disciple, to whom he was joined by a most holy intimacy (necessitudine) — which Clement perhaps would not have done, seeing that he was not joined to Timothy by so great a bond of fellowship in the building up of the churches.

But the author himself also closes the end of this epistle with that most happy prayer of grace, saying: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen." Which prayer Paul himself, at the end of the second epistle to the Thessalonians, attests to be his sign and token (tesseram), with which he was accustomed to subscribe all his epistles: "The salutation (says he) of me Paul, with my own hand; which is the sign in every epistle: so I write: The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen." [1]

There persuades us also that this epistle is Paul's that most ardent zeal and fervor with which the whole soul of Paul burned for the conversion of the Hebrews to the truth of the faith; which, writing to the Romans, he openly indicates, saying: "I wished to be an anathema for my brethren, who are my kinsmen, of whom is Christ according to the flesh." [2] And again: "As long as I am the Apostle of the gentiles, I will honor my ministry, if in any way I may provoke my flesh to emulation — that is, the Jews — and may save some of them." [3] How then should Paul not write to his own Hebrews, whom he loved so ardently? And since he had written many epistles to others who were not joined to him according to the flesh, why did he not write at least one epistle to his own? And if he wrote it, this is certainly that one: in which Paul, stirred by that divine fire, exhorts the Hebrews that, the oldness of the law being laid aside, they should hasten, through patience and the endurance of labors, to that heavenly Jerusalem, and to that more perfect tabernacle of eternal redemption, designated in the shadows of the Mosaic tabernacle. That this same epistle is Paul's, the common testimony of all the most ancient fathers proves. And before others, Blessed Dionysius, the disciple of Paul, in his works cites a testimony out of that epistle as composed by his own (as he calls him) preceptor, leader, and instructor. To him subscribes Blessed Clement, third after Blessed Peter bishop of the city of Rome; of whom Eusebius, in the third book of the History, speaks thus: [4] "Clement, in the epistle which he writes to the Corinthians, remembers the epistle of Paul to the Hebrews, and uses its testimonies. Whence it is well established that the Apostle wrote it in his native speech, as one to be sent to Hebrews; and (as some hand down) Luke the evangelist — but others say this very Clement — interpreted it [into Greek]. Which latter is also the more true: because both the very style of Clement agrees with this epistle, and the sense of each writing indeed preserves a very great likeness." [5] Thus far Eusebius. With whom Clement of Alexandria agrees, who in the books of his ὑποτυπώσεων [Hypotyposes] asserts that this same epistle was written by Paul, and afterward translated into Greek by Luke. And Origen, on the first psalm, writes of the author of this epistle in this manner: "Although some have doubted concerning the epistle written to the Hebrews, on the ground that there does not seem to be preserved in it that opinion of his which he pronounces of himself, saying that he is unskilled in speech — yet I say, as it has been handed down to me from my elders, that it is most manifestly Paul's, and all our ancient elders always received it as the Apostle Paul's." The same is the judgment of Chrysostom; whose abbreviator Theophylact inveighs thus against those who deny this epistle to be Paul's: "I cannot indeed but marvel at the impudence of many men, who, although they understand that by the exordium of this epistle so many heresies have been confuted, nevertheless do not cease to affirm that this epistle does not befit blessed Paul, as though foreign to the rest of his epistles. But I would have them not be ignorant that both the sense of this epistle, and its profundity, and that irrefutable force, can be no other's than Paul's, who has Christ speaking in him." And that I may not recount the several testimonies of the Fathers — namely of Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and others, who confess it to be Paul's — let one single testimony of the whole catholic church suffice us: which, in the natal solemnities of our Lord Jesus Christ, sings the beginning of this epistle in the divine mysteries under the name of Blessed Paul the apostle. From all which it becomes perspicuous that this epistle is no other's than Paul's.

But that the present epistle is to be received in the canon of the divine scriptures, the sacrosanct decrees of the Councils show first of all: above all, the most sacred Synod of Nicaea received it among the sacred volumes as written by the apostle Paul; and the Council of Laodicea related it in its catalogue; and the third Council of Carthage, and the Council of Orange (Aurusicanum), inserted it in the canon. To which subscribe the decrees of Innocent the first, and of Gelasius, and of Eugenius the fourth, which enumerate this epistle in the catalogue of the divine scriptures. And that it was also always received in the church as canonical, and reprobated by none except heretics, the common consensus of the Greek fathers demonstrates; of whom — lest I run through all their testimonies — I shall adduce the single sentence of Theodoret, which he expressed against the Arians who repudiated this epistle: "They accomplish nothing (says he) who labor under the Arian disease, if they rage against the apostolic letters, and separate the epistle to the Hebrews from the rest, and call it adulterine. For they who move their tongues against God and our Savior — what would they not have dared against his well-wishers, the grand-speaking heralds of the truth?"

[1] 2. Thess., last chapter (2. Theß. vlt.).
[2] Rom. 9.
[3] Rom. 11.
[4] ch. 38 (cap. 38).
[5] Eusebius, book 6 of the History, ch. 11; Eusebius, book 6 of the History, ch. 18 (Eus. li. 6. his. cap. 11; Eus. li. 6. his. cap. 18).

(printed p. 605 [PDF p. 610] — Heresy VIII: Impugnatio concluded; the heretics' objections 1–7 against Hebrews.)

"…heralds of the truth? For it is the voice of the Lord himself: 'If they have persecuted me, they will persecute you also.' And it behooved them, if nothing else, at least to reverence the long duration of the time through which the fosterlings of the truth have read this epistle perpetually in the churches. For from the time when the churches became partakers of the apostolic letters, from that same time they receive also the profit of the epistle to the Hebrews. But if not even this suffices to persuade them, they ought at least to believe Eusebius of Palestine, whom they call the patron of their own decrees; for even he confessed that this epistle is the most divine Paul's. But bidding farewell to all these, they impudently fight against the truth, not bearing the splendor of the apostolic Theology with which he adorned the proem. For since they could not resist the things which had been openly said concerning the divinity of the Only-begotten, they dared to reject the whole epistle; although both its decrees and its sentences have a great kinship with the other epistles of the same [Paul]." Thus far Theodoret. And Augustine, when he had heard that certain Latins did not receive this epistle, said that he preferred to follow the authority of the eastern churches, among whom there was never any ambiguity concerning this epistle. And Jerome, writing to Dardanus, judges the most efficacious argument of its authority to be this: that the longest-continued use of the church has approved it by unbroken reading. Let these things suffice against the enemies of this epistle. Now let us pass to the things which they object against its authority.

OBIECTIONES HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

There are two kinds of adversaries with whom our contest concerning the epistle of Paul to the Hebrews lies: the first (as we have already said) cast the epistle — whosesoever it may be — out of the canon as adulterine; the others, although they receive it as sacred and divine, yet deny it to be the apostle Paul's. Those, then, who explode it from the canon of the divine scriptures are moved by these causes (as Philastrius relates): [1]

1. First, the epistle to the Hebrews is to be disowned because its author, immediately in the very exordium, seems to think ill of the only-begotten Son of God, together with the Arians: both because he makes the Son diverse from the substance of the Father, when he names him not the substance of the Father, but "the splendor of his glory, and the image of the substance of the father" — of which assuredly neither is the substance; and because he shows the Son not begotten of the Father, but made together with the other creatures, when he adds: "Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath inherited a more excellent name above them." [2]

2. To this is adjoined that the same author, in the sixth chapter of this epistle, seems to favor the cruelty of the Novatians, which denies pardon to the lapsed. For he says: "It is impossible for those who were once illuminated, have tasted also the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Spirit, have tasted moreover the good word of God and the virtues of the world to come, and have fallen away — to be renewed again to penance." [3] And again, in chapter 10 of the same epistle, confirming this same thing, he adds: "For if we sin willfully after having received the knowledge of the truth, there is now left no sacrifice for sins." [4] Which sentences are so cruel that they lead the weak consciences of sinners into desperation. These things Philastrius relates as objected by the ancient heretics.

3. But the more recent Anabaptists and Servetians infest it with other calumnies, accusing first its author of interpreting the testimonies of the old testament perversely, and of introducing them far from their purpose: as he did in the beginning of the epistle, where, intending to demonstrate that Christ is the son of God, he violently wrested that testimony out of the second volume of Kings, namely: "I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son" [5] — which words were uttered not of Christ, but of Solomon. For thus in that place the Lord speaks to David through Nathan the prophet: "I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall go forth out of thy womb, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build a house to my name, and I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son. And if he commit any iniquity, I will correct him with the rod of men and with the stripes of men; but my mercy I will not take away from him, as I took it from Saul, whom I removed from before my face." [6] Which sayings — so far is it from being the case that they speak of Christ — cannot be accommodated to him without the greatest contumely. For how could those words be fitted to Christ: "Who, if he commit any iniquity, I will correct him with the rod of men" — since Christ not only never committed sin, but could not even sin?

4. Next, the author assumes certain fictitious things out of uncertain assertions of the Hebrews, asserting that in the ark of the covenant of the Jews there was a certain golden urn with the manna that rained in the desert, and that rod of Aaron which had budded; [7] whereas it is written in the third volume of Kings that there was nothing else in the ark except the two stone tables which Moses had placed in it at Horeb, when he made the covenant with the children of Israel, when they came out of the land of Egypt. [8]

5. Hence it appears to have come about that the Latin church did not receive it into the canon, and did not take it up for the proving of dogmas — as is discerned from the writings of Tertullian, Cyprian, Lactantius, and Arnobius, who never used its testimony. And Jerome attests that even down to his own times it had not been taken up into the canon. For he says, upon the sixth chapter of Isaiah: "Whence also Paul the apostle, in the epistle to the Hebrews — which the Latin custom does not receive…"; and upon the eighth chapter of Isaiah: "But for the rest (says he), the blessed Apostle, in the epistle which is written to the Hebrews — although the Latin custom does not receive it among the canonical scriptures…" Nay, Jerome himself seems to attribute little to the authority of this epistle, since he is accustomed always to cite it with a mark of doubt prefixed. And these are the arguments used by those who endeavor to break the canonical authority of this epistle.

6. But those who receive the epistle, yet deny Paul to be its author, strive to persuade this by many conjectures and by testimonies of the fathers — but especially from this (as Philastrius says): that its author wrote in a plausible style, rhetorically, [9] with a more splendid oration and a grander style, by no means observing that sentence which Paul pronounces of himself, saying that he is unskilled in speech; and, "I came not to you in loftiness of speech" [10] — inasmuch as he was more eloquent [than Paul], and could not imitate the simplicity of Paul which appears in his epistles.

7. But lest anyone should perhaps say that Paul, writing in Hebrew,

[1] Philastrius, in the catalogue, ch. 89 (Philast. in cat. ca. 89).
[2] Heb. 1.
[3] Heb. 6.
[4] Heb. 10.
[5] Heb. 1.
[6] 4. Reg. 7 (so printed; the passage is 2 Reg. [2 Sam.] 7, as the text itself says).
[7] Heb. cap. 9.
[8] 3. Reg. 3 (so printed; the passage is 3 Reg. [1 Kings] 8:9).
[9] cap. lib. 29 (so printed).
[10] 1. Cor. 1 (the passage quoted is 1 Cor. 2:1).

(printed p. 606 [PDF p. 611] — Heresy VIII: objections 7–13; the Dilutio, responses 1–2 begin.)

[lest anyone should say that Paul,] writing [in Hebrew], was more eloquent in this epistle than in the others written by him in the Greek tongue, it must be known that it was first composed not in Hebrew but in Greek. Of which thing these are the indications. First, because it is not found written in Hebrew; nor was there ever anyone who testified that he had read or seen it in the Hebrew language; nor is it at all established who turned it from the Hebrew tongue into Greek — some asserting, with uncertain authority, that Luke, others that Clement, was its interpreter. Next, because its author, in the seventh chapter of the epistle, interpreting the name of Melchisedech king of Salem, says: "which is interpreted king of justice, and of peace." [1] But if he — himself a Hebrew — was writing to Hebrews, and in Hebrew speech, I ask, for what reason did he wish to explicate what the word, most well-known to Hebrews, showed of itself? And then, in what language did he interpret it? Not in Hebrew — lest he should expound the same by the same, with a superfluous fault of trifling. It remains, therefore, that the epistle was put forth in Greek, and that the name Melchisedech — as being unknown to Greeks — was interpreted in the Greek tongue. To these things is added that the author uses testimonies of the old instrument not according to the Hebrew truth, but according to the Greek edition of the Seventy; which it is by no means verisimilar that a Hebrew writer, writing chiefly in Hebrew to Hebrews, would have done. For why, forsaking the fountain of the Hebrew tongue, should he have begged Hebrew testimonies from the rivulets of foreign interpretations?

8. This moreover seems to persuade that the epistle is not Paul's: that he did not prefix his name to this epistle, as he was accustomed to do in his other epistles. Nor is the occasion of doubting removed by what they say — that the Apostle did this deliberately, lest the Hebrews, hostile to him, upon seeing the name of Paul on the front of the epistle, should straightway cast it away. For the Apostle, if he had feared this, could have inserted his name either in the middle of the epistle or near the end, as he was wont to do in all his epistles. [2]

9. To these are added many testimonies, and first of all of the author himself: because in the second chapter of this epistle he numbers himself among those in whom the evangelical salvation was confirmed through those who heard it from the Lord Jesus; the opposite of which Paul proclaims of himself, saying that he learned neither from man nor through man, but through the revelation of Jesus Christ, the apostles conferring nothing upon him. [3]

10. But neither can that suit Paul which the author writes at the end of the epistle concerning Timothy: "Know that your brother Timothy is set at liberty; with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you." For how is it fitting that Paul — who had already appealed to Caesar, and for no other cause than to slip out of the hands of the Jews — should so suddenly be changed, and wish to return to them again, and promise that he will return the more speedily to the very place whence a little before he had fled for fear of death?

11. Furthermore, the testimonies of the scriptures, adduced by the author otherwise, and otherwise understood, than they are wont to be adduced and understood by Paul, indicate that someone other than Paul wrote it. For what the writer of the present epistle took out of Psalm 2 to show that Christ is greater than the angels, saying: "To which of the angels said he at any time: Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee?" — Paul understood otherwise, taking it up to prove the resurrection of Christ, when he expounded it in the synagogue of Antioch, saying: "And we declare unto you that the promise which was made to our fathers, this God hath fulfilled to your children, raising up Jesus again, as it is written in the second Psalm: Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee." [4]

12. The common consensus also of all the Latins, and of some Greeks, shows that the author of this epistle was not Paul — as Jerome has noted repeatedly: as in the book On Illustrious Men, where he says, "This epistle, among the Romans even to this day, is not held to be Paul's" [5] — and again in the same book: "The epistle (says he) which is carried about as 'to the Hebrews' is believed not to be Paul's, on account of the distance of style and speech, but either Barnabas's, according to Tertullian, or Luke the evangelist's, according to some; or even Clement's, of the city of Rome." The same he confirms also in the epistle to Paulinus, and in the epistle to Evagrius, and in very many other places. And among the Greeks, as Eusebius relates, Gaius — by no means to be contemned among the ecclesiastical writers — rejects it from the other epistles of Paul the apostle. [6]

13. Finally, whosesoever it may be, it matters nothing. For we can affirm, without any crime of heresy, that it is not Paul's; nor ought he who believes otherwise to be reckoned a heretic — Jerome so determining in the epistle to Dardanus, where he speaks thus: "That epistle most men judge to be either Barnabas's or Clement's. But it makes no difference whose it is, since it is an ecclesiastical man's, and is celebrated daily in the reading of the churches." These things the adversaries of this epistle are wont to bring forth.

DILVTIO OBIECTORVM [The Dissolution of the Objections]

1. Answering these, we say, to the first: that those words of Paul are so far from favoring the Arians that they are opposed to them in the highest degree. For, as Theophylact says, [7] these words — according to the explanation of Gregory of Nyssa — Paul, teaching that the Son is the splendor and the figure of the Father, does not signify him to be less than the Father; but by "splendor" he shows the unity of essence, whereby the Son is coeternal and consubstantial with the Father, no otherwise than splendor is to light; and by "figure," the equality of nature: because neither does the subject (suppositum) exceed its figure, nor is the figure exceeded by its subject; for the subject does not transcend the lines of the figure, nor do the lineaments of the figure go out beyond the amplitude of the subject. And when he said the Son was "made," he did not understand him made in divinity (says Philastrius), but demonstrates him made in body and in humanity. [8]

2. Nor do those words of the sixth chapter agree in any way with the dogma of Novatus. For when Paul says that those who have fallen away cannot be renewed to penance, he does not exclude sinners from repentance, but (says Philastrius) shows the diverse grade of dignity between him who has kept himself whole and him who has sinned. [9] For it is more glorious not to have fallen into the deformity of sin than to rise again from the deformity of sin after a fall. There is therefore a detriment of dignity in him who has sinned, but not a loss of salvation. For just as, when the ensign of virginity's [10]

[1] Heb. 7.
[2] Heb. 2. a; Gal. 1. a.
[3] Heb., last chapter, d (Heb. vlt. d).
[4] Psal. 2; Heb. 1; Act. 13.
[5] In [the entry on] Gaius; In [the entry on] Paul (In Gaio; In Paulo).
[6] Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 16.
[7] Theophylactus on the 1st chapter of [the epistle to] the Hebrews (Theophylactus super 1. cap. ad Heb.).
[8] Philastrius, ch. 89 (Phila. ca. 89).
[9] Phil. ca. 89; Heb. 6.
[10] Epiphanius, book 2, heresy 59 (Epiph. lib. 2. hær. 59).

(printed p. 607 [PDF p. 612] — Heresy VIII: Dilutio, responses 2–5.)

[just as, when the] beauty [of the ensign of virginity has been lost,] it is impossible to be corporally renewed to it again, so, when the dignity of pristine justice has been lost, it is impossible to be renewed again through penance to that same dignity of justice and innocence. For it cannot come to pass that he who has even once fallen into sin should any longer be able to glory that he has never at any time fallen into sin. But just as to him who has lapsed from virginity there still remains the second honor of continence, so to him who has fallen after the laver [of baptism] there still remains a second remedy. [1] Moreover, Paul in these words excludes not absolutely all penance, but the penance of the rebaptizers, who did not receive sinners to penance after a lapse except by a baptism reiterated a second and a third time after sin; which Epiphanius witnesses that Marcion did not long after Paul's time, expiating penitents by a threefold washing of baptism for the remission of each grave fault. [2] And since this had begun to be done even in the time of Paul, the Apostle pronounced that it cannot be that sinners should be renewed to penance through the iteration of baptism. [3] And that the words of the tenth chapter are to be understood in this sense, Chrysostom shows, whose words are these: "Here again rise up those who take away penance, saying: it is not safe to give the sacraments to sinners, since there is no second remission after sin. What then shall we say? That in this place he excludes neither penance, nor the propitiation which is made through penance; nor does he repel and cast down the delinquent by desperation — for he is not such an enemy of our salvation. But what then? He excludes a second laver. For he did not say, 'there is no further penance'; nor did he say, 'there is no further remission'; but, 'a victim (hostia),' says he, 'there is no more.' There is no second cross any more — for by 'victim' he here means this."

3. But as to the calumny of the Anabaptists and Servetians against Paul — that he violently wrested that scripture of the second of Kings to Christ — it is beyond doubt most false. For many things which were said to the letter of certain persons in the old testament have been fulfilled, according to the spirit and the perfect truth, in Christ; and most of all the present testimony, which, as Lactantius says, cannot according to the letter be understood at all of Solomon. [4] For neither can the kingdom of Solomon — which failed in the transmigration of Babylon — be called perpetual, as the words of that vaticination promise, when God says: "I will establish the throne of his kingdom even for ever"; nor can the words which follow be understood wholly of Solomon: "And thy house shall be faithful, and thy kingdom for ever" — because the house of Solomon was full of foreign women, worshipping false gods and driving Solomon himself to the same. It remains, therefore, that these things were completed in Christ, the son of David according to the flesh: whose house — that is, the assembly of the faithful — has been and will be faithful unto everlasting; whose kingdom — that is, the church of the Christians — is perpetual, according to the sentence of Daniel: "His power is an eternal power, and his kingdom [a kingdom] that shall not be corrupted." [5] Wherefore, just as the preceding and the following words of that vaticination are understood of our Savior, so also those which are placed in the midst of them — namely, "I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son" — are to be understood of the only-begotten Son of God. Nor do the subsequent words at all stand in the way: "If he commit any iniquity, I will correct him": because, although the very person of Christ cannot sin, yet the mystical Christ — that is, his members — can sin, and do sin at times, and their iniquities are visited with a rod, and their sins with stripes (as the Psalm says); but the mercy of the Lord is not taken away from them. [6]

4. To that which they commemorate concerning the ark of the testament, Theophylact, in the explanation of the ninth chapter to the Hebrews, meets them in this manner: [7] "You will ask, perhaps — since it is well known that it is recorded in the letters of the book of Kings that nothing else was laid up in the ark besides the tables — why Paul has now joined to them both the Urn, and concluded that rod of Aaron [to be there]? Perhaps he said this because, as one instructed by Gamaliel, he was excellently versed in Hebrew history, and had received by the tradition of the elders that the matter stood thus; especially since the Hebrews who follow the Pharisees both think and profess this very thing — not, however, in the very beginnings, but a long time afterward, when it was necessary that in the times of Jeremiah the ark should be hidden: [at that time,] they say, both the urn and the rod were stored away in it." [8] Thus far Theophylact; who, a little above, rendering the cause why these three things were placed in the ark, says it was done by divine providence, that in it the chief monuments of Jewish ingratitude might be preserved. His words stand thus: "These things without doubt are all monuments of the ingratitude of the Jews. For that the manna was preserved in the urn — that manna at which they had once murmured while being nourished by it — was ordained to this end, that the fame of this thing might pass to posterity, and that it might be handed down to memory how they had exasperated God; the rod of Aaron, that their contumacy might be made known, and how they had once withstood Aaron himself; and the tables of the testament convicted them of infidelity and inconstancy — for it was on their account that those [first tables] were worn away [broken], because they had molten a calf for themselves and had served idols."

5. But concerning that which they say — that this epistle is not cited by the ancient Latins, as being one which was not in the canon among them, and that by their example it is lawful for us to cast the same out of the canon — we answer that the opinion of the heretics is as rash as it is false. False indeed, since we read it cited by the most ancient fathers of the Roman church: and first of all by Clement of Rome, who, in the first epistle to James the brother of the Lord, produces out of it those words which are had in the eleventh chapter: "Without faith it is impossible to please God." And Evaristus, the first Pope [of that name], in his second epistle, cites from the fourth chapter of this epistle that sentence: "There is not any creature invisible in his sight: and all things are naked and open to his eyes." And Hyginus, the first Pontiff of that name, in his epistle to all the faithful of Christ, brings forth a testimony from the 2nd chapter of [the epistle to] the Hebrews in this manner: "For in that wherein he himself hath suffered and been tempted, he is able to help those also who are tempted." [9] And lest I weary my readers in recounting all the testimonies which are found received among the most ancient fathers concerning the present epistle: let us grant to them that this epistle was nowhere cited by the ancient fathers, and (what is more) that even by them there was at times doubt

[1] Philastrius, ch. 89 (Phil. ca. 89).

[2] Epiphanius, book 1, heresy 42 (Epiph. lib. 1. hær. 42).

[3] Heb. 10.

[4] Heb. 1; 3. Reg. 3; Lactantius, book 4 of the Divine Institutes, ch. 13 (Lactan. li. 4. diu. instit. c. 13).

[5] Dan. 7.
[6] Psal. 88.
[7] Theophylactus on Hebr., ch. 9 (Theophylactus Hebr. cap. 9).
[8] Heb. 9.
[9] Heb. 2.

(printed p. 608 [PDF p. 613] — Heresy VIII: Dilutio, responses 5 concluded, 6–8.)

[that even by them there was at times] doubt concerning it. What then? Will it therefore be lawful for us also to doubt of it again? By no means, assuredly. For although those most ancient fathers, before the universal determination of the whole church, were permitted to entertain doubt about this epistle, and not rashly to receive it into the canon, yet to us, after so many decrees of councils and the common sanction of the catholic church, it is by no means lawful to do the same: since by these all those causes of doubting have been removed which could induce Tertullian, Cyprian, Arnobius, Lactantius, and other fathers not undeservedly to hesitate about this epistle, and accordingly not to produce testimonies out of it for the confirmation of our faith. Now among the other occasions of suspicion the first was this: that this epistle was of the kind of those scriptures which came to the notice of the whole catholic church not immediately from the beginning of the nascent church, but a little later. Of which sort are the epistle of James, the second of Peter, the second and third of John, and the Apocalypse of the same; concerning which, before they were placed in the canon, there was deservedly disputation among the fathers, lest they should decide a matter of such moment without long and diligent examination. And the other cause is this: that since the authority of the whole church had not yet decreed anything about this epistle, it was free for anyone, without peril of heresy, to doubt and to discourse about it. But now, when this epistle, after so great a multitude of years, has been taken up into the canon by the decrees of so many councils, it is not only rash but heretical to call its authority into doubt again. And as for what they subjoin — that this epistle in Jerome's time was not in the canon, and that Jerome himself attributed little to its authority — they lie. For Jerome himself brings forth both his own opinion and that of the church of his time, in the epistle to Dardanus concerning the land of promise, speaking thus: "The epistle which is inscribed 'to the Hebrews' is received as the apostle Paul's not only by the churches of the East, but by all writers of the Greek speech; although most judge it either Barnabas's or Clement's. But it makes no difference whose it is, since it is an ecclesiastical man's, and is celebrated daily in the reading of the churches. And if the custom of the Latins does not receive it, neither indeed do the churches of the Greeks receive the Apocalypse of John with the same liberty. And yet we receive both — by no means following the custom of this time, but the authority of the ancient writers, who for the most part use the testimonies of each, not as they are sometimes wont to do with the Apocrypha, but as ecclesiastical and canonical." From which words it is plain that although the irrational custom of the vulgar in the time of Jerome did not receive this epistle, yet Jerome, and the other presidents and moderators of the church — whose office it was to decide concerning the authority of the divine letters — contemning the custom of the uncertain vulgar, received the epistle to the Hebrews as canonical. So much for those who cast this epistle out of the canon.

6. I come now to those who, receiving the epistle, deny it to be Paul's: because its author, wandering at large through Rhetorical places, uses a more splendid style than the Apostle is wont. [1] To whom we say that this is not to be wondered at, since it is natural to each man to be stronger in his own than in a foreign tongue. For the Apostle composed the other epistles in foreign speech — that is, in Greek — but this one, being a Hebrew, [he wrote] in Hebrew, that is, in his own eloquence, in which he was the more fluent, the more eloquently. And it is credible also, as Origen says on the first psalm, that what Paul had written eloquently in the Hebrew tongue, the Greek interpreter (whoever he was) translated into the Greek speech even more eloquently.

7. Now as for what they allege — that this epistle was not written in Hebrew, because neither is the name of the interpreter known, nor is it found written in Hebrew — it is of very little moment. For what does it matter whether it be found written in Hebrew or not, since all consent that it was turned out of Hebrew into Greek?

And who the interpreter was — whether Luke, as Clement of Alexandria thinks in the book of the Hypotyposes (Hypotiposeon), or, as others judge, Clement of Rome — is a matter of such trifling weight that it needs no consideration; but, as Origen says, if it be asked by whom its speech was composed, "God assuredly knows for certain; [2] yet the opinion which has come down even to us is either that Clement, the disciple of the Apostles and bishop of the city of Rome, polished it in Greek speech (though not in its senses), or that it was Luke, who wrote the Gospel and adorned the Acts of the apostles." And as to that which they say — that the interpretation of the name Melchisedech betrays a Greek writer — it is most trifling: since no one but will straightway recognize that this was done by the Greek interpreter, if he considers that it is a thing most usual in the sacred letters for interpreters frequently to interpret names of this kind, as was done in Genesis and in Exodus with the names Benoni, and Beniamim, and Phase: of which the Seventy turned the first "son of my sorrow," the second "son of the right hand," the third "the passover of the Lord." And what we say of the interpretation of these names — that it was done by the interpreter — the same we say also of the testimonies of the old testament adduced in this epistle according to the Seventy. For it is verisimilar that the interpreter (whoever he was), in turning the testimonies of the old scripture which Paul had cited according to the Hebrew truth, used the edition of the Seventy, as being more familiar to himself, who was a Greek.

8. But concerning the name of Paul — that it is neither prefixed to the epistle nor written within it — D. Jerome gives satisfaction, saying: [3] "But if this epistle is not Blessed Paul's because it does not have his name prefixed, then it will be no one's, since no other man's name is prefixed to it. How much more prudent, then, even for this very reason to judge it to be Blessed Paul's — because there was in it a singular reason for suppressing the name." And that reason was twofold: one, that writing to those who had believed out of the circumcision, as the Apostle of the gentiles and not of the Hebrews — knowing also their pride, and himself demonstrating his own humility — he would not set the merit of his office before them. For in like manner the apostle John, on account of humility, for the same reason did not prefix his name in his epistle. The other cause is that Paul was odious to the Hebrews, to whom he seemed both the Apostle of the Gentiles and a destroyer of the law. And so he did not set his odious name at the head of the epistle, lest the envy of the prefixed name should shut out the profit that was to follow,

[1] Origen on Psal. 1 (Origines in Psal. 1).

[2] Origen on Psal. 2 (Origines in Psal. 2).

[3] Jerome, in the preface of the epistle to the Hebrews (Hieron. in præf. epistolæ ad Hebræ.).

(printed p. 609 [PDF p. 614] — Heresy VIII: Dilutio 8–13 concluded; Heresy IX, on the Canonical (Catholic) Epistles, begins.)

should shut out [the profit] of the reading; and for that cause he neither wrote his name within nor subscribed it, as he had done in his other epistles, so that the epistle might travel more safely among the Hebrews who were hostile to him, without the impediment of his own name, and might the more willingly be read through entire, from beginning to end, by all.

9. Now concerning the words of the Apostle by which he seems to number himself among those who received [the faith] not from Christ but from the apostles: it is said that Paul in these words asserts that he learned from others not the doctrine, but the salvation — which salvation was confirmed in him through those who heard from the Lord; namely by Ananias, the disciple of the Lord, to whom he was sent, that through him the Salvation might be confirmed in him by the washing of baptism and the restitution of his sight. And yet, if we speak of his doctrine, this too was confirmed through those who seemed to be the pillars of the church: even as he himself testifies to the Galatians that he conferred with the apostles his gospel, which he preached among the gentiles, lest perhaps he should run in vain. [1]

10. Nor should it seem marvelous to anyone if Paul — who for fear of the Jews had appealed to Caesar — desired, as if his counsel were changed, to return again to the Jews; seeing that Christ willed to return into Judaea, whence a little before he had scarcely escaped from the hands of those who would stone him, even while the apostles reproved him: "for there are twelve hours of the day," as Christ then said. [2] Whence it is also possible that Paul, then admonished by the Spirit of God, desired that from which his mind before shrank — especially since, the two years at Rome being completed, he believed he might more safely return to Jerusalem: either because he hoped the envy of the Jews was now calmed; or, if he believed it not yet calmed, nevertheless, being now released, he could easily promise himself, from Caesar, a safe return to his own people.

11. But that which is objected concerning the testimony of the second Psalm — that it is adduced here otherwise than by Paul in the Acts — Bede most easily dissolves, saying that the testimony of the psalm recited by Paul in the Acts pertains not to the resurrection of Christ, of which the Apostle was about to speak next in his discourse, but to both nativities of Christ — namely the eternal and the temporal — of which he had spoken a little above in the same discourse, saying that he was born of the seed of David according to the flesh, and was proclaimed by John, as the Messiah, the true Son of God. [3]

12. To all the testimonies of Jerome we answer, as was already said above: that he speaks not according to his own opinion, but according to the opinion of certain Latins, and especially according to the custom of the vulgar, introduced at that time by usage rather than by reason or by the judgment of the learned. And although at that time some even of the illustrious among the Latins doubted concerning this epistle, whether it should be received into the Canon, yet in our age, after the church's determination, so long-continued and so certain, it is no longer lawful to doubt of it.

13. And lest anyone should say that he can at least doubt of the author of this epistle without the crime of heresy, because Jerome said, "Whosesoever it may be, it makes no difference" — it must be known that he brought forth that word not in the manner of one asserting and determining, but out of the opinion of his adversaries: so that, according to the law of disputants, he might show the absurd inference of those who, from the uncertainty of the author, inferred that this epistle is not canonical. Jerome, then, rejecting this consecution, says that whosesoever the epistle may be, it neither matters nor hinders but that it can be canonical, provided it be an orthodox and ecclesiastical man's. Let these rash men therefore cease to marvel if we pronounce them heretics when they refuse to believe, against so many testimonies. And let them no longer say: "What great matter is it, if one doubt about the author of this epistle?" For it matters enough, and much. For the Arians, Servetians, and Anabaptists took from this their first handle for rejecting this epistle — which assuredly they would not have dared to do, had they seen it received by all, for certain, as the apostle Paul's. Moreover, many books of holy men have been rejected by the church from the canon for no other cause than that it was not believed that they were the works of those authors under whose names they were fore-noted: as happened with the book of Enoch, and very many other books which are cited in the holy scriptures, which Augustine says the church spurned — not because it reprobated the authority of those men who pleased God, but because it did not believe those books to be theirs whose they were said to be. [4] Finally, it matters very much that the authority of so many fathers, who have attested this to us, be preserved whole, undoubted, and immune from every suspicion of deception. For if we concede that in this one thing so many fathers were deceived, what hinders but that in other things also they be rendered suspect of error and imprudence? — since he who is deceived, and deceives, in one thing, must be believed capable of being deceived and of deceiving in others also. Thus far concerning the epistle to the Hebrews.

OF THE CANONICAL OR CATHOLIC EPISTLES — Heresy IX (De Canonicis siue Catholicis Epistolis. Hæresis IX)

To reject the Canonical Epistles.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

This heresy is bipartite. Some cast away absolutely all the Canonical or catholic epistles — as Marcion, and all those who receive nothing of the new testament besides the gospel of Luke. Others reject only some of them — as Luther: who, having left untouched only two Canonical epistles (moved by what religious scruple I know not), namely the first of Peter and [the first] of John, raves freely against the five others: casting out of the canon, first, the epistle of James, for no other cause than that it is opposed to his dogma of Justification by faith alone. He asserts, moreover, that it is falsely inscribed with the name of James, because it contains nothing of the apostolic spirit, but is wholly (that I may use his words) dry and straw-like (arida ac straminea), full of swelling and of contention. He denies also that the epistle of Jude is canonical, or worthy to be numbered among the catholic scriptures; and in like manner he calls into doubt the three other Canonical epistles — namely the second of Peter, and the second and third of John — maintaining that they are not theirs by whose name they are fore-noted, but some uncertain author's, who wished to illustrate his own offspring with the splendor of another's name. But the Anabaptists and Serve[tians]

[1] Gal. 2. a.

[2] Ioan. 9 (so printed; the saying is John 11:9).

[3] Bede on the 13th chapter of Acts; Act. 13; Heb. 1; Psal. 2.

[4] Augustine, book 18 of the City [of God], ch. 38 (Aug. li. 18 de ciu. cap. 38).

(printed p. 610 [PDF p. 615] — Heresy IX: the assertors concluded; the Impugnatio — patristic and papal testimonies for the Catholic epistles.)

[the Anabaptists and Serve]tians, perceiving that the impiety devised by them against the majesty of the most holy Trinity is laid prostrate (prosterni) by the first epistle of John, asseverate that it was adulterated by the assertors of the Trinity, certain things being added in it by which they might defend their own assertion.

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

Whose audacity we, pressing it down with the weight of ecclesiastical authority, show that not only are all these epistles canonical, but that they are also theirs by whose names they are inscribed. First, then, that the first of John and the first of Peter are canonical, and are also those authors' under whose name they are carried, the perpetual consensus of the church and all the venerable antiquity of the fathers [affirm] so constantly that it would be superfluous to attempt to show it — which antiquity, as Eusebius asseverates, never doubted concerning these two epistles, and always recounted them in the order of the sacred letters under the name of Peter and of John. [1] But as for the other five epistles: although there was at one time doubt about them among the fathers — because they came to the notice of the whole Church not immediately in the very times of the apostles, as the first two epistles did, but long after — yet these also at length, by the unanimous will of all the fathers and the consensus of the whole church, were received into the number of the sacred volumes under the same name of the apostles which is now read on their fronts; and all the holy councils, from the council of Laodicea and the third of Carthage down to the most recent holy Tridentine Synod, have numbered them in the Catalogues of divine scripture — although even long before the aforesaid councils, those most ancient fathers of the nascent church used the testimonies of these epistles, not as of apocrypha, but as of Canonical scriptures, for the confirming of ecclesiastical dogmas. And first of all Clement, third pontiff after Peter, in his second epistle took from the fourth chapter of James those words: "But if thou judge the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a Judge." And again: "Be humbled in the sight of the Lord, and he will exalt you." And Anacletus the Pope, in his first epistle, cites under the name of James a testimony out of the second chapter, saying: "Whosoever (as the apostle James saith) shall keep the whole law, but offend in one point, is become guilty of all." And Alexander the first, Pope, bringing in James as witness out of the fifth chapter of this epistle, says: "For much availeth (as Blessed James the Apostle saith) the assiduous supplication of a just man." Urban I, in his first epistle, alleges the words of the second chapter of this epistle under the title of James, saying: "What doth it profit, my brethren (saith James the apostle), if a man say he hath faith, but hath not works?" And what makes most of all for confirming the majesty of this epistle is chiefly this: that the authority of the whole universal catholic church confirms, out of this one epistle, the Sacrament of extreme unction, first intimated in the gospel of Mark — as appears from the decree of Innocent, first of that name, and as is established from the Councils which were after Innocent.

In like manner also, from the second epistle of Peter, Anacletus in his third epistle adduces certain words of the third chapter as uttered by Peter, saying: [2] "Wherefore, dearest, expecting these things, be diligent (as Peter saith) to be found immaculate and inviolate before him in peace." Reason also shows this 2nd epistle to be Peter's: because, if it be not his, it will assuredly be the work of some most impudent trifler and fable-monger. For the author there testifies that he was one of those who were on the holy mount, and saw the magnificent glory of Christ borne down from the cloud. But if this mountebank (circulator) had so basely imposed upon us as to vend himself to all the faithful in place of Peter, how could it ever have come to pass that the church — which cannot err — should have computed this impostor among the sacred writers, and ordered him to be read in the assemblies of the faithful, even in the sacred mysteries? To this is added that the author of this epistle, when he rendered that most laudatory testimony concerning the epistle of Paul written to the Hebrews, calls himself not only Paul's brother, but his dearest brother, saying: "Our dearest brother Paul hath written to you." And certainly no one among the apostles was dearer to Peter than Paul; who, as he had always loved him in life, so neither in death was he separated from him — on one day, and in one place, having the same man as companion of his passion whom he had always had as fellow of his evangelical preaching.

Now concerning the two later epistles of John the apostle, it is well known that Jerome, Ambrose, and Augustine frequently take testimonies from the second of this apostle. And of the third (that I may pass over the other ancient writers), Dionysius, the most ancient of all, in the book of the celestial Hierarchy, chapter three, cites certain words from the first chapter of this epistle.

Of the epistle of Jude the apostle, likewise, Anacletus in his third epistle takes those words: "These are they who segregate themselves, animal men, not having the spirit," etc. And Alexander the first, in his third epistle, brings forth a testimony with the name of Jude the apostle set upon it, citing in this manner: "Behold (saith Jude the apostle), the Lord will come amid his thousands, and the rest." But he whom I ought to have named before all — D. Dionysius, in the book On the Divine Names, took a testimony from this epistle; [3] and D. Epiphanius, in the first book against heresies, citing a testimony from this epistle against the Gnostics, says: "Wherefore concerning these men I judge that the Holy Spirit was moved in the apostle Jude — in the catholic epistle, I say, written by him: now this Jude is he who is called the brother of James, and of the Lord." [4] And Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men, writes thus of this same epistle: "Jude, the brother of James, left a small epistle, which is of the seven Canonical ones; and because in it he takes testimonies from the book of Enoch, which is apocryphal, it is rejected by very many. Nevertheless it has now merited authority by antiquity and use, and is computed among the holy scriptures." And the same [Jerome], in the epistle to Marcella, brings forth a testimony concerning it in these words: "In the canonical epistle, Jude the apostle, the brother of James, writes, saying: 'But I wish to remind you,' etc." And concerning all the Canonical epistles together — their number, authority, and authors — the same Jerome, expressing his own opinion and that of the whole church, in the epistle to Paulinus says thus: "James, Peter, John, and Jude wrote seven epistles, as mystical as they are succinct — both brief and long: brief in words, long in sentences." And in the prologue of the seven Cano[nical epistles]

[1] Book 3, ch. 25 (Lib. 3. c. 25).
[2] 2. Pet. 3.
[3] ch. 4 (cap. 4).
[4] heresy 26 (Hær. 26).

(printed p. 611 [PDF p. 616] — Heresy IX: Impugnatio concluded; the heretics' objections 1–7.)

[in the prologue of the seven Cano]nical [epistles], to Eustochium, explaining singularly their number and order, he says: "The order among the Greeks — those who think soundly (integre) and follow the right faith — is not the same as that of the seven epistles which are called canonical as it is found in the Latin codices: so that, because Peter is first in the order of the apostles, his epistles should also be first in the order of the rest. But as we have long since corrected the evangelists to the line of truth, so, God helping, we have restored these to their proper order. For the first of them is one of James; two of Peter; three of John; and one of Jude." From which things it appears clearer than light that all these epistles, even to the very times of the apostles, were always in the greatest authority, and were always believed to be theirs by whose name they are fore-noted.

OBIECTIONES HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

1. Against the epistle of James, which is first in order, the profane Luther, rising up, objects first that its sentences conflict with the doctrine of Paul. For Paul, writing to the Romans, says that man is justified not by works, but by faith, [1] proving this by the example of Abraham, who was justified before God not by works but by faith, as it is written: "Abraham believed God, and it was reputed to him unto justice." [2] The opposite of which the author of the present epistle teaches, asserting that Abraham was justified not by faith, but by works, saying: "Was not Abraham our father justified by works, offering Isaac his son upon the altar?" [3] — and a little after: "You see that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only." James, therefore, teaches the contrary of what Paul taught.

2. Next, that this epistle is far distant from evangelical piety appears from this: that its author — more than befits an evangelical man, one freed from the yoke of the law by the benignity of Christ — shows himself bitter and harsh, while he again threatens (intentat) the faithful with the most severe malediction of the Mosaic law, already abolished through Christ, saying: "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, but offend in one point, is become guilty of all." [4] Which sentence, if it be true, how will it be true that Christ exchanged the most bitter hardness of the law for the sweet yoke of the gospel, and the light burden, for the quiet of souls? Again, since in many things (as the same author says) we all offend, [5] shall we not through our whole life be defendants (rei) of the whole law — and after this life be excluded also from eternal life?

3. Nay, the very style of this epistle argues that it is not James the apostle's: for its phrase does not carry that apostolic majesty and gravity, nor so much of Hebraism as it is credible was present in James, the bishop of Jerusalem. Then, the salutation of the epistle is so plain (pura), and so void of all Christian spirit, that it is conformable to none of the apostolic epistles — announcing nothing of God, nothing of Jesus Christ, nothing of grace, nothing of peace, as the other epistles of the apostles do, but offering greeting (salutem) only, in the profane manner. Nor does he name himself apostle in the title of the epistle, but only "James" — although in our Latin codices the surname of "apostle" has been added, against the truth of the Greek exemplars, in which such a surname is nowhere read. From all which things joined together, the author of this epistle is rendered less certain, and its authority is not a little diminished.

4. There are present, moreover, testimonies not to be contemned of ancient writers who turn the authority of this epistle into doubt; among whom Eusebius of Caesarea, in the second book of the Ecclesiastical History, speaks thus: [6] "Thus far concerning James, whose is held to be that epistle which is written first among those that are called Catholic. Yet it must be known that it is not received by some; nor does any one of the ancients easily make mention of it — as neither indeed of that one which is said to be Jude's, which is itself also one of the seven." And D. Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men, wrote thus: [7] "James, the brother of the Lord, wrote only one epistle, which is of the seven Canonical ones; which also is itself asserted [to have been put forth] by some other under his name, although little by little, as time proceeded, it obtained authority." From which words of Jerome two things offer themselves to be gathered: one, that this epistle is another man's, who adorned himself with the name of James; the other, that the epistle cannot have canonical authority: because neither the long duration of time, nor the custom of the faithful, nor the tacit permission of a conniving church, can bring it about that any doctrine whatsoever should begin to be true, canonical, and divine, if of itself it was not such. For it is not in the power of men to make things that have not been revealed by the divine spirit to be divinely published, or things not written by a certain author to be written by that author. Thus Luther against the epistle of the apostle James.

5. Concerning the second epistle of Peter the same man doubts whether it be Peter's: because Eusebius, in the third book of the History, sets down these words about it: [8] "Peter the apostle left very few monuments of his preaching. For there is one epistle of his, of which no one at all has doubted; but of the second it is uncertain to many." And D. Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men: "The second epistle of Peter," says he, "is denied by very many to be his, on account of the dissonance of its style with the first."

6. Concerning the epistles likewise the second and third of John, it is certain (says he) that they are not his: because the author himself, in the salutation of each epistle, calls himself John — not the apostle, but the presbyter — the name of John being even left unsaid: "The presbyter, to the elect lady"; and, "The presbyter, to the dearest Gaius." Whence Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men, says: "John wrote one epistle, whose exordium is, 'That which was from the beginning' — which is approved by all ecclesiastical and erudite men. But the remaining two — of which the beginning of the first is, 'The senior, to the elect lady,' and of the following, 'The senior, to the dearest Gaius, whom I love in the truth' — are asserted to be John the presbyter's; whose second sepulchre is shown at Ephesus even today."

7. But the very first epistle of John the Anabaptists contend to have been falsified with foreign additions, the argument being taken from this: that in its fifth chapter that sentence has been added: "There are three who give testimony in heaven: the father, the word, and the Holy Spirit; and these three are one." [9] Which sentence they say was inserted in that place by the favorers of the Trinity — all the ancient exemplars of Greece crying out against it, in which those words of old were not; and even Jero[me…]

[1] Roma. 4.
[2] Gen. 15.
[3] Iac. 2.
[4] Iac. 2.
[5] Iac. 3.
[6] Cap. 23.
[7] Cap. 3 (so printed; the entry on James is ch. 2 in modern editions).
[8] Cap. 25.
[9] Ioan. 5 (1 John 5).

(printed p. 612 [PDF p. 617] — Heresy IX: objection 8; the Dissolutio, responses 1–4.)

[even] Jerome has testified in the preface of the canonical epistles. And Erasmus — who in his first edition of the New testament does not have it — affirmed on that account that he had passed it over, because in the Greek codices those words were not read.

8. Now concerning the epistle of Jude: besides the fact that Eusebius, in the third book of the History, and Jerome, in the book of illustrious men, assert that it was doubted of by the ancients, [1] and that the ancient Fathers cite no testimonies from it — as being apocryphal — this also shows the epistle to be apocryphal and unworthy of credit: that it confirms its doctrine with Apocryphal testimonies, adducing for this the uncertain writing of Enoch, saying: "And Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, [saying]: behold, the Lord will come amid his holy thousands, to do vengeance against all," etc. To these things he cites also the altercation of Michael with the devil over the body of Moses, which is read nowhere in the sacred letters. Wherefore, since the author of the epistle — the fountain of canonical scripture being left, whence he could have received innumerable testimonies for his argument concerning the perpetual punishment of the impious — borrows helps from an uncertain writing, he has deservedly made his epistle suspect, as one that leans upon the uncertain testimonies of apocryphal scripture. To which absurdity he has added another yet more absurd: that he has approved by his own testimony the apocryphal books of the prophecy of Enoch and of the devil's contest, and has conferred upon them an authority equal with the canonical scriptures, since he took testimonies from them to prove canonical doctrine, as from books certain, approved, and canonical. Thus the heretics.

DISSOLVTIO OBIECTORVM [The Dissolution of the Objections]

1. Luther, blinded by malice, errs most widely when he believes the sentence of James to be contrary to the doctrine of Paul. For he ought to have read Augustine, who, in the preface on Psalm 31, reconciles Paul and James to one another in these words: [2] "Concerning Abraham himself, we find [something] in the epistle of another apostle, who wished to correct men who had ill understood the apostle Paul himself. For James, in his epistle, against those who would not work well, presuming upon faith alone, commended the works of that same man whose faith Paul commended; and the apostles are not adverse to each other. For since Abraham, according to Paul, was justified by faith, as by a root and foundation, [and] according to James was justified by works, as by fruit and superstructure — these two apostles, understood in this manner, are entirely concordant between themselves."

2. Nor is the sentence of James so severe that it makes us defendants of the whole law for any lightest fault whatsoever, as Luther complains. For James, by that single "one," does not understand in one defect any least and venial sin whatsoever, but that one grave and great delict by which one sins against the law of the charity of God and of neighbor, and against the lawgiver — not from human fragility, but from contempt of the lawgiver; against which charity and lawgiver if anyone commit a crime, he deservedly becomes guilty of the whole law: because the fullness of the whole law is charity, and on it the whole law hangs. So Augustine expounded this place, in sermon 4 De tempore, saying: [3] "'Whoso offendeth in one, is become guilty of all.' What is this 'one,' except that which the Apostle says — that the whole law is completed in one discourse: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, and thy neighbor as thyself?" And in epistle 29 to Jerome he says: "He who offends in one is become guilty of all, if he acts against charity, whence the whole law hangs; for he becomes guilty of all by doing against that on which all things hang." From which it appears that the severity of his sentence is promulgated not against all sinners who offend in something, but against those alone who offend against the law of charity and its lawgiver, God — out of contempt and despite of the law and the lawgiver, not from fragility of the flesh, but from the iniquity of malice and malignity. Again, according to the exposition of Cyril, it can be said that those who have failed in one are pronounced guilty of the whole law, not because they are to be punished for the other precepts which they observed, as if they had transgressed them (for that would be altogether unjust), but because on account of the transgression of one command they will be deprived of the eternal reward no otherwise than if they had contemned all the divine precepts. D. Thomas, not differing much from this interpretation, says that the sinner failing in one is made guilty of all the commandments for this reason: that in the transgression of one he contemns him who is the author of all the precepts.

3. But in that he accuses the salutation of the epistle, as one containing nothing of God and of Christ, he openly raves: for there is set in it, "James, the servant of God and of our lord Jesus Christ" — than which what could be said more Christian? "But," says he, "he prefixes to the epistle that word of greeting (salutis) in use among the gentiles." O insane and stolid Luther! Does not Luke, in Acts 15, testify that the apostles, writing from the council of Jerusalem to the gentiles, prefixed the same word to their epistle, in these words: "The Apostles and elders, to the brethren out of the gentiles who are at Antioch, and in Syria and Cilicia — greeting (salutem)"? [4] And yet he is not ashamed to propose such ineptitudes in public. He urges also, with a like insanity, that the epistle should be rejected because it is very like [profane] salutations; and yet he has before his eyes the third epistle of John, whose salutation is like none of the apostolic epistles; likewise also the first epistle of John, in which the Apostle, no salutation being prefixed, begins as it were abruptly: "That which was from the beginning." This profane fellow says, moreover, that there is not in the epistle so much of the apostolic spirit as would befit James. But far otherwise judge the catholic fathers — Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and all the others — who decree that it was composed at the dictation of the Holy Spirit; whom we believe rather than the insane Luther. He says the surname of "Apostle" is lacking in the Greek exemplars; but his rash impudence is refuted: because all the most ancient of the Latin codices, and besides these also some Greek exemplars, have it — which is a manifest indication that the ancient exemplars of the Greeks had that very surname of the Apostle in the salutation of the epistle, and that afterward, either by chance or by malice, it fell out.

4. He adduces also the words of Eusebius — but truncated, according to the custom of the heretics — passing over that which Eusebius straightway adds: "We know, nevertheless, that this epistle, with the rest, is received by all the churches." With these

[1] Cap. 25.
[2] Augustine, in the preface on Psal. 31 (Aug. in præfa. psal. 31); Rom. 4; Iac. 4.
[3] Aug. ser. 4. de temp.
[4] Idem [Augustine] de ver. & fals. poen. cap. 14 (Ide de ver. & fals. poen. cap. 14).

(printed p. 613 [PDF p. 618] — Heresy IX: Dissolutio 4–8 — James, 2 Peter, 2–3 John, the Johannine comma, Jude.)

With these [words] he also sets down the saying of Jerome — which nevertheless in no way patronizes his cause: since it is well enough established, from very many other sentences of Jerome, that he reports not his own but others' opinion. Nor are the following words of Jerome to be interpreted so perversely that from them we should deduce, with Luther, that this epistle was made divine, and ascribed to James, either by the succession of times or by the dissimulation of the church, when of itself it was not such (for this is utterly impossible); but rather they are to be expounded thus, according to the true mind of Jerome: that this epistle — about which at first it was disputed among some whether it was written by the divine spirit, and whether by the apostle James — the church of Christ, little by little as time proceeded, discovered to be true, and canonical, and the genuine work of James himself; and so what the church herself, illuminated more and more with the progress of time, after the manner of the dawn, had found, she manifested and declared openly to all the faithful: namely, that the epistle is truly the apostle James's, and was composed by him at the dictation of the Holy Spirit. So much for the epistle of James.

5. Now concerning the second epistle of Peter: when Luther contends that it is to be doubted of, on account of the words of Eusebius and Jerome, the argument is vain and puerile. For besides the fact that each of them reports not his own but others' uncertain opinion — if on this account it is now lawful to be in doubt about this epistle, because certain men once doubted of it, it will be lawful also to doubt of the divinity of Christ, because at one time, before the reception of the Holy Spirit, it was doubted of by the apostles themselves, not yet fully believing. Wherefore, if in the time of Eusebius the second epistle of Peter was uncertain to many, because the church had not yet defined anything about it, now, after the definition of the church, it is so certain that no place of doubting about it is left any longer — except to heretics. And as to the diversity of style by which the two epistles of Peter differ between themselves, Jerome, in the Questions to Hedibia, gives satisfaction in these words: "The two epistles which are carried about as Peter's disagree between themselves in style and character and structure of words: from which we understand that Peter, according to the necessity of things, used diverse interpreters." Which sentence of Jerome shows that from the diversity of the style there is inferred a diversity not of authors, but of interpreters.

6. That likewise which Luther opposes against the two epistles of John, from the fore-notation of "presbyter," has no weight. For in these epistles that John the presbyter is the same who is both Apostle and evangelist; and he calls himself presbyter, or senior, on account of the notable long duration of his age. For he lived, as Jerome hands down in the book On Illustrious Men, until the sixty-eighth year after the passion of the Lord, and died at Ephesus, worn out with long old age, after he had founded the churches of Asia. Nor does the testimony of Jerome at all harm these epistles, since it is certain that he spoke not according to his own mind — which he himself expressed in places adduced above by us — but out of the opinion of others; as he himself testifies in that very place, straightway subjoining to his aforesaid words these: "On which matter, when in due order we come to Papias, his hearer, we shall discourse." And in [the entry on] Papias, when he was speaking of the twofold John, he subjoined: "Now this we have said on account of the above opinion, which we have related as handed down by very many — that the two later epistles of John are not the Apostle's, but the presbyter's."

7. Now to that which the impious Anabaptists and Servetians contend concerning those words added (as they say) in the fifth chapter of the first of John, we answer: that those words have always been of undoubted truth among catholics, and were read in all the Greek exemplars from the very times of the apostles. Nor is there need to doubt anything of their perpetual integrity and sincerity, since Hyginus, the first Pope [of that name], adduces them against heretics as an invincible testimony for the supreme Trinity. For thus he writes, in the epistle to all the faithful of Christ: "And again, John the evangelist himself, writing to the Parthians, saith: There are three who give testimony in heaven — the father, the word, and the Holy Spirit; and these three are one." Nay, holy mother church also chants that testimony every year, through the octave of Easter, in the sacred mysteries, as from the true and genuine epistle of the same evangelist. Nor did Jerome anywhere say that it was lacking in the Greek codices of the Catholic Church; on the contrary, in the prologue of the canonical [epistles], to Eustochium, he complains that these words were not turned into Latin by unfaithful and heretical translators, although they were read everywhere in the Greek volumes. For these are the words of Jerome in that prologue: "Which epistles, namely, if they had also been faithfully turned into Latin eloquence by interpreters just as they were digested by them — that is, by the Greek authors — they would neither cause ambiguity to readers, nor would the variety of their language impugn itself; especially in that place where we read set down, in the first epistle of John, [the passage] concerning the unity of the trinity: in which also we find that much error has been committed by unfaithful translators, against the verity of the faith — they setting down in their edition only the names of three [witnesses], that is, of the water, the blood, and the spirit, and omitting the testimony of the father, the word, and the Holy Spirit, by which above all both the catholic faith is strengthened, and the one substance of divinity of the father, the son, and the Holy Spirit is proved." Thus far Jerome. And as for what they add out of the first translation of Erasmus, the authority of this man moves us nothing — not a few of whose sentences the catholic church has lately condemned — since those words were always in the Greek exemplars, as we have shown, and even now are openly read in our Greek codices in this manner: τρεῖς εἰσιν οἱ μαρτυροῦντες ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, πατὴρ, λόγος, καὶ πνεῦμα ἅγιον, καὶ οἱ τρεῖς ἕν εἰσι. And Erasmus himself, in his annotations, confesses that these same words are had in most ancient Greek exemplars of Britain, of Spain, and of Rhodes.

8. Finally, concerning the epistle of Jude, it is no marvel if some of the ancients doubted of it, or rarely brought forth testimonies from it, since it also is of the number of those scriptures which came late (as we have already said) to the notice of the whole church. Nor is anything subtracted from its authority because its author cited apocrypha out of the book of Enoch: since Paul the apostle (as Jerome prudently observed) adduced testimonies in confirmation of his doctrine not only out of the apocrypha, but also out of the books of the gentile poets — such as that, when he disputed in the court of Mars [the Areopagus]: τοῦ γὰρ καὶ γένος ἐσμέν — [1]

[1] Act. 17; 1. Cor. 15; Tit. 1.

(printed p. 614 [PDF p. 619] — Heresy IX concluded; Heresy X, on the Apocalypse of John, begins: assertors and Impugnatio.)

that is, "For we are also his offspring"; and that other, φθείρουσιν ἤθη χρηστὰ ὁμιλίαι κακαί — that is, "Evil colloquies corrupt good manners"; and that, writing to Titus about the Cretans: Κρῆτες ἀεὶ ψεῦσται, κακὰ θηρία, γαστέρες ἀργαί — that is, "The Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, slothful bellies." [1] Of which the first hemistich Jerome attests to be the poet Aratus's, in the exordium of the Φαινομένων [Phaenomena]; the second, an iambic from a comedy of Menander; and the third, entire, from the book of oracles of Epimenides the Cretan, or from Callimachus of Cyrene, in the things which he sang of the praises of Jove. Nor on that account did Paul use the testimonies of the gentiles as though divine testimonies from the sacred books failed him, but that he might convict the students of gentile books even from the reading of their own books. Which it must be believed the apostle Jude also did, with a certain scholastic art, prudently: while he wished to persuade those to whom he was writing by testimonies produced even from those books which had authority among them. Nor does it therefore follow that Jude approved the books of Enoch because he took testimonies from them — just as neither did Paul approve the books of Epimenides, Menander, and Aratus when he received testimonies from them. For each of them approved those authors' books not whole and entire, but received only those testimonies from their books, the rest of what was read in them being omitted. Whence Jerome, in the commentaries on the epistle to Titus, confuting those who reprehended Paul because he had used the versicle of Epimenides against the Cretans, speaks thus: "Some think the Apostle is to be reprehended, in that he imprudently slipped: while he was convicting false teachers, he approved their versicles. To whom it must briefly be answered: in that he said 'Evil colloquies corrupt good manners,' and in that other, 'We are his offspring,' he did not straightway approve the whole comedy of Menander, and, in the present place, not the whole work of Callimachus or of Epimenides — of whom the one sings the praises of Jove, the other wrote of oracles — but by the one versicle he rebuked the Cretans only as liars, from the vice of the race; not on account of that opinion for which they are convicted by the poets, but confuting them, from their own native facility of lying, out of their nation's own author. Now those who think that one must follow the whole book of him whose versicle one has used, seem to me to receive also the apocryphon of Enoch — from which the Apostle Jude set a testimony in his epistle — among the scriptures of the church." Thus far Jerome; from whose words it is had that Jude did not therefore approve the whole book of Enoch, because he approved that one testimony in it. And let these things have been said concerning the Canonical epistles.

OF THE APOCALYPSE OF JOHN THE EVANGELIST — Heresy X (De Apocalypsi Ioannis Euangelistæ hæresis X)

That the Apocalypse is neither John the Apostle's, nor to be received among the canonical scriptures.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

Both parts of this heretical assertion were first carried into the church by the Alogi, or A[nti]logiani, whom we remembered again when we treated of the Gospel of John. These men (as Epiphanius, Philastrius, and Augustine relate) judge this book to have been fabricated by Cerinthus the heresiarch, the adversary of the Apostles, and stuffed with innumerable figments and juggleries (præstigiis); [2] whose blasphemy Theodore of Byzantium seconds, the prince of the Theodotians, against whom Epiphanius writes in the second book. But Luther and his fellow-conspirators — although they dare not openly condemn this book by themselves, against the universal assertion of the catholic church — nevertheless cunningly vituperate it under the person of others, and endeavor to shake it with many reasons, which they leave undissolved: saying that it was of old exploded by most erudite and most grave men, as the narration of a fabulous and made-up matter, in which there was nothing of the apostolic breast. And they are in doubt also about the author of the book — whether it was a certain John the presbyter, buried at Ephesus, or some other; for they say they have it as a thing ascertained that it is not the work of John the Apostle.

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

Against the rash error of these men fight the testimonies of the most ancient fathers, the determinations of councils, and the authority of the whole catholic church. And first of all Dionysius the Areopagite, the disciple of Paul, first showed this book to be John the Apostle and Evangelist's. For he, in the book on the ecclesiastical Hierarchy, setting down a universal partition of holy scripture, speaks thus of the Apocalypse: "Or that arcane and altogether mystical vision of the beloved disciple, divine, of the lord Jesus — and it expounds the most lofty theology to those who merit to become gods (dii fieri), and uplifts and confirms them through the sacred and divine mysteries." [3] By which words assuredly Dionysius has most clearly designated the holy Apocalypse of John. But because Luther, with his Academics, who call all things into doubt, contemns the testimony of Dionysius — saying that he is not that Dionysius the Areopagite, Paul's disciple, because he wrote no volumes; and that this is a new and supposititious Dionysius, sent forth into the light by some Greekling scarcely five hundred years ago, and adorned with the counterfeited surname of the Areopagite — let him know that he is refuted by the testimony of many ancient writers, and condemned besides by the authority of many Councils. For Gregory the Great, in the homily on the hundred sheep; and Pope Agatho, in the epistle to the sixth synod, and the sixth synod itself; and Pope Martin, in the synod celebrated at Rome; likewise John Damascene, in the books on the orthodox faith and against the Iconomastics [image-breakers] — make mention of Dionysius the Areopagite and of his books, and prove ecclesiastical dogmas out of them, as from the authority of a most holy and most ancient man. And after Dionysius, Justin the philosopher and martyr not only attested that the Apocalypse is John the Apostle's, but also (as Eusebius in the Chronicles and Jerome in the book On illustrious men are witnesses) pursued it with a most luminous exposition. Irenaeus also, in the fifth book against heresies, attested that the Apocalypse was written by John the Evangelist near the end of [the reign of] Domitian Caesar [4]

[1] Jerome on 1 [i.e., the first chapter of the epistle] to Titus, and in the epistle to Magnus (Hier. in 1. co. ad Titum, & in epist. ad Magnum).

[2] ch. 60 of the catalogue [Philastrius]; book 2, heresy 50 [Epiphanius — her. 51 in modern editions]; in the catalogue of heresies, ch. 22 [Augustine, De hær. — ch. 30 in modern editions]; heresy 54 (cap. 60. catalogi; li. 2. hær. 50; in catal. hær. cap. 22; hær. 54).

[3] ch. 3, part 1 (cap. 3. par. 1).

[4] Cap. 8; Lib. 4. c. 54 (as printed).

(printed p. 615 [PDF p. 620] — Heresy X: Impugnatio concluded; the heretics' objections 1–3.)

attested [that the Apocalypse was written by John near the end of Domitian], and put forth commentaries upon it. Theophilus likewise, bishop of Antioch, as Eusebius writes, used the testimonies of this book, as of the canonical scriptures, against the heresy of Hermogenes; and Melito of Asia, bishop of the church of Sardis, composed commentaries on this book as on a canonical work. [1] The Council of Ancyra also, celebrated under Diocletian Augustus, uses the sentences of this book for the confirmation of dogmas under the name of John the Apostle, whom it also asserts to be the author of this book. For thus it speaks in the sixth volume of Eusebius: [2] "John the Apostle saw the sacrament of the Apocalypse in the spirit, not in the body, as he himself says: 'I was in the spirit on the Lord's day,' etc." Dionysius also, pontiff of the church of the Corinthians, noble among the ecclesiastical writers, speaks of the Apocalypse of John, in the same Eusebius, in this manner: [3] "But I, so far as pertains to my own opinion, in no wise dare to spurn or cast away the scripture of this book — especially since many of the brethren think with me; and this rather is my judgment of it: that the things written in it exceed and rise above the measure of human hearing, and that there is in it a certain arcane and recondite and admirable sense, which I too admire and venerate even if I do not understand it; and I so think, that certain divine sacraments are covered over by human words: not so much discerning this by my own judgment as believing it by faith; and thus I do not reprobate the things I do not understand, but admire them the more, the less I attain to them." But John Damascene also, in the fourth book On the Faith, after he had woven together a catalogue of the divine volumes, placed the book of the Apocalypse last in it, under the name of John the evangelist. [4] And Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men, has this of the Apocalypse: "In the fourteenth year, therefore, Domitian stirring up the second persecution after Nero, John, relegated to the island of Patmos, wrote the Apocalypse, which Justin Martyr and Irenaeus interpret." And in the epistle to Paulinus, weaving an encomium of this same book: "The Apocalypse of John," says he, "has as many sacraments as words. I have said too little: in proportion to the merit of the volume, all praise is inferior. In its single words lie hidden manifold intelligences." The divine Augustine also, in the thirty-sixth tractate on John, says that the Apocalypse is that same John's whose is the gospel; and in the book On holy virginity he asserts that the Apocalypse is his — the beloved disciple, who reclined upon the breast of the lord at the supper; [5] and in the second book On Christian doctrine he numbers it among the canonical books — upon which he also put forth particular Annotations in a separate volume. I pass over the testimony of Ticonius the African concerning the Apocalypse, and his commentaries upon it, which Gennadius writes that he read [described] in his catalogue; likewise the joint attestation of Epiphanius, and of Isidore in the sixth book of the Etymologies; [6] of Ambrose too, and of the divine Gregory, of Bede, of Haymo, and of writers without number. I am silent also concerning the decrees of the fourth Synod of Toledo, and of other councils, on behalf of the venerable authority of this book — observing that I have produced far more testimonies than was needful; but the rash assertion of the Innovators (Nouatorum) compelled me to do so, who proclaim this book as scarcely acknowledged by the ancient fathers, and especially by the Greeks. We have wished, therefore, to show that through all the successions of the fathers, from the very first beginning of the nascent church even to our own times, it was always received, as the true and legitimate work of John, Apostle and Evangelist, into the number of the sacred volumes.

OBIECTIONES HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

1. To begin with, it is established again and again (they say) that the Apocalypse is not John the Apostle's, from the inscription of the work, which in all the Greek codices is had thus: ἀποκάλυψις τοῦ ἁγίου Ἰωάννου τοῦ θεολόγου — that is, "The Revelation of B. John the Theologian." [7] But that this "theologian" was one far other than John the evangelist, Papias, the hearer of John, attested, writing — in the books which he entitled OF THE LORD'S SAYINGS (Verborum Dominicorum) — that there were two Johns: the one the apostle; the other outside the number of the Apostles, whom, a certain distinction being made, he called John the presbyter, and associated with a certain Aristo. From which words when Eusebius of Caesarea, in the third book of the ecclesiastical history, chapter 38, had fallen into the suspicion that perhaps [this] John [the presbyter], and not John the Evangelist, was the author of the Apocalypse, he said: "By these things it is proved to be true, what certain Asians write: that there are two sepulchres at Ephesus, and each is called John's. To which if we attend more diligently, perhaps this second will be the John — if the first is not believed [to be he] — under whose name is had the revelation which is called John's." Moreover — because Eusebius brought forth [his view] concerning the author of this book under doubt — Dionysius bishop of Alexandria, Eusebius witnessing in the seventh of the History, expressed himself most clearly, not only affirming that it is not John the Evangelist's, but also showing this with reasons adduced; namely: [8]

2. From the very style of the writing: both because the phrase and manner of speaking of the two volumes — namely of the Gospel of John and of the Apocalypse — is diverse; and because John, who wrote the Gospel, nowhere in his Gospel made mention of his own name, nor signed himself by name; but this man, who wrote the Apocalypse, makes mention of his own name at almost the third word, often repeating that: "I John; I John" — [9] as though he were writing us not a book but a promissory note (syngrapham) — contrary to the custom of the other Apostles, and his own, who in the Gospel, keeping his name unsaid, indicates the author only, saying: "This is that disciple whom Jesus loved," etc.

3. Next, those very ecclesiastical writers who ascribe the Apocalypse to John the Apostle so disagree among themselves about the place and time in which and when John wrote it, that it evidently appears John the Apostle could not have been its author. For Irenaeus, at the end of the fifth book, handed down to memory that the Apocalypse was written near the close of the empire of Domitian; consenting with whom, Eusebius in the chronicles and Jerome in the book On Illustrious Men assert that it was written by John on the island of Patmos in the fourteenth year of Domitian. But Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, Arethas and Andreas, bishops of Cappadocia, and very many others of the Greeks, [say that it was written] under [10]

[1] Eus. lib. 4. cap. 25.
[2] cap. 7.
[3] Libr. 7. hist. eccl. cap. 23.
[4] Cap. 18.
[5] Cap. 27; Cap. 8.
[6] Lib. 2. hær. 51. cap. 2.
[7] Eus. lib. hist. cap. 38.
[8] Lib. hist. 7. cap. 23.
[9] Apoc. 1. b.
[10] Lib. 2. lib. 1. hær. (as printed).

(printed p. 616 [PDF p. 621] — Heresy X: objections 3–7; the Dissolutio, response 1 begins.)

hand down that it was put forth under Claudius Nero, almost forty years earlier. And Dorotheus, bishop of Tyre, handed down to memory that the gospel was written by John on Patmos, but the Apocalypse by no means [there]. Nay, the author himself, in the very beginning of the book, narrating the time of his vision, says that he heard his revelation on the holy Lord's day: "I John" (says he) "was in the spirit on the Lord's day"; [1] but it is most certain that in the time of John the Evangelist there was as yet no institution or appellation of the Lord's day, which was decreed by the fathers much later. Wherefore, since concerning the author, the place, and the time of this revelation nothing certain is had, it remains that it cannot be affirmed by us as ascertained that the Apocalypse is John the Apostle and Evangelist's. On these and suchlike things they lean who deny this book to be John the Evangelist's.

4. But those who cast this very volume out of the canon and ascribe it to Cerinthus the heretic — the Alogians — taking their occasion from the things which are treated in this revelation, arm themselves against it with these weapons (as Dionysius and Epiphanius recite), saying: [2] First, that there is nothing in it agreeable to the sanctity and majesty of John, but all things vain and well-nigh ridiculous, of no utility or fruit. "For what utility" (say they) "comes to us out of this Apocalypse, which teaches us nothing besides certain empty things about seven stars, seven angels, seven eyes, seven candlesticks, seven trumpets, seven vials, seven seals, and frivolous things of this sort? — which, since they are covered over with a certain thick veil of ignorance, under wrappings of visions and enigmas of dreams, are worthy to be called not a revelation, but rather a veiling and an enveloping (non reuelationis, sed velationis & obuolutionis)."

5. To these add that in some places it is even manifestly caught lying, writing to churches which exist nowhere, nor ever did exist, saying: "And to the angel of the church which is in Thyatira write: These things saith the son of God, who hath eyes…" etc. [3] But in Thyatira — a city which is in Mysia, on the left side of the river Caycus — there was never, in the time of John, any church of Christians. How then does he write to her who is nowhere?

6. Besides these things, moreover, it contains the heretical dogmas of Cerinthus: namely, the restoration of an earthly kingdom in Jerusalem, and of the temple, and of the Jewish festivities, when he says: "I saw the holy city Jerusalem, new, descending from heaven, prepared by God as a bride adorned for her husband; and I heard a voice: behold the tabernacle of God with men, and he will dwell with them." [4] And a little after: "And the kings of the earth shall bring their glory into her; and the nations shall walk in her light; and her gates shall not be shut by day." [5] Likewise a satiety of foods and abundance of cups, when he says: "They shall not hunger nor thirst any more; and he shall lead them to the fountains of waters"; [6] and again: "To him that overcometh I will give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the paradise of my God; and I will give him the hidden manna." And again, future nuptials, and the pleasures of wedlock, and the other enticements of the flesh, saying: "Let us be glad and rejoice, for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath prepared herself. Blessed are they who are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb." [7] And then, after these things, the time of the kingdom of Christ and of the saints, according to the heresy of the χιλιαστῶν [Chiliasts], he designates as destined to endure through the space of a thousand years on earth, when he says: "And I saw the souls of the beheaded, for the testimony of Jesus; and they lived, and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not, until the thousand years be consummated. This is the first resurrection. Blessed is he who hath part in the first resurrection: in these the second death hath no power; but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." [8] All which things Cerinthus — that greatest friend of the flesh and of lusts — dictated according to the lasciviousness of his own wit; and, that he might strengthen them with the authority of an apostolic name, he divulged them under the title of John. These things the Alogians, in Epiphanius and Dionysius.

7. But the Lutherans superadd to these arguments of the Alogians that Eusebius, in the third volume of the History, relates that Gaius, a most ancient and most celebrated writer of the catholic church, wrote in the dialogue of his disputations that Cerinthus the heretic composed the book of this Apocalypse under the name of John, that by the authority of the apostolic name he might confirm an earthly kingdom of Christ, to endure through a thousand years. [9] To which they add also another disadvantage (incommodum) for this work: that none of the Greek churches receives it in the canon of the sacred volumes — as Jerome says to Dardanus: "Nor indeed do the churches of the Greeks receive the Apocalypse of John with the same liberty." And neither Anastasius the Greek author, nor the Council of Laodicea, enumerates the Apocalypse in the catalogue of the divine letters.

DISSOLVTIO OBIECTORVM [The Dissolution of the Objections]

1. From how light causes these heretics cast away the holy Apocalypse is shown first of all by that lightest of conjectures which they produce concerning the inscription of the book — not knowing that B. John the Theologian is the same who was both Apostle and evangelist; who, on account of the sublimity of his gospel, in which he touched the most lofty things concerning the divinity of the Word, and raised himself higher than the other evangelists, has been celebrated by the ancient writers under the name of "the Theologian" — by Dionysius the Areopagite especially, whose tenth epistle is still extant, fore-noted with these words: "To John the Theologian, Apostle and Evangelist, relegated on the island of Patmos"; in which Dionysius himself, speaking of the theology of John the Evangelist, inserts these words: "But us no storm, no adversity shall deprive of the most bright ray of John — [we being] indeed destined to attain it by the memory and renewal of thy most true theology," etc. In like manner invalid is the conjecture which they draw from the suspicion of Eusebius and the testimony of Dionysius of Alexandria, perversely understood. For Eusebius, in his Chronicles and in very many chapters of the ecclesiastical history, so openly confesses the Apocalypse to be John the apostle's, that he easily frees himself from this suspicion, and shows that he brought forth those words out of the opinion of others. And Dionysius does not deny that the Apocalypse is John the apostle's, but says only this: that he knows the author of the Apocalypse to be called John, and that it was written through the Holy Spirit; but that this is not clearly established for him — whether Jo[hn…]

[1] Apoc. 1. b.
[2] Epiph. lib. 2. hær. 51.
[3] Apoc. 2. c.
[4] Apo. 21.
[5] Ibidem.

[6] Apoc. 21; Ap. 7. & 1.
[7] Ap. 19.
[8] Apoc. 20.
[9] Cap. 28.

(printed p. 617 [PDF p. 622] — Heresy X: Dissolutio 1 concluded, 2–4 — style, chronology, the Lord's day, and the spiritual sense of the sevens.)

whether it be John the apostle's, on account of the diversity of style and the frequent repetition of his own name. And even if of old there was some doubt or other about it, before the decree concerning it was made in the Church, we, after so long an approbation of the church and of the fathers, can no longer be in two minds about it.

2. Now concerning the diversity of style, which these Innovators always inculcate and repeat in almost all the books of scripture, we answer that the conjecture from style is feeble, seeing that style must needs be varied according to the diversity of the argument. Wherefore, since in the Gospel of John and in the Apocalypse the argument is diverse, it would not be greatly to be wondered at if John had kept a diverse manner of speaking in the two. And yet the character of the two volumes does not very much disagree: for both were written in the common dialect of the Greeks, and with the same phrases and idioms of the Hebrew tongue. And if in the Apocalypse he makes frequent mention of his own name, of which he had never made mention in his Gospel, it is no wonder. For in the Gospel he was writing another's history — namely, Jesus Christ's — wherefore there was no need to name himself; but in the Apocalypse he was writing revelations and visions narrated to himself, in which to interpose his own name frequently was not at all beside the matter.

3. Nor is the argument less infirm which they adduce from the controversy of fathers dissonant among themselves about the time and place. For it does not follow that the Iliad of Homer was not put forth by Homer himself, because concerning the time and place in which Homer wrote, and likewise concerning Homer's fatherland, there has always been contention among his expositors, the suit still hanging before the judge. Wherefore, even if the sentences of the fathers differed about the place and time of the scripture, not on that account would the scripture itself have to be doubted. How much less, then, is there now to be any wavering, when the aforesaid sentences of the fathers, diligently considered, differ nothing among themselves? For Dorotheus does not deny that the Apocalypse was written on Patmos, but is silent and passes it by in silence. But if from his silence they would conclude that the Apocalypse is not John the Apostle's, by the same reasoning they will have to conclude that the first epistle of John the apostle is not his, because this Dorotheus made no mention of it. And as for what they object concerning the Lord's day — that it was not yet instituted in the time of John — it is most false, the consensus of the whole church crying out against it, which believes that the solemnity of the Lord's day was founded by the apostles themselves in memory of the Lord's resurrection. Of whose institution by the apostles Augustine testifies, in sermon 25 De tempore, in these words: "The apostles, therefore, and apostolic men, decreed that the Lord's day was for this reason to be held in religious solemnity: because on it our redeemer rose from the dead." Nor does that derogate from the authority of the Apocalypse, that even to the times of Eusebius there was disputation in the Church about its author and its authority; nay rather, this lends it much greater credit. For since John had begun a new kind of writing, and was writing things future — not things done, as the other writers of the new testament had — the novelty of the matter furnished a handle of admiration and of ambiguity to those first fathers; and that doubt yielded to the credit of the greater work: because this book was received by them into the order of the sacred volumes only after the matter had been diligently examined and discussed. Wherefore, even if it was at one time doubted of, it ought not now to be of less authority than the other sacred books, since the church has received it into the canon with a veneration equal to the rest. And let these things be said to those who deny that John the Apostle is the author of the Apocalypse.

4. It remains now that we confute the calumnies of those who accuse the Apocalypse as useless and pernicious, and full of the dogmas of Cerinthus: vituperating the things that are obscurely narrated in it of the seven trumpets, candlesticks, and angels — as if they were to be understood Judaically, that is, carnally, and according to the dead letter (as they perversely suppose), and not rather spiritually and mystically, according to the mind of the author; who at the beginning of his narration teaches that he saw the things which he wrote not carnally and corporally, but spiritually — since he was rapt in the spirit on the Lord's day, [1] and, the divine spirit thoroughly showing them, beheld the sacraments of intellectual visions not with the eyes of the body but of the mind. For he himself, in that same place, calls his visions "Sacraments" — that is, sacred secrets — that from this we may know that, just as in all sacraments one thing is seen and heard outwardly, but another is understood inwardly and spiritually through allegory, so in his visions one thing is represented without, another is found and uncovered within. So that by the seven golden candlesticks we should understand the seven churches, burning with divine charity and illuminated by the wisdom of the divine light, to which John writes; and by the seven stars and seven angels, the rulers and bishops of the seven churches (as John himself expounds), who ought to shine for others with the splendor of doctrine and of work; by the seven eyes of the Lamb, the seven gifts of the holy spirit, with which the Lamb — Christ — as with seven most bright rays, irradiates the darkness of our souls; [2] by the seven seals, the seven revelations of things to be carried on in the church through seven future times — sealed and shut up in the book of the divine mind to such a degree that, unless the Lamb had opened the book of his own arcana, we could never have either read or understood them; by the seven trumpets, the seven orders of preachers and teachers, who through the seven coming ages, even to the consummation of the world, were to succeed one another in turn: to uncover, by the sound of the evangelical voice, the ambushes of the heretics; to frighten off, by the clangor of the divine word, the rebel minds of tyrants; and to stir up the souls of the faithful, that they might sustain the assaults of the enemies and fight fiercely against their endeavors; and by the seven vials, the seven plagues and seven tribulations which the Church, through seven ages succeeding one another, was to suffer even to the end of the present world. All and each of which things were written by John the apostle not in vain, nor without any profit to the Church (as the heretics calumniate), but for the perpetual consolation of the faithful and the stability of the Christian faith. For the Apostle wished to hand down to the memory of posterity the things God revealed to him concerning the future tribulations and persecutions of the church, lest the faithful, terrified by the unforeseen arrival of these things, should suffer scandal,

[1] Apoc. 1.
[2] Apoc. 1.

(printed p. 618 [PDF p. 623] — Heresy X: Dissolutio 4 concluded, 5–7; end of Book VII: "Septimi Libri Finis.") and should fall away from the faith of Christ, thinking that the church of the Christians, oppressed with such great slaughters, was of no care to God, and that, its affairs being altogether despaired of, it was rolling down to final destruction. Meeting this scandal of the faithful, therefore, John prophetically foretold the calamities and hardships impending over the church even to the end of the world: so that, when the fullness of their time should arrive, the elect of God, already forewarned out of his writing, might not be troubled or waver at all, but might persevere firmer and more stable in the faith, seeing those things then being fulfilled in the Church which, long before they came to pass, the Holy Spirit had foretold through the mouth of his Apostle; and might come forth daily more robust in hope and in patience — hoping, again, after a little while, both the brief labor of the Church, and the promised rest for those who labor, victory for those who contend, the palm for the victors, and, the palm being obtained, the crown of eternal felicity. And this is the admirable utility of this book: that the punishments denounced in it terrify us, and the promised rewards gladden us. Yet John wrote these things obscurely and in wrapped-up fashion (inuolutè), lest his prophetic scripture should grow cheap, and lest there should lie open to the heretical robbers (latrunculis) a place for perverting it. And he called it by the most fitting name of Apocalypse for this reason: that all the things contained in this book were revealed and manifested to him, and he himself also revealed some of them to us. Whence in vain do the heretics make it a crime, [saying] that it ought rather to have been inscribed an involution than a revelation.

5. But as to what they reprehend concerning the Church which (they say) was by no means in Thyatira in John's time, Epiphanius answers: that John, in the prophetic spirit, wrote not to that [church] which then was not, but to that which afterward was to be there; and fore-announced to it how it was to err, deceived by the false prophetesses of the Phrygasters [Montanists] — namely Priscilla, Maximilla, and Quintilla — whom he designated under the name of Jezabel the prophetess, seducing the servants of Christ. [1] And the same Epiphanius writes that this church, in his own times, had been purged again from every heresy of the Phrygasters.

6. Finally, as to those things in which they accuse this book of the dogmas of Cerinthus, they gravely err — being ignorant that the things related in this book about the restoration of Jerusalem, and the nuptials of the Lamb, and the satiety of hunger and thirst, are to be understood not corporally and carnally of that corruptible Jewish Jerusalem, but of the heavenly and sempiternal Jerusalem — that is, of the Church, the bride of Christ; which John saw adorned with the ornaments of immortality and impassibility and the other divine dowries, together with her spouse Christ, in sempiternal felicity, to come after the judgment — [2] yet not before that first resurrection should take place, which is not corporal but spiritual, namely of the soul from sins; and this indeed he called the first resurrection, to distinguish it from the second, general resurrection, in which all sou[ls] will rise again with their bodies — just as by the second death he understood the perpetual damnation of soul and body; and by the thousand years of that [first] resurrection he designated the space between the seventh tribulation of the church and the coming of Antichrist: so that he took a determinate number (which is most frequent in the divine letters) for an indeterminate number of years. And that John wrote of the heavenly and spiritual Jerusalem, and not of the earthly, he himself discloses, when he adds that he saw no temple in her — "for the Lord God omnipotent and the lamb was the temple thereof" — nor Sun nor Moon to shine in her, "for the clarity of God illuminated her, and her lamp was the Lamb"; [3] at whose glorious conjunction with the church, in eternal beatitude, those saints rejoice, saying: "Let us be glad and rejoice, for the marriage of the lamb is come" — in which, namely, the Church was joined to Christ: she who, while she before was warring (militando), had been the spouse of Christ in hope, then at last, triumphing, was made the spouse of Christ in reality (in re); whose bridal garments and mystical ornaments are the justifications (as John says) and the merits of the saints. And the Nuptials to which the saints are invited are filled not with corporeal banquets and the other enticements of gluttony and of the flesh, but with the hidden manna — that is, with the presence of the divinity of Christ, which is the true manna — and with the tree of life, that is, the presence of the glorious humanity of Christ: in the sight of which things there will be present the end of all our desires, nor will there any longer be in us groaning or weeping, but a perpetual and stable beatitude, of soul and of body alike, destined to endure into everlasting.

7. Now finally, what the Lutherans adduce concerning the words of Gaius is altogether futile. For neither can that be deduced from the words of Gaius, nor does Eusebius affirm it; nor does the sentence of Gaius recited by Eusebius commemorate any such thing, but indicates only this: that Cerinthus had introduced his own heresy through certain revelations, as though written by a great Apostle. [4] Which words do not assert that Cerinthus was the author of those revelations, but that out of those revelations of the great Apostle, perversely understood, he introduced the falsity of his own dogma — as the words of Dionysius, bishop of the Corinthians, adduced by Eusebius immediately after these, show clearer than light; and Dionysius, in the same Eusebius, narrates it more at large. And concerning the catalogues of Anastasius and of the Council of Laodicea, in which the Apocalypse is not recounted, there is nothing to be wondered at, since in those times the Catholic Church had not yet decreed anything concerning its authority — as she afterward decreed that it was to be received in the Canon of the holy volumes. [5] Let all the heretics therefore cease to assail the holy Apocalypse of John with maledictions, and let them acknowledge themselves overcome by these things which, God aiding, have been said by us.

*

Septimi Libri Finis. (The End of the Seventh Book.)

[1] Lib. 2. hære. 51; Apoc. 1 (recte 2).
[2] Apo. 21.
[3] Apo. 21.
[4] Eus. lib. hist. 3. cap. 28.
[5] Lib. 7. his. (as printed).

Sixtus of Siena, O.P.

BIBLIOTHECA SANCTA — BOOK VIII

On those who have assailed the volumes of the Old Testament

English translation — Bibliotheca Sancta, BOOK VIII

TABLE OF HERESIES

The 13 heresies confuted in this book, in order, with the parts of each. The page number is the page of this English translation.

Page 4: OF THE OLD TESTAMENT in general — Heresy I (De Veteri Testamento in universali. Haeresis I)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 4
- The Refutation — p. 5
- Objections of the Heretics — p. 10
- The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 13

Page 18: OF THE OLD TESTAMENT in general — Heresy II (De Veteri Testamento in universali. Haeresis II)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 18
- The Refutation — p. 18
- Objections of the Heretics — p. 20
- The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 23

Page 25: OF THE BOOKS OF THE MOSAIC LAW — Heresy III (De Libris Mosaicae legis. Haeresis III)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 26
- The Refutation — p. 26
- Objections of the Heretics — p. 26
- The Diluting of the Objections — p. 28

Page 32: OF THE PROPHETIC BOOKS — Heresy IV (De Libris Propheticis. Haeresis IIII)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 32
- Objections of the Heretics — p. 33
- The Diluting of the Objections — p. 34

Page 36: OF THE BOOK OF PSALMS — Heresy V (De Libro Psalmorum. Haeresis V)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 36
- The Refutation — p. 36
- Objections of the Heretics — p. 38
- The Objections Are Dissolved — p. 40

Page 42: OF THE BOOK OF DANIEL — Heresy VI (De Libro Danielis. Haeresis VI)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 42
- The Refutation — p. 43
- Objections of the Heretics — p. 44
- The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 46

Page 49: OF THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTES — Heresy VII (De Libro Ecclesiastis. Haeresis VII)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 49
- The Confutation — p. 50

Page 51: OF THE CANTICLE OF CANTICLES — Heresy VIII (De Cantico Canticorum. Haeresis VIII)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 51
- The Confutation — p. 52

Page 53: OF THE BOOKS OF WISDOM AND OF ECCLESIASTICUS — Heresy IX (De Libris Sapientiae et Ecclesiastici. Haeresis IX)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 53
- The Refutation — p. 53
- The Objections of the Heretics — p. 56
- The Solution — p. 57

Page 57: OF THE BOOK OF JOB — Heresy X (De Libro Iob. Haeresis X)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 57
- The Refutation — p. 58
- The Objections of the Heretics — p. 58
- The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 60

Page 64: OF THE BOOKS OF ESDRAS, TOBIT, JUDITH, AND ESTHER — Heresy XI (De Libris Esdrae, Tobiae, Iudith, et Esther. Haeresis XI)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 64
- The Refutation — p. 64
- The Objections of the Heretics — p. 65
- The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 67

Page 71: OF THE BOOKS OF MACCABEES — Heresy XII (De Libris Maccabaeorum. Haeresis XII)
- The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 71
- The Refutation — p. 72
- The Objections of the Heretics — p. 73

The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 76
Page 81: OF THE TRANSLATIONS OF SACRED SCRIPTURE — Heresy XIII (De Translationibus Sacrae Scripturae. Haeresis XIII)
The Assertors of this Heresy — p. 81
The Refutation — p. 81
The Objections of the Heretics — p. 90
The Dissolution of the Objections — p. 96

(printed p. 619 [PDF p. 624] — Book VIII opens: title-block, Praefatio, Catalogue of 13 heresies; Heresy I begins, with its Assertores, Impugnatio, and first Proposition.)

BIBLIOTHECA SANCTA — BOOK VIII

Of Friar Sixtus of Siena, of the Order of Preachers: On those who have assailed the volumes of the Old Testament, or, Against the destroyers of the old Scripture (De his qui veteris testamenti volumina oppugnarunt, sive adversus veteris scripturae destructores) — the Eighth Book of the Bibliotheca Sancta

PRAEFATIO [Preface]

We demolished (Destruximus) in the preceding, seventh volume all the heresies which, from these times down [to our own], have arisen against the evangelical and apostolic scriptures of the New Testament: now, the order of disputation leading on, we subjoin to this work the Eighth and last book, pursuing in it the exposition and confutation of those heresies which, at various times, divers heretics stirred up against the Mosaic, the Prophetic, the Parenetic [hortatory], and the Historical books of the Old Instrument. Which being completed — the divine power favoring [us] — our labor will find the wished-for end of our whole work.

CATALOGUE OF THE HERESIES which are confuted in this eighth Book (Haereseon quae in hoc octavo Libro confutantur catalogus)

Of the Old Testament in general	Heresy 1
Of the Old Testament	Heresy 2
Of the books of the Mosaic law	Heresy 3
Of the Prophetic books	Heresy 4
Of the book of Psalms	Heresy 5
Of the book of Daniel	Heresy 6
Of Ecclesiastes	Heresy 7
Of the Canticle of Canticles	Heresy 8
Of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus	Heresy 9
Of the book of Job	Heresy 10
Of the books of Esdras, Tobias, Judith, and Esther	Heresy 11
Of the books of the Maccabees	Heresy 12
Of the Translations of divine Scripture	Heresy 13

OF THE OLD TESTAMENT in general — Heresy I (De Veteri Testamento in universali. Haeresis I)

To cast away the whole Old Testament — [as] made for the Jews alone, founded by the evil God of the Jews, and augmented by his followers with fabricated narrations; of no profit in any part to the Christian faith; noxious moreover to good morals; and contrary to the evangelical doctrine.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

The first authors of this prodigious and abominable heresy were those, whosoever they were, that introduced two Gods: one, namely, of the Hebrews, evil and false; the other, of the Christians, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, good and true. Of whom the chief (Epiphanius being witness) was Simon Magus the Samaritan, the first heretic after the ascension of Christ, who taught that the old testament — namely the law and the prophets — was put forth by a sinister power (virtus) and by evil angels. [1] To whom, in the same error, there succeeded Basilides, Carpocras, the Valentinians (so printed "Valerini"), who are also [called] Gnostics, the Ptolemaeans, the Heracleonites, the Cainites (Caiani), the Archontics, the Cerdonians, the Marcionists, the Apelleians, and the Severians — who by the same assent cast away the old testament, either wholly (ex integro) or in part. [2] After [these] others, in the times of the Emperor Aurelian, a certain Persian named Cubricus, surnamed Manes, so exalted this heresy — [which had] somewhat subsided — that his name has almost remained upon it. [3] Then his disciples, who for honor's sake called their teacher MANICHAEVS — that is, the pourer-out of manna (mannae effusor) — having sent forth the pernicious books of the same error, spread the now-famous heresy more widely over the whole world. Of their number the more eminent were a certain Addas, surnamed Adimantus, a disciple of Manichaeus while he was yet living; and, many years after him, Faustus the African, a Milevitan by fatherland; and a certain unnamed disciple of Fabritius, far worse than the Manichaeans of old — fragments of whose volumes are still preserved in the books of Augustine among the confutations of the Manichaeans. [4] There were also, as Augustine relates, certain Patrician heretics, named from a certain Patricius, who subscribed to the same heresy. After whom, through many ages of years, the Bogomil heretics of the Bulgarian nation, and at last the Albanenses [the Albanensian Cathars], called this same error — buried [as it had been] through so long a length of times — back again into the light. [5] And these are they who thought that the whole old testament was to be rejected wholly.

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

The present assertion of the heretics comprises five detestable and blasphemous propositions, which we shall endeavor to destroy in order, with as much brevity as may be.

Proposition the first. The first proposition is: THAT THE WHOLE OLD TESTAMENT IS FROM THE EVIL GOD OF THE HEBREWS, WHO IS THE DEVIL. And it is destroyed

[1] Epiphanius, in the Anacephaleosis (Epip. in Anacephaleosi); Jerome, in the preface to Titus (Hier. in praefat. ad Titum).

[2] Augustine, in the catalogue of heresies [De haeresibus], and book 2 against the adversary of the law, ch. 12 (Aug. in catalogo haere. & li. 2. co. adu. leg. cap. 12).

[3] Epiphanius, book 2, heresy 66 (Epiph. lib. 2. haer. 66).

[4] Augustine, book 2 against the adversary of the law and the prophets, ch. 12 (Aug. lib. 2. co. adu. legis & pro. cap. 12).

[5] Euthymius [Zigabenus], book 2, Panoplia [Dogmatica], title 23 (Euthy. li. 2. panoplia tit. 23).

(printed p. 620 [PDF p. 625] — Heresy I: refutation of Proposition 1 (one God of both testaments); Proposition 2 and Proposition 3.)

And moreover this execrable opinion is destroyed by the testimonies of the new testament, which make one and the same God the author of each testament. For Paul, saying that Abraham had two sons — one of the handmaid, and the other of the free woman, which by allegory signify the two testaments — shows that, just as there are two women and one man, so also there are two testaments, and one God, who bequeathed both. [1] And the same Apostle, writing to the Hebrews, making a mutual comparison of the two testaments, calls the one new and the other old; and says that the new was confirmed by its own testator, unto the imitation and completion of the old, in blood, through the death of Christ — so that, his death intervening for the redemption of the transgressions which were under the old testament, we might receive the promises (repromissiones) which were signified in it. [2] Therefore, unless Christ, the mediator of the new testament, had seen that the old testament was from the good God, he would by no means have completed it by imitating it. But he imitated it for this reason: because, as he himself says in the Gospel: "Whatsoever the son seeth the father do, this the son also doeth in like manner." [3] And that the same God spoke in each testament, the same Paul everywhere openly teaches, saying: "Paul, an Apostle, set apart unto the Gospel of God, which he had before promised by his prophets in the holy scriptures concerning his son." [4] And again: "In many ways (multifarie) and in many manners God, of old speaking to the fathers in the prophets, hath last of all spoken to us in [his] son." [5] And elsewhere: "Having the same spirit of faith, as it is written: I believed, for which cause I have spoken" — intimating by this that both testaments were inspired by the same spirit. [6] And Zacharias testifies that he is the same God of Israel who spoke in the old testament by the mouth of the holy prophets, and who in the new testament visited and wrought the redemption of his people; [7] with whom Mary, consenting in her Canticle, sings: "He hath received [taken up] Israel his servant, being mindful of his mercy: as he spoke to our fathers, Abraham, and to his seed for ever." [8] And lest we should perchance believe that there had been some prophet in whom God did not speak, therefore Peter added: "God, who by the mouth of all the prophets foretold that his Christ should suffer, hath so fulfilled it." [9] To which testimonies this demonstration also is joined: since the Mosaic law — on which the whole old testament depends — was founded by its author for this reason, that it might lead its cultivators to Christ as to the end of the law, Paul saying: "The end of the law is Christ"; [10] and, "The law was our pedagogue in Christ." [11] How can it be that that evil God of the Manichaeans, the perpetual enemy of our Lord Jesus Christ, should have promulgated the law and the testament by whose leading his followers were led to the worship of Christ — by whom he himself was to be cast out of [his] kingdom, Christ saying: "The prince of this world shall be cast forth"? [12] The one and only author, therefore, of both testaments is God, the father of our Lord Jesus Christ. [13]

Proposition the second. The second proposition is: THAT THE OLD TESTAMENT PERTAINS NOT TO CHRISTIANS, BUT TO THE JEWS ALONE ONLY. The absurdity of this is caught from this: that a testament pertains to those to whom the gifts and promises of the testament pertain, and who fulfill the conditions of the testament. But it is certain both that the conditions of the old testament are not kept by those who are Jews according to the flesh only, and that the promises of that same testament were not made on account of such [men]; but on account of the true Israelites, content with the promise of the seed of Abraham — that is, on account of those who believe in Christ, who is the sum and end of all the promises of the old testament, Paul saying: "For however many are the promises of God, in him they are [yea]." [14] And again: "I say that Christ was a minister of the circumcision, for the confirming of the promises of the fathers" — which promises, indeed, pertain not to those who are only of the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, [15] but to those, as Paul says, who are the sons of the promise of Abraham, and are reckoned in the seed of Isaac, of whom it was said: "In Isaac shall thy seed be called" — who is Christ. [16] For to Abraham, as the same Apostle writes to the Galatians, were the promises made, and to his seed. He saith not, "and to seeds," as of many, but as of one, "and to thy seed," which is Christ. [17] Concerning whose salvation, as Peter says, all the prophets searched and inquired, who prophesied of the grace to come upon us. [18] And that not only the promises of the old testament, but also all its other mysteries, were made on account of us, the heirs of these promises — that we might be rendered fit for obtaining them — Paul, to the Corinthians, openly expressed in these words: "I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and all were baptized in Moses in the cloud and in the sea, and all ate the same spiritual food, and all drank the same spiritual drink: for they drank of the spiritual [rock] that followed them, and the rock was Christ. Now these things were done in a figure of us." [19] And a little after: "All these things happened to them in figure; and they were written for our sake, upon whom the ends of the world are come." And to the Romans again: "Whatsoever things were written, were written for our instruction, that through patience and consolation we might have hope." [20] And that the true understanding of the old testament, taken away from the Jews, has passed over to us, the same Apostle testifies, saying: "Even unto this present day the selfsame veil, in the reading of the old testament, remaineth not taken away, which in Christ is made void; but even unto this present day, when Moses is read, the veil is laid upon their heart." [21] Wherefore, since they themselves neither understand nor keep the will of the testator and the conditions handed down in the testament, it is manifest that that testament pertains to us, who hold Christ, the end of its promises, know the will of the testator, and keep the conditions of the commandments set forth by him.

Proposition the third. The third proposition is: THAT THE OLD TESTAMENT HAS BEEN CONTAMINATED BY THE JEWS WITH FABRICATED NARRATIONS. Against a proposition so wicked and impious all the evangelical and Apostolic scriptures cry out — taking from the old books innumerable testimonies and examples for the confirmation of doctrine, for exhortation, correction, and consola-

[1] Gal. 4; Epiphanius, book 2, heresy 66 (Gal. 4; Epiph. lib. 2. haer. 66).
[2] Heb. ch. 9 (Heb. cap. 9).
[3] John 5. a (Ioan. 5. a).
[4] Rom. 1. a (Rom. 1. a).
[5] Heb. 1. a (Heb. 1. a).
[6] 2 Cor. 4; Psalm 115 (2. Cor. 4; Psal. 115).
[7] Luke 1 (Luc. 1).
[8] Luke 1 (Luc. 1).
[9] Acts 3 (Act. 3).
[10] Rom. 10 (Rom. 10).
[11] Gal. 3 (Gal. 3).
[12] John 12 (Ioan. 12).
[13] Augustine, book 19 against Faustus (Aug. lib. 19. contra Faust.).
[14] 2 Cor. 1 (2. Cor. 1).
[15] Rom. 15 (Rom. 15).
[16] Rom. 9 (Rom. 9).
[17] Gal. 3 (Gala. 3).
[18] 1 Pet. 1 (1. Pet. 1).
[19] 1 Cor. 10 (1. Cor. 10).
[20] Rom. 15 (Rom. 15).
[21] 2 Cor. 3 (2. Cor. 3).

(printed p. 621 [PDF p. 626] — Heresy I: refutation of Proposition 3 concluded; Proposition 4 (that the OT is useless for faith and adverse to morals) refuted.)

[for the confirmation of doctrine, for exhortation, correction, and] consolation of the faithful — not as [drawn] from fabulous [writings], but as from most truthful scriptures, composed at the dictation of the Holy Spirit. To these, as to an uncontaminated fountain of truth, Christ sent those skilled in the law, saying: "Search the scriptures; for they give testimony of me." [1] To these, as to intact letters of incorrupt faith, he called back his disciples, when — beginning from Moses, and running through the psalms and the prophets — he expounded all the things that were written of him in the old books, and demonstrated them fulfilled in his very self with a most certain outcome. [2] Out of these [scriptures], as out of sincere and inviolate writings, the two evangelists Matthew and Luke briefly gathered the two genealogies of our Lord — the one beginning from Abraham and descending, through the successions of the patriarchs and kings, down to Christ; the other ascending, through the several generations and times of the old testament, up to Adam: to wit, that from a compendium of the histories of the whole old testament, which each genealogy had touched upon, they might signify that the whole sum of the entire ancient scripture is to be received with undoubted certitude. Paul likewise — who gloried that at the feet of Gamaliel he had learned not the fables but the truth of the old testament — confirmed by his own authority very many sayings and deeds of the old instrument, and especially those histories which the Manichaeans deride, in that most brief compendium of the old scripture which he most artfully drew together in the epistle to the Hebrews; [3] where, summarily enumerating almost all the histories of the ancient testament, from the beginning of Genesis down to the last volume of the Maccabees, he says: "By faith we understand that the ages were framed" — and the rest, which throughout that whole chapter he so commemorates that he seems purposely to wish to point out with his finger the deeds of the old testament. [4] I pass over now the innumerable testimonies of the same Apostle, and of the other apostles, upon this matter, lest I heap loathing upon the reader in a thing most well-known, and to which all the letters of the new testament, and the stable and perpetual consensus of the Catholic Church, bear witness. But if anyone desires more for the confirmation of this proposition, let him read what is said by us below, in the confutation of the second heresy.

Proposition the fourth. The fourth proposition asserts: THAT THE OLD TESTAMENT IS USELESS FOR THE CONFIRMATION OF OUR FAITH, AND ADVERSE TO THE ATTAINING OF GOOD MORALS. Which impiety all the letters of the new testament most openly confute. And first of all Paul professes that the old testament is necessary both for faith and for morals, writing to Timothy in these words: "But thou, continue in the things which thou hast learned and which have been committed to thee — knowing of whom thou hast learned [them], and because from infancy thou hast known the sacred letters, which can instruct thee unto salvation by the faith which is in Christ Jesus. For all scripture, divinely inspired, is profitable to teach, to reprove, to correct, to instruct in justice: that the man of God may be perfect, furnished unto every good work." [5] By which words the Apostle shows the old scriptures to be most necessary in two things especially, namely for instructing faith and for forming good morals. For since the whole Christian profession is placed in two things — namely in contemplation, which insinuates faith, and in action, which teaches morals — the Apostle accommodates the scriptures of the old testament to each business. To contemplation, indeed: since, whereas there are two offices of Christian contemplation — that is, to teach truth and to refute falsehood — Paul embraced both, saying: "All scripture is profitable to teach" — namely truth — "and to reprove" — namely falsehood. [6] But to action the old scripture is profitable, because — since two parts complete the whole of action, namely that each one, according to the prophet's saying, should decline from evil and do good — therefore Paul says that those scriptures are profitable "to correct," that is, to snatch men away from sins, and "to instruct in justice," that is, to instruct men in justice and goodness. [7] Accordingly Christ, seeing how necessary the old scriptures are for the confirmation of faith, when he spoke of himself to those skilled in the law, brought in to them the books of Moses, saying: "If you believed Moses, you would believe me also; for he wrote of me." [8] And when he spoke to his disciples of his passion, he confirmed it from the prophets, saying: "All things shall be accomplished (Consummabuntur) that were spoken by the prophets concerning the son of man." [9] And when he had risen from the dead, he established almost all the Evangelical truths from the authority of the old books. For when he had given himself as companion to the two disciples going to Emmaus: "Beginning," says Luke, "from Moses, and running throughout by the prophets, he interpreted to them all the things which were foretold of himself in the old testament." [10] And again, when — the doors being shut — he had stood in the midst of the disciples, and had offered himself not only to be beheld by the eyes of the disciples but also to be handled by [their] hands: yet, lest they should think that anything was being done deceitfully with their mortal eyes and carnal senses, he strengthened them the more from the testification of the old books, saying: "These are the words which I spoke to you when I was yet with you: for it is necessary that all things be fulfilled which are written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me." Then he opened to them the understanding of the scriptures, that they might understand the scriptures; and he said to them: "Because thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day; and that penance and remission of sins should be preached in his name unto all nations." [11]

With these testimonies, therefore, just as Christ showed that the old testament is necessary for the firmness and certitude of our faith, so he demonstrated it to be most useful for the institution of the moral life — since from it he received so many examples for the shaping of an honest life: such as they are, when he rouses the sloth of his hearers to vigilance by the example of those who in the days of Noe were drowned by the unforeseen inundation of the deluge; [12] or when he admonishes those relapsing into sins by the example of the wife of Loth, saying: "Remember Loth's wife"; [13] or when he deters the obstinate minds of the Jews by the recollection of the Sodomites and the Ninivites and the queen of the South; [14] or when he reproaches the Pharisees that they do not the works of Abraham, whose sons they boast themselves; [15] or when, out of the words of Abraham, he calls back to penance the imitators of that rich man buried in hell, saying: "They have Moy-

[1] John 5 (Ioan. 5).
[2] Luke 20 (Luc. 20 — so printed; the passage is Luke 24:27, 44).
[3] Acts 22 (Act. 22).
[4] Heb. 11 (Heb. 11).
[5] 2 Tim. 3 (2. Tim. 3).
[6] Augustine, book against Faustus (Aug. lib. co. Faust.).
[7] Psalm 33 (Psal. 33).
[8] John 5 (Ioan. 5).
[9] Matt. 20 (Matt. 20 — so printed; the passage is Luke 18:31).
[10] Luke 24; Augustine, book 4 against Faustus, ch. 2 (Luc. 24; Aug. lib. 4. cont. Faust. cap. 2).
[11] Luke 24 (Luc. 24).
[12] Matt. 24 (Matth. 24).
[13] Luke 17 (Luc. 17).
[14] Matt. 11 (Matt. 11).
[15] John 8 (Ioan. 8).

(printed p. 622 [PDF p. 627] — Heresy I: refutation of Proposition 4 concluded; Proposition 5 (that the OT fights point-by-point against the NT) refuted; then the OBJECTIONS OF THE HERETICS begin.)

"They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them." Paul likewise, drawing the whole old testament to the instruction of morals, says that all the things which are written in it "happened in figure for our sake, that we should not be desirers of evil things, nor idolaters, nor fornicators, nor gluttons, nor murmurers, nor tempters of God — lest we perish as they did, who in the old testament perished for such misdeeds, whose scourgings (flagella) are written," says the Apostle, "for our correction, upon whom the ends of the ages are come." [1] Which things, and innumerable others which could be produced for this sentence, I pass over: they most efficaciously convince [us] that the old scriptures are greatly necessary both for faith and for morals.

Proposition the fifth. The fifth proposition is: THAT THE OLD TESTAMENT FIGHTS, POINT BY POINT, AGAINST THE NEW TESTAMENT. And this above all Adimantus the Manichaean strove to establish, having published a book in which, to the several sentences of the old instrument, he opposed the several contrary sentences of the new testament. But that in the divine scriptures nothing can be contrary or repugnant is manifestly convinced from the things said above. For since the old scriptures were written by God inspiring [them] — Peter saying, "Not by human will was prophecy brought at any time, but the holy [men] of God spoke, inspired by the Holy Spirit" — [2] and God is the highest truth, from which proceeds the spirit of union and not of dissension, it is necessary that in the scriptures composed by his afflatus nothing adverse or dissonant be found. For as from the highest truth nothing but the true can possibly proceed, so it is impossible that the true, which proceeds from it, should fight with itself. Moreover, as Augustine rightly infers, if the divine scriptures had been fighting among themselves and discordant, how could it ever have come to pass that so many and so great peoples should have believed scriptures so dissonant among themselves and conflicting — not the unlearned only, and those accustomed to the fields, but [men] worn [in study] in the cities, in the schools, and in the gymnasia amid contentious disputations? [3] who, whereas the garrulous [philosophers] ever dissented about the dogmas of philosophy — disciples from [their] masters, and fellow-disciples among themselves — at last, unanimous, came together under the concord of these scriptures: which is read never, either before or after, to have befallen any writings of the philosophers. For Plato dissents from Pythagoras in most things, Aristotle opposes Plato, and even his own disciples contradict Aristotle. But our writers are always concordant among themselves, nor do the apostles preach anything else than what the prophets pronounce. Who, although they be not so many as the writers of the gentiles — lest, like those, they should grow cheap by multitude — yet are not so few that their consensus is not to be wondered at. Yet we confess that many things are found in the sacred letters of which, although the meaning is the same, the words nevertheless apparently disagree: divine wisdom so disposing, unto the exercise of our faith, that while we know not how to reduce them to concord, we may pray to him who made both one, that he may open to us the reconciliation of the apparent contradiction. [4] And let these things, said against the five propositions of the heretics, suffice.

OBJECTIONS OF THE HERETICS (Obiectiones Haereticorum)

1. No cause presents itself to us why we should receive the Old Testament. For if we consider the person of the testator — which is first sought in every testament — deservedly, on account of it, do we execrate the old testament. For the founder of this testament is that evil God of the Hebrews, the perpetual enemy of the good God and father of our Lord Jesus Christ; from whom [come] all evils, slaughters, thefts, and concupiscences; who kills, blinds, hardens, and injects evil concupiscences into the minds of men and of women; who gives evil laws — as he himself testifies through his own prophets — and precepts not good, in which the cultivators of the law cannot live. [5]

2. Then also the inheritance left in that testament is so wretched, and corporeal, and far from the goods of the soul, that after that blessed promise of the new testament — which promises us the kingdom of the heavens and perpetual life — even if his own testator should thrust it upon me gratis, I would of my own accord loathe [it]. For since so many immortal goods have been left me in the new testament, the carnal goods which the old promises to its own — namely riches, and fullness of the belly, sons and grandsons, and long life — I willingly and gladly permit to the Jews as their own, content, forsooth, with the splendid inheritance of the new testament alone, and of the kingdom of the heavens. [6]

3. Moreover, the testament is to be accepted [only] by those to whom, together with the testament, an inheritance is consigned. But since the old testament not only does not constitute us heirs, but rather even disinherits [us], what impropriety it is to usurp for ourselves the tablets of the old testament, which — the inheritance being transmitted to others — testify us to be disinherited! For who is ignorant that the old Testament promises the land of the Canaanites, and that to the Jews alone — that is, to the circumcised, and to those sacrificing, and abstaining from swine's [flesh] and the rest of the meats which Moses calls unclean, observing the sabbaths, and the solemnity of the unleavened bread, and the rest of this kind, which the testator himself commanded them to observe? which, because they have pleased none of the Christians (for neither does any one of us keep them), it is fitting that, the inheritance being refused, we should give back the tablets also.

4. In vain, also, is a testament accepted by those who will not keep the will of the testator and the conditions of the testament. But since the conditions of the testament are that the heirs of the testament be circumcised, sacrifice, and abstain from unlawful foods, etc., and we keep not those things — I fear lest a Jew, rightly upbraiding me, should say: Why, wicked one, dost thou usurp for thyself the old testament, whose precepts thou keepest not? and what hast thou to do with the old testament, whose commands thou despisest? [7]

5. Furthermore, if there be any cause on account of which the old testament is to be received, this surely will be it: on account of the testimonies which are had of Christ in the law and the prophets. But since none such are found in them, by right their scriptures are seen to be worthy of contempt. And that there are in them no prophecies of Christ appears from those very testimonies which are wont to be brought forward, out of the old testament, for the confirmation of the faith concerning Christ. Out of which [8]

---

[1] Luke 16 (Luc. 16); 1 Cor. 10 (so printed "2. Cor. 19"; the passage is 1 Cor. 10:6, 11).

[2] 2 Pet. 1 (2. Pet. 1).

[3] Augustine, book 18 of the City of God, ch. 41 (Lib. 18. de ci. Dei. cap. 41).

[4] Augustine, in the same [work], ch. 7 (Aug. ibi. c. 7).

[5] Manes, in Epiphanius, book 2, heresy 66 (Manes apud Epiph. lib. 2. haer. 66); Judges 9; 1 Kings [Samuel] 18; 2 Chron. 18; Isaiah 6; Isaiah 4 (Esa. 4, so printed); Exodus 14; 3 Kings [1 Kings] 22; Ezekiel 10 (Iud. 9; 1. Reg. 18; 2. Par. 18; Esai. 6; Esa. 4; Exod. 14; 3. Reg. 22; Ezech. 10); Faustus, in Augustine, book 4 against Faustus, ch. 1, and book 10, ch. 1 (Faustus apud Aug. lib. 4. cont. Faust. cap. 1. & lib. 10. cap. 1).

[6] In the same place (Ibidem).

[7] Faustus, in Augustine, book 10, ch. 1 (Faustus apud Aug. lib. 10. cap. 1).

[8] Faustus, in Augustine, book 16, ch. 41 (Faustus apud Aug. lib. 16. cap. 41).

(printed p. 623 [PDF p. 628] — Heresy I: the OBJECTIONS OF THE HERETICS continue (objections 5 concluded through 10).)

together with that most common testimony brought out of Deuteronomy — "A PROPHET, namely, like unto thee will I raise up for them," etc. — [this] in no way looks to Christ. What, I ask, is to be thought of the other testimonies which are subjoined to this testimony by a like example? which certainly cannot be understood of Christ: for Christ is not a prophet, nor like to Moses — since that one [Moses] was a man, this one [Christ] God; that one a sinner, this one holy; that one born of coition, this one (according to you) born of a virgin; that one, his God being offended, is slain upon the mountain, this one, well-pleasing to his father, suffers by his own will. How therefore will he be a prophet like to Moses? But if there is no testimony of Christ in the old testament, then it is useless for the confirmation of our faith. [1]

6. But if it confers nothing to the certitude of our faith, much less will it help toward morals. For how can those most wicked examples — worthy of all hatred and loathing — which the old testament everywhere sets before us in the lives of the patriarchs and prophets, profit us for the instruction of living well? namely, that fathers-in-law sleep with their daughters-in-law, like Judas; fathers with [their] daughters, like Loth; prophets with harlots, like Osee; the Nazarites of God with whores, like Samson; husbands to behold the nights of their own wives [given over] to lovers, like Abraham; a married man to be mingled with two german sisters [full sisters], like Jacob; rulers of the peoples, and those most inspired (entheos) voices, like David and Salomon, to wallow with harlots by thousands and by hundreds: and many other examples of like foulness, which it would be long to enumerate. [2]

7. The old testament also narrates many fabulous and fabricated things, which shall be told by us in their own place; on account of which Paul, not unjustly, calls the old scriptures profane, and old-wives' fables, and foolish genealogies. For concerning these he said to Timothy: "Avoid PROFANE (Prophanas) and old-wives' fables." And again: "Attend NOT (Ne intendas) to Jewish fables, and interminable genealogies, which furnish questions rather than the edification which is in faith; as certain [men], wishing to be doctors of the law." And again: "Avoid FOOLISH (Stultas) and undisciplined questions, knowing that they beget strifes." And, writing the same things to Titus, he says: "Avoid QUESTIONS (Quaestiones) and genealogies and contentions: for they are useless and vain." All which things are said by Paul concerning the utterances of the law and the prophets. [3]

8. To these is added, that the old testament is so hostile and repugnant to the new testament that the two cannot come together into one. And indeed, first, in Genesis it is written that God by himself made heaven and earth; but in John it is written that the world was made through our Lord Jesus Christ, where it is said: "And the world was made through him." In Genesis it is read: "The Lord rested (Quievit) on the seventh day from every work which he had wrought"; but in the gospel, on the contrary, Christ says: "My Father (Pater meus) worketh until now." In Genesis it is written: "Let us make (Faciamus) man to our image and likeness"; but Christ says to the Jews: "You (Vos) are of your father the devil" — yet they cannot be sons of the devil [and] made to the image and likeness of God. The old testament forbids separation from a wife, saying: "Therefore (Ideo) shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall be two in one flesh"; the contrary of which Christ persuades, saying: "There is no one (Nemo est) who leaveth wife and children for the kingdom of the heavens, who shall not receive much more in this time, and in the world to come life eternal." In Exodus it is said: "Honor (Honora) thy father and thy mother"; but Christ, to him who wished to perform the office of burial for his father, commands the contrary, saying: "Let the dead (Sine mortuos) bury their own dead." In the old testament it is said that God was seen by Jacob, by Moses, and by many others, face to face; but on the contrary in the gospel it is said: "God no man hath seen (Deum nemo vidit) at any time." The old testament describes God as hating the evil and avenging sins, when it says: "I God (Ego Deus), a Zealot, visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the sons unto the third and fourth generation, upon those who hate me"; but Christ asserts him to be benign upon the evil, when he says: "Who (Qui) is benign upon the good and the evil." And he himself commands that we forgive a sinning brother, not only seven times, but seventy times seven. The old testament commands vengeance, saying: "An eye for an eye (Oculum pro oculo), a tooth for a tooth"; but Christ, in the gospel, destroying this precept, says: "You have heard (Audistis) that it was said to the ancients, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth; but I say to you, resist not evil; and if any one strike thee on one cheek, offer him also the other." Out of which, and other things like to these, in which the old scriptures fight with the new, it becomes manifest that not unjustly is the old testament disdained by us as contrary to the new testament. [4]

9. They exhort us moreover to the reprobation of the old testament, no less the Evangelical and Apostolic exhortations than [their] examples — but especially the example of the Apostles; who, lest they should be pressed any longer by the intolerable servitude of the old testament, although they were Jews and born under the old testament, nevertheless shook off its yoke. But we, on the contrary, having obtained by the benefit of nature that we should not be born under the law of servitude — Christ forthwith meeting us with the full gift of liberty — how wretched and foolish shall we be, and moreover ungrateful, if of our own accord we addict ourselves to servitude? Indeed Paul thereupon rebukes the Galatians, that, relapsing into circumcision, they went back to the weak and needy elements, which they wished to serve anew. How therefore shall we admit in ourselves that for which we see others reprehended? It is base, certainly, to go into servitude; but baser to return. [5]

10. Frequent, finally, are the admonitions of Christ and of his Apostles that admonish us of the same. "No one," says Christ, "seweth a new patch to an old garment, otherwise a greater rent is made; neither doth he entrust new wine to old, musty (veternosis) wineskins" — intimating that Christian newness is not to be mixed with Hebrew oldness. For since it is sordid, when one is clad in new garments, not to give the old garments to inferiors, therefore he admonished us to leave the old vestment — that is, the old testament — to the Jews as to the lowest servants, and likewise the law; and he compared the prophets to dried-up and inveterate trees, saying: "The Law and the Prophets [were] until John" — namely, that, according to Paul, he might show us that everything which grows old and ages is nigh to destruction [6]

[1] Deut. 18 (Deut. 18).

[2] Faustus, in Augustine, book 32, ch. 4 (Faustus apud Aug. lib. 32. cap. 4); Gen. 38; Gen. 19; Osee 1; Judges 14; Gen. 12; Gen. 20; 2 Kings [Samuel] 11; 3 Kings [1 Kings] 11 (Gen. 38; Gen. 19; Ose. 1; Iud. 14; Gen. 12; Gen. 20; 2. Reg. 11; 3. Reg. 11).

[3] Augustine, book 2 against the adversary of the law, ch. 1 (Lib. 2. co. adu. legis c. 1); 1 Tim. 4; 1 Tim. 1; 2 Tim. 2; Titus 3 (1. Tim. 4; 1. Tim. 1; 2. Tim. 2; Tit. 3).

[4] From Augustine against Adimantus (Ex Aug. co. Adimantum); Gen. 1; John 1; Gen. 2; John 5; Gen. 1; John 8; Gen. 2; Luke 18; Exod. 20; John 1; Gen. 32; John 1; Exod. 20; Luke 6; Matt. 18; Exod. 21; Matt. 5.

[5] Faustus, in Augustine, book 9, ch. 1 (Faustus apud Aug. li. 9. c. 1); Acts 1 (Act. 1); Faustus, in Augustine, book 8, ch. 1 (Faustus apud Aug. li. 8. c. 1); Gal. 4 (Gal. 4).

[6] Faustus, in Augustine, book 8, ch. 1 (Faustus apud Aug. li. 8. c. 1); Marcion, in Epiphanius, book 1, heresy 4 (Marcio apud Epiph. lib. 1. her. 4); Matt. 9 (Matth. 9); Manes, in Epiphanius, book 2, heresy 66 (Manes apud Epiph. lib. 2. her. 66); Luke 16 (Luc. 16); Heb. 8 (Heb. 8); 2 Cor. 3 (2. Cor. 3).

(printed p. 624 [PDF p. 629] — Heresy I: objection 10 concluded; then the DISSOLUTION OF THE OBJECTIONS begins (refutations 1–4).)

to be [nigh to destruction]. And Paul, for this cause, called the old testament the "ministration of death," when he said: "The MINISTRATION (Ministratio) of death, or the testament of death, formed in letters upon stones" — so that we should shun that [testament] no otherwise than [as a thing] put forth by the author of death; knowing that that law (as the same [Paul] says in another place) is not set for the just, but for parricides, matricides, and perjurers — but not for those who live justly in Christ. [1]

THE DISSOLUTION OF THE OBJECTIONS (Dissolutio Obiectorum)

1. If the rash heretics had commemorated, particularly and expressly, in those things which with unbridled tongue they utter against the good God, when, how, and in what place these things were done by God himself, we should indeed refute [them] likewise particularly and member by member, responding to the several [points]. But now, since they themselves touch upon certain things universally, as it were fleeing [glancingly], we too respond generally and universally. We say that the evil concupiscences are not from the God of the old testament. For how should he inject concupiscence who says: "Thou shalt NOT covet (Non concupisces) the things which are thy neighbor's, nor his wife, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor whatsoever are thy neighbor's"? If therefore he takes away concupiscence, he is not a supplier of concupiscence. But if he hardens and blinds the minds of some, he is not therefore to be called evil; otherwise Christ also would be evil, who says: "For judgment (In iudicium) I came into this world, that they who see not may see, and they who see may become blind." He therefore, who — according to the apostolic sentence — has mercy on whom he will, and hardens whom he will, without doubt illuminates whom he will, and blinds whom he will. But there is no iniquity with God, to whom the Church says: "Mercy (Misericordiam) and judgment I will sing to thee, O Lord." He illuminates, therefore, by mercy; he blinds by judgment — most equitable, though most hidden; for inscrutable are his judgments; to whom nevertheless it is said: "Thou hast sat (Sedisti) upon the throne, who judgest justice." But when those wretched [men] say, "How is the God of the Hebrews good, who commands thefts?" — the vain men know not that with God nothing perishes, and that his judgment is just, and that God "is not led by the nose" (naso non suspenditur), as the Egyptians thought, who wished the Jews to have labored without wages — and that indeed not for a few years, but for two hundred and fifteen years. It was equitable, therefore, before God and men, that a reward should at the last be rendered to them. And for this cause the just God commanded his own [people] to plunder the Egyptians, and to go out thence with the spoils; and for the same cause [he ordained] most just slaughters, and havoc as great among his own as among strangers, so that no crime of any sinner of his own should remain unavenged. But, they say, "How is the God of the law good, who glories that he gave to his own precepts not good?" — and the most unskilled scoundrels (nebulones) do not perceive those vital and holy precepts of the old law, of which Paul said: "The LAW indeed [is] holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good" — [and that they are] for this reason called "not good," not because in themselves they are evil, but because, a comparison being made of them with evangelical perfection, they are less good, and in a certain manner evil: by the usual mode of speech of divine scripture, namely, which frequently is wont to call those things which are less good, not only "not good," but even "evil"; just as Christ [called] so many good men, who were in the world, — by intuition of the divine goodness — [and] denies them to be good, saying: "No one (Nemo) is good, but God alone"; and just as the apostles, who by the merit of election excelled the goodness of the human race in many ways, [yet] compared to the goodness of God are called evil — the Lord saying to them: "If you (Si vos), being evil, know how to give good things to your sons, how much more shall your father from heaven give the good spirit to those asking him?" The Apostle also thus affirms that the glory of the law was blunted by the light of the new testament, so that — by comparison with the evangelical splendor — he pronounces it not to have been glorified, saying: "For neither (Nam nec) is that glorious which was glorified, by reason of the excelling glory." Good, therefore, and holy, and just is the God, the testator of the old testament. [2]

2. Whose testament, indeed, we do not receive for this reason — that our hope should be fixed in the promise of temporal things — since we do not even believe those saints of that time, and spiritual men, the patriarchs and prophets, to have been given over to these earthly things. For we have heard a prophet casting away such felicity, and singing that one must flee for refuge to the one Lord: "Deliver (Erue) me from the hand of the sons of strangers, whose sons are as new plantings established in their youth; their daughters set round about, and adorned as the likeness of a temple; their storehouses full, bursting out from this into that; their sheep fruitful, their oxen fat; there is no ruin of the wall, nor passage, nor cry in their streets. They have called the people blessed to whom these things are." Which felicity David, deriding, forthwith on the contrary added: "Blessed (Beatus) is the people whose Lord is its God." But just as those old fathers understood, in these promises — the Spirit revealing [it] — the future things which were being foretold through those very [temporal goods], and on this account were kindled to the desire of the new testament: so we also, knowing that the things which were signified through them have been completed in us, for this cause venerate and receive the memory of the old testament as [it were] the promise of our present felicity. [3]

3. Not, therefore, do we hold his scriptures for obtaining that earthly inheritance, but we receive [them] for understanding in them the promises of the new testament; for the testification of the old reconciles faith to the new. For we know that the promises of temporal things are contained in the old testament, and that for this reason it is called the "old testament"; and [we know] that the promise of eternal life, and the kingdom of the heavens, pertains to the new testament — but that in those temporal [things] there were figures of things to come. In which manner, indeed, Paul taught that the old testament is to be received by us, when he says: "All (Omnia) things happened to them in figure; and they were written for our sake, upon whom the ends of the ages are come." [4]

4. Neither is there danger that a Jew should rightly upbraid me. For to him saying, "Why holdest thou the old testament, whose precepts thou keepest not?" I will answer, that in those books there are two kinds of precepts: precepts, namely, for signifying life [the life to come], and precepts for acting out life [the moral life to be lived]; of which the latter are now observed by Christians, but the former were then rightly observed by the Jews, when they foretold those things which now have been revealed. But now, after the Light — Christ — has come, [it is] superfluous [that they should be observed] by us [5]

[1] 1 Tim. 1 (1. Tim. 1).

[2] Epiphanius, book 2, heresy 66 (Epiph. lib. 2. haer. 66); Exod. 20; Augustine, book 1 against the adversary of the law and the prophets, ch. 8 (Aug. li. 1. co. adu. leg. & proph. cap. 8); John 9; Rom. 9; Psalm 100; Rom. 11; Psalm 9; Epiphanius, in the book Anchoratus (Epiph. in lib. Anchorato); Exod. 21; Ezek. 20; John Cassian, Conference 23, ch. 4 (Ioan. Cassia. col. 23. cap. 4); Rom. 7; Luke 18; Matt. 7; 2 Cor. 3.

[3] Augustine, book 4 against Faustus, ch. 2, and against Adimantus, ch. 18 and 20 (Aug. lib. 4. con. Faust. c. 2. & con. Adiman. cap. 18. & 20); Psalm 143.

[4] Augustine, book 4 against Faustus, ch. 2 (Aug. li. 4. co. Faustus c. 2); 1 Cor. 10 (1. Cor. 10).

[5] Augustine against Faustus, book 10, ch. 2 (Aug. co. Faust. lib. 10. cap. 2).

(printed p. 625 [PDF p. 630] — Heresy I: Dissolution of the Objections continues (refutations 4 concluded through 8 begun).)

[it would be superfluous] that those shadows should be observed by us. Nevertheless we hold them — not for religion, but for testification; just as we also hold the carnal promises which are contained in them, since through them the spiritual things to be hoped-for by us have been revealed.

5. But they say: what need is there of the old testament for the certitude of our faith, in which there is no testimony of Christ? For what is written in Deuteronomy pertains not to Christ, because Christ is not like to Moses. To these [objections] we thus meet [them]: that which is called "like" is not understood [to be] like in every part and manner. For not only those things which are of one and the same nature are said to be like among themselves — as olive to olive — but also those which are of disparate nature, as olive to wild-olive (oleaster), and spelt (far) to wheat. So also the Son of God, who is so far distant from mortal things, is called in the scriptures "Lamb" and "Lion"; as in John it is read, "Behold (Ecce) the lamb of God," and in Paul, "The rock (Petra) was Christ" — which [names] they by no means would have spoken, unless Christ took upon himself some likeness with those [things]. Since therefore Christ was made like to a sheep, what wonder if he disdained not to be made like to Moses, who was unlike to Moses? Like, indeed, because man; unlike, because God: like, because made in the likeness of the flesh of sin; unlike, because holy and without sin: like, because born of a woman; unlike, because born of the Holy Spirit: like, because by true death he died upon the mountain; unlike, because he died not on account of his own sins, but by his own power: like, because — his God being offended on account of the crimes of men — he bore the offenses of the human race, dying in his own body; unlike, because it was not — [his] God being offended — on account of his own fault that he died. [1]

6. To those things which the most impure heretics vituperate in the lives of the patriarchs and prophets, we respond, that although — out of those vices which are narrated concerning the fathers in the old testament — it be conceded that certain [of them] were grave crimes, not on that account is the authority of scripture diminished; nay rather, it is the more commended to us, that it not rashly, but for most just causes, wisely narrates such vices — namely, that by the consideration of them we may obtain these four [things]: to wit, the instruction of faith, fear, and hope. First, faith: that we should doubt nothing of the truth of that history, seeing that it — as the brightness of a faithful mirror [reflecting] the persons brought before it — indicates not only those which are fair and whole, but also those which are deformed and vicious; and it excepts no person to be flattered, but the deeds of men, as much to be praised as to be blamed, it either itself judges, or proposes to be judged by the readers; nor only intimating the men themselves as either laudable or blameworthy, but also not keeping silent certain things praiseworthy in the blameworthy, and certain things blameworthy in the praiseworthy. Secondly, it refers the vices of the fathers to our instruction — not indeed that we should imitate and follow them, but that we may know those things to be shunned and fled which the scripture blames. Thirdly, to fear: that the fall of the greater should be the fear of the lesser. For if those so holy men the pernicious blandishments of this world overcame, how much more is it to be feared by us, [who are] weaker? Fourthly, to the consolation of hope: that we may learn, in such lapses, that salvation is not to be despaired of; for certain [persons], having fallen into sins, sin the more by desperation, and not only neglect the medicine of repenting, but, for the fulfilling of dishonest and nefarious desires, become slaves of lusts and of wicked cupidities, as if they would lose [their labor] if they did not do what lust tracks out — whereas already a certain damnation awaits them. Against this exceedingly perilous and destructive manner [of sinning], the commemoration of the sins into which the just and holy [men] fell is of avail. [2]

7. But as to what pertains to the fables which the impious confirm from the testimony of Paul — who, [understanding it] thus, unless a much-blinded heretic, would err? Why did the Apostle himself not do this, if he judged these to be old-wives' fables? Why, writing to the same Timothy, does he say: "We know (Scimus) that the law is good, if any one use it lawfully"? And why does he command the same [Timothy] to remain in the sacred letters which he had learned from infancy, [they] instructing unto salvation through faith? But let those insane [men] know that the Jews have, besides scripture, certain traditions called δευτέρωσιν (deuterosin) [the "repetition," the Mishnah], in which they hand down that God at first created two women for the [first] man, out of whom they weave various genealogies, contending that some descended from the one, others from the other woman. Concerning which traditions, when once the Pharisees interrogated Christ, saying, "Why (Quare) do thy disciples not walk according to the traditions of the elders?" they were refuted by him, saying: "Why do you also transgress the commandment of God for your traditions?" Which words the divine Epiphanius, expounding, said that those traditions are four kinds of expositions which are among the Jews: of which one is borne under the name of Moses; the second is [that of] Rabbi Aciba; the third [that of] Adda, or Juda; the fourth [that] of the sons of Asamonaeus [the Hasmoneans]. Concerning which — and also concerning the genealogies of the Jews and the Talmudic questions condemned by Paul — Annius, most skilled in antiquities, wrote some things worthy to be known, in the commentaries on the Chronography of Philo; to whom, for brevity's sake, we send the reader eager for this knowledge, passing on to those places which the Manichaeans adduce out of both testaments as [things] fighting among themselves. [3]

8. Whose contradiction — because it is placed in words alone — is dissolved with easy effort. The first opposition, therefore, which looks to the exordium of Genesis, is removed in three ways. First, when it is said, "In the beginning (In principio) God created heaven and earth," by "God" is signified the Trinity, in which not only the Father, but also the Son and the Holy Spirit, are understood. Secondly, when in the same place it is written, "God said, Let there be light; and light was made," it is necessary that we understand God to have made, through the Word, that which he made; but the Word of the Father is the Son. Thirdly, if for this reason the Son is not there understood — because it is not said that God made the world through the Son — neither in the gospel does God through the Son feed the birds and clothe the lilies, and the other innumerable things which Christ says the Father does, although he does not say that he does them through the Son. The second contradiction is removed, because it is not written that God rested from all his works so that thereafter he should work nothing whatsoever, but that he rested from all the works which he had then made — that is, from instituting the natures of things — so that he should no longer make the world [anew]; from which work, after [its] perfection, he had ceased: but in administering [governing] the world [he works] many [things] [4]

[1] Augustine against Faustus, book 16, ch. 15 (Aug. co. Faust. li. 16. cap. 15); Deut. 18; John 1; 1 Cor. 10.

[2] Augustine, book 22 against Faustus, ch. 60 (Aug. li. 22. co. Faust. c. 60); Augustine against Faustus, book 22, ch. 65 (Aug. co. Faust. lib. 22. c. 65); Augustine, book of 50 homilies, homily 21 (Aug. lib. 50. hom. 21); Augustine, book On Nature and Grace, ch. 35 (Aug. lib. de nat. & grat. cap. 35).

[3] Augustine, book 1 against the adversary of the law, ch. 1 (Aug. lib. 1. con. adu. leg. cap. 1); 1 Tim. 1 (1. Tim. 1); 2 Tim. 3 (2. Tim. 3); Mark 7 (Mar. 7); Epiphanius, book 2, heresy 66 (Epiph. lib. 2. her. 66).

[4] Augustine against Adimantus, ch. 1 (Aug. con. Adiman. ca. 1); Gen. 1; Augustine against Adimantus, ch. 2 (Aug. cot. Adiman. cap. 2).

(printed p. 626 [PDF p. 631] — Heresy I concluded: Dissolution of the Objections, the resolution of the scriptural "contradictions" (third through eighth) and refutations 9 and 10.)

[in administering the world he works] many things, always. And in this work Christ intimated him to be, when he said: "My Father (Pater meus) worketh until now." [1]

The third contradiction also is thus loosed. In three ways, in the scriptures, the name of "sons" is taken: according to nature, as Isaac [is] son of Abraham; according to doctrine, as the Apostle calls "his sons" those who learned the gospel from him; thirdly, according to imitation, as the Apostle calls us "sons of Abraham," because we imitate his faith. The Jews, therefore, by discipline and by imitation are sons of the devil, but by nature sons of God. [2]

The fourth is thus removed. When the cause of obtaining the kingdom of the heavens is not present, if any one leave [his] wife, it is disapproved by the Lord; but when the wife impedes the man from the possession of the kingdom of the heavens, then the wife is commanded to be left: because the wife is joined to the man, that together they may merit the kingdom of the heavens. [3]

The fifth is settled in the same manner: that on account of the kingdom of the heavens we should honor [our] parents, and the same [parents] — when it shall be needful, on account of the announcing of the kingdom of God — we should contemn. For the love of parents is a certain step to the love of God; whereby it is manifest that the honor of parents in its own degree is to be kept, and yet that they, in comparison with the divine love — especially if they are an impediment — are with no doubt to be contemned. [4]

The sixth is thus loosed. When it is said, "God (Deum) no one hath seen at any time," it is understood of God according to the immutable essence of his divinity, which cannot be seen except by a most purified and most simple heart; but when we read that he was seen, and heard, and spoke to many, we understand this to have been done by him through some visible creature: as in certain places scripture testifies that an angel was seen, where it says that God was seen — as in that wrestling of Jacob, scripture calls him an angel whom Jacob calls God, saying, "I saw (Vidi) the Lord face to face." And that God, whom Moses said had appeared to himself in the bush, and on Sinai with the law, Stephen — in the Acts of the Apostles — testifies to have been this same angel. [5]

The seventh is settled in this manner. God is a Zealot and benign: benign indeed, as Paul says, when by his benignity and patience he invites the evil to penance; a Zealot, and punishing unto the third and fourth generation, when by his justice he punishes those who — correction being despised — wished to persevere in the same perversity of [their] parents; but indulgent and pardoning he is, not only seven times, but seventy times seven, toward those who — the correction of God being accepted — are reconciled through penance. [6]

The eighth is thus reduced to concord. In these two sentences [the "eye for an eye" and "turn the other cheek"] not a contrariety of the testaments is shown, but a diversity of them in perfection. For since there are two degrees of leniency — the first, that the measure of the received injury should in no way exceed the sorrow of the avenger; the second, that one should forgive the whole injury with placated mind — the old testament, as [being] less perfect, constituted carnal men at the first degree, of measuring vengeance; but the new testament, as [being] more perfect, led spiritual men even to the second degree, of complete remission. [7]

9. But concerning the example of the apostles renouncing the legal precepts, we say that they did not fall away from those precepts for signifying the life [to come] according to faith — as though they did not believe them to have been figures of things to come — but that they desisted only from the observation of those [precepts] whose shadows had fled away, the evangelical light already coruscating. Neither do we, believing those things, relapse again into servitude: because we do not observe the things which once were commanded to the fathers for the foretelling of us, but in liberty we read the things which were written for the confirming of us. But Paul rebukes the Galatians, not as [men] reading the scripture of circumcision religiously, but as [men] wishing to be circumcised superstitiously. [8]

10. Neither do those testimonies of Christ and of Paul have any weight. For the new patch, and the old garment, and the new wine, and the old wineskins, do not signify two testaments, but two lives and two hopes. For if any one should think that two hopes are to be had — that he should serve God both on account of earthly felicity and on account of the kingdom of the heavens — this [hope] does not contain that [other]; for when this [earthly hope] shall have been disturbed by some tribulation, the failing man will lose that [heavenly] one also. Thence is that [saying]: "No one (Nemo) can serve two masters," which Christ expounded, saying: "You cannot (Non potestis) serve God and mammon." He mixes, therefore, the new patch with the old garment — not [he] who mixes the old testament with the new, but [he] who wishes to have spiritual continence, and has not yet laid aside the carnal hope. But as to what they add — that "the Law (Lex) and the prophets endured until John" — it is not so to be understood, that after John both are altogether to be cast away; but that the law and the prophets were until John as preparers and fore-announcers of the advent of Christ, which [advent] coming, their preparation and fore-announcing ceases. Yet both remain for the confirmation of the fore-announced things, that we may know the advent of Christ to have been foretold by them, by divine disposition, long before it came to pass. They remain also for the conserving of the gratitude of our mind, that we may render thanks to those who foretold to us so happy an advent of Christ. For just as, if any one should have a pedagogue (as also the Apostle says that the law was a pedagogue to us unto the advent of Christ), when he shall have come to [full] age and shall have received a teacher, he does not altogether reject the pedagogue as an enemy: so we also, since we were led [as children] in the law and the prophets until the advent of the teacher Christ, the teacher being found, do not reprobate the pedagogue, but confess gratitude to him, that he led our childhood [along], and dismissed [us] to more perfect disciplines. There remains, therefore, the law — which Paul for this reason says is not set for the just: because it is not against the just, inasmuch as the just [man] has already anticipated to fulfill the things which are of the law; but it is set for the unjust, that is, against the unjust, unto condemnation; and on this account [it is] called "the testament of death" — not because it was given by the author of death, but because it commands death to be given to homicides, adulterers, and the transgressors of its precepts. For thus it was fitting that the testament of death should go before, so that, first being dead to sins, we might live to justice. [9]

[1] John 5 (Ioan. 5).
[2] Augustine against Adimantus, ch. 5 (Aug. cot. Adiman. cap. 5).
[3] Augustine against Adimantus, ch. 3 (Aug. co. Adi. cap. 3).
[4] Augustine against Adimantus, ch. 6 (Aug. co. Adi. cap. 6).
[5] Against Adimantus, ch. 9 (Con. Adim. cap. 9); Gen. 32; Exod. 3; Acts 7 (Act. 7).
[6] Augustine against Adimantus, ch. 7 (Aug. co. Ad. cap. 7); Rom. 2.
[7] Augustine against Adimantus, ch. 8 (Aug. co. Adi. cap. 8).
[8] Augustine against Faustus, book 9, ch. 2 (Aug. co. Faust. lib. 9. c. 2).
[9] Augustine against Faustus, book 12, ch. 2 (Aug. co. Faust. lib. 12. cap. 2); Mark 9 (Mar. 9); Matt. 6; Epiphanius, book 2, heresy 66 (Epiph. lib. 2. her. 66); Luke 16; 1 Tim. 1 (1. Tim. 1).

(printed p. 627 [PDF p. 632] — Heresy II opens: title, heresy statement, Assertores, and the beginning of the Impugnatio.)

OF THE OLD TESTAMENT in general — Heresy II (De Veteri Testamento in universali. Haeresis II)

That in the Old scriptures, which the Church now holds, many things have been falsified — as much by the Jews as by the Christians — and that many things also have partly been super-added, and partly been subtracted.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

This most pestilent error the more recent Anabaptists profess in our age; with whom, in the same error, consent the Servetans — so called from a certain impious Michael Servetus, a Spaniard, whom, in the year 1554 (so printed "M.D.LIIII"; Servetus was in fact burned in 1553), on account of his execrable heresies, those same Lutherans burned by public fire in the city of the Allobroges, Geneva — [those Lutherans] who [nonetheless] contend that heretics, however pertinacious, are by no reason to be killed. These Servetans, therefore, since they know that many testimonies concerning the divinity of CHRIST and the holy Trinity (which they themselves deny) are written in the old testament, and those [testimonies] so open that they cannot be eluded, say that those testimonies were vitiated [corrupted] by the "Trinitarians" — for so those impious [men], by way of contempt, call the Catholic assertors of the Trinity.

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

It cannot be said that the divine scriptures of the Old instrument were falsified by the malignity either of the Jews or of the Christians. For if we should say that they were corrupted by the Jews, then it is deservedly asked (says Origen) whether the Jews corrupted them before the advent of Christ, or after his advent. If before, then surely Christ and the Apostles — who accuse the scribes and Pharisees of the other crimes — would never have kept silent about this crime, which was the greatest; nor would Christ have sent his hearers to them, saying, "Upon (Super) the chair of Moses have sat the Scribes and Pharisees: whatsoever they shall say to you, do" — if he had known them to bring forth falsehoods from the chair of the Mosaic reading. But if any one should say that, after the advent of the Lord Savior and the preaching of the apostles, those books were falsified by the Hebrews, I shall not be able to hold my laughter (cachinnum): that the Savior, and the Evangelists, and the Apostles brought forth [their] testimonies just as the Jews were afterward going to falsify [them]! [1] And if any one should say that those books were depraved by the Christians after Christ, Augustine responds that it was done by divine providence that not all the Jews were killed, but dispersed through the world by the power of God, so that from their intact volumes we might be able to recognize that ours are not falsified. And lest the Jews themselves should be able to hide those books from us, or to show [them as if] corrupted, God — two hundred and fifty years before the advent of Christ — inspired Ptolemy

Philadelphus, king of Alexandria, to take care that those scriptures should be translated by the seventy renowned interpreters of the Hebrews; and, through Demetrius, the prefect of the Library, [inspired] that [the volumes], together with the Hebrew exemplars, should be placed in his Library and diligently kept: which volumes, together with the Hebrew [2] exemplars, Tertullian in the Apologetic testifies to have been, down to his own times, in the same Library, and frequently read by the Jews, and by them judged most faithful. Neither can any prudent [man] believe that the Jews — dispersed in codices so many, and so far and wide — should have come together into one [conspiracy] out of whatsoever perversity and malice, and, by hatred of the Christians, should have conspired in the corruption of their own volumes; namely, so that, while they envied to others the truth of scripture, they should deprive themselves of the truth. Who, even if they had wished to do this by unanimous consent, [it] can be persuaded to no one that Christ our Savior would have permitted so grave a crime by the hands of the enemies of his Church — lest the Church, founded in the truth of his word, should receive so great a detriment of the truth from her own enemies, and be held in the perpetual error of deception, embracing false things for true. Nor even is it credible that God would have wished to deny to the Church of his beloved Son, after the advent of Christ, that which — before his advent — he had conceded to the Synagogue of the Hebrews: namely, that no one should dare to add to, or take away from, his scriptures — evident miracles being also applied against those who presumed to attempt it. [3] For we read, in Aristeas and Josephus, that certain illustrious men, for this cause, were long afflicted with an adverse state of mind and a languor of body — as Theodorus [Theodectes] and Theopompus: of whom that one, the writer of tragedies, when he wished to refer some things out of the Jewish scripture, in [his own] words, into a certain fable, was deprived of the [light of his] eyes; but this other [Theopompus], when he had begun to translate something out of the divine law into the Greek tongue, was struck by a certain disturbance of mind and soul: whence afterwards, greatly praying to God [to know] why this had befallen him, he received answer through a dream, that he had defiled the divine scriptures. [4]

To these are added so many labors and vigils of the most ancient fathers of the Church, who by unwearied studies applied themselves that they might leave to us the Hebrew scriptures free from all falsification and from the suspicion of vice — having for this cause bought, at great expense, the most ancient and most emended codices, with which they might compare our exemplars, and, having collated them, might translate [them], emend [them], and expound [them]; lest thereafter the infidels and heretics should be able to reprehend us concerning the falsity of the old scriptures. For "God knows" (says Jerome) "that I have sweated in the erudition of a foreign tongue, lest the Jews should any longer insult his churches concerning the falsity of the scriptures." But if any one should again insist that the old books, which we now use, were falsified after the age of those fathers, we shall respond that this would have been to be feared, were it not that the people of the Jews is widely scattered and widely known — among whom their own codices have always been kept with such great diligence that they could not be vitiated by the Christians. For the Jews are our porters (geruli), who carry the books for themselves as a burden, but for us for erudition and faith: so that when a doubt shall arise concerning the sincerity of our codices, it may be removed by the incorrupt faith of the Hebrew volumes. Finally, the irrefragable and perpetual consensus of all the fathers in the reading of the Old Testament takes away every scruple of falsification: for thus, through all the successions of times, the writers and doctors succeeding one another in turn, the old [5]

[1] Origen, book 8 of the commentary on Isaiah (Orig. lib. 8. com. in Esa); Jerome, book 3 of the commentary on Isaiah (Hier. lib. 3. com. in Esai); Matt. 23.

[2] Augustine on Psalm 58 (Aug. in Psal. 58); Eusebius, book 8 of the Evangelical Preparation (Eus. li. 8. Ev. praep.).

[3] Tertullian in the Apologetic, ch. 18 and 19 (Tertul. in Apolog. cap. 18. & 19); Augustine, book 15 of the City of God, ch. 13 (Aug. lib. 15. de ci. Dei ca. 13); Augustine, book 33 against Faustus, ch. 6 (Aug. li. 33. co. Faustus c. 6).

[4] Augustine, book 2 of On Christian Doctrine, ch. 14 (Aug. li. 2. de doct. Christ. c. 14); Aristeas, in the book on the Seventy interpreters (Aristeas in libr. de LXX interp.); Josephus, book 11 of the Antiquities, ch. 1 (Iosephus l. 11. ant. cap. 1).

[5] Jerome in the preface to Isaiah (Hie. in praef. Esaiae); Augustine, book 13 against Faustus, ch. 10 and ch. 14 (Augu. lib. 13. co. Fau. c. 10. & cap. 14).

(printed p. 628 [PDF p. 633] — Heresy II: the Impugnatio concluded; then the OBJECTIONS OF THE HERETICS (1–3, objection 3 running on to the next page).)

[the writers and doctors, succeeding one another in turn,] read the old books just as we now read [them], and always cited the same sentences, and with the same words, which we now use in our codices — Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. From these, therefore, and from very many other [things] which, on this argument, we set down in the preceding volume [Book VII], in the confutation of the first heresy, the scriptures of the Old instrument are freed from all suspicion of falsification.

OBJECTIONS OF THE HERETICS (Obiectiones Haereticorum)

1. That for many ages now — as much among the Christians as among the Hebrews — the scriptures of the old instrument have been corrupted, and on that account [are] various, and even dissonant among themselves, is convinced from the multitude of the mutually discrepant translations of the old testament. For there are the translations of the Seventy interpreters, and of Aquila, and of Symmachus, and of Theodotion; and, besides these, three others, which are called the Fifth, the Sixth, and the Seventh; and after these also an Eighth, which is believed [to be] of Jerome — so various among themselves, and conflicting, that one of these contains more [things], another fewer, another diverse [things] and perversely transposed, another things contrary not only in words but also in the senses pertaining to faith, and things repugnant to the other editions: which indeed is by no means to be believed to have happened by the fault of so many most erudite interpreters, but rather to have befallen out of the diverse variety of the Hebrew exemplars. But since a dissonant variety never subsists without falsity, it is consequent that the Hebrew codices — whence so manifold a discord of the interpreters arose — were not only various, but even vitiated and falsified.

2. This also argues that the context of the old testament was, by the succession of times, changed from its ancient sincerity: that in the Hebrew codices of our age all the narration of scripture, from beginning even to end, is extended in prose alone; nor in them does there scarcely remain even one of the so many songs (carmina) with which many old books are handed down to have been written. For Jerome testifies — in the preface to the Chronicle of Eusebius, in the preface to the book of Kings, and in the preface to Isaiah — that very many Psalms, and the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and many other [things] of diverse kind of meter, are contained in them. And in the preface to the book of Job he writes that the same book is composed in hexameter verses, running by dactyl and spondee, intermingled sometimes with certain ringing and sweet rhythms; and that there are, in the sacred volumes, various kinds of songs, such as are in the poems of our Virgil and Horace, and of the Greek Pindar and Alcaeus — of which [kinds] the Psalter, and the Lamentations, and almost all the canticles of the scriptures consist. The same [Jerome], writing to Paula of the City [Paula Urbica], adds that the last part of the book of Proverbs is closed with an alphabet [acrostic], which is reckoned by iambic tetrameter; but the Lamentations, with a fourfold alphabet, of which the second, third, and fourth are written in Sapphic meter, out of three little verses, always with a heroic comma [clausula], or concluded by an Adonic [colon]. Eusebius likewise, of Caesarea, in book 10 of the Evangelical Preparation, affirms that there are found in the old testament most artful songs — as the great Canticle of Moses, and David's hundred-and-eighteenth Psalm, composed in heroic verse, and many other songs, trimeter and tetrameter, most elegantly [1] composed, as far as pertains to diction. Josephus also, in the second book of the Hebrew Antiquities, writes that Moses, after the passage of the Erythraean [Red] Sea, sang that canticle which now exists, in hexameter verse. But now, in the Hebrew volumes, not even any vestige of this kind appears — whether of heroic or of lyric verses. And, to be silent about the other songs, in the whole old testament you will not find one hexameter woven together after the manner of the Latins or the Greeks, by dactyl and spondee; nor will you find two cola similarly [arranged], which are closed according to the custom of rhythm, either by an equal number of syllables, or by the same termination of the final syllable. Which, since they are none [such] in our exemplars, it remains that we say that the context of the old books, and the face of the whole narration, was changed, and that ancient sublimity of songs brought down into this humility of prose.

3. It makes to this [argument] also the testimony of some of the Latins, of the Greeks, and of illustrious Hebrew authors, who affirm that the Hebrew codices were of old depraved by the Hebrews themselves. Of whose number Justin the Philosopher and Martyr — a thousand four hundred years ago — writing against Trypho, shows that the Jews, in hatred of Christ, cut away and took away many prophetic testimonies from the holy scriptures. Origen, in Homily 12 on Jeremiah, writes that the Jews falsified their own exemplars, especially in the book of Jeremiah, where, for that which was read, "The sin (Peccatum) of Juda is written," etc., they themselves — unwilling to confess themselves sinners — put, for "the sin of Juda," "their sin." [2] Jerome also, in the commentaries on the third chapter to the Galatians, expounding that saying, "Cursed (Maledictus) [is] every one who shall not have remained in all the things which are written in the book of the law," says that in the exemplars of the Hebrews of his time those two words, "ALL" (Omnis) and "ALL [things]" (Omnibus), were lacking; and that he held it uncertain whether the Seventy interpreters had added them, or whether in the old Hebrew they were so [present] and afterward were deleted by the Jews; but that he was led into the suspicion of believing those particles to have been removed by the Jews — partly, lest the Hebrews should seem to be under the curse, [as being] not able to keep the things which are written; partly because Paul, a man of Hebrew skill and most learned in the law of the Lord, would never have brought them forth unless they were had in the Hebrew volumes; partly because, in his time, in the Hebrew, in the volumes of the Samaritans, there was found written chal [Hebrew כל], which is to be interpreted "ALL" (Omnes), or "ALL [things]" (Omnibus). [3] Similarly, that which is read in Deuteronomy, "Cursed (Maledictus) by God [is] every one who hangeth upon a tree," Jerome judges to have been falsified in the same place by the Hebrews — unto the ignominy of Christ, as much in the Hebrew as in our codices — two particles being interposed, "BY GOD" (A Deo) and "EVERY ONE" (Omnis): namely, that they might brand infamy upon the Christians, who would believe in Christ [as] cursed by God. Of which thing Jerome brought no slight indication: that in the old testament in no place is it written that any one is cursed by God; and wherever a curse (maledictio) is placed, never is the name of God found joined [to it]. Jacobus [James] Christopolitanus, likewise, bishop, in the preface of his enarrations on the psalms, writes that the Hebrews, Arabs, and Chaldees did not of old have either vowels or points in their letters [4]

[1] ch. 8 (Cap. 8); Deut. 32.
[2] Book 4, ch. 12 (Lib. 4. c. 12).
[3] Gal. 3.
[4] Deut. 27 (Deut. 27 — so printed; the "cursed is he that hangeth on a tree" is Deut. 21:23).

(printed p. 629 [PDF p. 634] — Heresy II: objections 3 concluded and 4 (the "Tikkun Sopherim" argument, with Hebrew examples); then the Dissolution of the Objections begins.)

[the Hebrews, Arabs, and Chaldees did not of old have vowels or points in their letters,] but [that] all sacred scripture was written by Esdras [Ezra] without vowels and without points; but that the Rabbis of the Jews, after the conversion of Constantine the Great, in place of the vowels invented points, and, according to their own human senses, perverted sacred scripture — and this especially in those places where manifest mysteries lay hidden, either concerning Christ or concerning the Church. Whence he also concludes that no faith is to be given to the scriptures of the Hebrews [as] thus written by points, and interpreted.

4. But what need is there of external testimonies, when the Hebrews themselves spontaneously confess that their volumes have now, for many ages, been corrupted? — that is, from the very destruction of the city of Jerusalem, but especially when Nabuzardan [Nebuzaradan], prefect of the king of the Assyrians (as is had in the fourth [book] of the volume of Kings), set fire to the house of the Lord, and the house of the king, and burned all the houses of Jerusalem: then those sacred and authentic volumes, which were kept in public places, were all consumed by the fire, nor could they ever afterward be restored to their pristine sincerity — although many endeavored to do this, certain particular codices, which had remained among some of uncertain authority, being collated together with one another. [1] Witnesses of this thing are very many of the Rabbis, and among others David Kimhi (Kimki), whose opinion a great number of the Rabbis follows. He, in the exposition of the third book of Kings, and in the preface to the Prophets, thus speaks: "In the first captivity the exemplars were corrupted, and they drew out [readings] from one exemplar thus, and from another otherwise. And where they could not clearly have the [right] sense, they wrote one word (dictionem) within the context, and another at the margin. The exemplars also perished, and were pulled apart; and, the wise men dying who held the sense of scripture, these who were of the great synagogue endeavored to restore the law to its own antiquity; and, finding dissensions in the exemplars, they gave faith to the more numerous exemplars agreeing [together]. But where they could not have clear cognition, they wrote one word without points, or wrote [it] in the margin and not within the context." [2] These [things] R. David [Kimhi]. But the Thalmudists, almost all, in the Thalmudic books frequently make mention of a certain correction of the old testament, which of old their Rabbis used in emending the text of holy scripture — which תיקון סופרים (Tikun sophrim), that is, "the Correction of the wise scribes," they call [it]; according to which the scribes, even before Christ was born, changed certain things in the books of the law and the prophets — now distinguishing the scripture by certain points, now placing other [words] in the margins, which, in place of those that were written in the context, might, for the sake of urbanity and modesty, be read more honestly and more decently: as, for coire cum concubina [to lie with a concubine], "iacere cum illa" [to lie with her]; and, for "human dung" (humano stercore), "evacuation" (egestionem). For the sake of which thing, sometimes also that which was written by the prophet they, erasing, put in its place that which they themselves judged more decorous for scripture. Whence it came to pass that a sense far diverse from the Prophet's meaning emerged. Of which thing the witness is Prochetus [Porchetus], a most diligent observer of the Hebrew volumes, in the first book of the Victory against the Hebrews, indicating that of old, at the foot (in calce) of the first chapter of Malachi, was written אותי ('othi), that is, "me"; in whose place the scribes substituted אותו ('otho), that is, "him," or "that one" — from which it follows that where we now read, according to the correction of the scribes, "Behold, [ye have brought] of your labor, and you have blown it away" (Ecce de labore vestro, & exufflastis illum), there it was once said by the prophet, "Behold, of your labor, and you have blown me away, saith the Lord" (Ecce de labore vestro, & exufflastis me, dicit dominus) — or "you have afflicted, vexed, or made me to expire, saith the Lord." [3] Similarly, that which we now read in Micah, first chapter, "In the house of dust, sprinkle yourselves with dust" (In domo pulveris, pulvere aspergite vos), "roll thyself" (involue te) — according to another translation, this (says R. Scelomo [Shelomo]) is a correction of the scribes, who, making the points, corrected [it], and said חתפלשתי (chit palascithi), that is, "ROLL YOURSELVES" (Involvite), where by Micah it had been written ִהתפלש (hith palasci), that is, "ROLL ME" (Involve me); for thus in the Prophet it was written: "In the house of dust, sprinkle me [with] dust." [4] Likewise, that which we now read in Osee [Hosea], the ninth [chapter], "In my departure [from them]" (In recessu meo), or "my departure," or "When I shall have departed from them" — R. Scelomo and R. Kimhi say that it is read [thus] according to the correction of the scribes, namely בשורי מהם (bessuri mechem), that is, "IN MY DEPARTURE FROM THEM" (In recessu meo) — whereas the true text of the Prophet once had בשורי מהם (besuri mechem) [pointed otherwise], that is, "MY INCARNATION [is] to them" (Incarnatio mea eis). The sense of which sentences, as we now have [it] according to the text corrected by the scribes, differs greatly from the sense of those sentences which the first [original] scripture once had — in which the Son of God, speaking through those prophets, designated the mystery ("according to you") of [his] future incarnation: [he] whom you now say to have, in the house of dust, sprinkled himself with dust, when he put on the dust of our flesh — [he] whom the Jews afflicted and made to expire. These, and very many other [things], Rabbi Scelomo, R. Kimhi, R. Simon, and R. Iohannam [Yohanan] testify to have been of old corrected by the scribes; whose example of scribes the later Rabbis, imitating, did the same, and persuaded their disciples to do the same — as R. Iohannam, out of the opinion of

R. Simeon, said in the book Ievamoth [the tractate Yevamot]: "It is good that thou pluck out one letter from the law, and [that] ח [Chet] be pronounced in public." These [things] Prochetus. From all these [things], therefore, it is manifest that the old books were falsified by the correction — or rather the corruption — of the scribes.

THE DISSOLUTION OF THE OBJECTIONS (Dissolutio Obiectorum)

1. So foolish is the hypothesis on which the argument of the Anabaptists leans, that nothing [is] more foolish. For the diversity of translations can arise not from that sole cause which they themselves adduce, but from many others — as from the varied talent (ingenium) and judgment of the interpreters, or sometimes [their] inexperience, or negligence, or even malice: by all of which it happens that interpretations of the same scripture frequently differ among themselves, and in many [places]. It can also happen that editions of diverse interpreters, which before agreed among themselves, afterward differ among themselves as much as possible — whether by the carelessness, or ignorance, or fraud of the writers and copyists (librarii), who copied them perversely from emended and sincere exemplars: as, in all the editions of the old testament put forth before the times of Jerome, it came to pass that individual [copies] differed from individual [copies], as much on account of the writers as on account of the variety of the interpreters — from which

[1] ch. 25 [4 (2) Kings 25] (Cap. 25).
[2] ch. 13 (Cap. 13).
[3] ch. 15 (Cap. 15); Mal. 1.
[4] Mal. 1; Micah 1 (Mich. 1).

(printed p. 630 [PDF p. 635] — Heresy II: Dissolution of the Objections, refutations 1 (concluded), 2 (the Hebrew poetic meters), and 3 (begun).)

some prudently, some malignly, some through ignorance, changed many things, or kept silent, or added. Prudently, indeed, the Seventy interpreters kept silent about many things — both lest they should betray the secrets of the faith to the heathen, and give what is holy to dogs; and because they did not fully understand many things, being interpreters before the advent of Christ: and the things which they did not understand, or omitted, or brought forth with doubtful sentences, [they did] so, the divine Spirit working in them, who — for [reason of] time and place — willed the forms of the mysteries to be covered over (obtectas) in the scriptures, so that the manifestation of them might be reserved to the Evangelists and apostles, Christ being manifested. But maliciously, indeed, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, and very many other Judaizing and heretical translators, permuted, subtracted, and added many things — whose editions the Church of Christ cast away, content with the sole edition of the Seventy interpreters down to the times of Jerome. Many things also, through inexperience and negligence, the drowsy copyists (librarii), copying perversely the things which had been well edited, perverted. Whence, all these causes concurring into one, it came to pass that, from one and the same fountain of Hebrew truth, so great a variety of editions and of codices emanated. Concerning the diversity of these editions — and how and when the Church used them — we shall speak more fully at the end of this work, when we shall treat of the editions of holy scripture. [1]

2. But concerning the diverse kinds of songs (carmina), with which the Anabaptists say that of old very many books of the old instrument were composed — which now among us are read in loosed [prose] speech — either they lie most impudently, or they are most imprudently deceived out of ignorance of Hebrew poesy: just as of old, for a like cause, Julian the apostate deceived himself, accusing Eusebius of Caesarea, [saying] that he had falsely persuaded [men] that many species of songs are found in the holy scriptures. Yet it is nearer the truth that the unskilled heretics are deceived from ignorance. For since they have neither skill of the Hebrew arts, nor have considered the words of Jerome, they think that those hexameters, and trimeters, and tetrameters, which Jerome, Eusebius, and Josephus commemorate, are of the same kind with the songs of our poets, and consist of the same quality of feet, quantity, and disposition — because Jerome said that among the Hebrews there are verses running by spondee and dactyl: which words the unlearned Anabaptists do not understand. [2] For neither is Jerome's similitude to be understood thus — that the verses of the Hebrews are in all respects like to the songs of the Greeks and Latins — but in this part only: that that very ancient poesy of the Hebrews has, just as ours [does], not only many feet like to ours, apt for making songs (namely dactyls, spondees, iambs, and many others), but also several kinds of songs — hexameter, trimeter, tetrameter, and others of this sort — which proceed with an equal number of feet as our hexameters and trimeters, but differ from ours by the varied quality, position, and order of the feet: because the hexameters of the Hebrews often receive, among the dactyls and spondees, also other feet, the order of the feet in which among us they are wont to be placed being also varied. For frequently (as Jerome says) the hexameters of the Hebrews, [3] on account of the property of the tongue, receive other feet besides the dactyl and the spondee — not of the same syllables, but of the same times [durations]. The Hebrews also, against the custom of our poets, interpose in their songs certain unusual rhythms, which (as Jerome says) the simple reader cannot understand, but only one most skilled in the metric art. Wherefore let not the Anabaptists wonder if in the old testament they have not found rhythms like to ours, and having an equal number of syllables, and recurring [each] into the same final syllable after a certain compass of verses — since not even among us do the several kinds of rhythms retain the same number of syllables and the same endings of songs: but some (as is in use among the Etruscans [the Tuscans]) consist of eleven syllables, accommodated to chanting heroic [verse]; others of seven syllables, most apt for odes to be modulated to the lyre, and most delightful; others of twelve syllables, always ending in a dactyl, hurried and slippery, wonderfully serving the stage; and out of all these rhythms, again, others [4] — among the Etruscan poets — always keep the law of rhythm, closed by the similitude of the final syllables; but others, loosed from that law, and the similitude of the final syllables being neglected, are moved [along] — whence they are called "loosed" rhythms. So, therefore, in the Hebrew divine scriptures there are many kinds of such rhythms and verses, whose canons and measures to narrate now would be long and superfluous. But if any one is held by desire of them, let him read the Hebrew poets, and among others Rabbi Scelomo, surnamed Gabirol [Ibn Gabirol], an eminent poet among his own, and the poem of Rabbi Iosephi Hyssopaeus, written in iambic song, which is inscribed "The Silver Dish" (Scutella argentea): among which two [poets] he will find almost all the aforesaid songs. But why the sacred interpreters, in translating the divine letters, did not keep the laws of the Hebrew songs, Augustine, in the epistle to Memorius the bishop, assigns the cause in these words: "For neither did the interpreter wish to express the [metrical] numbers out of the Hebrew tongue, lest he should be compelled, by the necessity of meter, to digress from the truth of interpreting further than the reason of the sentences [meaning] allowed: yet I believe the Davidic Psalms consist of certain measures. For that holy man loved pious music, and himself kindled us to those studies more than any other author."

3. But as much as pertains to the testimonies of the fathers which indicate that the old books were of old falsified, we freely confess that they were, in some places, depraved by certain Jews; but we do not believe such a depravation to have been of such moment but that it could easily be emended by Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Jerome, and the other fathers skilled in the Hebrew tongue — a collation being made with the other most ancient exemplars of the Hebrews: both because very few were those places corrupted by the Jews, and because the corruption of those same places was not so universal that, in all the exemplars of the Hebrews at once — dispersed over the whole globe of lands — the selfsame places and the selfsame words should be corrupted (divine providence of Christ not permitting this, lest the Church, his spouse, should be defrauded of the truth of the divine scripture). Wherefore, since the corruption of the old scripture was neither universal nor great, easily, out of the more numerous codices in which the integral

[1] Jerome in the preface to the Pentateuch and to Isaiah, and in the Apology against Rufinus (Hier. in praefat. Pentat. & Esaiae, & in Apol. contra Ruff.); Jerome in the preface to Job (Hier. in praefac. Iob); Irenaeus, book 3, ch. 24 (Irenaeus lib. 3 cap. 24); Jerome in the prologue to Paralipomenon [Chronicles] and in the prologue to the four Gospels (Hier. in prol. Paral. & in prol. 4. eua.).

[2] Book 1, heresy 4 (Lib. 1. haer. 4); Cyril, book 7 against Julian (Cyrill. lib. 7. advers. Iulia.).
[3] Jerome in the preface to Job (Hier. in praefac. Iob).
[4] The variety of Etruscan song (Hetrusci carminis varietas).

(printed p. 631 [PDF p. 636] — Heresy II concluded (refutation 4, with Jacob ben Chayyim's rebuttal); then Heresy III opens: Of the books of the Mosaic law.)

[out of the more numerous codices in which the] integral [text] had remained — [those] which in others had been vitiated — the Hebrew reading could be restored to its pristine sincerity; and in very fact it was restored by Jerome and other erudite fathers. Whence it is foolish, and without reason, to wish now to assert that the Hebrew codices were of old falsified in those places in which all the codices of all the Hebrews — as much the recent as the ancient — agree. Neither does the addition of vowel-points, made by the Jews, derogate anything from the perpetual sincerity of the divine volumes. For although now the Hebrews, points being added beneath the consonants, may interpret otherwise, and understand the scripture otherwise than they ought, yet they cannot, by this addition of points, so universally deprave and contaminate that [scripture] that it does not always retain its old integrity; for, the points of the Rabbis being removed, it is necessary that the old scripture always remain, with its radical and servile letters, in its purity, integral and incorrupt. Although (that I may confess the truth) it has never befallen me to see any volume of the Hebrews in which the points added to the consonants so rendered the signification of the words diverse from that ancient signification and sense which they had in the time of Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, and Jerome, that from that diversity anything absurd should follow in those [things] which pertain to the dogmas of our faith.

4. To the last [argument], which they adduce concerning the תיקון סופרים (Tikun sophrim), it pleases [me] to respond nothing else, except that we do not receive the portentous testimonies of the Thalmudic volumes — inasmuch as [they are the testimonies] of those books which are full of every lie, contumely, and blasphemy, not only against Christ, whom they themselves hold for an enemy, but also against God the creator of heaven and earth, whom the Jews alone confess themselves to worship: which [books] also have been damned by the public decree of the whole Church, and, through all the cities of the Christians, in recent years have been burned in the midst of the marketplace. Whose testimony even if we should receive, nevertheless the Anabaptists would obtain nothing thence for the defense of their cause. For the individual [things] which the Sophrim — that is, the scribes — are said to have erased are, in many and authentic Hebrew commentaries, annotated, and diligently handed down to memory. Out of which annotations (as has already often been seen, and can still be seen) all the things which were erased by the scribes in the Hebrew exemplars, which now exist in the whole world, have been restored down to the least jot or apex; and the Jews themselves damn the opinion of those who dared, among them, to say that the sacred books were at some time corrupted. Whence Jacob Benhaym [ben Chayyim], of the kingdom of Thunetum [Tunis], reproving the aforesaid opinion of R. Kimhi introduced by the heretics, writes against it in this manner: "The opinion of those is far from me; for I cannot be led to believe, and confess with [my] lips, that Ezra the scribe found the book of the divine law, and the books of the prophets, doubtful, corrupted, and confused. Nay rather, this is my opinion: that Ezra and his colleagues found the sacred Bible integral and unharmed; and that Ezra, by his own judgment, recognized which books were written by that excellent wisdom [inspiration], and why certain letters should be written, but certain [others] not — why also certain extraneous words (dictiones) were written; and he left them in the very text as they were written, adding in the margin, as it were, a gloss which might explain the nature of the extraneous word." These [things] R. Jacob [ben Chayyim]. From which the delirious trifles of the Anabaptists are exploded.

OF THE BOOKS OF THE MOSAIC LAW — Heresy III (De Libris Mosaicae legis. Haeresis III)

Whosoever [would] repudiate the books of the Mosaic law.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

The Ptolemaeite heretics, who descend from Ptolemaeus the Gnostic, of the sect of the Valentinians (as Epiphanius writes), damned these books, because they believed that the things which are contained in them are not from the good God, but composed by three diverse authors: namely, one part of them by God the maker of this world, who was middle between the good God and the devil; another part by Moses, according to his own mind, and not according to the will of God; a third by the elders of the Jews, devised according to their own talent. But the Manichaeans, far more iniquitous, affirm that they reject those books for this reason: that from the beginning even to the end they were dictated by the evil God of the Hebrews, and were stuffed by his sons, the Jews, with every turpitude and foulness — [the Jews] who, in order to cover those foulnesses, inserted into them a few certain words of that natural law which the good God impressed upon human minds, so that — as if by a veil and a mist of divine words superinduced — they might conciliate faith and authority to their own books. And Faustus, and the Anonymous disciple of Fabritius, collected, for the subversion of these books, whatsoever Celsus, Porphyry, Julian, and the other enemies of the sacred volumes barked out against the divine law. [1]

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

Already, in those things which were said above at the beginning of this book, we have sufficiently confuted the present insanity of the heretics, showing that the whole scripture of the old testament emanated from the good God, the father of our Lord Jesus Christ — by whom its writers, inspired, committed to those letters only those things which the Spirit, proceeding from the Father and the Son, suggested. Wherefore there is no need that we repeat here again the same things, or things like to the same.

OBJECTIONS OF THE HERETICS (Obiectiones Haereticorum)

1. "We," say the Ptolemaeites, "do not receive the books of Moses as divine: because we know that they were written not according to the mind of the good and perfect God, but partly according to [the will] of men, partly according to the will of the middle God. And first, that that law which is called the Decalogue, engraved on the twin tablets, is not from the good and perfect God, appears [thus]: because the works of the perfect God are perfect; but this [law] is imperfect, and needing completion — for the fulfilling and consummating of whose perfection our Savior testified that he had come. It appears also that there is in these books a certain other legislation, brought not by God, but by Moses, which he dictated following not the will of God but his own understanding, the perfect law of God [2]

[1] Epiphanius, book 1, heresy 33 (Epiphan. lib. 1. haer. 33); Augustine, book 23 against Faustus, ch. 2 (Aug. lib. 23. co. Faust. c. 2).

[2] Epiphanius, book 1, heresy 33 (Epiph. lib. 1. haer. 33); Deut. 31; Matt. 5 (Matth. 5).

(printed p. 632 [PDF p. 637] — Heresy III: the objections continue — the Ptolemaeite objection concluded, then the Manichaean catalogue of alleged unworthy things in Genesis and the Law (objections 2–14); then the Diluting of the Objections begins.)

[dictating] the perfect law of God [otherwise], permuting [it] according to the debility and necessity of those who were pressed by the grave burden of the divine law: lest, while they could not keep it, being driven by desperation, they should precipitate themselves into every injustice. As when, from himself, he gave a law of repudiation [divorce] contrary to the divine law, on account of the hardness of the people; so that, if they could not keep the divine [law] which says, "What God hath joined, let not man separate," they might not forthwith be turned to raging unto the slaughter of the wife, but might have a refuge to repudiation as to a lighter fault: which Christ testifies, saying, "Moses, on account of the hardness of your heart, permitted [you] to dismiss the wife; but from the beginning it was not so. For God said: They shall be two in one flesh; what therefore God hath joined, let not man separate." Again, certain other laws and traditions of the elders are found wrapped up in these books, against which our Savior is carried [inveighs], the testimony of Isaiah being applied, saying: "God says, Honor thy father and thy mother; but you have said (he says, speaking to the elders), whatsoever gift is from me [shall be] turned to thy profit — hypocrites! rightly did Isaiah [prophesy] of you: In vain do they worship me, teaching doctrines and commandments of men; for you have made void the commandment of God for your traditions." These [things] Ptolemaeus, in the epistle to Flora. [1]

2. But the Manichaeans — among whom Faustus and the anonymous disciple of Fabritius — add that they do not receive the books of Moses, because in them, from the beginning even to the end, are read [things] unworthy of the good God and of his son Christ, [things] destroying piety and morals. And first of all, in the very vestibule of Genesis, Moses describes a certain God turned [busied] in darkness from eternity, saying that darkness was before light was created, and that God walked over the waters beset with darkness through the night, before he made light. [2]

3. He describes also God wondering at the aspect of the unwonted light, and stupefied — and so much [so that], not knowing before what light was, when he first had seen it, then he judged it best. [3]

4. He shows [him] also malevolent, who prohibited man from taking the food of the knowledge of good and evil — that is, prudence, by which alone human life seems able to be sustained: as if he had wished him to be equal to the cattle that know not these things; whereas he [the serpent], whom he had made superior to the beasts, had denied this [to man], by which alone man surpasses the beasts. [4]

5. But he makes the serpent better, or stronger, than God himself: better, indeed, because, by alluring man to the food of prudence, he made [him] like to God — as God himself is witness, saying, "Behold, Adam is made as one of us, knowing good and evil"; but stronger, because he was able to deceive and conquer man, whom God had made. [5]

6. He makes God also either ignorant of the future, when he commanded that precept [to Adam] which he did not know whether Adam would keep; or imprudent, when he commanded that which he knew Adam would not keep. [6]

7. Improvident likewise, when — man lying hidden in a corner of paradise after his nakedness was recognized — as though he could not see him, he sought [him] with clamors, saying, "Adam, where art thou?"

8. Nor less envious than fearful, when he armed an angel with a fiery lance (framea) for the guarding of paradise, fearing lest perhaps our first parents — who, by the benefit of the serpent, had already been made participants of prudence — should again return into paradise, and taste of the tree of life, whence in future they might enjoy immortality, even himself [God] being unwilling. [7]

9. He describes also God as desirous of blood and fat, when — out of every kind of sacrifices, as if greedy of flesh and entrails — he commands [them] to be offered to himself. [8]

10. Likewise jealous (zelantem), bearing [it] ill and laboring with jealousy, while to other gods, of whom he is jealous, [are offered] the same things which he forbids to be offered to himself.

11. Wrathful, moreover, threatening, and truculent, and unjust; since so often he is angry, now against his own, now against strangers, destroying so many thousands of men on account of certain slight [things], or no crime committed — threatening that he will come with a devouring sword, and will spare no one, neither the just nor the unjust.

12. Nor only with contumelies of this kind did Moses treat his own God, but — what is more execrable — Christ the son of God, who for the cause of our salvation hung upon the wood, he lacerated with a dire reproach of [religious] devotion [i.e. a curse], pronouncing that every one is cursed who hung upon the wood; who — whether willing, or by chance, he did it — is in neither [case] to be excused. For if unwilling he cursed Christ, it is agreed that he was not divine, nor a prophet; but if willing, and not ignorant of these future things, he was certainly envious of our salvation, which was to be from the wood, in whose author [Christ] he drew forth the poison of his maledicent mouth. Which reproach touches also all the just and the martyrs, as many as died by a like exit of passion — as Peter and Andrew, and the rest of the same lot: for neither does he say that they are cursed among the common [people] only, that is, among men only, but cursed by God. [9]

13. For so also he pursues all the boys [children] of God, and the virgins, with a like [religious] devotion [curse], saying that every one is cursed who has not raised up seed in Israel. Which reproach principally touches Christ, who, sprung (as is said) from the Jews, nevertheless raised up no offspring for the sake of a posterity to be preserved among them. Then also his disciples, some of whom he [Christ] separated from wives, whom he had found joined [married], and some he forbade to be joined, whom he apprehended untouched [chaste]. [10]

14. Besides these things, Moses also extinguished all hope of the future resurrection in men, who pronounced the soul to be mortal, and said it to be blood, when he wrote: "The soul of all flesh is the blood." [11]

THE DILUTING OF THE OBJECTIONS (Dilutio Obiectorum)

1. The rash Ptolemaeus contentiously asserted that the books of the law have something from the middle God, something from Moses, something from the elders; yet he cannot anywhere show, from the holy scriptures which he is ignorant of, that the whole law of Moses is not from the best and most perfect God. Which [law], although it was not perfect in every part, and needed a fulfilling made through Christ, nevertheless — according to the distribution of those times and the disposition of persons, as much as its office befitted — was perfect, suiting the rude and carnal people, whom it, as it were a pedagogue, led [down] to Christ the teacher of perfection, for whose sake that law was given to Moses: [Moses] who never commanded or wrote anything in his books outside the will of God. Neither [did he ordain] an inseparable [bond] of marriage [12]

[1] Deut. 24; Matt. 19; Matt. 15; Exod. 20; Mark 7 (Mar. 7); Isaiah 29 (Esa. 29).

[2] From Augustine, book 22 against Faustus, ch. 14 (Ex Aug. lib. 22. con. Faust. cap. 14).

[3] In the same place (Ibidem); Gen. 1.

[4] Gen. 3; from Augustine against the adversary of the law, book 1, ch. 14 (Ex Aug. con. adu. leg. lib. 1. cap. 14); Julian the apostate, in Cyril, book 3 against Julian (Iulian. apost. apud Cyrill. lib. 3. co. Iul.).

[5] From Augustine against the adversary of the law, book 1, ch. 15 (Ex Aug. co. adu. leg. li. 1. cap. 15); Gen. 3.

[6] From Augustine against the adversary of the law, book 1, ch. 14 (Ex Aug. con. adu. leg. li. 1. cap. 14); Gen. 2; book 22 against Faustus, ch. 4 (lib. 22. con. Faust. cap. 4); Gen. 3.

[7] In the same place, ch. 4, and Julian the apostate in Cyril, book 3 against Julian (Ibid. c. 4. & Iulian. apost. apud Cyrill. lib. 3. co. Iul.); Gen. 3.

[8] In the same place (Ibidem); Exod. 20; in the same place, and Julian the apostate in Cyril, book 4 (Ibid. & Iul. apost. apud Cyrill. lib. 4); Ezek. 21.

[9] From Augustine, book 14 against Faustus, ch. 1 (Ex Aug. lib. 14. con. Faust. cap. 1); Deut. 27.

[10] In the same place, ch. 1 (Ibidem cap. 1); Exod. 23; Deut. 7; Deut. 28.

[11] From Augustine against the adversary of the law, book 2, ch. 6 (Ex Aug. co. adu. leg. li. 2. cap. 6); Lev. 17.

[12] Epiphanius, book 1, heresy 33 (Epiph. lib. 1. haer. 33); Gal. 4; Augustine against Faustus, book 9, ch. 26 (Aug. contra Faust. lib. 9. cap. 26).

(printed p. 633 [PDF p. 638] — Heresy III: the Diluting of the Objections (refutations 1 concluded, through 8 begun).)

[nor did he command that] the union of marriage, instituted by God, be dissolved — although he brought [made] a law about giving a bill of repudiation. For repudium (divorce) is one thing, and a bill of repudiation another: repudiation is a permission; to give a bill [of divorce] is a precept. Moses did not say, "Whoever shall wish, let him dismiss the wife" — which would be contrary to the law of God — but, "If anyone shall dismiss [her], let him not dismiss [her] unless a bill of repudiation be first given": so that, namely, by the interposed delay, the mind — [being] headlong into dissension — might, broken by the writing-out of the bill, desist, and might think what evil it is to dismiss a wife; and, by the wisdom and piety of the judges (praesides), before whom he was bound to read the bill, [the husband] might be recalled to conjugal concord. But if so much hatred intervened that it could not be extinguished and emended, then he permitted a divorce to be made — knowing that a man would not, without cause, dismiss a wife whom he so hated. All the legislation of Moses, therefore, is from God, nor are there in it any traditions of the elders mixed in. For the traditions of which the Savior spoke are altogether outside the law, and are (as we have already said) the fourfold expositions of the Jews — namely of R. Moses, R. Akiba, R. Juda, and of the sons of Asomonaeus [the Hasmoneans]. And that Christ understood these [traditions], his speech openly shows, when he says: "If anyone shall say to his father, Korban [Corban], that is, [it is] a gift, etc." — which words, since they are found nowhere in the books of Moses, it is consequent that Christ spoke of the traditions of the elders, which are outside the law. [1]

2. But as much as pertains to the calumnies of the Manichaeans, we respond: first, that although light was not upon the face of the abyss before God created light, God was nevertheless not busied (versabatur) in darkness before he made light. For there was not lacking, before this temporal and visible light, another eternal and inaccessible light in which God dwelt — namely God himself, in whom there are no darknesses. This light God inhabited from eternity, alone sufficient to himself for perpetual light. Accordingly, when the Spirit of the Lord was borne over the waters still beset with darkness, and cherished them by his own power, he did not lie hidden in the darkness as [one] destitute of light, but in the most clear light — namely, in his very self — he remained. [2]

3. But as to what they calumniate — that God wondered [was astonished] — that is neither written, nor does it follow from the things which are written. For it is read: "And God saw the light, that it was good" — which words show God rather [as] the approver of the light created by himself, than the admirer of an unexpected light. But even if the old scripture had said that God wondered, nothing absurd would thence be suffered [i.e. follow], since also in the new testament we read that Christ — whom the Manichaeans confess to be God — the faith of the centurion having been heard, wondered [marveled]: not because he saw anything beyond expectation when he first saw [it] in the centurion, but as [one who] approved that that which he had already before foreknown as future ought so to be done. [3]

4. Now, indeed, to that calumny of malevolence we respond, that the discernment of good and evil is twofold: one through science [knowledge], which is of the blessed man; the other through experience, which is of the miserable man, and is unhappily learned, and happily not known. For diseases and pains — how much more happily should I not know them? Therefore God, who prohibited man from this unhappy discernment, is to be called not malevolent, but benevolent — just as we would call a physician benevolent who would forbid us [4] from some food, by which he foreknew that we, having received [it], would sicken; and on that account, from the very event, would call the same food [the food] "of the knowledge of health and of weakness," because through it man, when he had begun to sicken, would recognize by experience what difference there was between contracted ill-health and lost good health — which he certainly would better have been ignorant of, if he had remained in that health which he lost, believing the physician through obedience, not the disease through experience.

5. If, therefore, that knowledge which God forbade to man is miserable, it sufficiently appears that the serpent was not better than God, as the impious triflers blaspheme, but — beyond what can be said — evil and worst, who showed to man so unhappy a knowledge of all evils. Nor are those words, "Behold, Adam is made as one of us," words of God affirming [it], but rather of [God] reproaching: just as that [saying] of the Apostle when he says, "Forgive (Donate) me this injury" — [which] certainly he wishes to be understood from the contrary, if there be present a learned expounder, not an unlearned calumniator. Nor is the serpent therefore stronger than God, because he deceived the man whom God made: [5] for God would by no means be deceived, if he [man] had not receded from God in [his] heart. Because, therefore, he receded from God, therefore he was deserted by God, and was conquered by the serpent. But neither did the serpent conquer, since by his very self he is himself deceived and conquered. For as much [as] he who deceived, as he whom he deceived, both are deceived, receding from him who cannot be deceived; and both are conquered, receding from him who cannot be conquered — by whom certainly, whoever recedes more, is conquered more, because he becomes so much the worse, [by] how much the more remote [he is]. And therefore it is necessary that he who seems to conquer by first inflicting evil on another, should himself the more be conquered by losing good; nor can it come to pass that a place should be better for him for whom the cause is worse. And when for a time the devil seemed to have prevailed, man being overcome, even so he is conquered for eternity, man being repaired [restored].

6. But as to that which they proudly deride — that God [was] ignorant of the future — we say that God was not ignorant that man would sin, but at the same time also foreknew, by [his] highest divinity, what of just and good he was going to do concerning the sinner: nor did he institute [that precept] which would be harmful, if man had not wished to harm himself, but rather he instituted that which would profit. Because man would not, without a good reward, have kept obedience, and not without a useful example — that his holy posterity might keep it — [and not without] having paid the penalties of disobedience. [6] Nor did he will [command] that which [man] could not [do]; for he willed this: that man should be either obedient, or, [if] disobedient, not unpunished. Nor did he will fruitlessly that which man was not going to keep — because the penalty of the contemner taught others to obey.

7. Neither was God improvident, because he asked Adam, lying hidden, where he was: for he therefore asked, that he might convince the man by his own response; although he knew not only where he was, but also what he was going to answer to himself, and willed that these things be answered to himself, so that — the confession of the crime being extorted — he might seem not unjustly to punish him. [7]

8. Similarly, neither is God to be argued of envy, because he did not permit the sinners to enter beyond the gates of paradise to the eating of the vital [life-giving] tree; but [he is] as [one] justly to be praised by merit, who from eternity — [+ knew what] justly

[1] Deut. 24; Epiphanius, book 1, heresy 33 (Epiph. lib. 1. haer. 33); Mark 7 (Mar. 7).

[2] Augustine, book 22 against Faustus, ch. 8 (Aug. lib. 22. co. Faust. cap. 8).

[3] Augustine against Faustus, book 22, ch. 13 (Aug. co. Faust. lib. 22. cap. 13); Gen. 1; Augustine, book 1 against the adversary of the law, ch. 15 (Aug. li. 1. co. adu. le. c. 15).

[4] Gen. 1; Augustine, book 1 against the adversary of the law, ch. 15 (Aug. li. 1. co. adu. le. c. 15).

[5] Augustine, book 1 against the adversary of the law, ch. 15 (Aug. li. 1. co. adu. le. ca. 15); 2 Cor. 12.

[6] Book 1 against the adversary of the law, ch. 14 (lib. 1. co. adu. leg. cap. 14).

[7] In the same place, ch. 14 (Ibid. cap. 14).

(printed p. 634 [PDF p. 639] — Heresy III concluded: the Diluting of the Objections (refutations 8 concluded through 14). It closes: "Thus far concerning the books of the law; now let us pass to the prophetic books.")

[who from eternity, what] justly had been given to the obedient, justly prohibited to the prevaricators [transgressors]. Just as neither would the Manichaeans say that Christ [is] envious, or fearful, because he did not permit the foolish virgins to enter into his kingdom, the door being shut; but [that he is] just, who did not admit sinners to eternal life.

9. But to think that God is desirous of blood and fat, because he commands the fat and entrails of animals to be offered to himself, is [the mark] of a man ignorant of the divine sacraments [mysteries]. For God did not command these things as [though] he were delighted by the slaughter of animals and the effusion of blood, or fed by their odor, or desired to be satiated with the blood of victims and the vapors of holocausts; but that, by those sacrifices, he might fore-announce to us that true sacrifice which the one true God-priest — the mediator of God and men — offered to the one true God, whose promissory figures it behooved to be celebrated in the victims of animals, on account of the commendation of the future flesh [of Christ], through which one victim there would be made the remission of the sins contracted from the flesh. [1]

10. Nothing, moreover, unworthy of God do [the scriptures] attribute, naming him a "Zealot" — since even in the new testament Christ, the money-changers being cast out of the temple, says of himself: "The zeal (Zelus) of thy house hath eaten me up." For the zeal of God is not that perturbation of mind by which a husband, troubled by the adultery of a spouse, pines away, but the loving care of conjugal chastity to be conserved, which God is wont to apply, when he admonishes his people as a spouse, lest through many false gods she fornicate; or when he exhorts each one that the chastity which the soul owes to the one God be not, through the false enticements of this world, corrupted and prostituted and defiled. Zeal, therefore, is attributed to God, not according to the anxiety of a livid [envious] perturbation, but according to the most tranquil goodness of [his] benevolence toward us; or according to the property of the Hebrew tongue; or according to the abuse [catachresis] of the word, by which virtues are frequently wont to be called, among all nations, by the word of vices. [2]

11. The like also is to be thought concerning the anger and fury of God — who, although he can be troubled by no human passions, is nevertheless said to be angry, when he inflicts on our crimes the penalties of due vengeance. His anger also signifies [his] vengeance, whether by some property of the Hebrew tongue, or by the abuse of the word — which is widely applicable in all tongues, when, by the names by which vices are properly denoted, virtues also are named: [as when] they say cunning for prudence, and cupidity for will. [3] God, therefore, did not — turbidly, like a human [being] — rage by anger, but retributed [something] just, a divine anger, which is named "anger" not on account of the lust of avenging, but on account of the rigor of vindicating [justice], by a certain use of speech. But as to the thousands of men destroyed on account of certain slight [things], or nothing: if those stolid [men] would expressly commemorate them, we would show [these] to be neither slight nor nothing, but most grave. For what greater impiety can there be, than to oppose the creatures to the creator? or to tempt God? or to murmur against him? or to defect from his worship? or to despair of his providence and aid? — all which things those [people] perpetrated, of whom many thousands are read [to have been] slain in the desert. [4] Whence God, who threatens that he will spare no one, neither just nor unjust, is neither truculent nor unjust: because — as we [read] — that vine-dresser [God] otherwise prepares the pruning-hook for the branches in the unfruitful [vines], otherwise in the fruitful; the [fruitful] ones, indeed, to be purged, [5] but those [unfruitful] ones to be cut away — the impious, as branches cut off for burning; but the just he does not spare, for the perfecting of [their] purgation: he spares not the just, nor the sinner — [flogging] that one as a son, [punishing] this one as impious. So, therefore, applying to the just a salutary correction, he is merciful and clement, not truculent and wrathful; but to sinners, retributing due severity on account of [their] sins, he is not unjust, but most just.

12. But now let us see what understanding that [saying] has which the execrable heretics vituperate — [the saying] concerning the curse of [one] hanging on the wood, brought forth by Moses. It is to be known that, just as the tongue and the hand in some manner signify those very parts and members of the body, but in some manner [signify] the works which follow from them — as the speech of men is called "tongue," because it is made through the tongue; and a man's writing is called "hand," because it is made by the hand — so "sin," or "curse" (which is the same), signifies not only that evil work itself, but also, in the holy scriptures, [signifies] death itself: because death is from sin, which is called a "cursed thing." [6] In which sense Moses called Christ "cursed," because Christ, without guilt, took up death, the punishment of us [who are] cursed. In which sense also Paul called Christ "sin" and "a cursed thing," when he said: "Him (Eum) who knew not sin, he made sin for us" — that is, the punishment of our sin; and, "He was made (Factus) a curse for us" — that is, dead for us: for it is the same thing, dead, [as] cursed; because death itself is from the curse, and cursed is every sin. [7]

13. But as to [the claim] that Moses is hostile to continence or virginity because he said, "Cursed (Maledictus) [is] every one who has not raised up seed in Israel" — let him read Isaiah, crying out in the same spirit: "Thus (Haec) saith the Lord to all the eunuchs (spadonibus) who shall have observed my precepts: I will give to them in my house a place named better than [that] of sons and of daughters; an eternal name will I give to them, and it shall not fail them." Or, if they think Isaiah contrary to Moses, let Moses please them, if Isaiah displeases. This is not of little [weight] against those [heretics]: for it suffices us to know that the one God spoke, both through Moses and through Isaiah; and that, according to the spiritual understanding, cursed is every one who has not left seed in Israel — that is, every one who, according to the measure of his own virtue, has not increased [invested] with the dominical gains [talents], and has not left seed which may see God: that is, who has not had either a son, or a servant, or a neighbor, whom he may teach the fear of God upon the earth. Spiritually, therefore, Moses is to be understood. [8]

14. [Moses] who, indeed, if he had believed the soul to be mortal, would not in another place say: "Every one (Omnis) who shall have touched the dead — and there shall have been a dead [person in his tent] — and he shall not have been purified, his soul shall be cut off from Israel, because he is still unclean." "Still" (Adhuc), certainly, he said, even after death, because he is not purified. But he called the soul "blood" not [in respect] of substance, but for the cause of signification — in the manner in which it is said, "The Rock (Petra) was Christ": not because it was this [literally], but because hence it was signified. Nor did he in vain wish to signify the soul by blood: because, just as blood in our body has the principate [rules] more than the other humors, so the soul invisibly prevails over all the [parts] of which we consist. Thus far concerning the books of the law; now let us pass on to the prophetic books. [9]

[1] In the same place, ch. 17 (Ibid. cap. 17).

[2] Book 22 against Faustus, ch. 18 (lib. 22. co. Faust. ca. 18); Psalm 68 (Psal. 68).

[3] In the same place, ch. 18 (Ibid. cap. 18).

[4] In the same place, ch. 19 (Ibid. cap. 19).

[5] In the same place, ch. 20 (Ibid. cap. 20); Augustine, book 14 against Faustus, ch. 3 and 4 (Aug. lib. 14. co. Faust. c. 3 & 4).

[6] Deut. 27.

[7] 2 Cor. 5 (2. Cor. 5); Gal. 3.

[8] Augustine, book 14 against Faustus, ch. 13, and in the Questions on the Old and New Testament, question 17 (Aug. lib. 14. con. Faust. ca. 13, et in quaest. vet. & nov. test. quae. 17); Isaiah 56 (Esa. 56).

[9] Augustine against the adversary of the law, book 2, ch. 6 (Aug. co. adu. le. li. 2. c. 6); Num. 19; Lev. 17; 1 Cor. 10.

(printed p. 635 [PDF p. 640] — Heresy IIII opens: Of the prophetic books. Title, Assertores, objections 1–4, and the Diluting of the Objections (1–2 begun).)

OF THE PROPHETIC BOOKS — Heresy IIII (De Libris Propheticis. Haeresis IIII)

That the books of the Prophets have nothing in themselves for the sake of which they ought to be received.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

And this also is a heresy of the Manichaeans, which before the rest Faustus, and the Anonymous disciple of Fabritius, defended. With these a certain Theodore of Mopsuestia (Theodorus Mopsuestites) seems to consent, who — as is read in the Acts of the Fifth Synod — asserted that nothing is contained in the prophets which is evidently pronounced concerning Christ, but that our elders drew, out of their own will, to Christ those things which had been said of other matters; for which heresy he was deservedly condemned in the Fifth Synod. But that in all the prophets there are innumerable prophecies, presages, and oracles concerning Christ — to whom, as Peter says, all the prophets give testimony — and moreover many examples of honest life; and that, for this cause, their books are exceedingly necessary to us, as much for the truth and firmness of faith as for living well and justly: [all this] we have abundantly proved above from the authority of the new testament. It remains, therefore, that we see how slight are those things which the Manichaeans object against the books of the prophets. [1]

OBJECTIONS OF THE HERETICS (Obiectiones Haereticorum)

1. If the books of the prophets are to be received, they are to be received chiefly on account of two [reasons]: either that they confer to the testification of faith, or that they confer to the information [instruction] of life; of which, since the books of the prophets furnish neither, no cause offers itself which might make them commended to us. For what need have we of their writings on account of testimonies concerning Christ the Savior, which are none in them? Or, if perchance there be any, we nevertheless neither need them for the confirmation of faith, nor ought to use them. For it is [the mark] of an inert faith not to believe in Christ without witness and argument. For since you yourselves are wont to say that nothing is to be curiously sought out, because Christian credulity is simple and absolute, how is the simplicity of faith not destroyed by propping it up with indications and witnesses — and especially with the Jews? [2]

2. Whose testimonies certainly are so useless to us for faith that they profit nothing, neither after faith nor before faith concerning Christ received. For if to a Gentile, before faith received, it is to be believed in Christ on account of the testimonies of the Hebrew prophets, which you think to be found in their books, then those [Gentiles] will have to believe the prophets before Christ. But say, I ask: if you think that Christ is to be received by me through the prophets, the prophets themselves — through whom shall I receive [them]? and who will make faith for me on their behalf? Certainly not other prophets — because then the question would go off into infinity, we asking again and again who should render testimony on behalf of those prophets [just] recently brought in. But if you say that they are to be received from the testimony of Christ, so that mutually — that is, those prophets commend Christ, and Christ [commends] those [prophets] — the Gentile, certainly, free by [being bound to] the condition of each, would believe neither the scriptures of the Hebrew prophets speaking of Christ, nor Christ testifying about their scriptures. Wherefore it sufficiently appears that the testimonies of the Jewish prophets are useless before faith in Christ; because before faith, when we were Gentiles, [3] we could not believe them, as [being] Hebrews; but after faith, since now we believe in Christ, the testimonies are superfluous, since we no longer need them, that we should believe those things which we have already believed.

3. But if any one should say to us that testimonies are needed, after faith received, for the stabilizing of the undertaken firmness of belief — I ask, what necessity compels that from external, obscure, and uncertain Hebrew witnesses we should beg superfluous testimonies? — as if there were not enough for us the most abundant and most faithful witnesses whom we have. For who can be a more faithful witness to us than God himself concerning his own son? — who, not through a seer, nor through an interpreter, but of his own accord, by a voice bursting forth from heaven, when he sent him upon earth, said: "This is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him." And Christ himself also says of himself: "I went out (Exivi) from the Father, and I came into the world"; and many things of this kind. To which [words], when the Jews said, "Thou givest testimony of thyself; thy testimony is not true," he himself responded: "And if I testify of myself, my testimony is true, because I am not alone. For also in your law it is written, The testimony of two men is true. I am [he] who testify of myself, and [the Father] testifies of me who sent me." He did not, moreover, say "the prophets," but "the Father." To these things he also calls his own works to himself for a testimony: "If you believe not me (Si mihi non creditis) (saying), believe the works." He did not say, "If you believe not me, believe the prophets." Wherefore, since we have as witness the Father and the Son, we do not need external testimonies for faith. [4]

4. Then, how can we read them for an exemplar of honest life, whose flagitious deeds we know to have been so openly damned by Christ? For the Savior himself, striking at the life and morals of all the prophets at once by a single sentence, called them robbers and thieves, saying: "All (Omnes), as many as came before me, are thieves and robbers." [5]

THE DILUTING OF THE OBJECTIONS (Dilutio Obiectorum)

1. It is [the mark] of a most demented man to say that it is [the mark] of an inert faith not to believe without a witness. For how can the knowledge of Christ come to us without a human witness? How, indeed, will they believe him whom they have not heard? and how will they hear without a preacher? Wherefore, when we say that a simple faith is necessary to the Christian, we do not persuade [men] that the testimonies of the old testament are not to be believed, but we admonish that the Christian mind ought first to be nourished by a simple faith, so that it may be rendered capable of understanding the supernal [things]. For thus says the prophet: "Unless (Nisi) you shall have believed, you shall not understand." This is that simple faith, by which we believe [6] before we know the super-eminent knowledge of the charity of Christ, in whom are all the treasures of the wisdom and knowledge of God hidden away — which are opened to none, if he shall have contemned, for himself, the food conveyed through the maternal flesh (that is, [the food] through the apostolic and prophetic udders of milk-nourishments), and, as [one] disdaining infantile victus, as if by reason of his over-great age fastidious [squeamish], shall have rushed sooner into the poisons of the heretics than into the wisdom for which he judges himself fit.

2. But as to what they contend — that the prophets of the Hebrews profit neither before nor after faith — asking who indeed [would make], for a Gentile (who believes neither Christ nor the prophets), faith of the prophets out of the scriptures: we easily refute [them], saying that the very scripture of the prophets conciliates [wins] faith for itself, and its own [faith], among all [7]

[1] Faustus, in Augustine, book 12 (Faustus apud Aug. lib. 12); Acts 10 (Act. 10).

[2] From Augustine, book 16 against Faustus, ch. 4, and book 12, ch. 1 (Ex Aug. li. 16. con. Faust. c. 4. & lib. 12. ca. 1).

[3] From Augustine, book 13 against Faustus, ch. 1 (Ex Aug. li. 13. co. Faust. ca. 1).

[4] From Augustine, book 12 against Faustus, ch. 1 (Ex Aug. li. 12. con. Faust. c. 1); Matt. 17; John 16 (Ioan. 16); John 8 (Ioan. 8); Deut. 19; John 5 (Ioan. 5).

[5] From Augustine, book 16 against Faustus, ch. 2, and against the adversary of the law, book 2, ch. 4 (Ex Aug. lib. 16 co. Faust. c. 2. & co. adu. leg. lib. 2. cap. 4); John 10 (Ioan. 10).

[6] Augustine, book 12 against Faustus, ch. 45 and 46 (Aug. lib. 12. cot. Faust. cap. 45. & 46); Rom. 10; Isaiah 7 (Esa. 7); Eph. 3.

[7] Augustine, book 13 against Faustus, ch. 14 (Aug. lib. 13. co. Faust. c. 14).

(printed p. 636 [PDF p. 641] — Heresy IIII concluded (Dilutio 2–4); then Heresy V opens: Of the book of Psalms.)

[the very scripture of the prophets conciliates faith for itself, and its own faith, among all peoples,] to commend [its] authority to all nations, while it fore-announces all those things which, through the successions of times, came to pass — so long before they were done, as [things] to be done: and those especially which, in these most recent days, the Gentiles themselves both know and confess to have been completed. As concerning the propagation of the Christian religion, which they themselves see; and concerning the persecutions stirred up against it by kings, of which frequent memory exists in the histories of the Gentiles, and the laws of the emperors, committed to their letters, testify; likewise concerning the faith of the emperors, and the most salubrious servitude under Christ, and concerning the name of Christ diffused far and wide into all nations, concerning the abolition of idols, and the blindness and captivity of the Jews. All which things, if I were to press upon a Gentile out of the scriptures of the prophets before those things had been done — so that he might believe those things which he had not yet seen done — he might perhaps deservedly say: "What [have I to do] with these scriptures, from which [source] you [claim to] prove [them] truthful is not shown to me?" But when so great and so many things which they said have now been brought to fulfillment, plainly that [Gentile], if he were perverse, would be unwilling, nor would he in any way contemn those [scriptures] which, by foreseeing so long before, and by fore-announcing with so great an apparatus, deserved to be commended. For we believe nothing more prudently — whether concerning things past, which were done of old, or concerning future things, which are not yet done — than [those things which] they [the prophets], to us who [take] from them faith of their words in so many and great [matters] (which, foretold by them, are now done), have proved. There are, therefore, the prophetic scriptures, before faith, useful to the Gentiles in [believing] Christ. But neither, after faith, are they on that account superfluous, because we now believe. Otherwise it would behoove those who believe to cast away all the books through which it came to pass that they should believe. For if this were true, I do not see why even the gospel itself should be read by the faithful of Christ: before faith, indeed, it is useless, because that Gentile whom the Manichaeans bring in does not believe in Christ; but after faith, [it would be] superfluous, if even by true preachings concerning Christ it is now superfluously believed, when it has [already] been believed in him. Here perhaps they will say: But the gospel ought to be read [by one] already faithful, lest he forget what he believed. So, therefore, O insane [men], he ought also to read the true testimonies of the prophets, lest he forget why he believed. But if he shall have forgotten [it], that which he believed will not be able to be firm with him. [1]

3. But now, when they ask why, after the testimony of the Father and the Son, we follow the external testimonies of the Jews, we respond: not that this is done by us because we do not believe the testimony of Christ without another witness, or because we prefer the testimonies of others to the testimony of Christ, but because a twofold cause impels us to this. THE FIRST, indeed, [is] that I may know why we have believed these things which they handed down to us, [things] which we now believe; and, knowing this, [that] we may be more stably confirmed in the faith of those things which they handed down to us. For since we neither heard that voice of the Father brought from heaven, nor saw the works of Christ, we needed the testimony of those who had seen and heard those things — so that, from their preaching, we might hear that Christ had done such things; and, hearing, might believe in Christ, before unknown to us. And for this cause the preaching of the apostles was made to [reach] all; which — lest it should be contemned by men, and thought fabulous — the vaticinations and testimonies of the prophets were necessary to the apostles, by which they might demonstrate those things which they themselves preached to have been fore-predicted [2] long before by the prophets. For although the miracles put forth by them attested the preaching of the Apostles, nevertheless there would not have been lacking certain [men] (as even now still certain [people] mutter) who would attribute all those things to magic power, unless such a thought of theirs were overcome by the prophetic contestation. For that they [the Apostles] had, by magic arts, constituted prophets for themselves long before they were born, by whom their preaching should be fore-announced, no one indeed would say. This, therefore, is one cause. But THE OTHER is, that by the authority of the old testimonies we may sweetly invite all infidels — as much Hebrews as Gentiles — [if] not resisting, to embrace the faith of Christ; or, [if] resisting and contradicting, may strongly repel [them]: the Hebrews, indeed, while we show to them that those [scriptures] which we believe were not written by us as [if] after the event, as [being] afterward warned, but by their own codices we prove that they were most openly proved by their own prophets; but the Gentiles, while — out of the books of our enemies, kept by them with such diligence that they could not be vitiated by us — we show fore-announced, so long a time before, [those things] which the Gentiles themselves now see completed: namely, concerning the vocation of the nations to Christ, concerning the overthrow of idols, concerning the persecutions of the Church (which the histories of the Gentiles describe), and concerning [3] the excellence of our Church, and the rest of this kind — which they have before [their] eyes, and, even if they wish, cannot deny.

4. That also they malignly add — that the Lord said, "All (Omnes) who came before me are thieves and robbers" — for it is not so written, but thus: "All (Omnes), as many as came, are thieves and robbers." For in this place he willed those to be understood who had not been sent — whom Jeremiah also rebukes, saying: "Thus saith the Lord concerning the prophets who prophesy in my name, and I sent them not." But those [true prophets] whom these insane [men] blaspheme were sent by the Lord, [and] came not of their own accord. Or, if it be written, "All, as many as came before me, are thieves and robbers" — as the Greek now has, πάντες ὅσοι πρὸ ἐμοῦ ἦλθον (pantes hosoi pro emou elthon) — he wishes those to be understood [as coming] "before" who came not with him, but wished by pride to precede him, and were unwilling to come with Christ (that is, with the Word of God), but, since God did not send them, brought their own lies to men; but the holy prophets came not before Christ, but with Christ, because they did not wish by pride to precede him, but bore him humbly, [him] speaking through them. [4]

OF THE BOOK OF PSALMS — Heresy V (De Libro Psalmorum. Haeresis V)

That the book of Psalms is falsely inscribed with the name of David, and composed without any prophetic spirit; and that, besides certain human ditties (cantilenae) of secular poets, it contains nothing else.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

Philastrius, in the catalogue of heresies, attributes this heresy to the Nicolaites, the Gnostics, and the Manichaeans, who also said that David was not a prophet of Christ, and a writer of the divine scriptures, but a composer of human and secular song. But in the epistle of the Council of Antioch, which is had in book 7 of the Ecclesiastical History [of Eusebius], the same error is ascribed to Paul of Samosata, in these words: "Paul of Samosata [suppressed] the psalms which were sung (dicebantur) unto our Lord Jesus Christ [5]

[1] Augustine, book 13 against Faustus, ch. 18 (Aug. lib. 13. co. Faust. c. 18).

[2] From Augustine, book 12 against Faustus, ch. 45 (Ex Aug. li. 12. co. Faust. c. 45).

[3] Augustine, book 13 against Faustus, ch. 10 and 16 (Aug. lib. 13. co. Faust. c. 10 & 16).

[4] John 10 (Ioan. 10 — so the passage, John 10:8; digit blotted); Augustine, book 2 against the adversary of the law, ch. 4 (Aug. li. 2. co. adu. leg. c. 4); Jer. 14; Augustine, book 16 against Faustus, ch. 12 (Aug. lib. 16. con. Faust. c. 12).

[5] ch. 127 (Cap. 127); Eusebius, book 7 of the Ecclesiastical History (Euseb. lib. 7 hist. eccl.).

(printed p. 637 [PDF p. 642] — Heresy V: Assertores concluded; then the Impugnatio (the first heretical claim — that the Psalter is falsely ascribed to David — refuted from Scripture).)

[the psalms which were sung unto our Lord Jesus Christ, Paul of Samosata caused to] cease, as [being] modern and recently invented; but those composed by himself he commanded women to sing, in the days of Pascha [Easter], in the midst of the church — especially [those women] whom he himself had before instituted for singing — so that one would shudder if he heard [it]. Theodore of Mopsuestia also (as is noted in the acts of the Fifth Synod) affirmed that nothing about Christ is written in the psalms. Lastly, the Anabaptists of our own times raised up this heresy again, asserting that the psalms were composed neither by David, nor by any holy man divinely, but by certain more recent masters of the Jews after the advent of Christ; and [that they are] filled with many dire [things] and imprecations against Christ, and against the [Christian] people — so that the Hebrews might have, for the solace of [their] captivity, some ditties by which, gathering publicly in their synagogues, by praying and singing, they might imprecate calamities and destruction upon their enemies. [1]

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

Two [things] are said by the heretics, of which the first is: that the book of Psalms is falsely entitled with the name of David the prophet. The vanity of which most slight opinion the most weighty testimonies of divine scripture crush. For we read, first of all, that David was an admirable psalmist, and for this cause was summoned by King Saul, that he might soothe his sick mind by songs modulated to the cithara; and when the ark was carried up into Jerusalem, we read that he sang hymns before the Lord upon instruments. Whence in the books of Kings it is written of him: "The man said (Dixit vir), to whom it was appointed concerning the Christ of the God of Jacob, the excellent psalmist of Israel." [2] But that he put forth psalms, and gave [them] to be sung in the temple of the Lord, the first book of Annals [Chronicles] testifies, commemorating that

David placed in the temple four thousand psalmists, singing to the Lord upon instruments, and that he chose out of them especially the sons of Asaph, and Heman, and Idithun, who beside him should sing canticles in the temple upon citharas, psalteries, and cymbals. [3] There are found also, here and there, in many books of holy scripture, very many psalms out of this book of psalms particularly cited under the name of David: so that it cannot be denied that the book is his, by whose name it is inscribed. In the second volume of Kings [2 Samuel], there is recited an entire psalm from the mouth of David, which in the book of psalms is numbered the seventeenth [Ps 18]. And in the first [book] of Annals is similarly related the whole hundred-and-fourth psalm [Ps 105], which David, when the ark was being brought back, gave to Asaph the chief of the singers to be sung. [4] And in the 1st book of Esdras it is written that, after the restoration of the temple, the Levites, the sons of Asaph, praised God upon cymbals, "by the hands of David the king" — that is, by the psalms composed by David; and that out of these they sang by name those which have the beginning, "Give thanks (Confitemini) to the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy [endureth] unto the age" — that is, the hundred-and-fifth [Ps 106], the hundred-and-sixth [5], the 117th, and the 135th — all beginning from this one song. [6] And in the new testament Christ, out of this book, under the name of David, brought forth the 109th psalm [Ps 110] against the Pharisees, saying: "How (Quomodo) then does David, in [the] Spirit, call him lord, saying: The Lord said to my lord, Sit at my right hand?" — which words, lest anyone should suspect [them] to be cited by our Savior rather from another book of David than from this one, Luke in the Acts [added]: [7] "David himself says in the book of Psalms: The Lord said to my lord, Sit at my right hand, etc." And Peter, in the Acts, ascribed the fifteenth psalm of this book [Ps 16] to David, saying: "David says in the book of psalms: I foresaw the Lord in my sight always." Of which [David] also the Apostles testified the second psalm to be, saying: "O Lord (Domine), who by the Holy Spirit, through the mouth of our father David thy servant, hast said: Why have the nations raged?" — which psalm Paul by name called "the second," saying: "As (Sicut) it is written in the second psalm: My son art thou; I this day have begotten thee." [8] And elsewhere the same Apostle testified the thirty-first psalm [Ps 32] to be David's, and likewise the sixty-eighth psalm [Ps 69]. It is manifest also, from some inscriptions by which certain psalms of this book are prefixed, that David — besides the psalms already mentioned — sang with his own mouth also many others: namely those whose arguments and histories are read in the books of Kings; as are the third psalm, to which is prefixed the title, "A psalm (Psalmus) of David, when he fled from the face of Absalom his son," whose history is written in the second [book] of Kings; [9] and the psalm of like argument to which is titled, "A psalm of David, when, fleeing from the face of Absalom, he was ascending the Mount of Olives with bare feet and covered head"; and the 32nd psalm [Ps 34], having for [its] title, "A psalm of David, when he changed his countenance before Abimelech, and cast him out, and, being dismissed, went away," whose argument is had in the first volume of Kings; likewise the fiftieth psalm [Ps 51], and the 51st [Ps 52]; and many others, whose occasions are related in the books of Kings and of Annals. [10]

The second [thing] asserted by the heretics is: that this whole book, composed without any prophetic spirit, contains nothing divine in itself. Whose stolidity the other books of divine scripture refute — but especially the books of Kings, in which David himself, with open voice, proclaims that he was inspired by the Holy Spirit, that he might fore-sing the Christ to come, saying: "The man said (Dixit vir), to whom it was appointed concerning Christ, the excellent psalmist of Israel: The Spirit of the Lord hath spoken through me, and his speech through my tongue. The strong [one] of Israel said to me, [that there should come] the ruler of men, the just [one], the ruler in the fear of God" — which our Savior confirmed, when he said to the Jews: "How (Quomodo) then does David call him, in [the] Spirit, lord, saying: The Lord said, etc.?" [11] And after his resurrection, when he opened the sense of the scriptures to his disciples, he testified that the Holy Spirit had spoken, in the book of psalms, concerning [his] life, passion, death, and resurrection, and the preaching of the gospel. [12] And the apostles call David, the author of this book, a prophet, and everywhere bring forth his vaticinations as [those] of a truthful prophet. "A prophet (Propheta)," says Peter, "since he was, and knew, because God had sworn to him with an oath, etc." And the apostles, in the Acts: "O Lord (Domine), who by the Holy Spirit, through the mouth of thy servant David, hast spoken." And Paul: "I will give (Dabo) you the holy faithful [things] of David" — that is, I will give you to recognize that the vaticinations of David were faithful. [13] But, although it may have been doubtful among the Catholic fathers (as Augustine writes in the seventeenth book of the City of God) whether all the psalms of this book were put forth by David, or whether per-[haps some by others] [14]

---

[1] Thomas Aquinas in the preface to the Psalms (Tho. Aquin. in praef. Psal.).
[2] 1 Kings [Samuel] 16 (1. Reg. 16); 2 Kings [Samuel] 23 (2. Reg. 23).
[3] 1 Chron. 6, 15, 16, 23, 25 (1. Par. 6; 1. Par. 15; 1. Par. 16; 1. Par. 23; 1. Par. 25).
[4] 2 Kings [Samuel] 22 (2. Reg. 22); 1 Chron. 16 (1. Par. 16); Esdras 1 (Esd. 1).
[5] so printed "306," a slip for 106
[6] Psalm 105 (Psal. 105).
[7] Matt. 22 (Matt. 20, so printed); Luke 20; Psalm 109; Acts (Act. 20, so printed); Acts 2; Psalm 15.
[8] Acts 4; Acts 13; Psalm 2; Psalm 13; Rom. 4; Rom. 11; Psalm 68.
[9] ch. 116 (Cap. 116).
[10] 1 Kings [Samuel] (1. Reg.).
[11] 2 Kings [Samuel] 23 (2. Reg. 23); Matt. 22 (Matth. 22).
[12] Luke 24 (Luc. 24).
[13] Acts 2; Acts 4; Acts 13 (Act. 2; Act. 4; Act. 13).
[14] ch. 14 (Cap. 14).

(printed p. 638 [PDF p. 643] — Heresy V: the Impugnatio concluded; then the OBJECTIONS OF THE HERETICS (1–4) that the Psalter is not David's and not prophetic.)

[whether] several of these were composed by certain [other] holy men, whom David had ordained [as] psalmists in the temple of God — namely by Asaph, Heman, Idithun, Chore [Korah], and their sons (because many of their psalms are prefixed with their names): nevertheless it behooves to believe that those too, by whomsoever they were [composed], were dictated by the Holy Spirit. For it is written in the first book of Annals [Chronicles] that all those singers — namely Asaph, Heman, Idithun, Chore, Moses — and their sons, were prophets, and holy doctors, in the temple of God. Whence Christ and the apostles approved their psalms as [things] put forth by the prophetic spirit, and confirmed their own preaching by the authority of them. [1] Of the psalms inscribed [to] Asaph, we find that our Savior cited that [saying] of the eighty-first psalm [Ps 82]: "I said (Ego dixi), you are gods"; and [we find] that Matthew similarly called Asaph himself a prophet, when — a versicle of his psalm being produced — he said: "All these things (Haec omnia) Jesus spoke in parables, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying: I will open my mouth in parables." [2] Of the psalms inscribed [to] Moses, Paul took a testimony, saying: "As (Sicut) the Holy Spirit says: Today, if you shall hear his voice, harden not your hearts." And of the psalms attributed to Chore [Korah], the same Apostle received that testimony: "Thy throne (Thronus tuus), O God, [is] unto the age of the age." [3] From all which it evidently appears that all the psalms were composed by the Holy Spirit, and sung through the mouth of David and of his singers. But the present Book of Psalms is inscribed with the name of David the prophet, either because the first and nobler part of the book was composed by David through his very self, or because — David suggesting the matter of the psalms to his singers — the greater part of the book was written and sung by them.

OBJECTIONS OF THE HERETICS (Obiectiones Haereticorum)

1. Those who affirm the book of psalms to be David's are led (say the Anabaptists) by no certain conjecture. For neither does the inscription of the book show this, in which the name of David is not [always] placed; nor in the whole of holy scripture is there ever mention of the author of this volume; nor is it ever read that any psalm was composed by David, except one only — when God had freed him from the hand of Saul — whose beginning is: "The Lord [is] my rock (Dominus petra mea)," which is written in the 2nd book of Kings [2 Sam 22]. And concerning this one psalm, whether it truly be his, it scarcely is agreed: because the Book of

Psalms judges otherwise about it, and the second [book] of Kings otherwise; in which it is written that this psalm was the very last of all [4] the words which David spoke; but in the book of psalms it is written that the last of all the psalms of David was that one which is placed in the seventy-second number [Ps 72], at whose foot it is written: "Finished (Finitae) are the prayers of David, son of Isai [Jesse]." [5]

2. There are, moreover, in this book very many psalms which are ascertained to have been composed neither by David nor in David's time — both from their inscriptions containing the names of men who were long after David's time, and from those things which are related in them [as] done many years after David: as the destruction of Jerusalem, of which the seventy-third psalm [Ps 74] speaks as of a thing already past; and the mourning of the captives at the rivers of Babylon, which is commemorated in the 136th psalm [Ps 137]; and the return from the captivity of Babylon into Jerusalem, of which [is] the 125th psalm [Ps 126], as [the psalter] speaks of it as already completed. Which [things] also seven-and-forty psalms more openly indicate — namely, from the hundred-and-eleventh even to the end of the book of psalms — which are inscribed "Reversions (Reversiones)" of Aggaeus [Haggai] and Zacharias [Zechariah], because through these two prophets they were sung for the return of the sons of Israel from Babylon into Jerusalem.

3. To this it accedes [is added], that almost all authors, as much Jews as Christians, affirm that the greater part of this volume is not David's. R. David Kimhi thinks those only to be psalms of David to which is prefixed the title לדוד (le David), that is, "of David himself" (Ipsi David); but the others to be [the psalms] of those by whose name they are entitled — whom Aben Ezra [Ibn Ezra], calling into doubt, says that it is uncertain whether every psalm to which is prefixed the name לדוד (le David), that is, "of David himself," be his, or rather of some singer who composed it concerning David. Jerome also, in the epistle to Cyprian, says: "They err (Errant) who think all the psalms to be David's, and not [the psalms] of those by whose names they are inscribed — as David, Asaph, Idithun, the sons of Core [Korah], Heman, [Ethan] the Ezrahite, Moses, and Solomon, and the rest, whom Esdras comprehended in the first volume." But Augustine, in the preface to the 2nd psalm, judges that David sang only nine psalms, but that the others, to which his name is prefixed, were sung by his singers. John Chrysostom, in the preface to the psalms, asserts [the same]. The inscriptions which are now prefixed to the psalms, he asserts to be for the greater part false. Which consensus of opinions makes faith [gives assurance] that this book is not David's.

4. But as to [the claim] that nothing prophetic is in this book, the Hebrews themselves testify, who exclude it from the prophetic scriptures. And you [Christians] also confirm the same, when you make David the author of the book — [David] who was not a prophet, but a king assumed for the governance of the kingdom. For those are called prophets in the scriptures who are divinely called to the office of prophesying, or are sent to a king, or to some people, with the public dignity of an office, that they may announce future things to them — as Moses to Pharaoh, and Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the other prophets to the people of Israel: but David we nowhere read to have been called to this dignity of prophesying. But also the psalms of this book themselves most clearly show that nothing is found in this book which pertains to prophecy. For those testimonies which are wont to be brought forth from the psalms as presages of Christ agree to none less than to Christ. For how do those words pertain to the crucifixion of Christ: "They have dug (Foderunt) my hands, and they divided (Diviserunt) my garments" — which can in no way be adapted to Christ? [6] For, besides that the Hebrews read those words otherwise, saying, "Like (Sicut) a lion my hands and my feet they have observed [watched]," it is also evident that Christ was not crucified with nails driven through hands and feet — because it was not the custom in Israel that those who were hanged on wood should be fastened to the cross with hands and feet transfixed by a nail, but the law so prescribing, that [men], suspended and transfixed, should hang on the cross. Likewise, that which is taken from the eighteenth psalm [Ps 19]: "Into (In) all the earth their sound went out" — how can it be twisted to the preaching of the apostles, when [7]

[1] 1 Chron. 25 (1. Par. 25).

[2] John 10 (Ioan. 10); Psalm 81 [Vulgate], "I said, you are gods" (printed "Psal. 18," apparently transposed); Matt. 13 (Matth. 13); Psalm 77 [= Ps 78] (Psal. 77).

[3] Heb. 3 (printed "Heb. 13"); Psalm 94 [= Ps 95] (printed "Psal. 64"); Psalm 44 [= Ps 45] (Psal. 44); Heb. 1 (Hebr. 1).

[4] 2 Kings [Samuel] 22 (2. Reg. 22); Psalm 17 [= Ps 18] (Psal. 17); ch. 23 (Cap. 23).

[5] Psalm 72 (printed "Psal. 27," a slip).

[6] Psalm 21 [= Ps 22] (Psal. 21).

[7] Psalm 18 [= Ps 19] (Psal. 18).

(printed p. 639 [PDF p. 644] — Heresy V: objection 4 concluded, objection 5 (the "imprecation" psalms); then the Objections are Dissolved (responses 1–3 begun).)

[how can "Into all the earth their sound went out" be twisted to the preaching of the apostles,] when it [the psalm] speaks expressly of the heavens themselves, according to a certain poetic prosopopoeia? By which two testimonies, if the matter be more attentively inspected, there are found also other testimonies like [these], which our elders referred to the vaticinations of Christ.

5. The sentences, moreover, and words of this book so abhor from the mind of every pious man that it appears its author was not divine, but a certain barbarous, inhuman [man], greedy of slaughter, of vengeance, and of blood, who everywhere sends against his enemies dire [things], imprecations, execrations: "Judge (Iudica)," he says, "O Lord, those who harm me; overthrow those who impugn me; pour out the lance (framea), and shut up [the way] against those who persecute me. Let them become as dust before the face of the wind, and let the angel of the Lord straiten them. Let their ways become darkness and slipperiness, and let the angel of the Lord persecute them." [1] And, "Let death (Veniat mors) come upon them, and let them descend into hell living." And again, "Make (Fac) them as Madian [Midian], and Sysara [Sisera], and as Iabin [Jabin], in the torrent of Cyson [Kishon]; let them perish, and become as the dung of the earth. Make their princes as Oreb, and Zeb, and Zebee [Zebah], and Salmana [Zalmunna]. My God, make them as a wheel, and as stubble before the face of the wind; as fire which burneth the wood, and as a flame burning the mountains, so shalt thou persecute them in thy tempest, and in thy wrath shalt thou trouble them." [2] With which indignations and maledictions almost all the psalms are so full, that they bear a similitude of those imprecations with which Callimachus devoted [cursed] Apollonius of Rhodes, and Ovid [devoted] his Ibis.

THE OBJECTIONS ARE DISSOLVED (Diluuntur Obiecta)

1. So inept are the objections of the Anabaptists that a response seems in some manner superfluous. For if the book is on this account denied to be David's — because it does not bear his inscription — then neither will Moses be the author of the five books of the law, because they are not titled with the name of Moses. The opposite of which thing Christ teaches, saying: "Moses wrote of me"; and all authors, as much Hebrew as Christian, confirm it. [3] And lest most unskilled men wonder that the name of David is not prefixed to this book, let them know that among the Hebrews the divine volumes are inscribed in various ways: either from the name of the author, as the book of Joshua; or from the first word of the book, as the book of Genesis, which from its first word is entitled בראשת ברה (Berescith barah) [that is, בראשית ברא, "In the beginning [God] created"]; or from the matter contained in the book, as the book of Kings, and the present volume of Psalms — which, from the hymns and odes contained in it, the name of the author being omitted, is called ספר תהלים (Sepher theillim), that is, "the book of psalms, or of hymns, or of prayers": which book, nevertheless, our Savior testified to be David's, when he said to the scribes, "David himself says in the book of Psalms: The Lord said to my lord." And we have already shown that the author of all the psalms which are in it was David, who — besides those psalms which he sang with his own mouth — supplied (as Augustine and Chrysostom say) all the subjects of the other psalms to those singers, who sang them, and inscribed them with their own names, and, the subjects being received from him, explained [them] in songs. [4] But those are confuted who say that David put forth one [psalm] only, through the very same words which they bring against us. For if that psalm which is read in the second volume of Kings [2 Sam 22] was the last of the psalms, then it behooved that before it more other psalms were composed by David; for neither would it be called the last, unless others had preceded it. But as to [the fact] that after the end of the seventy-first psalm it is written, "Finished (Finitae) are the prayers of David," it is not so to be understood, that I should believe the psalms of David to be there finished, and that [psalm] to be the last of all the psalms; but that we may know those prayers to be finished in that place, by which he besought God for the safety and the kingdom of his son Solomon. Similarly concerning the psalm of the book of Kings it is to be thought, that it was not the last of all David's psalms, but only of those which he composed during the persecution of his enemies.

2. To the second objection of the Anabaptists — concerning the psalms which seem to have been composed after David's time — Augustine, in the seventeenth [book] of the City of God, responds in these words: "It seems to me (Mihi) more credible to esteem that those [men] who attribute all these psalms to the work of David — and [say] that he prefixed some [of them] also with the names of others, prefiguring something which pertains to the matter [thereby dealt with] — [judge rightly]. Nor ought it to move [anyone] to this disbelief, [5] that some names of prophets who were after the times of King David are read inscribed on certain psalms in that book, and [that] the things which are there said seem, as it were, to be said by them: for the prophetic Spirit was able to reveal to David these names also of future prophets — as King Josias [Josiah], who was to reign after more than three hundred years, was revealed by [his] own name to a certain prophet." These [things] Augustine. But the Anabaptists say that those things which are contained in the psalms are not fore-announced as future, but narrated as past. Whom the divine Jerome meets, saying that this is set among the prophets as a custom: that, on account of the certitude of the prophecy, they should pronounce future things as if already past. [6]

3. To the third objection we respond, [that] three [things] are to be considered in the psalms: the invention, the disposition, and the pronunciation. If we inspect the invention, it is certain that David found out [devised] the matter and subject of all the psalms, and, [it] being found, supplied it to his singers — as the books of Kings and Paralipomenon [Chronicles] testify, and Aben Ezra [Ibn Ezra] in the preface to the psalms, and Augustine in the 17th [book] of the City of God, and Jerome, and Chrysostom in the preface to the psalms, confirm. If the discourse is about the disposition of the psalms, the aforesaid authors rightly judge that not all the Psalms were disposed by David through songs and modulations, but by Asaph, Chore [Korah], Idithun, Moses, and Samuel his son, and other singers accommodated to the meters, and fitted to the songs, and adapted to diverse musical instruments. But if the discourse is about the pronunciation of the living voice, Augustine, in the second preface to the psalms, best said that David alone sang nine psalms with his own mouth. But concerning the titles of the psalms, which Chrysostom said to be false, it is not to be believed that he himself thought the true titles to have been erased, and in their place other false titles substituted; but that he rather esteemed those titles to have been transposed, and — the order of the history being confused — permuted [rearranged], as his following words indicate, when he says that Esdras, after the Babylonian

[1] Psalm 34 [= Ps 35] (Psal. 34).

[2] Psalm 54 [= Ps 55], "let death come" (Psal.; printed digit unclear); Psalm 82 [= Ps 83] (Psalm. 82).

[3] John 5 (Ioan. 5).

[4] Luke 20 (printed "Luc. 12"); Augustine, book 17 of the City of God, ch. 14 (Aug. li. 17. de ciu. Dei c. 14); Chrysostom, in the second preface to the psalms (Chrysost. secund. praef. in psalmos).

[5] Augustine, book 17 of the City of God, ch. 14 (Aug. lib. 17. de ciu. Dei ca. 14).

[6] 3 Kings [1 Kings] 13 (3. Reg. 13); Jerome on Psalm 21 (Hier. in Psal. 21).

(printed p. 640 [PDF p. 645] — Heresy V concluded (refutations 3–5); then Heresy VI opens: Of the book of Daniel.)

[that Esdras, after the Babyloni-]an [captivity], collected these psalms — dispersed here and there — into one volume, the order of the history being omitted. Which the very series of the book of psalms betrays: in which the third psalm, put forth by David when he fled from the face of Absalom, precedes the thirty-third psalm [Ps 34], which David had made many years before, when — his madness being feigned — he fled from the hands of Abimelech.

4. But when they add that David was neither a prophet, nor [that] the psalms inscribed to him are divine, they show themselves much worse than the Jews: who, although they do not believe that the psalms fore-announced anything about our Savior, nevertheless believe that the Holy Spirit was the author of this book. And although they do not place it [David/the book] among the prophets, but in the beginning of the books which they call כתובים (Chetubim [Ketuvim], so printed "cherubim") — that is, ἁγιόγραφα (hagiographa), or "holy writings" — nevertheless they do not deny that many things in it are written by the prophetic spirit: as the second psalm, and the forty-fourth psalm [Ps 45], and the hundred-and-tenth [Ps 110], which they expound of their [own] Messiah. Therefore, to those vaticinations which — as if by us violently distorted — the heretics, together with the author of the book Nizaon [the Jewish Nizzahon], calumniate, we respond: [as to] those words of the twenty-first psalm [Ps 22], "They have observed (Observaverunt) as a lion my hands" — so it is read among the Chaldee translator [the Targum], who rendered it as it seemed [good] to them; but in the Hebrew exemplar it is read כארו ידי ורגלי (Chaari iadai, veragelai), that is, "They have dug (Foderunt) my hands, and my feet." Whence we cast away the Chaldaic translation as repugnant to the Hebrew truth. Nor does it move us at all that the [Mosaic] law did not command the hands and feet of the damned to be fixed to the cross: because, since at that time the power of judging was taken away from the Jews by the Romans, [criminals] were no longer punished exactly according to the Mosaic law, but as the Roman governor (praeses), who was over the province of the Jews, had given sentence, so were the penalties inflicted. Whence also Joseph [of Arimathea] asked Pilate that he would grant him the body of Jesus — which, nevertheless, according to the [Mosaic] law was to be taken down before the setting of the Sun. The breaking of the legs (crurifragium) also, and the transfixion of the breast, are not from the [Mosaic] law; and by the same reasoning also the infixion of nails. Truly, therefore, the words of this vaticination were fulfilled in Christ; as also those words of the eighteenth psalm [Ps 19] were most truly fulfilled in the Apostles, according to the mystical and allegorical sense, and most faithfully expounded by Paul in the epistle to the Romans. For the apostles are most truly the "heavens," who through the whole globe of the earth diffused Christ, the Sun of justice, and by his splendor illuminated the whole earth. [1]

5. Concerning the imprecations which are read in the psalms, we say that they are not evil, because they are born not from hatred, but from an ardent affection of charity. For this is the custom of the just: that they seek vengeance from their enemies in two ways — either that, by the occasion of vengeance, those who are predestined to life may be converted from evil to good; or that those who, God foreknowing, are to be damned, may die, and cease to sin, so that by this they may have a lesser penalty in hell (where each one, according to the quality of his works, will sustain the magnitude of the penalties): to which two ways a third also is added, by which, namely, the saints imprecate evils not by the wish of one desiring [them], but by the intuition of one foreseeing [them] — fore-announcing to men future evils, so that, after the fore-announced [things] shall have come to pass, they may know [2] that men suffer [these things] not by chance or fortune, but by the certain deliberation and counsel of God.

OF THE BOOK OF DANIEL — Heresy VI (De Libro Danielis. Haeresis VI)

To cut off, from the book of Daniel — which is falsely written under his name — many fabulous narrations.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

This heresy, drawn from the fountains of the Manichaeans — although all the Anabaptists most vainly defend it — yet they somewhat disagree among themselves concerning it. For some reject the whole volume of Daniel entirely, as suppositious [spurious] and false; but others receive only those [parts] which the Hebrews believe to be Daniel's, and reckon alone among the Hagiographa, the rest being cast away which are not had in the Hebrew codices: such as are the hymn of the three boys [the Song of the Three Children], the history of Susanna, the narration of Bel, and the history of Daniel cast into the den [of lions] and of Habakkuk [Abacuch] carried off [thither]. [3]

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

All those things which are read in the book of Daniel by the Church show [themselves] most true — the infallible and most certain outcomes of those matters which in it are found predicted many ages before they came to pass. For Daniel left [behind], as Josephus says, [some] of those things which he wrote, whence the integrity of his prophecy, and no change or variation in those things which he foretold, can be recognized. For he not only predicted future things (which is common to all prophets), but also foresaw most certainly at what time, and under what kings, and — the years being numbered in order — [that] those things ought to come to pass. Whose prophecy had so great credibility, that to incredulous men he seems not to have foretold future things, but to have narrated things past. For almost nothing is contained in the histories of the nations about the four Monarchies — of the Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans — which is not read fore-announced in the book of Daniel many ages before. [4] Since, indeed, those things which the same prophet predicted concerning the three prior Monarchies down to the times of Antiochus the Illustrious, even the Gentiles who wrote against his prophecies confessed to have been all most truly fulfilled. For Porphyry — who wrote the twelfth of his fifteen books against Daniel — when he saw all things most faithfully fulfilled just as they had been fore-announced, the histories of the Gentiles attesting to the outcome, overcome by the truth of history, could not deny that Daniel, at least down to the times of Antiochus, had most truly prophesied. But that he prophesied, without any error, concerning those things which came to pass after Antiochus, the same histories of the nations most lucidly show. Whence Jerome, in the preface to the commentaries on Daniel, rightly said that to understand this book there is need of the manifold history of the Greeks and Latins — namely of Sutorius [Callinicus], Callinicus, Diodorus, Hieronymus, Polybius, Posidonius, Claudius, Theon, and Andronicus, and also of Josephus and of those whom Josephus sets down; but especially of our [own] Livy, and Pompeius Trogus, and Justin, who narrates the whole history of the last vision, and, after Alexander, [the history] down to Caesar Augustus, of the [kings] of Syria [5]

[1] Rom. 12 (so printed; the "into all the earth their sound went out," Ps 19:4, is cited by Paul at Rom. 10:18).

[2] Augustine, Sermon 11 on the saints (Aug. ser. 11. de sanctis).

[3] Dan. 3; Dan. 13; Dan. 14.

[4] [Josephus,] book 10 of the Antiquities, ch. 13 (lib. 10. antiq. cap. 13).

[5] Jerome in the preface to the commentary on Daniel (Hier. in praefat. com. in Dan.); [a dense marginal source-list:] Berosus, book 3, of the Chaldaean history; Metasthenes, book 4, of the Indica; Diocles, book 2; Philostratus … Phoenician histories.

(printed p. 641 [PDF p. 646] — Heresy VI (Daniel): the Impugnatio concluded; then the OBJECTIONS OF THE HERETICS (1–5, obj 5 running onto the next page).)

[the kings] of Syria and Egypt — that is, of Seleucus, and Antiochus, and of the Ptolemies — describe [their] wars. All which things defend the truth of this book not only against the heretics, but also against the infidels. To these accedes the consensus of the sacred volumes — as much of the old as of the new testament — attesting to the prophecy of Daniel. In the first book of the Maccabees, Mathathias [Mattathias], nearest to death, exhorts his sons to the observance of the law and to the toleration of hardships, examples being received from this book — of the three boys, who were freed from the furnace of burning fire, and of Daniel, who was saved from the mouth of the Lions. [1] And Christ, in Matthew, out of this book announces the destruction of the city and the abomination of the temple of Jerusalem, predicted by Daniel. And Paul, to the Hebrews, mentions the history of the three boys, and of Daniel in the den of Lions, when he says: "They extinguished (Extinxerunt) the force of fire, they stopped the mouths of the Lions." To which testimonies is added, that in all the catalogues of the divine books, through all the successions of the churches, the volume of Daniel was always numbered among the prophets, and — together with the hymn of the three boys, and the history of Susanna, of Bel, and of Habakkuk [Abacuch] — received into authority. [2] For the hymn of the three boys is testified — by Rufinus, in the second book against Jerome, and by Augustine, in the forty-seventh sermon on the saints — always to have been sung, from the very beginning of the nascent Church, in every solemnity, in the sacred assemblies of the faithful. But the history of Susanna, Ignatius the martyr praises in the epistle to the Magnesians; and Rufinus, in the aforesaid book, affirms that the same history was read, for four hundred years before himself, as an exemplar of chastity and of modesty, to the married and the unmarried in the churches. And Origen, in the first homily upon Leviticus, approving the history of Susanna, says: "But it is time (Sed tempus est), against the wicked, to use the words of Susanna" — which [words] they [the heretics], as it were repudiating, cut away the history from the catalogue of the divine volumes; but we both receive [it], and opportunely bring [it] forth against them: "Straits (Angustiae) are on every side for me." But the Church, every year, reads this history at the [appointed] season in the sacred mysteries of the Mass, and with like honor venerates — reading at the same time — the history of Bel, of the Dragon, and of Habakkuk the dish-bearer [discophorus]. [3]

OBJECTIONS OF THE HERETICS (Obiectiones Haereticorum)

1. In the first place, it is sufficiently agreed that Daniel — whose deeds and visions the present volume relates — was not that Daniel who is memorialized among the holy men and prophets in certain places of holy scripture, but some other, who falsely usurped his name to himself, to whom [the things] which Ezekiel wrote concerning the prophet Daniel can in no way be accommodated. Who [Ezekiel], when he prophesied in the sixth year of Ioachim [Jehoiakim] king of Juda, reckoned Daniel the prophet among men of more advanced age and now great in birth [i.e. elderly], and among married men, having sons and daughters. But Daniel, of whom this book speaks, was in the same year of Ioachim king of Juda still a boy; and, together with the three boys Annania [Hananiah], Azaria [Azariah], and Missael [Mishael], erudite in the letters of the Chaldeans, the first chapter of this volume commemorates [him], and enumerates [him] among the royal Eunuchs. [4] And Jerome, in the first book against Jovinian, confirms that that one [Daniel] was a eunuch (spado), and [that] in him was fulfilled that vaticination of Isaiah which he brought forth over King Ezechias [Hezekiah], saying: "Of thy sons (De filijs tuis), who shall be born from thee, they shall take, and make Eunuchs in the house of the king." Another, therefore, is the Daniel author of this book, [different] from him who is named among the prophets. Which also Jerome — Rufinus being witness — seemed to feel, when in the preface to Daniel he admonished the readers that this book, among the Hebrews, is not had among the prophetic books. [5]

2. It appears also that this book [was] not [written] by the prophet Daniel, but composed by an uncertain author after the times of Antiochus, who did not predict future things, but narrated things already past. The argument of which thing is, that the visions of the lion, bear, and leopard correspond to the things done by Nebuchadnezzar down to Antiochus the Illustrious; but in those things which he predicted after Antiochus, down to these our times — since he was not a seer — he deceived himself, and others who believed him. For nothing has yet been fulfilled of those things which he foresaw concerning the fourth Beast — that is, concerning the fourth Monarchy of the Romans — describing ten horns (that is, ten kings, who at one and the same time were to sit [reign] in the Roman kingdom), and immediately another little horn (that is, a little king about to ascend, and to overthrow three of those kings). [6]

3. The phrase [varied style] of the volume, moreover, indicates that not Daniel, but a certain Greekling (Graeculus), friendly to the Jews, was the author of the book — who, although he lied egregiously, that he might the more easily impose upon the reader by [using] as much Chaldee as Hebrew speech, nevertheless could not so long conceal the imposture but that, at last, at almost the foot [end] of the volume, he betrayed himself [as] a Greek, when he brought in Daniel responding to the elders by Greek word-plays: the word σχίσαι (schisai) — that is, "to cleave" (scindere) — being derived from the word σχῖνος (schinos), that is, "the mastic tree" (lentiscus); and the word πρίσαι (prisai) — that is, "to saw" (secare) — from the name πρῖνος (prinos), that is, "the holm-oak" (ilex): which etymologies can be fitted neither to the Hebrew nor to the Chaldee tongue. [7]

4. But however it be believed concerning the author of this book, it certainly cannot be denied that a great part of this volume was fabricated: as that which is read in it concerning the adoration of Daniel. For — be it that it was not impossible that Nebuchadnezzar, such and so great a king, adored [worshipped] a Eunuch, his own servant (which can scarcely be believed) — nevertheless it is an impiety to believe that Daniel, a good man, suffered himself to be adored, and to be worshipped as God with sacrifice offered by his own most powerful king; when Paul was execrated [and refused], with garments rent, the same honor from the Lycaonians, who wished to sacrifice to him; and [when] the angel rebuked John, prostrating himself at his knees, saying: "Do not (Ne feceris) do [it], for I am thy fellow-servant." [8] Similarly also the hymn of the three boys is suspected: for, beyond that it is not verisimilar that three boys had so much leisure that, in the midst of the flames, they should play [compose] in hexameters, and invoke all the elements in order to the praise of God — it [the hymn] is also found nowhere in the Hebrew exemplars.

5. Moreover, the history of Susanna — which the aforesaid etymologies of the ilex and the mastic indicate to have been written by a Greek author — the most ancient fathers of the Church reject as fabricated; and Eusebius, in the sixth book of the Ecclesiastical History, relates the opinion of Origen and of Julius Africanus concerning this history, in these words: "Through (Per) [9]

[1] 1 Macc. 2 (1. Mac. 2).
[2] Matt. 24 (Matt. 24); Dan. 9; Heb. 11.
[3] Dan. 13.
[4] Ezek. 14 (Ezech. 14); Dan. 1.
[5] Isaiah 39 (Esa. 39); Rufinus, book 2 (Rufinus li. 2); Jerome (Hier.).
[6] Jerome in the preface to the commentary on Daniel (Hier. in praefat. com. in Dan.).
[7] Dan. 13.
[8] Dan. 3; Acts 14 (so the passage, the Lycaonians; printed "Act. 3"); Apoc. 19 (Ap. 19).
[9] ch. 23 (Cap. 23).

(printed p. 642 [PDF p. 647] — Heresy VI (Daniel): objections 5–7 concluded; then the DISSOLUTION OF THE OBJECTIONS (responses 1–2 begun).)

"Through (Per) the same time there was also Africanus, a man noble in ecclesiastical scriptures. His epistle is reported [to have been] written to Origen, objecting to him, or proposing [to him], that the history of Susanna, which is written in Daniel, seems fabricated, and alien to prophetic scripture. To whom Origen, most magnificently replying, asserts that in no way are the fabrications and frauds of the Jews to be listened to, but that this alone is to be held for true in the divine scriptures which the Seventy interpreters translated — for that alone is [true] which has been confirmed by apostolic authority." By which words it appears that Africanus thought this history [to be] the invention of a certain Greek; but that Origen esteemed the same to have been the fraud of some Jew — perhaps of Symmachus, or of Theodotion. Besides these things, also the time of the judgment of Susanna does not agree with the age of the boy Daniel. For the deed of Susanna, as is written at the foot of the 13th chapter, happened after the death of Astyages, king of the Medes and Persians, [in] the reign of Cyrus, who succeeded to the kingdom of Astyages. At which time, indeed — as is agreed from the same book — Daniel was not a boy (as he is brought in [introduced] in the judgment of Susanna), but, [being] now greater than sixty years old, lived in honor before Cyrus. [1]

6. But above all [things], the destruction of Bel, and the translation of Abacoch [Habakkuk] to Daniel in the den of Lions, are fabulous. For, besides that that Dragon is feigned to have been slain by a lump of pitch, in imitation of the Cretan Minotaur; and [besides] the fraud of the priests, detected by the sprinkling of ash — which could have been done, without any prophetic spirit, by whatsoever man even of mediocre talent — this also accedes, that the author of the fable is not consistent with himself: who, when he had first said that Daniel was only one night in the den, and thence in the first morning was drawn out by the King, afterward, little mindful [of himself], writes that he remained in the den for seven continuous days, and was refreshed by a meal by the prophet Abacuch [Habakkuk] — if, nevertheless, it be worthy to be believed that a man of heavy body traversed, in a moment of time, so great spaces of lands from Judea into Chaldea; when nothing ever similar is read to have been done in the [holy] scriptures. [2]

7. Wherefore, most prudently, Josephus — when he wrote out the deeds of Daniel in the tenth book of the Antiquities — omitted narrations of this kind as fabulous. And Jerome, in the preface to Daniel, called them fables, and, as [things] unworthy to be read, transfixed [them] with an obelus, or spit [veru], jugulating [them]; and truncated [them] from the rest of the volume of Daniel; and, the person of a Jew objecting being assumed, confuted those [fables] with many arguments. And in the preface of the commentaries on Daniel, deriding the defenders of these fables, "I wonder (Miror)," he says, "that certain μεμψιμοίρους (mempsimoirous) — that is, querulous [complainers] — are indignant at me, as if I had truncated the book; when both Origen, and Eusebius, and Apollinaris, and other ecclesiastical men and Greek doctors, confess these visions (as I said) not to be had among the Hebrews, nor [that] they ought to respond to Porphyry on behalf of those things which furnish no authority of holy scripture."

THE DISSOLUTION OF THE OBJECTIONS (Dissolutio Obiectorum)

1. The first argument which is brought by the Anabaptists, the divine Jerome, in the first book against Jovinian, dissolves in these words: "We say that Ezechiel [Ezekiel] mentioned Daniel not [as] a man, but [as] still a boy. But if any one should oppose that which is said in Ezekiel — 'Noe [Noah], and Daniel, and Job, in the sinning land could not free their sons and daughters' — it is to be responded that it was said according to a hypothesis [hypothetically]. For neither were Noah and Job [alive] at that time, whom we know to have been many ages before; and the sense is: if such and such men were in a sinning land, they would not be able to free their sons and daughters. But the boy Daniel is numbered among the two aged men, either because he was still known as a boy to the people, or on account of the interpretation of the dreams of the king, or on account of the liberation of Susanna and the killing of the elders. He is also numbered among those married men — not because he had a wife and sons, but because those three men (as the same Jerome, in the fourth book upon Ezekiel, and R. Kimki [Kimhi], upon the fourteenth chapter of Ezekiel, judge) experienced, in three diverse states, a great calamity and felicity beyond [that of] the rest. Noah saw the prosperity of the age before the flood, [its] ruin in the flood, and its reparation after the flood. Job saw his felicity, then saw the destruction of [his] sons and of all his goods, and again saw himself restored. Daniel saw himself illustrious in the palace of his kingdom before the captivity; then saw himself a captive; and after the captivity saw himself exalted to [high] rank." But as to what Rufinus objected to Jerome — that he denied Daniel to be a prophet — Jerome himself abundantly confuted [it], showing that he never denied Daniel [to be] a prophet, whom he had straightway, in the front of the prologue, confessed to be a prophet; but that he had only indicated what the Hebrews say. [3]

2. To the second argument of the Anabaptists — which is taken from the twelfth book of Porphyry, Jerome being witness — the same blessed father [Jerome] satisfied [answered], in the seventh chapter upon Daniel, in these words: "Therefore (Ergo) we say — that which all the ecclesiastical writers have handed down — [that] in the consummation of the world, when the kingdom of the Romans is to be destroyed, there will be ten future kings, who shall divide the Roman world among themselves; and an eleventh little king will arise, who shall overcome three of the ten kings — that is, the king of the Egyptians, and of Africa, and of Ethiopia (as in the following [passages] we shall say more manifestly); [and] these being slain, the other seven kings also will submit [their] necks to the victor." These [things] Jerome, concerning the sentence of Daniel: to which are conformable those things which are written in the Apocalypse concerning the beast having ten horns, where thus the angel expounded that vision of Daniel, saying: "The ten horns (Decem cornua) which thou sawest are ten kings, who have not yet received the kingdom, but shall receive power as kings for one hour, etc." Nor are there lacking [those] who, by the denary [tenfold] number of kings, understand a great and indeterminate number — according to that [saying] in the fourteenth [chapter] of Numbers: "They have tempted (Tentaverunt) me now ten times." But by the little horn [is understood] the kingdom of Antichrist, which Christ shall destroy in the consummation of the age. Since, therefore, the calumny of Porphyry can be refuted in so many ways, no necessity compels us to suspect the book of Daniel [to be] written after the times of Antiochus: especially since Josephus writes that, to Alexander the Great — who preceded Antiochus — upon [his] entering Jerusalem, [the book of Daniel] was brought forth by the priests [4]

[1] Dan. 13.

[2] Dan. 6; Dan., last [ch.] (Dan. ultim. [Dan. 14]).

[3] Ezek. 14 (Ezech. 14).

[4] Jerome in the preface to the commentary on Daniel (Hier. in praefat. com. in Dan.); Apoc. 17 (Ap. 17); Num. 14 (Num. 14); Josephus, book 11, ch. 8 (Iosep. lib. 11. cap. 8).

(printed p. 643 [PDF p. 648] — Heresy VI (Daniel): Dissolution of the Objections continues (responses 2 concluded, 3–6).)

[was brought forth by the priest]s the volume of Daniel, in which it was written that a certain king of the Greeks was to destroy the power of the Persians; and [Josephus writes] that Alexander greatly rejoiced, because he judged himself to be [the one] whom the scripture signified. [1]

3. Now, that which they adduce concerning the etymologies of σχίνου καὶ πρίνου (schinou kai prinou — of the mastic and of the holm-oak*)* proves nothing. For we confess that the history of Susanna — whose those words are — as Jerome and all the fathers testify, is neither read in the Hebrew codex, nor [was written] by a Hebrew writer, but [was written] by a certain pious Greek, according to the truth of the deed, in the Greek tongue; and then, indeed, by the judgment of the apostolic Church, added under [at] the end of the book of Daniel, as a thing worthy of such a prophet.

4. The fourth argument also, taken by the Anabaptists from the twelfth book of Porphyry, Jerome refutes in the third chapter upon Daniel, in these words: "Porphyry calumniates this place (Hunc locum), that a most proud king never adored a captive — as if the Lycaonians also had not, on account of the magnitude of the signs, wished to offer sacrifices to Paul and Barnabas. But this also we can say: that the king himself expounded the causes of adoring, and of immolating victims, and of incense, and of sacrifice, saying: 'Truly (Vere) God seems [to be], the God of Gods.' Therefore, not so much Daniel, as in Daniel he adores God, who revealed the mysteries. Which we read that Alexander the Great, king of the Macedonians, also did before the pontiff Ioiada [Jaddua]. But if this displeases, it is to be said that Nabuchodonosor, confused by the magnitude of the signs and by stupor, was ignorant of what he did — [so] that he, who understood [there was] a true Lord and [that Daniel was] the lord of kings, [nevertheless] adored his [own] servant, and burned incense to him. But in this the calumniator strives to reprehend the prophet: because he did not refuse the gifts, and willingly received the Babylonian honor — not considering that the king had for this reason seen the dream, and [that] the mysteries of the interpretation were revealed through the boy, that Daniel might grow, and in the place of captivity become the prince of all the Chaldeans, and the power of God be known. Which indeed we read was done to Joseph before Pharaoh, and [in] Egypt; and to Mardochaeus [Mordecai] before Assuerus [Ahasuerus] — so that in each nation the captive and sojourning Jews might have solace, seeing a man of their nation to be the prince of the Egyptians, or of the Chaldeans." These [things] Jerome, concerning the honor received by Daniel. [2] To which, when the Anabaptists oppose that Paul and the angel refused such things, it is to be responded that the cause was disparate in each. For Paul tore his garments at the divine honors offered [to him], because he saw that the Lycaonians wished to worship, in those honors, not God in himself and in Barnabas — as Nabuchodonosor [worshipped God] in Daniel — but himself and Barnabas as the impious gods of the gentiles (namely as Jupiter and Mercury), moved by a certain foolish opinion. For which cause also the angel prohibited John, prostrating himself at [his] knees: because he had perceived that he [John] esteemed himself to have God present; which, lest he should falsely believe [it], the angel indicated, with a rebuke, that he was not God. But concerning the hymn of the three boys — just as we confess that it is not found among the Hebrews, so we believe that it was sung by those boys in the furnace of fire; nor does it seem wonderful to us that, in the midst of the heats of the flames, they could play [compose] in meter, and, in order, invoke the single creatures to the benediction of God; since, by the benignity of God, they could [do] much greater and more wonderful [things] — namely, walk through the midst of the fires with garments intact, and the tips of [their] hair unharmed.

5. Concerning the opinion of Origen and of Africanus, there is nothing why we should be moved: since Africanus, not by deciding, but by doubting, asked of Origen whether this history seemed to be fabricated. But Origen was so far from an opinion of this kind, that he most strongly confuted it in a long and erudite epistle, and at the foot of the same epistle so wrote in praise of this sacred history: "These things (Haec) have been said by me for the defending of the history of Susanna; and would that I could celebrate an encomium of the scripture of Susanna — as much by dwelling on the single words, as by showing the excellent senses" — that which some private [person], who shall have studiously and abundantly meditated in the divine [scriptures], will be able to compose. But neither does Eusebius relate this history [to have been] rejected by Origen, but affirms only this: namely, that he moved [a doubt], lest the fables of the Jews should be received, but only those [things] which the Seventy Interpreters translated. Which Origenic words indeed are not to be referred to the scripture of Susanna, but to certain other Apocrypha, which Origen enumerates in that epistle. But concerning the times of the boyhood of Daniel, and of the liberation of Susanna — which seem to discrepate among themselves — it is to be known that those words, "And king Astyages (Et rex Astyages) was gathered to his fathers, and Cyrus received his kingdom" — which are read at the end of the thirteenth chapter — do not pertain to the history of Susanna commemorated just above, but to the history of Bel and the dragon, and to that [which follows] next, in the 14th chapter following, whose time is designated when it is said: "And king Astyages was gathered to his fathers, etc." [3]

6. Concerning the diverse number of days in which it is read that Daniel was in the den of lions, certain [men], following the opinion of those whom Jerome relates to have distinguished two Daniels, thus dissolve [it], saying: [that] this Daniel, who is placed in the history of Susanna, and of Bel, and of the dragon, is not he whose deeds are narrated in the book of Daniel, but another — who was not of the tribe of Juda, and a Eunuch of the king of Babylon, but of the tribe of Levi, a priest, concerning whom Abacuch [Habakkuk], son of Jesu [Jesus/Joshua], of the tribe of Levi, wrote. Accordingly there is no contradiction within [the book], since the history of Susanna, of Bel, and of Habakkuk does not pertain to the book of Daniel, but is a part [4] of the prophecy of Abacuch [Habakkuk], son of Jesu, of the tribe of Levi — as, according to the seventy interpreters, is placed in the title of the same history of Bel: "A certain man (Homo) was a priest, by name Daniel, son of Abda, a table-companion of the king of Babylon" — whereas [distinct from the fact that] the holy scripture testifies that Daniel and the three boys were of the tribe of Juda. These [things] they [say]. But we, approaching nearer to the continuation of the history, take away the controversy in this manner. Daniel was sent into the den not once, but twice, and for diverse causes. First, under Darius Hystaspes (Istaspes), because, against his edict, he adored his own God within the thirty prohibited days; and then — as is read in the sixth chapter of this book — he was one night only in it, and thence, in the following light [morning], was drawn out by the king. But secondly, he was again sent into the den on account of the destruction of Bel and the killing of the dragon, under Cyrus [5]

[1] Josephus, book 11 of the Antiquities, ch. 8 (Iosep. li. 11. ant. cap. 8).

[2] Acts 14 (Act. 14); Josephus, book 11 of the Antiquities, ch. 8 (Iosep. li. 11. ant. cap. 8).

[3] Jerome [on] ch. 13 upon Daniel (Hier. 13. ca. in Danielem).
[4] Jerome in the preface to the commentary on Daniel (Hier. in praefat. com. in Danielis).
[5] Dan. 6; Dan. 14.

(printed p. 644 [PDF p. 649] — Heresy VI (Daniel) concluded (responses 6–7); then Heresy VII opens: Of the book of Ecclesiastes.)

[under] Cyrus the king — who reigned with Darius Istaspes [Hystaspes] two years, and after him twenty-two years — and [Daniel] was in it [the den] six continuous days, and on the seventh was freed by Cyrus the king. But that Daniel lived after Darius the king, under the reign of Cyrus, is not doubtful: since he himself, in the tenth chapter of this book, testifies that in the third year of the reign of Cyrus, in Chaldea, beside the river Tigris, he saw a vision. Nor is it wonderful that Habakkuk [Abacuch] was carried to Daniel by an angel. For if — God permitting — the Devil could carry our Savior, with the whole weight of [his] body, from the desert into the temple, and from the temple onto the mountain (as Luke says) in a moment of time, why ought it to seem incredible that — God commanding — an angel could, within the space of one hour, bodily transport Habakkuk from Judea into Chaldea? [1]

7. The last [argument], which they oppose from the judgment of Josephus and of Jerome, those same authors refute. For Josephus, in the tenth book of the Antiquities, confesses that he passed over these, and many other sacred histories — not because he judged them unworthy of his narration, but because in the ancient books of the Hebrews they were not written, which alone he had taken to translate. But Jerome, responding to Rufinus (who had noted [reproached] him concerning the cut-off codex of Daniel), writes these things: "But as to what (Quod autem) I report — what the Hebrews are wont to say against the history of Susanna, and the hymn of the three boys, and the fables of Bel and of the dragon (which are not had in the Hebrew volume) — he who criminates me [as] foolish proves himself a sycophant. For I explained not what I myself thought, but what they are wont to say against us. If I did not respond to their opinion in the prologue — studying brevity, lest I should seem to write not a preface but a book — I think that I straightway subjoined [it]; for I said: Concerning which it is not of this place to dispute. Otherwise, also, from that which I asserted — that Porphyry said many things against this prophet, calling as witnesses of this matter Methodius, Eusebius, [and] Apollinaris, who responded to the many thousands of verses of his madness — he [Rufinus] will be able to accuse me, [saying] that I did not, in a little preface, write against the books of Porphyry." These [things] Jerome. Whom, if any one should again wish to carp at, because he everywhere called these histories "fables," we will respond that he derived the name of "fable" (fabula) not from "fabricating" (fabulando), but from "speaking" (fando). For also those who narrate true things are said, by the common speech of the nations, to "fabulate." As, concerning the two disciples speaking on the journey about the death of Christ, Luke said: καὶ ἐγένετο ἐν τῷ ὁμιλεῖν αὐτούς (kai egeneto en to homilein autous) — which the old interpreter [the Vulgate] translated, "And while (Et dum) they fabulated [talked] with one another," that is, "conversed." And these things concerning the prophetic books, said against the heretics. Now let us accede to the books which are called Parenetic [hortatory] and Moral. [2]

OF THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTES — Heresy VII (De Libro Ecclesiastis. Haeresis VII)

To repudiate the Ecclesiastes of Solomon.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

Philastrius, in the catalogue of heresies, places this error among the unnamed heresies, whose author is unknown. Hugo of Caro [Hugh of St. Cher] in the preface of this book seems to intimate that [the error] derived from the foolish opinions of certain Jews, who indeed asserted that Solomon put forth this book for the confutation of the ancient idolatry, whose root and cause had been [the belief in] the eternity of the world.

Who [Solomon], since at the time when he wrote this he loved [was enamored of] idolatrous women — as is read in the third [book] of Kings — did not dare to write openly about the vanity of the world, and about its origin and destruction, lest, plucking out the error of those [women] from that very root, he should offend either them, or the nations of them. Whence, as it were studying to please them, he sometimes affirmed all things to have been from eternity, when he said: "Nothing (Nihil) new under the sun" — adding also many other things similar to these, for the sake of the women whom he loved. [3] Jerome also, at the end of the commentaries on this book, relates that the Jews were about to cast this book from the Canon of the holy letters — because it seems to esteem the whole to be for nothing, and to prefer eating, and drinking, and passing delights to all things; but that they desisted from this opinion, on account of a few words which are found written at the end of this book.

CONFVTATIO [The Confutation]

The heretics damn this book (as Philastrius related), first, because straightway in the very exordium of the book he said that all things which are under heaven are not only vanity, but even vanity of vanities; and [because] he did not deny to himself whatever his eyes desired; and because there was nothing good in the life of man except to rejoice, and to drink, and to eat; and [because] the death of man and of beasts is the same. For which causes (as Jacobus [James] Christopolitanus, bishop, in the preface to the commentaries on the Canticle of Solomon relates) certain unnamed heretics said that Solomon lacked the illustration of the Holy Spirit — not only in the composition of the present book, but also of all his books — because his heart in old age was depraved by women, and turned to the magic arts and to idols, as is written in the third volume of Kings: which the Holy Spirit would surely never have permitted, if he had ever dwelt in him. [4]

But far be it that we should think any such thing concerning Solomon — the treasury of the celestial science, through whose mouth the divine wisdom spoke — esteeming that he thought so impiously concerning God: [Solomon] who wholly lay [labored] upon this, that — in the manner of the best preacher — he might provoke the people to the contempt of this world, showing all things which are under the sun to be caducous [perishable], and to be reputed for nothing; [showing] that the world daily grows old, and that all mortals vanish among the errors of this life and the fleeting lapses of times, and that nothing solid, nothing stable, is found in the universe, but that God alone is always the same, [as] he has been; and that those alone are wise and blessed who are joined to God. But that such was the design of Solomon in this book is more manifestly demonstrated in the peroration of the volume — where Solomon, concluding his disputation, says: "Let us all alike hear the end (Finem) of speaking: Fear God, and keep his commandments; this is [the whole of] every man. All things that are done, God will bring into judgment, for every deed, whether it be good or evil." By which words the whole [sum] of the disputation, and the cata-[logue] [5]

[1] Gregory (Gregorius); Luke 4 (Luc. 4).
[2] Josephus, book 10, ch. 12 (Iosephus l. 10. cap. 12); Luke 24 (Luc. 24).
[3] Philastrius, ch. 132 (cap. 132); 3 Kings [1 Kings] 11 (so the passage, Solomon's idolatry; printed "3. Reg. 4").
[4] ch. 132 (cap. 132); Eccl. 1 (Eccl. 1); Eccl. 2; 3 Kings [1 Kings] 11 (3. Reg. 11).
[5] Jerome (Hier.); Ecclesiastes, last [ch.] (Eccl. ult.).

(printed p. 645 [PDF p. 650] — Heresy VII (Ecclesiastes) confutation concluded; then Heresy VIII opens: Of the Canticle of Canticles — Assertors (the Pharaoh's-daughter theory; the divine-name argument); the Confutation begins.)

the sum of his catalogue [reckoning], compressing it as it were into this recapitulation (ἀνακεφαλαίωσις), he [Solomon] shows this one thing to have been the argument of his whole discourse [sermon]: that men, the enticements of this world being cast off, might fear and worship the Creator. But as to what (Quod autem) the heretics calumniate — that the creatures, good by their own nature, are in this volume called most vain vanity — it has an easy solution: for creatures are considered in two ways, either in themselves, or in relation

[comparison] to God. For when they are considered in themselves, assuredly the earth, the seas, and all things which are contained in this circle [orb], are indeed good in themselves; but compared to God, they are nothing, save vanity of vanities, and all vanity, and to be reputed less than nothing. And just as I hold [account] the little flame of a lamp most welcome in the darkness — which, the splendor of the sun being risen, I contemn — so, beholding the elements and the manifold variety of things, I do indeed marvel at the greatness of the works; but reconsidering that all things pass away, and that the world grows old toward its own end, and that God alone is always that which he has been, I am compelled to say, not once, but twice: VANITY (VANITAS) of vanities; and all is vanity. But when (Cum autem) they add that Solomon set the destruction [end] of men and of beasts as equal, and placed the highest good in food and in pleasure — let them know that he brought forth such things not out of his own opinion, but according to the foolish opinion of cattle-like (pecuinorum) men, who, thinking that man wholly perishes in death like the rest of the animals, for [their] highest beatitude account it to gorge themselves with pleasures, and to be sated with all the enticements of this world. [1]

That likewise which they mendaciously say — that Solomon lacked the inspiration [breath] of the Spirit — is expressly convicted [as] false out of the third book of Kings, in which it is written concerning him: "Behold (Ecce), [I have given] thee a wise and understanding heart, so much so that none before thee has been like unto thee, nor shall arise after thee." Who, although he afterward fell, did not therefore fall because he had not before had the Spirit of God dwelling [in him], but because the divine providence permitted him to fall — lest (as Ambrose says) on account of his admirable wisdom and incomparable felicity he should be believed by the Jews to be either God, or the Messiah promised in the law. Whose fall, however grave it was, neither ought, nor was able, to take anything from the authority of his books. Since we know it often to have happened that God spoke true and holy [things] even through evil men; for the malice of men can in no way harm the gifts of God, nor ought the gifts of God to be less commended to us if those be evil through [by] whom they are ministered to us. For the gifts of God are to be inspected, not the minister; and not who, but what is said, is to be attended to. [2]

OF THE CANTICLE OF CANTICLES — Heresy VIII (De Cantico Canticorum. Haeresis VIII)

That the Canticle of Canticles is an obscene ditty of a shameless lover, composed for the sake of pleasure [voluptuousness].

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

This heresy, which the Anabaptists have now renewed, Philastrius, in his catalogue, reckoned among the Unnamed [heresies]. Which Luther, wishing somewhat to moderate, in the exordium of his Annotations upon the Canticle, followed the error of certain heretics — whom Theodoret, in the preface to the Canticles, narrates to have asserted that this little book is nothing else than a familiar colloquy between Solomon and the Commonwealth of the Jews, inviting Solomon her beloved to reign over her. But Castalio [Sebastian Castellio], in the Annotations on the same book, thinks with the Anabaptists that this Canticle is a colloquy of Solomon with a certain lover [amica] of his, a Sulamite [Shulammite], concerning whom it is said: "Return (Revertere), return, O Sulamite; return, return, that we may behold thee" — to whose courtly women [ladies of the court] Solomon sometimes directs [his] speech, and they too in turn [direct theirs] to him, and to her. This stolid opinion, Philastrius and Jacobus [James] Christopolitanus, bishop, in the preface to this book, explaining more at large, write that of old there existed certain heretics who believed this Canticle [was] composed by Solomon — [when] now depraved by his concubines — in praise of the daughter of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, whom he loved as the most beautiful of all his women; esteeming that Solomon said concerning her: "To my cavalry (Equitatui meo) [company of horses] in the chariots of Pharaoh have I likened thee, my love. And there are sixty queens, and eighty concubines, and of young maidens there is no number; but one is my dove, and my chosen one. The daughters of Sion saw her, and proclaimed her most blessed, and the queens praised her." [3]

Which words, [they held,] cannot be referred to a spiritual and divine understanding; and this they confirmed by this token [indication]: that never in this Canticle is the name of God set down. And that this is [so] stands [as agreed], against the custom of divine scripture, in which there exists no book wherein is not written that name — the τετραγράμματον (tetragrammaton), or four-lettered יהוה (Iehova [Yahweh]) — or at least some other name of God, of which the others are: אדני (Adonai), אל (El), שדי (Saddai [Shaddai]), צבאות (Zebaoth [Sabaoth]), and others similar to these; none of which, since they found [none] in this book, they pronounced its matter to be profane, and accordingly [held] that Solomon, led by religion [scruple], did not dare to mingle the holy name of God with amatory songs — lest, against the precept of the law, he should take the name of God into vain discourses. [4]

CONFVTATIO [The Confutation]

But how far (Sed quantum) the carnal opinion of these men strays from the aim [target, σκοπός] of this divine Canticle, the very words of the Canticle demonstrate — [words] which do not suffer themselves to be expounded according to the letter. For such are the similitudes by which they describe that beloved spouse, that — understood according to the exterior sound of the voice [i.e. the literal surface] — they rather deform and disfigure her than illustrate and adorn her. For what can be said, or feigned, more inept than what is here reported concerning the spouse? — namely, that she has an ample head like Mount Carmel; eyes very like the great fishpools which are in Esebon [Heshbon]; a nose exhibiting, by its magnitude, the tower which looks toward Damascus; teeth like flocks of sheep; a neck like the citadel [tower] of Sion, from which a thousand shields hang; hands like golden spheres [globes]; legs like marble columns erected upon golden bases; and moreover, that she is fair as the place [town] of Tirza [Tirzah], comely as Jerusalem, terrible as an army set in array. All which things, if [taken] even of the daughter of Pharaoh [5]

[1] Jerome on Ecclesiastes, ch. 1 (Hier. in eccl. cap. 1).
[2] 3 Kings [1 Kings] 3 (3. Reg. 3).
[3] cap. 133 & 147 (Philastrius, ch. 133 & 147); Canticle 6 (Cant. 6); Canticle 1 (Cant. 1).
[4] Canticle 6 (Cant. 6).
[5] Canticle 7 (Cant. 7); Canticle 6 (Cant. 6).

(printed p. 646 [PDF p. 651] — Heresy VIII (Canticle) confutation concluded (Origen's Epithalamium; the divine-name response); then Heresy IX opens: Of the books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus — statement, Assertors, and the Refutation begun.)

[if] of the daughter of Pharaoh, or of a Sulamite [Shulammite] they be understood, [these similitudes] are so rude, unpolished, and rustic that far more elegant and polished are those [songs] which that rude Cyclops, among the poets, is feigned most ineptly to sing to his Galatea. It behooves us, therefore — if we would (as is fitting) free Solomon, the wisest of all men, from the mark of ineptitude — to recall the words of this Canticle from the carnal to the spiritual and mystical understanding, and in it to understand the chaste nuptials of the mystic Bridegroom CHRIST, and of his spouse the Church, or of the soul, whose Epithalamium [wedding-song] is sung in the present volume: as all the fathers testify in the preface to it, and especially Origen, who begins his commentaries in this manner: "The little book (Epithalamium) — that is, the nuptial song — seems to me to have been written by Solomon in the manner of a drama, which he sang after the likeness of a bride about to wed, and burning with heavenly love toward her Bridegroom, who is the Word of God. For he loved him — whether [as] the soul which is made to his image, or [as] the Church. But how magnificent and perfect this Bridegroom [is], [and] with what words he used [speech] toward the soul joined to himself, or [toward] the Church, this same scripture teaches us. The companions also of the bride — young maidens [ladies-in-waiting] placed with the bride herself — what they say; and what likewise the friends and companions of the Bridegroom [say], we come to know out of the same book, which is entitled 'the Canticle of Canticles.'" These [things] Origen. From which it is most evident that, by the one lover, spouse, and dove of Solomon, is signified the Church, the spouse of Christ; and by the queens and concubines, holy souls joined to Christ through charity — as by "Solomon," that is, "the peaceable," Christ, who is truly peaceable, is designated.

As to the fact (Quod) that the carnal readers of this Canticle, not recognizing [it], can find no divine name in it — whereas nevertheless its single songs are full of divine names, by which God names himself, now [as] shepherd, now [as] brother and friend, now [as] bridegroom, now [as] beloved and desirable, of set purpose — those ancient names being passed over (not without the greatest mystery), by which that incomprehensible Majesty had been wont, not without fear, to be circumscribed [bounded] by men: such as אל (El), that is, "the strong"; or אדני (Adonai), that is, "lord"; or שדי (Saddai), that is, "the robust"; or צבאות (Zebaoth), that is, "mighty in arms"; or יהוה (Iehova), which by the Hebrews is reckoned ἀνεκφώνητον (anekphoneton), that is, "unpronounceable" [ineffable]. For when that heavenly Bridegroom, in the present Canticle, wished to console his mystic spouse — [who was] now for so long a time awaiting the kisses of her beloved Bridegroom, and pining away with the deferral of [her] desire — he omitted that most ancient appellation of the divine names, formidable by its very sound, [and] taking in their place new and more gracious names, by the sweetness of whose sounds he might soothe the glowing [ardent] mind of the spouse: calling himself, in place of "lord," [her] brother, friend, beloved, and bridegroom; in place of "mighty-in-arms," the peaceable one, and shepherd; in place of "strong and robust," the wounded and stricken one; in place of "ineffable," poured-out ointment, a little bundle of myrrh, a cluster of Cyprus [henna], a young hart, chosen out of thousands, fairest of all, wholly desirable and lovable: thus in turn calling his spouse — not, as of old he had been wont to call [her], the land of Israel, the daughter of Sion, the land of Juda — [but] handmaid and servant; nay rather, sister, spouse, friend [beloved], dove, beloved one, only one, fairest of women, and by many other new and coaxing appellations of this kind, by which he might sweetly refresh his beloved spouse, worn out with the long desire of the Bridegroom.

OF THE BOOKS OF WISDOM AND OF ECCLESIASTICUS — Heresy IX
(De Libris Sapientiae et Ecclesiastici. Haeresis IX)

That the book of Wisdom is inscribed with the name of Solomon falsely; and that, accordingly, together with the book of Ecclesiasticus, it is [to be] excluded from the canon of the holy volumes.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

This proposed error, of old defended by certain remnants of the Pelagians (as Hilary writes to Augustine), and lately restored by the Anabaptists and Lutherans, asserts two [things]. The first is, that the author of the book of Wisdom is not Solomon, but Philo the Jew, an Alexandrian by fatherland, most skilled in the Greek tongue — concerning whom, on account of the likeness of Platonic diction which he had, it was said: ἢ Πλάτων φιλωνίζει, ἢ Φίλων πλατωνίζει (e Platon philonizei, e Philon platonizei) — that is, "either Plato follows [imitates] Philo, or Philo [follows] Plato." The other is, that neither of these volumes is canonical. Which assertions — as the first [we shall show] to be uncertain and rashly asserted, so the second we shall show to be openly heretical. [1]

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

And indeed, if the book of Wisdom was put forth by Philo the Jew, it ought not to be numbered among the books of the Old Instrument [Testament], but to be reckoned among the volumes of the New Testament: seeing that its author, Philo, flourished after the times of Christ, under Caius [Gaius/Caligula] Caesar — to whom (as he himself wrote in the book concerning his embassy [Legatio ad Gaium]) he was sent, [while] a very young man, as legate of the Jews. Wherefore, since the Church places this book back among the others of the Old Testament — which, by the common custom of the Church, are for this reason called books of the Old Testament, because they were composed before the giving of the New Testament — it is manifest that it [the book of Wisdom] is not [the work] of the Jew Philo, who became renowned under the New Testament. [2]

Next (Deinde), in the second chapter of this book, the author, by a prophetic spirit, describes the future attempts of the Jews against Christ, saying: "Come (Venite), let us circumvent the just one: for he is unprofitable to us, and contrary to our works, and upbraids us with sins against the law, and defames among us the sins of our discipline [training]. He promises that he has the knowledge of God, and names himself the Son of God. Let us see, therefore, whether his words be true; and let us try what things shall come to him, and we shall know what shall be his last end. For if he be the true Son of God, he will receive him, and will free him from the hands of the adversaries. With contumely and torment let us question him, that we may know his reverence, and may prove his patience; with a most shameful death let us condemn him." Which words, as the Catholic Church believes and preaches, [treat] openly of the future passion [3]

[1] Wisdom 2 (Sap. 2).
[2] (a cluster of source-references, partly illegible); Jerome, On Illustrious Men (Hier. de viris illustr.).
[3] Wisdom 2 (Sap. 2).

(printed p. 647 [PDF p. 652] — Heresy IX: Refutation of the first assertion (that Philo, not Solomon, wrote Wisdom); then proof that both Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus are canonical — New-Testament, ecclesiastical, conciliar, and patristic attestation.)

[the words of Wisdom ch. 2 contain a] prophecy [also] of the death of Christ; which, since in the time of Philo it was already fulfilled, it follows that he was not the writer of this prophecy.

To this (Ad hoc) also there accedes, that the author of this book, in the same second chapter, detests the envy, emulation, and zeal [malice] of the impious Jews against that same just one, Christ, and execrates their grave malice and impiety — which it is not verisimilar that Philo did, a man most celebrated among his own, and always held in the highest honor, and besides this always versed in the law of the Jews, and alien from the worship of Christ; lest, accusing so freely and openly the so recent crime of his own fathers, he should stir up the hatred of his own [people] against himself. [1]

Besides (Praeterea), the blessed Dionysius the Areopagite brings forth a testimony out of this book, in the first part of the fourth chapter of the book On the Divine Names, saying that, among the first institutions [foundations] of the scriptures, [Solomon] said certain things about the divine Wisdom more copiously: "I became a lover (Amator factus sum) of her beauty" — which is taken out of the eighth chapter of this book. Nor is it to be believed that the blessed Dionysius cited this out of the book of Philo, [as] now newly published, since he calls that book [one of] "the first institutions of the scriptures": which indicates that the book was not then first sent forth into the light, but composed many ages before, in that first institution of the divine scriptures. Which book, even if it were possible that the blessed Dionysius saw it newly published, it is still not verisimilar that so great a father would have deigned to lean, in a most grave matter, upon the authority of Philo. [2]

There exists (Extat) also a catalogue of all the works of Philo, in Eusebius, book 2 of the Ecclesiastical History, ch. 18, and in Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men — in which [catalogue] the book of Wisdom is nowhere named.

But because (Verum) some of the Lutherans saw that the aforesaid [arguments] stood in the way of their opinion, therefore, that they might extricate themselves from these [difficulties], they said that there were two Philos: one after the times of Christ, under the emperors Caius [Gaius], and Claudius, and Nero, of whom Eusebius and Jerome make mention; but the other more ancient, most eloquent in Greek fluency, above a hundred and sixty years before the birth of Christ, in the times of Onias the pontiff of the Jews — and [they say] that this one was the author of the book of Wisdom.

Which opinion those things wholly contradict which the author, in the ninth chapter of this book, writes concerning himself — asserting that he was king of Israel, and in the city of Jerusalem built a temple to God, in these words: "But thou (Tu autem), O Lord, hast chosen me [to be] king of thy people, and judge of thy sons and daughters; and hast said [bidden] me to build a temple in thy holy mount, and an altar in the city of thy habitation, a likeness of thy holy tabernacle, which thou hast prepared from the beginning." Which words, assuredly, can be accommodated to neither of these Philos — who were neither kings in Jerusalem, nor built a temple in it — but agree with Solomon alone, who reigned at Jerusalem, and first set up a temple to God; and who, as the wisest of all kings, composed this noble book of Wisdom, in whose aforesaid chapter he wrote that he prayed to God for the obtaining of wisdom, unto the rightly governing of the people, as is written in the third book of Kings. [3]

But above all (Sed super omnia), the authority of the Catholic Church, and the common consensus of the fathers, declare Solomon [to be] the author of this book. For the Church every year, on the fourth feria [Wednesday] of Pentecost, in the most holy mysteries, chants [decantat] the first sentence of this book, saying: "Solomon said (Dixit Salomon) to his sons: Love justice, you that judge the earth." With whom all the fathers, as well Greek as Latin, agree. And first, of the Greeks, Eusebius, book 4 of the Ecclesiastical History, ch. 22, thus says: "But indeed (Verum) this Hegesippus [Egesippus] also, and Irenaeus, and the whole choir of the ancients, called the book which is entitled 'the Wisdom of Solomon,' [Solomon's] — just as also the Proverbs." And Epiphanius, in the book On Weights and Measures, believed the book of Wisdom — called πανάρετον (panareton) [all-virtuous], from every virtue which is contained in it — to be Solomon's. And John Damascene, book 4, ch. 18, attributed the book of Wisdom, stuffed [full] with the doctrine of all virtues, to Solomon [as] author. But among the Latins, the blessed Ambrose, in the book On the Four Difficult Questions, makes Solomon the author of this book, thus saying: "In the book of Wisdom, Solomon relates that he besought the Lord, saying: 'I went to [approached] the Lord, and besought him: Give me, O Lord, wisdom, the assistant [attendant] of thy seats [throne].'" Augustine likewise — when at some time he had asserted that this book was not Solomon's — at length, recognizing his opinion [to be] but little probable, retracted [it] in the second book of the Retractations, ch. 4. From these [things], therefore, it is left proved that the book of Wisdom was composed by Solomon.

And as to the fact (Quod autem) that the Wisdom of Solomon, and the Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach [Syrach] — which is called Ecclesiasticus — are received into the canon of the holy scriptures, it is demonstrated by the attestation of the New Testament, by the authority of the Church, by the determination of the councils, and by the testimony of the most ancient fathers. For Paul, to the Romans in the eleventh [chapter], and to the Hebrews in the eleventh, alleges sentences [sayings] of Wisdom out of the 9th, 6th, and 4th chapters; and Peter and James, each in the first chapter of their epistles, bring forth testimonies out of the 14th chapter of Ecclesiasticus. The same do, of the book of Wisdom, Clement the Roman Pontiff in [his] first epistle, Anacletus in the second, Evaristus in the first epistle to the Africans. Similarly, of the book of Ecclesiasticus, the same do Fabian, Pope [the first], who in [his] second epistle to all the Eastern bishops takes words out of its 10th and 11th chapter; and Sixtus, Pope the first, received out of the 24th chapter of the same volume that [saying]: "I (Ego) came forth out of the mouth of the Most High, and alone compassed [went round] the circuit of heaven." John Damascene, making mention of each volume, in book 4, On the Faith, thus writes: "ΠΑΝΑΡΕΤΟΣ (Panaretos [the All-virtuous]) — that is, the book of the Wisdom of Solomon, and the Wisdom of Jesus, that is, Ecclesiasticus — [these] are indeed virtuous and good, but they are not numbered [in the canon], nor did they lie in the ark; and therefore, although among the Jews they are not numbered, yet among the faithful they are held of the greatest authority." Augustine, in book 2 On Christian Doctrine, says: "Those two books — one which is entitled Wisdom, and the other which is entitled Ecclesiasticus — since they have merited to be received into authority, are to be numbered among the prophetic [books]." And in book 1 On the Predestination of the Saints, ch. 14, of the book of Wisdom he thus says: "But (Sed), those who wish to be instructed by [the sayings of] the commentators [tractatores], it behooves that [they consider] also that book of Wisdom, where it is read: 'He was snatched away (Raptus est), lest malice should change his heart' — [a book quoted] by all the commentators" [4]

[1] Wisdom 2 (Sap. 2).
[2] Wisdom 8 (Sap. 8).
[3] Wisdom 9 (Sap. 9); 3 Kings [1 Kings] 3 (3. Reg. 3).
[4] Augustine, ch. 8 (of De doctrina christiana, bk 2) (Cap. 8); Wisdom 4 (Sap. 4).

(printed p. 648 [PDF p. 653] — Heresy IX concluded: the conciliar/patristic seal on Wisdom & Ecclesiasticus; the Objections of the Heretics (Jerome, Augustine, Epiphanius, Isidore); the Solution; then Heresy X opens: Of the book of Job.)

[they should prefer that book of Wisdom] to all the commentaries [tractationibus] which they [have otherwise] preferred to themselves — [a book] which even the excellent commentators of the times nearest to the Apostles preferred to themselves, who, adducing it as a witness, believed that they were adducing nothing but a divine testimony. Not, therefore, ought the book of Wisdom — which is read in the Church of Christ through so great a multitude of years, in which this [saying] too is read — to suffer injury, nor ought its testimony [sentence] to be repudiated: [a book] which has merited to be recited in the Church of Christ through so long an antiquity of years, and to be heard by all Christians, from the bishops down to the lowest laity, with the veneration of divine authority. To which testimonies of the fathers there accedes, at last, the authority of the third Council of Carthage, and of the great Lateran Council, and the epistle of Pope Innocent to Exuperius, and the catalogue of Gelasius — in [all of] which each book of Wisdom [i.e. both Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus] is numbered [in].

OBIECTIONES HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

1. That the book of Wisdom is not Solomon's, Jerome testifies in the prologue to the books of Solomon, calling it a book ψευδεπίγραφον (pseudepigraphon) — that is, falsely inscribed [ascribed] to Solomon, since it is [the work] of Philo the Jew, and nowhere exists among the Hebrews, and its very style savors of Greek eloquence. To whom subscribing, Augustine, in book 2 On Christian Doctrine, thus speaks: "For (Nam) two books — the first, which is [entitled] Wisdom, and the other, which is entitled Ecclesiasticus — are said to be Solomon's, from a certain likeness [to him]; for Jesus son of Sirach is most constantly reported to have written them." And in the seventeenth book On the City of God he says, to the same effect: "Two other (Alii duo) books, of which the one [is] Wisdom, the other truly Ecclesiasticus — on account of some likeness of eloquence, custom has obtained that they be called Solomon's; but that they are not his, the more learned do not doubt." [1]

2. And that neither of these volumes has canonical authority, Jerome, in the aforesaid prologue, is a witness, saying: "There is reported (Fertur) also the Panaretos [All-virtuous] of Jesus son of Sirach, and another pseudepigraphus [falsely-titled book], which is inscribed 'the Wisdom of Solomon'"; and a little after: "As, therefore, the Church indeed reads the books of Judith, and of Tobit, and of the Maccabees, but does not receive [them] among the canonical scriptures — so also [it reads] these two volumes for the edification of the people, not for confirming the authority of the ecclesiastical dogmas." And again, in the Helmeted Prologue [Prologus galeatus], he thus speaks: "Therefore (Igitur) the Wisdom which is commonly inscribed [with the name] of Solomon, and the book of Jesus son of Sirach, are not in the canon." Which he confirms also in the explanation of the eighth and eleventh chapter of Zechariah [Zacharias]. But Epiphanius, concerning each book, in the little treatise On Weights and Measures, writes these things: "For (Nam) two books [are] written in verse — the Wisdom of Solomon, called Panaretos [All-virtuous] from every wisdom, and the Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach — and of his grandson Jesus, who wrote that Wisdom in Hebrew, so that his grandson interpreted [translated] it, that is, wrote it in Greek: [these] are indeed useful and commodious, but they are not reckoned into the number of the received [books]." Isidore also, in the sixth book of the Etymologies, ch. 2, rejects the book of Ecclesiasticus among the apocrypha. But neither Gregory the Theologian [Nazianzen], nor Eusebius, nor Origen, nor any of the ancients, reckons these books in the catalogue of the divine volumes.

SOLVTIO [The Solution]

1. Unjustly do the heretics impute to Jerome what he himself does not assert, but writes by way of reporting — not himself believing it, but narrating that certain ancient writers, that is, the Jews, believed it. For he says: "The Jews (Iudaei) have affirmed it to be Philo's" — so that they thought that Philo collected together the sentences [sayings] of this book, first put forth by Solomon and [then] dispersed, and compressed [them] into one volume, which afterward, from the name of the collector, was by some called "the Wisdom of Philo." But Augustine retracted the sentences [he had] adduced [advanced], in the second book of the Retractations, ch. 8, in these words: "What (Quod) I said concerning the author of the book which many call 'the Wisdom of Solomon' — that Jesus son of Sirach wrote it also, just as [he wrote] Ecclesiasticus — I afterward learned does not so stand [is not so certain] as was said by me; and I found it altogether more probable that this [man] is not the author of that book."

2. But as to the words of Jerome, asserting that the book of Wisdom is not received into the canon by the Church, we respond — as we have also said elsewhere — that he understood this of the Church of his own times: to which, since it did not yet sufficiently openly stand [established] concerning the authority of these volumes, it [the Church] did not dare to receive them into the canon for the proof of dogmas; but a little afterward, being more fully taught by the Holy Spirit, in the third Council of Carthage it received each volume, and thereupon the following Councils numbered each in the sacred catalogues. But if Origen and certain other fathers rejected these books from the Canon, it does not on that account follow that they are in no way canonical; but this only is gathered from the authority of those fathers — namely, that books of this kind are not of the number of the scriptures which pertain to the first order [rank] of the Canon, and concerning which there was never any doubt: which neither do we deny. For we have placed each in the second order of the canonical volumes. It is plain, therefore, that the Parenetic [hortatory] books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus are, by the best right, numbered among the holy writings; concerning which, since enough has been said, let us pass on, at last, to the order of the Historical volumes.

OF THE BOOK OF JOB — Heresy X (De Libro Iob. Haeresis X)

That the history of the book of Job is a fiction; and that Job himself never existed among men [in human affairs].

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

This also is a heresy of the Anabaptists of our age, who, deriding this book, call it a Tragicomedy of the Hebrews — that is, a fable [fiction], put forth partly according to the laws of comedy, partly according to [the laws] of tragedy: because at the beginning of the history itself the slaughter of the sons and daughters of Job is related (which is customary in tragedies), but at the end (which is proper to comedy) the happy outcomes of Job are set down.

[1] (Augustine, On Christian Doctrine bk 2) ch. 8 (Cap. 8); [On the City of] God, bk 17, ch. 20 (Li. 17. de ci[vitate]. cap. 20).

(printed p. 649 [PDF p. 654] — Heresy X (Job): the Refutation (Job's historicity from Ezekiel, James, and Paul); then the Objections of the Heretics — objection 1, the "comic fable" argument, with the disputed identity and name-etymologies of Job and his friends.)

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

And this (Atque) impious error the re-dipped [retincti — a pun: the "re-dyed," i.e. re-baptized] Anabaptists received from the circumcised Jews out of בבא בתרא (Baba Bathra) — that is, from the third part of the fourth order of the Talmudic books. To which the divine scripture wholly contradicts, which testifies not only that Job existed among men [in humanis], but numbers him among the men foremost in sanctity. For in Ezekiel God says: "If (Si) Noah [Nohe], Daniel, and Job shall have stood in the midst [of a sinning land], they in their [own] justice shall free their souls." And James, in his catholic [epistle], proposing the admirable patience of Job for imitation in adversities: "The endurance (Sufferentiam) of Job," he says, "you have heard, and you have seen the end of the Lord." Who, if he had nowhere existed in the universe of things, scripture surely would not have so diligently noted his name, and [that] of his city, the number of his sons and of his daughters, his wife too, and the number — item by item — of all his goods, from oxen down to asses, likewise the days of his life, and the names of his friends, and their race, household, and fatherland. [1] To this accedes, that Paul and the rest of the apostles borrowed from this holy history many illustrious sentences — not as from a fabricated fable, but as from a most true scripture — such as these: "We brought NOTHING (Nihil intulimus) into this world," etc.; and, "I will COMPREHEND (Comprehendam) the wise in their own craftiness"; and, "God is NOT (Non est) a respecter of persons"; and, "God spared NOT (Deus… non pepercit) the sinning angels," and several others of this kind similar. Most true, therefore, and most holy, is this history, and worthy to be held before the eyes by all the pious throughout their whole life — inasmuch as in it is set before us the perfect form of a religious man, and truly wise, who is neither puffed up by prosperous things, nor broken by adverse, nor in either deserts his God, but, immovable in faith and constant in hope, perseveres through all kinds of temptations. [2] Wherefore rightly Moses translated this holy history — written first in Syriac, whether by Job or by his friends — into the Hebrew tongue, for the consolation of his Hebrews when they were being oppressed in Egypt by Pharaoh: so that, while they read those vehement sorrows of the blessed man, they might mutually console one another, and with patience and thanksgiving bear the evils which had surrounded them; and, hearing of the remuneration which God bestowed on blessed Job after [his] endurance, might themselves also hope for liberation, and expect the reward of their labors. And so this holy book — which the Councils so often mentioned received into the Canon, and the perpetual consensus of the Church has approved — is to be received by all the faithful with all veneration. [3]

OBIECTIONES HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

1. That the argument [plot] of the book of Job is comic, and fabricated according to the laws of the stage [scene], appears from this: that nothing certain can be had concerning the persons, nor the place, nor the time, nor the author of this history — the writers, no less Hebrew than Greek and Latin, dissenting among themselves. And first, concerning Job himself — who holds the chief part in this history, and on whom the argument of the whole narration leans — there is no small controversy. Origen, in the first chapter of the commentaries on Job, writes that this Job was an Arab, of the race of Esau, born in the land of Uz [Vsitis] — moved by certain words which are read in the common Greek edition toward the end of that book, where Job is said to have dwelt in the land of Uz, in the confines of Arabia, whose name before had been Iobab, and [who] was son of Zareth [Zerah], of the sons of Esau, of the mother Bozra, fifth from Abraham, fourth from Esau. To whom Augustine, in the eighteenth book On the City of God, consents. But Ambrose, in the commentary on the epistle to the Romans, thinks he was a king in Edom — from the fact that in Genesis it is read that kings once reigned in Edom, of whom the first was Balach [Bela] son of Beor, after whom Iobab reigned; whom Ambrose believed to be Job, deceived by the affinity of the words [names], which nevertheless among the Hebrews differ much, not only in the beginning, but also in the end of the word. For Job, from the letter א (aleph) with a hiriq point subscribed, is thus written איוב (Iyyob); but Iobab, beginning from the letter Iod, is thus written יובב (Yobab). But Jerome, in the Hebrew Questions, esteems those to judge falsely who believe Job to have been of the seed of Esau, asserting that he descended from the stock of Nachor [Nahor] the brother of Abraham. But others, whom Jerome cites in the same book, said Job to be that Iasub [Jashub] who, in the beginning of Paralipomenon [Chronicles], after Thola [Tola] and Suhal [Shuah], is numbered in the catalogue of the sons of Israel. But all the most ancient of the Hebrews — who, as more skilled concerning their own genealogies, are the more to be believed — hand down that Job never existed among men, but that this book was fabricated by an uncertain author under the person of Job: namely, as an example of patience, unto the instruction of endurance in adversities, and unto the solace of oncoming calamities. To which argument [design] they wish all the persons of the present book aptly to correspond. For there is set, in the first place, a man tossed through all kinds of evils, and oppressed with pains intolerable to human patience, on whom, from the outcome of his own misery, is imposed the name IOB — that is, "grieving, groaning, and howling, and afflicting himself." He is feigned also, not ineptly, [to be] of the land of Hus [Uz], which is interpreted "counsel," that we may learn that by counsel and prudence every kind of misfortune and hardship is easily overcome. But there are sent against so great a man — as if about to contend in the wrestling-school [palaestra] — not any sort of manikins from the lowest commons, but [men] distinguished by splendid names: Eliphaz, Baldad [Bildad], Sophar [Zophar], and Heliu [Elihu]. For Baldad is interpreted "ancient secrets"; Sophar, "watchman, or trumpet"; Eliphaz, "the gold of God"; but Heliu, "God himself": that in these it may be shown that against a man of Uz — that is, [a man] armed with counsel and prudence — no riches of men, however great, nor power, nor wisdom, prevails. Whence also, in the last act of this fable — in which the matter obtains a happier issue, as is wont to happen in comedies — God himself is brought in, who, as the best judge, restored to the most valiant man double for all [the things] which he had lost. And that the fable might be more delightful by the variety of speech, its single parts are so disposed by a certain comic method that its exordium begins in loose [prose] speech; then there follow acts, described after the manner of a drama in hexameter and pentameter verses, sometimes also with certain jingling rhythms [rhymes] interposed; and just as in the comedies, as well of the Greeks as of the La-[tins]

[1] Ezekiel 14 (Ezech. 14); James 5 (Iac. 5).

[2] Job 1 (Iob 1.d); 1 Timothy 6 (1. Tim. 6); Job 5 (Iob 5.b); 1 Corinthians 3 (1. Cor. 3); Job 34 (Iob 34.b); Acts 10 (Act. 10); Job 4 (Iob 4.c); 2 Peter 2 (2. Pet. 2).

[3] Origen, in the preface to [his] tome[s] on Job, [ch.] 1 (Orig. in praef. tom. in Iob 1).

(printed p. 650 [PDF p. 655] — Heresy X (Job): objection 1 concluded (the multilingual/comedy argument; uncertainty of place, time, author); objection 2 (Job made impatient and blasphemous); then the Dissolution of the Objections begins (response 1: significant names pervade all Scripture).)

the diverse kinds of languages of the Latins are sometimes wont to be mixed [in], for the greater delight of the hearers — as in Aristophanes, in the comedy which is entitled Acharnians, a certain barbarian is brought in speaking the Persian tongue; and in Plautus, in the Poenulus, a certain African, Hanno, speaks in Punic — so in this fable [of Job] various kinds of languages are brought in. And [they say] one part of the narration, Jerome himself being witness, is digested in the Arabic speech, another in Syriac, another indeed written in Hebrew eloquence. And this is the opinion of the ancient Jews concerning the argument [plot] of this book. To the confirmation of which makes [also] the uncertainty of the place and of the time in which Job is reported to have lived — some, with Origen, affirming him to have been contemporary with Moses; others (among whom is Augustine) believing him to have lived long before the giving of the Law. Concerning the place likewise the opinion is varied. The author of this book relates that he was born in the land of Uz [Vsitis]; Augustine [says he was] born in Idumaea, and there brought up and dead; Ambrose [that he] reigned in Edom; Origen writes that he lived in Arabia and was an Arab. Concerning the author of the present book, similarly, no one of the writers agrees with another. For — as Gregory in the preface to Job, and Isidore in the sixth book of the Etymologies, relate — some judge Moses to be its author; others think that Job himself wrote it after the stroke of his passion [suffering]; others [that it was] the companions of Job; others, one of the prophets. Wherefore, since concerning the argument, the persons, the place, the author, and the time of the book nothing stands [established], it seems to be judged that the present history was written not according to the truth of the deed, but for the sake of example and imitation, unto the commendation of patience. [1]

2. But however the matter itself may stand, the author of this narration could not be so Lynceus [sharp-eyed] but that he strayed much from the aim [σκοπός] of his proposed argument. For he, when he had set out to fashion the person of a perfect man, and above all a most enduring one — whom neither prosperous things should lift up into pride, nor adverse cast down into desperation — nevertheless, in the very course of the narration, against the order of his own design, and against all the laws of patience, more than once draws that most patient man into the crime of impatience and of blasphemy: charging him that he cursed the day of his birth, saying, "He cursed (Maledixit) his day," and says: "Let the day perish in which I was born, and the night, in which it was said, A man is conceived." And, as if this were a light crime, he describes his indignation against God — that he brought him out of the womb, and that, [Job] having come forth from the womb, he did not straightway slay him. Thereupon feigning him [to be] driven by desperation — indignant words too being premised — to run to the halter [noose], saying: "My soul (Suspendium) has chosen hanging, and my bones death; I have despaired, neither shall I now live any longer." He makes him also a boaster of his own justice, and an accuser of the justice of God, when he says: "Would that (Utinam) my sins were weighed in a balance! — as [if] the sand of the sea, [my] punishment which I suffer would be found heavier than my iniquity." Than which — what more iniquitous can be devised against the justice of God? or what more arrogantly could be pronounced than what the author here brought forth out of the mouth of Job? "My heart (Non… cor meum) does not reprehend me in all my life" — whereas, on the contrary, it is written: "There is not (Non) a holy [man] on earth, who sins not." And in another place, accusing the providence of God through the mouth of that blessed man — that his patience is not a care to him: "Where (Ubi) now," he says, "is my expectation, and who considers my patience?" Nor content with this alone, he casts him headlong into that desperation, that he should object cruelty to God — no otherwise than to some most cruel torturer — with reproach, saying: "Thou art turned (Versus es) to me into a cruel [one]: if thou scourgest, slay [me] at once; or at least laugh not at the punishments of the innocent." Which words indeed, and others of this kind — which everywhere in the book of Job are read, full of indignation, impatience, and desperation — manifestly convince [prove] that the author of this history so far digressed from his own aim that, in place of a most pious and most valiant man, he set before us a most impatient one. [2]

DILVTIO OBIECTORVM [The Dissolution of the Objections]

1. If it be permitted us, by conjectures so light, to pronounce concerning the holy letters — [so] that those histories in the sacred volumes be judged false which consist of a variety of languages, of verses [meters], of names, and of persons — no part of divine scripture, in which these and things similar to these are found, will be true. For by this reason the book of Psalms, the Lamentations of Jeremiah, the end of the book of Proverbs, the Canticle of Canticles of Solomon, and the great Canticle of Moses, will have to be reckoned among fables; and all the volumes, as well of the Old as of the New Testament, will be believed to be fabricated — because so many names are read set down in them according to the properties of the persons. Let the insane Re-baptizers turn over the book of Genesis, and they will find how nearly all human names are mystical, and how, by a certain prophetic spirit and a certain hidden disposition of God, they were imposed by the ancient fathers upon their sons from the very [moment of] birth, so that, from the appellation of the names, the future outcomes of the sons might in some way be fore-noted before they came to pass. Thus the first of all women [was called] Eve — that is, "of [all] the living" — because she was to be the mother of all living, [and] because she was to be such, she was so called. Thus Abraham — because he was to be the author of so numerous a seed — was called Abraham, that is, "father of many nations." Thus the younger son of Rebecca, by a certain hidden mystery, was called Jacob — that is, "supplanter" — that in the name the supplanting of the brother deceived by him might be noted; and truly of him his brother Esau at some time said: "Rightly (Recte) is his name called Jacob: for he has supplanted me now this second time." Thus the two sons of David, by [reason of] the future successes of [their] life, thus God inspiring, obtained names of diverse omen: this one, Solomon [Scelomo], that is, "peaceable," was so called on account of the future peace under his reign; but this other, Absalom — namely, "the father's bitterness" — was named by an unhappy augury, that the name might portend the bitterness of sorrow which the rebel son was to bring upon [his] father. And, that I may not wander further afield — thus in the New Testament Simon, by a most happy omen, received the name of Peter, and the sons of Zebedee the surname Boanerges, from Christ: that in him [Peter] the first rock of the Church to be built, [and] in these [the sons of Zebedee] the eminence of [their] future preaching, might be shown. To the likeness of these, then, Job — by a certain secret presaging of his calamities and sorrows, before he suffered them — obtains the name of one "grieving and howling"; just as also his companions, either because they were to have a life like [their] names, thus [it being] wil-[ling] [3]

[1] Job 3 (Iob 3).
[2] Job 7 (Iob 7); Job 6 (Iob 6); Job 27 (Iob 27); Job 17 (Iob 17); Job 30 (Iob 30); Job 9 (Iob 9).
[3] Genesis 27 (Gen. 27).

(printed p. 651 [PDF p. 656] — Heresy X (Job): Dissolution of the Objections continues — response 1 concluded (the significant names; the "three-language" and disputed-homeland objections answered, Uz = Edom = Idumaea); then response 2 (Job's supposed "blasphemies" are not to be read according to the dead letter).)

God willing [it], they were named; or that they might commend the memory of their progenitors to posterity — so, perhaps, were Eliphaz, Baldad, and Sophar named. For we read that some of those who are reckoned in the genealogy of Esau — whence these [men] drew their origin — were called by these very names. There is taken away, therefore, out of these [considerations], all suspicion of a fabricated name. But concerning the variety of languages, by which the most unskilled Anabaptists judge the diverse parts of the book to be written, it must be known that the author of the present history — whoever he was, whether Job, or some one of his friends — was an Idumaean [Edomite] by race, as the history itself testifies, and wrote this book in the Idumaean tongue, as being natural to him. But just as the Idumaean region — Pliny being witness — is partly mingled with Syria (whose farthest part toward the setting sun it is), partly indeed with Arabia Petraea, to which it is contiguous and into which it runs out — so it is to be judged that the Idumaean tongue was compounded partly of the Syriac, partly of the Arabic language; and that the writer of this book used this [tongue], which, when afterward Moses (as it pleases Origen) had turned into the Hebrew speech, and had rendered word for word rather than sense for sense, it came to pass that the book, turned into Hebrew, so abounded in Syriac and Arabic idioms that it seems to be written in a triple tongue. [1] And so, when Jerome, in the preface to Job, writes that his translation, out of the Hebrew, Arabic, and Syriac speech, sounds now the words, now the senses, now both together — his words are not so to be referred to the diversity of three languages that we should believe him to have derived his edition from three fountains of diverse languages, but [are to be understood] as directed [aimed] at the manifold variety of the Hebrew diction, stuffed with innumerable Syriasms and Arabisms. Which Jerome himself also indicated in the preface to Daniel, when he said that the book of Job has very much fellowship with the Arabic tongue — by this saying expressing rather that the book of Job has a likeness to the Arabic, than that any of its parts was written in Arabic. Now indeed, as to what they say — that the writers disagree among themselves concerning the author of this history, and its fatherland — it has so little moment for shaking the truth of the history that it is altogether unworthy of consideration. For, as the blessed Gregory in the preface to Job says: "Who (Quis) wrote these things is very superfluously asked, since the Holy Spirit is faithfully believed [to be] the author of the book: he wrote these things, who dictated these things to be written; he wrote [them], who in this work stood forth [as] inspirer, and through the voice of the writer transmitted his words to us, to be imitated." Besides this too, neither are the fathers, [when] diligently considered, at variance among themselves concerning the author of the book and its fatherland. For the same [things] concerning these the author of the book of Job — and Origen, and Ambrose, and Augustine — affirm, although the one may say he lived in the land of Uz [Vs], another in Arabia, another in Edom, another in Idumaea. For the same is the land of Uz and Edom, Jeremiah saying in the Lamentations: "Rejoice (Gaude) and be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the land of Uz" — and each is in Idumaea, which is joined partly (as we said) to Syria, partly to Arabia. Whence also Origen, in the first chapter on Job, says: "The Uzzites (Vssitidae) are of the race of Esau, the posterity and tribe of Edom." For the Uzzites, and the Minaeans, and the Eubeans, and the Temanites, and all the rest of the tribes were of the kindred and lineage of Esau, who was also surnamed Edom. [2] And all those tribes were called Idumaeans; but now they are all called by one name, Arabs. Concerning the stock of Job also — which Jerome derives from Abraham through Nachor [Nahor], but Origen, and Ambrose, and Augustine, and Gregory from the same Abraham through Esau — if the mind of each be attentively attended to, either they do not differ at all, or [but] little: since all these spoke according to the sentence [reading] of the old, and of the common Greek and Latin edition, in whose foot [appendix] these words were formerly read: "And Job was (Erat autem Iob) the son of Zareth [Zerah], of the sons of Esau a son, and of the mother Bozra." But Jerome, as he himself confesses, spoke according to the sentence of the Hebrews, among whom those words are nowhere read in the volume of Job. Nor yet did Jerome wish those to have erred who believed Job to have descended from Esau, but he believed those to be deceived who, to assert this, were moved by no other cause than by the aforesaid words, which the Hebrew verity knew not.

2. I pass now to the execrable blasphemies which the wicked impute to that most holy man — wishing the mentioned sentences to be understood according to the dead letter, which without any doubt are to be expounded according to the mystical understanding of the vivifying Spirit. The very context of the words openly convinces [of this], the preceding and following discourses compelling [us] to it — [discourses] which by no means permit the aforesaid sentences to be understood according to the letter. For how can it be that Job, out of anger and indignation, cursed the day of his birth (as his words outwardly seem to indicate) — [Job] who, after the death of [his] sons, daughters, and all his goods, after the stroke of an incurable plague, answered his ill-counseling wife: "If we have received GOOD (Si bona) from the hand of the Lord, why should we not sustain evil?" Or how would it be verisimilar that he decided, out of the desperation of [his] soul, to end his life by hanging — [Job] who with so great confidence exclaims: "Even if (Et si) he shall slay me, I will hope in him"? And how credible [is it] that he wished to proclaim his life clean from every stain — when he said, "My heart does NOT (Non) reprehend me in my life" — [Job] who confesses with public voice that he sinned, saying: "I have SINNED (Peccavi); what shall I do to thee, O keeper of men? why dost thou not take away my sin, and remove my iniquity?" And by what means shall we dare affirm that Job complained of the injustice and severity of God — [Job] who, proclaiming the justice of God, says: "If (Si) the equity of his judgment be sought, no one can speak testimony for me: for if I shall wish to justify myself, my own mouth will condemn me"? Since, therefore, these words, compared [collated] according to the letter, cannot agree with themselves, they show something else hidden in themselves, which is to be sought. Therefore, if first we understand the words of blessed Job by which he cursed his day according to the outward sound of the voice — as Origen expounds — they suffer no absurdity. For that curse is not of such [weight] that for its sake that holy man should be accused. Since, when he cursed his natal day — which had already passed away, and no longer was — he truly cursed nothing: for a past day is neither in nature, nor in act, nor in its own power, but only an empty name, and altogether nothing. He, therefore, who cursed nothing, sinned nothing. But if we follow the mystical [exposition of Gre-] [3]

[1] (Pliny,) bk 5, ch. 13 (li. 5. c. 13).
[2] Lamentations 4 (Thren. 4).
[3] Gregory in the preface [to] Job, ch. 3 & 4 (Greg. in praef. Iob c. 3 & 4); Job 13 (Iob 13); Job 9 (Iob 9).

(printed p. 652 [PDF p. 657] — Heresy X (Job) concluded: the Gregorian mystical reading of Job's "blasphemies"; then Heresy XI opens: Of the books of Esdras, Tobit, Judith, and Esther — statement, Assertors, and the start of the Refutation.)

[if we follow the mystical] exposition of Gregory, we shall recognize that a curse of this kind is holy, not depraved — inasmuch as it arises not from a wish of vengeance, but from the rectitude of judgment, and from tranquillity of soul: so that thence we may learn that there is a twofold day of our life. The one, of the first condition and of the human creation, in which man was created in justice and sanctity — that is, the day of justice, of innocence, of sanctity, and of grace. But the other, an execrable day, and obnoxious to malediction — namely, the day of the latter [second] birth, in which man is born in sin and iniquity, the day of sin and of human corruption. When, therefore, Job cursed his day, he did not say: "Let the day perish in which I was created [conditus]," but "the day in which I was born [natus]." As if he openly said: Let the day of sin and of fault perish, [let] the day of our mortality [perish], and let the day of innocence, of sanctity, and of grace — the day of glory and of immortality — break forth. And according to this sense it is to be understood that Job wished he had perished as an abortive [birth], and had not come into this life — namely, into the life of sin, iniquity, and fault. [1] Similarly, that which he says: "My soul (Suspendium) has chosen hanging, and my bones death" — is expounded of a spiritual kind of hanging and of death: so that by "the hanging of the soul" we understand its elevation from earthly things to heavenly, from carnal to spiritual. For thus also Paul chose hanging, when he says: "With CHRIST (Christo) I am fixed to the cross." But by "desperation" are to be understood the renouncing of earthly pleasures, and the casting-off of worldly hope. [2] That also, which he adds: "Would that (Utinam) my sins were weighed in a balance," etc. — is said mystically of Christ hanging on the cross for our sins. For Job, wishing to show the gravity of the Lord's passion: "Would that," he says, "my sins were weighed in the scale of the divine justice — mine, indeed, not by [my] fault, but by the assumption of a penalty, by which I merited the wrath of the Father; [and] the punishment which I suffer would certainly be found much heavier than the fault of man for which I suffer: because he who suffers is infinite, but he for whom he suffers, finite." [3] But when Job said: "My heart does NOT (Non) reprehend me" — we ought to consider that there are two kinds of sins: some which can be avoided by the just; but some which cannot be avoided even by the just. And these indeed are the perverse thoughts of sins; but those [others] are the consent and the executions of the perverse thoughts. He, therefore, who slips in the thoughts of sins, if he resists them, and repairs himself before he slips, through consent, into depraved operations, has nothing whereby he may afterward, weeping, be reprehended by his own heart. Thus, then, Job — who according to the sentence of Solomon had confessed himself a sinner — then confesses that he is not reprehended by his own heart: because, even if perhaps by thinking he failed in something unlawful, yet, resisting the thought, he failed nothing either by consenting or by working. [4] Finally, when we hear the words by which he seems to reproach cruelty to God, we ought to believe that they were brought forth by blessed Job not out of anger and indignation. For just as the holy scriptures call God, after the human manner, "zealous without zeal, angry without anger" — so by the holy man Job, after the human manner, God was called "cruel without cruelty." For he is called "cruel" who, striking strictly, spares not: so that, namely, in this place "cruel" may be understood [as] "striking strictly." As also Isaiah — wishing to show that the last day of judgment is to come not now with pardon, but with strictness — said: "Behold (Ecce), a cruel day shall come, and full of indignation." But those [words] which he subjoined, saying, "If (Si) thou scourgest, slay at once," etc., were likewise sent forth not out of hatred and reproach, but out of an ardent desire of human redemption [directed] to God the Father, by a certain prophetic spirit. And that the sense of these may become clearer, it must first be noted what is signified by "the punishment of the innocent," and by "the laughter of God." [5] Accordingly, the laughter of God — or [for God] to laugh — is

[for him] to be unwilling to pity human affliction; but the punishment is the deferral of desire, Solomon saying: "Hope (Spes) that is deferred afflicts the soul." The "punishments of the innocent," therefore, are those most ardent desires of the ancient fathers, by which, their soul glowing, they longed to see the mysteries of the Incarnation. But for God "to laugh" was not to fulfill their desires. For, so long as, not compassionating, he deferred the vows of his elect, what else was it than to laugh at the punishments of the innocent? And so the holy man, considering the gifts of the coming Redeemer, and patiently tolerating the deferral of his vows, says: "If (Si) thou scourgest, slay at once, and laugh not at the punishments of the innocent" — as if he openly prayed, saying: Since our life is daily worn away by the scourge of vengeance for [our] fault, let him now come who may once for us die without fault, that God may no longer laugh at the punishments of the innocent, if he himself appear passible in the flesh, in whose desires our mind chastens itself. Enough, therefore, out of these [things], let the blasphemies of the Anabaptists be confuted. [6]

OF THE BOOKS OF ESDRAS, TOBIT, JUDITH, AND ESTHER — Heresy XI (De Libris Esdrae, Tobiae, Iudith, et Esther. Haeresis XI)

To cast away the books of Esdras [Ezra], Tobit, Judith, and Esther, as histories of uncertain faith and authority.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

The Anabaptists reject these books in general; but Luther says that he doubts whether the book of Tobit and [that] of Judith are to be received into the order of the sacred volumes.

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

The authority of the whole Church, the decrees of the Councils, and the testimonies of the fathers, damn this heresy. For the first and second [book] of Esdras — which is called Nehemiah [Nehemias] — not only are found in all the catalogues of the most ancient fathers of the Church, and their testimonies are cited in the decrees of the Pontiffs, but also among the Hebrews are reckoned among the כתובים (Chetubim [Ketuvim]) — that is, the Hagiographa, or holy writings, which were placed in the ark. But Tobit, although among them [the Hebrews] it is not in the Canon, yet the Church of the Christians, from the third Council of Carthage down to these our times, always had it in the Canon; and all the most ancient fathers of the Church brought forth various testimonies concerning it, as [from] canonical scripture. Among others indeed, Clement the first pontiff of that name, in [his] first and second epistle, and Anacletus in his first decree, [and] Alexander

[1] Gregory, book 4 of the Morals, ch. 6 (Greg. libr. 4. moral. cap 6); (gloss:) "A twofold day: natural and infused" (Dies duplex, naturalis & influxa).
[2] Galatians 2 (Gal. 2).
[3] Isaiah 53 (Esai. 53).
[4] Gregory, book 18, ch. 85 (Greg. lib. 18. cap. 85).
[5] Job 9 (Iob 9).
[6] Gregory, book 9 of the Morals, ch. 20 (Greg. lib. 9. moral. c. 20); Proverbs 13 (Prov. 13).

(printed p. 653 [PDF p. 658] — Heresy XI: the Refutation continues (papal and Hebrew witness to Tobit, Judith, and Esther; the Purim institution); then the Objections of the Heretics — 1: Esdras; 2: Tobit & Judith not in the canon; 3: the chronological difficulties of Judith; 4: Esther begun.)

But Alexander, Pope the first, in [his] first epistle, for the confirmation of the most holy Trinity, uses the testimony of the benediction of Tobit, saying: "If the Trinity is not, why is Tobit — when he sent his son into the city of Rages with Raphael the Archangel — taught to have blessed them, saying thus: 'May God [of] Abraham, and God of Isaac, and God of Jacob, himself fulfill his benediction in you'?" Similarly also Innocent the first, in his decretal epistle to Exuperius; Callistus, Pope the first, in [his] second decree; and

Marcellus, Pope the first, in [his] second epistle, used the testimonies of this history. The book of Judith also, not only the holy Nicene Synod (Jerome himself being witness) received into the number of the holy scriptures, but the Hebrews likewise hold [it] among the histories worthy of faith, placing it, together with the book of Tobit, among the sacred writings which among them were kept outside the ark, and were not guarded within the ark with the rest of the canonical books. They hand down, too, that the author of this book was Joachim the priest, son of Jesus the high priest — whom Philo the Jew, in [his] second booklet of the Chronography, mentions in these words: "Jesus, then, held (Gessit) the first pontificate up to the twelfth year of Assuerus Priscus [the Elder], thirty-six years; but Joachim his son, in [his] absence, eight years. He also wrote out the deeds of Judith, and instituted the anniversary memory of the liberation, to be kept yearly." [1] But concerning the book of Esther — although of old, among certain Greek fathers, it was doubted whether it was canonical — nevertheless all the Councils reckoned it in the catalogues of the sacred volumes, and the Hebrews numbered it among the holy Chetubim (so printed "Cherhubim" [Ketuvim, the Hagiographa]) books. Most of the Latins think this [book] was published by Mardochaeus [Mordecai]; but Philo the Jew, in the place above mentioned, asserts [it was] written by the same Joachim the pontiff — who, when he was now for the second time pontiff, at the exhortation by letters of Mardochaeus the Hebrew, the adoptive father of Esther herself, committed this history to writing, and instituted the annual solemnity פורים (Phurim [Purim]) — that is, "of lots" — which is noted in the volume of Esther, and is celebrated by the Jews down to this time, every single year, in memory of the Jewish liberation. [2]

OBIECTA HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

1. What is to be thought concerning the books of Esdras, Jerome, in the preface to Esdras, indicates in these words: "Nor let (Nec) any one be moved that one book only is published by us, nor let [any] be delighted with the dreams of the apocryphal third and fourth book: for among the Hebrews the discourses of Esdras and of Nehemiah are compressed into one volume; and those [things] which are not had among them, nor are of the twenty-four elders [books], are without doubt to be rejected." From which words it is manifest that the third and fourth of Esdras contain nothing but mere and vain dreams, and that only two books out of the four remain in the canon: of which the one — namely the second, which is called Nehemiah — Isidore, in the sixth book of the Etymologies, ch. 2, casts out of the canon, affirming that the second and third books of Esdras are not had among the Hebrews, but are by them reckoned among the apocrypha.

2. But concerning the books of Tobit and Judith — that they are not in the canon — Jerome openly testifies in the prologue to Tobit, saying: "The book (Librum) of Tobit indeed, which the Hebrews record [as] consigned, from the catalogue of the divine scriptures, among the apocrypha"; and in the Helmeted Prologue: "Judith," he says, "and Tobit, and the Shepherd [Pastor], are not in the canon." And lest any one should think that he spoke of the Jewish canon only, in the preface to Proverbs he added: "The books of Judith, and of Tobit, and of the Maccabees, the Church of God indeed reads for the edification of the people, but does not receive them among the canonical scriptures."

3. And deservedly indeed does the Church of God not receive the book of Judith into the canon, on account of the uncertainty of the history — whose neither deeds nor times agree with the approved histories of the nations. For those two kings of the Medes who are named at the beginning of the book of Judith — namely, Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor — in whose times the deeds of the present history are narrated to have happened, are nowhere commemorated in the histories of the nations. Nor does that make anything to the matter, which Lyra, and the author of the Gloss, and Eusebius in the Chronicles bring forward — that those two kings were called by diverse names among the Hebrews and among the profane historians: so that, whom the Greeks call Cambyses, second king of the Persians, the Jews name Nabuchodonosor; and whom the Greeks make Diocles [Deioces], fifth king of the Medes, founder of the city Ecbatana, the Hebrews call that same [man] Arphaxad, founder of Ecbatana. For if it be so, how could Nabuchodonosor — by the Greeks called Cambyses, in whose time Eusebius in the Chronicles writes that this history happened — fight against Arphaxad (whom the author of the Gloss asserts to be Diocles, the builder of Ecbatana) in the great plain of Ragau, and obtain his kingdom (as is written in the exordium of the present history), when between Cambyses and Diocles more than a hundred and twenty years intervened? in which (as is gathered from the Chronicles of Eusebius) four intermediate kings reigned one after another, namely: Phraortes [Phaartes], twenty-four years; Cyaxares, thirty-two years; Astyages, thirty-eight years; Cyrus, thirty years — which, joined together, comprehend a hundred and twenty-four years. The history of this book is rendered uncertain also by many other [things] which are contained in it. As, concerning Arphaxad, or Diocles — whom Eusebius, and all the later chronographers, write to have held the kingdom of the Medes fifty-four years — but the beginning of the book of Judith narrates that he reigned only twelve years, and that in the twelfth year of [his] reign he was vanquished and cast down from empire by Nabuchodonosor, or Cambyses, king of the Assyrians. [3] And concerning the city Ecbatana — which the author of the book of Judith records that Arphaxad (otherwise Diocles) built most mightily of squared stone — Pliny, book 6, ch. 14, hands down [that it was] founded by King Seleucus a long time afterward. To which so open contradictions accedes also the authority of Josephus, who — although he professed to commit to writing all the Jewish antiquities, whatsoever he believed true — [yet] made no mention of this history, [and thus] rendered it uncertain and suspected of falsity: since no cause ought to have restrained him from transmitting to posterity so magnificent a victory of his own nation, had he esteemed it worthy of faith and of history.

4. Concerning the book of Esther likewise, there is no less suspicion than concerning the book of Judith: because (as Jerome in the pre-[face]

[1] Jerome in the preface to the book of Judith (Hier. in praefat. libri Iudith).
[2] ch. 9 (of Esther) (cap. 9).
[3] Judith 1 (Iudith 1).

(printed p. 654 [PDF p. 659] — Heresy XI: objections 4–5 concluded (the additions to Esther; the chronological impossibility of Mordecai's age); then the Dissolution of the Objections begins — response 1 (the third and fourth Esdras; the Nehemiah/Isidore point); response 2 (Tobit and Judith) begun.)

[as Jerome, in the pre]face to Esther, affirms — the theme of the history being taken, [the book] was written with historical artifice, these [things] being added at the writer's discretion which could, according to the occasion, be said and heard — just as it is customary in scholastic disciplines [school exercises], a theme being taken, to devise with what words he could use who has suffered an injury, or who has done an injury. That this opinion of Jerome is true, the last six chapters of this book show — namely from the tenth to the sixteenth — which are not had in the Hebrew volume, but were fabricated either by Josephus, or by some other writer. For both the copy of the letters of Aman [Haman], which are recited in the thirteenth chapter, and the copy of the epistle of King Artaxerxes, which is recounted in the sixteenth chapter, are excerpted into this book — with almost no word changed — out of the sixth chapter of the eleventh book of the Antiquities of Josephus. For Josephus, as he was skilled in the historical law [method], when he had noticed either that this history was rendered suspect, or that the king could easily be noted for inconstancy and levity — because, after the letters in which he had ordered the whole race of the Jews to be abolished, [being] suddenly changed, he revoked his sentence by new letters sent forth — inserted into the third and eighth chapter, and into very many other places of this history, many [things] by which he might vindicate this change of mind in the king, together with the narration of the history, from all suspicion of calumny or of fiction. But what was done by him in these chapters, it is credible that the same was done in the rest, either by him, or by other corruptors.

5. Besides these [things], the parts of the history are so dissonant among themselves that what before is reported to have been done in it under one king and time, the same is later read to have happened under another king and time. For although in its second chapter it is written that Bagatan [Bigthan] and Thares

[Teresh], royal eunuchs and doorkeepers of the royal palace, who had conspired against the murder of King Assuerus, were detected, and both hanged upon a gibbet — and that after the seventh year of King Assuerus — below, in the eleventh and twelfth chapter, the same is reported to have been done by the same eunuchs, and by Mardochaeus, under a different king and time, namely under King Artaxerxes, against whom those eunuchs are written to have conspired in the second year of his reign. And if any one should say that this Artaxerxes is the same with him who above was called Assuerus (as Eusebius notes in the Chronicles) — thinking this [man] to have been Artaxerxes Memnon, son of Darius Nothus and of Parysatis — then another, greater controversy arises, which overturns the whole authority of the history. For if the present history happened in the time of Artaxerxes, it is consequent that Mardochaeus the Jew was then two hundred years of his life — which exceeds all credit of truth: especially indeed since the history describes him as having exercised the royal services in the palace of the king with strength still entire, and to have ridden vigorously through the city, and to have accomplished many other [things] of this kind not sluggishly — which [things] it is not verisimilar that he could perform in so decrepit an age, [while] passing the two-hundredth year of [his] age. For we find that he lived so many years, if we reckon the time from his captivity down to King Artaxerxes. For Mardochaeus was of the sons of the captivity, whom Nabuchodonosor king of the Assyrians carried over into Babylon, together with Joachim, surnamed Jeconiah [Jechonias], king of the Jews; and that (as Eusebius writes in the Chronicles) in the eighth year of Astyages, the eighth and last king of the Medes. And it is verisimilar that Mardochaeus was then a boy, at least of ten years; to which if there be added the thirty years of Astyages — who reigned thirty-eight years — they will be forty; to which if there be added the number of years in which the eleven kings of the Persians reigned one after another — from Cyrus (who first transferred the kingdom of the Medes to the Persians, their king Astyages being conquered) down to Artaxerxes Memnon son of Darius Nothus — they will be a hundred and ninety-nine years: which sum of years it is necessary that Mardochaeus not only completed, but even survived by many years after. For it is written, in the tenth chapter of Judith [1], that King Assuerus, after the event of this history, waged many wars, and subdued to his dominion all the land and the islands of the sea, and thereupon set Mardochaeus over the rest, [and] made him ruler over his whole empire. Which, since it presents no likeness of truth, it is plain that the history of Judith [2], the theme being taken from an uncertain author, was fabricated for the exercise of style (as Jerome hints).

DILVTIO OBIECTORVM [The Dissolution of the Objections]

1. Concerning the third and fourth books of Esdras — which Jerome calls "dreams," and does not take into the Canon — although we judge that nothing need be answered to the heretics, nevertheless we do not dare to damn them, and altogether to reject them: especially since the blessed Ambrose (as we already showed in the first book) receives the fourth volume of Esdras, and Augustine indicates that some [things] which are in the third book are to be understood mystically, as of Christ. As is that [passage] where — a question having arisen among certain young men, [as to] what should be most powerful [strongest] in things — one said kings, another wine, the third women, who for the most part command kings; yet the same third demonstrated that truth is victorious over all: which certainly can most fittingly be applied to Christ, who is the highest truth. But concerning the second book, which Isidore seems to exclude from the Canon, we say that it is one book of Esdras which he calls "second" and rejects from the canon, and another that is the second book of Esdras which we receive in the canon. Ours begins: "The WORDS (Verba) of Nehemiah, son of Helchiah [Hachaliah]" — which among the Hebrews is the same with the first Esdras, and makes one single book with it. But the second [book], according to Isidore, begins thence, whence among us the third Esdras takes its beginning — namely from these words: "And JOSIAS made (Et fecit Iosias) [the Passover]" — which, together with the following book, does not exist among the Hebrews. But that Isidore receives, as canonical, the book which we, from the name of Nehemiah, made the second, is plain from the very words of Isidore, which he premised a little before, saying: "The book of Esdras is prenoted with the title of its author, in whose text the discourses of Esdras and of Nehemiah are alike contained." [3]

2. Concerning the books of Tobit also, and of Judith, we briefly respond, that nothing of authority is taken from them because the Jews reckon them among the apocrypha; for although the Synagogue of the Jews does not receive them, yet the holy Church of Christ receives [them] in the Canon; and them like-[wise]

[1] so printed; the reference is to Esther 10

[2] so printed; the argument throughout concerns Esther

[3] Augustine, book 20 of the City of God, ch. 25 (Aug. l. 20 de ciu. dei c. 25); book 18 of the City [of God], ch. 36 (Li. 18. de ciu. cap. 36); 3 Esdras 3 (3. Esdr. 3).

(printed p. 655 [PDF p. 660] — Heresy XI: response 2 concluded (the two orders of the Canon; why Jerome and Augustine differ); response 3 (the chronological objections against Judith and Esther rest on which historians one follows — Herodotus vs. Ctesias, Metasthenes, and Philo; the authenticity of Philo's Chronography defended).)

and them [Tobit and Judith] it reads and venerates with equal veneration with the other holy books. But to that opinion of Jerome, by which he asserts that these books are by no means received by the Church of God among the canonical scriptures, we say [that] his words, thus considered without any distinction, are not wholly true: since Augustine, contemporary with Jerome, in the second book On Christian Doctrine, ch. 8, enumerates each in the order of the canonical books; and the third Council of Carthage, at which Augustine was present, enumerates [them] in the catalogue of the sacred scriptures. From which it most evidently stands [established] that these books were, even in the time of Jerome, received into the Canon by the Catholic Church. Accordingly Ambrose, bishop of Compsa, meeting this argument, says that the "Church" is sometimes taken in two ways among the ancient writers: sometimes for those who preside over the rest in the Church of God — as are the doctors, pastors, and rectors of the Church — of which Church Christ wished himself to be understood, when he said: "Go (Vade), and tell the Church"; but sometimes the "Church" is taken for the whole assembly of the faithful, but especially for those who are inferior, and of the flock of sheep which are subjected to the pastors — of which Church Paul, admonishing the pastors, says: "Take heed (Attendite) to yourselves, and to the whole flock, in which God has placed you to rule the Church of God." And of this Church Jerome spoke, when he said that the Church of God in his time had not yet received these books among the canonical scriptures — certain seditious [men], namely, still making tumult, and, together with them, a certain vicious custom of the multitude resisting — lest they should be received by the whole congregation of the faithful, generally. But among the Church, taken in the first signification, these books were always held as canonical. These [things] Ambrose. [1] But since, in the beginning of this work, it was shown that very many fathers of great name, and leaders of the Church, reckoned the volumes of Tobit and of Judith among the apocrypha, it must be known — as we already warned in the first book — that there are two orders of the Canonical volumes: of which the prior contains the books concerning whose faith and authority there was never any controversy among the prelates and pastors of the Church; but the latter embraces the scriptures not straightway, in the exordium of the nascent Church, recognized and received by the fathers and pastors, but a long time after — when there had first been doubts, and diverse judgments among them, concerning these. Jerome, therefore, together with some fathers, looking to the first order, pronounced the books of Tobit and of Judith not to be Canonical — that is, [not] of the number of the canonical [books] of the first order; but Augustine, with other fathers, having regard to the second order, reckons the same books among the Canonical; nor does Jerome disapprove this.

3. But what they bring forward concerning the uncertainty of the history is easily dissolved, if we consider that all the ambiguity of the alleged difficulty consists in the reckoning of the various times and kings who were [living] through those times — in which [reckoning] the historians of the Greeks (whose prince is Herodotus, whom our Eusebius followed) differ very much from the historians and chronographers of the Jews and of the Persians, such as are Metasthenes the Persian, Ctesias [Cthesias] of Cnidus, and Philo the Jew: and on account of this diversity, it is necessary to reject some of them. Rejected, therefore, are Eusebius and the rest, who, in reckoning up the kings of the Persians and Medes, and in recounting their names and times, followed the fabler [fabulatorem] Herodotus; but received, for a most just cause, are Ctesias of Cnidus, Metasthenes, and Philo. For Ctesias (as Diodorus Siculus reports in the third book of his history) brought the annals into Greece out of the public faith [record] and Library of the Persians — for which cause Diodorus himself judges that his opinion, rather than Herodotus', is to be stood by. But Metasthenes, for the same cause, is preferred to Herodotus: because (as he himself reports) in numbering the series and time of the kings of the Persians and Medes, he used no other author than the public Susian Library of the Persians, in which the annals of the kings of the Persians were, in his age — that is, in the time of Alexander the Great — still preserved whole and incorrupt. But Philo the Jew is for this reason alone received of the Hebrew writers: because he most diligently collected the times of the four Monarchies, and especially the years and the names of those who reigned in Israel from Moses down to Herod — not following uncertain opinions, as Josephus did, but drawing most certain testimonies out of the books of the seventy Elders, whom the Hebrews call Zanedrin [Sanhedrin].

Nor does it move me, that the Anabaptists, enemies of the truth, object: that the Chronography which is reported under the name of Philo is not his — because neither Eusebius, in book 2 of the Ecclesiastical History, ch. 18, nor Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men, made mention of this volume, whereas each of them wove a long enough catalogue of the individual works of Philo. Since [in fact] both confess that Philo wrote more books, besides those numbered by them in the catalogue, which did not come to their hands. To this accedes also that which most declares the book to be Philo's — namely, the very testimony of the author of this Chronography: for the author writes, at the foot [end] of the third booklet, that he, quite a young man, was sent by his [fellow] Jews from Alexandria as legate to Rome, in the twenty-first year of Herod the tetrarch — which words can suit no one but Philo the Alexandrian Jew, whom Josephus, in the eighteenth book of the Antiquities, and Eusebius, in book 2 of the Ecclesiastical History, ch. 5, hand down was sent, [while] still a young man, to Rome to Caius [Gaius] Caesar, against Apion the accuser of the Jews, and wrote a book concerning that legation, in which the single [deeds] done by him were contained.

These [things] have been said by us for this [reason]: that out of this Chronography of Philo we might open a very broad way to the dissolution, not only of the present difficulty, but of all other ambiguities of this kind which can emerge in the apparent contradictions of the sacred histories. Now, therefore, responding to the proposed difficulty of the Anabaptists, we say that Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor are not those whom they themselves think — namely Diocles and Cambyses — but far others, whom Metasthenes the Persian and Philo the Jew recorded in the second book of the Chronography. For Arphaxad was neither a king of the Medes nor of the Persians, but a certain notable and most powerful favorer (as Philo says) of the Tamyric [Tamyris] faction, who rose up immediately after Cyrus was killed by Tamyris the queen of the Scythians; and into whose place was substituted Artaxerxes Priscus Assuerus, who in the book of Judith

[1] Matthew 18 (Matt. 18); Acts 20 (Act. 20).

(printed p. 656 [PDF p. 661] — Heresy XI: response 3 concluded (the identification of Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor via Metasthenes and Philo; the two Ecbatanas; why Josephus omitted Judith); response 4 (Jerome did not call Esther a fiction — only its Vulgate translation "vitiated"); response 5 (the additions are apocryphal appendices; Mordecai's great age defended from Philo).)

who, in the book of Judith, is surnamed Nabuchodonosor — first king of the Medes, the Persians, and the Assyrians, son of Darius Hystaspes [Istaspis], who, together with his colleague Cyrus, had ruled the Medes, Persians, and Assyrians (Baltassar [Belshazzar] king of the Babylonians being conquered), as is had in the first book of Esdras, and in the volume of Daniel. This Arphaxad, then, prince of the Tamyric faction — Cyrus being dead — increased the number of his own [followers]; and, Media being occupied, restored

Ecbatana, the royal seat of the Medes (once built by the kings of the Medes, and afterward half-ruined by Cyrus), and fortified it with squared stones (as is read in the book of Judith). He also compelled the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians to defection [revolt], and armed them against Artaxerxes Priscus Assuerus, surnamed Nabuchodonosor, who still kept himself within the bounds of Babylon. Meeting whom, Artaxerxes surnamed Nabuchodonosor — in the twelfth year of his reign (as the history of Judith narrates) — routed him in a memorable battle in the great plain of Ragau; and, vengeance being taken against the rebels, obtained his paternal kingdom, pacified on every side. After which victory, when in the following year he had heard that Holophernes, sent by himself, was beheaded by the Jews, being gravely indignant, by a public edict he forbade the temple to be raised — as is noted in the fourth chapter of Esdras. Nor ought it seem wondrous to any one that this Artaxerxes Priscus Assuerus is called Nabuchodonosor in the book of Judith — because (as is written in the book of Judith, and Philo confirms) Arphaxad had invaded the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians; but this Artaxerxes Assuerus held Babylonia alone, where the ruler is, by the common appellation of dignity, called Nabuchodonosor — just as in Egypt the kings were called first Pharaohs, then Ptolemies, and among the Romans, Caesars. These [things], therefore, being disposed according to the order of Metasthenes and of Philo, all the doubt of the Anabaptists is removed concerning Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, who are not found in the catalogues of the kings of the Persians and Medes among the Greeks. Likewise, concerning the number of years in which Diocles reigned, this alone remains to be discussed: how Pliny says that the city Ecbatana was first built by Seleucus (who reigned after Alexander the Great), and why Josephus did not mention this history. It behooves [us], therefore, to know that the Ecbatana of which Pliny writes is different from that of which the book of Judith speaks, and of which Strabo makes mention in the eleventh book, saying: "Media (Media) is divided into two parts, the one of which they call the greater, whose metropolis was the city Ecbatana, head of the Median empire, which now the Parthians also use as a royal seat." But the [other] Ecbatana, of which Pliny makes mention, is not in Media, but a city of Syria, founded by King Seleucus near the Caspian gates, twenty thousand paces [distant] — which some, writing it "Epiphania," others "Egbatana" (with a g), named. And that Josephus passed over this history is not without reason, since among the Hebrews it is not in the canon: for Josephus took to write only those things which were had in the canon of the Hebrews. Whence Josephus himself, excusing [himself] that he left untouched many sacred histories of the Hebrews, thus speaks: "Let NO ONE (Nemo), then, blame me, in that I have thus narrated the single [matters], just as they are found written in the ancient books. For at the very beginning of my history, on account of those who raise questions and strive to blame [me] in something, I asserted, saying that I would translate the Hebrew books into the Greek speech, and open [expound] these — promising neither to add anything apart, nor to subtract." [1] But why the Hebrews do not have this book in the canon, neither does it sufficiently stand [clear], nor is it to be anxiously investigated by us — since the Christian Church willed it to be among the canonical [books]. Thus far concerning Judith.

4. Concerning the book of Esther — which the Anabaptists contend was written upon a fabricated theme — I would not believe them to be so unskilled that they could not see into the meaning of Jerome; but [I would believe them] rather wicked and impudent, who were unwilling to understand Jerome. For he does not affirm that this history was written by its first Hebrew author upon a taken or fabricated theme; but he asserts that its Vulgate translation was vitiated [corrupted] by the fault of the translators, who — a narration-theme being taken (as is the custom in the schools) — mixed in much of their own head [invention] into this translation. For these are the very words of Jerome: "The BOOK (Librum) of Esther, it is agreed, is vitiated by various translators: which I, disclosing [it] out of the archives of the Hebrews, translated word for word more expressly; which book the Vulgate edition drags out with tattered fringes of words here and there, adding those [things] which could, according to the occasion, be said and heard — just as it is customary in the scholastic disciplines, a theme being taken, to devise with what words he could use who has suffered an injury, or who has inflicted an injury." Thus Jerome. Accordingly, if the translators added something, either from Josephus or out of some other pious intention, this derogates nothing from the Hebrew verity, which always remained inviolate in its own sincerity, and has come to us in its integrity out of the translation of St. Jerome — who, as appears from his scholia, cut off those last six chapters as adventitious [ascititious], and the Catholic Church neglected the same, as adventitious and apocryphal.

5. From which it becomes plain that the controversy of the Anabaptists, between the second chapter of this book and the eleventh and twelfth chapters of the same book, is null — as [being one] which leans upon the additional and apocryphal appendices of the book. Yet we confess that that Artaxerxes, who is treated of in those apocryphal chapters, is the same with that Assuerus of whom mention is made in the whole book of Esther according to the Hebrew verity: who also (Philo being witness) was called Great Artaxerxes, and Assuerus Darius Mnemon, the fifth king after Cyrus of the Persians, Medes, and Assyrians. In the twelfth year of whose reign this history happened — as is narrated in the third chapter of Esther — Mardochaeus being then nearly in the one-hundred-and-eightieth year of his life. And lest it seem incredible to any one that Mardochaeus could survive so long a time, we have the testimony of Philo, who in the second book of the Chronography thus writes: "Him succeeded Joachim — likewise second [time] pontiff — for forty-eight years, up to the twelfth year of the great Artaxerxes; who wrote the deeds of Esther, and instituted the memory of פורים (Phurim [Purim]), at the exhortation, by letters, of Mardochaeus, who by eighteen years exceeded the age of Isaac" — signifying by these words that Mardochaeus lived a hundred and ninety-eight years. For Isaac, as is read in Genesis, lived a hundred and eighty years. [2] Nor is it to be esteemed impossible that a man so long-[lived]

[1] Josephus, Antiquities, book 10 (printed "19"), ch. 12 (Iosephus li. 10. ant. c. 12).
[2] Genesis 35 (Gen. 35).

(printed p. 657 [PDF p. 662] — Heresy XI concluded (God prolonged the lives of Mordecai, Jesus the priest, Tobit, and Judith); then Heresy XII opens: Of the books of Maccabees — statement, Assertors (Luther and the Anabaptists), and the Refutation (their usefulness against modern heresies; the fulfillment of Daniel and Zechariah; patristic witness).)

so long-lived an old man served, with strength still entire, in the royal court — since nothing is impossible with God, who, out of the love with which he most especially cherished his people, led such a man to that age beyond the usual course of human life, that the people, oppressed by the yoke of the nations, might, while he lived, be freed. Thus also he willed Jesus the high priest (as Philo writes) to be a survivor of a hundred and thirty years, that with him — together with Esdras, and Zorobabel the leader — the people might be recalled from Babylon into Jerusalem. Thus he led Tobit the elder (as the last chapter of his history testifies) to the hundred-and-second year, or (as the Greek edition has) up to the hundred-and-fifty-eighth year, that the calamity of those who were in the captivity of Salmanassar might, by him as consoler and benefactor, be partly relieved: as, for that same cause, he prolonged the life of his son Tobit up to the ninety-ninth [year], or (as it is had in Greek) up to the hundred-and-twenty-seventh year; and made Judith reach the hundred-and-twenty-fifth year, that, she surviving, the fatherland, freed by her, might longer enjoy its liberty.

OF THE BOOKS OF MACCABEES — Heresy XII (De Libris Maccabaeorum. Haeresis XII)

That the books of Maccabees are neither canonical, nor worthy to be numbered among the sacred books.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

This is the heresy of Luther and of the Anabaptists. For Luther, since he denied the suffrages of the dead, and the invocation of the saints, and the dedications of temples, and saw that these books opposed his errors, rejected their authority. But the Anabaptists — who, besides these [things], also affirm that the saints sleep perpetually outside the kingdom of heaven until the day of judgment, and pray for no one — when they noticed that their [own] assertion was destroyed by the testimonies of these volumes, subscribed to Luther in this same heresy.

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

That the books of Maccabees are to be received among the divine and canonical scriptures, the authority of the Gospel and of the Church shows, and their vast usefulness persuades. For they are exceedingly useful for confuting especially the heresies of our times. For there are had, in the second volume of Maccabees, most clear testimonies concerning Purgatory, concerning the suffrages to be made for the dead, and concerning the prayers of the saints who have gone hence to immortal life. But to piety, and to all the virtues, they contribute very much — provoking us to fortitude, to patience, and to hope in afflictions, and to the sustaining of death, if need be, for piety's sake, by the example of the noble Eleazar, and of those seven brothers who, for the sacred laws, suffered such dire torments: whom their pious mother, while they were pressed with diverse tortures, not only did not weep [over], but even, rejoicing, exhorted to the glory of [their] passion. [1] These books are also worthy to be reckoned among the sacred writings, for the certainty and confirmation of many things which are found in the other books of sacred scripture. For very many things predicted beforehand by the prophets are read most truly fulfilled in these books. As, that which Daniel foresaw concerning the abomination to be [set] in the temple, these volumes indicate to have been fulfilled in Antiochus — who set the abominable idol of desolation (namely his own statue) upon the altar of God in the temple, and burned the books of the Law, and did other unworthy [things] here and there, which are commemorated in the present history. Likewise, that which God foretold through Zechariah — that he would visit upon the he-goats, and that there would go forth out of Israel [those] who should exact [vengeance from] and vanquish those he-goats in great glory — Jerome, not disapproving the opinion of the Hebrews, expounded [as] fulfilled in the Maccabees, who prevailed mightily against the he-goats, that is, against Antiochus, Demetrius, Gorgias, and Nicanor, who are designated by the he-goats by Daniel, in the kingdom of the Greeks. In the Gospel of John, too, a testimony is adduced concerning the feast of the Encaenia [Dedication] — that is, of the renewal of the temple — of whose institution treatment is made in the first and second volume of Maccabees. [2] Nor are there lacking also most grave authors who, with Theodoret bishop of Cyrus, assert that Paul, writing to the Hebrews, understood [the reference to] the slaughter of the seven brothers, which is reported in the second book, when he said: "But OTHERS (Alii) were racked [stretched out], not accepting redemption" — which words agree with none more than those seven brothers, without any remission of penalties, torn apart through every kind of torments. Nay, also the most ancient custom of the Church approves these books as canonical, when, in the sacred mysteries which are performed for the dead, it takes out of the latter volume the history of Judas Maccabaeus offering gifts for the sins of the dead. And although so many were just in the Old Testament, nevertheless the Church of Christ, by a certain singular privilege (as Bernard says), decreed an annual solemnity for these alone out of all the ancient just. To these accede innumerable testimonies of the most ancient fathers, drawn out of these books as [out] of canonical scriptures. Origen, in the commentaries upon the fifth chapter of the epistle to the Romans, refuting the error of the Valentinians (who said that in the Old Law no one dared to die for the God of the Old Testament, because they knew that he was not good), using the testimony of this history as canonical, says: "But (Sed) what will they do? for we find, in the Law also, many martyrs. Let them read the books of Maccabees, where, with all constancy, the blessed mother, with seven sons, underwent martyrdom; who not only receive martyrdom patiently, but even heap reproaches upon the tyrants. And let them see whether what they say be true." [3] Eusebius of Caesarea, in the twelfth book of the Evangelical Preparation — showing that the souls of the saints, loosed from the body, bring us help in [our] necessities — uses the authority of these volumes, saying: "It is to be believed, therefore, that the pious souls of the dead have a certain power, by which, even after death, they aid human affairs. Thus certainly the Jews contend it was handed down concerning Jeremiah, and the history of the Maccabees related, that he himself was seen, after death, to pray for the people." Ambrose, in the first book of the Offices, builds up [confirms], by the examples of the Maccabean leaders, [that the saints...] [4]

[1] 2 Maccabees 12 (Mac. 12).

[2] Daniel 9 (Dan. 9); Jerome on [Daniel] 9 (Hier. sup. 9); Daniel and [Jerome] on Matthew 24 (Dan. et super 24. Mat.); 1 Maccabees 1 (1. Mac. 1); Zechariah 10 (Zach. 10).

[3] 1 Maccabees 4 (1. Mac. 4); 2 Maccabees 10 (2. Mac. 10); Hebrews (Heb.); 2 Maccabees 7 (2. Mac. 7); 2 Maccabees 12 (2. Mac. 12.g); Bernard, epistle 313 (Ber. epi. 313).

[4] 2 Maccabees 15 (2. Mac. 15).

(printed p. 658 [PDF p. 663] — Heresy XII (Maccabees): the Refutation concluded (patristic and conciliar witness); then the Objections of the Heretics — 1: Alexander said to have "first" reigned in Greece; 2: the discrepant regnal years; 3: the contradictory accounts of Antiochus' death; 4: the contradiction over the temple's purification begun.)

[Ambrose, by the examples of the Maccabean leaders, builds up] that warlike virtue befits the saints also. Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, writing to the bishops of all Egypt, in the fourth Paschal book, exhorts them to abstinence from meats, by the example (taken from this history) of the seven brothers, who, lest they should feed on unlawful meats, offered their bodies to torments. Augustine also, in the second book On Christian Doctrine, places the two books of Maccabees in the canon of the divine scriptures. And in the eighteenth book On the City of God, concerning the authority of these volumes he says: "The books of MACCABEES (Maccabaeorum), not the Jews, but the Church holds as canonical, on account of the vehement and wonderful passions of certain martyrs, who — before Christ had come in the flesh — contended, even unto death, for the Law of God, and bore the gravest and most horrible evils." And this same [thing] he testifies also in other places of his works, but especially in the book On the Care to be had for the Dead, and in the 44th sermon to the brothers in the desert — in which places, out of the twelfth chapter of the latter book of Maccabees, he proves that prayers [and] sacrifices are to be offered for the dead. [1] I omit, for brevity's sake, the third Council of Carthage, the epistle of Pope Innocent to Exuperius, the catalogue of Pope Gelasius, and the decree of the Council of Florence under Eugenius the Fourth — in which, out of the testimony of these volumes, the error of the Greeks concerning Purgatory was condemned — and other innumerable [testimonies] which protect the authority of these books; and, lest I beget tedium for the reader, I betake myself to the objections of the heretics.

OBIECTIONES HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

1. Many things are in these books which discrepate from the common consensus of all histories, and dissent from the truth of the Christian faith, on account of which they seem deservedly to be rejected. And first, as to what pertains to the truth of history, straightway at the beginning of the first volume it is read that Alexander the Macedonian, son of Philip, "first reigned in Greece." To which opinion all the histories are repugnant. For Eusebius of Caesarea, the most diligent reckoner of times, and the rest of the Chronologers, write that many reigned in Greece before Alexander, and especially among the Macedonians: of whom the first was Gramaeus [Caranus], by some also called Carranus [Caranus]; at which time, among the Hebrews, there reigned in Juda Ozias [Uzziah], and in Israel Jeroboam. But Alexander the Macedonian reigned [as] the twenty-fourth in Greece, Jaddo [Jaddua] being high priest among the Hebrews, in the year of the world 4860, in the hundred-and-eleventh Olympiad. [2]

2. There likewise it is written that Antiochus Epiphanes began to reign in the hundred-and-thirty-seventh year of the kingdom of the Greeks — which began from Alexander. But in the Chronicles of Eusebius, and in the other annals of the Greeks, numbering from Alexander to the beginning of the reign of Antiochus through the individual kings, many more years are found — namely, a hundred and fifty-three. Whence not ineptly did John Annius [Annius of Viterbo], a most skilled Chronographer, seeing that this controversy could not be settled, write in the commentaries upon the Chronography of Philo, that Josephus rendered these books apocryphal, while he wished to distinguish [set out] their history by ill-reckoned times. [3]

3. Concerning the death of Antiochus likewise — and the kind, cause, place, and time of [his] death — the books of Maccabees narrate things as contrary to the histories of the nations as to themselves. For, concerning the kind of death, in the first volume it is written that he, from sadness of soul, fell into [his] bed, and — a testament being made, and a successor to the kingdom appointed — died: but, on the contrary, at the beginning of the second book, it is read that he perished by a violent death, being struck with stones (namely, by the priests), and, together with his companions, his head cut off, torn limb from limb. Then, in the ninth chapter of the same book, he is reported to have perished by yet another kind of violent death: namely, that, fleeing, he fell from his chariot, and — the members of his whole body crushed, his flesh withering everywhere, and worms swarming over his whole body — amid horrible pains and stenches, miserably expired. But concerning the place of death, in the first book he is said to have departed [this] life at Babylon, in his own bed, worn out by long sickness. But at the beginning of the second book it is written that he was slain by the priests of the temple, within the shrine of Nannaea [Nanaea], in Persia; while below, in the ninth chapter of the same book, he is read to have perished on the journey, having now passed over into Ecbatana. [4] Nor is the diversity less as to time: while the first [book] of Maccabees asserts that Antiochus died in the hundred-and-forty-ninth year of the kingdom of the Greeks; but otherwise, at the beginning of the latter book, it is narrated that the same died in the hundred-and-eighty-eighth year of the kingdom of the Greeks; and, from the ninth chapter of the same book, it is gathered that the same died in the hundred-and-forty-sixth year of the kingdom of the Greeks. For he died two years before the purgation of the temple of Jerusalem, made by Judas Maccabaeus; which indeed (as the first [book] of Maccabees testifies) happened in the hundred-and-forty-eighth year of the kingdom of the Greeks, on the twentieth day of the month Casleu [Chislev], that is, of the ninth month. Concerning the cause of his death too, the history of the Maccabees by no means agrees with the external histories of the nations. For Polybius of Megalopolis (whom Josephus names a most excellent man, and Livy calls a not-to-be-contemned author), and, together with Polybius, Diodorus Siculus — both report that Antiochus Epiphanes, trying to plunder the most wealthy temple of Diana in Elymais, and overwhelmed by the guards, and put to flight by the neighboring nations round about, [being] turned into madness by certain phantasms and errors, at last perished of disease for this cause: because he had wished to violate the temple of Diana. But each book of Maccabees casts the cause of all the evils and of the death of Antiochus upon the calamities unjustly inflicted on the Jews, and [upon] the Jewish temple, defiled by him with all impieties. [5]

4. There is also an implacable contradiction concerning the deeds done by Judas Maccabaeus, and concerning his death, between the two books. For, while in the first volume the author testifies that the temple was purged by Judas, and the altar of God restored, in the hundred-and-forty-eighth year of the kingdom of the Greeks, on the twentieth day of the month Casleu — namely, one year before the death of Antiochus Epiphanes — in the second volume the same author writes that the same purification of the temple was made by Judas two years after the death of Antiochus, namely in the year of the kingdom of the Greeks [6]

[1] 2 Maccabees 7 (2. Mac. 7); [Augustine, On Christian Doctrine 2] ch. 8 (cap. 8); [On the City of God 18] ch. 36 (cap. 36); Gaudentius, epistle, ch. 23 (Gaud. epist. cap. 23).

[2] 1 Maccabees 2 (1. Mac. 2).

[3] 1 Maccabees 8 (1. Mac. 8).

[4] 1 Maccabees 6 (1. Mac. 6).

[5] 1 Maccabees 4 (1. Mac. 4); Josephus, Antiquities book 12; Livy, [3rd] decade; Jerome in [his] commentary; Daniel 9 (Dan. 9).

[6] 1 Maccabees 4 (1. Mac. 4); 1 Maccabees 10 (1. Mac. 10).

(printed p. 659 [PDF p. 664] — Heresy XII (Maccabees): Objections continue — 4 concluded (the discrepant dates of the temple-purification and of Judas' death); 5 (the "fabulous" hidden-fire/ark stories fathered on Jeremiah); 6 (the suicide of Razis praised); 7 (a profane Greek/Josephus abridger); 8 (the fathers who excluded the books); then the Dissolution of the Objections begins — response 1 (Alexander "first" = first over all Greece).)

[in the year] of the Greeks' [kingdom] the hundred-and-fifty-first. To which Eusebius, in the Chronicles, consents, writing that Judas cleansed the temple from the images of idols in the second year of Antiochus Eupator, three years after it had been contaminated by Antiochus Epiphanes. Concerning the death of Judas likewise, in the first book of Maccabees it is said that he was killed at the outset, in battle against the generals of Demetrius Soter; in the sixth year of Demetrius (as Eusebius notes), that is, eight years after the death of Antiochus the Illustrious, but in the hundred-and-fifty-second year of the Greeks' kingdom. But the beginning of the second [book] of Maccabees shows Judas living thirty years after this time — under Demetrius the fourteenth king of Syria (who reigned fourth after Demetrius Soter) — [and] writing, together with the senate of the Jews, a letter to Aristobulus the tutor of Ptolemy Philometor, in the hundred-and-eighty-eighth year of the Greeks' kingdom. [1]

5. There are contained likewise in this history not a few fabulous and uncertain [things] which — what is even worse — are confirmed by testimonies falsely adduced from the books of the prophets. Such is that which is recounted in the latter volume: namely, that the priests, by command of the prophet Jeremiah, hid the fire taken from the altar in a valley where there was a deep and dry well; which, after many years, Nehemiah, returned from captivity, ordered to be dug out by the grandsons of those priests who had hidden it. And again, that Jeremiah, at the same time of the transmigration [exile], hid the tabernacle, the ark, and the altar of incense in a cave of Mount Nebo, onto which Moses, about to die, had ascended. Moreover, it confirms these [things] from the books of Jeremiah the Prophet and of Nehemiah — whereas nothing such is ever read to have been done, or said, in the whole Old Testament, nor was it even possible to be done: because Jeremiah, the whole time of the siege of Jerusalem, up to the last destruction of the city, was in prison (as appears from the 37th and 38th chapter of his book) — who, as he could not do these [things] before the destruction of the city, so neither after. [2] For, the city being taken, the Chaldeans immediately seized all the precious things of the temple, and carried [them] away into Babylon (as is found written in the fourth [book] of Kings); but among the precious things, the most precious were the tabernacle — in which (as is read in Exodus) were innumerable golden rings, [and] boards and columns covered with golden plates, [and] golden and silver bases very many — [and] the ark too, covered within and without with plates of the purest gold. Which, who would believe that the Chaldeans, greedy for plunder, gave to Jeremiah as a gift — [they] who abstained not even from things of lesser price, breaking all the vessels of silver and of bronze, and carrying [them] with them into Chaldea? Which [things], even if Jeremiah had received them from them as a gift, he would not have been silent about — since he was not silent even about lesser benefits received from them, nor passed over in silence the victuals and little gifts received from the master of the Assyrian army. [3]

6. Nor is it to be omitted that in these books some [things] also are proposed to be imitated against the divine and natural law — but especially at the end of the latter book, in which place the author, with quite magnificent words, extols the voluntary killing [suicide] of Razis [Razias], praising him because he bravely laid hands upon himself, and preferred to fall generously by his own hands, by a noble and honest death, rather than basely to live in the power of enemies, and, against the splendor of his birth, to experience insults from unworthy men. [4] Which deed, so far is it from meriting any praise of fortitude, that it is even worthy of the mark of the highest timidity and impatience — not only among the faithful, but also among the pagan [ethnic] philosophers; of whom the chief, Aristotle, indicated what he felt concerning this deed, in the third book of the Ethics [Morals], in these words: "But to procure death for oneself, in order to flee poverty, or love, or anything grievous, is [the mark] not of a brave man, but rather of a timid one. For it is softness to flee laborious [things]. For [such a one] does not seek death because death is honorable, but because he thinks to avoid an evil." [5]

7. Wherefore not undeservedly the Hebrews cast these books out of the canon of the divine scriptures, as profane, and as written by a profane and gentile author from the lying histories of the Greeks — as the author himself testifies in the second volume, in these words: "The books comprehended [gathered] by Jason of Cyrene into five [books], we have tried to abridge into one volume." Which abbreviator some think was a certain Greek (as the style indicates), before the times of Christ; but others — among whom Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men, and in the second book against the Pelagians — esteem to have been Josephus the Hebrew. [6]

8. But of whatsoever author the history be, it is plain that among the ancient fathers it was of no authority. For if we speak of the Greeks: Origen, in the preface to the first Psalm, cut the books of Maccabees from the Canon; Melito, bishop of Sardis, responding to Onesimus (who consulted him concerning the canonical books), made no mention of this history in his catalogue; and Epiphanius, in the book On Weights and Measures, did not receive these books into the number of the sacred [books]. But among the Latins, Philastrius explodes [rejects] them from the catalogue of the divine volumes; and Jerome does the same, in the preface to Proverbs, writing these [things]: "The books of MACCABEES (Maccabaeorum) the Church indeed reads, but does not receive among the canonical scriptures for confirming the authority of the ecclesiastical dogmas." And he repeats this same [thing] in the Helmeted Prologue. Nay, also Gregory, in the nineteenth book of the Morals, excusing himself that he receives testimonies out of the books of Maccabees: "We do NOT (Non) act disorderly," he says, "if, out of books not canonical, yet published for the edification of the Church, we bring forth testimonies." By which words indeed he indicates that in his time — namely, six hundred years after Christ — these books were not canonical. The Council of Laodicea also does not enumerate them in the catalogue of the holy scriptures. [7]

DISSOLVTIO OBIECTORVM [The Dissolution of the Objections]

1. The Anabaptists, deceived by inexperience of histories, hallucinate in a matter clearer than light. For it is not to be understood that Alexander so "first reigned in Greece" [as] that no king was in Greece before him, but [rather] that he was the first who ruled over all Greece throughout — the other kings who reigned in it being excluded — as Metasthenes, a writer of that time, testifies.

---

[1] 1 Maccabees 9 (1. Macc. 9); 2 Maccabees 1 (2. Mac. 1).

[2] 2 Maccabees 1 and 2 (2 Mac. 1. et 2).

[3] 4 Kings 25 (printed "28"); and Exodus 26 (& vlt. Exod. 26).

[4] 2 Maccabees 14 (2. Mac. 14).

[5] Ethics, book 3, ch. 20 (3. Eth. c. 20).

[6] 2 Maccabees 2 (2. Mac. 2).

[7] Eusebius, book 6 of the Ecclesiastical History, ch. 18 (Eus. li. 6. hist. eccl. cap. 18); the same, book 4, ch. 26 (idem lib. 4. cap. 26); Philastrius in the catalogue, ch. 88 (Philastrius in cat. c. 88); ch. 27 (cap. 27).

(printed p. 660 [PDF p. 665] — Heresy XII (Maccabees), Dissolution of the Objections: response 2 (the regnal-year discrepancy resolved by the Seleucid vs. Alexandrian era); response 3 (the kind, time, and place of Antiochus' death reconciled — Nanaea, Persepolis/Elymais, Ecbatana, Babylon); response 4 (Judas purged the temple twice) begun.)

2. But what they assert in the second place, concerning the years of the reign of Antiochus, has so easy a solution that it is not necessary — with [John] Annius — to reject the reckonings of the years of this history as [things] super-added by Josephus: since Eusebius, in the Chronicles, easily recalls the present diversity of the reckonings to a true concord, saying that in each book of Maccabees the years of the kingdom of the Greeks are reckoned, not from Alexander the Great (as the external histories reckon), but from Seleucus surnamed Nicanor — who, eleven years being completed from the death of Alexander, began to reign in Syria: to which [years], if the five years be added in which Alexander reigned as monarch over all Greece, there results the number of a hundred and fifty-three years, which is had in the histories of the Greeks. Therefore, if according to the first volume of Maccabees we take the beginning of the kingdom of the Greeks, we find that Antiochus entered upon the kingdom in the hundred-and-thirty-seventh year of the kingdom of the Greeks. But if we reckon the years of the same kingdom of the Greeks from Alexander (as the histories of the Greeks do), we find that Antiochus began to reign in the hundred-and-fifty-third year of the kingdom of the Greeks.

3. But concerning the kind of the death of Antiochus, there are not lacking [those] who believe that that Antiochus — whose slaughter the epistle of the Senate of Jerusalem to Aristobulus reports — is a different [Antiochus] from that one whom the history of the Maccabees narrates to have perished from sickness of soul. We, however — esteeming that the same Antiochus is everywhere described — say that the parts of this history in no way discrepate among themselves; for each is most true: both that Antiochus, dismayed with grief of soul, fell into a languor (as the first [book] of Maccabees testifies), and that, oppressed with the same languor, he fled from Persia, and in flight was thrown from [his] chariot, and — by the collision of [his] limbs, and the convulsion of [his] entrails, amid pains and stenches — perished (as is read in the second [book] of Maccabees). [1] But concerning the diversity of times about the death of Antiochus, there is no dissension, if we recur to the various reckonings of times. For [Antiochus], who in the first [book] of Maccabees is written to have died in the hundred-and-forty-ninth year of the kingdom of the Greeks according to the reckoning begun from Seleucus, that same [Antiochus] is said, at the beginning of the latter volume, to have died in the hundred-and-eighty-eighth year — not indeed of the kingdom of the Greeks (as the crafty Anabaptists added), but in the hundred-and-eighty-eighth year of the Hebrew reckoning — reckoning, namely, the number of years, not from the beginning of the kingdom of the Greeks, but (as Rabanus, Lyra, and Hugh of St. Cher [Carensis] teach) from the twelfth year of King Assuerus, from which some of the Hebrews began their reckonings; because in that year happened that admirable liberation of the sons of Israel through Esther and Mardochaeus. From which time, if a reckoning be made through the individual years of the kings down to the death of Antiochus, a hundred and eighty-eight years are found. To which two computations a third reckoning also corresponds, which is gathered from the tenth chapter of the second book, where it is written that Antiochus died two years before the purification of the temple made by Judas. But this happened — not (as the Anabaptists dreamed) in the hundred-and-forty-eighth year of the kingdom of the Greeks, but in the hundred-and-fifty-first year of the same kingdom — as is gathered from the aforesaid chapter of the second book. Nor does that stand in the way, which is produced by them out of the first book of Maccabees — namely, that Judas purged the temple in the hundred-and-forty-eighth year of the kingdom of the Greeks, on the twentieth day of the month Casleu — since this is to be understood of the first purification of the temple, made by Judas one year before the death of Antiochus; but this [other], which is written in the second book, is to be understood of the second purification of the temple, made by the same Judas, again, two years after the death of Antiochus. [2]

Concerning the place of the death of Antiochus likewise, all controversy is removed, if the words of the latter book — produced indeed by the Anabaptists, but not understood — be more diligently inspected. For they thought that Antiochus was slain in the temple of Nannaea [Nanaea] in Persia, together with [his] companions: because at the beginning of that book it is written: "And (Et) when Antiochus had entered the temple, [the priests,] casting stones, struck the leader, and those who were with him." But from these words it is not elicited that Antiochus was slain, but only struck with stones. And what is immediately subjoined under the aforesaid words — "And (Et) they divided [them] limb from limb, and, the heads being cut off, cast [them] forth" — is referred to his companions; upon whose slaughter, while the priests were insisting too much, Antiochus in the meantime escaped. Nor does that discrepate from this opinion which is read in the ninth chapter of the same book — that Antiochus entered Persepolis (which is also called Elymais in the first [book] of Maccabees), the metropolis of Persia (as Ptolemy writes). And when he had wished to spoil the temple, the multitude running together to arms, [he was] turned to flight; in which, when he had now passed beyond Ecbatana, he fell from [his] chariot. And in the Babylonian region (as is read in the first and second book) — a successor to the kingdom, Antiochus Eupator, being left [behind] — he died, amid torments and stenches: not indeed for the cause written by Diodorus and Polybius, but for the sacrilege of the temple of Jerusalem perpetrated by him. As Antiochus himself, dying, confesses in each book, and Josephus, in the twelfth [book] of the Antiquities, confirms — refuting Polybius in these words: "I wonder (Miror) that Polybius of Megalopolis, a good man, says that Antiochus perished for this [cause]: that he wished to violate the temple of Diana in Persia. For he who in no way did the sin, but only thought [it], is held by no guilt of the deed. But if it seem to Polybius that Antiochus therefore ended [his] life, it is believed far more verisimilar that he perished on account of the sacrilegious devastation of the temple of Jerusalem." [3]

4. I pass now to the deeds of Judas Maccabaeus, which suffer no difficulty at all, if they be distinguished according to the aforesaid reckonings. For it is agreed (as we warned above) that Judas twice purged the temple: first indeed in the year one before the death of Antiochus, immediately after it had been violated by him — that is, in the hundred-and-forty-eighth year of the kingdom of the Greeks reckoned from Seleucus (as is read in the first [book] of Maccabees); but the second [time], two years after the death of Antiochus, namely in the hundred-and-fifty-first year of the kingdom of the Greeks reckoned from Seleucus — for thus in the second book of Macca-[bees] [4]

[1] 2 Maccabees 6 (2. Mac. 6); 2 Maccabees 9 (2. Mac. 9); 1 Maccabees 6 (1. Mac. 6); 1 Maccabees 1 (1. Mac. 1).
[2] 1 Maccabees 4 (1. Mac. 4); 2 Maccabees 1 (2. Mac. 1).
[3] Ptolemy, [Geography] book 6 (Ptol. l. 6); 2 Maccabees 1 (2. Mac. 1); ch. 9 (of 2 Maccabees) (ca. 9).
[4] 1 Maccabees 4 (1. Mac. 4).

(printed p. 661 [PDF p. 666] — Heresy XII (Maccabees), Dissolution continues: response 4 concluded (the two Demetriuses; Aristobulus dated); response 5 (the hidden fire/ark drawn not from canonical Jeremiah/Nehemiah but from lost "commentaries"; apocryphal citation defended); response 6 (Razis — Augustine: his deed narrated, not praised); response 7 (the Hebrews' opinion is irrelevant once the Church receives the books).)

for thus in the second book of Maccabees it is written, and is had in Eusebius, that Judas purged the temple three years after it had been profaned by Antiochus. After which purgation, in six years or thereabouts, Judas dies, in the sixth year of Demetrius (as the first book testifies). But this Demetrius is not that one whom the Anabaptists, falsely transposing the names, lyingly [allege] — namely, the tenth king of Syria, surnamed Soter; but another Demetrius, the fourteenth king of Syria, in whose sixth year Judas fell in war — namely, in the hundred-and-fifty-sixth year of the kingdom of the Greeks reckoned from Seleucus, or thereabouts (as Eusebius hands down). But he [Judas] had earlier written the letter which is had at the beginning of the second volume, to Aristobulus, while Demetrius Soter reigned, in the hundred-and-eighty-eighth year of the Hebrew reckoning from Assuerus — which, according to the Greek reckoning from Seleucus, is nearly the fifty-fifth year: at which time it is openly agreed that that Aristobulus lived — the tutor of Ptolemy Philometor king of Egypt, a Jew by nation, a philosopher by profession, a Peripatetic by sect — who, to the same king of Egypt (Eusebius being witness), wrote commentaries upon Moses. [1]

5. But that which they say — that certain fabulous [things] are falsely introduced into this history from the sacred books of Nehemiah [and] of Jeremiah, which are nowhere read in those sacred volumes of theirs — is a calumny of the heretics: since nothing out of the divine and Canonical volumes of Nehemiah, or of Jeremiah, is cited in the second book of Maccabees, but only certain "descriptions" [records], and "commentaries," of Nehemiah and of Jeremiah. For thus it is written in that place: "It is FOUND (Invenitur) in the descriptions of Jeremiah the prophet"; and a little after: "But they were brought in (Inferebantur) in the descriptions and commentaries of Nehemiah." Which certainly no one who understands the signification of "commentary" will think to be those [books] which are counted in the Canon of the Old Testament. For commentaries, as appears from Cicero's Brutus, are books in which the daily events are noted — not more broadly and more diffusely, as they are described in a [formal] history, but as briefly and as strictly as can be. But in the aforesaid books which are had in the canon, the single [events] are extended, in the manner of a history, drawn out into a long narration. It is to be believed, therefore, that there were of old other commentaries in which these [things] about the fire, the ark, and the hidden altar were contained — written either by Jeremiah, or by Baruch his scribe, or by some other; and, because they contained the deeds of Jeremiah, entitled with his name: which perhaps, because they had nothing pertaining to prophecy, were not received among the divine books. For Jerome also, in the 27th chapter on Matthew, testifies that he read a certain apocryphal book of Jeremiah, which a certain Jew of the Nazarene sect had brought to him. Nor is the author to be damned on this account — that he adduced testimonies out of apocryphal writings in true and sacred matters: since Paul, as we showed elsewhere, took testimonies not only out of apocryphal, but out of profane books — namely, out of Aratus, Menander, and Epimenides — and Jude, in his epistle, cited the apocryphal book of Enoch. [2] But as to what they say — that it could in no way happen that the ark, the altar, and the tabernacle were hidden by Jeremiah — is asserted by them too impudently. For what forbids that these, before, or in the very destruction of the city, at the exhortation of Jeremiah (existing [then] in prison), could have been concealed by pious men? — as the very words of the history seem to intimate, when they say: "It is FOUND (Invenitur) in the descriptions of Jeremiah the prophet, that he commanded them to take the fire — [those] who were being transmigrated [into exile], as has been signified — and as he charged those transmigrated." Nor are the ancient fathers lacking who believed this to have been most truly done by Jeremiah — as Theophylact, in the commentaries upon the ninth chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews; Epiphanius, in the life of Jeremiah the prophet; and Dorotheus, bishop of Tyre, in the Synopsis in which he embraces the lives of the prophets. Nor does it stand in the way, that in the second [book] of Maccabees it is written: "And (Et) Jeremiah, coming thither, found a place of a cave, and brought in thither the tabernacle, and the ark, and the altar, and blocked the door." For it can happen that what was done by others — [when Jeremiah was] detained in prison, at the command of Jeremiah, before the sacking of the city — is said that Jeremiah himself did [it], according to the common custom of divine scripture, which frequently is wont to attribute to the author that which was done by others at the author's command.

6. Concerning the deed of Razis — for whose cause the Anabaptists wickedly vituperate the whole history — Augustine, in the sixty-first epistle to Dulcitius, responds in these words: "In the books of MACCABEES, although Razis was praised, yet his deed is narrated, not praised, and set before the eyes rather to be judged than imitated: not by the judgment which we, as men, might have, but by the judgment of sober doctrine, which is clear also in those old books themselves. For that Razis was far from those words where it is read: 'RECEIVE (Omne) whatever shall be applied to thee, and in pain sustain [it], and in humility have patience.' For that man was not wise in choosing death, but impatient in bearing humility [humiliation]. It is written that he wished to die nobly, but not wisely. For God says: 'The INNOCENT (Innocentem) and the just slay not.'" And the same [Augustine], in the second book against the second epistle of Gaudentius, ch. 23: "Razis — [the text] says — because he could not flee, is perhaps less guilty of his own blood, in that he inflicted death upon himself, than the enemy would have inflicted [on him] if [he had been] captured. Razis was praised as a lover of [his] city, as one very well spoken-of — that is, of good repute — because he was called father of the Jews, and because he held continence in Judaism. But it [Scripture] narrated that death of his [as] more wonderful than [it was] more prudent — how it was done, [it] praised, not as [something] that was to be done." The heretics, therefore, lie, asserting that this deed was praised, and set before us for imitation. [3]

7. Concerning the opinion of the Hebrews about these books — whatever it be — it matters nothing, since the Catholic Church receives them in the canon. Nor is anything derogated from their faith [authority], even if they were written by a profane author — since the faith of a book depends not on the author, but on the authority of the Catholic Church. And what she has received, it behooves to be true and indubitable, by whatsoever author it be said — whom I would dare affirm neither sacred nor profane; nor did Jerome ever, out of his own opinion, [reprove] those books

[1] 2 Maccabees 9 (2. Mac. 9).
[2] 2 Maccabees 2 (2. Mac. 2).
[3] Exodus 23 (Exod. 23).

(printed p. 662 [PDF p. 667] — Heresy XII (Maccabees) concluded: the "Josephus" attribution corrected (the real Josephan work is 4 Maccabees); the three-author theory of the two books; response 8 (the fathers who excluded them spoke of the Hebrew canon). Then Heresy XIII opens: Of the translations of Sacred Scripture — statement and Assertors (the ancient five heretical versions, and their modern sixth: the Protestant editions).)

[nor did Jerome ever, out of his own opinion, reprove] those books, or affirm [them to be] of Josephus, or of any other; but, "JOSEPHUS (Iosephus)," he says, "is reported [to be] the writer of the [Maccabaean] history." But that it was thus believed by some, came perhaps thence: because they had heard, in Eusebius or other authors, that Josephus wrote a book of the Maccabees, and thought this to be that [book] which is numbered among the canonical [ones] — which indeed is not so. For that book which Josephus wrote concerning the Maccabees still exists in Greek, and in some Bibles of the Greeks is placed immediately after the two books of Maccabees, with its author's name prefixed — namely, Ἰωσήπου εἰς τοὺς Μακκαβαίους (Iosepou eis tous Makkabaious — "Of Josephus, upon the Maccabees"). Of which little book Eusebius, in the third book of the Ecclesiastical History, brought forth testimony with such [words]: "There is also (Est) another elegant volume of Josephus, entitled εἰ αὐτοδέσποτός ἐστι τῶν παθῶν ὁ εὐσεβὴς λογισμός (ei autodespotos esti ton pathon ho eusebes logismos — 'whether pious reason is self-master [autocrat] of the passions') — which little book some have entitled 'of the Maccabees,' for the reason that the contests therein, and the struggles undergone for piety's sake by the Maccabees, are contained." It is plain, therefore, that nothing certain can be affirmed concerning the author of the present history — except that it was written by diverse authors, as the diversity of phrase indicates, and the repeated iteration of the same history, which it is not verisimilar that one and the same author made. For to what purpose would he have wished to repeat again, in the second volume, those same [things] which he had abundantly narrated in the first volume? I, for my part, would believe (as I already indicated in the first volume of this work) that these books were written by three diverse authors: the first indeed by a Hebrew author, and in the Hebrew tongue (as the style shows, and Jerome, in the Helmeted Prologue, affirms that he read it written in Hebrew). But the second — except its first chapter, and the half of the second chapter (the beginning being taken from those words, "OF JUDAS MACCABAEUS AND HIS BROTHERS (De Iuda Maccabaeo et fratribus eius)," whence the preface of the second book begins) — up to the end, I judge was abridged by a Greek author out of the five books of Jason of Cyrene, as the abbreviator himself affirms in the preface. But the third part of this history — from the beginning of the second book up to the half of the second chapter, in which those two letters of the Senate of Jerusalem are contained — I think was written by a public scribe of the senate, to the Jewish brethren dwelling in Egypt, as the salutations of the letters themselves indicate. [1]

8. Finally, to those [things] which they object concerning the fathers who do not receive these books in the canon, we respond that most of them spoke, not of the canon of the Christians, but of the canon of the Hebrews. For thus Origen says on the first Psalm: "It is NOT (Non) to be ignored that there are twenty-two books in the canon of the Old Testament, as the Hebrews hand down"; then, after the enumeration of the books, he adds: "And (Et) in these they conclude the canon of the divine volumes; but the books of Maccabees they have extrinsically [outside]." But as to that which Jerome and Gregory seem to intimate — that neither of these volumes is of the canon of the Christians — I recall that I already responded above: that there are two orders of the canonical volumes, from the prior of which Jerome and Gregory deservedly exclude the books of Maccabees, because concerning these it was long doubted in the Church. [2] And hence it is that the Council of Laodicea, and many of the fathers, did not number them in the catalogues of the sacred volumes — lest, in a matter so grave (concerning which many were not yet fully instructed), they should rashly define anything. But after — a diligent discussion being made — they recognized these books to be divine, then they referred them into the Canon, and left them to us so approved, that it is now no longer permitted to doubt concerning their certainty.

OF THE TRANSLATIONS OF SACRED SCRIPTURE — Heresy XIII (De Translationibus Sacrae Scripturae. Haeresis XIII)

That, all the editions of holy scripture which the Church has hitherto used being rejected, new editions are to be used, as more certain and more faithful.

ASSERTORES HVIVS HAERESEOS [The Assertors of this Heresy]

This is not (Non) a new heresy, or lately invented by the heretics of our time — who rashly boast that the Church of Christ, before this our age, had no sincere and faithful translation of the divine books — but of old too, above eleven hundred years [ago], this same heresy flourished in the Church. Of which Philastrius also, in his catalogue, made mention diffusely enough, enumerating around it five orders of heretics, who — the interpretation of the holy Seventy-two interpreters (which the Catholic Church then used) being cast off — followed the versions of diverse heretics. Of whom the first received only the translation of Aquila of Pontus; the second, another edition of certain thirty men, who had imitated Aquila in many things; the third, another translation of certain six men, full of depraved dogmas; the fourth, the interpretation of Symmachus and of Theodotion, the Ebionites; but the fifth chose a certain version, taken not from the authentic exemplars of the Hebrews, but from certain Hebrew codices, which they said had been found inside a cask [jar] after the Babylonian captivity. To whom, as in a sixth order, can be subjoined certain insolent heretics of our times — namely, the Sacramentarians, the Anabaptists, the Servetans, and the Lutherans — who, the interpretation of the sacred volumes being repudiated (which the Catholic Church has venerated for so many ages), follow the suspect editions of diverse heretics: as, in the Old Testament, [those] of Conrad Pellican, John Oecolampadius, Ulric Zwingli, Martin Luther, Sebastian Münster, and Sebastian Castalio [Castellio]; in the New Instrument [Testament] likewise, translations — or rather "recognitions" [revisions], or certain "castigations" [corrections] — of the same Oecolampadius, Zwingli, Luther, Castalio, and Michael Servetus, the Arian and Manichaean. These editions, therefore, each one embracing according to his own lust, they so prefer to our Vulgate edition, that [they assert] their interpreters alone attained the mind and words [3]

[1] [Jerome] against the Pelagians, book 2 (Con. Pel. li. 2); ch. 10 (cap. 10); (cross-reference:) page 46 (Pag. 46).
[2] [Eusebius,] book 6 of the Ecclesiastical History, ch. 18 (Lib. 6. hist. eccl. cap. 18).
[3] ch. 13 (of Philastrius) (cap. 13).

(printed p. 663 [PDF p. 668] — Heresy XIII (translations): the Refutation — the endless daily proliferation of rival Protestant versions; the need for the Church's judgment on ambiguous words, illustrated at length by the disputed הימים of Genesis 36:24 (Anah in the desert) and the קיקיון*/"gourd vs. ivy" riot over Jonah 4.)*

they so prefer [these editions] to our Vulgate edition, that they boast that their interpreters alone understood the mind and words of the prophets and apostles, and truly and faithfully expressed [them].

IMPVGNATIO [The Refutation]

But this is nothing else than to excite new tumults daily in the Church of God. For if, the old editions being rejected, we strive to introduce newer translations into the Church daily, what will be either the end or the measure of interpreting the sacred books — of restoring, of recognizing [revising], of castigating [correcting], of observing? — while each one daily, according to the opinion of his own mind and the affection of his own dogma, sends forth new subversions [euersiones], castigations, [and] recognitions — now to the Greek, now to the Hebrew verity — pernicious scholia, annotations, and glosses (pertaining to their own dogmas) being everywhere interjected; and while the interpreters, contending among themselves with the highest dissension, each rejects, confutes, and damns the other — so that Luther reprehends Oecolampadius and Zwingli as incautious; Münster in turn accuses Luther, that he dissimulated many errors of the old interpreter; Pellican vituperates Münster, that by his foul barbarity he befouled all the divine scripture; but Castalio [Castellio] explodes all the interpreters before him as ignorant of the Latin speech, and esteems that he alone interpreted the sacred books in the Latin tongue. Which, therefore, of these interpreters will the heretics follow? or whose edition will they bring forth into the midst, if they be compelled — against their own adversaries — either to confirm their own dogmas out of the sacred codices, or to repel diverse [ones]? Assuredly, if the Anabaptists adduce testimonies of the scriptures out of the edition of their [own] Servetus, straightway the Sacramentarians will cry out, and will say that these were derived from the depraved version of the Anabaptists, and are not so read in the emended and true codices of Oecolampadius and Zwingli. And likewise the Anabaptists will answer the Sacramentarians, when they feel themselves pressed by them with testimonies of the scriptures. But if any one, coming upon them, should say that neither edition is to be stood by, but that recourse must be had to the Greek or Hebrew fountains, that by their reading the proposed controversy may be ended — straightway a far sharper contention will arise, while each, pertinacious in his own error, will contend that the Greek or Hebrew word is to be turned otherwise and otherwise — but especially if the word be ambiguous, as almost innumerable [words] are among the Hebrews; and in this manner, altercating, they will never be able to agree among themselves, unless — contention being cast off, and their own judgment renounced — they submit themselves, by unanimous consent, to the judgment of the Catholic Church: that she, as a true arbiter and judge, may pronounce in which interpreter's opinion one ought to acquiesce. For there are, in the sacred codices of the Hebrews, certain words and sentences so uncertain, ambiguous, and so variously explained — even by the highest and most illustrious interpreters — that, however erudite you be, and skilled in tongues, you would nevertheless not know to which side to turn, and would always be compelled to be doubtful, unless the authority of the Catholic Church admonished you to embrace the interpretation of this [one], but to dismiss that of that [one].

And that the matter may become more illustrious by an example applied, there is a place in the thirty-sixth chapter of Genesis, famous by the contention of all interpreters, namely: "It (Ipse) is Ana [Anah] who found הימים (haiiemim) in the desert, while he was pasturing the asses of Zebeon his father." [1] Of whose interpretation (as Jerome reports in the book of Hebrew Questions) there are as many opinions as [there are] interpreters. Some think ימם (iemim) [means] "seas" [maria] — because "seas" are written with the same letters as this particle of the present sentence; and they hold that Anah, while he was pasturing his father's asses in the desert, found "congregations of waters" — which, according to the idiom of the Hebrew tongue, ימם (iemim) — that is, "seas" — is called; namely, because he found a pool, the finding of which is difficult in the desert, and [which] Diodorus denies [any] to be found in that solitude. Some — among whom [is] the author of the Vulgate edition — held that "hot waters" [aquae calidae] are signified by this word, according to the nearness of the Punic tongue, which is conterminous with the Hebrew, and that it is so to be turned. Others are [those] who judge that "wild asses" [onagri] were admitted by this Anah to the she-asses, and that he found this kind of coupling, so that the swiftest asses might be born from these; and that the word ought now to be turned "swiftest asses." Very many think that he first made the herds of mares to be mounted by asses in the desert, so that from thence new animals against nature — mules — might be born; and, according to this understanding, they esteem [the word] is to be interpreted "mules." But Aquila turned this place thus: "It (Ipse) is Ana, who found σὺν τῷ σιμὲν (syn to simen)"; and Symmachus, "τοὺς σιμὲν (tous simen)" — which interpretation signifies the plural number. But the Seventy and Theodotion — only the Hebrew characters being changed into Greek letters — turned [it] "τὸ ιαμὲν (to iamen)," which indicates the singular number. Concerning which word there has been no less doubt among these recent interpreters. Some — among whom Pellican, [following] the Seventy — now think [it] is to be left [untranslated], as a word not yet understood; Münster and Castalio turn [it] "mules"; Sanctes [Pagninus], "congregations of waters"; Galatinus, "wild asses"; others, according to Symmachus, "Symin" [σιμίν]; but some say that "hot mares" — that is, [mares] warm with the ardor of coitus — was formerly written in the emended codices, [and] afterward, by the fault of the scribes, "mares" [equas] was changed into "waters" [aquas]. Since, therefore, in this place, and in like [places] of this kind, there is so great a variety of translators, how will the wavering mind explain itself, unless it consult upon this the judgment of the Church? or how will the contentions and altercations be settled, if each one goes on to defend the interpreter of his own sect and faction, and each contends to read according to his own edition — unless the definition of the Church supervene, which by its authority may dissolve strifes of this kind?

Nor let any one say that these [things] are so light and minute that from them — howsoever they be interpreted and read — no peril of sedition, or endangering of salvation, could arise. For that name too, קיקיון (Kikaion [Kikayon]), which was turned "gourd" [cucurbita] in Jonah by the old interpreter, was of small moment; and yet (as Augustine writes in the epistle to Jerome) so small a matter excited a huge tumult in Africa. For when a certain bishop, in the church over which he presided — making words [a sermon] to the people — had read, for "gourd," "ivy" [hedera], according to the new translation of Jerome, so great a tumult suddenly arose among the people (especially the Greeks arguing, and clamoring the calumny of falsity), that [2]

[1] Genesis 36 (Gen. — printed "37").
[2] Jonah 4 (Iona 4).

(printed p. 664 [PDF p. 669] — Heresy XIII (translations): the danger of vowel-points (the Arian repointing of John 1:1; Servetus's repunctuation of Romans 9:5); the Council of Trent's decree fixing the Vulgate as authentic; the pernicious editions of Münster and Castalio criticized (the one crudely Judaizing, the other effeminately paraphrastic).)

so that the bishop was compelled first to implore the aid of the Jews, that they might bring forth for him testimony from their codices; then, they answering variously, he was compelled to recant his error before the people. But what is lighter or more minute than points [vowel-points]? And yet such very small things, if they be placed otherwise than in the editions and exemplars received by the Catholic Church, very often provide great fuel [foments] to heresies. Which Augustine also, in the third book On Christian Doctrine, showed by an example, in those words of John: "IN the beginning (In principio) was the Word." Which sentence the heretics — who denied the Word of God to be God — read with the points changed: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and [there] was God"; and here, a point being interposed, there followed: "This WORD (Verbum) was in the beginning with God." By a like example, in our times, the impious Servetus, in the second of the three books which, with a blasphemous title, he inscribed On the error of the Trinity, perverted that sentence of the divine Paul to the Romans, namely: "Whose (Quorum) [are] the fathers, of whom [is] Christ according to the flesh, who is over all things God blessed unto the ages, Amen." Which, when he — who denied Christ to be God — saw manifestly to gainsay him, [the point being transposed] he wished it to be read thus: "Whose (Quorum) [are] the fathers, of whom [is] Christ according to the flesh, who is over all things." Then, a point being affixed [inserted], it is to be added: "GOD (Deus) [be] blessed unto the ages. Amen" — as [if] a certain eucharistic [thanksgiving] epiphonema, by which the Hebrews frequently are wont to close the end of a prayer with thanksgiving and the praise of God: as, at the end of the eighty-eighth psalm, for this cause is placed: "BLESSED (Benedictus) [be] God unto the ages, Amen, Amen." [1] Therefore, that all altercations, doubts, and heresies (which could arise from the diversity of many editions) may be taken away out of the midst, there must be some one interpretation, approved by the common consent of the whole [body] of the faithful, and by the determination of the Church — by whose authority all controversies of this kind may be removed.

Accordingly, the sacrosanct Tridentine Synod, observing this, rightly, in the fourth session, second decree, sanctioned that, out of all the Latin editions which are circulated, the old and Vulgate edition alone — which by the long use of so many ages has been approved — be held as authentic, and in the divine offices, and sacred mysteries, and in sermons, and public readings, and disputations, be alone read and cited; and let no one dare to reject it under any pretext. And deservedly indeed: since — besides that it has now been received by the Church with so great a multitude of years [/consecrated by so great a reverence of years] — there is not even, among these editions of the more recent interpreters, [any] which is more certain, safer, and more faithful than this our Vulgate edition. For — to be silent about the other translations of our age (of Pellican, namely, of Zwingli, of Oecolampadius, of Luther, and of other heretics, which the heretics themselves confess to be "recognitions" rather than new translations) — I will name only two editions of the two Sebastians, namely of Münster and of Castalio [Castellio], which the Sacramentarians and Anabaptists hold in price above all [others]. Whereas, nevertheless, they are pernicious, and to be fled by the pious reader like a lethal poison — because everywhere they are full of nefarious annotations, scholia, observations, glosses, little prefaces, arguments [summaries], and like traps and snares set for the destruction of the reader. Of which, because it would be too long to relate all, let it suffice to have indicated only two places: of which the one Münster annotated on the first [chapter] of Malachi, against the true and corporeal presence of Christ in the Sacrament of the altar; the other Castalio annotated on the third [chapter] of Exodus, against the consubstantiality and equality of the Father and the Son — following in it the sentence of Arius, so often already condemned.

But if to these [things] the heretics respond that they speak not of their scholia and annotations, but of the kind [manner] of interpretation, and of the best manner of turning [translating] employed by them; and that for this cause they wish the editions of their [own] interpreters to be preferred to our edition, as more polished and more eloquent, and accommodated, by a more diligent industry, to the Latin custom of speaking — we shall not much resist. For we know that the office of a faithful interpreter is not to affect elegance of speech, that he may seem eloquent, but above all the certainty and truth of the sentence [sense]. And in this we affirm that our Vulgate edition is to be preferred to the rest in fidelity, integrity, and authority — discussing nothing at present about the style, and the choice of words, and the candor [purity] of the discourse: all which, because they are alien to the purpose of the present work, we leave to be judged by the professors of tongues.

Yet we cannot be wholly silent about what very many most learned men — even as regards the kind [manner] of interpreting — vehemently condemn in these two authors: namely, that each is, without measure, extreme. The one, in affecting the Jewish idioms, is hard, rustic, barbarous, and plainly a Jew; the other, on the contrary, in ineptly affecting the individual locutions of the gentiles, shows himself gentile and profane rather than Latin: so that, of their translations, the one may deservedly be called [that] of the Jews, the other of the Pagans. For Münster — everywhere horrid, thorny [senticosus], and rough — so far followed the horror of the Hebrew speech that, although he could have accommodated many things softly to Latin ears, he nevertheless so studied to preserve all the properties and phrases of the Hebrew speech that he was unwilling to omit even the very harsh sounds [stridores] of the Hebrew names: thrusting into Latin ears everywhere — for Ozias, "Vzijhau"; for Ezechias [Hezekiah], "Iehizkiahu"; for Ezechiel, "Iehezechel"; for Cyrus, "Choresch"; for Darius, "Dariauesch"; for Nabuchodonosor, "Nabuchednezzar"; for Baltasar [Belshazzar], "Beltzezzer" — and many other words of this kind, which no Latin can pronounce without a huge straining of breath and of tongue. But Castalio — whom I know not whether I should call a paraphrast rather than an interpreter — is, on the contrary, so delicate and soft that he suffers nothing that smells [olfacere] of a Hebraism; nor does he think that he truly speaks Latin, unless he speak most effeminately, and — without all the majesty of divine scripture, and the gravity of a divine interpreter — paints, in the manner of little harlots, and sears with a curling-iron [calamistrum], each single sentence, luxuriating in a certain wanton affluence of soft words: as he did in the Canticles of Solomon, in which, whatsoever the old interpreter turned chastely and gravely concerning the divine loves of Christ and of the Church, that man [turned] with every allurement [lenocinium] of words, and with all the voices of little women, and [their] affec-[tions]

[1] John 1 (Ioan. 1); Romans 9 (Rom. 9); Psalm 88 (Psal. 88).

(printed p. 665 [PDF p. 670] — Heresy XIII (translations): Castalio's effeminate diminutives in the Canticle and his paganizing vocabulary catalogued; his "palo deligatum" for the crucifixion and the stir it caused; then the history of the ancient Greek versions — the Seventy, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, the Fifth and Sixth found by Origen, and the Seventh (the κοινή / "Lucianic").)

[and using all the voices and affections of little women,] he translated so impudently (not to say obscenely), as if he had been about to publish the colloquies of harlots and panders — in almost every third word inculcating certain diminished, lubricious, and softly-jingling little words [voculae]: such as these are: "COME hither (Huc ades), O my little sister, my little friend, my dove, my little heart, in the little holes of the rock, in the hiding-places of the snail." And that: "HOW pretty (Quam bella) thou art, O little dainty one! Show me thy little face, make [me] hear thy little voice; for thou hast both a charming little voice, and a pleasant little face." And that: "CATCH (Capite) for us the little foxes, the little ravagers of the vineyards." [1] And again: "AH, thee (Ah te), pretty one! ah, thee, comely one! Thou hast a little neck very like an ivory little tower. Thou hast a little head very like Carmel, and little curls like royal purple; and thou hast little dove-like little eyes, interspersed with little curls. Thou hast little cheeks like the rinds of a pomegranate, set among little curls, and little breasts more shapely than a fawn." And that: "OPEN (Aperi) to me, my little sister; I will bring thee into the house of my little mother, of my little parent." Nor is it wonderful if Castalio so impudently [sported] in a divine matter — even as, with Catullus, he sported about the little sparrow of Lesbia, and the swelling little eyes of the girl, and the golden apple: because (as he himself indicated in the little glosses added at the margin) he never believed that, in that divine Canticle, the mystical loves of Christ and of the Church are described, but that an amatory colloquy was woven of the venereal and profane [loves] of Solomon, and of his lover [amica] the Sulamite, and of the loves of the [other] women of the same [Solomon].

And just as he contaminated this book of Solomon with dishonest allurements, so he profaned all the divine scripture with profane, gentile, and impious words, locutions, and sentences — this half-pagan and half-gentile interpreter: who, as if it shamed him to use the words which the Holy Spirit used through the mouths of the saints, changed the name of God, and of the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, into "Jove" [Iupiter], "Diuus," "Armipotens" [the Mighty-in-arms], "Gradivus" [Mars], and "Coelicola" [Heaven-dweller]; calling his divine charity "Cupid," and his Angels "the genii of Jove," and the temple of God "the shrine and fane of Jove," and the seat of God "the Augustale [palace] of Jove"; putting everywhere — for holy men, "Heroes"; for holy Israel, "the Augustan Israelite"; for the holy prophets, "seers [vates] and soothsayers [fatidici]"; for the prophetic spirit, "the fatidic spirit"; and for "to prophesy," "to rave [bacchari]"; for the giants likewise, "the offspring of the Titans"; for the Sun, "Phoebus and Apollo"; for lightnings, "the Jovian fire"; for hell, "Orcus and Tartarus"; for the inhabitants of hell, "the Manes"; and for the perdition of hell, "Pluto"; for sanctification, "lustration"; and for the sacred chant, "the Paean" — and innumerable other [things] like these, drawn from the very midst of the impiety of the gentiles, which no one truly pious would hear with equal [patient] ears. I omit, consulting brevity, the violent and ambiguous locutions which prepare matter for heresies: as when, for that which the Church reads in the Gospel of John — "And the Word was made flesh" — I know not whether he turned [it] Latin rather than Sarmatian [barbarous]: "AND the DISCOURSE (Et sermo) WAS EMBODIED (corporatus est)." As if the blessed Jerome had erred, when he turned that καὶ ὁ λόγος σάρξ ἐγένετο (kai ho logos sarx egeneto): "And the Word was made flesh"; and that which Peter, in the Acts, said of Christ — ὃν προσπήξαντες ἀνείλετε (hon prospexantes aneilete), that is, "WHOM (Quem), affixing [to the cross], ye slew" — this half-gentile interpreter, the [self-styled] pillar of the Roman tongue, translated: "WHOM YOU (Quem vos), FASTENED TO A STAKE [ad palum deligatum], LIFTED UP [sustulistis]." [2] Which words, in recent years — among certain Jews received to the faith [converted] by the Anabaptists of the city of Florence, not without huge peril to the Anabaptists — excited a great rumor in their conventicles, those Jews doubting whether Christ, according to the old custom of the Romans and Hebrews, had been affixed to a cross, or rather fixed to a stake [palus] (according to the present custom of the Turks), as the edition of Castalio seemed to signify. And such egregious fruits do these Ciceronian editions of the recent interpreters produce — celebrated with such great praises by the heretics. But perhaps I have been more [prolix] in this matter than the reader would have wished.

But since the heretics boast that the Church of God, before these new interpretations, had no faithful and sincere translation of the divine scripture — that we may repress this boasting of theirs, it is worth the while, having begun somewhat higher, to see briefly: first, how many and what kind of translations both the Greek and the Latin Church had; then indeed, of what authority each one of them was in the Catholic Church.

The FIRST (Prima) Greek edition of the Old Testament, therefore — which the Church first used — was the version of the seventy-two interpreters. The SECOND, of Aquila of Pontus, published nearly 120 years after Christ. The THIRD, of Symmachus the Samaritan, composed in the year 190 of human salvation. The FOURTH, of Theodotion of Ephesus, elaborated in the year 200 from the birth of Christ. Concerning which four Greek translations — since, in the fourth book of this Work, under the proper titles of the same authors, we have spoken copiously — we judge it superfluous to repeat the same in this place. The FIFTH Greek edition, together with very many other Hebrew and Greek volumes, was found at Jericho, in jars [dolia], by Origen Adamantius; who also, not much after, found another certain translation on the Actiac shore, at Nicopolis, hidden in the same manner in jars, and called it the SIXTH edition. And, joining these to the other four translations, he constructed, with wonderful artifice, the Hexapla and Octapla of the Greek editions, in that order which I have already commemorated in the book [already] cited, when I reviewed the writings of Origen. A SEVENTH — after all these — a certain Greek edition was found; and it was never placed either in the Hexapla or in the Octapla. This Isidore, in the sixth book of the Etymologies, thinks was found by Origen himself; which was called by the Greeks κοινή (koine) — that is, "common and vulgate" — but by some was called λευκιανός (leukianos [Lucianic]), or "λευκιαντα": because it was believed to have been published by Lucian the Martyr. Concerning which Jerome, in the epistle to Sunias and Fretela, thus writes: "BRIEFLY (Breviter) I admonish this — that you may know there is one edition, which Origen and Eusebius of Caesarea call κοινήν (koinen), that is, 'common,' and which is now by very many called λευκιανός (leukianos); [and] another, of the Seventy interpreters, which is found in the Hexapla codices, and has been turned by us into the Latin tongue, and is chanted at Jerusalem and in the churches of the East. But that κοινή (koine) is, according to the places and times, a corrupt edition, by the will of the old copyists; whereas that [other], which is had in the Hexapla, and which we have turned, is the very one which, in the books of the learned, is preserved [as] the incorrupt and immaculate translation of the Seventy interpreters." These [things Jerome]

[1] Canticle 2 (Cant. 2); Canticle 7 (Cant. 7); Canticle 5 (printed unclear).

[2] John 1 (Ioan. 1); Acts 2 (printed unclear).

(printed p. 666 [PDF p. 671] — Heresy XIII (translations): the two Latin editions (the old "Vulgate/common" from the Greek, and Jerome's new one from the Hebrew); the New-Testament translations and Jerome's revision under Damasus; the five editions received into authority; the Church's exclusive public use of them; and the threefold pre-eminence of the Septuagint (antiquity; divine inspiration — the separate-cells miracle).)

These [things], therefore, concerning all the famous editions of the Greeks, we have taken from Aristeas, Josephus, Eusebius, Justin, Irenaeus, Epiphanius, and Jerome.

After which, two other Latin editions of the Old Testament were in the Latin Church — namely, a new and an old: the old indeed received the name of the "Vulgate and common" edition — both because it had no certain author, and because it was taken, not from the Hebrew fountain, but from the κοινή (koine), or from the Septuagint interpretation, as Augustine, in the eighteenth [book] On the City of God, and Jerome, in the preface to the Gospels, testify; whose reading the Church used long before the times of Jerome, and also long after, down to the times of Gregory the Pope. But the new was turned by Jerome — not from the Greek, but from the Hebrew verity — into Latin speech: which the Church, from the very times of Gregory, used together with the old edition. For Gregory mentions each in the preface to the Morals, saying: "The NEW (Novam) translation I defer; but when the cause of proof demands [it] of me, I take now the old, now the new, for testimony: so that — since the Apostolic See, over which, God being author, I preside, uses both — my labor of study also may be supported by each." And let these [things] be said concerning the translations of the Old Testament, both Greek and Latin. [1]

But concerning the TRANSLATIONS (Traductionibus) of the New Testament — which it is agreed was written in Greek, but sometimes with Hebrew phrases — we cannot know their certain number. Yet that they were many, Jerome indicates in the Preface to the four Gospels; but among others he intimates that there was a certain old edition, vulgate in the Church long before himself, which — when, by dozing copyists, in the progress of times, it had become corrupt — Jerome, at the command of Pope Damasus (a collation of many Greek exemplars being made), corrected, emended, and restored to the Greek verity. Which castigation of Jerome — or rather edition — the Roman Church, from the times of the blessed Jerome down to this day, has perpetually used. So many, then, down to this age, have been the editions in the Church, both of the Old and of the New Testament.

Of whose number the Latin and Greek churches — all other editions being omitted — have hitherto received only five into authority: namely, in the New Testament two, the old and the new; and in the Old Testament three, namely, one only Greek, of the Seventy interpreters, and two Latin, that is, the Old and the New. Of the Septuagint edition alone being received by the Church, Eusebius (book 6 of the Ecclesiastical History) is witness; and Augustine, On the City of God, book 18, writes on the same matter in this manner: "For (Nam) although there were also other interpreters, who translated those sacred oracles from the Hebrew tongue into Greek — as Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion; as also is that interpretation whose author does not appear, and for this [reason is] without the name of an interpreter, [and] is called the Fifth edition — nevertheless the Church so receives this [one], which is [that] of the Seventy, as though it were the only one; and the Greek Christian peoples use [it], most of whom are ignorant whether there be another." These [things] Augustine. But of the Latin translations, it is agreed that only two were received by the Church: [2] first, that Vulgate edition, published in Latin not from the Hebrew origin, but from the translation of the Septuagint — which alone the Latin Church used down to the times of Augustine and Jerome (as Augustine himself testifies in the place already cited), and which (as we already said) Gregory writes, in the preface to the Morals, was in use in the Roman Church down to his own times. After which old and Vulgate edition, the Church began to have (as was said above) the new translation of Jerome, taken from the Hebrew verity; and received also the new castigation of the same [Jerome] into the New Testament, as appears from the third epistle of Augustine to Jerome. And with only these editions, down to the present day, has the Catholic Church publicly used — as authentic, true, and worthy of the highest faith — in the divine mysteries, and sacred sermons, and readings, in confirming the dogmas of our faith, and in refuting the heretics. But the rest the fathers used, not publicly, nor as authentic, but as extraneous, for their particular uses: namely, that from their collation they might understand the Septuagint interpretation more clearly, and that from the comparison of the Septuagint with the other editions they might refute the falsity of those. [3] And for this cause (as Philastrius and Epiphanius hand down) editions of this kind were never placed in the Hexapla in the middle column, but were assigned to the right and the left, so that — placed on this side and on that, as contrary, and not of full truth — they might be shown [to differ] from the true edition of the Seventy Interpreters, which was placed in the middle. All these translations, therefore, being passed over — which the Church either rejects as heretical, or, as suspect and corrupt, does not accept — let us see only how much authority and faith the aforesaid five translations had in the Church, and what the catholic fathers thought of each of them; that, from the gravity of their judgment, we may cast down the arrogance of those who boast that no entire and certain translation of the divine scripture has hitherto been in the Church.

Concerning the integrity, then, and faith of the Septuagint edition, there are so many and so great testimonies of the fathers, that time would fail me if I should wish to review them. Yet all agree in this: that it is to be preferred to the rest chiefly for three causes. First, because it is the most ancient of all editions. Then, because it was published by divine light, and not by human genius, by the seventy-two men full of the Holy Spirit: [4] since (as Justin Martyr writes, in the Admonition to the Gentiles, and Irenaeus in the third book) King Ptolemy — fearing lest the Seventy interpreters should not interpret fully and ingenuously the truth inserted in the divine volumes, but should of set purpose conceal some [things] — separated them each from the other, and commanded [them], placed apart, to interpret the same [texts]. But it was done by divine will that all wrote with the same words, the same names, and sentences, from the beginning even to the end — so that the king, and the gentiles themselves, manifestly recognized that those divine scriptures had been interpreted, not by human, but by divine nod and counsel. But Epiphanius, in the little book On Weights and Measures, more fully describing the number, situation, and form of the cells of the twenty-two [so printed; the seventy-two] interpreters, [5]

[1] [Augustine, City of God 18] ch. 43 (cap. 43).
[2] ch. 1 (cap. 1); ch. 43 (cap. 43).
[3] Isidore, book 6 of the Etymologies, ch. 5 (Isi. lib. 6. et[ym.] cap. 5).
[4] Jerome in the preface to Isaiah (Hie. in praef. Esaiae).
[5] ch. 24 (of Irenaeus, book 3) (cap. 24).

(printed p. 667 [PDF p. 672] — Heresy XIII (translations): the Septuagint's inspiration (the separate cells) and pre-eminence (patristic testimony, apostolic use); the Old Latin's authority (Augustine, Gregory); Jerome's new version defended in his own and others' words (the Psalter preface, the Helmeted Prologue, Augustine, Isidore); the New-Testament editions; then the Objections of the Heretics begin.)

but it was done by divine will that all wrote with the same words, the same names and sentences, from the beginning even to the end — so that the king, and the gentiles themselves, manifestly recognized that those divine scriptures had been interpreted, not by human, but by divine nod and counsel. But Epiphanius, in the little book On Weights and Measures, more fully describing the number, situation, and form of the cells, recounts that the twenty-two [so printed; the seventy-two] volumes of the Old Testament were translated by them, and that in diverse, separate cells — the traces of which the martyr Justin left written that he saw on the island of Pharos, in the Admonition. With whose opinion Philastrius in the catalogue, Rufinus against Jerome, and Augustine agree. The third cause why this edition is preferred to the others is, that the Apostles and Evangelists took testimonies from it, as from a true and faithful interpretation. And after them the whole Church, down to Pope Damasus, always held it in the highest veneration — as the most frequent testimonies of the most ancient fathers testify. Origen, in the epistle to Julius Africanus, attributed so much to this one alone, that he said that only that is to be held for true in the sacred scriptures which the Seventy interpreters translated. [1] And Augustine, in the eighteenth book On the City of God: "The CHURCH (Ecclesia) of Christ," he says, "judges that no one is to be preferred to the authority of so many men, chosen by Eleazar

(the then pontiff) for this so great work: for — even if there had not appeared in them one, without doubt, divine Spirit, but the Seventy, learned [men], had, after the manner of men, conferred among themselves the words of their interpretation, that what had pleased all might remain — no old interpreter ought to be preferred to them." Jerome too, in many places, and especially in the preface to Paralipomenon, asserts that the Seventy interpreters were men full of the Holy Spirit, and wrote by the authority of the Holy Spirit. I pass over other innumerable testimonies of the fathers, lest I inflict tedium on the readers.

But concerning the Latin edition of the Old Testament — which was formerly called the "old and vulgate" — Augustine, in the book already cited, testifies that it was, among the Latin churches, in such authority and reverence, that it was preferred to all other editions. And Gregory, in the preface to the Morals (as we mentioned above), testified that even in his own times it was, in the Roman Church, in the highest veneration — writing these words in the twentieth book of the Morals: "But nevertheless (Sed tamen), because this new translation is reported to have transfused for us all things more truly from the Hebrew, whatsoever is said in it is to be believed; and it behooves that our exposition search out its words more subtly." [2]

But concerning the Latin edition of the Old Testament made by Jerome — how faithful, certain, true, lucid, and exact it was — Jerome himself indicates. To whom, since he adduces the reason of his opinion as a pledge, it is fitting that we believe. For thus he speaks of himself in the preface to the Psalter, to Sophronius: "CERTAINLY (Certe) I will say confidently, and I will cite many witnesses of this work, that I have changed nothing at all of the sentence [sense] from the Hebrew verity. If, therefore, anywhere my edition shall discrepate from the old ones, ask any of the Hebrews, and you will clearly foresee that I am torn in vain by rivals — who prefer to seem to contemn illustrious things rather than to learn [them]." And in the Helmeted Prologue he similarly says: "To myself (Mihi) I am not at all conscious of having changed anything of the Hebrew verity. Certainly, if you are incredulous, read the Greek and Latin codices, and compare [them] with these little works which we lately emended; and wherever you see [them] to discrepate among themselves, ask any of the Hebrews to whom you ought rather to accommodate faith; and if he confirm ours, I think that you will not esteem him a conjecturer — as [though] to have divined, in the same place, equally with me." [3] But if the heretics will not believe the divine Jerome, bearing testimony as of himself, let them hear Augustine, who, in the 18th [book] On the City of God, thus says of Jerome's version: "There was not lacking (Non defuit) in our times the presbyter Jerome, a most learned man, and most skilled in the three tongues, who translated the divine scriptures into Latin, not from the Greek, but from the Hebrew; whose so great labor of letters the Hebrews confess to be truthful." Isidore, agreeing with Augustine: "The presbyter (Presbyter) Jerome," he says, "most skilled in the three tongues, translated the divine scriptures eloquently from the Hebrew into the Latin speech, which he transfused: whose interpretation is deservedly preferred to the rest, for it is more tenacious of the words, and clearer in perspicuity of sentence, and — as being a Christian interpretation — truer." To which testimonies of the fathers the Greeks too gave [their] consent — [Greeks] who, while Jerome was yet living, turned his edition from Latin into Greek, as the same Jerome writes in his first Apology against Rufinus.

As to the two Latin editions of the New Testament: the common assent of the ancient fathers, from the beginning of the nascent Church down to Pope Damasus, approved [the old one] by long use. But that the new edition, or castigation, of Jerome was received by the Church with the greatest favor — even while he yet lived — Augustine indicates, in the third epistle to Jerome, in these words: "ACCORDINGLY (Proinde), we give no small thanks to God for thy work, that thou hast interpreted the Gospel from Greek into Latin; because in almost all [things] there is no offense, when we have collated the Greek scripture. Whence, if any one shall be contentious of the old falsity, the codices being brought forth and collated, he is either most easily taught, or refuted. And if certain very rare [things] deservedly move [him], who is so hard that he would not easily pardon a labor so useful, to which it does not suffice to render a reward of praise [in turn]?" From these [things], therefore, it is concluded: either that these translations — received by the Church with such veneration, and celebrated by all the fathers — were true and faithful; or, if they were not such, that the Church of God (which believed them to be such as, in reality, they were not) was gravely deceived through so many centuries of years, and basely deluded. Which no one will ever be able even to conceive in mind, unless [he be] utterly destitute of the ecclesiastical spirit, and wholly addicted to the Lutherans, Sacramentarians, Anabaptists, Servetans, and the rest of the pests of this kind. But now let us pass to their contentions [objections].

OBIECTIONES HAERETICORVM [The Objections of the Heretics]

1. The purpose (Pro-[positum])

[1] [Augustine,] book 18 of the City of God, ch. 43 (Li. 18. de Ci[vit.] Dei, cap. 43); Eusebius, book 6 of the [Ecclesiastical] History, ch. 33 (Euseb. lib. 6. hist. cap. 33).

[2] ch. 43 (cap. 43); ch. 13 (cap. 13).

[3] ch. 43 (cap. 43); [Isidore,] book 6 of the Etymologies, ch. 5 (Lib. 6. etym. Cap. 5).

(printed p. 668 [PDF p. 673] — Heresy XIII (translations): the Objections of the Heretics — 1: the "Septuagint" is misnamed (the Seventy rendered only the Pentateuch) and was not inspired (Jerome: interpreters, not prophets); 2: it omits many Hebrew passages (the NT-quoted messianic texts absent from it); 3: it adds words not in the Hebrew (Gen 3, Sodom, Ps 22:1, Deut 21/27) — and small additions breed grave heresies.)

1. The purpose (Propositum) of our disputation is to show that the churches of the Latins and Greeks, before the editions of the more recent interpreters were put forth, had no interpretation of the divine scriptures which was not deformed by almost infinite faults and errors. Beginning, therefore, according to the series of times, from that first version of the whole Old Instrument [Testament] — falsely called by the name of "the Seventy interpreters" — we shall detect all its faults, if first we admonish our adversaries that this edition was falsely ascribed to the Seventy interpreters, and [that] it was wrongly believed that it was composed by them by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. For Aristeas, the satellite [attendant] of Ptolemy, in the book On the Seventy Interpreters, and Philo the Jew in his Chronography, and Josephus in the preface to the Hebrew Antiquities and in the twelfth book of the same work, and the author of the book Seder Olam the Lesser, and all the Rabbis of the Hebrews who have made any mention of the Seventy — all these report that the Seventy interpreters, at Ptolemy's exhortation, translated only the five books of Moses, no enumeration being made of the other books of divine scripture. With whom Jerome too agrees in almost innumerable places, but especially in the commentaries on Micah, ch. 2, where he thus says: "The INTERPRETATION (Interpretatio) of the Seventy — if, however, it be [that] of the Seventy: for Josephus writes, and the Hebrews hand down, that only the five books of the law of Moses were translated by them, and delivered to King Ptolemy." And in the preface to the Hebrew Questions, the same thus writes: "There accedes to this also, that Josephus — who sets forth the history of the Seventy interpreters — relates that only the five books of Moses were translated; which we too confess to consonate [agree] with the Hebrew more than the rest." All which [things] show that this edition, which is had for the whole Old Testament, is not [that] of the Seventy interpreters, but of some other translator of uncertain name and authority. But of whatsoever [translator] it be — even if it were of the Seventy interpreters — Jerome abundantly testifies that the translation which is believed [to be that] of the Seventy was not published through the [Holy] Spirit; and that the Seventy wrote, not as [men] inspired by the divine Spirit, but as men, who in many things could err, and [did] err. And thus Jerome speaks of them, in the preface to the Pentateuch: "I know NOT (Nescio) who first, by his own lie, built the seventy cells of Alexandria, divided into which they wrote the same [texts] — whereas Aristeas, the ὑπασπιστής (hyparaspistes — shield-bearer, bodyguard*)* of the same Ptolemy, and, long after in time, Josephus, related nothing such, but write that, gathered together in a basilica, they conferred [compared], [and did] not prophesy. For it is one thing to be a seer [vates], another to be an interpreter: there the [Holy] Spirit predicts future things; here erudition, and copiousness of words, transfers those [things] which it understands. Unless, perhaps, Tully [Cicero] is to be thought to have translated the Economics of Xenophon, and the Protagoras of Plato, and the [oration] of Demosthenes For Ctesiphon, inspired by a rhetorical spirit." [1]

2. But that this edition is stuffed with many errors, not only the Jews themselves affirm (as Augustine noted in the eighteenth [book] On the City of God), but many illustrious [men] of the Christians confirm — and the edition itself most manifestly betrays its own errors. For, since the office of the best interpreter is to take nothing away from the author's meaning, to super-add nothing of his own, to change nothing either into an ambiguous or a contrary sense — in all these [respects] the Seventy are found to have failed. And first, how many places from the Hebrew codices they passed over, Jerome indicates in almost all the prefaces of the sacred books, but especially in the preface to the Pentateuch, in which, enumerating some of those [things] which the Seventy omitted, he says: "We read MANY (Multa) [things] of the Old Testament which are not had in ours — that is, in the codices of the Seventy interpreters. As that: 'Out of Egypt I called my son'; and, 'Because (Quoniam) he shall be called a Nazarene'; and, 'They shall SEE (Videbunt) [him] into whom they have transfixed [pierced]'; and, 'Rivers (Flumina) of living water shall flow from his belly'; and, 'Which (Quae) neither eye hath seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it ascended into the heart of man, [the things] which God hath prepared for them that love him'; and many others, which require [their] proper composition [σύνταγμα (syntagma)] — of which the first is placed in Osee [Hosea], the second in Isaiah, the third in Zechariah, the fourth in Proverbs, the fifth likewise in Isaiah — of whose error it is not mine to expound the causes." [2] And a little after, accusing them that of set purpose they passed over all [the things] which they had found, in the sacred letters, concerning the holy mysteries of the Trinity, he thus adds: "FINALLY (Denique), wherever the scripture testifies anything sacred concerning the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, either they interpreted [it] otherwise, or were altogether silent."

3. But how many [things] they super-added of their own, which are not had in the Hebrew codices, the same Jerome — in the book of Hebrew Questions, and in the epistle to Sunias and Fretela, and in the book On the Best Kind of Interpreting — plucking a few from almost infinite places, noted. As that in the third [chapter] of Genesis, where in the Hebrew it is written, "Upon thy breast shalt thou go," they added, "AND [thy] BELLY (Et ventrem)," which the Hebrew codex has not; and [in] Genesis ch. 13, for that which the Hebrews read, "that (Ut) the men of Sodom were evil, and sinners exceedingly," they apposed, "IN the sight (In conspectu) of God" — which, as superfluously added, Jerome damns: because the Sodomites were not only evil in the sight of God, but also in the sight of men. And whereas at the beginning of the twenty-first psalm [Ps 22] there is written only אלי אלי למה עזבתני (Eli, eli, lama azavtani — printed "hazabathani"), which is interpreted, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" — they interposed two other words, namely, "LOOK UPON ME (Respice in me)." And for that which is read in Deuteronomy 21, "Cursed (Maledictus) by God [is he] who hangeth on a tree," they — as Jerome notes in the third [chapter] to the Galatians — added, "EVERYONE (Omnis) who hangeth on a tree." [And] in Deuteronomy 27, where it is written, "CURSED (Maledictus) [is he] who shall not have remained in the words which are written in the book of the law," three particles being added, they turned [it]: "CURSED (Maledictus) [is] EVERY MAN who shall not have remained in ALL the words which are written in the book of the law." And lest any one should esteem additions of this kind to be of light moment, let him know that from these additions — however small — very often the gravest heresies have arisen: as can be shown by the example of the Manichaeans, who, from this last universal particle "EVERY (Omnis)" — which the Seventy added to the testimony of Moses

[1] ch. 43 (cap. 43).

[2] Hosea 11 and Matthew 2 (Ose. 11 & Mat. 2); Isaiah 2 and Matthew 2 (Esa. 2 & Mat. 2); Zechariah 13 (Zach. 13); John 19 (Ioan. 19); Proverbs 18 (Prou. 18); John 7 (Ioan. 7); Isaiah 64 (Esa. 64); 1 Corinthians 2 (1. Cor. 2).

(printed p. 669 [PDF p. 674] — Heresy XIII (translations): the Objections of the Heretics continued — 3 (concl.): the Manichaeans abuse the added "Omnis" to blaspheme Moses; 4: the LXX translated things in a contrary sense (Gen 26 the well "saturity" vs "oath"; Ps 18 "for the sun" vs "in the sun he set his tabernacle" — which made the Manichaeans adore the sun); 5: from ignorance of proper speech it rendered things into an alien sense (Gen 30 marked/unmarked flocks; Gen 31 "ten times" -> "ten lambs"; Gen 35 "chibrath" -> "hippodrome"); 6: one argument suffices — Jerome's very labor proves the version's imperfection; 7: the Old Latin, an impure rivulet from an impure fount, is contaminated with all faults (Jerome on Joshua, Job, Esther, Daniel).)

3. [from this last universal particle "Every," which the Seventy added to the testimony of Moses, saying, "CURSED (Maledictus) [is] EVERYONE who hangeth on a tree,"] took occasion of calumniating and rejecting Moses, calling him (as Augustine writes in the sixteenth book against Faustus) now sacrilegious, now a blasphemer: because he had shut up [included] Christ, the Apostles, and the martyrs hanging on a tree, all under one and the same universal curse.

4. But of those [things] which the Seventy translated in a contrary sense (contrario sensu), Jerome too enumerates not a few in the places above mentioned. As in Genesis 26, for that which, according to the Hebrew verity, is read: "THERE CAME (Venerunt), in that very day, the servants of Isaac, announcing concerning the well which they had digged, and saying: We have found water: whence its name was called Saturity [Satiety]" — the Seventy turned [it] utterly from the opposite: "AND (Et) the boys of Isaac came, and announced to him concerning the well which they had digged, and said to him: We have not found water; whence its name was called Oath [iuramentum]." Which to be falsely translated, Jerome shows from the very etymology of the name: "FOR what (Quae enim) etymology is [there]," saith he, "that it should for this cause be called 'Oath,' because they had not found water? — whereas the contrary also is done [stated] in the Hebrew, and Aquila and Symmachus in translating have agreed, that they found water, and that for this cause the well was named: [namely,] 'Saturity,' or 'Abundance.'" And in the eighteenth Psalm, for that which is read in the Hebrew, "For the sun (Soli) he set a tabernacle in them" — that is, that God gave to the Sun in heaven a dwelling and a bridal-chamber, out of which, as a bridegroom, it should proceed in the early morning — the Seventy turned [it] in a contrary sense: [namely,] not that the sun was placed in a tabernacle, but that a tabernacle was placed in the sun, saying, ἐν τῷ ἡλίῳ ἔθετο τὸ σκήνωμα αὐτοῦ (en to helio etheto to skenoma autou), that is, "IN (In) the sun he set his tabernacle." Which bred an occasion to the Manichaeans, that they should adore the sun; because from these words they had esteemed that Christ, after he ascended into heaven, had constituted for himself a dwelling in the sun, and thenceforth had dwelt in it as in [his] own tabernacle: for thus Augustine writes of the Manichaeans, in the twentieth book against Faustus.

5. There are MANY (Multa) [things] also which, from ignorance of the proper speech [idiom], seem to have been translated by the Seventy wrongly, and into an alien and diverse sense. Some examples of which Jerome adduced in the places already said. As in Genesis 30, where concerning the flocks of Jacob and Laban it is had in the Hebrew, "MADE (Facta) were those [things] which were of the late season Laban's, and those of the first time Jacob's" — the Seventy, the Hebrew words not being understood, turned [it], Ἐγένετο δὲ τὰ ἄσημα τοῦ Λαβάν, τὰ δὲ ἐπίσημα τοῦ Ἰακώβ (Egeneto de ta asema tou Laban, ta de episema tou Iakob), that is, "MADE (Facta) were, however, the un-notable [unmarked] Laban's, but the notable [marked] Jacob's": which Jerome, in the book of Hebrew Questions, says pertains nothing to the sense [makes no difference to the meaning]. Likewise in Genesis 31, for that which is in the Hebrew, "HE CHANGED (Mutavit) my wage ten times [decem vicibus]" — the Seventy, deceived by unskillfulness of the proper word, turned [it] τῷ δέκα ἀρνῶν (... deka arnon), that is, "[with] ten lambs [decem agnis]": whence Jerome, refuting them in the Hebrew Questions: "I know NOT (Nescio)," saith he, "by what opinion the Seventy, led [astray], put the Hebrew word מנים (monim) [as] 'ten lambs' — whereas it signifies rather a number than lambs: and finally, from the consequents [context] too the sense of number is the more proved.

But Aquila also translated δέκα ἀριθμοὺς (deka arithmous — ten in number*)*; Symmachus indeed translated δεκάκις ἀριθμῷ (dekakis arithmo — tenfold, in number*)* — each of them consenting with Jerome concerning the number." Likewise in Genesis 35, for that which is read, "GOING FORTH (Egressus) thence, however, he came [a] כברת (chibratha)" — that is, according to Jerome, "in the vernal time [springtime]," or (as others expound) "as it were a stadium [furlong]" — the Seventy, not holding the propriety of the word, turned [it], "IN (In) the hippodrome"; which Jerome, in the aforesaid book, marvelling at: "I know NOT (Nescio)," saith he, "meaning what, the Seventy translated 'hippodrome,' since 'chibrath' cannot be a hippodrome." These [things], out of the innumerable errors of this edition, let them be [a] few collected for example's sake.

6. Although for all these [purposes] one single argument might suffice to show the utmost imperfection of this translation — namely, that unless grave and frequent lapses had been in it, in vain would Jerome have expended so much of labor and of vigils [wakeful nights], to publish a new translation from the Hebrew fount, and to furnish it to the Church to be read. Neither would the Church have received the edition of Jerome, so diverse from the interpretation of the Seventy, unless both Jerome and the Church had perceived that the translation of the Seventy departed much from the Hebrew verity, and in very many [places] erred not lightly. Let these [things be said] concerning the first version, of the Seventy interpreters.

7. But concerning the Latin (Latina) edition of the Old Testament — which they call the Old [Vetus] — it cannot be denied but that it was contaminated with all faults. For if the Greek edition of the Seventy interpreters abounded in so many depravations — whence [as its source] the Old Latin edition, as an impure rivulet from an impure fount, flowed forth — it is necessary that the Latin version too was deformed with much graver blemishes and errors: as also Jerome almost everywhere testifies, now cutting it back as superfluous and redundant, now supplying it as curtailed and amputated, now correcting and emending it as depraved, and in almost all the prefaces of the divine books always indicating its diverse faults. As in the preface of the book of Joshua, concerning the exemplars [copies] of the Old Latin edition, he complains in these words: "AMONG (Apud) the Latins," saith he, "there are as many exemplars as codices, and each one has added, or subtracted, at his own pleasure, what seemed [good] to him; and assuredly that cannot be true which is dissonant." And in the prefaces of the book of Job he complains that in the Vulgate edition the whole book of Job is torn and truncated, and that there are lacking in it above eight hundred verses; and that truly, among the Latins, that book, gnawed by the worms of errors, lies in the dung. But on the contrary, in the preface of the books of Esther and of Daniel, he damns the Old Vulgate edition, because it handles the sacred histories with ragged [tattered] endings of words, adding those [things] which can be said and heard extempore — as is wont to be done in the schools by those who, with feigned arguments, exercise themselves in writing history, excogitating what could have been said according to place, time, and persons: as was done in the book of Esther, in which six chapters are apposed [added] beyond the Hebrew verity; and in the book of Daniel, in which the judgment of Susanna, and the fables of Bel and of the Dragon, are added, outside the sum of the Hebrew narration.

(printed p. 670 [PDF p. 675] — Heresy XIII (translations): the Objections continued — 8: the "Old" Latin now in church use is not really Jerome's (it keeps none of his emendations — Gen 4 "he had regard" vs Theodotion's "he kindled"; Gen 4 "let us go forth"; Ps 2 "lay hold" vs "adore purely"; Ps 126 "sons of the shakers" vs "sons of youth"); it is Theodotion's or Aquila's or Symmachus's, sold under Jerome's prefaces — and even Jerome's own version was faulted by Palladius, Augustine, Rufinus, and Lyra, and Jerome confessed his own errors (Isa 19, Jer 6); 9: whosesoever it is, the Vulgate teems with errors in proper names (Gen 2 bdellium, Gen 12 Moreh, Gen 27 "prudently"->"fraudulently," Gen 33 "a hundred coins"->"a hundred lambs"), transmutes place and time (Gen 35 "a stretch of land"->"in springtime"), swaps deeds (Gen 36 "mules"->"hot waters"), and gives contrary, ill-sounding senses (Gen 6 "shall not judge"->"shall not remain").)

8. Concerning the edition (editione) of the Old Testament which is believed to be Jerome's, this one [thing] first of all is certainly agreed: that it is not Jerome's — Jerome himself being witness; who, in the preface of the book of Kings, speaking of his own edition, says that he changed nothing of the Hebrew verity. Which, assuredly, in the Vulgate edition of the Old Testament — which the Church now uses — we do not see to have been observed: since in it there are so many [things] which dissent from the Hebrew verity. To which this also accedes: that, out of so innumerable places which Jerome commemorates that he either emended, or turned otherwise, or judged ought to be read otherwise than they are now read, there is found in this our edition no place at all which corresponds either to Jerome's castigation or at least to his judgment. Which will clearly appear, if we compare some places of our edition with those concerning which Jerome, in the book of Hebrew Questions, indicated his opinion. And first, in Genesis 3 [4], where our edition has: "HE HAD REGARD (Respexit), God, to Abel and to his gifts; but to Cain and to his gifts he had not regard" — Jerome, according to the interpretation of Theodotion, thought it ought to be read: "AND (Et) the Lord kindled [fire] upon Abel and upon his sacrifice, but upon Cain and upon his sacrifice he did not kindle [it]"; adding that this interpretation is most true, because Cain could not otherwise have known that God had accepted his brother's gifts and repudiated his own, unless he had kindled his brother's sacrifice according to Theodotion — fire being wont to come from heaven for devouring the sacrifice, as is read in the dedication of the temple under Solomon, and when Elijah built an altar on Mount Carmel. Likewise concerning that which our edition has in Genesis 3 [4]: "LET US GO FORTH (Egrediamur) abroad," or "into the field" — Jerome thus writes: "And Cain said to Abel his brother" — [there] is understood, "those [things] which the Lord had spoken." It is superfluous, therefore, that in the volume of the Samaritans, and in ours, there is read: "LET US GO FORTH (Egrediamur) abroad," etc. Likewise in the second Psalm, for that which we now read, "LAY HOLD OF (Apprehendite) discipline" — Jerome, in the Apology against Rufinus, testifies that he turned [it]: "ADORE (Adorate) purely." And in the exposition of Psalm 126, to Marcella, for that which we now read in that psalm, "THE SONS (Filii) of the shakers-out [excussorum]" — he says that he translated: "THE SONS (Filios) of youth [iuventutis]," as Theodotion had done: because in the Hebrew it is had, כן בני הנעורים (chen bene hannehurim — "so [are] the sons of youth"). From which places, and from many others of this kind, it is manifest that this edition is not Jerome's. Which both Paul, bishop of Fossombrone [Forosemproniensis] (not to adduce meanwhile Münster and Luther), and very many others skilled in Hebrew letters affirm — esteeming that this our edition is either Theodotion's, or Aquila's, or Symmachus's, which an interpreter of uncertain name turned into Latin, and — Jerome's prefaces being appended [to it] — hawked [venditarit] it for Jerome's edition. And yet neither was Jerome's own edition (whatsoever it may have been) so perfect in every part that it could avoid just reprehension. For — to pass over Palladius the Galatian, who first of all reprehended it in so many places — Augustine, in the first epistle to Jerome, not only does not approve Jerome's edition, but damns Jerome's zeal in translating the Old Testament as superfluous, and exhorts him to desist from translating the Hebrew scriptures as from a rash undertaking. Rufinus too, in the second book against Jerome, thinks Jerome's edition much worse than the Seventy's, and accuses it of many crimes. Nicholas of Lyra likewise shows Jerome reprehensible in his translation — both elsewhere in many places, and especially in the forty-seventh Psalm, where at the close of it he thus says: "JEROME (Hieronimus), nevertheless, seems to say less well [rightly], because in all the Hebrew bibles which I have seen, עלמות (halmuth) here is one word [una dictio] — but why [dwell] on more [instances]?" Jerome himself, in his translation, confesses that he himself erred — in the commentaries upon Isaiah, chapter nineteen, where he thus says: "I think it BETTER (Melius) to reprehend my own error, than, while I blush to confess unskillfulness, to persist in error — [namely] in that which I translated, 'AND the land of Judah shall be to Egypt for a festivity.'" And in Jeremiah, chapter six, he did not deny that he was ignorant of the signification of certain words.

9. But of whatsoever [authorship] this Vulgate edition be, it is manifest that it stands far from the Hebrew verity, and everywhere teems with innumerable blemishes — the names of places, cities, men, animals, and plants being frequently varied [altered]. As in Genesis 2, for that which is had, הבדלח (habbedolach), our edition has "bdellium" — whereas that signifies to the Hebrews, not bdellium, but a precious stone, on the testimony of Jerome, and also of Lyra. And for that which is put in our edition, "UNTO (Ad) the place [of] Shechem, even to the illustrious valley," the Hebrew has אלון מורה (elon moreh) — that is, "the plain [planitiem] of Moreh"; for according to the Gerundensian [Nachmanides of Gerona] it is a man's name. And [in] Genesis 27, for that which in the Hebrew is במרמה (bemirmah) — which according to Lyra signifies "PRUDENTLY (Prudenter)" — our edition has "FRAUDULENTLY (Fraudulenter)." And [in] Genesis 33, for קשיטה במאה (bemeah kesitah) — that is, "for a hundred coins [nummis], or oboli" — our [edition] has "for a hundred LAMBS (agnis)." Sometimes also it transmutes places into times, and times into places: as in Genesis 35, where these words are written to the letter [literally]: ויסעו מבית אל ויהי עוד כברת הארץ לבוא אפרתה (va isehu mibeth el, ve iehi hod chibrata ha arez labo ephratha — with printer's slips for vayyis'u mibbeth-el vay'hi 'od kibrath ha-arets lavo ephratha), *that is, "And they set forth from Bethel, and there was yet as it were a stadium [furlong] of land to come to Ephratha" — for which our edition thus reads: "GOING FORTH (Egressus), however, thence, he came, in the vernal time, to the land which leads to Ephratha." Sometimes it puts other deeds to have been done for others: as when, in Genesis 36, the scripture says that Anah found הימים (ha iemim) — that is, a new generation of mules — in the desert, our translation puts "hot waters," which are nowhere found in that desert. Sometimes it puts senses altogether contrary to those which are had in the Hebrew, and ill-sounding in the faith: as in Genesis 6, for that which is read, לא ינון רוחי באדם לעלם (lo iadon ruchi baadam leolam), *that is, "MY SPIRIT shall NOT (Non) *judge in man for ever" — our edition has: "MY SPIRIT shall NOT (Non) *remain [permanebit] [in man for ever]." Which interpretation Jero-

---

(printed p. 671 [PDF p. 676] — Heresy XIII (translations): the Objections concluded — 9 (concl.): Gen 6 "shall not remain" makes God bloodthirsty, whereas the Hebrew "shall not judge" sounds His clemency; 10: the New-Testament editions — the old one Jerome (pref. to Damasus) judged unworthy of trust, the new one (denied to be Jerome's) is riddled with the errors Erasmus catalogued in his seven indices; conclusion: the Church has hitherto had no whole and sincere translation. Then the refutation begins — DISSOLVTIO OBIECTORVM — answer 1: against objection 1, the Seventy did translate the whole Old Testament (Jerome, Eusebius's Evangelical Preparation, Epiphanius, Origen, Philo, and the whole chorus of fathers), and translated by the Holy Spirit's afflatus, though not as prophesying seers; answer 2 begins.)

9. [Which interpretation ("My spirit shall not remain")] Jerome, in the book of Hebrew Questions, damns as cruel, because it makes God bloodthirsty and truculent: whereas rather that sentence, as it is had in the Hebrew, sounds the clemency of God. For he saith: "MY SPIRIT shall NOT (Non) judge in man for ever, because he is flesh" — that is, "because the condition in man is fragile, I will not keep them for eternal torments, but will here restore to them those [things] which they merit." Therefore [it sounds] not severity, as it is read in our codices (saith Jerome), but the clemency of God — while the sinner is here visited for his own wickedness, lest in another age he be damned for ever. From these, therefore, and from similar places contained in our edition, we gather that the Church, before our times, never had a whole edition of the Old Testament.

10. But what is to be thought concerning the editions of the New (novi) Testament — and especially concerning that which, in Jerome's time and before, was read in the Church — Jerome indicates in the preface to Damasus, esteeming it altogether unworthy that faith should be given to it: because there were as many exemplars of it as codices, and those [were] either badly edited by faulty interpreters, or perversely emended by unskilled presumers, or, by dozing copyists, either added to or changed — in which very many [things] discrepated from the Greek verity, and even from their own selves. But the new edition, which we now use, and which not only Erasmus alone, but also many other learned men, deny to be Jerome's — it would require a proper work [of its own], if we should wish to comprehend its every error. But let those seven indices which the most diligent Erasmus prefixed to his edition suffice for explaining all its errors. In the first of which he digested the inexcusable solecisms admitted through [by] the interpreter. In the second he collected nearly all the obscure places, in which interpreters of great name have lapsed. In the third he set in order the manifestly depraved places. In the fourth, the places redundant in our edition. In the fifth he apposed the places deficient in our edition. In the sixth and seventh he subjoined the places changed by the interpreter, and wrongly inverted. From which anyone will easily recognize with how many blemishes, solecisms, barbarisms, amphibologies, hyperbata, and a thousand other errors our edition of the New Testament is stuffed. It remains, therefore, [to conclude] that the Church of the Christians has hitherto had no whole, faithful, true, and sincere translation of sacred scripture — which indeed we assumed from the beginning [as the thing] to be demonstrated.

DISSOLVTIO OBIECTORVM [The Dissolution of the Objections]

1. Although we know it to be the opinion of almost all the Hebrews that the Seventy interpreters published in Greek only the five books of Moses, we prefer nevertheless to follow the certain and undoubted opinion of all the Christian fathers in this matter, rather than, with the Judaizing heretics, to follow the uncertain opinions of the Jews. But among the fathers, chiefly the divine Jerome affirms that the Seventy translated not only the five books of Moses, but also all the books of the prophets. Which Eusebius had testified long before, in the eighth book of the Evangelical Preparation — in which he also rendered the cause why the books of the prophets ought to have been turned by the Seventy interpreters, thus writing: "WHEN (Cum) now the times of our Saviour seemed to draw more nearly nigh, and it was most conducive to the salvation of all nations to understand whatsoever had been written by the prophets, He set forth the Judaic scripture to all through the Greek tongue — which almost all nations understood. For either we should not have had it after the times of our Saviour, the Jews from envy concealing [it]; or they would have given us more corrupt [copies]; or, if they could rightly be had, the translators would easily be called into suspicion. Our Saviour, therefore, who as God provided all things, instilled the best disposition into Ptolemy king of the Egyptians, that through the Seventy Hebrew interpreters he might translate the books of the prophets." But Epiphanius, in the little book On Weights and Measures, reports that not only the law and the Prophets, but also the rest of the books of the Old Testament — which he even names by name — were translated by them; and Origen before him thought the same, and, long before both, Philo the Jew: with whom the whole chorus of the Greek and Latin fathers consents. [1] Nor does Jerome discrepate anything from their consent — although (as the heretics object to us) he sometimes seemed to dissent; but rather he doubted out of others' mind than out of his own, whether the Seventy had translated the whole Old Testament. For always, in all his commentaries, he confessed that the Seventy interpreters translated the whole Old Testament. Nay, in the commentaries on the Twelve Prophets, as he testifies of himself against Rufinus, he always, together with his own edition, also discussed the Septuagint interpretation under their name. And at last, what he thought of this matter, he opened in the same commentaries in these words: "ALTHOUGH (Quanquam) the learned approve that only the five books of Moses were translated by the Seventy — as Josephus, and the Hebrews [do] — yet we, having followed the authority of the ancients, of Irenaeus, Tertullian, [and] Origen, say that the whole Old Testament was translated by the Seventy." But if, for the most part, Jerome contemns those Septuagint cells as published by an uncertain author, and wrote that the Seventy interpreters were not prophets and seers, but only interpreters — not for that reason does he yet deny that they translated with the Holy Spirit illuminating [them]: nay rather, that they, full of the Holy Spirit, and moved by the authority of the Holy Spirit, translated most truly, he constantly affirms in very many places, and especially in the preface of the book of Paralipomenon [Chronicles]. And although he asserted that they neither prophesied in interpreting, nor had the prophetic Spirit, nowhere nevertheless does he deny that they, imbued with the Holy Spirit, approached the translation of scripture. He denied indeed that they had the Spirit by which, foreseeing future things, they might divine and write [them]; but he did not deny that they had, within, the divine Spirit of understanding, and the afflatus of the interpretation of divine scripture — by the auspice of whose internal light they might convert, from one tongue into another, those [things] which had been written by the prophets. For the spirits of prophecy and of interpretation differ among themselves: this one interprets speeches [words], but that one prophesies things to come.

2. But as for those errors of which the Seventy are accused by the heretics — namely, that they [passed over] many testimonies of the prophets concerning Christ especially (praesertim)

[1] ch. 1 (cap. 1).

(printed p. 672 [PDF p. 677] — Heresy XIII (translations): the Dissolution continued — answer 2 (concl.): the Seventy omitted messianic and Trinitarian texts for three just causes (the mysteries were not yet perspicuous; not to scandalize Ptolemy into thinking the Jews held two Gods; not to cast pearls before swine); answer 3: their additions concern sense, not words — as Mark added "I say to thee" to "Talitha cumi," and the LXX added "look upon me" to Ps 21 for emphasis, and rendered the double sense of Hebrew "al gachon" (breast and belly) at Gen 3:14; the Deut "Omnis" was in the old Hebrew (Jerome found "cal" in the Samaritan volumes) and the Manichaean scandal was their own malice; answer 4 begins: the places seeming to fight the Hebrew are not truly contrary (Augustine, Jerome).)

2. [that they passed over many testimonies of the prophets concerning Christ, and] especially (praesertim) [those] concerning the holy Trinity, in silence — Jerome defends them egregiously in many places, demonstrating that they omitted much concerning the sacraments [mysteries] of Christ, and the mysteries of the holy Trinity, neither negligently nor maliciously, but by a prudent and pious counsel. First, because, since they interpreted before the advent of Christ, they could not know many sacraments of the Christ to come, not yet in those ages fully perceived — God so disposing, that all the mysteries of his divinity should be reserved to be unfolded at the rising of the splendor of the evangelical light of Christ. And so, what they were ignorant of, or did not fully know, they either translated in doubtful and ambiguous sentences, or were altogether silent — willing rather to be well silent about the unknown, than, by speaking, to pronounce ill of those [things] which they knew not. Secondly, lest they should scandalize Ptolemy king of Alexandria, they concealed much concerning the Son of God and concerning his advent; lest perhaps the king, hearing that God had a Son, should have thought that the Jews, according to the dogma of Plato, held a double divine power [numen], and had two Gods — whom he therefore [would have] made much of [reckoned great], because they were said to worship one God. Thirdly, they were silent about many other sacraments also besides these, lest they should betray all the mysteries of their faith to the heathen — esteeming it unworthy, according to the sentence of Christ, to give the holy to dogs, and to cast pearls before swine. For these most just causes, therefore, Jerome hands down that so many [things] were omitted by the Seventy interpreters. [1]

3. But concerning those [things] which were added by the same [interpreters], the divine Jerome, in the book On the Best Kind of Interpreting, shows that in those [places] the words are not to be considered, but the sense — to which the Seventy themselves added nothing of their own, although they adjoined certain words which were not in the Hebrew. But since they noticed that certain Hebrew senses could not so significantly pass into the Greek tongue with an equal number of words preserved, for that cause they sometimes added some diction[s], so that what they could not fully express with an equal number of words, they might — other words being added — express more significantly and more efficaciously. Which the apostles and evangelists also sometimes did: as we read in Mark, who, when he had introduced the Lord saying to the dead girl, "TALITHA CUMI" (printed "THABITHA CVMI"; Mark 5:41), immediately subjoined: "WHICH (Quod) is interpreted, Damsel (I say to thee) arise" — in the interpretation of whose sentence, two words, namely, I SAY TO THEE (Tibi dico), which are not in the Hebrew saying of Christ, he added of his own; and, that he might make the command of the commanding Christ ἐμφατικώτερον (emphatikoteron) — that is, more significant — and might more strongly express the sense of the one calling and commanding. [2]

So too the Seventy, for the sake of emphasis, often added many words of their own: as when, among those words of the twenty-first psalm [Ps 22], "MY GOD, MY GOD, WHY HAST THOU FORSAKEN ME?", they interposed πρόσχες μοι (prosches moi — printed corruptly "πρόσχευσομοι") — that is, "LOOK UPON ME (Respice in me)" — that they might more powerfully and vividly explain the affection of one supplicating and expostulating. And this is the one cause why the Seventy added some [things] of their own. But the other is the equivocation and multiple signification of words, which is wont to happen among the Hebrews more than in the other tongues of other nations — [namely] that one and the same word often signifies many [things]. Whence the Seventy, wishing for the most part to show the multiple signification of some Hebrew word, and seeing that it could not be done by a single word, by apposing several words, interpret several significations of the same word: as they did in Genesis 3, in the place remembered by the heretics — where, since in the Hebrew is written על גחון (al gachon), which signifies as well "upon the belly" as "upon the breast," the Seventy, desiring to express both significations of the word, translated: ἐπὶ τῷ στήθει σου, καὶ τῇ κοιλίᾳ πορεύσῃ (epi to stethei sou, kai te koilia poreuse), that is, "UPON (Super) thy breast, and belly, shalt thou go." Sometimes also it can happen that some [things] in the Hebrew codices — whether by malice, or negligence, or unskillfulness of the scribes — are omitted; which, since afterward they were found in the edition of the Septuagint interpreters (who translated from codices as yet whole), seem to have been apposed by the Seventy above [beyond] the Hebrew verity. As in those two places of Deuteronomy produced by the heretics, Jerome thinks it happened — who speaks thus of these in the commentaries on the Galatians, chapter three: "We hold it UNCERTAIN (Incertum), whether the Seventy added 'EVERY MAN (Omnis homo)' and 'IN ALL (In omnibus)'; or whether it was so in the old Hebrew, and afterward was deleted by the Jews. But into this suspicion that thing goads me: that the word 'EVERY,' and 'IN ALL,' as if necessary to his sense for proving that [statement], that whosoever are of the works of the law are under a curse — the apostle Paul, a man of Hebrew skill, and most learned in the law, would never have produced, unless it were had in the Hebrew volumes. For which cause, re-reading the Hebrew volumes of the Samaritans, I found כל (cal) — which is interpreted 'every,' or 'in all' — to be written, and to concord with the Seventy interpreters. In vain, therefore, did the Jews take it away, lest they should seem to be under a curse if they could not fulfill all [things] which are written: since more ancient letters of another nation also testify that it was there placed." Thus Jerome. But if the Manichaeans were scandalized by that word — esteeming that Moses blasphemed Christ, because he placed him under the universal curse of those who hang on a tree — this scandal was the heretics' [own], taken not from the occasion of the scripture, but from their own malice: as if the apostle Paul also (whom the Manichaeans venerate) had not said that Christ was not only under a curse, but was even made by God sin, and a curse, for us — made, I say, a curse of his own will, not born as [the] sin which man had committed through the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, [and] which he himself, hung [appended] on the tree, might blot out, as Augustine says against Faustus. And let these [things be said] concerning the places super-added by the Septuagint. [3]

4. But concerning the places which among the Septuagint seem to fight with the Hebrew verity, Augustine rightly said, in the eighteenth book On the City of God, chapter forty-four, that there are many [things] among the Septuagint interpreters which — though they be thought to discrepate from the Hebrew verity — if they be well understood, will be found not to be contrary to it; and the divine Jerome [likewise], in the book On the Best Kind of Interpreting: "They DISCREPATE (Discrepant)," he says, "the [translation] of the Septuagint interpreters, and ours; and yet the variety of the speeches [words] concords in the unity of the spirit. Whence it is not (non) to be believed"

[1] Jerome in the preface to the Pentateuch (Hier. in praefat. Pentateuchi).

[2] Mark 9 (Mar. 9) — the phrase "Talitha cumi" stands at Mark 5:41.

[3] Galatians 3 (Gal. 3. b).

(printed p. 673 [PDF p. 678] — Heresy XIII (translations): the Dissolution continued — answer 4 (concl.): the Gen 26 well is not contrary, only a variant reading (the Seventy's codices had לא "lo" = "not," the later ones לו "lo" = "to him," aleph dropped by scribes), and the "oath" etymology stands; the Ps 18 "for the sun / in the sun" difference is the spiritual sense (Christ's tabernacle in the Church), which the Manichaeans abused into sun-worship; answer 5: the alleged blunders (monim, chibrath) are scribal corruptions, not the interpreters' ignorance — Jerome never charged them with unskillfulness (Reuchlin wrongly says he did), and the Greek church's text is now corrected (Gen 35 reads "Chiphratha," not "hippodrome"); answer 6: Jerome's new version was not aimed against the Seventy (his self-defense to Rufinus and the preface to Chronicles).)

4. [Whence it is not to be believed] that the Seventy ever turned anything into a contrary sense. But if they translated that place of Genesis 26 in another sense than the later interpreters did, the cause was that in the codices of their own time they had a diction [reading] contrary to that which Aquila and Symmachus had in their codices. Whereby it came to pass that their interpretation differed from the Septuagint interpretation. For that which the Seventy had in their exemplars — לא (lo), terminating in aleph, which signifies, namely, the negative particle NOT (Non) — the later interpreters, in their codices, perhaps by the carelessness of the scribes, the aleph being omitted, had לו (lo), which signifies the pronoun "to him," or "to it." Whence both the Seventy and the later [interpreters] most aptly translated what they had in their codices: those [the Seventy], according to the negating particle: "THE SERVANTS CAME, AND ANNOUNCED TO HIM; AND SAID: WE HAVE NOT FOUND WATER" (Venerunt servi, et nuntiaverunt ei; et dixerunt: Non invenimus aquam); but these [the later], according to the demonstrative particle: "THE SERVANTS CAME, AND ANNOUNCED TO HIM, AND SAID TO HIM: WE HAVE FOUND WATER" (Venerunt servi, et nuntiaverunt ei, et dixerunt ei: Invenimus aquam). But which of these is the true and genuine sense of that scripture, is not to be very anxiously inquired by us — since neither of them is adverse to the dogmas of our faith, and each can equally be fitted to the history. To me, nevertheless, the Septuagint interpretation seems more fitting, lest the pronoun "to him" be superfluously repeated once and again, without any necessity, when it is said, "the servants came, and announced to him, and said to him" — whereas it would have sufficed to have said once, "they announced to him, and said." Nor does anything hinder [the objection] which they oppose concerning the etymology of the well — namely, that the denomination of "oath" cannot be deduced from waters not found: since neither the Seventy, nor Moses himself, said that the surname "oath" was derived from waters not found, but from the oath which, beside that same well, Isaac struck [swore] together with Abimelech and his friends banqueting with him — as appears a little above from the words of the history itself. Similarly, the place of the eighteenth psalm, if it be rightly weighed as to the mystical understanding, does not fight with the Hebrew verity. For that which, according to the dead letter, is read among the Hebrews: לשמש שם אהל בהם (la scemes sam ohel bahem), that is, "FOR THE SUN (Soli) he set a tabernacle in them" — the Seventy, transferring [it] according to the vivifying spirit, said: ἐν τῷ ἡλίῳ ἔθετο τὸ σκήνωμα αὐτοῦ (en to helio etheto to skenoma autou), that is, "IN (In) the sun he set his tabernacle" — thus, the divine Spirit dictating to them, that by those words might be designated the perpetual sacrament of Christ and of the Church, in which, as in a Sun, that divine Bridegroom, the Son of God (as Augustine, in the exposition of that psalm, says), placed his tabernacle and his perpetual habitation. Which spiritual and mystical sense, if the impious Manichaeans had followed [it], they would by no means have fallen into so great impiety as to exhibit that unique worship — which is owed to the immortal God alone — to a mortal and corruptible star [the sun].

5. But concerning the places which they charge to have been badly translated by the Seventy out of ignorance of the proper tongue, we respond that the Seventy are easily vindicated from that calumny out of the almost infinite places of their edition which — since they are far more obscure and more difficult than these which the detractors have indicated — make it perspicuous that the Seventy, being no less skilled in the Hebrew than in the Greek tongue, could not have erred in turning words so open [plain] as are מנים (monim) and כברת (chibrath). Therefore it is rather to be believed that errors of this kind happened by the fault of the copyists, than by the unskillfulness of the most learned interpreters. To assert which, two causes vehemently induce us. One, that Jerome — who detected all the defects of the Septuagint interpreters — nowhere noted them for unskillfulness [ignorance]. Nor do I know how John Reuchlin, in the third book of the Hebrew Institutions, dared to impute [impinge] upon Jerome that he sometimes damned the Septuagint interpreters for unskillfulness — since this is found in none of Jerome's writings; but only this is found, that the Septuagint edition, corrupted by the fault of the scribes, did not remain in its purity. But the other cause is, that many of those [things] which Jerome adduces out of the Septuagint edition — which he read as vitiated — are now had emended in the Septuagint edition which the Greek Church reads. As [in] that [place] where Jerome marvels that the word "hippodrome" was placed by the Septuagint for the word כברת (chibrath): the Greek edition of the Septuagint themselves, of our time, does not so have [it], but, according to the Hebrew verity, thus: ἐγένετο δὲ ἡνίκα ἤγγισεν εἰς χιφραθά (egeneto de henika engisen eis chiphratha), that is, "IT CAME TO PASS (Factum est) after he had drawn near in Chiphratha." Whence it clearly appears that the Greek codex of Jerome was in many [places] corrupt, and that he himself pronounced [judged] according to that which he had in his codex — not reprehending the Septuagint, but convicting those depravations which had crept into the Septuagint edition by the fault of the corrupters.

6. But that [thing] which they say — that the new labor [version] of Jerome most evidently convicts the Septuagint edition — is an old calumny, formerly also inflicted upon the divine Jerome by his own rivals; which he himself very often refuted throughout the several prefaces of the sacred books, showing that he undertook that labor not against the authority of the Septuagint interpreters, but for many other causes. Whence, against Rufinus (who had objected this same thing to him), he thus says: "I have (Ego) neither spoken anything against the Septuagint interpreters: whom, very many years ago, I gave, most diligently emended, to the studious of my tongue; whom daily I expound in the assembly of the brethren; whose psalms I chant by continual meditation. I should be a fool, to wish, as an old man, to forget what I learned in boyhood. All my treatises are woven with the testimonies of these [the Seventy]; my commentaries on the Twelve Prophets expound both my edition and the Septuagint edition," etc. But the causes which impelled Jerome to this edition [his own] are these. First, that those [things] which in the Septuagint edition had been depraved by the fault of the scribes might be emended out of his interpretation. Which cause he himself indicates, in the preface of Paralipomenon, in these words: "IF (Si) the edition of the Septuagint interpreters had remained pure, and as it was turned by them into Greek, you would, in vain, O Chromatius — most holy and most learned of bishops — impel me to translate the Hebrew volumes into the Latin speech. For that which had once occupied the ears of men, and had strengthened the faith of the nascent Church, it was just to approve by our silence. But now, since, according to the variety of regions, diverse ex-[emplars are carried about]"

(printed p. 644 [PDF p. 679] — Heresy XIII (translations): the Dissolution continued — answer 6 (concl.): Jerome's eight causes for making his new version (to emend scribal corruptions; to restore omitted/obscure passages [Job preface]; to stop Jewish taunts; to curb Greek arrogance [Ezra preface]; to spare the vast cost of buying all the editions; to remove error from the unskilled; to end the discord of the Greek and Latin churches over the divergent recensions of Hesychius, Lucian, and Origen; to aid Latin language-study) — none of them against the Seventy's authority; answer 7: the argument that the Old Latin is corrupt because it flowed from a corrupt Greek fount collapses, since the Greek is shown faultless — and though single codices were corrupt in places, the Church always held the whole and incorrupt text in the totality of its codices, God so protecting them.)

6. [since, according to the variety of regions, diverse] exemplars [are carried about], and that ancient and genuine translation is corrupted and violated, you think it [pertains] to our judgment either to indicate, out of many, what is true, or to fashion a new work upon the old work." Secondly, that he might restore, supply, and illustrate the many [things] which had been omitted by the Seventy, or obscurely translated for the causes already said: as he himself, writing in the preface to Job: "LET my dogs HEAR (Audiant)," he says, "that I labored in this volume, not to reprehend the ancient interpretation, but that those [things] which in it are obscure, or omitted, or certainly depraved by the fault of the scribes, I might make more manifest by our interpretation." Thirdly, lest the Jews should any longer insult the Church of Christ, reproaching [it] that in the Hebrew it is not so had as the Church of Christ and the Septuagint interpreters read [it]; and lest the Jews should any longer have byways of subterfuge, if ever they should be pressed by the Christians in disputation, and be laid low by their own arms; nor would the Christians any longer have need to consult the Rabbis of the Jews, and implore their help, if ever a suit concerning the Hebrew verity should arise. Fourthly, that he might restrain exulting Greece (as he himself says in the preface to Ezra), and repress the proud haughtiness of the Greeks — who so extolled themselves over the Latins as to say that the Latins had nothing of the divine scriptures which they had not received on loan from the Greeks. Fifthly, to avoid the huge expenses of those who — wishing to find the truth from the collation of many exemplars — were compelled, at intolerable cost, to buy the exemplars of the Septuagint interpreters, of Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, Origen, Lucian, [and] Hesychius the presbyter, [and] of the fifth, sixth, and seventh edition, and many others, which could not be procured without great expenditure of money, and by the rich alone. Sixthly, that he might take away the occasion of confusion and error from those who handled the diverse exemplars without skill in Hebrew letters — who, since, out of ignorance of the Hebrew speech, they knew not how to discern which among so many interpreters had spoken more truly, erred the more gravely. Which [thing] Jerome, in the preface to Ezra, testifies happened even to a certain most wise man among the Greeks in his times, who, since he knew not Hebrew, often — leaving the sense of scripture — followed the error of each interpreter. Seventhly, that he might take away the dissension of both the Greek and the Latin churches concerning the edition of the Septuagint interpreters: which [churches], although they publicly handled the same Septuagint interpretation, yet did not (as Jerome writes in the preface to Paralipomenon) have the same exemplars of the same edition, but plainly diverse and mutually fighting [ones]. For Alexandria and Egypt used the edition of the Septuagint interpreters emended by Hesychius, presbyter of the Church of Jerusalem; but Constantinople, even to Antioch, read the same Septuagint edition, yet in other exemplars emended by Lucian the martyr, once presbyter of the Church of Antioch, and afterward bishop of Nicomedia; but the provinces midway between these read the Palestinian codices, which — elaborated by Origen — Eusebius and Pamphilus published. To take away, therefore, so great a [variety] of exemplars, Jerome undertook a new translation from the Hebrew. Eighthly, that he might aid the studies of the Latins in the tongues (as he himself, against Rufinus, is witness), and kindle the minds of his [countrymen] to the love of the holy tongue, and to the handling of the Hebrew exemplars, lest thenceforth we should have need of the help of the unbelieving Hebrews. These causes, therefore, impelled Jerome to the new edition; and the same moved the Latin Church, that, after the old Septuagint edition, they should receive the new interpretation of the divine Jerome. So much hitherto concerning the Septuagint interpreters.

7. From which the argument of those is entirely overturned, who inferred the old translation of the Old Testament among the Latins to be vitiated for this reason, that it had flowed from the vitiated edition of the Septuagint interpreters, as from a vitiated fount. Which [edition], since we have now shown to lack all fault, it cannot be that any fault was derived from it into the old Latin edition. If Jerome detected many errors in it, and corrected [them], not for that reason does it follow that the Latin Church before Jerome had no true and sincere edition of the Old Testament. For although some exemplars were once corrupt, which afterward Jerome corrected, it does not therefore follow that all the codices, however many the Church had, were universally and wholly corrupt. And be it [granted] that all were even corrupt in some [places], yet it cannot come to pass that all at once were depraved in the same places — so that that should remain whole and inviolate in no exemplar which was vitiated in many exemplars. It follows, therefore, that out of several corrupt codices — a collation of them being made with one another, or with the Greek codices — a true and whole translation of any place whatsoever could easily be had by the learned, who conferred exemplars of this kind into one; and really [indeed] was always had by these. We gather, therefore, against the opinion of the heretics, that, although the Church, in the several separate codices, did not have a sincere and whole translation of the Old Testament, nevertheless it never — in all [the codices] at once, and in the exemplars gathered from everywhere — lacked an exact and absolute translation of the Old Testament; but always, in that general universality of the codices, what was corrupt in one and another codex, that same [thing] remained whole and incorrupt in this or in another codex — God so protecting the codices of the scriptures, lest his Church should for any time be defrauded of the truth of the divine reading, but that it might have it [the truth] at least in the whole simultaneous compass of all the codices [together], which it could not have in the several separate codices. Nor does that which Jerome said weaken this our opinion — [namely] that the old Vulgate edition is deficient in many places (as in the book of Job, in which nearly eight hundred verses were lacking), and in very many other places superfluously redundant (as in the book of Esther, and in the book of Daniel). Because, as much as pertains to those [things] which are lacking, it is possible that in the codices which Jerome had seen — and which certain particular churches then used — those eight hundred verses, and also many other [things], were lacking, which nevertheless in the rest of the [codices] of the other church-

---

(printed p. 645 [PDF p. 680] — Heresy XIII (translations): the Dissolution continued — answer 7 (concl.): the "redundant" passages were added extrinsically as apocrypha, marked with obeli and spits, and only later received into the canon; answer 8: the new Vulgate OT, though denied to be Jerome's, is largely his — it keeps his corrections (Gen 13 "in the sight of God" dropped; Gen 35 "springtime" for "hippodrome") and is compounded of his two versions (from the Hebrew, and from the Greek — as the Gallican Psalter shows); his version was praised, not condemned, and Augustine, Rufinus, Palladius faulted only its timing, not its fidelity (Augustine's letter); Jerome's admitted slips (Isa 19 "festivity"->"fear") he himself corrected, and unknown archaic words are no fault, as with Cicero; answer 9 begins: the Vulgate concords with the Hebrew in sense, if not always in words.)

7. [which nevertheless, in the rest of the codices of the other] churches, remained in the exemplars. For both the ancient edition of the book of Job, which Gregory discussed in the Morals, and the Greek edition of the Septuagint interpreters which now is extant, are found to have nothing less than the Hebrew exemplars and Jerome's translation have. But as much as regards those [things] which are superfluous [redundant] in the Vulgate edition, it is manifest that the truth of the translation was never corrupted by these — because they were not put into that common edition as genuine and proper, but were added extrinsically as exoteric and apocryphal, for the supplement of the histories; and — with obeli and spits [veru] slaying [them] — were transfixed [marked], both in the Greek and in the Latin codices. Which [things], afterward, because they seemed piously and holily written and added, merited authority by the succession of time, and were received by the Church into the sacred canon.

8. Concerning the new edition of the Old Testament, which they deny to be Jerome's, we respond that, just as it does not seem to be Jerome's (for the causes adduced by the adversaries), so, for the same causes, it does not seem altogether other than [different from] Jerome's interpretation. For just as they, from many places which in our edition are had otherwise than Jerome emended [them], argue that this edition is not that which Jerome translated from the Hebrew verity, so we too, by the same argument, can show that it is not entirely diverse from that interpretation of the divine Jerome — because in it many places are had just as Jerome testified that he had emended [them]. As [in] that [place] which in the Septuagint interpreters was read: "THE MEN (Viri) of Sodom were evil, and sinners in the sight of God." He himself wished it to be read, as it is now read in our edition, without those two words, "in the sight of God." And [in] Genesis 36 [1], for that which the Seventy had, "GOING FORTH (Egressus) thence, he came into a hippodrome," he says that he set "into the place of a hippodrome" [as] "in the vernal time," as is read in our edition. And lest I wear away time in reviewing similar places of our edition corrected by Jerome, let whosoever will, inspect the Commentaries of Jerome on the prophets, in which he discusses two editions — namely the Septuagint's, and his own translated from the Hebrew verity; and he will see that Jerome's edition discrepates almost nothing from our Vulgate edition. Accordingly it is credible that this our Vulgate edition consists of two editions of Jerome: namely, of that which Jerome published according to the Hebrew verity, and of that which he himself translated from the Greek edition of the Septuagint interpreters. For the divine Jerome testifies that he did both — both in the Apology against Rufinus, and in almost all the Prefaces of the Old Testament. Which the Psalter of our edition also indicates: for that very [Psalter] is not the same which he translated for Sophronius according to the Hebrew verity, but another, which he writes (in the epistle to Sunias and Fretela) that he turned from the Septuagint edition. But howsoever it be, this is certainly most true: that Jerome's edition was never damned [condemned] — either for unskillfulness in the tongues, or for falsity, as these [heretics] feign — but was, in a wonderful manner, praised by Augustine, Gregory, Isidore, and other most illustrious men. But if at some time Palladius the Galatian — envious of Jerome's rival glory (whom Epiphanius, writing to John bishop of Jerusalem, admonished was to be shunned as a heretic) — and likewise Augustine, and Rufinus, and certain others, seemed to accuse this translation of Jerome, it is to be known that they disapproved not the form [manner] of interpreting, and the fidelity, but the occasion, the opportuneness, and the counsel of the translator — because they deemed it unlawful [nefas] to depart from the now-inveterate authority of the Septuagint interpreters, and esteemed that this new edition of Jerome could not be divulged without the greatest perturbation of the churches, and scandal of the faithful. And that he spoke to this sense, Augustine himself declares, when he wrote to Jerome concerning this matter, in these words: "I indeed (Ego sane) would rather that you interpret for us the Greek canonical Scriptures, which are reported [to be established] by the authority of the Septuagint interpreters. For it will be very hard, if your interpretation shall have begun to be read more frequently throughout many churches, that the Latin churches should be dissonant from the Greek — chiefly because the gainsayer is easily convicted, the Greek book being produced, that is, [the book] of a most-known tongue. But if anyone, in that which is translated from the Hebrew, shall be moved by anything unusual, and shall charge the crime of falsity — either scarcely, or never, does one come to the Hebrew testimonies by which the objection may be defended. And if even it be come to them, who would bear that so many Latin and Greek authorities be damned?" By which words it appears that Augustine disapproved in Jerome not the form of interpretation, but the untimely office of translating. But as for that [fact], that Jerome sometimes confesses himself to have lapsed, and even not to have understood certain Hebrew words — this derogates nothing from the authority of his edition, since he himself diligently emended those [things] in which he had recognized that he had erred. As he did in the place adduced by the heretics from Isaiah: in which, when he had badly translated "FESTIVITY (Festivitatem)," afterward, emending the place, he put, for "festivity," "FEAR (Pavorem)." But concerning those words the significations of which he ingenuously confessed himself to be ignorant, this is not to be turned to his fault, as [though] to an unskilled [man], but is to be imputed to the words [themselves], now obsolete by too great age and antiquity. Just as no one will give it for a fault to the most illustrious orator Marcus Tullius [Cicero], that he confessed himself ignorant of many words antiquated by age, which were read in Varro and Cato: such as "nasciterna," "scutriscum," "urpex," "to make lessum," and other dictions of this kind — to which all those words are nothing dissimilar, whose signification Jerome did not deny that he knew not.

9. But to that [charge] in which they accuse [it], saying that our Vulgate edition — of whatsoever [authorship] it be — discrepates utterly from the Hebrew verity, we say that, although in the words it sometimes discords from the Hebrew, yet everywhere it concords in the truth of the sense, and in the unity of the sentence [meaning]. Nor is it a marvel if in the words it sometimes dissents from the Hebrew, since it (as has been said) was not purely and simply deduced from the Hebrew fount, but mixedly and confusedly taken from the two editions of Jerome — of which he himself translated the one from the Hebrew fount, the other from the Greek verity. Although neither in the words themselves would our edition, if it be diligently considered, [discrepate] from the He-

[1] recte 35

(printed p. 646 [PDF p. 681] — Heresy XIII (translations): the Dissolution continued — answer 9 (concl.): the Vulgate departs from the Hebrew only in a few ambiguous words, because the interpreters worked from unpointed codices where one spelling (e.g. שם, read five ways) admits many senses, from archaic names now obscure even to Hebrews, from near-identical points (Zere/Patach), and from letters easily confused (כל "all" vs בל "heart," Dan 6) — hence the "hard words" the heretics cite (habbedolach, alon, bemirma, chibrath, and Gen 6 "lo yadon") are not blunders but genuine ambiguities, and the Vulgate is right in sense though sometimes free in word; answer 10 begins: the New-Testament Latin — Jerome only corrected, not re-translated, it (his own testimony in De viris illustribus and the prefaces to Damasus and Eustochium), and though real faults remain (noted by Pagninus, Cajetan, Forerius, Oleaster) the Church has never lacked a true, whole New Testament, for nothing in it is heretical or hides the faith.)

9. [our edition, if diligently considered, would not] dissent from the Hebrew verity, except in certain dictions, in which the interpreters are necessarily compelled to vary from the exemplars, and to dissent somewhat among themselves — namely, when there occur to them certain ambiguous and uncertain words. But the Hebrew dictions are rendered uncertain to the interpreters for many causes. For sometimes the codices which the interpreters use in translating are destitute of vowel points: such as was the codex which Jerome used, and such as is now the volume of the law which the Jews commonly use in the synagogues. Since, therefore, the letters are not distinguished by their little marks [points], and there occur some dictions written with the same letters, then those [dictions] can be read and translated in many ways. As the word שם (Sem [shem]), written without the apices, the points being added, can be read שם (Scem) — and then it signifies "name"; or שם (Sciam [sham]) — and then it denotes "there," or "in that place"; or שם (sam) — which signifies "he set"; or שם (Scam) — which sounds [means] "desolate." But sometimes, as we have said, there occur certain very ancient names of places, animals, plants, and stones, the significations of which — even among the Hebrews themselves — have perished by the antiquity of the word and the long duration of time. Sometimes there occur dictions written with the same letters, and distinguished by almost similar points: as happens in these two words, שם (Sciam) and שם (Scem). In which, if those two points "Zere" (..), which are placed under one of those dictions, should — either by a slip of the pen, or by the carelessness of the writer — become a little nearer to one another, they will make the form of the point "Patach" (_), which was placed under the other diction; and thus a transition from one signification to another will come about. Sometimes also it happens that dictions are varied by the writers on account of the too great similitude of the letters among themselves: as if anyone, for כל (cal — "all"), which signifies "every [all]," should write בל (bal), which in the sixth chapter of Daniel signifies "heart." Since, therefore, by these and other such causes it often happens that the interpreters are impeded, they are not to be damned if sometimes, in a few places, they fall short of the truth of the Hebrew reading. Such certainly are those [places] which these sharp-nosed [captious] heretics object to our interpreter: as הבדלח (habbedolach), which — on the testimony of Josephus, Jerome, and R. Kimchi — signifies both "bdellium" and a stone of sufferings [a gem], a union [pearl], onyx, crystal, and carbuncle; and אלון (alon), which can be translated not only for "valley" and "plain," but also for "oak," as Augustine, bishop of Chisamus, noted; and במרמה (bemirma), which signifies "WITH GUILE (Cum dolo)" and "with prudence"; and for "Chibrath," which, according to the Septuagint, signifies "a place," and, according to Jerome, "the vernal time [spring]," and, according to David Kimchi, "a certain measure of a journey"; and that [word] likewise which is read in Genesis 6: לא ידון (Lo Iadon), which signifies both "to judge," and "to remain," and, as it were, "to sit as a judge." Whence also the Seventy — whom our interpreter followed — rightly translated οὐ μὴ καταμείνῃ (ou me katameine), "IT SHALL NOT REMAIN (Non permanebit)": so that the sense is, "My spirit shall not remain, or sit as judge, in man" — which is the same as if you should say, "My spirit shall not judge in man." From which it clearly appears that our edition rarely discrepates from the Hebrew verity in the words, and never in the sentence [meaning].

10. But concerning both Latin editions of the New Testament — and first concerning the new one — we do not much care whether it be of the divine Jerome or not, since that cannot be known clearly enough from his writings; and it rather appears that he emended that old edition of the New Testament, than that he published a new edition into a wholly new Testament. Because he himself, in the catalogue of Illustrious Men, writes that he restored [gave back] the New Testament to the Greek fidelity [verity], but translated the Old according to the Hebrew verity. Which words indeed indicate that he himself set a distinction between "translating according to the Hebrew fidelity," and "rendering to the Greek fidelity"; and that by these [words] he signified that he did not translate the New Testament from the Greek, but only corrected [it]. Which he also intimates in the preface of the Gospels to Damasus, saying: "THEREFORE (Igitur), this present little preface promises the four Gospels — a collation of Greek codices, but of old ones, being emended; nor, in those [places] which did not much discrepate from the custom of the Latin reading, have we so tempered the pen [as to change all]; but, those only being corrected which seemed to change the sense, we have suffered the rest to remain as they were." And in the preface of the seven canonical [epistles], to Eustochium: "THE EVANGELISTS (Evangelistas)," he says, "we lately corrected to the line of the Greek verity." From which it appears that Jerome rather emended the New Testament, previously turned by others, than that he again turned it from the Greek into Latin. And it is likely that this our edition is that which Jerome emended. But concerning the errors which Jerome noted in the old translation, and which more recent [scholars] have likewise noted in this new edition, we too ingenuously confess that many errors were emended by Jerome in the old translation; and that likewise, in this our new edition, there are found some blemishes, solecisms, barbarisms, hyperbata, and many [things] turned little aptly, and less Latinly expressed, obscurely and ambiguously interpreted; and likewise some [things] super-added, some omitted, certain [things] transposed, changed, and depraved by the fault of the scribes — which Sanctes Pagninus, Thomas Cajetan, Franciscus Forerius, and Jerome Oleaster (men most learned, of the Dominican Order) have indicated in their interpretations and explanations. Nevertheless, it does not follow from these [things] that the Church, even to this day, has not had a true, sincere, whole, and faithful edition of the New Testament: because, although errors of this kind are found in it, it is nevertheless certain that neither in the old, nor in the new, edition was anything ever found which

---

(printed p. 647 [PDF p. 682] — Heresy XIII (translations): the Dissolution concluded — answer 10 (concl.): the Fathers left the New Testament's minor faults uncorrected on just grounds (no danger to faith or morals; not to unsettle the faithful accustomed from infancy to the old edition; to honor the ancient interpreter's holy simplicity and follow their forebears, who — like the apostles with the imperfect Septuagint — did not despise it but preached it and built the foundations of the faith on it); therefore it is rash and heretical to spurn the Vulgate for its light defects and bring in the heretics' profane versions, especially after the Council of Trent's decree declaring the old Vulgate authentic and forbidding its rejection. Sixtus's closing apology for prolixity. Book VIII — and the main body of the Bibliotheca Sancta — ends here.)

10. [It does not follow that the Church has had no true New-Testament edition — nor is it] because so many most learned and most holy [doctors of the] Church either did not recognize those errors, or approved them, but because they saw themselves impelled, by just causes, to dissimulate [overlook] them. First, because they had noticed that no peril in faith and morals threatened from these so light errors. Then, lest the faithful should be offended by the importunate and too-exact novelty of correction — [the faithful] whose ears, even from infancy, that old edition had occupied [filled]. Lastly, that they might venerate that ancient edition, which had educated [nourished] the faith of the nascent Church, and had strengthened and exalted [the faith] of the growing [Church]; and that they might honor, by their own approbation, that holy and venerable simplicity of the ancient interpreter — who sought not the ornament of speech, but the truth of the history; and might follow the footsteps of their elders [ancestors], who, led by a certain sacred piety, tolerated those same errors, by the example of the holy apostles — who, although they knew that the edition of the Septuagint interpreters was redundant in many [places], and deficient in many, nevertheless did not contemn it, but everywhere preached it, and from it laid the first foundations of our faith. It is therefore rash — nay, plainly heretical — on account of certain light defects which are found in our Vulgate edition (without any detriment of faith and morals), to spurn it and cast it away, and to introduce in its place new and profane translations of the heretics: especially after the decree of the Ecumenical Council of Trent, whose words, approving the Vulgate edition, thus stand: "The Most Holy Synod (Sacrosancta Synodus), considering that no little utility can accrue to the Church of God, if it be made known which — out of all the Latin editions of the sacred books which are in circulation — is to be held for authentic: establishes and declares, that this very old and Vulgate edition, which by the long use of so many ages has been approved in the Church itself, be held for authentic in public readings, disputations, and expositions; and that no one dare, or presume, to reject it under any pretext whatsoever." And let these [things] concerning the translations of the divine scripture have been said — more prolixly, perhaps, than was fitting.

The End of the Eighth and last book of this [work]. (Octavi & ultimi huius libri Finis.)

(PDF p. 732 — the theologians' approbation [imprimatur] of the whole work. The in-book indexes that follow the text of Book VIII — PDF 683–731 — were passed over as out of scope; this leaf, a single full-width block bearing no running-head folio number, is the closing endorsement of the entire eight-book Bibliotheca Sancta, here appended as the final page of Book VIII.)

The written attestation [Syngrapha] of the theologians whom — according to the pious ordinances of the Order of Preachers — the Reverend Father John Mary of Lignasco [Lignascensis], Provincial, superior [Antistes] of both Lombardies, chose for the examination [recognition] of this work.

HAVING BEEN ordered (Libros… iussi) by our Reverend Father Provincial of both Lombardies, Father Friar John Mary of Lignasco, of the Order of Preachers, to examine the eight books of the Bibliotheca Sancta of the Reverend Father Friar Sixtus of Siena, of the Order of Preachers, a most excellent preacher — so that they might, as soon as possible, be sent forth into the light [published] — we took care to accomplish this not undiligently [i.e. with all diligence]. Those [books], therefore, having been read through by us, we give assurance [certify] that nothing is asserted in them by the author himself — so far as we ourselves are able to judge — which is adverse to good morals, or to the catholic doctrine of the sacrosanct Roman Church. For the rest, we judge that the labors of so learned a father, so great [as they are], if they be publicly printed, will be exceedingly welcome, and useful, to pious and learned men.

At Genoa, the 29th day of January, 1566.

Brother Stephen of Finario [Finale], lecturer in Theology, by his own hand.

Brother Paul of Ferraria [Ferrara], of the Order of Preachers, lecturer in Theology.

Brother Jerome of Genoa, Inquisitor of all Liguria, as he affirms above, by his own hand.